MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE HEARING RECORD

TO EXAMINE THE IMPACT AND EFFECTIVENESS OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 2005

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC.

The Subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 2:30 p.m., in Room 2141, Rayburn House Office Building, the Honorable Steve Chabot (Chair of the Subcommittee) presiding.

Mr. CHABOT. The Committee will come to order.

We would like to thank everyone for being here today. This is the Subcommittee on the Constitution. I am Steve Chabot, the Chairman of the Committee. We are going to be having a series of hearings over the next 2 weeks. This is the first of eight and will be probably be followed up by additional hearings before this Committee on the Voting Rights Act after that.

This is the first of a series of hearings that the Subcommittee will hold examining the Voting Rights Act, also known as the VRA. It has been 25 years since Congress last extended the number of the temporary provisions of the VRA. Six provisions will expire in 2007, including sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 203.

These hearings will examine the impact of the Voting Rights Act over the last several decades and its continued role in protecting minority voting rights.

I would also like to add that as Chairman, I will make sure that these hearings are as thorough and as exhaustive as they have been in the past. I make that commitment because there is no right more fundamental than the right to participate in our democratic form of Government.

The ability of our citizens to cast a ballot for their preferred candidate ensures that every voice is heard, most importantly, the right to vote safeguards our freedoms and all other rights enshrined in the Constitution. The sacredness of the right to vote is reflected in the protection afforded by the 15th amendment which States "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

For too many of our fellow citizens in our history, this has not always been the case. Our country has had a troubled history of invidious and disparate treatment in the most fundamental process of a democracy, namely voting.

The VRA pushed back against this history and challenged racial discrimination from a number of different angles. These hearings have taken on even greater importance in light of the impact that past proceedings of have had on judicial review of the Voting Rights Act. Beginning with the Supreme Court's decision in South Carolina v. Katzenbach in 1966, Oregon v. Mitchell in 1970, and later in the City of Rome v. the United States in the 1980's, the Supreme Court has consistently upheld the constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act based on the record established by Congress.

Acknowledging the broad power of Congress to remedy racial discrimination under section 2 of the 15th amendment and the appropriateness of the Voting Rights Act in remedying that discrimination, the Supreme Court in Katzenbach held that "as against the reserve power of the States, Congress may use any rational means to effectuate the constitutional prohibition of racial discrimination." This was clearly a legitimate response to the problem for which there is ample precedent under other constitutional provisions.

In the Oregon case, the Supreme Court held that "in enacting the literacy ban, Congress had before it a long history of the discriminatory use of literacy tests to disenfranchise voters on account of race and statistics which demonstrate that voter registration and voter participation are consistently greater in States without literacy tests."

Finally in the City of Rome case, the Supreme Court upheld the continued use of the Voting Rights Act's temporary provisions finding that "in considering the 1975 extension, Congress gave careful consideration to the propriety of readopting section 5's preclearance requirement."

The VRA has become one of the most visible symbols of our Nation's progress toward becoming an integrated democracy. Its success is reflected in record numbers of African Americans, Asian American, Hispanics, Native Americans and Native Alaskans registering and turning out to vote and in the diversity of our local, State and Federal governments. In his March 15, 1965 address to Congress, President Lyndon B. Johnson stated "the Constitution says that no person shall be kept from voting because of his race or color. We have all sworn an oath before God to support and defend the Constitution. We must now act in obedience to that oath."

We, as elected officials, must continue to uphold that duty and ensure that the protections guaranteed in the Constitution are afforded to all citizens.

We look forward to hearing from our distinguished panel this afternoon.

And before I yield to the gentleman from New York, we generally would have all the witnesses testify and then we would question them. We are going to go a little bit outside that today because one of our distinguished panel, former Secretary Kemp has a plane to catch a little later and Mayor Morial is also still en route. So we are going to try to accommodate both of those gentlemen. And at this time, I will yield to Mr. Nadler for the purpose of making an opening statement.

Mr. NADLER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman I want to welcome our distinguished panel of witnesses and also thank you and Chairman Sensenbrenner for beginning the process of reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act. Although the sections requiring reauthorization do not sunset until 2007, it is not too early to begin consideration.

The right to vote, the right to have a meaningful vote is fundamental to our system of Government and to our freedoms. Sadly, for much of this Nation's history that principle was honored in the breach. Indeed, much of the history of our country can be seen as successive efforts to extend to all Americans the promise of the principles on which our Nation was founded and we did not really begin to approach that until the Voting Rights Act was passed in 1965 and began to be implemented a year or so later.

In that long march to freedom, the Voting Rights Act has played a central role. No one can deny that the act and its amendments has been instrumental in protecting and expanding the right to vote. As we consider reauthorization, we will need to examine not whether the act is still needed, but what, if any, modifications might be appropriate.

That is why these hearings are so important.

The Supreme Court has made clear that Congress, in enacting legislation, needs to make a clear record supporting its actions.

I must add at this point, since the Supreme Court has constituted itself and these questions a super legislature especially when it comes to protecting individual rights against the actions of the States. We have all been elected to public office and so we are all intimately familiar with the workings of the electoral process. I represent parts of two counties covered by section 5's preclearance requirements, Manhattan and Brooklyn; that is, New York and Kings Counties. Our city is also home to main language minorities who also need the protections of the act. As the home to many new Americans, our board of elections must work with multiple language minorities who need assistance to be able to exercise their right to vote.

My experience has shown that the act is still needed and that to the extent that the right to vote is safer now than it was 40 years ago, it is because the act is on the books and is working. I look forward to hearing from those who have been on the front lines from around the country to hear their stories and their analyses of the Nation's current needs.

The Voting Rights Act is not simply a benefit to the disenfranchised, although they are its primary beneficiaries, but to all of society. We are all better off when every citizen has the real right to participate freely in the democratic process. As we try allegedly to bring democracy to Iraq, I hope we can all work together to ensure that our precious liberty is protected and enhanced at home. I thank you, Mr. Chairman. I look forward to the testimony of our witnesses. I yield back.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much and all Members will have the opportunity to offer an opening statement if they chose to do so, but we will wait until we have heard from Secretary Kemp. And it is the practice of this Committee, Secretary Kemp, to swear all the witnesses. So if you wouldn't mind rising. We will wait for the mayor to come for you all to be sworn in as well.

And if you would please right your right hand.

Mr. CHABOT. Witness notes in the affirmative. And we welcome you here this afternoon. And you will be our first witness. And if I could give you a very brief introduction. Secretary Kemp has had a very distinguished career, first as a professional athlete; later as a Member of Congress, and also member of the cabinet; and now in the private sector where he currently serves on a number of Boards and lectures extensively on economic growth, free markets, free trade and tax simplification. From 1993 through 2004, Secretary Kemp served as co-director of the public policy institute, Empower America.

Prior to his work in the private sector, Secretary Kemp served in both the executive and legislative branches of Government. From 1971 until 1989, he represented the Buffalo and Western New York district in the House of Representatives. Subsequently, he was Secretary under President, former President Bush, as Secretary for Housing and Urban Development. That was from 1989 to 1993. In 1996, he was nominated to be the Republican Party's candidate for vice-president of the United States.

Secretary Kemp also finds time to time on various charities and boards, including serving as the vice chair of the NFL charities. Secretary Kemp, we are very honored to have you here today and your recognized for 5 minutes.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE JACK KEMP, FORMER MEMBER OF CONGRESS, FORMER SECRETARY OF HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT, FOUNDER AND CHAIRMAN OF KEMP PARTNERS

Mr. KEMP. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member, to all my old friends and colleagues, it is a pleasure to be back. I want to start where I finished my testimony. You all have a copy of it.

I said if we are to be American, America, that is, to be that shining city on the hill as an example to the world of liberal democracy and equality of opportunity, let us start by recommitting ourselves to forging bipartisan solutions to the Nation's continuing civil rights challenges and problems, including this which we are talking about today, reauthorizing the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act. I want to be on the side of history, I wasn't there, Jerry, if you don't mind me saying that, on the front lines of the civil rights movement. I was playing professional football. But I am here today to testify on behalf of this important legislation and those sections which guarantee social justice and equality of opportunity.

Let me say, it is a particular pleasure to be with Ann Marie Tallman, the President and General Counsel of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund, my old friend Joe Rogers, former Lieutenant Governor of Colorado, and, of course, Marc Morial, the new Chair and President of the Urban League, with whom I have been working on a Committee of Dennis Hastert, Speaker Hastert's called Saving America's Cities with Richard Daley, Anthony Williams, Marc Morial among others.

The most fundamental right, as you said, Mr. Chairman, of our democratic system of Government, is the right of people to participate in the political process. As you mentioned, the 15th amendment ensures the right of every American citizen, regardless of race, color or previous condition of servitude as it was enumerated in the 15th amendment, to vote and participate in the electoral process.

As we have seen in previous elections, some local governments have actively, and in some cases, very aggressively, attempted to disenfranchise African American and people of color and other minority voters. To quote Chairman Sensenbrenner," while we have made progress and curtailed injustices, thanks to the Voting Rights Act, our work is not yet complete. "We cannot let," he said, "the discriminatory practices of the past resurface to threaten future gains. The Voting Rights Act must exist" and exist, and I agree with his statement, Mr. Chairman, "in its current form."

Of all the civil rights legislation that the Nation has enacted over the past 4 decades, the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is arguably the most important, other than maybe the Emancipation Proclamation. Yes, every major piece of civil rights legislation has helped eliminate injustices such as discrimination in education, employment, and what I faced at HUD in housing.

As Chief Justice Roberts recently said in his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee last month, the right to vote is fundamental because it is protective of every other right we have as citizens.

That is why, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, it is important that the Congress renew all three provisions that are set to expire as mentioned by Congressman Nadler: Section 5, which requires Federal preapproval for proposed changes in voting and election procedures in areas with a history of discrimination, section 203 which requires some jurisdictions to provide assistance in other languages to voters who are not literate or fluent in English and the portion of section 6 and 9 of the act which authorized the Federal Government to send Federal election examiners and observers to certain jurisdictions covered by section 5, where there is evidence of attempts to intimidate people of color and other minority voters.

In my opinion, Mr. Chair, if section 5 is not extended, I am pleased to be here with Wade Henderson of the Leadership Council on Civil Rights, an old friend of mine from my congressional days and days at HUD, Wade has been a champion of making sure that this is done in a bipartisan basis. And he and his staff have made it very clear to me that if section 5 is not extended, if covered jurisdictions will not have to submit their voting changes to the Department of Justice, thereby the loss of Federal authority to control voting procedures could enable local governments to easily discriminate against minorities voters.

For example, some areas have challenged minority black districts which changed elected positions to appointed and then transformed district elections to at-large elections. These measures are proven to weaken, in my opinion, the strength of minorities and are the main cause for our joint concern.

Just close with this thought, Mr. Chairman, it was a Republican President, U.S. Grant, who sent Federal troops to enforce the Voting Rights Act of the 15th amendment in the early years of his Administration. It was President Eisenhower who sent Federal troops to enforce educational opportunity, Brown v. School Board, and I believe Lyndon Johnson deserved tremendous credit for his—not only his putting Voting Rights Act up in 1965, but to those Americans who did stand on the front lines, walked across Edmund Pettis Bridge, suffered dogs biting at them, snarling dogs, billyclubs and the violence that occurred over the Edmund Pettis Bridge on that first March led by our dear friend John Lewis.

So renewing the Voting Rights Act is a way for us to renew our vows, to make what you said is America's promise, that every American will have confidence that his or her vote not only can occur, but actually counts. Thank you.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE JACK KEMP

Just forty years ago, on a bridge outside Selma, Alabama, civil rights leaders and activists, led by Hosea Williams of SCLC, Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth, Ruby Sales and others, took to the streets in a peaceful protest for Voting Rights for African Americans. As they crossed the Edmund Pettus Bridge on the way to Montgomery, they were met with clubs, snarling dogs and violence. They were beaten and many severely injured, including a young SNCC activist named John Lewis, now Congressman Lewis of Atlanta, GA. But the activists did not march in vain.

Five days later, President Johnson announced to a joint session of Congress that he would bring them an effective voting rights bill. Echoing the spiritual anthem of the civil rights movement, Johnson told the chamber that "We Shall Overcome." A few months later, working with a bi-partisan group of members of Congress, Johnson made good on his promise and on August 6, 1965 signed into law the Voting Rights Act, hailed by many as perhaps the most effective and important civil rights law ever enacted since the Emancipation Proclamation.

The most fundamental right of our democratic system of government is the right of citizens to participate in the political process. The Fifteenth amendment ensures the right of every American citizen, regardless of race, color, or "previous condition of servitude" to vote and participate in the electoral process. However, as we have seen in previous elections, some local governments have actively and in some cases aggressively attempted to disenfranchise African American and minority voters.

To quote Chairman Sensenbrenner, "while we have made progress and curtailed injustices thanks to the Voting Rights Act, our work is not complete. We cannot let discriminatory practices of the past resurface to threaten future gains. The Voting Rights Act must exist—and exist in its current form."

This year, all who care about social justice and equal opportunity in America share one over riding goal: that Congress needs to renew the provisions of the Voting Rights Act which are coming up for reauthorization next year and which ensure that our nation's government reflects the views, the values, and, most importantly, the votes of the people it serves.

Of all the civil rights legislation that the nation has enacted over the past four decades, the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is arguably the most important. Yes, every major piece of civil rights legislation has helped to eliminate injustices such as discrimination in education, employment, and housing. But it is the Voting Rights Act that empowers Americans to take action against injustices by electing those who pledge to eliminate it and removing those who perpetuate it. As Chief Justice Roberts said in his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee last month, the right to vote is fundamental, because it is protective of every other right we have as citizens.

African Americans in the South were prevented from voting by a battery of tactics—poll taxes, literacy tests that were for blacks only, and the crudest forms of intimidation. From the Southwest to some urban areas in the Northeast and Midwest, Latinos were discouraged from voting by subtler but also effective techniques that exploited the vulnerabilities of low-income newcomers, for whom English was a second language. Both groups were also the targets of districting designed to dilute their ability to elect officials of their own choosing—a fundamental freedom that all too many Americans take for granted.

That is why it is so important that the Congress renew all three provisions that are set to expire: Section 5, which requires a federal approval for proposed changes in voting or election procedures in areas with a history of discrimination; Section 203, which requires some jurisdictions to provide assistance in other languages to voters who are not literate or fluent in English; and the portions of Sections 6–9 of the Act which authorize the federal government to send federal election examiners and observers to certain jurisdictions covered by Section 5, where there is evidence of attempts to intimidate minority voters at the polls.

The Voting Rights Act was reauthorized in 1970 and 1975. In both of these reauthorizations Congress heard extensive testimony concerning the ways in which voting electorates were manipulated through gerrymandering, annexations, adoption of at-large elections and other structural changes to prevent newly-registered black voters from effectively using the ballot. Congress also heard extensive testimony about voting discrimination that had been suffered by Hispanic, Asian and Native American citizens and the 1975 amendments added protections from voting discrimination for minority-language citizens.

In 1982, in an effort shepherded by Chairman Sensenbrenner, the act was amended and section 5 was reauthorized through 2007. Congress also adopted a new standard, which went into effect in 1985, providing how jurisdictions could terminate (or "bail out" from) coverage under the special provisions of Section 4. Furthermore, after extensive hearings, Congress decided that Section 2 should be amended to prohibit vote dilution without a requirement of proof of discriminatory purpose.

If Section 5 is not extended, the covered jurisdictions will not have to submit voting changes to the Department of Justice. Thereby, the loss of federal authority to control voting procedures could enable local governments to more easily discriminate against minority voters. For example, some areas challenge majority-black districts, change elected positions to appointive and transform district elections to at-large elections. These measures have proven to weaken the strength of minorities and are the main cause for concern.

Even now, forty years after the Voting Rights Act was passed by Congress, there are communities across the country where these provisions are still necessary. For example, the Department of Justice recently objected to a proposed annexation by the Town of North in Orangeburg County, South Carolina, because they concluded that the town did not provide equal access to the annexation process for white and black persons. In its September 16, 2003, objection letter, the Department stated that "race appears to be an overriding factor in how the town responds to annexation requests."

In August 2002, DOJ objected to a proposal by the City of Freeport in Brazoria County, Texas, to return to using an at-large system of electing members to its city council, after Hispanic voters succeeded in electing their candidates of choice utilizing a court-ordered single member district system. A return to at-large council elections, DOJ concluded, "would result in a retrogression of the ability of minorities to exercise the electoral franchise that they enjoy currently."

And despite requirements under Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, no bilingual assistance was made available to Vietnamese voters in Harris County, Texas, until the Department of Justice and local activists intervened.

Renew the Voting Rights Act and these problems won't disappear. But more Americans will have confidence that their votes really do count.

If we are to be that "shining city on a hill," as an example of liberal democracy and equality of opportunity let us start by recommitting ourselves to forging bipartisan solutions to the nation's continuing civil rights problems—including reauthorizing the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act. Let's carry on the historically important work that remains to become a "more perfect union" with equal justice and a government of, by and for the people.

Mr. KEMP. That may be the first time I have ever been on time in my congressional career.

Mr. CHABOT. We are impressed. And normally we would take the testimony here, but again we are going to question Mr. Secretary at this time. And I recognize for myself for 5 minutes for that purpose. Secretary Kemp, what has been the direct and indirect impact of the Voting Rights Act on minority voting rights over the last 40 years, both in covered jurisdictions and in noncovered jurisdictions in your opinion?

Mr. KEMP. Well, I am sure that Marc Morial and Ann Marie Tallman, and of course, my old friend Joe Rogers can better address that issue. But for instance, the town of North in Orangeburg County, South Carolina, concluded that the town did not provide equal access to the annexation process for both white and black voters. So in September 16th, 2003, in an objection letter, the Department of Justice had to state that race has appeared to be an overriding factor in how the town was responding to annexation requests.

There are instances where section 5 would be applicable to problems and challenges like that. So in my opinion, that speaks volumes to the necessity—I am not blaming everything on Orangeburg, South Carolina, or picking on the south.

There are many places in the North where there are problems, or in the West.

So in my opinion, unless we can come up with a better way of doing it, I think section 5 should be extended.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. Now some individuals have suggested that the Voting Rights Act has outlived its usefulness. And is it—we have only seen it for 40 years thus far, and obviously there were hundreds of years of discrimination that has taken place in this country.

What is your view relative to those that do—their point of view is, that as it has outlived its usefulness, it clearly served a useful purpose during that time, people have voted in fairly significant numbers that weren't voting before, it shouldn't be reauthorized. What is your opinion relative to that?

Mr. KEMP. Well, I think the testimony you will hear today will strongly object to that predisposition, number one.

Number 2, I would suggest—and again, I will mention the South and there has been tremendous progress. And I know there are States and cities and areas of the country that are as bad as some of the problems that occurred. But I would ask them to go with John Lewis and the Republican co-chair of the annual pilgrimage to Selma, Alabama and Montgomery and Birmingham, and find out from the people who were on the front lines what it was like then 40 years ago and what it is like today, and without prejudging anyone or anybody's motives, I can't imagine us saying that 40 years is enough, we have created nirvana, at least democratically speaking, and we don't need it. I think we do need it.

I am glad that Joe Rogers, a Republican, and Jack Kemp, a Republican, are here with distinguished men and women of color and minority status to say, emphatically and emotionally, actually, that all of my background, all of my life has been but a preparation for coming before this Committee and suggesting we have got to right these wrongs and make sure that this democracy truly can provide an example to the Middle East, to Africa, to Latin America, to Asia and the rest of the world. So, I think this is a wonderful attempt to, if it need be, modify it, tweak it, but don't ever lose this Voting Rights Act and its importance to the American people.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much, and in the interests of time constraints here, I am going to yield back the balance of my time recognize the gentleman from New York for 5 minutes.

Mr. NADLER. Thank you. Mr. Secretary, a couple questions. Number one, it has been observed that the United States is pretty unique among democratic countries—or many of our States pretty unique among democratic countries—restrict some of them for life the right to vote for former felons, and that this is a greatly racially disparate impact and, in fact, large segments in some areas of the black population and some other populations are denied the franchise. Do you think that the Federal Government, through modification of the Voting Rights Act, should control this or view this as a improper restriction of the franchise and should clamp down on it?

Mr. KEMP. My answer is unambiguously yes. It is a restriction. It needs to be modified. My wife is on the Board of Prison Fellowship, has been on there for 15 years. This weekend we are going to a retreat with prison fellowship Democrats, Republicans, black, white, brown. There are many people behind bars who have been incarcerated who have served their time and——

Mr. NADLER. They are not behind bars anymore.

Mr. KEMP. Should, I think, be given a chance to vote in our democratic process. Obviously, there have to be restrictions, but this panel has been convened for that exact purpose to find out what are the modifications that could be made that would bring social justice to the justice system. So I would say yes. They should be able to vote under proper restrictions.

Mr. NADLER. I certainly agree with you. Some of our States, New York, for instance says that if you're sentenced to 5 to 10 years, you are released 6 years, you are on probation for 4, when the total sentence is over then you get your vote back.

Some States bar you from voting for life.

Mr. KEMP. Yes, life.

Mr. NADLER. I agree with you. I think that is wholly undemocratic and we ought to deal with that in this bill.

My second question is, the preclearance provisions of section 5, they extend to jurisdictions mostly but not entirely in the South. Well, I am told you have to catch a plane right now, so I will ask somebody else the question.

Mr. KEMP. There are jurisdictions I think outside of the South.

Mr. NADLER. Yes, outside the South. My own district, Manhattan and Brooklyn. The question I wanted to say is where it is based on a history prior to 1965 of either actively restricting the right to vote or a combination of illiteracy tests—of having literacy tests, and under 50 percent of eligibles being enrolled at that time and therefore the presumption that you were using a literacy test.

Now, do you think that we are to look at either restricting where the act is applied or perhaps broadening it, should a test be more modern than 40 years old? Are there perhaps districts that ought to be subject to preclearance today that aren't?

Mr. KEMP. If you're asking me, my answer would be, Congressman, that would be one of the purposes of these hearings, to find out whether it should be ubiquitous, should it be part of the whole country? Or should it be restricted to those——

Mr. NADLER. That has been suggested. But the objection to that is it would so dilute the effect of the Justice Department oversight that it wouldn't be effective.

Mr. KEMP. Yes. Well, when I went to the Civil Rights museum in Selma, Alabama there is a display of what type of questions Alabamans were asked prior to the Voting Rights Act. How many bubbles in a bar of soap? I mean, things were used, and are still being used to a certain degree, in other jurisdictions.

Mr. NADLER. I am sure we still need this. My question is, should we look at perhaps modifying where it is to add or subtract that, and if so, on what basis?

Mr. KEMP. That is up to the wisdom of some other Committee. I don't have the answer to that. It may be that it should be more broadly applied.

Mr. NADLER. It may be. My next question I will ask Ms. Tallman. There was an article in the New Republic a couple weeks ago, I forget by whom, in which they said essentially—I just want your reaction to the essential recommendation of that article—and that article said that the preclearance as a practical matter, because in the areas where you need preclearance—even moving a voting booth across the Street has to be precleared.

As a practical matter, the only act when they say—they get a list of 600 voting booths being moved, and they send it to out to the local civil rights organizations and they say any problem? And they only really look into it if someone says, yeah, there is a problem. Otherwise it is trivial and they only give automatic exemption. I don't know whether that is true. But my question is, would it be a good idea or a bad idea to say that if preclearances, should have automatic preclearance except where someone making a complaint, that everything that is changed should be sent out to everybody, and if the Justice Department—if anybody says, hey, wait a minute, there may be a problem, then you should have a preclearance requirement, otherwise, after a certain period of time, it should go into effect automatically so as to remove trivia from the burden here, so they can concentrate on real abuses.

What do you think of that suggestion?

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired, but you can answer.

Ms. TALLMAN. Actually, the polling place changes is pretty significant—can be very significant to voters that have been voting for 40 years in the same location. So what appears on its face—potentially on its face—to be perceived as a small change and ought to have automatic preclearance, would actually defeat the purpose of section 5.

Section 5 requires that jurisdiction——

Mr. NADLER. You have to understand my question. Could I have an additional minute?

Mr. CHABOT. Yes, the Chair, however, would encourage the Members to direct the questions to Mr. Kemp because those folks haven't——

Mr. NADLER. I fully recognize that these can be extremely—a voting booth change can be extremely important or it can be trivial, either one. I mean the question is since many of these things can be trivial, and since you want the Justice Department to spend its resources where they are not, where there is a possibility, does it make sense not to have automatic clearance, that wasn't the suggestion. The suggestion was that if no one either sua sponte the Justice Department by itself or somebody, some civil rights organization says that one we ought to look at, that that would go through, or is that a bad idea for some reason?

Ms. TALLMAN. A section 5 jurisdiction has had a history of discrimination. A section 5 jurisdiction has not used the bailout provision under the Voting Rights Act. A section 5 jurisdiction is a jurisdiction who ought to be scrutinized with regard to any changes in voting patterns or practices. So I would argue that section 5 is pretty clear.

Mr. NADLER. That is a bad idea. I appreciate that. Thank you very much.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired. Gentleman from Michigan is recognized for a short period of time to make a statement.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I couldn't let this opportunity to go by. Here we are at this historic hearing, beginning again to re-examine the importance of extending the Voting Rights Act and improving it where necessary. And our first witness is the former Member of Congress from New York, Jack Kemp, with whom I may be the only one here that has served with him during his period in the Congress. And I am very proud of the statement that he has made today.

As usual, he is leading Republicans and Americans alike to join in with us at this extremely auspicious beginning of a series of hearings of how we continue moving America forward on its most important document, the provision for voting, for everybody, to have it counted, and to have it be encouraged.

Mr. KEMP. Thank you.

Mr. CONYERS. It is good to see you again, Secretary Kemp, and I am glad that you started us off in the way that you have.

Mr. KEMP. Thank you.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman from Arizona, Mr. Franks, is recognized for 5 minutes. And again, we would encourage for the Members on both sides to direct questions to Secretary Kemp.

Mr. FRANKS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you Mr. Secretary, for being here. A lot of us feel like we are standing on your shoulders. That is not to suggest that you're old or anything like that.

Mr. KEMP. 70.

Mr. FRANKS. We should all like to carry 70 as well as you do, sir.

Mr. KEMP. Thank you.

Mr. FRANKS. Mr. Secretary, 40 years ago, some of the barriers that prevented minorities from participating in the political process were things like literacy tests and white primaries and poll taxes, and I know some of the things have changed to some degree, but what do you think are the primary and most egregious mechanisms that prevent minorities from actually participating today?

Mr. KEMP. Well, one thing that I wanted to mention after the support that I have alluded to for section 5 is section 203, which requires jurisdictions to provide assistance in other languages to voters who are not literate or fluent in English. Let's face it, you can go to Los Angeles County where I grew up and there is probably 60 to 75 different languages spoken from Vietnamese to Korean to Chinese to Russian to Persian, and clearly, people do not need Federal assistance if the jurisdiction is not providing them with access to voting lists and the information that they deserve as American citizens.

Probably very controversial because you know we are somewhat xenophobic about people from outside our borders. It is too bad because there are a lot of people that need help. And I think it should be given. That is one of the biggest barriers to making this democratic experiment work—for all people, that is.

Mr. FRANKS. I think it goes without saying that a lot of people who are citizens of this country still have not mastered the language in every way so you make a good point.

Secretary Kemp, you wrote an opinion, an op ed piece that was published last August. And it recognized the 40th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act and you described the impact that it has had in those 40 years. And of course, you advocated for the renewal of the act.

And what could we do to improve or make better the act for the next 25 years if you were writing it yourself?

Mr. KEMP. Oh, wow, I am no longer a legislator.

I appreciate my friend John Conyers's comments about the friendship that we developed many years ago, even though we differed on some issues, he was the one that came to me and said, Jack, Dr. King's "I Have a Dream" speech is right down your alley and Dan Lungren and Jack Kemp were basically the cosponsors in the Republican party of the King holiday. I felt very proud about that, John, then, and I do so today.

I think really think the hearings, Congressmen, are going to bring out areas that could be changed or reformed or modified or made progress on.

I think—I personally believe that someone who has been incarcerated—and let's face it, that does impact people of color a lot more than anyone else, unfortunately and tragically. I think they should be allowed to vote if they perform and meet the standards that we would hold them to as New York does, as Jerry Nadler pointed out.

My hope would be that that would be an area that could be improved upon. Perhaps section 5 can be improved upon by a careful—I use the word tweaking, reforming, and I will leave it to my expert friend Marc Morial and Ann Marie Tallman and Joe Rogers to take it further.

I would also suggest that you listen to Wade Henderson and his leadership conference because I think Wade, probably as far as I am concerned, is the expert. I hope I am not putting too much pressure on him. But he understands the need for bipartisanship and that was—I think, John, that is what we really need today more than anything else. This may be a place where we can rise above color and race and ethnicity and political divisions in our country and make a statement that would bring hope to the American people that we can work together for the greater good.

Mr. FRANKS. Well, Mr. Secretary, you were one of the few former Members that were here the last time this was reenacted, and I think this says a great deal for your commitment to human freedom and the American ideal, and I appreciate all that you have done.

Mr. KEMP. I like what the Chairman said, and I like what Chairman Sensenbrenner said to the NAACP convention a few weeks ago. It was really a powerful statement. If it's all right with you, Mr. Chairman, I have to catch a plane. I apologize.

Mr. CHABOT. Do any other Members have a very quick question they would like to ask? Are you okay?

Quick question for Secretary Kemp? Anybody on this side that has something pressing?

Yes, Mr. Scott. If you could make it relatively quick.

Mr. SCOTT. This will be fairly quick, and thank you, Mr. Secretary and thank you Mr. Chairman.

One of the problems with eliminating the preclearance provision is people get an advantage by cheating because by the time you remedy it, you have had the opportunity to serve, and if you ever remedied it, you would be running as an incumbent. Now you have run for public office as an incumbent and against incumbents.

What are the advantages in running as an incumbent?

Mr. KEMP. That is a good question.

To be brutally honest, Congressman Scott, I never even thought about it when I was running. I didn't. It really impacted me emotionally and intellectually when I went to HUD and began to see the problems of urban America from a firsthand existential experience. And then the trip I took with John Lewis down to Selma, Montgomery and Birmingham for the first time several years ago on the civil rights pilgrimage. And I remember vowing at that time I was going to be a voice for some who are voiceless. And so I don't have a great answer to your question.

Mr. SCOTT. My question, though, is just the politics of running for election. It is a lot easier to run if you're the incumbent.

Mr. KEMP. Absolutely.

Mr. SCOTT. Could you say a little bit about that? Because we are trying to establish a record. If you run as an incumbent, you have an advantage.

Mr. KEMP. Mmh hmm.

Mr. SCOTT. And if you have cheated and jury-rigged the election in a discriminatory fashion and got elected and then they finally fixed it, and after they fixed it, you get to run for re-election as an incumbent, an advantage you should have not have been able to get. And if there was preclearance, you never would have gotten. And just to set the record straight, we don't want people to have the advantage not only of serving illegally, but when we finally fix it, if the plaintiffs can afford the lawsuit to get it right, we don't want people who have cheated to benefit from their cheating by having the advantage of running then subsequentlyas an incumbent. So can you say a word about whether or not there are advantages in running as an incumbent?

Mr. KEMP. I totally agree with your statement. I was in the Congress from New York's 41st district. It ended up New York's 36th district after lost population. And I was redistricted several times, mostly by Democratic legislatures.

And, frankly, they just decided they weren't going to beat me so they gave me a very Republican district. I started out in a Democratic district. And I must admit I did everything I could to make sure I could run again. But I do understand what you're saying. I agree with it unambiguously, and I applaud your concern for that issue of the advantage incumbency gets. But every one of us knows deep in our hearts that we love the advantage. We love the advantage.

We use it to every benefit of our own, but I agree with your statement and I appreciate it.

I am going to jump, Mr. Chairman, if you don't have any questions.

Mr. CHABOT. One more minute. Mr. Feeney. I thought you had a question.

Mr. FEENEY. Well, I don't, but the Secretary is a good friend, and we are very grateful for your presence here. We want to make sure you catch your plane.

Mr. KEMP. Thank you. I appreciate that.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much, Secretary Kemp, we appreciate your time here this afternoon. And I would like to at this time introduce the rest of the panel.

Our next witness will be the very honorable Marc H. Morial, current President and CEO of the National Urban League. Prior to joining the National Urban League in May 2003, Mr. Morial served from 1994 until 2002 as Mayor of New Orleans.

He also served as President of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, where he developed and advocated a national urban policy, his area of expertise.

Mayor Morial, I know that my colleagues join me in keeping in our thoughts and in our prayers the folks in New Orleans right now, and I know it hits you particularly hard, having represented that city for such a long time. So, we appreciate you being here this afternoon.

And our third witness will be Ann Marie Tallman, President and General Counsel of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund. Prior to joining the group, Ms. Tallman specialized in the area of public finance law for the Denver law firm of—help me with the pronunciation——

Ms. TALLMAN. Kutak Rock.

Mr. CHABOT. In 1993, Ms. Tallman was appointed as Deputy Director of Planning and Community Development Agency in the city and county of Denver. In this capacity, Ms. Tallman was responsible for advising the Mayor on housing and community development matters. And we welcome you here this afternoon, Ms. Tallman.

Our fourth and final witness is the former Lieutenant Governor of Colorado, the Honorable Joe Rogers.

Lieutenant Governor Rogers currently serves as Commissioner on the National Voting Rights Commission, a bipartisan panel of academics, civil rights leaders and governmental and policy officials charged with examining the effectiveness of the Voting Rights Act in the past 25 years.

Since early this year, the National Voting Rights commission has held a series of hearings nationwide examining the prevalence of discrimination in voting since 1982. The Commission anticipates releasing their report in January 2006. Prior to serving on the Commission, Lieutenant Governor Rogers served as Colorado's Lieutenant Governor and had the distinction of being the youngest serving lieutenant in our Nation's history, and only the fourth African American in the country to be elected as a State's number 2 elected official.

In addition to his work on the Commission, Lieutenant Governor Rogers spends his time lecturing and engaging in motivational speaking. We welcome you here this afternoon, Lieutenant Governor Rogers.

And for those who have not testified before the Committee, before, you probably know that we have a 5-minute rule where each of you gets to testify for 5 minutes, and we are able to ask questions for 5 minutes. And we have a lighting system there which you probably have seen. The yellow light will come on when you have 1 minute to wrap up. When the red light comes on if you could conclude at about that time or shortly thereafter if at all possible.

And we also—it is the practice of the Committee to swear in all witnesses and we had already sworn in Secretary Kemp, so if the 3 of you would mind raising your right hand and please stand.

Mr. CHABOT. All the witnesses have indicated in the affirmative, and we welcome all three again this afternoon and we will begin with you, Mayor Morial.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE MARC MORIAL, PRESIDENT AND CEO, NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE

Mr. MORIAL. Thank you very much, Chairman Chabot—in Louisiana, we would say Chabot—and Representative Nadler and Members of the Subcommittee. Let me thank you as I begin for the support of the Congress in appropriating money to assist with the recovery in New Orleans. I appreciate it. And certainly urge your continued support.

Today, I have the opportunity to share with you my thoughts on the 1965 Voting Rights Act and the enormously positive impact it has had on this Nation. I am gratified to know of your strong support for the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act and appreciate your leadership on this very important subject. The importance of the Voting Rights Act and its necessity cannot be overemphasized.

We have learned through experience what a difference the vote make to us. In 1964, the year before President Johnson signed the act into law, there were only 300 African American elected officials in this Nation. Today, there are more than 9,100 black elected officials in this Nation, including a record for the Republic of 43 serving in both Houses of the Congress of the United States this term.

As you know, before I took the helm of the National Urban League, I was an elected official in Louisiana, proudly serving in its State Senate and later serving two terms as Mayor of the City of New Orleans. I followed in the foot steps of my late father, Ernest "Dutch" Morial who served as the first African American mayor of New Orleans.

Importantly, he served when he was elected in 1967 as the first African American elected official in Louisiana in 1967 since at that time the days of reconstruction. So Louisiana went almost 100 years despite having almost a one third African American population with zero elected officials until the passage of the Voting Rights Act in 1965.

It is unlikely that either he nor I nor many of the Members who serve in this Congress or the many African Americans who serve in State legislatures, particularly in the south, but across the Nation, would have been able to serve their cities, their States and this Nation without the passage of the Voting Rights Act.

Let me be clear. Expanding the opportunity to vote in America goes far beyond simply ensuring that minority voters have a voice or that African American politicians get elected. The Voting Rights Act, I believe, has enhanced the lives of all Americans, not just black Americans, not just Americans of color.

By opening up the political process, the Voting Rights Act has made available a broader pool of political talent, greatly improving the quality of representation for all Americans and all voters.

Just as important, the Voting Rights Act has been instrumental in moving America closer to its true promise, and thus has significantly benefited every single American regardless of race, color, economic status, national origin or political party.

I have heard it suggested that the Voting Rights Act, or certain key provisions, need not be reauthorized because its very success has rendered it obsolete. Indeed, not only is this a fallacy, but the opposite is true. I urge you in the strongest possible terms not to fall for that. The Voting Rights Act must be reauthorized because it is an important piece of legislation that works.

The great strides that we have taken in the last 40 years have been possible precisely and only because the Voting Rights Act has been in place.

Unfortunately, while this Nation has made great progress in the last 40 years in this area, we certainly aren't where we need to be or where we want to be.

Across this Nation, African Americans and other minorities continue to face obstacles to exercising their full voting rights. That is why Congress must reauthorize the act and its special provisions including the section 5 preclearance requirement.

I have a special interest in and history with preclearance provisions because of the long, tragic and documented history of discriminatory voting practices in my home State, Louisiana. It is one of those States required by section 5 to obtain preclearance for any proposed change in our election laws or procedures.

This provision, section 5, has been critical in the curtailment of voting rights abuses over the past 40 years. In fact, a bipartisan congressional report in 1982 warned that without this section, discrimination would appear overnight. And I believe that this is still true today.

For example—and I think this is important—since 1965, not one single Louisiana State House of Representatives redistricting plan as initially submitted to the Justice Department for review, has been precleared. Not a single one. In other words, in the last 40 years, every single State House redistricting plan adopted immediately after the census and submitted for preclearance in Louisiana has been found both by Republican and Democratic Attorneys General to abridge the right to vote on account of race or color or membership in language in a minority group.

In case after case, the efforts of the civil rights division of DOJ and minority voter advocates prompted Louisiana to withdraw its original plan and restore districts where African Americans had an opportunity to elect a candidate of choice.

There are, indeed, many African Americans elected officials in Louisiana. It is clear that attempts to undermine minority voting power in Louisiana continue to show its face from time to time in the present day.

Without preclearance, these and other discriminatory voting plans would, without a doubt, be put into place not only in Louisiana, but throughout the country. And we as a Nation would take a giant step backward.

We have come far, as I have said, because of the Voting Rights Act and the enforcement of section 5. Five gives full transparency to voting procedures. It deters State officials from proposing discriminatory voting changes, and the preclearance process also educates State officials in what the Voting Rights Act requires and how to formulate nondiscriminatory policies and redistricting plans.

I am gratified at the degree of support on both sides of the aisle for reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. And I think this is a moment in history when true bipartisanship can be a beacon of hope and a beacon of light and a high point for this Nation. I urge you to recognize a continued need for preclearance and other provisions that are so necessary for the progress we must make as a Nation. And I thank you for your attention and I will take your questions.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much, Mayor Morial. I appreciate your statement.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE MARC MORIAL

I appreciate having the opportunity to share with you my thoughts on the 1965 Voting Rights Act and the enormously positive impact it has had our nation. I am very gratified to know of your strong support for reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act and appreciate your leadership on this important issue of our time.

The importance and necessity of the Voting Rights Act cannot be over-emphasized. We have learned through experience what a difference the vote makes to us. In 1964, the year before President Johnson signed the Act into law, there were only 300 African American elected officials in the entire country. Today, there are more than 9,100 black elected officials, including 43 members of Congress.

As you know, before I took the helm of the National Urban League, I was an elected official in Louisiana—first in the state legislature and then as a two-term mayor of New Orleans. I followed in the footsteps of my father, Ernest "Dutch" Morial, who was the first African American to serve as Mayor of New Orleans. I saw first-hand the tremendous impact that the 1965 Voting Rights Act on my state, for without it, it is unlikely that either one of us would have been able to serve the city and state we loved so much.

Let me be clear: expanding the opportunity to vote in America goes far beyond simply ensuring that minority voters have a voice or that African American politicians get elected. The Voting Rights Act has enhanced the lives of all Americans, not just black Americans, not just minorities. By opening up the political process, the Voting Rights Act has made available a broader pool of political talent, greatly improving the quality of representation for all voters. Just as important, the Voting Rights Act has been instrumental in moving America closer to its true promise and, thus, has significantly benefited every single American, regardless of their race, economic status, national origin or political party.

I've heard it suggested that the Voting Rights Act—or certain key provisions—need not be reauthorized because its very success has rendered it obsolete. This is a fallacy—and I urge you in the strongest possible terms not to fall for it. The Voting Rights Act must be reauthorized BECAUSE it works!

The great strides we've taken in the last 40 years have been possible precisely and only because the Voting Rights Act has been in place. Unfortunately, while our nation has made great progress in the last forty years in the area of voting rights, we're not yet where we need to be. Across the country, African Americans and other minorities continue to face obstacles to exercising their full voting rights. That is why it is Congress must reauthorize the Voting Rights Act and its special provisions, including the Section 5 pre-clearance requirement.

I have a special interest in and history with the pre-clearance provisions. Because of our long, tragic, and documented history of discriminatory voting practices, Louisiana is one of the states required by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act to obtain pre-clearance for any proposed changes in our election laws or procedures. This Section 5 requirement has been critical in the curtailment of voting rights abuses in the last 40 years. In fact, a bipartisan Congressional report in 1982 warned that without this section, discrimination would reappear "overnight." That is still true today.

For example, since 1965, not one Louisiana State House of Representatives redistricting plan as initially submitted to the Justice Department for review has been pre-cleared. In other words, in the last 40 years, every single State House redistricting plan adopted immediately after the Census and submitted for preclearance in Louisiana has been found, both by Republican and Democratic Attorneys General, to abridge the right to vote on account of race or color or membership in a language minority group.

In case after case, the efforts of the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice and minority voter advocates prompted Louisiana to withdraw its original plan and restore a district where African Americans had an opportunity to elect a candidate of choice. While there are indeed many African American elected officials in Louisiana, it is clear that attempts to undermine minority voting power in Louisiana continue to the present day.

Without the pre-clearance requirement, these and other blatantly discriminatory voting plans would—without a doubt—be put into place throughout the country and we would take a giant step backward.

We have come as far as we have precisely because of the existence and enforcement of Section 5. Section 5 gives full transparency to voting procedures that would otherwise be too complex, technical, or hidden for the public to discover. It also deters state officials from proposing some discriminatory voting changes in the first place. They now take extra care to involve minority communities in policy-making, under threat of Section 5 complaints. The Section 5 pre-clearance process also educates state officials in what the VRA requires and how to formulate non-discriminatory policies.

I am gratified at the degree of support—on both sides of the aisle—for the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. I urge you to also recognize the continued need for pre-clearance and other special provisions that are so necessary for the continued progress we must make as a nation.

Thank you for your attention. I will be happy to take your questions.

Mr. CHABOT. I also have a statement that I have been presented here, the Rainbow Push Coalition, it was because we only have four witnesses available on the panel, we can't accommodate another witness. But we would like to put the statement in the record and without objection that statement will be submitted for the record.

Ms. Tallman, you're recognized for 5 minutes at this time. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF ANN MARIE TALLMAN, PRESIDENT AND GENERAL COUNSEL, MEXICAN AMERICAN LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATIONAL FUND

Ms. TALLMAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Members of the Subcommittee. Thank you for the invitation to testify regarding the reauthorization of the temporary provisions of the Voting Rights Act. I am Ann Marie Tallman, President and General Counsel of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

We are a nonpartisan organization that protects the civil rights, including the voting rights, of over 40 million Latinos living in the United States.

America's leadership recognized at home and abroad is defined by our democracy. Our democracy is a Government in which the sovereign power resides in and is exercised by the citizenry through representative Government. Simply put, democracy and the right to vote are our country's competitive advantage.

Our democracy works best when we have confidence that when we exercise our franchised rights, we will be free from harassment, unnecessary scrutiny, discrimination, or artificial barriers that may be placed in our way to dissuade us or to discourage us from exercising our most fundamental right that preserves all other rights.

In 1965, Congress passed, and President Johnson signed into law, the Voting Rights Act to bring us closer to freedom in the United States. Of course, the act, by itself, failed to eliminate persistent discriminatory voting schemes. It required vigorous enforcement not only by the United States Department of Justice, but by organizations like MALDEF to make the promise a reality.

The Voting Rights Act has done more for any other law to ensure that we, as a Nation, progress beyond the discriminatory election laws that have marred our democratic processes. Although important gains have been made, the VRA remains a necessary tool for protecting voting rights.

Two VRA components are especially important to the Latino community, section 5 and the language minority provisions. The impact of section 5 encountering discriminatory election laws cannot be overemphasized.

Section 5 has prevented voting discrimination against Latinos as well as African Americans and has fostered the unprecedented Latino political participation that we see today at all levels of American Government.

Section 5 prevents covered jurisdictions from changing the rules of the game to disadvantaged minority voters.

By invalidating discriminatory election laws before they are put into place, section 5 removes the need for minority voters to bring costly litigation to protect their voting rights.

A recent section 5 challenge bought by MALDEF in Texas demonstrates how section 5 preserves the voting rights of Latinos. In 2001 where Latinos had reached one-third of the State's total population, Texas proposed a redistricting plan for its State House of representatives that minimized Latino voters influence in State elections. Because the plan added only one new Latino majority district and eliminated 4 such districts, the United States Department of Justice concluded that it was retrogressive and blocked its implementation.

As a direct result of the DOJ's section 5 action, Texas kept the four Latino majority districts that has afforded Latino voters the opportunity to elect their candidate of choice. Had section 5 not been in effect, these districts would not have likely existed.

MALDEF seeks the reauthorization of section 5 for the next 25 years with language clarification, regarding Congress's intent to prohibit intentionally discriminatory voting changes.

Currently, 4.3 million voting age citizens are limited English proficient. Section 203 allows that these citizens can cast informed and effective ballots and is implemented in a very cost-effective basis. If Congress does not reauthorize the language minority provisions of the VRA, Latino and limited English proficient Asian Americans and Native American citizens will be unable to vote.

A recent challenge brought by MALDEF in Illinois, demonstrates the continued need for the language minority provisions. In 2002, Cooke County purchased a voting system that did not adequately inform Spanish voters, Spanish speaking voters. MALDEF challenged the system, obtained a consent decree for more Spanish speaking poll workers, new training and monitoring.

This would not have been possible without section 203.

MALDEF seeks reauthorization of the language minority provisions with an adjustment to the coverage formula to section 203 to include jurisdictions between 7,500 and 10,000 language minority citizens.

We have worked for over 37 years to ensure that Latinos' voting rights are protected. On behalf of MALDEF and other civil rights organizations that work every day to protect the voting rights of minorities in this country, I urge Congress to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act to reflect the original intent of these critical provisions.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ANN MARIE TALLMAN

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, thank you for the invitation to testify regarding the reauthorization of the temporary provisions of the Voting Rights Act (VRA). I am Ann Marie Tallman, President and General Counsel of MALDEF, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund. We are a nonpartisan organization that protects the civil rights of the over 40 million Latinos living in the United States.

Since our founding in 1968, MALDEF has challenged voting laws that deny Latinos an equal opportunity to participate in the political process. In Garza v. Smith in 1970, MALDEF won a ruling that permitted illiterate persons, many of whom were Latino, to receive assistance in casting ballots. MALDEF also frequently sought the elimination of at-large elections that deprived Latino voters of their ability to elect their candidates of their choice. Our first successful single member district lawsuit, White v. Regester in 1973, resulted in the election of three Latinos and one African American to the Texas State Legislature and laid the legal groundwork for the present interpretation of Section 2 of the VRA.

In 1976, following the enactment of the language minority provisions of the VRA and the extension of Section 5 to the Southwest, MALDEF successfully challenged a Texas law that would have had a devastating effect on Latino voting power by requiring the annual re-registration of all voters. MALDEF also pressured the city of San Antonio to change from at-large to single member districts. In the next election, a record 29 Latino candidates filed and an unprecedented five Latinos were elected to the ten-member San Antonio City Council.

The Voting Rights Act is widely considered one of the most effective pieces of civil rights legislation in American history. It has helped to usher in an era in which Latinos and other minority groups are generally better able to register, vote, and elect their candidates of choice. Prior to 1965, many Latinos, especially in the Southwest, were excluded from full political participation by poll taxes, exclusionary primaries, intimidation by voting officials, and language barriers. Latino votes were also routinely diluted through the use of mechanisms like at-large voting and numbered place election systems. The Voting Rights Act has done more than any other piece of legislation to ensure that we as a nation progress beyond the discriminatory election laws that have marred our democratic processes. Despite these important gains, however, the VRA remains a necessary tool for effectively protecting the voting rights of Latinos and other minority groups.

The focus of my testimony today will be upon two areas of paramount concern to millions of Latino voters in the United States: Section 5 and the language minority provisions Section 203 and 4(f)(4).

The impact of Section 5 in countering discriminatory election laws cannot be overemphasized. This provision of the VRA, which affects almost as many Latinos as it does African Americans, has been essential in stimulating the unprecedented Latino political participation that we see today at all levels of American government. Section 5 prevents covered jurisdictions from 'changing the rules of game' to disadvantage minority voters before these voters can seek redress for the deprivation of their voting rights. Section 5's effectiveness in protecting minority voting rights lies in its shifting the burden of proof from the minority voters who have historically been subject to discriminatory practices to the covered jurisdictions seeking to change their election systems. By invalidating discriminatory election laws before they are put in place, Section 5 removes the need for minority voters to continually bring costly litigation to ensure that their voting rights are protected.

A recent case brought by MALDEF in Texas demonstrates how Section 5 works to preserve the voting rights of Latinos. In 2001, when Latinos had reached one-third of the State's total population, Texas proposed a redistricting plan for its House of Representatives that minimized Latino voters' impact in three districts and completely eliminated a fourth Latino-majority district. Because the plan added only one new Latino-majority district and eliminated four such districts, the U.S. Justice Department concluded that it was retrogressive and blocked its implementation under Section 5. As a direct result of DOJ's Section 5 intervention, the current Texas House redistricting plan maintains the four Latino-majority districts that were dismantled and contains a total of thirty-five districts that afford Latino voters the opportunity to elect their candidate of choice. If Section 5 were not in effect, these districts would likely not exist.

MALDEF seeks reauthorization of Section 5 with language clarifying Congress's intent to prohibit intentionally discriminatory voting changes as well as to preserve 'ability to elect' as the touchstone of Section 5 review.

Also of great importance to Latino voters are the language minority provisions contained within Sections 203 and 4(f)(4). Currently, 4.3 million Latino voting age citizens are limited English proficient. If Congress does not reauthorize the language minority provisions of the VRA, these Latino citizens will be unable to effectively exercise the franchise.

A recent challenge brought by MALDEF in Illinois demonstrates the continuing need for the language minority provisions. In 2002, Cook County, Illinois purchased a voting system that used punch-cards with "voter error notification" capabilities that was incapable of notifying Spanish-speaking voters of problems with their ballots. This voting system, combined with the county's failure to provide Spanish-speaking poll workers, left many Latino voters unable to cast effective ballots. MALDEF challenged the county's voting system under the bilingual assistance provisions of the Voting Rights Act and negotiated a consent decree on behalf of Latino voters in which the county agreed to increase the number of Spanish speaking poll workers and implement new training, monitoring, and hotline procedures. This protection of Latinos' ability to cast an effective ballot would not have been possible without Section 203 of the VRA.

MALDEF seeks reauthorization of the language minority provisions with an adjustment to the coverage formula of Section 203 to include jurisdictions containing between 7,500 and 10,000 language minority citizens.

MALDEF has worked for 37 years to ensure that Latinos' voting rights are protected. Section 5 and the language minority provisions of the VRA have been and continue to be our greatest tools. On behalf of MALDEF and other organizations that work to protect minority voting rights, I urge Congress reauthorize the Voting Rights Act to reflect the original intent of its crucial provisions.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much. I appreciate your testimony this afternoon.

And Lieutenant Governor Rogers, you are recognized for 5 minutes.

STATEMENT OF JOE ROGERS, FORMER LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF COLORADO

Mr. ROGERS. Thank you so much, Mr. Chairman. It is good to be with you. We are delighted to join you as Members of the Subcommittee. Thank you kindly for having us here today.

It was good to see Congressman Watt in particular at our hearing that just took place this past week, as a matter of fact, so it is a delight to join you. We're honored to join you in particular in my capacity as the former Lieutenant Governor of Colorado, and I'm pleased to serve on the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act.

It is an honor to be before this distinguished Subcommittee as it conducts its first hearing related to reauthorization of this seminal piece of legislation. Indeed, major provisions of which are due to expire in 2007.

I am here to discuss the work of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. The Lawyers' Committee For Civil Rights Under Law indeed created the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act on behalf of the civil rights community creating indeed this nonpartisan national commission.

The National Commission is comprised of eight leaders whose represent our Nation's diversity. The Honorable Charles Mathias, former United States Senator from Maryland, is the Honorary Chair. And Bill Lann Lee, the former Assistant Attorney General for civil rights, indeed serves as Chairman of our commission. The other commissioners are the Honorable John Buchanan, former United States Congressman from Alabama; Chandler Davidson, the scholar and editor of one of the seminal works on voting rights in the United States; indeed Delores Huerta, cofounder of the United Farm Workers of America; Elsie Meeks, the first Native American Member of the United States Congress; and Charles Ogletree, the Harvard Law School professor and noted civil rights advocate; and yours truly.

In January of 2006, the National Commission will release its formal report detailing indeed the existence of discrimination in voting since 1982, the last time there was a comprehensive reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. To date, the National Commission has held nine of ten planned field hearings throughout the United States. We have heard from approximately 100 elected officials, election officials, voting rights attorneys, experts in voting cases, community leaders and concerned citizens who indeed have testified regarding their experiences relating to voting discrimination.

The commission's report will contain information from the hearings as well as include extensive research culled from many sources, including findings, reports, testimony from court cases and enforcement records of the Department of Justice. The report will not advocate any particular legislative action. Instead, the purpose of the report is to detail the facts that will inform your debate and the debate throughout the United States regarding reauthorization.

Because the commission's research is continuing, it would be premature for me to detail the commission's findings. Nonetheless, I would like to identify a few trends that have emerged from our hearings which are discussed in greater detail in my formal written statement which you all have.

First, the problem of discrimination in voting appears to be significant, and it affects virtually every region of the country. In stating this, it is important for me to note that compared to 1965, Mr. Chairman, there has been significant progress in our great Nation regarding race and voting, and indeed a decrease in blatantly racist or bigoted activity as it relates to voting in the United States. Nonetheless, whether the impetus is bigotry or simply plain old power or the idea of enhancing power at the expense in particular of minority voters—this sometimes occurs—official discrimination in voting remains a problem in the United States.

Second, in many areas of the country, voting continues to be racially polarized. By that we simply mean, it is a circumstance where white voters will simply only vote for white candidates and, frankly, in circumstances where minority voters will only vote for minority candidates. One consequence of racially polarized voting is that minority voters cannot elect candidates of choice or preference perhaps if it is by race or ethnicity. That simply may not be an option unless there is a majority or near majority of the electorate. Moreover, when racially polarized voting exists, a desired electoral result can be obtained by simply changing the voting procedure or practice that harms minority voters.

Third, application of the minority language provisions frequently result in increased participation of minority language voters and an increased ability of such voters to elect candidates of their choice.

Fourth, the Federal mandate of section 203 enables election administrators throughout the country to provide needed minority language assistance without political interference. In a soon-to-be-released comprehensive survey of section 203, indeed, it is noted that 71 percent of election administrators throughout the country support reauthorization of section 203.

Fifth, the existence of section 2 does not obviate the need for section 5 as some have suggested. Section 5 prevents discriminatory procedures from being implemented at little or no cost to minority voters and civil rights advocates. In contrast to section 2, litigation is complicated, often time consuming and frankly plain resource intensive.

When the commission's report is complete, this commission indeed is ready, willing and perfectly able to provide the report to this Judiciary Committee and frankly to discuss its contents fully with you. And we would welcome the opportunity to come back before this commission with the formal findings indeed.

Thank you so much for this chance today.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Rogers follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF JOE ROGERS

Testimony of Joe Rogers
Before the Judiciary's Committee Subcommittee on the Constitution
United States House of Representatives

Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee. My name is Joe Rogers. I am the former lieutenant governor of Colorado and currently serve on the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. It is my pleasure and privilege to be before this distinguished subcommittee as it conducts the first hearing relating to the reauthorization of Voting Rights Act provisions scheduled to expire in 2007. I am pleased to be back on Capitol Hill where I spent several years serving as counsel to Colorado's former United States Senator, Hank Brown, who served on the Senate's Judiciary, Budget and Foreign Relations Committees.

I am here today to discuss the work of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. Before doing so, I wanted to provide some background on the Act and reauthorization. Forty years ago, in the face of great social turmoil, the Congress enacted legislation that made the promise of the right to vote under the 15th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution a reality, ninety five years after the Amendment's passage. This legislation, the Voting Rights Act, is generally considered to be the most effective piece of civil rights legislation ever passed by the Congress. The Act, with its combination of permanent and temporary provisions, has enabled tens of millions of minority voters to fully exercise their right to participate in the political process and elect candidates of their choice. Since 1965, Congress has reauthorized the Voting Rights Act in 1970, 1975, 1982, and 1992. With each reauthorization, Congress has expanded the Act's scope to confront emerging issues of voting discrimination that emerged from the Congressional hearing.

The expiring provisions which we are examining today include some of the core provisions of the Act. In addition to the coverage formula for some of the temporary provisions that is set forth in Section 4 of the Act, three substantive provisions will expire in 2007 if not reauthorized. First, Section 5 of the Act requires certain states, counties, and townships with a history of discrimination against minority voters to obtain approval or "preclearance" from the United States Department of Justice or the United States District Court in Washington, D.C. before they make any change affecting voting. These changes include, but are not limited to, redistrictings, changes to methods of election, polling place changes, and annexations. Jurisdictions covered by Section 5 must prove that the changes do not have the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority. In recent years, the Supreme Court has limited the scope of Section 5 to voting changes that have the purpose or effect of worsening the position of minority voters. Second, Section 203 of the Act requires that language assistance be provided in jurisdictions or reservations where 5% or a total of 10,000 of the voting age citizens have limited-English proficiency and speak a particular minority language. Four language groups are covered by Section 203: American Indian, Asian, Alaskan Native, and Spanish. Covered jurisdictions must provide language assistance at all stages of the electoral process. As of 2002, a total of 466 local jurisdictions across 31 states are covered by these provisions. Third, Sections 6(b), 7, 8, 9, and 13(a) of the Act authorize the Attorney General to certify the appointment of a federal examiner to jurisdictions covered by Section 5's preclearance provisions on good cause and/or to send a federal observer to any jurisdiction where a federal examiner has been assigned. Since 1966, 25,000 federal observers have been deployed in approximately 1,000 elections.

The Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law -- acting on behalf of the civil rights community-- created the non-partisan National Commission on the Voting Rights Act to document the record of enforcement of these provisions and the state of discrimination in voting during the past 23 years. The National Commission is comprised of eight advocates, academics, legislators, advocates and civil rights leaders who represent the diversity that is such an important part of our nation. The Honorary Chair of the Commission is the Honorable Charles Mathias, former Republican U.S. Senator from Maryland and the Commission Chair is Bill Lann Lee, former Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights. The other commissioners are: the Honorable John Buchanan, former Congressman from Alabama; Chandler Davidson, scholar and co-editor of one of the seminal works on the Voting Rights Act; Dolores Huerta, co-founder of the United Farm Workers of America; Elsie Meeks, first Native American member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights; Charles Ogletree, Harvard law professor and civil rights advocate; and me. The Commission has two primary tasks: first, to conduct field hearings across the country to gather testimony relating to voting rights, and second, to write a comprehensive report detailing the existence of discrimination in voting since 1982, the last time there was a comprehensive reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act.

To date, the National Commission has held nine of ten planned hearings. It has held regional hearings in Montgomery, Alabama (March 11, 2005); Phoenix, Arizona (April 7, 2005); New York, New York (June 14, 2005); Minneapolis, Minnesota (July 22, 2005); Orlando, Florida (August 4, 2005); Los Angeles, California (September 27, 2005); and Washington, DC (October 14, 2005). The National Commission has also held state hearings in Americus, Georgia (August 2, 2004) and Rapid City, South Dakota (September 9, 2005). There will also be a state hearing in Jackson, Mississippi on October 29, 2005. We have heard from approximately 100 witnesses, who range from elected officials, election officials, voting rights attorneys and social science experts, community leaders, and concerned citizens who have testified about their experiences related to discrimination in voting.

The Commission's report will contain information from the hearings and extensive research culled from many sources including findings, reports and testimony from court cases and the Department of Justice enforcement record. The report's analysis will be quantitative and qualitative. The report will utilize maps to show graphically where there has been discrimination in the last twenty-three years. The report will not advocate for any particular legislative action. Instead, the purpose of the report is to detail the facts that will inform the debate concerning reauthorization.

At the request of the Judiciary Committee's staff, we have provided transcripts and testimony from the National Commission's hearings to the Judiciary Committee and we will provide all of the transcripts and testimony when the hearings are complete.

The reason an examination of the factual record is so important is that in order for Congress to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act in a manner consistent with recent Supreme Court rulings, Congress must have before it a record of discrimination in voting that is "congruent and proportional" to the remedies provided in the Voting Rights Act. Congress always has met this requirement in past reauthorizations of the Act. In fact, in recent cases where the Supreme Court has found that Congress exceeded its authority in enacting remedial legislation that went beyond the record supporting such legislation, the Court has cited the enactment and reauthorizations of the Voting Rights Act as the prime example where Congress developed a record of discrimination that necessitated a legislative remedy. As previous Congresses that have examined the Act, we certainly hope and expect that this Congress will engage in the same type of careful examination, and we are extremely pleased that the House Judiciary Committee has taken its charge seriously based on the number and scope of the hearings it has scheduled.

Because one National Commission hearing remains and the report is months away from completion, it would be premature for me to detail the Commission's findings. Nonetheless, I would like to identify a few trends that have emerged from the hearings:

First, the testimony (and supporting documents) and the factual record of objections and cases filed under the Act reveal that the problem of discrimination in voting is significant and affects virtually every region of the country. In stating this, it is important to note that compared to 1965 there has been progress in regard to race and voting. Indeed, there has been a decrease in blatant racist activity as it relates to voting. Nonetheless, there are a significant number of state actors who in an effort to maintain or enhance their power have taken actions that clearly discriminate against minority voters. Plainly, whether the impetus is bigotry or power the end result – discrimination against minority voters—is the same.

Though minority participation has increased dramatically since the enactment of the Act, there are a number of devices that our witnesses have identified that have been used to negate the effect of increased minority voter participation. These devices include: changing from single member to at large districts, manipulating district lines to either pack or fragment minority voters, moving polling places, and selectively annexing or deannexing property to affect the racial demographics of a jurisdiction.

Second, in many areas of the country, voting continues to be racially polarized – most whites vote for different candidates than most minority voters. In the last decade, federal court cases involving statewide redistricting plans in Georgia, Louisiana, South Carolina, South Dakota and Texas have found that racially polarized voting exists in their states. This is consistent with the testimony of witnesses who have discussed the existence of racially polarized voting. For example, Professor Richard Engstrom, one of the leading experts in the field, testified that his analysis shows that race still forms a demographic division in politics. Since the 2000 census, he conducted studies of racially polarized voting in several states. He found that racially polarized voting played a role in all levels of office from governor to the school board. This overwhelming pattern of racially polarized voting means that minority voters usually cannot elect candidates of choice unless they are a majority or near majority of the electorate. Professor Engstrom found this phenomenon prevalent in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi and North Carolina. Because of racially polarized voting, a new voting procedure that harms minority voters is likely to achieve the electoral result desired by state actors who make the change.

Third, application of the minority language provisions frequently results in increased participation of minority language voters and a dramatic impact on the ability of such voters to elect candidates of their choice. Here are two of the several examples we have heard during the hearings. Although the City of Lawrence, MA had been covered by Section 203 since 1984, the jurisdiction had done little to comply with the law until the Department of Justice filed suit against the City in 1998. When the suit was filed, there was only one Latino elected to the City Council in its history. The lawsuit was settled in 1999 and one of the key provisions of the settlement was that the City was required to hire a Spanish-language elections coordinator. In the first election after the settlement, three Latinos were elected to the nine-member City Council and today four Latinos sit on the nine-member City Council. This increased electoral power has led to more responsive city government with the city hiring its first Latino police chief and school superintendent after the filing of the lawsuit. In Harris County, Texas, the County did not fulfill its obligations under Section 203 to provide language assistance to its Vietnamese voters.

After an agreement with the Department of Justice in 2003, the County provided the required assistance: bilingual poll workers and properly translated materials. In November 2004, voters in Harris County elected Hubert Vo, the first Vietnamese member of the Texas state legislature, by a handful of votes.

Fourth, the federal mandate of Section 203 enables election administrators to provide needed minority language assistance without political influence. In a soon to be released comprehensive survey of Section 203 covered jurisdictions by professors and students at Arizona State University, 71% of election administrators who responded to the question supported reauthorization of Section 203. Several election administrators have testified that because of the federal mandate, they are able to provide language assistance that otherwise might not be provided as a result of cost or policy issues raised by the elected governing body. The ASU survey also found that 46% of respondents stated that they incurred no additional expense in providing language assistance.

Fifth, the existence of Section 2 does not obviate the need for Section 5. There are several critical differences between Section 5 and Section 2. As the Supreme Court held in 1966 and Congress has stated in subsequent reauthorizations of the Act, Section 5 shifts the advantage of time and inertia from jurisdictions to minority voters. At little or no cost to minority voters and their advocates, voting changes that violate Section 5 are never implemented. In contrast, to establish a Section 2 violation, minority voters must hire a lawyer and experts and file an expensive lawsuit that may take several years to resolve. For example, in early 2001, the Department of Justice and private plaintiffs filed a lawsuit alleging that the method for electing the County Council for Charleston, South Carolina violated Section 2. The plaintiffs prevailed and three black preferred candidates (all of whom were African American) were elected in the first election under single-member districts in 2004. The county spent over $2 million defending the lawsuit and has been ordered to pay the plaintiffs $700,000 in attorneys' fees. The Department of Justice also expended substantial resources. In 2003, after the federal district court had found in plaintiffs' favor, the South Carolina General Assembly passed a law which changed the method of electing the Charleston County School Board to that used by the County Council. The Department of Justice objected to this change under Section 5, thus preventing a second lawsuit that would have taken several years and cost millions of dollars.

In addition, Section 5 blocks jurisdictions from making last minute voting changes that harm minority voters. In months preceding the 2004 primary election, the Criminal District Attorney of Waller County, Texas threatened students at Prairie View A&M University, which has a 90% African American student body, with felony prosecution if they voted. The Prairie View A & M University NAACP filed a lawsuit against him that was settled shortly thereafter. Five days after the lawsuit was filed, and a month before the March 2004 primary election, the Waller County Commissioners' Court, the county governing body, voted to decrease the number of hours of early voting at the polling place where the students voted from 17 hours to 6 hours. This was particularly discriminatory because the students were on spring break on the date of the primary. A second lawsuit was filed on the ground that the Commissioners' Court had not sought Section 5 preclearance for this last minute change. Within a week after the Section 5 enforcement action was filed, the Commissioners' Court restored the number of early voting hours. A total of 346 students voted during the restored early voting period and a student running for Commissioners' Court prevailed in his primary by less than 40 votes.

The Commission's report will go into much greater detail about the issues discussed above and a multitude of other issues. The Commission will be working very hard over the next couple of months to detail as complete a record as possible of the current state of racial discrimination in voting. When the report is complete, the Commission is ready, willing, and able to provide the report to the Judiciary Committee and discuss its contents if the Judiciary Committee or the Subcommittee on the Constitution so desires.

Thank you for inviting me to testify at today's hearing.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much, Lieutenant Governor Rogers.

And now the Committee Members will have 5 minutes to ask questions, and I yield myself 5 minutes for that purpose.

Okay. I'll ask each of the witnesses this question, and you can answer it any way you see fit.

What has been the direct and indirect impact in your view of the Voting Rights Act on minority voting rights over the last 40 years? And if you could, if you could answer that with respect to both covered and noncovered jurisdictions if you so choose.

So we will begin with you, Mayor Morial.

Mr. MORIAL. I stated in my testimony the increase in the number of African-American elected officials. But maybe because everyone on the panel is an elected official, frankly, before 1965, even though there was a small number of African-American voters in New Orleans and in Louisiana, very few candidates for public office even bothered to campaign in black communities, show up in black communities, pay attention to the very existence of African-American communities. And therefore, it was very visible, you could ride through neighborhoods and look at public improvements, the conditions of playgrounds, the conditions of streets and the great disparities that existed.

The Voting Rights Act, which gave a greater voice to African-American communities in the south, forced, quite frankly, even in cases where white candidates were running against each other, it made the African-American voter a very significant player in the electoral process. And so it isn't just a case of African-Americans getting elected to public office, although I think that is a highlight. It is also the way in which majority candidates have responded to the African-American community, realizing that because they are full and complete participants in the democratic process, you have to campaign to them, you have to pay attention to them. And that's a real sort of on-the-ground effect.

It also translates into in the process of governing, to those communities being paid attention to when public benefits, public improvements are, in fact, doled out by a city council, by a State legislature, by a mayor or by a governor. So those are some real, I think, impacts beyond—you know, the existence of African-American elected officials is important. But, really, the true impact is the power of the voter to have his issues heard, his voice represented in the deliberative process and in the law-making process and in the executive process in our cities, States and at the national level.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much.

Ms. Tallman, did you want to respond?

Ms. TALLMAN. Yes, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

There have been significant improvements in the political participation of Latinos as a result of the Voting Rights Act. In 1982, for example, there were nine Hispanic Members of Congress. Today, there are 25. There are also two Latino U.S. senators. There are also approximately 5,000 Latino elected officials at the State and local level.

We believe that those strides would not have been made had the voting rights section 5, section 203 been in existence. We have made good strides in language provisions where the 5 percent of the voting population in a jurisdiction that has special language requirements, where voting materials are provided to those individuals so that they understand the ballot and are able to exercise their right to vote. I think that those strides have been very good in enhancing and improving our democracy and ensuring that every single individual who is a citizen can actually exercise their right to vote.

So I think the Voting Rights Act has had profound implications for not only us being a better representative form of Government as a country with the increased number of Latinos, African-Americans and people of color in jurisdictions at the State and local level and at the national level, but I also think that it has done a great thing in opening the dialogue on issues that impact all communities, which is very important and critical in our country.

Mr. Chabot. Thank you very much.

And Lieutenant Governor Rogers?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, when you were asking the question, the first thought that came to mind, frankly I was 1 year old, I had just turned one when this act was passed in 1965. I am 41 years old today. I think about the circumstances in terms of the life of my own family, sir. I know that you have worked hard to run for office, and you have done good things for many years. My grandfather ran for public office in 1960 in Omaha, Nebraska. In 1960, the sum total of African-Americans elected in the United States was right around 200 or so elected officials in America. When my grandfather ran for office, he ran for the school board in Omaha, Nebraska. It would have made him the highest elected official in the State of Nebraska.

When my grandfather ran in that election, his campaign theme was: Democracy is for everyone. I have never forgotten that, and I have kept his campaign card throughout the years as, frankly, a source of personal inspiration in terms of my own life.

I remember that, and I remember his life. He lost that election in 1960. Ten years later, in 1970, he was elected to serve the school board in Omaha, Nebraska. Change took place in America as a result of the sea of change that occurred right here in this body.

I know that you all deal with multiple pieces of legislation. You all deal with multiple issues, and you all know as well as I do, your staffs will be tugging on you to deal with 500 things throughout the course of this day and so many things to come. But this act, over the course of the last 40 years, as your statement indicated, has been seminal in its impact and remarkable in its scope. It shifted us as a country. It opened up new possibilities for people. Because what it simply said is, this fundamental right, this right to vote, to cast your ballot for the person who you hope will represent your interest in whatever capacity—whether they are the local city council person or a State legislature or in any capacity, perhaps in this august body of Congress—that frankly individual votes count and make a difference.

So when I look at the provisions of this act, it is real, and it is substantive. When I look at the provisions regarding preclearance in section 203, it is clear that the Federal Government just didn't say, you have the right to vote. That was arguably implicit in the 15th amendment. It was implicit in the 14th amendment. But what the Congress of the United States said was, we will enforce this right to vote, and preclearance gives you the ability to help enforce the provisions of the act. And certainly with section 203, Mr. Chairman, it is absolutely clear in terms of the data that we have received throughout the country that it has led to a remarkable increase in terms of the number of language minorities that participate in this process.

Many of you all campaign in bilingual languages. You campaign in Spanish. Some of you all might send out something. If you were in Louisiana, you might send out something in the French language or otherwise. We are all seeking to appeal to voters, and why not appeal to them in the language where they are? This has enabled that to happen.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much.

My time has expired.

The gentleman from New York, Mr. Nadler, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. NADLER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Let me start by asking the witnesses the first question I asked Secretary Kemp. It has been observed that a number of States in the union greatly restrict the right to vote of former felons. Some of them, some States—Florida, for example, is one that comes to mind—for life. This has a racially disparate impact. Starting with Mayor Morial and Ms. Tallman.

Mr. FEENEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NADLER. Yes.

Mr. FEENEY. In fairness to Florida, there is a process——

Mr. NADLER. Reclaiming my time. I know, a process that never works. Except for Chuck Colson.

Do you believe that it would be useful in terms of fairness in voting for the Voting Rights Act as we extend it to be amended to put some sort of control on this to say that ex-felons, once they have served their turn or X number of years after they served their term, must have their right to vote restored?

Mr. MORIAL. Congressman Nadler, I'm glad you raised that. The answer without question is, yes. Let me see if I can state the principle here. The idea here is that a person who has in fact served their time, paid their dues, ought not be permanently restricted. They should not have a lifetime sentence, in effect, or a long sentence in terms of removing their constitutional rights.

If you put it on another level, would we ever think of restricting a person's right to speak, right to exercise their religion, any other of the enumerated constitutional rights for life because they were convicted of a felony? My view would be, and I think it is our position at the National Urban League, that a national standard which provides an opportunity for those who have paid their dues to society—let's emphasize that for the record—completed their prison term, completed their period of parole, ought to have the right to vote again. It is important, certainly, to giving them a chance to reintegrate back into society and to feel that they are going to be a full part of society.

Mr. NADLER. Thank you. I would add, it is important, if we're going to call ourselves a democracy, that everybody have the right to vote.

Ms. Tallman?

Ms. TALLMAN. Representative, we applaud Congress' leadership role in ensuring the right to vote for minorities in the United States. It has been a very important leadership role that Congress has filled, and as a result, there are millions of people in this country whose lives are better for it.

One of the issues that still remains to be addressed is allowing those that have served their time, as Marc Morial has stated, to be able to fully reenter into society and to be able to exercise the right to vote. By voting, and participating in the voting process, people are more likely to engage in other civic endeavors. And so there are real benefits to voting and to having ex-felons vote. So we believe that it is certainly something that Congress could demonstrate.

Mr. NADLER. Thank you.

Lieutenant Governor Rogers.

Mr. ROGERS. Congressman Nadler, I can't take a position on behalf of the commission. We have not——

Mr. NADLER. On behalf of yourself. What do you think of it?

Mr. ROGERS. I differ, frankly, from my colleagues to some extent on this issue. And I think in terms of States, individual States have policies that, you know, have varied in terms of what happens to felons and the right to vote. And the Supreme Court has upheld the ability of individual States to deal with this issue. And I can only tell you, in having governed a State, I believe that determination should be left in many respects to Colorado.

Mr. NADLER. Do you think a State should have a right to say to someone who is 17 when they committed a felony, has served 3 or 4 years in jail, when they are 77 should not be allowed to vote? Or is that a fundamental right—such a fundamental violation of civil rights that Congress should say to a State that you can't do that.

Mr. ROGERS. The Supreme Court has held that it is not——

Mr. NADLER. No, no, Supreme Court has said it is a matter of constitutional law. We don't have to have the Voting Rights Act at all as a matter of constitutional law. The question is, we have chosen to have the Voting Rights Act. Should we choose to say to a State that you're State's right does not extend to depriving a person of the franchise for life because he committed a crime 30 years ago?

Mr. ROGERS. I tend to think in this area, to some extent, a State should have the ability to decide this issue and certainly when your dealing with people who obviously committed these crimes and otherwise, that that policy in many respects should be left up to the individual States to handle. You are talking about, obviously, there are a number of complexities that are involved to some extent in this issue, and it has varied by State in terms of how it is applied. And I am an advocate of the ability and the right of the States in their own sovereignty.

Mr. NADLER. Could I have one additional minute?

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. NADLER. I would pose the following question, first to Lieutenant Governor Rogers, in this order.

Mr. CHABOT. As long as they can answer.

Mr. NADLER. Wait a minute. Doing it as quickly as possible. Don't you think that the fact is, as we have observed, that perhaps one of the largest ways, one of the easiest—not easiest, one of the major ways of disenfranchising disproportionate numbers of people of color, et cetera, is by lifetime prohibitions on the right to vote for ex-felons? Isn't that the way it is used today in certain States?

Mr. ROGERS. Please forgive me, but I would not agree with that, Congressman. Let me tell you why, if I may. The assumption that you are making is that you have such a substantial number of minorities, for example African-Americans or Latinos, that are engaged in felonious conduct——

Mr. NADLER. Or that are arrested and convicted in a disproportionate number.

Mr. ROGERS. The assumption—please forgive me—is that it is such a significant number that it has a dramatic impact on the people as a whole, when we find in reality is that it is not that. You don't have African-Americans that are overwhelmingly in prison. You don't have Latinos that are overwhelmingly in prison. You are still talking about a significant minority within our peoples as a whole.

Ms. TALLMAN. There are many flaws in the criminal justice system as it relates to racial discrimination and racial profiling. As a result, oftentimes there are individuals that are convicted of crimes that are innocent, and there are individuals that are convicted of crimes and sentenced to tougher standards because of their race or ethnicity.

We believe that disenfranchising permanently individuals who have served their time is bad for democracy, and as a result, we would suggest that Congress look at the issue.

Mr. MORIAL. I would offer this. I think if you looked at the practices and laws of all 50 States, you would find the most restrictive provisions for the most part with respect to the voting rights of those who have been convicted of a felony in the very same States that are covered by section 5 and the very same States that have large minority populations.

On the other hand, you would see the least restrictive provisions in those States with small minority populations and in States that are not covered by the section 5 of the Voting Rights Act for the most part.

The second point I would make, if you looked at the genesis of many of these provisions that restrict the right of convicted felons to vote, they have their genesis in the post-Reconstruction backlash which occurred in the South. So if you look at facts, the facts are going to paint a picture in terms of what the—some suggest what maybe the motivation of some of these provisions have been, they were disenfranchisement provisions.

And I applaud you for raising this issue, but I think it is so important to keep the perspective that we are talking about people who have already served their time. It could be for something such as theft of an automobile. It could be a felony of a white collar nature.

Mr. NADLER. Or smoking marijuana.

Mr. MORIAL. It could be smoking marijuana. It could be something that is treated as a felony and therefore restrictive. I appreciate your raising it.

Mr. CHABOT. The Chair would note that the gentleman's 1 minute expired 3 minutes and 6 seconds ago.

Mr. NADLER. Appreciate the forbearance of the Chair.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman from Arizona, Mr. Franks, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FRANKS. Mr. Chairman, I have no questions at this time.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Conyers, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Just so that Mr. Rogers will sleep more comfortably in his bed at night, the bill that we have introduced which deals with ex-felon voting deals only with voting in Federal elections. So they don't try to tell the States what to do, and obviously, the States can't interfere. And that's the way we get around the discussion that has been raised here.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. David Scott of Georgia has joined us and obviously not a Member of the Committee, but his interest is overriding in this matter. And I just wanted you to know that he was present and that he is very welcome to the Committee.

Mr. CHABOT. I share your sentiments, and Mr. Scott is a very distinguished Member of the House. And we welcome him with open arms at our meeting, and we appreciate his caring enough to be here today.

Thank you very much for being here, Mr. Scott.

Mr. CONYERS. Now, the witnesses have been significantly in agreement today, which argues well for the first hearing and what we have got to go through to get this measure through as quickly as we can. Even though it is 2007, we still need to get this measure out before this 109th session expires. And so that is why there are a number of hearings that have been set up, some two, sometimes three in a week, to get us moving along.

We have talked a lot about the South, but as has been pointed out, New York has areas that are covered by the Voter Rights Act of 1965. In Michigan, I have two townships in two different counties that are covered by the Voter Rights Act. And so wherever there are problems existing, that's where we go to deal with them. And it is very clear that this problem is not over, as every witness has testified to.

And I think is that is very important. I wanted to raise the question that seems important to me, that even over and above the protection of this cornerstone of democracy, the right to vote and have your vote counted, are there other benefits that derive to the American system of democracy by having a Voter Rights Act extended, by having it strengthened wherever necessary, by having the expired provisions covered again? And I'd like to throw that open for the examination of anybody that would like to talk with me about it.

Ms. TALLMAN. Thank you so much, Representative, I applaud your leadership in the voting rights arena and the civil rights arena, sir. You're very well regarded, not only in the African-American community among civil rights advocates but the Latino community applauds all the work that you have done, so thank you very much for your leadership.

I think that one of the most important aspects of the Voting Rights Act is providing voters the confidence in voting. A democracy works when people, when they go to the voting booth, they will be free from harassment. They will not be targeted. They will not be discriminated against. They will be able to bring a relative or friend with them if they have limited English proficiency, if they are disabled, if they need assistance in the voting booth.

We are willing to protect freedoms in new democracies that are emerging around the world. We need to protect our democracy at home. And giving people the confidence in voting that they must have to know that democracy works has been a critical component of the Voting Rights Act.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you.

Mr. MORIAL. I think I would just add on a general basis, and I think we have enumerated specifics, but I think one of the key things is for our practices to reflect our principles, for the idea that democracy and the universality of suffrage is made real by that. The nation today has been involved in efforts to, quote, promote democracy abroad. Some of those efforts have been efforts to ensure that ethnic or religious minorities in countries a long way away from here have the right to freely participate without intimidation in the franchise.

We have to be consistent, and being consistent means ensuring that the same practices and the same principles are followed here in the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. Absolutely. And Congressman, I echo those sentiments as expressed frankly by Marc. Clearly, the Voting Rights Act sets a standard. It sets a standard for the United States in terms of our ability to participate in this notion of democracy, this remarkable gift of democracy. And it helps to clearly espouse that in many respects throughout the world as we seek to do so throughout the world.

So is it seminal it its scope? Is it broad in its range? Is it key to the fundamental element of who we are? I think clearly, as we have indeed received testimony across the United States, the answer to that question seems to be overwhelmingly yes.

Mr. CONYERS. I thank all of you because we have uncovered, particularly in this Committee, innumerable instances in voting in which people have been discouraged, misdirected, given improper information, sometimes from the electoral system locally itself. And as you said, you cannot believe in democracy if you are not being encouraged to choose who is going to govern.

And so I thank all the witnesses, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. The gentleman's time has expired. Before recognizing the gentleman from Florida for his 5 minutes, the gentleman from Arizona who had yielded back his time I think wants to take a minute to make a statement. So I recognize him at this time.

Mr. FRANKS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And in all respect to the panelists and the Members here, we have talked almost to the extent that we have redirected the focus of the hearing today on some of the ex-felon disenfranchisement.

And the Voting Rights Act doesn't really address that at all. And I am hoping that the panel will address some of the issues that affect those law-abiding citizens who are indeed being disenfranchised in their voting, and I think that is something to maintain our focus upon.

Mr. CHABOT. I thank the gentleman.

The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FEENEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think that the gentleman from Arizona's comments are right. I hate to get totally sidetracked on voting rights issues on the question of whether or not the problem with American democracy is too few convicted felons are determining the outcome of elections.

I will tell you that, with respect to the constitutional issues here, remember, Katzenbach was very narrowly decided, and its determination was, this is an extraordinary exercise of the congressional power, dictating to the States based on the 15th amendment, which mentions race, color or former condition of servitude. Unless there is a direct tie to race, color or former condition of servitude, there may no longer be a foundation for Congress to overwhelm and dictate to the States.

And I would say that, in fairness to Florida, my friend from New York said that the application never works. Well, that is just not true. We have streamlined the process. And it is true we don't have automatic restoration when your sentence is over, but among other things, we ask for restitution, evidence of rehabilitation. The notion that a violent rapist ought to have his rights fully restored while his victim still has medical bills unpaid offends some Floridians, and that, I think, is something that policymakers in the State can decide.

I was really interested, Mr. Rogers, in some of the findings that your commission has found. And I'm sorry that a lot of the questioning hasn't been directed to that, because, remember, in the Gingles test, in order to legitimately make a section 2 claim—we haven't asked questions, but you did a good job going over it—there has to be some findings. We have to find that we have compact and significant numbers of minorities in an area that are underrepresented when it comes to redistricting or opportunities to select candidates of their choice. We also have to find that there are cohesive voting patterns among the minorities if they had an opportunity. And finally, the third prong of that test is that there is significant cohesion among the traditional voting patterns of the majority, where minorities are denied their opportunity.

And that, I think, is the most important thing that has been said all day in terms of the importance of the current rationale for any Voting Rights Act whatsoever. And I would ask you to elaborate on that and, to the extent that there is time, the other two panelists. But I think that is the most important thing has been said, and I would ask you, as you make that case that the Voting Rights Act is still relevant and apparently you have heard testimony that we have not heard yet, because this is our first hearing—this is wonderful stuff, and this is what we ought to be focusing on. We have got at least two Supreme Court justices that, based on the equal protection amendment, you have Thomas and Scalia saying that race-based district drawing is always inappropriate. That was a fair and reasonable rational position. We need to counteract that if we are going to have a fair and reasonable rationale for continuing or extending the Voting Rights Act. We have at least two justices that think that it is inappropriate.

Sandra Day O'Conner, who tends to be a swing vote on all these issues—we have had a court of one until it is redone on things like the Voting Rights Act and redistricting, and O'Connor is the court. She decides, as the swing vote, virtually every meaningful case that has been decided in the last 15 years. And O'Connor said in a separate issue, but related issue—remember the Michigan law school preferences case—she said she wants to get to a color-blind society and has condemned the Balkanization of America. And she has said perhaps in 25 years we can get rid of race-based districts.

So the debate is between, on the one hand, people who think we ought to have permanent race-based voting processes and districts; on the other hand, people like Scalia and Thomas and Abigail Thernstrom, who said we should never do it; and people like O'Connor and the rest of us who think we need to remedy problems when they occur.

I hope we will get the details of the evidence that you have collected because that is what we need to be focused on in my view here. Let's get back to section 2 and section 5. I wish I had an hour to go into the rationale and the basis and the meaning of that. But Mr. Rogers, if you would address that question.

Mr. ROGERS. Absolutely. Thank you, Congressman, for your thoughts on the same. It is absolutely clear. You are dealing with reauthorization as it relates to two provisions, section 5 and section 203. And those are the provisions that come up for reauthorization this coming year. The Supreme Court has made it very clear—and when I think about the standard I'm reflecting on the City of Boerne v. Flores opinion, in which the court essentially cited Congress and Congress' example of finding a factual basis for essentially invoking legislation as being key to its constitutionality.

And in this case here, your establishment of the factual record, looking at the patterns or practices as they exist or you might find they do not exist throughout the United States is frankly the most important determination following this legislative body. Ultimately, the Supreme Court will deal with the management of these cases. What we have clearly seen throughout the United States is, with respect to section 5, which comes up for reauthorization, since 1982, literally the Department of Justice has had over 600 submissions that have been objected to involving some 2,000 individual objections. And that's just simply since 1982 as it relates to congressional districts throughout United States as a whole. Not to mention the private cases, for example, that have been filed throughout the United States dealing with the provisions of section 2, section 5, section 203, for example, by the Department of Justice.

The factual record in and of itself over the course of the last 23 years and what we are finding in terms of our determinations—and again, I don't want to be too premature—indicates that there are still remaining significant problems. The most fascinating thing about this, Congressman, is the nature of the problem in and of itself is being articulated. It is kind of different in the way it is being articulated today. As you well know, Congressman Conyers, in that era, the movement the country was in a different mode. There were different ways that people talked about issues and problems in our society. That was a different language at the time.

Even though the language may have changed here in the year 2005, the reality is that we are still seeing, unfortunately, practices being engaged. So it is done under a different name. It's done under a different label with, for example, what it is, is a movement from district-based elections to at-large elections on whims. It's the elimination wholeheartedly of elected positions saying that we are not going to have the elected office anymore. This often takes place at the local level in principal part as we are finding around the country, and it varies.

For example, testimony that we heard, what was going on in Chicago, for example, or what we heard that was taking place in California in Los Angeles, those are not classically southern cities. Frankly, what we heard, Mr. Nadler, about New York and heard about issues related to problems related to voting or the testimony that we received there, all of those issues were of deep concern.

The factual basis—and we're delighted to provide this information to the Committee—we believe will give you some information upon which you can say we ought to move forward on reauthorization or we ought not to move forward, but at the very least you will have the facts upon which to make a decision.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you.

The gentleman's time has expired.

The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Scott, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank our witnesses. They have contributed a great deal to our proceedings. And I wanted to start my questioning by asking Ms. Tallman, focusing on the preclearance provision, some have suggested that since section 2 is sitting up there, why do you need section 5? Can you—if the legislature passes an illegal plan, what are the costs involved in a section 5 denial of preclearance compared to a lawsuit under section 2?

Ms. TALLMAN. The costs by minority voters to hire a private attorney under section 2, which is the permanent section that allows for a private right of action when there has been discrimination in voting, the costs associated with hiring private attorneys can run in the millions of dollars. There are very significant fact-based findings, facts that need to be gathered as opposed to section 5 preclearance in jurisdictions where there has been traditional discrimination or a history of discrimination, where there have been ongoing suits, litigation brought within those jurisdictions because of changes in voting practices that have been viewed, have been discriminatory; where nonprofit organizations, civil rights organizations can work on behalf of minority voters who, having identified discriminatory practices, raise those practices, it can be brought then under consideration by the Department of Justice, which I think provides a very good basis in which those that have suffered discrimination have a course of action.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Well, you mentioned the cost of gathering all of these facts. If you don't know whether a plan is discriminatory or not until you have gotten all the facts, who has the burden of proof under section 5? Who has the burden of proof under section 2?

Ms. TALLMAN. Under section 5, the burden of proof is with the jurisdiction. So the jurisdiction that is engaged, under section 5, where they are a section 5 jurisdiction who is trying to change voting patterns and practices has that burden.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. And the cost of getting all the facts to prove the case is therefore on the jurisdiction?

Ms. TALLMAN. No, Congressman, there is a significant cost that also takes place with regard to a section 5 preclearance action that is brought by civil rights organizations on behalf of voters to the Department of Justice or by voters who hire a private attorney to the Department of Justice. There are still significant costs.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. But that cost, compared to a section 2 cost—can you compare the cost of getting a plan thrown out under section 5 by a civil rights organization protecting the rights of the minorities compared to the costs of defeating the plan under section 2?

Ms. TALLMAN. We will be happy to submit, as the testimony continues over the next several months, in working with other civil rights organizations, to be able to provide a comparative analysis for the Members of the Committee so that they can determine the differential and the costs.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. If you are under section 2, is the plan generally implemented and the perpetrators of the fraud, do they get to enjoy the fruits of their fraud while the case is going on if you are under section 2?

Ms. TALLMAN. Under section 2, there is a claim that has been brought by the Attorney General or of a State or there is a private right of action——

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. If there is a change, if there is a change and you are trying to defeat it under section 2.

Ms. TALLMAN. Right.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. The plan has been implemented.

Ms. TALLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. And the people who have perpetrated the fraud get to enjoy the fruits of their fraud while the litigation goes on, as opposed to section 5 where you never get to enjoy the fruits of your fraud to begin with because you can't get it precleared.

Ms. TALLMAN. Yes, sir. There is a difference between 2 and 5 where, in 5, if there is discrimination, it doesn't—there is no opportunity for it to be put into place. Yes, that is correct, sir.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Mayor Morial, you have run for public office. You have run as an incumbent and not as an incumbent. Can you state some of the advantages that there are running as an incumbent?

Mr. MORIAL. Obviously, there are many advantages that an incumbent has. One is the ability to raise money. Two is already established name recognition. Three is a network of relationships. The fourth one can be something that cuts both ways, and that is, you have a record.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. But the fact, the idea——

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired, but we will give the gentleman an additional minute.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Thank you. The idea is, if you were under section 2 and someone is enjoying all of these benefits even if you win under section 2, you are now facing an incumbent.

Mr. MORIAL. I think your point is so instructive and so incisive that section 5 prevents in effect the discriminator from continuing—from being able to benefit. Because you're right. And there are probably a number of instances where people had to run in a newly created district, but because they were running as an incumbent and they had money and they had name recognition and they had relationships, even in a district that they could not have been elected in originally, they have a significant advantage.

And I think anyone who has run for public office knows what I'm talking about. And I think it could be clearly documented and demonstrated by eminent political scientists, pollsters and others who you might invite before this Committee.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Watt, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WATT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I may not take 5 minutes. But let me start by asking unanimous consent to submit an opening statement that I had prepared for the record. And by asking unanimous consent to submit Representative Linda Sánchez's opening statement record.

Mr. CHABOT. I'm sorry, I was otherwise engaged there. Would the gentleman repeat his request?

Mr. WATT. I was asking unanimous consent to submit my opening statement and Representative Linda Sánchez's opening statement.

Mr. CHABOT. Without objection, so ordered. I apologize to the gentleman for not listening intently when he was speaking, as I usually do.

Mr. WATT. Listen intently, because I wanted to associate myself with some of the remarks that Mr. Feeney made, which is so unusual in this Committee.

And the Members on my side may have some dismay about this. But I agree with Mr. Feeney that we should try to restrict ourselves to the provisions that we ought to be trying to reauthorize or put into the Voting Rights Act. And, while I am a very strong supporter and cosponsor of the felon disenfranchisement legislation that has been introduced by Mr. Conyers, my support of that does not lead me to conclude that we should try to put it into the Voting Rights Act.

Mr. CONYERS. Would the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATT. Yes.

Mr. CONYERS. I merely wanted to associate myself with that, which is why we introduced it in separate legislation.

Mr. WATT. Right. I just want to be clear to the Members of the Committee that what we are engaged in here is so important as a basic constitutional proposition that we should limit ourselves to what we are here to try to deal with. I, in another context, will be as strong a supporter of legislation to set a national standard, to the extent that we can constitutionally, for felon re-enfranchise-ment as anybody on this Committee, but I think that is a subject for a different day.

Having said that, I would like to spend the rest of my time not on the substance of the Voting Rights Act, but to basically lay a foundation that, if it has not already been laid, for the introduction at some point of the entire record that the Voting Rights Act commission is developing and of the Voting Rights Act commission's findings into our record.

I think this is so important that, despite the fact that I am elated that Chairman Sensenbrenner has agreed to hold 8, 10, 12, hearings, that the more hearings are being conducted by the more different sources all over the country and the more exhaustive we can make the record for support of the Voting Rights Act, the more likely it is that we will meet the constitutional standard that the Supreme Court has articulated that Mr. Feeney has made reference to.

So I would like to ask Lieutenant Governor Rogers just to give us a description of where and how often and how methodical the commission is being in its process of developing a record. Because at some point, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I should say up front that it will be my intention to try to put the entire record that they are developing into our legislative record and make it a part of what we are doing.

So if you could just give us as exhaustive—I've run out of time, but they will let you answer the question as long as you want to answer the question. Give us as exhaustive a description of what you are doing and how your commission is doing it as you can so that we get a full appreciation of what the Voting Rights Act commission is doing.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman was not going to use his complete 5 minutes and has skillfully acquired additional time for the witness to answer the question.

Mr. WATT. It takes a lot of time for me to agree with Mr. Feeney. Sometimes that is not as easy. I have to couch it and so make sure that everybody understands exactly what I am saying.

Mr. CHABOT. Duly noted.

Mr. ROGERS. Thank you, Mr. Watt, so much. I wanted to make sure, if I could, to detail with you exactly what has happened. Over the course of the past years, there essentially have been a series of what are ten hearings that have been held throughout the United States. They were all public hearings. Of the ten hearings, seven of them are individual State hearings that have been held. The seven individual hearings outside of the three—excuse me, I don't want to be confusing. Ten total hearings. Of the ten, three are State hearings. Seven of them have been regional hearings throughout the entire country where we literally brought in States from—representatives from each individual State have either submitted direct testimony that they provided personally or they provided written testimony or they agreed to provide documents, for example, to the commission.

The commission will be responsible for formally writing its report based upon its assessment of all of the information received. The information we're taking into account in terms of the factual record here include the Department of Justice's objections, DOJ enforcement actions, DOJ observer coverage, DOJ settlement agreements, court opinions and litigation under the Voting Rights Act that includes both State and Federal cases, expert reports on litigation under the Voting Rights Act, studies and reports by civil rights organizations throughout the United States, testimony at hearings by voting rights practitioners and social scientists throughout the country, settlement agreements from cases brought regarding voting rights practitioners throughout the United States as a whole.

So we are making some effort to be as broad as possible to cover every range of thought as it relates to voting rights but not just the thought but the facts. What are the facts as they establish conduct as it has occurred throughout the United States? In particular, our reference point has been since 1982. We did not want you to simply have to dwell on the past or just to dwell 40 years in context but to really look at the substance of what has happened from 1982 forward.

We would hope that we would be able to note, Mr. Watt, significant progress that has occurred in the country. Because there is no doubt, as we have been throughout the United States, there have been as I mentioned earlier great progress that has occurred in the country. But at the same time, the facts do indicate significant problems that remain.

And so, in detail, forgive me for being too much in detail, I didn't mean to do that. We're making every effort to be as exhaustive as possible and would like to provide that full report to the Committee along with all supporting documentation.

Mr. WATT. Can I ask one elaborating question?

Mr. CHABOT. Without objection.

Mr. WATT. Just to be clear about whether you are stacking the deck or not stacking the deck. Are you also at each——

Mr. CHABOT. Mr. Watt before you go on, I think——

Mr. MORIAL. I've got to run.

Mr. CHABOT. We would like to thank you, Mayor Morial.

If he could be excused.

We want to thank you.

Mr. WATT. He has covered every base that I anticipated that he would cover, and I appreciate it.

Mr. MORIAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you all, thank you. See you.

Mr. CHABOT. We appreciate your testimony.

Mr. WATT. At every one of these hearings, are you providing a public opportunity for people, not the cast of witnesses who have been preselected, to express themselves also?

Mr. ROGERS. Please forgive me for not making that reference. That is probably the most important consideration. Forgive me for not referencing that. At every one of our hearings, we have a public testimony portion. At each one of these hearings, there have been press releases issued in each of the individual communities asking members of the public to come, whether you are, frankly, for this act, against the act. We haven't been focused on policy advocates necessarily. What we have asked for is people who provide facts, can you give us documented facts as they relate to either the existence or nonexistence of discrimination as it relates to voting?

And to some extent, this begs—if I could open up a little bit of a can as it relates to Mr. Nadler's remarks regarding whether or not some jurisdictions, for example, ought to be able to opt out of or block or be taken out of the provisions of section 5, for example. There is no doubt that there is some debate in the United States about whether or not all jurisdictions should still remain under the provisions thereof, and that may well be the subject of your consideration.

But at the very least, what we will seek to do is to provide you with the facts upon which you can make those determinations, and public testimony is critical in that regard.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WATT. Could I ask unanimous consent to allow Mr. David Scott to ask at least some questions? He is not a Member of our Committee.

Mr. CHABOT. We generally don't do that. I will make an exception in this case since Mr. Scott has been here this whole afternoon. I would also like to recognize the presence a little while ago of Congresswoman Maxine Waters from California who was also here.

Generally, we don't unless somebody yields that. We will make an exception and yield to the gentleman for 3 minutes. But we don't want to make this, set a precedent of doing this on either side. We don't like to break the rules.

Mr. SCOTT OF GEORGIA. Mr. Chairman, let me thank you for your graciousness and kindness in granting me the opportunity, having not been on the Committee. I really, really appreciate that, and I certainly appreciate the Ranking Member, Congressman Conyers, for inviting me and allowing me to participate in this. Thank you very much, and I realize that it is an effort and want you to know how much I appreciate it.

And thank you, Chairman Watt, for your generosity as well.

I believe that this is a very, very tricky, tricky time for the participation, particularly of African-Americans, in the political process. And there is no greater example of that than what is happening in my State right now. We have a glaring example of two things: one, why it is tricky; two, why we desperately need the Voting Rights Act reauthorized in all of its parts. And that is, this law that was recently passed in Georgia requiring a government-sponsored, sanctioned and approved voter ID before one can vote. And it only applies if you go to the polls. It doesn't matter if you are absentee; you don't need that.

If there ever was a glaring impediment to those who are elderly, those who are poor, those who have a habit—and it is very important to make this a part of the record, because within the African-American community, it is sacrosanct to go and exercise your vote because it took us so much and had to go through such a struggle to get it, that many will still go and will vote and not use the absentee.

With that in mind, I also want to say, the other side that makes this so tricky is that it went through preclearance and was precleared, but I am very happy to announce today that just a few hours ago, a Federal judge did institute a preliminary injunction blocking the application of this very, very significant deterrent to voting.

And therein lies the trickiness of what I am talking about and why we need it and why we need every recourse. I wanted to get your all's opinion on that and plus the point that there are six sections that will be up for renewal, plus section 203. Much has been said here on basically section 5. I want to get your opinions, do you not conclude that all of each of these sections needs to be reauthorized? If not, why?

And what are your thoughts on this requirement of the voter ID?

Ms. TALLMAN. Congressman, MALDEF was very actively involved in Georgia with the Black Caucus of the State in trying to oppose the legislation in Georgia. We are actually also involved in the preclearance efforts. So we are very aware of the potential chilling effect on voting that that particular piece of legislation has.

Regarding section 203, the language provisions of the Voting Rights Act are very important to the Latino community, to the Asian American community as well as the Native American community. And in the Latino community alone, there are 4.3 million voting-age citizens that are limited English proficient. Without section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, those individuals would be unlikely to vote. So we believe that, to Congressman Watt's point and the Congress from Florida, that there is much to focus on with regard to voting rights reauthorization; that we should not dilute the voting rights reauthorization debate on these very critical and important sections, section 5, section 203 and other language provisions, with a discussion around felony re-enfranchisement. But that is something of consideration when looking at the area of voting that certainly Congress is taking a lead on, and we applaud that lead.

But we do believe very firmly that 203 does need to be reauthorized because it would have very limited—it would have huge impacts on limited English proficient citizens necessary this country.

Mr. ROGERS. Thank you, Mr. Scott. The provisions you may be referencing are, sections 6, 8, 9 and 13, have essentially to do with the ability of the Department of Justice to send observers in or otherwise engage the mechanism of enforcement related to section 5 or to section 203. Those provisions are important, and I know they are not as—they won't be talked about on the same level of significance, but they represent part of the substantive tools in terms of the ability to really move forward in terms of section 5 as well as section 203.

Mr. SCOTT OF GEORGIA. The only point—and I will conclude with this—that is the point I am saying, that everybody here is saying, that it will be reauthorized. But if we don't take those other sections and just dwell on 5 and we happen to not authorize those others, it will have a diluting and weakening effect as well.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Scott, that point is well made. There is no doubt, in terms of the legislation, if you looked at the key to the Voting Rights Act in substance, again what it effectively does is takes the 14th amendment and 15th amendment, and it makes it real. Congress essentially said, these provisions have been in place for years, but we're going to enact legislation that will help make the substance of the 14th and the 15th amendment a reality for people in the United States. And you gave it the teeth, if you will, the teeth of the provisions are in section 5 and certainly section 203 to the extent that it allows language minority voters access to the polls in new ways.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired.

I would note that Ms. Tallman nodded her head noting in the affirmative as well to the question.

I would also ask that, without objection, all Members have 5 legislative days to commit additional materials for the hearing record.

I would also note that we have another hearing on the Voting Rights Act coming up in 2 days, on Thursday. It is at 10 o'clock in the morning, and we have at least one or two more next week. And we will have eight all together through November 3, and there will in all likelihood be more to come.

If there is no further business to come before the Committee, I thank the witnesses for their excellent testimony this afternoon. And at this point, we're adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 4:32 p.m., the Subcommittee was adjourned.]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE JOHN CONYERS, JR., A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MICHIGAN, AND MEMBER, SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

The importance of the Voting Rights Act is amply demonstrated by its historical bipartisan support in Congress. The commitment of Chairman Sensenbrenner, in particular, extends back to his support of reauthorization of the Act in 1982. He has evidenced his continuing commitment in speeches before the NAACP and the Congressional Black Caucus and, moreover, has agreed to a robust schedule of hearings to support our current reauthorization efforts. I whole heartedly salute his historical commitment to the Voting Rights Act and look forward to working with him on strengthening and reauthorizing the Act.

When the Voting Rights Act passed in 1965, I was one of six (6) African-American, five (5) Latino, and four (4) Asian-American Members of Congress. The civil rights era was in full bloom, with sit-ins and marches across the South in response to the massive resistance to the call for equal rights. Brave Americans of different races, ethnicities, and religions risked their lives to stand up for political equality.

The pursuit of equal voting rights was most dramatically displayed on the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Alabama on March 7, 1965, a day that would come to be known as "Bloody Sunday." On this day, nonviolent civil rights marchers, like John Lewis, were beaten, brutalized, and demeaned. The news media brought home to all Americans the horror and violence that propped the system of segregation, forcing us to a decision point about our nation's democratic ideals. Without sacrifice by countless individuals in Selma and across the South, the struggle for equality could never have been achieved, and this legislation would have failed in Congress.

Eight days after Bloody Sunday, President Lyndon B. Johnson called for a comprehensive and effective voting rights bill. He would sign that bill into law and the Voting Rights Act would come to stand as a tribute to the countless Americans who fought for voting rights for all Americans.

Today, as we commence the process of reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act, its importance to opening the political process to all Americans is beyond doubt or challenge.

As the Act has evolved over the last 40 years, it has been expanded and refined to protect language minority citizens through the 1975 amendments, and disabled Americans through the 1982 amendments. Where we had anemic voter registration and turnout in many Southern states, such as Mississippi, with just 6 % of African Americans registered to vote compared to 70% White voter registration; today, 62% of all African Americans and 69% of all Whites are registered to vote.

Where we had a handful of minority Members of Congress in 1965, today we can count 43 African-American, 29 Latino, 8 Asian-American, and 1 Native American in the U.S. House and Senate. And the federal government itself is merely the tip of the of the iceberg. Across the nation, the number of people of color elected to federal, state, and local offices has increased tremendously in the last forty years, opening the political process to every American. It is not an overstatement to call the Voting Rights Act the keystone of our nation's array of civil rights statutes.

While there is much to celebrate over the last 40 years, we have not yet reached the point where the special provisions of the Act should be allowed to lapse, as some might have you believe. Witnesses will bring us testimony over the next several weeks and months from around the country, detailing the continuing barriers to equal voting rights faced by people of color, language minorities, and the disabled.

It is these modern day challenges, along with the continuing historical barriers, that require us to ensure the continuing vitality of the Voting Rights Act. The reauthorization process is an opportunity to take stock of where we are and, if necessary, to make adjustments that will protect and strengthen the Act, just as we have done in the past.

I trust that, as a Committee, we will work collectively to protect the vitality of the Act. I am also pleased that we will be joined in this process by civil rights groups like the Lawyers' Committee, LCCR, NAACP, ACLU, the Legal Defense Fund, MALDEF, People For the American Way, the National Council of La Raza, the Native American Rights Fund, the National Asian Pacific American Legal Consortium, and many others who support our important work in this area.

The Voting Rights Act is one of the nation's most important civil rights victories. It memorializes those who marched, struggled, and even died to secure the right to vote for all Americans. Through hearings and other dialogue, we will establish a detailed record supporting reauthorization. We owe a deliberative and thoughtful process to those who risked so much in the fight for equal rights. While we must applaud the substantial progress which has been made in the area of voting rights, we must also continue our efforts to protect the rights of every American voter.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE MELVIN L. WATT, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, AND MEMBER, SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Chairman, thank you for convening this first in a series of very important hearings on the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Several months ago, the Chairman of the Full Judiciary Committee, Jim Sensenbrenner and I began a discussion that continues to this day. Recognizing that several provisions of the Voting Rights Act were due to expire in 2007, the Chairman and I fully agreed that extensive hearings should be held to sustain any constitutional challenge that may come. On September 23, 2005, at my annual Congressional Black Caucus Voting Rights Braintrust, Chairman Sensenbrenner announced this series of hearings. He noted that, "[t]his bipartisan effort should educate Members about the complex nuances of the Voting Rights Act and build a solid legislative record towards our goal of a long-term Voting Rights Act extension."

I share the goal of extending the Voting Rights Act and also believe that the Act should be strengthened to ensure that Congress's intent in protecting the voting rights of all Americans is fully realized. In the 40 years since its passage, the Voting Rights Act has come to be regarded as one of the most effective civil rights laws in our Nation's history. The Act has safeguarded the right of millions of minorities to have their votes counted and therefore, their voices heard. The gains in African American, Latino, Asian and Native American elected officials is but one indication of the success of the Act. Prior to passage of the Voting Rights Act, there were fewer than 300 African Americans in public office in all the southern states. This figure rose to 2,400 by 1980, and stands at more than 9,100 today.

The trends in increased voter registration may also be attributed to some degree to the existence of the Voting Rights Act. These gains are a testament to the effectiveness of the Act as well as to its continued necessity. But the success of the Voting Rights Act is not cause for its demise. When something works you run with it not away from it! Not to extend and strengthen the Voting Rights Act would be a blow to democracy.

Very briefly, let me just say that each of the expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act serve a vitally important and unique purpose: Section 5 requires those jurisdictions with an ongoing record of discrimination to "pre-clear" any voting changes to ensure that those changes will not disenfranchise racial, ethnic, and language minority voters. Jurisdictions covered by Section 5 may "bail-out" from coverage by demonstrating compliance with the Voting Rights Act and that they facilitate equal opportunity at the ballot box.

Section 203 requires bilingual voting assistance for language minority communities in jurisdictions that have a significant population of language minority groups, evidence of severe language barriers, high rates of illiteracy, or depressed voter registration or turnout. Section 203 extends to American citizens with limited English proficiency who pay taxes, serve in the military and embrace all of the other obligations of citizenship, equal and meaningful access to the benefits of the ballot box.

Other expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act help ensure that voters are free from discrimination on election day. The federal examiner and observer provisions are key when effectively utilized by the Department of Justice. Examiners may prepare and maintain lists of eligible voters and receive complaints by phone, while observers are assigned to monitor elections in specific jurisdictions that are suspected of discriminatory activity. This federal presence also serves a deterrent effect dis-

Based upon a record of evidence demonstrating how gerrymandering, annexations, at-large election policies and other political machinations have been employed to disfranchise minority voters, Congress has voted three times to extend § 5 coverage: in 1970 (for five years), 1975 (for seven years) and 1982 (for 25 years). Notwithstanding the considerable progress in minority voting rights and office holding in recent times, I expect that we will see a similar record compiled throughout these hearings substantiating the continuing need for the Voting Rights Act and its expiring provisions. Moreover, we must act to strengthen and expand the Voting Rights Act by addressing restrictive Supreme Court decisions and providing for adequate resources to litigate cases seeking compliance with the Act.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased that we are conducting these hearings. I welcome and look forward to the testimony of our distinguished panel of witnesses, and yield back the balance of my time.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE LINDA T. SÁNCHEZ, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Thank you, Chairman Chabot and Ranking Member Nadler for convening this hearing, "To Examine the Impact and Effectiveness of the Voting Rights Act."

In my opinion and the opinion of many leaders in the civil rights community, the Voting Rights Act has had a tremendous impact on the voting rights of all minority groups, including Latinos.

The Voting Rights Act is one of the most successful and exercised civil rights laws in American history, and this landmark legislation has effectively given all Americans political power and voter enfranchisement.

For Latinos and other communities suffering from long histories of discrimination and disenfranchisement, the Voting Rights Act has been key to gaining equality and fairness in the electoral process.

Before the Voting Rights Act was passed in 1965, literacy tests, poll taxes and intentionally discriminatory mechanisms were used to keep Latinos and other minorities from the polls.

Today, many of the advancements and achievement of Latinos in our democracy are a direct result of the Voting Rights Act.

Several current Members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus would not be in the House of Representatives today without the Voting Rights Act.

Members such as Congressmen Ed Pastor of Arizona and José Serrano of New York have districts that were drawn as a direct result of the Voting Rights Act.

This vital statute also opened the door to empower individuals like Willie Velazquez, whose mission in life was to register Hispanic Americans.

Today, we all know that his slogan "Su voto es su voz" ('Your vote is your voice') continues to resonate in our community today.

The positive impact the Voting Rights Act has had on all Latinos is evident.

For instance, when the VRA was enacted in 1965, about two-and-a-half million Latinos were registered to vote. Today there are 9.3 million Latinos registered to vote.

In the past three decades, Latino registration has quadrupled, while our participation in elections has tripled.

In the 1976 presidential election, about 2 million ballots were cast by Hispanic Americans and in 2004 that number climbed to a record 7.5 million.

In 1974, there were about 1,200 Latino elected officials. Today there are 6,000.

I am proud that my sister and I are two of those 6,000 Latino elected officials, the first sisters ever elected to the United States Congress.

While we have come a long way from the widespread use of such blatant tactics as literacy tests to deny Latinos of their voting rights, more subtle efforts persist.

For example, in 1988 the Orange County Republican Party hired uniformed security guards to be posted at polling places in heavily Latino precincts. The guards, wearing blue uniforms and badges, were removed from polling places after the chief deputy secretary of state said their presence was an "unlawful intimidation of voters." The next year, the Orange County GOP paid $400,000 to settle a lawsuit stemming from their voter intimidation program.

Many communities still rely on the Voting Rights Act to maintain full participation in local, state, and federal elections.

I my home state of California in 2004, 26 out of 58 counties are covered by the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act. Within those 26 counties, there are 26 Hispanic communities, 6 Chinese communities, 3 Filipino and Vietnamese communities, and two American Indian communities where language minorities are covered by the Voting Rights Act.

These protections allow millions of voters to make their voices heard on Election Day.

California is also one of ten states with overlapping coverage under Section 203 and Section 5, two of the most important provisions of the Voting Rights Act for language minorities.

Section 5 has prevented jurisdictions from redrawing district lines or otherwise amending election procedures in a way that discriminates against Latino voters by requiring those jurisdictions to get pre-clearance of any changes in electoral practices from the Department of Justice.

Section 203 is vitally important to Latinos because it requires certain jurisdictions to provide bilingual assistance to language minority citizens at all stages of the voting process.

As the U.S. House of Representatives begins reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act, we must recognize that Section 5 and Section 203 are not mutually exclusive.

These two sections have worked together to protect Latinos and must be reauthorized together to permanently preserve voting rights for Latinos and all language minority groups.

As the Judiciary Committee, the House, and the Senate, work to reauthorize the VRA, we must ensure that Section 5, Section 203, and all of the expiring provisions are not only reauthorized, but strengthened to preserve and cultivate total participation in the voting process.

Voting is the one way that every American citizen is able to directly participate in our democracy. The Voting Rights Act is invaluable in preserving equal participation for all Americans in our government. This legislation must be reauthorized.

I look forward to the testimony of the Subcommittee's distinguished panel of witnesses. I am positive their testimony will begin the process of establishing a thorough Congressional record in support of reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act.

STATEMENT OF THE RAINBOW PUSH COALITION ON REAUTHORIZATION OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

The Rainbow PUSH Coalition supports reauthorization of the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act to assure that all Americans enjoy the unfettered right to vote. The Rainbow PUSH Coalition is pleased that the Congress, under the leadership of Congressman Sensenbrenner, has scheduled hearings which will establish a clear record for the continued vitality of Section V. The Rainbow PUSH Coalition is also appreciative of the efforts of Congressman John Conyers, ranking member on the House Judiciary Committee, for his leadership here in Washington and across the nation on this vital issue.

Emanating from the tens of thousands who demonstrated on August 6, in Atlanta, the voice of the people has been heard. There is now a broad consensus that there will be a reauthorized Voting Rights Act. Now, we get down to the serious business of fashioning the contours of the Act, assuring that it is not diluted and that it is fully enforced.

Today, The Rainbow PUSH Coalition focuses on the undiluted reauthorization of Section V of the Voting Rights Act fully cognizant that its pre-clearance provision was designed to ward off new and unimagined threats to the right to vote. Today, unfortunately, in Georgia, and in other covered jurisdictions, there is a new wave of threats unimagined at the time the Voting Rights Act was initially adopted.

The right to vote precedes, preserves and protects all other rights. Therefore it is of the utmost importance that we preserve, protect and if necessary, expand the provisions of the Voting Rights Act, set to expire in 2007 unless reauthorized by the Congress.

According to Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, President and Founder of the Rainbow PUSH Coalition, "as a child my father told me a story that always made him sad. He talked about the pride he felt defending democracy in France against the Nazi war machine. He and thousands like him held out hope that their bravery on the battlefield would translate to full citizenship at home. It was not to be. Returning to Greenville by train he was forced to sit behind Nazi prisoners of war in Jim Crow cars. It was a blow that permanently damaged his spirit and inspired me to work for change. Similarly, Joe Louis was man enough to defend America's dignity by defeating the symbol of supposed Aryan superiority, but he could not exercise the basic privilege of American citizenship in rural Georgia where he was born.

But, thanks be to God, who moved in the lives of countless nameless, faceless souls, black and white, change did come. Forty years ago, after the bloody march in Selma, Congress passed and LBJ signed the historic Voting Rights Act striking down centuries of voter discrimination against Blacks and people of color. But today, we have entered a new era of mean-spirited attack on civil rights, workers rights and the poor. The Rainbow PUSH Coalition intends to assure that the will of the people is not thwarted by undemocratic attempts to undermine or weaken the Voting Rights Act and its enforcement provisions. The Voting Rights Act changed our entire nation for the better, casting the United States as a global example of democracy.

In the 40 years since the Voting Rights Act was passed, African Americans in public office have soared from 300 in 1964 to more than 9100 today. From three members of Congress to 43 today. More than 6,000 have been elected and appointed nationwide, 27 who now serve in Congress. Asian Americans, Latino and Hispanic Americans, and Native Americans historically shut out of the political process have also moved toward full political participation and empowerment.

Key provisions of the Voting Rights Act must be reauthorized before they expire in 2007: Section 5 contains the "pre-clearance" provisions of the VRA – requiring jurisdictions in all or part of 16 states under the VRA to prove to the Department of Justice that a voting change does NOT have a discriminatory purpose of effect on minority voters, BEFORE that change can be implemented. Examples are plans for redistricting, annexation, at-large elections, re-registration requirements, polling place changes, and new rules for candidate qualifying.

There is one telling example that new schemes and devices are still being crafted and employed to hinder the right to vote in the covered jurisdictions. The Georgia Voter Identification law, popularly known in Georgia as the Voter Suppression Bill, demonstrates that, regardless of the outcome of the pending litigation, and in spite of the fact that the legislation has been pre-cleared under Section V, that the pre-clearance requirement is still critically necessary to assuring that no retrogression in the ability of citizens to elect representatives of their choice occurs.

The Georgia voter suppression act requires a government issued photo identification card be presented each time a voter appears at the polls. This is true no matter how long the voter has been registered or how many other forms of identification the voter has. It also applies universally, disregarding the fact that the voter has not attempted to impersonate another voter, and that no one has attempted to impersonate the voter. This law passed over impassioned objection by the minority during the 2004 term when Republicans gained control of the Georgia legislature for the first time in more than 100 years. Former President Jimmy Carter termed it an "abomination."

The Voting Rights Act prohibits the implementation of devices that have the purpose or effect of inhibiting voting. As a consequence of the outcry against the voter suppression law, Governor Perdue instituted a mobile voter identification bus. According to Janice L. Mathis, "our Atlanta staff wrote to the Governor seeking permission for the bus to visit the historic, mostly black, Atlanta University Center to issue identification cards. After receiving no reply, they contacted the Motor Vehicle Unit directly and learned that the mobile van would be parked at Turner Field, about a mile from the campuses. Approximately 20 African American AUC students traveled to Turner Field in a group to get the appropriate identification cards. The published price of the cards - $10.00 – was hiked to $20.00 without notice to the public. The students' school identification cards, drivers licenses and voter identification cards were insufficient proof, according to DMV to authorize issuance of the new photo id cards. Finally, students who had the $20 and were able to prove their Georgia residency to the satisfaction of officials were required to surrender their home state drivers licenses in exchange for a Georgia ID that did not entitle them to drive in Georgia or in any other state."

It is not surprising that none of the Atlanta University students was issued a photo identification by the state of Georgia. It is fully understood that the purpose of the law is to suppress the vote of assumed liberals and progressives, and has little if anything to do with identifying those unqualified to vote. If the purpose were to identify valid voters, then absentee balloters would also have to present identification.

There is also a sad continuation of extreme racial polarization in voting that, left untended, threatens the ability of African Americans to elect representatives of their choice. Jim Wooten, a columnist with the Atlanta Constitution, the most widely read paper in the state, stated his opposition to reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act early on, indicating that proponents of reauthorization merely sought to use the debate to enfranchise felons, a claim that has no basis in fact and which I have heard no advocate make.

