Introduction to the index

This report and accompanying maps and table present information on the Defense Minerals Administration (DMA), Defense Minerals Exploration Administration (DMEA), and Office of Minerals Exploration (OME), mineral exploration programs in the United States. Under these programs, the federal government participated in the exploration costs for certain strategic and critical minerals. Federal funds for mineral exploration under the programs were available from 1950 to 1974, although limited funds for OME administrative work were continued until 1979. Contracts that were granted with these agencies provided financial assistance for exploration on a joint-participation basis. Applications are documented in over 5,000 property files (called "dockets") generated by the DMA-DMEA-OME exploration-assistance programs. Not all applications were awarded contracts. This report reviews the three programs, associated regulations, administrative procedures, and operational techniques. It also describes the various types of informative reports generated by the programs, lists mining properties in the U.S. that were involved in the exploration programs, advises on location of compiled exploration information that resulted from the work, and describes the process for accessing the information.

Using the index

To find a property/docket in the index start at the US map page. Select a state code, within a state boundary, on the map. An image of the selected state will appear, showing color-coded county boundaries. The graduated colors represent the number of dockets per county as the value (see legend on each state map page). Select a county name from the adjacent list to view all dockets within that state/county. The table \(DMEA Data Base\) lists all dockets, sorted by state, county, and site name.

Four previously published reports by Kiilsgaard (1996, 1997, 1998a,b) were produced for Montana, Idaho, Washington, and Oregon are available on-line as pdf files (state maps are not available in digital format).

Docket contents

The first item in most dockets is the property owner's program application, which would contain information concerning the property's location, commodity to be pursued, and funds requested. This may be followed by a site evaluation and recommendation. Additional reports might detail the status of the application, specifics of any financial contract awarded, results of exploration, production summaries, payback schedules, interim evaluations, and contract-completion data. The dockets reflect program activities carried out in 43 States; only Delaware, Indiana, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, Rhode Island and District of Columbia are not represented.

Docket access

Until 1996, dockets were stored at several locations throughout the United States. In the spring of that year, they were consolidated into the DMA/DMEA/OME Archive, located in the USGS Spokane Field Office. The integrated collection occupies approximately 480 cubic feet and has been indexed in a Microsoft Access database. Interested parties may access dockets at the Spokane office or make arrangements to have them copied, at requestor expense, for offsite inspection. No original materials may be removed from the Archive.

Property Files from Federal Government Exploration-Assistance Programs (1950–74)

Historical Information about the Programs

In 1950, Congress enacted the Defense Production Act, which authorized the President to make provision for the encouragement of exploration, development, and mining of critical and strategic minerals, metals, and materials. The President delegated his authority to the Department of the Interior, among other agencies, and the Secretary of the Interior established the Defense Minerals Administration (DMA). One of the purposes of the DMA was to provide Government support for exploration of unknown or undeveloped mineral deposits. To this end, the DMA established a program that would provide funds for projects that sought or developed sources of strategic or critical metals and minerals. When the DMA was terminated in November 1951, the Department of the Interior formed the Defense Minerals Exploration Administration (DMEA) and continued the program until June 1958. In August of that year, Congress enacted a law that authorized the Secretary of the Interior to provide financial assistance, which would promote exploration for domestic mineral reserves, and the Secretary formed the Office of Minerals Exploration (OME). In 1965, OME was transferred to the United States Geological Survey (USGS), where it remained until Congress terminated funding in 1974.

Defense Production Act (Public Law 774)

The Defense Production Act of 1950 (Public Law 774, 81st Congress) provided financial assistance to private enterprise for the production of goods and services necessary for national security. Title III, Section 302 of the Defense Production Act, provided for encouragement of exploration, development, and mining of critical and strategic metals and minerals. Under provisions of the Act, the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, established the Defense Minerals Administration, within the department, by a Secretarial Order dated December 4, 1950. Along with other duties, the Defense Minerals Administration was to serve as a direct contracting agency for minerals exploration.

Defense Minerals Administration (DMA)

The DMA program was administered at national headquarters, Department of the Interior building, Washington DC. It was administered by a small group of senior mining engineers and geologists recruited from the minerals industry who had an experience in mineral exploration and mine development.

This group developed guidelines, forms, and operational procedures for the DMA minerals exploration program. They prepared pamphlets that described the DMA program, identified minerals classified as strategic and critical, and advised on the percentages of exploration costs the government would pay on exploration for the minerals. They developed application forms for use in seeking federal financial assistance, and contract forms for those cases where an application was approved and a mineral exploration contract was negotiated between the applicant and the federal government.

