Appendix A Suggested Core Collections by Library Type

Offers an explanation of suggested core collections, describes how suggested core collections fit into the scope of collection development, and provides lists of titles for the core collections in academic, public, and law libraries designated as Federal depository libraries.

This list, first disseminated in the Federal Depository Library Manual in 1993, has been reviewed and updated to indicate if item numbers are no longer active. The suggested core collection lists consist of recommended titles in all subject areas for academic, public, and law libraries acting as depository libraries. The lists are provided to address core collections in the majority of types of depository libraries participating in the FDLP. For a full discussion of collection development for depository libraries, see Chapter 5 in this Handbook. For titles on the suggested core collection list, depositories should work with other depository libraries both locally and nationally to retain material essential to users and for possible digital preservation.

Many libraries participating in the FDLP have significant holdings in particular subject areas, consisting of government documents and other types of works, or are located near and/or working with other libraries with specific strengths. Providing ways for users to learn of collection strengths and for the libraries to not only foster research but a variety of other cooperative services will increase the value of collecting these materials. When selecting items from the suggested core list, libraries may find it helpful to look at comparable libraries' holdings.

Provisions may be made for acquiring or locating audio, Braille, large print and foreign language editions of a range of works, noting also the availability of video, film, photograph, map and other non-print archives. Some suggested core collection items are available in only one format, however, if a library wishes to purchase alternative formats, either through the GPO Bookstore or commercial sources, there are no restrictions on doing so.

Depository libraries need not:

Select all the items on the suggested core collection list since this is not a mandatory list.

Select a certain percentage of items from the suggested core collection list. It is expected that most large academic and public libraries would select most items listed for their library type, and smaller libraries would be more selective, choosing items only most pertinent to their mission and community. Libraries may be selective, based on such criteria as their own collection development policies and items held in nearby depositories, and other collections. However, it is important to remember that the suggested core collection is a list of important resources and as such, serious consideration should be given to selecting as many titles as reasonable within the libraries' collection development plan as possible.

Select suggested core collection items in specific formats since libraries can choose the format that best meets users needs, whether it is tangible or electronic.

Keep suggested core collection items indefinitely. Suggested core collection items can be discarded following FDLP procedures for discarding depository materials and the local library's collection development policies.

Shelve suggested core collection items separately. Suggested core collection items can be treated the same way as other FDLP materials.

Provide access to the official version of titles listed on the suggested core collection list. Libraries can provide access to commercial versions of the titles listed on the suggested core collection lists rather than the official/depository version, providing that the effort is made to allow for ease of access to the databases for all library patrons.

Keep your profile of selected items on the suggested core collection list the same every year. Libraries can change their selection of suggested core collection items according to the needs of the library.

The decision to host a government documents collection is an important one. The investment of personnel, time, and space provides users access to the varied resources which our government makes available. The FDLP offers coordination and some degree of standardization of these required and recommended collections so that users throughout the country and citizens elsewhere may access a consistent, basic foundation collection, augmented by resources of local and regional interest.

The suggested core collection lists offers guidance to managers of these collections without unduly burdening the library with unnecessary materials.

Note: Items on the suggested core collection lists are marked with a symbol (^) and highlighted in yellow if the items numbers are inactive as of July, 2007. These items can no longer be selected by depository libraries.

^ indicates this item number is no longer active as of July, 2007