The second example arises of out South Carolina. Until February, 2004 a third of South Carolina's 46 counties did not recognize the Martin Luther King federal holiday, including the most prosperous county, Greenville. Trial court judges in South Carolina are elected by the state legislature. In the 2005 session , not a single black judge was elected in a state that is more than 30% black, despite several highly qualified candidates. If the legislature, despite ominous warnings from the State's Chief Justice, that the administration of justice requires a more diverse bench, cannot see its way to appoint even one black judge, the prospect of non-biased electoral regulation is not good.

Another example comes from the realm of voter registration. During the Fall leading up to the 2004 elections, many groups were conducting voter registration drives. In a six-week period, the Citizenship Education Fund registered more than 4000 voters in Georgia and South Carolina. In order to assure that the applications were genuine, staff examined each one of them and placed approximately 400 phone calls to the newly registered voters. At no time was there an attempt to ascertain or influence the voter's political affiliation. Volunteers were stationed at public places, such as Wal-mart Stores, which were freely available to the public. It is a mistaken notion that voter registration activities are undertaken by progressive groups with a wink and a nod toward non partisanship. The majority need not be afraid that these drives will confer disproportionate advantage to progressive candidates. My observations, over the past 30 years, has been that registration activists seldom attempt

Finally, the Rainbow PUSH Coalition urges members of the majority to temper their natural desire for political victory with respect for this nation's long struggle for universal suffrage. Women have had the right to vote for less than a century. Blacks, for only four decades. The majority must resist the sinister temptation to weaken the Voting Rights Act for political advantage. The Constitution stands for the proposition that citizens, whatever their socioeconomic status, level of education or income, or color, are less citizens of the United States. If the majority is to maintain political control in the South, in particular, it must be based upon ideas, efficiency in governing and ability to communicate with voters. The majority must not allow the fear of loss of political control drive it to stack the deck by weakening section V. We are all guaranteed the right to liberty. Liberty is more than freedom. Liberty is freedom informed by enlightenment. A person is free to do whatever they want. Liberty requires respect for the rights of others.

THE IMPACT OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT ON AFRICAN-AMERICANS IN NEW YORK STATE

HAZEL N. DUKES
PRESIDENT
THE NEW YORK STATE CONFERENCE OF NAACP BRANCHES

JUNE 14, 2005

"THE RIGHT OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES TO VOTE SHALL NOT BE DENIED OR ABRIDGED BY THE UNITED STATES OR BY ANY STATE ON ACCOUNT OF RACE, COLOR, OR PREVIOUS CONDITION OF SERVITUDE.

THE CONGRESS SHALL HAVE THE POWER TO ENFORCE THIS ARTICLE BY APPROPRIATE LEGISLATION"

THIS, THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION WAS PASSED AND RATIFIED IN 1878. HOWEVER, IN EVERY NATIONAL ELECTION SINCE THEN, AFRICAN-AMERICAN VOTERS HAVE FACED THE DETERMINED EFFORTS OF WHITE AMERICANS TO DENY THEM THIS PRECIOUS RIGHT OF CITIZENSHIP. NO MEASURE OF VIOLENCE OR INTIMIDATION WAS TOO EXTREME THAT WAS USED TO DENY AFRICAN-AMERICANS THEIR RIGHT TO VOTE. NEITHER WERE THE SO CALLED "QUALIFYING" TESTS THEY USED, TOO RIDICULOUS. WHO KNOWS HOW MANY BUBBLES ARE IN A BAR OF SOAP?

DURING THIS ERA OF TERROR AND PERSECUTION OF AFRICAN-AMERICANS WHO SOUGHT TO EXERCISE THEIR CITIZENSHIP RIGHTS, THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE WAS ESTABLISHED IN 1909. SINCE THAT TIME, THE NAACP HAS FOUGHT IN THE COURTS AND COMMUNITIES ALL ACROSS THIS LAND TO SECURE VOTING RIGHTS FOR OUR PEOPLE.

THE BALLOT TODAY IS STAINED BY BLOOD OF NAACP HEROES LIKE MEDGAR EVERS AND MANY OTHERS WHO WERE KILLED BY WHITE RACISTS WHO REFUSED TO SHARE THE POWER OF THE BALLOT WITH AFRICAN-AMERICANS. INDEED, REGISTERING TO VOTE WAS HAZARDOUS TO YOUR LIFE IF YOU WERE A NEGRO! IN 1965, CONGRESS FINALLY ADDRESSED THIS PERSISTENT DISENFRANCHISEMENT OF AFRICAN-AMERICANS BY ENACTING THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT. SOME ARGUE THAT NO OTHER LEGISLATION BEFORE OR SINCE HAS HAD THE IMPACT AND SIGNIFICANCE OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. THE POLITICAL LANDSCAPE OF AMERICA WAS DRAMATICALLY RE-ALIGNED. THE RESULTING REDISTRIBUTION OF POLITICAL POWER BROUGHT AFRICAN-AMERICANS TO CITY, STATE AND NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL POSITIONS IN PLACES ALL OVER THE NATION. AND, IN THOSE POSITIONS, AFRICAN-AMERICANS WERE ABLE TO MAKE ECONOMIC DECISIONS THAT BENEFITTED THEIR COMMUNITIES. FOR THE FIRST TIME IN OUR NATION'S HISTORY, THE COLD, EXCLUSIVE CLAMMY HOLD OF WHITE RACISM ON THE THROTTLES OF POWER WERE LOOSENED, AND AFRICAN-AMERICANS WERE FINALLY ABLE TO GET A GRIP!

- THERE ARE NOW 43 AFRICAN-AMERICAN MEMBERS OF CONGRESS
- THERE ARE NOW 24 AFRICAN-AMERICAN MEMBERS OF THE NEW YORK STATE LEGISLATURE

- THERE ARE 135 AFRICAN-AMERICAN JUDGES IN NEW YORK STATE
- THERE ARE TWO NEW STATE LEGISLATIVE SEATS CREATED IN PRIMARILY AFRICAN-AMERICAN COMMUNITIES IN LONG ISLAND, NEW YORK

BUT FOR EVERY STEP FORWARD INTO THE POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC POWER CIRCLES MADE BY AFRICAN-AMERICANS, THE REACTIONARY WHITE POWER BROKERS ARE BUSY DEVELOPING NEW TACTICS AND MODERNIZING OLD ONES TO TAKE BACK THE POLITICAL POWER OF THE BALLOT THAT THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT PRODUCED FOR AFRICAN-AMERICANS. I WILL ADDRESS JUST THREE AREAS.

VOTER INTIMIDATION IN RECENT ELECTIONS HAS BEEN BOTH BLATANT AND SUBTLE. FOR EXAMPLE, HERE IN NEW YORK CITY, WHITE OFF DUTY POLICE OFFICERS WITH GUNS IN VIEW BLANKETED POLLING SITES IN BLACK COMMUNITIES DURING THE 1993 MAYORAL ELECTION IN AN EFFORT TO DISCOURAGE BLACK VOTERS FROM CASTING THEIR BALLOT IN THE RE-ELECTION OF DAVID DINKINS.

BLACK POLLING SITES. THIS WAS PURPOSEFULLY DONE TO OPPRESS THE BLACK VOTE IN THE GORE/BUSH PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. MANY AFRICAN-AMERICANS WHO REGISTERED TO VOTE IN PUBLIC AGENCIES, SUCH AS MOTOR VEHICLES, SOCIAL SECURITY AND PUBLIC ASSISTANCE OFFICES, NAMES WERE NOT FORWARDED TO THE LOCAL BOARD OF ELECTIONS IN A TIMELY MANNER; SO THAT THESE VOTERS WERE NOT ABLE TO GO INTO THE VOTING BOOTHS ON ELECTION DAY. AND, MANY WERE NOT ABLE TO USE A PAPER BALLOT EITHER.

FELONY DISENFRANCHISEMENT KEEPS MILLIONS OF AFRICAN-AMERICANS FROM VOTING BECAUSE THEY ARE IN PRISON OR ON PAROLE. FOR SOME, THERE IS A LIFETIME BAN ON THEIR RIGHT TO VOTE, EVEN AFTER RELEASE FROM PRISON. HERE IN NEW YORK, THERE IS PENDING BEFORE THE 2ND CIRCUIT A LAWSUIT BROUGHT UNDER THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT CLAIMING THAT NEW YORK'S FELON DISINFRANCHISMENT LAW IS AN ARBITRARY VOTER QUALIFICATION THAT RESULTS IN THE DENIAL AND ABRIDGEMENT OF THE RIGHT OF A CITIZEN OF THE UNITED STATES TO VOTE; AND , WHICH HAS A DISPARATE IMPACT ON THOSE DENIED THEIR RIGHT TO VOTE AND THEIR COMMUNITIES FROM WHICH THEY COME. FELON DISENFRANCHISEMENT LAWS DIFFER FROM STATE TO STATE. MAIN AND VERMONT PERMIT FELONS TO VOTE FROM PRISON; HOWEVER THE NUMBER OF AFRICAN-AMERICANS IN BOTH THESE STATES COMBINED IS SO SMALL AS TO BE LESS THAN THOSE IN THE VILLAGE OF HARLEM. BUT IN SOME STATES, FELONS ARE DENIED THEIR RIGHT TO VOTE FOR LIFE.

THE RE-AUTHORIZATION OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT IS ESSENTIAL TO ADDRESS THE NEW AND ENTRENCHED RESISTANCE TO FULL AND FREE ACCESS TO THE POWER OF THE BALLOT FOR ALL AMERICANS. IT TOOK A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT IN 1870 AND THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 TO "BRING US THUS FAR ON OUR WAY." WE MUST ALWAYS REMEMBER AND REMIND OTHERS THAT THE BALLOT IS STAINED WITH THE "BLOOD OF MANY MARTYRS." IN THE WORDS OF FREDERICK DOUGLAS, "POWER CONCEDES NOTHING WITHOUT A DEMAND. IT NEVER HAS AND NEVER WILL." THE RIGHT TO VOTE IS THE MOST POWERFUL COMPONENT OF OUR DEMOCRATIC NATION; AND, IT MUST BE FULLY AND FREELY AVAILABLE TO ALL ADULT CITIZENS WITHOUT REGARD TO RACE, COLOR OR PRIOR CONDITIONS OF SERVITUDE.

THANK YOU.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF JOSEPH D. RICH BEFORE THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JUNE 14, 2005

Statement of Joseph D. Rich Before

My name is Joe Rich and last month I became Director of the Housing and Community Development Project at the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. Previously, I worked in the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division for my entire 36+ year legal career. From 1999 until April, 2005 I was Acting Chief and then Chief of the Division's Voting Section. My testimony today in no way is intended to reflect the views of the Department of Justice. Rather, based on my experience enforcing the voting rights act, it reflects my general views of the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act that are due to expire in 2007.

My long career enforcing civil rights laws has contributed to my perspective on the Voting Rights Act. In addition to my having enforced the Act during the last six years, I have had extensive experience enforcing the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Fair Housing Act. There is little question in my mind that the Voting Rights Act has been the most important and most successful civil rights law ever passed, and, indeed, one of the most important pieces of social legislation in the country's history. Voting is our most basic civil right and the positive impact the Voting Rights Act has had on the voting opportunities of minority voters cannot be overstated. The clearest demonstration of this is a statistical comparison between (1) the numbers and percentages of minority voters registered to vote prior to the Act's passage with similar numbers today, and (2) the number of elected officials who are minorities is a stark demonstration of this fact. I have attached some statistics showing these comparisons to the end of the written testimony I have submitted.

Today, nearly forty years after passage of the Act, the landscape has changed. The blatant discrimination in the south that gave rise to the Act has been substantially reduced. Yet, the more subtle forms of discriminating against minority voters which replaced the invidious pre-act discrimination linger on – not only in the southern states, but also in many states outside the south -- with continuing adverse effects on the right to vote free from discrimination. My experience has been that the non-permanent provisions of the Voting Rights Act which are scheduled to expire in 2007 – Section 5; the authority of the attorney general to assign federal observers to elections in Section 5 covered jurisdictions pursuant to Sections 6 and 8; and the language assistance provisions in Section 203 – remain crucial to address this continuing discrimination.

I. Section 5

The importance of Section 5 in ensuring equal voting rights is evident from the fact that close to one-half of the resources of the Civil Rights Division's Voting Section are devoted to review of voting changes submitted for preclearance. Each year the Section receives over 4,000 submissions from covered jurisdictions containing close to 20,000 voting changes. Each of these changes is carefully reviewed pursuant to a process that has been established through regulations to determine whether the jurisdiction has demonstrated that the change "does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color" or because of membership in a language minority.

The number of times that the Attorney General objects to voting change is very small – less than one percent of the Section 5 submissions are objected to. But that is not a good indicator of the importance of Section 5. Rather, the most important impact of Section 5 is its deterrent effect on discriminatory voting changes. Jurisdictions, particularly local jurisdictions, that are required to get preclearance must always be aware of Justice Department review. Because the Department has built a tradition of excellence and meticulousness in its Section 5 review process, jurisdictions will think long and hard before passing laws with discriminatory impact or purpose.

During my tenure in the Voting Section, I often heard examples of this deterrent effect, e.g. careful consideration of discriminatory impact of a voting change during the legislative process, and minority elected officials reminding white officials of the need for justice department review of laws under consideration. Similarly, on many occasions the department has deterred potential voting changes with discriminatory impact or purpose by sending letters seeking further information – letters which usually signal department concern with the law under review. These letters often result in abandonment of, or changes in, the proposed law in order to remove any discriminatory impact or purpose. An analysis of the impact of these letters reveals the deterrent effect. In the period from 1982 through January 2004 there were 501 changes withdrawn after receipt of what are known as "more information" letters.

In sum, since the Voting Rights Act was passed, Section 5 has been probably its most important and effective provision. The continuing deterrent effect of this provision is central to the Act's goal of equal voting opportunity.

One other comment about Section 5. The scope of this provision was significantly reduced by the Supreme Court's 2000 decision in Reno v. Bossier Parish School Board, a decision that essentially eliminates the intent prong of Section 5. A majority of the department's objections during the 1990's were based on this intent prong and this decision has significantly narrowed the ability to object to and deter discriminatory when compared to the pre-Bossier Parish standard. Because of this it has had an adverse impact on Section 5's deterrent effect. It is truly anomalous to me that a voting change which intentionally discriminates against minority voters in a manner that violates the constitution is not objectionable unless it has "retrogressive purpose."

II. Federal observers

The role federal examiners in assisting minority voters in registering to vote has been virtually eliminated since the early days of the voting rights act and is probably no longer necessary. However, the ability of the attorney general to assign federal observers to monitor elections pursuant to Section 8 of the Act in jurisdictions to which federal examiners have been appointed remains a crucial provision. For, like Section 5, the

As is the case for Section 5, the Civil Rights Division has developed very careful procedures for determining when to recommend to the attorney general that federal observers be sent to cover an election. The most important factor is evidence of potential voting rights act violations which arise most often in elections pitting minority candidates against white candidates, resulting in increased racial or ethnic tensions. The federal observers, who are employees of the Office of Personnel Management, are carefully trained to observe elections in a neutral manner and report any voting irregularities to their supervisors, who work closely with Voting Section attorneys. Where appropriate and after consultation with Section management, Voting Section attorneys will take steps to resolve the irregularities with election officials or use the information for more formal legal action.

This federal presence at elections consistently has had a calming effect during highly-charged elections in which there have been allegations of possible Voting Rights Act violations and has helped deter discriminatory acts. On several occasions it has been important to an enforcement action. A good example of this is the presence of federal observers at elections held in Passaic County, New Jersey. The county was under a consent decree which required specific actions to bring the county into compliance with Section 203 of the Act [which I discuss further below]. The consent decree also authorized the Attorney General to send federal observers to elections. On the basis of information gathered by federal observers at several elections, the Department took legal action to ensure full implementation of Passaic's court-mandated language assistance program.

The need for the Attorney General's continued authority to send federal observers to elections is clear from the increase monitoring activity in recent years. Not only has the department increased its use of federal observers, but also has started monitoring elections with department employees where it does not have authority to place federal observers. For example, in the 2004 general election, the Department dispatched 840 federal observers to 27 jurisdictions and send monitors to 58 other jurisdictions.

Section 203, the oral and written language assistance provision of the Voting Rights Act, has become increasingly important. Originally passed in 1975 and renewed in 1992, the need for this provision has never been greater than now because of the increasing numbers of limited-English proficient citizens in the United States.

To be able to understand the ballot and the voting process is crucial to the right to vote and if a citizen is limited in his or her English language skills, it is absolutely necessary that voting officials provide appropriate assistance. The need is reflected in the significant increase in enforcement of Section 203 by the Voting Section in recent years and continued vigilant enforcement of this provision is crucial in addressing this problem.

The Passaic case noted above exemplifies the importance of this provision. After entry of the consent decree and the resulting increased assistance offered limited English proficient voters, voters in Passaic elected an Hispanic mayor for the first time.

The increased enforcement of Section 203 by the department in recent years has also resulted in a growing awareness of this problem by election officials. At this point it is clear to me that there is a need to increase this enforcement and awareness.

IV. Conclusion

My work in the Civil Rights Division's Voting Section brought home to me how important the non-permanent provisions of the Voting Rights Act have been in ensuring the right to vote free of discrimination. Indeed, well over half of the section's resources are devoted to enforcement of them. While Section 2 provides basic protections against discrimination, the special provisions have been, and continue to be, equally important in the effort to fight and deter voting discrimination.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF DOLORES WATSON, MEMBER, LONG ISLAND ACORN, BEFORE THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JUNE 14, 2005

Testimony of Dolores Watson
Member, Long Island ACORN

Hello, my name is Dolores Watson, and I am an ACORN member from the Village of Hempstead, Long Island. I am here today representing our members on Long Island. I have been an ACORN member for 5 years, and have lived in Hempstead for 10 years. I am the president of my tenant association, a Democratic Committeeperson, and a member of the Working Families Party.

I'm speaking today to tell you about the problems we have had in Nassau and Suffolk Counties on Long Island so you know how important it is to reauthorize these parts of the Voting Rights Act.

When Mayor Garner ran for election in Hempstead in March 2001, the management of HUD senior citizen buildings told tenants that if they didn't vote for Mayor Garner they would lose their apartments. At 260 Clinton, a senior HUD Building, the management put up flyers saying that HUD was coming out to inspect their apartments on Election Day, and if they weren't home to let the HUD inspectors in, they would risk losing their apartments. ACORN was organizing in that building then and so the management was worried about people voting against Garner. We complained to the management and put out another flyer to tenants saying that management was just trying to scare them and that they couldn't take away their apartments. Management called a meeting with the tenants two nights before Election Day to say they were sorry and that they would change the day for the HUD inspections, but then on Election Day they still stood out front telling people that if you don't vote for Garner you'll lose your apartment. Also during that election, workers inside the polls were asking people if they were Democrat or Republican, and this was a general election, not a primary. They asked me and I got very angry and told them they couldn't ask people that. Poll inspectors were turning people away if they didn't tell them what party they belonged to.

This past November, they had long lines even in the morning when I went to vote, because the pollworkers were confused about which machine they should be telling people to vote on. They had three machines and they usually only just have one. The pollworkers were sending people away and telling them to vote at Kennedy Park, and then the people at Kennedy Park were sending them back over to the middle school. When people were turned away from voting, I told them they should challenge that and ask for a provisional ballot, but once they've been hassled, they won't go back.

VOTING IN PENNSYLVANIA ON THE 21ST CENTURY

DISCRIMINATION IN VOTING BASED ON NATIONAL ORIGIN/ANCESTRY AND MINORITY LANGUAGE

Introduction:

For the past six years I had been centered in a struggle for civil rights and voting rights in Pennsylvania, especially in the region known as the Pennsylvania Dutch Country (Berks County and surrounding counties). My approach to the voting issues is nonpartisan, based on the fact that I don't have any political affiliation. My ultimate goal is to improve the voting process, to advance the public interest in a real election reform.

The input I pretend to provide to the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act will portray or summarize some of the issues that our community confronted. Special emphasis will be made or focus on the findings and outcomes of the investigation made by the Civil Rights Division, Voting Section from the United States Department of Justice in the city of Reading, Pennsylvania from 2001 to 2003.

The election practices and procedures in Berks County, Pennsylvania resulted in the issuance of a preliminary injunction and latter a permanent injunction by a federal judge. Those decisions are cited as U.S. v. Berks County, PA. 250 F. Supp. 2d 525 (E.D. Pa. 2003) and 277 F. Supp. 2d 570 (E.D. Pa. 2003).

In summary, the court founded that Berks County "use of English-only election process violated § 4(e) of Voting Rights Act by conditioning right to vote for county's sizeable Puerto Rican community, many of whom attended schools in Puerto Rico, on ability to read, write and understand English..." They denied information and assistance necessary for those citizens to participate in the election process.

Another of the initial findings was that "English-only election process violated § 208 of Voting Rights Act by failing to ensure that limited -English proficient voters of Puerto Rican descent who were unable to read ballot received voting assistance at polling place from assistors of their choice."

The Federal District Court also decided that "English-only election process violated § 2 of Voting Rights Act by failing to provide language assistance to limited-English proficient voters of Puerto Rican descent who were unable to read ballot and by failing to appoint minority poll workers." The Court emphasized on "evidence that election officials permitted poll workers to openly express hostility to Hispanic voters; that

"Hispanic voters were treated differently and discriminated against at polling places, and Hispanic residents in county were severely underrepresented as poll workers."

As Judge Baylson pointed in the opinion of the preliminary injunction: "At the heart of this case is Section 4(e) of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(e), an act of Congress which mandates protection of the voting rights of non-English speaking United States citizens. A substantial portion of the citizens of Berks County, particularly the City of Reading were born in Puerto Rico and educated in Spanish-speaking schools... Congress mandated protection of their right to vote in a language other than English if they are illiterate in English."

I. Berks County, PA election practices

A. Hostile and disparate treatment of Hispanic and Spanish-speaking voters

Poll workers turned away Hispanic voters because they could not understand their names, or refused to deal with Hispanic Surnames.

Poll workers made hostile statements about Hispanic voters; others made discriminatory statements concerning Hispanics.

Poll workers placed burdens on Hispanic voters that are not imposed on Anglo voters, like demanded photo identification.

Poll workers required only Hispanic voters to verify their addresses.

Hispanic voters stated that this hostile attitude and rude treatment makes them uncomfortable and intimidated in the polling place, and discourages them from voting.

B. Lack of Bilingual Poll workers

There is a need to recruit, appoint, train, or maintain a pool of Hispanic poll workers or poll workers with Spanish-language skills. There was approximately 3 percent of poll workers in Reading precincts with Spanish surnames, compared to a voting age population that is over 30 percent Hispanic.

C. Lack of Bilingual Materials

This has severe impact on limited-English proficient voters. Many are unable to read these English only materials.

D. Denial of Assistor of Choice

Due to the lack of bilingual materials and assistance available at the polling places, many voters attempt to bring bilingual friends or family members to the polling places to assist them, but poll workers have not permitted voters to bring their assistors of choice with them.

E. County Officials' Knowledge and refusal to remedy

II. ISSUES

A. Section 4(e)

Congress declared that to secure the rights under the fourteenth amendment of persons educated in American-flag schools in which the predominant classroom language was other than English, it is necessary to prohibit the States from conditioning the right to vote of such persons on ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter in the English language.

Berks County knowingly conducted English-only elections and fails to provide limited-English proficient United States citizens of Puerto Rican descent with election information and assistance necessary for their effective participation in the electoral process.

Berks County violated this section by failing to ensure that voters who are unable to read the ballot receive voting assistance at the polling place from assistors of their choice.

This section of the VRA (42 U.S.C. § 1973, states:

(a) No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any state or political subdivision in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees...set forth in section 1973...

(b) A violation of the previous subsection is established if, based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election ...are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens protected by subsection (a) in that its members have less opportunity than others members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice.

Based in the totality of circumstances, Berks County election policies and practices has denied limited-English proficient Hispanic voters the opportunity to participate effectively in the electoral process on an equal basis with other members of the electorate.

As cited in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30 (1986), the critical question in section 2 claim is whether the use of a contested electoral practice or structure results in members of a protected group having less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and elect representatives of their choice.

Section 2 had been brought to challenge election officials' failure to provide language assistance as well as failure to appoint minority poll workers. Had been established that lack of minority poll workers also is a serious impediment to Hispanic voters gaining equal access to the electoral process.

D. The public Interest

The Court found that ordering Berks County to conduct elections in compliance with the VRA so that all citizens may participate equally in the electoral process serves the public interest.

III. Relief and ORDER

A. Berks County elections must comply with the Voting Rights Act of 1965 as amended, specifically Sections 2, 4(e) and 208 and the guarantees of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the US Constitution.

B. OPM authorized to appoint Federal examiners

C. Berks County shall provide in English and Spanish all written election-related materials.

D. Bilingual poll officials or interpreters in precincts with at least 5% of Hispanic voters

E. County required to use all practicable means to recruit, engage as temporary County employees, and train persons to serve as bilingual poll officials or interpreter in all elections in the City of Reading, PA

F. Bilingual poll officials or interpreters shall be present in all designated polling places for the standard time.

G. Ensure voters are permitted to have assistance in voting, by a person of their choice.

H. Maintain at least 2 dedicated telephone lines for use on Election Day answered in the Spanish language by a trained bilingual employee throughout the day while polls are open. All polling places within the City of Reading should have posted the information describing the availability of telephone assistance.

I. County shall publicize in Spanish and English prior to the election the availability of bilingual election materials, interpreters at the polling places, Spanish language telephone assistance, and the right of voters to bring their assistor of choice.

J. Training of all poll officials and making them aware of their obligation to comply with all applicable provisions of VRA.

K. Bilingual Coordinator shall be trained in all aspects of the election process at least 3 months prior to any election.

L. The Coordinator and the Director of Elections shall meet with representatives of the Hispanic Community at least one month prior to each election.

M. Coordinator shall investigate all allegations of poll worker hostility toward Hispanic and/or Spanish speaking voter and report the results to the Director of Elections and the counsel of record for the United States.

N. At least 10 days previous to any election, County Elections Services Office shall provide to counsel of US all information about location polling places and poll officials, including identification of bilingual; a copy of most recent voter registration list, a set of all written materials to be provided to voters and documents pertaining to the hiring and training of bilingual poll officials

Conclusion:

Despite some improvements in Berks County election practices and procedures, there are many areas that need improvement. Lack of consistency in pool of polling places officials, the uncertainty about how Berks County deal with the position of Bilingual coordinator and the need to improve communication and education using the media and Spanish newspapers remain areas of concern.

The need to remain enforcing the Voting Rights Act provisions of the law and maintain tracking compliance with the Court Order are the only safeguard to assure compliance. The matter of compliance didn't depend on whom or which political party is in control. The experience for us in Berks County is that the work of voting rights advocates/activists and not the political machines of the political parties are the ones that are improving compliance with Voting Rights Act and other applicable legislation.

Other issues still demanding attention for inproving the voting rights are:

1. A reform of the redistricting process with legislation creating a nonpartisan redistricting commission.

2. Amendment of the Ballot Access laws to improve fair competition and participation in the electoral process.

3. A new legislation "Nonpartisan Judiciary Election Act" which improve the system of elections for the Judiciary.

Dear National Commissioners on the Voting Rights Act:

I am writing this letter to convey my strong support for the Voting Rights Act that was enacted in 1965. Since 1965 the Voting Rights Act has been essential in ensuring that all citizens regardless of race, age, ethnicity and language skills are guaranteed the right to vote. Not only are citizens assured the right to vote by this act, but they are guaranteed that their vote will be counted fairly and accurately. Some may argue that we have come a long way since 1965. They may claim that racial injustice and discrimination are no longer condoned as they once were and that those dark and disgraceful years of American history are over. These same people might believe that no citizen in America is kept from exercising his or her right to vote by fraud, discrimination, through misleading information or unreasonable laws, but they are wrong. Voter disenfranchisement continues to be a national problem.

In light of the 2000 elections in Florida, it is absurd to argue that fraud does not exist in our electoral system. When thousands of voters were turned away from voting booths because of their race and their political affiliations and numerous ballots thrown out because they favored one candidate over another, how can we claim that there is no discrimination in the voting process? I believe history will reveal that more should have been done to investigate these claims and bring to justice those persons or groups responsible for the election improprieties.

Florida is not the only state that had a break down in the voting process. Numerous Missouri voters experienced a similar turmoil. I was quite disheartened by some of the events that took place in Missouri during the 2000 elections. I found it disturbing that St. Louis election officials routinely violated state and federal law in the implementation of Missouri Statute Section 115.195. This statute specifically limits the use of the inactive voter list. It states that the inactive voter designation can only be used to determine the number of ballots to be printed, to compute the proportional costs of elections or to facilitate mailing information to registered voters. The law does not give election officials authority to purge the names of inactive voters from the election rolls. It is meant to ensure that voter's rights are protected and not denied because the voter has relocated or the U.S. Postal Service has failed to update its records. St. Louis City and County violated this law by keeping records differentiating between active and inactive voters and then denying those identified as inactive voters from voting when they came to the polls.

Another issue of great concern that undermines voting rights is the use of provisional ballots. I firmly believe that provisional ballots are detrimental to our democracy. A federal judge in Missouri ruled that the state is not required to count provisional ballots if they were cast outside the voter's own precinct. After the 2004 elections, there were reports that poll workers failed to distribute provisional ballots and that many did not understand the legal issues surrounding these ballots. Clearly, the provisional ballot law is confusing; it lends itself to interpretation by ill informed election officials and must be eliminated. Missouri voters should not be turned away at the polls because of a misinterpretation of law.

Due to the numerous failings that still plague the election process, I strongly believe that the Voting Rights Act is vital to ensure that every citizen has the opportunity to vote and that each vote is counted. According to the Department of Justice, the Voting Rights Act has been called the single most effective piece of civil rights legislation ever passed by Congress. In Mississippi the difference in voting registration rates between blacks and whites went from numbers as high as 63.3% to 6.3%. In Louisiana, this number went from 48.9% to -2.0%. This is nothing short of a testament to the effectiveness of this act. Although we have come a long way since the days of Jim Crow and the Grandfather Clause, we must realize that there will always be individuals and groups who will try to manipulate the voting process in order to advance their own agenda. We must protect this constitutional right that so many have struggled and died for. We must ensure that the Voting Rights Act is reauthorized.

Sincerely,

Wm. Lacy Clay

PREPARED STATEMENT OF GWEN CARR BEFORE THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JULY 22, 2005

TESTIMONY OF GWEN CARR
To
The National Commission on the Voting Rights Act
Friday July 22
Minneapolis Minnesota

Introduction:

Ske N'on! My name is Gwen Carr, I am from the Cayuga Nation of NewYork, Heron Clan. I work and reside in Madison Wisconsin and I am the founder of the Wisconsin American Indian Caucus , a statewide voter education and empowerment project . I am here today in support of the renewal of the Provisions of the VRA and to talk a bit about voting and American Indians in Wisconsin and the United States.

General Overview of Voting in Indian Country:

The struggle of American Indians to gain the right to vote has been a long and arduous journey. It is important to understand the context in which American Indian people have fought for the right of citizenship, and for the right to vote in America.

The historical genocidal and racist policies of the United States government over the past 200 plus years have found Indians caught between tribal membership and the denial of citizenship, assimilation policies that included everything from wardship to allotment based citizenship, from removal from traditional lands, to removal from reservations to urban areas. Indians were only finally declared citizens in 1924, and the last American Indians granted the right to vote in 1948 in Arizona. The existence of racism in American Indian voting issues cannot be determined to be something of the past. As recently as earlier this year, tribes and tribal members have had to seek legal redress to right the discrimination and barriers to voting in many areas of the country. It has not only been a federal Indian Problem in regards to voting. Many states, such as South Dakota, Washington, Arizona and New Mexico have created local legislative barriers to the Voting Rights act in the form of redistricting, voter dilution among others. The only remedy for American Indians and the only means by which we can exert our right to vote has been the Voting Act of 1965. Section 2 which bans voting practices that result in the denial or abridgment of the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority and Section 4 and 201 which abolish tests and devices for voting are the bulwarks that stand between Indians being able to freely participate in the electoral process and the forces which would destroy it.

Wisconsin Indians:

Wisconsin is the home to eleven federally recognized tribes and Native Americans make up approximately 69,386 or 1.3 percent of the total state population.[1] While the overall statewide percentage is small, there are dense concentrations of the Native American population. For instance, in the case of the Menominee Nation, the entire reservation is a county. There are also significant Indian populations in Milwaukee and Green Bay. These eleven federally recognized tribes form the nucleus of Wisconsin Indian tribal communities. These tribes share little in the way of common native language, material culture, and economic livelihood, yet parallels exist in their historical experiences with invading European powers, loss of land, American governmental policy, and experiments in home rule. Every tribe in Wisconsin, for example, has felt the disastrous brunt of physical removal. Some tribes were removed from Wisconsin, while the Brothertown, StockbridgeMunsee, and Oneida Indians were moved here from places in the east.

Wisconsin Indian tribes were subject to deleterious nineteenth-century land cession treaties in which they lost virtually all of their traditional homelands to make way for incoming Wisconsin settlers. Non-Indian entrepreneurs and settlers forced thousands of Winnebago [now known as Ho-Chunk], Potawatomi, Chippewa, Menominee, Sac and Fox, and Santee Sioux Indians to clear the land and make way for statehood. The U.S. government established reservations with the intent to subjugate the scattered remains of the once-powerful nations of native peoples. This action further opened their ceded lands to exploitation and their cultures to the federal policy of assimilation, with its purpose to sever the native people's unique propensity to the land-mother earth.

Wisconsin is, in a sense, a national model for federal Indian policy experimentation, as every trial-and-error initiative was attempted here. Failed federal government experiments in reservation land allotment, annuity payments, timber removal, off-reservation boarding schools, relocation, and termination only added to the woes of the tribes.
The success of Wisconsin tribes in creating environs of political and economic sustenance is due in large part to their perseverance in maintaining traditional values and tribal heritage. Tribal goals of self-determination and political sovereignty are being realized through constitutional representative governance, legislative and rule-making powers, law enhancement, and judicial resolution of conflict. Tribes retain governing powers, human service and education responsibility, as well as economic leadership, stewardship for the land, and natural resources.

These powers are guaranteed through treaties (unique court-affirmed legal agreements) with the United States government. In fact, a government-to-government relationship exists between the eleven tribes of Wisconsin and the United States of America. This relationship forms the basis of a "trust" to further the interests of the Wisconsin tribes by protecting their property assets and guaranteeing a future for tribal culture. Wisconsin Indian tribes will accomplish their goals of self-determination and sociopolitical viability only if they nourish their heritage; preserve their tribal languages; maintain their spirituality, customs, and values (which well-served their ancestors through generations of hardship), and maintain an adequate land base for the future generations to follow.

Elections in Wisconsin Indian Communities:

The 2004 American Indian Coordinated Campaign put approximately $65,000 into the state of Wisconsin's Indian GOTV program. The campaign brought approximately twenty-five field organizers into the state to specifically work on each reservation. In addition to these organizers, the campaign identified and employed a number of GOTV coordinators on each reservation. Many of the GOTV people working on the reservations had previous experience in campaigns, participated in the Wisconsin American Indian Caucus, and/or had attended a Native Vote political training. The campaign made efforts to pair up experienced organizers with less experienced people to create a pool of organizers for upcoming elections. Most of the reservation coordinators were aware of the outside field organizers arrival and purpose and worked well with them in creating walk lists, phone banks and the voter GOTV card program.

The Wisconsin American Indian Vote Campaign pursued multiple avenues to ensure turnout on the reservations. The campaign worked with many of the tribes in obtaining information to create a statewide American Indian voter file. Menominee Nation had all their members on a voter file and utilized it for literature distribution, phone banking, and GOTV activities. The campaign media efforts included earned media in the local urban Indian community newspapers in Milwaukee, an ad share program for reservation and statewide Indian newspapers, and made available free, non-partisan GOTV ads for tribal radio stations. Education outreach was extensive and included presentations to young first time and potential voters at on and off reservation schools and the distribution of down ticket Indian literature at gatherings, including pow-wows, rallies and other public events. Finally, GOTV materials were made available for tribal efforts to distribute which included t-shirts, posters, and buttons. As a result of these efforts, the American Indian Coordinated Campaign played a key role in mobilizing Native American voters in the state.

Statewide Wisconsin Voter Turnout, 2000-2004[2]

Election Year	VAP	Turnout	Turnout as % of VAP
2000	3,994,919	2,598,607	65.06%
2004	3,990,696[3]	2,997,007	75.13%

Throughout the state, overall voter participation for Native Americans/Alaska Natives residing on reservations increased. Some of the reservations saw an increase in voter turnout of 162 percent in the general election from 2000 to 2004..

VRA Section retirement and its impact on American Indian voting rights:

The Preclearance Section up for renewal in the Voting Rights Act has a particular impact on American Indian communites in Wisconsin and nationwide. For instance the (1) the Section 5 "preclearance" provisions which require jurisdictions in all or part of sixteen states to submit voting changes to the United States Department of Justice ("DOJ") or the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for preclearance approval before they can be implemented; In Indian Country, there have been numerous redistricting laws enacted that specifically are designed to disenfranchise native voters, by breaking up their communities in more than one district hence diluting their vote and making it impossible for Indian people to elect their choice of candidate. Such is the case in South Dakota where Indians recently won a court case on July 14 , 2005 which granted an injunction against the state of South Dakota for violating the preclearance section or the VRA. In Wisconsin we have had numerous bills introduced in the state legislature that have tried to disenfranchise Indians as well as non Indian minority groups by redistricting. Even tho Wisconsin isn't one of the states which is named and required to comply with that Section of the VRA; without it in place on a national level there would be no protection against more of the same kind of legislation.

Section 203 minority language provisions which require more than 450 counties and townships to provide language assistance to voters with limited-English proficiency

The issue of bilingual voting material;s is an essential one for many Tribal communities. When I worked with Navajo in AZ and NM, it was essential for educational and informational purposes that voting materials were in the Navajo language. The Navajo nation has over 225,000 members, over the largest land mass that include four states, with over 100 Chapter Houses. which can be characterized as wards or precincts . The common language choice is not English. Having the Minority language provisions are essential to overcoming the barriers to voting in minority language communities.

The examiner and observer provisions:

In 2004 the National Congress of American Indians and the DC Native American Bar Association conducted a nationwide voter election protection project that coordinated and provided outreach and support for American Indian communities including Wisconsin as a means to combat voter suppression and discrimination. This project worked with local Indian lawyers and others to provide local communities with the knowledge of their voting rights within the state and document any incidences of voter fraud or discrimination. While Wisconsin had less incidents than other states, this project was vital in informing Native communities of their rights. The observers sent into Wisconsin and other states not only helped support Indian people at the polls but also sent a message to the larger community that Indian people were not going to be subject to harassment or any other form of suppression. Without the Examiner and Observer provision of the VRA, Indian people could again be without the knowledge and tools they need in order to fully exercise their right to vote.

Reports of discrimination in voting experienced by minority voters or impediments To elect the candidates of their choice.in Wisconsins Indian Communities:

While the well organized on the ground voter turn out programs run by Native people in Wisconsin and the existence of same day of voter registration and vote casting certainly make the voting process less cumbersome for Indian voters, there are still serious impediments to voting in some Indian communities. Most of the occurrences of voter intimidation or suppression occurred with either new young voters or early voters.

Examples:

1. Early and first time voters who reside in Red Spring, which is outside the Menominee reservation and in neighboring Shawano County but is comprised of a significant Indian population were told they could not vote in Red Spring and had to go to Neopit or Kashena on the reservation.

2. Red Spring town clerk told early voters that they could vote at her house and to meet her at 5PM . 50 Menominee and Stockbridge voters were driven to her house. She never showed up. Finally after waiting 3 hours outside she arrived home and told them shed never made that statement.

3. Shawano High school students who were of voting age were told by school officials that Indians cannot vote in Shawano County under any circumstances.

4. Menominee tribal members were requested by Red Springs town clerk to identify in writing ALL known Indians who resided in Middle Village which is in Shawano County before they would be allowed to vote.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak here today.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF CAROL JUNEAU BEFORE THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JULY 22, 2005

Date: July 22, 2005

Testimony of Carol C. Juneau, Representative, HD 16
Member of the Mandan and Hidatsa Tribes
Blackfeet Reservation
Box 55, Browning, Montana 59417

Issue: Voting issues, Voting Rights for minority voters since 1982.

My name is Carol Juneau and I currently serve as a Montana State Representative, for HD 16. The Blackfeet Indian Reservation makes up the majority of my House District. I am an enrolled member of the Mandan and Hidatsa Tribes of North Dakota. I have been active in the political empowerment of Indian people for many years.

I was a plaintiff in the Old Person v Cooney, later called Old Person v Brown, Voting rights case that was filed after the 1992 Redistricting Process. We spent many years on this and it became moot after the 2003 Redistricting Plan was approved for Montana. I won't spend time on this case but would like to encourage this Commission on Voting Rights to review the issues raised in this case of the dilution of the Indian vote in Montana.
Also, I want to ask the Commission to include for the record the report that was recently completed by Dr. Janine Pease for Yale University on Voting Rights in Indian Country called "Lessons From the Past, Prospects for the Future: Honoring the Fortieth Anniversary of the Voting Rights Act of 1965." This is a comprehensive report on the history of voting rights for Indian people, what some of the barriers are, and how the Voting Rights act protects American Indian Voter, highlights voting rights cases in Indian Country, and other issues. Dr. Pease outlines many issues that should be considered in this study of voting rights for American Indians.

Montana has a long history of voting rights activities such as voter registration drives, voter education projects, and get out the vote drives throughout the seven Indian reservations in Montana. We also have a history of voting rights litigation that has helped move us forward. Also, the recent redistricting of Montana after the 2000 census, the Montana State Legislature has created the opportunity for eight (8) American Indians serving – 6 in the House and 2 in the Senate. We expect to have nine (9) in the 2007 Session.
The issue of proportional representation for American Indians in state legislatures as well as county, city, school boards and other local government systems needs to be addressed by this Commission. Although we may be equitably represented in the Montana State legislature, Indian people are far from equitably represented in county government systems, school boards, city governments, and all those other policy making bodies that make the decisions that impact all people in the state, including tribal communities. This lack of equity in representation of these decision making bodies lead to inequities in employment opportunities and services.

The progress that has been made in Montana has not been without challenges or without the very hard committed work of many people who had to dance through the hoops placed in front of them by the County Clerk and Recorders as well as by laws passed by the State Legislature on voting procedures.

Most recently the State's Redistricting Process of 2003 faced a number of challenges before it was actually implemented. The Republican majority in the Montana House and Senate introduced a number of bills that were designed to set up barriers asking that the plan be redone. Those of us who were advocating for the Plan as presented by the Redistricting and Reapportionment Committee were kept very busy getting to bill hearings. All of these hearings would be a matter of public record if information is needed. Another bill invalidated the plan and urged the Secretary of State not to accept the plan, and he did not. Instead he went to Court and said the plan was unconstitutional. He lost and the State was required to accept the Redistricting Plan.

Just recently in Blaine County in Montana, which includes the Fort Belknap Reservation, another election legal challenge was filed and won by the Indian people of that community. For 80 years there had never been an Indian County Commissioner elected. An election was held with a new district created on the Reservation area and an Indian was elected.
In preparing for this testimony I asked a number of people in Montana to share some of their stories and information that might help you in your work. Following is their testimony:
From Dr. Janine Pease, Crow Indian Educator and Voting Right Activist
pease@rocky.edu

There are several ways that American Indian voters experience discriminatory practices in the voting process. Following are four areas that pertain to virtually every reservation in Montana, from my experience in voter registration and education over the past twenty years.
1 - The rural locations on reservation render American Indians at the mercy of the county clerks, for electors must accurately place their residence location in "section, township and range." This is hypertechnical voter registration cards. In Bighorn County, it is our experience that the lack of addressing in our county places our potential registrants at risk. They will often get "tossed" if the location is not specific. When we do voter registration drives, we gather all the cards prior to their submission to be sure and place the locations so as to specify the section township and range.

2 - Montana has had a purge process that removes registered voters from the voter lists if the voter does not cast a vote in the general election when the U.S. President is up for election. This process eliminates many registered voters. For our registration processes, this means a repetitious investment of time and energy. The impact of the voter purging primarily impacts first time and young voters, who are the most difficult to register and whose voting habits are hardly developed.

3. American Indian voters in Montana experience the highest level of discrimination in the voting process in the established methods of election schemes. The election schemes in Montana are at-large systems. Most Indian voters are unaware that the election schemes dilute their strength, and make it nearly impossible to elect school board members, county commissions, water board commissioners, city mayors, and more. American Indian voters desperately need the chance for representation. Services provided by cities, counties, water board, and the state of Montana are all controlled by these elected officers. Until American Indian people have a clear path to representation, many of these governmental entities will continue their practices that in Montana tend to exclude American Indians.

4. American Indian voters need to have American Indian judges at the polls. Montana county clerk contact and train election judges, usually through the local county committees of the democrats and republicans. The nomination of judges needs to include American Indian nominees, so that American Indian voters can rely on a familiar face AND the provision of voter information in the tribal language. For our tribal elders, having an election judge who can explain the voting process in the American Indian languages, is a necessity.

Bilingual (Cheyenne and English) speaking people are still needed at the polls here and it is never a priority despite us pointing it out over the years. I believe there are some racial connotations to this issue not being addressed on our Reservations--i.e. in the cities like San Francisco the ballots are translated into numerous languages and they have folks at the polls there who speak these languages to assist the voters. On our Reservations, we are dealing with a disenfranchised population who are already hesitant to vote due to backlash--and they have none or maybe one person who can speak the tribal language at the polls. This backlash is especially prevalent today in the county clerk and recorder offices when Cheyennes go to get their automobiles registered and face the covert and sometimes overt hostility due to us getting our license plates at reduced fees because of our residence on the Reservation and tribal sovereignty.

During the 2004 election, we had a hard time with the bilingual issue in Lame Deer. I had to have my mother go into the poll booths with some elders to help them vote--and this was when she was voting herself--no telling how many Cheyennes did not have bilingual assistance that election day. This is very important also for interpreting and explaining the numerous ballot initiatives that folks had to vote for--I had to explain these to my mother and then she helped explain them to the tribal elders in Cheyenne who were waiting in line to vote--issues like the medical marijuana, the coal bed methane county zoning vote--these are complex issues not easliy interpreted into Cheyenne language.

Anita Big Springs, Flathead Reservation

This is what Get out the Vote Flathead Reservation encountered in the most recent election in 2004:

Smudged Voter Cards. Voter Cards were sent out and ink smudged by the precinct number/district

Remarks from the Lake County Election Admin Assistant when we took electors in to due change of addresses: "Oh, You moved again, we can't keep up with you." (from Marion Siedentopf, Admin Assistant, Election Office)

Sending a Kootenai Elder on a wild goose chase to vote: The elder went to Dayton to vote and was told she had to vote in Polson. She went to Polson to Vote and Polson told her to vote in Dayton. (I called Kathie Newgard, Lake County Election Administrator, her reply was "That was my fault Anita, she should be voting in Polson and I sent her out a new card this morning". This was on said on Election Day. No election judge offered the elder to vote provisional in Dayton. A total of 50 miles or more for the elder to get the run around.

Talking down to a Kootenai Male Elder and treating him like he was in kindergarten. This man is a Veteran of War and is the War Dance Chief for the Kootenai Community and is also the community "grave digger" who is held in high esteem in the Kootenai Culture. Him and his family dig graves by hand. To be treated like he has no sense is totally outrageous!

Election Judges I.D. discrimination and not following voting protocol. Not asking their friends or relatives or community people for I.D.'s and letting them vote. When an Indian went to vote who had been voting in the same precinct for 30 years, he was asked to produce an I.D.

Sending an Indian to vote in three different precincts because the voter card was wrong, which was not the electors fault. (this is a tough one and needs lengthy explanation).

Not having anyone who can speak Native Language as Election Judges to help the Kootenai/Salish People Vote.

Not recruiting the minority to serve as Election Judges.

Late Voter Registration Lists. When we asked for the list, it was hard to set a time when they would be ready from the election administrators. Answering in only one word sentences from the Lake County Election Administrator.

The Chief Election Judges do not have enough training in the Voting Rights Act. Provisional Balloting Spoiled Ballots Collecting Absentee Ballots at precincts, etc. .

Our Indian Representative running for office and her name was not on the absentee ballots that had been sent out. She had to request the absentee ballots be spoiled and had to ask for a new ballot send out.

Election Administrators giving out voter registration cards or absentee ballot requests to a minimum. (Like about 20 voter registrations in a pile and maybe 10 absentee requests). Telling us that they do not like the ones downloaded from the Net or in the phone books because it does not fit in their little card board voter card box and it creates more work. They had their own voter registration cards printed with the Lake County Address. We had to use these ones first.

Polling places: A precinct who only had 42 non-Indian voters as registered voters who have their own polling place. A district where there is 282 registered voters with the Indian minority who have to travel 60 miles to vote.

Election Administrators following the law on "mismarked" ballots! It is the big one with the 7 Ballots, I disputed. There were not only the 7 ballots I disputed, but in district court another 70 Ballots were brought up. A total of 77 Ballots that should have been thrown out. I disputed only 7 Ballots. Duncan Scott (Jore's lawyer) brought up the other 70 ballots in his argument.

I guess following the law to the "T". If an election administrator has to "speculate" than the ballot should be thrown. You have seen personally how they were being counted in Lake County. Stickies over the ballot mark, etc. Plain ole' sloppy ballot counting to me.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF STEPHEN LAUDIG, ATTORNEY, SUBMITTED TO THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JULY 22, 2005

STATEMENT OF STEPHEN LAUDIG

Greetings and thank you for asking me to assist in this venture.

My name is Steve Laudig.

BACKGROUND

I am an attorney. I have practiced in Indianapolis for 27 years and now split my time between practicing law and being a graduate student in political science in the Political Science Department of the University of Hawaii.

By way of a separate document I am providing my current vitae and contact information.

I am admitted to practice before the U.S. Supreme Court; the Seventh Circuit; and the state courts of Indiana and Hawaii. I have been a death penalty qualified public defender and have tried a death penalty to verdict and participated in several others.

I was the Marion County, which includes Indianapolis, Democratic Party Chairman from 1997 until 2001. Personally I have been the Democratic nominee for a few public offices. I have had much more success as a litigator than a candidate. As part of my political activity I have registered voters and carried people in stretchers to vote when they didn't get their absentee ballots in time.

I belong to the following organizations: Hawai'i Bar Association; Hawai'i Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers; Native Hawaiian Bar Association. I have previously been a member of the Indiana Public Defender Council; Indiana Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers (Charter Member); Marion County Criminal Defense Bar Association (Founder and Charter Member); National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers; American Trial Lawyers Association.

I currently edit the Hawaiian Journal of Law and Politics. http://www2.hawaii.edu/~hslp/index.html. I am a member of the Hawaiian Society of Law and Politics.

POINT OF VIEW

I should probably put my particular points of view and predispositions up front so no one is left guessing about my particular "biases." My approach to the responsibilities of political action have first been, what is the best for the least powerful in society and that no political party has a monopoly on serving this interest.

It seems to me that the matter of "race and color" in the United States isn't simply the most important problem facing the many cultures present in the society of the United States, in many ways "it" is the "only" problem. Being such a large problem that it manifests in many different aspects of the culture. Since it manifests so many different ways there must be many solutions.

"It" is a "radical" problem in the sense that it is a problem of the root of American society and culture. One of the better solutions for this problem of the root, has been the Voting Rights Act since, when it is enforced, it results in making our increasingly threatened democracy more representative and, in my opinion, better able to resist what appears to a growing appetite in some currently very powerful political groupings present in the United States for messianic totalitarianism.

My experience in Indianapolis during the last three decades of the 20th centuries and the first half of the first decade of the 21st century leads me to conclude that the local Democratic Party is vastly more open to variety and is virtually free of any displays of racial or ethnic prejudice. Is prejudice present in the hearts of Democrats in Indianapolis. I imagine so, but you couldn't prove it by what you see. It doesn't show much in the Democratic coalition and that's important. Racially integrating political leadership tends to suppress it's manifestations even further. The less it shows the less it can be learned.

I'd like to relate one story as to why I say this. When I was the County Chairman I would call precinct committeepersons around town just to chat and find out what was going on in the neighborhoods. Some years ago I was speaking to a retired white working class committeeperson in an aging formerly completely white working-class part of town. He had been a committeeman since the 1960's. He was a retired "union man" but not necessarily politically progressive nor racially tolerant but neither was he a hater. More of a bit of a contrarian than anything in the sense that he didn't appreciate anyone acting like they thought they were better than anyone else. When it came to local politics he was a "Blue Dog" Democrat. But, I would not be surprised if he voted for Wallace in 68 in light of Wallace's tirades against hippies, the Supreme Court, and big government, and his ennobling of the white working class. Reagan once and most certainly Perot in 1992. Each time for the same reasons. He has an emotional, rather than intellectual, understanding of class politics. But it was a deeply felt understanding. Anyway, I called him to find out how his neighborhood was adjusting to the sudden influx of Hispanics into the neighborhood he had lived in all his life. It is a neighborhood of old and inexpensive housing and was a bit of a magnet for new arrivals. I wanted to gauge racial and ethnic reactions and see if we needed to do some Spanish language training for voter registration. We talked about people we knew and then I asked him about the changes and he said something like "Yeah, there's a lot of those [expletive deleted] Mexicans moving in." So, I asked him how he felt about that and he said something like he didn't really "care for it" but that he'd "get used to it." When I asked "How so"? He said he didn't have much choice since his favorite grand-daughter "just married one."

My point is that a lot of the local Democrats are very tolerant and the ones that aren't very tolerant are tolerant enough to become more tolerant. This is a sharp contrast with the local Republican leadership that seems to go out of their way to belittle most of the few African-Americans that are active. They seem especially insensitive to African-American women.

This apparent intolerance is a rather recent development in local Marion County Republican circles. Please keep in mind that my comments here are to the local political scene, not state or national.

As recently as the late 1970's and 1980's it had always seemed to be a priority of local Republican leadership. Republican Mayor [now U.S. Senator] Lugar, and Republican Mayor Hudnut vigorously, and seemingly genuinely, engaged the political interests of the African-American population in Indianapolis. Mayor Hudnut would regularly receive nearly 1/3rd of the African-American vote. No Republican mayoral candidate since him has reached the high single digits. After Mayor Hudnut left the local Republican party seems to have written off the African-American vote. This seems both a shame and foolish politically. If you write-off one-fourth of the voters, it means that you have to get a supermajority of the remaining 75% to win and there's always about 15% of the electorate that votes based upon the style of your campaign, as opposed to what issues you campaign upon and these voters will not vote for someone who appears intolerant. In a county like Marion where the party strength is about even, it is a ticket to political obscurity. Coke doesn't write off 25% of all consumers to Pepsi. It seems self-defeating for a political party to do so. But it seems that the remaining local Republican leadership is hooked into an "ahistorical" political ideology that refuses to take into account the persistent effects through time of past racism. The ideology doesn't allow them to even admit that discrimination is real and thus they are lost in a parallel political physics reality where past causes [racial segregation in housing; racial discrimination in employment; segregated schools] have no present effects.

It is my personal opinion that the litigation that I've been involved with has opened doors and made the "class picture" of those elected look much more like the "class picture" of those doing the voting than before the litigation. Having integrated elected political leadership means that a Julia Carson [U.S. House of Representatives, 7th District Indiana] an African-American daughter of a domestic elected in a "minority-minority" district with enthusiastic white support can help to explain to those who will listen what it means to be discriminated against and she comes to the podium with the credibility of an elected U.S. Member of the House of Representatives. I am proud of the fact that she was one of the plaintiffs in my first VRA case, Carson v. Hudnut, described below. She was a State Representative at the time.

I have been either lead or co-counsel in the following voting rights act cases with the following results for increased minority participation. Lest there be any concern about me being completely biased I should tell you that the local Democratic party "leadership" never helped the litigation in any formal way and only a couple of office holders took the chance and publicly supported any of the suits.

A few words on the structure of the electoral and political structure of Marion County. Marion County is a 20 mile by 20 mile square in the middle of the state. It is divided into nine townships in a "tic-tac-toe" fashion with three up and three over. The townships are the same geographical size but the population varies from "Center" township, which is the old urban middle of the "tic-tac-toe" with more than 200,000 to a nearly rural township of 20,000. There is township government in Marion County. In 1971 Indianapolis and Marion County were consolidated "electorally" in the sense that the suburban population was added to elections for mayor and the old "county" council and the old "city" council were consolidated into a "city-county" council. The intent and effects of this "consolidation" are discussed later.

Baird v. Indianapolis: Filed 1987. Indianapolis has a 29 member city-county council. Twenty five members are elected from districts and four at-large. In 1987, I filed a suit challenging both the districts and the at-larges on racial and partisan discriminatory grounds. At the time the suit was filed the Council was 23-6 Republican even though the baseline Republican vote in the city was only 52% overall.

After spending three years and a half a million dollars the Republican-controlled council settled with us by agreeing to redraw the districts but forced us to trial on the at-larges. The judge wasn't persuaded enough as to the discriminatory effects of the at-large district [especially since the new districts increased the African-American districts from 4 to 7] and we were unable to tip that over. Prior to the litigation [before 1987] there were four African Americans elected from twenty five districts. Beginning with the redistricting caused by the litigation [1991] there were immediately seven African American districts electing six African Americans. In one district, a non-African American councilor was the candidate of choice of African American political leadership and African American voters. There are now eight African-American district councilors including two [one Republican and one Democrat] elected from white majority districts. There is also one African American majority district that continues to elect a non African-American as its council member.

The Republicans, who refused to modify the at-large district election, are now probably regretting it since Democrats have won all four at-larges the last two times.
The council is now 15-14 Democratic and without the at-larges it would be 14-11 Republican. This is rather poignant evidence of the inherently discriminatory nature of at-large district which uses the primitive winner-take-all voting method.

The at-larges now "over-represent" the African-American community since Marion County is about 28-30% African American but 75% of the At-large members on the council are African-American. This is up from none before.

The current [2005] Council president is African-American as was the immediate past council president.

Dickinson v. State Election Board: Filed 1990. Voting Rights Act litigation on behalf of African-American citizens in Indiana to end racially discriminatory multi-member districts in state legislature. Prior to the litigation the Indiana house was a mix of single member and multi-member districts. It was not an accident that multi-member districts were used in areas with significant African-American population while single member districts were used in all white areas.

Shortly before we were to try the case the General Assembly redrew the Indiana House districts and ended the multi-member districts. Prior to this litigation [before 1990] there had been two African-Americans [Summers and Crawford] elected from the five, three-member districts, in Marion County. The partisan makeup of Marion County districts was 12-3

Republican. After the litigation [1992] there was an immediate jump to four African-American majority districts electing three African-Americans and one white. Beginning in 2002 there are five African-American districts electing four African-Americans. One districts has continued to elect the same non-African-American candidate it has since prior to 1982. The partisan makeup now is 8-7 Democratic.

Hines v. Marion County Election Board: Filed 1991. Voting Rights Act litigation on behalf of African-American citizens in Marion County to end racially discriminatory at-large districts in township board elections. Township boards are the legislative branch of township government that in Marion County are involved with emergency poor relief and, with one township excepted, fire protection. Under the old system, there was a three member board for each of nine townships in Marion County and out of 9 boards or 27 members there were two African-Americans. The partisan make up was 24-3 Republican. We prevailed and the at-large districts were abandoned in favor of seven single member districts for each township. Beginning immediately after the litigation [1996] there were twelve 12 out of 63 seats held by African-Americans. Now [2005] there are 17 out of 63 held by African-Americans and 23 of 63 held by Democrats. Democrats controlled 1 of 9 Boards, now they control 4 of 9.

Carson v. Hudnut: 1987 Voting Rights Act litigation on behalf of African-American citizens in Indianapolis to end racially discriminatory boundaries for precincts. Under the old system African American neighborhoods had very populous precincts and correspondingly fewer precinct committeepersons. We prevailed and the precincts were redrawn. In Indiana each precinct is entitled to a precinct committeeperson and a vice-committeeperson. In presidential year primaries the elections for committeeperson [but not the vice who is appointed] is held. The person holds office for four years. If there is no candidate the county chairman may appoint a committeeperson. All duly elected, or appointed, committeepersons and vice committeepersons convene every four years and elect the county party central committee consisting of the county chairman, vice-chair, secretary and treasurer. If there is a vacancy in a non-judicial elected office the committeepersons of the party that held the office convene to fill the vacancy. For example, if the State Representative is a Democrat and resigns or passes away the Democratic precinct committeepersons of that district convene and elect the successor. Subsequently [1989] precincts were made more equal in population and there was an increase in African American political strength in selecting party leadership and slating candidates for office which mitigates the discriminatory effects of a slating fee.

Although I haven't examined the U.S. census numbers for all precincts recently, in preparing this affidavit I discovered that Marion County Precinct Ward 7- precinct number 6 has a population of 23, while Marion County Precinct Pike Township, Precinct number 13, has a population of 4,253.

I have not examined whether there has developed a racial tilt but clearly there are equal protection problems in electoral districts with such a great difference in population.

Anderson v. Indiana State Election Board: Filed 1991. Voting Rights Act challenge to racially discriminatory elections to Marion County Small Claims Court. We prevailed and several legal procedural practices relating to landlord tenant litigation that were objectionable were ended, particularly a venue change which made it possible for inner city landlords to move eviction proceedings to suburban courts with no mass transit access which had led to high levels of default evictions. Additionally prior to the litigation there were no African American small claims court Judges out of nine. After the litigation [2002] there was one African-American Small Claims court judge and two others must have the support of African American voters to be elected. Prior to the litigation there was 1 Democrat out of 9 judges. Now there are three. It is highly likely that next year there could be 6 with one or more of the 3 new ones being an African American.

Bradley v. Work: 1991 we attempted to end the appointment of Judges in Lake County [Gary] and replace it with elections just like all the majority white counties in Indiana. Prior to 1967 Lake County had elected its judges just like all other counties in Indiana. The change to appointments had been done in response to Richard Hatcher being elected mayor of Gary in 1967 and had been adopted to thwart Lake County African American voters from having influence in electing judges. Sadly, the Chief Justice of the Indiana Supreme Court Randall Shepherd intervened and opposed us on this and devoted several hundreds of thousands of taxpayer dollars in funding the defense and we were not successful. One particularly nasty aspect of this litigation is that after the Plaintiffs lost, the Intervening Defendants at the instigation of Indiana Supreme Court Justice Randall Shepherd sought fees against me personally in a "SLAPP" style proceeding.

CURRENT LITIGATION:

I am presently representing African Americans in a challenge to districting and an at large district in Lawrence Indiana which is a suburb of Indianapolis inside Marion County.

According to the United States Census for 2000, the population of Lawrence is 39,216. Of these, 30,586 (77.99%) are white, and 6,195 (15.79%) are African-American. The remaining are other races or multiple races. Of the voting age population of 27,625, there are 22,167 (80.24%) that are white and 3888 (14.07%) are African-American. The remaining are other races or multiple races.

Lawrence has six single member districts and one three member at-large district. No African-American has ever been elected to the Lawrence Council, or any other Lawrence City office since the establishment of Lawrence as distinct political entity. No African-American has ever been nominated to be a candidate for the Council in the Republican primary for the Council. Rarely, perhaps only twice, has an African-Americans ever been nominated in the Democratic primary to be a candidate for the Council.

INDIANA'S HISTORY ON RACIAL MATTERS

What follows is a summary of factual submissions made in the cases noted above and it comes from the sources noted. Additionally it is based upon a report by expert witness I have used, Dr. Leonard Moore, of McGill University, author of Citizen Klansman.

Indiana and Marion County have a history of discrimination touching upon the rights of minorities to participate in the political process. Indiana has a long record of official discrimination against its African-American citizens.

Indiana was a "free" not a "slave" state prior to the Civil War. The 1851 Indiana Constitution Article 13 prohibited African-Americans from coming into Indiana and provided for penalties for persons who encouraged their entry. See, The Negro in Indiana Before 1900: A Study of A Minority, Emma Lou Thornbrough, Indianapolis, (1961) at 82 ("The Negro in Indiana"). Article 13 passed in Marion County by a vote of 2,505 - 308. See, The Negro in Indiana at 82. Although Article 13 was declared null by the Indiana Supreme Court in 1866, it was not formally removed until 1881. See, The Negro in Indiana at 206, 250. At the end of the Civil War Indiana's African-American solders were legally ineligible to return to Indiana because of Article 13. See, The Negro in Indiana at 231. In 1856, the Indiana Supreme Court in Barkshire v. State, 7 Ind. 389 (1856), held that it was the public policy of Indiana to remove those Negroes already present in Indiana by urging colonization in Africa and held that a male Negro resident of Indiana who married a Negro woman who came into Indiana after the adoption of Article 13 was subject to a fine. See, The Negro in Indiana at 73.

In 1860, Indiana's public schools were exclusively reserved for whites due to the failure of the state to provide of the education of Negro children. See, The Negro in Indiana at 162. Anti-minority hatreds and discrimination were not only restricted to African-Americans during this period of time. See, Bryant v. Whitcomb, 419 F.Supp. 1290 (S.D. Ind. 1970) at 1292, fn. 1. By 1865, Indiana was the only northern state to retain laws against Negro testimony. U.S. Senator Thomas Hendricks, from Indianapolis, voted against the Thirteenth Amendment in the U.S. Senate in 1865. See, The Negro in Indiana at 204. In 1866, Governor Oliver P. Morton gave a speech against Negro suffrage. See, The Negro in Indiana at 241-243. In 1869, Governor Conrad Baker gave a speech opposing Negro suffrage in Indianapolis. See, The Negro in Indiana at 241-243. The 1868 platform of the Indiana Democratic Party opposed Negro suffrage. See, The Negro in Indiana at 241-243. For many years, Indiana was the only northern state east of the Mississippi to retain laws against interracial marriages. See, The Negro in Indiana at 394. That law remained on the books until it was finally repealed in 1965. See, West's Indiana Law Encyclopedia, Marriage §14.

In 1875, two Negro ministers were arrested in Indianapolis for performing marriages contrary to the Indiana law against racially mixed marriages. See, The Negro in Indiana at 263. At least 20 Negroes were lynched in Indiana from 1865 to 1903. See, The Negro in Indiana at 276.

In the 1890's, discrimination against Negroes increased. In 1892, after Republicans had become able to elect their candidates without Negro voters, the Republican Party Chairman in Indianapolis said Negroes were a detriment to the Republican Party and expressed repugnance at white and Negro party workers mingling. He delayed opening the county headquarters because he did not want any "lazy coons" hanging around the place. See, The Negro in Indiana at 308. In 1896, the Republican Party in Indiana began a long period of control of state government during which their margin of victories was large enough that they no longer sought Negro votes. In Indiana, as well as in the South, there was a "lily white" movement within the Republican Party. See, The Negro in Indiana at 315. In 1899, a bill passed the Indiana Senate (but died in the House) which would have made it a felony for an African-American man to live with a white woman. See, The Negro in Indiana at 265, 270.

In the 1920's, Indiana, along with Illinois, and Ohio, contributed well over five hundred thousand (500,000) Knights of the Ku Klux Klan and taken together represented the heaviest concentration of Klan strength in the United States. See, The Klan in the City, Jackson, Oxford University Press (1967) at 90. From 1922 to 1925, Indianapolis was the unrivaled bastion of the Invisible Empire. See, The Klan in the City at 144. From 1922 to 1925, Indianapolis was the base of operations of the legendary D.C. Stephenson and the headquarters of the powerful Realm of Indiana and the home of the largest Klan. See, The Klan in the City at 144. In 1924, the "Invisible Empire" became visible by winning control of the Marion County Republican organization by electing George Coffin as county chairman over the mayor's candidate. See, The Klan in the City at 152. In 1925, the Klan elected both a mayor of Indianapolis and a school board. See, The Klan in the City at 158. Gary, Indiana, with a total population of 55,000, had a Klan membership estimated at 10,000 men. See, The Klan in the City at 239. The politically dominant Gary Republican party "was the party of the Ku Klux Klan, and several mayors and city councilmen were either members of the Klan or nominated and elected with Klan support." See, Steel City, Gary, Indiana 1906-1950, Betten, Holmes & Meier Publishing, New York, (1986) at 64. In 1925, the Klan in Gary elected Floyd Williams mayor. He was an undertaker "with no political experience." Five of the fifteen Gary council members, the ones elected at large, were Klan candidates. See, A History of Gary, Indiana: 1930-1940, Richard J. Meister, Doctoral Dissertation, Department of History, Notre Dame, (January 1966) at 43.

During the 1920's, Gary Negroes began to show increasing independence politically by winning their first elections --they had just elected a council member from their own ranks. The white political response was a proposal that Gary should switch to a "city manager" form of local government. This proposed electoral reform is later paralleled by the adoption of Unigov in 1969.

Rising African-American political power triggers what is labeled "reform" but which in actuality is the incumbent powers attempt to thwart a group's rising political power from becoming effective. It's a mid-game rules change to prevent political success. It is "not a coincidence that Unigov was conceived after the election of Mayor Richard G. Hatcher in Gary." Indianapolis whites did not want to see African-Americans begin to be able to influence governance. See, The Indianapolis Busing Case, Indiana and the United States Constitution, Indianapolis, (1983) at 74.

A recent [2005] example is Indiana Senate Enrolled Act No. 483 which the Republicans [as soon as they had all three branches of Indiana government] enacted. It is the most onerous voter identification legislation in the country. It amends IC 3-5-2-40.5 and is presently being litigated in U.S.D.C. Southern District of Indiana under case name Crawford v. Marion County Election Board, Cause Number 1:05-cv-00804-SEB-VSS.

I am not extremely familiar with the litigation but it seems to have been brought only on 1983 grounds and not VRA grounds and perhaps bears monitoring.

In Gary, in the 1920's, Negroes were becoming a balance of power group in local Gary politics and their gains would be wiped out by a city manager system. A leading representative for the city manager group was a Klan member. See, A History of the Black Community of Gary, Indiana: 1906-1940, Elizabeth Balanoff, Univ. of Chicago, Doctoral Dissertation, Department of History, (1974) "Black Gary, 1906-1940" at 322-323. During the late 1920's, African-Americans began defecting from the Republican Party because of the close alliance of that party with the Ku Klux Klan.

The trend continued during the years of the Great Depression and the New Deal until a revolution had occurred in Negro voting habits. A group that had been solidly Republican for generations became almost as solidly Democratic. See, The Negro in Indiana, at 395. By the elections of 1934 and 1936, the mass movement of African-Americans into the Democratic Party was complete.

On the whole Democrats, nationally and in Indiana, were more consistent in their support of effective legislation against racial discrimination than were Republicans and this accounted for the Negro exodus to the Democratic Party. See, Since Emancipation, A Short History of the Indiana Negroes, Emma Lou Thornbrough, Indiana Division American Negro Emancipation Centennial Authority, Indianapolis (1963) at 39. ("Since Emancipation").

Even with this support, African-Americans were excluded from governmental participation at all levels. For example, from 1897 to 1933, no Negro sat in the Indiana State Legislature. See, Since Emancipation, at 395.

They were also kept from voting. For example, in November 1932, the Federal District Attorney in Northern Indiana had to sue the Lake County Election Board to provide voting machines in African-American precincts and a federal judge ordered it. Black Gary, 1906-1940 at 359. There was renewal of African-Americans' protest about school segregation present at Froebel High School in 1931. Id. at 275. Litigation to end segregation was brought, but the Indiana Supreme Court upheld segregated schools in Gary, in its November 1931 term. State ex rel. Cheek v. Wirt, 203 Ind. 121 (Ind. 1931).

Indianapolis school authorities had lobbied for years against the adoption of anti-segregation legislation. See, The Indianapolis Busing Case, at 71. African-Americans in Indiana were excluded from public dining places. In 1920, the Indiana Court of Appeals held that an ice cream parlor was not an "eating place" within the meaning of the 1914 Civil Rights Act and that refusal to serve Negroes was not a violation. Chochos v. Burden, 74 Ind. App. 242, 128 N.E. 696 (Ind. App. 1920). African-Americans were racially segregated in the parts of town they could live in.

In 1926, the Indianapolis City Council enacted a zoning ordinance which declared that it was "advisable to foster the separation of the white and Negro residential communities" in the interest of "public peace, good order and the general welfare" and that the ordinance required written consent of the majority of persons of the opposite race to approve the sale of residential property to a member of another race. It required written consent of the majority of persons of the opposite race to approve the sale of residential property to a member of another race. Private racially restrictive covenants were frequently used in Indianapolis until the 1948 U.S. Supreme Court decision striking them down. See, Since Emancipation at 24.

Actions from nearly a century ago have effects and consequences now. There are still many parts of Indianapolis that are highly racially segregated. But in an interesting way. According to the 1990 U.S. Census out of 868 precincts there were 110 precincts with 100% white population. But there were no precincts with 100% African-American population. According to the 2000 U.S. Census, out of 914 populated precincts there were 32 that were 100% white and another 50 or so with only "1" African-American and again none that were "100%" African-American. As recently as this summer there have been violent race based incidents. The phenomenon seems to never end. The July 4, 2005, Indianapolis Star headline read "Suspects have violent pasts. Racial intolerance, crime not new for 3 of 4 charged in arson."

This was a story on burning out African-Americans who were moving to the neighborhood. [http://www.indystar.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20050704/NEWS01/507040377/1006/SPORTS03].

Thirteen years ago the same sort of incident occurred in the Ravenswood neighborhood of Indianapolis's Northside. Funny you never read stories about African-Americans "burning" white families out that are moving into the neighborhood.

In 1947, a bill prohibiting racially separate schools failed to pass the Indiana Legislature. See, Since Emancipation at 43. In Indianapolis, until the early 1960's, there was an unwritten rule that no realtor would sell a house to a Negro unless there were already two Negro families on the block. Negroes in Indianapolis continued to be excluded from real estate boards until the 1960's. See, Since Emancipation at 25. Indianapolis was the only large northern city in 1948 to have a policy of racially segregated public schools. See, Since Emancipation at 59.

Between 1950 and 1960, the percentage of Negroes in Indianapolis increased from 15% to 20%. Although the suburban population of Indianapolis increased from 125,000 to 220,000, the number of African-Americans in the Indianapolis suburbs only increased from 1,100 to 2,000. See, Since Emancipation at 27. According to the 1960 Census Beech Grove had one Negro out of almost 10,000 residents. Speedway, a town of comparable size to Beech Grove, had three. See, Since Emancipation at 21.

As late as 1964, neither Broad Ripple High School nor Northwestern High School enrolled a single African-American student, while there was not a single white student at Attucks High School. See, The Indianapolis Busing Case at 72. African-American legislators were not welcome at downtown hotels or private clubs and could not dine at downtown restaurants before the mid-1950's. African-Americans were not welcome at the Claypool Hotel until 1955 when it lifted its race ban after the Congress of Industrial Organizations threatened to cancel a scheduled convention there unless African-American union members were permitted to stay in the hotel. Downtown Indianapolis did not approach full integration until the 1960's, after a public accommodations bill became law in 1961. See, The Centennial History of the Indiana General Assembly, 1816-1978, Walsh, Indiana Historical Society, Indianapolis (1988) at 586-587.

In 1969 --the same year that Unigov was passed-- legislation (House Bill 1006) was enacted making disannexation from Gary much more possible by lowering the petition requirements from 50% of the population to 10% of the population was passed by the Senate. See, Indiana Acts 1969, P.L. 239, §606. At the same time that disannexation from African-American-controlled Gary was made easier, the Indiana General Assembly revised the 1959 Town Incorporation and Annexation Act. See, Indiana Acts 1959, P.L. 240. This statute, which had only been on the books for ten (10) years, required that the common council of any second class city, viz. Gary, be obtained if "any part of the area [was] sought to be annexed by" a newly-formed town. See, Indiana Acts 1959, P.L. 240, §14. The amendment thus deleted the requirement that the Gary city council approve annexations being attempted by Merrillville.

Until 1972, Marion County elected all of its members of the Indiana House of Representatives, at-large, from a countywide district. See, Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971). In 1981, the Indiana Legislature passed a redistricting law with "grotesque gerrymandering" and "unusual shapes" drawn intentionally to deprive Democratic voters, of which African-Americans are a significant component, of electoral power. See, Bandemer v. Davis, 603 F.Supp. 1479, 1488 (S.D. Ind. 1984), rev'd on other grounds, 478

U.S. 109 (1986) at 178-183 (Powell, J., joined by Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). The 1981 plan used multi-member districts to encompass and dilute the voting power of virtually all African-Americans in Indiana. Single-member districts were used for the white population Indiana.

In 1990, a group of African-Americans filed Dickinson v. Indiana State Election Board, Southern District of Indiana, Indianapolis Division, 90-435 C which alleged that the 1981 Indiana House districting violated §2. The 1981 redistricting plan, like its predecessor, created five (5) three-member House districts in Marion County, which were successfully challenged as discriminatory against African-American voters. Dickinson v. Indiana State Election Board, 933 F.2d 497 (7th Cir. 1991) (Reversing Trial Court's dismissal of complaint.)

In 1991, as a direct result of Dickinson litigation, the Indiana House of Representatives ended the practice of using multimember districts only in areas with politically significant African-American populations and in 1992 for the first time in the history of Indiana African-American residents of Marion County were permitted to select members to the Indiana House of Representatives in single-member districts.

During the same period the Unigov was adopted in the face of rising African-American political power in Indianapolis, the manner of electing judges in Allen, Lake, Marion, St. Joseph and Vanderburgh Counties -- each of which has politically significant African-American populations -- was changed by the Republican-controlled General Assembly at the request of the local white power structures of those communities. Each change made it more difficult for African-Americans to affect the election of judges in those counties. Prior to 1967, all counties had direct, popular partisan elections for Superior Court judges. After 1973, no county with a politically significant African-American population had direct popular partisan elections for Superior Court judges. Four (4) out of every five (5) African-Americans in Indiana vote for their Superior Court judges in a different kind of election than three (3) out of four (4) whites. Counties with politically significant African-American populations are to have electoral systems that make it more difficult for minorities to nominate and elect judges.

In 2005 the Republicans, once they had captured the governorship, the Senate and the House attempted to remove judges from elections but only in counties where African-Americans have rising influence. House Bill 1703.

In 1968, some African-American citizens filed a suit contending that Indianapolis Public School officials were intentionally operating a segregated school system. In 1969, the General Assembly adopted "Unigov", (I.C. 36-3-1-1 et seq.) which "consolidated" government in Marion County. It became effective January 1, 1970. Unigov "consolidated" the county and the city for purposes of electing a city county council and a "mayor". Four cities--Beech Grove, Lawrence, Southport and Speedway; and eleven school districts-- Beech Grove City, Decatur Township, Franklin Township, Lawrence Township, Perry Township, Pike Township, Southport, Speedway, Warren Township, Washington Township and Wayne Township were excluded from being incorporated into Indianapolis and the Indianapolis Public Schools for improper reasons related to race and/or party politics. In 1971, the federal district court held that Unigov perpetuated racial segregation, in an opinion subsequently affirmed by the Seventh Circuit, United States v. Board of School Commissioners, 332 F.Supp. 655 (S.D. Ind. 1971), aff'd. 474 F.2d 81 (7th Cir. 1973), cert. den. 413 U.S. 920 (1973); 368 F.Supp. 1191 (S.D. Ind. 1973), aff'd. 503 F.2d 68 (7th Cir. 1974), cert. den. 421 U.S. 929 (1975); 419 F.Supp. 180, 183 (S.D. Ind.

1975), aff'd. 541 F.2d 1211 (7th Cir. 1976), vac. on other grounds and remanded 429 U.S. 1068 (1978), decision on remand 456 F.Supp. 183 (S.D. Ind. 1978), aff'd. 637 F.2d 1101 (7th Cir. 1980), cert. den. 440 U.S. 838 (1980). These decisions held that the Indianapolis Public Schools Corporation was guilty of de jure racial segregation. The Court also found that the adoption of Unigov by the General Assembly in 1969 was intended to have a racially discriminatory effect. The Court found that, after the Brown v. Board of Education decision in 1954, Indianapolis Public Schools continued policies that perpetuated and increased segregation by the drawing and changing of school district boundaries. It also found that the Indianapolis Housing Authority was complicit in keeping schools racially segregated. In 1973, this District held that the de jure segregation of the Indianapolis Public Schools was to be imputed to the State of Indiana because of the General Assembly's enactment of Unigov. 368 F.Supp. 1191 (S.D. Ind. 1973), rev'd in part, aff'd in part 503 F.2d 68 (7th Cir. 1974), cert. den. 421 U.S. 929 (1975). In its August 1975 opinion, the District Court declared: "When the General Assembly expressly eliminated the school system from consideration under Unigov, it . . . inhibited desegregation." 419 F.Supp. 180, 183 (S.D. Ind. 1975).

Township, and excluded cities' public school districts were intentionally excluded from the Unigov 'unification' in order to perpetuate a long-standing racially discriminatory public education system which was part of a de jure racial segregation scheme by the State of Indiana; the City of Indianapolis; and, the County of Marion, which had intentionally operated a racially segregated school system through 1971 and which remains subject to a court-ordered remedy. Unigov "consolidated" political aspects of the county in a way that left white-controlled electoral and political structures intact. For example, township schools were not consolidated, township governments were not consolidated, and the all white cities of Beech Grove, Lawrence, Southport and Speedway, and their all white school districts, were not consolidated. It appears that the only structures that were "consolidated" were those which African-American voters were posed to influence, or control, politically. Unigov was intentionally constructed in a way that greatly limited the political influence of African-American voters. African-Americans were totally excluded from the process of creating Unigov. Professors Owen and Willbern, concluded that in several instances that Unigov was, to a significant degree, driven by both partisan and racial politics, and that it's final form was shaped by these considerations (See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis, University of California Press, Berkeley, (1985)).

The predecessor to the Unigov task force met regularly and worked on the draft proposals for Unigov over nearly a two-year period before one Democratic businessperson and one African-American public relations person "were added to the group to give some balance to the previously all-white Republican committee." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 55. Then Mayor of Indianapolis Richard Lugar, who lobbied extensively for the adoption of Unigov, said "I'll be candid. I know this is good for the Republicans. That is how I sold it to the legislators statewide." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 173.

Republican Party chairperson Keith Bulen boasted that Unigov was his "greatest coup" which added substance to the charges of a political takeover. See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 173. Owen and Willbern concluded that given the results of the elections after Unigov was adopted it became "rather obvious that the Unigov consolidation design has proven itself as a workable political strategy. It has accomplished its basic goal, which was to displace the Democrats from city hall and take command of Indianapolis city government with all the privileges, patronage, and partisan benefits that go along with such political control." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 176 quoting Robert V. Kirch, "Unigov Stratagem Revisited: 1979 Indianapolis Election." Indiana Academy of Social Sciences, Proceedings, 3rd ser. 15:106 (1980). Owen and Willburn concluded that "political advantage was a part of the Unigov strategy." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 176. Race was a significant factor even if not the only factor involved in the creation of Unigov in the form it took. It has been judicially established that the intent behind excluding the townships and the excluded cities from consolidation was race. The politicians who wanted unification concluded that "any attempt to change the school system would endanger the proposal."Consequently, the 11 independent school systems were untouched." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 72. Similarly the "nine townships were untouched, thus avoiding or at least muting, opposition from the elective township trustees." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 72. "The largest suburban municipalities were excluded from the territorial jurisdiction and tax base of the consolidate city-county . . . [to] help mollify the potentially most effective suburban opposition." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 73. The African-American community opposed Unigov "on the ground that it would dilute the black vote." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 94. The African-American community fought "Unigov on different terms [than the white suburban community which fought] it on terms of integration . . . [blacks fought] it more on a political basis. . . [suburban whites'] reason for fighting Unigov [was] that it opens up housing to blacks in [their] area." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 95.

As one knowledgeable observer pointed out "the relationship of the schools to the Unigov plan was a volatile issue that needed to be handled cautiously [by saying] `to have included schools in Unigov would have raised the specter of racial integration . . . and would have meant instant death for the plan." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 98. Owen and Willbern noted that although "the school officials were in fact deliberately cooperating with the mayor in order to keep the schools out of Unigov, a public statement would have unnecessarily raised the ire of those who preferred to have the schools included. At the same time, those who were opposed to the schools inclusion were tacitly reminded that the schools would not be affected by Unigov." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 99. This leaves no doubt that Unigov's final form that includes maintaining the City of Lawrence, as a separate political entity, was in fact finally shaped by considerations of race.

The discriminatory effect of the final form was noted by Owen and Willbern in that if "the old city had continued . . . blacks would have still been a minority, but they were developing a good deal of political leverage, especially in the old city's normally victorious Democratic Party. This advantage was reduced when Unigov extended the boundaries countywide. . . . The [1980] proportion of blacks countywide [was] at about the level it reached 20 to 25 years [prior to Unigov] and black leaders see this as a significant setback." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 180. This perception was joined in by Ebony magazine that noted at the time of Unigov's passage that "black political power had been diluted by Unigov. See, "Cities for Blacks," Ebony, February 1978, pp 95, 101. Owen and Willbern endorsed the findings of William Schreiber who concluded that Unigov "had an adverse effect on the influence of blacks and especially on their influence wielded through the once-dominant Democratic Party. Finally, consolidation dilute[d] minority group, especially black, voting power . . . whether . . . as a side effect or primary purpose is difficult to determine, although there is cogent evidence that it [was] the latter." See, Governing Metropolitan Indianapolis at 198.

Unigov was constructed in a way that would greatly limit the political influence of African-American voters and contained important provisions clearly tied to prevailing racial concerns. These provisions centered on the local government institutions that would not be consolidated into the new government. The townships and the excluded cities were excluded from incorporation on account of race or color. Lawrence would have been dissolved and its functions absorbed into the new city/county government if not for the politics of race.

In 1987, a group of African-Americans filed Mason v. Hudnut, Southern District of Indiana, Indianapolis Division, IP-87-37-C challenging the manner in which precincts in Marion County were created alleging that the precincts concentrated African-American voters into very populous precincts thereby diminishing, by packing, the effectiveness of African-American votes in both major political parties. The case was settled and precincts were redrawn. As a direct result of Mason, election reform was accomplished and in 1992 the political precincts were redrawn in a way to create more equally populous precincts.

In 1992, a group of Marion County African-Americans filed Hines v. Marion County Election Board, Southern District of Indiana, Indianapolis Division, IP-92-1727-C and Warren v. Washington Township Board, Southern District of Indiana, Indianapolis Division, IP-92-1479-C, which challenged the manner in which members of the Township Boards were elected. Board members were elected at-large from the township as a whole with no subdistrict residency requirements. As a direct result of the litigation, election reform was enacted by the legislature, and in 1996 members of the township boards will be elected from seven (7) single-member districts rather than three (3) members at-large from the township. (See Entry of 27 September 1995 in Hines v. Marion County Election Board).

Between 1971 and 1994 there were modifications of single-member Marion County-Indianapolis City-County Council district boundaries to assure white domination of special taxing districts, called Special Service District Councils, that control police and fire services, and prevented black "council members from obtaining a working majority on the Special Service District Councils." Between 1971 and 1994 the State of Indiana modified the membership requirements for participation on the Special Service District Councils to assure white domination and prevent African-American "council members from obtaining a working majority on the Special Service District Councils." In 1971, 1975, and 1981 Indianapolis African-Americans could have constituted effective voting majorities in six (6) City County Council districts.

In 1971, 1975, and 1981, after the enactment of Unigov, the City-County Council enacted racially discriminatory districting ordinances for the City-County Council which packed African-Americans into four (4) City-County Council districts and "cracked" the balance of the African-American population into districts where they constituted sizable, but ineffective, voting minorities. Indianapolis African-Americans could have constituted effective voting majorities in six (6) districts. In 1987, a group of African-Americans filed Murray v. Hudnut, later renamed Baird v. Indianapolis, Southern District of Indiana, Indianapolis Division, IP-87-111 C which alleged that the 1981 Council redistricting violated §2. In 1990, the City County Council entered into a consent decree in the Baird case in which it agreed to redistrict one year and one election earlier than Indiana law required. The Federal District court held that it "could almost take judicial notice of the fact of such discrimination. Indeed, the evidence on this point admitted at the hearing went largely unrebutted." The Court also observed that the 1981 districting scheme which provided for only four (4) African-American majority districts would have "been subject to very serious Voting Rights Act challenges." (Baird, Entry of April 25, 1991, at 24).

Thus, in 1991, for the first time in the history of Indiana, African-American residents of Marion County were permitted to elect members of the City County Council from non-discriminatory single-member districts. These districts came about only as a result of litigation.

Unigov "consolidated" political aspects of the county in a way which left the white controlled governmental structures intact. Unigov "consolidated" political aspects of the county in a way which demolished governmental structures that were African-American controlled or that were significantly influenced by African-Americans. In the recent past, the Indianapolis Police Department would park patrol cars outside polling places on election day in an attempt to intimidate and suppress Black voter turnout. Election recounts have targeted inner city precincts and had the effect to intimidate minority voters and minority precinct workers.

There has never been a Republican nominee for a countywide executive or administrative office in Marion County who was an African-American in Marion County. The Republican Party has never slated an African-American for a Small Claims Court Judgeship in Marion County.

Democratic Party has only twice nominated an African-American for a Small Claims Court Judgeship in Marion County. Marion County Democrats and Marion County Republicans rarely nominate an African-American to be their candidate in a white single-member district. With only one exception, the only time Republicans will nominate and African-American for a major office is if the Republican has little or no chance of winning. [See, Evan Bayh v. Marvin Scott, U.S. Senate 2004]

There has been a lack of proportional representation in electing City County Councilors from districts. There has historically been a lack of proportional representation has occurred in electing the General Assembly delegation in Marion County that has only recently been remedied. Prior to 1999 there has never been a candidate of choice of African-American voters elected at-large candidate to the City-County Council. There is only one African-American Township Assessor out of nine. There is are two African-American Township Trustees out of nine.

No African-American has ever been elected to the Beech Grove City Council. No African-American has ever been elected Beech Grove City Mayor. No African-American has ever been elected Beech Grove City Clerk Treasurer. No African-American has ever been elected to an office of Beech Grove City government. No African-American has ever been elected to the Speedway City Council. No African-American has ever been elected Speedway City Mayor. No African-American has ever been elected to an office of Speedway City government. No African-American has ever been elected to the Southport City Council. No African-American has ever been elected Southport City Mayor. No African-American has ever been elected to an office of Southport City government.

a. Decatur Township;
b. Franklin Township;
c. Lawrence Township;
d. Perry Township;

e. Pike Township;
f. Warren Township;
g. Washington Township;
h. Wayne Township.

The following excluded city governments do not employ African-Americans in numbers equal to their percentage of their population in the township: Beech Grove, Lawrence, Southport, Speedway. These cities and the townships in Marion County would have been dissolved and their functions absorbed into the new city/county government if not for the politics of race. Taken together as a whole, township governments in Marion County do not employ African-Americans in numbers equal to their percentage of their population in the county.

The white political majority in Indiana and Marion County has a history of using voting devices to dilute the voting efficacy of ethnic, and racial, minorities dating back to 1849. See, Bryant v. Whitcomb, cited above at 1292, fn. 1.

Both major political parties in Marion County have candidate slating processes which includes fees and which historically have been closed to African-Americans, especially the Republican slating process. This slating fee affects the African-American community more than the majority white community from seeking or obtaining a party's endorsement. The effect is that African-American candidates are selected by white political leadership.

For example, the Republican party has never nominated an African-American for a countywide executive or administrative office. The Republican Party in the City of Lawrence has never slated or nominated an African-American to a city elective office.

In the first Unigov election [1971] John Neff, the Democratic nominee, used a "white picket fence" campaign in an attempt to appeal to white suburban Republicans by clearly implying his opposition to school desegregation. Richard Lugar was his opponent who had been instrumental in excluding the township schools from consolidation under Unigov.

The exclusion was undoubtedly based, at least partly, upon his 1966 experience in which he, as a member of the Indianapolis Public School Board, had proposed that the eleven school districts of Indianapolis and Marion County be consolidated. The public reaction was so overwhelmingly negative and hostile that Lugar withdrew his proposal having learned at minimal expense the depth of sentiment in metropolitan Indianapolis for the segregationist racial status quo. See, The Indianapolis Experience: The Anatomy of a Desegregation Case, 9 Indiana Law Review 897 (1976) at 930 fn. 195.

In 1990, the white Republican candidate for sheriff, Joseph McAtee, made special targeted mailings of campaign literature naming his African-American opponent, something candidates rarely do unless naming their opponent works to their advantage and including a photograph, black and white and grainy.

In 1992, the Republican candidate for Attorney General, Timothy Bookwalter, a white male, drove around small town Indiana with a full color standup photograph of his African-American female opponent in a clearly race baiting campaign.

Lack of proportional representation has occurred not only on the Small Claims Court benches, but also on all Township Boards; the City-County Council of the City of Indianapolis and the County of Marion; the Indiana General Assembly generally; and the Marion County delegation specifically; and the City of Lawrence and all other elective offices in Marion County. Prior to 2002 there was only one (1) African-American Township Constable.

Except for the County Sheriff in 2002, in which the Democratic candidate, an African-American who was extraordinarily popular and a much-honored U.S. Marshal who had handled an extremely well reported foreclosure action that had a potential for tragedy in a very skilled way, beat the extraordinarily unpopular white Republican candidate, who only a year later lost a mayor's race in which he was the incumbent, no African-American has ever been elected to a county-wide administrative or executive office such as mayor, treasurer, auditor, prosecutor, clerk, recorder, assessor or coroner.

Local governments in Marion County, especially excluded city and township governments, are singularly non-responsive and show a significant historical, and contemporary, disparity in the distribution of all types of governmental services by race in Indianapolis.

African-American areas of Indianapolis receive inferior city services such as street and sidewalk cleaning, street and sidewalk repair, fire protection, police protection, flood control, and storm sewers. The almost complete inability of African-Americans to obtain employment with township governments is further evidence of systematic racial discrimination. For example, as recently as 1998 neither Washington nor Lawrence Township employed any African-Americans in their administrative offices (out of 19 and 9 employees, respectively). As of 1996, the Lawrence Township Fire Department had only three African-American employees out of 84, and the Washington Township Fire Department has only three African-Americans out of 130 employees. See, "Stipulation of Lawrence and Washington Townships Regarding Administrative and Fire Department Employees. Thus, out of an aggregate employment in the two townships of 242 employees, 6 employees (less than 3%) are African-Americans, despite the fact that the African-American population in those townships is nearly 25% of the total population. African-Americans continue to suffer from the legacy of official and private racial discrimination, which contributes to their lack of equal access to the political processes within township government in Marion County. Both the Indianapolis Police Department and the Indianapolis Fire Department operate under an affirmative action decree.

It is only due to litigation that any of the racially and partisan-discriminatory electoral structures in Marion County have been changed. But for the Voting Rights Act none of the advances would have occurred. The plantation would still exist.

Thank you for providing me the opportunity to present this.

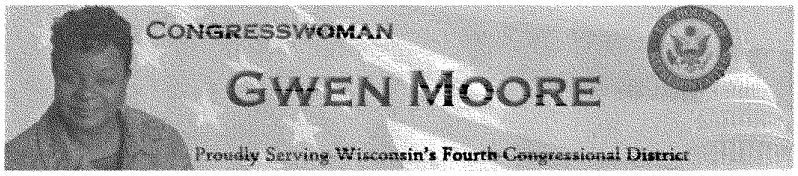
PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE GWEN MOORE, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, BEFORE THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JULY 22, 2005



The Honorable Gwen Moore (WI-04)
Testimony for the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act

I would like to extend warm greetings to the National Commission members, esteemed panelists and attending guests of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act Midwest Regional Hearing. I apologize that I am not able to attend in person, since I must remain in Washington, DC today as Congress is in session.

I'd first like to commend the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and the other leading civil rights organizations that created the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. Since the last reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act in 1982, the tactics used to disenfranchise minority voters has sunk to a new and disgraceful level.

Milwaukee has the largest number of African-Americans in the state of Wisconsin, which has been a swing vote state, especially in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections. The state has been the breeding ground for new tricks to effectively disenfranchise African-Americans, who are a critical and decisive voting bloc there.

Prior to 2000, a Wisconsin state statute enabled election inspectors to challenge electors by asking them questions that had nothing to do with their eligibility to vote. In the 1996 Milwaukee mayoral race, when an African-American county sheriff challenged the white incumbent, the election inspectors, under the mayor's authority, resurrected these archaic statutes to challenge black voters. Inspectors were asking questions like "Do you plan to file an income tax in this ward?"; "Are you married?"; or "Do you live with your parents?" They were using a state statute as a means to justify asking these condescending and belittling questions. With Considering Milwaukee's high unemployment rate among African-Americans, these questions, many of which directly or indirectly related to economic status, were clearly designed to suppress the vote. As people answered "no" to some of these questions, they were given the false perception that they were not eligible to vote. An election protection organization secured an injunction on election day to stop this clear voter suppression strategy. Subsequently, as a State Senator, I authored legislation to revise the statue to specifically state what kind of questions could be asked of electors.

In the 2004 election, with George Bush having lost the state by 5,000 votes in 2000, there were all types of flyers targeted to black voters with misinformation designed to discourage them from voting in Milwaukee, which comprises most of my congressional district. For example, there was a flyer distributed by a fictitious group called the "Milwaukee Black Voter League." As Chairman Julian Bond mentioned in his speech during the NAACP's national convention in Milwaukee in July 2005, this flyer told black citizens they couldn't vote for President if they'd already voted in an election that year. Of course, there had been a strong outpouring of votes for the mayoral race earlier that year. The flyer also told black citizens that a traffic violation made them ineligible to vote; that conviction for anything by anyone in a voter's family made the voter ineligible, and that violating any of these restrictions would result in a prison term and the seizure of their children.

There was also another flyer mailed that included extremely racist remarks toward black supporters of Senator Feingold. As a tasteless tactic of psychological warfare, the pejorative "N" word chided African American voters for their previous allegiance to the Democratic pol. Yet another flyer urged black voters to vote by noon with the confusing implication that voting was not possible after noon.

Such tactics create a divisive and polarizing environment. Racial tensions in Milwaukee drew national attention as partisan combatants vied for the decisive African American vote. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were spent on radio messages to inflame African Americans about Teresa Heinz's claim that she was African. The woman was born and raised in Mozambique, but of course the ads neglected to mention that because their point was to create resentment that would discourage them from even bothering to vote.

Another tactic we need to monitor closely is the potential requirement of voters to present a photo ID like a valid driver's license at the polls. In the minority communities of Wisconsin, there are a disproportionate number of people who either don't have licenses or whose licenses are suspended or revoked. John Pawasarat from the University of Wisconsin – Milwaukee's Employment and Training Institute conducted a first time study of the driver's license status in Wisconsin by race/ethnicity, sex and geography. The study found that 78% of young African-American males between the ages of 18-24 and 66% of young African-American women do not have a valid driver's license. Fifty-seven percent of young Hispanic men and 63% young Hispanic women also do not have valid driving licenses. We have to make sure that this circumstance, which again relates more to economic status and the failure to pay fines rather than for traffic point violations, is not used as another method to disenfranchise minority voters.

We need to track and expose these tactics for what they are in order to continue to prove to the American majority that we are not living up to the true meaning of democracy. Every vote is not being considered. Every vote is not being counted. Here we are in 2005, and 40 years later underhanded tactics are still being taken to suppress the black vote, which further justifies the need for the Voting Rights Act.

The most memorable disenfranchisement of minority voters during the 2004 election occurred right here in the Midwest region in Ohio. A recent report found that 28 percent of all Ohio voters and 52 percent of black voters said they experienced problems in voting.

While we review provisions of the Voting Rights Act that are set to expire in 2007, it is vital to evaluate our recommendations and their constitutional impact. During the NAACP Convention, Rev. Jesse Jackson noted that it is important for us not to fight to make provisions of the Voting Rights Act permanent. If Congress is forced to go back and renew parts of the Act periodically, then we always have the opportunity to review and improve these provisions based on the new underhanded tactics that might have arisen since the last renewal.

I am a strong supporter and advocate of voting rights. As a cosponsor of H.R. 939 – the Count Every Vote Act, I am in support of requiring a voter-verified paper record, allowing citizens to register to vote on Election Day (Wisconsin has same day registration, but there is no national standard), improving security measures of voting machines and requiring that there be at least one voting machine at every polling station that meets the needs of disabled and language minority voters. I am in support of requiring states to act in a uniform and transparent manner when purging voters from state registration lists and establishing guidelines to provide for the prosecution of those who engage in deceptive practices to keep people from voting. As a cosponsor of the Democracy Day Act, I am also in support of making Election Day a legal public holiday.

Because I have experienced the deceitful tactics used to undermine the black vote —
Because I have witnessed the destruction and racial polarization these tactics create —
Because I am passionately believe in the true power of democracy —
I will continue to do all that I can to protect the voting rights of every American.

I look forward to reviewing the final report of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act and again commend the Commission for its great work.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE BARACK OBAMA, SENATOR, SUBMITTED TO THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JULY 22, 2005

SENATOR BARACK OBAMA

STATEMENT FOR THE RECORD

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

As the nation approaches the 40th anniversary of the signing of the Voting Rights Act by President Lyndon Johnson, it is time for the nation to look back and see how far we have come and at the same time recognize how far we have to go in our efforts to ensure every citizen the right to vote.

It is remarkable to look back and think, just 40 years ago people like me were routinely prevented from exercising their most fundamental right as citizens – the right to vote. I think about a woman I met on the campaign trail last year. She decided to come to shake my hand and take a photograph. She is a wonderful woman. She was not asking for anything. I was grateful that she took time to come by. It was an unexceptional moment except for the fact that she was born in 1894. Her name is Marguerite Lewis, an African-American woman who had been born in Louisiana, born in the shadow of slavery, born at a time when lynchings were commonplace, born at a time when African Americans and women could not vote. Yet, over the course of decades she had participated in broadening our democracy and ensuring that, in fact, at some point, if not herself, then her children, her grandchildren, and her great-grandchildren would be in a position in which they could, too, call themselves citizens of the United States and make certain that this Government works not just on behalf of the mighty and the powerful but also on behalf of people like her.

The very fact that Marguerite Lewis, and so many people like her – and like me – are able to exercise the right to vote is in large part due to the Voting Rights Act and its implementation. So, on the 40th anniversary of this monumental legislation, I hope we all pause to appreciate what has been accomplished because of this law and why this Act must be reauthorized.

At the same time, none of us can deny that the last two Presidential elections have had too many problems to say that there is nothing left for the Voting Rights Act to do – that we don't need to reauthorize this law. When too many voters stand in long lines for hours, when too many voters cast votes on machines that jam or malfunction or suck the votes without a trace, when too many voters try to register to vote only to discover that their names don't appear on the roles or that partisan political interests and those that serve them have worked hard to throw up every barrier to recognize them as lawful, when too many voters will know that there are different elections for different parts of the country and that these differences turn shamefully on differences of wealth or of race, when too many voters have to contend with State officials, servants of the public, who put partisan or personal political interests ahead of the public in administering our elections – in these circumstances, we have an obligation to fix the problem. So we must ask ourselves, what can we do to ensure that the nation's laws, and the Voting Rights Act, help fix these problems. I hope these hearings help us answer that question.

I am so pleased that so many brilliant minds have joined in the regional hearings to evaluate the issues surrounding voting and the Voting Rights Act, including my former colleague and good friend Judson Minor. I look forward to working with all of you to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act and ensure that the nation's voting rights are strengthened and protected in the years to come.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MARK RITCHIE, PRESIDENT, INSTITUTE FOR AGRICULTURE AND TRADE POLICY, BEFORE THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JULY 22, 2005

Testimony Before the Midwest Regional Hearing National Commission on the Voting Rights Act

Mark Ritchie, President, Institute for Agriculture and Trade Policy

My name is Mark Ritchie and I live and work here in Minnesota, serving as the President of the Institute for Agriculture and Trade Policy. For the last two years I had the privilege of heading up National Voice, a non-partisan coalition of community, faith, and business organizations that organized the NOVEMBER 2 voter registration and Get Out the Vote campaign that operated in about two dozen states around the country.

Thank you for this opportunity to provide testimony at this very Midwest regional hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. On behalf of those of us from Minnesota and throughout the Midwestern region I want to express our appreciation for your efforts to hear from concerned people from all across this nation.

Here in Minnesota, over 300 voter registration groups created the Minnesota Participation Project, pulling together a wide diversity of grassroots and community groups into an effective, non-partisan statewide voter mobilization effort. I am very proud of what we accomplished here in Minnesota and nationwide - with over 5 million new voters registered by the organizations that participated in coordinated efforts.

In the course of this work we became more fully aware of the many challenges that still remain to the full achievement of voting rights here in the US. Although we celebrate the 40th anniversary of the signing of the Voting Rights Act, there is still much to be done. Perhaps we can take some comfort in recent statements by the Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee who seems to understand what is at stake. In a recent speech to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's (NAACP) Convention in Milwaukee, Chairman Sensenbrenner summarized the challenges ahead in this way:

"Our democratic system of government has as its most fundamental right the right of its citizens to participate in the political process. Adopted 135 years ago, the Fifteenth Amendment ensures that no American citizen's right to vote can be denied or abridged by the United States or a State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. As far too many here know and have experienced, some government entities have not only been unfaithful to the rights and protections afforded by the Constitution, but have aggressively - and sometimes violently - tried to disenfranchise African-American and other minority voters."

From my perspective, his statement is accurate. Some government entities have not only been unfaithful to the Constitution they've used violence, harassment and intimidation to deny access to the polls to minority voters. This past year we were reminded of the murders of three young men doing voter registration 35 years ago in Mississippi. And while we may no longer be witnessing murder as a tactic to stop citizens from exercising their right to vote, we are seeing an upswing in subtler voter intimidation tactics. We need to stop intimidation in its tracks so that we never have voter registration volunteers murdered or threatened again.

to make voting instructions available in all common languages and additional provisions to help voters obtain assistance if their inability to read, speak or understand English is a barrier to exercising voting rights. Our commitment to the equal opportunity to participate in the political process demands nothing less.

The language issues remind us that we need to both re-authorize Section 5 and also to renew our commitment to full access to voting rights by reauthorizing the provisions of Section 203 to ensure that all citizens have available to them the kinds of assistance needed to ensure their full participation, regardless of their English proficiency.

Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act has become a very important protection to our most vulnerable Americans. When a group of citizens cannot participate in our elections for whatever reason, it undermines the foundation of our democracy. Since 1975, section 203 has afforded many new Americans the ability to partake in our democratic process, empowering them to make America their new home by electing their representative of choice. Today, there are over 450 jurisdictions mandated by section 203 to provide in language voting materials to at least one of the following community: American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Native, and Spanish-heritage citizens.

Although Minnesota is not currently covered by Section 203, Minnesota has a growing population of immigrants and refugees who are looking to make this state their new homes. In the twin city area, there are over 45, 000 Hmong Americans (according to the 2000 US Census), many of them are U.S. citizens, many of them will become active citizens in a few years. As in many other communities across the U.S. we are relying on Section 203 to afford the same protection of their voting rights in the near future. The lack of language access should not prohibit any American from voting.

Furthermore, we need to renew the expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act. It should be pointed out that two recent 5-to-4 decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court have, unfortunately, thrown the legal standard to be applied in the preclearance process into some doubt. When Congress convenes to consider the reauthorization of Section 5, it should fix these new ambiguities with clear legislation.

When jurisdictions subject to Section 5 submit proposed changes to their election laws to the attorney general or D.C. District Court for preclearance, they are required to show proof that the proposed changes do not make minority voters worse off. This standard was long understood to prohibit jurisdictions from implementing both purposefully discriminatory voting changes and those with a discriminatory (or "retrogressive") effect But, in 1999, the Supreme Court issued a decision that effectively eliminated the "purpose" part of this test. This decision, in Reno v. Bossier Parish Sch. Bd. (2000), dramatically reduced the power of Section 5.

Despite the plain language of Section 5 and the strong evidence that the school board in Bossier Parrish was acting with an unconstitutional intent to discriminate against black voters, the Supreme Court found no basis for an objection under Section 5.

forced to stand in long lines, as was the case in too many voting places last November, is one of the most effective ways to deny voting rights.

Today we should give thanks to those who came before us and who had the courage to admit, like President Johnson, that government has a responsibility to ensure a well-functioning democracy. Renewal of the Voting Rights Act and ensuring full political participation by all voters should not be partisan issues.

After all, the four previous extensions of the Voting Rights Act received strong bi-partisan support and were signed into law by four Republican Presidents, including Ronald Reagan who called the right to vote "the crown jewel" of American democracy.

Fulfilling our commitment to build a healthy and well-functioning democracy requires going beyond simply re-authorizing the Voting Rights Act. We must also be prepared to address myriad and new 21st century challenges here in Minnesota and around the nation.

To summarize my recommendations regarding expiration of those crucial sections of the Voting Rights Act that will expire in 2007, I believe Congress should:

1. Re-enact the Section 5 pre-clearance requirements for 25 years, consistent with the time period adopted with the 1982 extension. These provisions directly impact nine states with a documented history of discriminatory voting practices and local jurisdictions in seven others by requiring them to submit planned changes in their election laws or procedures to the U.S. Department of Justice or the District Court in Washington, D.C. for pre-approval.
2. Renew Section 203 for 25 years so that new citizens and other Americans who are limited in their ability to speak English can continue to receive assistance when voting. These provisions currently impact 466 local jurisdictions across 31 states.
3. Renew Sections 6-9, which authorize the attorney general to appoint election monitors and poll watchers.
4. Provide for the recovery of expert fees in voting rights litigation.
5. Enact language that restores the original intent of Congress as expressed in the 1982 reauthorization and repairs the damage done by two narrowly decided U.S. Supreme Court decisions which fundamentally weaken the administration of Section 5: Reno v. Bossier Parish Sch. Bd. (2000) and Georgia v. Ashcroft (2003).

Thank you again for this opportunity to provide testimony and for your excellent work to ensure that the Voting Rights Act is both re-authorized and renewed. I look forward to reading the final report of this Commission and on celebrating both the 40th anniversary of the original enactment of this historic law but also the introduction and safe passage of a stronger and forward-looking Voting Rights Act.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ELONA STREET-STEWART, CHAIR, ST. PAUL BOARD OF EDUCATION, BEFORE THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JULY 22, 2005

Elona Street-Stewart - July 22, 2005

Thank you for the opportunity to present today. My name is Elona Street-Stewart and I am Chair of the St Paul Board of Education. In addition, I am program staff for Racial Ethnic Ministries and Community Empowerment for the Synod of Lakes and Prairies, a middle governing judicatory of the Presbyterian Church USA. My service area is WI, MN, IA, NE, SD, ND, and the northeast corner of Montana – the Ft Peck Indian Reservation. I travel this area from east to west, north and south and engage in community relationships of small and large proportions, particularly with American Indian, historic racial ethnic, and immigrant/refugee groups.

Key sections of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 are set to expire in 2007. As a high school student I experienced the passage of the VRA as cause for celebration within the African American community and civil rights organizations across the nation. It now appears that 135 years after the 15th Amendment to the US Constitution and 40 years since the passage of the VRA, the right to vote is not secure for those communities of people recognized by our nation's courts to have suffered discriminatory actions prior to 1965, such as racially motivated violations and voting irregularities.

The results of the 1990 and 2000 Census brought a realignment of voting districts through a congressional redistricting process. For the first time, significant numbers of African American and Latino officials were elected from new districts where there were sizable populations of people of color. However, since then the numbers have not been sustained or increased nor have elections produced a horizontal widening of the diversity of candidates and elected representatives. The reassigned residents as citizens are not significantly aware or solicited for strategic planning or comparative analysis of the impact of the changes in district geographical dimensions, economic transitions or demographic variances.

There are likely to be changes of 2-3 justices on the Supreme Court over the next few years. Since the Court has not always found in favor of minority voting rights, it is important to address these issue legislatively in order to accomplish fair and equitable protection to America's right to vote by its citizens. This should protect the rights of American Indians, people of color, those in poverty or injunctive relief to eligible individuals previously convicted of a criminal offense unless such person is serving a felony sentence in a correctional institute or facility at the time of the election.

Although there were several attempts to suppress the Native American vote in Minnesota in 2004, what happened in Red Lake was the most blatant. The Red Lake Nations is the only closed Indian Reservation in Minnesota and in theory anyone who is not a Red Lake tribal member should get permission from the tribe before coming onto their reservation. On Election Day that did not happen and several party sponsored challengers showed up on the reservation before the polls opened. There are four voting precincts on the Red Lake Reservation. The Ponemah precinct is were the major issues occurred. A Republican challenger showed up in Ponemah, first he started questioning and intimidating the election judges, he then started to intimidate the voters by arbitrarily challenging individuals who were standing in line to vote. Some potential voters left the precinct because of this challengers antics. The Red Lake Tribal Police Department was called to observe the situation. However, this challenger's behavior worsened once the officers arrived. He continued to disrupt the voting process and eventually the Tribal Officers were forced to remove him from the precinct and escort him to the reservations border.

A few things to note: 1. According to one election judge up until this election no challenger had ever showed in Red Lake during an election, 2. Red Lake is the only area in the state where all of the election judges are native (and nearly the entire voting population is Native), 3. Some of the challengers that showed up in Red Lake were from out-of-state)according to one of the election judges, the challenger at Ponemah was a lobbyist from DC), 4. The other two challengers (one republican and one Democrat) that showed up in Red Lake only observed and did not disrupt the voting process (the challenger at Ponemah as Republican). This incident made the national news (CNN). Louann Crow was the Red Lake tribal member and election judge who testified in the Senate.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ALICE TREGAY BEFORE THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, JULY 22, 2005

TESTIMONY OF ALICE TREGAY – REAUTHORIZATION OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

As a member of the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition, an organization founded by the Reverend Jesse Jackson aimed at social change and justice for all Americans, I have experienced firsthand the problems facing many African-Americans in seeking to exercise their right to vote. These problems often cannot be solved by organizations such as Rainbow/PUSH alone, as we need the laws of the federal government to offer protection to Americans seeking to vote for the officials of their choice. Without legislation such as the Voting Rights Act, we cannot ensure justice and equality for all Americans in the exercise of their Constitutional rights. The problems concerning districting of the wards in Chicago and barriers to voting access in Chicago illustrate how important the Voting Rights Act is to preserving African-Americans' right to vote.

Redistricting

The City of Chicago has had more than its share of problems concerning mapping of voting wards. The city is broken down into various wards, and each ward elects an "alderman," which aldermen collectively serve as an equivalent to a city council. In the mid-1980s, a suit was brought against the City of Chicago regarding the alderman wards, as African-Americans in Chicago's wards were not being adequately represented. Due to the lack of majority African-American wards, it was very difficult to elect African-American aldermen, or even to elect the candidate of the African-American population's choice.

The federal court in Illinois ordered that the city's wards be remapped to create a larger number of African-American majority wards. The maps were redrawn in 1985, creating 2 majority black wards, for a total of 19 African-American wards. As a result, both African-Americans and Latinos were more fairly represented in Chicago's aldermen wards – two additional African-American aldermen and two Latino aldermen were elected in special elections. One of these Latino aldermen is now an Illinois United States Congressman, Congressman Gutierrez.

Although the 1985 Chicago redistricting resulted in a fairer representation of minorities in Chicago elections, the population has changed, and the wards in Chicago have again been mapped in a manner that results in an unequal and unfair representation of African-Americans. The wards are oddly drawn in a manner that "packed" too many African-Americans into wards. Certain Chicago wards contain almost 95% African-Americans, even though a ward need only be about 65% African-American to ensure that the African-American population of that ward be able to elect the candidate of their choice. Rather than "packing" large numbers of African-Americans into a single ward, the ward maps could be and should be re-drawn to include a greater number of wards for greater minority representation. This has not been done, seemingly to prevent a greater number of African-American and Latino aldermen from being elected to office. The local government does not seem willing to fix this problem, as the incumbent aldermen are more likely to maintain their position under the present ward maps. Federal action and protection is needed in order to ensure fair and equal representation of all of Chicago's residents, and to remove the obstacles that are posed to minority candidates under the current districting scheme.

Barriers to Voting

In both the 2000 and 2004 elections, the voting status of many African-Americans in Chicago was challenged, and many African-Americans lost their votes in these elections. This group faced challenges to registration – the voting registration form was difficult for many to fill out completely, and the forms were rejected if they were not filled out completely and accurately– as well as challenges to their right to go to the polls and cast votes. Many African-Americans are wrongly removed from the voting rolls, purportedly because they no longer live at the address that is listed on their voting registration, despite having lived in the same house for many years.

As noted in an October 2004 article in The Chicago Reporter, "In the March [2004] primary, 13,424 voters in majority black wards who were incorrectly challenged took the extra steps at the polls to restore their voting status, compare with 3,745 voters in majority white wards and 2,006 in majority Latino wards. Those who did not have enough identification either had to go home to get it or used provisional ballots." Rupa Shenoy, A Challenging Election, THE CHICAGO REPORTER, Oct., 2004, available at <http://www.chicagoreporter.com/2004/10-2004/vote/vote1.htm>.

An example of how African-Americans are disenfranchised due to sloppy, incorrect, or inappropriate application of voting laws or procedures concerns a resident of Chicago named Joelle, who told me of her plight in the hopes of preserving her vote. Joelle has lived in her Chicago home for many, many years. In both the 2000 and 2004 elections Joelle went to her polling place to cast her vote, as she had done many times before. However, in both 2000 and 2004, she was told at the polling place that she was not on the voting rolls and was not entitled to vote. Although this seemed impossible to her, as she had not moved, her polling place had not moved, and she was an active voter for many years, Joelle responded that she would then cast a provisional ballot in 2004. After the election, she was told by the Board of Elections that her provisional ballot was not counted. No reason was given.

In the 2000 presidential elections, many Chicagoans' votes were lost or subject to "falloff." Of the 1,027,627 votes cast in Chicago, only 9555,261 were counted – this was a loss of 72,366 votes (7.04% of the votes cast). See STATEMENT BY LANCE GOUGH, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR BOARD OF ELECTION COMMISSIONERS FOR THE CITY OF CHICAGO, available at <www.eac.gov/docs/ June%203%20Punch%20Card%20-%20Lance%20Gough.doc>. Many, if not most, of these lost votes were cast by African-Americans.

The Voting Rights Act is essential to protect the rights of minority voters, and as demonstrated by the problems faced by African-American voters in Chicago, is still as necessary today as it was years ago. Problems in access to voting still exist for many minorities, and the Voting Rights Act provides a means to address the barriers faced by many minority voters or would-be voters. I urge our lawmakers to reauthorize the provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

Statement of Ihsan Ali Alkhatib
Board President
Arab-American Anti- Discrimination Committee
Detroit Chapter

Before the

Introduction:

Good afternoon. My name is Ihsan Ali Alkhatib. I am and an attorney in private practice and the President of the Detroit Chapter of the American- Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee (ADC). I live in Dearborn, Michigan, which is a suburb of Detroit. Greater Detroit has the largest concentration of Arab Americans in the United States.

I appear before you on behalf of the ADC-MI Regional Director, Mr. Imad Hamad, who unfortunately was unable to appear due to a previous commitment. As I'm sure many of you are familiar with, the ADC was founded in 1980 by U.S. Senator James Abourezk, and is the largest Arab American grassroots civil rights organization, which welcomes people of all backgrounds, faiths and ethnicities as members. It has members in all 50 states, and it's national headquarter is based out of Washington, D.C.

Arab Americans, as a minority, face discrimination. However, the irony is that Federal law does not consider Arab Americans as a minority. In fact, we are considered White when actually we face the discrimination that Black and other non-white communities face. Furthermore, this discrimination intensified in the aftermath of the September 11 terrorist attack on the US.

In the year following the terrorist attacks on September 1, 2001, the following hate crimes and discrimination were documented by ADC[1]:

- There were over 700 violent incidents reported targeting Arab Americans, or those perceived to be Arab Americans, Arabs and Muslims in the first nine weeks following the attacks. Unfortunately, this included several murders.
- There were 165 violent incidents from January 1-October 11, 2002, which was a significant increase over most years in the past decade.
- There were over 80 cases of illegal and discriminatory removal of passengers from aircraft after boarding. These incidences actually occurred before the aircraft took off, and was based on the passenger's perceived ethnicity.

[1] Report on Hate Crimes and Discrimination Against Arab Americans: The Post-September 11 Backlash September 11, 2001-October 11, 2002

- There were over 800 cases of employment discrimination against Arab Americans, which was approximately a four-fold increase over previous annual rates.
- And lastly, there were numerous incidents of denial of service, discriminatory service and housing discrimination.

Having said that, I speak before you regarding the fundamental right to vote.

The Preamble of the Constitution of the United States reads:

> "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

The American form of government is a system of dual sovereignty- the federal government and the state governments are sovereign. However, ultimate sovereignty is in the American people. Voting is how the people of the United States exercise this sovereignty.

The right to vote is guaranteed in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments of the US Constitution. However, despite the lofty promises of the Declaration of Independence and our Constitution, our reality in this country is that belief in noble ideals has coexisted with unconscionable practices of discrimination. When it comes to the right to vote, it has been a struggle to enable minorities to exercise this right. To deal with this reality, Congress passed the landmark 1965 Voting Rights Act to provide the tools necessary to enforce the voting guarantees of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments of the US Constitution. In fact, it was President Lyndon Johnson, on signing the Voting Rights Act on August 6, 1965, that stated:

> "The Act flows from a clear and simple wrong. Its only purpose is to right that wrong. Millions of Americans are denied the right to vote because of their color. This law will ensure them the right to vote."

I would like to present an example of voting discrimination that occurred in the city of Hamtramck:

As I stated previously, even before the September 11th attacks, Arab Americans and those perceived to be Arab Americans were subject to discrimination. An example of discrimination occurred in Hamtramck, Michigan, in 1999.

