

I buy my favorite CD's and then copy best songs to my computer in my own virtual albums and my portable music devices to carry with me. I strongly believe that copy-protected CD's infringe on my fair use rights and should be hacked - which is crime under your law. Do I have to buy new copy of particular song to use on every device? Don't be ridiculous - Chinese or Russians don't care about your law and will break any copy protection introduced, while we Americans are restricted by the snowballing of copy-protection technologies. You should encourage breaking copy-protection to guarantee that stupid and greedy companies don't trample citizen's rights, not outlaw them.
