

Honestly, when a majority of the spam (of all types) is coming from overseas, why is the American Government trying to establish and enforce a "labeling code" on certain types of unsolicited email?

This law can never be enforced on the international bulk emailers and American spammers that don't want to deal with this will just move their operations offshore. This law will do nothing to change the subject lines of spam and will just spend more tax money on a monitoring and enforcement agency that is powerless and useless.

Get a clue and stop wasting taxpayer funds! Any American citizen that backs this plan is an idiot, in my opinion.

For the record, I hate getting spam in my inbox. But half-assed legislation makes me equally upset. What we need the FTC to do is start backing legislation that will drive new technology in the direction of real solutions (not lame guidelines) - like validation keys for email - allowing the user the ability to grant permission to other users and businesses to send them email and block any other email that doesn't have a valid key.
