

SUCCESS STORY

Runaways Get a Second Chance

Young, vulnerable runaways are given food, medical care, shelter — and a chance to go home

Photo: USAID/Virginia Foley

Runaway boys attend informal classes in the police headquarters at New Delhi Railway Station.

Recent runaways are much more likely to accept placement in a shelter home than those who have learned to live on the street.

Close to 150,000 street children live in New Delhi, of which 7–10 percent are runaways. More than 2,500 of these children live in and around the New Delhi Railway Station, where they scavenge for food in rubbish heaps and sleep between the tracks. Runaway girls who show up at the train station tend to be picked up by pimps within a day. All of the children are potential victims of drug peddlers, child traffickers — and the harsh street life of New Delhi.

Salaam Baalak Trust is a USAID-supported non-profit organization established in 1988 to provide street children aged four to fifteen with food, security, medical treatment, shelter and education. A 24-hour hotline is offered for children in distress, as well as a comprehensive HIV/AIDS awareness program.

Social workers help children return to their homes, with supervision, whenever possible. Four shelters house children who cannot go home, while others, who choose to remain on the street, can receive an informal education at locations around New Delhi.

Social workers from Salaam Baalak Trust visit the station platforms daily to collect the newly arrived runaways — about 25 girls and 80 boys each month. Recent runaways are much more likely to accept placement in one of the shelter homes than those who have learned to live on the street, but children who prefer the street may still attend classes and have access to other services. The organization also provides medical checkups and treatment, health education and referrals to government hospitals for treatment of serious illnesses or emergency intervention.

With USAID's help, Salaam Baalak Trust hopes to become a resource and partner for other organizations involved in helping India's street children.