Hamtramck is a small town in Wayne County, Michigan. The Hamtramck Chamber of Commerce describes the city as follows:

> "Hamtramck has been a destination and become home for many immigrants to the United States for most of this century. Originally established in 1798 as the township of Hamtramck, in what was then part of the Northwest Territory, Hamtramck was organized as a village in 1901. While a quiet farming town at the turn of the century, the population soared during 1910-20, when it was the fastest-growing community in the nation, spurred by the booming automobile industry. Thousands of immigrants, mostly of Polish and other European descent, settled here. Today, immigrants from all over the world continue to settle in Hamtramck, enriching our community with their cultures and customs."[2]

The incident that resulted in the involvement of the US Department of Justice in November 1999 is rooted in the fact that immigrants "from all over the world" came after the immigrants from Polish and European descent. The increasing numbers of non-European, non- Polish immigrants had an effect on the city of Hamtramck. In a democracy, demographic change translates into political power. A few members of the established community wanted to make sure that the demographic change does not translate into a sharing of political power with new comers "who are not like us."

On November 2, 1999, Hamtramck held a general election for the municipal offices of mayor, city council and city clerk. There were a number of dark-skinned citizens of Hamtramck wanting to vote, but were harassed by individuals that wanted to keep the election "pure."

Under Michigan law, political parties and citizen groups have the right to designate "challengers." M.C.L. Section 168.730. "Challenges" are individuals who have the right under Michigan election laws to observe the electoral process and challenge the eligibility of a person to vote. The challenger must have good reason to believe the individual is not a registered voter. MCL Section 168.733.

In October of 1999, a group called "Citizens for a Better Hamtramck" ("CBH") registered with the City Clerk of Hamtramck to provide "challengers" for the November 1999 general election. CBH stated in its registration, the goal was keeping the election "pure." Also during that same election, another group called the Committee to Re-elect Mayor Zych (the Zych Committee), registered to provide their own "challengers."

In Michigan, a challenger may contest a voters' eligibility on the ground of citizenship, age and/or residency. At the November election of 1999, more than forty voters in Hamtramck were challenged by CBH on the ground of their "citizenship." The challenged voters had dark skin and distinctly Arab/Muslim names such as Mohamed, Ahmed, and Ali. Although a number of the challenged dark-skinned voters produced US passports as proof of citizenship, which is conclusive evidence of citizenship, members of CBH were not satisfied, and the election inspectors required citizenship oaths as a prerequisite to voting. No white voters were challenged for citizenship and required to make an oath before being allowed to vote. The City did not prevent the challenges on the basis of color and surname from continuing. Moreover, the chairperson of one election precinct directed election inspectors to the effect that anyone who "looks Arab" must show a driver's license and voter registration card.

The Attorney General of the US filed action against the city of Hamtramck for violating Sections 2 and 12 (d) of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.[3] This action resulted in the following actions:

1. The city was to establish a training program to train election officials and private citizens regarding the proper grounds for election challenges;
2. The city was to train election officials to remove challengers who appeared to be discriminating against voters based on their race, color or ethnicity;
3. The city was to provide notices in English, Arabic, and Bengali to inform voters regarding these procedures;
4. And lastly, the city was to provide bilingual workers on election day.

According to Imad Hamad, ADC-MI Regional Director, "the involvement of the Department of Justice was most welcome and restored the community's faith in the system. It reassured them that their right to vote is backed by the enforcement power of the United States." According to Mr. Hamad, the Department of Justice made sure to involve community organizations in the process.

Wayne County criminally prosecuted those who were harassing the voters on the basis of a Michigan common law. Community activist, and Wayne County lead attorney, Mr. Abed Hamoud, stated that the decision to criminally prosecute the harassers was not an easy routine decision. In fact, Wayne County prosecutor at the time, John O'Hair, wanted to send a strong message that the county would not tolerate such actions. To Mr. Hamoud's recollection, it was the only prosecution of its kind under an obscure Michigan common law section.

In Conclusion, despite more than four decades passing since the enactment of the Voting Rights Act, discrimination is still a reality of American life. The following provisions of the Voting Rights Act are scheduled to expire in 2007:

1. Section 5 preclearance provisions,
2. Section 203 bilingual ballot access protections,
3. and the examiner and observer provisions that authorize the Department of Justice to appoint an examiner or observers to any jurisdiction covered by Section 5.

We urge that these provisions be expanded in scope to include areas with concentrations of Arab Americans. Our experience tells us that discrimination is still a reality of American life. We urge that the expiring provisions are expanded, strengthened and made permanent. As our regional director Imad Hamad always states " rights are nice to have but the key is enforcement. All the rights in the world are worthless unless there is a strong serious enforcement mechanism behind them."

I thank you for allowing me the time to come before you.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF BRADFORD BROWN BEFORE THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, AUGUST 4, 2005

Consideration of Miami-Dade County Florida for Inclusion in the Extension of the Voting Rights Bill

Aug 4, 2005
Florida Regional Hearing
Orlando, Florida

Few locations have been identified in the national conscience with voter rights obstructions as Miami-Dade County Florida. The travesty of the 2000 election, the debacle of the 2002 primary and the immense effort on the part of watch dog organizations in the 2004 election is overwhelming... The 2000 election resulted in hearings in Miami of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights (at which I testified) and their subsequent report, the U.S. Justice Department entering into a consent decree with Miami-Dade County concerning the treatment of Haitian Creole speaking voters, and a suit by the NAACP and supporting organizations against Miami-Dade County also resulting in a consent decree. The later was signed too late to impact the 2002 mid term and gubernatorial elections.

Since that time a new threat to Black voting empowerment has occurred. In the 1990s a voting rights suit was filed in Federal Court and a court decision rendered and then upheld by the 11th Circuit, which declared that at large elections to the Miami-Dade County Commission deprived minority voters of their right to representation. Now, there is a referendum to go before the voters to amend the County Charter to remove the executive powers of that Commission and give them to the County Mayor. A simple example of that impact will suffice for illustration of this impact. There are over 100 Advisory Boards and Committees in Miami-Dade County ranging from the Community Relations Board to the Hospital Trust. The mayor would be the sole selector of all of these positions. This removes the ability of the current 4 Black out of 13 total Commissioners to ensure that their constituents have a voice. Currently there are efforts to adjust the Commission numbers and boundaries to enable Haitian American and non-Cuban Hispanic representation and the strong mayor would greatly dilute that impact as the County manager would become essentially a staff assistant to the Mayor and no longer report to the Commissioners. The mayor rather than the County Manager would have the power to hire, supervise and remove all Department Heads.

To understand how this situation came to be, a little history is necessary. Through much of its history Miami-Dade County was predominantly an old south area despite the presence of tourism in some sections. Segregation was the law and custom. The Klu Klux Klan rode to discourage Black voting, including a major effort in 1939. With this background one might wonder why it did not meet the criteria for inclusion under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act I in the first place.

In the years following World War II, Miami boomed with persons moving to Miami, many of whom had served part of the War there. Tourism expanded as the middle class grew more affluent. Union conventions came to Miami as did national television shows like Jackie Gleason. Black entertainers began to appear on Miami-Beach although they could not stay overnight there. With the rise of the 1960s civil rights movement, Miami powers that be decided that if it followed the example of the Birminghams of the south their growing tourism industry could be greatly damaged. As a result a County Community Relations Board was established and desegregation tokenism was quickly agreed to, although not without a few bumps and disruptions. The civil eruptions in the Black communities of Miami came in the 1980s much later than in other areas.

However the Anglo hegemony that ruled Miami in the 1950s and 1960s is gone. The Cuban refuges began arriving in the 1960s and after a hiatus in the 1970s exploded again in the 1980s and continues to this day. More recently immigration of non-Cuban Hispanics has increased. Today the approximate population is 40% Cuban Americans and the remainder divided approximately equally between non-Cuban Hispanics, Blacks and Anglos. The Black population has shifted, and now has large Caribbean components from both Haiti and the English speaking islands.

When the single member district suit was filed Anglos still had a controlling vote. Now there are two Anglo, 4 Black and 7 Cuban Commissioners. Both of the mayors elected under the current executive mayor system have been Cuban Americans. The residential segregation in Miami is such that the western half of the county is very heavily Hispanic and tends to vote Republican while the Black population is primarily in the eastern part just back for the water. Within those areas the Haitian population is concentrated in the more northeasterly portion.

Highlights of the consent decrees agreed to by Miami-Dade County following the 2000 election are instructive. The County agreed to an equitable distribution of laptop computers amongst polling places. This arose because the telephone access to check on registrations so individuals could be directed to the correct polling place was essentially non-functional while the Hispanic dominated western areas all had laptops with immediate access! The consent decrees go into significant detail in addressing this issue

Another agreement stated that a duly qualified official shall be stationed at the end of the line at poll closing time so that every voter in line at that time would be given the opportunity to vote. The closure of polling places in 2000 arbitrarily eliminated persons who had been in line prior to the closing time. This problem of persons being in line took place in predominantly Black precincts as the increase in registrants and turn outs brought numbers that the elections department was unprepared to handle. The lack of the laptops contributed to this. In the Hispanic areas they prepared for increases due to increases in persons becoming citizens etc but not in the Black areas. The problem was exacerbated because of the failure to provide assistance in Creole and the prevention of persons taking someone into the polling place to assist them.

The Elections Department also agreed not to place signs stating that a photo ID was required to vote. Photo IDs have been shown nationwide to be less frequently held by Black voters, particularly those who are low income, and Miami is noted as one of the poorest cities in the country.

An outreach and education effort was also agreed to, and in 2004 that did take place. However it was not done fully in the manner I believe the consent decree called for, namely a specific effort involving the NAACP (named in the decree) and others to request specific input as per the decree, into any proposed changes.

Also not fully carried out in our opinion, were the efforts to contact persons who file incomplete registration forms and those who had been wrongly removed from the voting lists by the State of Florida in 2000 under the ruse of removing only ex-felons.

These examples indicate clearly the differential treatment of Black voters by the Miami-Dade County election operations. This consent decree ends May 15 2005.

The consent decree with the U.S. Department of Justice was based on allegations that Creole speaking voters at several precincts were denied assistance from persons of their choice and that oftentimes the poll workers providing assistance did not speak Haitian Creole. Even where persons were allowed to bring someone to assist them that person was limited to being allowed to explain the sample ballot and not allowed into the polling booth. There are nine pages of specific agreements to address this issue. The decree ends on December 31, 2005. An issue of concern in the termination is the spreading out of the increasing Haitian population and the increasing number of individuals becoming citizens as the decree focuses on "Haitian" precincts. The number of precincts with increasing Haitian voters is growing.

Of course it is recognized that the consent decrees make no stipulation of guilt.

Since 2000 the Miami-Election Reform Coalitions (MERC) was founded, which includes the Miami-Dade NAACP. It continues to work today. The 2000 primary was a debacle as the new machines failed, (worse in heavily Black areas). This likely cost former Attorney General Janet Reno the Democratic nomination for governor. As a result the County Commission took away all but the specifically legal requirements of the Director of the Elections Department and put the County Manager in charge. And directed him to use whatever County resources were necessary for the November 2002 general election. MERC was very much involved in this effort. In addition a significant election protection effort was carried out on Election Day primarily by the NAACP and People for the American Way (PFAW).

The County Manager removed the director of elections and hired a replacement approved by the County Commission. In the run up to the election MERC was very active, directly working with both the Elections Department and the County Commission. In the 2004 election there was a massive election protection effort run jointly by the NAACP and PFAW. Other groups also had monitoring activities. Teams of lawyers were poised to act immediately on any violations. The U.S. Department of Justice also monitored their consent decree and stood ready to go to other polls if problems were brought to them by the election protection workers. As a result things generally went smoothly on Election Day, but there were issues in the early voting. Early voting resulted in extremely long lines and these seemed to be the worst in Black areas, although precise data are not available. At one early voting site in a predominantly Haitian area, spurious challenges were made concerning persons giving assistance to voters and this held up voting so long that numerous persons left before voting. The Justice Department when contacted, resolved this with Miami-Dade's Election Department and the problem did not re-occur. Nevertheless there were enough issues that the County Manager has since removed the Director of the Elections Department and replaced her with the approval of the County Commission. It should be noted that in most Florida counties the Supervisor of Elections is an elected official but in Miami our single member district commission assures that the Department Director can be held to be responsible to all areas.

What of the future? MERC has been successful but how long can we rely strictly on citizen volunteers? The NAACP has been the member of the coalition with the greatest political clout, but the NAACP participates less in MERC's week to week work due to the press of other issues such as educational equity, economic development and police behavior. The NAACP weighs in particularly when issues need to be brought before the County Commission. The tremendous Election Protection effort in Miami, with volunteers coming in from all over the country, especially lawyers, is not sustainable given country wide demands.

Now the County is faced with a referendum that will destroy the executive power of the County Commission. History has shown that left alone as it was in 2000, the Elections Department will concentrate its resources on the majority (Hispanic primarily Cuban) areas to the detriment of minority Black voting precincts, particularly Haitian precincts. It has also shown that thanks to the presence of single member districts and the power of four Black Commissioners this emphasis can be shifted to better perform for minority areas if there is citizen pressure and continual vigilance. However citizens would be even more effective if the Justice Department were an ongoing presence as would occur if Miami-Dade was added to the counties covered under any extension the expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act. We in the Miami-Dade NAACP believe that if we were currently covered by pre-clearance the obvious diluting of Black voting power provided by the single member districts ordered by the Federal Courts after a finding of discrimination, could compel the Justice Department to intervene. In the worst case scenario where the referendum passes, there would be even more need for the Justice Department to pre-clear future changes. Having the Mayor elected county wide, where Black voters are a distinct minority, would remove any significant influence of Black voters (the polarized voting in the first executive mayors race where a strong Black candidate was defeated by a solid Cuban vote supports this). The new strong mayor would not have the checks and balances of the Commission as does the current executive mayor, and the new mayor would hire fire and supervise the Director of the Elections Department. Human nature and history makes it obvious over time that the emphasis of the Elections Department would be in providing efficient service to the majority and not in protecting the rights of Black voters.

I. INTRODUCTION

My name is Marlon Primes, and I am an attorney and the Vice President for Sections and Divisions of the National Bar Association ("NBA"). I was born in Akron, Ohio, and I have practiced law in Cleveland for the past thirteen (13) years. I previously served as the president of the Norman S. Bar Association, which the NBA affiliate chapter in Cleveland, Ohio.

During the 2004 presidential election, I volunteered for the Election Protection Program ("EPP") and consequently passed out voter information outside of voting precincts in several inner-city communities in Greater Cleveland on November 2, 2004. Today, I would like to briefly testify in my personal capacity about some of my observations regarding provisional ballots and election challengers.

II. PROVISIONAL BALLOTS

At 6:00 a.m. on November 2, 2004, I arrived at an EPP station in East Cleveland, Ohio, to receive final instructions and to find out the location of my assignment. I was initially told to report to a precinct in an inner-city neighborhood on Cleveland's Eastside. Later in the morning, I was reassigned to work in East Cleveland, which is a predominately African-American suburb of Cleveland that is also one of the poorest communities in Ohio.

I served as a volunteer worker for EPP until about 5:00 p.m. During my lunch break, I voted in my precinct in Cleveland Heights, where I have lived for the past twelve (12) years and which has a large middle-class, African-American population.

Although my personal observations are limited to the precincts where I volunteered and voted, EPP supervisors frequently came by and monitored my EPP location and shared anecdotes about other local precincts. Moreover, I used my cell phone to frequently call local EPP headquarters, where I received updates about election day issues that arose.

From 6:15 a.m. - 9:30 a.m., the precinct that I was assigned to had a large voter turnout, as did some of the other inner-city precincts staffed by EEP volunteers. Many of us observed and received reports of a substantial number of provisional ballots being cast in East Cleveland and poor African-American neighborhoods in the City of Cleveland. This ultimately presented a number of problems because Ohio guidelines indicated that provisional ballots that were cast in the wrong precinct would not be counted.

Although it may seem fundamental that every voter should know their correct precinct, many of my fellow EPP volunteers and I soon recognized that this is not as clear as it would appear. During the course of the day, we learned that many of the inner-voters were renters that moved several times since the last presidential election cycle and truly did not know where to vote. Also, many residents were assigned different voting precincts as a result of redistricting.

Questions from voters revealed these facts throughout the day and enabled EPP volunteers and I to understand why the number of provisional ballots in the inner-city was so much higher than those in other areas.

III. CHALLENGERS

While serving as an EPP volunteer, I learned of the presence of election challengers that were sitting at tables near the voting booths with county election workers. In fact, in Cleveland Heights, there were several challengers present. When I relayed this fact to a white attorney I was working on a case with, he indicated that he lived in a white, affluent suburb and that he nor any of his white friends ever saw a challenger present at their respective voting locations.

IV. RECOMMENDATIONS

A. Given the transience of some minority voters, examine whether provisional ballots should be counted when they are cast in the correct county, as oppose to the correct precinct.

B. Examine how new computer technology can be utilized to immediately verify registration of prospective voters.

B. Study the impact of challengers at voting booths and how they are assigned.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, TRANSCRIPT OF SOUTHERN REGIONAL HEARING, MARCH 11, 2005

NATIONAL COMMISSION
ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT
LAWYERS' COMMITTEE

P R O C E E D I N G S

PASTOR NETTLES: First of all, we want to thank you-all for coming and sharing. We, the pastor and members of Freewill Baptist Church, are just honored to have you here in our midst. And we're certainly grateful to each of you, and we just pray that your stay is most comfortable while you're here. Let us pray.

(Opening prayer.)

PASTOR NETTLES: I'm sorry. At this time, I'd like to introduce to you a member of the Commission staff, Jon Greenbaum. Jon is Executive Director of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act and Director of the Voting Rights Project of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. As director of the Voting Rights Project, Mr. Greenbaum is responsible for the Lawyers' Committee efforts to secure racial justice and equal access to the electoral process for all voters. At this time, I'd like to present to you Jon Greenbaum.

MR. GREENBAUM: Thank you, Pastor Nettles. Good morning, everyone.

MR. GREENBAUM: On behalf of the civil rights community, the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law created and organized the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. We are lucky to have such a wonderful group of commissioners as well as panelists today. And at this time, I want to turn it over to the chair of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, Bill Lann Lee.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Jon. First, on behalf of the Commission, I'd like to express our happiness to be here at Freewill Missionary Baptist Church. This is a church that was created in the 1960s in the historic district of west Montgomery, Alabama. And we thank you, Reverend Nettles, for welcoming us to this wonderful sanctuary. And Freewill -- I'd just like to say that Freewill is not just a very impressive physical site; it is a vibrant church that fosters evangelical Biblical teaching, strong family involvement, community partnerships, and life-changing ministries. My name is Bill Lann Lee. I am a lawyer and a lifelong civil rights lawyer, and I'm also a former assistant attorney general for civil rights. I'd like to thank you for joining us for the first regional hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act during this 40th anniversary commemoration of the Selma to Montgomery March. It is fitting that we begin our examination of the Voting Rights Act during this jubilee commemoration of the march from Selma to Montgomery, because it is that march which led to the passage of the Voting Rights Act.

President Lyndon Johnson sent the Voting Rights Act to Congress just two weeks after Bloody Sunday and when the determination of Alabama's African-Americans to gain access to the ballot was met with such shocking violence. Bloody Sunday wakened the conscience of the nation to the struggles of African-Americans to the most basic right in a democracy: the right to vote.

Alabama was at the forefront of this movement as civil rights leaders sought to enfranchise African-Americans in response to the horrific bombings of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church. That bombing killed four girls: Denise McNair, Cynthia Wesley, Carole Robertson, and Addie Mae Collins. It is in their memory and the memory of Johnny - of Jimmie Lee Jackson, whose death spurred the original march from Selma to Montgomery, that we are here to examine what is often cited as one of the most important pieces of legislation passed by Congress. The Voting Rights Act was signed into law in 1965 by President Johnson. The Voting Rights Act bans literacy -- literacy tests and poll taxes that had been used to deny blacks the right to vote and to speak in the political process; outlaws intimidation; authorizes federal monitors and observers; and creates various mechanisms to protect voting rights of racial and the language minorities.

Some of the acts and provisions are permanent, such as Section 2, which is the general non-discrimination provision. I want to note specifically that what you may have heard -- what you may have misheard, which is that the Voting Rights Act somehow goes out of existence; that is not true. The right of African-Americans to vote is guaranteed by the 15th Amendment and is permanent. However, there are some special provisions of the Voting Rights Act that will expire in 2007 unless they are reauthorized by Congress. In 2007, three major protections of the Voting Rights Act will expire unless Congress acts to reauthorize. First, Section 5 of the Act requires certain states, counties, and townships with history of discrimination against minority voters to obtain approval or preclearance from the United States Department of Justice or the United States District Court in Washington, DC, before they can make any voting changes, including redistrictings, changes to methods of election, and polling place changes. These jurisdictions must prove that the changes do not have a purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership to a language minority. Second, Section 203 of the Act requires that bilingual language assistance be provided in communities with a significant number of voting-age citizens who are limited English proficient. Four language groups are covered by Section 203: American Indians, Asian-Americans, Alaskan Natives, and those of Spanish heritage. Covered jurisdictions must provide language assistance at all stages of the electoral process. As of 2002, a total of 466 local jurisdictions across 31 states are covered by these provisions. Third, Sections 6(b), 7(b), 9, and 13(a) of the Act authorize the attorney general to appoint a federal examiner to jurisdictions covered by Section 5's preclearance provisions of good cause or to send the federal observer to any jurisdiction where a federal examiner has been assigned. Federal observers have been deployed every year from 1966 to the present, except for 1973, and about 25,000 observers have been deployed in 1,000 elections. From the initial passage of the Voting Rights Act in 1965, Congress has relied on an extensive documented history of discrimination in voting to justify the need for the special remedies of the Act and to ensure that these remedies are proportional to the problems the Act seeks to cure. The United States Supreme Court has made it clear that reauthorization of the expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act must be supported by a record of discrimination in voting since the last comprehensive reauthorization in 1982. The non-partisan National Commission of the Voting Rights Act was created by the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law on behalf of the civil rights community. The National Commission was created because, as I've noted, some important parts of the Voting Rights Act will expire in 2007. To reauthorize and satisfy constitutional standards, Congress will need to find an ongoing record of racial discrimination in voting.

The National Commission is comprised of seven distinguished advocates, academics, legislators, and civil rights leaders who represent diversity that's such an important part of our nation. We are also fortunate to have two regional guest commissioners to join us today. In a few minutes, you will hear from each of the national commissioners as well as the guest commissioners. However, let me say that the Commission has two primary tasks: First, to conduct regional hearings, such as this one, across this country to gather testimony relating to voting rights and to provide information regarding the Voting Rights Act; and, second, to write a comprehensive report detailing the existence of discrimination in voting since 1982. The Commission's report will be based on several sources, including facts compiled from the Commission's hearings, United States Department of Justice enforcement records, court opinions, and other sources. The report will be used to educate the public, advocates, and policymakers about the record of racial discrimination in voting.

The purpose of today's hearing is twofold: First, to gather information from citizens, government officials, leading practitioners, and academics about their experiences relating to voting rights issues; and, second, to -- to educate local residents about issues related to reauthorization. The first panel will provide historic overview of the Voting Rights Act in the South. We will then hear from leading voting rights practitioners in this region, academic experts, members of the community, and government officials in the second and third panels. Each panelist will provide a five to 10 minute presentation. After all the members of the panel have spoken, the Commission will address questions to the panelists. And we look forward to a vigorous dialogue. We encourage members of the public who are here today to share their voting rights experiences in our fourth and final panel of the day. If you are interested, please speak with a staff member in the classroom, which can be reached through that door on the right.

I would now like to introduce the other members of the National Commission who will each make a brief opening statement. Unfortunately, three commissioners are not able to make this hearing, the Honorable Charles Mathias, Former Senator from Maryland -- that's actually Charles Mathias; I'm sorry -- former Senator from Maryland, who is the Honorary Chair of the Commission; Delores Huerta, the Cofounder of the United Farm Workers of America; and Charles Ogletree, Professor of Law and Vice-Dean of Clinical Programs at the Harvard Law School. In their place, we have two guest commissioners, who I will introduce after the national commissioners. Commissioner John Buchanan represented Birmingham, Alabama, in the House of Representatives for 16 years. He is an ordained Baptist minister; has served churches in Alabama, Tennessee, Virginia, and Washington, DC. Commissioner Buchanan, would you like to say a few words?

MR. BUCHANAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Although I was in the Congress, I'll try to make it a few words. I -- it is a privilege to be a part of this Commission and this function of the Lawyers' -- Lawyers' Committee. I am not a lawyer. I'm a Baptist preacher. I'm a Baptist preacher who lost his mind and ran for the Congress. And not only did I lose my mind and run for Congress, as I go from sublime to ridiculous, as far as some members of my congregation -- which I resigned from -- but I'm a Republican member of the Congress, as is Charles Mathias, our Honorary Chair. They ran out of distinguished members of Congress, and people like me, who are Republicans and are right on all of the issues; they had to reach down to get me to run. But to be -- when I was 21 years of age, I had just graduated from Howard College -- now is Samford University -- in Birmingham, Alabama. And at that point, 21 was the voting age. You couldn't vote until you were 21. I went to the Jefferson County courthouse; I saw a group of black Americans gathered around a table pouring over a thick tome. I picked up a copy and started leafing through it. And you would have needed a master's degree in history or political science, or maybe both, to be able to answer the questions about that tome. It was the literacy test. I went up to registrar. I said, sir, I just graduated from college, and I don't think I can pass this test. He said, who was the first president of the United States? I said, George Washington. He said, you just passed the test; pay your poll tax; I'll register you. That's how it was in Birmingham, Alabama, when I registered to vote.

I had been a fan and a -- Abraham Lincoln had been my hero for many years, from boyhood up, and so like all the black folk who were Republicans, I was an Abraham Lincoln Republican. But I got an early lesson in the need for this legislation. My first year in Congress was 1965. A sophomore Democrat from Atlanta and a freshman Republican from Birmingham were spearheading an investigation of the Ku Klux Klan at that point, and the things we discovered reminded me that our problem was not confined to the deep south states but to many other places as well. The largest Klan state was Indiana, for example. So when the Voting Rights Bill came along, I followed my leader, Gerry Ford, who throughout all the Great Society proposals offered constructive Republican alternative proposals to each one. And on voting rights, he and I cosponsored -- tried to get the judicial committee and the Congress to pass legislation that covered more completely and more thoroughly all the states, not just the southern states. Now, any rational voting rights act would have to zero in on the south because we were the heart of the problem; no question. But -- so I started off as concerned about its applying primarily -- and some of its major provisions, Section 5, 2 -- to -- for example, to states like Alabama, Mississippi, and other selected states.

I want to begin by saying I'm so glad I was wrong -- I'm going to ask our distinguished panelists later on to tell me why I was wrong. We needed it -- the medicine the most and had a great problem -- if I had been a lawyer, I might have known that -- applying it well. It had spread throughout the whole country. By 1970 and 1975, I wouldn't have voted for the Voting Rights Act if it applied only to my own constituents, 35 percent of whom were black Americans. The most productive change for the south; the most healthy change for the south there ever was came out of the Voting Rights Act. We had states-rights Democrats in Congress headed by white supremacy for the right, the official Democratic ballot in Alabama. The symbol was not the donkey but the white rooster. And that wing had control in the Democratic Party until the Voting Rights Act, after which the Democratic Party in Alabama began to become more as the Democratic Party is throughout the United States in most places.

So this is the best thing that ever happened to Southerners, black and white. The Civil Rights Movement, I think, was born in churches like this. I believe it was born in the Christian church, in black churches of the deep south. Many others joined in. But another group of people who did a great deal of (inaudible) about were young lawyers, like some who remain crusaders for this after they were no longer quite as young. But I was thrilled to see young lawyers in this group who are carrying on the fight. We need the Voting Rights Act. We must have its provisions continued. And if the elections in 2000 and 2004 didn't make people understand we still have problems with voting and people getting their votes counted, they need to look again and think again. We need this Act. I'm so pleased to have a small part toward it's reenactment and full - and strengthening, if possible. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

MR. LEE: Thank you for that too modest statement.

MR. BUCHANAN: Too long too.

MR. LEE: I think it was just right. Commissioner Chandler Davidson is Professor Emeritus of Sociology and Political Science at Rice University. Dr. Davidson is co-editor of Quiet Revolution in the South, a definitive work on the impact of the Voting Rights Act in the south. Doctor Davidson has served as an expert in numerous cases in voting rights and is a renowned scholar in the field. Commissioner Davidson.

DR. DAVIDSON: Thank you. I'm honored to be here today. At its heart, the Voting Rights Act is a powerful government sanction of means to prevent voting discrimination against racial and ethnic minorities. Put differently, it was conceived as a means to prevent the second reconstruction from the suffering and fate of the first reconstruction. The latter half of the 19th century, the hard-won right of most African-American males to vote was gradually taken away after approximately 30 years. We are now 40 years beyond passage of the Voting Rights Act. Should it be allowed to expire? To answer this question, I am interested in hearing testimony about the existence, or absence, if that is the case, of any form whatsoever of voting discrimination against minorities, including minority vote dilution through redistricting; voter intimidation through such mechanisms as race-based challenges of voters at the polls; sudden changes of polling sites; false information given to potential voters regarding time and place of voting or voter qualifications; illegal purging of voters' names from registration lists; use of racial or ethnic code words in campaigns to stir up prejudice against candidates; activities on the part of election officials, party officials, or others that could have the effect of intimidating or discouraging potential minority voters. In short, any activity or arrangement by officials or others that appears to have a purpose or effect of infringing on the voting rights of potential minority voters or minority candidates. Your testimony regarding these questions today will play an important role in helping Congress decide whether the temporary features of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 should be extended beyond - beyond 2007.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Commissioner Davidson. I would now like to introduce Commissioner Elsie Meeks. She is the first Native American member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, which she has served for six years. She is also the Executive Director of the First Nations Oweesta Corporation, and an enrolled member of the Oglala Lakota Tribe. Elsie, if I mangled the pronunciation -- incorrectly - or anyone else's --

MS. MEEKS: Mangled words that nearly everyone mangles. Oglala Lakota Tribe. I am so happy to be serving on this Commission. I was just sitting here thinking a little bit ago what a strange situation this is. In fact, I've found myself in situations for the past six years. Coming from Pine Ridge, South Dakota, which is one of the -- includes one of the two counties in South Dakota that's covered by Section 5, we really didn't even understand the importance of voting. That's how far removed we were from even thinking about this. And then after I got elected to -- appointed to the Commission by then Majority Leader Senator Tom Daschle, I really did come to understand how important. Of course, through the Commission, we held a lot of hearings and briefings, mainly in the 2000 election. Then published a very good report. And we've held lots of briefings since then. I mentioned that in South Dakota -- I'm from Pine Ridge - and in the 2000 election, I think this is one -- or 2002 election, this was one of our really first experiences at seeing what voting could do. And I don't know if any of you know of Senator Tom - Tim Johnson's race. He was behind by 2500 votes, and the last precinct in was Pine Ridge. And he ended up winning by 524. So that really, I think, caused us to understand in great detail how important this was. And after -- and since that time, our -- before Senator Tim Johnson's race, the turnout had been about 14 percent. And in the last race, it was something like 48 percent. So we had gained a great deal. The ACLU has been really active in South Dakota in the last few years and has won several lawsuits because of voter packing issues and districting issues. So I am very happy to be a part of this commission. And I think that this is such an important issue, and we do need this to be reauthorized, and I look forward to hearing from you and participating in this.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Commissioner Meeks.

Guest Commissioner Denise Majette is an attorney in Atlanta, Georgia. She is a former member of Congress. She was elected to Congress as Representative to the Fourth Congressional District in 2002, and she was the Democratic nominee for the United States Senate in 2004.

MS. MAJETTE: Thank you.

MR. LEE: Welcome.

MS. MAJETTE: Thank you. Good morning. I'm honored to be a part of this historic commission hearing, and I thank Barbara Arnwine, who is my fellow Duke Law School alum, and the Executive Director of the Lawyers' Committee, as well as Jon Greenbaum and the members of the Commission, for having me be a part of this historic proceeding. Today we will receive testimony from men and women who have been more than conquerors; men and woman who have given so much of themselves in the cause of justice, freedom, and equality across this country, but especially here in the south. We are a grateful nation and a better nation for the work that they have done. We are thankful for the sacrifices of so many civil rights leaders, including Dr. Martin Luther King, Dr. Joseph Lowery, Dr. Dorothy Height, Fannie Lou Hamer, and Congressman John Lewis, with whom I served in the 108th Congress. They and so many others were on the front lines and allow us to be here in this position today. We owe a debt of gratitude to these courageous warriors. And we are indebted to the lawyers who so wisely crafted legal arguments, and to the judges who upheld their oath to interpret the laws providing equal justice for the poor, for people of color, and to all men, women, and children. They fought for justice and placed their careers, their families, and their very lives in harms way. The brave men and women like these inspired me at the age of 13 in 1968, a young black girl in Brooklyn, New York, to decide to become a lawyer. They made it possible for me to pursue that dream at Yale College and Duke University School of Law in the 1970s. And then to go on to practice law at Legal Aid in Winston-Salem, North Carolina. And it was there that I experienced in an up-close and personal way the challenges of southern life for those who had been so long denied the right to freely exercise that most sacred franchise, the right to vote. The Voting Rights Act made it possible for me, an African-American woman, to be elected as a judge to the state court in the Stone Mountain Judicial Circuit in Georgia, and then to be elected to the United States Congress representing Stone Mountain of Georgia in 2002. And just last year to be elected as the Democratic nominee to the United States Senate from the state of Georgia. So great is the power of the ballot.

Doctor King addressed the issue of ballot power in his May 17th, 1957, speech, "Give Us the Ballot," as he commemorated the third anniversary of Brown versus The Board of Education. He understood and we have seen that great and awesome power at work. It is the power of the ballot that enables us to elect men and women who understand our beliefs, who shape public policy, and who will implement court decisions that embrace those among us who have been left out of the American dream. And so our charge here today is clear: To assess the progress that has been made and to help determine where we go from here.

This hearing and the ones that will follow will help Congress have a clear record, a clear road map, as they determine what the next step will be in considering the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. As a nation, we have come a mighty long way. But there is yet still a long way to go. The work of the Commission through these hearings will serve to light the path ahead. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you. Guest Commissioner Derryn Moten is the Associate Professor of Humanities at Alabama State University. Doctor Moten has presented programs on the Civil Rights Movement with the Montgomery and Tuscaloosa public libraries and is a board member of the Alabama Writers' Forum. Welcome.

DR. MOTEN: Thank you. Good morning. It is a personal pleasure of mine to be selected to serve as a guest commissioner here. In 1865 Alabama was a principal character in America's morality play about race and freedom, and in 1965, Alabama played her role again. The events of that year and this place determined, in the words of Fannie Lou Hamer, whether America was America; whether America, a' la, Alabama, was the land of the free and the home of the brave. The women, men, and children who helped bring about the Voting Rights Act believed, as Commissioner Charles Oglethorpe's colleague, Harvard Professor Lani Guinier, has written, that democracy demands the ability to participate.

On a personal level, I realized the importance of voting at a very early age, when my mother was among the legions of other blacks in my hometown of Gary, Indiana, who helped elect the first black mayor of our city, Richard Gordon Hatcher. Thank you very much.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Professor Moten. Before we begin, I need to make some acknowledgements. First, again, I'd like to thank the Freewill Missionary Baptist Church for their wonderful hospitality. I want to think our distinguished group of panelists. They are, in fact, some of the leading voting rights lawyers, academics, and advocates. I want to thank the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law for establishing the National Commission. I want to thank the national cosponsors: The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the NAACP National Voter Fund, the National Asian Pacific American Legal Consortium, and the National Conference of American Indians. I also want to thank the regional cosponsors: The Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the National Voting Rights Museum, the Southern Regional Council, 21st Century Youth, the African-American Human Rights Foundation Center for Democratic Renewal, N'COBRA Southern Region, and the People's Agenda. I also want to thank the law firms: Ballard, Spahr, Andrews & Ingersoll, LLP; Bingham, McCutchen, LLP; and Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher, Folm, LLP, for helping to staff the Commission. Most of all, I want to thank everybody in the audience for attending today's session. We're now ready to begin with our first panel, which is the panel about history.

We have two panelists, and I'll just introduce both of them to start with. Doctor Gwendolyn Patton is the Program Field Director for the Southern Rainbow Education Project, a coalition devoted to grassroots activism. Doctor Patton has travelled extensively throughout the United States to organize and work on behalf of voting rights and other issues of equality and freedom. But she is particularly a historian and archivist of the Civil Rights Movement in the state of Alabama. We welcome you, Doctor Patton.

DR. PATTON: Thank you so much.

MR. LEE: Vernon Burton is Professor of History and Sociology at the University of Illinois. Professor Burton has written and testified extensively about the issue of racial discrimination in voting. I'll also say he is one of the most renowned scholars in the field and quite a gentleman as well. And so if we could begin (inaudible) Dr. Patton.

DR. PATTON: Yes. I'd just like to say first of all, thank you for asking me. I probably will be a little eclectic in my remarks. I have a tremendous responsibility. I'm the coordinator for the Montgomery leg of our 40th anniversary.

Gentle ladies and gentlemen, I want to say a special hello to Honorable John Buchanan. He was a Republican when it was not safe to be a Republican in the south. And we do recognize that. I just hope you'll be able to have some influence to revamp at least a part of that Republican Party to the principles and the ideals of Abraham Lincoln, because they have really ventured far, far away. As has been stated by the Commissioners, voting is about power. And let us be very clear about that. And what do we mean by power?I was a member of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and my grandmother's home was the freedom house for the leaders of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. And when we looked across Alabama, particularly in the Black Belt, where you had 80 percent, 90 percent black citizens, and they had absolutely no power, I mean no power even over their lives -- and at that point when we first embarked on this mission in a contemporary way -- because the Voting Rights Movement in Alabama began way back in a consistent way in the 1920s, in a very consistent, very organized way. And I invite you to come and visit the archives of which I have responsibility of the Honorable Rufus A. Lewis, who saved every piece of paper from the mid-'30s until his passing. He passed at age 93.

And so there has always been a thrust. The murder of Jimmie Lee Jackson, I think was the straw that really broke the Jim Crow -- political Jim-Crow back. And we said, enough is enough. Many young people -- I'm 63 years old. Many young people when I was a teenager played real school. We didn't play, play school. When I was 12, 13 years old -- and I probably will cry -- we helped with the literacy test. We had citizenship schools. Jefferson County's literacy test was horrendous. It was the worst in the state. You had to know the duties of the secretary of state in Alabama. In Montgomery, it was less arduous, but not really something that should have been in the place in the first place. You had to know how many US representatives, what were their duties and functions; the Senate, you had to know about the state legislative process. And we worked very, very hard and long to help our people learn how to fill out that literacy test. And we talk about college professors with master's who could get the answers correct, all right. And the registrar was always recalcitrant, mean. And, of course, they had a people. And when they would check and see that you had all of the answers correct, they will ask a question, how many bubbles are in a bar of soap, or how many seeds are in a watermelon? So it was just absolutely humiliating. When somebody finally got registered, we would have parties in the community to celebrate. And that might be maybe one or two times a year. So -- and I don't think, given the current political climate if -- if we don't maintain it, I am convinced that there will be a variation of those same kinds of barriers. Going back to my original thesis, it's about power; it's about people collectively having control of their own lives and their own governance. In 1965 and '66, we weren't interested in running for President or even US Congress. I'm glad we got to that point. We were concerned about who was the coroner, where a young black man normally could be murdered in jail, and the coroner or the medical examiner would say, by his own hands; we were concerned with running for sheriff so that people like Jim Clark in Dallas County during that period and his posse and his extra legal arm of the KKK without their hoods would just massacre us at will. And there was no, no restraint. They go to court, and they're found not guilty. We were concerned about the school boards so that our children could have a sensitive policy-making body. Because we had to go to county training schools; we didn't go to regular schools. We didn't go to school in the Black Belt, in the rural, until October. All of the other kids, white kids, could go to school in September, but our children had to pick the cotton. That was cotton picking time. And then they were let out of school in March. We didn't have a spring break. We were forced out of school almost for a month because it was cotton planting time. And how children could folly during the summer, our children couldn't do that because they had to hoe and chop the cotton. Forty years is not that long ago. And I just think that we have to keep these provisions intact. And I'll talk about that later. I want to say that the Voting Rights Movement was not for black people only. When we got rid of the poll tax, poor white folks could vote. There was a whole thing about who was a 100 and 400. 100-whites were poor whites; they got paid weekly. Professional whites were called 400s because they got paid monthly. These are the kinds of anecdotes, the kind of maugres and customs that we knew about. The poll tax also freed up white women, because white women had to do what their husbands -- vote the way their husbands say vote. And if not, the poll tax simply wouldn't be paid. So the voting rights struggle, and which is continuing, was not for black people only. It was about our -- I think I used somebody's -- heard somebody say participatory democracy. Someone mentioned Fannie Lou Hamer, and I had the privilege of working with Fannie Lou and -- Fannie Lou and the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party challenge, which was so insulted. And I think Ms. Hamer said, we didn't all ride up here on a broke-down bus just for five of us to sit down; we's all tired. But what that struggle did was open up the Democratic Party. I am convinced the formula to get delegates, not just black inclusion in the whole process, but women -- you know, we have a formula; we've got -- I've been to Democratic conventions, and -- so there's a formula; your delegation has to have this type of composition. And that has factored all the way down to the local executive committees of the Democratic Party. So that's important in terms of our struggle. You talked about negative campaign. That's almost -- I mean, that just goes without question. There are always code words. And unfortunately I'd like to say that the Republicans have taken over where the Dixiecrats were in the '40s:Symbols, images. Here in Alabama, for instance -- I've talked about this often -- and I don't know what to do about it, Judge -- but the star of Jefferson Davis is on the steps -- the top steps of our State Capitol. Jefferson Davis, we all know who he was. And governors of today, when they take the oath, they stand on that star. What is that saying? What is that saying? Lastly, before I talk about the importance of saving and why, our struggle for the right to vote, which it also includes for our right for our votes to be counted, was not simply about passive participation in the political process. It was also about active participation in the process. And with all of this money in the political process now, this private and PAC money, that is a new civil rights issue, because it excludes and eliminates, particularly black people, to even think about getting into the process. I've known grassroots local candidates who put down a set of signs today and then at night go pick up those signs because they can't buy more signs to put in another neighborhood the next day. Humiliating.

I think our government, because of all of this money, has become some kind of hybrid plutocracy or oligarchy or something. Money is the new barrier. It's a civil rights issue as well. I don't know if this commission can handle that or if it's in your purview, but that issue has to be taken up. Section 5 is important. I wish it were a law and not a provision. We still have instances of polling places being relocated and nobody knows where they are. We have issues of people having to re-identify, whatever that is. We have issues, that you vote at this poll on a certain date and you vote for a certain kind of election, then you vote at another poll -- at another poll on another election. A lot of our people, particularly in the rural, which might be rather large because of the land -- you know, Lowndes County has, you know, a small population, but trying to travel from Fort Deposit to White Hall, I might as well fly to New York because of the mass of the land, the expanse. And so we must maintain Section 5. The federal government has to be -- or the district court has to be informed before any changes can be made. We all know about -- we don't have to talk about districting and redistricting and diluting the vote. Money dilutes the vote too. But we all know about those issues and how -- you know, we come from a generation of -- Judge Buchanan, who was it? Was it -- I think it was Judge Varner in Tuskegee, Macon County, the gerrymandering case, you know, where they gerrymandered all of the 80 percent of black folks in Macon County completely out of a political district. We still have a variation, the cynicism, because it's all about power. And we have to be very clear on that. And I wish white people in general -- and I don't want to over-generalize -- would understand that shared power is a wonderful thing, that you don't need to have all of the power.

I tell my students, if you're the only A in class, you're going to go crazy, because you'll have no one to talk to; there's no one on your level. And likewise, with people with all of the money, all of the power, they're crazy, as far as I'm concerned. Look at Enron and its impact and how it has infected our political process. We must keep Section 5. Alabama is getting a growing, growing Spanish Mexican, to be more particular, here in Montgomery, population. And they're moving in the black community, many of them. And I'm working on -- make certain that we can have that kind of mutual respect for one another, especially our cultures. They need to be a part of the political process. So Section 203 must maintain. Mexicans, or people of Spanish heritage, are no longer simply located on the west coast or in New York City. They're all over the country, the midwest, and in the south, and in Florida. To appoint the federal examiner, which goes back to Section 5, I think that has to stay in place because it reminds me, when President Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act into law August 6th, 1965, also the same day that Hiroshima or Hiroshima was bombed -- I see all kinds of connections -- we had to send for federal registrars. Because how did we expect -- there was no expectation -- that the existing registrars would register black people? And I visit the archives, and I can show you letters where ordinary citizens wrote to Washington asking for federal registrars to come here to observe our elections. And I see federal registrars as the federal examiner. And I think we still need them, of course, where there's evidence, you know, affidavits, proof, in those areas. We still have instances in the south where the poll -- what do you call -- the box? What do you call it, Judge? Where you put your votes in the box, disappears; ends up in somebody's home. I'm talking about recent. I'm not talking about in the '60s. Can't find -- whatever the box is, if you have paper ballots. We need to have federal registrars to make certain they examine the ballot. I am convinced if the ballots in Florida had been examined -- and we have the technology; we could do it -- because I'm convinced a lot of those ballots were already pre-perforated, and so if you vote for another candidate, then that ballot becomes, what? Invalid. So we need federal examiners and the extension of that to make certain that the ballot is valid. Ladies and gentlemen, this is my testimony. I would be willing to entertain questions, but please give me the opportunity to leave at this moment so I can handle the rest of my responsibilities for the 40th anniversary, and I will return later.

MR. LEE: Well, why don't we, to meet the requirements, ask some questions for now. If I may start. You gave some examples of, I think, the lost -- the ballot box that ended up in someone's house and redistricting and changes of polling places and that occurred recently. I wonder if you could just as much as you can give some more specificity about when those things occurred. Are we talking about things that happened in the 1990s --

DR. PATTON: Yes.

MR. LEE: -- 2000s? If you could, just sort of tell us which counties maybe.

DR. PATTON: Oh, the Black Belt counties in particular: Greene County, Hale County. I can give you some real evidence because it's in my archives. I have a whole folder called voter irregularities, which is evidence. I just didn't have time to collect that. But I'd be more than happy. During the Jesse Jackson campaign, oh, my goodness the voting irregularities were rampant, and that's where much of my evidence is. And that can occur again. I think that happened because Jesse was black.

MR. LEE: Well, Dr. Patton, why don't we expedite this by, if you could make available your folder on voting irregularities, we will keep the record open.

DR. PATTON: Okay. I will provide that. I talked with one of your associates and said that I would provide that. And I would like to say that the archives is housed at Trenholm State Technical College, which I think is the correct repository, though I have a wonderful relationship with the State archives, because it's these kids who go to this community college, if you will, whose grandparents and great-grandparents, poor people, were the foot soldiers of the Movement. And they just revere the fact that they have an archives. And we are the only college in the whole entire state, two-year college system, which has an archives. But I'd be more than happy to provide that data for you, even this afternoon if someone would join me and go right around the corner and copy it.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Dr. Patton. Any questions for Dr. Patton?

MR. BUCHANAN: I just wanted to second yours, Mr. Chairman, and thank Dr. Patton for her kind words. And also for your testimony. I heard Joyce Hughes say some years ago that what we need to do in this country is make a promise on paper the Constitution and the Bill of Rights become realities in the world for all Americans. And that job has to be re-fought every generation. I'm so glad you made plain that these problems do continue and we have to do what's necessary to fight them now. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Professor?

DR. MOTEN: Doctor Patton, you mentioned some of the challenges or irregularities in the rural areas. As you and I both know, most of this state is rural, and there are a lot of challenges regarding voting in those rural areas. Could you speak a little more about those challenges, particularly like, for example, with absentee ballots?

DR. PATTON: Yes. Thank you. They don't ever make it a lot of times, you know, to be counted at all. And then when black people -- sirs, gentle ladies, we had a horrendous case down here, when black people assist other folk, infirmed folk, with the ballot -- with the voting process, the absentee ballot, we had people watching -- what do you call, the legal apparatus -- I don't want to call his name from Mobile, but I'll leave that alone, the state prosecutor -- I mean, yeah, yeah, in the attorney general's office or something, brought charges, filed charges against voter activists in Marion County and Greene County. And they were simply assisting elderly people with the right to vote. They were found not guilty in Marion County and also Dallas County by the appeals. Greene County and Hale County is somewhat complicated, but I can get you that data. Yes, we are hampered very much by the absentee ballot process. Either assisting our own people or if they get down to where they're to be counted, they are not counted. If that brings any light to what you're. . .

DR. MOTEN: Thank you.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Meeks.

MS. MEEKS: Thank you for your comments. I really appreciated hearing the history. You mentioned in Section 203, in this bilingual. Has -- has there been any progress on providing bilingual ballots or bilingual information? Has it reached that stage where that needs to happen?

DR. PATTON: That needs to happen. And we also need to have, what we used to call -- we had citizenship schools. That's where we learned how to fill out the literacy test. But we also had what we called political education, you know, so you can understand the political process. I don't think that's existing in Alabama. I know not in Montgomery, in terms of our new residents. You know, I talk with them. We go to the same washeteria. I go there on purpose. I speak a little bit of Spanish to make them feel comfortable. And I think they really feel like they're not -- they shouldn't even be a part of our political process. And something should be done so that they can be independent so they don't become what black folks used to be in the '20s and the '30s, where you had a few blacks -- by the way, you know we couldn't even vote in the primary. It was called a white only primary, okay. Always happened in May. And then you had this hand -- I'm trying to make a parallel, a possible analogy, with our new friends, citizens -- you had a handful of blacks, and the white leader would pay the HNIC, because that's really what that person was, to deliver the little handful of block black votes to that particular candidate. Remember that? Outrageous. And then they would get some little favor. If we don't have real civic political education for our newly-arrived friends of Spanish background, that can happen again. And I don't think we need to have a repeat of that.

DR. DAVIDSON: Doctor Patton, thank you for your testimony, your moving testimony. From somebody who was only around during the large work from the '60s onward -- and I'm very pleased to hear that you're going to make your archives available to this commission, which would be a big help to us. As you know, the kind of information that one gets about voting discrimination is often word of mouth, and sometimes it makes it into newspapers and constitutes a printed record, and I wonder if you can give us any sense of how often -- I know this is a rather difficult question to answer. But just off the top of your head, estimate how often these voting problems, these instances of voting discrimination, make it into local newspapers, say, in the Black Belt counties.

DR. PATTON: Well, we have the Greene County Democrat, which is a black owned that's very good in capturing. Let me also be very specific and clear. Where you are in a majority -- I'm talking about now in the urban areas -- where there is a majority of blacks -- and because county commissioners -- and we've gotten that resolved in terms of composition -- appoint people who work in the polls -- not poll watchers, but you know, the official poll workers -- and, like, in my precinct, they're all black; there are no problems there; we all know each other and so forth. But in those areas where it's a mixed population, you might find -- and I can only just say by hearsay because I don't have any record of that -- how they might have been intimidated. You know, particularly -- I'm just going to have to call names -- in the areas where the Christian Coalition has a stronghold. And, you know, the abortion thing gets all up in there and -- all kinds of things get up in there that can intimidate black voters, particularly if they're a minority in that particular district. So that's where we need to look. Another place -- and help me, Derryn. I want to say Clanton, where we have proportional representation. A certain kind of -- I can provide you the book on that -- a certain kind of voting process, cumulative voting, so that black people can have some little say in the governance. Because black people in Clanton -- Chilton County, they are the minority in terms of numbers. And so that's a positive. But it took a struggle for us to get there. But that's a positive, and perhaps a way out when we're dealing with black folks, as well as other people of color, as the minority, so that they can have some say-so. Otherwise -- and, of course, we had it precleared, to have that kind of a cumulative voting process. I don't know if that helps.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Doctor Patton, for your time, and thank you for your willingness to -- to make yourself available to the staff, and also those archives. Thank you for that wonderful eloquent testimony.

DR. PATTON: Thank you.

MR. LEE: Our second speaker on the historical panel is a very (inaudible). I am introducing Professor Burton. I somehow left out that he is the Associate Director for Humanities of Social Sciences of the National Center for Supercomputing Applications. Professor Burton is a native of Georgia. Welcome, Professor Burton.

DR. BURTON: Thank you. When Dr. Patton said that 40 years wasn't so along ago, I think it's something we need to remember when we're thinking about the Voting Rights Act. Not only it was just 40 years ago when this march across the Pettus Bridge finally brought people here about this time -- which I think it's so appropriate to hold this commission. But 40 years ago there are people who go to the polls today who knew they were threatened when they went 40 years ago, who were a group of voters who are still alive and voting who risked their jobs, and often their lives, to go vote. So I think that's something to remember when you think about renewal of the Voting Rights Act. There was a period of time in America when people, a whole group, was discouraged in the most horrific ways from exercising what we think is central to a democracy. In 1957 Martin Luther King, Jr., making a connection between the vote and America's sin of slavery, declared that the right to vote was a moral issue: So long as I do not firmly and irrevocably possess the right to vote, I do not possess myself. Two things that modernized the American south: Air conditioning and the Voting Rights Act. It's almost a disgrace. I think that Americans understand better how air conditioning works than they do how the Voting Rights Act works. I think we can say that we're proud that we have such good science education, but we need better civics education, better history education, and better political education, something as important as the Voting Rights Act. I think we have just not let the public know as historians how effective this extraordinary piece of legislation has been; what it's done to change America for the better. The Civil Rights Movement changed the way blacks and whites and eventually other minorities and whites interacted in America. While there have been all sorts of studies, particularly recently of Brown v. Board, even studies of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, there's not been that same sort of systematic study of the Voting Rights Act. We have this wonderful book that Chandler Davidson helped edit, Quiet Revolution in the South, and I would encourage everybody to look to see how effective the voting rights has been and see how -- where it has not been applied, how ineffective, when people are, in fact, still racially-block voting, which I'll get to in a minute, which has not decreased over the years, but, in fact, seems to be going up again; where whites generally vote only for whites most -- most times. And where we've had at-large elections in small communities and towns, how -- where there have not been anything but at-large, how very few minorities are represented in those communities. I think one reason, though, that there hasn't been the sort of study of the Voting Rights Act that we need is because, as opposed to other federal public policy, there's no agency that oversees the Voting Rights Act legislation. The Voting Division of the Justice Department oversees district target under the 1965 Act -- and we hope that they will continue; I certainly think they need to. But, otherwise, the history of the Voting Rights Act has been in various court decisions handed down across the United States since 1965. Several sections of the Voting Rights Act are pertinent to its success. Section 5 of the law outlawed voter qualification tests, specifically literacy, educational achievement, and character tests. This section did not cover the whole nation, but only areas selected by the famed automatic trigger, that is areas of the south, based on past discrimination. Congress was willing to acknowledge the racism of whites only in the states of the Confederacy. Section 2 also applied to target areas of the south; required Justice Department approval as a preclearance for any change in voting procedures.

Congress renewed all the provisions of the Voting Rights Act in 1970, and in 1975 -- amended it in 1975 to include Section 203 provision to protect language minorities such as Asian, Hispanic, and Native American voters. In the renewal of 1982, the Voting Rights Act extended beyond the original targeted areas. Renewal also included the powerful amendment of Section 2. The Act now prohibits electoral policies whose purpose or result diluted minority voting strength. The Voting Rights Act is one of the most successful civil rights statutes ever enacted by the United States Congress. The Act sought to remedy the failure to fulfill the promise the Reconstruction amendments of full and equal citizenships for voters of color. The effects of the Voting Rights Act are dramatic. The Voting Rights Act eradicated, and in some cases overnight, a multitude of discriminatory practices that had the purpose and effect of disenfranchising voters of color. Literacy tests were suspended, as was local legislation, that was on its face race neutral but had a racially-discriminatory impact. At-large elections, full slate laws, numbered place rule, redistricting, gerrymandering. After the passionate testimony of someone who lived through this, the emotion that she had, I think is what we need. It can't replace -- it's a litany of the story that I'm telling as a historian. But I think it's a story that does need to be told. Citizens of color, particularly African-Americans, were able to register and vote; racist demagoguery ceased or at least developed less offense code words. I was just an expert witness a year or so ago in the Texas Congressional redistricting, the second one. And I was amazed to find how overt some racial appeals and close to the demagoguery still existed at least in Texas. Most states have become more careful with the code words and the kind of thing that were done, but it's still there. And, in fact, I brought both court orders that I've been involved in and expert witness reports from Texas to South Carolina where we echoed -- and recently the very things that Dr. Patton was telling about in Alabama. So it's not isolated to one state, but across the south again and again and again. Some of these have been listed in -- by judges in court orders. And we're not talking about before the Voting Rights Act or even 1980, but the 1990s and 2000s where these sorts of things can be documented, from poll watchers, who make it hard for people, to the actual official person working at the booth, to all the sorts of things we talked about, are still there; the reasons we need the Voting Rights Act to be renewed. Enforcing the Voting Rights Act in conjunction would require one person, one vote reapportionment, led to single-member districts that allowed African-Americans in particular the opportunity to elect candidates of their choice in the south, usually African-Americans. The first two African-American representatives elected to the US Congress after redistrict under the Voting Rights Act were Andrew Young from Atlanta and Barbara Jordan from Houston, obviously urban areas. Though the benefits of the Voting Rights Act have (inaudible) primarily to voters of color, the Voting Rights Act has had a salutary effect that cannot be measured in terms of registered voters and elected officials. The Voting Rights Act is contributed from the expansive understanding of representation and meaningful participation in democratic politics and has done so in a manner that transcends race. Moreover, the Voting Rights Act forces more discussion about voting dispute and political participation more generally. And the only example I know of where the have-nots triumphed over the haves, minority plans invoking the voting rights won in the courtroom since 1965, opened the American political system to more people. Forty years and several reauthorizations later, the Act remains one of the nation's premiere vehicles for advancing the cause of racial fairness in the electoral arena. From about 1980, because of the Voting Rights Act, in most instances, new plans for county, city council, school boards, state House, Congressional redistrict, allowed for more minority representation. And I can't help but worry, indeed as an expert witnesses, as I mentioned, for African-Americans, NAACP, in fact, and Latinos, LULAC, in this 2003 Texas Congressional redistricting case, Sessions v. Perry, which is now back on remand to the Supreme Court; I was witness to the ruling by the three-panel court that it was all right to disadvantage minorities as long as it was for political partisan purposes rather than for racial reasons. Now, to me, that's turning the Voting Rights Act on its head. Opposition to the Voting Rights Act is complicated and influx. Some whites who would never deny African-Americans the right to vote are willing to deny single-member districts, which provide an opportunity for African-Americans or minorities to elect candidates of their choice. White politicians will often lament, they are perfectly able to represent minorities in the Legislature; yet they've failed to grasp that a minority would be equally capable of representing them. We were speaking last night: You hear about black-influenced districts, but has anyone ever heard anyone talk about a white-influenced district? The way we think about whiteness and white in America. Instead of understanding how the Voting Rights Act has opened the political system of minorities, many supporters of racial equality today mistakenly blame the Voting Rights Act to the demise of the Democratic Party and the rise of the conservative party, Republican Party, in the south. Because two things are -- happen at the same time does not mean that one causes the other. In 2007, Sections 5 and 203 of the Act are scheduled for expiration or renewal. Some observers now contend that the south and other covered jurisdictions have changed so much in the intervening decade that the remedy is no longer justified. Congress will need to address these questions. Hearings, which many witnesses will testify, will play a critical role in determining whether the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act are extended in their present form, revised so as to provide continuing protection for minority rights are effectively gutted. This hearing is a grand opportunity to point out the historical development of the Voting Rights Act so citizens make informed judgments, which is, after all, an instructive tool. Let me just conclude by saying, at the time when the rest of the world is looking to the United States for how democracy works, when South Africa, and Africa, Libya say, let's do like the United States has done; let's create districts that have been made possible by the Voting Rights Act; to think about not renewing the Voting Rights Act just seems unconscionable to me as a world leader. Try to imagine a world, in fact -- or particularly the United States, where we don't have Section 5. Just about a month ago, I was contacted by the NAACP. Thomasville, North Carolina, which is not covered, one of the districts covered, areas in North Carolina, was forced to go -- and went to a mixed plan, the single-member district, where no African-Americans have been elected before. So they had five districts, two mixed plans, and now they've had a referendum to go back to all at-large, where it's been successful. Black candidates have been elected in the at-large -- two at-large seats, but they're not black candidates of choice by the black community. Which is another thing we have to look at, the complexities of, why do you need the Voting Rights Act?

These were black Republicans who the black community did not support, but whites did. We just finished a case about two years ago in Charleston, South Carolina, example, after example, which I brought with me, the court order. But after this case, which went all the way to the Supreme Court -- the county has gone to districts -- the school board, after African-Americans get elected, they decided to change the method of elections and take away powers from them. All of these are good reasons why we need to have Section 5. Section 5 just does not look at, in fact, the preclearance, but it's supposed to deal with people changing polling places, times of elections, these things that affect the real lives of people. As Dr. Patton said, the lives of who's going to be your coroner; who's going to make those decisions at the local level. We are moving into a multicultural world in the south. I grew up in the town of Ninety Six, South Carolina. I still consider it home. For 31 years, I've taught history at Illinois, but home has always been Ninety Six, South Carolina, to me. When I left Ninety Six, there were only two things people did; they worked in the cotton mill or the farm. And I used to get mad at the university -- I said, I want to come home. My mother would say, what are you going to do? I said, well, I'll farm. She'd say, well, nobody else has made a living at it, and nobody else is able to do it anymore. I said, well, I'll work at the cotton mill. The cotton mills are all closed now. So the largest employer is Fujifilm, Japanese. And we have a Japanese presence now in Ninety Six, South Carolina. The nearest city -- which isn't that large; the county seat is Greenwood -- five years ago more than one-fifth of the city's population was Hispanic. There were no Hispanics there when I left to go off to graduate school at Princeton in 1969. Now a fifth -- more than a fifth by now -- of the city population is Hispanic. This brings a whole new element into the way we deal with racial block voting. I brought evidence from South Carolina that showed racial block voting has continued. It's in a court order, in their latest 2000 redistricting. I have a quote, if we get to it. But what I really wanted to talk about just briefly -- and then I'll end and let's do it with questions. So much of redistricting, people have focused on state redistricting. This is what makes the headlines. This is where people see the Voting Rights Act. What we need to think about are those communities like Ninety Six, South Carolina, that I grew up in, a small town, that when it went with the Voting Rights Act to districts, elected African-Americans so that even then with a 10 percent population, an African-American who had shown how good a citizen and leader that he was could be elected mayor in this town. I think of Edgefield County, South Carolina, where I was involved in court case after court case. What the Voting Right has done is open up the resources of the entire community so that people on the school board, so that people on -- who are commissioners, let alone county council, the whole community is represented. And the communities are better, and it's working. This is what's amazing, that people are thinking about doing away with something that is working. You can point to specific examples of the difference that the Voting Rights Act has made. That's probably a good place for me to stop. I can go on forever. I'm used to doing a 50-minute lecture, and I apologize for that. But I have brought -- thinking I was going to do this in another context -- as I said, a lot of examples from cases that I've been involved in if people want to hear about them, or we can hear about them later, or perhaps the history. I'm going to give the lectures at the University of Washington in May, science lectures. And I chose to do the Voting Rights Act because I believe this is something we need to know about. It will be published as a book, and I hope there will be a book that will -- the public can understand how important this piece of legislation is to democracy, the heart of what America is all about has been and continues to be and needs to continue to be part of what makes American democracy work and be the envy of the rest of the world.

MR. LEE: Well, thank you, Professor Burton, for that insightful testimony. I was wondering if you could address an issue that's come up many times, which is there are now so many minority elected officials in the south. Is the extension of the Voting Rights Act needed? Because we've gone way beyond the two black -- first black House of Representatives.

DR. BURTON: Absolutely it's needed. And why have we gotten those? And those have gone on, as people in Georgia have like (inaudible) be elected only were able to do so after they had shown their ability when they were elected under districts that had been challenged or made to be challenged under the Voting Rights Act. That's why I gave the example of both Charleston and Thomasville, North Carolina. Thomasville can only try to do this because it's not covered by Section 5, I would assume. Now, I don't know. I'm not going to speak for the Justice Department. But certainly I would look very suspicious at a place that under a court challenge had gone to districts, or a mixed plan, and then suddenly has been successful in electing a black representative. Again, about a fifth of the population there in their one district has decided now to go at-large. The other big issue I think is, in fact, candidates of choice, who, in fact, the African-American community is voting for. Certainly in Charleston what we saw was the claim, well, we are electing at-large and African-American, but it was not the candidate of choice of the black community; the black Republican was the choice of the white community. It's not about, in fact, the color of the representative, but is it the candidate of choice? And then again when I said, as you see the real multicultural south -- there have been Native Americans and still are in the south -- but this real movement of Hispanics into the south has really complicated things, and there's an Asian population coming in the cities. And I particularly think it's important for rural areas. To see how Charleston, in the court case we did there where I was an expert, continue again and again to try to stop from going to districts, where African-Americans would have an opportunity to elect candidates of choice, in every possible way was amazing. And then -- I brought some of the documentation -- we aren't talking about before the Voting Rights Act; we're talking about elections 2000. We're talking about elections where all the things that Dr. Patton talked about were happening in different places in the south. In the 2000 election, just as everyone read about Florida, but exactly the same thing happened in Hampton County, South Carolina. In this last election, it cannot be coincidence, it seems to me, that both in Texas at predominantly black school and South Carolina predominantly black school that police are there, and students were discouraged from voting and poll watchers. These things are happening now. If you don't have a Voting Rights Act, who's going to be reporting to these? Particularly, as you said, Alabama is rural. Though almost every place is urbanizing, people live out in the country away, and you need to have this Act, I think. I think it's very important. Why would you not want it when it's been so successful?

MR. LEE: Commissioner Elsie Meeks.

MS. MEEKS: In fact, that was sort of the question that I wanted to ask. You know, when we look at the real important events, at the symbolic importance of the voting in Afghanistan and Iraq, I mean, what could be the negative impact of reauthorizing these provisions?

DR. BURTON: Well, I think it sends a message -- I think it sends a message to the world about our inclusiveness, our belief in everyone's vote having an equal impact -- or an equal opportunity, would be the best way, I think, to say it.

MS. MEEKS: So but what would be the negative impact of reauthorizing?

DR. BURTON: I don't see a negative impact of reauthorization. I see a negative impact of not -

MS. MEEKS: Well, yeah, I agree with that but. . .

DR. BURTON: I mean, it seems to me it could only send a positive message, that we care about inclusiveness in the democratic process; that people should have a voice and an opportunity.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Majette.

MS. MAJETTE: Thank you. And thank you, Dr. Burton, for your testimony. I'd like to follow up on comments that you made, as well as a reference that Dr. Patton made, about the -- this -- the problem of the disappearing ballot box and to find out if you have any information about the allegations that were made in the last Congressional primary regarding Representative Ciro Rodriguez. And there were some allegations that one of the ballot boxes disappeared. And then when those votes were found, they actually put his opponent up, and I believe there was a court proceeding regarding that. But those kinds of instances and the ones that you have made reference to, can you just elaborate a little bit more about how the reauthorization would help?

DR. BURTON: Well, this very past election, the 2004 election, showed an African-American candidate in Texas for county commissioner in Caplan (phonetic) County winning, but they later said the computer made a mistake in one of the races and took a couple of hundred votes away from her, and she lost by a handful of votes. It's another example, I think, of the kinds of things -- this is Texas.

MS. MAJETTE: Yes. As well as Representative Rodriguez is from Texas.

DR. BURTON: Right. So -- and I must say I was amazed when I did the expert witness work for LULAC and the NAACP for the 2000 redistricting. It was an amazing list. I have a little sort of summary here, and it's also -- I think I have already sent -- you know, there were transcripts of hearing the Texas NAACP had in 2001 and 2003 in Houston, Texarkana, and Fort Worth, where they detailed many examples of problems with voting encountered by minority systems. There they had illegal use of mailboxes in Fort Worth, where intimidating articles were included in an African-American newspaper threatening to have people arrested if they illegally voted. They stationed police cars outside of polling places in Fort Worth and off-duty officers after this threat had been made in a newspaper from there; the late change of polling places; dropping individuals from poll lists without cause; not allowing individuals to file challenge ballots. Particularly, I remember something that happened in Fort Bend County. And one of the worst things documented in several places was actually a hate crime in Wharton, where a female campaign staff treasurer for a black candidate for sheriff had her home burned down. And her husband, a former county commissioner, were actually inside and got only because the dog was barking. And she had just received threatening calls saying what would happen to her if she did not get -- and we won't use the N word -- sign out of her yard. So, I mean, this is the kind of things that -- you know, sort of, when I went to do the Texas Congressional redistricting, the totality of the circumstances; I certainly had not expected to find that. These same sorts of things -- this is actually from a judge's order in the Charleston case, where I was one of the expert witnesses in Charleston, South Carolina. And I brought this for the Commission to have. Starting on Page 31, it goes through a list of things. There's a lot more. There's a lot more in the trial testimony and other things, and my expert witness reports and others. But these are the ones that were indisputable; that a judge just took down. But -- people making it hard for African-Americans to vote. Officials. Not the poll watchers, but officials. I also, just this last election, was the expert witness on the Ohio and the Florida poll challenges, things there. And -- which is similar, that is, the political challenges that come. But this document, officials appointed by the State to, in fact, or the County, to collect the ballots and things are making it very hard and -- again and again appointed in the 2000 elections. Many going on to be head of the election commission, or some -- so I have this to enter into the testimony for you. Because I said, this is -- a judge has accepted these, and I can give you lots of other examples. Still, cards being mailed out warning people of -- you know, if you come and you change your address or things, you could be liable for a crime and arrested. And as I said, when you put this in the context of what Dr. Patton said about 40 years is not so long ago, when people -- not just an idle threat. That may not mean much to most of us who grew up -- particularly when you're white voting. But what does that mean to people who were threatened 40 years ago, when people in most communities when I used to do these -- I don't know if there's a county I haven't done in South Carolina probably -- but I would go out and talk to them; they could tell stories of people, what had happened to someone. And these were truly heroes. It's not just the heroes who marched across that bridge down here; though they're truly some of my great heroes. But these were heroes who tried to register to vote before the Voting Rights Act. We don't know how many are -- you know, literally were killed because of that. But people were. So I think historically -- I want to reemphasize, 40 years is not such a long time ago when you place these -- what might seem like, well, a mild threat, if you put it in the context of what had happened -- and you remember, Reverend Buchanan, exactly what I'm talking about, the kind of memories, the collective memories that people have. That's why I think the Voting Rights Act is so crucial, and why I think particularly you need to have Section 5 for preclearance for all these changes. And if you think about -- and this is just on the south. We could talk a lot about California. But when you think about this new Hispanic population and Asian population, particularly the Hispanic population, coming into the south, then the language amendment -- if we believe in democracy, as I do, and why I love this country, is when we try to live up to those ideals. And that's what the Voting Rights Act has -- at least made us try to do better. And it just seems unconscionable to me to not renew. I think to take away Section 5 and the preclearance is like having the fox guard the hen house, is the best analogy I've heard. You're saying to people, you know, you have open reigns, so you'll have a lot more cases like Thomasville, which says, we're past this now, and we don't need districts. But what we find is with racial block voting -- let me just -- let me just -- this comes from the judge's decree in South Carolina. And this is not the Charleston case; this is the redistricting. (As read:) In this case the parties were presented substantial evidence that this disturbing fact has seen little change in the last decade. Voting in South Carolina continues to be racially polarized to a very high degree. In all regions of the state and in both primary elections and general elections, statewide black citizens generally are a highly politically cohesive group than whites engaged in significant white block voting. Indeed this fact is not seriously in dispute.

If we didn't have block voting, we wouldn't need, I guess, the Voting Rights Act for that part of it. But history is showing us currently that we do have racial block voting. And it continues. And it's strong. There was a period as a historian -- we never really talk -- but I think about the '70s and early 80s, particularly with the Democratic Party; it was almost a slating process, a good time in a way, that said, we need to have more minority representatives. And I think there was an attempt to be more inclusive. The amazing thing that's happened lately, I think, is throughout the south, that sort of attempt is even going away. So in some ways, I think we're going back to a worse situation in terms of people reaching out to be inclusive. Part of it is, again, we focus so much on Congressional and state redistricting and not the small communities where it's made the difference for people to become part of the community, real citizens, and part of the political process.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Professor Burton. What was the year of that district court decision that you were reading from?

DR. BURTON: It is March 6, 2003. I brought a copy for you.

MR. LEE: Thank you. You know, I'd just like to say generally that you have provided many documents to the Commission, and we look forward to receiving them and keep the record open, you know, to receive more, because you've been a gold mine of information. DR. BURTON: Thank you for this opportunity.

MR. LEE: Reverend, would you like to ask a question?

MR. BUCHANAN: Just one thing. You and Dr. Patton have both given highly informative and eloquent testimony of why we need Section 5 and the Voting Rights Act in 2005 now. But I still am troubled about the whole state of Florida, the state of Ohio, the places where we had massive irregularities that may have had a big influence on the outcome of the election in 2004, and in Florida's case 2000 -- 2000 and 2004; maybe the whole ball game. If you have anysuggestions about what we can do about that, either now or for the record, I'd appreciate it.

DR. BURTON: Well, I'm a historian. My family would be a lot happier and have a lot more money if I were a prophet about what to do. So I'm not very good at looking forward. But what I find very interesting as a historian, you know, most of these techniques of disfranchisement, of discouragement, the south actually borrowed from the north -- mainly they didn't need them before because blacks didn't vote, and it was a -- very much a class society. But I think what's happened is many areas in the north have learned how effective some of these disfranchising and diluting of particular votes have been, and they are being used very successfully in other places. This moving of polls and closing and giving out a ballot -- this happened in Missouri. You know, it -- it just seems to me, how can this happen in an election in America in a democracy that you know how many people are there, are registered to vote, and you don't have enough time to get them voted? You don't have enough ballots or -- mentioned ballots being lost and things? All of this is evidence to me why we need to have the Voting Rights -- these things are happening when we have a Voting Rights Act. This is when people say it's not needed. What would happen -- that's why I keep going back to things I do see happening, where they aren't -- what would happen if we didn't have something to cover these irregularities? It's very hard now. In this Charleston County court case that I was just quoting from, it was extraordinary extensive -- when you think -- one of the things -- that the burden falls on these plaintiffs. In almost all of these cases, these small communities, the plaintiffs have had to come up with some way to do this, that is, the minority community, where usually there isn't the resources, where the government was being sued has to do it. And unless the Justice Department or the ACLU or -- the NAACP does not have that much money. But when they can put some money behind it, as it -- become almost a chance for success for these communities. What has been amazing is how well they have done and how much they have won, given, as I've said, they are the have-nots. That's very unusual in American history, and it's because of the Voting Rights Act and renewing the Voting Rights Act.

MR. LEE: That's a good way to end. Thank you, Professor. At this time, we'll take a short break to set up for the next panel. (Brief recess taken.)

MR. LEE: Okay. We're ready now to begin our second panel. And we'll begin with the Honorable Frank Jackson. Frank Jackson was elected mayor of Prairie View, Texas, in 2004, after serving on the city council for 12 years and as county commissioner of Waller County for eight years. Mayor Jackson has worked in higher education administration at Prairie View A&M and is himself a graduate. I'm very interested to hear, Mayor Jackson, about the situation in Prairie View.

MR. JACKSON: Well, first of all, giving all praises and honor to God, I am extremely honored and deeply humbled to have been invited to come and address this distinguished panel, this commission. I bring you greetings from the beautiful city of Prairie View, Texas, home of Prairie View A&M University. And there's 4,410 residents, 3,200 of which are students at Prairie View. We are located in the Brazos River Valley. The Brazos River stretches from the northwest out of the foothills of the Rocky Mountains and flows into the Gulf of Mexico. There are Native Americans in the -- that first inhabited that valley; called it the Arms of God, so I bring you greetings from the Arms of God. It was also the place where the first Anglo settlement was located, about 25 miles to the southwest of where Prairie View is currently located. It was the headquarters of Stephen F. Austin, who was the father of Texas. He had the dubious distinction of also being the father of slavery in Texas. Stephen F. Austin lobbied the Mexican Government and told them that he needed the negro slave in order to wrestle the bounty from the earth to make Texas a productive enterprise. He said, without the negro, Texas would fail. So he sent out a message to the original settlers, the Old 300, as they were called, and he told them -- said, for each negro slave that you bring into Texas, he would give them an additional 80 acres of land. A gentleman out of Alabama named Jared Ellison Groce brought 110 slaves into that Brazos River Valley. All total, Groce received over 44,000 acres of land just for showing up in to Texas. Jared Ellison Groce was the first one to arm the militia of African troops to help exterminate the Karankawa Indians, the people of that valley. Jared Ellison Groce was the first true planter in Texas. In my opinion, he was the one that really formed the Revolution. He was the one that brought Sam Houston into Texas. Waller County is -- where Prairie View is located is named after Jared Ellison Groce's nephew, Edwin Waller. Prairie View A&M University resides on the old Alta Vista Plantation, which was one of five owned by Jared Ellison Groce's great nephew, name Jared Ellison Kirby. Prairie View is two and a half miles from the Leindo Plantation, which is still there. It belonged to Jared Ellison Groce's son, Leonard Waller Groce. So the Groce family help power swaying that valley. It's interesting to note that the first signers of the Declaration of Independence of Texas was Edwin Waller. Edwin Waller was also chosen by the President of the Republic of Texas, Mirabeau Lamar, to find a location for the new capital of Texas, because the old capital, which is 25 miles to the northwest of where Prairie View sits now, was called Old Washington on the Brazos. He located the current city of Austin. That site was his choice, and he became the first mayor of Austin.

The other thing Edwin Waller did, he was the first one to sign the Articles of Succession from the Union. So the Confederacy in Texas was born in that Brazos River Valley, was born right there in the Arms of God. And I have to give you that background so you understand our current situation. There in the Brazos River Valley, we have Confederate prisoner of war camps for Union prisoners, within two and a half miles from where Prairie View sits now. It was also the training camp for the calvary and for the infantry for the south. Camp Abare (phonetic) and Camp Groce were also located there. When the Civil War ended, the last three-star Confederate general still in the field of battle, still fighting, was a general by the name of Edmond Kirby Smith. He was kin to the Kirbys that were kin to the Groces that was there. And his headquarters was at his cousin's plantation called Alta Vista, which is now Prairie View. That's where he kept his wife and his children. And when you go to Waller County and go to the Waller County courthouse, on the north lawn, there's a marker that says Confederate States of America. And when the war ended, that's where they read the orders dismissing the Confederate troops. And when they left there, they left there kind of angry. And something interesting happened. Dr. George -

MR. LEE: Mayor Jackson, I wonder -- I think we understand now the context of the Arms of God. I wonder if you could bring us forward.

MR. JACKSON: Bring you forward. When the -

MR. LEE: Quite interesting, the Prairie View situation.

MR. JACKSON: Well, in 1972 the students at Prairie View tried to register to vote and the then democratic elections administrator denied them that right. That battle was fought out and was eventually decided in the '78 court decision that allowed them the right to vote. Again, in 1992 we had 19 people indicted by the district -- assistant district attorney at that time McKeg (phonetic) in order to say that they were voting illegally. One of the interesting things about that '92 case is where they said a lot of students had registered twice; a lot of students had voted in other elections. Like in Beaumont, where we had a young man named Moore, I think it was Carl Moore Jr. His father was senior. He had voted in Beaumont, but nobody bothered to go and check the records to make sure that it was senior that had voted rather than junior. Also the students marched on the Waller County courthouse in '92 and fought that -- those indictments, and eventually, they won out. But the old guard didn't go away. Again, they came back in 2004. And the district attorney then, Oliver Kitzman, wrote a letter to the local press and was really challenging the students as being legal residents of the county. Again, the students mobilized and marched -- about 7,000 people marched well over seven miles from the campus of Prairie View to the Waller County courthouse. And, again, when they walked in that valley, they really sent a message that they would not be intimidated. Again, those students turned out and registered to vote. But they were also fighting for a place to vote on campus, being one of the largest voting blocks. They were denied access to vote there on that campus. They still had to go to a place on the far perimeter of the campus, the community center, in order to vote. So I guess a long story short is that we're dealing with a cultural situation in Waller County. We know public policy can change, but cultures are slow to change. And even if you just glance at Prairie View's history, you know that that's where the experiment really took place. And how do you now transition a people from being slaves, into the -- what was dictated by the new industrial economy; how do you move them from slaves to being wage earners? And it was worked out that -- and one of the things that came up earlier is that -- when African-Americans left office in Texas during the Reconstruction Era around 1899, from 1899 to 1966, when Barbara Jordan was elected, the highest ranking state official in Texas was the principal, slash, president of Prairie View. And I'm going to close with this last remark, is that during the times when they established those land grant institutions throughout the south in order to use education as their technique for social control, Texas A&M University was established in that Brazos River Valley for white males. It remained for white males from 1876 up until 1963. Prairie View was established for black males, and eventually it admitted women in 1879, became the first state-supported institution to admit a female. And during that time, they looked for a president of both of those universities, because Prairie View -- the president at A&M was always the president of Prairie View. They offered the presidency to Jefferson Davis, who respectfully declined. But he said, I've got a man out of Mississippi I know well named Thomas Garthright (phonetic). So he sent Thomas Garthright. And he said, well, you need a black man for -- for Prairie View, so he brought L. W. Minor. So you can see the Confederacy kind of retrenched to Texas. And so we're dealing with something that's deeply entrenched. So that section of the Voting Rights Act that affords us some protection is severely needed, because the culture has not just moved. And the new phenomenon now is the Hispanic in migration into territories that they once owned. And so there's a gap between the education levels of those that are now the majority and those that are going to soon be the majority. But that gap is more -- when you're talking about closing it and making sure that the new people can handle the economy of Texas, I think the culture has given a backlash to that, because they feel threatened. They see that they will be mutated into something else with this new majority. So you've still got some safeguards that need to be in place.

MR. BUCHANAN: Thank you. Beautiful testimony.

MR. LEE: Mr. Davidson.

DR. DAVIDSON: I have three questions for you. The first one is, what percentage of Waller County is African-American? MR. JACKSON: Well, based on the current census, we're probably roughly about 26 percent, somewhere like that.

DR. DAVIDSON: So a significant percentage there -

MR. JACKSON: Yes.

DR. DAVIDSON: -- that can certainly change election outcomes. The second question is -- first of all, I guess, I have a good friend and former student named Dalzinia Sams (phonetic), an African-American woman whose dad was named Arista Sams (phonetic), who played a very important role in -

MR. JACKSON: Yes.

DR. DAVIDSON: -- securing the vote for African-American students there at Prairie View in 1972. Did you have the privilege of knowing Mr. -

MR. JACKSON: I served with Mayor Sams on the city council for many years, so I know him well, and I know his daughters and his wife, Ms. Ann Sams.

DR. DAVIDSON: Third question, do you feel that the Voting Rights Act had an impact on getting the situation taken care of, the most recent situation that you were describing to us, whereby African-American students again were at first prevented from voting?

MR. JACKSON: It provides us with some necessary safeguards, because if it was not for that looking-over-the-shoulder, somebody watching the process, then we would have been at the mercy of the powers that still advocate states rights. Even though they're now Republicans, they still are tied into the old ideology of the south. It's very well entrenched.

DR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mayor Jackson. At this point, I'd like to acknowledge the presence of the individuals who have been marching this week from Selma to Montgomery for the 40th anniversary. And a banner has just gone up with SCLC's name on it and the 40th anniversary march, so we welcome you marchers. MR. LEE: Our next witness is Dr. Richard Engstrom. Dr. Engstrom is a Research Professor of Political Science and is now Professor of Africana Studies at the University of New Orleans. Doctor Engstrom has published extensively on election systems and minority rights and has been testifying as an expert in voting rights cases since the 1970s. And so we welcome you, Professor Engstrom.

DR. ENGSTROM: Thank you.

MR. LEE: And I understand you're going to focus on polarized voting.

DR. ENGSTROM: Yes. Again it is for me as well a privilege to be invited to talk with you today. And I am going to deal with racially-polarized voting, because it's a central concept when we deal with Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, which will be up for renewal, as well as Section 2. Both those provisions contain protections against what we call racial vote dilution or minority vote dilution. When we talk about dilution, we're referring to what we often refer to as a second generation type of discrimination. The first generation was disfranchisement. But once people get the right to vote, we face additional impediments and hurdles in their ability to convert that vote into the election of representatives of their choice. Actually, this has been borrowed from educational re -- research on educational discrimination, where the first generation was simply segregation and not even being allowed in the schoolhouse door; then the next was, you're in the school, but now you're tracked into particular areas; disciplinary policies are different. We have the same thing with voting rights. First generation was disfranchisement; second generation then we discovered dilution, which is a systematic impediment in terms of the ability to convert voting strength into the election of representatives of choice.

MR. LEE: Dr. Engstrom, we have a situation where we don't have enough microphones, so if you could speak up as much as you can -

DR. ENGSTROM: Okay.

MR. LEE: I think the audience will appreciate it.

DR. ENGSTROM: All right. And so central to these protections, of course, is, as Vernon Burton was saying earlier today, racially-polarized voting. Now, if voting isn't racially-polarized, we no longer need these protections, as Vernon said. If we don't have divisions along racial lines in our candidate preferences, then we don't need to be concerned about election systems that dilute the voting strength of minority groups in those arrangements. But unfortunately, it still is racially polarized, and when voting is racially polarized, then how we structure elections can have a very critical impact on the ability to convert that voting strength into people you want to represent you in government. Vernon mentioned some of the things, but just quickly, whether we have elections at-large or by multimember districts or by single-member districts can matter greatly. Whether when we look at those districts we have one district (inaudible) versus another, and which one gets chosen can affect the opportunity to elect candidates of choice greatly. Today I want to tell you race remains the central demographic division in American policies. Don't trust me; read the literature. Read the recent books on southern politics. Race is still the major demographic division in southern politics and, indeed, politics across the country. And racially-polarized voting persists. I know this because I study it. Since the nineteen -- since, excuse me, the 2000 census, I have worked in seven different states in which I've conducted studies of racially-polarized voting, or at least what it takes to elect minority choice representatives. I have today for you an illustration of the tables from one of the cases I worked, which was the Section 5 preclearance case involving the State of Louisiana and its initial plan that it attempted to implement the first time in terms of state representative districts. I -- there are copies I know. Whether you have them or they've been distributed or not, I'm not aware. But, anyway, this was part of my report in the case of Louisiana versus The United States, and this was, again, the new plan after the nineteen -- 2000 census. There are four tables. Well, the report concerns four areas of the state in which particular districting arrangements were at issue. All right. They covered different parts of the state. We're not talking about only one part of Louisiana, but different geographical areas. There are four tables. Table 1 concerns racially-polarized voting in the state House elections at issue or at least three of the districts at issue. Table 2 concerns racially-polarized voting in, quote, exogamous, unquote, elections. I apologize for that, but that's the jargon. Basically, all that means is, in elections to other offices than the office at issue in the litigation. In other words, elections not involving the state House of Representative, but lots of other offices. And we'll get to that in a minute. Table 3 and 4 do the same thing for an additional district. I apologize. I no longer remember why one district came in a little later. But it's essentially the same as Tables 1 and 2 but for a district -- different districts. All right. Those elections studied in that handout, or in those tables, are over the lifetime of the previous redistricting plan, all right, from the plan adopted at the 1990 census, up to when Louisiana was adopting a new plan based on the 2000 census. They cover elections from 1991 to 2002. We're not talking history here. All right. These elections come up through the latest round, 1999, when the Legislature was elected again, and some other elections incurring -- occurring in 2001, 2002. Now, note in the tables there are three different estimates of racial divisions in candidate preferences for each election. Now, my colleagues ask me what I do when I go into court. And I say, I document racially-polarized voting. And my colleagues say, well, doesn't everybody already know that voting is racially polarized in this country? And I say, well, in court, you have to prove it, and you have to prove it over and over and over again. And then you even have to defend it because of statistical arguments about the estimation procedures and things. I'm not going to get into that. But what I'm going to say is the reason there are three estimates for every election in this report is because we look at it every which way we can. All right. We do two procedures approved by the Supreme Court in Thornburg vs. Gingles; we do another procedure that is developed and developed specifically for this purpose since Thornburg versus Gingles, and, indeed, were available -- or where they can be done, we will even use exit poles as additional evidence of the candidate divisions. The estimation procedures typically reenforce each other. You can look through those tables, and you can see occasionally there may be some differences that have meaning, but, basically, in almost all, they're going to be pretty close to each other, and certainly have no difference in terms of who's the candidate of choice of African-American voters and non-African-American voters. In that table for Louisiana, there are 90 separate election analyses. And that means roughly 270 estimates. Almost every election analysis in those tables show racially-polarized voting in that election. Almost every one.

There are a few exceptions, usually when African-Americans themselves may not be supportive of the African-American candidate. But generally that's not the case. Rarely is that the case. And normally, then, other voters don't share that preference. Now, does it matter where the Louisiana -- we're looking at, as I've said. It doesn't matter really what office we're looking at either when we look at these elections. As I said, the -- the elections at issue, the office at issue were seats in the state House of Representatives. But you'll see through the tables that it doesn't matter; you'll find racially-polarized voting when it comes to votes for governor; you'll find racially-polarized voting -- excuse me -- when it comes to votes for mayor; you'll find it when it comes to votes for public -- state public service commissioners; when it comes to votes for state Senator; when it comes to votes for people running for the state board of elementary and secondary education; when it comes to people voting for district attorney; constable; recorder of mortgages; register of conveyances; and numerous judicial offices. There are elections in there for the state court of appeals, district court, civil court, criminal court, juvenile court, and traffic court. It doesn't matter what office is at issue; it doesn't matter whether it's high profile or low profile; it doesn't matter whether it's top of the ballot or down on the ballot. Time, place, and office do not matter. What we find consistently in almost every instance is that voting in those elections in Louisiana show -- reflect racially-polarized preferences on the part of the voters. Now, there's nothing unique about Louisiana. There's nothing unique about the set of tables I've given you. There's nothing especially more dramatic about this evidence than what one finds in other states. As I mentioned, I've worked in six other states since the 2000 census. I've worked for plaintiffs and defendants; I've worked for civil rights organizations; I've worked for states; I've worked for the US Department of Justice. My testimony doesn't vary depending on who I work for in the sense of what I find is what I'm going to talk about and what I'm going to testify to. I want to just quickly point out some other states. One state I did not work in, in which we've already had testimony about, is South Carolina. Vernon Burton this morning read from you -- read from a court decision talking about racially-polarizing voting in South Carolina. Let me add Georgia. I was the Department of Justice's expert witness to do the voting analysis portion in the case Georgia versus Ashcroft. A lot of people here will -- will know what that case is. Now, the deal -- the Department of Justice lost that case on the ultimate question of preclearance. But they did not lose on the question of whether there's racially-polarized voting in Georgia. The trial court held that they found -- there's a holding of finding of fact -- that voting is racially polarized in those areas that were at issue, and that's -- that determination, that finding, was not overturned on appeal. It was in no way disturbed by the Supreme Court when they overruled the trial court that had agreed with the Department of Justice. I've worked in the state of Florida; I've worked in the state of Alabama; I just finished a deposition in the state of North Carolina. And I can tell you that I was the state of North Carolina's expert when it came to racially-polarized voting in the Shaw case, the Shaw versus Reno litigation. And racially-polarized voting was found in North Carolina at that time. Given my more recent experience, which concerns the southeastern portion of the state, racially-polarized voting is still -- it persists in North Carolina. I also have done work in Texas involving Hispanics as the group at issue. And not in the south, but I've done work showing polarized voting when it comes to Native American preferences and other people's preferences. So -- and I want to say I also did some work in Mississippi. I didn't do racially-polarized voting there, but during the process of adopting their plan, I did serve as a consultant to the state and documented the need for majority African-American districts in order to elect African-Americans to the Legislature in the state of Mississippi. And I'm happy to say that it was the first time since the Voting Rights Act was adopted that Mississippi gained preclearance for the first plan it adopted for the new legislative lines, again, in the history. So I want to say racially-polarized voting is a persistent thing in the American south. I wish I could say it was a thing of the past, but it isn't. And, therefore, Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, unfortunately, needs to be extended. As long as we have racially-polarized voting, we need the protections that Section 5 provides and also the protections that Section 2 provide. The Voting Rights Act continues to be needed because the basic problem when it comes to dilution, racially-polarized voting persists throughout the south.

MR. LEE: My colleagues on the Commission admonished me that we're going to change the ground rules a bit. We're going to listen to all the testimony first and then come up with some questions. But at this point, I'd like to acknowledge Charles Steele, Jr., President and CEO of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Mr. Steele. Mr. Steele, we're going to provide some time for you to say a few words later, but do you want to just say something now briefly?

MR. STEELE: Well, you can tell that I'm a former elected official. I saw a microphone; I began to walk. I served in the Alabama State Legislature for the first black since Reconstruction for ten years. And I resigned in the latter part of August to take on full-time representation for SCLC and currently president and CEO. Also was one of the first black city council persons elected in the City of Tuscaloosa. I would just like to greet you; say I'm happy to be here. We've been marching since actually Sunday from Selma to Montgomery. And at some given point, I'd just like to give you the root causes why we have discriminatory practices within the system that we're currently experiencing in terms of voting rights, and hopefully to implement for the future things that we can do for SCLC in working with you to eradicate those concerns. I just left Israel, and going throughout the world, the same type of concerns, to eradicate racism from our system. That's the root cause. I'll pause at this point.

MR. LEE: Thank you very much. We're going to provide time right after lunch for --

MR. STEELE: Well, in case I don't come back, let me just say this, because I do have some other things. Let me say this to you.

MR. LEE: Oh, sure. Of course.

MR. STEELE: Let's deal with the real issue. And the real issue is racism. Let's not skate and skirt around this thing. I'm tired of playing ticktacktoe with an issue that is serious. There's racism in this country. A hundred years ago, the issue with black folks was racism; 50 years, the issue was racism; 2005, the issue is racism, and that's what we have. You can't expect a system that enslaves you to save you. Thank you very much.

MR. LEE: We turn now from the very compelling and striking testimony of Dr. Engstrom about the persistence of race-polarized voting to testimony of Victor Landa. He's going to focus on the Section 203. Victor Landa is the Central Region Director of the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project, which in 2004 registered 100,000 new Latino voters to 16 states. Mr. Landa has worked in Spanish and English media, print and broadcast media, for 22 years. Welcome, Mr. Landa.

MR. LANDA: Thank you very much. Distinguished members of the Commission, ladies and gentlemen, good morning. Buenos dias. My name is Victor Landa. I'm the central region director of the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project. In this capacity, I'm responsible for our operations in Texas, Colorado, and New Mexico. On behalf of the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project, I want to thank the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law for putting together this series of timely and much-needed forums and for inviting my organization to participate in this hearing.

The Southwest Voter Registration Education Project is a national nonprofit nonpartisan organization committed solely to the political empowerment of Latino communities through voter registration, voter education, as well as voter participation. Southwest Voter was established in 1974 by the late Willie Velasquez to encourage civic and political participation in Latino and other underrepresented communities. And since its inception, Southwest Voter has registered over 2. 2 million Latino voters throughout the southwest and Florida. I'd like to speak to you this morning directly with regards to Section 203 and Sections 6 through 9 of the Voting Rights Act and how these come to bear on the voting experience of Latinos in Texas. The purpose of Section 203, as you well know, is to provide non-English-speaking citizens with the same information and opportunities to participate in the electoral process as the general electorate. In our work, specifically in the 2004 election cycle in Texas, Southwest Voter Registration Education Project found that election materials in Spanish, from registration cards to ballots, were essential. In the months leading up to the general election in November of 2004, Southwest Voter registered close to 20,000 new Latino voters across Texas, many of whom are not fluent in English. This was a record breaking year for us in or 30 year history, and it's a fact, that we could not have enjoyed this level of success were itnot for bilingual registration cards. We find that older citizens and new immigrants feel more at ease, more secure, when the process is in a language that they have mastered. I've found that citizens who prefer Spanish registration cards do so because they feel more connected to the process. They also feel they trust the process more when they fully understand it. Many older citizens, new citizens, and first-time voters whose primary language is Spanish would not have registered to vote if not for the access to registration cards in Spanish. Without materials in Spanish, those citizens whose eagerness and ambition to participate in the electoral process would compel them to register even using a form with registration instructions they did not understand, would run the risk of making errors on the registration card that could prevent them from voting if those errors made them wrongly appear ineligible.

Without materials in Spanish, many citizens not fluent in English would find the process too difficult to navigate and would not vote or would not necessarily vote in the way that they had intended. As an anecdote, I offer the case of an 86-year-old woman who answered her door and told one of our volunteers that she believed that she was too old to vote. She was assured in Spanish that there was no age limit to voting -- the voting process, and she happily registered. This woman spoke limited English and would not have been able to understand our volunteer's explanation if it were not in Spanish. Then there's the case of a 46-year-old construction worker who I approached after Sunday mass, where he and his family were celebrating the baptism of a newborn nephew. When he saw that there were Spanish registration cards available, he went back into the church to bring out 12 members of his extended family, all citizens, who stood in line to register, and told us that if it were not for the Spanish registration cards, they would not have registered, and, of course, they would not have voted. Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act should be reauthorized to protect the voting rights of Spanish-speaking and Spanish/English bilingual voters. Bilingual materials are not a mere preference; they are not just a convenience; they are a necessity because they insure the franchise.

Now, a concern to us as well is the preservation of Sections 6 through 9 of the Voting Rights Act. These sections authorize the federal government to send federal election examiners and observers to specific jurisdictions and polling places where they are deemed necessary. They also allow for federal registration in jurisdictions that discriminate in registration and at the polls. It was our experience in the 2004 election cycle in Texas that there exists what can only be described as strategic efforts to exclude certain citizens from voter registration. In one county in south Texas, some of our Spanish-speaking volunteers were denied the eligibility to be deputized as registrars. Now, in Texas only a deputized registrar can register voters in the field. Some officials who are empowered by law to deputize registrars deliberately set obstacles to deputization for people who may have belonged to an opposing political party. One of our volunteers was stripped of his deputized registrar privileges because he turned in a registration card with a numerical transposition. His team of volunteers was also denied deputization privileges on similar flimsy technical merits. On one occasion, a volunteer was told by an authorized person in the elections office to change a date on the registration card. And as soon as that date was changed, her deputized registrar privileges were taken from her. Sadly, I can elaborate not further, because the volunteers in question fear retribution and have asked that names and locations not be mentioned. It's noteworthy to say that all of our volunteers who were denied or were stripped of their deputization privileges were fully eligible to be sworn in as deputy registrars.

Texas officials have been arbitrary and discriminatory in their refusal to deputize our Spanish-speaking volunteers. In addition, in San Antonio, Texas, our field volunteers were denied access as registrars to naturalization ceremonies. Part of our strategy across the country is to go to naturalization ceremonies, where newly-sworn citizens are eager to register to vote, in order to become full-fledged participants in the political process of their adopted country. In October of 2004, when our volunteers approached the immigration official in charge of the ceremony in San Antonio, they were told that the local registrar was coordinating the voter registration effort. The office of the county elections administrator then told us that official county personnel were covering the voter registration tasks and that there was no need for our help. But when time came for the ceremony, there was, in fact, no one registering new citizens at the time of their naturalization. We know this because our volunteers did, in fact, attend the ceremony, but as private citizens, not as voter registrars. And they were witnesses to the lack of voter registration at the ceremony. Our efforts to file an official complaint with the United States Citizenship Immigration Service, with the county elections administrator, and with the persons in charge of the ceremony venue, as well as our request to the same agencies and persons in San Antonio to be present at subsequent naturalization ceremony -- ceremonies bore no fruit. The effort to exclude certain voters in Texas from participating in the electoral process has reached the State Legislature.

Representatives Betty Brown and Jim Jackson have introduced in committee House Bill 516, relating to requiring proof of citizenship at the time a person registers to vote. The bill states that a person would have to provide a copy of proof of citizenship in order to register to vote; a driver's license or a Social Security card would not work. To be permitted to register to vote, a new voter would have to provide a birth certificate, a passport, or naturalization documents. The most common forms of identification that you and I carry would not be enough to register to vote. This bill carries the stated intent of fighting voter fraud, but what it actually does is set greater obstacles for the registration of new voters, and a substantial portion of new voters in Texas are Latin voters.

The way the law presently reads, a person who wants to register to vote must provide proof of identification and can provide that information when he goes to cast a ballot in the first federal election after he registers. Now, this new law, if enacted, would place the stricter transaction of proof of citizenship at th moment of registration. This change, while making it more inconvenient for all Texans to register to vote, would adversely and disproportionately affect new Latino voters in Texas because most new Latinos in Texas are registered in on-site registration drives, in places where they shop; where they gather; worship; and celebrate; places where people don't carry birth certificates or passports or naturalization papers. This law would be another in a series of obstacle for Latinos who have a historically tenuous relationship with voter registration, going back just one or two generations, to a time, for example, when eligible voters were required to pay a poll tax.

Ladies and gentlemen, Sections 203, as well as Sections 6 through 9 of the Voting Rights Act, must be reauthorized to prevent exactly the harms they were originally drafted to redress, because these harms persist, and in their persistence, they erode Latinos' rights and privileges as citizens of this country. Our experience is a reminder that federal protection of voter registration continues to be necessary because there continues to be a population against whose voting rights registration restricting strategies continue to be used. Latino voting rights in Texas are not protected by simply observing the polls on election days to be sure that registered voters are allowed to vote. We need the legal provisions in the Voting Rights Act that ensure that those who work to register Latino voters in Texas have the chance and the necessary Spanish language materials to do so and that all eligible Latinos voting age have a meaningful opportunity to register so that they can vote. The acts of obstruction I have described speak as well to the need to reauthorize Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. The requirement to preclear changes in voting practices or procedures based on evidence, that the proposed change does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, membership in a language minority group. It's a weapon we must not lose. Section 5 is, in effect, our first line of defense against preferences of the kind that I have outlined this afternoon, which limit, obstruct, and also deny the right of suffrage to language minorities in the state of Texas. Again, I thank you for the opportunity to appear and speak before you, and I thank you for your attention. Muchas gracias.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Landa. Now we're going to hear from Raoul Cunningham, who is the President of the Louisville, Kentucky, branch of the NAACP. Mr. Cunningham has also served as a National Deputy Director of the NAACP Voter Empowering Program, as well as Region 3 Coordinator and the Kentucky State Coordinator of the NAACP. Welcome, Mr. Cunningham.

MR. CUNNINGHAM: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Let me express my appreciation to the Commission and to the Lawyers' Committee for inviting me to participate with you. In my letter of invitation, they asked me to discuss discrimination faced by the voters of Kentucky since 1982. If I may, there are three specific cases or instances that I would like to discuss with you. First, in the 2000 general elections, the voters of Louisville and Jefferson County passed a referendum merging the City of Louisville and the unincorporated areas of the county. This act passed by vote of 158,000 to a 134,000. Interesting aspect of this merger is that the 92 small cities in the county were not included. African-Americans voted 83 percent against the referendum. At the time of the vote, African-Americans were 33 percent of the city and 18. 9 percent of the county, and composed 33 percent of the Board of Alderman, and 25 percent of the physical court, which is our legislative body in Kentucky. Prior to this, the general assembly had passed enabling legislation which passed the referendum on the ballot and stated that the University of Louisville Geography Professor, Dr. Bill Dakan, would draw the 26 districts for the new government. The enabling legislation also stated that Jefferson Physical Court had to approve the districts drawn by Dakan without alterations or amendments. A one-man show.

During the campaign, the proponents and Dakan of merger had promised that there would be -- six of the 26 districts would be majority black districts. However, the plan as drawn by Dakan diluted minority voting strength because it failed to create the effective voting age minorities -- majorities -- I'm sorry -- in Districts 2 and District 3. Several alternative plans submitted to Dakan by the NAACP clearly demonstrated that it was possible to create majorities of voting age African-Americans sufficient to provide the citizens of those districts with a reasonable opportunity to elect their candidates of choice, as required by the Voting Rights Act. Today the plan drawn by Dakan is in place.

Second scenario -- oh, in the area of redistricting, two months before the 2002 session of the general assembly convened, the NAACP unveiled a redistricting plan that showed how the Legislature could draw three majority black districts in Louisville instead of two and create an influenced district in Jefferson County as well as Christian County in the west. On the second day of the session, January the 10th, the proposals were -- were submitted to the leaderships of both houses. We also testified before both committees. The House passed this version of redistricting, which was House Bill 1, without including the recommendations of the NAACP. During the debate on the Free Conference Committee Report to House Bill 1, the speaker pro tem assured the House that a third African-American district in Jefferson County had been created. The House and the Senate, within an hour after that declaration, passed the bill, and the governor affixed his signature that same afternoon. The problem with that is that there was no third African-American district in Jefferson County, and the other two districts had been greatly diluted. Prior to 2002, the 42nd district had 71. 2 percent black voting age population, and the 43rd district had 61. 8 black -- black voting age population. Under the House Bill 1 that we -- that now is in effect, the 41st, which was to have been the new majority black district, has 47. 6 black voting age population. The 42nd has 52. 6 black voting age population, and the 43rd has 54. 1 black voting age population.

The third -- the third circumstance is that on October the 3rd -- I'm sorry, October the 15th, 2003, the chairman of the Louisville Jefferson County Republican Party filed a list of 59 persons to serve as challengers in 59 predominantly African-American precincts with the Jefferson County Board of Elections. In July of 2003, a Republican recruiting flyer entitled "Gubernatorial Election Integrity Call to Arms" was circulated, that stated, in the past three elections, the NAACP and the A. Philip Randolph Institute had, quote, targeted poor black voters, end of quote, and encouraged them to, quote, commit fraud, end of quote. The flyer also attempted to raise money for the GOP. The Republican Party had asked the FBI to come in and investigate. They did, and found no illegal election activities or election fraud related to the Get Out the Vote campaigns of the NAACP or the A. Philip Randolph Institute. According to Kentucky election laws, a report of precinct election officials stating, any irregularities must be filed immediately after each election. A careful check of each report was made for the previous years and found no irregularities reported in any of the challenged precincts. The Republican chairman defended the challenge of plan by stating that precincts were chosen at random. When the civil rights community found it amazing, how all the randomly-selected precincts, with the exception of four in Newburg area, were in the west end of Louisville and fell into a perfectly tight contiguous pattern. Even the four in Newburg, which is an African-American suburb of Louisville, fell into a tight contiguous pattern. We also found it more amazing that of 483 precincts in the county, no predominantly white precinct was randomly selected. Kentucky election law states that each of the two major political parties shall pay -- shall place two election officials in each precinct. In 2001 and 2002, the Republican Party failed to -- to fill a complete slate of election officials. Two days after filing the challenges, the GOP still had not filled 33 election precinct officials.

On election day, there were actually 18 challenges that were placed in African-American precincts. Others had been reassigned to serve as election officials, and some had failed to take the mandatory training. Voter turnout that election in 2003 in predominantly black precincts was nearly identical to the previous year's election, while voting in the white majority precincts fell 7 percent. The only precincts that saw higher voter turnout in 2003 were 21 precincts that were among the 59 precincts targeted by the GOP challengers. That was an attempt to intimidate African-American voters. And what was so interesting about this, Mr. Chairman, Kentucky is not a covered state. Basically, we had not had problems of intimidation since the 1800s. We found it very interesting that it would then -- and would come about in 2003. The first two cases that we discussed with you brings to mind what can happen in states that are not covered by Section 5. Unfortunately -- and having been involved in 1965, when the Voting Rights Act was passed, as a student, I guess I felt some pride that my state didn't have to be covered. But that same feeling comes and bites you 40 years later, when you realize that discrimination and intimidation still exist; new patterns and new opportunities have been seized by those who had not tried to intimidate or challenge in the past. Thank you, again, for the opportunity to appear before you and appreciate it. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you for that testimony. Commissioner Moten.

DR. MOTEN: Doctor Engstrom -- excuse me -- at the risk of sounding naive -- and I agree with what Former Senator Steele had to say -- does your empirical studies bear out his pronouncement, that is, or his conclusion -- in other words, I'm asking you -- the question that I'm putting to you is that if -- if racial-polarized voting or racial-polarized preferences equals racial prejudice.

DR. ENGSTROM: I would certainly agree with him, that it does. Now, having said that, I will say the evidence in court does not require proof of causation, only proof of the differences. So we don't do analyses that go into causation. Now, often defendant's expert witnesses, albeit working the other -- you know, in opposition, they will attempt to employ some type of causal analysis. But I think they have -- in my experience are easily rebuttable every time that I have seen it. What they often do is simply insert other variables that in turn relate to race and say, well, look, these variables that relate to race have a more proximate impact on the racial divisions and the vote; therefore, it's these variables, not race. And it's simply an effort to cleanse divisions in voting of their racial content and racial importance. But the analysis we do, do not get into the reasons for the causes of the racial divisions. But I have looked at too many, too much evidence, for too long a time, in too many places to say that, you know, I don't believe that's a reflection of racism. I do believe that it is.

MR. LEE: Your point is that you believe Congress should take into account these consistent studies about racial-polarized voting today in deciding if a 40-year old statute should be extended; isn't that your point?

DR. ENGSTROM: Yes. I think the problems -- the -- in terms of vote dilution, you know, and the problem of racially-polarized voting, is still an important impediment today. And 40 years ago, when the Act was initially passed, there was more interest in disfranchisement, because that was the first generation of discrimination. It was -- once disfranchisement was largely overcome -- I'm not going to say completely, but many of the barriers have been eliminated -- and the voting strength began to be there, that then we discovered there's simply a second generation of discrimination. Just like in education. You know, we face a new set of barriers that say, okay, you've got the right to vote; now try to elect your representatives of choice.

MR. LEE: Well, I noticed the same thing that Commissioner Moten noticed, which is that you and Mr. Steele were actually saying the same thing. I notice it's -- also Mayor Jackson -- Jackson was saying the same thing, starting -- reminding us of the earliest days of the Texas Republic and testifying about presently. I must say personally it's very sobering testimony. Did you want to follow up some more?

DR. MOTEN: No. Not at this time.

DR. DAVIDSON: Could I follow up his question? MR. LEE: Sure. Commissioner Davidson.

DR. DAVIDSON: And just push it a step further, Dr. Engstrom. It seems to me that even though you don't have to show that racially-polarized voting is the result of racial prejudice in these cases, nonetheless the force of your statistics are stronger if that is the case. And wouldn't some people come back and say -- talking about variables that are introduced in the courtroom here to -- to confound your testimony, wouldn't some people say, well, this is not -- this racially-polarized voting is not so much an expression of racial animus as it simply is partisan differences? DR. ENGSTROM: That is often one of the explanations now. And let's face it, it's extremely difficult to disentangle race and partisanship in the American south today. The studies I mentioned earlier about the new books on southern politics, they all acknowledge that race is the major demographic variable distinguishing between party choice. So if you put a variable in that distinguishes -- that is in turn related to race and said, well, no, see; it's party choice, I don't believe you can wash the racial content of that from it.

There are numerous variables. I mean, they get as -- as I would say, silly as which friends and neighbors vote. Well, look at the precincts. Black candidates are being supported by the people who live closer to them. White candidates are being supported by the people who live closer to them. Well, why is there that geographical pattern? We know why. It's racial discrimination in the housing market. In many ways in the past, formal; informal today. And all of these things. Race is -- excuse me, party is now a frequent explanation for the divisions. As if it's just party; it has nothing to do with race. Well, we know there has been white flight to the Republican Party. We know that has occurred. And I just don't think you -- it's -- that you can disentangle it. And, statistically, it can be very difficult to disentangle causality between things or among things that are themselves related to each other.

DR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Meeks.

MS. MEEKS: My question was, sort of, similar. When you were giving your testimony -- it was a little frustrating -- a little frustrating, and, you know, the question that kept coming, well, how do we overcome this, and then the question, that it is about racism, which is not an easy thing to overcome. You can't legislate that. But if this happens, gerrymandering, all that sort of thing, on -- and it's allowed on the grounds that it's just not focused on race, and that's acceptable -- like in Texas, we heard Vernon Burton talk about that. But the effect is that race or minority group is (inaudible), I mean, shouldn't -- this is maybe naive on my part. Shouldn't we be talking about how we strengthen the Voting Rights Act instead of just reauthorizing it?

DR. ENGSTROM: If you could structure the issue as to how to strengthen it, I would be thrilled, because I think you're right. But I'm afraid the issue is going to be defending the Act and showing that its contemporary -- its contemporary importance is still there. And you say some of these things are not easy to overcome, and that's certainly true. But there are some things that can be changed almost overnight, and those are election systems. You can change them by legislation; you can change them by court order; you can prevent them through preclearance. And that's why the Act is so important. It deals with something that we can change. And, unfortunately, Section 5 is more prophylactic. It is against retrogression. You can still have Section 2 violations that -- under the law that no longer impact Section 5 determinations. But at least that's a very, very important preventative. It's not as strong as it used to be. Supreme Court has handed down decisions in the late '90s in which they've changed the way in which the law was interpreted, or at least it could be expressed a different view as to the way the law was interpreted, making even Section 5 preclearance a more difficult thing to deny. So I wish we -- I wish we could focus on what needs to be done still; see glass as half-full or half-empty? Well, you know, I like to say we've got great improvement; we've come a long way. But we still have a long way to go.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Buchanan is ready to ask a question.

MR. BUCHANAN: Yes, indeed. I would say the President who signed the Voting Rights Act of 1965 once correctly said, politics is the art of the possible. But then he went on to prove a great many more things were possible than people had dreamed of. The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Cunningham, has made a -- also laid out a very clear case of problems in a state that is not covered by Section 5. I really wonder, is there a way we can strengthen, as well as -- without losing what we have, because we can't lose what we've got. I agree that's the highest priority. Is there a way that we can strengthen that, or shall we just (inaudible).

DR. ENGSTROM: Well, unfortunately, ways to strengthen the Act, I mean, suggestions are often ways to dismember it, like making Section 5 nationwide in preclearance. I understand that --

DR. DAVIDSON: Can you speak up a little louder, please?

DR. ENGSTROM: It's -- sometimes the proposals to strengthen it are, in fact, proposals to dismember it. And I'm talking about proposals to go nationwide in terms of preclearance, not -- as we've just heard, Kentucky is not precleared; perhaps -- it's not a covered jurisdiction; perhaps it should be. I'm not saying we're capturing everything. But Mr. Lee has worked with the Justice Department in the Voting Rights Section, and he knows the massive amount of work preclearance decisions have to take. Every voting change has to be sent for preclearance from -- from a public jurisdiction. If precinct lines are changed -- and that's not a trivial thing, necessarily. Precinct lines can be changed for racial purposes. If polling -- polling booths, polling stations, are relocated, they're supposed to be precleared. It doesn't always happen in the late rush in elections and things, but they can be things that are extremely important. I have to admit my mind has not been on how to go forward and strengthen. But I will admit a couple of things: In my experience as an expert witness in studying voting rights -- and this begins in the '70s, I am amazed at how resilient and imaginative civil rights, voting rights workers, and politicians can be. I've learned a lot about how political scientists think in boxes, and we don't get out of the textbook enough. I'll give you two quick instances. When the City of Mobile versus -- versus Baldwin case came down, I was ready to put my tail under my behind and go home; I thought it was all over. And I went to a conference in Atlanta, and people -- the ambition, the strength, the creativity was there. And, by gosh, in 1982, there were important revisions in the Act. I will say another thing: When it comes to remedy for dilution, politicians are far more imaginative and creative than political scientists. We think in boxes. And I have been in situations where you think, well, this is really going to be difficult to implement. And politicians can sit at a table and say, now, what do you want, what do you want, and what do you want? Oh,we can give everybody what they want. It's amazing. So I don't -- you know, I don't say that more imaginative, creative people can't come forward with -- or an approach to -- on how to improve the Act. I've not been think -- I've been thinking more defensively, I must admit.

MR. LEE: Well, I'd like first to ask a question of the two gentlemen from Texas. And the gentleman from Kentucky, which is -- Texas, you're covered, and Kentucky you're not with Section 5 coverage. You know, how -- what kind of benefit has Section 5 coverage meant in Prairie View and in Southwest registration efforts? I mean, in Kentucky, if you had been covered, would you have had more procedures in place and how -- what difference has Section -- I mean, you know, this is a pretty interesting panel, because you can ask this question. Does Section 5 make a difference?

MR. LANDA: It makes a great difference. There was an instance in an election in San Antonio, Texas, where early voting places were changed in the west side and south side of San Antonio that's predominantly Latino. Voting -- early voting places were taken from there and put in the other parts of town. The reasoning for this was that more people vote in the other parts of town than they do on the south side and the west side. Well, what happened is that they didn't preclear it, so it was very easy to stop it before it even happened, while it was still in the planning stages -- or I think it might have happened one or two days, and it was immediately taken back. So, yeah, it's very useful; it's very practical.

MR. LEE: Mr. Mayor.

MR. JACKSON: Yes. One of the things that led to the 1992 indictments that -- prior to the drawing of the lines --

MR. LEE: Of the students?

MR. JACKSON: Of the students, yes. The campus of Prairie View was divided into three of the four commissioners' precincts. They were gerrymandered. And when a student would move from one dormitory across the street to a new dormitory, they were in a new voting precinct. So the law said that if you registered to vote and your card was mailed to your old address, they couldn't forward it to your new address; they would send the cards back, so then the kids would be dropped from the rolls. But to an 18-year-old first time to vote, they were registered to vote. So when they show up at the polls, they'd sign the challenge affidavit and say that they were registered, and then when they didn't see the names on the list, they said, well, you voted illegally, and then they got indicted. I mean, so it's -- so the Act helped protect communities like Prairie View. The tactic that was used this last election was that they went after the elections administrators in those cities. Three of the four major cities in Waller County now have black mayors. But in two of those cities, we all experienced indictments of our elections administrator. In Prairie View we had -- our elections administrator was indicted, and in Brookshire, where they had a black major, his elections administrator was indicted; then they indicted the mayor on some reasons far removed from voting. They claimed he stole a tractor. Now, he was cleared. But it tainted those communities with, you know, what's going on down there? So the tactic now is moving us into the courts. We've spent a lot of time and money fighting this. If it hadn't been for organizations that came to our assistant, you know, like the lawyers group, we'd have been hung out to dry. Because you've got to have money to get into the court system and actually defend yourself. So with this oversight, you know, this preclearance, that help us, because it gives us some safeguards because we're open to attack.

MR. LEE: Mr. Cunningham.

MR. CUNNINGHAM: In the case of Kentucky, I think two of the instances that I cited could have been different had Kentucky had to preclear, or if it had been a covered jurisdiction. I think also in the -- in looking back over the Legislature, Kentucky has never given African-Americans in the state an opportunity to elect candidates of choice across the board across the state. They have packed us; they have cracked us. I think that if it had to -- if we were a Section 5, or covered by Section 5, they would have had to present such a proposal that would have been looked at by another -- by the Justice Department. I think in the case of the merger, it would have been the same thing, with those two districts not having sufficient numbers where African-Americans could elect a candidate of choice. So, yes, I think it would have had a great impact on noncovered states and these African-American communities in terms of the ability to elect candidates. MR. LEE: Well, I would like to thank this panel for its testimony. This has been extraordinarily helpful. We'll now adjourn for lunch. (Lunch recess taken.)

MR. LEE: The National Commission on the Voting Rights Act is now back in session. We're ready to begin our third panel. And I'd like to welcome the Honorable Bobby Singleton.

MR. SINGLETON: Thank you.

MR. LEE: Senator Singleton was elected to the House -- to the Alabama Senate in January 2005. Congratulations.

MR. SINGLETON: Thank you, sir.

MR. LEE: And from 2002 to 2005, Senator Singleton served in the Alabama House of Representatives. Senator Singleton represents Alabama's Black Belt --

MR. SINGLETON: Yes.

MR. LEE: -- which we've heard so much today. Senator.

MR. SINGLETON: Thank you. Good afternoon. And thanks for having me here at this panel today. To all of you who are here, welcome to the great state of Alabama, and I hope you're enjoying our beautiful weather while you're here. But we're here on more important notes today. Back in 1984, I was a candidate for city council in the city of Greensboro in a city that was 63 percent African-Americans but no black elected officials. We were still running on an at-large system. And in 1984, I lost that election by 50 votes. Upon losing that election, I filed a contest, and that contest was moved from the state's courts to the federal courts, and it was put in a group of cases called the Dillard versus The United States. And under the Dillard versus The United States, we got our one man, one vote single-voting districts. And because we were 63 percent African-Americans, we were given three majority black districts and two majority white districts. In 1992 because of -- between 1984 and 1988, the courts did not allow us to have an election. We were in lame duck. From 1988 to 1992, a special master was sent into Greensboro, Alabama, to help us to design a map that would meet the preclearance of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. As we drafted those districts, we saw in 1992 the first African-Americans to be elected in the 100 year history of the City of Greensboro. In 1992, we put three African-Americans on the city council. Though I was not one of them, I was just one of the persons who was behind the scene. I was the campaign manager for all three of those members in their -- in their campaigns. We, for the first time in 1997, experienced our first African-American mayor. And that all became of -- because of what we had done in 1992 for the first time to elect African-Americans to the city council. Even though the mayor had to run on an at-large system, at-large voting for the mayor was much different from 1984 and 1992 simply because now blacks were then divided into districts, understood the boundaries, and were registering to vote. We registered more than 85 percent of the voting age population in Greensboro, Alabama, and that's how we were able to achieve those goals. In 1992 we also experienced other problems with the Voting Rights Act. We had at that time still white minorities in that -- in that community, who were still in control of the electoral process, holding the doors, closing the doors on African-American voters before the vote -- before the voting hours were over. I experienced that by having to go to jail because I was able to snatch the door open and allow people who was coming from the local fish plant, to whom they did not want to come in, that would have made a difference in the electoral votes on that particular day. I was incarcerated but yet later set free. We've experienced that in the city of Greensboro many of many of times over and over again, and even in the county of Hale, where Greensboro is the county seat. We look at this -- these changing -- in terms of the voting hours, we have had to make challenges to the Department of Justice many of times for voting rights because we needed to bring in monitors because of electoral process, because of intimidation of black voters going to the poll electing majority leaders in the city of Greensboro. We have also experienced numerous of letters that have been written to the Department of Justice, to the city -- to the attorney general's office here in the state of Alabama, and we've also done some prior testimonies before the Department of Justice and asked them to bring down monitors to help monitor elections. With the monitors at -- at the electoral process, we experienced from going from -- from 20 percent African-American elected officials in the County of Hale to 80 percent, where we was able to take over the school boards in terms of one man, one vote; we were able to take over the county commissioners; we were able to get a majority with most of the cities in the area; and we were able to elect a black circuit judge; black circuit clerk; myself as a state representative; and other black county commissioners. (Brief interruption.) (Off-the-record discussion.)

