NEA Literature Fellowships

40 YEARS

of Supporting American Writers

This year, the National Endowment for the Arts marks its 40th anniversary of leadership in the arts. The NEA is a public agency dedicated to supporting excellence in the arts, both new and established; bringing the arts to all Americans; and providing leadership in arts education. Established by Congress in 1965 as an independent agency of the federal government, the Arts Endowment is the largest national funder of the arts, bringing great art to all 50 states, including rural areas, inner cities, and military bases.

Preface

Before I assumed my current position, I supported my family for 12 years as a full-time writer. Although primarily a poet, I also reviewed books and music, edited anthologies, gave readings, wrote for radio, and even taught college part-time. I did what it took to make a living—while always trying to guard a little time for poetry. Making one’s way as a literary writer in America is hard work. Consequently, I understand only too well the importance of the NEA Literature Fellowship program. Over the past 40 years, these awards have helped new writers find their voices and established authors continue their work. The program represents one of the great successes of the Arts Endowment in enriching American culture.

Many important authors have been recognized by the NEA. Some of our early grants went to writers whose work is now a permanent part of America’s literary legacy—Gwendolyn Brooks, Isaac Bashevis Singer, John Berryman, Raymond Carver, Donald Justice, Wallace Stegner, Malcolm Cowley, Denise Levertov, Robert Penn Warren, and Eudora Welty, to name only a few immortals. The notable variety of their talents testifies to the inclusivity of the NEA’s program. You have to respect any poetry list broad enough to include both Anthony Hecht and Charles Bukowski—Allen Tate and Allen Ginsberg. More important, the NEA Fellowships have also recognized many writers years before their talents were acknowledged by a wider audience, including Paul Auster, T. C. Boyle, Ernest J. Gaines, Tobias Wolff, Kay Ryan, Ted Kooser, Oscar Hijuelos, X. J. Kennedy, Maxine Hong Kingston, and Alice Walker.

In the fortieth year of the Arts Endowment’s existence, it seems both proper and timely to celebrate the history of the NEA Literature Fellowship program. Through this program of competitive individual grants—3,256 individual grants to date—the agency has made a direct investment in American creativity. By helping writers at every stage of their careers, the National Endowment for the Arts has supported the excellence and diversity—cultural, stylistic, and geographic—of American letters.

The NEA awards also have had an importance beyond their immediate financial impact. By recognizing many writers at critical and often early stages of their careers, the Fellowships have brought significant attention to these individuals—publication opportunities, critical reviews, job offers, academic tenure, and especially added self-confidence. Such forms of recognition bring enduring benefit to a writer’s life long after the fellowship check has been cashed and spent.

By helping writers at every stage of their careers, the National Endowment for the Arts has supported the excellence and diversity—cultural, stylistic, and geographic—of American letters.

The NEA Literature Fellowship program includes four award categories—fiction, poetry, creative nonfiction, and translation. While the creative writing awards have gathered most of the attention, the importance of the translation awards can hardly be overstated. This program has been especially significant in a period when the publication of newly translated works by American presses has become a marginal activity. By supporting translation, the Arts Endowment broadens conversations among cultures and provides opportunities for Americans to gain perspective on our own complex national identity by exploring the work of writers from around the world.

Walt Whitman once claimed that, “The United States themselves are essentially the greatest poem.” If that metaphor is true, then the Arts Endowment has helped enrich and enlarge the national poem with 40 years of bold and constant support. I cannot imagine anyone surveying the pages of names that follow without appreciating the enormous investment in American creativity represented by our program. Most of these authors are still writing at the peak of their powers. As Whitman observed, “The strongest and sweetest songs yet remain to be sung.”

The NEA Literature Fellowships Turn Forty: AN INTRODUCTION

BY AMY STOLLS, NEA LITERATURE SPECIALIST

One sweltering summer day in the nation's capital, when the bureaucratic static of meetings and deadlines and clerical crises had peaked, I looked at our wall of fellowship applications and said to our hardworking intern we need art. After eight years at the agency, I knew the feeling of being buried in thousands of folders and files and piles of paper three-hole punched, boxed in, and taped shut. I knew, too, that when the job felt like a job, it was time to remind ourselves why we do what we do, and why we love it. We grabbed copies of a manuscript from the stacks and took a moment to read. And we were transported.

When the language sings, you can find yourself: in a civil war or a morning routine, a filthy fifth-floor walkup or a thousand acres of sagebrush and sky, staring and listening and understanding the pain of a wounded soldier, the rage of a silenced citizen, the simple joy of kicking a stone. On this particular afternoon, we were led to a crescendo of a moment, powerful in its subtlety, of an old Jewish woman who, after fifty years of sleeping through suburban afternoons and snapping insults, whispered for the first time the circumstances of her horrific capture during the Holocaust. We ended the story with our hands over our hearts, our breath quickened, and a visceral desire to say to everyone in the office read this! Then we wanted to know who this writer was.

Art leads us to the artists because we are curious creatures. How do they do it? we wonder. If only a few hundred literary authors in America can make a living from royalties on books alone, how do most writers find the time and energy to write with night shifts and dirty diapers and a continual stream of rejection letters? They struggle, might be one answer. Or they stop, might be another. "If man needs bread and justice," wrote Albert Camus, "he also needs pure beauty, which is the bread of his heart." If it's a struggle to find this bread of the heart because it is not being created and not reaching audiences, then the logical next question for us as Americans should be: how can we best help?

For 40 years, the National Endowment for the Arts has been asking that very question. The answers haven't always come easy, but if you look through the following list of 2,756 writers and translators who have received NEA Literature Fellowships, you'll see a varied landscape of the best contemporary literature America has to offer. And if you take into consideration that the majority of these writers received their fellowships early in their careers, when they most needed financial support and acknowledgment to keep them writing, you'll understand why we at the Endowment feel we have something to celebrate. In its noble and unprecedented service to American letters, the Literature Fellowship program has made an invaluable contribution to the manifold expression of American culture.

In its noble and unprecedented service to American letters, the Literature Fellowship program has made an invaluable contribution to the manifold expression of American culture.