DMA officials relied on field teams composed of U.S. Geological Survey (USGS) geologists and U.S. Bureau of Mines (USBM) engineers for all fieldwork. The United States was divided into regions, with different USGS-USBM field teams responsible for field investigations in the different regions. Regional headquarters for field team work in Montana, Idaho, Oregon, and Washington was the U.S. Geological Survey field office in Spokane, Washington, where all dockets now reside.

The initial step for an applicant seeking Federal financial aid in mineral exploration was submittal of an application. The application required description of the real property to be involved, and of the proposed exploration work. Description of geologic features of the property to be explored was also required, along with an explanation of the strategic mineral or minerals being sought, and reasons for expecting the proposed work to result in a significant discovery. Maps or illustrations of the prospective property that showed location of the proposed work, proposed work with respect to property boundaries, and existing mine workings, if any, were also required. Many applications contained supporting geologic or engineering reports. These reports commonly contained maps or illustrations that showed grades and thickness of known parts of the deposit, and other descriptive information. Upon receipt of an application, DMA officials would request that the appropriate USGS-USBM field team make a field examination of the proposed exploration site, and that a report covering the field examination be submitted to DMA headquarters. If the application examination report indicated that proposed exploratory work might result in a significant discovery, and if ownership or title to the prospective property was clear, DMA usually entered into an exploration contract with the applicant, who, thereafter, was identified as the contract operator. The exploration contract specified the work to be done, determined the time frame in which the work was to be done, estimated the total exploration costs of the project, determined the amount of estimated costs to be paid by the government, and included other pertinent data.

The exploration contract obligated the contract operator to certain responsibilities. These included submittal of monthly progress reports, which were used by the government to justify payment of the government's share of exploration costs for work completed during the reporting period. A final report was required upon completion of the exploration project. This report was supposed to cover all aspects of the exploration project, including accomplishments, costs, and findings. Should ore be mined and sold from the obligated property during the time the exploration contract was in force, the contract operator was obligated to repay the government for its share of the exploration costs at a fixed percentage of funds derived from the sale of the ore. In the event a significant discovery was made, or the government decided the exploration project had been successful, the government issued a Certificate of Possible Production to the contract operator, under which a specified royalty was to be paid to the government on mineral production from the obligated property. The obligated royalty rate varied according to terms of the Certificate of Possible Production but commonly was 5 percent of the net smelter returns on processed ore, and was for a specified period of time, commonly for 10 years from the date of the contract, or until the government's share of exploration costs had been repaid, whichever occurred first. If no discovery was made, repayment was not required and the contract operator was notified that the government had no lien on the obligated property. The contract operator was not obligated to mine any ore found by contract work, nor was the government obligated to purchase any mineral material found by contract work.

DMA was a short-lived program that was terminated on November 20, 1951.

Defense Minerals Exploration Administration (DMEA)

The previously described DMA program was concerned with various administrative aspects rather than mineral exploration. These other aspects included, serving as a claimant agency for materials and facilities, as an advisory agency responsible for a minerals' supply expansion program, and as an allocation program for ores and concentrates in short supply. These various aspects, other than mineral exploration, were transferred to the Defense Materials Procurement Agency (DMPA), General Services Administration, on November 20, 1951. As a means of continuing the mineral exploration program started under DMA, the Secretary of the Department of the Interior established the DMEA program within the department, effective November 20, 1951.

The DMEA program was confined to exploration for critical and strategic minerals and was administrated by the same personnel who had formerly administered the DMA program. It operated from the same national headquarters site. Under the DMEA program, DMEA officials were responsible for processing all exploration applications received under the DMA program and for administrative work involved in completion of exploration contracts started under the DMA program. Some DMA exploration contracts were revised and subsequently executed as DMEA contracts. DMEA also issued Certificates of Possible Production to DMA contracts, if in the opinion of the government, mine production of ore was likely to result from a successful exploration project. In rare instances the government issued a royalty obligation to an exploration contract operator that was similar to a Certificate of Possible Production. Such a royalty obligation was issued to ensure repayment of the government's share of exploration costs, in an instance where exploration work gave good indications of a possible mineral discovery, that would benefit the obligated property, but where the contract operator short of completion of work terminated the scheduled exploration specified in the contract. The DMEA program utilized the same USGS-USBM field team arrangement, and operated more or less under the same regulations, practices, and procedures established by DMA. It was a much more extensive program than DMA and continued until 1958, when it was terminated.