MR. SINGLETON: But in all seriousness, we feel that the extension of the Voting Rights Act is -- is proper and what is right, especially Section 5. We've had more experience in the Black Belt of Alabama under Section 5. More and more African-Americans in the Black Belt have been incarcerated for voter fraud, has come from the Black Belt of the United States across the state of Alabama. Right now, there are voting fraud allegations being carried out in my home county of Hale just because of my past election, where African-Americans have used the absentee ballot process and now it's as if only African-Americans used the process for fraud. We train our people very thoroughly under law. The state of Alabama gives us 13 reasons why you can use absentee ballots. Because of higher employment in most of the counties across the Black Belt, a lot of our people have to work 40 miles to go to work, and that is a good reason to vote absentee, because they are going to be out of the county on that particular date. Right now, we were under investigation; we've had several members of our community be locked up and in prison, such as Mr. Aaron Evans, who was just released in 2002 for allegation of voting fraud. And that is because of the system in terms of whites who don't want to give up the power, continue to do investigation on black elected officials. Just as of today, one of my city councilmen in the city of Greensboro has been targeted for food stamp fraud. Years ago when she was a young woman growing up was on food stamp; now they want to bring back a case on that, simply because she's a member of the city council. Trying to dilute that power and the voting strength of African-Americans in that community. So those are some of the things that we have experienced in terms of that -- we're also looking at right now the city -- the county of Hale now moving into reapportionment. We have not reapportioned since the 2000 census, and we are now drawing maps right now trying to make sure that we get some fairness, where they are still trying to make sure that the boundary lines does not reflect the majority of the county. So our county has grown more than 15 percent over in the last two years of African-Americans coming into that particular county simply because there have been some increase of jobs moving in. But we're beginning to see where white minority are now trying to dictate how those lines are going to be drawn, and we will make sure that we continue to hold that majority. Thank you very much.

MR. LEE: Thank you for your testimony, Senator Singleton. The next witness is James Blacksher. James Blacksher is a civil rights lawyer here -- well, not here -- in Birmingham, Alabama. And he has served as counsel of record in over 90 reported cases mainly in voting rights. He was a witness in the hearings before Congress on the extension of the Voting Rights Act in 1981 and 1993. I would just say on a personal note, when I started as a civil rights lawyer in 1974, James Blacksher was already legendary in his courage and skill. Mr. Blacksher.

MR. BLACKSHER: Thank you, Mr. Lee.

MR. LEE: I would like to thank you on behalf of the panel for your written statements. And we have that written statement. And you can feel free to elaborate on it.

MR. BLACKSHER: Right. And because it's a written statement, I'm going to read a little of it, but mostly skim the rest of it, because you'll have the material in the record. I have to take my glasses off to read now.

MR. LEE: I have to put mine on to read.

MR. BLACKSHER: Thank you for giving me the opportunity to testify about why it's critically important to the equal rights of African-Americans and the emerging Latino and Asian-American communities in Alabama for Sections 5 and 203 of the Voting Rights Act to be reauthorized and strengthened in 2007. There's no doubt in the minds of every fair-minded observer that if Section 5 is not reauthorized, the state of Alabama and many of its political subdivisions will attempt rapidly to reverse or to undermine the gains African-Americans have made under the Voting Rights Act in the last few decades. And the reason is that in Alabama's political culture, if the Congress of the United States were to tell the white majority that it is no longer legally prohibited, that they are no longer legally prohibited from making changes that roll back and completely submerge the political and electoral influence of African-Americans, it would send the signal that maximization of the majority's power, the principle that dominated Alabama politics from 1819, when it became a state, to at least the passage of the 1982 Voting Rights Act, that that principle has been revalidated and restored. Now, this is not necessarily a matter of racial discrimination in the eyes of most of us white Alabamians; rather as Historian J. Mills Thornton testified in open court in a case in Birmingham back in 1990, in traditional Alabama politics, the purpose of white supremacy, quote, as those whites who held this idea would have understood it, is to preserve civilization in the Republic. They understand themselves to be fighting to preserve the essence of the Republic. Now, I have given in my written statement three sets of examples of -- of evidence that shows what would happen if the legal requirement of preclearance under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act were removed. The first set of evidence I cite to is the continued pattern of severe, extreme, even growing racially-polarized voting in elections in Alabama.

I second everything Dr. Engstrom said this morning; and, in fact, I have attached as an exhibit a report, an expert report, that Dr. Engstrom prepared for us in a case pending in Dillard versus Chilton County, in which he analyzes the election returns in November 2004 in Chilton County, coming up with examples of extreme racially-polarized voting that are as severe as anything that we've probably seen. And when he first -- when Dick first called me about this report -- Dick, you remember this? He said -- he said, do you look -- he said, look at the scatter plot. Said, look at the scatter plot. Have you ever seen a scatter plot like this? And if you look at Page 6 of Exhibit A, which is Dr. Engstrom's report, you see this diagram, this -- what he called a scatter plot, which plots the -- on one axis, the vote per -- vote per voter, and on the horizontal axis, African-American percentage. And as you see -- as you go -- as the percent African-American voter in the precinct increases -- in this case, only to 45 percent -- it's like a straight line, a straight-line graph, showing the vote per voter going up. And that -- that's a reflection of the racially-polarized voting in Chilton County. The black candidate, Commissioner Bobby Agee, who has been elected under the cumulative voting system that Chilton County agreed to in 1988, has been elected since -- in every election since 1988, as the sole black member on a seven member commission. He received in two thousand -- in the 2004 general election between 5.2 and 5.6 votes per voter. This is a cumulative voting system. And if I have to stop and explain cumulative voting, we'll get diverted. But each voter gets to cast seven votes any way he or she wishes. All seven votes for one person, or one for -- you know, that sort of thing. Commissioner Agee got 5.2 to 5.6 votes for every black voter. He got 0.1 to 0.2 votes for every white voter. And he would have come in last in the election had their -- had their only been whites voting in the election, whereas he came in second because of the cumulative voting scheme, the top seven voters being elected. I then go on to cite judicial decisions in my written statement, recent judicial decisions, that cite to continuing patterns of racially-polarized voting in Alabama. The next set of data that I refer to are primarily situations that show how the state of Alabama is prepared to go backwards if there is no longer a legal requirement that they avoid retrogression in the influence of African-American voters. And the first one that I cite to is actually a recent decision by a federal court in 2005, actually, involving our challenge to Alabama's property tax system. The constitutional provisions in Alabama's -- the provisions in Alabama's State Constitution of 1901, as has been amended all the way up to 1978, are there to prevent local and state governments from raising property taxes. And the key to these provisions is the electoral power of blacks. The federal court found that these provisions were placed there because of the fear of white landowners, that once they were politically empowered, blacks particularly in majority black counties like Hale County, would exercise that power to raise taxes on the property of whites. And these provisions were able to be placed in the Constitution all the way -- for a whole century, from, as I say nineteen -- actually, from 1875 to 1978, the last Lid Bill in the last George Wallace Administration, with the argument that whites should not be taxed to pay for the education of blacks. Now, the connection with the Voting Rights Act is clear: The only way -- well, for example, in 2003, the Republican governor of this state tried to get some of these constitutional provisions amended, and it was defeated. The only counties who voted for the changes were the majority black counties, including Hale County and some of the Black Belt counties. Then I go on to cite -- and I'm skimming here a little bit, because each one of these deserves more attention than I'm giving it in my oral statement. But I then go on to point to the -- the importance in the redistricting process that we just experienced post-2000 census in Alabama. For the first time in the history of this state, the Alabama Legislature in 2001 was able to enact statutes that redrew the state House and Senate districts, the state Congressional districts, and the state board of education districts; got those statutes precleared by the Department of Justice and were able to -- we were able to defend those districts in a series of collateral attacks that were brought in federal and state courts against those districts. And they stand to this time. And the point I want to make here is that what made that legislative process successful was the -- the requirement of Section 5, that there be no retrogression in the electoral strength of blacks. That was at the top of the list of the legislative guidelines for redistricting. And I attached as Exhibit B a copy of those guidelines. And those legal requirements gave African-American legislators the leverage they needed to negotiate districts, plans, in both houses, that won majorities, and there were -- not only to preserve black electoral influence in past scrutiny in the Department of Justice, but also to be defended in federal court against Shaw claims and other types of claims, like the one, by the way, that just succeeded in Georgia. We beat that claim in a 2002 case in Mobile. I will quickly in my discussion here by pointing to the third -- the third category of evidence that I give are various cases that we have had to bring in the last five or six years, at least two examples of cases where the State of Alabama would not submit for preclearance changes that -- that do affect voting. And we had to bring three-judge court actions in order to get them to submit them for preclearance, including, by the way, one state statute that -- talking about absentee ballots, Senator, the statute back in 1998 -- remember? You must remember this. The Legislature passed a law that said that absentee ballots could not be sent to a post office box; that it could only be sent to a residence address. And, of course, most -- many, many rural residents in the Black Belt don't have delivery to their homes -

MR. BLACKSHER: -- and it would have prevented them from getting that. We managed to get that knocked down by a three-judge court ruling. Thank you very much.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Blacksher. We're going to hear testimony of all the witnesses on this panel before we circle back and get questions from the commissioners. Helen Butler is our next witness. Ms. Butler is the Voter Empowerment Coordinator for the Georgia Coalition for the People's Agenda. Welcome, Ms. Butler.

MS. BUTLER: Thank you very much, and thank you for conducting these hearings to ensure that all citizens' right to vote is protected. I guess my role here today is talk about voting and the Voting Rights Act from a practical prospective, in that having local jurisdictions be responsible for implementation of the Act and being responsible for ensuring that voting rights are protected, sometimes it is misused. The coalition, by the way, is headed by Dr. Joseph Lowery, our convener. It's comprised of all of the civil rights, human rights, peace, justice; you name it -- women's groups, that come together to focus on issues such as voting through voter empowerment initiatives. And, of course, we've registered since 2000 over 200,000 voters in the state of Georgia. That -- and that's minority voters, because we have over a half-million, unregistered voters in the state of Georgia.

But my task here, as I said, is to talk about why we feel the Voting Rights Act should be reauthorized from the prospective of the actual practical implementation of the Voting Rights Act. A lot of the discretionary powers invested in local election boards sometimes prohibits voters rights being protected. And I want to address some of those practices, because without the Voting Rights Act, especially the Section 5 preclearance and the part -- for language minorities, we would not have their rights protected. In Georgia, for instance, there's a law that says that you can become a deputy register; that you can actually collect the voter registration forms; you could take them in to the registrar's office to ensure that the registrations got implemented. Well, they're -- in my particular county -- I live in Morgan County -- and the local elections official took it upon herself to say that she was not going to allow a deputy registrar to be held -- to conduct voter registration in Morgan County. We pressed her on that issue and gave her the law, and finally she said, well, one of the discretionary powers that I have is to say when that registration should occur, because there's a certification process to that. So she said, after each voter registration drive, I'm going to make sure that you come back and get re-certified each time you wanted to do a voter registration drive, which certainly prohibits people from becoming registered voters. While in other cities in the state of Georgia, once you're certified, you have that certification for at least a year. Again, the discretionary power of local election officials certainly can impact voting rights. The other part, in 2000, I want to address, our secretary of state is very progressive, but still she has limited authority for the actual implementation. And if you look at Georgia's record for voting, we were worse than the Florida situation. We had 94,000 votes that did not get counted, all because of long lines; because of polling places being changed; because of police barricades being put up at voting precincts to check for driver's licenses while people are going to vote. So there are things that were in place, that if you leave it to the discretion of the local jurisdictions, then we certainly wouldn't have the right to vote. There's another instance of that. In the College Park precinct, not only is the polling location in a police precinct, but there is also -- and for municipal elections, you have to go from one precinct to another in order to get your vote cast, again, making it difficult for people's rights to be exercised to vote. This time, in 2004, we talked about provisional ballots, where the local elections officials took it upon themselves to say that, I'm not going to let you vote; you can't exercise a provisional ballot.

In Chatham County there were 30 Savannah State University students who were denied the right to vote because they weren't given a provisional ballot. They showed up; their name wasn't on the active or inactive list, as it was required to be, and so they were denied that right, and they didn't check it with the state office. So there are things that are in place that the local jurisdictions can do to really prohibit the right to vote. Another thing in Savannah, I worked with the young students there with the Voices Project this past election cycle. We had a lot of people who were from Haiti, who did not have the proficiency in the English language and requested assistance. The local chair of the state -- of the county election board wanted to exercise his right and say that our election protection people could not assist those voters. And we had to get a legal injunction to make sure that those people could assist them. They wanted to invoke the 155th campaign rule, when, in fact, in the law, you can assist any voters as long as they request your assistance. So we had to invoke that and get legal assistance to make sure that happened. So those are kinds of things that are done to prohibit people from voting and exercising their rights. The other thing I'll note, Laughlin McDonald is going to talk about the redistricting process, so I'm not going to talk about that -- and we had several lawyers to address redistricting. But certainly that is an issue that we want to keep in mind. Currently, there's legislation that is before the state that would say under HAVA, as you know, there are 17 pieces of identification that voters can use to actually go and vote. There is a Georgia legislation bill that is being introduced that is saying that you have to have a state-issued ID only to be able to vote. Again, this is -- will prohibit people from exercising their rights, especially for African-Americans or the Latino communities, who do not always have that piece of ID, and it was just another means of making sure that they do not exercise their rights to vote. And I don't want to go over my time. I just -- I will entertain questions about the practical side. But I do want to say that we feel the Voting Rights Act should be reauthorized. And I don't usually quote any particular candidate, but Reagan said, voting is the crown jewel of American liberty. And the way to protect that crown jewel is through reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Ms. Butler. Thank you for your testimony. We will next hear from Anita Earls. Ms. Earls is the Director of Advocacy at the University of North Carolina Center for Civil Rights. Ms. Earls also was Deputy Assistant Attorney General of the Civil Rights Division of the United States Department of Justice. Among other sections, she supervised the Voting section. Ms. Earls before that, was a very skilled voting rights lawyer in North Carolina. Ms. Earls.

MS. EARLS: Thank you. Good afternoon. I'm very honored to have a chance to talk with you this afternoon, and I really appreciate the time that you are putting into this effort, and I thank the Lawyers' Committee for inviting me.

MR. LEE: I also need to thank you for your written statement, which we have. And so you can assume that we have that, and you can do what Mr. Blacksher did.

MS. EARLS: I actually do have a written statement and some attachments that I'm going to present; briefly highlight some of the current issues that we're facing in North Carolina; and then talk a little bit about the Justice Department enforcement rule and how Section 5 and Section 203 are crucial to their efforts. But let me start by talking about current issues that raise problems of racial discrimination in voting in North Carolina. And it first deals with the question of provisional ballots. After HAVA was passed, North Carolina passed a statute indicating that they would count provisional ballots that were cast outside a voter's precinct as long as the voter was voting in the county in which they were registered. A ballot cast out of precinct may not count for all of the items on that ballot because -- it would only count for the things that the voter was actually eligible to vote for. But that was the state law, and that's what the state board elections told voters; that's what election protection workers and other nonprofit groups, the League of Women Voters. Throughout North Carolina, we were training voters, that if for some reason they couldn't get to their precinct on election day and they had to cast a ballot in a different precinct, that out-of-precinct ballot would count. That was the law in North Carolina prior to the election. After the election, two unsuccessful candidates brought litigation in state court challenging that under on state constitutional and statutory grounds. And on February 4th in 2005, the state Supreme Court ruled in James v. Bartlett that on the statutory grounds, that that was not correct; that those ballots would be thrown out. An Advocacy group did an analysis of the estimated 11,400 out-of-precinct provisional ballots cast in the election. And we found that while black voters were 18.6 percent of the electorate state-wide, they cast 36.4 percent of the out-of-precinct ballots. From our point of view, Section 5 should prevent invalidating these ballots. Now, the Legislature -- after the Supreme Court decision, the Legislature passed a law verifying its intent, hoping to nullify the effect of the Supreme Court decision. The litigation is still pending. But I think that this highlights how it's important to have a non-retrogression principle in place. And we think that certainly a change affecting voting that disproportionately invalidates the votes of black voters has got to be retrogressive and not permissible under Section 5.

But it also highlights how socioeconomic status and others factor affect the ability of black voters to participate. And we saw this same kind of disparity in the impact on minority voters with regard to punch card ballots in Florida in 2000 and in various other places around the country. That's a current issue where the -- where Section 5, we think, will be crucial to protecting the votes of black voters in the states.

Another issue is more innate to North Carolina. There is a situation under state law where, without Section 5, a large number of state legislative districts that currently elect black elected officials will not -- will not stay in place. And let me explain the situation. In 2004 the -- the state Supreme Court decided that the state statute -- the state constitution provision requiring that legislative districts be drawn from whole counties, must be put into a place -- put into place except where there are Voting Rights Act implications. So the state legislative plan was redrawn. Where there were Section 5 counties or Section 2 potential litigation, the districts could combine a couple of counties; they could cross county lines. They were more irregular in shape -- but where there were no Section 2 or Section 5 issues, the counties have to follow -- the legislative districts have to follow county lines. At the same time -- or right around the same time, 2004, the Fourth Circuit decided in a case Hall versus Virginia, that Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act cannot be interpreted to permit influence district claims, making there be a bright -- 50 percent bright-line standard for the first threshold of Gingles in order to establish a Section 2 violation. So what this means is that without the non-retrogression requirement in place, the only place in North Carolina where you can draw or protect minority district is where you can have a 50 percent majority voting population. If you look in front of you, there is a chart which has the blue lines on it. This -- this is from an affidavit that was recently submitted in litigation. It's compiled by the state of North Carolina. What it shows -- the first chart shows a ranking of state House districts by total black population. The second column is by black voting population. The third column is by black Democratic registration. The blue lines highlight districts that have elected African-American candidates in the 2004 election. So if you look down the middle column at black voting age population, you see that pretty soon you get to 49.97 percent. All of those districts below that line could not be drawn under the whole county provision and the current interpretation of Section 2 in North Carolina. So the concern is that without Section 5 non-retrogression requirement in place, 12 of the 19 districts that have elected African-Americans would be in jeopardy in North Carolina. Also I provided for the record, evidence of the continuing need for minority representation. Carey Haney (phonetic), who is a PhD at Duke, has done an expert report, and I've given you his deposition. He found two significant findings in a study of the North Carolina Legislature. He looked at the representation of black interests, and he found that there was an unequivocal connection between a descriptive (inaudible) of African-Americans in the Legislature and the substance of representation of black interests. African-American legislators were more likely to introduce bills prohibiting racial discrimination; twice as many African-Americans introduced such bills than did non-black legislators. He controlled for the -- whether the district was majority black or not, a variety of other factors, and then found this very clear connection. His second finding was that there is significant racial prejudice in the views of the colleagues about the effectiveness of African-American legislators, that is to say surveys of all the legislators about who's most effective and surveys of lobbyists about who's most effective controlled for all sorts of other factors. Race came out as a determining factor and -- and African-American legislators were, across the board, viewed as less effective than their colleagues. And one other suggestion is that we need strong enforcement of the Voting Rights Act and Section 5 until these blue lines are dispersed randomly along this three-page chart of North Carolina's legislative districts and Carey Haney's findings are no longer true.

Let me just say something briefly about the extent of African-Americans elected to other offices in North Carolina today. As a result of the November '04 elections, we do not have an African-American serving in an elected seat for statewide office other than court of appeals judges. There has only been one African-American elected to a non-judicial state seat statewide since 1982. That was Ralph Campbell, who won for state auditor in 1996 and 2000. He ran again in 2004 and was defeated in a state that is 22 percent, with no African-American currently on the state Supreme Court. I think that earlier panels talked about the efforts to dismantle majority black districts at the local level. Let me just say that I am aware of at least four such instances in North Carolina. Montgomery County, Thomasville, two motions that have been filed in court to overturn court orders establishing single-member districts, and there are moves in Beaufort County and Columbus County. The second part of retrogression standards should be (inaudible) where it applies. Of the four I mentioned, only two are covered by Section 5, only if the federal court orders are reviewed. It is my understanding that if a federal court order is implementing a local jurisdiction's plan, it will be reviewed under Section 5. If it's a court order that's the result of the Court's own findings of fact, it's not reviewed. So it's not automatic that federal court orders would be reviewed. But the point is that there's an effort underway to get rid of the court orders that were established to create opportunities for black voters, and Section 5 retrogression standard is a bar against that. Let me move to the question of Department of Justice enforcement. Section 5 review makes a huge difference. And we can't count that simply by the number of objections. Below the surface, what you don't see are all the times that the Justice Department writes letters requesting more information on a submission, and as a result of that, the jurisdiction changes its plans and brings them in compliance; you don't see the times that -- it doesn't even have to rise to the level of a written letter for more information. They get a submission; they make phone calls; make inquiries; the jurisdiction says, oh, you're right; you can fix that; they change what they're planning to do.

In a lot of ways, the Section 5 Unit and the Voting section provides technical assistance to jurisdictions to help them run their elections and structure their elections systems in a way that's fair to minorities. That should be something that we are proud of. That should be something that we protect. There's no need -- there's no reason why the need for that has gone away. And that's something that's hard to quantify because you don't -- there's no written letter necessarily that you can see on the Web site, but that's a lot of the work of the section and a valuable contribution that they're making. I also want to highlight the importance of federal observers, because they have the power to actually enter polling places. I think the experience of a lot of us who do the election protection work is that posting volunteers outside a polling place helps, but it doesn't get you where you need to be. You can't go in and face to face talk to election officials; you can't observe what's going to. You really -- your hands are tied in a lot of ways. DOJ exercises its authority sparingly. Only roughly 157 jurisdictions -- and these are all local jurisdictions -- have been certified for examiners. It's an important power, and it's one that they have demonstrated they use judiciously; it's one that they need to continue to have. And then finally, Section 203, is in many states the only way to protect the right to political participation for limited English proficient citizens. So in conclusion, let me say that I have a lot of ideas about how Section 5 can be vastly improved. But without a doubt, the conditions that made it necessary still exist.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Ms. Earls, for that testimony. Our next witness is Leslie Lobos. Ms. Lobos is Staff Attorney at the Atlanta, Georgia, office of the Mexican-American Legal Defense and Educational Fund. Several witnesses today have mentioned increasing Latino population in the south, and I guess it's a sign of that, that MALDEF has an Atlanta office. Welcome, Ms. Lobos.

MS. LOBOS: Thank you very much. And thank you for the pastor. It's an honor to be here today. I'm going to talk to you a little bit about some of the issues that we see in these last elections, but specifically about the bilingual provisions in the Voting Rights Act and also about the role of federal examiners and poll watchers in helping us protect our communities' right to vote. First I want to talk a little bit about some of the preelection issues that we see when it comes to intimidation. I'm going to give you two examples that we saw in Georgia in two counties. One was Long County during the July 2004 pre -- preliminary. Three gentlemen who were running for office went into the board of elections and challenged two-thirds of the Latino registered voters, specifically asking for people who were self-identified as Hispanic and challenged their registrations. As a result of that, MALDEF -- we got notice of it after the hearing had been set. And as a result, only six Latinos voted in that election. Then it was repeated in Atkinson County, Georgia. We were notified a little bit earlier so that we were able to get other national organizations -- the Lawyers' Committee was very active, and the Department of Justice also helped. But in that situation, three gentlemen who -- individual citizens went in and challenged 80 percent of the Latino registered voters, and their basis was challenging their citizenship. And there was a hearing held. At that hearing, the county held correctly that challenging voters solely on the basis of their race and ethnicity in this case prevented them from actually being able to go through with the hearing, and 93 of those challenges were dropped. But it still had quite an effect in intimidating our community from fully exercising that right to vote. Similarly here in North Carolina in Alamance County, a sheriff took it upon himself to get a sample list of Latino voters and then announce in front of the board of commissioners and said, I'm going to go door to door knocking on people's houses and ask -- and see proof of their citizenship. Again, another way that our community is being intimated from exercising their right to vote. Again, the Department of Justice and other local and national organizations were involved. And the sheriff pulled back and didn't actually go through with the door-to-door knocking. But it also had a chilling effect on the perception of our ability to exercise that right. These bilingual provisions, although they didn't -- they don't apply in these three counties I have mentioned, in the counties that do have them, they provide something, I think, that words can't even quantify. But being a daughter of an immigrant and being an immigrant myself, I can use the example of my mother. She says, every time I go to vote, I just get so nervous, and having the ability to have it in your own language provides something that allows you to fully exercise and enjoy this ability to vote. I also want to talk a little bit about some of the issues that we found during these last elections, 2004. Specifically, we saw in several states, including here in the south, in Maryland, and also Texas, where the Section 203 did apply and there weren't -- it wasn't being fully exercised. There weren't bilingual poll workers or all the materials were not in Spanish the way they should have been, or in the other languages; Vietnamese specifically. We also saw issues with the provisional ballots. I think several people have mentioned that today, and we saw -- we were part of the national coalition -- we had an 800-number, where people could call in and have questions, and I think that was one of the largest issues that we saw, where people weren't informed of their ability to use the provisional ballot and were either turned away without given that information, or for those people who requested to use it, were denied that ability. So these are issues that are continuing. They are ways of intimidating our community from exercising it, and this Voting Rights Act helps to protect it. Equally, at -- these kinds of activities of national organizations, local community organizations educating our community, that helps. But the Voting Rights Act is something that is invaluable to the protection. I also want to talk just a little bit -- a few more problems and issues that we saw. We still -- we are still seeing in some -- in some areas -- and I'm going to talk specifically about one county in Maryland, Montgomery County, when they qualified for Section 203 for the first time. In the primaries it was their very first time. I think it was inadequate training, and so there was lots of issues where the poll workers themselves were not informed of the fact that Section 203 required it, and it wasn't being provided as something as a complement, but it was something that was required under the law. We were alerted about that and were able to work with the elections officials. And by the next voting period, people were able to come in, and there was provisions -- everything, you know, was bilingual. There were poll -- bilingual poll workers in every section where there was Latino -- large Latino community. And so we were able to see how, when it's done correctly, applied correctly, it actually makes a difference. People came out and were appreciative of the opportunity. And so I think that if we train our poll workers correctly, and if we train our community correctly, I think that we can continue to enforce our ability to -- and to vote and fully exercise that right, which is so important to all of us. I thank you for this opportunity, and I'll answer any questions.

MR. LEE: Thank you for your testimony, Ms. Lobos. Our last speaker on this panel is the patient Laughlin McDonald. Mr. McDonald is the Director of the Southern Regional Office and the Voting Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union, also located in Atlanta. Mr. McDonald has litigated numerous key voting rights cases, not only in the south, but in other regions of the country. He's authored several books on civil rights, and he, like Mr. Blacksher, was a witness before Congress during the Voting Rights Act extension hearings in 1982. Mr. McDonald, thank you and welcome.

MR. MCDONALD: Thank you very much for the invitation to be here, which I'm very pleased to accept. I brought some documents with me, three documents which I'd like to leave with the Commission. The first is an eight-page statement called "The Voting Rights Act: What It Has Meant and What Does Say?" And it discusses the prior extensions of the Voting Rights Act and the kind and evidence that Congress considered. I mean, we know that there was a lot of opposition by the white politicians in the south to the Voting Rights Act and to its extension. Lester Maddox, who was Governor of my fine state of Georgia, was one of those who testified in 1970. And one can almost not believe that someone would say this, but our governor said it -- this is a quote: The Voting Rights Act is an outrageous piece of legislation. It is illegal, unconstitutional, and ungodly, and un-American, and a wrong against the good people in this country, and phooey on anything that says otherwise. Well, ironically, I think it probably was Lester Maddox's testimony that convinced Congress that they absolutely had to extend the Voting Rights Act of 1970. Then again, in 1982 (inaudible) testified and there were others who testified against the extension in 1982, and one of them was another Georgian Freeman Ledman (phonetic), Former Assistant Attorney General of Georgia, and to read his testimony, and proudly recalls that he had argued on behalf of Georgia in South Carolina versus Katzenbach that the Voting Rights Act was unconstitutional. And then (inaudible) and disparaging the Civil Rights Movement, he said, the Voting Rights Act had been passed in 1965 to appease the surging mob in the street and that Section 5 should be allowed to expire because there is no longer any justification for it at all. Well, that's not just ancient history. In 2003 -- this is more detailed in my paper. In 2003 the State of Georgia filed the brief in the Supreme Court of the United States in Georgia versus Ashcroft, and the brief really is quite remarkable -- there may be other adjectives that you would want to use other than remarkable -- but just outrageous. But in any event, they argued that the retrogression standard in Section 5 should be abolished. It also said that racial minorities, the very group for whom the Voting Rights Act was passed, should never be allowed to participate in the Section 5 preclearance process. And then it argued that, consistent with Section 5, the State of Georgia should be allowed to abolish all of its majority black districts. Now, if that were the standard that was adopted, we would have very few, if any, minorities in the state legislature. Fortunately, the Supreme Court rejected those arguments, but I think the brief raises the question, are the interests of minority voters adequately protected today by a state such as Georgia, which advocates repeal of the retrogression standard, the abolition of majority/minority districts, and the exclusion of minorities from Section 5 preclearance? The answer is surely, no, unless the southern fox should be now left to guard the voting rights hen house. I think that this brief filed just a year or so ago really underscores the need to continue the protections afforded by Section 5. The second document which I would like to read with you is a request for a judicial notice, which we'll filed yesterday in one of our cases in South Carolina, challenging the at-large method of electing the school board in Lexington and Saluda counties. The request is a compilation of statutes and Constitutional provisions dealing with race, and also a compilation of reported decisions dealing with racial issues and also dealing with voting rights issues. And many of the cases that are cited in here were ones that have been decided since 1982 in the last extension to the Voting Rights Act. And I'd like particularly to draw your attention to two of the -- the last of the cases here. One is Smith versus Beasley, decided in 1996. And the three-judge court there found that, quote, in South Carolina voting has been and still is polarized by race; this voting pattern is general throughout the state. Now, this is not (inaudible) Mr. Engstrom, but the learned court, a three-judge court, making these findings. And there was no appeal in that case. More recently in Colleton County Council versus McConnell, decided in 2002, the three-judge court made similar findings, that, quote, voting in South Carolina continues to be racially-polarized to a very high degree in all regions of the state and in both primary and general elections. I think it's clear from these two opinions that race is still dynamic in the political process. The persistent wide-spread patterns of racial block voting found by the Courts underscores the need to continue Section 5 and, indeed, to strengthen it. And the Court in the Colleton County, by the way -- and I think that that decision, which was written by Judge Traft (phonetic), who is on the Fourth Circuit, Circuit Court, is perhaps the best court ordered redistricting decision that we have. And there the Court indicated that it had to follow, not only the Section 2 racial fairness standards, Voting Rights Act, but that it also had to apply Section 5 retrogression standards to avoid any diminution of the ability of the minority voters to elect candidates of their choice. And the court opinion does that, underscoring yet again that Section 5 exerts its influence in many places including in court orders. And then I would like to give you two Georgia House and Senate bills and a resolution containing the standards that the State should adhere to in redistricting. And all of these provide at the outset that, quote, all districts shall comply with the United States Constitution and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. And I think that these bills and resolutions rebut the arguments that are sometimes put forward by even professed friends of equal voting rights, that we don't need Section 5 anymore because the Department of Justice doesn't enforce it and because the courts have, you know, vitiated its impact. It is clear from the kind of standards for redistricting adopted by the Georgia Legislature that Section 5 continues to have a very strong deterrent effect, and the State has only yesterday enacted a new Congressional redistricting plan -- and I haven't had a chance to analyze it, but I have looked at four or five plans -- proposals that were floating around, and every single one of them avoided any retrogression in the majority black Congressional district. So, I mean, to say that Section 5 is vitiated hasn't -- (inaudible) of the Georgia Legislature. And let me just find the finish line responding to a chat that Jon and I had before the session started, and that is, there's plenty of voting rights litigation that has taken place in Tennessee as well. As you know, there are, sort of, two major principal concentrations of black population in that state. One in the so-called rural west Tennessee counties to the west, Memphis and others; and then there's a big concentration of black population in Chattanooga, which if you know your history, you know it was under the sway of the Union forces during the Civil War and was a big refugee center for blacks. And there remains there a very substantial black population. So there's been voting rights litigation in Chattanooga and voting rights litigation in rural west Tennessee. And in all of that litigation, the Courts made the same kinds of findings that courts have made in Alabama and Mississippi and South Carolina and in Georgia, about the presence of racial block voting, about a history of discrimination against blacks. So, I mean, obviously, I tip my hand here; I am a big proponent of extending the protections of the Voting Rights Act, and I think you also need to find ways to strengthen them to try to address some of these Supreme Court decisions, which I think have undercut the effectiveness.

MR. LEE: Thank you. Now we're going to open to questions from the commissioners. Commissioner Meeks.

MS. MEEKS: Well, it goes back to the question I asked of the earlier panel, because several of you have litigated voting rights cases. You know, again -- I mean, and we still -- I mean, I -- Section 5 certainly has helped. But there is still great polarization, along with gerrymandering. Is there ways that you feel that we can strengthen that way? And I'll defer to whoever can answer this question, because I think if anybody has the answer, that would be great.

MR. BLACKSHER: The question is, how do we reduce the racial polarization?

MS. MEEKS: How to strengthen Section 5.

MR. BLACKSHER: How to strengthen Section 5. Well, obviously, the two big items -- maybe I should give it to Anita -- to fix Bossier Parish 2, that is the requirement of proof of intent to retrogress, not just intention of discrimination of any variety; and -- and to fix -- fix Beer. I mean, I see no reason why the -- I'm sorry, I guess it would Bossier 1 that said that Section 2 -- Section 2 is not grounds for denying preclearance, a Section 2 violation. But, I mean, I see no reason why the Section 4 provisions regarding coverage should not be extended to places like Jefferson County, Kentucky, or many of the other jurisdictions around the state where there have been -- Dade County, Florida, excuse me. I mean you could -- the list -- the list goes on. This is not a southern phenomenon. And there are so many jurisdictions that need additional protection. I think the retrogression standard itself needs to be rethought. But, again, I'm just throwing out ways that we ought to be thinking about strengthening -- making it -- making it more of a clear instrument, sending a clearer message, that the right to vote needs to be protected in practice and not just in lip service, and that it is -- it is -- it is a serious -- it is a serious problem in this country. And there seems to me, if you look at the national press, to be some sort of a growing wave that there are serious problems. You read articles and editorials every day about this. But this is -- this is a major complement of it.

MS. EARLS: If I may, I think James hit the high point, in one sense, we're saying, we want the standard we had in 1982, before Bossier Parish, before Georgia v. Ashcroft. And there are some people thinking about logical ways to make coverage relevant to the places where we see problems today, in addition to the places that are currently covered. I would just add one thing that really -- apart from what Mr. McLaughlin said, but also comes from my experience when I was at the Justice Department and seeing the impact or the fact that in the Section 5 review process, when a submission is submitted to the Justice Department as opposed to when it goes through the DC District Court, the voters who are affected by the change, black voters who feel that the change is retrogressive, can submit comments to the Department. But if the Department preclears and says, this is not retrogressive, there's no further review that can be had. It's sort of like, if they -- if they find that it's -- if they issue an objection, jurisdiction ultimately can go to court and litigate that. But black voters can't go to court and litigate whether the Department got it right on retrogression. So I would add a private right of action or right of appeal for voters so that this issue of retrogression can be determined in an adversarial setting, in a judicial setting, if voters feel that the Department didn't get it right.

MR. LEE: Chandler Davidson.

DR. DAVIDSON: I have two questions, and one is addressed to Senator Singleton, but I would be happy if any of the other panelists has anything to add on it. You mentioned vote fraud charges, which are a common tool of minority vote suppression, a claim being that African-Americans are sometimes -- the code word here is Democrats -- are more likely to engage in vote fraud. And as Mr. Cunningham testified this morning, those kinds of charges are then used to challenge and obstruct voting in minority precincts. And I have tried to follow some of these charges up the last year or so. But it's -- I found it to be more or less a matter of looking for needles in haystacks here. And I'm wondering if, in your experience, there has been any records kept of these kinds of charges that have been brought against black voters or black officials in the -- in the Black Belt in these years that could be part of a -- of an archive or file that would provide a little bit more systemic evidence of this kind of behavior?

MR. SINGLETON: Well, there are. In most of our district courts, in terms of where these cases are taken, we don't have stenographers in a lot of our district courts in the state of Alabama. It's only upon request or whether or not the plaintiff or the defendant can afford to have a stenographer there. So we're lacking a lot. And there have been some lawsuits filed on behalf of being able to have stenographers in district court. And a lot of our cases, if they are not appealed to circuit court or to the court of appeals, they're not there, so a lot of them are being tried on the district court level, on the state court level. Those that are from the federal court level and the US District Court here for the Middle District under the Dillard cases, or those others that were here, in the federal courts, we have records of those. We had in the 1980s -- we called it the Greene County Five and -- and the Marion Three in Perry County, Alabama, consisting of Mr. Albert Turner, Senior, and his wife and others. Those have been documented. Those in the state courts are a little harder to track, but we can find, you know, assemblage of evidence for that, and we can compile some of that information. I can get some of it to you in the counties to which I know there have been trials in the past five years.

DR. DAVIDSON: Thank you. That would be very helpful. Anyone else care to address that issue? (No response.)

DR. DAVIDSON: And this is addressed specifically to Ms. Earls, and it has to do with her claim about the fact that -- I believe I am correct here -- and I'm quoting her as saying, that no African-American in North Carolina has held statewide office since 1982?

MS. EARLS: No -- no one currently serves. And the only African-American elected statewide -- I just took '82 as the cutoff point -- the only person to serve is Ralph Campbell, who was elected state auditor.

DR. DAVIDSON: Is it the case that there have been many African-American candidates for statewide office, or is this just a reflection of the fact that very few have run.

MS. EARLS: Yes, I can. There have been several very well-supported campaigns for statewide office who -- you know, not the least of which Harvey Gantt 1990 and 1996 campaigns, but also for other -- they are called council of state, but other statewide elections. I don't think any have run for governor. But, yes, there have definitely been candidates.

DR. DAVIDSON: It would be fairly easy to identify strong African-American candidates for statewide office between 1982 and 2004 for somebody who's familiar with North Carolina politics?

MS. EARLS: Well, absolutely. And Professor Engstrom did that up until 1995, I believe, in his expert report in the Shaw versus Hunt case, which is a part of the appendix from the Supreme Court record. And he -- so he got, not only the races, but the polarized-voting data.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Buchanan.

MR. BUCHANAN: Like Commissioner Meeks, I want to thank you for the ways you have clarified how the Act might be, not only extended, but strengthened. And any rationale you have to add to that -- the idea that might be incorporated in legislation, I think would be extremely helpful, in addition to what you've said you can supply. It seems to me that the covered jurisdictions of the state who were whole or in part covered by Section 5 were covered because they had a very clear track record that no rational person could argue with, and, therefore, should have been included into evidence to indicate (inaudible) that continuing to be the case. But we have heard and have seen in 2000, 2004 and other elections, a very clear case in other jurisdictions, it seems to me, at this point in history. So it would seem to me (inaudible) the purpose of the original Act to take a look at recent history and who is doing what now in the near recent past that might make them likely subjects. Then I want to thank personally -- as a lifelong Republican, I want thank Counsel Blacksher and the Senator for something. Counsel, you mentioned the lingering concern of Republican Governor of Alabama Bob Riley's attempt to amend the Constitution to reform our property tax law. And -- and he was clobbered at the poll. He was clobbered by his own Republican Party and others for that effort. Now, Senator, I expect without the Voting Rights Act, you might have really had a hard time -- had a very hard -- becoming Senator in the Alabama State Senate.

MR. SINGLETON: Yes.

MR. BUCHANAN: And those majority black counties, without the Voting Rights Act, would probably be majority black in population only.

MR. SINGLETON: Yes.

MR. BUCHANAN: And so I want to think you and the people of the black majority counties for being the best Republicans in the state of Alabama.

MR. SINGLETON: Thank you very much.

MR. BUCHANAN: Because if you are the governor who is trying to practice fiscal responsibility, which is a traditional Republican value, and still valued by those of us who remain to be traditional Republicans. You're also a pretty good Democrat because one has to assume that a state that is not burdened down with debt and in the soup, and being brought into the black, and in condition to serve the people and lead their nation, is somewhat greater value to the people than a state that is in the red and in the soup, like Alabama has been.

MR. SINGLETON: Yes.

MR. BUCHANAN: Thank you.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Majette.

MS. MAJETTE: Thank you. I would like to thank all of the members of this panel for being here, and it's a point of personal privilege to give a special thank you to Ms. Butler and Ms. Lobos and Mr. McDonald. You represent Georgia extremely well. But I have a question about the reauthorization, specifically with regard to Section 5. And I'll address the question to Mr. McDonald and anyone else who can jump in as well, Ms. Earls, perhaps. But under the laws as if stands now, redistricting traditionally has taken place every ten years after the census has been taken. But we've seen in recent years that there have been these attempts between census to redistrict. We had that in Georgia, Texas, and other places. If the -- if Section 5 is not reauthorized, wouldn't that allow states that are no longer covered to make -- would you -- in your opinion, would that encourage some states to look at doing redistricting more frequently than the ten-year period? And what impact do you think that might have on the ability to maintain or to increase the numbers of minority members of -- members of Congress, members of state Houses, and state Legislatures?

MR. MCDONALD: Well, I think that partisan gerrymandering has just gone to new heights. In 1986 the Supreme Court in Davidson versus Banderman (phonetic) said that partisan gerrymandering was justiciable, that is that the federal courts could examine it. But the standard that they set for finding partisan gerrymandering was whether or not the voting power of the particular group were, quote, systematically degraded. And there's not been a single case, not a single reported defendant, that has ever set aside a redistricting plan on the grounds that it was a partisan gerrymandering. And in the two cases that have been most recently up before the US Supreme Court, the Jubilier case and then the appeal in Georgia versus Ashcroft, or in the Texas case, the Courts have basically left partisan gerrymandering where it was. Theoretically possible, but a dead letter law. And we see it going on everywhere. And I don't really know how one can stop that unless the Legislature does something about it. The Supreme Court apparently is not going to intervene. There are some states, South Dakota, where Commissioner Meeks is from, that prohibit redistricting more than once a decade, and the same is true in Montana. Not only do they prohibit redistricting more than once in a decade, but they take it out of the hands of the Legislature and put it in the hands of this commission, and they set standards for redistricting, hold hearings, and then the commission files its plan with the secretary of state and goes out of existence. I think that the state should clearly consider passing laws or constitutional amendments that limit redistricting to once in a decade. That would solve some of the problems. But as things currently exist, one of the positive things is that when states like Georgia do churn the process, when the Republicans get the upper hand, they're going to do it the Democrats because the Democrats did it to them when they had the upper hand, at least one of the things that protects the interest of minority voters is Section 5. And if we are going to continue to have this kind of churning process, if the legislatures aren't going to exercise any constraint, it just underscores the need for Section 5 and federal oversight.

MR. BLACKSHER: Could I add something to pick up on something that McLaughlin is talking about? There is a -- I think one of the biggest -- and I don't know why I didn't think of this before when we were talking about strengthening the Section 5 -- there is -- there's a big problem in Judge Higginbotham's majority opinion in -- what is it -- Sessions versus Perry, the Texas Congressional redistricting case -- in which he rejected the arguments that Texas' mid-decade Congressional redistricting plan violated Section 5 -- violated Section 2, as well as -- by the time it got to court, it had already been precleared by the Justice Department. And the argument that Judge Higginbotham accepts is that if the Legislature gerrymanders for political reasons that -- predominately over racial reasons -- that is, if the Latinos and African-Americans in Texas get caught up in partisan politics, then somehow the Voting Rights Act doesn't apply. Now, that is to me a serious emerging danger that needs to be addressed legislatively, that even -- the law ought to be clear. That even if there are strong partisan motives behind any particular voting rights or election law, that if it does disadvantage protected minorities, it violates the law, and it can't stand. Partisan politics has to yield to the historical problem of vote dilution against racial and ethnic minorities in this country. It's as simple as that.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Moten.

DR. MOTEN: Attorney Blacksher and Senator Singleton's comments and the discussion about what state measures might be considered or taken raises -- or strikes me and raises a question for me, and that is, for you, Senator, particularly with respect to the efforts to intimidate voters, is there anything legislatively that you can do or that the Alabama Legislature can do to augment the Voting Rights Act with respect to, you know, some of the blatant examples that I heard you give about voter intimidation?

MR. SINGLETON: Yeah. There have been some attempts to do that, but we're still in the south. And there have been a lot of filibuster in terms of election laws here in the state of Alabama. We went through HAVA trying to make sure that we could put some provisions in HAVA in terms of a strengthening. Right now, our secretary of state, being the chief voting electoral officer in the state, does not have enforcement laws to be able to try to help enforce that. The attorney general right now does not have enforcement laws, or they try to put it back on each constitutional provision. But what we're looking at is that we're having that fight here in the old south still, when we come up for election laws, trying to strengthen them to make sure that we at least look at the strength of the provisions of Section 5 to make sure that there's adequate protection for voting rights for the citizens of the state of Alabama. Again, we are met with a lot of resistance.

DR. MOTEN: Attorney, do you have any suggestions?

MR. BLACKSHER: As Senator Singleton knows -- and I think as you know, Professor -- the problem -- we're talking about generations, in an earlier panel, of the Voting Rights Act, about first getting the franchise, and then having to deal with election structures that dilute black voting strength. We're in a generation now that I think Lani Guinier has called third generation, where you've got African-Americans, Latinos, other protected minorities in office. And then the question becomes, once they get in office, how -- how do they -- how do they develop the ability to promote a legislative agenda such as this? And the fact is that in Alabama -- and I think most every place else in the south, even a place like -- even a state like Alabama that has black proportional representation in both houses of the State Legislature, the black caucus -- well, first of all, is never completely united on most issues, and that's not surprising because they're politicians too. And -- and we know that that's going to be difficult. But there are issues that come up. Like last week, when there was a -- a unanimous vote by the black caucus to boycott Auburn athletics until certain employment problems were cleared up over there. Well, that stirred up a big hornets nest with their fellow Democrats, if you will, the white Democrats. The problem is that the black legislators, even when they're united to block legislation for the passing, but it's very difficult for them to get --

MR. SINGLETON: Passed.

MR. BLACKSHER: -- a positive agenda through that directly and openly concerns the interests of the -- of African-Americans. And that in itself is a clear sign of why we still need the protections of the Voting Rights Act. And until we can talk openly and legislate affirmatively in the south and for even outside the south on some of these issues, then the circumstance that the Voting Rights Act is -- was put there to address continues, and those protections are needed.

DR. MOTEN: Thank you.

MS. MAJETTE: Can I just follow up?

MR. LEE: Sure.

MS. MAJETTE: On that -- on that issue, Mr. Blacksher, would you -- would you say that that also applies to -- to women as a minority in terms of particularly in the legislative arena, that we're not just talking about racial minorities, but we're also talking about women who are elected to -- to office at the state level or the federal level not being able to -- as you put it, to move an agenda or to be able to have that kind of influence because of their minority status in that capacity? So would the -- would the strengthening of Section 5 affect the ability of women to be able to move their agenda as well?

MR. BLACKSHER: Well, as a matter of law, the Voting Rights Act does not address the problems or does not create a category of women as a protected minority group.

MS. MAJETTE: But if you look at it in the practical -- in the practical aspect.

MR. BLACKSHER: The practical aspects are similar in terms of the way the legislative dynamic works, that's true. But in terms of why you would need -- and I think this is important, because there -- whether you think of women as a minority group -- there are many minority interests that are oppressed or at least subordinated in the political processes all over the country, and they deserve a fair shake. But the only reason we have a Voting Rights Act is because we live in the United States of America, which has a particular history, that the only major western democracy that was founded on slavery to begin with. And it's that history that the Voting Rights Act addresses, and we shouldn't forget that the particular -- the particular evil, if you will, that the Voting Rights Act is intended to address are the vestiges of slavery and segregation. And those are the -- those are the reasons why we need -- the Voting Rights Act is not like some sort of a universal platonic law that should apply across the board everywhere in every place. It is an artifact of our history, and it addresses a very specific historic problem. Now, the problems of Native Americans, of Latinos, of Asians, of other minorities who are protected groups have built on that through legislative action. And it would be -- it would be up to women's groups to -- to put together some sort of a legislative agenda that addressed in a coherent way their problems. And so far, I don't -- I don't know anything about how that's developed.

MS. MAJETTE: Thank you.

MR. LEE: I just wanted to ask one or two questions, and then Chandler Davidson wants to ask a few.

Ms. Earls, I wonder if you could expand upon your comments about the Section 5 Unit of the Justice Department and the Civil Rights Division, functioning as a -- I think you used the term "technical assistance." How do you quantify or document that -- that phenomenon? I ask this because during your testimony, I recalled that during my time in the Department there were actually several jurisdictions who -- who requested of the Department that observers be sent to monitor their elections. The Senator spoke about monitors. And it struck me at the time as rather remarkable that a jurisdiction would actually ask for monitoring. But at this point in preparing a report, how do we document that phenomenon? How do we quantify? And how do you --

MS. EARLS: Well, two ways come to mind. One, there's probably some sort of -- possibly some sort of public records request that would -- would -- that you could get from the Department information about, possibly contacts that they've had with jurisdictions. I don't know how much of it is public information. I mean, a lot of this is just in the personal experience of the career attorneys that have been there over the years, and, you know, know how often they get calls from jurisdictions wanting assistance. So I'm not -- that would be one way to approach it. And the other way would be to go to the elections officials themselves and find out from them, you know, how helpful has the Department been to them. And I think that some would be candid to say, yes, they've been helpful. Beyond that, I think it's -- it's not as formal as the submission objection letter process, so it's hard to get at. But -- and also I suppose people who have -- were in the Department and left, perhaps, could talk about their experiences.

MR. LEE: Since we have -- thank you. Actually, those are good ideas. Since we have lawyers who practice in the area, have practiced for so many years, it would be of help to the Commission to -- to get your ideas as to testimony in cases or court records. That would be helpful to the Commission. And I wonder, what do you think, Mr. McDonald, about how that could be accomplished?

MR. MCDONALD: Well, we do plan to do a comprehensive report, and it will really build in part on this kind of thing, the request of judicial notice, because we've got all of the documents in a big box, so we don't have to go out and do the research to figure out what the cases were. But we will do a major document, which will discuss in detail all of the lawsuits and the Section 5 problems that we know about since 1982, and we'll, of course, make that available to the Commission as a work in progress.

MR. LEE: You'll be addressing both 203 and --

MR. MCDONALD: Our office has really had very little experience in Section 203, so we don't really have very much to say about that. But we've done a lot of work in recent years in Indian country, and that would be a major part of what we've done. I was telling Commissioner Meeks that I have written an article which has just been published by the American Indian Law Review about the recent voting rights litigation in South Dakota, and I'll certainly make that available to the Commission.

MR. LEE: How about you, Mr. Blacksher? Would it be possible to get some help from you identifying testimony and reports in your cases?

MR. BLACKSHER: Yes. But I think -- I actually think there are several professors -- maybe some of them who are here now and in some groups -- perhaps Marcia could tell us -- that are working on precisely these projects. I know each of these organizations -- I think -- I think there will be a fairly comprehensive summary of just about everything useful that's been in the case law, as well as, I think, there are already studies under way, I think, maybe people like Peyton McCrary are involved in, in gathering some of the information that Anita was just talking about with respect to matters that never surfaced in the preclearance process.

MR. MCDONALD: Could I just add, that part of the problem is that a lot of stuff is not reported. I mean, consent degrees where -- so, I mean, we have got -- I mean, a lot of the stuff in this request for judicial notice, there are consent degrees that are not reported. So if we had the decrees and we had these documents, we can make them available to you on a CD-ROM or something. So we could make all of this available. And we've done something like this in many of the states in which we've done litigation; in Tennessee and in Georgia, for example. We are happy to share all of that. But I think that what we do intend to do is to write a report and -- you know, sort of, in English that will talk about all of this and try to give some kind of form.

MR. BLACKSHER: I'll send you a consent decree.

MR. LEE: Ms. Lobos, we really would appreciates it if MALDEF could be doing this as well. I hope you'll tell me that MALDEF is already doing this.

MS. LOBOS: Yes. I think our national office is actually working on something that -- I can forward this -- this to them and have something for you also.

MR. LEE: Thank you very much. I wanted to ask one general question and turn it over to Commissioner Davidson, Senator. This is for all you. Why should white people in Alabama care about the Voting Rights Act? We've heard a lot a testimony about the African-American population, Latino population. But I just wondered, what do you say to people in Alabama --

MR. BLACKSHER: Maybe Reverend Buchanan would be better to answer that than I could.

MR. BLACKSHER: Yeah. Laying the burden down, Mr. Buchanan?
MR. BUCHANAN: Liberation from the scales over our eyes and the chains of prejudice and -- and the knowing that -- know who our brothers and sisters are and learning how to call them by their names and understanding their rights are as precious under the Constitution as our own and deserve our full protection, given the great privilege to participate in the process. I think more good has been done -- well, when Billy Graham came to Alabama -- I'm sorry. When Billy Graham came to Birmingham, Alabama, he wouldn't come until we would desegregate the audience. And for a while, nothing happened, and then they decided they would have something at Legion Field, and everybody could come who wanted to hear Billy Graham. So when the event finally came and the place was full, and Bear Bryant, the only person since Jesus that could walk on water -- Bear Bryant --
MR. LEE: We are in Alabama.
MR. BUCHANAN: -- walked all the way from one end of Legion Field to the other to get up on the platform giving his blessing to that gathering. Now, he was neither a racist nor a fool, because he was a football coach. And he had watched how in Birmingham and other places in Alabama these wonderful athletes which graduated from high schools and going off to other states because they couldn't get into state universities. And it wasn't just that he was emancipating; it was just that he was a realist and he understood how much the athletic achievements of those universities would improve if everybody could come to the University of Alabama and Auburn University and the others. And if you look at what has happened to the voting process, rather than having once segregationists and one white supremacist trying to out-hate the other to get the votes of a portion of the population, you have a political process in which there is an honest chance for an honest person on a responsible platform to win on something other than trying to out segregation everybody else. That has been a real emancipation for Alabama politics through these years since 1965. And it's been a step-by-step process.
But I think the white population of Alabama and her sister states has much -- has been as beneficial to that population -- what has happened has been beneficial to the white population as it has the black population. We are one people, thank God. And may we be so to a greater extent than we are. Now, I have really done it because for about the fourteenth time instead of asking a question, I act like a (inaudible) --
MR. LEE: I don't think it's possible to supplement that answer.
MR. BLACKSHER: Can I try -- to follow up on what -- the 1901 Constitution, Reverend Buchanan, remember, which the courts -- the Supreme Court of the United States has found and was brought for one person, and that was to disfranchise blacks. But the white northern counties, the white -- what we call the white counties or the hill counties in Alabama in 1901 resisted the conservative -- the big mules and the Bourbon forces, the rural forces, that wanted to put all these caps on property taxes and fundings because they wanted funding for their schools. And they tried every which way to get around the race problem in order to get money for their own -- for the white schools.

And they were unsuccessful, because when the race card was played, they had to follow the white supremacy line. And to this day, Alabama has the worst funded schools, public schools in the United States. There was an article in this morning's paper about Montgomery County's got the lowest property tax -- or maybe it was -- I'm sorry, it was Autauga County. Autauga. The lowest of all 128 school districts in this state. And the story is still the case in the Legislature of Alabama today, which is in regular session right now, that the interests of progress for white folks will be blocked until we can put down this burden of racial slavery, segregation, and white supremacy. It's as simple as that.

MR. LEE: Ms. Earls.

MR. EARLS: I don't know that I can be of help or address Alabama, but I would have two responses to that question. First, a lot of the changes that have a disproportionate impact on black voters and are, therefore, retrogressive still hurt white voters. In the example of the out-of-precinct provisional ballots, there were 36 percent that were African-American voters, but there's that other, you know, 64 percent that were white voters who want their votes to count as well. And my second response deals with redistricting. What we found about the North Carolina's Congressional districts, when they were redrawn to provide an opportunity for black voters in the 12th District and the 1st Congressional District of North Carolina, those districts were also the most poorest in the state. And they were the most homogeneous districts. And so for the first time we had an urban district that allowed urban poor whites to have representation, where before they had been submerged in a system that didn't represent their interests. And so there are ways in which white voters really do benefit from districting that provides opportunities for minority voters.

MR. LEE: Senator Singleton.

MR. SINGLETON: And I agree with her in terms of follow up. And what you see in Alabama in some of the rural poorer counties is that poor whites benefit even from this. In terms of when you're looking at at-large elections, there was a lot of discrimination. Not by race, but even so by class. Even in the white community, whether or not poor whites could even run for particular offices versus -- that it was just for big, rich white landowners. So based on us having that right for preclearance and have single-member districts and -- poor whites are at least given the chance, even in some areas of district, to be able to be represented in government.

MR. LEE: Ms. Lobos.

MS. LOBOS: I just say you just hit it right there. I think a lot of times -- we need to be participate in the political process. And so it's something that nationwide -- that, you know, in Alabama, in all these states, we want people to participate. And so white voters benefit by more people participating, especially when there is some -- a piece of law that will affect a white voter; not a Latino voter or a black voter, but mostly a human; you know, there's a piece of legislation that's affecting them. And this ability to have more people participate helps everyone.

DR. DAVIDSON: Well, I'm beginning to sound a little like a stuck record, but I have a question here for Ms. Butler and also for Ms.

Lobos. Both of you list many examples of racial discrimination in voting in Georgia. And I'm wondering if you have files or archives of these that you can share with our Commission.

MS. BUTLER: In Georgia we do. In 2000 the NAACP conducted a hearing where we had citizens to actually come in and do testimony, and that is on file in both Fulton County and Dekalb County. And we also have -- as a part of our ongoing process, we have what we call an Incident Report Form, where we collect data with regards to voting problems that people have experienced. And so that is documented, and we can make that available.

DR. DAVIDSON: Wonderful. Thank you.

MS. LOBOS: And recently, we -- we conduct -- we have a report of all the different issues that we saw nationwide, and so we can have that for you.

DR. DAVIDSON: Okay. Thank you. And I have one more question here, which I'll just address to anyone who wants to answer it. Ms. Butler mentioned that there are now bills, as I understand it, in the Georgia Legislature that are essentially pretty onerous: ID requirements for the voters. And this is part of a larger pattern across the country. We're beginning to see many of these bills. And a lot of them have already been passed. I think one was passed recently in South Dakota. But I'm wondering, is there any way that the Voting Rights Act can be used to deal with this to the extent that it is a method of a vote suppression?

MS. BUTLER: I'm not a lawyer, but I think certainly that it's requiring -- putting restrictions on them that will impact a minority -- minority groups more so than other majority groups. So I don't know. But I believe that this change in the process, because it is a part of the process, HAVA required -- gave an extension or enhanced the way that people can really vote to make it easier to vote, where you could have 17 pieces of ID, and this, then, takes it back and makes it more restrictive. So from that prospective, that it's being a process or change in the law, I believe that under Section 5 that would be covered.

MS. EARLS: It is true the Department in the past has issued objections to ID requirements, particularly where there -- evidence that it would be a greater burden for minority voters and also particularly where there was no alternative to sign a statement certifying that you are who you say you are. And that's prior to HAVA. And I'm not sure if there's been anything since HAVA. And the second avenue, it seems to me, would just depend on the proof. But I think particularly when we get complaints that, at certain polling places, election officials are only asking black voters for ID, that can be addressed under Section 2, and I believe that the Justice Department filed a case in Michigan dealing with Arab-Americans being asked for ID when other people weren't. So that's also possible.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Meeks has to leave to catch an airplane. I would like to thank Commissioner Meeks, because I think she actually travelled the longest distance in time to get here. And she has to catch a flight, so I told her we'd give her an opportunity to make a closing statement.

MS. MEEKS: I have been so pleased to be a part of this today, and I look forward to continuing this. But you all gave such wonderful testimony.

And I think the work that we do has got to have an impact; that the Voting Rights Act, that we should be able to prove without a doubt that this is so important, ongoing; that it hasn't -- things haven't changed so much. In fact, things have gotten more complicated. So I appreciate all the work you do and thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you very much to all the panelists on this wonderful panel, and we'll take a short recess. (Brief recess taken.)

MR. LEE: Okay. We -- we're now ready to resume the first hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. And we have had panels today about the history from academics, lawyers, and advocates. And at this point, we have a session devoted to members of the public who have asked to speak. And so if the first witness would sit down and get comfortable and identify herself, we will begin.

MS. WHITLOW: All right. Good evening, everybody. My name is Willie Mae Whitlow, and I'm a resident --

MS. WHITLOW: I'm a resident of Montgomery, Alabama, for the last half-century or better, but I was born and raised in Macon County, Tuskegee Alabama. Educated through high school up there. Educated through college at Alabama State. I have been a long, long fighter for equal rights. And when I look on these papers and it says that a -- civil rights community, kind of puzzles me, as to what is meant by a civil rights community. Because to me, there was human rights. And if those who have considered themselves the supreme powers of this nation were to consider human rights, we would all be equal and there would be no need for what we are saying and doing here today. But since it is, I just want to say that I have lived -- and you can look at me and tell I have lived through Jim Crowism. I have lived through the fight for equal rights for our people, which, in my opinion, should include everybody. When I was a very young child, I didn't know the difference between whites and blacks. Because we lived in Macon County, and I guess the poorest of us, both black and white, kind of lived around together. We played together; we ate together; we slept on the porches of each other's house. But when we got ready to go to school -- and my family; there were people who looked like you, including my grandfather, and there were people who looked like me. There were people all around us who looked like each other. And I didn't know the difference until we got ready to go to school. There were the white children -- and the little white girl was my special friend. Same age. We got ready to go to school, and we had to go to different schools. That's when we began to question, why do we have to go to different schools; we love each other; we live together? Then I had to ask my mother and my father, why is it? And she asked her parents. I don't know what her parents told her. But my parent told me, it's because some people think they have a right to everything good and right over other people, but that does not make it the truth, because we weren't made that way. And so I learned -- when I first knew this -- like I say, we played together. We didn't know any difference. But once all of this came to -- into our minds -- certain things have to be learned; people don't -- born not liking each other or knowing what's low class and upper class and all. People are not born knowing that; they are taught that. Because once we were taught that, then we began to look at each other with different eye sights. And goose pimples would pop out on me and I suppose on her when we touched each other. Then we had to go through a period of getting over that so that we had -- we tried, that little girl and I, tried to get over that, tried to get it through to our parents that this wasn't right, but we couldn't do it, because they wouldn't listen. But as time went on and I come through high school and began to think that I ought to have some privileges to vote because that's the way I found out that people were put into places of power over other people. And so I decided, then, I want to vote too, because I want to be in a position so I can make it right for everybody. But I found out that I couldn't vote. Guess what I ran into, the obstacle the obstacle that I ran into? Anybody can think of it here? Grandfather clause. Remember that one? Anybody know what that means? Anybody? Nobody knows?

MS. MAJETTE: If your grandfather couldn't vote, then you can't --

MS. WHITLOW: If your grandfather was not a registered voter, you can't register to vote. And what grandfather -- although my grandfather looked like you-all, because he was the son of his slave -- mother's slave master, he still couldn't vote. Because back then, you had a little bit of black blood in you, you had to go on with the people who didn't amount to anything. But he couldn't vote. Neither could any of us. So I set out along with other people who were interested and who were concerned to try to get rid of that. And so we worked -- and I don't know of anybody in this building might know of a man named Mr. Rufus Lewis. He was a coach for years at Alabama State, so he got dubbed Coach Lewis. He and some other men back then during the middle and late '40s on into the '50s set out to try to get black people registered, and that grandfather clause had them stumped. So we worked hard to get rid of that grandfather clause. Guess what we ran into after that? I think I heard it back here.

UNIDENTIFIED SPEAKER: Poll tax.

MS. WHITLOW: Poll tax. Now, it wasn't a whole lot of money. Something like anywhere from 5 to 6 maybe 7 or $8, but back then, that was a whole lot of money for people who were making 50 cents a day and had families to take care of. Y'all think I didn't live through the time when you made 50 cents a day to work, huh? I did. Right up there in Macon County. And they -- we were having to take a little bit of that money that we had and pay a poll tax, not one year just to get registered, but every year. But we fought, and we worked, and we got rid of that eventually. And then they came up with this long drawn-out literacy test. Anybody remember that? Anybody in here remember that one, huh? I do. Because we got copies of it knowing that our people who could scramble up on a little bit of money and got registered, a view of us here and there, when this literacy test thing came out, they didn't know anything about it. And some of this -- the irrelevant -- and I don't want to call it the other name that's really terrible: How many bubbles are in a bar of soap? That's how ridiculous it was. But we had to work through it. And so Coach Lewis, who was really a hard worker, and we went from county to county in this state, especially all the rural counties, precinct by precinct, street by street, house by house encouraging and helping and teaching people to vote, to overcome that thing. We had to contend with that up until the Voting Act was eventually passed --

MR. LEE: Ms. Whitlow, you know, your testimony has been really very moving --

MS. WHITLOW: Beg your pardon.

MR. LEE: Your testimony is very moving. I wonder, since we have some people following you, if you could --

MS. WHITLOW: Kind of speed it up?

MS. LEE: Try to speed it up maybe like a minute or so.

MS. WHITLOW: But I think everybody will tell you that I'm a firm believer in giving some background sometimes.

MS. LEE: You have done that.

MS. WHITLOW: Coming up to this -- back then, when we only had -- had been able to get a few people registered to vote, the black vote didn't matter anyway, because there wasn't enough of us to make any difference to the candidates. But we still plunged on. And now we come to this voting -- Voting Rights Act. And it has to be upgraded every so often, is why we're sitting here. And my thing is, why is that? Once you recognize that you have wronged a people by taking away or disfranchising them and you say that this is wrong; we're going to make it right so we're going to pass it a Voting Rights Act, why couldn't it be permanent so this wouldn't be necessary? Somebody said that all of this is a waste of time. And it is a waste of time, a waste of energy, a waste of money and all of that. So let me say in closing, we need to say to those powers that be from this commission if we are to give a report as to what we felt in this community, you tell them that this person believes that the Voting Rights Act in the first place was necessary, because everybody already ought to have a right to vote, and that this should be the final act of correction so that we won't have to come back and waste time and money doing this again.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Ms. Whitlow.

DR. DAVIDSON: Thank you very much.

MR. BUCHANAN: Amen. MS. WHITLOW: You-all be blessed, and let us all do the right thing and make things right once and for all.

MR. BUCHANAN: You've blessed us, Ms. Whitlow.

MS. WHITLOW: Thank you much. You-all have blessed us just by being here, but just remember, that it is all so unnecessary and shouldn't be again.

MR. LEE: Sir, would you identify yourself?

MR. COOLEY: My name is Fletcher Earl Cooley, native of Montgomery Alabama. And the reason I requested to follow the first speaker is that I thought she explained the hurdles and obstacles that have been continually placed in front of minorities in their effort to participate as full citizens of this country. I also feel very strongly that if we as a country -- and we do this quite well; we spend money quite well; and we go to war quite well; and we find money to finance wars quite well, but we can't find money to nurture the needs of our own people. I truly feel that all of this is not about black and white. It's not necessarily about rich and poor. But it is about equity versus inequities and who are the benefits of the equity and who are the beneficiaries of inequity? If, in fact, we can propose in the Iraqi Constitution the rights to protect minorities, why can't we have in our own Constitution the rights permanently presented to protect minorities? We can avoid the -- Afghanistan going through the 19th Amendment or the 18th Amendment for women's suffrage and can demand that that be in their constitution, and yet we have all of these obstacles and hurdles in our own Constitution. So the point is, as the first speaker said, we waste too much money talking. And we talk things to death, which aren't necessary. If, in fact, our leaders see a necessity to protect Iraqis and to lose 15,000 lives and billions of dollars, why can't they have that same feeling for the slaves who built this country?

MR. LEE: Thank you, sir, for your testimony. Please have a seat and could you identify yourself?

MS. WANGAZA: My name is Efia Wangaza. I am the coordinator of the South Carolina Chapter of the Malcolm X Grassroots Movement for Self-Determination. And I'm wanting -- I will make available, as I've told your staff, a copy of the transcript that was the result of hearings that were initiated in Greenville, South Carolina, on January 22nd, hosted by the Greenville Legislative Black Caucus, which was to assess the events of the 2004 election. Despite icy, cold rains, we had members of the community to come out and to talk about their voting experience. And to build on the points that have been made by the previous two speakers, I would simply say that the obstacles that they described have simply mutated into various other forms. And those forms tend to escape the current definition, certainly of preclearance, as I read it. For instance, the changes -- deregulation -- FCC deregulation has a direct impact on a candidate's ability, and thus the black communities' ability to participate in the electoral process. The last election, the campaigning was either radio or television. Without an equal time requirement, people who did not have money, which is characteristic or typical for people of color, had little or no access to the media. Another example of undermining these electoral abilities has to do with the destruction of neighborhoods, either as represented by a, say, (inaudible), where we wind up with scattered sites, Section 8 vouchers, or public housing communities destroyed and half the families or housing being restored and even less of those people being able to afford the housing, which means that by the next census, the number of people who were originally in that district has been substantially reduced, and, therefore, that community is grafted onto a white community, which means that we expect in South Carolina the number of black elected officials to decline with the next census. Another point that was raised in the hearings was that of felony disenfranchisement. The south has characteristically used the criminal justice system as a mechanism for disenfranchising people, and it has -- that continues to this date. I've listened with interest through today's session. Having been involved in voter education and registration since I was 13 years old with the NAACP youth and college chapters and then as a college student with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and I am fascinated that -- with the consternation that there are no -- were no statewide elected officials in North Carolina since 1982. There hasn't been any in South Carolina since Reconstruction. And I don't think South Carolina is peculiar in that regard. I think that the question as to whether or not the Voting Rights Act ought be extended is -- is rhetorical, but a more substantial question is the question that Ms. Whitlow raised, and at what point do we begin with the cause? And that is white supremacy. Thank you.

MR. LEE: One -- I think we would like to ask you some questions.

MS. WANGAZA: Certainly.

DR. DAVIDSON: You mentioned a transcript of the hearings, which I believe were held, you said, in Greenville, South Carolina?

MS. WANGAZA: That's right.

DR. DAVIDSON: If you can make those available to our commission -

MS. WANGAZA: Yes, I will.

DR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MS. WANGAZA: I thought you would appreciate that.

MR. LEE: Thank you very much. Sir, would you please have a seat and identify yourself?

MR. JEMISON: Yes. I'm Apostle James -- Apostle James Jemison, J-E-M-I-S-O-N. I'm with Alabama Alliance to Restore the Vote. Also the Alabama Coalition on Black Participation -- Civic Participation. I've been involved with getting people registered to vote for the past 15 years. This past election or -- we worked with the NAACP Voters Fund, and we had the opportunity of coordinating three counties where we had gotten over 14,000 people registered to vote, and the majority of those are right here in Montgomery County. Had the opportunity to meet a lady that was 74 years old that never voted because of the Ku Klux Klan threatening her neighborhood that she lived in, she was just afraid to vote. And so we encouraged her and got that lady registered to vote. We also have been very instrumental in getting disenfranchised ex-felons their voting rights back. We are also trying to get their pardons, where they can be full pardoned, in order to get back into the system of voting, and also being able to have decent jobs to provide for their family. So my main issue is human rights. I feel that a voting right is a human right; a right that shouldn't be taken away from any man or woman that comes of legal age of understanding the power of a vote. They should be able to vote. And I think the biggest problem that we are having now is that problem of people voting for the powers that be. And I mainly think that disenfranchising was the worst thing that could ever happen to any man. You know, regardless of what -- a person go to jail, pays his -- do his time, pay his fine, he should be automatically welcomed back into the system. Even if he did his time, he should be welcomed back into the system to vote. Myself, I -- I got in -- I remember -- 1965, I was 13 years old when the march came here from Selma to Montgomery. And I had the opportunity to see a guy. He was an Asian. This guy was a deadly martial artist. He got whipped by policemen right here in Montgomery on High and Jackson. Could have whipped all of those polices. But he took a beating, serious beating, and I think that beating changed my life; made me saw things different. You understand that? Fighting with my fists all the time didn't win. That man won that day when he stood up and took a beating for my rights. He didn't even live in the United States. He was just like Gandhi in another country, and that he wanted to fight for equal rights for everybody, where people had been getting killed, getting their homes burned, losing family members just for the sake of a vote. You know, I think we need to go back to do the human thing, the godly thing, and that is allow God's people to be a part of the system.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Jemison.

MR. FOSTER: Good afternoon, Chairman, members of the Commission. My name is Claude Foster. I'm also a native of Selma, Alabama. I grew up there. I went to segregated schools there for a while. My current position is with the NAACP National Voter Fund. The NAACP National Voter Fund was established in 2000 by the NAACP as a free-standing 501(c)(4) organization with permission to engage in civic participation, community-based mobilization, and education and awareness campaigns surrounding key communities of color. I'm also a member of the Texas HAVA Commission, and prior to my appointment as a -- the National Field Director for the NAACP National Voter Fund, I served as Regional Director for the Voter Empowerment Program in Region 6, which included the states of Texas, Arkansas, Louisiana, New Mexico, and Oklahoma. I tend to agree with everything that's been said today. Doctor Chandler, if you -- I mean, Dr. Davidson, if you really want some documentation on why it's important to extend the Civil Rights Bill, just read his testimony from the redistricing hearings in Texas. I've never seen a more stronger argument and more compelling case to extend the Voting Rights Bill. In Texas we conducted hearings after the 2000 election, and we made those hearings available too about the climate in all the major urban -- major urban cities, along with Martin Frost. We conducted hearings in east Texas, which -- where a lot of African-Americans reside. We conducted hearings in Dallas County, which is Dallas, Texas; in Harris County, which is Harris, Texas. Also I had the opportunity to work a nonpartisan Get Out the Vote campaign and voter registration campaign in 2003 in the Houston mayoral election. In that election, there were -- stressing the need for Section 5, there was -- the City of Houston -- or the county changed about 200 precincts right before the election and didn't tell anybody. It took the NAACP leadership, political leadership, to sit down and have a special meeting using Section 5 as a leverage to get them to hone up -- because at first they were just saying it was going to be about 19 precincts. So without that legislation, the full disclosure of the number of precincts they had to change would have never been brought to the light. And most of those precincts were in African-American communities. But, you know, I agree with everything that's been said, but I just want to talk about another, I think, more compelling reason to support extension of the Voting Rights Act. There's been recent articles in the newspapers about the military -- or having a hard time meeting their recruitment goals, especially amongst African-Americans and Latinos. And I think that -- my own brother served in the first Gulf War, my dad served in the Korean War. I also served in the military for a while, the United States Air Force, and retired honorably for the reasons that we thought America would one day live up to its creed of having a democracy that everyone could enjoy. But, you know, my brother right now in Fayetteville,

North Carolina, this weekend has been participating in an anti-war rally, because he is sickened by the fact that there is even any discussion that the Voting Rights Bill is not going to be reauthorized. And I would encourage the Commission to look at -- not only that aspect of it, because I think the arguments -- just like Truman made the arguments about the Civil Rights Bill and our -- our image in the world, I think the Commission should look at that argument, because the argument for Brown versus the Board of Education was not a political or legal argument; it was a compelling argument based on what was fundamentally right. And I think that when you look at what -- the military is having a hard time with its recruitment goals and people are aware, and I think that there is an unwillingness on behalf of African-Americans and Latinos to serve. So I see this as a national security issue as well as a civil rights issue, because the NAACP, a lot of other groups, did a lot of work in Ohio to try to make up -- did a lot of work around election protection to try to adjust the problems in Florida in 2000, and you saw what happened in 2004. Over 120,000 people in Ohio were denied the right to vote. Now, I served on the HAVA Commission. As long as states have control over elections, there is going to be a continuing need for civil rights legislation and the Voting Rights Act. Because whether it is the NVRA, which the states never fully implemented, whether it's HAVA, which the states never fully implemented -- I served on the HAVA Commission, and I'm telling you, there is no -- there is no driving force on behalf of partisan election officials to meet the -- the intent of HAVA, which was to address a lot of the disenfranchising problems in Florida in 2000. In fact I attended the National Secretaries of State's annual winter meeting in Washington, DC, and they even passed a resolution to do away with the Election Assistance Commission, because they didn't want to see the Election Assistance Commission turn into an agency that oversaw state elections, which they view as a states-rights issue. So for those reasons alone, I would urge the Commission to continue to take testimony, but understand, that I think that there's a national security concern here, because many, many military folks that I've talked to back in Texas and many parents that I've talked to, minority parents, are unwilling to send their children in a war while we sit here in America and debate on whether or not we need to extend the Voting Rights Act.

MR. LEE: Thank you, sir. Thank you for your good work with the NAACP. Sir, please identify yourself and then begin.

MR. WAGNER: Yes. I'm Reverend Earl S. Wagner. I'm with the Concerned Citizens Organization. I say greetings to the ladies and gentlemen of the Committee. I would just like to say that as Representative Steele -- or Former Senator Steele said earlier, there is a lot of racism still involved. And I say this because one of the things that happened, my daughter lives in Colorado Springs, Colorado. This was her first time being able to vote in a national election. She'd never been in trouble, straight A student, going to college, works for Carnival Cruise Lines, lives in a well-integrated neighborhood. When she went to vote, they told her she was at the wrong polling place. They sent her to another polling place. She ended up going to three different polling places, and she finally was so frustrated, she refused -- she didn't vote. But she was unaware of the provisional vote, and her fiance, he was aware; they gave him the same runaround. But when he got to the second one, he asked for a provisional ballot. But also, our organization here, we're involved in a lot of activities. And some of the things that we've seen is that this is -- what's going on now is the same thing that went on in post-Reconstruction. They're coming up with low-level crimes and they give you long jail time, and they find a way to give you a felony. And what they did in the post-reconstruction, that was to get the black elected officials out of office; that was to keep the blacks from having a large voting pool. And what we see now -- we see a pattern of the police and the judicial system fabricating minor violations, and they turn them into a larger violation in order to get a felony on the person. We had -- for example -- and we talk about the people; once they have a felony on them, it's so hard to get their right to vote back. And, for example, we had a GOP official here say, when we were talking about getting the voting rights back for ex-felons, he said he was not overly concerned about it because most ex-felons vote Democratic. In some instances, we've asked the Justice Department to investigate and substantiate -- we asked them to investigate various civil rights issues about police planting evidence and that type of thing, and they say, it's up to us to investigate the crime. And I would just like to say, if you compare some of the statistics -- sometimes all of the professionals don't compare statistics. But if you look at some of the information provided by the Justice Policy Institute in regard to drug convictions and disenfranchisement, versus the black and white population, you'll see that on average -- their very last statistics I looked at was 74 percent of the black population in prison, federal prison, were for drugs, but blacks and whites use drugs at the same rate. I would just like to say also, one of the things that continues to go on -- Representative Holmes, I talked to him before coming over here. He represents District 80 of Montgomery. He said there's a lot of voter intimidation going on. The ID requirements, they intimidate old people. You know, the old people are not used to showing a picture ID. And some of them haven't had a picture ID before, and they catch a lot of flack. He gave an example of his 80-year-old mother so -- and the other thing he brought up to be told was the high percentage of machine malfunctions in minority districts. And as I prepare to close, I would just like to say that I entered the military in 1969. I retired in 1990. Some of the same civil and human rights issues we as black people were fighting in 1969, I find myself as a military retiree fighting all over again. I have a son that's in the navy that has fought in every battle in the Gulf except the first war. I have a son and daughter -- I had a daughter that the navy wanted to recruit to the academy, and the marines want my son. And I told my son, I did not want him going to fight a war to make Bush and Cheney rich. And I would like to close and say that we do need to extend the Voting Rights Act.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Wagner, for your testimony. Do we have any other individuals from the public who would like to speak? (No response.)

MR. LEE: Well, at this point, it might be useful if we gave the commissioners a chance to say a few words, and we could close up this session. Do you want to start, Chandler?

DR. DAVIDSON: I only want to say that, as I did this morning, I'm honored to be here, and I'm humbled by the testimony that I've heard today from different people. It's tugged at my heart strings. I thank you for coming out here today and sharing your views and your stories with me, and as a member of this commission, I will try to do justice to your testimony by incorporating what I can into the report that we will be writing for this commission. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Reverend Buchanan?

MR. BUCHANAN: I want to think, especially the public witnesses. As a representative of some Alabamians in Congress for a long time, some of the best insights I ever gained was from people like you. I thank you for caring enough to be here and to share with us your experiences and your thinking on this important subject. As we sit here, within the next several weeks, we may face a very real crisis in our country, because this filibuster, which for many years was used by southern Senators to block civil rights legislation, is now about to be perhaps done away with in order to retreat from civil rights legislation. And if that happens, then 51 Senators can vote in any judge the President sees fit to nominate no matter how unqualified or how extreme ideologue that person may be; then the federal judiciary can be impacted for a generation, and a great many rights or one may be -- back again. If that should happen, God forbid -- and it will be a lot of work to keep it from happening. Once again, our only hope is at the ballot box and free Americans taking out of office the people who got them into trouble; trying to put in office the people who will correct the situation again. So this legislation becomes once again of extreme importance. And it seems to me that a society in which everyone is permitted to vote and given equal opportunity in the world is the only real democratic society, as well as one in which minority rights are, in fact, protected. And if we want to be a model to the whole wide world, we better make sure we've got ourselves that kind of model.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Majette.

MS. MAJETTE: Thank you. And I just want to say thank you to all the witnesses today. And I certainly have been moved and informed by the testimony that we've heard, and I look forward to working with the other commissioners to make sure that we prepare the kind of report that really will reflect what has happened and be able to help Congress make the decision that it ought to make in terms of reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Moten.

DR. MOTEN: I too would like to thank all of you for coming out and sharing your heartfelt testimonies with us. I've -- I've learned a great deal today. You have demonstrated to me yet again why my decision -- or my wife's and I -- my decision to bring our family to Montgomery, Alabama, to live here in this community was the right decision. You represent in my mind the true heroes and heralds of this movement. I sat here during the course of the day listening to some of this testimony, and I thought of something I once read about a speech that Frederick Douglass had given. I believe it was in Ohio. And he had gone through this litany of what was wrong with white folks and what was wrong with slavery, and Sojourner Truth was in the audience, and I guess she had had enough, and so she just said, Frederick, is God dead? And so I don't think God is dead. I know he's not. I think of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., when -- a lot of people think of his "I Have a Dream" speech as one of the -- his best speech. I happen to think that the speech he delivered here in Montgomery at the conclusion of the Selma to Montgomery march was his finest speech. And at the end of that speech, he quotes, being the great (inaudible) that he was, several stanza from the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," because Dr. King knew that God was on your side and his side and our side. There is no doubt in my mind that, you know, the Voting Rights Act is needed, sorely, desperately, and I will do whatever I can to ensure that. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Well, I, too, would like to thank the panelists but also the audience, and the public speakers in particular. We've heard a lot of history, beginning with Gwendolyn Patton and ending with Ms. Whitlow, about the fact that we can't proceed ahead without remembering that history. We are still in this (inaudible). We've had a lot of testimony that has been frankly disturbing to us on many levels and very challenging as well. We appreciate that you've come out; that you've taken very seriously our charge and the kind of importance of this issue. We all know how important this piece of legislation has been to the soul of our nation. This is the first of several hearings. We will be moving on to other cities. But I want you to know that this was the appropriate place to launch this commission. So I thank you very much. And as, I think, Professor Davidson has said, we will try our best to put into the report the concerns you've expressed and the insight you've provided. Thank you very much.

Whereupon, the proceedings concluded at approximately 4:05 p.m., on March 11, 2005.)

SOUTHWEST REGIONAL HEARING
NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

Tempe, Arizona

PREPARED FOR: NATIONAL COMMISSION

REPORTED BY:
Marty Herder, CCR
Certified Court Reporter
CCR No. 50162

Tempe, Arizona
9:00 a. m.

MS. BARBARA ARWINE-IUTRO: Good morning, everyone. My name is Barb Arwine. I am the executive director of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law, and I am so honored to be here with all of you today.

Thank you for coming to the second hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act.

I want to thank Arizona State University and the Barrett Honors College for their tireless effort in making today's hearing possible.

I want to thank Dr. Tucker and Professor Espino for their leadership and commitment to these important issues.

And I particularly want to thank the Barrett Honors students for their dedication in assuring that all Americans have an equal opportunity to participate in political decision making.

As an activist, it always, as always, gives me hope to meet the next generation of leaders in the country's continuing fight for equality.

That hope is also exemplified in the law associates who are helping us here today from law firms throughout the United States. It is critical that young people understand the importance and are, in fact, activists in making everybody understand the relevance of this movement, and are the best emissaries to convey that message.

So I am so happy to see you.

I also want to thank our commissioners. I am humbled by their talent and skill with these issues.

We have assembled a distinguished panel of practitioners, experts, policy makers, judges, and community leaders who will hold on to a common thread of experience on the Voting Rights Act.

This distinguished panel is uniquely qualified to develop a record demonstrating the impact the Voting Rights Act has had on the ability of minority communities to exercise their political voice.

The task of this commission is nothing short of essential.

The Voting Rights Act is the culmination of years of struggle, the pinnacle of a tragic and hopeful movement that broke the shackles of Jim Crow at the ballot box.

In 2007 we must reconsider if key provisions of the act are still effective in overcoming discrimination in voting.

The record created is a result of these hearings and the commission's independent research.

We'll provide policy makers, advocates, the media, and the public an invaluable resource to begin discussions on how to make this historic piece of legislation continually relevant.

I also want to extend a special thanks to our many panelists who have flown from throughout the country to be with us today.

The Voting Rights Act is a living document. It is daily given life and actualized by the actions of citizens who register to vote, by voter registration groups, by voter education groups, by GOTV organizations, civic organizations, at the local, county, state, and national level.

We are delighted today to have witnesses from New Mexico, Texas, Arizona, Colorado, and Nevada.

Your testimony today will bring enlightenment and vital information in helping the commission to come up with a report.

I want to take this opportunity to turn the program over to the chair of the commission, Mr. Bill Lann Lee.

Mr. Lee is a partner at the law firm of Lieff, Cabraswer, Heimann & Bernstein, L. L. P. , in San Francisco.

He was the assistant attorney general for civil rights of the United States Department of Justice from 1997 to 2001.

Prior to that, Mr. Lee was an attorney with the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, for 17 years, including eight years as head of the Legal Defense Fund's western regional office.

Mr. Lee will now give his opening statement. Good morning.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you, Barbara.

Good morning and thank you for joining us for the second regional hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, which is going to cover the states of Arizona, Texas, Colorado, New Mexico, and Nevada.

Today's hearing is also the second day of a conference at Arizona State University's Barrett Honors College.

That conference is One Nation With Many Voices, the language assistance provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

Later this morning we will hear testimony about a ground-breaking study sponsored by the National Commission on minority language assistance from a team of professors and students. Excuse me, I'm losing my voice. At Barrett Honors College.

Let me begin with a little background about the Voting Rights Act.

The Voting Rights Act was signed into law in 1965 by President Linden Johnson in response to voting discrimination encountered by African-Americans in the south.

It's a story that we all know.

When Congress reauthorized the act in 1975, Congress made specific findings regarding discrimination against language minority citizens, including the use of English-only elections and other devices that effectively barred minority language citizens from participating in the electoral process.

In response, Congress expanded the act to account for discrimination against language minority citizens by enacting the minority language assistance provisions found in Section 203 and expanding the coverage of Section 5 pre-clearance provisions to Arizona and Texas. I will be saying more about Section 5 and Section 203 in a minute.

But first I wanted to give some general background on the Voting Rights Act and what is scheduled to expire in 2007 and what is not.

The right of African-Americans and other minorities to vote is guaranteed by the 15th Amendment and is permanent.

There are some permanent provisions of the act that ban illiteracy tests, poll taxes, outlaw intimidation, authorize federal monitors and observers, and create various mechanisms to protect the voting rights of the racial language minorities.

However, there are some special provisions of the act that will sunset in 2007 unless they are reauthorized by Congress.

Our primary focus today is on those special provisions.

In 2007 those three major protections are, first, Section 5 of the act requires certain states, counties, and townships with a history of discrimination against minority voters to obtain approval or pre-clearance from the United States Department of Justice or the United States District Court in Washington, D. C. , before making any voting changes.

These changes include redistrictings, changes to methods of elections, and polling place changes.

These jurisdictions must prove that the changes do not have the purpose or effect of denying or bridging the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority.

Second, Section 203 of the act requires that language assistance be provided in communities with a significant number of voting age citizens who have limited English proficiency.

Foreign language groups are covered by Section 203. American Indians, Native Asian Americans, Alaska natives, and those of Spanish heritage.

Covered jurisdictions must provide language assistance at all stages of the electoral process.

As of 2002, a total of 466 local jurisdictions across 31 states are covered by these provisions.

Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Nevada, and Texas are among those 31 states. Third, the act authorizes the Attorney General of the United States to appoint a federal examiner to jurisdictions covered by Section 5's pre-clearance provisions on good cause or to send a federal observer to any jurisdiction where a federal examiner has been assigned. Since 1966, 25,000 observers have been deployed in approximately 1,000 elections.

Let me tell you a little bit about the purpose of this commission and its membership. The nonpartisan National Commission on the Voting Rights Act was created by the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law on behalf of the civil rights community. The commission was created because constitutional standards require that Congress have before it a record of ongoing discrimination in voting in order to reauthorize the minority language and other special Voting Rights Act provisions.

The National Commission is comprised of seven advocates, academics, legislators, judges, and civil rights leaders who represent the diversity that is such an important part of our nation.

We are also fortunate to have three regional guest commissioners join us as guests today.

The commission has two primary tasks. First, to conduct regional hearings, such as this one, to gather testimony relating to voting rights. And, second, to write a comprehensive report detailing the existence and extent of discrimination in voting since 1982, the last time there was a reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act.

The commission's report will be based on facts compiled from the commission hearings, United States Department of Justice enforcement records, court opinions, and other sources. The report will be used to educate the public, advocates, and policy makers about the actual record of racial discrimination in voting.

Let me tell you about, give you a little bit of a road map of our panelists.

There will be four panelist speakers today. We will hear from leading voting rights practitioners in this region, academic experts, the public, and government officials in the first and third panels.

Each panelist will provide a seven-minute presentation. After all of the members of the panel have spoken, the commission will address questions to the panelists.

In the second panel, the lead researcher and project co-director from Arizona State University will share their insights on their ongoing study of minority language assistance. This is the groundbreaking study that I referred to earlier. We encourage members of the public who are here today to share their voting rights experiences in our fourth and final panel today. If you are interested, please speak with staff members in the back. They're standing there in the doorway.

If you would like to share your testimony, but cannot stay, please see one of the staff members in the back. We'll take your statements to be entered into the record.

I would now like to introduce the other members of the National Commission who will each make a brief opening statement.

Unfortunately, four of the commissioners were not able to join us for this hearing.

The Honorable Charles Mathias, former senator from Maryland who's the honorary chair of the commission. Dolores Huerta, co-founder of United Farm Workers of America. Elsie Meeks, the first Native American member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights. And Professor Charles Ogletree of Harvard Law School. In their place we have three guest commissioners, who I will introduce after the national commissioners.

First, never the least, Commissioner John Buchanan. Commissioner Buchanan represented Birmingham, Alabama, in the House of Representatives for 16 years. He is an ordained Baptist minister and has served churches in Alabama, Tennessee, Virginia, and Washington, D. C.

Commissioner Buchanan, would you like to say a few words?

HON. JOHN BUCHANAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

When I went from the sublime to the ridiculous and left the pastures of a Baptist church in the Birmingham area to become a member of the Congress representing that city, I was associated closely with two very distinguished members from Arizona. Senator Barry Goldwater, who was as far right as I am on this panel, as we are seated here looking at you, and Mo Udall, who was about as far left as I am to you who are looking at the panel.

And it is a pleasure to be in the state that can bring such distinguished members of Congress all across the spectrum. Right now you are governed by one of the great governors of the United States in Governor Janet Napolitano, and you are represented by perhaps the most colorful, interesting member of the United States Senate, Senator John McCain.

It's a great pleasure to be in the state of Arizona. It's also a pleasure to be at Arizona State University.

Some my daughter's best friends, among the brightest and best of them, chose Arizona State as their university of choice from the Washington area to come here because of the quality of this university. It's a pleasure to be here.

You know, our country's great strength as a whole is equal to the sum of its parts. A nation is equal to the sum of its people. Now our great strength has been in our diversity as a nation.

We're not just a melting pot. We're a rich mosaic of the world's peoples and cultures and faiths. And yet we have not been wise enough in our history always to honor the potential of our people.

I grew up in a state where we held our last hearing, Montgomery, Alabama, where a large portion of our population was denied the most basic rights guaranteed in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights of our country.

One of them was the right to vote, which was honored very poorly, if at all, by my state. And out of that came this landmark legislation, which we celebrate and which we seek to extend in 2005.

I served for a little while on the UN Commission on Human Rights, when I was -- a few years in the 1970s helping represent our country there.

In that commission, if you look at the members, you would see the worst governments on earth helping represent the UN Commission on Human Rights, the Human Rights Commission.

I would think that if these are the positions, that the patient would surely die.

But whenever I would make a speech as an American representative about the problems, human rights problems on earth and other countries, someone else, one of my colleagues would say, what about Native Americans in the United States, what about your record there. And I would have no answer.

So I look forward very much to learning some things today about how we now in this time, 2005, honor the Constitution, the Bill of Rights, the whole basic idea from which this country was created, and celebrate the diversity that is our country.

And it's a pleasure to be with you here to pursue that end.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you, Commissioner Buchanan.

Commissioner Chandler Davidson is professor emeritus in sociology and political science at Rice University. Dr. Davidson was the coeditor of the Quiet Revolution in the South, a definitive work on the impact of the Voting Rights Act in the south.

Commissioner Davidson.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you.

As I told Secretary Vigil-Giron earlier this morning, I love this part of the country. I grew up in a little town in southern New Mexico. Lordsburg, New Mexico. I'm a native Texan, but I spent my formative years in what I consider to be this part of the country. I love this country and the people in it, and I'm looking forward with great anticipation to the testimony of people before this commission today.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: And now to our three guest commissioners.

The Honorable Rebecca Vigil-Giron is the Secretary of State for the state of New Mexico and president of the National Association of Secretaries of State.

As a former head of Civil Rights Division, I can tell you this association is a very important outfit in the voting rights area.

She is the highest ranking elected Hispanic woman in the country, and the first Hispanic to serve as president of the National Association.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Thank you very much.

I'm very pleased and honored to be with all of you here today.

As Secretary of State, and as Bill mentioned, I'm the highest ranking elected state official, woman Hispanic, in the country.

We have no lieutenant governors that are Hispanic. No governors yet that are Hispanic governors throughout the United States. Women.

And so I'm very, very proud, but sad, that that is the case.

I carry my title with distinction. I represent New Mexico. I represent 19 Indian Pueblos. Two Apache tribes. The Jicarilla and Mescalero. Part of the Navajo Nation. Of course our population of Hispanic Americans, over 45 percent in the state of New Mexico, and everyone else that lives in the state of New Mexico as well, I represent them very proudly. As I go to my meetings with the National Association of Secretaries of State, at every single one since I heard that states -- that more than 31 states would be required to translate their election information into the various languages if they had more than five percent of the population as speaking other languages than English, I got very excited about that.

If this does not go through, if this portion is not reauthorized, we are going to fail our country. And I really -- I'm very, very strong in thinking that the only way that the United States and Americans can remain strong is that everyone understands, gets the amount of voter education that is necessary for everyone to participate, to know what kind of impact, at the very, very simplest level, to realize that your tax dollars are going to the infrastructure to paying my salary, to pay the president's salary, to make things happen.

You are the only ones that can make things happen, as long as you know what you're voting for and who you're voting for.

And for that I'm going to be a very, very strong voice, Bill, with our National Association, make sure that this is at the top of our agenda for the reauthorization. Thank you.

(Applause.)

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you. That was actually a very important statement. The Honorable Penny Willrich is a judge in the Superior Court of Maricopa County in Arizona. She is also the first and only African-American woman trial judge in the state of Arizona. Before ascending to the bench, she was a sole practitioner and attorney for various legal services, organizations.

Commissioner Willrich.

HON. PENNY WILLRICH: Thank you, Commissioner Lee. It's a pleasure to be here.

Good morning to everyone.

Ninety-two years ago our Arizona legislature enacted a statute that read: Every citizen of the United States and every citizen of Mexico, who shall have elected to become a citizen of the United States, who not being prevented by physical disability from doing so, is able to read the Constitution of the United States in the English language in such a manner as to show he is neither prompted nor reciting from memory, and to write his name, shall be deemed an elector of the state of Arizona.

That was in 1913.

This was known as the literacy voting law of Arizona. And it remained an enacted statute in our great state until it was repealed in 1972, even though such laws have been deemed invalid by the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

In 1973, as a citizen and college student in Texas, I was participating in a local campaign in my home town. And as we were going door to door, soliciting votes for the particular person running for office, I realized that many of the elderly residents of this small town did not realize that the Texas poll tax had been abolished by the 24th Amendment that was adopted in 1964. I took that information to the candidate that I was campaigning for, and we implemented a registration, a voter registration campaign for elderly in that particular community. And we also assisted in providing transportation for those citizens to vote.

One of those members was an elderly aunt of mine, who was 70 years old at the time, and I took her to vote for the first time in 1973.

It's with that historical backdrop that I say that I'm honored to be here today to serve as a commissioner for the Southwest Regional Hearing.

It's a privilege to be a part of this historical fact gathering process as we approach the 40th anniversary of the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

The dialogue and the exchange that we will have today will go a long way and will be vital to us taking information to Congress so that they will realize that there is an important need for reauthorization of those special sections.

I also believe that the culmination of all of the hearings will provide information and perhaps an impetus to all of us for the need for continued education in communities across this country. As long as the perception exists that voting rights can be thwarted, we all have work to do.

It's an honor to be here.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you.

Guest Commissioner Ned Norris is a representative of the Intertribal Council of Arizona, which provides a united voice for tribal governments located in the state of Arizona to address common concerns.

Those of us outside the west don't often realize that the tribal governments are sovereign institutions in fact in our history, so it's a great honor to have Mr. Norris join us.

MR. NED NORRIS, JR. : Thank you.

I just wanted to take this opportunity to make some comments in addition to the fellow commissioners' comments, and welcome everyone to this state of Arizona that's not from the state of Arizona. It's a beautiful day outside. We should have had this hearing outside. Maybe next time.

The Intertribal Council of Arizona is a nonprofit organization that represents 22 tribes within the state of Arizona, 21 tribes within the state of Arizona.

The area that we're in is really the ancestral lands of our people of the O'Odham. There are four O'Odham tribes that are related to each other. The Tohono O'Odham, which is Southwestern Arizona; the Gila River and Ak-Chin Indian Communities; and the Salt River, which is just west of Scottsdale here, east of Scottsdale here in the community.

We are all related together, and we are all descendents of the Hohokam, which are our ancestors that dwelled in this area for centuries.

In 1924 the United States Congress passed legislation extending United States citizenship to all Indians born in the United States.

In 1928, in Arizona, the State Supreme Court in Porter v. Hall decided that Indians be disqualified from voting because they were under federal guardianship, a status construed by the court to be synonymous with persons under disability.

That particular decision remained for the following 20 years.

It wasn't until 1948 when the Indians in the state of Arizona won the right to vote in a case called Harrison v. Levine, I believe it was. It was that case, two veterans of the United States armed services that challenged, that went to go to vote after having served the United States honorably in the armed forces, went to cast their votes at the election that year, and were denied, denied the right to vote.

So they challenged and were successful. And in 1948 won the right to vote for all Native Americans in the state of Arizona.

It's unfortunate that in most recent years, you know, that tribes entering into multi-million dollar gaming enterprise businesses, that it wasn't until most recent years in the establishment of these multi-million dollar gaming enterprises that the tribes began to receive some recognition. And the political power that we now are beginning to learn about and beginning to enjoy and beginning to exercise.

And, you know, in the state of Arizona there have been a number of initiatives that have come to the voting public in the state of Arizona, the most recent being Proposition 202, which was the gaming law that was passed by the state of Arizona.

I think that with that -- actually I was sharing with fellow commissioners earlier that tribes in Arizona had a major influence in the election of our current governor, Governor Janet Napolitano.

The tribes have enjoyed a very positive working relationship with the current governor. I think it was the gaming proposition and the fact that we were able to assist in impacting Governor Napolitano's election that at least in Arizona we began to really begin to feel a sense of power, of voting power, a sense that our vote is going to and can and will make a difference.

I think that for us in tribal communities where we're really trying to continue that momentum, we're really trying to get our people educated and get our people to understand the voting process and the impact that the tribal vote can have, not only in the state of Arizona, but nationally.

And so tribes are spending a lot of time, much time educating their people, going out, knocking on doors, issuing out voter election information, establishing tribal election campaigns, to Get Out The Vote campaigns.

And with the national Voting Rights Act, you know, that really is, it's really critical for us to continue the act, and in our efforts to continue the impacts that we believe we know we can have in the elections ahead of us.

So it's an honor that we have the opportunity to -- I have the opportunity to be here, and to listen to the important testimony that's going to be provided to this hearing today. And I thank you for the opportunity.

I also serve as the second vice president for the Intertribal Council of Arizona, and on behalf of Intertribal Council I welcome you to the state of Arizona as well.

Thank you.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: I'd like to thank the commissioners for those splendid statements.

The first hearing in Montgomery, Alabama, we were reminded of the history, the terrible history that brought the act into being and has made its continuation an important question to us.

Here at this hearing we are reminded by these statements that the Voting Rights Act is momentous, not just in the south but also in the western region here. And so I would like to thank the commissioners for reminding us of that.

It's now my duty to thank a lot of people.

Before we start our first panel, I want to thank the Barrett Honors College at ASU for hosting today's hearing as part of their One Nation With Many Voices conference.

I'd like to thank the college for its hospitality.

I want to thank our distinguished groups of panelists who are some of the leading voting rights lawyers, academics, and advocates.

I would especially like to thank the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law for establishing the National Commission.

And we also need to thank the national co-sponsors, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the NAACP National Voter Fund, the National Asian Pacific Legal Consortium, and the National Conference of American Indians.

I also would like to thank regional co-sponsors.

The Barrett Honors College at ASU. They've gotten thanked three times now. The Intertribal Council of Arizona, and the Maricopa County branch of the NAACP.

Last of all, I want to thank everybody in the audience for attending today's hearing. Before we commence with the first panel, we'll take a short break so we can change the location of the camera.

Thank you.

(Brief recess taken.)

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Before beginning our first panel, I need to apologize to the law firm of Fennemore & Craig, Fennemore, Craig, which has done a tremendous job of helping to staff the National Commission.

I inadvertently didn't acknowledge them. I do so now.

The first panel, Penny Pew, elections director, Apache County.

Claude Foster, national field director, NAACP, National Voter Fund.

Mr. Foster is a repeat offender since he testified at the first meeting.

Nina Perales, regional council, Mexican American Legal Defense Fund.

Andres Ramirez, Clark County, Nevada.

Alberto Olivas, director, Voting Outreach, Maricopa Community College.

And Reverend Oscar Tillman, Maricopa County branch of the NAACP.

And Robert Valencia, councilman of the -- I'm sorry, I'm going to -- Pasqua Yaqui tribe. I should point out most names in Chinese, I'm Chinese American, are one syllable.

The ground rules for this panel are that we ask each panel to speak for no more than seven minutes. If you want to speak for less, that's great. We would like for you to all testify first, so that we follow with questions after you testify.

Is there anything else?

Thank you very much.

So, why don't we start in the order I introduced everybody.

And if you could say your name and elaborate on the introduction.

Why don't we start with Penny Pew.

MS. PENNY PEW: Thank you very much.

My name is Penny Pew, and I am the elections director for Apache County. I have been elections director since June of 2001. We have a very large area, about 11,000 square miles, in our county. We have about 45,000 registered voters.

Of those, approximately 35,000 are Native American. So we have a great program. I look forward and appreciate the opportunity to share that program.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Do you want to do your testimony now?

MS. PENNY PEW: Pardon me?

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Do you want to give your testimony now?

MS. PENNY PEW: Do I need to sit here? Do I stand?

I'll sit here.

I have prepared a small sampling of our program. And I would also like to share some information from my outreach workers a little further into the presentation, if that would be appropriate. MR. BILL LANN LEE: That would be very interesting. MS. PENNY PEW: Okay.

We do have a status report that we submit to the Department of Justice after each fiscal year.

I have included that in here also.

And I will leave this as written testimony for you. I know that the observers and the program that we have developed has improved.

I know that with the Section 203 in progress that we have made leaps and bounds.

I know that in 2000 we had a total of 19,634 voters that participated at the polls, and in 2004 we had 24,335 that participated.

This is a direct reflection of the program that we're running given the demographics for our county.

We do work hard and we work a lot of hours. We have poll trainings that are conducted in various portions, parts of our county.

We go to the remote areas because a lot of our poll workers do not have transportation. They are in very remote areas. Our translator trainings are also promoted to give credence to the written.

The Navajo language is now written. I have outreach workers that now write that language. It's a very time consuming, very -- I don't want to say tedious, that's a negative word, but it is very long. And they do a fantastic job.

Each of the poll workers are given a cassette and the option to check out a cassette player to take home and practice their recordings.

That is a very crucial part to the uniformity.

We can't have poll workers that are giving their personal views on issues, and so we have written sheets of each proposition or school or county issue that may come up.

Those are given.

Our outreach team does the translator trainings. They do verbal reviews with each of the individuals that are attending.

The translators have the option to attend as many trainings as they need to, and they are compensated for each of those. They must be able to feel confident on election day, thus we don't limit them.

We have some that can attend as many as four trainings in an election cycle, especially during federal elections.

I do have power point presentations that are also in here. Each of them have a pamphlet. Also we've done brochures.

In 2000 the presidential preference in Arizona, we did a pamphlet in English, and it was so well received, the presidential pamphlet, that I asked my outreach workers if they would do one in the Navajo language. And so we have one here, and I have also enclosed this in here. Very well received.

Things like this that give a little more creativity to the program.

We all know that elections, when you say elections in a group, what do we get. Oh, my gosh.

Well, we have to have some humor. We have to have the ability to put something different into our program.

I do wear a CTR ring, and I do tell them as I'm out that it is a cruising the res ring. For those who are familiar with that, cruising the res is about what I do with 11,000 square miles of places.

We have I voted stickers that we have presented in the Navajo language. Those have been very well received.

There are just so many things that we can do to add and make our Native Americans feel a part.

I voted stickers, when you don't speak English or don't speak English fluently, that's like giving me something that's in a different language, and I wouldn't appreciate that either. I also, as we go through early voting sites -- and this is something that I believe is probably specific to our county and other areas, we have an early voting trailer that goes out and goes to the very remote areas to promote early voting and to give the voters an option to vote. Some of them must travel hundreds of miles to vote.

It has been very influential and very productive to go out to these areas.

We have one area that's on the border of Navajo County that's on the fence line, and they stand at the gate, and that's where the people come to vote.

And it's working.

We go to trading posts.

We go to chapter meetings.

And it's very important that we advertise in the newspapers and on radio. People look for us at the fairs. They know we're going to be there.

At this time I would like to bring Matthew and Virgil Attson up, if I could.

I would like them to tell you just a little bit about a chapter visit. Chapter is similar to a city council, in very -- various areas of the area.

Matthew Noble and Virgil Attson.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Ms. Pew, we look forward to receiving written materials. I guess we could set aside a few minutes to have this presentation.

Why don't you go ahead.

MR. MATTHEW NOBLE: Thank you again. Thank you again.

Ladies and gentlemen, I'm name is Matt Noble, and just a brief introduction. Normally when we come to meetings on the Navajo Nation, we give a brief introduction who we are, and especially our clans.

My clan is Edge Water People, which is Ta'bahaa; Tse nji kini, which is Honeycomb Rock People; and my paternal grandfathers are Todich'ii'ii, Bitter Water; and my maternal side of the grandfather is Ah'Sheen'ah (phonetic), which is -- call it Saltwater.

Anyway that's my four clans.

And I'll let Virgil introduce himself.

MR. VIRGIL ATTSON: Hello. My name is Virgil Attson. I work with Apache County.

I'm (inaudible).

That's who I am. And we introduce ourselves, because at one point an elderly man told me that he had to introduce himself in case we go to these chapter meetings, somebody wants to yell at you, or you have to say your clan. So just in case, you can have relatives in the audience that can back you up.

If you don't say your clan, you're on your own.

So that's what I learned.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: I think you're safe here.

MR. VIRGIL ATTSON: Mostly we do these in Navajo. Because Navajo elderly people, you know, they get mad when you talk English. Some of them don't talk English. We do a brief presentation in Navajo. They really like it, you know, and they look forward to it, especially when we go out, they come talk to us. Even when we're off, you know, they'll come talk to us, hey, tell me some more about this deal.

So I'll give this back to Matt Noble.

MR. MATTHEW NOBLE: Within Apache County, we represent, or actually we take care of 33 precincts. It's a pretty good size area.

We have three different boundaries that we -- when an election comes about, we have to identify these areas, which is we have our school districts, and on the Navajo Nation we have five school districts.

Like, for instance, in May, this year, May 17, we have a budget override election that's coming up.

These Mylar maps, they really help.

Back in, I believe, 2002, we had a school district, a budget override election. We didn't have this at the time, but with the Apache County Recorder's Office, they produced these maps for us, and they've been a great help for us too when we go to them and they create these types of tools for us to use.

At that time we had a school district election. And some of these precincts, they're divided.

Some of them, like, for instance, Kaibeto Chapter, it sits inside the Sanders school district. Also the Ganado school district.

So people get confused and they don't understand, like, for instance, the ones that are inside the Ganado school districts, they come to the -- the day of election they come out and then, you know, you tell them that the ones that are voting are the ones that are residing inside the school district.

So in order to explain it or clarify this information a lot better, we use these Mylar maps. So it helps us when we're doing our presentations at the chapters, school districts.

And also we have -- I believe the next one is the justice of the peace districts. And you can see that the boundary lines overlap the school districts. So the boundary lines are a lot different.

And also we have the board of supervisors districts.

So these overlays really help us when we're explaining things, when we are explaining what the issues are on the ballot.

Also we have --

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Sir, I wonder if you could finish in like the next two and a half minutes.

MR. MATTHEW NOBLE: Sure.

We use flip charts. We also use the power point projector, but sometimes we have to have like temporary workers that we hire on the side, and we split them, and we sometimes use these flip charts.

We use these binders so when we split up, not every one of us can carry the power point projector.

So these are very helpful tools for us when we are doing our presentations. These are just some of the tools that we brought that we wanted to present to you.

And as you can see, they're written in our language.

The federal offices, and here it says -- Washington (inaudible).

It identifies who also all is running for office. Like, for instance, United States Senator, which is Washington (inaudible).

Then we give the name of the individual that's running for that office.

So that's how we relate, relate our information to the people.

Thank you for your time.

(Applause.)

MS. PENNY PEW: I really appreciate the opportunity to do this. And I think the reauthorization will help us continue with our program.

And we do work very closely with the Navajo Nation, weekly, sometimes daily basis, as we share polling places in November with the tribal government.

Again, I thank you for your time.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Pew.

I wonder if you could hand the mike over to Claude Foster. Mr. Foster.

MR. CLAUDE FOSTER: Good morning. My name is Claude Foster. I am the national field director for the NAACP National Voter Fund. The Voter Fund was created by the NAACP in 2000 to engage primarily the African-American community, more along the lines -- MR. BILL LANN LEE: Sir, I wonder if you could speak up a little. I'm not sure people in the back can hear you. We're having problems with that mike.

MR. CLAUDE FOSTER: Can you hear me now?

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you.

MR. CLAUDE FOSTER: Again, my name is Claude Foster. I'm with the NAACP National Voter Fund.

The Voter Fund with created by the NAACP in 2000 to engage the African-American and other minority communities in issue advocacy and voter empowerment.

Prior to that position I worked for the National NAACP as a regional director.

This August we will celebrate the 40th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the act that made state laws restricting political participation by African-Americans and other minorities illegal.

The National Voter Fund recently participated in the 40th anniversary of the Selma to Montgomery voting rights march. For me, it was also a homecoming, having grown up in Selma as a youth and having participated as a youth in many demonstrations for African-Americans' right to vote.

The 1965 Selma to Montgomery march was a response to Bloody Sunday, that Sunday in March when America watched in horror as law enforcement officers viciously attacked men, women, and children at the foot of the Edmund Pettus Bridge for assembling a march for the right to vote.

The members of men on horseback chasing and beating the civil rights marchers through the streets of Selma, even riding up on porches to get in the last vicious lick, are as vivid today as they were 40 years ago.

But the march's brave crusade as well the deaths of martyrs, such as Jimmy Lee Jackson, Reverend James Reeb, and Viola Luzzo, compelled the nation to support the passage of the historic Voting Rights Act a few months later.

The act became landmark legislation that outlawed poll taxes, literacy tests, and other forms of voter disenfranchisement that had been waged against African-American citizens throughout the south for many decades.

The 40th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act deserves celebration.

The bravery of the many marchers at Selma's Edmund Pettus Bridge and a growing tide of disenfranchisement with violence against African-Americans, wanting nothing more but the right to vote, pushed Congress to make a constitutional promise of one man/one vote a reality for African-Americans.

In two years this legislation comes up for reauthorization. Unfortunately, many Americans are unaware of just how the law works, as evidenced by the fact that it is all over the Internet that African-Americans will lose the right to vote in 2007.

There could be nothing farther from the truth.

The 13th Amendment establishes the right of African-American citizens to vote. However, there are still systematic efforts to keep African-Americans and other minorities from casting their vote and having their vote count.

That's why we need to act now and not wait until 2007

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law and the National Commission on Voting Rights for conducting these very important hearings. In the letter I received from the Lawyers' Committee, I was asked to give a 5- to 10-minute presentation focusing on the efforts of African-American voters in Texas to vote free from discrimination and for the candidate of their choice.

And, two, a brief discussion about efforts to address acts of discrimination against these voters and the results of such efforts.

Of that total, 28,021 new voters were added to the rolls in Texas.

We know from history and past elections that African-Americans would encounter problems at the polls, not just in Texas but around the country.

The NAACP National Voter Fund, the NAACP, and many other national, state, and local organizations have spent years developing election protection programs designed to prevent disenfranchisement.

However, efforts to disenfranchise African-American voters continue and center on the following:

Evasion of Voting Rights Act, Section 5, harassment of African-Americans voters at the polls, removal of African-Americans from voting lists.

As part of my testimony I brought with me documentation to illustrate just how African-Americans are still disenfranchised.

I would like to take a few minutes and discuss some of the complaints received from actual voters in Harris County.

Said they -- and I'm quoting here, and I'm taking it right off the complaints that were received.

Said they could not vote because they were not in that county.

They claim they ran out of ballots.

Tried to vote and the precinct judge told him he was not on the rolls.

Told he could not vote in elections.

Was told by precinct judge that she could not vote because she was not in city limits. She voted at that same place for 12 years.

Showed a list of signed names of the only people who could vote.

White people of same ZIP code were allowed to vote.

The woman would not let her vote, did not try to help her find out what precinct to vote in, and ultimately was discouraged.

Drove 30 miles to vote from original precinct and was again told she couldn't vote. Never allowed to vote today.

They asked her name without asking for ID, and told her she was not eligible to vote. She received a challenge ballot. When she tried to submit the ballot, they rejected it saying she could not vote.

Told her she could not vote because she wasn't in the county.

Again, White people were allowed to vote though.

Saw a list of handwritten names and was told those people's votes wouldn't count. Also her husband was on the list, and she was told she was not allowed to vote.

The precinct or school called the police. Black people were not being allowed to vote. Mr. Chairman, I also brought with me some additional documents which clearly show the continued disenfranchisement of African-Americans in Texas.

I ask that the documents be included in the records as part of my testimony here today.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Of course we'd be happy to receive those documents. To the extent that we can rely on those documents, you can try to summarize.

MR. CLAUDE FOSTER: Okay. I'll summarize.

I brought a copy of the voter irregularity hearings by the Houston Coalition for Black Participation, on which I was a panel member.

The hearings document complaints such as those I described above.
A copy of a letter from Carol Douglas, NAACP Region 6 director.
The letter was sent to Beverly Kauffman, Harris County Clerk, in regards to complaints received in the November 6, 2001 Houston mayoral election in which Ms. Douglas alleged that Harris County officials may have committed serious violations of the Voting Rights Act, the Motor-Voter Law, and the Texas Election Law.
HAVA wasn't implemented at the time.
The copy of the Southwest Region's press release, dated December 1st, 2001, detailing the assault of one of the NAACP's voting department volunteers for assisting a voter to the polling station at the voter's request.
A copy of a press release announcing the formation of the Harris County Voters Assistance Task Force set up to address issues in response to allegations by voters of intimidations.
Mr. Chairman, without the Voting Rights Act, what other tool would minority communities have for redress if a state, county, city, or town adopted a discriminatory new procedure by changing voting locations without adequately notifying the community. This was done in the Houston area in the election in 2001, when over 166 precincts were changed without the African-American community being notified.
The community was not notified of the changes until the civil rights community challenged election officials under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.
A word about the status of community university students who were denied the right to vote because election officials challenged the students' residency requirements.
The NAACP National Voter Fund worked in over 11 states this past presidential election cycle registering over 475,000 new voters since 2000 and helping mobilize over one million voters who voted in various elections since then.
The results have led to historical consistent African-American voter participation, despite well-documented cases of voter intimidation, unfair purges, and other barriers as I have described in my testimony here today.
The Voting Rights Act is the reason for the continued enfranchisement of the African-American community, despite continuing efforts to deny access to the voting booth. Mr. Chairman, thank you for conducting these hearings today. I look forward to answering any questions you or the commission members may have.
MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you, Mr. Foster, for the materials about Harris County and Prairie View. They will be very helpful to us.
And to the extent that you can give us those documents, that would be great. And, Ms. Pew, I wondered if it's possible to get some of those flip charts and other things that your folks presented?
I think that would be very interesting.
Now to Nina Perales, MALDEF.
MS. NINA PERALES: Thank you. My name is Nina Perales, and I'm the regional counsel of Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, MALDEF.
My office in San Antonio, Texas, covers the geographic territory encompassed by the Fifth and Tenth Circuit Courts of Appeals, which includes Texas, New Mexico, and Colorado. Since its founding in 1968, the political integration of Latinos has been a central part of our work.

MALDEF's first case was a lawsuit to force Latinos to be seated on grand juries in Bear County, Texas, which is where San Antonio is located, because prior to that time Mexican-Americans simply were not seated on grand juries throughout Texas.

From litigating the Wind versus Register case to providing testimony regarding the Mexican-American political experience in Texas for the 1975 amendments, MALDEF has consistently worked to achieve greater political participation and fairer election systems for Latinos.

Today I'll touch on several examples of voting problems faced by Latino voters in the southwest, and hopefully the opportunity to supplement my testimony in writing.

My testimony today will touch on problems related to both dilution, access to the ballot, and retrogressive measures.

Although Section 2 is a permanent part of the Voting Rights Act, I provide some of these examples in the way of context for the kinds of voting problems that are faced by Latinos in the southwest. We offer this testimony today in support of the reauthorization of Section 5 and Section 203.

In Colorado, in 1996, Latino voters won the creation of a Latino opportunity district in the southern portion of the state. Although during the 1990 redistricting process there was a substantial amount of testimony in favor of holding the San Luis Valley together as a community of interest, and the Colorado Reapportioning Commission considered creating a Latino majority district in this area, they ultimately adopted a plan that contained an ineffective district of only 42 percent of Hispanic voting age population.

And it took a lawsuit and a negative ruling by the trial court and finally an appeal to the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals for the Latino voters in southern Colorado to win House District 60. Past voting discrimination against Latinos in this area of Colorado included: Voting registration branches being placed in Anglo homes, limited hours for farm workers to register to vote, and a system where Anglo county commissioners tapped their friends for election judge, resulting in an all Anglo election judge pool.

We also have significant issues of access to the ballot in Colorado related to language.

Only eight Colorado counties are covered by Section 203. Last year I spoke to local advocates from uncovered counties in Colorado, who stressed as their primary concern the availability of bilingual ballots and other election materials to the voters in their counties.

For example, in Adams County, which is not covered, close to 2,000 voting age citizen, limited-English proficient people live. In Pueblo County, 1500 voting age citizen, limited-English proficient.

Also not covered, El Paso County, 3,200 voting age citizen, limited-English proficient. Not covered by Section 203.

In New Mexico, Latinos are more than 42 percent of the state population.

Most southern counties are covered under Section 203, but not all the counties are covered.

And if you look at a colored map where the counties are shaded, you'll see that as you progress north, the language coverage drops off.