Writers who meet the Endowment's eligibility requirements may apply by filling out a form (available on the NEA Web site: www.arts.gov) and sending in a sample of their best work. In a year when prose is reviewed, applicants submit 30 pages of fiction or creative nonfiction; in the alternate year for poetry, they submit 10 pages of poems (translation is a separate category with different requirements). To facilitate the process of blind judging, our staff assigns a tracking number to each anonymous manuscript, copies of which are then sent to a panel of distinguished American writers who spend five months evaluating them.

To ease the workload (and entice panelists to serve), we split the panel into teams, each of which receives a portion of the total number of manuscripts (which came in just under 1,600 in FY 2005). Each team picks its favorites, thus creating a pool of manuscripts to be discussed at a meeting all panelists will attend in Washington, DC. Every chosen manuscript is read, discussed, and scored by a subset of judges (panelists include a layperson, who acts as a representative of the public and is not in the business of writing books but is an avid reader and knowledgeable on the genre of the manuscripts being reviewed). At this point, any panelist who is in conflict with a manuscript is removed from the subset of reviewers.

Manuscripts are ultimately rank-ordered according to their combined scores. The full panel looks at the ranked list and makes its final recommendations, which then go through two more levels of review: the presidentially appointed and Senate-confirmed National Council on the Arts and the NEA Chairman. Fellows are announced to the public at the end of each year. They may use their grant as they wish, as long as it relates to their writing. They will send us a progress report during the grant period and a final report at the end, usually outlining publishing achievements and speaking engagements.

In this ever-changing world, there are always timely issues that demand attention. What exactly is creative nonfiction? Should certain self-published work be eligible? Should we accept manuscripts in other languages? How do graphic novels or blogs or performance poems fit into the picture? At the end of every panel meeting, the Endowment holds a public policy session in which panelists (who are sometimes former NEA Fellows themselves) raise these sorts of questions and offer suggestions. This, in fact, is how the Endowment arrived at a system that works: by listening to the advice of those over the years who sailed, stumbled, or slogged through it all.

A Unique System

The NEA Literature Fellowship program is arguably the most egalitarian grant program in its field. The $20,000 fellowships for general writing-related costs are highly competitive, but unlike most other literary awards, they are selected through an anonymous process in which the sole criterion for review is artistic excellence.

How, then, is it possible to ensure the diversity of the group of writers to whom we give grants? We assemble a different panel of judges every year, each diverse with regard to geography, ethnicity, gender, age, aesthetics, and life experience. This system helps, but it's no guarantee; a Latina poet, for example, can speak out for poetry by and about Latinas or be its harshest critic. And yet, the NEA's commitment to artistic excellence leads consistently to diversity. Take the 42 prose Fellows from FY (fiscal year) 2004: they hailed from 22 states; 43 percent of them were women; and they ranged in age from 27 to 58. Also demonstrating the openness and inclusiveness of the program is the fact that 93 percent of them were first-time NEA grant recipients. The two things the 2004 Fellows all have in common? They are American, and their writing made a panel of distinguished authors sit up and take notice.

The fundamental emphasis of the program has always been on artistic excellence. Despite an anonymous process, the Endowment has had an outstanding track record of finding and supporting talent. For example, 46 of the 70 recipients of the National Book Award, the National Book Critics Circle Award, and the Pulitzer Prize in Poetry and Fiction since 1990 were previous NEA Fellows. All but three received NEA Literature Fellowships before any major national award, usually at least a decade earlier.

In the Beginning

In May 1966, eight months after the NEA and its advisory board—the National Council on the Arts—were established, Council members Ralph Ellison, Paul Engle, Harper Lee, and John Steinbeck proposed the development of a program to provide grants to creative writers.

While the Endowment awarded individual grants to all types of artists in 1966—Donald Justice, X. J. Kennedy, Léonie Adams, and W. D. Snodgrass among them—a formal program to support creative writers began in 1967 with 23 individual grants to

INITIAL GOAL OF THE PROGRAM IN 1967

To help all writers, but in particular those writers who were—to use a modern term—underserved, such as:

- Non-teaching writers;
- Women with domestic responsibilities and dependent children;
- Talented writers from disadvantaged backgrounds, including urban ghettos;
- Young writers who do not yet have the kind of established reputations to appeal to private foundations; and
- Older writers whose reputations have faded, but who have made distinguished contributions to the cultural fabric of this country, and whose productive years may be extended and enriched by aid and recognition.

such writers as William Gaddis, Tillie Olsen, Grace Paley, May Sarton, Richard Yates, and Isaac Bashevis Singer. With his grant money, Singer was able to focus on completing his novel The Manor; 11 years later, he received the Nobel Prize for Literature. Similarly, numerous poets well known today—Hayden Carruth, Maxine Kumin, Robert Duncan—were awarded NEA grants that year at a time when their national literary reputations were still developing.

To facilitate the new program, the Endowment appointed poet Carolyn Kizer in 1968 as the first NEA Literature Director. From that time to today, the NEA Literature Program has been committed to the support of the individual writer.

For the first six years of the program, there were several variations of such support. While most of the NEA's grants were not controversial, the agency learned early on that it would be criticized for decisions, including ones it did not make directly. For example, in 1970, the NEA gave a grant in support of The American Literary Anthology, edited by George Plimpton. Under the guidelines then in place, editors of leading literary magazines were asked to submit works of authors presented in their magazines that year. These authors were paid a cash award and included in the anthology. The program ended in part due to delays in publication of the first volume, concerns of self-sustainability, and what became the NEA Literature Program's first controversy. Aram Saroyan's seven-letter poem—light—for which a federally funded effort indirectly paid $750—was among those selected for the anthology. Though the poem was picked by Plimpton rather than an NEA panel, it caused a flurry of agency criticism. Michael Straight, then deputy chairman of the Endowment, was personally called to the offices of 46 members of Congress to explain the matter.

Other individual grants in Literature made an immediate impact on developing writers. The Endowment gave grants to writers to visit predominantly black colleges in the South. It gave grants to help writers and other artists teaching in institutions of higher learning to take one-year leaves to pursue their creative work. And it gave grants for travel or research or finishing a work-in-progress. Most of these grantees were hand-selected by a Literature advisory panel.