Mineral Exploration (Public Law 85-701)

Government-supported mineral exploration under the Defense Production Act of 1950 was not considered justifiable in 1958, as defense needs of mineral supplies were considered to have been met. However there continued to be a need for mineral raw materials to meet an expanding national economy. To meet this need, Congress, on August 21, 1958, enacted Public Law 85-701, under which governmental financial assistance, on a participating basis, was available to private industry for stimulation of exploration for such raw materials as might be designated by the Secretary of the Department of the Interior. Under this law, the Secretary of the Department of the Interior established the Office of Minerals Exploration program on September 11, 1958.

Office of Minerals Exploration (OME) program

The OME program was similar to the previous DMA and DMEA programs but more restrictive. It was operated under the same Department of the Interior administrative offices and utilized the same USGS-USBM field team arrangement, as had the previous DMA and DMEA programs. It adhered, more or less, to practices, regulations and procedures that had been established under the two preceding programs. One change in the OME program was allowance of participating funds for the exploration of certain minerals and metals, including gold and silver, which had not been eligible under the two previous programs. Funds for the government-supported mineral exploration program came from annual appropriations to the Department of the Interior.

To economize on costs, all administrative and operating responsibilities of the OME program were transferred to the USGS in 1965. Thereafter, USGS personnel performed all field functions previously handled by the USGS-USBM field team. Funds allocated to the USGS for participation in OME mineral exploration projects were terminated in 1974, although limited administrative funds continued to be received by the USGS until 1979. These administrative funds covered costs of such work as closing out existing exploration contracts, preparation of final reports on completed contracts, and continued review, and audit of royalty funds received from the sale of ore mined from deposits that had been discovered by the government-supported exploration projects, and subsequently covered by a Certificate of Possible Production, or which, by contract amendment, were obligated to royalty payment. A change in regulations concerning acquisition of federal assistance in financing exploration for mineral reserves in the United States, its territories became effective on January 19, 1993 (Federal Register, vol. 57, no. 243, December 17, 1992). The change in regulations terminated the OME program.

Filing practices for DMA, DMEA, and OME data

Applications for financial assistance in mineral exploration were sent either directly to national headquarters, Department of the Interior, Washington DC, or to a USGS-USBM field team headquarters of the region in which the property to be explored was located. Applications received at a field team headquarters were forwarded to the national headquarters in Washington DC. At national headquarters, applications were filed under individual docket numbers. These docket numbers subsequently were used by both national headquarters and the field team as a means of cataloguing and identifying correspondence and documents related to the particular application or to a resulting exploration contract.

The national headquarters file, in effect, became the master file for all compiled information resulting from the application. Copies of compiled information on applications and on exploration contracts that resulted from the applications also commonly were filed at the field team headquarters office in the region where the concerned properties were located. For applications that concerned properties in Washington, the field team regional headquarters was at the USGS field office in Spokane, Washington (where all dockets now reside).

After 1965, when OME activities were consolidated under the USGS, OME applications were sent either to the OME office of the USGS in Washington DC, or to field offices of the USGS in Knoxville, Tennessee; Denver, Colorado; Menlo Park, California; or Spokane, Washington; depending on the location of the applicant's property.

Information compiled under the DMA, DMEA, or OME programs

The DMA, DMEA, and OME programs generated a variety of technical information. Property and proposed work descriptions together with geologic and analytical information on the target to be explored were submitted with the initial application. Such information commonly was accompanied by unpublished data, supporting technical reports, or production records on the property. Operators of active exploration contracts were obligated by contract terms to submit monthly progress reports that described work that had been completed. Exploration contracts also obligated contract operators to submit final reports on completed projects. These final reports described exploration work that was done, costs, problems, and findings. The USGS-USBM Field Team wrote application reports that covered initial field investigation of the proposed exploration project, interim reports that covered field investigations of active exploration projects, and final reports that covered accomplishments and findings of completed contracts. After administrative responsibilities for the OME program were transmitted to the USGS in 1965, the USGS personnel wrote all reports formerly written by the USGS-USBM Field Team.

Field team application report

Once received at national headquarters, (Department of the Interior, Washington DC) applications for financial assistance, were transmitted to the appropriate regional office, with the request that a field team examination be made of the applicant's property and proposed exploration project, and that an application report on the examination be prepared and submitted to the national headquarters office. The field team application report investigated all factors concerned with the applicant's proposal. Principal attention was given to the geology of the exploration target and to whether the proposed work had a reasonable chance of resulting in a significant discovery. The applicant's maps of the proposed project site, illustrative material, and reports were examined. If the maps were found to be inadequate, the field team prepared maps or other illustrative material. Samples of mineralized structures were taken and assayed to check sample values reported by the applicant. The location of proposed work (with respect to existing mine workings and to mining claim or property boundaries) was examined as were documents pertaining to the applicants' rights to the prospective property. The estimated costs, time schedule of proposed work, equipment to be used, and operating experience of the applicant or the applicant's supervisor were considered. The proposed work was carefully studied to see if it presented the most logical way for exploring the mineralized target. Modifications of the proposed work often were discussed with the applicant and commonly were adopted.

