

Johnathan Dinan
1540 York Avenue
Apartment 13L
New York, NY 10028
(212) 535-6465
jpd5836@rit.edu

In response to the DMCA issue, I believe that these laws are a major injustice to people everywhere, especially when groups like the MPAA are using them in an attempt to basically outlaw reverse engineering. How are we to learn more about technology and make things better, if we do not have the right to examine, dissect and tweak our creations? How are members of the Linux community supposed to enjoy the superior quality and features of DVD video when the MPAA ignores them? This is not an issue about illegal copying and piracy. This is an issue that involves our personal freedom, and the right to use things that we legally purchase however we like, provided nobody is making a profit from it, or stealing from the MPAA. How can you steal market share from an organization who ignores that particular market? It just makes no sense.