The issue of whether to fund established writers for their accomplishments or help younger writers find time and resources to write was at the forefront of the debates in the early days of the program. For a time, the Endowment gave lifetime achievement awards designed to attract national attention to writers of significant accomplishment, writers such as John Berryman, Denise Levertov, Wallace Stegner, and Gwendolyn Brooks. These fellowships never garnered enthusiastic support from Congress, and even in the arts community one could hear rumblings about "aesthetic partisanship."

Discovery Grants

The Endowment initially decided it could make a greater contribution through Discovery Awards to emerging writers. The Endowment hired "talent scouts" to find these gifted, financially needy,

NEA'S LIFETIME ACHIEVEMENT AWARDS

In the late 1960s, there were Distinguished Service Awards, worth $10,000; in the 1980s, they were called Senior Fellowships, worth $15,000 at the start, climbing to $25,000 in 1984 and $40,000 in 1986. They were finally cut in 1992 due to shifting priorities.

unknown writers. The response from the scouts was “overwhelming,” claims a 1967 report to the Council, citing “a young Negro poet who supports her three children by running a general store in Alabama,” and another “young Southern writer, blind since birth and seriously crippled in infancy, who has managed to struggle through her teacher’s certificate, and is now teaching young children in Tennessee, and writing poems and stories for three hours each evening.” Grants were then awarded according to need: $1,000 to the single writer without dependents; $1,500 to the writer with one dependent; and $2,000 to the writer with two or more dependents. Among these recipients one can find the 25-year-old Alexander Theroux and the 26-year-old Nikki Giovanni.

The Discovery Awards didn’t last long. The first advisory panel on literature, consisting mostly of editors and publishers, held its first meeting in September 1970 and recommended these awards be terminated. Members voted almost unanimously in opposition to the addition of economic need as a determining factor in making grant selections. In 1972, therefore, the Endowment began what can be called the precursor to the current system—a competitive fellowship program based on artistic merit.

Creating the Process

To receive a fellowship in the early 1970s, a writer had to be nominated by an established writer. An oversight committee composed of a broad spectrum of publishers, editors, agents, critics, and other experts in the field from around the country selected the nominators—among them James Dickey, Eudora Welty, George P. Elliott, Kenneth Koch, Adrienne Rich, and William Stafford. (The Endowment publicized the names of committee members and nominators to avoid the perception that decisions were being made in secret.) The nominators were to recommend potential writers who had published a book or at least two short stories or poems or essays in magazines, or had a play staged. From their recommendations, the NEA Literature Fellowship program was launched with 27 awards.

When the system of nominations was replaced with an open application policy in 1974, the Endowment received a whopping 1,500-plus proposals, of which 120 were awarded grants at $5,000 each (the number of applications escalated to nearly 2,500 the next year). Reflective of the time, most of them were from men, and more than half were from poets. Four years later, the number of successful fiction applicants would substantially exceed the number of poets. And by the mid-1980s, applicants would come to represent American writers living in all 50 states and Washington, DC, and women would make up a significant portion of each year’s grantees. What hasn’t changed significantly over the decades is the percentage of applicants who are chosen to receive grants; on average it has been only five percent, with recent years showing two or three percent.

The Endowment periodically tweaked the fellowship process to meet the demands of the times and the ever-increasing workload. To adjust for cost-of-living, the amount of the grant was incrementally increased over the years. Film and television scriptwriters were transferred to the Endowment’s Media Arts Program; playwrights were sent to the Theater Program. Guidelines were amended to accept manuscripts in languages other than English if they came with an English translation. Eligibility requirements became more stringent to address the growing number of applications. “Belles lettres” was added as a genre eligible for funding and then changed to “creative nonfiction.” And when Congress significantly reduced the budget in FY 1996, the Endowment moved to judging genres in alternate years (prose one year, poetry another).

Translation Awards

Perhaps the most successful outgrowth of the 1980s was the development of a process to review fellowships in translation, which began in 1981 and flourished under the leadership of then Literature Director Frank Conroy. Translation Fellowships in poetry and prose are currently offered to published literary translators for specific translation projects from other languages into English. Unlike the other fellowships, the Translation Fellowships are not reviewed anonymously, and they can be for either $10,000 or $20,000, depending on the scope and merit of the project. To date, the Endowment has awarded 246 Translation Fellowships, bringing to the American public more than 200 foreign works in 46 languages from 60 countries. Among them one can find Khaled Mattawa’s (FY 1999) translation of Without an Alphabet, Without a

Transition: The 1990s

Throughout the life of the fellowship program, critics have questioned its worth or, in some cases, lobbied for its demise. Some criticism has come from writers. Lawrence Ferlinghetti, for example, told the Washington Post in 1992 that he "objected to a welfare system that would turn wild artists into tame lapdogs." Many vocal critics came from the halls of Congress, which exercises legal oversight and budget control of the NEA, as it does with all federal agencies. "Aid to individuals is nothing more than a subsidy for hippies, beatniks, junkies, and Vietniks," stated one member of Congress during the Vietnam War. Congressmen with concurring views, if not concurring quotes, were successful in moving the House to curtail the Endowment's ability to award individual grants. The agency, however, made a strong case for the restoration of this power. A Congressional compromise allowed grants to continue, as long as the words "of exceptional talent" were inserted to describe persons who would be eligible.

A larger threat to the program, and to the agency as a whole, came in 1995 when measures emerged in the House to phase out the Endowment or, at the very least, slash the budget and abolish all grants to individual artists. The literature field, in pure grassroots fashion, rose up in protest to the cuts. Hundreds of writers published opinion pieces and wrote letters. Representatives from literary organizations held meetings every month and brought writers to Capitol Hill to meet with Congressmen, writers such as E. L. Doctorow, Wendy Wasserstein, Bobbie Ann Mason, and Walter Mosley.

"People all across America came together to prioritize the fellowships," said Gigi Bradford, NEA Literature Director from 1992 to 1997. "The individual fellowships made up 50 percent of our budget in literature, so we had a lot to lose." Ultimately, Congress voted to eliminate individual grants awarded by application in all disciplines, except for Literature Fellowships in poetry, fiction, creative nonfiction, and translation. (Congress also voted to continue two popular lifetime achievement fellowships awarded through public nominations—the NEA National Heritage Fellowships and the NEA Jazz Masters Fellowships.)

