When visiting these homes for wildlife, be on the lookout for a brown and white binoculars sign (see above). This sign represents a partnership of Federal and State agencies and private conservation organizations who are promoting "Watchable Wildlife" opportunities to help you enjoy your public lands and learn about the value of America's wildlife and their special places.

Alaska's refuges encompass millions of acres of mountains, tundras, grasslands, lakes, rivers, woodlands, glaciers, and islands. Over 12 million ducks, geese, and swans exodus from Alaska each fall to winter in the lower 48 states. Another 40 million seabirds breed on refuge islands near Alaska's coastline. Hundreds of thousands of caribou annually wind their way through the vast horizons of Arctic tundra.

National Wildlife

A Great Idea, Getting Better The first national wildlife refuge, Florida's Pelican Island, was established by President Theodore Roosevelt in 1903 to protect egrets, herons, and other birds that were being killed for feathers used in the fashions of the time.

Periodic burning, grazing, or harvesting of grasslands or marshes stimulates growth of new plants for food and cover. Sandhill cranes, elk, and the endangered Attwater prairie chicken are a few of the species which benefit from such techniques. In the prairie pothole region and others, thousands of acres are planted in native grasses as nesting cover for waterfowl.

Through cooperative efforts of Federal and Stat. agencies, private organizations and individuals, the Refuge System is a model of stewardship by the American people to conserve their precious natural resources.