As the Latino community grows and becomes more of a presence in non-covered counties, it is vitally important that we have Section 203 in place in order to provide language access to the ballot in this northern region of New Mexico.

In November 2004, we did an election monitoring project. I'll give you just two examples from New Mexico.

One example from New Mexico or really just more vote denial practices includes in Dona Ana County, which is where Las Cruces is, there were Anglos videotaping the license plates of Mexican-American voters as they went to vote.

And we received that call, and were told that it is very intimidating to voters to be videotaped and to have their license plates videotaped by Anglos standing outside the polling place.

In addition, there were some -- I have to echo Mr. Foster that the relocation of polling places is one of the time honored and classic mechanisms for defeating the minority vote. And in Roswell, New Mexico, I believe it was that the traditional polling place was, for Mexican-Americans, was not open for the same number of hours that the polling place was open in the -- I heard it was weekend hours at the mall in the northern part of Roswell. But I will defer to the commissioners, if you wanted to address that for me.

It may have been cleared up in the time that we received the complaint until the election was continuing, which sometimes happens.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Nina, would you pull the microphone closer to you?

MS. NINA PERALES: Sure.

I did want to touch on -- I seem to have lost my Texas page, and I really did want to talk to you about Texas.

Here we go.

In Texas, which is where my office is located, we believe there is widespread noncompliance with both Section 203 and Section 5.

My anecdote on Section 203 is from Terrent County, which is where Fort Worth is located.

Even though Terrent County is required to provide bilingual ballots, their translation or their purported translation of the ballot into Spanish was utterly incoherent, because it had been done by a non-Spanish speaking staff in the county elections administrator's office. And when we appeared, not to sue them, in fact rarely, this was a rare occasion where we went to negotiate, we were simply told flat out by the elections administrator that we were wrong, that this was correct Spanish -- he didn't speak Spanish either -- that it was correct Spanish, and we were simply wrong, and that he was going to go forward with his translation and to heck with the rest of us.

With respect to Section 5, political jurisdictions failed to timely submit for pre-clearance of their elections changes or they just don't submit at all.

In fact, MALDEF could spend all of its time doing Section 5 enforcement actions in the state of Texas.

We limit ourselves to litigation where we believe the change is going to either be retrogressive or in violation of Section 2.

And my example is that in the spring of 2003, Bear County closed a very large number of its early polling places, and all of the early voting polling places on the west side and south side of San Antonio, which is where the Mexican-American population is concentrated. They also failed to timely submit for pre-clearance under Section 5.

If the Justice Department had had an opportunity to view these changes, we have no doubt that they would have concluded that they were retrogressive. Because if you shut down every early voting polling place in the Mexican-American neighborhoods, this is going to have an impact on the ability to vote.

We brought an enforcement action and were able to get an injunction from the court to get those polling places reopened.

Even today, Section 5 prevents retrogressive changes from being put into place. We won a statewide objection in the year 2001 with respect to the redistricting plan for the Texas House of Representatives.

There we were able through getting this objection from the Justice Department to restore three Latino majority Texas Representative districts to the redistricting plan which had been eliminated by the -- I believe it was the Texas legislative redistricting board that did not plan.

In Arizona, where I've done some work, even though it's outside my area, it's very, very important to hold the line on retrogressive changes.

MALDEF led the Latino effort in 2003 to prevent the dismantling of congressional district four, which is the Latino majority district here in Phoenix, which elected Ed Pastor to the United States Congress.

After that district was redistricted as a Latino majority district, certain plaintiffs brought a lawsuit to dismantle that district and lower the Latino population below 50 percent.

We intervened and we were able to persuade the judge, even though he was a state court judge, that if he allowed congressional district four to be dismantled and lowered below 50 percent, it would no longer be effective to elect a Latino candidate of choice, and that it was likely to lead to an objection from the Justice Department.

So even though this case was not in the context of a pre-clearance action, we were able to talk about Section 5 and talk to the court about the implications and the requirements of Section 5, and we won a ruling that preserved the Latino population in the congressional district.

MALDEF offers these from the southwest region to emphasize the vital importance of the Voting Rights Act to Latinos in our struggle to overcome discrimination in voting. The continuing nature of this discrimination shows us that we must achieve reauthorization to continue in our forward progress.

Thank you very much.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Perales.

Now, Andres Ramirez will be talking about Nevada.

MR. ANDRES RAMIREZ: Nevada.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Nevada.

MR. ANDRES RAMIREZ: Nevada.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: In California we say Nevada.

Mr. Ramirez used to work for us under Harry Reed. Is that correct?

MR. ANDRES RAMIREZ: That's correct.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thanks for correcting me.

MR. ANDRES RAMIREZ: Senator Reed wouldn't forgive me if I didn't.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, members of the commission, good morning. My name is Andres Ramirez. I am a resident of North Las Vegas, Nevada, which is a city in Clark County, in the state of Nevada.

I'm here today to talk to you about the voting experience of Latinos in Clark County. Before I begin, I'd like to take some time to talk to you about the demographics of Clark County, to give you an understanding of our community.

Clark County is one of the fastest growing counties in America. And the growth is spearheaded by the influence of Latinos.

The city of North Las Vegas is the second fastest growing city in the nation, and there are estimates that the Latino population is approaching 42 percent of the total population. There are over half a million Latinos in Clark County. And according to the census, there are more Latinos in Las Vegas than there are in Albuquerque, New Mexico, which is a huge misconception.

So the population is growing extremely, extremely fast.

Many of the Latinos arriving in Clark County are recent immigrants or residents from California who decided to move.

Looking for jobs in the casino industry or construction.

I have been involved in voter empowerment projects for several years in Clark County. Most recently I served as the state director for the organization Voices for Working Families. The process of involving Latinos in the political electorate has been an arduous task. There are many challenges and obstacles to overcome to accomplish this scope.

It's been extremely difficult, and I'll start by saying Clark County is one of the newly covered regions by the Voting Rights Act, because of the Hispanic influence, and so our experience with the provisions and with enforcement have been fairly recent.

And it's caused us to take a hard look as to where we are as a country, as a community, and how far we need to go.

But the tremendous growth of Hispanics has caused quite a bit of a backlash in the community and has sparked very racist behavior.

Upon announcement in 2002 allowing voters to register and to vote in Spanish, the election department was inundated with complaints.

I believe the last official tally was a little over 10,023 letters of complaint from people who were appalled and stating that everyone who wanted to vote, who didn't want to vote in English, should have to go back to Mexico to vote in Spanish.

It was just very bluntly, almost immediately after we announced that we would be offering voting in Spanish, the group the National Alliance began recruiting in Clark County to organize an effort to stop any efforts of opportunities for Spanish speaking voters in Clark County.

So it's, to say the least, it's been exciting to deal with the issue.

I think many folks, Mr. -- Claude talked about the early civil rights. It's almost as if we're going through that now, dealing with those issues of protest.

Among minority issues, we have several problems of discrimination against the African-American community in Clark County as well. Recently there was an African-American well to do who moved into an affluent neighborhood to join the exclusive golf club because he liked to golf. Upon joining, he found a letter found by his school age daughter pinned to his door with a picture of a Black man hanging, saying the only good, excuse me, nigger is a dead nigger.

And this was, you know, three months ago.

And this is stuff we're beginning to see in our community explode more and more and more.

Again, with the racism in our communities, and it's something we know we have to deal with and we can't just stand down and let it happen.

But, you know, change is difficult for a lot of people. And people are afraid of what they don't know.

So we have to make sure we educate them about what the law is and why we're pursuing this matter.

I also want to talk about the positive steps taken in Clark County.

As I said, 2002 Clark County election department implemented the new voting machines to enable Spanish language voting. These machines were also able to print a voter verified receipt of the ballot cast to make us the only state in the nation to implement such a system.

It was implemented in 2002, and in 2004 we were the only ones that used a voter verified receipt.

And we continue that now.

These machines that we purchased are multi-lingual. So we don't just offer languages in Spanish. They can be programmed to offer any language that we may need to adapt to.

But, in addition, the election department established a Latino advisory board to help develop education or outreach strategies in the Latino community, as well as they assigned a permanent staff member to serve as a liaison to the Latino community.

And these were, these to us were very, very important steps.

Ms. Perales talked about early voting. In our community, all the early voting locations in the Latino locations are determined by this advisory commission. They decide where they go. They decide what days, the hours of that, and that's what the election department establishes.

The election materials that are produced in Spanish are contracted to a Spanish interpreter, and even still are given to the Hispanic advisory committee to review to make sure they're understood, that the language is simple enough for an average voter to comprehend.

This advisory board has served as a great accomplishment for the election department to ensure that Hispanics have a voice at the table.

And having Elsie Garcia, who is a staff member for the election department, there on staff as well, who is fluent in Spanish and serves directly as a liaison to work with community projects and community organizations to help educate Hispanics about the new voting systems, has been extremely helpful.

These are very important first steps. However, they are just that. They are first steps, and we have a long way to go.

Because we are a newly covered jurisdiction, there has been a lot of misinformation that has been spread over time.

Part of that also comes from the fact that we have people that move to Las Vegas from around the country, not just from California, and there are different voting patterns and rules in each state, as a state establishes its own voting regulations.

So when they come to Las Vegas, for instance, our early voting rules are different in Clark County than they are in Florida, than they are in Texas, than they are in Arizona. The method in which we establish them also differ.

In Clark County our early voting systems, you can vote anywhere. Not in the same city. Doesn't matter where you go. You can live in Mesquite and go vote in Las Vegas if you want. It's offered Saturdays and Sundays. We have it available at malls, at grocery stores.

We make it as easy as possible for people to vote. We need to allow people to be able to vote in those areas.

But people who aren't used to that don't quite understand, and when we try to teach people about early voting, they think we mean for them to show up at the polls at 6:00 a. m. , not necessarily voting before election day.

So the educational process about the differences has been a huge, huge problem for us. And also, as I said, just simply the misinformation.

Many Hispanics who are first time voters or newly registered voters have been told they can only vote once.

So if they happen to vote in the primary election, they believe they cannot vote in the general election because they'd be breaking some law because they've been told you can only vote once.

There's simple misunderstandings, but yet when you're talking about someone who has never voted in this country before, it's valid for them not to understand what's going on. Hispanics have also been told they need to speak English in order to vote.

Which is also a clear violation.

So they have problems.

They've been told they need a driver's license, which we know is incorrect. And many, many other false statements.

We've also had, especially last year, lots of problems with voter fraud and voter intimidation.

One of the motion blatant things that was happening was that non-citizens, Hispanics, were being registered to vote and told that once they became citizens their registration would be active, which is clearly against the law for them, but that's what they were told.

And people would show up in nice suits and said, no, you have no problem, we work for the election department, trust us, this is perfectly legal, we're trying to make sure that you're taken care of ahead of time.

Obviously it's against the law for people to sign an affidavit saying when the registration form expressly says that you are a citizen and they are not.

We were able to identify the problem after many people called us and told us this was happening with the election department, to submit their names, and their forms were discarded, and they weren't reported to any agency for violating any laws for registering to vote even though they weren't citizens.

But that happened quite a bit, especially last year.

We had several forms of Hispanics who went to register and their forms were found in the dumpster outside some stores, so their forms were not submitted and they could not vote. Hispanics were told that polls closed at 9:00, 9:00 p. m. Again, people would knock on the doors, give then a call, saying, hey, Hispanic, the polls in these communities are going to close at 9:00 p. m. So if you work a little later, don't worry, you'll still have time to vote.

By the way, these messages were given to them in Spanish, so they assumed they were legitimate statements.

So there are just a lot of problems.

I could go on and go on about all the stuff we experienced last year.

But I'd like to spend some time on some suggestions, at least in Clark County, that I see we can do to improve the system and help develop how we want to work this Hispanic community.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Can you do that in about two minutes?

MR. ANDRES RAMIREZ: I can do it in one and a half.

Currently there is no system established in Clark County to assess how many Latinos are Spanish speaking. This information is useful. Although we know how many Hispanics there are, we don't know how many really speak Spanish and whether the Spanish speaking come from Guatemala, Mexico, Puerto Rico, Cuba, or various.

I think that's something that we need to begin to collect at some point. What are the Spanish speaking groups, how many speak Spanish.

Also, I think there should be some sort of function on the voting machines to enable us to track how many people are choosing to vote in Spanish, so we know, you know, 50,000 voters needed to vote in Spanish, or 5,000, so that we know that information.

In Clark County, we have a hotline for Spanish speakers for them to call for any assistance they have with voting problems. It's answered by only Spanish speakers that work for the election department.

However, they don't keep a log of how many people called to report problems. They have a hotline, but no information that's kept.

I think there's just some ideas that we want to start tracking. If there's information and it's being reported to an official agency, that this agency be required to tabulate and keep these, these reports of discrimination or problems that they have.

In regards to the Voting Rights Act, it is my assessment that improvements accomplished in Clark County would not have been obtained without the requirements detailing the Voting Rights Act. Specifically the bilingual voting materials requirement. As I mentioned, when the election department announced the availability of Spanish language, they got inundated with complaints.

And we have no Hispanics at the Clark County commission among our elected officials. A lot of them got a lot of pressure not to allow this.

And it would have been easy for them to buckle and say, screw Hispanics, we don't need to spend the money buying new machines and translating materials.

But because there's a law that requires them, they were forced to do so.

In addition to Clark County, we have cities in rural Nevada such as West Windover that are 58 percent Latino and are not covered by this.

In many of them, as a matter of fact in Windover, almost 90 percent of them are Spanish speaking of the Hispanics there.

We have a huge influx of Filipinos in Clark County. I think they now total more than five percent of the population. I t's only a matter of time before we start providing the voting in their language as well, and I can just tell that these protests are going to continue again and again.

And if we don't have these requirements in place for the teeth to force the local governments to offer these services, I don't think it's going to happen and many Americans are going to be disenfranchised.

Thank you for your time. I'm open for questions.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you, Mr. Ramirez, for that report from the front lines of Clark County.

Mr. Olivas.

MR. ALBERTO OLIVAS: Thank you very much. It's Olivas actually. Alberto Olivas. I'm here --

MR. BILL LANN LEE: As you know, those of us from California are challenged in many ways.

MR. ALBERTO OLIVAS: But it was very close.

I'm here wearing several hats. I should mention that I'm a newly appointed member of the board of directors of the Arizona Commission on Indian Affairs.

I was born in Sierra Vista, Arizona, near our southern border with Mexico. And I am the border outreach director for Maricopa Community College's Center for Civic Participation. We're the largest community college district in the nation. We serve over a quarter million students throughout Maricopa County.

And our voter outreach program, which frankly I predicated on my previous experience as state border outreach director for Secretary of State Betsy Bayless, seeks to use our ten community college campuses and resources to provide outreach to our communities and educate community members about important election issues and help build skill levels of voters so that they can understand processes and really begin grass roots level deliberation about policy issues in ways that are meaningful to them and to their communities, starting with local and municipal elections, school district, state, and all those things.

What I found in my service as voter outreach director for both Secretary of State Betsy Bayless and currently for the community college district is that a lot of the perceptions people have about non-voters are pure myth.

In particular, when we're talking about young voters, 18- to 25-year-old voters, trying to understand why they don't vote. When I began my service in the state, it was a brand-new project, the voter outreach program was newly created, and I sought to bring my anthropology background as a scientist to understand the behavioral and psychographic factors affecting non-voters. What was the difference fundamentally between a non-voter and a regular voter and how could we connect those dots.

I had to unlearn a lot of things I thought I knew about people that don't vote.

In particular, young people, as we did surveys, looked at research, what other states had already been doing, we found that most young voters that aren't voting will tell us that they do feel it is important, that they do think it's a very critical responsibility, but that they don't vote because they don't know how. They don't know enough to vote that they feel it's irresponsible to vote on issues that they don't understand, and that they don't have the skills to understand the system or access it. In Arizona, we do a terrible job of educating our students about their role as citizens.

It's something we're struggling with today, where our learning standards that drive curriculum in our state focus on history and facts and names.

They don't focus on building skills.

And there's an international study that's been out for a few years now that's looked at public education in industrialized democratic nations all over the world to look at what works. What they found is that skill building results in graduating students that understand their role as citizens, are interested in and passionate about voting, and can engage in very high level dialogue about their own nation's policies and political issues. Our students don't look like that, because our students aren't given stills.

They're told to memorize facts and dates and names, but they don't understand how to hear news coverage of political issues and understand what's being discussed.

They don't understand how fundamentally to vote, how to register to vote, what the time lines and processes are.

So as I began my service doing voter outreach, I found I had to do a lot of basic education about election processes, things that people should know and don't know and are embarrassed to admit they don't know because they thinking they're the only ones. That's true for most young voters in our state. They're not given that training in our education system.

The problem is only exacerbated in our rural and small towns, which make up 13 of our 15 counties in Arizona. It's even worse for people that have language impedence, which is certainly the case for many of our 21, 22 tribes in Arizona and for our Hispanic population.

It angers me to no end when I think about -- I thought all the people from California moved to Arizona, coming here to buy houses and making them too expensive for me to buy a house.

But Arizona was Indian country before it was anything else. And then it was Indian country and Mexican country before it was anything else. It's only very recently in our history that we're part of the United States, and we have a real cultural change now that it's really making my home town of Sierra Vista a place I don't want to visit anymore.

When I was born, it was a little town. Hardly heard about it. A very beautiful part of the state. And people got along. Indian people, Mexican people, and Anglo people. Starting about ten years ago, immigration started pushing everyone through the worst part of our deserts because of their increased enforcement in California, Texas, and Mexico. Arizona was the only place they could come in. And they started coming through the Tohono O'Odham country, which if you don't know how to live in that country will kill you.

And so, for about ten years now we have untold numbers of people, many undiscovered, that have perished trying to make the crossing.

And the ones that do get through are having a real devastating effect on that part of the Indian nation over there.

Those people have had to suffer undue burden.

But also the ranchers in Cochise County went from -- as a result of seeing all this increased immigration coming through this part of Arizona, have very much reacted. And our state as a result of increased immigration and as a result of natural Hispanic population growth is becoming very reactive and very hostile to minorities in general and Hispanic minorities in particular.

And even more so to Spanish language issues, as they're starting to see more media in Spanish, more signs and television shows, stores with Spanish signs, and election materials. It's like every time they see one of those things, it just make these them angry. They want Arizona to be an English only state, and we have a proposition that's going to be on our ballot next year to make us an English only state where no official government business can be conducted in any language other than English.

I think that's driven by a fear of Hispanics taking over the country.

In Maricopa County where a quarter of the population now, and we're growing rapidly throughout the state, I don't think there's purposeful intent to affect Indian tribes. I may be naive on that, but I don't think there's overconcern to make sure Indian people are not adversely affected.

I think most voters in Arizona have not given it any thought, but that it's not a high priority of them.

We have a history in Arizona, a very long history, of preventing people from accessing their civil and voting rights. That's why I'm afraid of the expiration of some of these provisions.

I love my state, but I don't trust it. Having worked for state government and done community outreach locally and statewide, I don't think we have a political culture had that has any interest in protecting the rights of minorities.

We don't prepare people to defend themselves within our state with our civic and social studies curriculum. We have more and more people that are becoming citizens, legally becoming citizens, entitled to all the rights and provisions of citizenship, that speak pretty good English.

But, and I'm going to harken back to my anthropology, I got to study language acquisition issues. I know scientifically and also through my family that if you're past the age of puberty and you start to learn another language, you may get to speak it pretty good, but it's next to impossible to be able to read technical information in another language and understand it.

I have a college degree, and I speak both languages fluently, and I worked in elections, and it was still hard for me to read our publicity pamphlet and make heads or tails of it. I have to confess, I never read it before I worked in elections. It was just onerous to get through that.

I think it's incumbent upon us as civil officials and as civil rights workers to find ways to hold election officials in state governments accountable for making election information understandable and user friendly for all citizens in their languages.

I understand the concern about making these provisions permanent. In particular the pre-clearance provision and the examiner and observer provisions I think should have the lines be reviewed on a periodical basis. I think Section 203 language provision is one that could be implemented as a permanent standing provision based on census data.

I also think a lot of the resistance that election officials have to providing election information in other languages is based on expense, and that's reasonable.

But I think there are very practical solutions to reducing the cost.

For example, as my colleague has mentioned, allow voters to indicate their preference, when you register to vote allow voters to indicate what language you want to receive election information in. Also allow voters to indicate how they prefer to vote.

In Maricopa County, I think all counties in Arizona you can't get on a standing list to vote by mail.

I am a voter that prefers to vote by mail for a number of reasons.

I think voting by mail allows a lot of our minority and rural residents to vote with much more practicality and time to consider their issues and do some research and consideration and avoid a lot of the issues they face at the polls when they get challenged and have their rights taken from them by poll workers, either on purpose or just because they're not trained or not conscientious.

But I'm not able to indicate that I always want to vote by mail. And it's very difficult for me to do that every time.

And I know better.

But for voters that have less education or less familiarity with voting systems, that's difficult.

Voters should be able to indicate that they want to vote by mail or vote at the polls and in what language they want to get their materials.

That would result in a lot of cost saving.

And I'll cut my other comments. Thank you very much.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you very much.

Now we return to Reverend Tillman.

REVEREND OSCAR TILLMAN: You have it correct.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: If you wish to say something about California, I wish you would say it sooner than later.

REVEREND OSCAR TILLMAN: Chairman, I'm glad to see you again.

I remember introducing you at an NAACP regional conference several years ago when we had people at DOJ that cared about us. So I'm glad to see you here this morning.

I have been, and it's kind of going back some years, I see in Anderson County, North Carolina, where I was born and raised, still under watch.

And I joined the NAACP in 1952, in Anderson County, North Carolina. So we are here today still fighting what we did in 1952.

That's a sad commentary on America today, 2005, that we're still having to go and do this over and over again.

When I sat down, I said I wonder what are we going to accomplish.

We need to send a message, and we need to state that we have voter rights that are being trampled upon.

I believe that the national NAACP and the local, because we received awards three years ago for the number of people that we signed up and got out to vote, Maricopa County, I cannot find where they've ever had a problem on getting the Black and minorities to vote. It's just the fact that somehow seemed like the votes disappear. You can talk to everybody who voted, but yet whenever they're counted, somewhere they're not there.

We have, and that's -- I'm filling in basically because the only known Black state elected official, Representative Leah Landrum Taylor, who was supposed to speak, she was notified yesterday that they're on lock down until they get a budget passed, so she's not here this morning.

But something is very wrong whenever everybody is out voting but yet somehow between the time you vote and the time they're counted, some very magical numbers come into play.

And I'm not going to be as a good old Baptist preacher, I'm not going to kill anybody that's doing anything wrong. But I know one thing, I can count one and one. When they don't come out to be two, somebody is not telling me the truth.

The other part of the picture is that the outreach, we have gone and we have found out that our churches have been, as you say, back to the basics.

We work very close with the churches. On election day, regardless of whether it's local, state, national, the churches make their buses, their vans available to carry people to the polls. The NAACP have a special fund set aside that we will, if you cannot find a bus, van, or any other way to get to the poll, we have a certain taxi, you call that taxi, we pay the taxi to get you to the polls.

We have done that.

But yet we still cannot find, and personally the state as a whole, of the legislators as a whole, have really embraced the Hispanic, African-American, and other minorities to vote. It's taken for granted in this state.

You vote, okay. You don't vote, okay.

We prefer you not to vote because we think you're going to vote for the other candidate, and I won't even mention the other candidate.

But that is the gist from the national representatives and Congress people all the way down as to their feeling about the Black vote, specifically in Arizona.

And until we get to that point where everyone is serious about voting, everyone -- I moved into Willow Historic District over 12, 13 years ago.

I have voted at four different places during my 12, 13 years there.

So every time you mention voting time has come around, you have to first search out where to vote this time.

If you do not pay close attention to that little pamphlet, you're going to drive up. You're not here. You're on your way to work or getting off work, so that's a vote that you and your wife or whoever is not counted.

We would love to see where it remained one place. Somewhere, I don't care.

If you got four places you're voting at, one of them should suffice.

When you continue to change, you confuse the people. So number one, our vote is not taken serious.

We fought hard, going back to Anderson County, whenever you go up to vote, and you had to read. And I just wanted to mention here today what they make you read. You miss one word. That one word was always ascertain. If you said "a certain", you can't vote. We're doing that same stuff now. And they're trying to pass rules in this state where you can only vote under this rule.

We have historically in the NAACP signed up voters.

We were told by the Attorney General we can't do it anymore until this matter Proposition 200 is cleared up.

So something that we have taken pride in, I've been president of either local or state going on 20 years here in Arizona. And we take pride in signing up people to vote.

We can't even do that anymore.

So the system is broken. I don't know how we're going to fix it. But until we get it fixed, we're losing our young people because they look at it, say, why vote, it's not going to count. So along, and I reiterate, we need the teeth back in the Voter Rights Act. We know we have the right to vote. But unless we have the teeth there to make these states do what they need to do, are supposed to do, we will not. We'll go back to where we were in Anderson County in the 1950s and '40s.

Mr. Chairman, thank you, and I pray that you'll all do something to change this and turn it around.

God bless.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you, Reverend.

Mr. Valencia.

MR. ROBERT VALENCIA: Good morning, Mr. Chairman, members of the panel.

My name is Robert Valencia. I'm with the Pasqua Yaqui tribe. It's a relatively small tribe, a little pinprick next to our neighbors the Tohono O'Odham Nation.

We're about 4500 people on the reservation, 13,000 overall. We have communities here by Tempe, in Guadalupe, Scottsdale, and around the Tucson area. So we're all over the place.

One of the things I wanted to -- things that have been touched on is the general fear of the minority voting, I guess.

You know, there's the Prop 200, which is causing a lot of misinformation.

If I could read a couple paragraphs out of this news section last week, it is entitled Napolitano Vetoes Voter ID Bill Citing Legal Reasons.

Janet Napolitano vetoed legislation Friday to bar some people who show up at the polls without identification from voting.

Napolitano said that the measure, Senate bill 1118, is illegal because it violates the federal voter Help America Vote Act.

She said that could result in properly registered Arizona citizens being denied the right to vote.

That's something, you know, that law is one thing, and we can argue that up and down, but, you know, to -- I'm talking about Native American, our people on reservations, sometimes, you know, poll workers may be given the wrong information, and, you know, it's like, well, maybe you can vote next time.

And the election -- in ours it doesn't happen, because we -- all of our tribal members work at the polls, but sometimes at the other locations, some of this misinformation may be going around.

We're talking about, at one point in time, because of some of these rules, one rule that is implied to say, grandmother, those are the rules, you don't have an ID, I know who you are, grandmother, but if you don't have your ID you can't vote.

Those type of things.

I know that they said tribal IDs would suffice, but some of the people don't have those things.

Or they don't have the addresses, depending on the tribes.

So there's a lot of that happening.

It's not the rules themselves, but how they're interpreted that it's very dangerous. We vote, both our tribes, Tohono O'Odham and our tribe, at the last -- in 2002, took a very active role in getting the word out, and I think we were pretty successful, as Mr. Norris alluded to.

The governor credited the tribes for their work in both successful passage of the gaming bill and the election.

That's something that we gained a lot of strength from.

Some of the things that have changed locally over the Tucson area is, especially with the, I guess, the Pima County voting -- I forgot their name, one of the things is that our people are generally trilingual, so as far as the 203 requirement, English, Spanish, and Yaqui. What has happened before is we already have materials in Spanish, shouldn't that suffice. Well, no, some people may not read Spanish or understand it as well.

So the other was, you don't really speak Yaqui, do you?

In any case, it's changed from that to where we have our own tapes and we have our own information in our language. And sometimes it works both ways.

Sometimes two phrases might be ten pages, or, you know, vice versa.

But that's important for us, because the way that I look at things, if an elderly person that's on dialysis, can barely move and walk, their vote is just as important as a multi-millionaire living in the foothills. It makes no difference whatsoever.

There has been attempts at marginalization. In our local paper, people expressed that Indians don't matter because they don't vote, so what does it matter, what are they crying about.

That's not the case.

The more we learned, the more I feel that these type of commissions are out there, the more that we can gather strength in being able to exercise those votes.

We do support, the tribe does support the position on Section 5 and 203, because they are important.

In particular, the dialogue we've had with the Pima County voting division has been also because of the work of Bruce Saddlestein. We met with him a few times, and pretty much he's helped us to learn what are the things that we should be looking for.

And I think, like I said, at this point in time that it is getting a little bit better. We know -- the more information that we know, the more we know what to do with the next election. But, in any case, I'd like to thank the commission for coming out here, and, you know, there's a lot going on.

It's really hard to express everything in six, seven minutes. And I think I'm the only one who is probably under the time here.

In any case, thank you once again.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you, Mr. Valencia. Thank you for coming.

We have five minutes until the end of the tape. So we'll go for five minutes and take a break afterwards in order to change the tape.

Is that okay?

Judge?

HON. PENNY WILLRICH: Let me direct this question to Mr. Olivas. Specifically from Maricopa County, how do you think Maricopa County specifically would be impacted or affected if the three provisions of the Voting Rights Act were allowed to expire? MR. ALBERTO OLIVAS: Right now we have various consent decrees with our surrounding Indian tribes that provide for provision of election information in their respective languages. The counties currently struggle with being able to provide that information in a cost effective manner.

I know that that would not continue were the Section 203 to expire.

Maricopa County is a major source of relocation of refugees from other countries that become citizens, not just Latin American.

Having worked with Secretary Bayless, I was able to speak on her behalf at numerous swearing in ceremonies for new citizens.

I can tell you that nobody takes their voting rights more seriously and enthusiastically than new citizens from other countries.

Many of them are quite elderly, and it is especially difficult for them to learn this language coming to this country at 60, 70, or 80 years of age.

They have upon receiving their new citizenship all of their rights and privileges afforded to them of voting and all the responsibilities that citizenship entails, and they shouldn't have more obstacles imposed upon them than somebody that is fluent in English.

And I'm very much afraid that the expiration of 203 will mean there will be no language provision for those citizens.

We have, in fact, several communities in our county, but other counties in our state are very much distressed and put upon to provide equal access to elections and voting for their citizens.

And it's something that is constantly going to the Department of Justice for pre-clearance, changes to procedures, changes to how we provide information, to make sure that we're not putting our rural and small town and reservation citizens at a disadvantage as compared to Maricopa County, that in rural parts of our state, rural parts of our county, people have the same access to information and ability to get to their polls as they do in Maricopa County, that the equipment that they use is suitable for them.

We are still struggling with our redistricting of our legislative and congressional districts in Arizona. And without the pre-clearance provisions, we wouldn't have any protection for minority and rural voters and Indian voters in Arizona.

Many of our outreach efforts as described by Ms. Pew are modeled on wonderful programs in New Mexico, California, Texas, and other states, but mainly they -- I have to say, even though we have some county recorders and election officials that take their duty very seriously, in many cases we only have these outreach programs because of our consent decree issue or pre-clearance issues that require us to demonstrate to the Department of Justice that we are treating all voters in the state of Arizona equitably and fairly.

Without the pre-clearance provision and 203, minority and small and rural citizens would have great disadvantages placed upon them to have access to their voting rights and to election information.

I can foresee most, if not all, of our voter outreach programs at the county and state level would be eliminated because they are expensive and they require manpower and hours and dollars, and if there's not the federal onus of that oversight to make sure that we're not violating civil rights and voting rights, I can't foresee that our legislative powers would continue to fund and allow these activities.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: You have about 30 more seconds.

MR. ALBERTO OLIVAS: I think I'm done.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Let's take a break now.

Panelists, if you could stay in your chairs, that would be helpful.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: We're going to start up again from the first questions from Commissioner Vigil-Giron.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Thank you. A couple of things before -- I just wanted to answer a couple of things.

In Dona Ana County, when I did receive that call that that gentleman on the inside, he was a challenger, he was a watcher, inside. He would call on his cell phone when he saw that person voting provisionally. Okay.

Then it was placed in an envelope and marked as such. He would call on the phone to the guy on the outside and say, this guy, videotape him, he just voted provisional, check his license plate so we can see if he is a citizen or not. Okay.

We ran him off twice, on two different polling places, by the sheriff.

That's in Dona Ana.

In Roswell, I think that's an early voting site, and the clerk was able to locate early voting sites wherever they chose. All of our material since 1912 built into our Constitution must be written in English and Spanish.

All election ballots are in English and Spanish. All constitutional amendments are translated into a booklet in English and Spanish.

Now we have an opportunity to translate into the Navajo language because it is a written language.

So we take an opportunity to do that as well.

I'm distressed by what I'm hearing, not only because the Voting Rights Act and some of the things surrounding it that would help and encourage what's going on here, but the fact that you have not been able to take advantage of voter education dollars that your states were given.

The chief elections official was given millions of dollars to spend on voter education, poll worker training, the purchase of the Help America Vote Act compliant voting machines that assist the disabled and the language minority populations, as well as building their central voter data systems.

Arizona, I'm sure, with a population of, what, three million people, four million people, something like that, you received in comparison to my $14 million that I received in New Mexico, you had to have received about $30 million that has obviously not been siphoned down to the locales. And it's not being utilized. And so I urge you, elections officials and activists, demand that money to go to these certain areas.

I spent $2 million on a media campaign to teach people how to vote absentee, provisional, in person, how many days prior. I spent $2 million in a market of 1. 9 million people in the state of New Mexico in English, Spanish, and Navajo. They ran every 30 minutes prior to the election, beginning 30 days prior to that election.

So what I'm hearing, I'm very distressed.

Penny, this is for you. Did you receive any -- how do you receive your election materials?

Because I'm in charge of that.

I translate all of our election materials into Spanish, and I have my Navajo coordinators who translate into the Navajo language. Martin Avila, who coordinates the Tia'Timma'Tomma (phonetic), the two Apache languages into the various languages to -- at least the spoken language, to let our Native Americans know that the proclamation has been issued, that these are the constitutional amendments in those languages. How does it work in Arizona?

MS. PENNY PEW: In Arizona we have the Secretary of State contracts with the Navajo speaker and writer. In the past it's been Mr. Harold Noble, who is also in the county as an election outreach, was there when I began.

He's very proficient. Everything that is translated is presented to the Navajo Nation contact, Mr. Kim Apiazi(phonetic), for approval, he signs off on that, and then it goes to the state.

The State disperses, in this last cycle, all the propositions.

We also have --

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Could you get closer to the mike?

Thank you.

MS. PENNY PEW: Matthew Noble, you met him earlier. He's very proficient in the Navajo language.

He writes all of the translations that we have from the schools, to the county, to the everything that we do, the pamphlets.

They are also now in a linguistics class through the Diné College, so they can continue their education. And it's very crucial that they stay up with the linguistics that are in the language as well.

That's how we take care of it on the county level. We know the qualifications that it takes to be a Navajo writer and a speaker.

Far be it from me to make those determinations. They have been given that responsibility. And the Navajo Nation and our county work very closely to make sure that those are coordinated efforts.

MS. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Did you have any issues that came up during the 2004 elections at any of your polling places by your citizens, your voters?

MS. PENNY PEW: We had issues in 2002 that were Caucasians going on -- I believe there were 11 precinct polling places that we had a Caucasian go into the polling place and intimidate and cause far more destruction and commotion that should not have happened. So to try and prevent that in 2004, I presented a political protocol manual and pamphlet. And we gave many presentations, invited personally each candidate, county, state, and federal, or their designee, with a sign-in sheet, to make sure that they attended one or more.

They were each given a political protocol manual or brochure, so that we could ward off anything else.

It was very disturbing to have the Navajo strong inspector in those areas be intimidated by this Caucasian man.

And being Caucasian, I said to him: We'll not have this again. You will not do this. And I had the chief counsel of the Navajo Nation draft a letter, and it's in the information that I submitted also to each party representative, to let them know that this is not going to be handled and they will be escorted off the Navajo Nation.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Thank you.

MR. CLAUDE FOSTER: May I respond?

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Sure.

MR. CLAUDE FOSTER: I'm a member of the Texas commission. And I want to applaud what you did in New Mexico.

However, the provision that they spend those dollars for education is not a mandatory provision. They have that option.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: You need to pull your microphone closer.

MR. CLAUDE FOSTER: The provision that states those dollars be spent on education is not the mandatory provision.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: It is based on the state plan.

Look at your state planning. They have to assign a certain amount of money from whatever it is appropriated to.

MR. CLAUDE FOSTER: For poll worker training.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: That also isn't mandatory.

MR. CLAUDE FOSTER: It's how the states interpret that? And it's how they implemented that?

You're to be applauded.

It goes back to the point that you said you're the first Latino, is how these rules are interpreted and how they are implemented and the interpretation of those rules.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Exactly. Who is the one interpreting it.

The way that I interpret it is fair access to everyone in the various languages. Even the playing field for everyone.

Give everyone the same information in the languages of their choice.

And that is the way that I read it and the way that we performed.

We had a 26 percent more voter turnout than in the 2000 election, and more people voted absentee and more Democrats voted absentee than the Republicans who always have higher numbers by the absentee voters.

MS. PENNY PEW: We did reap some benefits also. KTNN reaches into Apache County, and so we got to hear promoting it, and it was helpful in our Navajo areas.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Ms. Pew, it sounds to me that if different states are construing the same federal statute differently, perhaps your national conference would be helpful.

MS. PENNY PEW: I think some of you saw what went on in Ohio, heard what went on in Ohio, in Florida, and other states.

It depends on the person in charge.

I'm the person in charge of New Mexico.

And those 33 county clerks don't work for me, but they work for the state of New Mexico, and they have to follow the laws of the state of New Mexico that I have to administer.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Mr. Norris.

MR. NED NORRIS, JR. : You know, it's unfortunate. We're sitting here and hearing all these comments about illegal activities going on in the voting places, and it's unfortunate that racism is alive and well in this 21st century.

And we need to continue to address those issues that are negatively impacting minority, the minority vote.

Speaking of racism, I guess I'd like to find out from Mrs. Perales, Mr. Olivas, actually any of the other panelists, regarding this Proposition 200 that's right now in front of us here in Arizona, whether or not there are any pre-clearance issues that you know of that you can share with us about Proposition 200, and also would like to hear your thoughts about the -- we heard a little bit earlier about the English only issue that's probably going, as Mr. Olivas mentioned, is going to be before the voters of this state.

I think that it's important for this commission to understand how the Voting Rights Act, how those laws that exist, the 200 and the potential for English only, is going to have a negative impact on the Voting Rights Act.

I'd be interested in hearing your thoughts on that.

MS. NINA PERALES: With the commission's permission, I'd like to give the microphone to Mr. Steven Reyes, who is the staff attorney in MALDEF's Los Angeles office, who worked on the MALDEF comment that went to the Department of Justice regarding Proposition 200's implementation on the election changes that were included and what happened with that, since he worked on it.

MR. STEVEN REYES: Good morning.

MALDEF has been involved extensively in the pre-clearance process and comment process relating to Proposition 200, and we submitted a lengthy comment letter detailing all the problems that would result with implementation of Prop 200's citizenship verification provisions and voter identification provisions for gaining access to a ballot on election day. This included a number of census data indicating the problems with which people, particularly those who are poor, those who live out in rural areas, would have in obtaining access to different forms of ID that might be deemed acceptable by the Secretary of State or by local county officials.

Or by, for that matter, poll workers who may be using their own discretion to decide what is appropriate or not.

We were lucky to and appreciative of all the help we received by local community groups and national civil rights organizations in also challenging and requesting that the Department of Justice denied pre-clearance for Prop 200's voting provisions.

Unfortunately, as some of you may have heard yesterday, they very quickly pre-cleared these provisions nonetheless, notwithstanding all these -- the parade of horribles that we outlined for them in our comment letters.

More recently, about one month ago, or a little more than a month ago, the Secretary of State's office here released a draft provision for implementation of the voter ID provisions, which immediately drew an outcry from MALDEF, from a number of accounting clerks throughout the state, from different American Indian nations, and community groups as well.

And they profoundly affect the ability of rural voters with P. O. Box addresses, without dated addresses on their driver's license, to obtain a ballot. These are people that would have been registered to vote and voting at the same polling place for decades. This would have affected the ability of women who may have changed their name through marriage or divorce to obtain a ballot, because the names and addresses may not have matched.

This would have affected those people who may have been too poor to have utility bills, or utility service, automobiles, all of which the census, United States census data corroborates and says there's a significant population within Arizona which lack access to these basic services and utility services, then consequently IDs. So there is a whole chain reaction of consequences for Prop 200 and that we have yet to see the full impact of.

Right now thankfully Governor Napolitano vetoed the bill that would have made worse many of these ID provisions, and now counties are not yet implementing the voter ID provisions of Prop 200 and awaiting direction.

It's our hope that those stay unimplemented until there is some very clear assurances of exactly the methods that will protect all those type of voters that I mentioned.

And there's still some very significant problems with the voter registration process in Prop 200.

That has begun to be implemented in the state already. It's going to severely affect the ability of voter reg groups like Southwest Voter Registration Group, like all sorts of groups who conduct non-partisan registration efforts in the state, like the NAACP, to collect and process those voter registration forms. Because many people do not walk around with that type of required proof of ID with them, birth certificates, tribal IDs, passports, et cetera. So there's still a great looming threat in Arizona's voter practices.

MR. ALBERTO OLIVAS: I can only echo what Steve has told you about the potential for the impact of Prop 200.

As you can see from all of these comments, in Arizona we've been struggling and struggling for a long time with efforts to make access to voter registration more difficult, access to voting and voting information more difficult. And that's with the pre-clearance provisions in place.

Without these pre-clearance provisions, these things would just become law, and these are regulations that would just be implemented with no more recourse to voters.

We're not a state that's currently very friendly or open to helping bring more people into the voting system. We seem to be more concerned with keeping people from accessing voting and voter registration.

As Steve touched on as his last point, it's very possible that with the implementation of Prop 200 and these citizenship, proof of citizenship requirements with voter registration that nonprofit and non-governmental organizations will no longer be able to conduct voter registration in Arizona.

This is an unbelievable and unprecedented concept in Arizona.

Minority and disenfranchised voters in Arizona are most effectively reached out to and registered to vote and get out the vote efforts are most effectively brought to those voters not by government agencies, but by community based organizations.

Now we face the prospect that these organizations, such as the NAACP, no longer being able to do these activities, much less community colleges. Then it will be the sole purview of the state and county to do this, and probably without the resources to do this effectively.

Or the requirement to do it, if the language provision is expired.

So we could face a very real prospect in Arizona of a future with no community based voter registration or voter outreach allowable in our state.

I think it's a horrifying prospect and one that's all too real.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Did you want to add something, Ms. Pew?

MS. PENNY PEW: Yes, I would. Thank you.

As it relates to Apache County, I find it quite ironic that I would be questioning the citizenship of just about 90 percent of my voters, as they are Native Americans.

I did do a test on my own ID to see if I would be eligible to vote.

If I vote early I could be eligible. However, if I were to present my driver's license as it appears with the Post Office box, I would not be able to use that.

I would have to take a water bill that has my husband's name but would have to have mine added on there to make it my ID as well.

I found that quite to be a tremendous burden on a lot of our voters, as it's $25, I believe, to renew and to change my driver's license.

I also found the alternate for my tribal ID. They carry a CIB, which is certificate of Indian blood, which is 8-1/2 by 11. Which would be like me carrying my birth certificate around, which I don't do.

Nor does the tribe offer a photo ID with an address on there at this time.

So I would be turning away in a community of poll workers who are most of them related -- if not related they go to church, they go to school together, they have lived in the same community for quite some time, and absolutely know that each other are who they say they are, I would be turning away and doing exactly what we have tried real hard not to do in the past few years.

And I believe if there was a provision that would offer a provisional ballot, I think Prop 200 probably could be dealt with. But without a provisional ballot option for a voter, I could never, I could never implement that with good ethical. . .

Just in follow up to the comments here, and for the record I just wanted to share that for many tribal communities, and I know for a fact in my tribal community, that there are a number of members of the Tohono O'Odham Nation and other tribes that are -- would not be able to document proof of citizenship because they were born in their tribal community, a remote village within the community, under a mesquite tree somewhere, and there's no record of that.

They don't -- for all intents and purposes, they were born in the United States of America, but born at home, and don't have proof of citizenship to document their citizenship. The last comment that I wanted to make is that many of the issues that the panelists have raised with regards to Prop 200, and English only, have been -- was specific to Prop 200 -- have been raised by the Tohono O'Odham Nation and other tribal communities directly to the Arizona state Attorney General's Office, who seriously took those issues into consideration and ordered that Prop 200 not be implemented this coming next election because of some of the issues that were raised.

I spoke to the state Attorney General about a month ago, and thanked him for the position that he took, but he also wanted to let me know that the state legislature was moving towards eliminating the Attorney General from -- that authority from the Attorney General himself. So. . .

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Thank you.

MR. ANDRES RAMIREZ: Mr. Chairman, I have a question regarding the Prop 200. I don't know much regarding it, but I'd be interested in seeing, just from what I've heard, will this effectively eliminate the rights of homeless people to vote, since they have to have an address requirement?

REVEREND OSCAR TILLMAN: In essence, yes.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: I think there's a general consensus --

MS. PENNY PEW: It's my understanding that if they have an address, they can vote. That's as broad as the statute is given.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: A physical address; correct?

MS. PENNY PEW: Correct.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: So if you don't?

REVEREND OSCAR TILLMAN: Then you are not allowed to vote.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: We're a bit behind, but I think this has been important. Chandler Davidson has a question.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: I have two very brief questions.

The first one is to Mr. Reyes, but I'll ask it via Nina Perales.

Would it be possible to have entered into the record the letter that Mr. Reyes wrote regarding the problems presented by Prop 200?

MS. NINA PERALES: Yes, and we can get it for you from our website, where we have posted MALDEF's comment on Proposition 200.

It's actually a part of a larger report that MALDEF has done on proof of citizenship and voter identification bills that are currently sweeping state legislators across the country. Arizona is not the only state that has seen these proposals.

In fact, there are now 15 states that have dealt with them, including Arizona, all the way from Georgia, which just passed theirs. There are bills pending in Texas. Something, something has passed in New Mexico. We're trying to sort out what it is.

And they're all, with the exception of New Mexico's, which is a little bit different, most of them are clone bills.

Many of them in a sophisticated way have been wrapped up inside immigration related legislation. It is apparently part of a larger backlash across the country to minority participation that has increased since 2000.

And will effectively shut down community based registration and thwart minority voting in many, many states across the country.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you. This will be very helpful to our commission.

The other question I want to ask I address to Reverend Tillman. You mention the fact that votes cast by African-Americans in Arizona seem in some cases to be lost, to use your term.

I wonder if there have been any newspaper articles that focus on this, any reports, or data collection by civil rights organizations or by local academics that could shed light on this for the commission.

REVEREND OSCAR TILLMAN: We have looked at it, but I was talking to the person from Nevada, and they're looking at what they're doing now, and that is monitoring online early voting so they can see in the future.

We have not had that.

As a matter of fact, on previous occasions whenever there have been complaints, I have had to practically threaten a protest to get to sit down with election people at the county level whenever -- I had no problem with our Betsy Bayless. She attempted to open up at the state level.

But as I hear her today, and as we're all talking about the different avenues and different directions we're working with the different tribes, that's not happening with the African-American community.

I don't think you can go into any election office and say what type of education are you doing in south Phoenix, which predominantly has had over the years problems with voting. We don't have that.

We are taken for granted now.

No, we do not have that.

But we're working daily to try to find everything someone else is doing and to look around and say, well, we thought that we had a vehicle with clean elections to look at things. But status quo. There are not one Black on the clean elections panel commission, even -- you know, although they're appointed by the governor, but the point is we're not there.

So we have slowly and categorically, the Black vote has been pushed aside, and further pushed aside under the current administration. We've seen that and to the point that how they have gone after our national organization.

So we are trying, every election, we try something new. But the numbers are there. You can go down and pull the rolls. We're there.

But somehow our vote don't translate into electing people. We have one Black on the city council for the fifth largest city in America. We have one Black statewide elected, State Representative Leah Landrum Taylor.

Something has got to be wrong, when we used to have six and seven. What happened?

We haven't died that many. I know I'm getting old, but I'm still here.

So, you know, in the 20 years I've been monitoring this, every year it seems like, you know, like with Prop 200, something new comes on the horizon.

We had to spend all our time fighting Prop 200. We had to take away getting out the vote to fight Prop 200. We did not want that.

We were getting -- people called the NAACP asking when is your election, we want to send somebody to monitor, we want to do the same thing.

I honestly felt like not telling them of the election. North Carolina sent a delegation out to watch. Louisiana sent a delegation out to watch, so did they, as she mentioned, clone 200. Instead of cloning 200, why not look at what we can do better to vote and push voting rights.

That's the problem we have.

Thank you.

MR. BILL LANN LEE: Reverend Tillman, you're still here.

I'd like to thank the panel. We've run out of time. It's been very helpful.

(Applause.)

MR. BILL LANN LEE: What we're going to do is go right into the next panel. So James Tucker, Professor James Tucker, and Rodolpho Espino.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Welcome to the second panel of the Southwest Regional Commission on the Voting Rights Act.

Our chair, Bill Lann Lee, has had to leave to catch a flight back to, pardon my mentioning this, California -- Florida. Well, I don't have to mention California then. So I will be sitting in for him.

The panel that we are going to hear now will present the results of an ongoing research project on language assistance problems, conducted by James Tucker, Rodolfo Espino, and ten student assistants in Barrett Honors College, one of whom will assist in the presentation. Dr. James Tucker is an adjunct professor at Arizona State University's Barrett Honors College and co-director of the Voting Rights Thesis Project.

Dr. Tucker is an attorney with the Phoenix law firm of Bryan Cave, L. L. P. , and formerly served as a trial attorney with the voting section of the Civil Rights Division at the United States Department of Justice in Washington, D. C.

He has authored several articles on the Voting Rights Act, including the forthcoming piece on the language assistance provisions of the act.

Dr. Rodolfo Espino joined the faculty of the Arizona State University political science department in 2004

Dr. Espino's primary research and teaching interests are in the fields of minority politics, political behavior, and political methodology.

Dr. Espino is presently engaged in a number of research projects, some of which include an examination of Latino political empowerment, the campaign rhetoric of Latino candidates in Spanish political campaign ads, and the political behavior of Whites in response to Latinos. The student who will be assisting them today is Elizabeth Andrews of Tempe, Arizona. She's a sophomore in political science and history, a recipient of the National Merit Scholarship, a leadership scholarship, a Robert C. Burns scholarship, and president's scholarship. She plans to attend the graduate programs in law and public policy, foreign relations and diplomacy.

I should add, having listened to the presentation of the students yesterday, I think she's off to a flying start, in whichever career she chooses.

So we're pleased to have you with us today, and we will begin.

DR. JAMES TUCKER: First of all, we want to thank the National Commission again for coming out to Phoenix, Arizona.

You know, as you know, we've got two very large language minority groups that are covered under Section 203 of the act, as well as being a Section 404 coverage jurisdiction for purposes of Section 5 of the Act. So we think it's very important.

We want to get started by first of all just mentioning the genesis of this project briefly. This is something --

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Mr. Tucker, could you get a little bit closer to the microphone, please?

DR. JAMES TUCKER: This is a project that we had discussed originally with the Lawyers' Committee and a host of other civil rights organizations with respect to information that would be of use in the reauthorization process.

And along with that, what we did was we have, through the general support of the Barrett Honors College, ten honors students signed up for this project as part of their senior honors thesis.

And Dr. Espino joined as the co-director of the project and really the lead researcher on the project.

So, first of all, let's talk briefly about what it is that we did.

We're going to go through and discuss briefly the purpose, the surveys themselves, and the findings.

The election day survey is really relatively straightforward.

We did a total of three surveys.

Actually go back to the previous slide.

We did a total of three surveys as a part of this project.

The first survey was conducted during the presidential election last November in two counties, Maricopa County and Coconino County up in the northern part of the state. We basically looked at two covered language minority groups, primarily Spanish speaking voters in Maricopa County and Navajo speaking voters in Coconino County on the Navajo Reservation.

We followed up with a telephonic survey after the general election just to see -- to basically capture voters that we may not have been able to capture on election day. I will go into the reasons why in a moment.

And then finally the jurisdiction survey is the survey that we're presently in the process of completing, and I'll talk about that in just a moment.

The election day survey was basically designed to measure three things in the two jurisdictions that we examined.

We wanted to see what the need for assistance was. We have the census data that tells us the limited English proficiency for the counties, but we wanted to see what the actual need was from the voters' perspectives.

We also wanted to see what sort of availability of assistance was there. Was there assistance there for them when they went to vote.

And, finally, how effective was that assistance, both oral and written.

We selected the precincts based on a variety of factors. Initially we did it based on the limited English proficiency data supplied by the census. Summary table three. And we did that with the cooperation of the Maricopa County GIS department that works very closely with the county and state on the redistricting issues. We designed the survey itself in a manner that would evoke honest answers without being suggestive as to what the answer should be. The thing I want to emphasize with this is notwithstanding the fact that the genesis of this project was with civil rights organizations, this is a nonpartisan project, and the other organizations that really formed the genesis of this have been completely isolated from the underlying data. The data would be kept here at Arizona State, and it will not be disseminated for purposes of confidentiality of both the voters and the responding jurisdictions.

Ultimately the survey itself is conducted in two different counties, at 50 polling locations.

Approximately 40 polling sites in Maricopa County, again, focusing on a range of limited English proficiency precincts that go from about 40 percent Hispanic voting age population all the way up to above -- well above 80 percent.

And then of course we also covered approximately ten polling sites on the Navajo Reservation in Page and Tuba City. And just given the shear numbers of voters that are Navajo voters, the limited English proficiency rate was significantly higher. On average in Coconino County it's approximately 35 percent. Telephonic survey was meant to capture the voters we couldn't capture on election day for a few reasons.

First of all, there are many voters in Arizona, really about half, that voted early, by mail.

So if you go to the polls, you already are missing 50 percent of the folks who voted.

The other group that we needed to capture under the telephonic survey are those that didn't turn out to vote at all. They're registered voters but for whatever reason they did not vote by either early ballot or on election day.

Unfortunately there's one group we could not capture, and those are individuals who are not registered to vote at all.

In some respects, while that's a limitation of what we were able to do, the census does cover that because the limited English proficiency data does capture that.

Again, what we wanted to do was we targeted the same jurisdictions, the same voting precincts in Maricopa County that we covered during the general election as a follow-up to see whether or not one of the comparisons we could do is whether or not those individuals surveyed their responses different from the voters we surveyed on election day.

The jurisdiction surveys in a lot of respects are really the gemstone of this entire project, because it's something that really hasn't been done before on the scale that we've done. The primary focus is -- the voters' focus is a bottom up view.

He also want a top down view to get the perspective of the election officials responsible for implementing the language assistance provisions.

Along with that, we asked several questions designed to measure not only the availability of the assistance, the quality of assistance they provided, but how well they were in compliance with not just Section 203 but other provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

The jurisdictions were selected through a variety of means, but in a nutshell it starts with every jurisdiction that is specifically identified in the federal register as a covered jurisdiction. In addition, there are a total of five states, Arizona, California, New Mexico, Texas, and Alaska, that are covered statewide. In those states, we also sent the survey to every county in the state. In addition, we selected cities with populations of 50,000 or more in each of those jurisdictions that I just mentioned.

Again, just to see what sort of, what sort of activities were occurring there.

And we also wanted to see the few jurisdictions that dropped out as a result of the 2002 census.

There were a couple of jurisdictions in two states that are no longer covered, and we did send to those states as well.

We also sent the surveys to the chief elections official for each of the 33 states where we mailed the surveys.

As you can see, it all totals out to 810 election officials that received the survey. The response rate is ongoing. In fact, ironically as we were having the conference here yesterday we actually received an electronic submission of the survey that I picked up on my BlackBerry.

The response rate is between 45 and 50 percent. We expect to achieve 50 percent within the next week or two.

The number's actually a little bit higher than that. I estimate about 370 completed surveys.

And the responses that we've coded in to date are from 29 of the 33 states that we sent the survey out to. This makes it is the most comprehensive survey ever conducted of election officials on this subject.

The one prior to this was one conducted by the General Accounting Office in 1984, and they had a total of 295 responding jurisdictions.

So to the credit of the students on the project, they achieved something that is actually an improvement upon a study that was done by the federal government some 20 years ago. Okay.

MR. RODOLFO ESPINO: At this point we'd like to talk a little bit about some of our preliminary findings, from both the voter survey and election officials survey.

Keep in mind that what we are presenting here are our first cut of analysis of the data. But what we are presenting is stuff that we are pretty confident on what the percentages are. There's still some surveys, telephonic surveys, and election official surveys that we will be coding in that may change our percentages slightly and a final report that we expect to produce by the end of the summer.

With respect to need for assistance, we asked voters in our election based survey and our telephonic survey whether they need assistance on going to the voting booth for language assistance.

And what we found was that 24 percent of Navajo voters -- another question we asked is whether they have ever provided assistance.

We'll talk about that one first.

We find that 24 percent of Navajo voters have reported providing assistance to another voter in Navajo at some point.

Twenty-nine percent of Latino voters have reported assisting Spanish speaking voters in elections at some point.

Now, another question I said that we asked was whether voters claim to have needed language assistance in order to vote on election day.

We found that 20 percent of Navajo voters said that they did need language assistance. We found that about 9 to 10 percent of Latino voters here in Maricopa County responded that they did need language assistance.

Now, of the 20 percent of Navajo voters that claim to have needed language assistance, half of those said that they brought someone with them to provide that assistance. Compare that to Latino voters here in Maricopa County. Of the 9 percent of Latino voters who said they needed assistance, only 10 percent of those voters said they brought someone with them to vote.

This is something that we're going to of course explore on, to look at what explains the difference between Navajo voters and Latino voters that we are interviewing here in Arizona. Certainly there's some anecdotal evidence that might suggest why these percentages are coming out the way they do.

Jim, you can probably speak to that because you were up in Coconino County on election day.

In Coconino County, a lot of these precincts were at community centers where there are all day activities going on, barbecues, so it was much easier for voters there to call out to someone, can you come help me.

Also transportation in those rural counties may have played a factor in why these percentages are coming up, because a lot of these voters needed someone to drive them to the polls given the long distance that they had to get to vote on election day.

DR. JAMES TUCKER: The thing about the elections up in northern Arizona is the presidential election was combined with the elections for the Navajo Nation, so as Dr. Espino said, what was frequently happening is many of the election sites were conducted at Navajo chapter houses.

The ones that we visited, such as the LeChee chapter house outside of Page, they had barbecues outside, so there were plenty of individuals outside of the polls who could provide assistance.

The other thing that must be pointed out is many of the voters who went into the polls were also able to get assistance from the poll workers in the polls, because most of the poll workers, I would say well over 90 percent of the poll workers in the precincts covered in Coconino County, were Navajo voters themselves.

MR. RODOLFO ESPINO: With respect to availability of assistance that's being provided by election officials, this is some information that we are gleaning from the election official survey. We found that close to 80 percent of jurisdictions were providing language assistance of some form, whether it be written, oral, or both.

We are finding that about 20 percent of the responding jurisdictions on our survey claim to be providing neither written or oral assistance.

Now, that may jump out as a really large figure to you. This is something that we certainly need to explore. Because right now at this point we haven't examined whether there are certain characteristics of these jurisdictions that might explain this, most notably whether it's small jurisdictions that could be contracting out to a county, to a larger entity, who are in this 20 percent category.

Therefore on the survey they're responding, no, we don't provide assistance. But if you keep reading on the questionnaire, they may indicate that they are receiving this help from some other government entity.

So certainly that's something that we want to explore.

Continuing on, with availability of assistance, another question that we asked on -- this is from the voter survey here in Arizona. We found that 68 percent of Arizona voters reported receiving language assistance of some type, whereas 32 percent of Arizona voters reported not receiving assistance.

And of Arizona voters right now, this is just the percentages of Navajo and Latino voters that we're talking about.

Again, this 32 percent claiming not to receive assistance of any kind, this is something that we also want to explore too. Some factors that may contribute to this percentage are the primarily language of the Navajo or Latino voter that we talked to. Consider that perhaps if you are a Latino voter and you receive something in the mail that's in both Spanish and English, if you immediately start reading the English side and don't flip it over to the Spanish area, you may not recognize that Spanish assistance is being made available.

So this is something that we want to explore further with further questions in the survey to understand why that percentage is the way it is.

Also continuing on availability of assistance, this is information that we're obtaining from the election official survey. We found that 55 percent of responding jurisdictions have at least one full-time member who is fluent in another language. We did not find any relationship between the size of the jurisdiction and whether that jurisdiction had a full-time worker that was fluent in another language.

In addition, we examined the distribution of language type across these jurisdictions that claim to have at least one full-time worker that was fluent in another language.

And not too surprisingly we found that most of these jurisdictions that had claimed to have at least one full-time worker that was bilingual, that worker was fluent in Spanish.

We found that the other percentages were six percent of jurisdictions claim to have at least one full-time worker that is fluent in native, six percent in some Asian language. And then 13 percent reported having multiple workers that were fluent in multiple languages. So you could have a jurisdiction that's responding with we have workers that are fluent in both Navajo and Spanish.

Which is a case for a lot of the jurisdictions of course here in the southwest.

Jim, did you want to talk about that?

MS. ELIZABETH ANDREWS: Basically this presents the percentages of the responding jurisdictions providing assistance for telephone inquiries according to the size of that particular jurisdiction.

There's a significant positive correlation between availability of telephone assistance and jurisdiction size. One reason it may not appear so from the chart is the fact that we have so far only received a small sample of surveys back from jurisdictions with populations of 500,000 plus.

I think we've received 13 that we've coded in.

So this is a correlation of what we've seen so far. But it's not conclusive, because we're still continuing to code and look at this particular information.

Keep going?

For this particular graph, this one illustrates the bilingual coordinator and telephone inquiries available.

It really represents the fact that most of the inquiries that are directed to jurisdictions are responded to by personnel that's located in that area, and the calls are directed to a volunteer. So it seems to illustrate the need for bilingual individuals at those offices in order to respond to all of those particular individuals that need assistance.

This just talks a little bit about telephone assistance for bilingual. It shows that smaller responding jurisdictions reported directing phone calls to volunteers fluent in covered languages more often than large jurisdictions did.

In addition, smaller jurisdictions may not have the same amount of resources available to larger jurisdictions for telephone assistance.

And they have to rely on volunteers because of lower cost.

Again, only the largest responding jurisdictions reported providing phone directories in covered languages.

No correlation exists so far between size of responding jurisdictions and the presence of an election worker fluent in the languages covered in that particular jurisdiction.

MR. RODOLFO ESPINO: Another question that we asked of election officials was whether they had a bilingual coordinator available to actually just be a liaison between the election officials and the community that was in need of language assistance.

What we found in our election official survey was that 35 percent of jurisdictions indicated that they did have a bilingual coordinator that served that liaison function. Some of you know that not all covered jurisdictions are required to have a bilingual coordinator but there are some that do.

Again, this figure, that 35 percent of jurisdictions are responding that they do have a bilingual coordinator, again, we wanted to explore this further to see if there was a relation to jurisdiction size, a percentage of LEP voters in that jurisdiction, to see if data exists explaining why a jurisdiction would chose to have a bilingual coordinator or not.

In terms of availability of oral language assistance, if you turn to, on the election official survey that you should have before you, question two on Section E, which is on Page 6, you'll see that we asked election officials what type of activities did they provide oral language assistance in.

And the chart that we have on the screen up there is the distribution of jurisdictions across this question, and we just summed up all those individual election activities.

So a jurisdiction that did everything would have a score of 14 on this list, because they provided assistance in all 14 of these activities.

A jurisdiction that provided no assistance in any of these activities would have a score of zero indicating they didn't do anything.

You see from the distribution of responses that we found that about a third of jurisdictions responded that they provided no oral language assistance in any of these activities on question E2.

About another third provided half, assistance in half of these activities. And the remaining third provided more than half.

So fairly even distribution across going from zero to half to full assistance on all activities.

In terms of availability of written materials, this was derived from the question two in Section F, which is on the following page, Page 7.

Here we have a list of 18 types of activities that election officials could provide written language assistance in.

And, again, this index ranges from zero to 18.

What we found here interestingly was 25 percent of jurisdictions responded that they provided no type of written language assistance in any of these activities.

Only 20 percent zero to half.

But a large majority of these jurisdictions responded that they provided at least half if not all of the assistance in these activities.

This in comparison to the availability of oral -- written, oral assistance activities, what, what you'll find in comparisons of questions, responses to questions E2 to F2 is that jurisdictions are expending more resources and efforts into providing written language assistance than oral language assistance.

So it's one of those conclusions that we can reach from the comparison of these two questions.

DR. JAMES TUCKER: There are several possible explanations of that. That's something that we could look into in a little more detail.

One example might be if a county is a covered subjurisdiction, such as you have a small county in Texas, but it's covered because the state is covered statewide, it may be possible that they're providing written language materials provided by the Secretary of State's office such as bilingual registration materials, but they're not actually providing bilingual poll workers because the limited English proficient percentages are actually quite low for that county. This is another example of where we need to correlate this with the census data to see whether or not that is one of the things that's driving it, or, in fact, especially given the fact that, as we will talk about at the very end, written language assistance costs appear to be higher than oral language assistance costs.

MR. RODOLFO ESPINO: Now, you commissioners, of course, will probably be interested in the testimony you're gathering here with respect to the voters on the quality of assistance they're receiving.

This is a question that we asked on the voter surveys. We asked Navajo and Latino voters to rate the quality of oral and written assistance they received from election officials. The good news here is a large chunk of both Latino and Navajo voters are rating the quality assistance that they're receiving from election officials as good to excellent.

I think with respect to the Latino populations, 95 percent or greater of Latino voters are rating the quality of assistance good to excellent.

Now, there are some variations within the population that are a function of the primary, their primary language, the voters' primarily language that they speak at home.

So, for instance, you'll find that Latino voters whose primarily language is English, they're much more likely than Latino voters whose primary language is Spanish to rate the quality of -- I'm sorry, to rate oral assistance higher than Latino voters whose primarily language is non-English.

With respect to Navajo voters, we find that, again, a large chunk of Navajo voters are reporting that the quality of oral assistance they're receiving is good to excellent, but there is not the same distinction by primary language as we saw with Latino voters.

That is, that Navajo voters, regardless of whether their primarily language is English, Navajo, or equally both, they seem to be responding in the same general trends toward the rating of the quality assistance, regardless of their primary language. Now, this is something that, Elizabeth, you can probably answer because this is derived from an open-ended question on the voter survey, and so you read these in great detail.

MS. ELIZABETH ANDREWS: This particular graph illustrates those that responded to question 14. The question, I believe, was: Do you have any suggestions about ways in which the assistance could be improved. And these are the responses they gave us.

As you can see, there's a wide variety. We've tried to group them as much as possible, even though they are individual responses. A lot of people didn't feel -- well, probably a little more than a quarter felt that help was needed. A large degree didn't know that they were available, didn't know that they there. And that's the maroon portion at the bottom.

There are a lot of different resources and suggestions that they made.

In looking into ways it could be improved, this is something that we hope will give us a little more insight into the needs of the voters.

DR. JAMES TUCKER: We also asked a series of questions regarding the frequency of training.

What we've seen, what I've seen in election coverages, there's frequently a correlation between the quality of training of the poll workers and the quality of assistance that's being provided to voters in the polls on election day.

The good news is, at least according to what the election officials are reporting, is most of them do provide training.

Again, you can see there's approximately just under 20 percent provide training annually. And you see the number just about 65 percent actually provide training before each election.

So that's actually good news.

The interesting thing about this though is that in addition, if you look at the second point, less than four percent of the jurisdictions answered a question specifically asked to test the jurisdictions', the election officials' knowledge of Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act. It's question E6 on Page 7, top of Page 7.

And specifically it says who of the following may accompany voters who need assistance in the voting booth, check all that apply.

We designed the question that way because we didn't want it to be leading or suggestive.

But essentially under Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act the answer is very simple. Anyone who's the assister of the voter's choice may accompany the voter into the -- even into the voting booth, with two exceptions. One of the exceptions is the voter's employer and the other one is the agent of the union that the voter may belong to.

And curiously enough what we found was that of all the jurisdictions that responded to this question, only 12 answered it correctly.

And they actually wrote in what I just said.

Everyone can go in and provide assistance with the exception of the voter's employer or their union agent.

So, again, this shows that 96 percent of the jurisdictions are getting it wrong in some respects.

The other point that should be made about this is that many of the jurisdictions specifically said that they would not allow children to provide assistance to a parent. Only adults can accompany the voter into the voting booth to provide assistance.

This is inconsistent with the plain language of Section 208.

The data is preliminary, but we don't think these numbers will change a lot.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Could I just interrupt here and say we're running late, and I want to ask you if it's possible for you to wrap up your presentation in the next five to ten minutes.

DR. JAMES TUCKER: Yes, actually what I will do is I'll look through this very quickly.

First of all, this slide basically shows that most jurisdictions do not require any kind of confirmation of language abilities of the poll workers.

Again, you see this slide actually shows that most of the jurisdictions providing training to poll workers do so through written materials.

The numbers that are actually a little striking are the numbers, the figures to the right of the slide which indicate that jurisdictions are not providing any kind of demonstrations to elections officials. Very few jurisdictions do that. As well as a small number of jurisdictions actually provide training on covered language groups in the jurisdictions.

And then in addition, see the slide there, I actually want to move on, but this shows a little bit about how the voters are actually informed about the assistance.

As far as the costs go, this is the last point that we have as this part of the presentation. Two thirds of the responding jurisdictions provided at least some cost data. Roughly about half provided data concerning the cost of both oral language assistance and written language assistance.

And what we did find in this is that many of the comments that were provided along with the survey response confirmed the difficulties that the general accounting office experienced when they sent out the previous studies in 1984 and 1997.

That is, most jurisdictions simply do not separate out the cost of providing language assistance, whether written or oral.

The data that we found does, however, correlate with what the findings of the earlier GAO studies were. Particularly the 1984 GAO study published in 1986.

They found roughly two percent -- of the responding jurisdictions, roughly two percent of the total elections expenses were providing oral language assistance. That's exactly what we found.

The number hasn't changed.

The 1. 4 percent simply refers to the total -- percentage of total election cost for providing oral language assistance on election day.

You see the range from zero to 30 percent.

Telephonic language assistance makes up a very small percentage of total election costs. Of those that do provide telephone assistance that reported, on average it makes up about one half of one percent of the total election expenses.

Again, you see the range from zero to 20 percent. The 20 percent is going to correlate, in all likelihood, this is something we need to explore a little bit more, it's going to correlate with the smaller jurisdictions that have smaller budgets.

And as far as the cost of providing written language assistance, the earlier GAO studies found that roughly seven and a half percent of total election expenses went to the cost of providing written language materials.

Our numbers are actually showing it's a little bit lower. It's probably roughly consistent with what the GAO found.

On average the jurisdictions that responded to this, which is approximately 52 percent of all the jurisdictions, reported that five percent of the total election expenses are spent on bilingual written language materials.

You see the costs range from zero to 75 percent.

Seventy-five percent is an outlier because you see only four jurisdictions responded that over 50 percent of their total expenses went to written language materials.

And that brings us to the conclusion of our formal presentation. If the commission has any questions.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you very much.

Do the commissioners have any questions?

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Let me ask one preliminary question.

I believe you mentioned that your findings here are preliminary, there are still questionnaires being returned, and you will finish the study sometime this summer. And I presume that you'll make a copy of that finished study available to the commission for inclusion in its record?

DR. JAMES TUCKER: Yes, that's correct. We're in the process now of continuing to receive responses to the jurisdiction survey. We are still coding in some of those responses we have. The universal data we have here is pretty big. That represents roughly 45 percent of all the surveys that were sent.

So we believe that's a fairly representative sample of what you're going to see.

We don't expect the numbers to change a whole lot.

In addition, one of the bigger tasks that we're going to have is simply to choose the variables. Again, this is a snapshot. We have literally thousands of possible variations that we can do based upon the variables that we're comparing.

The one thing we want to do is integrate the 2000 census data into this, because we can actually look at percentages by the responding jurisdictions to determine if there's a correlation between some of the census data, whether it's population size or limited English proficiency, by the responses we received. MR. RODOLFO ESPINO: That will allow us to speak to whether there is a need in that area, and that election officials are responding to that need.

HON. PENNY WILLRICH: I have a question for any of the panelists. This deals with the issue of literacy.

When you're looking at the data that you're gathering, are you looking at literacy from a perspective of a voter being able to speak their native language plus English, and a voter who only speaks monolingual in a particular language, and whether or not there's a correlation to literacy as they're looking at voter material and getting assistance?

MR. RODOLFO ESPINO: In the voter survey we did ask a couple questions that we have not looked at yet related to those questions. And those questions in particular were asking the respondent to rate their ability to speak English and to read English.

Again, we have not looked at how those, how those responses to that question relate to the other questions that we've presented here.

DR. JAMES TUCKER: One of the other points that needs to be made is the categories that we used in the voter survey track the same definitions that are used by the census department. We ask the voter to self-report whether or not they speak English very well, well, poor, or not at all.

By definition, a limited English proficient voter is anyone that speaks English less than very well.

For any of us that looks at any of our many propositions on the ballot in Arizona, you fast understand why that's the case. In addition, one of the additional forms of analysis that we perform is to compare the data self-reported by the voters and compare it to the limited English proficiency data available through the 2000 census.

MR. RODOLFO ESPINO: A good indication to us too about ability to read or write in English is just the language in which the survey was conducted. That's something, again, that we want to be looking at.

MR. NED NORRIS, JR. : The only question I have is, I find it all interesting and great information, I was just wondering, the Navajo Nation was one of your survey areas, target areas. I was wondering if there was any consideration to any of the other tribal entities that are in the state, and, in particular, you know, the Salt River or the Fort McDowell or the tribes closest to the Phoenix metro area.

DR. JAMES TUCKER: There were basically a couple considerations that went into it. One was the sheer logistics of the operation.

The thing to the credit of the students, the students here were able to recruit over a hundred volunteers at no cost to us at all who went out to the polls in Maricopa County. We were looking at precincts where we could get the biggest bang for our buck. We did not want to exclude Native Americans just by looking at the precinct numbers, you know, the number of registered voters.

We selected Coconino County as a good location because of the large numbers of Navajo speaking voters.

It may be the Maricopa and Pima Indian communities, the numbers, and Tohono O'Odham, the numbers may actually vary, but we know based on the limited English proficiency data for Arizona that the Native American population with the greatest need for language assistance is the Navajo and Hopi Nations.

Coconino County was specifically targeted because 35 percent of all Navajo voters in Coconino County indicated in the 2000 census they require assistance in voting.

So it was not designed in any way, shape, or form to exclude any communities. It was largely based on getting the biggest bang for the buck.

MR. NED NORRIS, JR. : I understand that.

I guess my thought was there's a lot of important data that you've been able to gather as a result of the survey, and I think if you went to some of the other tribes with the same or identical survey you're going to assist us in our ability to justify the need for these resources that we may not be able to secure at this point within some of the other tribal entities here. DR. JAMES TUCKER: I think it's a very good recommendation.

I think one of the things we can pursue is Dave Castillo through the Intertribal Council of Arizona has been instrumental in helping us with many portions of this, so perhaps the most logical way to do this is to see if we can circulate the survey through the ITCA and cover all 19 tribes in the state of Arizona.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: I have one other question with regard to one of your findings that was especially interesting, as I wrote it down, 79 percent of the jurisdictions that you surveyed said they'd provided some form of language assistance, and the remaining 21 reported providing none at all.

Is there any way for you to estimate now, or when you further analyze the data, how many language minority voters live in this 21 percent of the jurisdictions that provide no assistance at all?

MR. RODOLFO ESPINO: With the data we have right now, no. But our plan is in the next couple weeks to merge that census data to the jurisdiction survey results that we have to answer that question exactly.

This was something that Jim and I have been talking about that we need to do first thing.

DR. JAMES TUCKER: One point that needs to be made about that too for the record to make it clear.

We do know, we know on the survey project the numbers that correlate with the respondents, we're able to do that, but we have promised the respondents, the election officials strict anonymity.

To the extent that over the course of the summer, as we wrap this project up, if there is particularly good narrative data that might disclose or otherwise identify the jurisdiction that responded, we're going to have to suppress that data. Valuable though it might be.

But that's the manner in which we're going to be able to correlate the census data.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: I think just the numbers themselves, aside from identifying the jurisdictions in question will be invaluable information for this commission to have.

DR. JAMES TUCKER: Certainly.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: I would like on behalf of the commission to thank you once again for appearing here. As a sociologist, I would also like to compliment you on the research that you've done.

If you want to continue to answer some of these questions and you're running short on money, I'm not going to provide it myself, but I strongly urge you to contact the Law and Society Section of the National Science Foundation. This seems to be the kind of research that they would be interested in.

Thank you again very much.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: We'll resume our hearings at 1:30.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Welcome to the afternoon session.

I'm one of the members of the commission, Chandler Davidson.

I'm sitting in for Bill Lann Lee, the chair who had to leave earlier today.

It's a pleasure to be with you this afternoon, and I'm going to begin by introducing the panelists who will be giving their testimony.

And I will begin by introducing Richard Ellis, who is chair, Southwest Studies at Fort Lewis College.

Dr. Ellis lives in Durango, Colorado.

From 1987 through 1995 Dr. Ellis served as director of the Center of Southwest Studies at the college.

He has served as director of the Institute of Southwest Studies since 2004.

He is the author, co-author, or editor of seven books, sixteen book chapters, 21 articles and professional journals.

Dr. Ellis has served as an expert witness in the Cortez and Montezuma school board. He was an expert for the ACLU and the water rights case New Mexico v. Emmett.

Our second panelist is Shirlee Smith.

I'll find the bio very quickly.

Ms. Smith, originally from Navajo, New Mexico, speaks Navajo fluently, has worked with the Bureau of Elections in Bernalillo County, New Mexico, for seven years.

As a Native American election information coordinator, Ms. Smith has been responsible for interpreting voting procedures for the urban rural native people in Bernalillo County. She also coordinates the Sandia tribal government, Teewa (phonetic) and Carris (phonetic) language interpreters that are selected and trained.

Lydia Guzman is the policy director of the Clean Elections Institute.

She is based in Phoenix.

She has more than 15 years' experience with voter registration, Get Out The Vote campaigns. She was Arizona state director for the Southwest Voter Registration and Education Project.

Prior to that was the director of voter outreach for the Arizona Secretary of State.

Ms. Guzman was a clean elections candidate for Senate in 2004.

Adam Andrews is an executive assistant of the chair and vice chair of the Tohono O'Odham Nation.

The Tohono O'Odham Nation is comparable in size to the state of Connecticut. Its four noncontiguous segments total more than 2. 8 million acres, at an elevation of 2674 feet.

Within its land the Nation has established an industrial park located near Tucson. Tenants of the industrial park include Caterpillar, the maker of heavy equipment; the Desert Diamond Casino, an enterprise of the nation; and a 23-acre foreign trade zone.

Next is John R. Lewis, who is the executive director of the Intertribal Council of Arizona.

The Intertribal Council of Arizona was established in 1952 to provide a united voice for tribal governments located in the state of Arizona and to address common issues of concern.

On July 9th, 1975, the council established a private nonprofit corporation under Tribal Council of Arizona, Inc. , under the laws of the state of Arizona to promote Indian self-reliance through public policy development. ITCA provides an independent capacity to obtain, analyze, and disseminate information vital to Indian community self-development.

The members of ITCA are the highest elected tribal officials. Tribal chairpersons, presidents, and governors, these representatives are in the best position to have a comprehensive view of the conditions and needs of the Indian communities they represent.

As a group the tribal leaders represent governments that have a shared historical experience. Consequently, the tribes have a common governmental status as well as similar relationships with federal and state governments.

Next is Daniel Ortega, who's a partner of Roush, McCracken, Guerrero, Miller & Ortega.

He practices -- his practice concentrates on serious personal injury and wrongful death cases.

He serves on the board of directors of the National Farmworkers Service Center, and Los Abogados, Hispanic Bar Association. He has also served on the board of directors of the Mexican-American Legal Defense and Education Fund, National Council of La Raza, the Arizona Trial Lawyers Association, Valley of the Sun United Way, Arizona State Alumni Association, Chicanos Por La Causa, Incorporated.

I skipped and will now go back to Rogene Calvert, an old friend from my early Houston days.

Rogene G. Calvert is a native Houstonian of Chinese descent, who has been involved in the non-profit field for almost three decades.

She has worked for the Community Welfare Planning Association, United Way of Texas Gulf Coast, and served as the first executive director of the Child Abuse Prevention Network.

Ms. Calvert was the founder and interim executive director of the Interethnic Forum and served as the first executive director of the Asian Pacific American Heritage Association.

She is now serving in Houston, Mayor White's administration, as director of personnel and volunteer initiatives program.

And our last presenter is Paul Eckstein, partner of Perkins, Coie, Brown & Bain, PA. He's worked on redistricting cases in Arizona for the last three decades, and his law practice's areas of emphasis include civil litigation, including appellate, media law, political law, Indian law, gaming antitrust, and alternative dispute resolution.

Mr. Eckstein is a regional vice chair of the Lawyers' Committee.

He is currently on the board of directors of Arizona Town Hall, and is the former president of the Arizona Center for Law in the Public Interest.

I'll begin by asking Mr. Ellis to give his presentation.

And just so we understand the procedure here, I will ask each person to give his or her testimony, and then after everyone has presented, the members of the commission will ask you questions.

Mr. Ellis.

MR. RICHARD ELLIS: Mr. Chairman, members of the commission, is that better? I'd like to think that I was invited to be here because of my brilliant scholarship and brilliant performance in the classroom, but, alas, that is not the case.

I was asked to be here because I served as an expert witness on what we call the Cuthair case, which was a case filed by a number of Ute tribal members, Ute Mountain Ute tribal members, against the Cortez-Montezuma county school board.

Because the school board used at large elections as an effective technique of disenfranchising or at least disempowering Ute Mountain tribal members.

I was asked to keep my comments to five minutes, and told my students that yesterday, and they bet me that I couldn't do it.

But I'll --

MR. BILL LANN LEE: We're betting on you.

MR. RICHARD ELLIS: I was asked to summarize, I guess, what I had uncovered in the Cuthair case, and was asked by the attorney for ACLU to look at attitudes in Cortez, Colorado, and Montezuma County, but to go back a little bit and try to give a historic perspective to attitudes toward American Indians in the state of Colorado.

And I work in that field, so I wasn't surprised at what I found.

It is a long and sad record, but as a former New Mexican having worked in New Mexico history, I know the record is bad there. And Arizona and other western states are the same. Colorado had its origins in the gold rush in 1859, and Coloradians, at least the first Whites who went out there, were trespassers on federal land, and knew it, and so what they wanted to do was find a way to acquire title to that land and move Indians out.

And they persisted in that attitude through the 19th century, attitudes that perhaps best are expressed by a quote or two.

This came after a failed effort on the part of the United States government to buy land from the Utes who owned the western two thirds of Colorado.

This is from the Boulder News, Boulder, Colorado, newspaper.

The Utes would not resign their reservation. So the fairest portion of Colorado and some of the richest mining country is closed to settlement unless it be settled by force of arms. So settled we believe it will be and should be. An Indian has no more right to stand in the way of civilization and progress than a wolf or a bear.

By the latter part of the 18th century, the newspaper editorials in Colorado picked up literally what became the chant in print, the Utes must go.

And you find that expressed in virtually all of the newspapers in Colorado.

An attitude that is supported by the memorials to the territorial legislature, by petitions from the governor. It is the attitude of Colorado.

And ultimately they effected that desire with the exception of a narrow strip of land on the New Mexico-Colorado border, that is today the home of two reservations, initially one, but then later split.

The Southern Ute Reservation and the Ute Mountain Ute Reservation.

The Ute Mountain Ute reservation is located in the western part of that stretch of land. It is in Montezuma County, just south of the community of Cortez.

And by the second half of the 20th century, Ute Mountain Ute children began to enter the school system in Cortez, Colorado.

One of the things we did was to try to sample public opinion by use of the newspaper. A small town newspaper is usually an effective gauge of the attitude of the community. And in the 1940s, there are jokes, for example, about Sambo and Rastus. There's the use of, quote unquote, nigger talk. And virtually no mention of Ute Indians in the newspapers, until they began to acquire funds from gas and oil and from the claims case against the United States government.

And it was only then that they began to become important.

And as the school superintendent in 1956 said: Gee, now that the Utes are getting some money, we need to pay attention to them.

The newspaper through the remainder of the century and into the beginning of this century expressed attitudes opposing tribal sovereignty, opposing Indian voting, opposing the Navajo Indian irrigation project because it would give cheap water to Indians.

It is a community that as late as 1968 had the county clerk seeking an opinion from the Attorney General, she failed, but she sought an opinion that Indians residing on reservations should not be allowed to vote.

It's a community that in the 1980s saw two White men kill a 78-year-old Ute that was asleep in the county, in the city park, and nothing appeared in the newspapers until a nurse in the hospital who happened to be married to a jailer -- a daughter of the jailer and married to a state patrolman let the news out. And only then was an investigation undertaken.

The DA chose not to prosecute even though they had a confession from the two perpetrators.

So this is an attitude that purveys at least Montezuma County and extends over into my county to the east.

We continue to see anti-Indian attitudes.

When I did the research in the Cuthair case and went through the newspapers, I wanted to hire two of my best students, and they declined because they were from Cortez, and they were preparing for teaching jobs, and if anybody learned that they had helped me in the research, they knew that they would not be employed.

And so, I know that we're dealing with contemporary issues, but it seems to me that something of a historic background is useful.

And I may have missed five minutes, but I came pretty close.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: I would call it a draw, that bet, between you and the students.

Thank you very much.

Mrs. Smith.

MS. SHIRLEE SMITH: Good afternoon.

Members of the commission, can you hear me?

Excuse me for my cold, but my name is Shirlee Smith, and I am Navajo, and originally from Navajo, New Mexico, and I moved to Albuquerque, New Mexico.

And I work for Bernalillo County as a Native American election information program coordinator. And just recently my title was changed to voting act coordinator.

First of all, I would like to just talk about myself a little bit. And then I'll go into the consent decree that we're under.

First of all, when I came to, as I was growing up, we moved around, and my first language was English. And as I grew up, I went into -- I learned my Navajo language.

My reading, my writing, my speaking, and my background is mainly accounting, but when I came to Albuquerque, I came across this position.

And it was interesting, because I never had expertise or experience in an election. And when I applied for it, I got it. I came down to the county, and the position was given to me. They told me that here's this position. This position, we don't know what we're going to do with it, but you handle it from here. So I took on this position, went out to the rural areas, which are the Native Americans.

They have four tribes, reservations that are in this county. We have the Laguna Reservation, the Navajo Reservation, the Isleta Pueblo Reservation, and Sandia Reservation.

And when I went out to go visit them, to start finding out and give them the information of the election, I had to start from the bottom with our Native Americans. None of them didn't know anything about election, how to vote, what kind of document is needed. A lot of it was, you know, rumor. And I had to gain my trust with the Native Americans.

What are you doing here, is what I always got. And I had to start from the bottom.

And the negative attitudes that they had toward the election was -- all of that, I had to turn that around and more like educate our people on the election process.

It was sad because a lot of elderlies that I listened to had tears running down their eyes and saying that, you know, we didn't know about this, we didn't know we were a part of this.

We have people come out here to spring documents and say you have to go, and we don't know anything about it, we just, we just vote.

So that was where I started from. And start educating the elderlies.

And telling them that the positive part of it, to put aside the politicals and stuff on the side and teach them the procedures and how their voices can be heard.

As far as funding, how they're living, what kind of changes they can make just by voting.

And all of that had to be taught to our people.

And then I started going into schools, younger generations. And a lot of it was, you know, what elderlies said, how it was brought down.

So even that had to change.

As I was going through this whole thing, a lot of our language was an unwritten language. Especially with our Pueblos. They don't want it written. They would rather have it interpret.

So in the election process, a lot of words in there, we don't have words for them.

And we had to come up with words. We had to come up with identifying the position by explaining what the individual did or does or their responsibility is.

So an elderly, when you're interpreting, you practically have to explain what that individual or what that candidate position is, what their responsibility is.

A lot of the written and writing stuff had just recently come about onto the reservations, because of the board. We had code talkers back then. So that's where our writing started, and that's where our reading started.

So we didn't have words.

We don't have words for the elderlies.

We had to, you know, to interpret things became longer and time consuming. And now we have colleges that are going into courses that are, you know, they're learning how to read and write.

It's sad to hear, you know, they sound good, they sound like they're, you know, real good in their language.

But sometimes you ask them more, and they won't know what you're saying. They don't even know what they're saying.

So it's kind of sad.

But the people are all at a different level with the Voting Rights Act being in place. There's a lot of teaching. To have, you know, I'm looking forward to seeing the act reestablished for the people, because it's time consuming to teach the people the process of the election. So at the people's level, that's how it is.

Then when I'm working within the election office, I hear a lot of these changes happening. Policies, bills that are being passed, identification, all these other things that are coming about.

And to say that this is ending or it's not going to be renewed, I wonder about our people, who's going to interpret for them.

What's going to really happen.

You know, that's what I'm looking at.

I would like to see this reauthorized for our people, for all the Native Americans that are, you know, needing the language assistance in their area.

It's really touched my heart to see our people, not knowing what the process and how much their voice can be, it's important to them, and it's important to us, and will make a difference, that they can make a difference. That's the way I look at it.

And we also, the county is also 293,000 voters, is what we have in our county. We have four tribes that are living there.

I think that's it. Thank you.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you very much, Ms. Smith.

Commissioner Buchanan has to catch a plane very shortly, and he has asked to have a few minutes before he leaves, and we're pleased to give that to him.

HON. JOHN BUCHANAN: I express my final appreciation to our distinguish commissioners, regional commissioners, and to all of the panelists, both those that we have heard and not yet heard. I look forward to reading and/or hearing your testimony in the future. And I think this visit to Phoenix has been invaluable to the commission.

We appreciate very much your contribution and your presence here. Please forgive me, when I leave you, it will be with great regret, but I'll be listening for and reading about your testimony. Thank you.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you, commissioner.

(Applause.) Mrs. Guzman.

MS. LYDIA GUZMAN: I don't know if I need a microphone. I've been told that my voice carries.

Again, my name is Lydia Guzman. I thank you very much for taking the time to listen to our testimony.

I come here wearing several hats.

One of them is indeed with LULAC. I'm also the district director for LULAC, district one, which encompasses the areas of Kingman, all Maricopa County, and a lot of the rural areas in Yuma and Yuma County.

So we have a lot of folks that this definitely affects as well in the Latino community. I wanted to share with you my experience with doing voter registration.

I started off as a teenager conducting voter registration drives, knocking on doors and helping to empower communities in some of the small suburban communities in Los Angeles County where we had a high number of Latinos living in an area where we didn't have representation.

This is years of movement. However, in doing the voter registration drives, and knocking on doors, and asking people to register to vote, it was a true blessing to see that the voter registration forms in L. A. County were bilingual.

They were bilingual.

And so it tremendously helped because a lot of folks in asking for that information, sometimes they liked to fill out the forms themselves and see what it is that they're actually filling out and signing.

And that really helped a lot to empower communities like that.

Now, in working that way, I was doing this as a teenager as a volunteer for an organization called Southwest Voter Registration Education Project, who has been empowering Latino communities for years and years in the southwestern region.

And their motto and their emblem has always been Su Voto es Su Voz. Which in Spanish, that's the way it's always been, it translates to your vote is your voice.

Okay. But the fact that it's in Spanish is only symbolism of the fact that they can go to the polls and Latino communities can go to the polls and they can receive information in Spanish because they're going to voice their vote in Spanish.

They do have a vote, the Latino citizens. The U. S. citizens have a vote indeed. Through the course of doing voter registration drives, I remember after Proposition 187 in California so many people that didn't have the power of the vote started applying for citizenship.

More people became citizens, more people applied for citizens, for citizenship in the following two years, after Prop 187 in California, than in the previous 30 years, that of course there was a huge backlog, and everybody knows the history of what that backlog created. However, what that did is that empowered a lot of Latinos in the state of Arizona to say this isn't going to happen to us again. We have mean spirited propositions that are attempting to hurt us in every single way, when it comes to areas that are grave concern to us, in areas of education, in areas of housing, in so many different programs, that we need to step up to the plate and we need to go to the polls.

And of course that increased the number of Latinos that were registering to vote. Again, thank goodness that it was bilingual.

Bilingual and there was assistance.

And even though we -- I saw problems. I remember my aunt, for the first time in California, this was a few years back, when she went to the polls, she called me right after she voted, and this was in Palmdale, Palmdale, California, and she said, you know, I was so humiliated, I voted, but I tell you what, I voted biting my tongue.

I asked her why.

She said, well, because I asked for assistance in Spanish, and because I heard them say, they may not know that I can understand, I may not feel comfortable speaking it, but they said: I'll bet you she's illegal.

Okay.

So it broke her heart.

I said this is why you need to continue to go vote. You need to continue.

She was so heartbroken by this.

Her original intent was never to go back to the polls. She doesn't want to be mistreated this way. The fact that she was mistreated.

And this is only symbolism of why we need also more bilingual workers at the polls.

But, but just, in continuing to do this work, and I am trying to do this in chronological order so you can see how this is slowly affecting and the problems continue to exist throughout the years. Coming here to Arizona, again, doing voter registration with different projects and working with several different organizations, I found myself being hired by Secretary of State Betsy Bayless, who you heard testimony from Alberto Olivas, he had the position before I did.

And she was the first Secretary of State in Arizona to ever create such a position to have a voter outreach person covered under this provision that had to be bilingual.

And I applaud her effort for doing this.

You know, she allowed the person in this position, and Alberto and myself, to go out into the communities.

Now, in doing so, one of our primary duties as a voter outreach director was also to conduct town hall meetings in different communities of Arizona on the different ballot initiatives. In doing so, everything, of course, was bilingual.

I am so thankful that we had bilingual folks in the different counties that were able to assist in the Navajo Reservation, when it came to areas like Fort Defiance, Kayenta, Chinle, and all of the Native American communities, because without them, and they were covered, their positions are covered under this provision, without them, I don't think that I could have effectively shared the information so that they could make a conscientious decision on the different ballot initiatives.

Especially in that election where we had initiatives that were affecting the Native American community, three different gaming propositions, they had a lot to win or lose.

And in moving right along in time, there was recently a proposition that would have closed a county hospital.

A county hospital locally here that would have closed services to so many folks in Central Phoenix, majority Spanish speaking, a lot of low income.

And this was, even though it was a county election, the folks that stood to lose the most were the folks that this hospital serviced.

Many of these folks were registered voters. However, they were monolingual Spanish.

The importance of bringing out this message -- at this point I was the state director for Southwest Voter Registration Education Project.

At this point so much information came out in Spanish to allow the information to the voters saying your county hospital, the one that services you the most, is about to be shut down. Come to the polls.

Those are the small elections that the Latinos stand to lose the most.

We lose so many programs on the local level, even though, you know, the presidential elections, they bring in a lot of folks, they do a lot of commercials, they do a lot of everything bilingual, and they have the money to do so.

However, in the smaller elections when the Latinos have so much to lose, we lose so many wonderful programs, like for school programs, bond elections. There's not a lot of money put into that.

Because of those small bond elections, maybe we have counties that consolidate their polling places, so where you vote in one place in one election will definitely change, and it's because of the consolidated voting place. If it's not in Spanish, what's going to happen is that so many folks in the areas where these programs are going to be lost, if they don't get the voters out, they're going to lose those voters anyway.

Recently, of course, in my bio, when you read, I did run for the Senate -- I know I have one minute left -- I wanted to share with you this.

My mother, my mother voted for the first time this election.

She had an opportunity and she was very blessed to vote for the first time in voting for me. Okay.

And it was wonderful. However, it was a terrible experience at the same time.

She voted at the Dreamy Draw legislative district ten. There were no bilingual assistants outside. I stood outside, outside the limit, and I explained to her how she was, you know, how to effectively vote for a candidate, in connecting the arrows, just, you know, we do have a mark system and we have to connect the arrows, and I thought I did a wonderful job explaining to her for the first time.

I forgot one important thing. So when she went in there, she was lost.

The poll workers, they didn't deny her the right to vote, but they did deny her the opportunity of being properly instructed in how to vote.

It was a terrible experience for her. She was heartbroken because she thought maybe her vote didn't count. Simply because there were so many other candidates on there that she wasn't sure whether or not to vote.

She never heard of them, and we had so many justice candidates on there that she never heard of.

So she was wondering if I vote yes, if I vote no, when you vote would you do more harm than good. If abstaining from voting, will her entire ballot be tossed out.

So I forgot to give her those instructions, so she was heartbroken thinking that her vote didn't count.

For so people like my mom, I'm asking that we continue to extend and to reauthorize. Like my mom, there are so many cases. And for all of those folks that are going to apply for citizenship as a result of this passage of Prop 200, Prop 200 will disengage so many voters because of the new ID requirements and because of the new strenuous, not only iD requirements, but the citizenship requirements that are going to be imposed on the voters. Our Latino voters stand to lose so much.

I'm very concerned about this not being reauthorized.
I'm very concerned that we're going to lose, where we call ourselves the sleeping giant that is awaking, if we don't have this reauthorized, this is just like giving that sleeping giant a sedative.
Thank you.
MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: I'm going to take a couple of our speakers out of order, because they are both going to be addressing an issue from a different point of view, as I understand it, and I think it would benefit the commission to hear both of them give their points of view, and then for us to be able to ask them questions before at least one of them has to leave.
And so with your permission, I will ask Mr. Ortega to present his views.
MR. DANIEL ORTEGA: Thank you very much.
I appreciate this opportunity to come before you today, and especially to give you an opportunity to deal with the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act, and for taking me out of turn.
I thank all of you.
First, my name is Daniel Ortega. I'm an attorney here in Phoenix and have been practicing law for approximately 28 years. I say approximately because I haven't gone beyond 28.
I don't want to say 40 like Paul here.
Approximately 28 years, and having in that time handled a variety of cases involving election law as well as issues related to the Voting Rights Act.
I've specifically handled over a dozen election cases in my career. I have been involved in both the redistricting legislative and congressional district cases.
I was also co-counsel to Paul, with Paul Eckstein, on a lawsuit that was brought against a high school district, Phoenix Union High School District, asking to split up the districts. And we were successful in doing that.
Currently I am Arizona counsel on the legal challenge against Proposition 200, along with MALDEF, who is also here.
In the redistricting cases that come around every ten years, I've represented Congressman Ed Pastor in the first one back in 1990. This time I represent Congressman Ed Pastor as well as the Hopi Tribe.
Currently that litigation is underway, and I am representing the Hopi Tribe.
I'm a member of the national council and also board of directors. I'm a member of the National Farmworkers Service Center board, as well as Hispanic Bar Association board here in Phoenix, Arizona.
If ever there was a time in the history of Arizona to reauthorize VRA, it is today. There has never been the onslaught of legislation and actions taken that affect voting ever in the history of Arizona as what's occurred in the last year.
And it started with the license the voters gave the legislature of this state in approving Proposition 200.
Proposition 200, as you know, under sections three, four, and five deal directly with changes to the election laws regarding new requirements for registration as well as new requirements for voting.

But because they did it so poorly and the drafting was so bad, they had to figure out a way to fix it.

They attempted to fix it. Luckily we have a governor who chose to veto the bill when they tried to fix Prop 200 and sections three, four, and five.

The problem is we don't know how long this governor will be there. And we'll continue to need the protection of justice and pre-clearance with regard to the changes that I believe will be made by this reactionary legislature in the future.

I always want to -- last week I heard the governor talking. She told a group of us that she was going to veto the bill dealing with the changes in the election laws to try to fix Prop 200.

And she said that the bill was on its way to her office and she was going to get her veto stamp out to make sure it was vetoed. She also said something very interesting.

She said this is the legislature that's also going to get rid of the Equal Employment Opportunity office for the state of Arizona. There are only two states in the whole country who don't have EEO offices, and they are Alabama and Mississippi.

This state wants to join that group of people.

If ever there was a time for the Voting Rights Act to be authorized and Section 5 be directly applied to Arizona, it is now, folks.

We're talking about legislature that believes in English only. We're talking about legislature that doesn't believe in bilingual ballots.

We're talking about a legislature that's trying everything in its power to disenfranchise a segment of voters primarily which are the Hispanic community and the Native American community. We definitely and unequivocally need the protection of the Voting Rights Act, and in particular Section 5.

I know that my colleague Paul is going to speak to the contrary with regard to Section 5 and its application, and I recognize the debate that exists about how the Voting Rights Act has benefitted the Republicans.

I would be dishonest if I didn't tell you that. But there has to be a balancing. The balance has to weight in favor of people of color and the minority communities who have historically been disenfranchised from the electoral process and but for the Voting Rights Act would not have had the gains that they had over the years to ensure that people of color can elect candidates of choice. We have made unbelievable strides in legislatures across the country, in city councils across the country, in the Congress across the country, all because of the Voting Rights Act.

Has it benefitted the Republicans? Yes, it has. I will not tell you that.

So the Democrats argue that we're better off without Section 5 jurisdiction and allowing the process to take care of itself and elect more Democrats because the policies that come out of legislature and the things I'm complaining about this legislature could be taken care of at that level.

But what that really says is that we should take the chance to be elected, Hispanics and Native Americans.

That would be the cost to assure that more Democrats get into the legislature.

Before the Voting Rights Act, Democrats didn't take care of Hispanics and Native Americans.

It took the Voting Rights Act to do it, and I urge you, I urge you now is the time to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act, to please remember that we're dealing with an environment that is hostile to people of color.

They color it with an anti-immigrant code. It is nothing but a code.

It is primarily in this state anti-Mexican.

And it's going to spill over into our voting laws, and we need the Voting Rights Act to protect us.

Thank you.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you, Mr. Ortega.

Mr. Eckstein.

MR. PAUL ECKSTEIN: Thank you very much.

Chairman, members of the commission, my name is Paul Eckstein.

As my good friend Dan said, I have been a lawyer here for 40 years.

I have worked on a number of election cases like Danny, written initiatives, indeed opposed the first attempt at English only in 1988.

As Dan said, he and I and a lawyer from the Legal Defense Fund brought an action under Section 2 in the early 1990s, I think it was 1990, to force the Phoenix Union High School District to elect its board members by district, rather than at large.

Prior to that board members had been elected at large, and even though at that time I think approximately 30 percent or 40 percent of the students were members of one minority group or another, Latinos or African-Americans, I think there had only been one or two African-Americans and/or Hispanics that had been elected to the board.

Since that time with districts, a number of African-Americans and Hispanics have been elected to the Phoenix Union High School board.

I point that out because that action was not brought out under Section 5. That was brought out under Section 2.

One of the things that I would like to stress is that in my belief Section 2 and the 14th Amendment are sufficient tools to deal with the issues that are before a number of states, including Arizona, today.

I have worked on several Congressional and legislative redistricting actions.

As the chairman said, one in the 1980s, I think 1982, and one that started in 2001, and is still going, and may be going until I retire from the practice of law.

Indeed we have an appeal in that case before the Arizona Court of Appeals next Tuesday.

We have, as you may know, a different kind of law in Arizona that it was adopted by initiative, an amendment to our constitution, that provides, number one, that an independent redistricting commission do the redistricting; number two, that the commission meet six particular goals, one of which truly is unique, that is the favoring of competitive districts. I am, as the chairman noted, a member of the national board of the Lawyers' Committee and a regional vice chair, and I need to say right up front that it's very generous of the Lawyers' Committee to invite me to be a participant here, knowing that my views are different than I suspect the majority and maybe everyone connected with the Lawyers' Committee except for me.

I have this view based on 30 years of experience in the trenches, and I would like to share that with you.

I want to make five points.

The first point is that I seriously question the necessity and wisdom of renewing Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

I do not question that when it was adopted in 1965 the Voting Rights Act was necessary. I do not question that in the 1960s, '70s, and '80s the Voting Rights Act of 1965, in particular Section 5, were used effectively to elect members of minority groups, African-Americans in the south, Latinos in Texas and Arizona and California, and perhaps other states, New Mexico certainly.

I suspect that the panel and the staff of the panel is well aware of a law review article that appeared in the October 2004 issue of the Columbia Law Review authored by Samuel Issacharoff, and it's entitled Is The Voting Rights Act a Victim of Its Own Success.

I don't have time to reiterate the arguments, and I couldn't reiterate them as well as the author, but I want to go on record as saying I subscribe to the positions taken by the professor in that article.

He asks the question, comparing the situation of African-Americans in New Jersey, which is not covered by Section 5, and Georgia, which is covered by Section 5, asking why the African-Americans in that case in Georgia should not enjoy the same rights to form cross political connections as African-Americans in New Jersey.

I ask a slightly different question.

That is, if this Section 5 is so good, with states like Georgia and Alabama and Mississippi and Texas and Louisiana and somehow Alaska and Arizona, why is it not adopted at the national level? If it is really that good, why not adopt it at the national level.

I think I ask the question, the answer is in part we know why it isn't, because politically that just wouldn't happen. It can't happen.

The second point I want to make is that Arizona should never have been added to the list of states covered by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act when it was added in 1975 Arizona was added in 1975 because of an amendment that Congress had adopted that said a voting test included the fact that ballots and other information were not made available in the language in which five percent of the people, other than English, five percent of the people spoke.

To wit, Spanish.

And in a state where more than 50 percent of those who were registered to vote -- were not registered to vote, are those who were eligible to vote, did not vote in the presidential election.

Arizona was such a state, in 1975.

But Arizona is not such a state today.

I don't deny there are innumerable injustices that go on every day in this state. There are major and minor slights, and they need to be dealt with.

Oftentimes through the courts. Sometimes through the political process.

But Section 5 is too blunt a tool, too blunt an instrument to deal with those kind of acts. What fine company Arizona has, states in the old Confederacy.

I ask, where is Arkansas, where is Tennessee, where is North Carolina, where is Virginia.

Arizona has had, under the Voting Rights Act, and if there's any question about it, I certainly subscribe to the notion that federal law, whether it's in the Voting Rights Act or not, ought to make absolutely clear that ballots are provided in other languages.

Maybe the five percent threshold ought to be lowered.

I certainly support that.

And I think that if one does that, one solves the problem that Section 5 is designed to do. Oliver Wendell Holmes said a hundred years ago that when the reason for a rule ceases to exist, the rule ought to cease to exist.

That's where we are, at least in Arizona, and I submit, based on my knowledge, the nation.

The third point I want to make is that Section 5 creates an incredible burden, an incredible burden on the states and other jurisdictions that have to deal with it. The burdens are cost and time.

Every time one goes to a particular county that is responsible for redrawing district lines, one is met with the argument, it's going to cost us a whole lot of money to redraw those precinct lines, and we don't have enough time to do it, even though the argument is made in January for a November election.

I face that argument time and time again. And I almost believe it. I know they have the time to do it, but I also know that the costs are incredible.

Every single precinct line change in Arizona has to go to the Justice Department to be pre-cleared with Section 5.

That is an enormous waste.

I haven't tried to add it up, but it wouldn't shock me if there's $5 million in salaries and computer time that is spent this date to try to get precinct lines cleared by the Justice Department. That is a waste.

Fourth point is that Section 5 is subject to manipulation. It's subject to manipulation by the bodies responsible for redistricting.

It's subject to manipulation by the Justice Department. And it's subject to manipulation by incumbents that use Section 5 to justify understandably increasing people who are favorable to them to make sure they get elected.

As far as bodies responsible for redistricting, we see in the legislative redistricting a special case of that where the Justice Department and the expert hired by the Justice Department in federal court approved 55 percent of voting age Hispanics in district 14, and when the independent redistricting commission got a hold of it, it was boosted to 58 percent.

Fifty-five percent was sufficient. Fifty-eight percent was put in, and as a result they couldn't meet the competitive goal as required by the Arizona Constitution.

Final point I want to make is that Section 5 was designed as a temporary measure.

It was voted on again -- first voted in 1965, voted on again in 1982, extended for 15 years in 1982 to 1997

And then sunsetted in 2007.

That's why we're here.

I realize in Washington the temporary often have a way of becoming the permanent.

But it not ought to become permanent without good reason. I think, I truly believe based on my experience in the trenches that Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which is not up for renewal, should be kept in the act at all costs, and the 14th Amendment are sufficient tools to allow protection of minority voting rights in Arizona and in the United States.

Thank you very much.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you, Mr. Eckstein.

Now I will give the commissioners a chance to ask both Mr. Eckstein and Mr. Ortega questions.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Mr. Eckstein, I'm president of our National Association of Secretaries of State. I'm from New Mexico. And a few years ago, just before we passed the Help America Vote Act, the Justice Department, of course, identified 37 states throughout the United States that have very high language minority populations.

And basically telling all of us, New Mexico already translating into Navajo and Spanish, all of our election materials, but telling the other 36 states you must translate into those languages where you have five percent or more of one minority population or another language-wise.

Well, 36 states, more or less, said, oh, no, we can't, we can't do it, we want an exemption until 2007.

Back then I didn't realize why they wanted to wait until 2007, until I was invited and brought up to speed with what was going on today and next year and the year after that. The reason why we need to reauthorize is because they will not do it on their own.

They will not translate on their own.

Not because there aren't plenty of people out there to translate and that know how to translate into those various languages, but because they don't want to take the time, the effort, and they use the excuse of money as well.

I don't buy that.

And that's why we have to reauthorize.

Please, your thoughts.

MR. PAUL ECKSTEIN: Chairman Vigil-Giron.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Vigil.

MR. PAUL ECKSTEIN: Before I answer that, I want to make one point that I neglected to make.

Mr. Ortega is absolutely right about Proposition 200.

Proposition 200 was submitted to this Justice Department for pre-clearance.

And they pre-cleared it in record time.

If Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act was designed to do anything, it was designed to make sure that a proposition like Proposition 200 would not pass.

And if one is going to do -- if one is going to renew this act, one has got to figure out a better way to make sure that non-political considerations are visited upon propositions like Proposition 200.

And whether it goes to courts or not, I don't know, but I was shocked at what the Justice Department didn't do, particularly in light of what they didn't do in our case, which they had three districts that they had previously looked at three times, and diddle-daddled for 45 days, and ended up doing nothing.

Now, in response to your question, I absolutely agree that there needs to be legislation, whether it's in Section 5, Section 2, or independent legislation, to make sure that different language groups, and as I said I don't know where the threshold ought to be, have the right to have ballot and voting information in their languages.

And I would go further.

I would appropriate the money to have people to translate, to make sure that those people who are citizens of the United States, whose primarily language is another language, have the right and the ability to vote in their languages.

But one does not need the pre-clearance provisions of Section 5 to accomplish that. That is my point.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Well, I think it's more or less an insurance until we get to that point when we can pass legislation within our states.

It's not the other way around.

I don't think that states will take it upon themselves to pass something that is fair and just for the minority populations within their states.

MR. PAUL ECKSTEIN: I wouldn't leave it to the states.

This is something that I would press on Congress.

The point is if Section 5 is such a wonderful thing, why did it not operate to prevent the operation and the enactment and effectiveness of Proposition 200.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: I think Daniel wants to answer that.

MR. DANIEL ORTEGA: The Justice Department, as I understand it, pre-cleared the provisions of Prop 200 so that the Secretaries of State and the counties, and anybody that was going to have an election, there was an election in March, what the Justice Department said was pre-clear the law so that you can begin to put together the policies and the procedures or guidelines that you're going to operate under to implement Prop 200.

But those procedures are going to be subject to pre-clearance.

So it's not over.

That gave them the go ahead to put together the guidelines under which to operate, so it's not over.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Thank you.

HON. PENNY WILLRICH: I have a question for Mr. Ortega.

Given Mr. Eckstein's position, and if Section 5 is not reauthorized, it appears that we might return to a case-by-case challenge of a Voting Rights Act violation.

Do you think that that is really a wise way to handle it, or would reauthorization of Section 5 perhaps with some changes or some measures to tighten it up be more effective? MR. DANIEL ORTEGA: Well, I'd like to say that having the federal government involved in the pre-clearance process that presently exists is a good safeguard for what we potentially believe could be violations of the Voting Rights Act and a measuring stick by which we can all operate.

The bottom line is that typically litigation ensues in either direction, so you're always going to have litigation.

But I think the Justice Department and the way it has gone about with regard to pre-clearance, and many of the things that occurred in Arizona, has provided what I believe to be a good measuring stick and a good guideline for how commissions, legislators, city councils, counties operate, and the way they redraw their districts and/or enact ordinances or laws.

MR. PAUL ECKSTEIN: If I could respond, I think as Professor Issacharoff points out in his article, one of the evils of the pre-clearance provision of Section 5 is that it is in the hands of a political department.

Now, there are those that say that the Civil Rights Division, in particularly the voting rights section, are immunized and isolated from the politics of that department.

I don't know one way or another whether they are or they aren't.

But one thing I know is that the invitation, the opportunity to do mischief is there. And I have seen results that are difficult to explain in any way other than political action.

One of the problems with Section 5, the pre-clearance provisions of the Voting Rights Act, as Mr. Ortega has said, is that those in power, either in the legislature or in Arizona, in the case of the independent redistricting commission, can and I believe have taken advantage of Section 5 to pack minorities in certain districts to make sure that the vote that the minorities would typically give typically to Democrats is widely dispersed.

And I gave you the example of district 14.

That commission did not have to do that.

It used Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act as an excuse, even though the Justice Department had blessed 55 percent, even though the expert called by the federal court in 2002 had blessed 55 percent, they put in 58 percent.

There was no reason, no necessity to do that.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: I don't understand the word packed.

They already lived there in those areas.

The gerrymandering that goes on during these redistricting procedures and processes is unbelievable what they do to some of our communities.

I know specifically in Albuquerque, in Bernalillo County, it's like the problem is cut in half.

If they would sue me, I want them to sue me, so that we can prove that this is a strong district that could be primarily of all of the reservation of the Isleta Pueblo.

It hasn't happened yet. I don't really like that word packed.

We're already there.

We're not moving in because somebody is paying us to move into those areas so we can have that 58 percent, or whatever the test is.

MR. PAUL ECKSTEIN: There's no doubt that there are minority groups in Arizona, Native Americans particularly on the reservations, that provide a concentration of particular minorities groups, and Latinos in Tucson and Phoenix.

And no one is saying that people ought to move out of their districts.

The point is that lines can be drawn anywhere, and if the line between district 14 and district 10 had been moved north rather than kept where it was -- I'm sorry, moved south so that there were more Latinos in district 10, we might have a state senator sitting on this panel.

That's the point.

Three percent Latinos were not necessary to allow Latinos to elect representatives of their choice, given the fact they had 55 percent Hispanic age voting population.

That three percent could have made the difference, if not this year, next year, or the next year in district 10.

MR. NED NORRIS, JR. : I'm debating in my own mind whether or not I should ask this question.

Mr. Eckstein, you had commented, I believe, that you felt that Section 5 could be manipulated. I think that was the term that you used.

What do you mean, and could you give me an example, of manipulation of Section 5?

MR. PAUL ECKSTEIN: We spoke of three groups that can manipulate.

Number one, the Justice Department, which can, depending on who's in office, decide that there need to be more of a particular minority group. And that's typically the way it is manipulated. And we saw that in the Supreme Court case of Georgia versus Ashcroft, where the Justice Department insisted in its pre-clearance procedures under Section 5 that there be a higher percentage of African-Americans in certain districts. And when the Supreme Court looked at it, they said no.

There were alternative ways to do that.

So it clearly is susceptible, it's susceptible in terms of timing.

The Justice Department has 60 days and it can grant itself another 60 days to do the pre-clearance.

Last year at this time the Justice Department submitted -- it was given a new plan that was identical to a plan they had pre-cleared a year before, except for three districts. It didn't take 60 days to pre-clear that plan. Yet they never got around to doing it.

Forty-five days went by. We were up against election deadlines in Arizona, and the Court of Appeals stayed the judge's order which provided for the creation of that new map.

I think that was a potential for manipulation.

The bodies that do the redistricting, in some states legislatures, and in Arizona the independent redistricting commission, and in other states commissions like Arizona, can and often do use the Voting Rights Act as an excuse to pack, and that is an acceptable word and it is a word that people who do this understand very well, although they would deny it, minorities into certain groups so as to limit their influence.

One knows, it is important that under Section 5, and it is the law, minorities be able to elect representatives of their choice.

But, it is also well known that by putting more minorities into a particular district, one limits the ability of those minorities to be in other districts and therefore have at least an influence on the election in other districts.

That happened in Arizona, in the 2001, 2002 redistricting.

It happened with district 23.

Pete Rios was the senator from that district. He was district six under the old map. And he and my clients in the redistricting case urged the independent redistricting commission to move the line so that there would be more Latinos in that district, even though it was well under 50 percent, because that was a, what's called, an influence district.

And the Justice Department agreed with us on that one.

But I think the commission took advantage of that saying, no, there is no such thing as an influence district. We are going to, here's the word again, pack Hispanics into certain districts, and if Pete Rios only has 25 percent instead of 29 percent, so be it.

Third, the third way in which the act can be manipulated is by candidates, when they're in the legislature, and legislators are looking out for their self-interest, candidates can say and often do say, look, the Voting Rights Act requires that people in my district be able to elect representatives of their choice.

I'm their representative.

Let me tell you, I need 60 or 70 percent to get elected.

Every politician, every politician argues for getting as many votes that will elect him or her as possible.

I understand that.

Those are the motivations that I think Section 5 derives.

MR. NED NORRIS, JR. : I guess the comment I would like to make is whether or not the answer is to disallow any reauthorization of Section 5 versus looking closely at the section itself and see how any legislation might be able to address those concerns.

I'd like to hear Mr. Ortega's comments.

MR. DANIEL ORTEGA: I think what I find interesting about -- and Paul is not making this argument. I'm not saying that he is.

But what I've been hearing generally about the opposition to the reauthorization has been more so from leaders within the Democratic party.

And if you want to talk about manipulation, what some of the leaders within the Democratic party are saying is that it's more important to elect more Democrats in the state of Arizona, and they can coexist with making those Democrats people of color, Native Americans or Hispanics.

Therefore the shift in percentage of two or three percent in a particular area, that would give a Democrat the opportunity to be elected, who could be a person of color, is also important to the process.

The problem with that is it's all, though I think some people are well-intentioned, and I think some people are making that argument in good faith, the fact of the matter is it doesn't work that way.

And that what you do have is Anglo Democrats elected in those districts where those shifts are made for the most part. Okay.

Not as a matter of design, but just simply as a matter from the standpoint of voting patterns.

And so the way to deal with the numbers as it relates to electing Hispanics who are not incumbents to new legislative districts is extremely important, and the numbers that we get, I think, are highly protected by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: I would like to exercise the chair's prerogative here to thank both Mr. Ortega and Mr. Eckstein for being here today and engaging in the important and very civil debate here.

And now, I think, given time constraints, it's important to move forward.

We're told that we've got five minutes to go until the tape runs out. So maybe before we resume, we just call a brief halt here and in a few minutes get back to business.

Thank you very much.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Okay. At this time I would like to ask Mr. Andrews for his comments, please.

MR. ADAM ANDREWS: In the spirit and purpose of this hearing, I would like to greet all of you in my first language and the first language of this area and just say is: (Whereupon, Mr. Andrews spoke his native language.)

What I was just sharing is saying good afternoon and I want to thank the chair and the commissioners for allowing us to be heard as it references this act.

And in hopes that it would benefit all people and all walks of life.

I am pleased to serve as a panelist this afternoon and to share with you the impacts of the reauthorization of this act will have on the Native American community, but specifically I will speak to the impacts to the Tohono O'Odham Nation.

As mentioned by the chair, my name is Adam Andrews. I'm Tohono O'Odham, and I work with the Tohono O'Odham Nation as executive assistant to Chairwoman Vivian Juan-Saunders and our guest commissioner here Vice Chairman Norris.

The Tohono O'Odham Nation recognizes the importance of its members to participate in the Democratic process, both as citizens of the Tohono O'Odham Nation and as citizens the United States of America.

This is a demonstration of the value system, and the American value system, that stems and speaks to responsibility and community responsibility.

Historically voter registration and voter turnout on the Tohono O'Odham Nation has been less than 50 percent of the eligible population.

Just recently the nation was able to field a voter turnout of 55 percent in this last 2002 election and a 59 percent in the 2004 election.

The Tohono O'Odham Nation, as mention earlier, is 2. 8 million acres, and is located within the congressional district seven, with a total eligible Native American population of 27,869, or in translation 6. 2 percent of the total population.

A large percentage of this, of those in this district are members of our tribe, Tohono O'Odham.

The nation has about 28,000 enrolled members, and of which 17,000 or 64 percent of our population are eligible to vote.

And I want to share with you, to speak this afternoon specifically to Section 203 and its benefits for us.

Tohono O'Odham Nation is covered by three counties. Primarily Pima County, and Pinal County and Maricopa County.

As mentioned earlier, the tribe is 2. 8 million acres, which is comparable to the size of Connecticut.

And with that, there are certainly counties that stem into portions of our nation. But, again, as I mentioned earlier, primarily the nation is in Pima County.

A large barrier to effectively mobilize our tribal members to vote has been the rural environment and the ability of the voter block to make it to the polls on election day. And common reasons cited for low voter turnout are a lack of transportation, a lack of supervision for their children to get to the polls, employment responsibilities, and lack of employment, and overall a lack of education and apathy towards voting.

Within the successes of the nation to be able to get people to the polls in this last election, 2004, we were able to increase our voter registration to close to 1,000 voters, and we attribute that success to our partnerships not only on a grassroots level but also on a very state and national level.

We were able to get support from the Intertribal Council of Arizona, the National Conference of American Indians.

Organizations, nonprofit organizations such as the National Voice, Moving America Forward.

The Democratic party reached out to tribes, and our tribe specifically, to assist.

Pima County elections office and the counties that exist on our nation.

And as I mentioned earlier, we were able to gain and increase our voter registration to close to 1,000, a total of 955 newly registered voters.

One of the avenues that we approached in getting the vote out in 2004 was to do early voting.

