

I have been receiving unsolicited emails from a site called Ezcheating.com that have no label what so ever in the subject line although you know exactly what you could possibly see. I would have sent you a sample but I have deleted it all out of my mail box. They are using forged Yahoo addresses to advertise their site. I have contacted Yahoo who told me that they are looking into the matter. I have written to the site's info email and customer service requesting that my email be dropped from their distribution list. I have also contacted my employer's abuse team (the University of Pittsburgh) as now I have received emails using my Pitt account along with a fake Yahoo account as the originating address. I will be taking this matter to PA's Attorney General if my removal request is not honored. I feel strongly that porn whether it's on the net or in email should be banned since we have no control over who views it. We cannot guarantee that the people seeing this smut are of the proper age. Who knows how much of this email could be sent to people who are under 18 with email accounts. I would welcome strong government regulation of email based advertising. In my opinion, spam is worse than telemarketers. If the FCC can launch an investigation into the revealing stunt that occurred during the half-time show at this year's Super Bowl, I would hope that the FTC could investigate those who send pornographic email spam and stop them from doing so. A naked breast is a naked breast whether it is on TV or in your inbox.

Sincerely,

Heather Brockway
