RE: Interagency Proposal for Model Privacy Form; 72 Federal Register 14940, March 29, 2007

Dear Sir or Madam:

The Financial Services Roundtable and BITS appreciate the opportunity to comment on the proposed model privacy form. The Financial Services Roundtable represents 100 of the nation's largest integrated financial services companies. Roundtable members provide banking, insurance, investment products and services to American consumers and businesses. Roundtable member companies manage over $18.3 trillion in assets, have revenues in excess of $670 billion, and employ over 2.1 million individuals. BITS is an affiliate of the Roundtable that serves as a forum for the financial services industry on e-commerce, risk management, payments and technology issues.

General Comments

Members of the Roundtable have been long-standing proponents of simplified privacy notices. In 2001, shortly after the current privacy notice requirements became effective, Roundtable members presented a series of recommendations on short-form privacy notices at a workshop sponsored by the Federal Trade Commission.¹ Subsequently, the Roundtable urged Congress to simplify privacy notices, initially as part of the renewal of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, and more recently as part of regulatory relief legislation.

Our support for simplified, short-form notices has been based upon extensive market research on short-form notices by Roundtable member companies. Appendix A includes several versions of short-form privacy notices developed by our "Short-Form Notice Working Group." Many Roundtable member companies currently use these forms, or variations of them, in conjunction with more detailed forms that are available upon a customer's request. Our member companies also regularly solicit feedback from customers and refine their privacy notices based upon that feedback.

Given this background, we obviously were pleased that Congress provided for the development of a model privacy form in Section 728 of the Financial Services Regulatory Relief Act of 2006. We also appreciate the significant amount of time and effort your agencies have devoted to this matter, even before the passage of that Act.

It is clear that Congress, your agencies, the financial services industry and consumers share a common goal — the creation of a simple, consumer-friendly privacy notice. The model form proposed by your agencies in response to Section 728 of the Financial Services Regulatory Relief Act of 2006 is a step toward the realization of this goal.

However, we are concerned that, in its proposed form, few, if any members of the Roundtable will use the model. The prescriptive nature of the proposed model form will make it impossible for most institutions to explain their privacy policies and practices fully and accurately. Inconsistencies between the proposed model form and the terms of the Fair Credit Reporting Act will confuse and mislead customers. The lack of uniform requirements by different regulators will prevent affiliates in a diversified company from using the same form. The proposed size of the model form will require a new, separate mailing to customers, which will impose significant compliance costs for individual institutions, and the industry as a whole.

¹ Industry recommendations on short-form privacy notices were presented during the Federal Trade Commission's Industry Workshop on "Effective Financial Privacy Notices" on December 4, 2001.

Greater flexibility in content requirements is needed to better meet the variety of industry privacy policies and practices, and to help financial services firms comply with applicable state privacy laws. A less prescriptive format is needed to lower compliance costs for financial services firms. Uniform requirements among federal regulatory agencies are needed to enable diversified financial services firms to use just one form for all customers. Accommodating these concerns would greatly enhance the utility of the model form.

We respectfully recommend that the agencies reissue the proposed model form for a second round of comments, after the form has been revised to take into account issues raised in this comment period and the results of additional testing.

Furthermore, we recommend that the proposed model form be a compliance alternative for financial services firms, not a substitute for the model clauses contained in the existing regulation. This would permit individual financial services firms to determine the most appropriate means to comply with the privacy notice requirements of federal and state law.

Our detailed comments on the format and content of the proposed model form follow.

Format of the Proposed Model Form

Cost Impact of Paper Size

The format of the proposed model form is significantly different than the format currently used by most Roundtable members. Most Roundtable members send privacy notices as inserts in monthly statements, such as credit card statements. Typically, these inserts are printed on paper that is less than full-size (i.e., less than 8.5 x 11 inches), are printed on both sides of a single page, and are included in monthly statements that are smaller than 8.5 x 11 inches. In contrast, the proposal calls for the privacy notice to be printed on full-size (8.5x11 inch) paper, with printing on only one side of the paper. Thus, the size requirement effectively will force institutions to send the form in a separate mailing, not as part of a monthly statement.

Monthly statements have proven to be the most effective delivery mechanism for privacy notices, and customers have become familiar with this format. Sending the notices in a separate mailing may inadvertently cause customers to ignore the notices. Also, while the proposal suggests that the notice can be satisfied with two pages of paper, many Roundtable members share information in a manner that would require the use of a third page to explain a consumer's right to opt-out of information sharing.