We were able to successfully do that and so much that we were able to get 850 early votes cast within the last 2004 election. And a lot of the tools and mechanisms that we used to address or get people to the polls, not only during early voting but also during election, was to provide incentives such as a barbecue as was mentioned by an earlier panelist that is done at the rural areas. Also free goodies. You know, T-shirts.

Also tribal members seek -- look to the government to guide them in terms of what the issues are and what direction or suggestion they would like the members to vote on particular issues or particular candidates.

And in doing so, we were -- the tribe was able to produce a voter guide.

Also the tribe recently opened and began its own tribal radio station.

And within the last year was the first year that we were able to have the radio station during an election season.

We very much maximized that opportunity to speak in our native language to members of the tribe on the importance of voting and specifically making note, taking, making it specific to them that we all have assistance for them in the polls.

And, again, going back to, as I opened my statement, I wanted to speak specifically to the benefits of Section 203.

Pima County, as I mentioned, is primarily of the nation, and they have been real helpful in respect to meeting the requirements or respect to meeting our request to engage tribal members in the electoral process.

One of the ways is they seek out and they work with the tribe to identify people within the nation that would translate material, translate pamphlets, translate proposition language in our native language.

And those are put on audio cassettes and distributed throughout the tribe.

And I will say that most of our tribal members who do vote are elders and, of course, certainly most, all of the members who are elders speak the O'Odham language as their first and primarily language.

We -- they also offer employment for poll workers to be tribal members, so certainly that also assists in helping people to feel welcome to the polls, and not feel a sense of fear, to cast their vote and to participate.

And that we also -- they, the county has also been more than willing to accommodate early voting, specifically during a time when this last election, during a time when a ceremony, tribal ceremonies were taking place that would prohibit people from getting to the polls on that particular day.

So we are very much in support of the key provisions that are being considered for reauthorization, but specifically to Section 203 for the reasons that I mentioned earlier. And I want to go ahead and conclude my statements here, and again the Tohono O'Odham Nation supports the reauthorization.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you, Mr. Andrews.

Mrs. Calvert.

MS. ROGENE CALVERT: Good morning.

My name is Rogene Calvert, and I'm representing Houston, Harris County, Texas. Today I plan to cover my experience as a community leader in the rollout of the Vietnamese voting language assistance program in Harris County.

I first heard the news that Harris County met the threshold for Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act in late July of 2002 when representatives of the Justice Department came to the National Organization of Chinese Americans, OCA, annual convention to inform those of us there that our local chapters or the cities in which we reside were part of the jurisdictions that were deemed eligible based on the 2000 U. S. census.

Having no prior knowledge of Section 203 and how it could affect our community, I was delighted to know that our Vietnamese community in Houston and Harris County would now have voting information in their native language.

Shortly after returning to Houston, I spoke with our county clerk Beverly Kauffman whose responsibility it would be to manage the county's Vietnamese voting language assistance program.

I suggested putting together a community advisory committee to assist in this endeavor as I imagined there would be mountains of information to translate.

And from experience I knew that simple translation is not an easy task and would be best to have the translations reviewed and translated back into English to ensure accuracy. Within a month the community advisory committee met to discuss their agenda. Tackling the translation of materials was both easy and difficult. Since other communities had already translated voting information into Vietnamese, the county chose to use one of those companies from another state.

The local advisory committee had issues with some of the translation, down to the choice of words.

In some instances the choice of a certain word over another indicated whether it was before or after the communist takeover.

And this was a great offense to the reader.

Members of the committee recommended revisions of the translation.
Of course, revisions mean expense, and expense was not always tolerated.
It was not as important or sensitive to a non-Vietnamese speaker who had the decision-making power to deem if the change was substantive or not.
Just earlier in Harris County the change from the paper ballot to the E-slate had taken place.
This, of course, is a critical part of the voting process.
As it turned out, the county was not able to put the E-slate ballot in Vietnamese until two years later, March of 2004.
They gave us a reason for not having the E-slate ballot in Vietnamese because the Internation Testing Authorities had not fully certified with firmware required to run the necessary applications on the E-slate.
This was because of the lack of clarifying input from the Election Assistance Commission, EAC, which was authorized through the Help America Vote Act of 2002. However, the EAC was not in existence yet.
Whether this excuse was valid or not we will never know.
We were, however, very disappointed, and this excuse seemed indicative of the general attitude of the county.
To get done just what was necessary to get by.
After all, it was almost two years since we had begun the Vietnamese language program, and the E-slate should have been one of the most important things handled. Furthermore, the alternative left much to be desired.
Instructions for using the E-slate was of course put into the Vietnamese language along with a paper ballot template in Vietnamese. This was held up next to the E-slate machine for the voter to read while looking at the E-slate in English and Spanish.
It was during this election process that the Asian-American Legal Center, AALC, documented voting problems among the Vietnamese.
The lack of Vietnamese speaking poll workers was a critical issue, especially since the actual E-slate voting process would require more assistance.
It was also noted that the translated paper ballot template and instructions were not always available at the polls, or Vietnamese voters were instructed to go downtown to get them.
Furthermore, poll workers were not properly trained to know about or to use the translated paper templates.
As a result of this less-than-satisfactory effort, the Justice Department and the county entered into a memorandum of agreement that outlined certain terms that needed to be accomplished.
Some of these terms addressed the need for Vietnamese speaking poll workers in precincts with 50 or more registered Vietnamese voters and Vietnamese speaking workers on call for smaller precincts.
To emphasize letting voters know in Vietnamese that anyone can assist them with voting, except their employer or agent of the employer or the union.
I know this has been mentioned a few times today, and actually I was called by the daughter of a woman -- the daughter was asking if her mother could go back and revote because when she went to vote, the poll worker went into the booth with her, did not offer for the daughter to go. The mother who was elderly felt very pressured and felt very rushed.

Therefore she got nervous and ended up not voting for the person she wanted to.

And of course they couldn't go back to revote.

Also it said that we had to address, it had to address the use of county employees who speak Vietnamese to work the polls during election day.

They had to keep strict records on who was trained and a checklist of the items upon which they are trained.

They had to employ on a full-time basis a coordinator for the Vietnamese language program.

And they had to convene an advisory committee that meets monthly during the election cycle and whose meetings are documented in summary fashion.

This agreement would continue through December 31st, 2006. This agreement has helped tremendously in implementing things that were lacking previously or seemed to take excessive time to complete.

The Vietnamese speaking coordinator has been helpful in recruiting more poll workers, but the numbers are still not enough to fill the need.

More resources are required to recruit and maintain these workers.

They need to be educated about the importance of this task, and their employers need to be -- to understand why a day off from work is critical.

Many Vietnamese are employed in service industry jobs or own their own businesses and cannot take a day off without negative ramifications.

The suggestion to add a polling place in the densely populated Asian-American area of southwest Houston was finally adopted. In the last election, this polling place saw waiting lines every day during the early voting period as well as on election day.

The familiarity and convenience of this site run by Vietnamese poll workers as well as it being a presidential election year and we had a Vietnamese American on the ballot drew Vietnamese voters from all over the county and many first time Vietnamese voters as well. With the obvious success of the Vietnamese language voting program, the large and diverse Asian American community in Houston is hopeful that the Chinese language can be next.

Community leaders are willing and ready to work with the county on incrementally translating information into the Chinese language. Congressman Al Green, who has a large part of the Asian American population in southwest Houston in his district, has committed to finding resources to do so.

I am somewhat dismayed, however, at the possibility of this happening without Section 203 making it mandatory.

I recently spoke with the county clerk to introduce the idea of working voluntarily towards this end, as she too agreed that in due time the Chinese population would probably meet the threshold, but she indicated that unless it was mandatory she wouldn't be as, quote, enthusiastic.

I think this statement sums up my experience with the local municipality in charge of the language assistance program.

Unless it is mandatory, it would be done less enthusiastically.

Unless we have the Voting Rights Act and especially Section 203, the effort to assist limited speaking populations with the right to vote would be less than enthusiastically accomplished, if at all.

Thank you all for the opportunity to share my thoughts and experiences with you. We are on the brink of making or breaking a very important program that has ensured that many persons in this country can exercise their right to vote.

Please let those who make this decision know that hundreds of thousands of individuals in Houston, Harris County, are grateful for the language assistance program in both Vietnamese and Spanish.

Thank you.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you.

And now I will ask my fellow commissioners to -- I'm so sorry.

I'm so sorry.

Mr. Lewis, I apologize.

MR. JOHN LEWIS: Thank you. Thank you for the opportunity to be here and to speak in support and need for the Voting Rights Act and its reauthorization.

Welcome on behalf of the Intertribal Council of Arizona to Indian country.

Here in the state of Arizona, tribal nations occupy approximately 27 percent of the land base here in the state of Arizona.

Nationally, the land base here with the tribes in Arizona is over 50 percent. So this really is Indian country.

We also as have heard Tohono O'Odham is the size of Connecticut. Navajo Nation is the size of West Virginia. I guess that means we have 48 states to reclaim yet.

What I want to do is give you a little history, and the importance of it, because this has been an ongoing struggle, as it is with the other people that have been here before you today. This is something that ended here in Arizona with the recognition of the right to vote in 1948 for the American Indian.

In that Supreme Court decision, the Arizona State Supreme Court, Levi S. Udall, the father of Congressman Morris Udall, quoted the Indian law scholar Felix Cohen, that in a democracy suffrage is the most basic civil right since its exercise is the chief means whereby other rights may be safeguarded.

To deny the right to vote, one is legally entitled to do so, is to do violence to the principles of freedom and equality.

I think that really does lay the foundation for what we're about here, and what the act is about, and something that we do have to continue to protect.

The issues that have been facing the Indian people, particularly here in Arizona, is of a rural nature and the distances here that people have to travel, long distances. And tribes are scattered throughout.

We have a tribe located in the bottom of the Grand Canyon.

And all that has to be considered in designing how best to ensure that there is maximum voter opportunities.

The idea of distances is real crucial in terms of where voting is to take place.

The other thing that is important to recognize historically is that there's -- the citizenship of Indian people wasn't until 1924, before Indian -- American Indians were recognized as citizens of the United States.

And one of the leaders of Indian rights in that era was Carlos Montezuma, a Yavapai Indian, from Fort McDowell, an Indian reservation here in Arizona.

And it wasn't again until 1948 until recognizing the right to vote.

But as citizens of the state and citizens of the tribal nations and citizens of United States, this is, this is all important that those rights are upheld.

The other area is in the role of the American Indian people in terms of looking at the military service in World War II, and joining in defending the country before they were citizens in 1947.

Returning veterans, not only here in Arizona but in New Mexico and other states where there's an Indian population, came back and fought for the right to vote and achieved it. So this is something that is not unique to Arizona as Indian people, but all Indian people across the United States has had to deal with.

So those, I think, are important things to remember as we look at this area. There's been continuing struggles in terms of implementing and participating in voting. There have been the type of thing that was mentioned here, in relation to redistricting. There is the challenges that Indian people have faced at the polls, and just the basic information access to it.

The locations of precincts and other things.

And but most important was the language and ability to get assistance and to have assistance in the polling places and as part of voter education.

All these things are really key to the opportunities.

So we see that the 203 is a very important part of the Voting Rights Act, and that really does need to be protected and enhanced in terms of what's happening here.

As has been mentioned, Proposition 200 requiring identification or different forms of identification, including pictures, how difficult that is. And we have citizens, Indian citizens who may not have been born in the United States because our tribes extend into Mexico, and those areas are being -- need to be challenged and dealt with in an appropriate manner. And birth certificates and other forms of ID, Social Security, all are difficult in many of the tribes to produce in terms of what's been now required. So there is a need for the ongoing challenge in those areas.

Just the idea, as we mentioned, people of color here, with surnames, very similar in terms of the American Indian population.

And Hispanics. In terms of people of color, we're all treated the same.

There's no distinction, American Indian, Hispanics, and others, in terms of the attitudes and barriers, we all face it equally.

So, again, all those issues that have been discussed here are applicable to the American Indian.

So voting rights, the Voting Rights Act, and Section 203 specifically, that we really do need to enhance in order to ensure the viability of the democratic electoral process and to ensure that all citizens are encouraged to vote in exercising the most basic civil right, the right to vote.

Thank you.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Thank you, Mr. Lewis.

Now I'll invite commissioners to ask any questions that they would like.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: You mentioned that, and I didn't quite understand who gave the excuse that the EAC was not in place before 2004, so that the firmware for the E-slate, and I can't remember what company produces the E-slate --

MS. ROGENE CALVERT: I have to look it up, but I have it with me. The county gave us that excuse.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Okay. Well, the firmware for any type of voting equipment is actually tested by our national laboratories, our testing authorities.

The firmware goes to one location, and then the software goes to another location to be tested.

So it was the responsibility of the company to have sent that and be certified in order for them to have brought it back to your county or state, or however it is that you purchased voting equipment.

The EAC was in place shortly after -- latter part of 2003. The moneys that were also appropriated for the creation of the EAC came later on. The Help America Vote Act was 2002.

So getting the ball rolling in regards to the Help America Vote Act process was a long process, but they were in place by January, February 2004.

Not 100 percent, but they were in place, so they should not have used that excuse.

MS. ROGENE CALVERT: It was the 2003 election that we didn't have it ready. So it could be that they weren't ready. It was Hart InterCivic.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Hart. Yes, I know them. So it's their responsibility to get that firmware certified and be brought back to your county to be recertified by your county.

MS. ROGENE CALVERT: And would the EAC have to have input into that, so if they weren't up and running at the end of 2003, then that would have been a reasonable excuse?

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: What's happening right now is the EAC and the National Institute of Standards and Technology have joined to create new standards for voting equipment.

Those new standards are based on the voting equipment that's identified in the Help America Vote Act, and those will be out hopefully by the end of April, beginning of May, on the national registry so that the public can make comments for 45 days. And then we'll adopt them once we join the EAC in July of this year, so that everyone, the vendors will know what to create out there, based on those standards.

MS. ROGENE CALVERT: We were suspecting or suspicious of whether or not this thing sat on someone's desk and didn't get the attention it needed to move it along.

That was sort of what I was inferring, is that perhaps people just weren't paying attention to it.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: I don't believe it would have been on the end, NASED is the responsible party right now, National Association of Election Directors. They're going to be replaced by the EAC for the certification process and give those numbers to those companies that are producing the voting equipment. We'll wait to make that transition, but NASED wouldn't have sat on it. That's for sure.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Other questions?

HON. PENNY WILLRICH: I'd like to ask any of the panel members that are still here if there are any specific acts of discrimination that have been related to you or that you are aware of that has occurred, and how, if it did, the Voting Rights Act helped to resolve those issues that arose.

MS. LYDIA GUZMAN: I'd like to answer that. Thank you very much.

This is in reference to those folks who go to polling places, and I've seen this over and over again, and I'm going to use a general, you know, answer for this.

We have folks that sometimes because of the consolidated voting places they go and vote at the wrong place.

And in giving out the information, sometimes, you know, the information that's posted on the door is so small that you miss it. You're not sure whether it's one of those small things that you see when you walk into the bank where it says member FDIC. Right. It's real small. In there, you know, obviously it says you have the right to request information in Espanol. Right.

But you miss it, because you're in there and you want to go vote, then they say, you know, you're not on the rolls.

So at this point, you know, this is when, this is when, of course, you know, the opportunity has come up to -- for those folks to actually point out and say, you know, like a poll worker or a poll monitor will actually come up and say, look, you have the right to request assistance in Spanish.

In which, because of the lack of a bilingual worker in that polling place, they were able to call somebody, you know, to do that.

However, still the fact that this person could have been potentially disenfranchised because of that, this was someone who was a potential falling through the cracks and being disenfranchised because of that.

Another is with provisional ballots.

In the provisional ballots, you know, many, many times when a person requests a ballot, they receive the ballot, you know, to vote by mail absentee ballot.

And sometimes because of, you know, maybe you want to sit down and you want to vote in the comfort of your own home or whatever, you lose the ballot, you misplace the ballot, you spoil the ballot. The information is not properly out there, you know, in Spanish or other languages to inform the voter that they have a right to request another ballot at the polls for those folks that have lost that ballot and the opportunity to vote provisional at the polls or an opportunity to vote at the polls, is not there in many, many times.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Let me answer the provisional ballot concept. It's not for the people that have received an absentee ballot or spoiled them.

It's for the person that is -- does not appear on the roster because he was not processed in time or his application was lost or it never reached the location where it should have gone or it's for the person, the first time voter, who registered to vote by mail.

Now, states treat provisional voting differently all over the United States. I've seen this. The way that we saw the absentee ballot situation as recent as yesterday in our legislation reform legislation, if you received your absentee ballot, you can actually walk it the day of the election to your polling place rather than your county clerk's office which is 10 miles away from you.

So you will have a chance to surrender your ballot, destroy it there, and vote on the machine if you choose.

MS. LYDIA GUZMAN: I agree, and that is the case also here.

However, in many times when, when you lose your ballot, and you have to go over there, and then of course at the polling place and the poll worker says, I'm sorry, I'm showing here on your records that you already voted early or you voted provisional -- an absentee ballot by mail, that whole process in itself still needs to be worked out and more attention from Section 203 can still be, you know, emphasized on that because we do lose a lot of voters in that situation.

A lot of folks in the Latin communities and Spanish language voters are choosing to vote by mail, because of -- that will alleviate the pressure of voting at the polls and the pressures of somebody watching over them, and they'll be able to do the research. However, many times because of the complex lives that we have and the busy work schedules, many of us, and I include myself because I'm terrible at this, we lose things in our homes. You know, you misplace it and of course on election day, you know, a person tries, makes an attempt of showing up at the polls and trying to vote.

Then, of course, when the poll worker says just this, then the Hispanic voter may just turn away and say okay.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: I don't know what kind of fail safe voting or emergency voting you have in Arizona, but in New Mexico if that does happen you still can go to a polling place and swear or sign an affidavit, get a ballot, it's placed in an envelope, and then it's questioned later on as they're canvassing the votes, did this person vote twice or is this going to be accepted or not.

MS. LYDIA GUZMAN: And that should be the process here.

It is the rule. That is the rule here.

Then, of course, it's the County Recorder's duty to verify to see if this person voted twice by checking anything that was received in the mail at the same time anything that's also been voted on the provisional ballot that's in a separate stack.

However, before it gets to that process, many voters will be turned away because they were given that excuse by the poll workers.

MS. ROGENE CALVERT: I don't have individual cases, but I know for a fact just from people that have run the polls or poll workers that the fact that in the Vietnamese or Asian-American community where names, especially Vietnamese communities, where you have just really a handful of surnames, and they're so similar, and also with the Asian language you put the last name first, so there's a lot of mix up that when you're looking for a name in the book and the poll worker can't find it if they're not familiar with the language and those customs and all, that has been very discouraging.

So having somebody who speaks the language and knows the culture has helped a lot in understanding those nuances.

Also if there's questions just like she said, okay, I have a question, when I show up, if someone can speak your language and takes the times to listen to you and looks like you, so that you feel comfortable talking to them, that helps tremendously.

And they just come away better informed all the way around because they've had the opportunity to read it in their own language.

So now hopefully there would be fewer mistakes or misunderstandings because they've had a chance to understand it.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Mr. Lewis, or, Ms. Smith, would you like to add to that?

MR. JOHN LEWIS: I think it's somewhat difficult to really assess sometimes the outright discrimination versus -- although it is there. And I think people feel it, and there's certainly those perceptions, but also part of the problem is that people manning the polls may not be trained properly, and there is the communications and cultural aspects of it.

And I think what's -- as groups and organizations and individuals promote voting, and you have a lot of first time voters, and they run into one or two of these things, I mean, that's where the perceptions come in.

And sometimes they can be explained, just like is happening right now in terms of what the alternatives are to proceed with and better understand the procedures.

Again, that turns into perceptions.

But, in other cases, you know, there are other things that kick in.

But when challenged as to discrimination, it's easy to roll off these other types of things.

So that's why I say it's sometimes a little difficult to assess. And I think that there does need to be some effort to monitor better and document these situations. And of course do better education, difficult as it is, because people are volunteers that are manning the polls and working with them.

But there needs to be some more thought given by everyone as to how best to improve in that area.

MS. SHIRLEE SMITH: To add on, the experience that I had during one of the elections or the previous election that I -- that we had is the provisional ballots.

The problem we had was miscommunication. The problem we have is through physical address, and one of the tribes that's in our county don't have streets, street names or house numbers.

So they give directions by, you know, two miles, I live two miles away from this building. That's their physical address.

And the experience that came about in our county is that when they had to vote, some of them had to vote provisional. And the problem that -- the reason why they weren't counted was because their physical address didn't match up in our system. And they were turned away because they needed a physical address that they said maybe ten years ago when they registered and they might have put a mile away, but this time they might have said a mile and a half, not remembering.

So that was a communication.

And also the education part for the people to get the provisional, you know, straightened out, we lost a lot of new voters because of that, the provisional also.

As it goes along, rules and regulations have been passed so, you know. I really think the Section 203 should be, you know, placed ineffective because it does have impact on people.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Mr. Andrews, finally, would you like to add anything to that?

MR. ADAM ANDREWS: Not specifically to any strong examples of discrimination but for Tohono O'Odham because our members are both on the American side and the Mexican side, certainly the citizenship issue that we're dealing with, but moreover, during the last election there was threat of poll watchers who were to come to Tohono O'Odham Nation and harness or dispatch some level of intimidation to tribal members, you know, and then do some racial profiling, namely because, you know, our tribe is the border there to Mexico.

But fortunately that was just that, hearsay, and we did not have any prominent or paramount issues in relation to that.

But certainly that's not to say that that may still be an issue in the future, future elections.

HON. REBECCA VIGIL-GIRON: Dr. Ellis, do you think that it was not just the fact that they recognized the Ute Nation or the Ute tribe as being resource rich that the 1965 Voting Rights Act had an impact and all of the provisions in it also had an impact, of were they treated any differently because Colorado recognized them as having these rights? MR. RICHARD ELLIS: I think that came, the impact of that was slow. I think the level of hostility toward Utes was very evident in the late 1970s, 1980s.

I really do think that the economic factor has probably been most important. Today the Southern Ute tribe of La Plata County is the largest employer in the county. People think it's because of the casino, but it's more oil and gas.

But they are the largest employer. If the Ute Mountain Ute tribe isn't the largest, it's got to be one of the top one or two.

That's had a huge impact.

It also increases jealousy, and I've said in class and heard Southern Ute tribal chairmen say it as well publicly that people in La Plata County like the Southern Utes when they're poor, but when they have money then they don't like them quite so much.

La Plata County, for example, demanded that the Southern Ute tribe provide the salary costs for the automobile, equipment, et cetera, for a police officer, county sheriff's patrolman, because of the heavy traffic that would be generated by the casino.

We have a ski area which is not charged for a policeman. And we have a college, which generates a whole bunch of traffic, and it was the added expense, you know, caused by gaming, which is alcohol free, for the Southern Ute tribes.

So economics I think probably more than the, at least initially, with the Voting Rights Act.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Dr. Ellis, I have a question for you too. You said you were an expert in the Cuthair case.

Could you tell us what happened so far as school board elections following the resolution of that case?

MR. RICHARD ELLIS: The decision was 1998, and the districts were set up so that no longer they're elected at large, of course.

And the Ute Mountain Ute Reservation is in a district so that tribal members have been elected since 1998. So the decision has been effective.

MR. CHANDLER DAVIDSON: Any future -- any other questions for the panel? I would like to take this opportunity to thank those of you that came this afternoon for giving very useful testimony and sitting here over a large period of time.

And I hope that -- I know that we will have a chance to use your testimony and the report that we're going to write.

And I also want to thank my fellow commissioners for being here today, and in some cases traveling rather long distances to get here.

I hope our paths cross again one of these days. Thank you very much.

NORTHEAST REGIONAL HEARING ASSOCIATION OF THE BAR OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

9:00 a. m.

City Bar Association
42 W. 44th Street
New York, New York

Reported By:
Margaret E. Antz

MS. KLEVIN: Good morning. It's my pleasure to welcome you today on behalf of the Association of the Bar to the City of New York, today's Northeast Regional Hearing. My name is Betsey Klevin. I'm president of the Association of the City of New York. I'm also welcoming you here today in light of the Association's long history of support for Civil Rights including voting rights, which was founded 135 years ago for insuring the democratic processes of our government.

We are particularly pleased to host these Northeast Regional Hearings today on behalf of more than 23,000 members. It's my pleasure to welcome at this time commissioners and members of the public to the Association for this purpose. This year we're celebrating the 40th anniversary of some of the most important provisions. At this time of reflection of the legacy of the Voting Rights Act, we're aware of how far we've come as a nation and equally painfully aware of how far we have to go. The proceedings today are an important part of the Civil Rights community's efforts in voting, the key provisions of the Voting Rights Act, which are set to expire in August of 2007. Now, it is my pleasure to introduce from the lawyers' panel Marjorie Mennon.

MARJORIE: I'm one of the co-chairs, and I too am delighted to welcome you here today, and I want to thank the Commissioners, the Guest Commissioners, and panelists, who have taken the time to be part of this important process.

It is my pleasure to introduce Barbara Arnwine. Barbara has been our Executive Director for many years, and she, along with our staff, has the foresight to realize that this kind of fact-finding is the key to making sure the evidence for re-authorization of the Voting Rights Act is present. With that, I turn this over to Barbara Arnwine.

BARBARA: Good morning, everyone. Thank you so much, Marjorie. However, before I make my remarks, I would like to introduce Sidney Rashliter, who is Chair of the Civil Rights Committee of the Bar Association of New York.

MR. RASHLITER: Good morning. I'm going to be very brief. I think the only thing I would think this morning, after attending a lawyer's committee dinner last night is, if anyone heard John Lewis, you would know how important these hearings are; to have the effort of the Voting Rights Act renewed in 2007.

The Civil Rights Committee has been working on a pledge for authorization and to have this opportunity to co-sponsor the hearings today. I am very proud to be a part of this and a part of the Association's Commission. I am most proud to be a part of the Lawyer's Committee, so, thank you very much for allowing me to be here and the privilege of participating.

BARBARA: Thank you, Sidney. I also want to thank Betsey Klevin, President of the Bar Association of New York, and the great Board of the Members of the Lawyer's Committee for hosting us today. When I mentioned this to Betsey, the possibility of wanting to have the hearing here, she immediately said, "they want to be "in the house. " So, we're happy to be here this morning.

I want to start by thanking everybody for coming to this, the Northeast Regional Hearing on the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, and in particular, I want to extend a special thank you to the Association Bar of the City of New York who has graciously loaned us this wonderful space, and the time of staff and members for hosting this for us. I would like to thank the law firms of Scadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, LLP, Bingham, McCutchin, LLP, and Balluts, Swallard, Andrews, and Ambersol, for their time and effort in making this event happen. I want to thank Demos for hosting two events that helped educate the public about the Voting Rights Act, and also the Commissioners' work. I also want to thank the co-sponsors of the National Commission. These are the National Co-sponsors, they are Associates of the Community for Organization For Reform Now, (ACORN), Congressional Black Caucus Foundation, Democracy Works, Demos, The Korean American League For Civil Participation Conference and Civil Rights. The NAACP National Voters Fund, The National Asian Pacific Consortium, the National Congress of American Indians, People for the American White Foundation, Project Vote and Vote Rainbow is having its big convention right now. It's this coordinated effort that will accomplish its task. Many of us were in law school when we studied the 14th and the 15th Amendments, and we noticed how critical this was that these amendments granted our citizens the right to vote. Well, that right, despite the internet rumors, is permanent. However, it is the Voting Rights Act which gives the federal government the ability for the citizens to protect and support that right.

It was only after the Voting Rights Act was passed in 1965 that they were able to exercise their vote. That's why the Voting Rights Act might be the most important Civil Rights statute ever passed by Congress. Some of the provisions of the Voting Rights Act are permanent and some are temporary. The temporary provisions, are the Preclearance Provisions of Section 5, Minority Language Provisions of Section 203 and the provisions which are given to the Department Of Justice. These are about to expire in August of 2007 unless they are re-authorized. The Lawyer's Committee hopes to create the National Commission on behalf of the civil rights community to identify the degree of racial discrimination in voting, as the nation discusses the issue of re-authorization.

This is the National Commission's third hearing since March. In addition to holding these hearings across the country, the Commission will be releasing a report that will offer a comprehensive picture of the evidence uncovered through the period process as well as the study of the historic work of the Department of Justice, responsibilities of the individual voting rights. And right now, as we are meeting, because of the great work of so many of the law firms I mentioned, there are law students throughout the country visiting those voting rights lawyers, going through their files, finding the best documentation of the problems in voting. And we will continue to look at other relevant data that will help maintain a comprehensive picture in voting for the past 40 years and how the minority voters will pass protection to the political process. The evidence we have gathered so far is both hopeful and thrilling.

During the Commission's first hearing in Montgomery, Alabama commemorating Bloody Sunday, practitioners, advocaters, educators, knew about the all too familiar legacy of voting discrimination in the south. We have heard from citizens in the State who have been active for over 40 years, that African American citizens can exercise the right to vote freely without intimidation, administrator obstacles, and so many other barriers in the implementation of their rights. Over the last 40 years we have heard from citizens and experts who gave a technological and statistical analysis, particularly Section 5 of the Central Provisions. The Voting Rights Act must be re-authorized. The Voting Rights Act has been responsible for providing a voice to a fairly voiceless community. Unfortunately, we don't, and very sadly, we have also heard from advocates and citizens quoting the continuing experiences between minority voters. Clearly, the work of the Voting Rights Act, while dramatic and powerful, is not done. In Phoenix, Arizona, where the Commission held its second hearing, we worked with the Commission in Arizona University to identify the legacy of obstacles to the ballot box, voters in the south -- lives who told stories in counties, including language assistance, and currently sensitive electoral officials, the areas covering our first Americans. The Commission also took testimony from experts, academics voting rights practitioners and others in the Latino Commission who told how Section 203, the Voting Rights Act which require jurisdictions to provide multi-lingual systems to voters, Spanish language to "speak only Spanish" -- as Spanish is their primary language -- to participate in the process. That is not set up for the demand of minority communities, and to illustrate that society has been central in addressing many of these concerns. But it's work, once again, is not done. Today, we will hear from voters and expert advocates and academics and many others who will detail the roles of those in the states of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island, and we will talk about how the Voting Rights Act has had an impact on discriminatory practices.

I am looking forward to hearing today's testimony and adding it to the already impressive August file. When we put together this impressive group of Commissioners, we did so knowing this was not an easy one. The continuing accordance of arguably, the most important piece of Civil Rights Legislation that has passed Congress, they have responded with distinction. I am so proud to see this process unfolding and to have this opportunity to work with such a distinguished group. I will now turn it over to the Commission's Chair, Bill Lan Lee who is the former Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights where he made sure that the word "justice" meant a lot, and he has been an attorney for seven years with the NAACP Legal Defense Educational Fund the law firm founded by Justice Thurgood Marshall. He headed three defense fund's Western Regional office in Los Angeles, and anyone one who knows Bill knows that when we called him and said, "Bill, would you do this?" Everyone had been calling on Bill to do everything, from suing the president over the failure to protect people in prison in Iraq, and for all of the other work that he's doing, he graciously, even though it's a hard personal time, said, "I'll do it" because we knew he was the best. Please, ladies and gentlemen, join me in welcoming the Chair of The National Commission Voting Rights Act.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Barbara. That was very rousing. On a personal note, when I was a young lawyer I was a member of this Association on several reports. Good morning. On behalf of the National Commission, I welcome you to what is the third of nine public hearings. The Commission will be conducting this, as Barbara mentioned, over most regions covering States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island. In the past two hearings, which Barbara has vividly described, we heard some compelling testimony about voting discrimination and the impact on the Voting Rights Act on African-Americans themselves, Latinos and Indians in the southwest. Today we're concentrating primarily on the Spanish, African American, Latino and diverse areas of the nation. First, a little bit about the history. The Voting Rights Act was signed into law in 1965 by President Lyndon Johnson, in response to voting discrimination encountered by African Americans in the South. Those of us who were fortunate to attend, heard the description of what life was like back then. Congress re-authorized Voting Rights Act in 1975. It also made specific findings that I think only legislation and others that affected the Bar, and minority language citizens were participating in electoral responses. In response, Congress expanded the act to counter Section 203. Before discussing Section 5 and 203 in greater detail, I want to explain what is scheduled to expire in 2007 and what is not. African Americans and other minorities is permanent. This is a very important point, and I want to reiterate because it is sort of an urban legend that African Americans will lose their right to vote. Permanent revisions of the act, the literacy faction, authorized federal monitors and observers to various mechanisms. However, there are some temporary provisions which will expire in 007 unless they are re-authorized by Congress, and those temporary provisions are our focus today. First, Section 5 Preclearance Provisions of the Act requires jurisdictions in all or part of sixteen states to submit voting changes to the United States Department of Justice or the United Sates District Court for the District of Columbia for preclearance approval before they can be implemented. They have to obtain pre-approval before the district director before making a voting change, re-directing the change to a methodof legislation and polling rights jurisdiction. Section 5 must prove that the change does not have a purpose or effect of denying or bridging the right to treat only race, color, or language minority. Section 203 requires that language assistance be provided for communities with a significant voting number having limited language for American Indian, Asian Americans, Alaskan native to provide language assistance. As of 2002, a total of 41 states are covered by this provision. Counties in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and Massachusetts are among those jurisdictions covered in Section 5. Third, the Act authorizes the Attorney General to appoint a federal examiner or send observers to any jurisdiction to comply with Section Five on good cause. Any jurisdiction where a federal examiner has been assigned is very important. Since 1966, 25,000 federal observers have been employed under probably 1,000 legislations in our country. Let me tell you a little bit about the Commissioner's purpose. The lawyers in the civil rights, acting out of the civil rights, created a nonpartisan of the Voting Rights Act to examine discrimination in voting since 1982. 1982 was a critical date because that was the last time it was re-authorized. The Civil Rights leader represents the diversity of the some of the panelists, Honorary Chair Commission of the National Commission is former United States Senator, Republican Charles Matthias, is not able to be with us. To the other six commissions: The Honorable John Buchanan, leading Voting Rights Scholar, Dr. Chandler Davidson, Dolores Huerta, co-creator of the United Farm Workers of America; Elsie Meeks of the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights, and Harvard Law School Professor, Charles Ogletree and the Honorable Judge, former Republican Lieutenant Governor of Colorado, Joe Rogers. Commissioners Buchanan, Davis, and Rogers are present along with me today. We are also fortunate to have three regional Commissioners: Juan Cartagena, Kimberlee Crenshaw, and Miles Rapoport. Ron, the Commissioner from primary past, was the first to conduct these regional hearings such as this one, across the country, gathering testimony relating to the Voting Rights Act and the second to write a comprehensive report detailing the commission since 1982. The report will be used to educate the public, advocates, and policymakers on this record of discrimination and its relationship to the upcoming re-authorization. It will also be submitted to Congress as to the purpose of this and how we'll proceed.

There will be five panels of speakers today. The first four panels will be comprised of the Voting Rights Practitioners and members of the aid who are effective in the voting rights issues. Each panelist will have five or ten minutes to make a presentation. After all the panelists have spoke, members will ask questions. We encourage you the public, to share in their voting right in our fifth and final panel, and if you are interested, please speak with a staff member on the back or the side. One of the staff members -- actually maybe we should have the staff members raise their hands. They are very friendly. And if you can't stay, please talk to the staff members to take your statement. That statement will be included in the record along with Barbara Arnwine. To know how democracy works the Post National Commission is conducting a committee, Voting Discrimination and Voting Rights Act in Connecticut. That program is going to be videotaped and telecast from the record of that program and that will be incorporated in the record. I'd like to introduce each of the Commissioners present at today's hearing and each one will make a short opening statement. Commissioner Buchanan is our hotel commissioner. He is the ordained commissioner of Alabama, Virginia, and Washington, D. C. He also represented Birmingham, Alabama Congress in the past 16 years, as well as the 1979 reauthorizations. For the outset of his career, he worked for and was a strong component for representation. After Congress, he chaired the Civil Liberties Organization and People For The Americans for ten years.

MR. BUCHANAN: I'm a filibuster, particularly when I'm the one doing it.

MR. LEE: Thanks for the warning.

MR. BUCHANAN: 1965 was my first year in congress. I was elected in the Goldwater sweep in 1964 in Alabama which turned out to be a Johnson sweep in most other places and the first vote that was elected for congress was Jerry Ford to become a minority leader. Virtually everything that Lyndon Johnson proposed in the straight society programs, Jerry Ford came up with constructive republican proposals, and this collided with the Voting Rights Act. Jerry came up with a different -- it was a strong Bill that applied more equally in the whole country, to take care of going after the whole state -- my own state, and I sponsored that, but I supported his alternative proposal. Now, it is not true that Jerry Ford was captain of the football team of the University of Michigan in college. He went to a University for law and at Yale University, he was not the "C" student as some of us -- I won't mention -- but he was in the upper third of his class while coaching football at Yale, and I thought Jerry had some good ideas, so I supported it. But I feel that Lyndon Johnson in this instance were righter than we were. This legislation has been extremely important to the country and the provisions that are set to expire. I think we need to take a hard look at this commission. Taxation without representation is wrong, and it is wrong in the world's greatest democracy for us to deny people their votes or any kind of discrimination or any kind of democracy and that's clearly happened in the past years and we want to hear from you young "C" students. We're anxious to hear from you. We're determined that those protections that guarantee our constitutional amendment and rights by voting in 1965 -- which transformed the political life in my part of the country -- that those rights will be sustained and need to be sustained and individual rights of the American citizen will be protected under the law. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you. Commissioner Chandler Davidson served as Chairman of the Department of Sociology. Dr. Davidson was the co-editor of Quiet Revolution In The South, a definitive work in the South. Dr. Davidson testified before Congress during the 1982 Voting Rights Act.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you. It's always a pleasure to visit New York City and I look forward to hearing the testimony that you're going to give today.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Joe Rogers completed this term as Lieutenant Governor of 2003. He was the youngest Lieutenant Governor and only the 4th African-American in the United States of America as Lieutenant Governor. He served as founding chairman in the Lieutenant Governor Association, served on the executive committee of the National Congress. Joe Rogers created "I Have A Dream," a program in dedication to the memory and legacy of Martin Luther King.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: First of all, it's just good to be here in New York. How many of you have been to Colorado? Well, you've all been to God's country. You already know there is good reason to call it God's country. Colorado is one of the highest sea levels. In New York, it's always a pleasure to come here, and in particular, to see so much of the man-made monuments in the context of our great nation. The United States is a cross-section as you well know, of people and culture. The Northeast in particular, with the brashness that you might argue with Northeasterners, as you might insist. The South is more congenial, and the West, if you come to my part of the world, wide open, cowboy country. And then you head over to California. As you well know, you get a different feel and sense of America. The same is true of us. We all have unique beings and a sense of culture that exists here, despite the differences. We are one great nation. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 was enacted one year after I was born. I was born in 1964 and so much has occurred in the past years. There is great progress that has been made in these United States of America. Great changes have occurred in the United States. We're proud of our progresses we have made in the nation. I wouldn't be sitting here today, certainly not having served as a Lieutenant Governor, but obviously so many great leaders who gave us an opportunity to help us all in the Civil Rights Act of 1965, the Voting Rights Act of 1965. We're here to assess the fact that the Supreme Court is such that we have to establish a factual basis in order to continue with reauthorization with certain provisions of the Act. If we cannot establish a factual basis that certainly has to be authorized. That's crucial, in terms of overall process, and so we're here to today, particularly in this region of the country whereby it is that voting rights has been addressed with practice and issues related to enforce them. Problems related to voting. Obviously, in this region of the country, I look forward to hearing the commissioners this first year, and I'm looking forward to hearing from you individually. Good to be with you.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Commission Rogers. I mangled his name, I apologize. Commissioner Cartagena is a Civil Rights attorney who serves as a General Counsel for the Community Service Society of New York and co-chair of the New York Voting Rights Consortium, which is a collection of major legal defense funds that protect voting rights of racial and minorities. That sounds relevant for our purposes since 1981. The Commissioner has represented Latino and African-American Voting Rights litigation and other states, including some of the states we're covering today, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. Commissioner Cartagena.

COMMISSIONER CARTAGENA: Good morning. I am so happy that we're celebrating this in New York and to also be participating and submitting testimony to this commission. In many ways, I am very happy that this is happening in New York as well because of the incredible richness to one segment of the voters in the United States, the unique nature of the relationship of this one particular item in this county. A lot of what we talked about in New York State and New York City, most particularly in the 1960's, when the Voting Rights Act was the home and epicenter of the entire migration to the United States. I was very welcoming of the remarks by Mr. Buchanan through the course of the day. We talked about '65, and I want to share a little quote that I found from the record in '65. It had to do with the Voting Rights Act because in 1965 when that act was passed, the Voting Rights Act also passed a Section 4E. It particularly stated that no voter could achieve a sixth grade education because of an English only registration. New York State also had a English literacy requirement in the 1960's. In 1965 two Senators, Barbara Kennedy and Jacob Javitts composed Section 4E. A senator from the floor said the following. "My consciousness happens to be in the deep south." He said, "In the state of Florida, there are tens of thousands of citizens of Latin American heritage. Many of them not yet able to speak the English language and have limited education to even know what they're doing." For years we have permitted them to vote and we're very happy of the fact that the great State of New York now turns to us in the democracy which we believe the State of New York has been in need for a long time. The nature of the debate in the '60's which I would love to hear from Congressman Buchanan about, and Howard -- you know -- focused particularly in the south. That is that one exception, and that one exception is New York City State. The English Literacy Program was used to effectively stop the people from voting. The many cases of the 1970's allowed the voters to vote freely despite the fact it was in an "American flag" school where the language was Spanish. Bilingual Congressman debated that privilege, looking at what happened to New York City with bilingual issues going on until early '70's, and basically said, "Having a bilingual structure in the cities of New York is not a radical aspect." . Because the Voter Rights Act, which now extended protection to Asian languages, the American language endorsed all the Spanish languages in the cities throughout the county. They had this precursor here in New York City because of Section 4E, because of that, Commissioners, I also commit to continuing my obligation. Now, going into the States besides New York City. Now you will hear, I'm sure, today, testimony from others, and other States in the Northeast which makes it very, very interesting in terms of reauthorization. A new nature of Puerto Rican experiments, so to speak. Except for a small segment, Puerto Rican issues have not changed since 1982, so in many ways, the one small segment of the population that has, has been because of the ingenuity of a handful of lawyers and that ingenuity. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Commissioner. Commission Kimberlee Crenshaw is a bi-coastal Professor of Law in the University of California. At present, she is also an ACLU Racial Justice Fellow. Professor Crenshaw is a specialist on race and gender. Her work was influential in drafting the quality and cause of race and gender discrimination for the United Nations World Conference. Commissioner Crenshaw.

COMMISSIONER CRENSHAW: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Executive Directors, On-line Commissioners, distinguished members of the Bar, colleagues, friends, good morning. First off, it's a distinct pleasure and a privilege to be a part of this important fundamental right as American citizens. The right to participate as equals in the political process. As we gather this morning in New York City, I'm mindful of the events that are transpiring right now in Philadelphia, Mississippi, where a new generation of Americans has taken up the task of confronting the human toll paid by the challenge to America to live up to their ideals and democratic commitments. Forty years have passed. We have paid the highest price possible to register African-Americans in this city to vote. This injustice may well have faded from memory had it not been for the efforts of three young people who determined that they would search out the truth and make the truth matter. We commend those students not only in Mississippi, but because their democracy can't be deterred by sentiments that would wish these problems away or hope that they would be resolved merely through the passage of time. As much as we all recognize the quality to living the dream, it requires us to be conscious of current realities that frustrate or deny our enjoyment of the rights that this country was created to defend. So today, here in New York, we take up the task of the state of democracy to challenge. We continue to fight the Voting Rights Act which is perhaps the most important and successful civil rights legislation. In part, because it was grounded in actual voting conditions. Its prophylactic provisions balanced the barrier of removing the bad lot of those who have the power and the authority to make wrongs right. It is fitting, therefore, to visit on the factual upon which these presumptions remain, as our highest ideals of democracies, to the sacrifices that were made by civil rights activists of people born in the Mississippi Delta, but also to the Americans and from all other countries from around the globe. Perhaps Jamie Goodman and Joyner would never have drafted the benefit of sacrifice, but when we pay attention through the democratic association, the ideal simply can't be contained. I look forward to today's testimony and am grateful for the opportunity to play even a small role for our nation.

MR. LEE: Thank you for those thoughts. Commissioner Miles Rapoport holds up the City of Connecticut. The Commissioner is President of Demos, the Research and Ethics Organization, dedicated to ensuring the highest levels of electoral civil litigation, and many economic prosperity opportunities broadly shared in prosperity from serving at the Demos. The Commissioner served for ten years under legislation as secretary of state.

MR. RAPOPORT: Thank you, very much. I'm delighted to be here, commissioning here today, and I really am glad to come to today's proceedings. As mentioned, I was Secretary of State for Connecticut for four years in the 1990's and as such, was the Chief Legislation Officer for the state. And it was clear to me at the time when I was Secretary then, the fact of how the legislation laws were implemented, how the local legislation officials made decisions, and how bifurcation of rights are carried out. The way the Voting Rights Act are treated has everything to do with whether people are encouraged to participate in the process or discouraged to participate in the process. I think that all officials should do some backup. Not all voting processes are as high as we can possibly make it. I don't think any of us, despite the uptake in the turnout in the 2004 Presidential Election, can feel good about a situation which, in many elections, less than half of eligible persons are voting, and the very simplest in all of the studies that have been done, don't go first to the deepest question of whether people choose to vote or not. But many people don't vote because of procedures. So that brings me to wonder if the maintenance and understanding of the Voting Rights Act is to encourage or to discourage the behaviors of elected officials in Connecticut. That, I do see the need for that kind of thing. The need is that these issues are alive and well and need to be addressed, but as a point of view from the Demos, I think the system is always fundamental in the root word of democracy, and I think it's our fundamental decision that democracy is the most vibrant, and inclusive. It's interesting, this management issue, that Demos and Lawyer's Committees and other organizations that are represented here address neutral issues that should encourage or discourage people, whether that be people with felony convictions getting their voter's rights back or not. All these things have a great deal of impact, and these are policy issues that we want to continue to address. But while looking at the new frontiers, what discourages or encourages people from voting, I think what we will let slip is one of the most crucial things that is something that we ought to pay great attention to. So I am delighted that the Lawyer's Committee has taken an interest in putting this together. I'm very happy that Demos is participating, and I will look forward to the testimony that we're going to hear today.

MR. LEE: The Commission wishes to thank the Association of the Bar of New York for providing this majestic room. The Commissioners would also like to thank Mr. Greenbaum, the director, and Masiah Johnson -- Deputy for this project -- for their valuable effort for running the show. We will proceed to the first panel immediately after we have a camera change, so we will start in about five minutes. Thank you. Okay. The first speaker of the panel is the Honorable David Paterson. He's been a member of the State Bar of New York since 1985, representing the third district, representing Harlem and East Harlem and the upper west side. He has been a Senator since November 2002. The Senator has to leave early, so we're going to go forward with his testimony and the commissioners will have a round of questions for him before proceeding with the other speakers. Is that okay? Thank you very much.

COMMISSIONER PATERSON: Good morning, Commissioners and members of the Lawyer's Committee, and all of you who have come together to discuss the Voting Rights Act.

I will try to confine most of my remarks to the issues relating around Section Five which is obviously one of the sections that we have been involved in, in some issues. The reapportionment, and also designations of New York. It's obvious there is still "bloc" voting that is practiced to a great degree and exists, so therefore, we would hope that the judiciary and private citizens can still take advantage of the pre-clearance provision of the Voting Rights Act, Section Five. Whenever there are situations where there are devices or practices that have a purpose or effect of diluting the voting strength of people who live in the minority communities, Section Five is hardly the best section in the Voting Rights Act for application. Actually, Section Five relates more to procedure than it actually does to substantial issues. Section Five has been important in our circumstances and actually Section Five was vital in a case that was brought in the federal court in 2002 relating to New York City's reapportionment. There are areas in Long Island, Hempstead, Freeport, Uniondale, Garden City and Lakeview, where citizens who lived in what had to be considered a politically cohesive community and a geographically condensed community. It would have comprised about 40 percent of a potential single State Senate district, however in the 2002 reapportionment those communities were "cracked" and "broken" through the district. The result was, there were no more than 13 percent, and as low as six percent in the North, the smallest district. This "cracking" had the effect of completely alienating minority citizens in those communities from the actual government and electoral process, and so when Martin Luther King was arrested in February 1st in Selma, Alabama and we heard the first of testimony letters, we considered that voting would be one of the most important parts of democracy and that is true in Section Five. We brought in the circuit effect of the federal court because the effect of splitting up individuals living in the neighborhood would have that effect of denying, really, any opportunity for them to participate in this process. The court's ruling was that the minority communities being less than 50 percent of the overall population couldn't really guarantee that that would be the catalyst for electing a minority representative. But what the court really wasn't thinking about was the issue that it was a significant percentage compared with other groups in the area. It could produce a minority representative in that area, and what was most important about the decision was that, though it was a strict interpretation of Section Two by the court, in the end, Section Five was actually irrelevant, because Long Island was not a covered area. It legally had no effect, because Section Five tried to preserve what a minority voting district backup doesn't enhance, but when Section Five was first adopted in 1965, it probably had a positive affect then, because what we're look for is districts of minority communities to be represented in the government. The question is, is that really representative of what minority strength actually is, and would there be an opportunity to go beyond Section Five with some kind of legal redress where enhanced capability is possible as it would have been in that particular area? I grew up in that area and I would never have had an opportunity to be in the New York State Senate in that area, and basically it's a good thing I moved out. So Section Five still has a valid use and valid meaning in our society as we found in another district, the 34th Senate District, which is the Bronx and Westchester. This district was "gerrymandered" in a way to ensure White representation. It violated the county line more than once, which is against the statute and basically rounds up all the White in the still Parkway on a piece of paper, which would be reminiscent of a dismembered lobbier. It has absolutely no relevance to the geographic location there are five small districts in the Bronx, and to accomplish the maintaining of the 34th district, it was up to the other four minority districts with each of them now representing over eight minorities, to keep this one White district viable in that particular area. In ruling against our claim, the Court said that it had a concern about the picking of the minority district. That the percentage dropped from 85 to 75 or even 70 percent. The Court feared that that would actually be a threat to the ability of African-Americans or Hispanics to represent those districts. Meanwhile, it showed a viable, a 59 percent White district which was drawn in such a way that we felt that it violated the sections of the Voting Rights Act. So one of the issues that we would hope in extending the Voting Rights Act is that Section 5 would never be used to "overpack" the minority districts. When minority districts are overpacked, when seats change hands, there is so much of a "warming effect." African-American and Hispanics run against each other, therefore a White candidate can win. So those are some of the relevant issues that we thought we would point to the commission this morning, relating to the application of Section 5. As we review the authorization of the Voting Rights Act, I must confess to the Commissioners, ten years ago, when I first heard of expiration of the Voting Rights Act which expired in 1975, 1982, and will again in 2007, I thought that districts around this country were represented so well by African-Americans and Hispanics, that there would really be no need to re-authorize theAct. But looking now at the progress of the last decade, looking at what may be further confiscated methods that may be used as a purpose, is a result of diluting minority strength. These are things such as charges of voter fraud, and recent advocating for voter identification of the polling places, which significantly reduce the influence of African-American and Hispanic and other minority communities. It is our feeling that the re-authorization of this section is paramount to maintaining the opportunity for equal representation. An equal opportunity in voting, and that's why I'm very pleased that the Commission would examine it this morning and would allow me to express my viewpoint.

MR. LEE: We'll start with you Mr. Buchanan.

MR. BUCHANAN: I'd like to say that the 1970 and 1975 Voting Rights Act didn't protect anybody but my own constituent. But I hope they're taking a hard look -- Congress -- at your experience. Like your own business, we have not often come up with perfect legislation in Congress, and it is perfectly clear that we need to strengthen in what is possible.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Cartagena?

COMMISSIONER CARTAGENA: One question. Since we have the benefit of your knowledge with respect to what happens in Albany to re-districting, could you just comment a little bit about how Section 5 is viewed up there? How it's talked about -- your colleagues in the Senate -- how aware of the provisions, what it means, what it stopped them from trying do?

COMMISSIONER PATERSON: I think it's unfortunate that Section 5 has been twisted and cajoled in such a fashion. The idea of overpacking districts -- which is the new and modern form of segregation -- in order to accomplish the same goals that were, of course, to antagonize 40 years ago, of representation. What they found 40 years ago is that they could divide minorities in such a small area that they would create a chilling effect in the preliminary process, and obviously dilute any representation. Now, because of voter population and demographic changes, the minority communities are too large. They are just too large to divide into small areas in the same fashion. So the new way is to draw the district in such a way that you pack as many minorities in one area. That is misunderstood in some points, and to be perfectly honest, I sense that my Hispanic legislators, even when making sustaining personal interest, obviously are going to have an easier time in "dogging" the district. It's decreasing the overall count that can be elected. If the districts are drawn coordinately from political conflict and communities of interest, I think that the Section is in a sense, the way it was written -- being manipulated for purposes other than which it was intended.

MR. LEE: Questions?

COMMISSIONER CRENSHAW: I want to say congratulations that you were able to move all of us. We are better for it. The re-authorizing with regard to the two stories that you tell. You tell a story of the effect of "cracking" in the minority district and the inability to effectively contest that with the existing provisions. And the latter story is one of "packing," and so, I'm curious about how you go about what might be the best way of providing the "cracking" that you talk about and the "packing" that you talk about. And the second question, there is a general conversation about whether re-districting can happen in that colorblind way, given your experience in Albany. Anyone? If you can speak to that?

COMMISSIONER PATERSON: Well, the interesting aspect of "cracking" in Nassau county and "packing" in the Bronx and Westchester county -- what's crucial about it is that the courts both ruled in the same situation and one has to wonder as a matter of sophistry, what the reason was that the Court took this rather mercurial position of almost defending two competing aspects of law at the same time. And that is why we can't have colorblind districts, because the people who are drawing them aren't colorblind and the people ruling on the cases are less. So the reality is that the desire to have a colorblind environment was exactly what we were pursuing in Nassau county. We have said that we could draw a district of a majority-minority nature but what you're saying is, if you get 40 percent, that a candidate was strong in his or her minority community backup, and avert the issues in such a fashion that was particular in other neighborhoods, you could have an opportunity to win, as opposed to never having an opportunity to win. So there was the colorblind argument. They rejected it in that case. Then, when it went to the "packing" issue, they became color-conscious and decided to recall four districts of over 80 percent minority, because they considered that to be a concern of minority representation, whereas minority representation could come through as a conflict of the White. They rejected it. The unfortunate aspect of Section 5 is that in many respects it was restrictive for issues that went beyond some of the basic voting rights problems we had in 1965 I don't want to diminish the gravity of changes that have been brought by many people -- you commissioners and the audience -- but we have preached a reality that's representative or reflective of the considerable ability and talent that existed in African-American and Hispanic communities that could be seen in government, if any of us had more of an opportunity to serve. And, so, just in terms of trying to fulfill the ideal that the constitution and declaration provide for us, it's my suggestion that we're going to have to, if anything, enhance the Voting Rights Act to address some of the specific issues that might not have been really in the part of the thinking that went to passing the legislation 40 years ago.

MR. LEE: Commissioner Paterson, you're essentially talking about folks wanting to have it both ways. You've indicated what the purpose or the rationalizing and the influence of "packing," is, and so, when you look at essentially how you resolve that concern, you talk about issues related to how you enhance, for example, the Voting Rights or the Voting Rights Act. How do you strike that balance? How has that been articulated by a Court, to your knowledge, or was it an articulated period or the balance that's been struck in terms of meeting -- about "packing" on the one hand -- having influence on the other?

COMMISSIONER PATERSON: I can't site Court actions that I'd say would properly reflect the right balance between the methods from within. Districts can actually be drawn as a precursor to that, because for me, it might be somewhat of a -- it's just something that I can't perceive right now. What I would settle for right now is consistency. A method which is using a standard and applying it the same way, and that did not happen in our case that we brought before the Court. In fact, we had planned that when we were addressing the Court, we would actually use a standard deviation of 10 percent of the population in districts to actually pack more constituents into the "down State" region jobs in New York and less in the "up State" region jobs to create another "White seat" in upstate New York. So, in other words, what they did was, when a 10 percent standard deviation was lowered in the "down State" areas, all of the "down State" seats had approximately 15,000 to 20,000 northern citizens in this "up State. " With what was left over, they were able to create another seat upstate where the minority is about 6 percent, as opposed to down State, with the minority population at 20 percent. So, in trying to bring this argument, what we were saying is that there was a racial aspect to the draw and that was also rejected. But as I said before, the Court allowed the racial aspect, re-drawing, when they put 85 percent of minority districts in force in the Bronx seat to validate a fifth seat where they now packed all the White citizens. So it would probably take some research for me to find what I think would be the most negotiable portion to be fair, but what I could say right now is, what we observed was so antithetical to what we were trying to achieve. And specifically, the same in all the areas, the population of minorities in New York State is such that, in the other house of government, there are 42 minority seats, whereas, in the Senate there are only 11. Even though the other house is only two and a half times the size of the senate. So strangely enough, if they do the districts continually, one right after another, that would, in and of itself, would assure us four or five African-American Senate seats.

MR. LEE: Do you believe because of racial bloc -- is that correct, Commissioner Paterson -- the problems you've identified with "cracking" and also "packing" you would have to do sort of the administrative -- I guess picking appropriate remedies in the racial block realities -- thing.

COMMISSIONER PATERSON: Yes.

MR. LEE: Do you believe there is a long -- language-wise –

COMMISSIONER PATERSON: Yes.

MR. LEE: Well, I think that it's rare that we have an official here.

COMMISSIONER PATERSON: I think that wherever there is a harmonious equality that impinges on a geographic area, that there would be similar voting patterns, and the aspect of language and language spoken. I think it would be based on national orientation and some of the other protected classes. The opportunities and the interests in the voting itself are actually greater at times, as we found, in particular, the Dominican area, because they have such a political orientation in the Dominican Republic. What actually was keeping the voting poll places down in New York City was the inability to have dual citizenship in the Dominican Republic and the United States. When that was granted in the year 2000 by President Lionel Fernandez of the Dominican Republic, the increase in voting population in that area has been immeasurable and has produced three new senates in the New York State counsel. But what often has been the barrier is obviously the disconnect, that people would speak their native language with society in total. In terms of reapportionment, the language issues are drawn, probably based not on language, but based on ethnicity, so just in terms of motivating or having bigger opportunities to vote, they probably go hand in hand.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Senator. I know you have to leave, and it's 11:00 right now. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER PATERSON: Thank you.

MR. LEE: Our next speaker is Joan Gibbs. Ms. Joan Gibbs is General Counsel, Center for Law and Social Justice, Medgar Evers College, The City University of New York.

MS. GIBBS: Thank you. Good morning, and thanks to the members for participating in this hearing. The center is in the process of preparing detailed analysis of the impact of the Voting Rights Act and the litigation in the City of New York and particularly in the borough of Brooklyn, where the center is located. We have not finished that analysis yet, but actually, we are at the end of it. It's being edited right now. Its being edited by our secretary right now. But I would like to talk about what's to be included, we believe, what's to be re-authorized. And we also want to show support for portions of New York City that are covered by Section 5 to continue to be covered by it in every re-districting city. Since New York has come under Section 5, in every district, the Black community, particularly along with other minority communities, have been committed to intervening or initiating litigation. First, to secure, and second, to secure our proper voting strength representation. Their last cycle, for example -- and Senator David Paterson was talking about this case -- and we're involved in this case as well, Rodriguez versus Patak. Unfortunately, it was lost. But in any event, in that meeting it was pursued from the beginning and it continued afterward, because the concerns about the U. S. Senator district, were currently represented by English, and so we continued in this litigation. And one of the things that we found -- and they're really concerned about it -- was the prevalence of the racial voting in Senator Ingle's district. The other issue we wanted to talk about, because everybody focuses on the broader electoral, we also had reason to use Section 5 in other areas, particularly New York City. They used to have community school boards. The school boards were dismantled a couple of years ago and we went to the Justice Department to argue that that was a violation of the Voting Rights Act. And that has been true, not only around the legislation joint district, but the Section 5 application has been for the the residents of New York City. The other thing that we are looking at in our stadium, because we believe that it's important, cities are undergoing in certain communities, demographic changes, and by that I mean that, although external districts are now majority-minority districts, that might not be. And so we're concerned that the Voting Rights Act remain particularly in Brooklyn. Rapid changes may be active because people might have to resort to maintaining their strengths, not necessarily in positions. The other issue that we're looking at in the study is that last year, the Voting Rights Consortium, which is comprised of members of the Legal Defense Fund Community Service Society, Asian Legal Defense Fund for Legal Defense, as well as a group of minority district professionals. Our office focused on the federal talks about the broader findings, but when Brooklyn joined the legislations, we found that there was a lot of confusion. A lot of people were being asked for I. D. , which was inappropriate, but nevertheless, they were being asked for I. D. And we're going to document that in our study. And we see this with new voters. A lot of people have been familiar with just the process of the Voting Rights education, so that's one of the other areas to educate people. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Ms. Joan Gibbs. The next panelist is Martin Perez. Mr. Perez is the president of the Latino Leadership Alliance of New Jersey. Originally from Puerto Rico, Mr. Perez is a labor leader of the National Workers Union.

MR. PEREZ: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, honorable members of the commission. I want to start by thanking you for this opportunity to address the commission on this most important issue for our State, and in particular, for the Latino community. The Latino Leadership Alliance is an umbrella organization that includes most of the Latino organizations in our State. It was established in 1999 to foster the political empowerment of Latinos across New Jersey. In the last decade, the community has made some progress, but we are still underrepresented in the halls of power of our State. New Jersey Latinos make up 14 percent of New Jersey's population which is an estimated 1. 2 million residents. Census trends indicate that by next year, our percentage of the State's population will climb to 17 percent. We are the largest of all minorities in the New Jersey area and in the nation, yet our faces are missing on many of the governing bodies of the United States, even with sizeable Latino populations. There are no Latinos in our State Senate. That is what brings me here today. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 is widely regarded as the most influential civil rights statute. Latinos in New Jersey rely on the Act to protect our fundamental right to vote. In 1999, the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division found that Passaic County was discriminating against Latino voters by denying equal access to the election process. The county was not providing Spanish-speaking workers or Spanish language voting materials. The Civil Rights division entered into a consent decree with the County of Passaic. From 1999 to the present, Passaic County conducts four elections each year, all monitored by the federal observers. A three-judge panel of the U. S. District Court of New Jersey was formed to ensure that the County will comply with the court orders. The monitor assisted the County in its efforts to comply with the Court's orders and to implement major institutional reforms. The Passaic case has not only helped the Latinos in Passaic County, its influence was felt in other parts of the State. In order to avoid similar intervention from the Civil Rights Division, other counties took affirmative actions to bring themselves in compliance with the Voting Rights Act. We rely on the minority language and other provisions in order to protect our rights to vote. These provisions are scheduled to expire in August 2007. The question that we face today is, do we need the re-authorization of these provisions? There is no doubt that the answer is yes. New Jersey has made progress in efforts to comply with implementing the Voting Rights Act, but the reality is that we still have a long way to go. Our organization receives complaints in every election from almost every county. Some of the complaints are as follows:) Counties don't recruit enough bilingual election workers that work specifically in Passaic, which by the way, Passaic was supposed to stop in 2003, and the Civil Rights division saw fit to extend it because they still haven't recruited better workers and trainers for the county. . 2) The election workers are not properly 15 trained to deal with language issues. 3) The Spanish language signs and 17 documents are not in the poll places and are 18 not posted in places accessible to the 19 people in the community. 4) Community Outreach: To educate our 2 community that language assistance is 22 available is deficient at best, and in some 23 instances, non-existent. We are state-wide with more than 200 in minorities. I have never received a call from any county to ask me to cooperate for any election problems. New Jersey has seven counties that qualify for coverage under Section 203 of the Act. Middlesex, Passaic, Union, Bergen, Essex, Hudson, and Cumberland. Due to population trends, it is reasonable to expect that after the Census, we will have more counties qualifying for coverage under Section 203. It is also fair to expect that, unless we maintain vigilance, the complaints will increase. We acknowledge that there are other laws, like the Help America Vote Act (HAVA), that set minimum standards for voting systems and accessibility for persons with disabilities and non-English speakers. These laws are a compliment to the Voting Rights Act. For example, HAVA requires that so that new voters, Registered by mail since 2003, produce some form of identification at the voting place. We received complaints from Latinos from the City of Vineland during the last mayoral election that election workers were asking for identification from many Latinos irrespective of whether they were new mail registers or not. Some people, because of frustration or embarrassment, simply go home and don't return to vote. The conduct of the Vineland election workers, which might be a lack of training, is not only in violation of HAVA, but also of the Voting Rights Act. Some people could argue that if Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act is not reauthorized, Latinos in New Jersey can turn to the state laws for protection. Those who've lived in New Jersey long enough, know that the office of the Attorney General in our state has not been the most effective agency in prosecuting corruption or illegal conduct of other government agencies. We understand that it is the responsibility of New Jersey to continue to pressure our state agencies, like the Attorney General, to become more effective, but the reality tells us that we still need the Department of Justice to protect our voting rights. It is our insurance. Yes, we have made progress in protecting voting rights in New Jersey, but the only guarantee to maintain the progress and be ready to defend our rights against new and creative forms of discrimination is the re-authorization of the Voting Rights Act.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Perez. I think that the commission would appreciate it if some of our members could talk about the complaints you have received from Latino voters. Would that be possible?

MR. PEREZ: Yes.

MR. LEE: And Ms. Joan Gibbs, we would like a report. Do you have a copy?

MS. GIBBS: Yes.

MR. LEE: Thank you. The last panelist is Ted Shaw. He is a Director of Counsel, Associate Director for the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund.

MR. SHAW: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It's an honor to be here at the National Commission On Voting Rights Act, and I want to commend Barbara Arnwine and the Lawyer's Committee and staff for all the hard work that they are doing, and the many silent workers in working toward the re-authorization Voting Rights Act. Being in this commission, I have testimony that I have submitted in writing, and I will not go into all the detail in that testimony, but selectively read some of it.

MR. LEE: We have the testimony.

MR. SHAW: Thank you. The Legal Defense Fund was a pioneer in the efforts to secure and protect minority voting rights in the United States, particularly those of African-Americans, and it has been involved with the voting rights since its inception. The Legal Defense Fund co-chairs, the New York Voting Rights Consortium, which is a group of New York Minority Voting Rights advocates which include the Community Service Society of New York, the Center for Law and Social Injustice at Medgar Evers College, The Asian American Legal Defense, and the Education Fund, Inc. , the Puerto Rican Legal Defense Fund. And it also includes other voting rights of independent practitioners and experts. In addition, we've been active in monitoring and/or challenging various issues affecting race and language minority voters on voting rights in the New York area. What I want to do is talk briefly about Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, particularly since 1982. Attached is Appendix A to my testimony which is a listing of all the Section 5 objections since 1982 and in New York State. And you also have a timeline that is Appendix B, which shows you when those objections were interposed. Since 1974, New York Municipal and State governments have attempted 19 times to make electoral changes that the justice department found have a retrogressive effect on the minority Voting Rights Act. But for the Justice Department's rejection of those retrogression plans, there would have been numerous instances of changes which would have harmed minority voting rights. The job in New York, therefore, clearly isn't over. As you heard earlier, there is a long history in New York State, going back to the days before the passage of the Voting Rights Act, particularly with respect to Puerto Ricans in New York, where there were explicit rules in effect that took away or blocked the right to vote for individuals based upon the language of that vote. So there is deep history, and of course, New York City is covered. The City of New York is covered in part, by Section 5 of the Voting Act. That is to say, New York County, Kings County, and the Bronx. What I want to do then, is to give you a little bit more detail on that. First I want to illustrate that part of minority vote changes which have continued over 40 years. Second, the jurisdictions with multiple growing minority populations, including complex voting processes that provide many opportunities for discrimination. And thirdly, I want to say that, contrary to particular belief, Section 5 -- a lot of people believe that Section 5 only protects African-Americans while the Voting Rights Act language provision protects only language minority. First of all, anybody that knows anything about the various populations of New York knows that the split people try to draw between race and language minorities is a false one. That's one point. But the reality is that voting, symbolically and practically, the Voting Rights Act created an integrated protection program. Let's talk about some of the Section 5 issues in New York. In July, 1970, the Attorney General filed a determination that New York's English Literacy Program adversely impacted minority voting participation and that, of course, is relevant to the Section 5 triggering formula.

Of course, in March of 1971, the U. S. Bureau of Census reported that fewer than 50 percent of the voting age residents were registered and that, of course, what initially triggers coverage in New York of those jurisdictions. From 1982 or since then, Section 5 objections have helped prevent minority vote dilution in re-districting, non-geographical election procedures, and election controls, (suspension of elected bodies, etc.) and barriers to political access for linguistic minorities. The scope of these categories is significant. There's talk about re-districting since 1982. That authorization objection has occurred six times against proposed municipal, state and federal voting power, and that is reflected as I indicated earlier, in our appendices A and B. Each individual objection to each redistricting plan in fact, sited multiple harms to minority communities across the city so, in effect, at this time, the total number of changes that would be prevented by intervention of the Section 5 objections was more than six incidences. This occurred under both democratic and republican administrations, three Departments of Justice have stopped discriminatory voting changes in neighborhoods that reach across New York City, including Williamsburg, East and West Harlem, Flatbush, Bushwick, Cypress Hills, East New York, Fordham Road, Morris Heights, Inwood, Washington Heights, Williamsbridge, Wakefield, University Heights and Union Port. In my written testimony you have more specifics with respect to those instances and you'll see them also again reflected in the appendices. They include instances which "packing" and "cracking" were at stake, but also included non-geographic methods of eluding minority voting strength. The borough of Queens is not included in the voting Rights Act. It is not covered, but interestingly enough, the influence of New York City provides a unique front to observe an impact. If you compare Kings County, New York County, and the Bronx with Queens -- which never, of course, had Section 5 protection in Queens where redistricting plans are not subject to the scrutiny of preclearance review, pressure to protect White incumbents from dramatic demographic changes has wrought a districting pattern that, according to former Assistant Attorney General John R. Dunne, who served under that public administration of the Justice Department, "consistently disfavored the Hispanic voters. " The Queens county district is twice as overpopulated as Kings County, New York County, and Bronx County. If Section 5 is allowed to expire, we can expect to see that pattern become the "norm" in the covered jurisdictions. Now in New York City, as we see in Queens, a few examples of non-geographic vote dilution from 1994. That state amendment to the Bill proposing the allowing of the Governor to appoint judges to the Court of Claims and then immediately transfer them to the Supreme Court. That would effectively take away or dilute the Voting Rights Act with respect to Supreme Court Justices. The Civil Rights provision rejected these under Section 5, noting that the method of selecting supreme court judges, from election to appointment has changed. In 1996, Section 5 allowed the jurisdiction to intervene when the Schools Chancellor dismissed nine minority community school Board members elected by a 90 percent minority district and replaced them with unilaterally chosen political appointees. Now we see the dismantling of New York City community schools, but these obviously occurred before that, and even that dismantling was subject to Section 5 with clearance, which should have been. It was pre-cleared over the objection of the minority advocates. But, nonetheless, the early evidence demonstrated Section 5 to secure our protecting the Voting Rights Act, and finally, still more recently, a federal government blocked a 1999 proposal that would have claimed to alienate government in voting, in school board elections. Limited voting is a classic "anti-single-shot" strategy to prevent minorities to casting their vote in blocs, and as the Chair of this Commission may recall when he was in the role of acting Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, he determined that these changes would have made it three times as hard to elect a candidate of their choice to the New York City school board in elections. So Section 5 is well documented. These kinds of methods would "pour new poisons into old bottles," and Section 5 was enacted to "shift the advantage of time and inertia from the perpetrators of the evil to its victims. "

I also want to point to that in New York City, with respect to the Chinese language speakers in New York. So half-hearted was New York City's original Chinese translation language plan that acting Assistant Attorney General James P. Turner, 1993, noted, "There was no awareness that there were multiple Chinese dialects spoken in the city. " In addition, no procedure for assessing the language abilities of the people and the translation skills. " Without the intervention of Section 5, that city's plan was to send one interpreter to the polling place, no matter how many Chinese speakers needed translation in that district, and one single interpreter would have had to have served 2,000. Before the Department of Justice objected, the city's plan was to provide no translation services at all in all districts with fewer than 200 Chinese, and this goes on and on and on. Details of the testimony of the Chinese is continuing to increase and has increased since 1982 reaching 47. 6 percent of all New Yorkers by the 2000 Census. Without Section 203 and Section 5 a critical number of linguistic minorities face barriers of their fundamental rights to vote. In some of that, Section 5 provisions, it serves also as a deterrent to voting changes. In other words, what you speak, with respect to objections under Section 5 that arelodged, that does not reflect that entire force and effect of having Section 5, because judges know that they have to abide by or pass Section 5 scrutiny, and often don't propose that. They otherwise propose, in the absence of Section 5, the need for Section 5 support of minority voting rights in New York city has not declined since 1982. In fact, the 19 times the Civil Rights Division has made Section 5 objections, in the City of New York, 11 have occurred of the voting rights, and just as much discrimination, since 1982. In 1982, most Assistant Attorney Generals who have served under Republican and Democratic presidents, have noted the persistence of racial polarized voting in New York City. Geographic segregation by race, ethnicity, language was significantly higher than the national average and reflects the existence of continued impediment. The job is not over. Section 5 is necessary. I commend the commission for the work that it is doing for the Voting Rights Act extension, and we are available for any further questions. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Shaw. I wonder if you're preparing similar reports for other regions?

MR. SHAW: We will participate in any way that we can be helpful. We work closely with many lawyers. We of course, have a flex office, which is our West Coast Regional office, and we will participate.

MR. LEE: Very well.

COMMISSIONER CARTAGENA: Well first of all, I want to thank all three of you who took the time in sharing your views with us, and New Jersey found "fills" in a lot of gaps and this kind of work can be done in general, of these United States. I have a short question for Mr. Perez and that is, you mentioned before that there are more Blacks connected to the New Jersey State Senate. Could you just give us your opinion of what may contribute to that, dysfunctionally or otherwise?

MR. PEREZ: The biggest contribution? The contributor is the registering process. We try to engage in the past registering process and we even prepare charts and new maps that we submitted to the commission, but the reality is that for these to process, it is generally controlled by both political parties and it is assigned to protect incumbents. That's the reality in New Jersey. Some incumbents are controlled by the Democrats, and some counties are controlled by the Republicans. You protect the incumbency, and by the way, politics work almost in similar situations in taking different organizations, and you end up with the same people. So it's fair to say that the registering process in New Jersey has not been kind to Latinos and that's why we're working -- we're going to work in context in trying to select this Senate for this control.

MR. LEE: Kimberlee?

COMMISSIONER CRENSHAW: I'd like to thank all of you. I have two questions for Mr. Shaw. I understand and take most of the facts that both Democratic and Republican administrations have intervened, using the Voting Rights Act against various changes in voting policy. Is it also fair to infer that both Democratic and Republican local administration have been "equal opportunity violators" of the Voting Rights Act? And question number two, I was really interested in the comparison that you offered between counties where the voting act was in effect and counties that are not covered. I was wondering, if you were to "flip the script" somewhat, do you have any sense that Section 5 has a pre-numbered effect? In other words, does it have an effect even in areas that are not correctly covered in part, because of carryover or seen in areas where Section 5 is in effect?

MR. SHAW: Let me answer that first question by simply saying, yes. With respect to the second question, I think that if the negotiable instrument you were asking about was in play everywhere, we would not see the difference between Queens County and the covered jurisdictions in New York City, that is, Kings county, the Bronx and New York county. So while I would like to be able to say that Section 5 creates a culture that extends beyond covered jurisdictions and maybe some of that effect, certainly it isn't a complete "Halo" effect which only underscores the need for extension. Section 5 jurisdiction, where we do have problems from West New Jersey has cases -- that are KNC and RNC, are provided, I believe, by Judge Boyd, and I'm curious, (turning and addressubg panelist Mr. Perez,) over the recent years, have you observed any attempts of voter supression, specifically in Passaic county, which I imagine you have observed?

MR. PEREZ: This making complaints against the Sheriff's Office -- Sheriff of Passaic county -- Sheriff Paiyalsik -- that tried to suppress the Latinos voting. The Latinos were trying to organize Latinos, and he was there from time to time suppressing the vote. And Mr. Paiyalsik is still the Sheriff of Passaic county. And when he was elected, his first act was to fire 12 Latino Sheriff Officers that participated. There are some litigations still going on in the Courts.

MR. SHAW: Thank you.

MR. DAVIDSON: Mr. Shaw, the question that I have for you has to do with the state that you have and it's a little more in your report here. I'm reading it, and essentially, that document has found just as much discrimination since 1982 in the years prior. And you're talking about New York and I gather that most of the evidence for that statement is found in the preceding sentence there, where you say in fact, of the 19 times the Civil Rights Division has made Section 5 objections in New York, 11 have occurred since 1982, and then you also footnote some letters from the Assistant Attorney General James Turner and Acting Assistant Attorney General, Loretta King, and I'm wondering if you have copies of those letters that you could give to our commission?

MR. SHAW: I don't have them with me, but we will submit them to Mr. Greenbaum.

MR. LEE: Joe Rogers, obviously one of the key Voting Rights Act is to make sure that new and creative -- that people are not disenfranchised and neglected. Several states, Indiana among them, have recently adopted requirements, and this will very well have some impact on the levels, and that might be something that the presence or absence might have a significant impact on them. How concerned are you, or what evidence are you seeing that newly enacted identification requirements may have a changing effect on people's participation?

MS. GIBBS: Well, as I said when I spoke earlier in our office with headquarters in Brooklyn, we received a number of calls -- a substantial number of calls regarding requests for identification in circumstances where it wasn't required, and we are concerned about that. We are familiar with the demographics of Brooklyn. Brooklyn is a large home of people of African descent, and it is also the home of a number of immigrants from all over the world, including the African immigrant. And we are concerned our registered voters -- and have been -- that they are subject to be asked for identification as well as Latinos and Hispanics being asked for identification. We're very much concerned about that.

MR. SHAW: The I. D. requirements are being counter-played in jurisdictions. They are reminiscent of Prop 196 in five elections. Requirements that selectively enforced African-Americans and other people of color. So, for example, even though people argue, you have to show an I. D. card to rent a video at Blockbuster, it's no big deal. We know that something that should be neutral is subject to be used in a racial discriminatory way. So, for example, just as before in 1965, African-Americans in the south were subjected to a literacy test, there may have been requirements that specifically applied directly to African-Americans that were particularly discriminatory. Beyond that, the right to vote is something that is guaranteed and should be guaranteed of every citizen of the United States of voting age, and that guarantee should apply regardless of whether there person has a Driver's License, a State I. D. , how poor that person is, whether that person has a home. It's guaranteed to the rich and the poor, the homeless and those who are wealthy, and the imposition of I. D. requirements in my view, and in the view of the Legal Defense Fund, hopes all kinds of opportunities of mischief with respect to depriving people of the right to vote, particularly people of color.

MR. PEREZ: I have a brief comment. One of my biggest concerns in the process of re-authorizing the Act -- in the process of discussion -- the enactment -- there are some people in the federal legislature, in the Senate, and Congress was trying to somehow connect the real I. D. act and the electoral process, and that would have an effect on participation of the people. So, one thing is to be very careful in pursuing it, to propose any type of tie with the electoral process.

MR. LEE: Mr. Buchanan?

MR. BUCHANAN: Mr. Shaw, when I personally registered to vote, I walked into the room. There were these Black Americans pouring over these questions on a literacy test. I couldn't answer the questions as a registered voter. I had just graduated from college. I told the person in charge, "I don't think I can pass this literacy test." He said, "Who is the first president of the United States?" I said, "George Washington." He said, "Use this card, you passed." So, I know what's going on.

MR. SHAW: And that's consistent with the story of the Harvard graduate, the black Harvard graduate who returned to Mississippi and was asked, "What does this mean?" And he was answering all these questions, exactly what they meant, but it was a means to say, "You don't want me to vote."

MR. LEE: Well, we've run out of time. Thank you Ms. Gibbs, Mr. Perez, and Mr. Shaw. Could we have our next panelists? Ms. Cohen, Kevin Peterson, Marc Morial, Joe Rich. Joe Rich is the Director of Fair Housing and the Community Development Project. He is also the Former Chief of Voting Section of the Department of Justice. Mr. Rich has several decades as a lawyer in the Civil Rights division, including the voting sector which we've heard so much about. Mr. Rich.

MR. RICH: Thank you, and thank you for asking me to speak. I have been with the Lawyer's Committee for the last six weeks and my testimony today is based on my experience at the Department of Justice and in particular, I was the Chief of the voting section for about five and a half years until the end of this April. But it is also based on my long career in the division. I have had extensive experience enforcing the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Fair Housing Act for many years. The reason why I mentioned this is because it is very clear that the Voting Rights Act has been most successful of all the Civil Rights Acts passed, and indeed, it is my judgment, one of the most important pieces of legislation in this country's history is the success of this Act. It became apparent very quickly in some States showing tremendous increase in African-American voter pre-act, and even shortly after that Act, up to a point today where the African-American percentage of registered votes is equivalent to other groups, particularly Whites. Similarly, the states are showing a tremendous increase of African-American elected officials. This has been a steady increase since the Act passed. There is no doubt in my mind that particularly, especially the provisions up for renewal, played a real crucial role in this progress. The question now, given the success, why do we need to renew it? And to me, there is no question. It needs to be renewed. I will briefly go through the three provisions that are up for renewal to indicate why I think they are so important and remain important, and in particular, I'll start out just by saying in my mind, what Mr. Shaw said, "Stand out the deterrent factor of these provisions." If you look at the states of Section 5, the voting section gets some 4,000 voting changes per year to review. Under Section 5, 4,000 submissions for 20,000 voting pieces are included in that. Probably less than 1 percent of those changes we make objections to. So, again, the question is raised. "Why is Section 5 so important?" Well, it's important, because again, what Teddy said a minute ago. He said, "Those jurisdictions are covered and they have to consider that Section 5 is the consequences of their Act or their voting law that they are considering makes a big difference." I have seen it and anecdotally, of all the years I was in the voting section, whether the stories would come out in consideration of that law or not, the tremendous debate of what the Section 5 consequences of those changes were before committed, and more recently, the voting section. One of the practices we have is, when we have some concerns with a voting right, we, on many occasions, send out letters for additional information which is considered generally by a voting community, to be a signal that we have a concern about that change and Bond gave me some statistics that he's reviewed. These letters and over 500 of these letters lead to the jurisdiction withdrawing the change we had showed concern about, and either connecting it or not submitting it, and again, that to me, is indicative of the deterrent effect that Section 5 has on voting changes. And its continued to be there. The fact that there's only a few objections is, a smoke screen, frankly, for somebody arguing, "You don't need them. " It's just what Teddy said. "If you know you have to submit, if you know you have the burden, it makes a big difference of how the laws get protected. " Secondly, the effect of provisions. Observer provisions only applied to Section 5 jurisdictions or jurisdictions that have been ordered by the Court. And part of the Court order is to authorize federal observers to observe elections, and the voting section over the years has a very careful procedure for making those determinations. We have very well trained observers who are employees of the Personnel Management or observers who go into a jurisdiction you know is going to have a determined effect on discrimination and that decisions are made where we think there is a potential of that type. Discrimination is the discussion of Passaic. It is a good example of how observers affected that day in Passaic. There was a consent decree that permitted the Attorney General to send in observers, despite the fact that the Passaic legislation officials were still in compliance with Section 203. Our observers have come up with a series of information, and based on that information, we brought a Contempt Act, and it lead to concluding inspection methods. These observers are not only a deterrent effect, they can gather information that could lead to enforcement actions. I would say that is rarer than the fact of being there. The importance of being there, that federal government having the presence -- having the current effect of it happening, and the need for that continues. This last election, the Department of Justice sent out more observers than ever before. The Department of Justice, in recent years, have been sending out people that aren't observers, but are sending similar work of observers. We are not authorized to send out observers, but we have sent out employees that are not in violation of the law. And finally, Section 203. I don't think it's any question that it's needed more than ever. To be able to vote is essentially to understand the ballot and understand the process in this country. The increase in the number of citizens that have limited English speaking abilities has increased. It's shown in the number of jurisdictions that are covered as a result of the 2000 election. It was a significant increase and the number is on the tip of my tongue. It's indicative of ingrowth in relation to this population. You have that increase and you don't have that protection for English speaking ability. You're in a spin, bridging their right to vote, and again that amount of effort the department has put into enforcement of this provision in recent years has increased significantly, and I think it's indicative of -- it's important. So, I'll end with that. Just the fact that these -- the importance of these three provisions cannot be overstated, in my mind, over half -- well over half -- go into enforcement. You take away those provisions, the voting section is outreached in protection and will be dissipated.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Rich. Our next panelist is Nadine Cohen. Ms. Cohen is senior staff counsel of Boston Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. Ms. Cohen has also served in counseling including re-districting.

MS. COHEN: Thank you, and thank you for inviting me to participate in this critical hearing and an opportunity to discuss the challenges facing minority voters in Massachusetts. The Boston Lawyer's Committee was actually the first local affiliate of the National Lawyer's

Committee and since the committee's inception in '68, we have been actively involved in protecting the voting rights in Massachusetts. The African-Americans, Latinos and Asian hold less than two percent of the key elected offices. The State's twelve-member congressional delegation is comprised of all White men. All statewide constitutional offices from the government on down are held by Whites. There has not been one non-white official elected to statewide office since Ed Brooke was last elected to the U. S. Senate 30 years or more. The 160-member House Of Representatives has only five African-Americans and three Latinos, and the Latinos have recently elected the fourth in the State. Massachusetts Senate has only one African-American senator and has had only one African-American senator for most of it's recent history. Just very recently, the first Latino was elected to the State Senate. No African-American or Latino member of the state legislature has ever held any of the influential positions. Virtually every mayor in the state is White. Only 40 or so of the state's 351 in the community have elected an official of color in the past 25 years. In 000, officials ranked 26th in the number of Black elected officials, and since 1980, has not improved that rank. People of color have battled over districts for seats for city counsel and school committees that have operated to dilute minority voting strength in a state that was once the center of the movement to abolish slavery. The Senate can improve. Of course, I would be remiss if I didn't also state that it was Massachusetts that invented "gerrymandering" when in 1812, Governor Elbridge Gerry Mander began this, and unfortunately, "GerryMandering" continues to be used in the office as a means to dilute the vote. Section 5 is essential where minority voters have faced many barriers in there efforts to retain their freedom of choice. I want to focus on two specific issues. One is the re-districting of the state House of Representatives in Massachusetts, and the other is the language assistance issues and some other voting problems affecting people of color. For re-districting, the 2000 Census first became a majority-minority city with people of color making up 50. 5 percent of the population. Despite the substantial growth of the minority population, the two -- now one district began. Instead of increasing the number of minority districts for the state, the House Of Representatives eliminated two majority-minority districts and put in White, and several of the incumbent districts and super-packed another district so that it had 98 percent minorities. The district's performance was well in excess of the number justified by the white voting-age population. The Re-districting Act, "gerrymandered" districts and diluted minority strength in violation of Section Two of the Voting Rights Act. And the constituents re-districting actions deprived them of equal voting power and prevented them from re-electing candidates of their choice. The Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights Under Law brought suit in Federal Court, on behalf of several organizations, including the Black Political Task Force and Oiste, and 13 individuals of color. In 2003, we had a trial before a three-judge panel. The three-judge court in 2004 found that the re-districting plan was unlawful and deprived the rights of African-American voters, in that it diluted the minority vote. The Court found that the legislature -- and this is their language -- sacrificed racial fairness to the voters to achieve incumbency protection, and to make matters worse, the House knew what it was doing, despite the fact that this is what the Court found. It increased the number of majority White districts to 12, and diminished the number of black districts to one. The court found that the plan contained extremes and unexplained "packing. " After moving out of two districts, it says the plan leaves African-American citizens in the Boston area less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate and elect representatives of their choice. The court gave the legislature six weeks to come up with a new plan and they specifically told the legislature that they could not "rob Peter to pay Paul. " After the haggling, we finally agreed on a new plan, and

I'm very happy to say that as a result of the districting laws, the speaker, as the House of Representatives, which was once the most powerful politician in the state, reassigned an American-Asian person, and he has recently been indicted by the D. A. for lying in the re-districting, saying that he had never seen that plan prior to his disclosure. In an unusual footnote, the evidence strongly suggested otherwise. This case will explain the minority voters in Massachusetts as well as throughout that country. We still don't have a level playing field and we still need a Voting Rights Act to protect them. That case also shows a warning that they will not be able to get away with depriving people of color of their right to vote. As a matter of fact, this very moment, the former speaker is being arraigned in the U. S. district court for perjury. I know my time is limited.

MR. LEE: You stayed between us and lunch.

MS. COHEN: And the one thing that I'm more passionate about in the Voting Rights Act besides eating too, is that the unfortunate voting disenfranchisement that is also alive and well in Massachusetts as it is in other parts of the country. Minorities will hold a public hearing. We listed all the problems, including polling places, that were inaccessible. People were told they couldn't vote because they were not on the voting list. We tried to work on all of these things in the 2004 election. We participated in the election protection project, we covered 11 stipulations and testimonies en masse and we just released a report of the voting problems similar to other places and I should say, the 11 cities were places that were fundamentally communities of color that were disproportionately limited, affected the minority voter translation problems. Twenty-eight hundred voters were told they were not on that list of registered voters. This can mean that a county can have between 100,000 and 200,000 people prohibited from voting. Provisional ballots were not given. Poll worker issues. Misapplication of I. D. requirements were real problems in a number of communities of color. Poorly trained pollers, and language issues were probably the most critical voting problem. We worked with AALDEF in Massachusetts and they had observers and people monitoring at a number of locations. We found that interpreters were not provided from communities where they were needed. The Boston officials only provided interpreters if they were requested ahead of time. Translation persons were not available, and we have instances where inappropriate language assistance in Chinatown. People were told by some of the poll workers who to vote for, and that has been a problem. A growing number of Latinos, Asian, Haitian are not only re-authorized, but fully in force. Voters who need language assistance are able to vote and have their votes counted. I thank you for this opportunity to be able to be heard, and I will give you my written testimony.

MR. LEE: Thank you very much, Ms. Cohen. The next panelist is Randolph McLaughlin. Mr. McLaughlin is the Professor at the School Of Law, Civil Rights and Labor Law.

MR. McLAUGHLIN: Thank you very much for your kind remarks. Thank you to the Commission for inviting me here. I'd like to talk about two things. One is Section Two of the act and some general comments about the Voting Rights Act, and where we are, and what we need to do. I think we are -- right or wrong -- over 30 years ago, 40 years ago when Civil Rights workers were in Mississippi trying to get Blacks registered, they were brutally murdered, not one of those allegedly accused were executed. One day after the United States Senate recognized that it had been wrong, lynching statutes came into effect. So we are in a historical time, and I think we also have to be cognizant of the climate in which we function. This is not 1982, when the Civil Rights problem has won the Voting Rights Act and turned it aside. I will suggest to you that we are in such a climate now, that the Supreme Court of 1982 has done a fairly good job of cutting back the Voting Rights Act, and I suggest -- as we go in 1982 -- I suggest to you -- in 2005, we need a Voting Rights Restoration Act to correct the many wrongs that have been on our national report. To Section Two, it is clear why we need Section Two for provisions and protection. As a Civil Rights Officer, I teach going back to the Civil Rights Act, case after case. You have heard testimony here throughout the entire day through all the counties, one case after another, where jurisdictions are not covered in Section 5. Numerous cases and litigations. I just want to mention too, you will hear from New York that one is entitled to the "Court of Hempstead." Let me state the second interpretation of Section Two of the Act. I was one of the counsel, and the other case is fairly recent -- vintage 2003. New Rochelle. Davis versus New Rochelle, and Davis was the late Ossie Davis. First the Hempstead case. That Hempstead case was filed in 1981 with a challenge to "at large" election system used in the historical town of Hempstead, which is the largest town in the country, largest in the cities. It took us ten years, ten years to bring that case to trial, to successfully litigate it to trial successfully. Ten years later, in the town of Hempstead, after having created an African-American district when they were redistricting, we had to again threaten that town with further litigation and they had to come to their senses that it was not a good thing to try and butcher that district. We weren't as successful in New Rochelle. In 1980, we were successful in filing this case. Davis had previously been an "at large" location for the citizen counsel. The first opportunity the citizen counsel had in New Rochelle to redistrict itself. It decided, over the objection of the NAACP, the African-American community might open testimony. It decided to gut the only black district in the city. New Rochelle was literally polling off sections in the Black communities and placing them in White communities and importing them into a heavily Republican town, reducing them to a majority Black district. To the minority district, we were forced to sue New Rochelle. We were successful under Judge Bryan and the Judge ordered the city of New Rochelle to restore the Black district to a majority status. Now those two cases are relevant for that following reasons. The city of New Rochelle particularly would not have a Black district, and why is that? Because there are too few Voting Rights Organizations, Civil Rights Organizations, and there is too much work out there in the field. You can't be everywhere, and the difference between Section 2 and Section 5 is quite clear. With Section 5, the burden is placing all districts from Section 2. That burden is placed on the community that can least afford to protect itself or retain counsel to protect it. Now you might say, "Well, you might not sell. But certainly you can argue there are attorney's fees -- if you went, with respect to any litigation expert witness -- fees that can run anywhere from $15,000 to $20,000. Those aren't covered, nor is that an oversight. So any suggestion is to clearly reenact Section 2 and Section 5. It's no "quick fix" because of the efficiency and effectiveness of the voting section. Whether it's the Reagan Section, Bush Section, or Clinton Section, each of that voting has been consistent with the protection for the rights of minorities to vote. My suggestion is that I do believe that we need to "push the envelope" and consider expanding the scope of Section 5 protection to include, not just the districts that are presently under the Act, but to include perhaps districts where Civil Rights plaintiffs have successfully gained Section 2 cases over a period of years -- make it five years, ten years. Because if you do that, if you study these jurisdictions where successful plaintiffs have moved against these counties, districts, and states, you will find that those districts where Section 2 combines with Section 5 don't know Section 2 districts are just as likely to violate the Act as covered districts are. But because of Section 5, the district, many of those protected are being visited. Only African-Americans, Latinos, and Asian communities are not being protected. Since 1982, there has been a number of decisions at the Supreme Court Level. I just want to read two lines of a case. One at Thornby General, which starts to read back into the Act, the "intent" requirement. We had to prove the intent of the voters, that there are many resistant voters, which is almost an impossible burden, and there is a split on that score, but we need to write the intent out of the Voting Rights Act. It has no role in the statute. Second, since the Voting Rights Act in 1982 was reenacted, the Supreme Court has created a whole line of cases called the "Shaw V. Reno" cases that we saw in the affirmative action case. It's retrogression, it's quiet community saying, "We are being disadvantaged, it's reverse discrimination. " And I think that the Court has articulated some standards. What to do when there is a conflict between the 14th Amendment and the 15th Amendment, the standard is not clear. I think if there is a reenactment of this statute, we need to make it very clear what the standard is. Whether or not that voting rights in the 15th Amendment and 14th Amendment rights goes to that next round of redistricting. What are the standards? Otherwise, we would be faced with numerous cases along these lines yet again. Finally -- and I've mentioned this already -- in reenacting statutes, we must put back into the statute, payment of expert fees. The burden of minority payments is an exorbitant amount, and as I said earlier, the conflict is there. For example, one case I know that is an academic case -- I am academic, but I am also a litigator -- how many plaintiffs are unable to get professional help in their counties without that aid? How many are unable to fight back on their right to be violated? Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. McLaughlin. Our final panelist is Walter Fields. Mr. Fields was a consultant to the Democratic and Republican Label campaign. He is the Director of Political Development, Community Service Society of New York. Welcome Mr. Fields. Thank you for coming to New York City. It's nice to have you here in the north in New York City examining these issues.

MR. FIELDS: I recently returned to the Community Service Society, better known as CSS. After being consultant to both the Democratic and Republican parties, redistricting in the last two rounds and an expert witness in the last case known as Page and Martel, as well as insights into what has transpired from New Jersey CSS, one of the oldest cities, dealing with the needs of low-income residents. It has been in the forefront of the evidence, from the founding of the Columbia of University's social lunch program, to building the first model and those recently affected by the 2000 September 11 terrorist act, and -- I'm fanatic -- and I'd like to site a few examples in 1989. We successfully used the Voting Act to stop the discriminatory purge of over 320,000 voters, United Parents Association Versus New York City Board of Elections. Subject to the State's non-voting purge, CSS proved that the law's application had an unlawful discriminatory affect as Blacks and Latinos were 32 percent more likely to be purged for non-voting. The Federal National Voter Registration Act of 1993, a facility agency based registration, particularly in agencies serving poor communities. In 1995, CSS sued in State Court to fully implement voter registration in mayoral agencies and whether franchise law CSS fully supports that reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act mandating pre-clearance changes, covered jurisdiction, and Section 203, mandating consideration of language and minorities. New York City by any definition, one of the nation's most complex cities to administer elections, continues to warrant the oversight of the Voting Rights Act political advantage, providing access to the ballot by preventing the manipulation of the balloting procedures, and to make it effective and complete. You may know that New York State election law is notorious for the effect it has on candidate access to the ballot and the resulting diminishment of the public's choice for elective office. What appears to be minor considerations in the electoral process, such as the age of voting machines, can, and in application, be used to disenfranchise large pockets of voters, primarily the already under-represented who most often are racial and ethnic minorities. As the city continues to serve as one of the nation's largest portals for new immigrants, it is imperative that protections in the election system are maintained for non-English speaking citizens. The large numbers of immigrants that are entering New York City, new to our nation's democratic practices, are most susceptible to having their voting rights diminished by discriminatory practices and devices, including the consideration of language differences in the context of elections, staffing of coworkers, and displacement of election information on both machines. Language should not be a barrier to the electoral voting participation. That causes great concern over manipulation of the Act, particularly Section 2, mainly in the drawing of state legislative districts. Both the major political parties have each found reason to cast their fate in a self-serving manner in the name of political voters. In solidarity, the answer of disenfranchisement under 2001 elections in the District of New Jersey is of the Voting Rights Act. Minority succeeded the White district and I will say that I am a registered democrat. In 2001, I crossed the party lines to be in the republican party because of my outrage of what was happening in the state, and all this was on that premise that some Black elected officials were from minority districts and their outright control by powerful party bosses. In this case the numbers lied, because we did not accurately represent the dearth of the Black state. And, to add insult to injury, they were required to sign identical affidavits attesting to the plan's positive impact on minority representation without ever first seeing the plan. My action was shared with Black legislatures, but I had it as a consultant for one of the parties. They never signed the plan, but that plan empowered the party's leadership, insisting that there be an expanse to the Democratic floor. Their plan would empower Black voters indirectly by reclaiming that it be in line to control committee assignment. It was a spurious claim then and remains so today. For years, the number of Black voters in New Jersey has not increased, and their presence has had little impact, judging by their inability to claim any of the primary leadership posts. If you look at Hudson county in New Jersey, the fact of the matter is, it had a black legislature. It no longer has a black legislation. They also denied the line to identify black incumbents, replaced the black incumbents and then tried to remove the incumbent when they tried to run for the presidency. So, I think we have to be very careful with how the Act has become a partisan tool. This is not to say the Act is not necessary. I am just giving some warning after hearing the Massachusetts case, after learning and experiencing the New Jersey case, after coming back to New York City, and still having the issues in this city. It is clear to me that the Voting Rights Act continues to be necessary, particularly Section 5, and I was so moved that perhaps that entire city has been under Section 2, so I appreciate my invitation to share my thoughts with you. This requires extra measures guaranteed in our race, ethnicity or native roots. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Fields. Questions?

MR. RAPOPORT: Question to Nadine. One of the most heartening developments in the last recent years has been the efforts of Boston, Massachusetts to have a substantial increase in the number of voters in the communities of color. The stats have been the voting registration in Boston are not to say, phenomenal, so they question whether you can link that to Voting Rights Act in which there's instances which the Voting Rights Act were attempted to be final, immediate, or attempted to be commuted in any way?

MS. COHEN: Well as a "non Section 5 community," certainly under-redistricting would have helped us. I think if we had that, provisions of Section 5, in terms of increasing the numbers of people of color who are voting, I really think that that has been a community effort, and we've gotten some support from the election departments, but not enough. And I think that it really has been the force of groups like Black votes and other Latinos. Asian groups have really gone out and really registered people and have seen the effectiveness of voting. I think the re-districting -- in the case of the people of Boston -- that you can use the law to challenge procedures to dilute the minority vote, and the fact that we had some success in getting some elected officials of color really increases the people's feasibility, but if we didn't have the Voting Rights Act, we would be much worse off. And I just want to say that I agree with this re-authorization or a restoration of the Voting Rights Act and in expanding it. It may be an unreal figure, but it really makes sense, because we see these Northeastern cities, New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, and we need that protection of the Act.

MR. LEE: Mr. Davidson, I'm asking you to try to get a perspective on the other side, because I see the need for re-authorization. I'm trying to understand arguments that work in the office, in particular, Mr. Rich, given your experience -- trying to balance out the interest in anything, whether there are violations or not, solutions. What is the essence of the argument that says no on re-authorization of Section 5 in an argument with respect to Section 2. What is the essence?

MR. RICH: I'm only looking at the re-authorization of Section 5. Section 2 is in the law. I'm just looking at Section 5, and the argument, to my eyes, has been that Section 5, when it was passed, was rather a far-reaching type of statute, putting a burden on the local or state jurisdiction. It proved to the justice department, the burden on them to show that their voting claim was not discriminatory. That's a fairly significant burden placed on this issue, and I think that the arguments over the years has been particularly -- as I said earlier, it is after the law was passed, many of the issues that lead to the law, disappeared. Voter registration went up, Black-elected officials increased tremendously. Why do we still need it or why should we just limit it to one part of the country? I think these are the arguments that have to be dealt with. I understand these arguments, but my feelings are, yes, there was a tremendousamount of discrimination in the districts that lead to this act, and one of the problems in a voting change is that the justice department would put in tremendous resources and get an injunction against that particular law. A new law was passed right after that concerning that discrimination. Section 5 testified that it's a burden. You can't just pass a law to continue discrimination. That type of blatant discrimination frankly, has gone away, in my eyes, but that amount of discrimination is still out there, but much more subtle. You're getting it from all our hearings on this, that's why the Voting Rights Act is still needed. It may be that you may want to consider certain changes to Section 5 because you're seeing discrimination throughout New England, all parts of the country that aren't covered by Section 5. Now, do you do that as justified under constitutional law? That is something that has to be considered. The Speaker has to look very carefully. The Voting Rights Act has traditionally been looked at as a justifiable act, and because we're at the point where we're at now, its going to have significant effect.

MR. DAVIDSON: As opposed to the Supreme Court.

MR. LEE: That is a race-conscious remedy, in an effort to resolve problems and equality, with its highest standard as we all know. And so on a factual basis, it's more than what's so critical. I think its remarkable to point out that statistical information, as it relates to the number of claims and how that plays out, as it relates to the factual basis for reorganization. And I hear you clearly in terms of the turn around. In other words, what their needs in effect, have clearly seen. What that opposition sees. In fact, saying no to the re-authorization.

MR. RICH: There has been no less discrimination. We don't need it any more. Section 2 will take care of these problems. But to me, there is less blatant discrimination and people are in need of more wider discrimination. In 1965 the focus was on the deep south because of what was going on there and it was blatant. It was terrible. There is still a tremendous need all over the country, because without that Section 5 protection, some of that discrimination will reappear. That's the effect of Section 5. Those jurisdictions are saying we might want to do this, but the justice department might be a problem if you're under Section 5. Well, we'll take our chances. I don't think anybody would sue us under Section 2 and Section 5. That kind of prophylactic effect is really crucial to that type of vote.

MR. LEE: Referring to the earlier testimony of racial bloc polling, what or how widespread is racial bloc polling? I'd like to ask the same question to Joe Rich.

MR. RICH: I don't have a real full answer on that. I know that in the case of Georgia it was assumed there was racial bloc polling. In South Carolina, it was assumed there. Usually there has not been an argument in States, particularly Section 5 States, that racial bloc polling continues. We do have a lot of arguments about racial bloc polling in other jurisdictions. I think when you see it come up, I think in New Jersey, if the argument that New Jersey was the racial bloc polling, how serious was the racial bloc polling without the racial bloc polling? It was not a Section 2 violation, and I think that's what the Court reached as such. So it depends on where you are. It's a big comparison between that New Jersey case and the Georgia case and any point of view. There is no question there was racial bloc polling. Different kinds of cases, but they had racial bloc polling.

MR. McLAUGHLIN: I think it's a very complex question. That question in the Section 2 case, I think is, what type of legislation are you looking at? Are you looking at the Department of Justice legislation or the Department of Justice elections? If the voters had a choice in the Department of Justice legislation, look at the Department of Justice elections. That is a very, very complex question with a lot of layers to it, but I will suggest to you, depending on that method, the analysis you can find is in racial bloc polling. Now what is racial bloc polling? If weget back to the issue of intent, I would have to show that a voter voted against that candidate because of their race. Do I have to show that a voter voted for a candidate because of his race? Then that intention creeps into it. You've got to get a multi-varied question analysis which is so expensive to prove. Again, I think that's purely an aggressive analysis. If you had a White voter on one access and the racial voter on the other access, the race of the candidate, and you want to determine whether there is some correlation between those two, the more Blacks that are voting for a Black candidate or for a White candidate, when given a choice, which one should you look at?

MR. LEE: Mr. Fields?

MR. FIELDS: I think that's one of the difficulties that we face. The question that I raised in Court was this issue of motivation. Was it whether or not it's the choice of the voter? In a state like New Jersey, where you still have a very strong party of machinery, my argument was that those choices were not made by voters, even though you see cross racial bloc polling voting to make that argument that voters truly have been disenfranchised. One of the other issues in New Jersey is they're using a very short time span to prove that voters were voting across race. It was a fairly new phenomenon in New Jersey. We had these suburban districts where you had Blacks that were elected from non-Black districts due to the politics of the State. There were those of us who were very concerned that the Court sided with that democratic society to make that analysis.

MR. LEE: Ms. Cohen, do you have anything to say along these thoughts?

MS. COHEN: Well, I just want to state the obvious. In Boston, we were able to show Black voting and I think, particularly, when you start having large Latino and Asian and ethnic growth populations, it becomes more and more difficult to do that. Just a note, I have a case -- the Springfield case, and again, we think we're going to be able to prove Black-White voting, so I think it's still out there all over.

MR. DAVIDSON: I have a question for Mr. Rich, which follows up Mr. Rogers' question and it tends to start where our arguments begin -- re-authorization of Section 5. Some people argue that it's no longer necessary, but one of the leading cases in Georgia V. Ashcroft is now presenting a criteria for deciding racial polarized voting. I'm wondering what your view is on -- I mean vote dilution -- not racially.

MR. RICH: I'm still trying to understand after a couple of years, but clearly, it complicates Section 5, and how you're going to apply it, taking into effect a lot of the factors that weren't considered before. I don't think that's a good argument for that section, but if you're concerned with Georgia V. Ashcroft, legislatures should try to define what they think the standard should be. It was developed by the courts and cases in '76 of what I thought was a pretty standard retrogression, and all of a sudden, we got this new standard and how that was to develop under this pre-authorization would be an interesting thing. I think it raises a lot of issues. It's harder to administer, but having done it for the last two years, it can be done. It's harder, I think, in the end. It can give States a lot more leeway as to what they can do, but still, there is still a need for Section 5 under Georgia V. Ashcroft, and I'd say particularly at the local level. The local level in terms of what they do in the State district, and that's where the greatest need for Section 5 is. These are limited communities, smaller communities that don't have the protection of the Black Caucus, and I don't think, in my judging Georgia V. Ashcroft on those communities. And I think putting emphasis on how Black legislatures vote in the compass of Section 5, I think may employ certain local Black legislatures, because if they come forward and say, as a group, it may be one or two of them, "We don't like the plan," that is a factor of what it takes toward finding retrogression. It could be Black legislatures. It's a fine plan without understanding it or because it makes it easier for business. It's a short answer,but I don't think that it's a good reason for not renewing. If you think clearly, it makes the Section 5 analysis more difficult, not so much more level. Kimberlee?

COMMISSIONER CRENSHAW: Thank you. I do have a few questions. First of all, I want to thank you all for real provocative answers. My first question is for Mr. Rich. We have been largely talking about Section 5 and language provisions, but I appreciate your bringing to our attention the federal examiner and observer provisions. I have a couple questions. First of all, following up on anticipating arguments against refuel. It would be useful to have some understanding to what kind of factors, what kind of complaints you have received that prompted the deployment of observers? We tend to have an understanding that happened a long time ago, but I'm somewhat interested in hearing just what kind of conditions that prompted this, and together, you mentioned that in non-covered jurisdictions, the employees of the Department of Justice are anticipating that. An impossible response -- you already have this ability to do so, so what would be the requirement of using the examiner status if you can, in fact, use employees of the Department of Justice? What is it that they cannot do or to apply the question, how does the effect of Section 5 affect the examiners?

MR. RICH: I think the first question is, many of the situations that we find that we think federal observers are needed are certainly not as prestigious as we found 30 years ago. What we find is a situation where there is a race on both sides. Whether a local city counsel is going for the majority Black, anyone White will turn that around, and it gets asked and we get information. Interestingly enough, we get questions from local jurisdictions that they would like us there just to have a calming effect. There is a federal expense to make sure people have assuredness in the place. In other situations, we -- and this is less in the federal observers -- if we have information of a possible violation, it might be some sort of intimidation not directly related to the election. This gives us a chance to have a coupling effect, but also to gather information that may lead us to use it. And that second question is a good one. The number of departments of employees has increased dramatically, but there is a limit. In fact, in November, we were recruiting not just the voting section, we were recruiting throughout the Civil Rights division, so we had more people out there than we did before, but I don't think you can expect that to happen. OPM are specially trained, better trained than the Department of Justice lawyers have ever been. But another factor too, is that if the jurisdiction says we're not going to let you in our State, law doesn't let anybody in. Outside in the polling places, we're right in the polling places observing what's going on in the polling places, and they can keep us out, and this happened to us in the case of Reddick who did not have observer coverage. They had serious 4E problems in Reddick. We sent several people up in several elections that didn't go in. It happens that they had to get in the polling places. Our employees had some effect, certainly, on the federal observers.

COMMISSIONER CRENSHAW: Thank you.

MR. LEE: Also, I want to point out how many lawyers, including Joe Rich -- it's about 45, so we're talking about how many?

MR. RICH: We have been sending out attorneys too, but also using paralegals and other professionals.

MR. LEE: Well, excluding secretaries, it was 100.

MR. RICH: It's not a big coverage.

COMMISSIONER CRENSHAW: My second question is a follow up to the quite interesting notion presented by Professor McLaughlin. Thinking of this potential as a restoration, an even expansion, I want to ask both you and Mr. Fields if you could give us a little bit more guidance in this regard. You will recall from 1982, some part of that debate was how to correct and some of that correction was in the debate. If you would respond to attempts to suggest ways of to correct that. I was wondering if you had more "flesh that you could put on the bones?" For example, you mentioned, Professor McLaughlin, about the possibility of making jurisdictions who have lost Section 2 cases, a covered jurisdiction under Section 5, which I think, is provocative. We've heard earlier from Senator David Paterson about the action of "packing" in one instance, and "cracking" in another, and the difficulty in finding some kind of direction other than that consistency. Also, Mr. Fields, you mentioned abuse of Section 5, and I am just wondering if you have any general ideas about that kind of declaration of statements like in 1982? How do we best interpret these Sections?

MR. McLAUGHLIN: I think the clearest thing one can do is -- to make it crystal clear -- is that the intent of a vote in the racial bloc voting analysis that creeps in is irrelevant to a Section 2. That other thing we've seen in the "Goosebine" case, for instance, is when we won that liability case and the Court ordered the district to create a jurisdiction. They can't create jurisdictions without violating, so I think it has to be clearly stated in the act. The Supreme Court has said, to my knowledge, you can use race, not as a factor, but the predominant factor. But I think the statement is we have to have clear standards in authorizing.

MR. SHAW: So that when -- and it's really a Section 2, I remember what the jurisdiction is in Section 5. Whether creating circumstances like Shaw V Reno is leaning over their head. So it has to be clear in Section 5 as to what the instances are, what race can play in the re-districting effort and what Shaw V Reno can play, and that's the conflict. Even if they pack the pre-clearance provision, they'll be sued by the White voter.

MR. FIELDS: My agreement also. Which is Section 5 jurisdiction, Section 2 jurisdiction. When you look at what transpired in 2001, one of the real difficulties was that none of the rights of the voter -- whether you look at the case of New Jersey -- was truly given by a party boss. None of those officials served. In my estimation, you can't run from New Jersey without that beating of a party boss. There is no such thing as challenging the party line and winning, it does not happen. So this notion of using a racial bloc analysis becomes difficult in a place like New Jersey, because even when a jurisdiction is created that you have say -- White voters voting for a Black candidate. The question then becomes whether that person truly represents his or her --

MS. COHEN: Community. But his or her community did not elect that community, because one, the party machinery did their testimony in New Jersey. That, I think, could be considered for Section 5. A place like Hempstead county, a place like Hudson county, a place like Essex county. But unfortunately, we have a picture based on the current district. The Voting Rights Act is to prevent Black voting rights from being diluted. When you have Black voters elected from majority White districts, it's a tough case to make, and unless we have some across the board, we'll never see the Black number. In fact, the Blacks and Latinos in New Jersey are not empowered by any stretch of the imagination, and I think at the end of the day, that has to be the final say of the test of any Voting Rights Act.

MR. LEE: Last but not least. Mr. Cartagena.

COMMISSIONER CARTAGENA: Well, I'll ask this -- by the way, I really appreciate it what you said about the indictment Ms. Cohen, because he lied about what he claimed to see or not see, in Court. It is amazing that the officials are not even seeing the plan in favor of the voting. We hear that a lot in Albany, and I think "you hit the nail on the head" with respect to Jamison, which does say that the intent of the voting provision, the voting analysis is irrelevant from a basis. Mr. Joe Rich, here is my question. To the extent that you have been using employees in some jurisdictions but not observers with respect to the observer process of the Voting Rights Act, did you have any recommendations for improving it, or is it just more money?

MR. RICH: I think that observers have always been put in Section 5 coverage jurisdictions. I think the need for observing and monitoring is not so much in the last five years. There should be consideration given about anything the Justice Department can do, which is a very effective tool for keeping common places. It makes a difference. I'm not sure what kind of opposition. Maybe that the idea is logically you win or constitutionally you have your reason, but the fact is what I said earlier. Is it that so many people of the jurisdiction, elected officials not minorities, are afraid of a possible intimidation of voting rights violations? So many of the officials welcome business. I think its confidence in the public in selection that have that presence. I think that's a very strong argument for broadening and that's really, I think, it explains what we're doing. We've broadened it by sending out Department of Justice people. I think it would be much better to have neutral observers trained by a trainer to have them sent out. I don't have any particular formula. It should be nationwide or something less, but my feeling is, it's a greater need for it now than when I first started.

MR. LEE: Well perhaps you can take account of the history of Section 2.
MR. RICH: Yes.
COMMISSIONER CARTAGENA: Much less under terms of constitutional, because we're talking about someone paid by federal.
MR. RICH: And right now, the recent monitor out, I consider that part of the investigation. We're sending them out because there may be a violation of the law. Are we building a case, because that's a given. The Department of Justice has the ability to work on investigation violations of the law. The difference -- the only thing I think is, that observers have the right to get into the polls and that's important, but I must say, that generally speaking, there have been very few jurisdictions. We go through them and we say, "You know, we're coming down to monitor elections if you let us. " And we very well knew of them because of state law, even federal law enforcement. So you know what I'm saying now, may be that we do have that ability, but I would much prefer to see it formalized in legislation to a Federal plan. Federal observer provision.
MR. LEE: Well, thank you very much. The panel has obviously been very helpful. Mr. Fields, Ms. Cohen, Mr. Rich.
MR. LEE: Our next panelist is Marcos Devers. Marcos Devers is an "at large" member of the City Counsel in Lawrence, Massachusetts, Latinos First, In The Wake Of Voting Rights In A Lawsuit By The Court And Jury.
MR. DEVERS: I thank you, the Civil Rights Commission Voting Rights Act, for inviting me here. As you said, my name is Marcos Devers. I'm City Counsel of the City of Lawrence. That is called the City of Immigrants. The city has a beautiful and strong history of immigrants, the spirit of Lawrence. Six point five area miles and 73,000 people. In the past, the community has been, in the last four decades, however the Hispanics in the City of Lawrence is 60 percent of the population. I'm also a civil engineer, math and science instructor in the school of Lawrence. I have run successfully in the years 1991, 1993, 1995, and 1999. It was in 1999 that I finally made "City Counsel At Large. " It was more difficult to make City Counsel At Large at that time. There was already a Latino in the district counsel in the county. The six wards that we have, A, B, C, D, E, and just one Latino made it and it was in 1993, but "at large. " I was the first getting there in that position. In the year 2001, I became the first Latino Mayor and the first Dominican Mayor of any U. S. city and that was when the city counsel appointed me. I was re-elected as city counsel in the year 2001, and I got the majority of votes in the history of Lawrence, over 8,000 votes. I served as counsel president just after being mayor. Now, in getting to the lawsuit in the City of Lawrence. In 1978, the Department Of Justice applied to the lawsuit, which lead to numerous violations of the Voting Rights Act. Section 203 and Section 2, regarding lack of Spanish language assistance of the Voting Act. At this time only one of the City Counsel members was on that team, yet, this action alleged that the city's methods of electing it's city counsel school board violated Section 2 of the Voters Rights Act, an illegal opportunity to participate in the process of electing a candidate of their choice. The Department of Justice also alleged that violation of Section 2 and Section 203, the National Information Spanish Language Assistance and refusal to appoint Spanish speaking monitors. They were able to resolve several of their claims. The city subsequently was to change the method of electing the school committee from a large member to single member distance and a plan for the city counsel board, 2000. Until 2001, it was alleged that the proposed 2000 census resulted in Section Two violations. That counsel agreed to 2002 of both bodies to provide an additional Latino. The counsel also agreed or required the city to hire a person who is bilingual and Spanish to it's staff, in connection with it's office. My testimony. I would like to refer to the fact that on many occasions, the complaints that those violations happened from all sides, and although I didn't observe particular situations, specific situations, it is in every election event. We had to handle situations that were in violation, and complaints of people that couldn't vote, and even on some occasions, the complaints were about possible fraud or were demonstrated and implemented by those in power. And some of my constituents thought that in 1977 we run the race in just the kind of environment we had. I couldn't make it, but in 1999 after providing important services, I could make it. Obviously the voter turned out as being more participation. After that and since, although we have a lot of progress after the Department of Justice intervention, I still feel that we need this kind of assistance, Minority Language Assistance. We have more bilingual Hispanic co-workers. Eventually we're going to need Asian. The Asians are moving to Lawrence. There are right now 2000 and there are voters going to the polls and need to exercise that right. That's it. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Devers. Questions?

MR. CARTAGENA: Well Mr. Devers, congratulations on your accomplishments there, and being part of a, I'm sure, it's a very energizing accomplishment, being elected as the first Dominican in office. That is an accomplishment. Can you tell us a little bit more about language assistance in Lawrence today? In your opinion, the last population that still needs testimony in those kinds of circumstances.

MR. DEVERS: Yes. The more immigrants, mostly Dominicans and also from Central America. They also don't know the language, this population, the Dominicans. Still, folks who know the language cannot exist in this environment. As you know sometimes I don't see the possibility. You have kids in San Francisco, the poll workers should be bilingual, English, Spanish, and eventually some of the Asian language.

MR. CARTAGENA: Thank you.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Congratulations. I am curious. In your experience you experienced office in the way of immigrant people, Hispanics and peoples from all walks of life.

MR. DEVERS: All different kinds. The city had to know I was running for the district. It would have been easier, but I tried "at large," and I was able to accomplish it.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: What was the terms of percentage in non-immigrating percentage?

MR. DEVERS: Demographics have changed drastically since 1999. There were voters with Italian last names and similar, so it was less than 10 percent and 90 percent of the registered voters were all Latino. Now we are 50/50, and also, in terms of the total registration, we are 70 percent Latino and 30 non-Latino. Make that 60 percent Latino and non-Latinos, White, over 35 percent.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: What's the actual registration?

MR. DEVERS: Close to 10,000 voters.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: But thepercentage of the population you're seeing is roughly are voters of the community?

MR. DEVERS: Close to 50 percent is Latino registered voters. Now, in terms of population, Latinos are 60 percent population.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: You were successful in obtaining -- what was your percentage -- I'm just curious -- under terms of your non-Latino percentage?

MR. DEVERS: Non-Latino?

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Non-Latino.

MR. DEVERS: Oh, at least two elections. The ratio between 60 and 40. Sixty percent Latino and 40 percent non-Latino.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: So of the White voters -- you carried White voters?

MR. DEVERS: Yes, roughly.

MR. LEE: Mr. Devers, do you have any opinion on our having a need for observer coverage? We talked about it earlier. I was wondering if you were -- if you have had any experience in the City of Lawrence?

MR. DEVERS: Could you rephrase that?

MR. LEE: Federal observers in Lawrence.

MR. DEVERS: Yes. We have in the last three legislations. The Secretary of State had sent observers and monitors. Did I understand your question?

MR. LEE: Well, I was trying to figure out if you thought that that coverage was useful for electoral?

MR. DEVERS: Definitely.

MR. LEE: Can you expand a little on that?

MR. DEVERS: Sorry. Your question is?

MR. LEE: What benefits were there to having the observers?