The Congressional decision to continue the Literature Fellowships affirmed the integrity of the anonymous panel review process and the undeniable excellence of Literature Fellowship recipients. "The committee recognizes that a great many of the grants to individuals have been for projects of superior merit and worth," states a 1995 majority report on the Arts, Humanities, and Museums Amendments from the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee. "It was a victory not to have to change policy," said Bradford. "After the cuts, there was intense Congressional scrutiny of the process, but it was always affirmed by both the agency and by erstwhile Congressional critics."

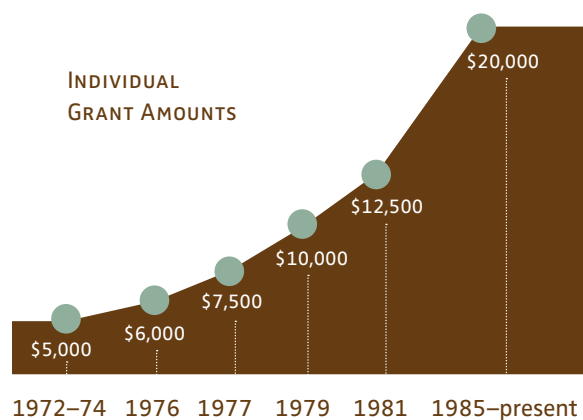

The Program Today

Celebrating the discipline from which he emerged, Chairman Dana Gioia has increased the allocation for support to writers, thus raising the number of NEA Literature Fellowships from 42 in FY 2004 to 50 in FY 2006. In addition, he has tightened the conflict of interest requirements for panelists both to ensure the integrity of the process and to prevent even the appearance of any conflicts. "The fellowship process for a public agency needs to be fair, open, democratic, and inclusive," stated Gioia.

Gioia also supported a policy shift in FY 2005, initiated by Literature Director Cliff Becker, to separate the review process for fellowships in translation from the review process in creative writing to highlight the importance of translation as its own art form. "The American arts are most vibrant when they include the best works of art from other nations," said Gioia. "Through our commitment to funding translation, the NEA has been an essential catalyst for bringing the world's literature to our country."

Since 1996, the number of Literature Fellowships has increased overall and the review process continues to impress its participants. "Scrupulousness was the watchword of those overseeing our discussions and our voting, and scrupulousness was our guide," wrote Elinor Lipman, a judge for the FY 2006 Creative Writing Fellowships. "My experience on the panel, listening and discussing, arguing or defending, restored my faith in level playing fields and art for art's sake."

the Literature Fellowships, all designed to build an infrastructure that can support American writers and connect them with communities nationwide. “Through its grants to literary journals and presses, literary centers, reading series, festivals, writers-in-the-schools programs, libraries, and other literary organizations, the Endowment ensures that the writing of our Fellows is published and preserved,” Gioia stated. “We should remember the words of Whitman who said, ‘To have great poets, there must be great audiences, too.’” These grants to organizations connect Fellows with audiences across the country—from soccer moms to soldiers, radio listeners to subway riders, secondary-school students to senior citizens.

To further cultivate an audience for literature, Chairman Gioia announced in December 2005 the launch of The Big Read, headed by Literature Director David Kipen. Modeled after successful “city reads” programs, The Big Read is a national initiative to encourage literary reading by asking communities to come together to read and discuss one book. In partnership with Arts Midwest, the NEA will provide organizer’s guides, reader’s guides, teacher’s guides, CDs of readings, a Web site, and additional funding to selected communities to initiate activities and partnerships with schools, arts organizations, and local government. “The NEA’s landmark 2004 study, Reading At Risk, showed that literary reading in the U.S. is in steep decline,” said Gioia. “No single program can entirely reverse this trend. But if cities nationally unite to adopt The Big Read, together we can restore reading to its essential place in American culture.”

The Fellows

Fellows are freelance writers and university lecturers. But they are also registered nurses and gardeners, diplomats and farmers. One Fellow I called about winning a grant said she was a mother of 12. Another said he had been volunteering as a subject for medical experiments to make money and he was glad not to have to do that anymore.

Most Fellows will tell you the money they received provided an essential boost to their career. But they also will tell you the benefits of an NEA grant extend far beyond the cash. They’ll tell you it allowed family, friends, and colleagues to accept them as serious writers, that it brought them into first or further contact with editors, publishers, and other writers at the national level. It got them invitations to conduct workshops, give readings, or teach. It allowed them to undertake longer or different kinds of work, to take risks, to write with confidence. And it gave them a desire to give back to their country.

In his final report at the completion of his FY 1999 grant, poet Dainis Hazners from Wyoming recounted the following anecdote:

At the feed store, buying grain for my goats and chickens, I was introduced to the new owner as Our Local Poet. “He’s the one got that big award. Quite the honor.”

“I was ... shocked,” I offered.

“You mean that NBA outfit back East?” the new guy asked.

“National Endowment for the Arts,” I said, meekly. “Washington.”

“That’s it. I’m proud to know you!” he grinned.

“It’s amazing to me,” wrote Hazners, that “even after a year, people remember. I belong to them, in a funny kind of way—like the mountains and the bad weather, I’m out there somewhere.”

May the bread of the heart be plenty, may the bakers be always out there. Happy 40th anniversary, NEA.

Creative Writing Fellows

JULIA ALVAREZ (87), born in New York City to Dominican parents, has written 14 books of essays, poetry, short stories, novels, children's books, and young adult novels, including How the García Girls Lost Their Accents (1991) and In the Time of the Butterflies (1994). Alvarez has also translated the poetry of Pablo Neruda.

I had been writing for over two decades and thinking I would never be considered a true American writer because I was an immigrant girl with English as my second language. But I kept working at the craft, writing, revising, trying to keep faith with the dream inside me. Every year I'd send off my application for an NEA grant, hoping that this would be the year my work was recognized. When I got my NEA grant, I felt as if I was now included among the storytellers and poets of my new country!

The fiscal year(s) NEA Literature Fellows received the award is in parentheses following the name. Residence listed is that of the Fellow at the time of award (for multiple awards, residence of most recent award is used).

