

Squirrels wound young, smooth-barked trees in several genera (see page 8 ). The typical “palm and finger” defect pattern results. In some species these defects are called mineral streaks.

Insects wound trees (see page 8) and small islands of defects form. Each island of defect is a small "palm and finger" column. The columns usually penetrate only to the depth of the hole made by the insect.

