The DeCSS has NOT changed my position on DVD's. I still have to buy them for my front room. My Panasonic DVD player in my front room does not run on software. Nor has any software released over the net changed my opinion on buying DVD's, or players.

Also, I do not believe that companies should be able to punish specific persons who are able to reverse engineer weak codes. That is also saying that people are not supposed to think. People are not supposed to "figure out how things work". I am to believe I am supposed to just accept that something works, and never ever attempt to figure it's inner workings??

I am appalled by the greed of the MPAA. This software does not affect DVD Players, and DVD movies sold to the millions of households that do not own a DVD drive on their computer, but do a DVD Player in their front room.

With technology, this event (the discovery of DeCSS) was going to happen. The MPAA is only capitalizing on the recent "hacker" witch hunt. Using the current rash of online attacks on a general name "hacker". The MPAA is also feeding on the ignorance of the mass. I am one individual who is intelligent to realize this notion. There are also thousands of others who also. If the MPAA does succeed in winning the injunction, and therefore winning against thought, I will ban, and help the campaign of, dvd's.