T. C. BOYLE (78, 83) has written 11 novels and seven collections of short stories, including World's End (1987), for which he won the PEN/Faulkner Award. Boyle founded the creative writing program at the University of Southern California in 1978 and still directs it.

Both grants came early in my career and were invaluable not only for buying me time to complete two novels, but as a psychological boost too—here was a ratification that what I was doing was worthwhile.

I should say, too, that I served on the Literature Panel under Frank Conroy in 1986–87 as a way of expressing my gratitude for a program that I feel is essential to fostering the arts—particularly for beginning or out-of-the-way artists whose work is not immediately apprehended in a commercial way.

JARED CARTER (81, 91) was born in Indiana, where he still lives. He has written four books of poetry, the latest—Cross this Bridge at a Walk—to be published in 2006. Among the honors he has received are a Guggenheim Fellowship, the Walt Whitman Award from the Academy of American Poets, the New Letters Literary Award for Poetry, the Indiana Governor's Arts Award, and the Poets' Prize.

In 1985 and 1986, I was invited to serve on a variety of panels convened by the Literature Program. I witnessed firsthand the hard work on the part of the staff and the panel members that goes into making the grant-giving process as fair and equitable as possible. In retrospect, this experience was a valuable complement to the welcome financial assistance provided by the two grants I received, and by serving on the panels, I was able to give something in return.

ANNIE DILLARD (81) is the author of 11 books, often about nature and spirituality, including the Pulitzer Prize-winner Pilgrim at Tinker Creek (1974). She is currently living and teaching in Connecticut.

The grant freed me from teaching and enabled me to write two books: a book of thoughts about contemporary fiction, Living By Fiction, and a book of essays, Teaching a Stone to Talk.

I try to describe what it feels like to be alive in the United States. My books are about rural Virginia, about Pittsburgh, about the Pacific Northwest Coast . . . Literature has all my heart and mind. That the NEA supports literature in the United States enhances and confirms our cultural status. All civilized nations support artists; we know nations by their works of art.

RITA DOVE (77, 89) has written eight books of poetry, including the Pulitzer Prize-winning Thomas and Beulah (1986), as well as books of fiction and essays. Her numerous honors include the National Humanities Medal and an NAACP Great American Artist Award. From 1993 to 1995, Dove served as the U.S. Poet Laureate. In 2004, she was appointed the Poet Laureate of Virginia.

It is impossible for me to say what I would have done had I not received a fellowship; I can only say that I believe the course of my literary career would have been markedly different. Because of my gratitude, I have served on several panels for the Endowment—my way of repaying, in part, the support and encouragement provided me at a young and tentative age.

ANDRE DUBUS (78, 85) was the author of nine works of fiction, including the short story collection Dancing After Hours (1996). In 1986, he was struck by a car, but continued to write; his 1991 collection of essays, Broken Vessels, deals with this accident. Dubus passed away in 1999.

In my career I have mostly made a living from teaching jobs, readings, grants—and have rarely made a living from sales of books, or stories to magazines. The 1985 NEA grant was bountiful for me. It was $20,000, an amount I would have earned had I still been teaching, and that year I got a lot of work done, finishing a book of four novellas and two stories called The Last Worthless Evening.

ERNEST J. GAINES (68) published his first short story in 1956, and since has written eight books of fiction that examine African-American life in the American South, specifically in his home state of Louisiana. A Lesson Before Dying won the 1993 National Book Critics Circle Award.

The NEA grant—a thousand dollars at that time—encouraged me to keep writing. I was finally being recognized by critics and my colleagues. The young writer needs that. He needs the money, yes—but he also needs a little recognition now and then to keep pushing himself. I know many young, very talented people who gave up out of despair. I feel that I was lucky. The recognition by the NEA gave me enough push to start my next novel, The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman. I have not looked back since.

CRISTINA GARCIA (04) was born in Havana, Cuba, in 1958, and emigrated to the U.S. with her family in 1960. She is the author of three novels and has been a finalist for the National Book Award. Garcia's work has appeared in many anthologies, and she is the editor of Cubanismo: Readings in Contemporary Cuban Literature.

I had been struggling long and hard on my third novel, Monkey Hunting, when I got a call from the NEA telling me I had won a fiction fellowship. It lifted me from a state of desperate futility (what was I doing writing a book about a 19th-century Chinese farmer in colonial Cuba, anyway?) to one of optimistic determination. Thanks to the grant, I was able to concentrate exclusively on my writing, see my way through the book's cultural and chronological obstacles, and do what I love best: tell a good story.

KAYE GIBBONS (89) has written eight novels, two of which were chosen as Oprah Book Club selections in 1997: Ellen Foster (1986) and A Virtuous Woman (1989). Gibbons continues to live in North Carolina, the state in which she was raised.

Before I received an NEA Literature Fellowship in 1989, I did not have the money for the February rent. But that grant enabled me to pay the rent, feed my children, and work in peace. However, I never saw the grant as something to which I was entitled. I felt I could contribute something of value to the American letters and therefore to my country. Because of the book I wrote with the grant and because of subsequent books, I have paid over $750,000 in federal income tax. The government has been more than repaid for its investment in my work, and for that, we should both be grateful.

JOHN HAINES (68) has lived and worked in the Alaska wilderness much of his life. He has written thirteen volumes of poetry, and his many prose works include a memoir, The Stars, the Snow, the Fire (1989). Haines currently lives in Helena, Montana.

When one has no bank account for at least ten years, and no money at all to speak of, when $20 constituted a fortune to be spent with considerable care, the generosity of a grant like this can easily be appreciated.

I doubt that many people have had their lives changed as drastically as mine was at the time, but I don't doubt that many others have had some related experience and a period free from immediate money concerns.

A member of the Muskogee Tribe, JOY HARJO (77, 92) is the author of six books of poetry, including In Mad Love and War (1990), which received an American Book Award. Her poems have been included in numerous journals and anthologies. Harjo served on the NEA's National Council on the Arts from 1998 to 2003.

When I received my first NEA fellowship for poetry, I was a single parent with two children who were four and nine years old. With the time the grant bought, I was able to buy child-care, pay rent and utilities, and make my car payment while I wrote what would be most of my second book of poetry, She Had Some Horses, the collection that actually started my career. The grant began the momentum that has carried me through these years. I can now call myself a poet.