The field team application report, in effect, evaluated the applicant's proposal and the geologic probability of the proposed work resulting in a significant discovery. It provided a basis for the national headquarters decision on whether to approve or deny an application. For applications that subsequently were denied, the application report commonly represented the best-documented source of geologic information on the concerned property.

Exploration contract

An approved application usually resulted in an exploration contract between the federal government and the applicant. The contract was designed to do the work proposed in the application, or that of a modified exploration plan approved jointly by the applicant and the government. Under the contract, the government agreed to participate in the costs of completed work on a prorated basis and for a fixed amount. The percentage of exploration costs to be paid for by the government depended on the principal metal to be explored. As an example, the government paid 90 percent of the exploration costs for a uranium deposit but only 50 percent of the costs for a copper deposit. The contract obligated the contract operator to prepare and submit certain reports. The field team also prepared reports that dealt with the exploratory work done by the contract operator.

Exploration contract operator's reports

Monthly progress report: An exploration contract obligated the contract operator to submit a monthly progress report that described exploration work accomplished and costs that had been incurred during the reporting period. Payment to the operator, for the government's share of exploration costs incurred during the reporting period, was based on the monthly progress reports, which were usually brief. Occasionally, the operator would request an amendment to the contract and would use the monthly progress report to justify the request. For example, the exploration work might have uncovered evidence that indicated proposed work in the target area should be changed, in which case the contract operator would use the monthly progress report, along with accompanying maps or geologic illustrations, to justify a requested contract amendment. In such instances, the monthly progress report might constitute the only documented information for an amended change in the exploration project.

Final report

An exploration contract stipulated that the contract operator submit a final report upon completion of contract work. This report reviewed exploration accomplishments, problems encountered, findings, and costs. It usually contained maps and geologic sketches to illustrate what had been done and found. In instances where a significant mineral discovery was made, the report commonly presented estimates of the tonnage and grade of ore reserves found. Final reports on unsuccessful contracts usually were brief and non informative.

Field Team reports

Interim report: Interim reports by the USGS-USBM Field Team, and after 1965, by the USGS, were based on routine field investigations of a property being explored under an exploration contract. The principal purpose of these investigations was to ensure that exploration work was being done in compliance to contract specifications. Some interim reports, particularly those that described amended changes in contract specifications, often contained assay information and sketches of the geologic findings.

Final report: A final report described and summarized accomplishments of the exploration contract. The report reviewed the geologic setting of the deposit, geologic structures that controlled the ore body, the mineralogy, and alteration features of the deposit or associated wallrock. It presented information on tonnage and grade of discovered ore reserves, using the contract operator's data, where acceptable, otherwise it presented field team calculations, based on contract findings. Final reports included maps, sample and assay data, and other supporting information. The final report discussed geologic guides to ore (where they had been determined). They also described additional targets that warranted exploration, should the exploration work have identified such targets. Maps showing location of the completed work with respect to property boundaries were included. The report included a description of completed work, summary of costs, and an evaluation of the project. It recommended a Certification of Possible Production when appropriate, or noted the existence of an already declared royalty obligation, should one have been declared previously. Also discussed was whether the government should participate in the funding of further exploration work at the property. The field team final report was comprehensive and contained most of the available compiled information on the explored deposit.

Description of database

The master DMA, DMEA, OME database resides in the USGS Spokane Field Office in Spokane, Washington. It was compiled using Microsoft Access, and has additional fields not displayed here. The fields shown in this report were chosen for their usefulness to the broadest audience possible. These fields, in order, are:

Docket # - The number assigned to an application request for mineral exploration assistance

Agency - Defense Minerals Administration, Defense Minerals Exploration Administration, or Office of Minerals Exploration

Applicant Name - The name of the person who submitted the application

Property Name - The name of the property under which the application was made

County - County name, Alaska has no Counties and this field is filled with

USGS 1:250,000 quadrangle map name

State - Two character State abbreviation

AllCommodities - All commodities under which the application was filed

AppYear - Year the application was first filed

AppStatus - The status to which the docket reached

Township, Range, Section, and Meridian - Cadastral information about the location of the property

Mining District - if known