A separate, three-page mailing to customers would impose millions of dollars in production and postage costs on individual Roundtable member companies. One Roundtable firm has estimated that its total costs per customer to deliver the proposed model form would increase from $0.06 to $0.44, an increase of nearly 600 percent. Currently, that firm spends approximately $900,000 per year to deliver privacy notices. The company estimates that the costs to print and mail the proposed notice would be in excess of $6 million. Another Roundtable member estimates that a separate mailing to its 4 million customers would increase its costs by more than $2 million annually. When we extrapolate these costs to the entire financial services industry, we conclude that the overall cost to the industry to provide the proposed model form could easily approach $400 million.²

We appreciate that the proposed model form was well-received in consumer tests. However, the potential benefits of the proposed model form are so overwhelmed by its cost that most firms will find it difficult, if not impossible, to justify the use of the form. We strongly urge you to test alternative formats that would be less costly.

Type Size/Font/Color/Logo

We do not believe that these requirements are necessary. Other clear and conspicuous disclosure requirements do not include such standards. In fact, when Regulation Z was modified in 1980, type size and font requirements were eliminated. We do support the limited use of color and corporate logos. Many Roundtable member companies are associated with particular colors and corporate logos. The use of colors and logos on the form will help consumer's identify the source of the form, and help to maximize our firms' accountability in the minds of our customers.

Content of the Proposed Model Form

Inclusion of Certain Supplemental Information

The proposed model form is more limited in scope than the notices currently used by many Roundtable member companies. While the scope of the form is consistent with the goal of creating a simple notice, flexibility in the content would allow firms to accurately describe their actual practices and thereby enhance the utility of the form for firms and consumers. "Yes" and "no" boxes simply are not sufficient to accurately describe the privacy policies and practices of most Roundtable member companies. Additional information is needed to provide consumers with a meaningful disclosure. Also, we are concerned about the risks that may arise under state unfair and deceptive practice laws if the form does not describe an institution's privacy policies and practices fully and accurately.

We recommend that individual financial services firms be permitted to add certain types of supplemental information to the form to make the disclosure more meaningful and complete. Specifically, we recommend that institutions be able to include information that (i) is related to a customer's privacy rights other than those established in the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act ("GLBA") or the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"); (ii) accurately explains privacy practices; and/or (iii) satisfies applicable state law requirements.

² Roundtable members have calculated that it will cost approximately $0.38 to mail each notice. Assuming that over one billion notices would be mailed, the total cost to the financial services industry would be approximate $400 million.

Information related to a customer's privacy rights beyond GLBA or FCRA could include information about applicable state or federal do-not-call requirements, or information on how to prevent or respond to identity theft. Many institutions currently include such information in their notices. Typically, such information is extremely well received, and appreciated, by consumers.

Information related to privacy practices could include information such as applying a customer's opt-out election to both affiliate sharing and affiliate marketing activities, the application of an opt-out for a period greater than five years, or the application of an opt-out to closed accounts. The inclusion of such information will permit institutions to disclose their privacy policies and practices more fully and accurately.

Finally, firms should be able to include information required under state laws. This is particularly important for insurance firms. Insurers are subject primarily to state law, and in order for them to use the model, it is imperative that they be able to address various state requirements. For example, many state insurance authorities require privacy notices for insurance companies to include information on the collection and use of medical information. Without the ability to provide information about state law, insurers will find it impossible to use this form and to comply with state law. It also is important for all financial institutions to be able to include information about other state laws, such as the Vermont and California laws. Otherwise, consumers will not be able to receive all applicable privacy related information in a single notice.

Expanding the notice to permit institutions to include such supplemental information will make the notice more accurate, useful, and less confusing to consumers, but should not detract materially from the goal of a simple, more uniform notice.

Joint Use of Proposed Model Form

The instructions to the proposed model form indicate that it is intended for use by individual companies or groups of affiliated companies. However, the prescriptive nature of the form does not allow a company to clearly identify affiliates. More specifically, it is not clear if the definition of affiliate on page two is intended to be a general definition of the term affiliate, or a list of the affiliated companies that are providing the form. Furthermore, if that box is intended to identify all of the companies that are providing the form, it may not be large enough for many Roundtable member companies. Roundtable member companies are among the nation's largest, most diverse financial services firms. As such, they typically have multiple affiliates, many more than may be listed in the space provided. We urge the agencies to clarify how a group of companies should be identified on the form when the form is intended to apply to such a group.