MR. DEVERS: In Lawrence, they have been attainable. A few families have been willing to see a group in power and it has been using the Latino statistics to get the funds from the state, from the federal government. Then they are in the position, and some of them even are willing to receive by remote control. They just use the minority statistics to get those funds and other grants provided by the federal Government and State. They are for producing more organizations like that and the Voting Rights Act and any other legal instrument. The Federal-State government act, definitely, has been a lot of benefit to everyone. That's why we're trying to guarantee this system of democracy.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Devers. I know you have to catch a plane.

MR. DEVERS: It's a pleasure. Thanks again.

MR. LEE: Our next panelist is Margaret Fung. Margaret Fung is Executive Director for the Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund. In 1974 she founded the Native American particularly active voting rights activity in New York City and elsewhere, I understand.

MS. FUNG: Thank you, very much. Good afternoon. We are a one-year-old organization and we do litigation at the community level, Education, Immigrant Rights, Economic Justice for Workers, police misconduct, language access to services, youth rights and educational equity, and voting rights and civic participation for the last decade. And several more years all of this monitored legislations on a regular basis for compliance with Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act. In 2004, our monitoring efforts were focused in Rhode Island, Michigan, and Illinois. In the past we've campaigned to secure fully translated language in Chinese under Section 5 of the justice department, in rejecting a plan for diluting minority strength, as well as the minority screen that would discriminate against Asian Americans. In a challenge to New York's 12th Congressional District, we determined that Asian Americans in Manhattan and Brooklyn constituted a community of interest. Conducting the largest multilingual exit polls of Asian American voters on the East Coast, polling over 5,000 Asian New Yorkers in the 2000 elections, and almost 11,000 Asian American voters in 8 states in the 2004 elections, including a weekly events in which we registered newly-naturalized citizens in federal court. I want to talk today about the significance of 203, the Voting Rights Act, to promote Asian Americans' participation here in New York City to support 203. In order to support it 13 years ago, I testified before the House of Judiciary SubCommittee on Civil and Constitutional rights in support of the Voting Rights Act, Assistance Language Act of 1992, and only covered jurisdictions of at least 5 percent of the members of a single-language minority. We argued for a new alternative benchmark of ten new language minority citizens, because large concentrations of Asian Americans in New York would not otherwise have been covered under the existing cover. Of the New York City legislature or the New York City counsel, no Asian had been elected. Four out of five voters in Manhattan's Chinatown, Flushing, and Queens did not speak or read much English, so when the amendments were passed in 1992, 200,000 Asian Americans were covered under Section 3 MR. LEE: The amendments to pass coverage under Section 203 -- 200,000 Asian Americans worldwide? MS. FUNG: Looking at the Census -- 200,000. That's tremendous. There are now 16 counties in seven states that are now required to provide assistance in one or more languages. Asian Americans' language population remains one of the most fastest growing communities of color. That rose to 7. 1 billion. In 2004, 6. 7 million Asian American voter turnout has also increased very steadily to nearly 3,000,000 in 2004. So for us, Section 203 really is a success story because thousands of Asian Americans are registering to vote for the first time. We did an exit poll, asking questions of almost 11,000 Asian Americans in eight states and found that almost a third of them needed some form of language assistance. Around 46 percent were actually first time voters, and every year that we do the poll for the first time, so the most fundamental level translated ballots in voting machines have enabled Asian American voters to exercise their rights to vote independently and privately. In several places, the availability of interpreters can provide additional oral language assistance for Asian American voters who are not fully proficient in the English language. Section 203 has aided the voter registration efforts to increase when only a handful of voters such as the Chinatown Voter Education Alliance and the Coalition of Korean American Voters in New York City did voter registration. There are now scores of Asian American groups on the East Coast that are doing voter registration for Filipino, Asian Indian, Pakistani, Bangladeshi, Cambodian, Laotian, and Vietnamese communities. Many more Asian Americans return for office and they can effectively reach out to their constituents in voting districts. In 2001, for example, John Liu was the first Asian American elected as City Council member in New York City and Jimmy Meng became the first Asian American member of the New York State Assembly in 2004. Notwithstanding the success of 203, there continues to be a deficiency in the program. The translations in the 2000 Presidential elections of "Democrat" and "Republican" were converted in several polls in Queens. Absentee ballots contained mistakes in the Chinese language. Asian Americans were given instructions in Chinese to "vote for three," other instructions to "vote for five. " The word "yes" was translated as "Si" on the Chinese ballot. John Kerry complained that voters were not able to recognize his name based on the Chinese translation, based on what the Chinese were given, the interpreters which created long lines in the polling process. Two hundred and three sights were targeted and 66 sites were targeted with a combined 979 interpreters, and the board did not come close to meeting that required number. This, unfortunately, still exists among Asian Americans in the polling place, and I want to give you a few examples. Jackson Heights, Queens at P. S. 69, one poll inspector told an oriental guy, "You are taking too long to vote," and turned to one of our monitors to say for them to tell "his people" -- implying Asian Americans -- they should really vote faster because others are waiting on line. Another one commented if they need help with language, they should not ask to vote. At the poll site, a Chinese American voter who asked for language assistance, was directed to a Korean interpreter, who could not help. And several hostile White voters at this poll site made remarks such as, "You're all turning this country into a third world waste dump," and "You can't have anyone go inside the booth with you. " and "You should prepare and learn English before you come out to vote. " A recent example in New Jersey: Two talk radio hosts on 101. 5 FM, a so-called radio announcer made racist remarks about Jun Choi commenting on an accent in response to a color stated a caller, "Indians have taken over Edison. " The response was, "It's like a foreigner in your own country. " The Asian American, South Asian community organized a broad-based coalition to protest these remarks and they got an on-air apology from Millennium Radio. Observers sent a questionnaire in terms of community groups and that really did make a difference in terms of the elections. During the language minority assistance, New York City is one of the places where both Section 5 and 203 are funded in the New York City after 1992. Real assistance, bilingual ballots, the Board of Elections kept saying, "Well we provide translation of simple ballots, but we really can't interpret ballots in the voting machines. " And the oversight in the Chinese Language Assistance Program. It was mailed to Chinese and there was a faulty translated ballot in New York City and that really wouldn't have offset it without Section 5. Both Section 5 and Section 203 need to be continued for minority language. Congress really ought to be expanding coverage in Section 203, and Section 5, especially when the time of the Civil Rights Act is getting to have real significance in the Asian American community.

MR. LEE: Thank you. Our next panelist is Mr. Carlos Zayas from Redding, Pennsylvania, and you're a community activist?

MR. ZAYAS: Yes, sir. Some people say I'm a community voting rights advocate for racism, some say I'm an agitator. That can be a different point of view from where they are judging, but the truth is, I have been working for the last six years on voting rights for our community and I have understood that doing that would involve this poll of the political machine that is more difficult. We the people believe in what we are doing and this is why all of us are here. We need to keep working pretty hard. If you think listening to Margaret Fung -- I realize that the racism that was shown against her people was the same one that was shown in Redding, Pennsylvania. They were throwing against us -- the Hispanic -- exactly the same remarks, and that was the observers of the Department of Justice. For two years we have been working in the investigation. Also, if we can't trust them, we came to Passaic we can make with the department in this situation. I will need to say, here at the Department of Justice, that the section is doing a very good job in the same way that we found out in Passaic that we can trust them. We called them and provided all the areas that we collected and that expedited the investigation in Redding. They spent two more years during the investigation because they said, "as you know, they don't trust no one. " And in that investigation in Pennsylvania, they augmented all the findings, and eventually they went to Federal Court because there was no explanation from the statutes of 1999. Every time that we asked for something -- their standard reply -- they always said, "You want something here, take us to court. " And now they have compliance. At least not so happy, but they are trying to move. I want to mention here that the Board of Pennsylvania, the 21st century in my point of view, is the case of discrimination of the polling base of the minority language for the past six years. As I said, I have seen the action of the rights and voting rights in Pennsylvania, especially the Pennsylvania Dutch country, Berks county, and surrounding counties. My approach to the voting issues is nonpartisan, based on the fact that I don't have any political affiliation. My ultimate goal is to improve the voting process, to advance the public interest in a real election reform. I want to mention here, that I have been -

- I have come with Juan Rodriguez, another Voting Rights Act advocate or activist. I intend to provide the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act with summaries and some of the issues that our community is confronted with. A special emphasis will be made to focus on the findings and outcomes of the investigation made by the Civil Rights Division and Department of Justice in the city of Redding, 2001 to 2003. The election practices and procedures in the county of Pennsylvania resulted in the issuance of an injunction and later, a permanent injunction by a federal judge. Those decisions are cited by the County of Pennsylvania, 250 F. Supp. 2d 525 (E. D. Pa. 2003) in the Eastern district of Pennsylvania. And the second one is the final injunction, the final order, 277 F. Supp. 2d 570(E. D. Pa. 2003). Eastern district, Division of Pennsylvania. In the summary, the Court found that Berks County "use of "English only" election process violated Section 4E of the Voting Rights Act by continuing the right to vote for the county's Puerto Rican community. Many who attended schools in Puerto Rico were not really able to read, write, understand English. " They denied information and assistance necessary for those citizens to participate in the election process and initial findings was that "English Only" election process violated Section 203 for the test on Voting Rights Acts. The voters of Puerto Rican descent received voting assistance from assistants of their choice. The Federal District Court also decided "that the English-only election process, violated Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, by failing to provide language assistance to limited-English proficient voters and by failing to appoint minority poll workers. " The court emphasized from the evidence, that the election officials permitted poll workers to openly express hostility to Hispanic voters; that Hispanic voters were treated differently and discriminated against at polling places, and Hispanic residents in counties where they were severely under-represented as poll workers. I want to emphasize the treatment of discrimination, a treatment of hostility, and when we talk about this, these findings of the Department of Justice in 2001 to 2003, we were not talking about older stuff, we are talking in the 21st century in Pennsylvania in the United States of North America. These situations cannot happen as Judge Baylson pointed in the opinion of the preliminary injunction. That was a situation more close to heavy shame, with the condemnation that was based on the opinion of the preliminary injunction. At the heart of this case is Section 4E of the Voting Rights Act, an act of Congress which mandates protection of the voting right of non-English speaking rights of U. S. citizens. Berks County, particularly in the City of Reading, where only Puerto Ricans are educated in Spanish speaking schools, Congress mandated protection of their rights to vote in a language other than English if they are illiterate in English, and it's important to pay attention to Section 4E, because not so many people are aware of this section. Not so many people, and this is what the Berks County commissioners confirmed. The Director of Relations, they are assuming that we have no case because they were under Section 203, and we weren't there. Section 4E was there for us. Section 220, a full Section 203, as I understand it in the case of the Department of Justice, and it's important to summarize the county of Pennsylvania. The hostility that Hispanics and Spanish-speaking voters receive. Poll workers turned away Hispanic voters because they could not understand their names or refused to deal with Hispanic surnames. Poll workers made hostile statements about Hispanic voters; others made discriminatorystatements about Hispanic voters that are not imposed on Anglo voters like, demanding photo identification. That was not a requisite. The city of Pennsylvania required only Hispanic voters to verify their address. Hispanic voters say this hostile treatment in the public place discourages them from voting. That was at this time a practice that was mentioned. Another one is the lack of bilingual poll workers that are left to recruit, train, or maintain a pool of poll workers that are Hispanic. One more approximating 30 percent of poll workers in Reading precincts with Spanish surnames compared to a voting population that is over 30 percent. Now it's more dramatic, but in every Census, computing has been communicated for the numbers that were mapped on 1989, 1990 and that happened in 2000. And now by those projects, based on the fact that in 2000 we have 70 percent of the total population of the city, I am sure that we are very clearly, a minority in the city of Reading at this time, because we do this change every ten years. There is a lack of latin speaking in the community. That was the finding at that time. They made improvements in that area, but there is still some areas which they need to comply with the mere use of the media to reach our community. There was a denial of a choice to vote due to lack of bilingual materials and assistants for Hispanics in the voting places. Many voters would bring their friends, their companions of choice to vote. But poll workers have not permitted voters to bring their assisters of choice with them. Also the county officials have acknowledged to reintroduce this information, and they have knowledge about this in practice, and I think since the state began telling me to take them to court in regards to Section 4E. It's important that the Congress declared that to secure the rights under the 14th Amendment of persons educated in American-flag schools in which the predominant classroom language was other than English. It is necessary to prohibit the States from continuing the right to vote of such persons on ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter in the English language. Berks county conducted English-only elections and fails to provide limited English proficient United States citizens of Puerto Rican descent with election information and assistance necessary for their effective participation in the electoral process. By failure to ensure that all voters who are unable to read the ballot receive assistance at the voting places.

MR. LEE: If you would shorten up your testimony?

MR. ZAYAS: Okay. Basically, Section Two -- but it's important that also the correspondence established in the case of U. S. versus West county that was later mentioned in the one case in California, that they could not find to conduct elections to comply with the Voting Rights Act, so that all citizens may participate, serve, interest, remuneration of the different order that provides the judge base. So I mentioned already, the size of these cases that was provided to the commission to finalize any presentation of my other peers here. I want to say that despite some improvement in West county elections' practice and procedures, many areas that need improvement lack consistency in places of officials. The uncertainty about how West County deals with the positions of Latinos and on correspondence all around, there are just as many on welfare and they are not trained in all the aspects of the election process. There is a need to improve communication and education using the media. Those remain areas of concern. Despite that, there is a change. There was a lot of improvement in the voter turnout after the decision of the federal court and signs to the Department of Justice. They need to reuthorize the Voters Rights Act to the law as the only safeguard of compliance. The compliance need not depend on which or whom the voting party is in control. The political parties are the ones that are improving compliance Voting Rights in order to have a relation that is still demanding and improving their rights, but despite all that we can do, there are situations where we need to attain within this year and next year if we want to improve voting rights. As you know, all of you will know the case of Pennsylvania and the United States, andit's important that the process with legislation, creating a nonpartisan redistricting commission. If we want a real reform, the nonpartisan commission is the way to go. It's also important that the Amendment at state efforts of the Ballot Access laws improve fair competition and participation in the electoral process. That they were not affiliated to the mayor, and also, I assume it's a good idea, and their term of "Nonpartisan Judiciary Election Act" which improve the system of elections for the Judiciary. In order to focus on a nonpartisan in regards for a Justice of the Peace, but you know that a nonpartisan can change the establishment in terms of running a campaign for a justice, but they can't vote on a single issue, because they were not only partisan and I'm able to understand the filing of California, Democratic Party versus Jones.

MR. LEE: We accept your statement, but I wanted to see if you could finish so we can give Mr. Bolton a chance?

MR. ZAYAS: Well, just to finalize, this was mentioned by Ms. Fung about the vote dilution and that is also a process to use. The last round of the district, we went to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania 127. A district that was a City of Reading. And the fact that there was no deviation at all and we asked for maintaining the status quo, because there was no indication to move the tenth district out. Eventually, Pennsylvania based quality of population over voting. Well, as you may know, after that, we submitted in the plan to the City of Reading, not based on the filing of the Court in the City of Pennsylvania we reached for, but when we went to the City for the final plans, of the city, you know what they tell us? No, now we want the status quo. We cannot get there. We showed them the quality of cooperation. We went to the city with the best plan admitted publicly by members. Despite that, our plan was the most won.

MR. LEE: I see it's an unfinished struggle. Going on to Mr. Walton, Charles Walton is currently the Director for Special Programs for the Community College of Rhode Island from 1983 to 2002. Mr. Walton served as a Rhode Island State Senator, as the first African American to be selected as tempore for the Senate. Welcome, Mr. Walton.

MR. WALTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and good afternoon to you and the distinguished members of the commission. It is certainly my honor to come before you and speak a little bit about learning where we're at, at least in Rhode Island, and perhaps, in the nation, with respect to why it's important to have the Voting Rights Act renewed. Because as you've heard already, it's made a difference in so many other places across the country, especially in our country that is changing so rapidly and for the better. We need to figure out better ways to make sure everyone's vote counts in this country, and everyone has an opportunity to participate in this process. I got elected in 1983 for the first time, in a special election following litigation that determined, among other things, that the legislature's initial redistricting plan discriminated against African-Americans and served in the State Senate. That was then passed in the state Senate where there was a re-districting plan in violation of the Voting Rights Act. Through that process, I was able to be the first African-American to serve in the state Senate, and I will tell you, this is a sorry state of the history in general. As I indicated, being the first African-American serving on that body, I think we only had one or two members to serve. That did change. After the 83rd district case brought our numbers up in the House Of Representatives. Just to give you a small history of Rhode Island and the uniqueness of it which extends back to the evolution of this country, it being one of the 13 colonies as part of the triangle that ensured there were Africa's imported slavery which had a tremendous impact on several economic bases. We somehow got by that, and I think one of the real reasons obviously, is the 1965 Voting Rights Act which had tremendous impact on us, including so many people who were left out and were not a part of that process. For example today, the city is a minority-majority system for the first time, and we still have a real void in representation of Black and Latino in the state 2 African-Americans, and 2 Latinos. And a part of that is that I've seen some of the political problems that my fellow panelists here have already mentioned, and that is, we're a city where there are about 70 different languages spoken. We're a city where the school system is about 85 percent minority, but yet, our school system is an apartheid system with about 80 or 85 percent who are applied in the system. So when you start looking at the person that exists under horrendous conditions, we have some cities in the State of Rhode Island that are decisive in the majority. There is no one that serves on counsel. There is no one in the school committees, but the decision within the larger system are made essentially by the minorities. Minorities in this case being minority White, and this is a pattern I think. It is a pattern not only in my state of Rhode Island, but it is a pattern that is indicated by most Northeast states as indicated by many of my fellow panelists. We're looking into several states where we have had minority candidates, Latino and Asian Americans. They run and have never been successful, because all too often, the game changes. We've seen some of our cities go from single districts to "at large" districts, and one sterling example was in Kentucky. At one time I think it was a five-member committee. Four of the five members all lived on one street, but yet, in the school system, the school system is about 65 percent minority. There has never been elected on the school panel in some of our urban areas. It continues to be a pattern and it's a problem to break out of that pattern. I have been fortunate with the Lawyer's Committee For Civil Rights to come to Rhode Island. When we had our re-districting fight with the state Senate, we clearly demonstrated and drew maps that would indicate we could have had, after the 2000 Census, at least three of the six senatorial districts represented by people of color, but my White colleagues wanted to maintain the authority of incumbency and went ahead and denigrated our arguments. After a long drawn out testimony to the contrary, they delegated and went forward and made sure after the 2000 elections that five of the six seats were held by White incumbents, and that compelled us to challenge through legal efforts. We fortunately, ultimately won in that situation. I absolutely agree with the gentlemen to my left. There are language problems in the system in many places, but it starts before that. All politics are local, but the fact of the matter is it's still local. All too often we eliminate the local voice and local input of the real voters which should have an opportunity to exercise their basic rights. There are a couple of points that I would also like to make, and I'm not sure how it fits under the 1967 Voting Rights Act, and that is the problem of the disenfranchisement issue. That is a growing issue in our community. The Senator right now replacing me, Howard Metts, has restored the rights to counsel that the system had cleaned out any past records, etc. etc. That is a situation that really impacts a great portion of our community as well, and we continue to face this if we don't try to meet head on the litigation or other means as well. I just wanted to go back -- that I know when the '65 Voting Rights Act was heavily focused on the South and it was heavily focused on all of the bad things that happened in those months, but I can tell some don't even look on Northeast when it's in New York City, in Pennsylvania, in New Jersey, Rhode Island, Massachusets. We have these patterns of discrimination that continue to exist and so much of our urban communities perceive our immigrant population of these cities, and again, to franchise the right to vote. They are going to continue the system, so we need to look at the language barrier that many of these cities and states put in front of the population to deny the opportunity of the right to vote. And it's not just the right to vote, because I can tell you, for years in the African-American majority, I could bring issues that most other legislatures wouldn't even care to think about. Healthier areas in the district. I represented at least three fourths of that district until I was able to get on the books, and today, I can absolutely tell this, if you were to come to the district that I represent, it is the fastest growing district in the state, and that's because I was able to help craft legislation to deal with these problems that our communities are confronted with. So I'm absolutely here to tell you that it is absolutely essential that we find every ounce of energy to get the 1965 Voting Rights Act renewed, because it would have further impact across this country. I don't see too many other avenues, with all due respect, I don't see too much hope there as well, so I'm going to check my remarks at this point and will happily take my leave.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Walton. Going back to what Mr. Walton said about these communities, the freedom of language. How prevalent in the state of Pennsylvania is it? Are there a lot of cities in Pennsylvania that have a lot of inadequacies?

MR. WALTON: Yes sir.

MR. LEE: Can you name some of them?

MR. WALTON: And also at this point, the Department of Justice is aware of this situation. They came to Reading to investigate. We explained the demographics of the other cities and the situations at that point. I know there is a violation going on in Bethlehem. I assume by accepting information, knowledge in Philadelphia, Section 5, we have an extremely huge Hispanic population in Allentown, Bethlehem, Lancaster, York, and Montgomery county. But the big ones, Allentown, Bethlehem, Lancaster and York is growing.

MR. LEE: Thank you, very much.

MR. CARTAGENA: This is very, very informative and helpful. Pretty quick, for Margaret Fung, I've read your testimony and I think you've emphasized this in your remarks to us, if you didn't have Section 5 in New York City at the time you are doing this work with respect to sharing access to Asian American voters in New York City we could expect thousands that would have been without a means to vote. And to Mr. Walton, I have done workshops on the voting literally since 1998. Every time I talk about the difference between our system, I just make up this thing, in that all five counsel members probably live on the same block. You are the first person in the 20 years of work that has actually given me that story as a true statement. So I can now put it with a true statement. But my question is, please elaborate on the report on improvement of parole. How does it work? I had a long conversation with Mr. Zeis over lunch about this.

MS. FUNG: Even today, 14 years later, we're still fighting with the New York City board of legislations whether or not it's assigning enough interpreters, why it can't do translations correctly, but nonetheless, the program has become more institutionalized. It is their thinking and people putting pressure on registrars and legislations. We would not get into polling sites to examine the ballot machines if the justice department had not also sent in their own observers to see if there is a problem or not. Being given provisional ballots, enables us, because the justice department -- in addition to sending in federal observers to monitor this -- when those changes or various proposals for pre-clearance came in, the justice department denied the plan. It went back into the plan because we were making the argument that in votes, you can translate these names, put them into machines. It would have been a much longer battle to get to where we are now. The very fact that there is a program and it works, and the justice department comes back and periodically monitors and reviews changes, other cities and other counties also, they do volunteer, which we encourage, and they see it's not that difficult and they provide a language that everyone will be able to vote.

MR. WALTON: If I could respond briefly to the vote. I'm not an expert in this area, but I'm learning real fast. We have in the State of Rhode Island ex-felons disenfranchised that accepts anyone who has to retain their voting rights. Part of the problem is if there has been a charge of not guilty in places, they simplyhave been charged that they have no right to the vote any more. And I think this is illegal, but people have mainly been told that we have a growing problem, not unlike the national problem. The percentage of African-Americans and Latinos who are cut up in the justice system is appalling. In Rhode Island, for example, one in five black males are involved in some way or another in the criminal justice system. One in 11 are involved in criminal justice. Those numbers are not probably going down. So when we look at the voting rights, it is also in the community. This is an area at some point in time where many of these men and women are going to enter into society, and what are we going to do when they are fully enfranchised? When they do that, it's an issue, and I know there are testimony that has legislation before our assembly right now to look at the direction that this issue has taken in our state, but it's a huge problem now. Especially when we start talking about prison industries. As we're talking about prisons, that can be used -- started and so forth. It's an issue.

MS. CRENSHAW: Thank you. My colleague has returned the favor of asking the question that I wanted to ask about the interactive effect between Section 5 and 03, and it would be important to hear more about that interactive, particularly those who might be sustaining Section 203 and not sustaining Section 5. So, thank you for your comments. I have a couple questions for Mr. Walton. You might have mentioned this and I didn't write it quickly so I didn't get it. Can you tell us what percentage of the Latino and African-Americans are in the population in Rhode Island in particular, and in the county of Providence?

MR. WALTON: As a result of this last Census, the Providence did become a majority-minority fate. The majority is Latino. That population is somewhere around 35 percent. All know it is slightly higher. The African-American population is just under ten percent, the Asian American population is close to ten percent, and then there are other immigrant communities in Rhode Island. There is also a Carribean community, so put it all together, you end up with 70 different languages that are spoken in the city across the state, and that makes up a majority-minority in the state. The city counsel is made up of 15 single-member districts and out of that 15, there are four people of color.

MS. CRENSHAW: And no Asian American?

MR. WALTON: We have no Asian American. It's a city that is one square mile. It's called Central Falls. I think eight percent are Latino, one city counsel person, no school committee people.

MS. CRENSHAW: Okay. My second question -- this might call for a little bit of speculation, but I'm interested, because so many times I'm interested by efforts to maintain incumbency, and your story is hopefully in the sense, that Section Two can be effected if the source is available to engage in litigation. But we've heard how difficult it is to amass the resources, so I'm wondering if you have any thoughts about how to strengthen Section Two. It's more of a prophylactic to dissuade your colleagues in using minority voters to support. There are incumbencies.

MR. WALTON: That is a big question, but it's a very important one. What we did I think in Rhode Island, I worked for the past ten years, ten years prior to 2000 redistricting process. One of the things that we did was made our effort very clear. You can't just discard the fact that you are part of a large minority-based population, and you need to include that in that process. And with Rhode Island, Section Two favored out how we ended up going to the courts. It's an ongoing fight, but I think the thing that absolutely helped us was the threat of legal action. We continued that process. We made it clear to them if they were going to go forward to pass this legislation, they were leaving too much to the significant minority-based population, and they did with the district that I had to run, in that they changed the numbers over 90 percent. There was 65, close to 70 percent Latino which I never had. In fact, I ran in adistrict that was less than 50 percent African-American, so it's the least threat of the Voting Rights Act. That was certainly one that they were not concerned about. In fact, they tried to build their entire argument, why their claim was sensible, versus our proposal, and in the end, we were at the district level and it wasn't very favorable there. But when we got to the circuit court there, it was very favorable because my previous election indicated that I could win, made up on black-white, so on and so forth, and it may be the issue in the future if we look at the population. That is an interesting point. One of the arguments they made at the City of Providence is that they were going to hold all the elections within the city boundaries and our argument was no, because when you do that, they come up blank. They try to justify it and when you have a board of community that is subjected to a major city and you have a population, you would "straddle" to the city, to the suburban district, those populations, it is, in some ways, has a more common interest -- are disenfranchised -- which is what we demonstrated. We demonstrated that you can go outside the city barriers and still satisfy the need to minority versus majority. Not being an attorney, it's hard for me to give you the "size one," but we shouldn't be restricted as to how you draw boundaries. You shouldn't "gang" people of common nationalities together.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I had three questions I wanted to ask you. You said there was roughly about 6. 7 million Americans in the country?

MS. FUNG: About 6. 7 million citizen voting population.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Okay, 6. 7 million citizen voting population. The percentage would be what percentage?

MS. FUNG: Unclear, because the census represents numbers which sometimes don't seem to accurate.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: We're required to make a factual report to the House and Senate that would be reviewed by the Supreme Court. Roughly three million or so Asian Americans voted in the last elections. I can't figure out how those numbers are accurate if you're looking at a total base of 6. 7 million or so and then some turnout according to the numbers you've given us.

MS. FUNG: I think the 6. 7 number may have referred, I'm pretty sure -- no, that's the number according to the census -- is that it's 6. 7 million Asian American citizens of voting age and some percentage -- I don't have the estimates -- that get thrown out at various times at somewhere around 40 percent, 40 to 50 percent.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I think it would be good to know how these numbers are actually done, because I know that the Census underestimates, based on project. Ms. Fung, it would be wonderful if you could get us the accurate number. I understand that the numbers are thrown around. Asian American would have to be the highest percentage of voters in the United States. If up look at the total, and I'm not quite sure that is accurate, of the immigrants voting, and the new immigrants are not registered to vote even though, and with respect to Section 203, it has been re-authorized three times, '75, '82, '92. Presumably, the purpose in setting a time period as it relates to Section 203 was the assumption that the goal would be accomplished by the jurisdiction of the United States. Is that accurate?

MS. FUNG: Was that the assumption? I think I recall a question? When would the time come when language assistance would no longer be needed? Is that -- for now there are more Chinese American voters. There are many other populations that are now coming to the United States that are growing in numbers and now -- language assistance -- well, at that time, this was focused only on Chinese and Japanese assistance. Those populations have grown now in many more places than in New York, California, and Hawaii which is -- what was covered. I think there will be a time when discrimination will be over, I don't know, but I know it's not over now. And look atthe population demographics that have occurred. Not only Chinese, Japanese, Korean, and Filipino, but also many of the South Asian Americans are immigrating here.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Who is arguing for a nonrenewal or nonreauthorization for Section 203?

MS. FUNG: Right now, I don't know who would be arguing that. I don't know that there is anybody who said it should not be reauthorized.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: One last question. As a group, I'm curious about this present action in terms of Section 203, as well as Section 5. Specifically, are you raising conscious preventions, talking about race? Nowadays, what they do or what happens can be very broad, but we don't speak in terms of White and Black, we don't specifically talk in those terms any more. But I'm curious, given your testimony, Section 5, and in particular or with respect to your thought to Rhode Island, you essentially said you were raising these arguments, that they were going to be diluting our voting strength and power. Just don't do it because it's the wrong thing to do. Your opposition said no, it's the right thing to do. But they didn't say it was the right thing to do based upon race. Presumatively the argument was made to say, essentially, listen, it's about politics. It's about who will vote for us and not vote for us, so they argue that it's not a race consciousness. They argue, it's simply a matter of political speaking, and many reasons why I raise that and forgive me for that. I think it's critical. The Supreme Court says that it's okay, you can fight out this arena, but issues relating to race are sort of counterbalanced. The 14th and the 15th Amendments, that race, as it applies in Rhode Island in particular, where White people will not vote for you. Is that what you're -- at the end of the day -- Whites are no longer voting for, as a practice, African-Americans in Rhode Island, where we have significant numbers of minority influences. Some Whites will vote for you in exchange of African-Americans that will vote for you?

MR. WALTON: It is rather a long question. I don't think I said that Whites won't vote for African-American candidates. What I think my focus is, is to ensure that African-American voters would be in a position to make a choice or candidate, and we shouldn't do things to limit their ability to make a choice for a candidate. In other words, a candidate as their choice. And I think what we're experiencing in Rhode Island is that the legislature was drawing districts that would in fact, would have done that. They would have eliminated voters for making African-Americans or other minorities from being part of a collective community for making a vote that would have some impact in terms of voting for some that represented their interest.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: That would have been political expediency or race?

MR. WALTON: Exactly.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: What would it have been, political expediency or race or both?

MR. WALTON: There are people "in the closet" in the issue of race or political power. I think in the case that we're facing, it was more of a final approach to dealing with the problem. There was certainly decisions on the part of the leadership to protect the White incumbents for political reasons, but at the same time, our argument that they were doing it at the expense of people who would have lost there enfranchisement of voting for candidates of their choice have done that historically.

MR. LEE: Actually I would like to ask a few questions, but I'm not going to. Thank you for disproving the adage that there is always a letdown after lunch. Thank you, Ms. Fung, Mr. Walton. (Break)

MR. LEE: We're going to come to order. If the attendees could sit down. I've been admonished by the commissioners, I'm being too hard on the commissioners and too soft on the witnesses. Our next panelist is the president of the City of New York State conference of the NAACP. Hazel Dukes is an expert on votingand things of that kind.

MS. DUKES: Good afternoon. Thank you for inviting us to participate today. The right of the United States citizen shall not be denied by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous conditions of servitude, so I want to ask the question of the commission. Race is a problem and Whites don't vote for African-Americans in the numbers that they do for others. I want that to be in the record. For my point of view, the 15th Amendment to the United States constitution was passed and ratified in 1878. However, in every election since then, African-American voters faced the determined efforts of White Americans to deny African-Americans their right to vote. Neither were the so called "qualifying" tests they used, too ridiculous. Who knows how many bubbles are in a bar of soap? During this era of terror the persecution of African Americans who sought to exercise their citizenship rights, The National Association For the Advancement of Colored People was established in 1909. Since that time, the NAACP has fought in the courts and communities all across this land to secure voting rights for our people. The ballot today is stained by the blood of NAACP heroes like Medgar Evers and many others who were killed by White racists who refused to share the power of the ballot with African Americans. Indeed, registering to vote was hazardous to your life if you were a Negro. In 1965, Congress finally addressed disenfranchisement of African Americans by enacting the Voting Rights Act. Some argue that no other legislation before or since has had the impact and significance of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The political landscape of America was dramatically re-aligned. The resulting redistribution of political power brought African Americans to city, state and national legislative, executive and judicial positions in places all over the nation. And, in those positions, African Americans were able to make economic decisions that benefitted their communities for the first time in our nation's history, the cold, exclusive clammy hold of white racism on the throttles of power, were lucid, and African Americans were finally able to get a grip. There are now, according to the African-American Members of Congress 43, there are now 24 African-American members of the New York State legislature. There are 135 African-American judges in New York State. There are two new State legislative seats created in primarily African-American communities in Long Island, New York. But for every step forward into the political and economic power circles made by African-Americans, the White power brokers are busy developing new tactics and modernizing old ones to take back the political power of the ballot that the Voting Rights Act produced for African-Americans. I will address just three areas. Voter intimidation in recent legislations have been both blatant and subtle. For example, here in New York City, White off duty officers with guns in view, blanketed polling sites in Black communities during the 1993 mayoral election in an effort to discourage Black voters from casting their ballot in the re-election of David Dinkins. Voter access was severely inhibited in 2000 by reducing the number of voting machines and using old voting machines which broke down and which were not repaired in a timely way in Black polling sites. This was purposely done to oppress the Black vote in the Gore-Bush presidential election. Many African-Americans who registered to vote in public agencies such as Motor Vehicles Departments, Social Security and public assistance offices. Names were not sent to the Board of Elections in a timely manner so that these voters were not able to go into the voting booths on election day and many were not able to use a paper ballot either. Felony disenfranchisement. You've heard that many African-Americans are not able to vote because of their life in prison or on parole. For some, there is a lifetime ban on their right to vote, even after release from prison. Here in New York, there is pending before the 2nd circuit, a lawsuit brought under the Voting Rights Act claiming that New York's felon disenfranchisement laws differ from State to State. Maine and Vermont permit felons to vote from prison, however, the number of African-Americans in both these Statescombined is so small as to be less than those in the village of Harlem. But in some states, felons are denying the rights of a citizen of the United States to vote for life. The re-authorization of the Voting Rights Act is essential to address the new and entrenched resistance to full and free access to the power of the ballot for all Americans. It took a constitutional amendment in 1870 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 to bring us this far on our way. We must always remember and remind others that the ballot is stained with the "blood of many martyrs." In the words of Frederick Douglas, "Power concedes nothing without demand." It never has and it never will. The right to vote is the most powerful component of our democratic nation, and it must be fully and freely available to all adult citizens without regard to race, color or prior conditions of servitude. Thank you.

MR. LEE: We note that the NAACP has faithfully justified this. Are there any questions?

MS. DUKES: And the Lawyer's Committee For Civil Rights has always worked with us. We maintain great relationships.

MR. LEE: Questions on this side, the reason that I ask -- Ms. Dukes has informed me that she has to run, so you're released at this point. Veronica Jung of the Korean American League For Civil Action which provides civic education in it's internship program, welcome.

MS. JUNG: Thank you.

MR. LEE: If you could move that microphone closer to you.

MS. JUNG: I sit before, you not only as a Civic Director of a community-based organization, but also as an Asian American. I am grateful to the United States. Today I wish to speak to you on the direct impact that the Voting Rights Act has on the community, because I know of the community, best of all, the Korean community. Of all communities impacted, the Korean community, as you know, is a community that, in comparison to some other Asian American groups, is a recent arrival group to the United States. And as such, according to the 2000 Census, the incidents of language fluency is the lowest in our community, so that over 60 percent are faced with limited English proficiency. Section 203 became applicable to our community in 2002. As of that date, as low as 15 percent of registered voters were enforcing Section 203. Under familiar suggestions, we have been told that this language is too crude, Korean, as a language. We have studied the increase, and in 2004, the participation turnout rate was 75 of registered voters with traditionally low levels of experience.

MR. LEE: Any response? That's really high.

MS. JUNG: As I stated earlier, as a recent arrival from Korea, our community has been known to have a higher level of illiteracy to protect it, but in this instance, regardless of whether you're a college or Grad school graduate, that does not necessarily translate into English proficiency. That is truly the case in our community, where over 8 percent of the community receiving the main source of the news happens to be from the media. According to the 2004 general elections, at the communication centers, nearly a third of the voters were first time voters, so that goes to the heart of the matter. That in our particular community, this one is particularly vulnerable. So that we can have a direct relationship with the lack of English speaking people and actually control the incident of people turning away or being turned away by poll workers. I would also like -- and it has been raised by the few -- that perhaps this type of protection promotes separatist activity, but in fact, it promotes a person to fully participate in the intern process. I would also like to point out ways in which we have communications with the Board of Elections in New York City, however, despite a full mandate of federal law, there are serious ways in which the Board of Elections has fallen. In other words, providing full protection of the law -- just to give you a small example, in the last elections, despite the federal mandate to provide language assistance for Koreans as a required language, there were 4 states that provided zero interpreters on Election Day. (Cases Q38, Q0086, Q0040.) Of all those cases in Queens county, where there were clear indicators likely to have Korean efforts to the polls, there was actually zero interpreters to those non-designated sites, and so between those types of numbers and the fact that the overall percentage of our communities report having difficulties, and despite even the speaking -- lack of -- the panicking with the current foreign language, it is very imperative that we do much more to enforce federal law. With that said, I would like to move on to a greater need of translators and we are trying to help people become interpreters on a mandate with such urban coalition. Before that, we have made efforts to provide the Board Of Elections with applications of individuals who are both qualified, interested, and available to work as poll workers on interpreters on elections days. Despite their efforts, we have noted that it is at times, difficult to determine the feasibility which these applications are processed, because it is clear that there was significant numbers of who do apply, but who are not on election day, appointed as poll workers. Thirdly, I'd also like to point out that there is that same great need for more proactive community outreach, that is to say, given the high levels of communication and access to information about election day directed through the media, it would be a gross understatement to say that the Board Of Elections in New York City are utilizing the pieces at its disposal. So we would urge the commission and Board of Elections to pay particular attention to this matter. It is our understanding at this time that their staff at the present time, is the initial staff in New York City. However, the rate is not clear to us at this time if that staff is able to provide education to help the election process. Thank you, very much.

MR. LEE: At this time, our next panelist is Ozzie Maldonado. He is a resident of Passaic, New Jersey which we've heard a lot from, and he is the founder and current Chairman of the Puerto Rican Counsel of Passaic. Welcome Mr. Maldonado.

MR. MALDONADO: Thank you. Thank you very much. I was asked to be here because in the year 2000, the Justice Department came into the City of Passaic because of the irregularities that existed in the voting process in the City of Passaic. One of the things that I would like to speak on is looking back on the time the Justice Department came into the City of Passaic. We had 33 districts and all the districts in the City of Passaic are largely Hispanic, which qualifies the act of Hispanic poll workers. Normally you would have in the 33 districts, you would have one Republican, one Democratic poll worker. So that would amount to having 66 Hispanic poll workers. In the City of Passaic, when the Justice Department came in, there was only 12. They started implementing the county, so on and so forth, and eventually it brought it up to par. That was extremely important, because in urban cities like Passaic, you have many problems with poll workers, and the Latino community there has been discouraged and how would you say -- making the voter uncomfortable by certain forms of harassment. And harassment leads to not just ill-treating them in a lower manner, we've had many of these problems prior -- where it was a form of discouraging voters to go out and vote. When the Justice Department came in and we started getting Hispanic poll workers, it made it better as far as the Hispanic communities to go out and vote. If they had any questions, they could ask the poll workers and thus far, we've had a great deal of success in that area. We then established a commission work with the Board Of Elections of the county where you have a master poll worker and you have individuals working to make sure that you have enough poll workers on election day, not only in the City of Passaic, but in certain towns in the county. That was basically due to the Justice department coming in before everyone knew. But it was hard to break ground. We've been successful in that area. In the other area that I would like to speak on is the provisional ballots. In the urban cities we have a large portion with the minorities and the transient. You take a city like Passaic or what we call the East Side. We have residents that live in an apartment for two months a year and they move out of economic reasons, so on and so forth. We have a lot of transient. At one time, even if you lived in an apartment where it was 11B and you moved to 12B, you were not eligible to vote. They would turn you down. If you moved and didn't change your address and so forth, with the changes that occur, they have no work. If by district the same community becomes the district. A person goes to vote and that is very important, because it was a form of discouragement. At one time you'd go to vote, they'd look up your name. A lot of times your name might have been there but they couldn't find it, but they'd tell you, "You're not eligible to vote. You can go to the county and file a complaint. You can go in front of the judge. " This would take all day. With the provisional ballots now, we tell everyone when they cannot find your name or they can't find you for whatever reason, you ask for a provisional ballot and you vote. The ultimate decision is made by the Board of Elections, which is a nonpartisan group by the county. If it is within your district, then they make your vote count. If you didn't apply within the district, what has happened with this situation is that it neutralized the atmosphere at the polls. The poll workers realize that if they can't find you, that you were entitled to -- as a community person -- and what happens is that when you sit out campaigns and you find that someone is turning people away, the first thing you try to do is get in touch with the city clerk and notify them that there is an irregularity going on within the polls, because they aren't supposed to give this provisional ballot. Because I heard someone mention a decrease of the City of Passaic and the county as being a success. For that reason I am here. I ask for this commission to take in hand that the Justice Department and the monitors that they do send out are extremely important to urban cities so that they can continue. If it's not done, what could easily happen is since the communities, these urban communities are very vulnerable, it could revert back to the same old system, to the system prior to it. So take this in mind, that the advancement of getting out to vote and having the people have the right to vote. If they are American citizens and they are voting, okay. They should be able. If they don't comprehend the English language, voting, which ever language, they need to have -- an assistant should be there. As American citizens, they should not be turned away from voting because of not understanding. So it's extremely important for you to continue in having this type of commission go into urban cities and cities of need so that we can continue progressing and having the citizens of the United States have their right in voting. I want to thank you. Any questions pertaining to these issues, I'd be glad to answer.

MR. CARTAGENA: Thank you, Mr. Maldonado. We're going to hear from Jose Garcia. Mr. Garcia is vice president for Policy Analysis and Advocacy Coordinator, Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund.

MR. GARCIA: Thank you. I'm here for the Telephone Policy Board Of Right Network. That is according to a policy in New York City 982 as a nonprofit, nonpartisan, focusing on Latino issues. Since our inception we have worked to protect Latinos and other people of color as part of our city participation program. It is based on more than two years of experience. The Board has the right issue and we can testify to the continuance of the need for the Voting Rights Act to fully participate in this country's electoral system. We support the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act that is scheduled to go into the sunset in 2007. Section 5, Section 203, bilingual as steps for authorizing the Department of Justice to appoint and expand observers to any jurisdiction covered by Section 5. The Latino Board of Right Network has 8 states on the East coast, individuals, and the United Nations and other areas of the country including Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. The state which we've been working in are Kentucky, Florida, Delaware, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island and New York City. And we want educate our community in the use of the Voting Rights Act and also, have full participation in the electoral system. It was estimated that the Latino community in 2004 numbered over 41 million. That means one in every seven residents of the United States reported that the Latino population grew by 3. 6 percent in one year. More than three times that of the total population. For Latinos, that growth was, for the first time, citizen driven by the growth rate. And immigration, which is still the highest immigration, about two thirds of Latinos are of voting age and about 60 are national origin immigration status. The Voting Rights Act impact on these segments of the community have been in different and important ways, the Carribean, which is a minority, and Puerto Rican. The Puerto Ricans migrated into the United States and have been U. S. citizens. In 1970, by an act of the U. S. Congress, they have been coming to the U. S. for the entire period. For those born in Puerto Rico who attended "American-flag" schools whose instructors were primarily Spanish, along with Mexicans, Puerto Ricans were among the original Latino groups in the Voting Rights Act that have been actually discriminated against the Voting Rights Act. In the counties in the Southeast coast, these more recent arrivals have more significant -- have hurdles to the voting process. The U. S. has more citizens coming in, and the failure for the Latinos to be accommodated with their national language -- Puerto Ricans have been residing in cities of New York for more than 150 years. In the 1990's they, like other Dominican groups, had no historic ties with large Latino populations, while in large cities like in New York, Hartford, Philadelphia, Boston, explaining the Voting Rights Act in smaller cities and towns have been introduced more recently in the face of rising issues in general. Race, employment, housing, other areas that have resulted in highly concentrated Latino segregation. In sections of New York its effectiveness in protecting the rights of Latinos and voting for candidates of their choice in New York City alone there are 25 Latino officials, most elected in the three counties that are covered by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. However, now, in the newer and faster growing Latino communities in the county of Queens, which is not covered by Section 5, there have been increasingly community questions for Section 5 Protection Rights. The challenges for the 2007 re-authorization is how to continue this protection in large communities where needed and, at the same time, in Latino communities in the smaller cities and towns, as well as part of where Latinos experience a more direct voters discrimination and communication. The first voting rights obligation for minorities is to go forward in its re-authorization in it's more complex and challenging context. The members of the Voting Right Networks have reported over time a recurring set of policies and practices that have undermined the voting rights of Latinos. These having to do with such things as "Racial gerrymandering," packaging, municipalities ignoring the rights of that district. Everything is to the exclusion of Latinos from the decision-making process. In the setting up of restricting rules, problems and practices, not providing the sufficient English-Spanish needs for the public hearings and other aspects of the redistricting process. The training of poll workers to identify foreign looking and sounding voters, to single out the ineligibility to vote. Poll workers are preventing millions from trying to vote and threatening them with being deported directly. They are instructing citizens not to vote. They are directing Spanish speakers to learn English or "Go back to your own country," Or raising objections as to the denial to register to vote in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands and the moving of no recorded places of necessary work request. The support of Puerto Rican policy and Puerto Rican defense and education is sponsored throughout the preliminary. And among other things, there has been a systematic documenting of these voting rights violations, how it has played in the protection of those rights. The Voting Rights Act continues to be an important part in assuring the full participation in the electoral process for it's continuing vigilance to our community and other communities, by assuring that the Voting Rights Act of Latinos are protected. The Voting Rights Act also protects the integrity of the electoral vote for all communities. Thank you for letting me express my views.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Garcia.

MR. CARTAGENA: Ms. Jung, if you don't mind, would you repeat for me the four cases you mentioned earlier, and would you just perhaps, if you know the area of Queens, where this occurred?

MS. JUNG: Well, first of all, I neglected to mention earlier that we do work with the Department of Justice as well as the Defense Fund, so the whole site that I mentioned earlier included poll site Q 2308 it's a Junior High School 73, and we know that there are 63 voters, 36 in that area. The next poll site was Q0086, P. S. 173 where there were 93 Koreans identified on the register to vote and then zero sited. P. S. 209, and that was 32 registered Koreans at that poll site.

MR. CARTAGENA: That was the image and what you mentioned for provisional ballots and how you were counseling people -- community education effort. If there were any questions they can find out that day. Have you considered whether it would also make sense to change whatever policies or procedures might exist in New Jersey, so that a provisional ballot would serve from that day forward? So this way, if a person -- if you can't find the name in a book and a person can find a provisional ballot by their place in the next election in the next year --

MR. MALDONADO: Well normally, if they assume, and I think that the procedure is, once they accept that provisional ballot, the individual would find ways to redistrict and they'd reject the registered voter, but transfer them into whatever correct address it might be, so it wouldn't occur again. I assume that that would be the proper procedure, but you don't want him to come back the following year with the same problem, so I think that they would use corrective measures, but if they find you in the district and you're eligible to vote within the state –

MR. CARTAGENA: So you have come across that problem.

MR. MALDONADO: It's a good question, because what we intend is for the person to have his right to vote. Once he accepts the provisional ballot, the county takes it from there and makes the decision. I'll give an example. The mayor of the City of Passaic. The first time he ran, the provisional ballot was not counted. It was never enacted on. The second time he ran and he was successful, we lost by 103 some odd votes. The second time he was successful and the provisional ballot existed and he got very close to 400 ballots. If that would have happened in the very first election who knows what the outcome of that election would have been at that time. So, as far as I'm concerned, the provisional ballot through the United States would be for the benefit to the voter, because a lot of times it's a form of discouragement when they can't find you in the books and so forth and so on. Because I'm sure what is testified on this issue pertains to Asian because it didn't turn the voter away from the provisional ballot. That's one of the things we don't want if this vote doesn't count. Because he came from a different district, because he had an opportunity to question that.

MR. LEE: Could you give us the name of the Mayor you're referring to.

MR. MALDONADO: Yes. His name is Sam Rivera.

MS. JUNG: Also, if I may, the problem with voters being turned away is certainly not just to the last community. It's simply to point out that our people monitoring where voters who have turned out to be on the books all along. Oneexample was a family of five. I personally accompanied them 30 minutes before they were polled because they were told repeatedly during the day that they were not on the census. I feel very strongly about this, that it's really important to have interpreters available on the polls. Sometimes it's used in a way to detect disenfranchisement. Whether it's a fact that they really should have been allowed to go in the first place.

MR. CARTAGENA: And the last question, Mr. Garcia, to your knowledge, you're familiar with the census policies as a result of your position in the policy, but to your knowledge. in this decade and going forward, will the Census conduct surveys on a more frequent basis?

MR. GARCIA: Yes. The Census is planning to serve a long term, which is happening in ten years. Internal communities, surveys would be yearly data that would be provided, not only would they deal with issues of language, but also they would deal with other policies. However, when we talk about the last community and specifically, Asian communities, the sample is not as good. The provision of ACS might not be all of them. Representation for the Latino survey can be under-counted. It would not be a good count for the planning provision under certain areas, but yes, it would be a community on a yearly basis. But there are still some issues for minority opportunities to deal with.

MR. LEE: Thank you.

MS. CRENSHAW: Thank you all for an informative panel. In the interest of time, I'm going to ask a few questions. My question is to Ms. Jung. I was really interested in the literacy in Section 203. I've always been puzzled by that as well, so I wanted to know whether you were aware of anyone attempting to qualify -- the attempts to conquer the literacy rights, and second, what would your recommendation, with respect to re-authorization be? Would you recommend the entire provision of illiteracy be eliminated or would you suggest some other form of provision?

MS. JUNG: Well, Commissioner, that second question, I think, goes to a higher standard. Effectively, that has been something that we begin to scratch our heads, so I think it's fair to say that many of our communities felt that they were not qualified and it was an unfair burden, an extra burden to not only meet the ten, now five percent -- we're growing, but to in fact, have higher than the National Average and that would be the very state the Congress requires.

MR. LEE: So the decision is to eliminate literacy rights.

MS. JUNG: What was the rationale behind that. The extra burden, where you're requiring certain communities to having certain greater incidents of literacy and particularly the Bronx, where I've seen increasing populations arise in New York City for Korean language, I think it's very -- there will be a higher need for the purpose of such provisions, and that is certainly true of other communities in say, today. That may be communities such as Bangladesh and others that are in great need of true network. It's something where even if it were necessarily protected by provisions. As of now, it's very easy for the Board Of Elections to happen to be bilingual, so to address your first question, our effort to quantify that effect, there has been no such studies on that particular question. However, it is very extremely true in particularly the Korean American community. I think that the literacy rate is probably in the 80 percent range, not higher. The fact that most people are reading the paper in their first language to get information. And I think despite this objection, it has had some impact. We, on our hot line election day, we did receive calls from voters outside of Queens who encountered problems in the polls. They didn't have the wherewithal to view those calls from the Bronx and Brooklyn and use that as a portents as to what was to come.

MS. CRENSHAW: And the second question, very quickly is for Mr. Garcia. Did I understand you correctly to say that in the Metropolitan area with the highest percentage are those that are covered by Section 5?

MR. GARCIA: Yes. The higher percentage of elected officials is where Section 5 now leans. For instance, you can take Jackson Heights, 88 percent of the community with a lack of language proficiency, the highest percentage of poverty, which means low in terms housing, segregation, political structure, and, it will be, I think, very beneficial for the betterment and integration of these communities who have Section 5. Much of their arsenals are basically to empower this community to be part of the system, to participate and so on, and support their issues.

MS. CRENSHAW: Thank you.

MR. LEE: I have a question for Mr. Garcia. Do you have any materials to document the proliferation of language minority communities throughout the Northeast?

MR. GARCIA: We definitely can create it.

MR. LEE: I think that would be helpful actually.

MR. GARCIA: Yes. I have mentioned this afternoon that many other people have mentioned 1965 and 1980 and so on, where urban issues were settled. That is not the case any more. You have small towns and issues. We are like in the first stage. Basically I would say incorporation, the political structure, I think, has homogenized this community and they are having a hard time being incorporated, and I think in a way, the re-authorization of the Voting Rights Act and the providing of Section 203 in the community would be better.

MS. JUNG: Well, as an organization, we would not be, on our own, able to provide that, but certainly with privileges -- that we work towards -- I think that would be in favor of, off the top of my head -- like New Jersey or Massachusetts. The population of the Asian American community politically tries to get to the exact level of the 10,000 mark, for example, but they are very close or almost getting there. But that, we can provide in partnership with other alliances.

MR. LEE: Mr. Davidson, I have a question for Ms. Jung, and it has to do with your statement a few minutes ago, that you feel the need for transparency on the election system, and one of the reasons you said is that you've provided the names of people who would be willing to work as poll workers, but many of these people didn't get appointed, and I was curious as to whether your group had contacted the officials and made any effort to get an explanation from them and allow more people to suggest it, like you had pointed out?

MR. DAVIDSON: Yes, I referred to that. In fact, we do more than just providing the names of potential workers. The Coalition which is an "Umbrella Group," which includes Latino groups, Asian American groups, and others to actively recruit by bringing workers. So this past election year, we were actually able to encourage members of our community not just to inquire, but to actually apply and submit and fill out applications. We have data on that. We've participated in every hearing by the Board Of Elections and have had meetings from time to time with the Board Of Admissions, also in New York City. And we have asked for more transparency. They didn't provide a roster of presenters of that pre-planned effort to use on prior notice, with respect to the process that they use to either reject or accept a person. One claim that we faced several times is that the district leader in election areas make the determined decision that gets connected to the various poll sites and that may be a poll right in New York City. However, it is not to our understanding. There is no requirement that that be the case, and so to that extent, it is the way it appears to be. We note that some of the communities were "under-serviced," and see ways in which neglecting to tap into those resources have not been a benefit to them.

MR. LEE: Thank you very much, panelists, Ms. Jung and others. It's been a long day, but I think that this has been really very, very helpful. And now, we have the last panel. A public testimony. The following individuals have identified themselves, if they could come up to the table, Kevin, from the New Democracy Coalition, Delores Watson from ACORN, and Colombina Santiago from ACORN. And if there are other members from the public who wish to testify, if they raise their hands, they can make some room at the table. Okay. Mr. Reynolds?

MR. PETERSON: Actually, Kevin Peterson.

MR. LEE: I'm sorry. The New Democracy Coalition is a nonprofit --

MR. PETERSON: Nonprofit, nonpartisan organization based in Boston.

MR. LEE: We referred to a little bit about Boston in the morning.

MR. PETERSON: My intention is to complement the speaker Ms. Cohen, to amplify her testimony. I hope that you accept these comments as broad and not specific focus on just Boston. With Boston, specifically as Director of the Civic Rights Organization I briefly want to testify, to give my support to your efforts to substantiate the necessity for you extending the Sections of the Voting Rights Act. Building efforts is indeed needed to broadcast the broad sentiments in support of this renewal effort. In countries so divided in terms of political entities, in which all Americans can agree on a united, collective stand, I applaud the Commissioners for organizing and the strategizement of this renewal. I do understand that the general purpose is to collect the documents of instances of voting rights abuses in forms of electoral justices, but thank you for extending to me, the voting rights as a means of articulating. The Voting Rights Act has been called the greatest of the Civil Rights Legislation of the 1960's. Public policy, expression of thoughts across the country. Forty years after it's passage, we marked it's incredible journey and in that and since the passage, two Blacks have been appointed to the Supreme Court, three elected to the U. S. Senate, and two have served as the Secretary of State, a man, and a woman. Whereas in the vote of registration, in 1965, such states as Mississippi and Alabama, it was 19 and 7 percent respectively, African-Americans, one of which was Ronald Walters out of the University of Maryland. Two Blacks out of 3. 6 percent registered voters, while Whites were 6. 7 percent. And the program in 2004, Blacks were 53 percent of those voters who came out to the polls, while White voters were 56 percent. With the passage of the VRA, the political fortunes of so-called minorities have also appointed Native Americans, and Asians have now taken seats in Congress and State Houses across the country. But more than this, the Voting Rights Act must be renewed because it now represents our collective commitments as a civil society. On a philosophical level, democracy within communities determine access to freedom and liberty. Democracy is a communal expression of those sentiments that concern the deepest well being of all citizens. In fact, that is a tool that we give ourselves. The municipalities and the national governments.

The Voting Rights Act enlivens all of the above. That is why it must be re-authorized. For decades, an unlettered and misunderstood daughter of a Mississippi sharecropper said,

"Nobody is free until everybody is free. " With this famous, simple speech, with power and persuasiveness, we note for the record, that our freedom to vote is presently being surveyed in Massachusetts. A recent study last being reported that up to 100,000 voters across the State are being dealt with. Serious problems across the country are that the voting machines in certain cities simply vanished on election day. In Georgia, they have enacted stricter voter identification. For these reasons, I want to put these comments on the record and encourage the commission that the Voting Rights Act be renewed and strengthened, as the Sections that are up for renewal are needed. Thank you.

MR. LEE: Thank you, Mr. Peterson. Mr. Thuy?

MR. THUY: Very quickly. I wasn't planning on testifying. I am here with Ms. Fung. Mr. Cartagena had asked the question, what would have happened if we only had Section 203 and only 65 percent coverage in New York. I want to examine that. In 1994, I mean the '90's had proposed creating separate but equal voting machines in New York. So one machine would be English one machine would be Chinese and that would create two segregated lines of all minorities and all the Whites -- oh, I mean the English speakers. All that opposed the segregated voting machines would have had access to requirements that we felt were improper under Section 5, particularly improper given that "equal but separate. " where hundreds of people of color would be problematic, we would oppose that. So in passing Section 5, we would have separate but equal voting machines in New York. We don't have it, so we are grateful to Section 5.

MR. LEE: But since you did come, Mr. Thuy, I asked earlier about the documentation of the ratio of the Asian minority throughout the Northeast area. Can your organization help on that?

MR. THUY: We are trying to develop that. That's an incredible project, and we are trying to do that. We will make it available to the commission, yes.

MR. LEE: Thank you.

MS. WRIGHT: My name is JoAnn Wright, W-R-I-G-H-T. I'm with ACORN and I'm going to be reading a testimony of ACORN. I also have Ada Lopez with me.

MR. LEE: We actually have a written testimony.

MS. WRIGHT: Most of the ACORN members are elderly and so I speak in there behalf. ACORN is a national grass roots organization with chapters in 86 cities around the country. We have 150 new members, all lower income families of color. So, I'm going to be reading the testimony of Delores Watson as a member of ACORN-Long Island. "Hello, my name is Dolores Watson, And I am an ACORN member from the Village of Hempstead, Long Island. I am here today representing our members on Long Island. I have been an ACORN member for 5 years, and have lived in Hempstead for 10 years. I am the president of my tenant association, a Democratic Committee person, and a member of the Working Families Party. I'm speaking today to tell you about the problems we have had in Nassau and Suffolk Counties on Long Island so you know how important it is to re-authorize these parts of the Voting Rights Act. When Mayor Garner ran for election in Hempstead in March 2001, the management of HUD senior citizen buildings told tenants that if they didn't vote for Mayor Garner, they would lose their apartments. At 260 Clinton, a senior HUD Building, the management put up flyers saying that HUD was coming out to inspect their apartments on Election Day and if they weren't home to let the HUD inspectors in, they would risk losing their apartments. ACORN was organizing in that building then, and so, the management was worried about people voting against Garner. We complained to the management and put out another flyer to tenants saying that management was just trying to scare them and that they couldn't take away their apartments. Management called a meeting with the tenants two nights before Election Day to say they were sorry and that they would change the day for the HUD inspections, but then, on Election Day, they still stood out front telling people that if you don't vote for Garner, you'll lose your apartment. Also, during that election, workers inside the polls were asking people if they were Democrat or Republican, and this was a general election, not a primary. They asked me and I got very angry and told them they couldn't ask people that. Poll inspectors were turning people away if they didn't tell them what party they belonged to. This past November, they had long lines even in the morning when I went to vote, because the poll workers were confused about which machine they should be telling people to vote on. They had three machines and they usually only just have one. The poll workers were sending people away and telling them to vote at Kennedy Park, and then the people at Kennedy Park were sending them back over to the middle school. When people were turned away from voting, I told them they should challenge that and ask for a provisional ballot, but once they've been hassled, they won't go back. ACORN has been working with the Long Island Immigrant Alliance on voting issues in Nassau and Suffolk Counties for a few years. Suffolk has been under the Department of Justice ruling, requiring Spanish and English signs at polling places for 12 years, but they didn't really do anything until the last year. A bilingual poll inspector there was told by her supervisor not to speak Spanish in the polling place. In 2003, we did a press conference at the Suffolk elections office and got in the press, and so finally, the Department of Justice pushed them last year and made them call us. The elections office finally sent out notices of the election coming up in Spanish, but it was translated by a computer, so no one could understand it. We did a survey to see if people had signs in Spanish in the polling places and asked how do you handle people speaking only Spanish, and the main result we found was that poll inspectors need more training. Nassau County, where Hempstead is, has been under the Department of Justice ruling requiring Spanish and English signs at polling places for 2 or 3 years, and they have been working with us and trying to get better, but they need to do much more voter education and outreach. We suggested to them that they put the Spanish on the same sign as the English, because what was happening is they put up the English signs and not the Spanish signs. There is also a special hotline for Spanish speakers to call on Election Day, but the poll inspectors didn't even know about it. ACORN had a series of meetings with the Nassau County Department of Justice, bringing them ideas and pushing them forward, and the county has doubled the amount of Spanish poll inspectors and made other improvements. We have made progress over the last few years, but only with pushing and with the help of the Department of Justice. We need to re-authorize these sections of the Voting Rights Act so that people know they can't intimidate voters and have to protect everyone's voting rights. Testimony of Colombina Santiago. My name is Colombina Santiago, and I am an ACORN member from the City of Passaic in New Jersey and I am here today representing our members in Passaic County. I have been an ACORN member for three years and am a graduate of ACORN's leadership school. In 2002, my home was the headquarters for a "Get out the vote drive," and I increased the turnout in my precinct from 95 to 134 voters. I want to thank you for listening to my testimony, since I want to make sure that our rights as voters are protected. In Passaic County there is a history of voter intimidation, especially against voters who speak Spanish. My home was the headquarters of a "Get our the vote project" in my neighborhood and we had some problems. Many people we talked to were voting for the first time and were very excited. There was a problem with absentee ballots though. Many people got them, but didn't fill them out and wanted to vote at the polls instead. When they got to the polls, they were told they couldn't vote and weren't offered a provisional ballot. I got a ride to Paterson on Election Day to turn in my ballot at the elections office and make sure my vote counted. In 2002, Latino voters got a letter telling them that armed police officers would be out at the polls, and I think this scared away a lot of people who wanted to vote. In the City of Passaic, the administration tells businesses that they have to put up signs supporting the current leaders, and if not, they will have a hard time. In Clifton, another city in Passaic County, every election they try to make it English only, and don't want to have information and ballots in Spanish and other languages, even though lots of people didn't learn English as their first language. I don't speak English well, but I am very active in my community. I have even been to Washington and spoken with our Congressmen, and I want to make sure my vote counts. Please re-authorize these important parts of the Voting Rights Act and protect the voice of al American citizens.

MR. LEE: Thank you.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you very much for your testimony.

MR. LEE: Thank you very much. Well, that brings an end our Northeast Regional Hearing on the National Voting Right Act. It's been a long day, but I think that all the Commissioners agree that it's been extremely valuable. I confess, I was born in New York City and there is a lot of change that has gone into effect. Certainly there have been needs for the Voting Rights Act, but there are new facts that are on the ground, and it's interesting to me that there has been a credible disproportion of the minority population language. It's interesting, the differences between Section 5, coverage between the districts in New York, and noncoverage in Queens and Staten Island. We have heard some interesting testimony about Section 203 and observers, and what struck me was the extent of the demographic change in these areas and the implications it has for the issue we are charged to report about. Do any of the Commissioners want to make any comments? Commissioner Buchanan is never at a loss of word.

MR. BUCHANAN: To the great regret of my colleagues, I would like to compare the commissioners to the wise lawyers of Chicago and they said, "what we shall do in this country is to make promises on paper for the Constitution and the Bill of Rights to be of help all over the world and America." I grew up in a part of the country which was mostly African American and European American. It is impressive, and it has been a rich experience to hear these witnesses say that they want to remind you that they're one people.

MR. LEE: John Buchanan, thank you, very much.

NATIONAL COMMISSION
ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

MIDWEST REGIONAL HEARING

11:00 A.M. JULY 22, 2005

DORSEY & WHITNEY LLP
SUITE 1500
50 SOUTH SIXTH STREET
MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA 55402

MR. CARLSON: Good morning. I'd like to welcome you all to the Midwest hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act.

My name is Steve Carlson. I'm one of the two pro bono partners at Dorsey & Whitney, and I want to welcome you all to Dorsey & Whitney for this hearing.

At Dorsey & Whitney in the participation of this project, we've had a team of lawyers and summer associates who have been involved in working on the report. And I want to acknowledge Mike Pignato and Chris Shaheen who have been involved in the project and leading this from the Dorsey perspective. On a personal note, two things. I wanted to indicate how much we enjoy working with the Lawyers' Committee on Civil Rights. They've just been very much involved in this project.

And also just to mention that I have been reading just this week, refreshing and taking a look at the speech that President Lyndon Johnson gave when he proposed the Voting Rights Act after the march in Selma, Alabama. And I've been reading that piece because it was striking both in what a distance we've traveled in 40 years but also what a distance we have to go. It's my privilege to introduce Jon Greenbaum, who will be taking things over. Jon is the director of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act and the director for the Voting Rights Project of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. As director of the Voting Rights Project, Mr. Greenbaum is responsible for the Lawyers Committee's efforts to secure racial justice and equal access to the voting process for all voters. From 1997 to 2003, Mr. Greenbaum was a trial attorney in the voting section of the Department of Justice, the civil rights division, where he enforced the Voting Rights Act to protect the rights of minority citizens throughout the United States. Mr. Greenbaum.

MR. GREENBAUM: Thanks, Steve. Good morning, everybody. Thank you so much for coming out. I want to thank Dorsey & Whitney for the tremendous amount of effort that they've put into today's hearing, including a 200-page report for the commissioners that goes through the 14 states that are part of today's hearing, as well as the hospitality that Dorsey & Whitney have shown in putting this event on, and we're very much appreciative. The Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights under Law has been dedicated to civil rights issues for the last 4years. And right at the -- right in the center of that is the issue of voting and the Voting Rights Act. On behalf of the Civil Rights Committee, the Lawyers' Committee created the National Commission to look at the record of discrimination and voting as Congress looks at reauthorization of certain portions of the Voting Rights Act.

And we're very honored to have the group of commissioners and guest commissioners that are part of this process. And I want to turn it over to Bill Lann Lee, who is chair of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. Bill is a partner of the firm of Leiff, Cabraser, Heinmann & Bernstein in San Francisco. Prior to that, from 1997 to 200he was the Assistant Attorney General for civil rights appointed by President Clinton. And for 17 years prior to that he worked for the NAACP Legal Defense in Education Fund. And for several of those years he was the Legal Defense Fund's western regional office head in Los Angeles. Bill.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you very much, Jon. Well, good morning. On behalf of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, I welcome you today to the fourth of nine public hearings that the commission will be conducting.

This hearing covers the Midwest Region and will look at the state of discrimination and voting in 14 states: Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, Wisconsin and Wyoming. In our previous hearings, we've heard some compelling testimony about voting discrimination and the impact of the Voting Rights Act on minority voters in the South, Southwest and Northeast.

Today's testimony will examine the experiences of African-American, American Indian, American and Latino voters in the Midwest; as you know, a vast, diverse region. I'd like to start off with some background about the Voting Rights Act. The Act was signed into law, as you heard, in 1965 by President Lyndon Johnson in response to voting discrimination encountered by African-Americans in the South.

When Congress reauthorized the Act in 1975, it made specific findings that the use of English only elections and other devices effectively barred minority language citizens from participating in the electoral process. In response, Congress expanded the Act to account for discrimination against language minority citizens, and we see that through Section 203. Before discussing Section 5 and Section 203 in greater detail, I want to explain what is scheduled to expire in 2007 and what is not. The right of African-Americans and other minorities to vote is guaranteed by the 15th Amendment and is permanent. The urban legends you've heard that African-Americans will lose the right to vote in 2007 are simply not true.

The permanent provisions of the Act ban literacy tests and poll taxes, outlaw intimidation, authorize federal monitors and observers, and create various mechanisms to protect the voting rights of racial and language minorities. However, there are some temporary provisions of the Voting Rights Act that will sunset in 2007 unless they are reauthorized by Congress. Now, these are temporary provisions, but keep in mind they have been in effect for over 20 years.

Now, what are these expiring provisions? First, Section 5 of the Act requires certain states, counties and townships with a history of discrimination against minority voters to obtain approval or preclearance from the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. or the United States District Court in D.C. before they make any voting changes.

Now, these changes can include redistricting, changes to methods of election, polling place changes, things of that kind. Jurisdictions covered by Section 5 must prove that the changes do not have the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority. In this region, two counties in South Dakota and two counties in Michigan are covered by Section 5.

Second, Section 203 of the Act requires that language assistance be provided to communities with a significant number of voting age citizens who have limited English proficiency. Four language groups are covered by Section 203: American Indians, Asian-Americans, Alaska natives and those of Spanish heritage. Covered jurisdictions must provide language assistance at all stages of the electoral process. As of 2002, a total of 466 local jurisdictions across 3states are covered by these provisions. In this region, 37 counties and one township are subject to Section 203 requirements.

Third, several sections of the Act authorize the Attorney General to appoint a federal examiner to jurisdictions covered by Section 5's preclearance provision on good cause or to send a federal observer to any jurisdiction where a federal examiner has been assigned. This is a very important provision. Since 1966, 25,000 federal observers have been deployed in approximately 1,000 elections. Let me now tell you a little bit about the commission's purpose and its membership. As you heard, the Lawyers' Committee acting on behalf of the Civil Rights Committee created a nonpartisan commission to examine discrimination voting since 1982, the last time the Act was extended.

The commission is comprised of eight advocates, academics, legislators and civil rights leaders who represent the diversity that is such an important part of our nation. The honorary chair of the commission is the Honorable Charles Mathias, former Republican senator from Maryland.

The other six national commissioners are the Honorable John Buchanan, former congressman from Alabama. Chandler Davidson, scholar and editor of one of the seminal works about the Voting Rights Acts. Delores Huerta, co-founder of the United Farmers Workers. Elsie Meeks, the first Native American member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights. Charles Ogletree, a renowned Harvard law professor and civil rights advocate. The Honorable Joe Rogers, former lieutenant governor of Colorado. Commissioners Davidson, Meeks and Rogers are present today. We are also fortunate to have the legendary Matthew Little, chair of the Minneapolis NAACP serving as this hearing's guest commissioner. The commission has two primary tasks: first to conduct these regional hearings, to gather testimony and information relating to voting rights. And second, to write a comprehensive report detailing the existence of discrimination in voting since 1982.

The report will be used to educate the public, advocates and policy-makers about the record of racial discrimination in voting. We've all read the newspapers, and there seems to be emerging a bipartisan consensus that the Voting Rights Act ought to be extended. However, under our existing legal standards, in order to get that, and if that is appropriate and it should be done, there needs to be a factual record examining what is the state of discrimination in voting rights. Does it still exist, how pervasive, how extensive. And we need to find out what is the record. Should the Act be extended, should the Act be improved. Those are kinds of issues that we're addressing, and we're trying to create a record so that Congress and the public can act in a manner that's informed and cognizant of the reality of voting rights today.

There are going to be five panels of speakers today. The first four panels will be comprised of members of the US and state legislatures, leading voting rights practitioners and members of the community who have been active in voting rights issues. Each panelist will provide a five- to 10-minute presentation.

After all the members of the panel have spoken, the commission will address questions to the panelists. We encourage members of the public who are here to share their voting rights experiences in our fifth and final panel of the day. If you are interested, please speak with some of our staff members. Maybe they could stand.

There's Marcia. Please see Marcia if you're a member of the public and wish to testify later this afternoon. Now I'm going to introduce each of the commissioners who are present at today's hearing and each will make a short opening statement. Commissioner Chandler Davidson is the Radoslav Tsanoff Professor of Public Policy Emeritus, and served as the department of -- and is chair of the department of sociology at Rice University in Texas. Dr. Davidson was the co-author of the "Quiet Revolution In The South," a definitive work on the impact of the Voting Rights Act in the South. Dr. Davidson, among other things, testified before Congress during the 198reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. Commissioner Davidson.

MR. CHANDLER: Thank you. I'm very pleased to be in the interesting and beautiful city of Minneapolis today. As a longtime scholar of minority voting rights, I'm very concerned that all adult Americans have the unimpeded right to vote and to have their votes accurately counted. I'm therefore eager to hear testimony on the subject today.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Elsie Meeks is the first American Indian to serve on the United States Commission on Civil Rights in its 48-year history. I must say it's long overdue. But Ms. Meeks has spent most of her adult life working to improve the conditions that exist in some of the nation's poorest communities by promoting economic development. Ms. Meeks is currently executive director of the first nation's Oweesta Corporation, a national financing intermediary that assists American Indians in establishing community development financial institutions. Commissioner Meeks.

MR. MEEKS: Thank you. I'm so pleased to be able to serve on this, as a commissioner on this panel. I just don't think that we can take for granted, coming from Indian country myself, that we can take for granted that our rights will always be upheld. And so these hearings are very important, and we will appreciate all the testimony given. So thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Joe Rogers completed his term as lieutenant governor of Colorado in 2003 where he held the distinction of serving as America's youngest lieutenant governor and only the fourth African-American in the United States history ever to hold the position. We have some commissioners who have established landmarks in our history. Joel Rogers served as founding chairman of the Republican Lieutenant Governors Association, has served on the executive committee of the National Conference of Lieutenant Governors. Mr. Rogers created the acclaimed Dream Alive Program in dedication to the memory and legacy of Martin Luther King, Junior and the leaders of the civil rights movement. Commissioner Rogers.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. You all, it's just good to be with you today. I often would not say that, by the way, about Minneapolis. We have played a football game or two, as you well know, with the Denver Broncos. But it's good to be here. I'm delighted to join you now. We're excited, frankly, about the idea of hearing testimony, obviously, in this region of the United States. As you well know, the issues in terms of civil rights have been definitive issues in many respects for the United States of America. They define, in essence, who it is that we are with respect to not only ourselves but in many respects with respect to our world. And when you look at the key pieces of civil rights legislation, you're essentially talking about the 1964 Civil Rights Act, as you know, that landmark piece of legislation which fundamentally changed the life in America for all of us of all different races, creeds, colors and backgrounds. It helped to really bring about the full substance of what obviously President Lincoln talked about in terms of the Emancipation Proclamation, and even dating back, frankly, to what President Washington talked about in the founding of this great nation, what it is that we would be about as one nation under God with a sense of liberty and justice for all. The other key piece of legislation, obviously the Voting Rights Act in 1965, as the chairman has pointed out and Jon has pointed out, central to the substance of who it is that we are, our ability fundamentally to vote and guaranteeing that right to vote is, in essence, key to our life and way of life as Americans. And obviously following that was a another key piece of legislation which dealt with housing. Those three pieces of civil rights legislation fundamentally altered America. So we're glad to be here today. We're looking forward to testimony that each one of you will present. Thank you kindly.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I'd like to point out that Commissioner Rogers, when he served as lieutenant governor of Colorado, was particularly active on Native American issues. Commissioner Matthew Little needs no introduction in this town; however, I've been asked to do so. He has been somewhat active in civil rights for the last 40 -- 50 years or more. And as president of the Minnesota NAACP, he organized busloads of activists to attend the historic 1963 march on Washington. And he probably remembers when the '65 Civil Rights Act was passed with its voting rights provisions. Commissioner Little recently supported the NAACP lawsuit against the government of Minnesota which charged that the public schools had failed to provide equal educational opportunity to all children. Commissioner Little.

MR. LITTLE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. First of all, I want to express my appreciation on the part of the city of Minneapolis that it has been chosen for this hearing. And also, of course, Dorsey & Whitney Law Firm who has really been completely in support of the NAACP in its efforts throughout the years as far as pro bono support. So I am -- those are two things I'm very proud of.

And having to act, having been actively working in the field of civil rights for the last half century or so, I've certainly seen an awful lot of changes, not only throughout the country and the South but also in Minnesota. For example, here regularly there was a time when I first came to Minnesota in which Minneapolis was held nationally as the anti-Semitic champion of the United States. And to give just an idea of the kind of prejudices that were here that was prior to the Humphrey era, of course, who was -- who changed things so dramatically in that regard, and had a tremendous hand in the passage of the civil rights as a leader in Congress at the time. As a matter of fact, he was a whip at that time.

And so things have changed dramatically, but it has still not reached the point of Martin Luther King's dream; that is an ongoing process.

But I do think one of the keys to all of that again is voting rights. I think that one of the things that held African-Americans back so long was the lack of being able to vote, which is so American and so important. And for all those reasons, I am indeed honored to be here, a commissioner here, and welcome the rest of the commissioners and the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. We welcome them here, and I hope that the testimony that we receive here will be of some assistance for their overall aim of the commission. Thank you very much.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you. The commission wishes to thank Dorsey & Whitney not only for its hospitality in providing us this wonderful facility to hold the hearing but for the excellent report. I have to confess I didn't see this report until earlier this morning, and I haven't had a chance to read it.

But it obviously is going to be substantially helpful in one of the key objectives of this fact-finding effort, which is ferreting out all those voting rights cases that not even lawyers from the civil rights division of the Department of Justice have known about. Particularly in this region, which is usually not thought of as a place where the Voting Rights Act has had an impact, I think these cases that you've ferreted out are really going to be very helpful. And I think one of the themes that's emerged in all of our hearings is that because of the long time span that we're talking about, people sometimes forget the substantial number of cases that have actually been filed and litigated and the kinds of problems that have arisen in various areas that have been dealt with not just through litigation but by protests and other means.

So I'd like to thank Dorsey & Whitney in particular for their substantial assistance in preparing this wonderful report. We're going to take a short break and ask the panelists on the first panel to come forward and we'll get set up. So we'll take a break for about two minutes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We're going to start the first panel with some -- two congressional statements. And why don't we have the congressional statements read by the lawyer from the Lawyers' Committee, and then we'll go going directly into the first panel. The two statements are from William Lacy Clay from the First District of Missouri and Congressman Emanuel Cleaver from the Fifth District of Missouri.

MR. GOLDMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, members of the commission. My name is Jonah Goldman. I'm a lawyer with the Voting Rights Project at the Lawyers' Committee. The first statement is, as the chairman suggested, from Congressman William Clay for the First District of Missouri.

Dear National Commissioners on the Voting Rights Act: I am writing this letter to convey my strong support for the Voting Rights Act that was enacted in 1965 Since 1965, the Voting Rights Act has been essential in ensuring that all citizens, regardless of race, ethnicity and language and skills are guaranteed the right to vote. Not only are citizens assured the right to vote by this Act but they are guaranteed that their vote will be counted fairly and accurately.

Some may argue that we have come a long way since 1965. They may claim that racial injustice and discrimination are no longer condoned as they once were, and that those dark and disgraceful years of American history are over. These same people might believe that no citizen in America is kept from exercising his or her right to vote by fraud, discrimination, misleading information or unreasonable laws, but they are wrong. Voter disenfranchisement continues to be a national problem.

In light of the 2000 elections in Florida, it is absurd to argue that fraud does not exist in our electoral system. When thousands of voters were turned away from voting booths because of their race and their political affiliations and numerous ballots thrown out because they favored one candidate over another, how can we claim that there's no discrimination in the voting process? I believe history will reveal that more should have been done to investigate these claims and bring to justice those persons or groups responsible for the election impropriety.

Florida is not the only state that had a breakdown in the voting process. Numerous Missouri voters experienced a similar turmoil. I was quite disheartened by some of the events that took place in Missouri during the 2000 elections. I found it disturbing that St. Louis election officials routinely violated state and federal law in the implementation of Missouri Statute Section 115.195. This statute specifically limits the use of the inactive voter list. It states that the inactive voter designation can only be used to determine the number of ballots to be printed, to compute the proportional cost of elections or to facilitate mailing information to registered voters. The allow does not give election officials authority to purge the names of inactive voters from the election rolls. It is meant to ensure that voters' rights are protected and not denied because the voter has relocated or the U.S. Postal Service has failed to updated its records.

St. Louis City and County violated this law by keeping records differentiating between active and inactive voters, and then denying those identified as inactive voters from voting when they came to the polls. Another issue of great concern that undermines voting rights is the use of provisional ballots. I firmly believe that provisional ballots are detrimental to our democracy. A federal judge in Missouri ruled that the state is not required to count provisional ballots if they are cast outside the voter's own precinct. After the 2004 elections, there were reports that poll workers failed to distribute provisional ballots, and that many did not understand the legal issues surrounding these ballots. Clearly the provisional ballot law is confusing. It lends itself to interpretation by ill-informed election officials and must be eliminated. Missouri voters should not be turned away at the polls because of a misinterpretation of the law. Due to the numerous failings that still plague the election process, I strongly believe that the Voting Rights Act is vital to ensure that every citizen has the opportunity to vote and that each vote is counted.

According to the Department of Justice, the Voting Rights Act has been called the single most effective piece of civil rights legislation ever passed by Congress. In Mississippi, the difference in voting registration rates between blacks and whites went from numbers as high as 63.3 percent to 6.3 percent. In Louisiana, this number went from 48.9 percent to negative percent. This is nothing short of a testament to the effectiveness of this Act. Although we have come a long ways since the days of Jim Crow and the grandfather clause, we must realize that there will always be individuals and groups who will try to manipulate the voting process in order to advance their own agenda. We must protect this constitutional right that so many have struggled and died for. We must ensure that the Voting Rights Act is reauthorized. Sincerely, William Lacy Clay, member of Congress. The second statement is from Congressman Emanuel Cleaver from the Fifth Congressional District of Missouri.

I would like to begin by commending the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act for their ongoing struggle for civil rights. Composed of some of the most distinguished contemporary civil rights leaders, the commission provides a sign of hope that voter discrimination will be addressed. It is unfortunate that voter discrimination still exists in this country, but it is imperative that it be addressed head on. I firmly believe no collective body is as qualified to address this issue as the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. It is an honor to provide my testimony to this commission.

As we all know, the Voting Rights Act was passed by Congress in 1965 because certain people, mainly African-American citizens, were being silenced at the polls. At first the Act only monitored a few Southern states where blatant evidence regarding the disenfranchisement of African-Americans voters existed. These states were required to receive federal approval before passing any election laws, and were forbidden from using eligibility tests at the polls. By 1970, the Voting Rights Act was extended to certain jurisdictions around the entire country, not just jurisdictions within specific Southern states. In addition, the Act was amended enabling private citizens to challenge discriminatory election laws in court. Nationwide, voters were no longer required to take literacy tests before registering to vote and the Act was extended for five more years.

Several adjustments were made to the Act over the following decade. In 1975, bilingual assistance became a requirement at election polls, protecting citizens whose language is not English. Revisions were also made in 1982, including a clause that the administrative provisions of the Voting Rights Act shall expire in 2007. These provisions include the provisions under Section 5 that require preclearance for new or changing election laws. The year 2007 is not too far from now. It is questionable whether the rights of voters are safe from discrimination. Despite the measures of the Voting Rights Act, thousands of people were again denied their right to vote in the 2000 presidential election. Thirty-five years from the passage of the Voting Rights Act, it was mainly African-American citizens who were turned away. An estimated 1.9 million votes were discounted in the 2000 election. One million of those were cast by African-American citizens. Voting discrimination in the 2000 election is perhaps best illustrated by the state of Florida where African-Americans were nearly 10 times as likely to have their ballots rejected. In spite of the revisions made to the original Voting Rights Act, the color of a person's skin is still a deciding factor in whether his or her vote does or does not count in an election.

Growing up in Texas, voting was never discussed because the Cleavers, including my grandfather and great grandfather, were poor. They could not afford to pay the poll tax which African which African Americans were required to pay. While I cannot make up for lost voting years for my ancestors, I can help assure my children that I am working to lessen the barriers. The Voting Rights Act is the mother's milk for African-Americans' political power. It was a milestone in the fight for civil rights, and I strongly believe in its principles of equality and opportunity for all people to voice their opinion, regardless of skin color. It is imperative that we keep these principles alive at the ballot box, and renewal of the Voting Rights Act is critical to preserving those protections for Americans of all races. Various proposals have been made by Congress that would actually serve to undermine the constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act, creating more voting barriers for many minorities across the country. As congressmen I will carefully examine all proposals to renew or alter the Voting Rights Act to ensure all Americans are afforded the opportunity to be part of a free and fair election.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, Jonah, I hope you will convey to Congressmen Clay and Cleaver our thanks on behalf of the commission. I also understand Congresswoman Gwen Moore of Wisconsin's Fourth Congress District is going to be available sometime today to participate in these hearings I guess telephonically. So we look forward to that. But let's go forward with our panel. The first panelist is Mark Ritchie. He's the executive director of National Voice, a Minneapolis based coalition of nonprofit and community groups working to maximize public participation in the nation's democratic process. In 2004 Mr. Ritchie led a nationwide effort to help churches, businesses, neighbor groups and nonprofit organizations, all on a nonpartisan basis, to increase voter registration, and I understand it resulted in five million new voters.

Mr. Ritchie is also the president of the Minneapolis based Institute for Agriculture and Trade Policy, another nonprofit, working to foster long-term economic social and economic sustainability for Minnesota's family farmers and rural communities. Welcome, Mr. Ritchie. Some of us have an earlier version of your testimony and we can -- when we receive your written testimony, you can put that in the record.

MR. RITCHIE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and members of the commission. I want to thank you for coming here and including the Midwest in your deliberations and in your considerations. I felt for a long time as someone who grew up in the South but has lived in many parts of the country that the Voting Rights Act needs to be seen and felt as a national treasure, not as something that was imposed on one region, and so I feel like this is a very important opportunity to nationalize some of those concerns. In my work in the last two years doing voter registration, working with organizations doing voter registration and Get-Out-The-Vote, we had a lot of opportunities to see how far we've come. We've also had a lot of opportunities to see a number of the problems. I don't want to dwell totally on the problems, but that is part of building the record for the reauthorization, so I will address a few of those in my time. There are more in the written testimony.

But in our state of Minnesota which I want to focus on specifically, we had about 300, 340 organizations that were part of a Minnesota participation project doing voter restriction, specific education in all their communities. In that process, we began to alert local communities and community leaders, be they from the church or the business council or some other organization, about possible or potential problems and about things that they need to be aware of and paying attention to. And it turned out that Minnesota was a target especially of very aggressive challenges in the polling place. We had a very large number of paid challengers who came from outside the state. We had several instances of actual altercations, police had to be called. But one of the -- let's call it a positive outcome of that attempt to intimidate and to discriminate is that our state legislature has, in fact, passed legislation which bars paid outside challengers from future polling places in our state. So we began to see that some of our preparation and our involvement of people in the voting registration process then help build a more informed and possibly a more, uhm, aggressive in the sense of defending voting rights in the general population, and this was a very important aspect of our work.

But there were other quite visible -- some might consider them quite illegal, but activities that took place that turned out to be forms of intimidation and attempted discrimination. The one that was of particular concern to me, because of watching people's reaction all day, was the posting of signs that came from our secretary of state's office that said, this polling place may be the target of a terrorist attack. This kind of thinking, of course, is, you know, quite common in our country at the moment, but when it is applied very specifically to scaring people about their polling place, I think we've reached a new level, perhaps a new low level in the attempt to use the current national and international security situation to intimidate and discourage voters. And, of course, we're very upset about this, and there's been quite a bit of controversy about that.

There were other specific examples, several occasions where voting election officials of our state government had to be taken to court or to administrative court. Perhaps the most important, and I hope that you'll hear more about this today or we can talk about it more, was the attempt to prohibit the use of tribal IDs in the voting registration process. We were able to successfully challenge our secretary of state on that point, but it was just an example of another thing that was an attempt to be put in front of, put in front of voters to just make it more complicated.

Perhaps our situation in Minnesota in those specific examples is of some use in thinking about the future and some potential changes. But I think there's another set of experiences that we have that I think might be important in shaping a voting rights act and other civil rights legislation going forward, and that's the very fast pace of evolution of our demographics and especially of our languages. We have suburban high schools very near right here where there are more than 40 languages spoken today. I don't think people think of Minnesota this way yet, but, in fact, we are very rapidly changing our community. And in our rural communities there are many rural communities where over half of the kindergarten classes are now not of European origin and there are many languages being spoken from -- really from every continent, from Asia, from Africa, from Latin America.

And this change in our own demographics and rapid change in our language situation is first being absorbed at the level of the schools, the hospitals and law enforcement, because that's the first place where, as a community, we interact with each other and there are, you know, emergency situations or daily situations, that kind of thing. But we're now beginning to face this more and more in our civil organizations, in our trials and our legal affairs and also, of course, in voting.

And so while I think those provisions of the Voting Rights Act have not received perhaps as much attention as they might, and, of course, they have been somewhat limited in the language that's covered and all of that, I believe that our life experience here, and not just in Minnesota, but I believe in the whole region is beginning to push us to say, we have to take this into consideration more directly, and we have to perhaps rethink part of how we imagine the Voting Rights Act working to bring the language provisions much more forward to expand them and then to see what are the triggers or what are the changes.

I believe that most people -- and I have been privileged to be able to meet with many of the county auditors who normally are the election officials at the local level, sometimes it's in a city. They are, of course, concerned about this change happening because, you know, they want to do a good job. They are also aware that there's costs and there's Help America Vote Act implementation for disabilities, there's all kinds of things coming down on the heads of election officials at the local level, and they are being met with extreme cuts in funding assistance from the state. Minnesota, I believe, is not unique in the heavy cutting from state to local. So these two things might make some local election officials perhaps more resistant or feel somewhat pressurized. But my sense is that they want to do a very good job. They need the resources, but having something like the Voting Rights Act, it helps become a more positive, not just a punitive or negative force, might be a way to also engage this conversation more broadly.

There have been, of course, Supreme Court and other court decisions that have weakened some components, those kinds of things, that people in this region are not very aware of, but we are aware of the general process by which good legislation can be weakened, can be undermined by certain court rulings in one place or another. And with the new national debate about the Supreme Court and the new justice and all of this, I think people in this region have concerns that need to be expressed about those parts of it.

There is another aspect that I believe that our state and our regional experience might be of use in terms of building the records in a very positive sense, and that's that our nation's military, the active, the reserves, National Guard is often and largely drawn from communities of color. It's often from low income communities as well. This is a very big factor in many communities. And at the moment, many of our troops are overseas. And the military in this state, especially I'm most aware of the reserves, which is our largest component, invested heavily in making sure that all of our troops overseas were able to vote. And Major Coulihan who was responsible for that program was the assigned staff for that, was part of a larger team. So there was a tremendous investment of leadership at a time when their leadership staff are quite stretched, and money to make sure that all the troops knew what was going on, how they could vote, just a very tremendous process. Very successful.

But it's also a reminder that other parts of our government ought to also be investing in democracy. Military took a real leadership position in our state making this happen, but they set an example that we are now trying to get other parts of the government to understand that that form of investment is what it takes to make the democracy work, especially if your concern is making sure there isn't discrimination. We are going to have tremendous numbers of voters overseas in the military for a long time. Next year's elections will be conducted with many Minnesotans in Iraq and Afghanistan. And so I'm hopeful that our military here will continue to invest, but I'm also hopeful that their example will continue to inspire people in other parts of government to make the same investment. Let me close quickly to stay within my time.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you, Mr. Ritchie.

MR. RITCHIE: We have five recommendations that I want to draw your attention to at the back. We're not particularly innovative or revolutionary here. We think the Act has been good and needs to be strengthened and renewed. We also think that there are ways that the Act should start to feel more like a national treasure than it has been seen by some as a punitive measure. And finally, we do believe that we were experiencing rapid changes, particularly on the language side, that might imply some changes might be necessary or some supplemental ideas might be necessary going forward. Again, thank you very much for this opportunity. I look forward to any questions and discussions after today.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We're going to go ahead now with the testimony of Alice Tregay who's testifying on behalf of Rainbow/PUSH. Ms. Tregay has been a nonstop advocate for positive change through grass root politics, particularly in the Illinois and Chicago area, for many decades. Welcome, Ms. Tregay.

MS. TREGAY: Thank you. I really feel like I'm an amateur here but I have been --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: It is we who are the amateurs.

MS. TREGAY: I have been with the Rainbow/PUSH since its inception. And Reverend Jackson has -- for the last six months had petitions out for the Voting Rights Act to ensure that it gets signed. And we're having a rally August the 6th in Atlanta, Georgia and hopefully people will come from all over the country to rally for the Voting Rights Act. Reverend Jackson can't solve the problems of the federal -- that we need at the Rainbow/PUSH, but the federal government offers protection to Americans seeking to vote for officials of their choice. Without legislation such as the Voting Rights Act, we cannot ensure justice and equality for all Americans in the exercise of this constitutional right. The problems concerning districts of the wards of Chicago and barriers to voting access in Chicago illustrates how important the Voting Rights Act is to protecting African-Americans' and Hispanics' right to vote.

In the City of Chicago in 1982, they had an alderman named Keane who had gone to prison, but when he got out, they asked him to draw up the map for the City of Chicago. We were 40 percent of the population there. And he decided that we didn't deserve but 17 wards but we really were over 19 wards. And we had to go to court. This is the year Harold Washington was elected. And it took three years before that court case came to bear in the court system, and we got the other two aldermen and we got two more Hispanics. So it does change when people fight for the right for proper representation. And I went all off of this piece of paper.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, Ms. Tregay, we have your testimony and it will be in the record, so you don't have to feel bound to cover everything that's in the testimony. You could hit the highlights.

MS. TREGAY: All right. There's several things that are wrong in, in the city of Chicago. And by the way, one of the aldermen that was elected in that year turned out to be a US congressman. Today he's Luis Gutierrez. It continues, even now, the gerrymandering of the wards. And I brought a map for you all to see. And just, just one ward. And I'm not showing you all of them, just one. This is the second ward. And what they're doing to keep the voting -- wait a minute, I think I have it upside down. This is the second ward in Chicago. This is one ward out of 50, and it goes everywhere. And what they do, and they get the black and the Hispanic aldermen to go along with it because our mayor is a very strong mayor and he keeps them in office.

So Hispanics still don't have the correct amount of representation and blacks are down also. So we have to somehow get the people who draw these maps -- this was going on in 1982, again in 2002, so nothing changed. I mean, this is 30 years. Everything is the same. In our last election in Chicago, we had -- in 2004, the primary, 13,424 voters in majority black wards who were incorrectly challenged and took the extra step at the polls to restore their voting right status with 3,700 voters. The majority white wards in 2000 and majority Latino wards, those who did not have enough identification either had to go home or to use provisional ballots. Those provisional ballots were not counted, most of them. They have another way that they do of taking people off the roll. They go and send out -- the ward committeemen send out precinct captains to check to see if you live there. Not only do you live there, I had a six-flat with my name on the front of the building and on the mailbox, and I was taken off the rolls. I had to get myself put back on, and it wasn't hard to do because I have a loud voice.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We're aware of that, ma'am.

MS. TREGAY: So what we do, we found a whole lot of people. They even took their own employees off the rolls. And they, they were in -- or during my training they said, "They took me off the rolls." And I said, "No, they didn't. You work for the board." But they, they have all kinds of ways that they want to take people off the rolls. I have a friend named Dorella who's lived in the building for 25 years. And she moved from one apartment to the other, and she changed her address. And then she went down to vote, and they told her she was not on the rolls. When I called the board of elections, she is on the rolls. They said, "We don't understand why they said you couldn't vote."

But she voted twice in the primary and the general, and when they looked her up, her provisional ballot was not counted. I just have last one last thing that I want to say. Somehow or another we need to work on getting the judges who sit there and make these judgments about who can and cannot vote correct. I don't want cheating, I just want them to be correct. And so many times we have the elderly sitting there and they have done things the same way for so many years and things change. They don't change. And we need to get the training done.

Now, we're getting these new machines in and it's going to be really hard. I go to so many homes to help people vote, blind people, paralyzed people. And the last time I called the board of elections because she couldn't make an X, and they told me she couldn't vote. I said "Oh, yes, she can." So I called the executive director and I took it directly to him. But everybody has the right to vote, especially if they're registered. And because she's paralyzed didn't mean she didn't have that right. So we just need to make sure that everything is in order and that everybody has a right to vote. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you, ma'am. The next panelist is Ihsan -- I'm sorry if I mispronounce your name, I'm terrible for this.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Al --

MR. ALKHATIB: Alkhatib. The H is silent.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, Mr. Alkhatib will testify, and then we'll have questions from commissioners. The marvels of modern technology. We're going to have to hear from a congresswoman, apparently, right now. Could we ask you to --

MR. ALKHATIB: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LEE: -- to hold that for a couple minutes? I'm sorry to do that. By way of introduction, Gwen Moore is the congresswoman from Wisconsin's Fourth Congressional District. And she, I understand, was newly elected. Since we have this moment, Ms. Tregay, could you give the commission a copy of that, the map that you showed us?

MS. TREGAY: Yes, they can have it.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you very much. It does, in fact, look like a salamander, by the way.

MS. TREGAY: You do have a map of the whole city in your packet, but it doesn't, it doesn't illustrate how pretty that map is. Only that big one shows how pretty it is. This would be a better map too. This is a map of the city in color --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you.

MS. TREGAY: -- to see the other wards and how they're drawn.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: If members of the public during the break wish to see these maps, they can. They are pretty interesting, actually.

MS. MOORE: Good afternoon.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Congresswoman Moore? Hello?

MR. MOORE: How are you?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Congressman Moore, this is Bill Lee. I'm chairing this commission hearing that we're having here, and we miss you, but I understand that we can hear from you today.

MS. MOORE: Oh, absolutely, Mr. Chairman, and thank you so much for bringing me in. I know you have a very ambitious schedule, and I appreciate your accommodating me. I did not want to miss this opportunity to weigh in.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, if you wish, you could give us some of your testimony. We have your written testimony which has not been released, but if you wish --

MS. MOORE: And I would like to revise and extend my remarks because we have done this in a hurry, and I do think that there are just relevant things that I would like to submit to you later on this afternoon, if that would be appropriate.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, that would be wonderful, and, Ms. Moore, you have the floor right now.

MR. MOORE: Thank you. First of all, I would like to send warm greetings to the National Commission members in being panelists and attending guests of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, Midwest Regional Hearing. I, of course, am unable to appear in person since I must be here today in Washington, D.C., as Congress is in session. I want to commend the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and the other leading civil rights organizations that created the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. And since the last reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act in 1982, the tactics used to disenfranchise minority voters has been more creative, and they have sunk to a new and disgraceful level.

Milwaukee, Wisconsin is home to a quarter of a million African-Americans, and it has the largest concentration of African-Americans in the state. Wisconsin, of course, in the last two election cycles has been a swing state from a partisan vantage point. As many of you on the commission may recall, in both 2000, in the presidential election of 2000, and the presidential election of 2004, Wisconsin was blinking all night long as a state that took until the wee hours of the morning to determine who was the ultimate winner in our state. That particular situation has, of course, been a breeding ground for many electionary tricks by partisans to disenfranchise the African-American vote which is highly regarded as the swing vote in this state. And I'll give you some examples. Prior to 2000, the Wisconsin state statute enabled election inspectors to challenge electors by asking them questions that had nothing to do with their being eligible to vote. Our state statute provided for questions to challenge electors.

In the 1996 Milwaukee mayoral race, an African-American county sheriff, Sheriff Richard Ardisson, who had been the largest biggest vote-getter countywide, challenged the white incumbent mayor, and the election inspectors, under the mayor's authority, literally resurrected these archaic statutes and challenged black voters with, with the questions from the statutes. Inspectors were asking questions like, quote, "Do you plan to file an income tax in this ward," unquote. "Are you married or do you live with your parents?" They were using these questions from the state statute that were clearly, clearly designed to suppress the voters.

In my situation, my sons, for example, lived in my home and they were of age. They did not file an income tax and they, of course, would have answered negatively to these questions as the perception clearly would have been they were ineligible to vote.

The, the -- fortunately, an election protection organization secured an injunction on election day with poll watchers watching this activity, and it was clearly, clearly a voting suppression strategy. And subsequently as a state senator, I authored legislation to repeal and recreate these statutes to eliminate these unnecessary questions from being asked at the polls and to have more typical questions asked, like are you 18 years of age, are you an American citizen, literally things that were relevant.

In the 2004 election with, with George W. Bush, having lost the State of Wisconsin in the year 2000 by a mere 5,000 votes, there were all types of voter suppression fliers, commercials targeted to black voters with misinformation designed to discourage them from voting in Milwaukee, Wisconsin which, of course, comprises most of my congressional district. For example, there was a flier distributed by a fictitious group called the Milwaukee Black Voter League.

As Chairman Julian Bond of the -- mentioned in his speech during the NAACP national convention in Milwaukee in 2005 -- in July of 2005 just the other week, this flier told black citizens that they couldn't vote for president if they had already voted in an election in that year. And, of course, there was an overwhelming number of African-Americans who had voted for, for a black mayoral candidate in April of 2004.

There was an outpouring of, of ambition on the part of the African-American community. But this flier told black citizens that they couldn't vote in the presidential election if they had already voted in an election in that year. That even traffic violations made them ineligible to vote, and that a condition for anything by anyone in a voter's family made the voter ineligible to vote, and that by violating any of these restrictions, that would result in a prison term and seizure of their children.

There was also another flier mailed using the United States mail that included extremely racist remarks toward black supporters of Senator Feingold. The pejorative "N" word, as in psychological warfare, Mr. Chairman, psychological warfare. They used the pejorative "N" word and chided African-American voters for their previous allegiance to the Democratic poll. Clearly a voter suppression tactic designed to make them feel guilty and ashamed of supporting him. Calling them all -- using the "N" word, slime, all kinds of, of negative pejorative terms. Yet another flier urged black voters to vote by noon with a confusing message, an implication that it was not possible to vote if they didn't vote by noon. Such tactics created a divisive and polarizing environment. Racial tensions in Milwaukee drew national attention as partisan combatants vied for the swing African-American votes.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars were spent on radio messages to inflame African-Americans about Teresa Heinz's claim that she was an African. The woman, of course, was born and raised in Mozambique, but, of course, neglected to mention that because their point was to create resentment that would discourage them from even bothering to vote. I wanted to add something else here that's not in my written testimony that I think is extremely important. Literally since the Bush versus Gore election in 2000 when Wisconsin delivered the vote to Al Gore by a mere 5,000 votes, there has been an ongoing effort on the part of the state legislature to raise the bar for black voters, you know, by requiring voter IDs; not just any old voter ID but state-issued driver's licenses. And, of course, there are studies that we could provide the commission that demonstrate that there are more suspended -- more blacks with suspended licenses than with driver's licenses. And that the -- that this really amounts to a poll tax that they have been fervently trying to impose upon the black community, hence the reality that, that the swing vote in Wisconsin literally will determine the outcome of a presidential election.

We need to track and expose these tactics for what they are in order to continue to prove to the American majority that we are not living up to the true meaning of democracy, and every vote is not being considered or counted. Here we are in 2005, 40 years after the Voting Rights Act was enacted, and these underhanded tactics are still, still being taken to suppress the black vote, which further justifies the need for the Voting Rights Act and its extension. Wisconsin, of course, has never been under Section 5. But here the recent effort over the course of the past four years, the vigilant effort to suppress the black vote, we need to have the Voting Rights Act not only extended but not have it made permanent so that we can continue to review the need for states' blacks votes counted but to come under the purview of the Justice Department. And, of course, the most memorable disenfranchisement of minority voters in the Midwest region recently occurred in Ohio. And that report found that 28 percent of all Ohio voters and 5percent of black voters said that they experienced problems in voting.

While we review provisions of the Voting Rights Act that's set to expire in 2007, it's just vital to evaluate our recommendations and their constitutional impact. During the NAACP convention, the Reverend Jesse Jackson noted that it's important for us not to fight to make provisions of the Voting Rights Act permanent. If Congress is forced to go back and review parts of the Act periodically, then we'll always have the opportunity to review and improve these provisions based on the new underhanded tactics that may have arisen since the last renewal. And, of course, Milwaukee, Wisconsin would be an example of that.

I'm a strong supporter and advocate of civil rights. I'm a cosponsor of H. R. 39, Count Every Vote Act, and I'm a supporter of requiring a voter-verified paper record, allowing citizens to register on election day. We have same-day registration in Wisconsin, and I think that that should be something that every state should have, improving security measures in voting machines, and require that there be at least one voting machine at every polling station that meets the needs of disabled voters and minority voters and non-English speaking voters. I'm also a supporter of requiring states to act in a uniform and transparent manner with purging voters from registration lists and establishing guidelines to provide for the prosecution of those who engage in deceptive practices to keep people from voting.

As a cosponsor of the Democracy Day Act, I'm also in support of making election day a legal public holiday. I want to add here that I am in support of putting our money where our mouth is. It is not enough to espouse our belief that every vote should count and having meaningful provisions in the Helping America Vote Act and then not providing the dollars and creating mandates on local governments that they cannot meet in terms of updating older equipment. Because I have personally experienced these deceitful tactics used to undermine the black vote in my district, and I have witnessed the destruction and racial polarization that these tactics create, and because I passionately believe in the true power of democracy, I will continue to do everything to protect the voting rights of every American.

Thank you so much, Mr. Chair, and the commission. And I commend you in your great work, and I'm available here for any questions you may have of me.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you very much for being available for questions. I think we'll have just a few questions for you, perhaps one or two. But I did want to follow up with your statement that you would be willing to give us those documents you referred to, the studies, I believe you referred to.

MS. MOORE: Yes. One of the studies -- you know, we, we will have to research. I can find the repeal, the purge of that statute. We just needed more time to be able to do that.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well --

MR. MOORE: I can also provide you with a study by the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, John Pawasarat, which shows that blacks are -- disproportionately don't have driver's licenses. So when you look at all of the legislative initiatives that have been undertaken since 2000, you know, to require driver's licenses or ID from the DMV, you can clearly see the link between disenfranchise and black voters and, and these new -- this new bar. And certainly we will provide you with copies of these findings and some of these fliers.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you very much, Madam Congresswoman, and we look forward to the commission staff getting in contact with your staff. We have a question from Commissioner Joe Rogers, the former lieutenant governor of Colorado.

MR. MOORE: Oh, how are you, sir?

MR. ROGERS: I'm fine, congresswoman. Thank you so much for appearing with us. We appreciate you joining us.

MR. MOORE: Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Congresswoman, I was just curious about several aspects of your testimony, and I wanted to make sure that I asked you directly, if I could, essentially about what happened. You made reference in particular about -- I wanted to try to get a sense about that flier. You mentioned that the fliers would be provided, that you could you provide information to the committee, is that correct?

MR. MOORE: Yes, we can find it. This -- literally, there was a flier with all of this misinformation on it, and it was a, a voter suppression flier that was distributed. You know, I'm only pointing out to you the stuff that I can show you.

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MS. MOORE: There were so many other things that created a hostile environment, you know, that I can't really prove. But this is a flier that does exist. We will send it to you, and it literally did say, you will have your kids taken from you if you try to vote, and anybody in your family has ever committed any crime or got traffic tickets that you haven't paid, you can't vote, yes.

MR. ROGERS: Congresswoman, was there ever an investigation that was done about this? In other words, did the state attorney general or anyone --

MS. MOORE: Oh, no.

MR. ROGERS: -- bring any action related to this at all?

THE WITNESS: No.

MR. ROGERS: No?

MS. MOORE: No.

MR. ROGERS: Were complaints made in particular to the civil rights division of the Voting Rights Act?

MR. MOORE: I don't know if there were complaints, but I will tell you what, the -- and, you know, this -- this may sound a little self-serving because my son, of course, is the defendant in this action. The Republicans sort of flipped the script on us. There was an incident on the morning, on election morning where the tires were slashed, where literally the Republicans had rented up all the vans available.

And here's what I can't prove, but, you know, from my perspective, it was a voter suppression tactic because they know what Democrats do, they provide rides to the polls. And many of them in the Democratic Party had to travel farther from Minneapolis to Chicago to get vans. So they amassed all these vans. And on the morning of election day, tires -- some of the tires were slashed. And so the immediate outcry was from black Republicans and Republicans saying that Democrats were trying to suppress the vote. And so that was the, the message. And that is where the law enforcement effort went, towards prosecuting young African-American men who were suspect and indicted for felonious tire slashing when all of these other tactics had occurred.

MR. ROGERS: And finally, Congresswoman, I wanted to ask -- thank you kindly. You mentioned in particular the -- in terms of the votes or I think you made some reference in terms of what's happening with respect to Congress. I wanted to get your sense. My understanding is that there may be fairly broad bipartisan support as it relates to the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. Do you sense that?

MR. MOORE: Well, I can tell you that a congressman from my own state, literally a neighbor, who is the chair of the judiciary committee, Representative Sensenbrenner, indicated at the 2005 National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Conference that he was guaranteeing that he would reauthorize the Voting Rights Act. Now, the devil is in the details, because you all know better than I do that, that it could be reauthorized in such a manner that it could be found unconstitutional, provisions stricken. It could be reauthorized in such a way where sections that are truly important to us are not reauthorized. Like Section 5, for example. It could be reauthorized in such a way where there's no enforcement. So the devil is with the details. So there is broad -- so there's bipartisan support reauthorizing it, but what does that mean? I, I would not relax if I were you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We appreciate your advice. Mr. Little, do you have any questions?

MR. LITTLE: No.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Congresswoman, thank you very much for your testimony. Thank you for taking the time from your busy day in Washington to give us those few minutes, and we really appreciate your testimony, and we look forward to getting those materials.

MR. MOORE: Okay, thank you. We will work diligently on, on amassing these materials.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: And congratulations for being there.

MS. MOORE: Hey, I tell you, it still wasn't easy. And to the extent they wanted to vote, it was a confused vote. But you know what? I'm there. I'm here. Okay, thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you very much.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Mr. Alkhatib, I apologize for the scheduling difficulty, but I thank you for your patience. Mr. Alkhatib is a practicing lawyer in Dearborn, Michigan, which is the home of the nation's largest Arab-American community. And he graduated from the University of Toledo College Of law. Professor Davidson, I want you to know he is finishing up his Ph.D. program in political science at Wayne State. He's also president of the Des Moines Chapter of the American-Arab Antidiscrimination Committee. Welcome.

MR. ALKHATIB: Thank you. Thank you for inviting me. I am the -- I'm the board president and our regional director asked me to appear on his behalf because he was unable to come.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: If you could pull that microphone closer to you, that would be great. Thank you.

MR. ALKHATIB: We as Arab-Americans face discrimination; however, we're not regarded as a minority. But we face all the discrimination that black and other nonwhite communities do face in this country. Discrimination -- we faced discrimination before 9/11, but after 9/1this discrimination intensified. And ADC has a report of the many incidents of discrimination and hate crimes that occurred after the 2001.

To the effect of the voting, we had a case in Hamtramck where, where citizens who were not screened and had Arab or Muslim sounding names were discriminated against while trying to vote. Hamtramck is a small city in Wayne County, and Hamtramck has traditionally been Polish; mainly Polish-Americans live in Hamtramck. However, they -- the succeeding waves of immigration were from non-European countries. And now it has a large, a large population of non-European, non-Polish people. It has a lot of Arabs and lot of people from other Middle Eastern communities that are not Arab. However, they do look like Arab and they have Arabic sounding names because they are Muslim. And they have last names like Arahd and Mohammed and names like this.

And in the election of 1999, there was a general election for the municipal offices of mayor, city council and city clerk. And under Michigan law, challengers, challengers can be involved in the process where if they suspect that somebody's not eligible to vote, they can approach that person and make sure that they're eligible to vote. And what happened is it was a group called the Citizens For a Better Hamtramck which filed to be involved in the monitoring, stating that they want to keep the election pure.

And what they were doing was approaching people on the basis of skin color and on the basis of name that would indicate that they're not -- that they're Muslim or Arab. And about 40, actually 40 citizens were approached. Now, no white citizens were approached and required to conduct an oath of, of citizenship. Actually, despite the fact that a number of these voters presented American passports to prove citizenship, that did not end the inquiry, and it was clearly an attempt to suppress the vote.

And actually word, from speaking with leaders in the community, word spread that people attempting to vote from the community were being harassed, and it was, it was difficult to vote. So some people did change their mind about voting because of this. This led to the US Department of Justice being involved in the -- filing an action, and this action was settled. It was brought on the basis of Section and Section 12(d), and this is Page 4 of my testimony.

And the action resulted in the city establishing a training program to train election officials and private citizens regarding the proper grounds for election challenges, and training election officials to move challengers who appeared to be discriminating. Third, the city was to provide notices in English, Arabic and Bengali. And the city was to provide bilingual workers on election day.

The bottom line of this experience and given the large concentration of Arabic speaking communities in the area, we suspect that this is not atypical, that this does occur in other areas, but given the low numbers, it probably doesn't become a national issue. According to Imad Hamad, who is our Michigan regional director, himself and other people involved in social activism, the involvement of the Department of Justice was most welcome, and it restored the community's faith in the system. It assured them that the right to vote is backed by the enforcement power of the United States.

However, at the same time, Wayne County, to look at a accurate state remedy, Wayne County did -- at the time the prosecutor was John O'Hair. And they looked what happened at Hamtramck. They didn't like what happened in Hamtramck, and they looked into how to go after those who, who could -- who interfered in the process to, to make people unable to vote. And from speaking with a prosecutor, who was a young prosecutor at the time, his name is Abed Hamoud, and now he is the lead attorney, he told me that it was difficult to, to find a basis to go after these people who, who did intervene in the process. That they have to, they have to go look through the laws and find a law that would allow them to, to go after those people to make sure that in the future this does not happen, that it does send a strong message that things of this nature would not be tolerated in Wayne County. And finally, we were able to find a provision, actually an obscure, he said, provision in the common law that made a misdemeanor what these people did. So they were charged, they were convicted of -- under that provision.

However, to his knowledge, there were no other cases of this nature in, in Michigan, and it took a while for them to be able to, to find some legal basis to go after those people. In conclusion, we do -- we're not classified as an American, and we're not -- as a community of Arab-Americans, we're not -- in Michigan, the area we live in is not covered under Section 5. However, we do support the 1965 Act. We do support the provisions that are set to expire. We hope that they get renewed. We still feel that discrimination is still a reality, that it hasn't ended, and we hope that the law would be made permanent. As has been commented, the rights are nice to read, but the key is enforcement. All the rights in the world are worthless unless there is a strong enforcement mechanism behind it. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you for that very important testimony. I'd point out Hamtramck was actually the first case that the United States Department of Justice Civil Rights Division filed on behalf of the voting rights of Arab-Americans and Muslim-Americans. Well, we've now come to questions. Joe Rogers, did you want to begin?

MR. ROGERS: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: While you're thinking, I could ask.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you. I'm sorry, Mr. Chairman, I did have a quick question. I was trying to think about this whole issue. I don't know where the designation comes from. As an Arab-American you are classified as being white under what portion --

MR. ALKHATIB: Right.

MR. ROGERS: -- under what designation of law?

MR. ALKHATIB: My understanding is even the census we are considered white, that Arab-Americans are not considered a minority.

MR. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, I have to ask you that. I don't know the answer to that. I don't know about the classification in particular of ethnic minorities and how they're classified for purposes of voter issues.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I believe for census purposes, Arab-Americans are not necessarily separately reported. But under some statutes, 1983, I believe, Arab-Americans are considered a protected group under that statute, some of the traditional civil rights statutes. Under the modern civil rights statutes beginning in the 1960s, Arab-Americans are not specified as a protected minority group in the way that African-Americans and Latinos and Native Americans and Asian-Americans are. But I think, I think certainly raising that is an important issue. Certainly after 9/11it's an important issue. But I understand that in Michigan there have been problems like Hamtramck for -- Hamtramck is not singular, is that correct? I mean, you refer to your perception that there was ongoing discrimination against Arab-Americans, and I wonder if you could expand on that actually.

MR. ALKHATIB: In the, in the Wayne County area, there is a large concentration of Arab-Americans. And as a new community, as recent immigrants relatively, they feel that there is need to support. However, in the areas where we have low concentrations of Arab-Americans, they are isolated communities and they are afraid to come forth and present. However, our regional office, ADC regional office does receive many complaints about all kinds of discrimination. And if it -- as regards voting, we refer them to the Department of Justice to make complaints.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, actually, it would be helpful to the commission if maybe our staff could contact your organization and try to get some documentation of the fact that Arab-American and Muslim voters have been having problems and to see what kinds of problems they are and where they occurred. Would it be possible?

MR. ALKHATIB: Definitely. Definitely possible.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay, thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that. That's just helpful there. May I ask questions of the other people?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Go ahead.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you.

Mr. Ritchie, thank you so much for being here. I wanted to ask you a question, if I may. It seems to me that there's this striking this balance, and this whole issue about balance seems to come into play under the Voting Rights Act, in particular as it relates to the preclearance provisions which again deal with essentially what local districts may do with respect to drawing of lines or boundaries.

And in particular what's fascinating to me is to hear you talk about essentially how alderman districts were drawn in Chicago. You point to the example, as the chairman notes, of sort of being a salamander example of a district in and of itself. Essentially, you talk about how the black folks are packed into directs, as much as 95 percent of black folks are packed into districts. And then you talk about the fact that essentially we really don't need that many black folks in the district in order to have black representation. What we'd really like to have is only about 65 percent or so in order to have that number.

MS. TREGAY: That's correct.

MR. ROGERS: It's interesting to contrast your position and opinion, frankly, with the thoughts as articulated by the congresswoman who was on the line about sort of issues related to the, frankly, packing of districts or not having enough minority voters in a district or otherwise. And I'm just wondering if you might expound upon that particular notion. I'm -- what I'm trying to get a sense of, and this has been, no doubt, an issue of some significance, what balance comes into play in terms of minority voters and districts from your perspective?

MS. TREGAY: Well, what has happened in Chicago is that we've had a lot of white people leave Chicago. We have -- and what happens is, when they draw these maps, they continue to pack these districts so that we have 95 percent blacks instead of moving where we would have no less of the blacks, maybe 70, 65 or 70 and, and some whites, which would give us additional districts and make the representation fair to the amount of people we have in Chicago.

In the 1990 census, we lost 150,000 white people in Chicago. And they still try to keep us down. And I think we have -- the kind of wards that we have with the kind of mayor that we have, who is very strong in support of all the aldermen, they all feel obligated to go along with him 100 percent. And you don't get any resistance. All the resistance comes from the outside. I think that some things are going to change. I think our mayor might be in a little bit of trouble and with so many scandals that are going on in the city of Chicago. But, you know, I don't care how hard we work to do voter registration, they work twice as hard to take the people off the rolls.

MR. ROGERS: Do you see this as a partisan issue, because it's fascinating to me because Chicago politics is democratic politics.

MS. TREGAY: That's right.

MR. ROGERS: Are you talking about essentially the Democratic Party engaged in practices which ultimately deny African-Americans arguably a greater influence in other portions of that city relative to their ability to vote or have votes influence an election?

MS. TREGAY: That's correct. And maybe because -- you know, right now we've got a large Hispanic population in Chicago, and we still don't have the correct Hispanic representation that we need. We should have at least 20 wards out of 50 with 40 percent of the population and growing. And we are not getting what we should have.

And I think that the good old boy system wants to stay in place that has run Chicago all these years. We had a little break in there with Harold Washington, but it's gone right back to where it was.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Little, do you have any questions?

MR. LITTLE: No, I have none.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. I would like to ask a question, it's a follow-up to Mr. Ritchie's point about the demographic changes. I notice that in the USA Today that was put at my hotel door this morning that apparently 19 percent of students in the nation's school now speak a language other than English, which is an extraordinary percentage, so I think that sort of backs you up on the point that you're making about seeing changes in the voting, I guess getting a sense of the changes that will come in voting from looking at the elementary school and I guess high school populations.

Could you expand a little on what you were talking about in terms of the number of languages, particularly in Minnesota, because we often don't think of Minnesota as a state like California, which I guess, is kind of a rainbow state. The second question I have for you, Mr. Ritchie, is -- actually for probably all of you -- which is do you think it would have made a difference in the situations that you talked about, Mr. Ritchie, in the last election, and Ms. Tregay about some elections over the years, and Mr. Alkhatib in Hamtramck, if there had been federal examiners present during those elections? Mr. Ritchie.

MR. RITCHIE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. We're in the middle of a broad community-wide conversation on the language question because the provisions of the Help America Vote Act, which are mostly being viewed on the question of enabling disabled Minnesotans from voting, bring the possibility of some other options for languages.