Born in 1951 of Cuban parentage in New York City, OSCAR HIJUELOS (85) is the author of six novels. In 1990, he became the first Hispanic-American writer to win the Pulitzer Prize in fiction.

Needless to say, the grant made an immeasurable difference to my creative life: because of it, over the next several years, I was able to complete my Pulitzer Prize-winning novel, The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love. From a fiscal point of view, I am proud to say that since that book's critical and financial success, I was able to repay the government's largesse back many times over, by way of taxes.

But beyond that, I have always felt that the NEA is an invaluable asset to this country. For in expressing its faith in art, in all its diversity, the NEA provides the most vital service, which is the nurturing of this nation's artistic legacy.

JANE HIRSHFIELD'S (05) fifth collection of poetry, After, is forthcoming in February 2006. Hirshfield has also published a collection of essays and has edited and co-translated three anthologies of work by women poets from the past.

A fellowship from the NEA is an act of optimism, of generosity proffered—not a reward for past work, but an invitation to the new. Mid-year now in the fellowship, I can say that the support the NEA offers has brought me time for the solitude and silence in which I can ponder, write, revise, consider, range, experiment, feel, and saturate myself in the necessary freedoms out of which poems arise. There are no guarantees that a given time will produce good work, or any work at all. But it's exceedingly rare that the outside world ever says to a poet, 'Please, would you write some new poems?'

MARK JARMAN (77, 84, 92) is the author of seven collections of poetry, the book-length poem Iris (1992), and two books of essays on poetry. He teaches at Vanderbilt University.

I have been the fortunate recipient of three grants from the NEA. Each of these grants has helped me find time to complete a book of poetry, but the first was the most important. When I received the NEA Literature Fellowship for poetry in 1977, I quit my onerous teaching job and went with my wife to live in Italy for the better part of a year. There I completed my second book of poetry. We were in our mid-twenties and able, at that time, to pick up and go. It was a crucial decision and year and would not have been possible without the NEA's assistance.

EDWARD P. JONES (86) was born and raised in Washington, DC. He has written one book of short stories and one novel, The Known World (2003), which subsequently won the Pulitzer Prize and the National Book Critics Circle Award in fiction.

I can't say I really had a career before receiving the NEA Literature Fellowship. I published a few stories, but had a day job summarizing newspaper and magazine articles on taxes, working 10 hours a day four days a week. When I got the grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, I stopped going in every day and worked at home. This freed up my time, and I could work the way I wanted: get up in the morning and write stories, and then do the summaries in the afternoons. I began in earnest writing the collection of stories that eventually came out in 1992, Lost in the City.

SUJI KWOCK KIM (01) has had work published in Poetry, Paris Review, The Nation, The New Republic, Threepenny Review, and other journals. Her first book, Notes from the Divided Country, was the winner of the 2002 Walt Whitman Award from the Academy of American Poets.

I used the fellowship to do research in Asia, necessary to the completion of my first book, Notes from the Divided Country. Among other things, it explores my family's life in North and South Korea during the last century, particularly the War (1950-1953) and the Japanese occupation (1910-1945)... I hope to honor my family's memory the only way I know how: by imagining and giving voice, however subjectively, to what they lived through and witnessed.

TED KOOSER (76, 84) is the author of ten collections of poetry, and was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 2005 for his collection Delights and Shadows. In 2004, he was appointed U.S. Poet Laureate. He is currently a visiting professor in the English department of the University of Nebraska at Lincoln.

I received my first NEA Fellowship in 1976 and was thrilled to have the recognition and, of course, the money. I considered the fellowship to be an encouragement, and I was encouraged indeed. I remember suddenly feeling like a real writer, and it was both a heady and productive time. During the next few years I published lots of poems in the journals and two collections of poems. Eight years later I received my second fellowship and that one helped me to finish the manuscript of a book published in the following year.

PHILIP LEVINE (76, 81, 87) was born in 1928 in Detroit, Michigan, where many of his poems are set. He has won numerous awards for his writing, including the National Book Award, the National Book Critics Circle Award, and the Pulitzer Prize. He is author of sixteen collections of poems and two books of essays.

The '87 grant gave me resources to return to Detroit in order to research the poem, 'A Walk with Tom Jefferson,' the longest and best poem I've ever written.

Had such grants existed when I was in my 30s and early 40s and teaching too much and writing too little, there's no knowing how much more I might have written, but I thank my good fortune that they arrived in time to help me become, for better or worse, the poet I have become.

BOBBIE ANN MASON (83) grew up in rural Kentucky, the setting of much of her fiction. She has written a memoir, novels, and short-story collections, including Shiloh and Other Stories (1982).

I wanted to do something that would be rich and lasting, but I never expected it to have such popular appeal and tangible social effect. Yet this novel [In Country] was a surprising commercial success, and it has affected the lives of many people.

The NEA grant helped me write the novel, which I did for my own artistic reasons. I report these unexpected benefits that In Country brought to the community—from the classroom to the veterans' group to the economy to the morale of my own hometown—because I think they are significant in reminding people that what may look like self-indulgence in its beginnings can turn out to have long-reaching, positive effects on the culture.

DAVIS MCCOMBS'S (03) first book, Ultima Thule, was chosen by W. S. Merwin as the winner of the 1999 Yale Series of Younger Poets. Published in April 2000, the book focused on Kentucky's Mammoth Cave where he grew up. Sixteen of his recent "tobacco poems" won The Missouri Review's 2005 Larry Levis Editor's Prize.

The poems of my first book, Ultima Thule, like the eyeless fish found in Mammoth's Echo River, evolved in the silence and darkness of the cave. The poems I am writing now begin to venture out into the world of light, into the vanishing communities of tobacco farms above the cave. With the help of the NEA, I can now devote myself fully to writing them. Only in that way do I have any hope of writing half the book I want.

MARILYN NELSON (82, 90) has written six books of poetry, several of which have been finalists for the National Book Award, and two collections of poetry for children. She is Professor Emeritus at the University of Connecticut, Storrs, and was named Connecticut Poet Laureate in 2001.