FCRA

The box in the table on page one and the optional check box on page three related to the sharing of information between affiliates for marketing purposes do not match the requirements of FCRA. Section 624 of FCRA does not limit the sharing of information among affiliates, only the use of such information for marketing purposes. Additionally, those sections of the model form do not acknowledge the various exceptions to Section 624, such as pre-existing business relationships. We recommend that the form be revised to conform to the requirements of FCRA. Otherwise, the form could mislead and confuse consumers. Additionally, the utility of the form will be enhanced if institutions can use it to disclose both GLBA and FCRA privacy policies and practices.

30-Day Waiting Period

Page three of the form refers to a 30-day waiting period after which an institution may begin sharing information. No such waiting period is required in FCRA or GLBA. We recommend that this sentence be eliminated.

Check Box

The check box on page three is based upon a mail-in response by a customer. Some Roundtable member companies do not offer a mail-in option, but permit customers to communicate opt-out choices over the telephone or on-line. We recommend that the form permit institutions to acknowledge response options, and that the heading on the check box be labeled “Your Choices” rather than “Check Your Choices.”

Other Matters

Sample Clauses

We strongly recommend that the existing sample clauses not be replaced with the proposed model form. We make this recommendation for several reasons. First, retaining the existing clauses is consistent with Section 728 of the Financial Services Regulatory Relief Act of 2006, upon which the model is based. When Section 728 was crafted, Congress was well aware of the existing sample clauses, and did not require that the model be a replacement for them. Instead, Section 728 expressly states that the model form is to be an “option” for financial services firms. Thus, the model should be a supplementary means to meet privacy notice requirements, not a substitute for existing compliance forms.

Second, many firms, including some Roundtable member companies, have invested significant resources into their current privacy notices, and would prefer to use those forms, regardless of the safe harbor protections provided by the model form. Those firms should be able to continue to select the most appropriate means to comply with the notice requirements.

Uniformity in Forms

The model form proposed by the Securities and Exchange Commission (“SEC”) is slightly different from the form proposed by the other federal agencies. In the form proposed by the SEC, the language in the “What” box on page one, and in the third box of “sharing practices” on page two, is somewhat different than the other agency proposals. While the differences are relatively minor, they make it impossible for diversified firms to use a single form for all customers. We recommend that the basic requirements in the forms be harmonized, so that the form may be used by diversified firms. Alternatively, institutions that are part of diversified firms should be able to rely upon the SEC model or a model proposed by another relevant agency.

Web-based Designs

The Roundtable does not believe your agencies need to develop an on-line form or prescribe a specific on-line presentation for the proposed short-form notice. Most Roundtable member companies present the GLBA notice along with other information outside the scope of GLBA. We see no need to alter these presentations.

Customer Identification

Page three of the form proposes to use account numbers to identify customers. This approach would be appropriate if privacy preferences were maintained at the account level. However, most Roundtable member companies maintain privacy preferences at the customer level. Thus, we recommend that institutions be permitted to determine the most appropriate identifier, including Social Security numbers.

Conclusion

Without exception, Roundtable members support the objectives of the proposed form. It is critical that consumers receive clear and concise information about how we protect and use information. However, we have substantial concerns with the form as proposed. The prescriptive nature of the proposed form will make it impossible for most institutions to explain their privacy policies and practices fully and accurately. Inconsistencies between the proposed form and the terms of the Fair Credit Reporting Act will confuse and mislead customers. The lack of uniform requirements by different regulators will prevent affiliates in a diversified company from using the same form. The paper size requirements will require a new, separate mailing to customers, and this will impose significant compliance costs for individual institutions, and the industry as a whole. Unless these concerns are addressed, few, if any, members of the Roundtable will use the form.

Greater flexibility in content requirements is needed to better meet the variety of industry privacy policies and practices, and to help financial services firms comply with applicable state laws. A less prescriptive format is needed to lower compliance costs for financial services firms. Uniform requirements among federal regulatory agencies are needed to enable diversified financial services firms to use just one form for all customers. Additionally, the proposed model should be a compliance alternative for financial services firms, not a substitute for the model clauses contained in the existing regulation.

We respectfully recommend that the agencies reissue the proposed form for a second round of comments after the form has been revised to take into account issues raised in this comment period and the results of further testing. We also recommend that the proposed model be a compliance alternative for financial services firms, not a substitute for the model clauses contained in the existing regulation.

Sincerely,

Leigh Williams