In 1982 I had a teaching position in a department in which I was junior, one of few women, and the only person of color. My department weighed the value of poems toward tenure and merit pay increases by their length: a 3-page free-verse poem was worth more than a sonnet, and both were worth much less than an essay about commas in the work of Beauregard Wadsworth (1796 – 1861). With the fellowship I became not the African Americanist who hadn't published, but the award-winning poet. By freeing me from teaching responsibilities it allowed me to start the painful inner growth necessary for a new project.

ISHMAEL REED (75) is the author of nine novels, six plays, one opera libretto, six books of poetry, and six books of essays, and he is the editor of numerous anthologies and magazines. His honors include the Chancellor's Award for Community Service from the University of California, Berkeley, where he taught creative writing for 35 years, retiring emeritus as of January 2005. He is also founder of the Before Columbus Foundation, which annually presents the American Book Awards, and the Oakland chapter of PEN.

I received a National Endowment Fellowship in 1975. This assistance and a small advance from a publisher gave me the time to conduct research and to write my fourth novel, Flight To Canada, which was a parody of 19th-century fugitive slave novels. This novel is still in print!

NORMAN RUSH (86) was raised in Oakland, California, and graduated from Swarthmore College in 1956. He has been an antiquarian book dealer, a college instructor, and, with his wife Elsa, he lived and worked in Africa from 1978 to 1983. They now reside in Rockland County, New York. He received the National Book Award for his novel Mating and has published a book of short stories and a second novel.

The NEA grant, coming closely after one from the New York State Council on the Arts, gave me confidence that I might truly be able to devise a viable literary life. We lived modestly, and the material contribution the grant made was significant. It also encouraged me to apply for other grants while I worked on my first novel, Mating, whose positive reception changed everything for me.

KAY RYAN (01), a lifetime Californian, was born in 1945 and grew up in small towns of the San Joaquin Valley and the Mojave Desert. Known for her compressed poems and use of rhyme, Ryan has published five books. She has received an Ingram Merrill Foundation award, and her poems have been published in The New Yorker, Paris Review, and numerous anthologies. In 2004, she received the Ruth Lilly Poetry Prize from the Poetry Foundation.

My fellowship made me less intolerant. No longer could I automatically disregard anyone who had enjoyed a smidgeon of success. Here I was, with my own smidgeon. As time has passed since my award, I have found myself becoming disturbingly open-minded about the possible relationship between talent and recognition.

CHARLES SIMIC (75, 79) was born in Belgrade, Yugoslavia, and came to the United States as a teenager. Simic has published more than 60 books of poetry, prose, memoirs, and essays, and has twice won the PEN International Translation Award for his translations. He received the Pulitzer Prize in poetry in 1990 for The World Doesn't End (1989). Since 1973, he has taught at the University of New Hampshire.

Did my fellowship make a difference? You bet! It allowed me to take time off my work and write and gave me confidence that my peers value what I'm doing. I was a poor man, overworked, with a family and children to support. Where else would I find money? I don't know about the others, but we poets are grateful for the miracle of the Endowment.

JEFFREY SKINNER (87) has published five collections of verse and with his wife Sarah Gorham, he edited an anthology, Last Call: Poems on Alcoholism, Addiction, & Deliverance. His poems have appeared in The New Yorker, The Nation, and other publications. He is a professor in the creative writing program at the University of Louisville, and is co-founder of Sarabande Books.

When I received a Fellowship from the NEA, I had a wife and two small children. I had made the decision to quit my long-term job in business, and to use our limited savings to finance two years of searching for a teaching position. In our second year, as our money ran out, we were given the blessing of the NEA, which kept my family afloat for another year, until I secured a university job. I know this sounds dramatic, but what can I do—it's the truth. The NEA, for me, was life altering, if not life saving.

JANE SMILEY (78, 87) has published 11 books of fiction, including A Thousand Acres (1991), which won the Pulitzer Prize and the National Book Critics Circle Award. The settings of her stories follow her own migration from the rural Midwest to California. She writes regularly for magazines, including The New Yorker, The Nation, and Vogue.

I received my first NEA fellowship in 1978. I got $7,500, which was a tremendous amount at the time and enabled me to write my first novel, Barn Blind. The pat on the back was worth as much as the money. For the first time I felt rewarded rather than just allowed to proceed.

I received my second fellowship in 1987, after I had established myself as a promising young writer. In both instances, money from the NEA smoothed my passage through difficult transitional moments in my career, and helped me move forward.

CATHY SONG (97) was born in Honolulu, Hawaii, and maintains a permanent home there. She is the author of four books of poetry and her work has been widely anthologized in many publications, including The Norton Anthology of Modern Poetry and The Best American Poetry 2000.

A Literature Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts means a great deal to me. It means I live in a country that refuses to be shut down, numbed, silenced, and party-lined by the ranting and raving of the truly timid—those who in their fear of life and living seek to make it their mission to obstruct the voices of its artists. It means I live in a country that chooses to hear the vital singing—the pulsations, the life blood, the pathways that connect us profoundly to each other, profoundly to the intelligent compassionate cosmos.

VIRGIL SUÁREZ (01) was born in 1962 in Havana, Cuba, and emigrated to the U.S. in 1974. Suárez is the author of seven poetry collections, four novels, a collection of short stories, and two memoirs. He teaches at Florida State University.

The NEA grant reaffirmed the value of my work in my own life and mind. The money of course always helps, and it too came at an important time in my life. It allowed me to take a little time off and continue to work on my poetry. The important thing is also that my work was being judged by a committee of my peers, other professional writers and poets. The NEA grant not only saved me literally from the gutter, but from anonymity as well. I will forever be grateful.

LARISSA SZPORLUK (03) is an Associate Professor of Creative Writing and English Literature at Bowling Green State University in northwest Ohio. She is the author of three award-winning volumes of poetry, and her fourth book will be published in 2006.

The National Endowment for the Arts grant was crucial for the development of my fourth manuscript, Embryos and Idiots. The collection was conceived as a novel-in-verse and relied on close examination of an "enchanted" mountain in Sabaudia, Italy. As the story developed, it also changed: the narrative impulse exploded into a series of lyric rants, many of which were informed by the extensive travel the grant enabled me to do. Had I not been awarded the grant (and the dynamic experience abroad), it is most likely that the poems would have stayed faithful to their stagnant narrative program. I owe the NEA whatever vitality resides in those poems.

NANCY WILLARD (76, 87) is the author of 12 books of poetry, two novels, numerous children's books, and a collection of essays on writing. Her collection, A Visit to William Blake's Inn: Poems for Innocent and Experienced Travelers, was the first poetry book to win the Newbery Medal. She teaches in the English Department at Vassar College.

What the NEA fellowship gave me, twice, was what every writer longs for: a period of uninterrupted time, which allowed me to work on a novel, Sister Water, and a collection of poems, Household Tales of Moon and Water. Those of us who both teach and write know the art of carrying ideas around in your head and hoping they'll still be there when you're ready to write them down. The fellowship allowed me to take time off from teaching (which I love) and dwell in the work itself, and to focus on shaping it and revising it without the usual intrusions and interruptions.

JOY WILLIAMS (73, 88) is the author of four novels, two collections of short stories, and a collection of essays, often depicting life in Florida. Many of Williams' short stories and essays have appeared in the Best American collections and anthologies, and a short story published in Antaeus won a National Magazine Award. She lives in Key West, Florida, and Tucson, Arizona.

It's a remarkable thing to be rewarded by one's own government for being an artist, for pursuing a unique vision. The recognition and money were enormously helpful to me at the time, and since then I've been a judge for the NEA and know that the criterion is excellence, always only excellence and promise. It's a great fellowship to receive, a sustaining and emboldening award.

TOBIAS WOLFF (78, 85) is the author of two memoirs, This Boy's Life (1989), about his childhood, and In Pharaoh's Army (1994), about his service during the Vietnam War, as well as three volumes of short stories, a novella, and a novel. Wolff received the PEN/Faulkner Award for his novella The Barracks Thief.

During the period of my first fellowship I completed a collection of short stories, In the Garden of the North American Martyrs, and during the second I made a substantial beginning on a memoir, This Boy's Life. The grant allowed me to write without one eye on the wallet and the other on the clock, and to experiment and develop in ways that would otherwise have been very difficult. I will always be profoundly grateful to the NEA for the difference it has made in my life and work.

Translation Fellows

ERDAG GÖKNAR (04) is Assistant Professor of Turkish Studies at Duke University. He is the award-winning translator of Orhan Pamuk's historical novel My Name is Red. Currently, he is completing the translation of Ahmet Hamdi Tanpinar's modernist classic, A Mind at Peace.

The NEA translation grant allowed me to overcome significant challenges to the Tanpinar project. It was a factor in finalizing copyright and a publishing contract, in researching aspects of the novel during translation, and in giving me the time and space to do the work. In addition to recognizing the importance of literatures that are under-represented in English (such as that of Turkey), the NEA grant enabled me to focus on the intricacies of literary translation away from the demands of university teaching.

The fiscal year(s) NEA Literature Fellows received the award is in parentheses following the name. Residence listed is that of the Fellow at the time of award (for multiple awards, residence of most recent award is used). In cases where the country of translation is not obvious, the country is listed in parentheses next to the language.

DAVID HINTON (91, 01) has translated 18 books, which have earned him numerous honors and awards, including the Landon Translation Award from the Academy of American Poets. His translations of ancient Chinese poetry and philosophy have earned wide acclaim for creating compelling contemporary English texts that convey the actual texture and density of the originals. Hinton lives in East Calais, Vermont.

I am an independent scholar devoting my time solely to translation and writing, so NEA support has been extremely important in making my work possible. Without it, the books simply would not have happened. My first NEA grant came early in my career, allowing me to translate my second book: The Selected Poems of T'ao Ch'ien. My second grant came much later, allowing me to translate a large anthology: Mountain Home: The Wilderness Poetry of Ancient China.

LYNNE SHARON SCHWARTZ (85,02) has written numerous novels and short story, essay, and poetry collections in addition to translations from Italian by noted writers Natalia Ginzburg and Liana Millu. Her novel Leaving Brooklyn (1989) was a finalist for the PEN/Faulkner Award.

It's not unusual for fiction writers to feel, in low moments, that their work is of no tangible use. Despite all we tell ourselves about the necessity of art as a chronicle of private and public life, or art as a means of nourishing the living language, we do occasionally imagine our time might be better spent, say, building furniture or bridges, work that fills a clear need. The NEA fellowship assured me what I did was indeed useful, enough so to warrant its encouragement. I was able to complete a collection of short stories, and some years later, a translation that took seven years to find a publisher.

WILLIAM JAY SMITH (72, 95) was Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress (Poet Laureate) from 1968 to 1970, and in that capacity traveled widely in Russia, Eastern Europe, and the Middle East. His books include Army Brat, a memoir, The World below the Window: Poems 1937-1997, and Laughing Time, a children's classic. His translations have won awards from the French Academy, the Swedish Academy, and the Hungarian government.

As a young poet and translator, I followed Eliot and Pound in their admiration of the French poet Jules Laforgue, and after years of work produced the first comprehensive English selection of his writing. The NEA grant enabled me to undertake new versions of the fairytales of Madame d'Aulnoy, who had long been an inspiration in my work for children. With that grant I joined the host of translators indebted to the NEA for allowing us to seek treasures beyond our borders and to present them with a new transparency to American readers.

DONALD A. YATES (00) has translated numerous works from Spanish into English. Outside of his translations of Jorge Luis Borges, Adolfo Bioy Casares, Marco Denevi, Manuel Peyrou, and many other short story writers and novelists, Yates is a creative writer in his own right as well as a noted critic and anthologist.

I did my first translations from Spanish nearly 50 years ago. In 1962, with James E. Irby, I co-edited and co-translated Labyrinths, the first collection of the writings of Jorge Luis Borges to appear in English. The NEA translation grant is allowing me to bring into English the complete writings of the Argentine author Edgar Brau, who to date has published two novels and thirteen short stories. I see Brau as a truly gifted writer, who draws inspiration not only from Borges, but also from his compatriot, Marco Denevi, whose literary and ethical standards he clearly admires.