And I'm meeting with the county auditor in Blue Earth; it's a county fairly nearby. And the possibility that one of the machines they're looking at could handle up to 2languages was a very important point to her. So it seems to me that the problems and challenges that we are seeing in our schools and in our courts and our hospitals, that kind of thing, is generating a conversation, and that conversation is mostly informal and not necessarily led or guided by a civil rights perspective but it is kind of a problem-solving perspective. And, and I think we would -- could find expertise in other community institutions to help think us through this problem. But that being said, the very rapid nature of this change. So, for example, Minnesota was one of the sites where the CIA relocated former allies from Southeast Asia. So we have a very large and now politically active Hmong population. Two elected representatives, fantastic community involvement. But that was a very rapid change. Our Center for Victims of Torture, which is a treatment center here, was a first stop for many coming from Ethiopia, from East Africa as treatment -- a clinic for treatment. But that center then touched off a real joining by families to -- the estimates now, we're somewhere in the 100,000 range of Somalia, Ethiopia, Eritrya, Aromo, and a very, very rapid expansion in that community. Our expansion of immigrants from Central America during the time of the wars, particularly when it was the most violent, Minnesota had a reputation as a sanctuary, that was a commonly used term, and so there was an attraction. All of these immigrations happened very rapidly. And it's in the rapid nature of them that things happened.

While we're struggling to figure out about perhaps the mechanics of voting and languages, we also note and former Vice President Mondale's institute at the university did a two-year long study of cultural values in Minnesota, especially looking at exurban areas. Very disturbing trends in antiimmigrant feeling often linked to the rapidity of the change. And so we are noting that other problems we will -- we will be facing other problems in addition to just language logistics because of the speed of this change that we, as a community, have to get ahold of. So I think it's not a very commonly discussed subject. And I think we're a state that maybe doesn't talk about all these things. But I think underneath in many institutions, language and other issues linked to immigration and the speed of social change is now coming to the fore. It's being tackled in a courtroom or in an emergency room, in a high school classroom. It's being tackled at the front line first.

It is being looked at by election officials who have a job to do, but I think our political scientists and our political leaders feel it much more in its more darker elements, and they are concerned about what this will do to our whole community. So somewhere in this process, the extension and perhaps enhancement of the Voting Rights Act could play a role in trying to give a more positive and some leadership to this question, but it also could be manipulated as a kind of a tool or a club or something like that and kind of inflame some of these issues. So I don't think we have our solutions here yet, but I think our community is in conversation about them.

And I would, you know, appreciate an opportunity over time to forward to you, for example, the study that Vice President Mondale prepared which I think raises some serious questions about our future, but also some of the creative solutions that some of our counties are approaching right now on the language question. And I'll try to do that very rapidly because I know you're working on this right now.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I wonder, was Hamtramck one of these communities that saw a rapid demographic change?

MR. ALKHATIB: Actually the wave of immigration that began in the -- after the change of the immigration law in the '60s actually led to a different kind of immigration to this country. And the new immigrants were not, definitely not European, not Polish and they are different languages.

And many of them live in communities where actually they -- the, the fact that most Hamtranck people in the community like them who run restaurants and gas stations and things of this nature makes them less able to learn the language, actually. And, in fact, living in an ethnic community makes them unable to learn the language, and therefore when they go to vote, they don't have the language ability to understand.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Sort of like the reservations.

MR. ALKHATIB: I wouldn't call it the reservation.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I meant Native Americans.

MR. ALKHATIB: They, they live there because the new immigrants, they don't know the country too well. They come from the same village, so they think then they get help if they need help and things of this nature.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I just wanted to follow up on something you talked about, Mr. Ritchie, talking about what the local election officials need.

Is there a role -- is there need for technical assistance and grants and things of that kind, because in a time of rapid change, of course, you have to, I think your budget doesn't go up, necessarily. So maybe you could address that since it sounds like you've been in contact with a lot of local election officials.

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, and I will only preface my comments by saying that I am finding that township election officials, the city and the county election officials are an unbelievably positive problem-solving force. And mechanisms that you might have to be in touch with them directly would be, I think, very valuable, because they are -- you know, they're actually the people who run elections in the country. And I have had the opportunity to meet with a number of them and our statewide association, in fact, is meeting next week. And so we've been in conversations about some workshops about the question of assistance and leadership and direction on this question. They are being driven almost exclusively by the disability provisions of the Help America Vote Act. This is the big thing coming down on them. There's quite a bit of federal dollars for some things like equipment purchases, but that doesn't answer the questions of voting in a place that doesn't have electricity or doesn't have heat or if you have 50 voters, how can you afford to reprogram and on and on and on. And so there's kind of a huge flood of money going to come out for equipment, but there isn't a future that explains how that equipment will be handled.

And our state has been cutting back local government aid, and in the case of a county I was at last week, 50 percent. And the money for elections is generally coming out of the general budget, so there's that crunch. Now, the leadership part is the most interesting to me because if you can just like hold your breath long enough and look at it, the imposition of some of the requirements around machinery available for disabled voters does create the possibility of language -- addressing some language issue. That doesn't give you electricity or heat or money in the budget, but it gives you a different thing. The second thing is that it raises fundamentally the question of access to voting. Now, you know, that could be a topic of very little interest to most people, but frankly, the 2000 election, the 2004 election and some of the problems we've had here has raised public interest and public concern about these questions. So we have an opportunity when -- it's, perhaps an unfortunate coincidence, but in any case, we now have a higher public awareness that it does matter who is running the elections. It does matter who's sitting in the judge's chair or the challenger's.

So leadership that might come from a national level, governmental or nongovernmental organizations or civil rights organizations that say, look, HAVA creates a lot of trouble, it also creates some opportunities, let's try to put that together into something that we might tackle. Because it may be that there's a different kind of trigger that if counties have certain kind of language demographics right now and in the near future, they get assistance to get the kind of equipment and the kind of support that makes handling those language challenges actually possible. Because you could just have a court order that says, the county, you got to provide these things in X number of languages. That's one way to do it. But another way to do it is say, hey, you have this HAVA requirement. You're going to have to replace all of your equipment. Here's a way we can help you with some information, technical assistance and maybe a little bit of money to be able to get the equipment that can give you 20 languages.

I was in a county just south of here, Austin, which is famous for Spam and the Hormel Company. Half of its manufacturing base is now all from more or less three villages from Mohaka. They have to change completely because they vote by paper ballot, except in the city. And so now they have this opportunity. In fact, a very innovative county auditor asked me what I thought -- just, I mean, I was talking to him getting his information -- what I thought about one particular machine. And he said, "I like it because it could give me the language thing I need." So it means that they are thinking about this If they're asking somebody like me who's not an expert in any way. So that says they're open to leadership, would like real information, and are ready to make changes if what change required can be made available to them. So I would urge you to be in touch with that level of election official because I think often folks might talk to secretaries of state. But who really runs elections are township officials, city clerks and county auditors.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, actually, I wanted to thank you for reminding us of the importance of townships and some of the smaller entities. We usually think of state, county and city elections but, you know, I think all the testimony has actually been about elections below that level. Of course, we're talking about the city of Chicago --

MR. RITCHIE: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- which has its own world. But I had asked this question about the utility of federal examiners, and I wonder if in the kind of incidents you were testifying about whether federal examiners would have made a difference.

MS. TREGAY: Let me just say in Chicago in 2000, we lost more votes than Florida. We were not on the air. Nobody knew how many votes we lost. And it was the same kind of situation in Florida where people voted for the wrong people because the ballots are so close to the names and numbers. But what is really crucial is we had an application that people had to fill out, and if you didn't fill it out correctly, they didn't count your ballot. And we had a lot of those. Over 20 percent of the people didn't fill out the application correctly. The application should not have been that hard.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: So what was the disqualification range in, let's say, in the African-American population?

MS. TREGAY: It was over 20 percent for just the applications. But then there were other reasons why they weren't allowed to vote. And supposedly when it comes up again, they're supposed to have it much easier. But this thing that you all have put out that says you have to have a driver's license, everybody doesn't have a driver's license. And it's not because they're suspended, it's because they can't afford a car. So --

MR. ROGERS: What are you suggesting on that? Forgive me, Mr. Chairman. What are you suggesting? People clearly have to have some form of identification to make sure the state --

MS. TREGAY: Then you need to get a state ID down here.

MR. ROGERS: A state ID would be appropriate, you're suggesting?

MS. TREGAY: It's the same -- you get it the same place you get your driver's license.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. You're not suggesting that an individual ought to not have identification.

MS. TREGAY: No.

MR. ROGERS: You're just simply saying that the driver's license issue, to require a driver's license as opposed to --

MS. TREGAY: Right.

MR. ROGERS: -- another form of state-issued ID.

MS. TREGAY: You know what? I've been fighting with the board of elections all my life about the social security number, and they've now gone to four. But people, anybody who's had trouble -- my daughter had $100,000 when someone stole her wallet and they had her social security number and they opened up bank accounts. And there's so much that goes on. I mean, it even happened to me. Somebody got ahold of one of my checks and had them printed. What we have to -- you can't use a social security number for identification. I think the driver's license is okay, but everybody can get a state ID. So I mean, I think this is just making it very hard on people like me who do voter registration, and on people that won't give you their social security number and don't have a driver's license.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Any of the other panelists want to address the question about being examined?

MR. ALKHATIB: My understanding is in Hamtramck, for a number of years monitors were sent to watch the election and --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: This is after the --

MR. ALKHATIB: -- after the 1999 election. And actually, the city entered into a consent agreement with the Department of Justice that ended in June 2004. I'm not sure how much increase in turnout occurred because of this intervention, but from my involvement in the community, I know that it increased confidence in the process. And the monitors assured people that they would be able to exercise their right to vote without anybody harassing them.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. I'm sorry to monopolize the time.

Ms. Meeks.

MS. MEEKS: All my questions were answered.

MR. CHANDLER: Just one question for Mr. Ritchie. Did I understand you earlier when talking about the problems, for example, of the Hmong, to be suggesting 203 coverage of all or parts of the state of Minnesota?

MR. RITCHIE: Your presence here has touched off a lot of conversations. And my testimony today was the subject of many, many people's inputs, and it has now generated a question about would Minnesota want to try to agitate in some way or how would the trigger mechanism work. And, you know, so far I can't say there's a consensus because there are perceived negative aspects to it. But what has happened is people are saying, we now have to talk about the language elements of voting and start to put forward some suggestion and we need to do it right now.

And so -- I mean, this is, you know, maybe not relevant to your national work, but your presence touches off conversation that then gets to real problems. The language one happens to be one that we are tackling. The problem with the challengers we had to tackle through state law. Maybe there's something in state law that we will do about the languages. But I would say for the moment right now, we are in kind of the discovery stage of what our -- I started asking school districts about languages. And I thought maybe they would say there was a dozen languages, and Anoka-Hennepin said there were 4or 43 languages. So like that's a whole other level, like do we need to look at machines that might handle 100 languages instead of 20. So I don't think we have dealt -- dug deep enough into our own situation to know what might be a proper solution. But we now know that we have a window, and we should address it in a very affirmative way. And we need to also be paying attention to how the reauthorization might have components that might trigger certain things.

And then the final question is, is there another approach where we got more leadership, perhaps money, but leadership and technical assistance from a more national perspective that could help us. Because, you know, we're not -- I mean, San Francisco in California has tremendous experience with multiple languages and elections. I had lived there for 10 years. And it might drive people crazy, but there's many languages available. We need probably expertise from other places first, and then the conversation in the civil rights communities and others might lead us to say, we need some more federal intervention.

You know, it's perhaps -- on the question of would more federal monitors have made a difference here, we, we need to know more about what happens in more isolated, rural communities. Our reservations, our Native Americans are half in the city but half in very isolated places. I think we don't know enough that there may be some situations. But what is changing is that our particularly East African community and our Central American community are now dispersing in rural areas. I don't think we know exactly what, what the future is, but we need to deal with the problem at home first, and then if -- in the future we need to pay attention to that as a potential option for us.

But your presence and this reauthorization, I really appreciated that comment. Perhaps it was Reverend Jackson who said, "By having a reauthorization every X number of years, this conversation takes place." And I will only say in Minnesota your coming here has really opened up conversation that I think will have a very positive outcome at our own level very directly right here in this state.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well,I want to thank all of the panelists for their insightful testimony. I think it's been very helpful, and we welcome all of your offers to give further documents. It's also my pleasure to announce that we will have lunch now, and we have about 45 minutes. There's lunch in the Seattle Room, which is accessible through the back door. We will start again promptly at 2:00 with the second panel. In the second panel will be the Honorable Michael Murphy, Jorge Sanchez, Ellen Katz, Gwen Carr and Elona Street Stweart. So we hope the panelists will be in their chairs at 2:00. Thank you very much.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay, we're now ready to begin our second panel. And what we're going to do is run through the second panelists. I don't believe we have any congressional testimony coming from afar. So we'll begin with the Honorable Michael C. Murphy. Mr. Murphy is the state representative for the 68th House District representing the greater Lancing area. Prior to being elected to the Michigan House of Representatives, he was the president of Lansing City Council. And last, but not least, he's the pastor and founder of the St. Stephen's Community Church, United Church of Christ in Lancing. Welcome --

MR. MURPHY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- Representative Murphy.

MR. MURPHY: Thank you very much for this opportunity to come before you and the Commission to make some brief remarks. Being an ordained minister, I don't want to take too long because I know I have several others who want to speak as well. But again, I thank you for this opportunity. I come as chair of the Michigan Legislative Black Caucus, which is a 22-member legislative caucus in the Michigan legislature.

The Legislative Black Caucus was founded in the early '70s to be a voice and to advocate for African-Americans living in Michigan, especially coming out of the late '60s with the Detroit riots. It was at a time when people like Coleman Young, the late Coleman Young, the former mayor of Detroit, was involved in the Michigan senate.

And our caucus comes from all across Michigan. Twenty years ago there was a time when mostly all the members were from Detroit. Now the Legislative Black Caucus comes not only from Detroit but from Pontiac, Flint, Saginaw, Lancing, Port Huron and Kalamazoo.

When you think about Michigan and you think about where the African-American population is in Michigan, I like to talk about the three Is: I-75, I-96 and I-94. When you go down from Detroit to Saginaw along I-75 you come to Pontiac, you come to Flint, you come to Saginaw. When you do I-94, you come to Ann Arbor, Jackson, Battle Creek, Kalamazoo and Benton Harbor to the far west. When you talk about I-96 from Detroit, you're talking about Lansing, Grand Rapids, Muskegon Heights and Muskegon. So that's where the African-American population is concentrated along those particular thoroughfares.

Among our issues as a caucus, certainly election reform is on our agenda, although insurance and homeowner insurance reform is a big issue in Michigan when you talk about redlining. Certainly education and -- education, access to health and jobs. Michigan, just as a way of some context, is probably one of the most segregated states in the nation. And I say that not out of -- to be putting that out there lightly, but a recent report shows that five of the 10 most segregated cities are located in Michigan. That's something I'm not proud of, but that speaks to what Michigan, where we are today as a state.

It's a Great Lakes state, it's a beautiful state, but yet cities are segregated and there's no indication that that is changing. Just to give you an idea about Michigan, it was said earlier about how some things are being used today. We have what is called the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, which is not really a civil rights initiative, but is an effort to turn the hands of the clock back by eliminating affirmative action in the state of Michigan. A very controversial issue, one that the State Board of Canvasses earlier this week refused to take up because of the allegation that people were tricked into signing a ballot petition.

When you hear Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, you think of something positive and favorable, but it's not. And so it's an ongoing issue in the state of Michigan, and more than likely, it will be on the 2006 ballot. In the report it states, when you look at Michigan, that there are certain -- Allegan County, that location, that locality was not in compliance with the Voting Rights Act, I believe Section 203. And also it was said earlier about Hamtramck. Buena Vista, which is in Saginaw County, is also a locality that is under the Voting Rights Act. In 2002, in my second term as a legislator, we were presented with legislation that would put on the ballot before Michigan voters what is called the voter identification proposal that would outlaw straight party voting. And that measure was defeated.

But what that measure would have done essentially would have not only eliminated straight party voting, but also would have required voters who did not -- whose names did not appear on their precinct registration list to show a photo identification.

During the 2004 election, there were problems, long lines in Detroit and other cities, denial of provisional ballots. Leading up to that election last year, we had one of our former legislators who made the comment in the Detroit media that we must suppress the Detroit vote. That controversial comment made its way all the way to the New York Times. And this legislator, who was a Republican, denied that it was racially motivated, but it was the buzzword to keep African-American votes, especially in Detroit, at a minimum and to discourage that. That was an issue during that time. There were misleading phone calls made to voters in Detroit, Flint, Pontiac saying that they wouldn't be able to vote at a particular site. There was an incident with the secretary of state's office putting out a flier that said that people could no longer register to vote because the time had passed, which was not true.

Voter intimidation, off-duty police officers at the polls, particularly in African-American and Hispanic precincts, is something that happens just about every national election in Michigan, and it's something that our caucus wants to address and remove those type of barriers. In closing, let me just say that our caucus is working to remove direct and indirect barriers, and certainly we want to see the Voting Rights Act reauthorized. In April, we issued a resolution that is still pending in the Michigan legislature that would go to congressional delegation members, as well as Senators Levin and Stabenow to make sure that they support the Voting Rights reauthorization.

We are working to make sure to have no reason to have absentee ballots upon request. We're working on other election reforms, such as on-the-spot registration. One of the efforts coalition -- our caucus is involved with and one that I think is so important is coalition building. We're trying to get our resolution passed in a bipartisan way. We're working with Rainbow/PUSH and NAACP, the National Caucus of Black State Legislators, as well as the National Caucus of Hispanic State Legislators, faith-based organizations, as well as neighborhood groups.

We are promoting within the schools. We met recently with our school superintendent of Michigan schools, as well as the Michigan State Bar Association and the Educators Association to begin having more about the Voting Rights Act of 1965 taught in the curriculum in our schools to bring awareness to our young people.

This and other items that we are seeking to promote in Michigan but we encourage you. This needs to be reauthorized and we commend the work that you're doing, and certainly hope that when your report comes out, it will be a strong report and one that the Congress would act speedily. Thank you, Mr. Chair, and commission.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you, Representative Murphy. Our next speaker is Maggie Kazel, an activist from Duluth, Minnesota, a psychology instructor. She writes grants for the Fond du Lac Community College and has worked for Winona LaDuke, and co-founded the White Earth Community Resource Alliance to build safety education awareness for American Indian women and girls. And last year she ran the Voter Education Program as public policy coordinator for Community Action Duluth. Welcome, Ms. Kazel.

MS. KAZEL: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Have I mispronounced your name, by the way?

MS. KAZEL: You got it right. And thanks to Jorge Sanchez. I have a long drive ahead of me and he switched places with me. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We appreciate your coming all this way.

MS. KAZEL: First to give you a sense of how I view things, I'm not from here. I did -- I was born in the Midwest. However, I spent many years outside of northern Virginia in North Carolina and in South Carolina. And then I moved here in 1975. I stayed in the Twin Cities for 23 years, and then I moved up north for the last 10. When I moved here in 1974, I was shocked. On my first day here I saw only one African-American person. I was amazed, I, I had no idea. I had chosen to come here for college and for the arts. And my response to that was to raise money for the Children's Defense Fund with the Southern Poverty Law Center because it was -- it was just jarring to live in this environment after coming from the East Coast and the South.

And I've continued to find that that's true, especially as I move north. It's geographically isolated. Up north, we used to have more influx of different cultures when the shipping industry was with us. It no longer -- it's just dwindled to just about nothing. And you take that with the economic depression of the region I come from now in Duluth, and that economic tension is, makes the racial tensions that much greater right now. So last year I was working with a coalition of Get-Out-The-Vote groups in Duluth, and I kept saying, you know, what I'm hearing is that we're going to get challengers, we've going to have a tough time at the polls, and people didn't believe me. I said, "You know, this is what I'm hearing." And they literally said, "No, it not going to happen, it's not going to happen here." And so what we tried to do was a few of us was organized amongst themselves to make sure that the four neighborhoods we were most concerned about had some people ready to vouch. We still didn't have enough. It was devastating what happened at our polls. And right up to the last three days before the election, the secretary of state kept changing her mind, basically, about tribal IDs, which just threw us into a tailspin. You know, we put out one thing and we'd blanket the neighborhood, an amazing number of hours that we would spend trying to say, don't worry about it, you know, bring this.

And the next week, wait a minute, okay, bring that tribal ID, but also if you've got a utility bill. I mean, we, we just kept running back and forth. It was horrible. That was a huge problem. In the 10 years I lived there and voted there, I'd never seen this many people of color come to the polls. It was a sea of white up until this last election literally. And so there was tension in our polls like you wouldn't believe in places.

Our city has received a lot of recognition in the last few years for a monument to lynching victims, the Clayton, Jackson, McGee Memorial. So you would think that with that kind of awareness that we would have more going on. We really don't. There's just sort of this lethargy in the sense that it will be fine, it will be fine. It really wasn't. And I'll read for you what I gave to the state legislator on March 21st. On November 2nd, I witnessed several acts of voter discouragement and harassment. I also witnessed a very calm, prepared Native American by the name of Michael Sayers, who hopefully you'll hear from later today, as he endured tense examination and cross-examination of his people as to their right to vote. Michael had registered hundreds of natives all through our city in the months prior to the election. On the day of election, he gave rides to and from the polls, several times observing, as I did, his people being questioned vigorously and relentlessly over and over. At the Duluth Public Library downtown branch, it was common to see all people of color experience an unusually high level of questioning by judges and mostly by challengers. The effect was chilling. Many were turned away and many more witnessing this decided to avoid being grilled, opting to relinquish their right to vote. Several people broke down in tears as they were questioned, leaving with looks on their faces of shame and humiliation.

At the downtown Duluth Public Library where I personally have voted the last nine years, my worst fears regarding challenger behavior came true. One set of challengers were almost zealot like in their mission. They looked a great deal alike, all Caucasians wearing business suits and trench coats and all carrying cell phones. When questioned as to where they came from, three of them identified as attorneys from the D.C. metro area, northern Virginia to be specific.

We decided to go up and ask them, "Where are you from?" And they said they had been in our city for a week getting ready for this election and paid. These folks stood out very obviously and made a point of walking all of the site frequently. It felt to be intimidating, like soldiers guarding a site. Four separate times at this polling site I served as a voucher, and all four times I went through a challenge. On the last challenge, I clearly irritated one party's challenger beyond her tolerance level. She repeatedly announced her challenge until several election judges reminded her that I had worked as a family advocate for nearly a decade and knew many people from all walks of life. I knew very well the stakes attached to my oath, but the fine amount of $10,000 was loudly announced as I signed my name, as was the felonious nature of my possible crime. This particular challenger then flipped open her cell phone and basically called in an alarm to her party. Within 20 minutes a group of about 30 to 40 people raucously assembled outside of our library. Their presence, their yelling and their posters posed such an intimidating, harassing presence that the librarians were forced to call the police. The demonstrators were also blocking the polling site entrance. I had a teenager with me. We left by the back entrance because she was frightened. I explained to her that the fear she was experiencing was similar to that of the people now afraid to enter the polling site. I also explained to her that this was democracy being thwarted. And then we discussed the McCarthy era and how similar it was to the menacing tone and presence of certain challengers at our polling place.

When I gave this testimony to our state legislature, they questioned me vigorously, and then decided to add the amendment asking that we make a law saying we can't have challengers from out of state, they at least have to live with us, which I think is fair. And it hadn't occurred to us. I mean, you know, when you're experiencing it, it hadn't occurred to us to say, you know, why you here from wherever you came from. But the first person to walk up and ask somebody was a Moose Lake prison guard, and he decided he was just going to go ask them because he wasn't intimidated by them and many of us were.

Also to note, women from a battered women's shelter. We had a whole group that had to leave because they couldn't prove where they live. They didn't want to say where they lived, so they had to go back to the shelter and then come back again. And what I will term loosely white trash, people who were poor and who were dressed not in middle class clothes were also challenged vigorously. I mean, this was really well organized. And one thing I noted when we came down to the state legislature, someone had done their homework and found that in 1930s in our state the voters' ballots reflected 26 languages. So we do have a history of having done it right. But my concern is that we -- of those three provisions that we really need observers at our polls. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you very much, Ms. Kazel. Because Ms. Kazel has to leave early, if there are any questions from commissioners, we should ask them now. Ms. Kazel has an arduous drive back home. Go ahead Ms. Meeks.

MS. MEEKS: What percent in that area is Native American?

MS. KAZEL: The registered percent is about percent. I think it's higher because the population moves frequently. And the ways that we document don't always reflect the actual population. There are two -- well, there are really three neighborhoods: Lincoln Park, the neighborhood I live in, Hillside, and a little bit on the east side that are all native neighborhoods. And it's -- I'm sure it's higher, I'm sure it's probably 5 percent.

MS. MEEKS: Do you know what percent of those turned out?

MS. KAZEL: Turned down?

MS. MEEKS: Turned out.

MS. KAZEL: Oh, turned out. Michael would have that. I know that he registered between three and 400 Native Americans, but I don't know the percent.

MR. ROGERS: This problem that you're talking about -- excuse me, Mr. Chair. The problem that you're talking about is largely a problem among new voters and not necessarily voters who have had a history of voting?

MS. KAZEL: The problem is --

MR. ROGERS: The people that you were seeking to get to the polls?
MS. KAZEL: The new voters should have been old voters. The problem is the entrenched racism of Duluth and the economic tension. What I think happened is that the economic tension and the fact that we -- our town has always voted one way strongly the last --
MR. ROGERS: "One way" being which way?
MS. KAZEL: Democratic. That what happened was outsiders were contacted saying, this is a target spot. We need to really target this town. And we, we really took the hit. We've never had a good push to get the native vote out. We've never had a good -- there is NAACP work in our town to get the African-American vote out, but it's not been strong. And then this last year was unprecedented, the amount of effort that went into it. They should have been recruited years ago to vote, but it's that type area.
What most people think of and what I see in the United States is that they think of the South as the place that's the most difficult place to live if you're a person of color.
Living up north, my daughter's half Anishnabe. Her grandmother was killed walking home from work one night just because that was -- that's sport up there at night. And it's just a common sport to amuse yourself, is to open your door as you're driving past an Indian and that's how she was killed. It's, it's really just geographically isolated, and bad economy fuels the racism.
MR. ROGERS: So you'd describe it purely as a problem of racism, in and of itself, essentially whites and their racism towards Native Americans --
MS. KAZEL: I think it was --
MR. ROGERS: -- which cause these problems here.
MS. KAZEL: Yes. It was bad enough to begin. And then you add casino moneys coming in and the economic tension of the fact that we're economically depressed, and, and it's fueled it. It's just really tense.
MR. ROGERS: Were there ever any complaints made to the US Civil Rights Commission about this?
MS. KAZEL: None that I'm aware of, no.
MR. ROGERS: Was the state attorney general ever involved in this process at all?
MS. KAZEL: We tried to contact the attorney general, and we didn't get any feedback through any office, the Community Action Agency.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Just to get the background, what is the racial mix in Duluth?
MS. KAZEL: We have, it's at least -- predominantly Caucasian. We're talking probably 9percent and it's really high. And of that, we have in the last five years a new African-American population that's moving in. We lost a Hmong population due to the AFDC law changes. They all moved back to the cities and it just became horrible to live there. And we've always had a strong Indian population for up north; it remains strong. Like I would say on the rolls it's percent. I would say its probably more like 5 percent.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Any other questions? Commissioner Davidson.
MR. DAVIDSON: Ms. Kazel, you read to us from the statement that you read to the legislature.
MS. KAZEL: Yes.
MR. DAVIDSON: Was that the entirety of your statement that you read to us or are there portions of it that you read to the legislature that we don't have access to?
MS. KAZEL: No, I read you the entire testimony.

MR. DAVIDSON: And am I correct in understanding you to say that as a result of your appearing -- at least partly as a result of your appearing that a law was passed --

MS. KAZEL: Yes.

MR. DAVIDSON: -- by the legislature?

MS. KAZEL: Well, I'm sorry, it's still being debated. It's on, it's on the books. It's -- it's not on the books, it's in process.

MR. DAVIDSON: Okay.

MS. KAZEL: Yes.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MS. MEEKS: Can I just ask?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Go ahead.

MS. MEEKS: So challengers, I'm not -- they can challenge whether that person is who they say they are --

MS. KAZEL: Yes.

MS. MEEKS: -- is that it?

MS. KAZEL: Yes. And they can challenge the voucher as to -- I was just told that I was lying. And I live in the poorest neighborhood. I've lived there nine years. And I've worked in my neighborhood for nine years. And I just said, "You know, I do know all these people and they all know me." I, I got really grilled because I forgot one lady's last name. It was like, wow, you know, I'm sorry. You know, I'm getting premenopausal here, I have these moments, I can't get always get the name.

But by the third challenge, you know, the judges had started checking around to make sure that I was who I said I was. And then the fourth challenge, they did turn to the challenger and said, "She does know what she's talking about."

MR. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Sure.

MR. ROGERS: -- I wanted to get one factual clarification, if I can. What's so important about the Voting Rights Act is to establish not just the partisan nature, sort of Republican versus Democrat stuff, but really to understand the underlying implications related to race, which is really what the Supreme Court has said, so that's really what I'm trying to understand here.

THE WITNESS: Okay.

MR. ROGERS: The judges presumptively here are both Republican and Democrat, is that correct?

MS. KAZEL: Yes, I would think so. I don't know that for sure.

MR. ROGERS: I'm nearly certain of the requirement that at most polling sites, the requirement is to have a judge of both parties so that you don't have issues related to one party favoring the other.

MS. KAZEL: Right.

MR. ROGERS: But yet you described the problem as essentially a problem of judges as a whole, regardless of party orientation --

THE WITNESS: Judges --

MR. ROGERS: -- thus racism's exercised --

MS. KAZEL: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: -- by both Republican and Democrat white people.

MS. KAZEL: Yes. My -- well, I call them the council of the silver hairs. At my public library, the same troop of little white ladies come in every year to do our deal. And I'm telling you, I find them intimidating. They just like -- you know, want the letter of the law, you know. And if you don't have the right ID, they're just intense. And I think, you know, it's just the way it's been accepted to do it. And I'm assuming they're bipartisan. I don't know. But the racism is in the drinking water really thick up there, and they don't want anybody to get out of line. So they kind of see themselves as, you know, we're going to maintain here, and they do a good job of it.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Jon Greenbaum also wants me to point out that the way challenges are done in each state actually differs from state to state, so this is the system that exists in Minnesota.

MR. GREENBAUM: I meant poll workers. Joe, it's not necessarily the case. Some states have minimum requirements about Democrats, Republicans. In some states it's not based on party at all.

MR. ROGERS: Okay.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. Well, thank you --

MR. LITTLE: I have one question.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Oh, excuse me.

MR. LITTLE: Were those discrepancies reported to the department of human rights?

MS. KAZEL: We wrote them up and distributed them to department of human rights, one commission that I'm forgetting the name of, and a group called NAPA, which is the group that kind of coordinated our Get-Out-The-Vote effort in Minnesota. Association of Progressive Agencies. And we've, we've been taking our testimonies anywhere we can, so I'm pretty sure it's lodged as many places as we can find.

MR. DAVIDSON: Mr. Chairman --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Sure.

MR. DAVIDSON: -- one more question. Would it be possible for you to give the commission that material that you have, the complaints that you have lodged?

MS. KAZEL: Sure, yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Including the agencies that Commissioner Little mentioned. Well, thank you very much Ms. Kazel.

MS. KAZEL: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you for coming.

MS. KAZEL: Oh, glad to be here.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: And have a good drive.

MS. KAZEL: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Our next witness is Professor Ellen D. Katz. Professor Katz teaches voting rights and elections, property law, legal history and equal protection at the University of Michigan. And prior to the University of Michigan she practiced law as a lawyer at the United States Department Environmental and Natural Resources Division in the appellate section. Professor Katz is well credentialed and has written on voting rights matters. Welcome, Professor Katz.

MS. KATZ: Thank you very much. And I want to thank the Lawyers' Committee for organizing this event, particularly Jon Greenbaum for inviting me today. I have the good fortune today to brag about my students, and I'm going to just talk briefly about a project that a group the University of Michigan law students have under way. I know some members of the commission are familiar with it or at least somewhat familiar with the project already. We call it the voting rights initiative as part of the Michigan election law project. And what the students are doing is cataloguing every decision handed down by a federal court under Section of the Voting Rights Act 1982. And the plan is to provide as detailed a portrait of Section litigation as possible using publicly available published decisions.

It's our premise that a detailed portrait of this litigation, the core permanent provision of the statute, is essential to the discussion on reauthorization about the provisions that are actually set to expire. So I want to say a few words about sort of what, what we're doing and then some preliminary findings that we have. And they are really preliminary, but we hope to have more complete results by September or so, and then close with just a couple thoughts about why we should care about this. As I said, we're looking at every reported Section lawsuit that's available with a published decision on LexisNexis, Westlaw and that reached what we're calling a liability stage judgment, meaning that one court reached a determination that Section 2 of the statute had been violated or was not violated, that it got past preliminary matters. And we're coding all the cases according to a bunch of factors. The factors the Supreme Court articulated in Thornburg versus Jingles, the so-called Jingles factors, to see whether those are met in any case.

And then most specifically the senate factors, which were the factors the senate listed in the amendments of 198to the -- to Section of the Voting Rights Act. Factors the senate said would be relevant in considering whether Section of the statute had been violated.

And I don't want to go through all of them, but just, you know, a laundry list of factors, a history of discrimination that affected the rights of members of a minority group to register to vote, racially polarized voting, the use of a candidate slating process for which racial minorities were excluded, racial appeals and campaigns, nonresponsiveness of elected officials and others. And so we're looking to see every time a federal court found the existence of one of these factors or more of these factors since 1982.

We'll be able to tell you trends over time. The number of these factors that were found, the number of cases that were found in the early '80s, the mid-'80s, the early '90s and so on, we'll be able to track changes. We're looking at all 50 states, so we're looking at jurisdictions that are covered by Section 5 and those that are not. And we hope to be able to make some comparative statements about the course of Section litigation as a consequence. We're also coding all the cases in terms of the minority groups that are involved, the governmental unit that is being challenged, state, local, county and so forth, and the types of practices that are -- that have been challenged. We have some nifty technological folks working with us, so we're going to put this all together on a Web site that will be publicly available. We'll have the data there, but it will also be available for interested researchers and others to search. If you want to find out how many at-large election practices were challenged in Alabama between 1988 and 1994, you'll be able to do that. If you want to find out about how many cases involved African-Americans in North Dakota or somewhere else, we'll be able to tell you that. Was there racially polarized voting, did a finding of racially polarized voting give rise to violation or was it correlated with a violation of Section and so on, so you'll be able to do your own searches as well as our information.

I would have liked to give you the final results. The students have been working hard. We're not, we're not there yet. We've completed the covered states, and we've completed a few of uncovered jurisdictions or partially covered jurisdictions, and we optimistically anticipate having them all by September or October. So I just want to give you a couple. I don't want to bore you with numbers, but I just want to give you a couple of preliminary findings -- or not preliminary, the findings from the covered jurisdictions only. So we're talking about states that are wholly covered by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. And in those states, just a couple of numbers, we've identified 133 lawsuits filed under Section 2. And of those, 93 ended with a liability determination, meaning they got past preliminary matters. And 93 lawsuits in these covered states found that Section was or was not violated.

And of those are numbers -- 37 percent, 37.6 percent, in fact, found violation of Section 2; found that the practice being challenged was discriminatory in result. The next statistic I'll give you is very shaky because it's comparing it to the noncovered states, and we don't yet know -- we don't obviously have the universe of it. This appears to be a far higher number. The trends we're seeing so far bear out that we're finding many more Section violations in states that are covered by the voting -- by Section 5 than elsewhere.

Again, I, I pause in saying that because we haven't counted all the other states, but in the noncovered states that we've looked at, we're only finding -- let me get the right number -- 14 percent rate of violation where courts have reached a judgment there. The overwhelming number of lawsuits we've found have been brought by black plaintiffs. Ninety, 90 percent of all the lawsuits, 97 percent of the ones have that have gone to judgment. Latino second with 14 percent. The numbers don't add up, we realize, because some suits are brought by groups together. And, in fact, in coverage jurisdictions there are no Asian-American lawsuits or lawsuits involving Asian-Americans that went to final judgment -- went to what we're calling a liability stage judgment.

Again, just a couple of more, I think, interesting things that are emerging. The large -- the, the majority of challenges that we're finding in coverage jurisdictions are to local practices, not to statewide practices. That many, many more of the lawsuits challenge counties, cities, school boards, entities of that sort as opposed to statewide districting practices and the like. So we're seeing it happen at a, at a low level, and we're seeing that in the number of cases filed and in terms of the of ones that actually find violations.

The last thing I wanted to sort of give is a little bit of the findings on the senate factors because I think these have bearing to a lot of the issues with the commission that other folks have been talking about today. And so again a few numbers, if you're bear with me. In the 186 decisions that we have identified, 104 of them have found at least one senate factor to be present. And of those 84 -- and I can give the commission these pages -- 84 of them found a history of discrimination in voting, the first senate factor to be present. It counted 45 percent of the cases that were filed. And of the cases that ultimately found a violation of Section 2, 76 percent found this history of discrimination to be present. To give you just a few of the other prominent results, racially polarized voting is found in 38 percent of the lawsuits, and 86 percent of the cases in which a violation was, in fact, found. The minority group bearing the socioeconomic effects in discrimination was found in 35 percent of the cases, but 73 percent of the cases was in which violation was found. And the last number I'll give you is the success of minority candidates in getting elected. And there we have 83 percent of the cases in which a violation is found that minority candidates are having a hindered ability to be elected.

I just want to say in closing that I think the Section litigation provides an important lens on opportunities for political participation in the United States today. It is the permanent provision of the Act. It's not being expired, it's not subject to expiration. And yet looking at what's going on, it helps us see different opportunities and sort of where problems have been identified and the sort of track record that's been going on. I think if, if we're thinking not just about what can be done but perhaps what -- I'm sorry, what should be done and as well as what can be done and what the Supreme Court would ultimately uphold, I think these factors are relevant and provide a good indicia of, of what's going on on the ground or at least a partial portrait of it. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you. Our next witness is Gwen Carr. Gwen Carr directs Indian programs for the Wisconsin Department of Commerce providing advice, training, technical assistance and economic development information to Wisconsin tribes, tribal communities and American Indian entrepreneurs. Ms. Carr served as the native vote coordinator for Wisconsin during the 2004 presidential election. Welcome, Ms. Carr.

MS. CARR: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for having me here. I'm very honored to be a part of this event and to appear before all of you to talk about native voting and the, the Wisconsin experience. Actually, Maggie's testimony was very upsetting to me personally because I have seen that not just in Wisconsin but in other areas of the country time and time again in voting.

To add to my introduction only for the fact of it speaks to my experience with Indians in voting, I have been involved in voter projects and voting and Native American political trainings and all sorts of things for a number of years and all over the country from Oklahoma to Arizona, California, North Carolina, New York, on reservation, off reservation, so I have a lot of areas of, you know, working with the native communities from all walks of life in city elections and county elections and statewide elections, presidential elections. So I have seen this inherent racism in native communities. That is probably the most consistent thing I have ever seen in native communities, frankly.

In Wisconsin in particular, I have been in Wisconsin for about two and a half years. I'm originally from Chicago. I'm a Cayuga from the Heron Clan of New York. But I have been working in Arizona -- not in Arizona, in Wisconsin for a couple of years. I get confused. I have worked in a lot of places. But when I came to Wisconsin, you know, I, I come from Oklahoma where there are 39 tribes and a very substantial Indian commission, very substantial participation both in voting and just engagement with state government with the tribes. And I came to Wisconsin kind of expecting the same dynamic.

And there wasn't -- there is no commission in Wisconsin. There is not a lot of formal organizational infrastructure other than the tribal governmental infrastructure in Wisconsin. There is the Great Lakes Intertribal Council which meets once a month, but it basically is a program-related organization talking about various different educational programs, economic programs, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera. It's not anything to do with civil rights, it's not anything to do with voting, it's not anything to do with politics, per se, it is much more of a problematic type of gathering of tribal leaders. So there really -- there's really a vacuum in the area of Wisconsin as opposed to other -- even Minnesota -- as opposed to other states in regard to evidence of discrimination, lawsuits, et cetera, et cetera. And there has not been a lot of infrastructure in voting or voting rights of any sort in Wisconsin for the American Indian community that I could find when I got there.

So I started the Wisconsin American Indian Caucus, which is basically an informational and empowerment group to teach native people the importance of voting and the importance of civic engagement and how, how it works part.

I mean, that has been the extent of the work that I have done outside of my regular job within the Indian community in Wisconsin, of telling people that yes, you can vote, and, and this is how it works.

I put on a number of political trainings for tribal members in various parts of the state over the past couple of years. And at first it was very sparse. I think it had six people at the first training; the next time I had 35, which is a significant increase. And so -- and the questions and the things that I heard, some of the people that would come to the trainings or come to our meetings where we would have meetings about, you know, civic engagement of all sorts looking at various different issues in Wisconsin. There have been a lot of issues in Wisconsin with gaming and the state legislature and there has been lawsuits. There's been a lot of issues about those types of things in Wisconsin that have to do with tribes and native people. So we would meet and talk about all sorts of things. And the kinds of responses that I would get from the individuals that would come to these meetings reflects what Maggie has said. It's, you know, this -- Wisconsin is the land of the spear fishing issue. The northern part of Wisconsin is very much like what Maggie was talking about, Duluth area.

I have actually been to the Lac du Flambeau Indian Museum. And at that museum, one of their exhibits is about the spear fishing issue, which is the treaty rights issue in the '70s in Wisconsin, and there are actually beer cans lining the walls that say "Save a fish, kill an Indian. Save two fish, kill a pregnant Indian." Those are the kind of things -- that stuff is alive and well, unfortunately, and living in our country. Not just in Wisconsin but our country, whether it be for American Indians or African-Americans or Hispanics or women or Asian-Americans or Arab-Americans, those things, they live and breath and they affect how we, how we vote and how we live on a daily basis. So these are the kinds of things that I would hear from native people in Wisconsin. There was not a lot of knowledge about why it was important to vote, where you could do it, how you could do it. The mechanics of voting, there was not a lot of knowledge. And frankly, initially there was not a lot of interest.

So, you know, there had -- a lot of people had been able to talk of an extended period of time of voting either in their own community, have a lot of examples of things. My time has been spent in the past two and a half years in teaching and reaching Indian people about the importance of exercising their vote. Which is not just to say that, you know, that there are not incidents of discrimination in voting in Wisconsin for Indian people. The other thing that's important to understand with, with regard to native communities is that they don't come forward right away and talk about what happened to them. Part of the, part of the real damage of racism and discrimination is people's acceptance of it, that it is the natural standard operating procedure, and that it will always happen to me, therefore why bother to tell anyone about it again. And I've seen that in, in native communities, especially, especially in very isolated areas. There's no point in telling anyone, if there is anyone to tell, because no one is going to come and help you. I mean, the dynamic of the history of this country is that the actual political and governmental infrastructure of this country that one would think to turn to has actually been the greatest depresser of American Indians out, out of anybody and everybody. It is the, the fundamental racism of this country. This country is founded on racism, and it is founded on those types of principles, and native people are the actual living, breathing witnesses to that and all else comes from there.

So in -- but I'm also happy to report there is, there is an upside to what I'm saying here, that we were able to design a, a Get-Out-The-Vote program for native people across the state. You know, we had -- we have 1tribes in, in Wisconsin. They were all involved in it. We had a tremendous amount of interest in voting, interest in the issues, interest in being part of something larger than ourselves. There was also a true sense of hope that was a very deciding factor within the 2004 elections. I can't speak to 2000, I was in another state, so -- but the 2004 elections really did -- there was an energy about them in the native community. We had not only the statewide plan that we did, but we also -- each individual tribe had their own native vote, Get-Out-The-Vote type of program. And to that end, at the end of the day, we had the largest turnout of native Americans in the history of Wisconsin in 2004. We had six out of the 1tribes had 100 percent voter turnout when, when measured against voting age members that were enrolled in the tribe.

Now, that is an amazing story. But, you know, it is, it's an extraordinary story. It's also a very hopeful story. It's also a very important message to send out to native and nonnative people in, in, in the United States. And so one of the things that was very helpful, and I want to make this recommendation to this commission, is that Wisconsin is a same-day registration voting state. You know, I have worked in many, many states where, you know, that it is not the case. And the barriers to registration of various different dates and this date and that date and then they change the dates, it's very confusing. And I mean, I think that uniformity in some ways is a very good things. I think that -- you know, it seems to work well in Wisconsin to have same day, especially for new voters, especially for shaky voters, you know, never done this before, not exactly sure. Oh, it's okay, you can do it and vote at the same time. It's also -- it's good for communities for a lot of different reasons.

I would recommend that that be something that really be stressed in this -- the Voting Rights Act. I really think that it is something that if, if states are really serious about really availing people of the ability to vote seriously and not just talking about it, that they seriously take up that particular issue and make it something that is a great facilitator to voting. So -- but at the same time, we had a number of incidents. And again, it's, it's ironic. Because, because folks knew that I was coming to this particular thing, my phone rang a lot. Right after the election everybody was flat out tired, everybody went to sleep for three months. But my phone started to ring when folks heard that I was coming here to talk to you. And while we did have a voter protection program that was done by the Native American Bar Association, the National Congress of American Indians, we had people, local people within tribal communities and native lawyers in Wisconsin ready to do a lot of the protection program. There were -- again, people didn't tell anyone. So when they found out I was coming, I got a lot of phone calls about some of the things that happened in 2004, even given the great turnout we had. And the fact that people overcame these things this time, as opposed to just turn around and go home, says a lot for the determination of the native community in Wisconsin to have their voice heard.

We have -- and most of these things happened -- I'm going to generalize three or four of them. They're in, in my testimony here. But most of these were from either early voters or first-time voters. And one of the dynamics, and you heard it from Maggie, and I'm sure you'll hear it from native people who come before you across the country, you'll hear the same story over and over again because it's true. That most of the most severe discrimination happens right around reservation communities. That's the front line of racism right there. So most of the things that I'm talking about occurred right around the reservation border.

And, and so -- and as other people have testified to, Indian people were told, A, the high school students around the Menominee Reservation, which is an entire county in Wisconsin, they were told that they could not vote under any circumstances. High school students that were voting age were told by school officials that they could not vote, period. And then we had other people -- one of the great things, I think one of the greatest successes of our voter turnout program was the fact that we really did go for grassroots people who lived in the community and give them the tools and the ability to do what they do best. So there were a lot of people gathering new voters and taking them for either early voting or on election day. And a lot of the counselors around the Menominee Reservation, the Lac du Flambeau Reservation, Mole Lake Reservation. One county clerk told about 50 people that they could vote at her home, okay? And then -- that they should be there at 5:00. So they bused 50 people, 50, 55 people to this county clerk's home 5 p.m and she never showed up. They waited for three hours. They were not leaving until they saw a person. And finally, you know, she showed up, I think, about 9:00 or so. But, you know, that, that -- those are the kind of things that native people were being told.

And then also that a lot of the people who had actually worked on the campaign, the Indian turnout, the Indian vote campaign, they were asked to submit lists of tribal members to county clerks and voting officials, in addition to identifying them verbally. And so -- they wanted to know who the Indians were.

And these were in communities that are, that are right on the border or right inside or, you know, right, right around the reservation communities where there is a lot of, you know, bad feeling, animosity and long term. I mean, we're talking, you know, hundreds of years of racist attitudes about native people in particular. So the -- and I also want to just say one thing about Congresswoman Gwen Moore's testimony. I too saw those fliers. And that is -- that was not -- I, I heard a number of radio spots about African-Americans and voting and, and felonies and all sorts of -- it was bizarre. It was about three or four days before election day. So I just wanted to let you know that, you know, in the course of my going out to all sorts of different communities on and off the reservation, I managed to, you know, come into contact with those particular -- that particular flier in particular.

So anyway, I think that that just about takes care of it. The other -- the only other thing I wanted to talk about for one second is the tribal ID issue. Congressman Sensenbrenner, there's a -- there's been legislation about the national ID. And a lot of the tribal leaders have been talking about the tribal ID issue. And the fact of the matter and whether -- I think one of their greatest concerns is the fact that it -- that they're looking at hooking up all of these various different lists of people with the DMV, and that is a direct abrogation of sovereignty to require tribal IDs to hook up with any other state or federal agency. So, you know, that's -- and that remains -- it remains to be seen how big of an issue that particular one will be in Wisconsin, but folks -- that is one of the things that folks are talking and have been talking about over the past couple of months. So thank you very much. Thank you for giving me the time, and that's it.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Carr. With the exceptions we've made, we are holding questions until the end of the panel. So we're going to go on to testimony of Elona Street-Stewart, who is chairwoman of the school board of St. Paul, Minnesota. And she was the first American Indian elected to the board. Ms. Street-Stewart has been very active in the Twin Cities area. She's chair of the Twin Cities Healthy Start-American Indian Advisory Committee, the St. Paul Area Council of Churches, the Department of Indian Work. It's a long list. But thank you very much for coming, and we look forward to your testimony, and we do have a copy of your written testimony.

MS. STREET-STEWART: Well, I say miigwetch to the Lawyers' Committee and to Andrea Speck for inviting me here today. In fact, I realize now at the end of the table, so much of the testimony that's been previously shared with you about our American Indian community, I could reflect those same situations without regard to those at home. They will be duplicated across this nation in Indian country and in particular in communities that have border residency.

MR. ROGERS: You said miigwetch?

MS. STREET-STEWART: Yes, which is -- thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Exactly which language?

MS. STREET-STEWART: Nishnawbe.

MR. ROGERS: Nishnawbe?
MS. STREET-STEWART: Uh-huh. Or we can say it a number of other languages.
MR. ROGERS: All right.
MS. CARR: But it is important, I think, to recognize that there are native languages still in existence and people do use them for conversation and interpretation and definition. My own work, I'm a staff person for the Presbyterian Church in addition to being on the school board. And my specific work area involves racial ethnic ministering in the six upper Midwest states. But I also, because of my work with our Indian communities, I work out in Montana on the Ft. Peck Indian Reservation. So I actually am traveling on these highways and know these communities very well. I know the size, I know the nature of their official protocol and absolutely can, as I said, reflect on the issues of identification and recognition and subrogation of rights.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Ms. Street-Stewart, if you could just move -- don't move, you can just move the microphone closer to you.
MS. STREET-STEWART: Thank you.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We want to catch, we want to get every word on the record.
MS. STREET-STEWART: We'll try it there. Maybe I can tilt it.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Good, good.
MS. STREET-STEWART: Yes, I know that key sections of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 are set to expire in 2007. There's an awareness of that, because when I was in high school, I experienced the passage of the Voting Rights Act as a cause for celebration at that time, especially for the African-American community in civil rights organizations across our nation. It now appears, though, that after 135 years after the passage of the 15th amendment to the US Constitution and 40 years since the passage of the Voting Rights Act, the right to vote is not secure for those communities of people recognized by our nation's courts to have suffered racial discriminatory actions prior to 1965. I know also that the issues that are very specific I would say come in the four Rs. It's realignment, redesign, reclassification and race.
The results of the 1990 and the 2000 census brought a realignment of voting districts through congressional redistricting processes. For the first time, significant numbers of African-Americans and Latino officials were elected from new districts where there was sizable populations of people of color. However, since then the numbers have not been sustained or increased, nor have elections produced a horizontal widening of the diversity of candidates and elected representatives.
And as you know, I can speak of that personally. I'm the first American Indian elected to a public office in Ramsey County. And in Minneapolis, while there have been other Native Americans elected to public office, we have had our first American Indian school board member just elected last year to the Minneapolis Council. The reassigned residents as citizens are not significantly aware or solicited for the strategic planning or comparative analysis of the impact of the changes on district -- or from district geographical dimensions, economic transitions or the demographic variances.
I'm also cognizant of the fact that there are likely to be changes of two to three judges on the Supreme Court over the next few years. And since I believe since the court has not always found in favor of minority voting rights, it's important now to address these issues legislatively in order to accomplish fair and equitable protection of the American right to vote by its citizens. And in particular, those citizens that are American Indian, other people of color, those in poverty or those who, through injunctive relief, are eligible individuals having been previously convicted of criminal offenses. This is very important because those situations affect our American Indian communities especially. I think it is also important to note that American Indicans have, in fact, been told that we are not eligible to vote in local elections. That has been part of, I think, the historical reality, that we can vote for tribal offices so that the tribal elections, which would be specific to a geographic region, are the only place that American Indians see themselves as part of an electorate. They are not seen as part of the citizen electorate of this country.

So I'm going to share with you today an incident that happened in the Red Lake Nation last fall in the 2004 elections. I particularly share this with you because the nation has been very attentive to the needs of the Red Lake Nation recently. We know that because of the school shooting incident and the disaster that has occurred there.

It is important also, I think, to know that there have been a number of persons who will have put this testimony together. The individual that actually compiled it for me is a Mr. Jamie Edwards and he, in fact, provided this. He's a representative to the Mille Lacs Band of Ojibwa. He has provided this as part of a report to a committee that has been chaired by a Representative Keith Ellison here in the Twin Cities area. And so I'll just share with you what happened. Although there were several attempts to suppress Native American votes in Minnesota, what happened in Red Lake was the most blatant.

The Red Lake Nation is the only closed Indian reservation in Minnesota and in theory, anyone who is not a Red Lake tribal member must get permission from the tribe before coming onto their reservation. And we saw that in some of the immediate news response when the school shooting occurred. That was part of the concern, people were not aware that, in fact, you do just not have open access on the reservation.

On election day, that did not happen, and several party sponsor challengers showed up on the reservation before the polls opened. There are four voting precincts on the Red Lake Reservation. The Ponemah precinct is where the major issues occurred. A Republican challenger showed up in Ponemah, started questioning and intimidating the election judges, and then started to intimidate the voters by arbitrarily challenging individuals who were standing in line to vote. Some potential voters left the precinct because of this challenger's antics. The Red Lake Tribal Police Department was called to observe the situation. However, the challenger's behavior worsened once the officers arrived. He continued to disrupt the voting process, and eventually tribal officers were forced to remove him from the precinct and escort him to the reservation's border. A few things to note here. According to one election judge, up until this election, no challenger had ever showed in Red Lake during an election. Two, Red Lake is the only area in the state where all of the election judges are native, and nearly the entire voting population is native.

Three, some of the challengers that showed up in Red Lake were from out-of-state areas, and that was determined by conversations with the election judges. And that the particular challenger at Ponemah was a lobbyist from Washington, D.C., and that's how he identified himself. There were two other challengers identified, one being Republican and one Democrat, that did show up in Red Lake, but they only observed but did not disrupt the voting process.

This incident made national news on CNN. And if you had questions you could contact Louann Crow, who at the time was the Red Lake tribal member and election judge who testified in the senate about this matter. I would add that there's a few other things to note, having heard the testimony of other panelists here.

There has been noted from this incident also that individuals were challenged to the number of persons they could vouch for. And as you heard, community members vouching for one another may, in fact, be the most easily identifiable way to verify someone. American Indians may also legally have and socially may have more than one name. So that's why it would be important to have a community member vouch for someone. The challenge was that they could only have the opportunity to vouch for one individual, which I understand is not the case.

And that grievance or protest procedures are not clearly posted anywhere. So that if someone was concerned about incidents and witnessed or experienced a violation, there would be no way to determine what they needed to do, in fact, beginning at that moment to proceed to register a grievance. I have also been told just as of last night that there is interest now on proposing a constitutional amendment that will affect the determination that we currently have in the United States that if you are born here in this country, you are issued citizenship. And that there is a growing interest in having an amendment to the constitution where someone who was born in the United States may no longer be offered citizenship if their parents were not legal or if both parents were legal. If their parents are not married, they may be denied citizenship.

I would say in terms of culture communities, and I -- again, I just heard this last night so I could not tell you where this is surfacing, but that for culture communities we have been reclassified by state and federal and local governments consistently, and issues of what makes one a legal resident or, in fact, could identify that your parents have participated in what would be a recognized ceremony of marriage would affect not only our immigrant refugee population but your oldest indigenous population.

We did not, of course, secure citizenship until 1924. Part of the issues that prolonged the recognition of American Indians with the right to vote was that there were several states in the Southwest who continued to reclassify American Indians across the border; either that they were residents from Mexico or that they were residents of the United States. And we know that that in particular happened in Arizona up through the '60s.

So by taking Pueblo populations and not recognizing their cultural traditions of marriage or reclassifying them based on their origin, again American Indians may be redenied the opportunity to vote. And again, we live in no other nation or continent in the globe. It's the only place where we are found. So I certainly would say that I would seek and support reauthorization of all those provisions of the Voting Rights Act, especially those that involve registration, especially those that would determine proof of identity and those that, in fact, would offer the additional training and consistently of training for election judges in managing the environment where the voting occurs.

Thank you very much.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Stewart. Commissioner Meeks is going to begin the questioning, and then I'll follow up, and then Commissioner Davidson and then move to the ever-vocal Commissioner Rogers.

MS. MEEKS: For both Gwen and Elona, on those incidents, then was there a grievance filed with someone?

MS. CARR: No.

MS. MEEKS: And not at Red Lake either?

MS. STREET-STEWART: Well, part of this has been, I think, additional testimony that has been provided to our senate hearings, and it's been in committee structure.

But what I don't know -- again, as I mentioned, the procedures for filing a grievance are not well noted in the community.

MS. MEEKS: Well, I mean --

MS. CARR: Do I have to speak into this thing to be on the record?

MS. MEEKS: Probably.

MS. CARR: Oh.

MS. MEEKS: I think it helps.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: In your case, I don't think it's particularly necessary.

MS. CARR: Thanks.

MS. STREET-STEWART: No I, I -- as I said when I was giving my testimony, some of the things that I spoke of this afternoon I heard about literally 48 hours ago. And so one of the things that I would like to go back to Wisconsin with is some ideas of where to take that and what to do with that.

MS. MEEKS: Well, I mean, the reason I raise that is actually a point earlier, would have a federal monitor have helped this situation? It seems like it would have if there had been a federal monitor there.

MS. CARR: Yes.

MS. MEEKS: And isn't it the case that the only time a federal monitor will be sent out is if there was a grievance filed or reported --

MS. CARR: If it was a troubled area --

MS. MEEKS: Yes.

MS. CARR: -- initially? Yeah. And I'm sure -- let me -- I'm sure that we could, in all honesty, in native communities across the country, I think we could use a federal monitor in, in -- for a number of different reasons, whether they be in Wisconsin or Minnesota or Arizona or anywhere else.

MS. MEEKS: You know, it seems like this hasn't been a problem because in large part Indians weren't voting.

MS. STREET-STEWART: Correct.

MS. MEEKS: And now that --

MS. CARR: It wasn't important.

MS. MEEKS: -- it's -- right. And now that there are more and more, the percentage is much higher, you know, I would think that this is going to be an issue. So going forward for a recommendation, you know, I would hope it would be that in, you know, most of the minority areas that a federal monitor could be present.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I was -- if I could interrupt --

MS. MEEKS: Sure.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- Ms. Meeks.

MS. MEEKS: I don't know the answer.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: In both your testimony and Ms. Kazel's testimony, you referred to the fact that the area outside, immediately outside of reservation areas is sort of the chronic area of tension.

And I recall that when I was at the Justice Department, a Justice Department lawyer once mentioned to me that the division had had cases in the Southwest and the Four Corners area that went back many, many years. And that it wasn't just voting cases but that there was this phenomenon you're referring to, which is the area right outside of a reservation. And when I guess the native community collided its interests --

MS. CARR: Right.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- with the local white community, there were always, there were always tensions. It does sound like it's the equivalent of what -- the earlier testimony about these new immigrant populations when you had areas of rapid demographic change you saw this kind of phenomenon. But you're -- I guess what you're suggesting is that -- and I guess Commissioner Meeks is agreeing -- that in these areas outside the reservation, they are traditionally areas of some tension.

MS. CARR: Absolutely. Absolutely. You will find that to be -- you'll find that to be true virtually across the country, is that the most virulent racism discrimination, violence, discrimination of kids in schools, of just harassment on the street, of gang violence is going to be found right on the border towns of reservation communities pretty much uniformly across the country. It doesn't matter what tribe it is, it doesn't matter how, you know, how long they've been there. It doesn't matter if they're actually indigenous to the area or they're part of some removal. That is the realistic dynamic of living in Indian country. And most Indian people know what that is and know what that is immediately. You will see a lot of heads doing this.

MS. STREET-STEWART: I'd also like to recognize, though, that the native population, in fact, while it's growing on the reservation and the median age is very young on the reservation, the majority of your population lives off the reservation and it may be in rural areas and urban but they are off the reservation.

So the issue of the tribal identity card when the states were not consistent in determining how that information would be provided and up until the day of registration, there was still not a determination of what was legal proof of one's identity. And especially for the majority of natives living off the reservation, when you're in an area where your identification still may be your Indian identification, that was even, I think, a greater opportunity for the challenge.

MS. CARR: Absolutely.

MS. STREET-STEWART: Because even though we saw it happening on the reservation areas, clearly off the reservation there was just so much confusion and chaos about the use of tribal identity for someone to register to vote. And Minnesota also has same-day registration. So we were -- I mean, I was literally sitting with a marker changing cards because we were trying not to confuse the population. They were told you can use your identity, you can't use your identity and very, very difficult.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I wonder if I could just interrupt.

MS. MEEKS: Sure.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I gather, Ms. Street-Stewart, that there was some kind of state legislative hearing on some of the issues you were talking about, is that correct?

MS. STREET-STEWART: Well, and I think people are even more interested now. As we're moving into another election season and I think our legislative session has finished their economic work, there will be -- what I understand, in fact, from my representative, Keith Ellison, is that he is hoping to establish another community for review.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I wonder if -- do you have access to the transcripts or could tell us how to get access to these transcripts or documents or other evidence that might have been given to the commission? It would be very helpful for us to have that. And I noted earlier that you said you traveled around --

MS. STREET-STEWART: Uh-huh.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- to a lot of areas. Do you yourself know of organizations that have received letters or complaints and things of that kind? It would be very helpful --

MS. STREET-STEWART: Uh-huh.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- to us. And If you could give that -- if you could cover the state of Minnesota and Ms. Carr could cover the state of Wisconsin, you know, with that kind of information, that would be very helpful.
MS. STREET-STEWART: We could work to provide that for you.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes, I think Commissioner Davidson would particularly appreciate it. I'm sorry, Katherine.
MS. MEEKS: No, I'm done.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Little.
MR. LITTLE: Did I understand you to say that Michigan is the most segregated state in the country?
MR. MURPHY: It's one of -- there was a report that looked at 10, the top 10 most segregated cities in America. Michigan had five, four of which were predominantly African-American, and one of which was predominantly white.
MR. LITTLE: It just seems a little bit kind of hard to think of Michigan --
MR. MURPHY: I know.
MR. LITTLE: -- considering all the things 153 that Michigan is famous for --
MR. MURPHY: Yes.
MR. LITTLE: -- to being the most segregated state --
MR. MURPHY: Yes.
MR. LITTLE: -- in the Union.
MR. MURPHY: And that is an issue, Mr. Little, that even the Detroit Regional Chamber of Commerce at its annual meeting on Mackinac Island raised as an issue in Michigan that was at the forefront. We, we have a ways to go when it comes to that issue. I mean, Michigan is sometimes a state of contradiction. Back in the '70s, it elected George Wallace in the Democratic primary. And then in the late '80s it elected Jesse Jackson. So, you know, we're, we're trying to change that image. Right now the state is struggling with our economy, the three big automakers as you probably have been reading. But Michigan is the Great Lake state and a place of great hope as well.
MR. LITTLE: I think primarily -- I think, when I think of it, I think of Motown.
MR. MURPHY: Yes.
MR. LITTLE: Ms. Katz, your study, do you intend to give that to -- when it's finished, to give it to the commission?
MS. KATZ: Of course.
MR. LITTLE: Do you have it -- at this point do you have any idea, have any feelings about how it's going as far as the Voting Rights Act is concerned?
MS. KATZ: Well, like I said, I mean, some -- the findings we have so far are preliminary. We have some good indications that there's been successes in various parts of the country and we'll know more by September or October.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Davidson, I apologize, I skipped over you.
MR. DAVIDSON: No, you actually asked the question I was going to ask about the availability of --
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: If anybody has any documents, cough them up, please.
MR. DAVIDSON: I'm a documents man.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Ms. Katz, I'd like to ask about some -- you said that for the coverage jurisdictions you had 37 percent of the cases finding polarized voting? I was reading 38.

MS. KATZ: Yeah, in the covered jurisdictions where they found a violation of Section 2, 86 percent found polarized voting. But you may be asking something slightly --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: No, that's what I was trying to clarify.

MS. KATZ: Yeah.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: So it's 86 percent -- I'm sorry, if could you give the numbers again.

MS. KATZ: Okay. In, in all of the decisions that we found where there's a liability decision, so there might be more than one in a particular lawsuit, we found racially polarized voting in coverage jurisdictions in 7out of 186 decisions. It's 38 percent of the actual opinions you could find. And of those opinions that found a violation of Section 2, we found 86 percent of those found racially polarized voting. It's hard to find a violation of Section without finding racially polarized voting in a coverage jurisdiction.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I guess it's conceivable that you could find racially polarized voting and not find it --

MS. KATZ: Well, of course.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: So the 7out of 108 is the number without the --

MS. KATZ: Right, 186 or the total number of cases in which the court said Section is or is not violated.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes.

MS. KATZ: And of those, 7found racially polarized voting. Of the ones that found Section is violated, we got 60 of those decisions, and in those decisions, of -- of the ones with the violation, 5of them found racially polarized voting. If you found a violation of Section 2, you were almost certain to find racially polarized voting. Finding racially polarized voting is not itself sufficient to find violations of Section 2.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Right. Well, the existence of racially polarized voting could be of some interest to this commission.

MS. KATZ: Of course, yes. That's why we're tracking it under both categories.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I guess since you're a law professor who teaches this, do you attach any significance to that number, that percentage, the 7rather than 108? It seems rather high to me.

THE WITNESS: I, I think, I think -- well, 38 percent and we're over a 25-year period. I don't have the numbers broken down over time. I wouldn't be surprised if you found more recent cases not having the same percentage. I think it's just consistent with other people's studies about a decline in racial, racial block voting --

MS. STREET-STEWART: Yes.

MS. KATZ: -- particularly in these jurisdictions. As more minority candidates are elected, we see crossover voting, lots of votes for minority candidates in the -- a breakdown. I would hardly say it doesn't exist anymore, but certainly at the level it once did it's diminished. And we'll have numbers to tell you exactly how many cases in the last five years found racially polarized voting in these jurisdictions. I can't break that down for you now, but I'll be able to do that.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I guess it would be interesting to see the finding where racially polarized voting was found among the covered states.

MS. KATZ: And again, this is something we're not tracking that I would be interested to know because I think there's a lot of racially polarized voting within primaries, within the Democratic primary itself.

And there are courts in Texas in the district -- the partisan gerrymandering case that was decided relatively recently finding that you can't make out a claim under Section because minority groups are voting for different candidates within the Democratic primary. So you see -- what you see is racially polarized voting within the primary but not in the general election. So blacks will vote for black candidates, Hispanics for Hispanics, whites for whites. In the primary when it comes time for election day, will they all rally behind the Democrat? And I don't think the Voting Rights Act now really deals with that, or we really don't have a language to deal with what's going on in the primary in the way in which open, closed primaries and different rules would have a -- you know, can affect kinds of racial vote dilution. This is the claim that Cynthia McKenny's supporters made, actually, after she lost that election in Georgia's crossover. This was -- she's back -- this was back in the 200primary where Republicans crossed over, and well within Georgia law which invites people to do so and rallied behind Denise Mayette (spelled phonetically). And she was elected with indisputably considerable support from white Republicans within, within the Democratic -- within that district.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Did you want to comment on --

MS. KATZ: That's not good or bad, it's just -- it's a part of the electoral process that I don't think has been focused on sufficiently.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Did you want to comment on --

MR. MURPHY: Yes, just to add to what Professor Katz has said, in the 2000 Democratic primary in Michigan, the use of the Internet became an issue in terms of how voters could vote through the Internet well before the primary date. And our concern is that many urban voters, Detroit, Flint, Lansing, did not have access. And it's well documented, minorities really don't have access or are not up to speed on the use of computers and the Internet for that type of thing. And that was a concern and will probably be a concern in the future as well.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Rogers.

MR. ROGERS: Ms. Katz, I'm curious. What percentage of cases are filed by whites related to the Voting Rights Act?

MS. KATZ: You know, I, I don't know the answer to that. I'm not actually, I, I -- in coverage -- I don't know the answer to that. I don't know that we've broken these down by that. I'm wondering here just doctrinally whether white plaintiffs can make out a claim of racial vote dilution because of the senate factors in --

THE COURT REPORTER: Can you slow down, please.

MS. KATZ: Sure, I'm sorry. I grew up in New York. I can try. I don't know of a case brought by white plaintiffs. I know of a lot of cases in D.C. and elsewhere where white plaintiffs are bringing reverse discrimination claims in, in predominantly African-American cities. I'm still talking fast.

Under, under Section of the Voting Rights Act, I can't think -- and maybe Jon knows of a case offhand -- in which white plaintiffs have sustained a claim of racial vote dilution because of the way district lines have been drawn. And one of the reasons I wonder whether they would have trouble is because of the factors the senate has given us in terms of the history of discrimination and, and those other factors where they're at least not traditionally associated with the white majority.

But I don't think that would preclude a claim. I just happen -- I mean, I've taught this for a number of years. I can't think of a claim in which white plaintiffs -- I mean, there are all the Shaw cases, obviously, but they're not claiming racial vote dilution, they're claiming something distinct.

MR. GREENBAUM: The only case I know of is in Alabama, and it was either Birmingham or Montgomery, and the case was actually settled. But that's the only white vote dilution case that I'm aware of that that's been filed.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly. I guess I'd be fascinated to know that. Given the study that you're putting together, there may well be cases that evidence that. Of the arguments that's made about the Voting Rights Act is that -- well, there are two arguments. One, people would argue that it's only an act as it relates to minorities. Others would argue that it really strengthens the entirety of the country, and that its application really is broad in its scope to all of us, including whites, and that it is to the benefit of all of us, including whites. And I'd be interested to know that, and whether or not whites have, in fact, ever filed claims as it relates to the Act in a way that you could argue would extol the virtues of the benefit of the Act as it relates in particular to white Americans also.

MS. KATZ: We'll look for that as we look nationwide again. If Jon doesn't know of a case, I'm inclined to think that there isn't a case yet, but there's obviously --

MR. GREENBAUM: Michigan State looks at its own published opinions and I don't believe there are any of those.

MR. ROGERS: Yes.

MR. GREENBAUM: Now, there's another case that's not a vote dilution case that Department of Justice -- it's a pending case that the Department of Justice brought on behalf of white voters who allegedly were intimidated by black Democratic Party officials in the South. And like I said, that case is ongoing right now.

MR. ROGERS: Yes. And I wanted to ask a follow-up to that, which really is the essence of that, because I'm trying to get to both of sides of this, if I can, to try and understand the parameters of this Act as it relates. You all -- or mostly for the most part testified regarding essentially practices as engaged by Republicans as it relates to minority voters. And in our previous panel, there was some of this conversation as related in particular by Democrats, for example in Chicago, in terms of practices or policies as they affected minority voters. I'm curious as to whether or not you all could provide this commission information as it relates to practices engaged by Democratic officials in particular which have an adverse impact upon minority voters as it relates to the Voting Rights Act. I'm just curious. I don't know the answer to that but --

MS. KATZ: Yes, I'd like to speak to that because I, I don't think that was the -- if I gave that implication, I certainly don't want to suggest that. We're, we're looking at practices adopted by governmental bodies, so they're not clearly Democrat or Republican. There's a huge debate going on long-standing about the Voting Rights Act and the existence of majority-minority districts and whether those districts help Democrats, hurt Democrats, help, Republicans. And I think that's a complicated question, whether the election of a black representative from a majority-minority district is actually well within the interests of the Republican Party. And if we look at a case like Georgia versus Ashcroft, which the Supreme Court decided about two years ago which upheld Georgia's districting plan, if you parse out the political alignments in which you have black voters challenging the unpacking of districts within the state of Georgia, and you have John Ashcroft's Department of Justice --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: If you could slow down.

MS. KATZ: I'm sorry. My students complain about this all the time.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Think of us as slow students.

MS. KATZ: Hardly. You have John Lewis defending the decision of the state of Georgia to unpack these districts and disperse black voters. And you have the Justice Department saying, no, you can't do that, you have to concentrate that. You have the Republican governor at the time of Georgia saying, let's not fight this anymore. I don't want to fight this claim in the Supreme Court.

This very bizarre alignment, I think the politics under Section and Section 5, for that matter, are incredibly complicated, and it's not accurate to say these are Republicans harming African-American voters. I think there's a lot of dispute as to who's hurt and who's harmed. And it may well be that what's in the best interests of African-American voters may not be in the best interests of the Democratic Party at some, at some level at least on certain facts.

MS. STREET-STEWART: So that the chronicle of experience also reflects the Native American community. Tribal elections are not partisan. So that the experience of native people becoming part of, as I said, the citizens electorate and identification with partisan politics is something that is much more contemporary. Which is why I think there's the increased attention paid to native communities right now in the primary and general elections. Although many of the incidents, I think, that we heard about would have been on general election today, most native people, if they are not voting in primaries, will arrive at the polls on election days still with that sense of having had to claim party identity.

Now, I'm going to give that as a general statement, and I have no figures to, you know, substantiate that. But it is pretty clear that if their previous experience has been tribal elections, whether that's up in Alaska's villages or all the way down here through the States, there has not been a need to be able to identify yourself in terms of partisan politics, which is why again this is such an incredible experience these last few years, because that's a new energy that's been applied to native voters.

MR. MURPHY: I think that the comment made in Michigan last year by the legislators of Oakland County that we need to suppress the Detroit vote really reflects some of the politics and thinking going on in Michigan. We have come up -- we have legislation proposed to -- no reason absentee voting, same day registration to open up opportunities, remove the barriers to get more people to vote. And I think there's a concerted effort to contain in Michigan, especially in our urban centers, the vote, especially when you look at statewide and national elections. Local elections are somewhat different. When you look at statewide and national elections, there is that -- that comment pretty much says it all. And I don't think that there have been -- they're successful in changing that perception around.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: You know, I think it's interesting testimony we've gotten because it's not just Chicago. I think there's some testimony about New York testified.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: And then I'm not sure. I, I know the political alignment in Hamtramck, for instance, and some of those northeast, smaller northeast cities that we heard about I guess not necessarily with respect to African-Americans but with respect to the Latino populations. So it is an interesting issue that you're raising. It seems to be not one party or the other.

MR. ROGERS: No doubt about it.

MS. CARR: I think as far as parties go with American Indians that the political parties seem to be much more interested in Indian gaming money than they are in a lot of the voting issues, just from my experience.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you for the slap of reality. Mr. Rogers, do you have any more questions?

MR. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, just one final question for the panel. I'm just curious. Let's assume that the Act is not reauthorized, just assume that it's not reauthorized, that a vote fails in Congress next year and the Congress simply says, we will not reauthorize Section 5 preclearance, and we will not reauthorize the language provisions. What happens?

MS. KATZ: I can just say under Section 2 nothing. Section stays in place, it's a permanent provision of the Act. And I think --

MR. ROGERS: No doubt about it.

MS. KATZ: -- one of -- well, it does matter in the sense, I mean, when we see what's happening in covered and uncovered jurisdictions, is Section a supplement? I mean, I think the world looks very different after Section 5 -- without Section 5 afterwards. It's very hard to tell what would happen. I would imagine there would be a great rise in the number of Section cases, but it wouldn't be enough to forestall what Section 5 attempts to prevent.

MR. ROGERS: You don't think you'd have circumstances -- for example, I'm just thinking of -- let me assume that there's a strong local effort. Assume that states will engage in practices, for example, representative of what you specifically mentioned, is that your legislative bodies specifically took action to try to remedy a problem. If you do not reauthorize the Voting Rights Act or these provisions that we're talking about, would not legislators, if there are problems, seek to, in fact, solve these things at the local level?

MR. MURPHY: I don't necessarily think so. I think, first of all, if it fails to be reauthorized, I think perception-wise it's a message to the country, especially to minorities in America, that, you know, this is not important. And I think it opens up the door to return to some of the practices; maybe not right away but over a period of time. And I think that's one of the dangers of not reauthorizing.

I think it would have a very demoralizing effect, especially with African-Americans in the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and the Selma rally in March really is symbolic of that victory, and I think it would be a setback. Would local, would state governments take action? That remains to be seen, you know.

MS. MEEKS: I would just like to make a comment concerning that. I mean, in states like South Dakota where there's 76 whatever percent Republicans in the state legislature and all due respect to Elona, at least tribes in South Dakota primarily vote Democratic, I don't think there would be any impetus to change that, to make corrections. In fact, I think that the opposite has happened. So -- and I think there's plenty -- I mean, Hawaii is primarily a Democratic state. I think that they have some problems they aren't prone to face either. So I, I absolutely think that these sections of the Voting Rights Act need to be renewed, reauthorized.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, the job of this commission is to do fact-finding rather than take a --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- partisan position on the way there. I would point out, however, that the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice is actually a pretty unique institution. There's nothing else like anywhere else in the world. So when you're talking about yes, Section 2 would go on, when you take out Section 5, I think it -- it does remove a big piece of the enforcement mechanisms we have right now. So I think that would be my comment on that.

And as far as language, I think, you know, I think we've heard a lot of testimony about the importance of 203, not just the Native American populations but for others, and I think it would just be a world that would be hard to imagine without those kinds of things. With respect to the monitors, I think when the Act was passed, that was a provision that really was very controversial because it meant the federal authority showing up in Alabama or Mississippi. But I think nowadays, I'm not sure that it means quite -- it doesn't have that kind of symbolism in the South or the rest of the country anymore. It wouldn't -- I think having monitors come in, particularly seems to me, and we've heard the testimony about it seems to be a positive way to avoid problems from happening. So I mean, just looking at the testimony, I think that, you know, it seems to me that we've had some testimony that's pretty relevant on this issue. But, you know, I don't mean to jump in and cut you off. Did you want to say something about if 203 was not extended?

MS. CARR: Of course. Actually --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Why am I not surprised?

MS. CARR: -- I'd like to say that my answer is indicative of the dichotomy that is in Indian country. In one respect, Indian people wouldn't ever notice because we have been existent in this way for thousands of years, to a lesser or greater extent intact, our tribal governments, our traditions, languages. There certainly have been many difficulties, I guess, is probably the only way I can say it at this point.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Calamities is what you want to say.

MS. CARR: Yes, difficulties, whatever you want to call them. So -- but we are living proof that, you know, we have survived. All the native people at this point in the country who walk around, we are the survivors and the children of survivors.

So in one respect I have to say to you we would not notice because we have been here forever. Our tribal governments, our tribal, you know, languages, traditions, et cetera, et cetera, would indur as they have endured through the last 500 years of occupation and certainly thousands of years before that.

That being said, I think that it would, you know, it would disenfranchise yet another disenfranchised group. And in all honesty, while there has been the, you know, the American Indian Movement et cetera, et cetera, in history, as far as the movement such as the civil rights movement, et cetera, et cetera, with other groups in the country, American Indian communities even today are some of the last at the table, so to speak. Even though we're the first citizens, we're the last at the table. So the things that impact the last at the table, the opportunities, the hope, the participation, the empowerment, et cetera, et cetera, all those things would be challenged tremendously. There would be a great sorrow in the Indian community on or off the reservation. There would be, you know, certainly no protections for the things that you heard today and more. And worse. Unfortunately, people who like to, to perpetrate those kinds of behaviors don't usually get better on their own, they get worse. So if it was the case that these were not reauthorized, we would have, you know, some very -- we would go back to a lot of the things our -- all of our ancestors experienced. And so I think that that's an important thing for each one us to remember, and that we need to do everything that we can to honor our ancestors, whether they be American Indian or African-American, Asian or whatever in making sure this is reauthorized.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, why don't we give Ms. Street-Stewart the last word. And if that could be a minute, that would help.

MS. STREET-STEWART: My answer will be brief. In fact, we are a portion of the population that, of course, has unique access to all levels of government, state, local, county and federal. And I do believe that the political sophistication of the American Indian community and our protection of rights under our treaty sovereignty would, in fact, allow a number of our tribes, if the Act was not reauthorized, I believe that they would continue to explore what might be possible either under their treaty status or again in a protected status because of the trust relationship with the government. So I think we would know that there would be other avenues that we, as a population, could access because of our unique relationship to the government.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you, members of this panel, and if you have to leave, feel free to do so. We're going to quickly hear the testimony of Jorge Sanchez who has been very nice about being here most of the day and wanting to get to testify now. He has to catch a flight, so we're going to try to hear his testimony right now. Jorge Sanchez is a staff attorney with the Mexican American Legal Defense Fund, MALDEF, in its Chicago office. He was formerly a legislative staff attorney for MALDEF, and he's a lawyer who, among other things, went to Baltimore. But welcome, Mr. Sanchez, and I do apologize that we've kept you so long, and please feel free to go ahead.

MR. SANCHEZ: No apologies necessary. I thank the commission for the work you're doing. It's an honor to find myself in such esteemed company. This commission has been given a serious charge and I have to apologize even before I begin my comments that they're far from exhaustive in terms of the information you seek. Clearly we're getting a picture today that is, is still somewhat incomplete about the kinds of things that have gone on in recent memory.

And, and certainly when I got the letter from the commission saying that we're looking back through 1982, I was a sophomore in high school in 1982. So I don't have personal knowledge about some of those things that have gone on since then, though, though some about some of the things since then. As to the language provisions found in Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, many of the covered jurisdictions only became so pretty recently as of the year 2000 because of our growing population.

MALDEF has found that even sympathetic county registrars and clerks have dragged their feet in, in translating election materials, and have at times failed to understand the needs for all materials to be translated. In Cook County, which is a fairly friendly jurisdiction to both immigrants and Latinos, it was only after litigation that the clerk of the Cook County ordered all materials to be translated. We actually are very, very happy to have Cook County as an example at this point. It allows us to go to other jurisdictions and say, look, Cook County was able to do it, you can talk to them, you can talk to David Ohr (spelled phonetically), ask him who he used to translate these materials. Chances are he'll even give the translation of things he's already translated. So the idea of cost and, and logistical barriers to translation become less so as, as resources are pooled and shared that way.

Our experiences with other coverage jurisdictions haven't been as quite as smooth as they have been even with Cook County. After the census numbers were released in 200and jurisdictions became aware of their obligations under Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, MALDEF met in late 2001 with the King County registrar. It's a jurisdiction to the west and somewhat north of Chicago. The office, the office was made aware of its obligations, and for the next years -- for the next three years did almost nothing to comply with the Section 203 provisions to translate its materials. It was only as a result of activism by a statewide coalition and the efforts of MALDEF that we were able to push the jurisdictions -- actually take movement on, on these issues.

I mean, and -- in, in '04 when we meeting with them they were saying, "Well, you know, the election's right around the corner. How are we ever going to get this done?" And that's when we went back to our notes and said, "Well, we met with you three years ago." And, in fact, the Justice Department had met with King County at the same time.

And so we said, "You all were well aware of your obligations at the time. You know, it's not an excuse now to be saying you don't have enough time to do this." Even after they agreed that they were covered, that they had the obligation to translate everything, we found them fighting about what needed to be translated. Well, does it really have to be everything? You walk into the King County registrar's office and there's absolutely no sign in Spanish of any kind. So someone who's a Spanish speaker comes in and can't even figure out where they have to go to register a vote. There are pamphlets that talked about voting for seniors that weren't translated into Spanish at the time. There, there were pamphlets that were seeking election judges and were seeking to get high school students involved in the election that weren't translated into Spanish. And they thought these thinks were kind of minimal and, and not important.

And we said, "You know, this is the whole point. If you're making the outreach to white or English speaking high school students to start getting involved in the election process, what message is it sending to the Latino or the Spanish speaking students who want to be part of this to not even give them the opportunity? Even more striking was a Web site that was quite extensive, no translations at all at the time.

They've made quite a lot of progress in King County thanks to our efforts and, and, you know, a recognition that, that it is really only Section 203 that made them do this. I mean, it was the threat of litigation that if you don't comply, you've had a lot of time, we're going to come after you.

Another -- a very, a very common problem that we see too is the lack of competent translators to produce intelligible translations. In one of the cases we were involved in in East Chicago, Indiana, they had a clerk translating ballot materials. And so you actually had them making up words that don't exist in Spanish. They had translated the words "ballot" as -- I don't remember. They basically made up a word that was not the word for ballot in Spanish. And this had actually gone out. This was some time ago.

But we understand that sometimes the temptation in terms of complying with 203 is let's just get it done as opposed to getting it done well. And there are nationally certified translators. There's court translators in almost every federal jurisdiction. There are qualified and competent people to do this work.

I wanted to talk a little bit now about observers. I think it's very important that, that the observers and, and monitor provisions be maintained on the Voting Rights Act. Chicago has a very, very checkered history with elections, and not just Chicago but jurisdictions around Chicago as well. We hear about people being -- voting who are dead, people voting from addresses that are registered -- that are vacant lots, et cetera. And, and similar, as was raised, a lot of times the flash points are places of rapid population growth, or if not of rapid population growth, of growing Latino empowerment.

I think of Cicero, Illinois as being one of these places that had election monitors the last time around. And needs them and absolutely needs them. This is a town that was basically Al Capone's headquarters for decades, and organized crime still has a lot of influence in this town. It's a town where -- which is a complete Latino majority in terms of total population, and which only recently saw it elected its first Latino mayor. It's a place where all sorts of shenanigans go on, and we know it and everyone knows it, and the only way to put to a stop to these kinds of things are by having federal monitors there on site.

The other thing that's important is the federal monitors actually get out to the polling places. We heard at the last election around that Justice was sending out observers to jurisdictions, and the observers were sitting in their offices unfortunately. This, I think, unfortunately represents more -- is more of a reflection of the administration I, unfortunately, assume than, than the good work that the Justice Department has done traditionally in this area. I'd like to talk a little bit about a case that we still have going on in our Chicago office. It touches upon the appointment of federal monitors and other topics that are germane to this commission.

In the May 6th, 2006 mayoral primary in East Chicago, Indiana, a decades-old political machine, in an attempt to regain its waning power, engages in a series of actions aimed at vote suppression, vote stealing, vote buying and vote denial.

There was quite a lot of litigation over this, over this primary, and it resulted in a, in an opinion by a district court. And these are the findings that the district court made. After eight and half days of testimony and after hearing from approximately 165 witnesses, the court found that over 155 instances of individual voter fraud existed. The trial court made a number of specific findings, and I'll read some of these. A predatory pattern existed by Pastrick supporters of inducing voters that were first-time voters or otherwise less informed or lacking any knowledge of the voting crisis -- process, the infirm, the poor and those with limited skill in the English language to engage in absentee voting.

There was widespread solicitation of people to apply for absentee votes and then a concomitant handling of those ballots or the applications or the -- either the ballots before or after they were voted.

There were numerous actions of Pastrick supporters of providing compensation and/or creating the expectation of compensation to induce voters to cast their ballots via the absentee process.

The use of vacant lots or former residence of voters on applications for absentee ballots. The possession of unmarked absentee ballots by Pastrick supporters and the delivery of those ballots to absentee voters. I could go on and on. This is -- the court summed up by saying.... I could go on and on.

This is a jurisdiction that is about 75 percent Latino and, and had not been able to elect an executive for decades. And, and it's, it's particularly important that these kinds of fraud were aimed at a Latino and in some cases a limited English population and first-time voters. This was, this was completely about taking advantage of the naive voter who, who might not know their rights and, and exploiting that ignorance at every step of the way to the, to the advantage of, in this case, a Democratic machine.

There, there's also issues of -- actually, let me read the quote from the court. "The East Chicago Democratic mayoral primary may be a textbook example of the chicanery that can attend the absentee vote cast by mail. "Examples of instances where the supervision and monitoring of voting by Pastrick supporters and the subsequent possession of ballots those by malefactors are common herein. Those illegalities came with a side order of predation in which the naive, the neophytes, the infirm, and the needy were subjected to the unscrupulous election tactics so extensively discussed."

And what the court leaves out is it was primarily the Latino population that suffered these indignities. This, this didn't happen without the help of the election authorities. On May 6th, prior to the May 6th election, one of the plaintiffs in the case was a poll judge, and she had attended a training session prior to the election.

On the day of the election, she was told incorrectly that she could not help anybody, any Spanish speaking voters, that Spanish could not be spoken in the polling place at all. This was told and, and actually given to her in writing on the day of the election when she sought to help people who actually sought her help to vote.

Another difficulty that was encountered in, in this process was that, that if a voter -- oh, when voters showed up who had been sent absentee ballots, they were told they could not vote. So in some cases voters went and got their absentee ballot and said, here, I'm giving it back, I want to vote, and weren't allowed to do so. Then they were told they could only vote if, if they actually went to the county seat, which is 20 miles away. So you could take your absentee ballot and turn it in and vote but only if you went 20 miles away to the county seat to do this. Again, a very clear example of vote denial.

And again, this relates back to the observer -- observer and monitoring issue. This is an election that as a result of the litigation in this case, a new election, a special election was ordered by the Indiana Supreme Court and a federal judge appointed federal monitors to oversee this election. In the election, the challenger, a plaintiff, his name is George Pabey, a Puerto Rican native of East Chicago, won by an overwhelming margin in the rerun election. And now they're unfortunately dealing with four decades of utter corruption, of looting the treasury, of casino moneys that were supposed to go to develop the community that instead were used to line the pockets of, of political patronage appointees.

I just want to touch a little bit too about the issue of community organizations and the voter outreach programs. Again in Illinois, there's an organization called the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights, which undertook a massive voter registration campaign. I believe they registered over 24,000 voters in the state of Illinois. And as part of their registration efforts, they also had done Get-Out-The-Vote efforts and then election day monitoring efforts.

And in one jurisdiction in Kane County, the county registrar out there, Willard Helander, initially denied this group the ability to go and observe the election. And, and there were a few precincts in Lake County that they were interested in looking at. The, the reality is there aren't yet a lot of Latinos yet in Lake County, so they're, they're in a fairly small area. And it was only again the threat of litigation that, that opened the doors for this group. And, and the defense that Ms. Helander gave -- first she said this group wasn't registered with the state, which indeed they were registered with the state to be a registrar of voters statewide, and had the proper credentials to, to do the poll-watching as well.

But then Ms. Helander was very, very proud of the fact that -- she said, "Well, you know what? I denied the League of Women Voters observing status too, because monitoring elections isn't within their mission statement." And this was the logic that she used to exclude the League of Women Voters, which -- I mean, we all know the League of Voters. But I mean, to me this, this exemplifies the kind of resistance that our communities face as we grow, as we expand into places, and as we start to reach for political empowerment because these communities have largely been there for a long time. It's a growing political sophistication, and the growing activism and registration that's, that's now threatening. And the more that we do it, the more resistance we're going to be met with.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you. Questions? Commissioner Little?

MR. LITTLE: I'll pass.
MR. DAVIDSON: Yes, I'm sure that the court reporter is -- I mean, his fingers are a little slower than your speech is, my mind is a little slower than your speech is. And you and Professor Katz are a team, I'll tell you. You -- when you were talking about a jurisdiction that was 75 percent Latino and that these fraudulent efforts were aimed at the Latino population, this was East Chicago we're talking about?
MR. MURPHY: Yes, yes.
MR. DAVIDSON: Okay. And the -- CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Is the Indiana jurisdiction?
MR. SANCHEZ: Yes.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: What's the name of the case?
MR. SANCHEZ: It's called Pabey, P-A-B-E-Y, versus Pastrick -- or actually, it's called Gonzalez versus Pastrick.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, you have the decision, right?
MR. SANCHEZ: I don't. This is actually a pleading. It's a draft complaint.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Gonzalez versus?
MR. SANCHEZ: Gonzalez versus Pastrick, P-A-S-T-R-R-I-C-K. And there's state companion cases that were brought for the new -- to get a new election.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay.
MR. SANCHEZ: I can also provide the commission with copies with more of this information. I, unfortunately, was rushing a little bit.
MR. DAVIDSON: If you could do that, and especially the judicial findings --
THE WITNESS: Sure.
MR. DAVIDSON: -- there --
MR. SANCHEZ: Sure.
MR. DAVIDSON: -- mentioning the 155 instances of vote fraud --
MR. SANCHEZ: Yes.
MR. DAVIDSON: -- that would be very helpful.
MR. SANCHEZ: will certainly do so.
MR. DAVIDSON: Okay.
MR. SANCHEZ: Our complaint, actually, many of the facts that I recited when we filed our complaint it was -- there were attachments of the court's decision as well as affidavits from a number of people who were affected. So I will provide all of that to this submission.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I imagine that the MALDEF office in Chicago has legal files with the cases it's been involved in.
MR. SANCHEZ: We've done a number of Section cases over the years.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I think that it would be useful to be able to access the files of those cases.
MR. SANCHEZ: Certainly.
MS. STREET-STEWART: We should address this.
MR. SANCHEZ: And we have a Section case going on right now in Aurora, Illinois where there's a -- it used to be a, an at-large system. They now created a 10-member district system with two at-large seats and, and in, in a city whose population is about 30 percent Latino. They created one safe district and keep fighting where -- well, we just reached summary judgment in that case. So I, I think it's actually a very strong case.

And it's indicative of -- I mean, it's one of these jurisdictions, like I said, where the population has turned. And I think it's also the aging of our population. You know, with every year we get more new voters. And so these, so these thresholds, you know, are pretty darn thin. And, and I think that there's that realization out there that, that, you know, that it's a tipping point. And when you get these jurisdictions with huge numbers of Latinos in them, things will change. And I think that there's that realization and there's that resistance that builds to that.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I think it would be helpful to get copies of the opinions in the cases that your office has brought. It's a renowned office. And we're hitting a problem in some case -- some number of cases are unreported. And so we figure if we could get someone like to you to make sure that the universe we're looking at is complete, that would be very helpful. So if you could give us, you know, the opinions and the cases that your office has litigated. I hope that isn't too much of --

MR. SANCHEZ: No, not at all, not by any means. And, and just one more small point that I did want to make is this rash of voter ID laws that we're seeing all over the country. I mean, that, that is --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Do you want to talk about that for a minute?

MR. SANCHEZ: Yeah, it's clearly on our radar screen and clearly there, there are situations which -- where disenfranchised poor, primarily minorities, that will -- it will disenfranchise language minorities. The tribal ID issue is something that I've certainty been -- I mean, clearly sovereigns have the right to issue IDs. And Indiana's law, for instance, there may not be a reservation in Indiana, but certainly there are native people that live in Indiana. There's no provision in the Indiana law for the acceptance of anything other than state or federal ID. There's -- you know, most of these -- most of the states have some charge for the provision of a license or, or a state ID card.

And, and it's just another hoop you have to jump through. I mean, I think that, that -- you know, people who put together sweepstakes or, or -- will tell you the more steps that people have to go through to get to -- from Point A to Point B, you're going to get dropoff at every single new requirement you add. And this is a big one. It's -- in Illinois we get to show up on polling day, sign our names, and there's two judges who get to look at our names and decide if we're, if, if we should vote.

And it may not be a perfect system, but it's worked thus far. And, and to start requiring more from very busy people, from working people, from people who have a hard time getting to the polls as it is on Tuesday is -- it's really marching us down a road of further disenfranchisement of communities that have traditionally been disenfranchised.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you, Mr. Sanchez, and we thank you for your testimony. And we apologize for holding you unnecessarily and God speed. We will take a 10-minute break at this point.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We're going to reconvene and we have Mr. Gregory Moore, executive director of the NAACP National Voter Fund, available telephonically.

I will say that Mr. Moore is responsible for the overall national coordination of national programs designed to promote increased voter education and participation among African-Americans and communities of color throughout the United States while promoting voter rights election reform and issues that are important to the NAACP and its chapters.

Mr. Moore has been an advocate for many years and has served in the capacity of being chief of staff to John Conyers, the dean of the Congressional Black Caucus, and actually the ranking member of the Judiciary Committee as well. Mr. Moore, you have a long resume, but I won't go more into that. Welcome to the commission hearing on the Midwest, and please feel free to go ahead.

MR. MOORE: Well, thank you very much, and I want to check and make sure you can hear me okay.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes, we can hear you fine.

MR. MOORE: Thank you very much. And I want to also thank Marcia for the work in helping me prepare. I apologize that I'm not being there in person. I planned to be on a plane last night and was delayed. I wanted to --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: If you could speak slowly, Mr. Moore. We're going to turn up the microphones, so if you could just speak slowly. The court reporter is having difficulty getting you down. Why don't you proceed, but if you could proceed slowly.

MR. MOORE: All right. I'll go ahead and start. I'll read excerpts from my testimony and not the full testimony in total, and I have submitted it via e-mail.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes, we have it.

MR. MOORE: Oh, well, good. You mentioned I'm the executive director of the NAACP National Voter Fund. And we've been active over the last four, five years, actually, in registering, educating black voters around the country. We're headquartered in D.C., and over the last several years we've coordinated programs in over 25 states.

I'm from Ohio. I'm a graduate of Ohio University, and I've spent a good number of years doing work in Ohio, and I thought in this hearing I would primarily contain my remarks in the time that I have -- the short time that I have to focus on some of the concerns I have about the activities taking place in Ohio concerning election reform and how that might impact the whole debate that we're having across the country in terms of election voting and reauthorization under the Voting Rights Act. If you want to take that in conjunction with --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Mr. Moore, can you stop for a second?

(A discussion was held off the record about sound quality.)

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay.

MR. MOORE: Let me just start by reminding the commission here again that we were involved in a registration drive that was historic in 2004 along with several other allied organizations. We were able to register 220,000 voters alone and about three and a half million that we're aware of and with several other partners throughout the country. So there was a dramatic increase in the number of African-American registered voters that we know had an impact on the turnout. We were actively involved with those efforts. We were also seeking to ensure that every voter was fairly counted.

We were participants in a number of hearings in November and December of 2004 in the aftermath of the Ohio presidential debacle. And in 2005 we've been closely monitoring the work of the Ohio General Assembly and other state legislators, that they have sought to address the issues that arose out of the problems that occurred throughout the voting process on election day.

As we conducted these hearings on -- as you conduct these hearings -- as the commission conducts these hearings, it's important that we hear many of the concerns that are being expressed by voting rights advocates, as you have been doing, as well as specific community groups that know firsthand what went wrong in Ohio and other states as well. We know from Michigan past elections that African-Americans who are first-time voters are more likely to encounter counters problems at the polls, and not just in Ohio but around the country. The NAACP National Voter Fund and NAACP and other organizations at the state and local level have spent years in development of election protection programs designed to ensure full compliance with the Voting Rights Act of 1965. However, these efforts to get disenfranchised voters continues to this day, and it is therefore the challenge of all federal and state lawmakers to ensure that all election-related laws which govern how elections are conducted in states are being drafted and enacted in compliance with the spirit of the Voting Rights Act. That's the primary point I want to make with this sort of testimony. I know that Congresswoman Conyers had planned to be here today, and I know that she will try to speak with you at some point in your calendar of other hearings. But I would refer you all to the Conyers report entitled "Preserving Democracy: What went wrong in Ohio." This is the best publication, I think, that has been written. It gives a detailed account of many of the voting irregularities that took place that impacted African-American voters in Cleveland, Columbus and other counties throughout the state. Now, while Ohio is not one of states that's covered under the Voting Rights Act, I think it's important that states that do have -- that do not have to preclear their voting law changes should be aware and they should actually enact these laws in the spirit of the Voting Rights Act, and also these laws should fall within the letter of the law as well.

A number of hearings, not unlike this one today, were held immediately after November 2nd. It produced hours of testimony and volumes of firsthand accounts of voter suppression on the part of state and county election officials in urban and minority communities across the state. And I urge the commission and other voting rights activists to monitor the actions of the Ohio General Assembly in particular as they undergo their version of election reform.

Based on an in-depth analysis of the proposed legislation being sponsored by the governing party there, it is clear to us and to a number of voting rights activists that the reform language attempts to codify many of the abuses that we saw take place in 2004

Today we urge the members of this commission to send a strong signal to Washington and to the state legislative leaders that the commission is willing to submit its findings of all of the recently gathered evidence of voter suppression, voter intimidation and voter disenfranchisement. In fact, any relevant fact or finding regarding current barriers to the full exercise of voting rights should be exposed and taken into consideration before any final reauthorization legislation is passed into law.

We also need to take this opportunity of the 40th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act to advance innovative state legislation initiatives that can expand the voting rights where it is needed despite the political consequences that may still exist. Now, opponents of expansion of voting rights are working overtime at state legislatures all across the country drafting up cookie cutter legislation that is increasing imposing mandatory ID requirements, imposing restrictive voting procedures, and will force millions of more voters into this provisional voting status.

Likewise, I'd urge the commission to consider the following recommendation that sometimes may go against the conventional wisdom of the current legislative strategies, but these are the issues that need to be addressed now and not after the debate of voting rights after extension. And that, I think, would be in the true spirit of the Voting Rights Act that helps spur this enactment.

The election laws that are taking place must have the greatest emphasis on increasing the electorate and not making it more difficult to participate. And so we know that there are laws that may seek to do one thing or have the effect of doing something else. And as these legislatures continue to deliberate on election reform, it's important that the basic principles of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as well as the National Voter Registration Act of 1993, and the Help America Vote Act of 200are all adhered to.

First and foremost, each provision of the new election reform laws must ensure that the reforms will expand the right to vote and not contract it, and that the provisions should be designed to make voting on election day easier, not more difficult. On the question of provisional voting, the NAACP National Voter Fund believes that citizens who vote provisional ballots should have laws that will not penalize them or take away their right to vote simply because they showed up at the polling place or the wrong precinct. And in this case, sometimes the wrong precinct is in the same polling place, and people are denied the right to vote because they effectively stood in the wrong line. The jurisdiction for protecting provisional voters' rights should be as broad as possible, but if they do make a mistake, it can be corrected without sending them through hoops that may ultimately prevent their vote from being counted. On the issue of voting jurisdiction, through a review of the testimony from voters in Pennsylvania and Ohio, we learned that how a state defines voting jurisdictions can have a major impact on the counting of particularly minority voters -- or particularly on minority voters' votes.

In an increasing number of states, the voting jurisdiction which governs provisional balloting are precincts. Now, the NAACP National Voting Fund believes that this jurisdiction should be counties and not precincts. This will ensure that the least amount of people are turned away at the polls on election day. This is a major change that we feel must be made for any legislation being considered at the state level.

There were many cases in 2004 where provisional ballots were cast and in the correct polling locations, but were not in the correct precinct lines, so those provisional ballots in too many cases were never counted. Now, this accounts for over 92,000 ballots in the 2004 election in Ohio where the election was decided by just over 118,000 votes.

The Help America Vote Act designated the voting jurisdiction as the entity that oversees an election. So in Ohio, this is the Board of Elections, which is usually based on counties. And if Ohio and other states are to embrace the true spirit of the Voting Rights Act, it should designate counties as the jurisdiction to govern provisional voting, thereby dramatically decreasing the number of voters whose votes would not be counted in future elections. Our overall goal must always be to pass laws which would decrease the number of people who should vote provisional ballots and not increase the number.

On the issue of voter registration expansion, again, as I mentioned, we have historic levels of voter engagement in 2004. And it was a breakthrough from decades of neglect of potential voters not being registered on behalf of African-American and Latino and low income communities. I think -- you know, I do not have exact numbers, somewhere in the neighborhood of 300,000 new voters were registered across the state.

Now, in Ohio, again, hundreds of thousands of minority young voters found that when they got to the polling place, there were long lines of people who were forced to wait anywhere from two to nine hours to vote.

There were also intransient election officials and offensive poll watchers who challenged their right to vote because they made honest mistakes on their forms in their efforts to find the right polling place.

In Ohio, over 35,000 registered voters were placed on a statewide list to be challenged at the polls by partisan party operatives. Over 150,000 were not able to participate in our elections due to administrative and sometimes political barriers that occurred on election day. For that one day they became second-class citizens, and the term "provisional" was stamped on their right to vote and we believe nullifying their right to vote. Now, contrary to popular beliefs, voter -- mandatory ID requirements for all voters are not required under HAVA, and it is only required for those new registrants who did not provide either their social security numbers or driver's license on their original mail-in form. However, Ohio and many any other states have gone further and taken steps to require all voters to show ID. NVF strongly opposes these efforts that are under way to add this new provision to the state election codes. These requirements are opposed by not only NAACP but many other civil rights organizations because of the well-known barriers that it creates for low income, homeless, and people of who are statistically less likely to have a voter -- a photo ID.

There was a study that was released in May of 2005 by the Ohio League of Women Voters that revealed that over 357,000 voters, a disproportionate number of minority voters, could be disenfranchised in the state of Ohio were this provision to be added, and would set back years and years of progress that has been made to increase voter participation, particularly among traditionally disenfranchised communities. By the same token, we oppose any efforts that would weaken laws that provide -- weaken or repeal laws that allow ex-offenders to regain their right to vote after they've served their time. Since a high portion of these voters affected would be African-Americans and other men and women of color, we need to monitor these efforts and these changes to ensure that they are not contributing to the increased state-sponsored minority voter dilution. Ohio and Pennsylvania has one of the best laws in the nation regarding restoration of voting rights and led the way for other states. But both legislative bodies, we are urging them to resist temptation to repeal this law in the wave of reform. If anything, these states should be doing more to help young men and women regain their full citizenship rights.

An ex-offender who is registered is more likely -- is much less likely to return to a life of crime than a person who remains politically estranged from their community. So in 2005, as we commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act, we need to be breaking down barriers and not erecting new ones. Many --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Mr. Moore --

MR. MOORE: -- of these regressive reforms that are being promoted in the name of stopping voter fraud are not doing that, they're actually creating more voter disenfranchisement. The League of Women Voters study again and COHIO reveal a startling revelation that only four cases of voter fraud could be documented out of 9 million votes cast in Ohio since 2002. And I'll repeat, only four cases of voter fraud has been documented in a survey of all 88 counties of Ohio out of 9 million votes in 2002.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Mr. Moore, I wonder if you could try to finish up in the next two minutes.

MR. MOORE: Sure. So in summary, I just want to say that we think that what failed on November 2nd and all across the country was the election apparatus was not prepared to accommodate a large outpouring of democratic participation. Any time you have a large registration campaign, the election officials at the state and local level, we actually have a concern that they can accommodate those voters. You know and I know that this hearing is focused on the reorganization of the Voting Rights Act, but I appreciate the ability to talk about how these other statutes that we've also worked on, the National Voter Registration Act and the Help American Voter Act, are all extensions of the Voting Rights Act. And that we know there's not going to be many opportunities for people to focus on voting and the voting rights and the voting laws that are affected.

And so even though it may create some complications on the part of some people, it's important that we let states know and let people who would attempt to weaken the Voting Rights Act or weaken the ability of people to be engaged in voting know that we are also interested in these provisions, which is why I put so much time into trying to focus on those things.

In Ohio, as well as other states, we know that there are several things that are wrong, but I hope that as we finish this discussion and we talk about the reorganization of the various sectors of the Voting Rights Act that there is a place for those conversations to take place. And I think this commission is the only place to do that, and we will hopefully get some of that feedback from people throughout the country. I appreciate the ability to be a part of this hearing, and I apologize for not being able to be more engaged, but I look forward to whatever deliberations might come through as a result of these hearings, and will be glad to stay involved in the process.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, Mr. Moore, I think we have a question or two. But I just wanted to be sure that you would get us copies of the Preserving Democracy report and the report of the Ohio League of Women Voters.

MR. MOORE: Yes. In fact, I would have submitted those two for the record, but I want to make sure I get those to you because those two documents are very, very good studies of some of the things that we're talking about here today.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. Commissioner Rogers, and then if you have any questions, Mr. Davidson.

MR. ROGERS: Yes, Mr. Moore, thanks so much. It's good to hear from you and your testimony. I did have one quick question for you. I know that you served as former chief of staff to Congressman Conyers on the judiciary committee, is that right?

THE WITNESS: That's right.

MR. ROGERS: I know that you've taken a look at where the votes are and -- or got some sense about where votes are going to be with respect to the reauthorization. Can you just give us a quick sense of where things stand on the political front as relates to reauthorization?

MR. MOORE: Well, I really couldn't because I'm not on the Hill anymore. I'm a full-time director of the Voter Fund, so I'm not there much. But my understanding is that Congressman Sensenbrenner at our convention least week came and announced that he was co-sponsoring his version of the reauthorization. We were not shocked by that, but we were surprised that he chose that location to do that.

Mr. Conyers had a bill in draft form for several, several months in conversation with many members of the voting rights committee. I understand that there's going to be efforts to make sure that Sensenbrenner's bill is the vehicle --

MR. ROGERS: It is.

MR. MOORE: -- and we do what we can to strengthen it to make sure --

MR. ROGERS: Do you know or do you have an idea of when you can expect to get a draft of whatever his bill is going to be?

MR. MOORE: I'm not sure exactly. I think it may have just been introduced just recently as a result of his speech at the -- at our convention last week. But my guess is that it's very soon, and I'm sure that they will probably have something introduced in the next few weeks.

MR. ROGERS: One of the things that the chairman and I spoke about yesterday was looking at to the extent that there is bipartisan support related to reauthorization of this act that there may be some things that we want, want to point to to strengthen the provisions of the act.

That might be the subject of amendments or otherwise or some thought we might add with respect to reauthorization or as it relates to this act, period. So it sure would be wonderful, to the extent you have thoughts in that regard, if that information could be provided to the commission.

MR. MOORE: I would like to do that. And at some point in the future I know that everyone is concerned about this being there. But I do think we, we don't have any opportunities to have a bipartisan bill passed. And I am certain there will be Republican amendments to that bill that will do things we won't like. So I think we should keep our powder dry, keep our options open when it comes to possibly strengthening amendments. So again, I'm not sure how everybody feels about that thought, but that's just my own view, but I think that is something we should pay attention to because it has been talked about for a long time.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Davidson, do you have any questions? Well, Mr. Moore, we don't have any more questions for you. Thank you very much. Thank you for your patience in particular because of the audio difficulties.

MR. MOORE: Well, I appreciate your taking the time. And again, thank you for doing what you're doing with these hearings. It's really useful for everybody I've talked to who's been a part of it; they've been really happy to participate in the process. Thanks.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Mr. Sayers and Ms. Robideau, thank you for being patient. I wonder if we could start with Mr. Sayers because we started earlier talking about Duluth and perhaps we could finish talking about Duluth before we start talking about Missoula, Montana. Mr. Sayers, I compliment you on pulling the microphone closer to yourself. Mr. Sayers is a Native American activist in Duluth and has been involved with nonprofits and tribal activities for a number of years. And he is going to give us more information about Duluth. MR. SAYERS: Yeah, I'm employed by the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians as urban liaison for Duluth, Minnesota. And I also worked with Native Vote 2004 last year in the 2004 elections. And I'm also on the indianslist.org as a state director. It's a political organization.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Mr. Sayers, if you'd just pull the microphone as close to you as you can get it.

MR. SAYERS: It's an organization that's targeting Native American candidates. We're looking at getting more Native Americans involved in the political process and running for state, federal and local level offices. Last year at the 2004 elections, I did voter mobilization and voter registration in the Duluth area. I work primarily in Native American and predominantly black neighborhoods in Duluth where the voter turnout has been pretty low for the last several years. And I couldn't figure out why people just weren't voting. You know, we got out and talked to people and, you know, find out why they weren't getting out the vote. And then we tried to work on issues that would, you know, make them more comfortable voting. And one of the things we found is that, you know, they, they just felt displaced at the polls, and they felt that, you know, that their vote didn't really matter, so we gave them a lot of good reasons last year why we turned out the vote.

We turned out the Native American vote. In Duluth we had 96 percent. And, and I know we got commendations from around the state. We were one of the highest, highest turnouts.

But we did run into a lot of problems with Republican challengers who openly engaged in voter suppression. And myself, I live in a predominantly white neighborhood of Duluth, and when I went to vote, there was poll challengers at the polls. And I have other friends and other colleagues that work in and live in white neighborhoods in the Duluth area and, you know, they observed the same thing. And you go to the inner city where the population is predominantly black and Native American, there was poll challengers at every polling place. And the Republican challengers were all from Washington, D.C. and were all attorneys. Now, you know, it's one thing I couldn't understand, is how can you be a poll challenger in a community if you don't know the people in the community that you're challenging votes in. I mean, you couldn't come up to somebody and say, you can't vouch for this person because you don't know that person. How would you know that if you're not from that community? And it doesn't make sense to bring someone in from out of state to do that in a community where you don't know anybody.

So we, we ran into a lot of problems. We had Republican poll challengers who openly threatened people. At the Duluth Public Library, I personally brought down several individuals from a halfway house, and they were all Native American. Only one had an ID, and he was going to vouch for six other, six other residents of the halfway house. Now, the poll challenger let the first five through. And when the sixth, the sixth voter registered and cast his vote, the Republican challenger jumped up to the other guy, "Okay, you just vouched for this man. You know, you're subject to a $10,000 fine, 10 years in prison for each illegal vote that went through here." And, you know, he said it loud enough for everybody in the whole, you know, in the whole polling place to hear him.

And so then I stepped in and said, "No, you're wrong. He can vouch for as many people as he knows. He can vouch for anyone as long he knows them, knows where they live, and, you know, that's, you know, that's the way the law reads." So the republican challenger said, "No you're wrong. If, if any one of them is an illegal vote, he's subject to a $10,000 fine and 10 years in prison." And I said, "Well, no, if you're, if you're going to challenge his vote, you need to take the election judge aside and in private say you're going to challenge that vote. You can't openly threaten someone with prison time or, you know, monetary damages for something like that. That's voter suppression, and you can't do that. And you do it again, I'm going to call the police myself and have you removed from this polling place." So we didn't have any more problems at that area. So I went up the hill and I took some ladies from a battered women's shelter to another polling place. And they also had an attorney that was a poll challenger.

And we brought the ladies in. Now, the ladies in a battered women's shelter, they're in a domestic violence situation. There's federal and state laws that, you know, govern what information they can put on their, their voter registration cards. They can tell the election judge, you know, this is my situation, this is why this -- this is why this information is missing. There's confidentiality rules. And the poll challenger challenged every one of them; demanded -- he wanted each and every one of them's addresses.

And I said, "Well, you know, you're potentially putting these women at risk by trying to put this out as public information when they're in domestic violence situation and there's federal laws that govern that and you can't do that."

And so he was adamant that, "Well, then they can't vote. You know, we can't allow you to vote. The election judge should not let you vote because you're not putting an address down." So I told the ladies to go ahead and vote. If he's going to challenge the votes, we would actually, you know, bring its attorney over to actually discuss it with him. Which they have an attorney on site at the federal women's shelter.

So those five ladies got to vote in the end, but we just felt that, you know, that's, you know, that's a statement, voter suppression to, you know, try to -- any little, any little thing that they could use to try to keep people from voting. And it was pretty blatant that they were only minority communities in the Duluth area. You know, there wasn't poll challengers in the white communities. You know, and I know that firsthand because I voted, you know, in a predominantly white neighborhood.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: The incident you just referred to involving the ladies from the battered women's shelter, is that the same incident that Ms. Kazel earlier testified about?

MR. SAYERS: No.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: It's a different situation?

MR. SAYERS: It was a separate issue. There was -- they, they have a separate -- there's three battered women's shelters in Duluth, and the one I was working with is a shelter for Native American women. The one she is talking about is a separate -- it's a whole separate incident.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you.

MR. SAYERS: There was several incidents like that in Duluth last year. So, you know, it wasn't just, it wasn't just the one incident, there were several incidents in downtown Duluth and the Central Hillside community which is predominantly community. And the surrounding communities, predominantly white neighborhoods, there was no incidents but there was quite a few in the Central Hillside community. So there was more than the ones I, I witnessed.

There was another fellow from Mille Lacs that was doing pretty much the same work I was doing, and we kind of, you know, touched base with each other throughout the day. And he related about 1or 12 different incidents at the polling places he was working at. So there were several incidents in Duluth last year with voter suppression. So I just feel that, you know, it was pretty blatant in the Duluth area. And Red, Red Lake, you're going to hear from a lady later on this evening, and she's going to -- she's got a real horror story for you. And that's -- I mean, you're going to be surprised at what actually went on there.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: What are the names of the minority areas in which these efforts were undertaken?

MR. SAYERS: Well, just the Central Hillside.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Central Hills?

MR. SAYERS: Central Hillside community in Duluth.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay.

MR. SAYERS: It's probably a mile and a half long by -- Duluth is a -- it's a port town and it sits on the hill. So the area below the Central Hillside are, which overlooks downtown, and that's mainly where all the minorities have, you know, congregated as, you know, the house -- the rents are cheaper. The, you know -- I mean, the buildings are older and they can afford to live there, in that area. And it's closer to shopping, it's more convenient for a lot of these minority community to live there.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you, Mr. Sayers. Now, we have testimony of Janet Robideau.

MR. SAYERS: Oh, before --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I'm sorry.

MR. SAYERS: -- I'm done, I just had another issue about the Minnesota governor appoints the secretary of state. And last year Mary Kiffmeyer, just before the election, was going to not allow tribal IDs in the state of Minnesota. Now, the Voting Rights Act directly relates to that because if it weren't for the Voting Rights Act, they wouldn't have a leg to stand on when they took her to court. And the state supreme court overruled her and allowed tribal IDs. Now, the party that's in -- that's in power at the time is allowed to make the choice on who's the secretary of state for that state. The secretary of state, in turn, enacts the election laws. So if it's a Republican governor, they're going to lean towards the Republicans as far as what the election laws are going to be for that state for that year. And, you know, if it weren't for the Voting Rights Act, I think that, you know, that there would be a lot more abuses than there were in the past. It's a pretty important point.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay, thank you very much.

TELEPHONE OPERATOR: Carol Juneau from Montana is on the line.

MS. JUNEAU: Okay.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I'm sorry, could you repeat your name again? MS. JUNEAU: This is Carol Juneau from Montana. I'm on the line. I was told to call in about this time.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: You're on the phone right now, but we're going to --

MS. JUNEAU: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- we're going to, if we can, Representative Juneau, could we ask you to wait a couple of minutes because we have --

MS. JUNEAU: I certainly will. I'd be happy to do so. It's been great listening.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, I want you to know you're deferring to another Montanian.

MS. JUNEAU: A great lady. I heard her name.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. Well, Ms. Robideau is a member -- I'll just introduce her and then she's going to testify for a few minutes --

MS. JUNEAU: Wonderful.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- and then you will follow. Janet Robideau is a member of the Northern Cheyenne Nation and a resident of Missoula, Montana. She is a longtime activist, as well as the executive director of the Montana People's Action MPA and Indian People's Action organizations. IPA I guess is the last one. And these organizations fight for social, economic and racial justice using a direct action organizing. Welcome, Ms. Robideau.

MS. ROBIDEAU: Thank you. And I'm glad to be here, and I don't talk fast and I talk loud, so, okay.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: The court reporter appreciates that.

MS. ROBIDEAU: As you stated, I am the executive director of Montana People's Action and Indian People's Action. We organize low income people in our urban Indians. And our Montana stats are pretty much par for the course for that area of the US. The population of white people is at 9percent. Indian people are 7.7 percent of the population, and all other groups of color comprise the remaining 1.3 percent.

The largest other non-Indian groups are -- we have a large Hmong population. We have a large Hispanic population in Billings. And also in Missoula, in addition to the Hmong, we have a number of Belarussian immigrants. There are roughly 70,000 people in the state of Montana, a quarter of which are children, not of voting age yet.

Half of us live in the urban areas, and I just brought a, a picture, it's on a shirt that we distributed for voting stuff. But we have 1tribes and seven reservations -- you'd think I'd know that by heart right now -- and five urban areas that we as Indian People's Action serves. And just -- and I've been working in this total arena since the early 90s, and I've been an activist since 1973. I do -- I did want to comment earlier about what three of the other people had said talking about border town violence, an enormous amount of border town violence, those little towns and bigger towns that surround our seven Indian reservations. This last election cycle we encountered a number -- there were rumors floating about that the cops were going to pull over Indian people, Indian drivers and check for insurance and driver's license. And, of course, if we don't have that, we're breaking the law.

So a number of our folks were reluctant to go out driving. My organization provides rides to the polls. We work and we make sure that people are registered and educated and we mobilize them. We got a number of calls from people who did not want to drive because they don't have insurance, they're poor, they can't afford it, and it's against the law if we don't have it.

I find that the racism in our state is especially rampant against Indian people. People feel quite free and comfortable doing things to us that they would not ordinarily do to other people of color. And their attitude is, well, just an Indian, you know, who cares. Why are you taking up for that person, that's an Indian.

Our governor has been called an Indian lover because he has appointed a number of our Indian people to various posts within his administration.

And we talked about complaints, and we basically feel like complain to who, who's going to listen, who really cares, although that is changing, and it continues to change over the years because we're, we're letting our Indian people know that you have to be vocal about this. You know, people don't really understand that this is going on, and if we don't speak up, it's never going to change.

People feel that they're not going to be believed, and so it takes time to get people to get to that level of trust. So when they're targeted as they go to vote, they're not -- I mean, what we encounter is not so much at the polls, it's what happens as we go in and, and we try to get people registered to vote.

So we encounter clerks who don't want to give us voter registration cards. They -- and they're actually very nasty about it. They say, "Well, we'll give you 10, we're not giving you 100." In Missoula, we registered over 2,300 people for this last election. We had to go in and get cards 10 at a time because these folks refused to give us the cards because they -- you know, I'm not sure what's -- you know, why. We did actually go over their heads. We were told, we talked to attorneys and they said, "Call the state office."

And so they sent us this huge box of voter registration cards so that we could register people to vote.

Then when -- every Friday we took our cards to the county elections office, and they were outrageously rude to our folks. We had to send our nicest, most mellow folks to go and deal with the county clerks because they would literally like throw cards. They were upset. They, you know, they didn't want to -- they didn't want to deal with us.

And we were very careful about explaining to people how they should fill out these cards, because we would encounter such rudeness at the -- from the county clerks which, you know, they ultimately deny.

During election 2000, we worked really hard to get absentee ballots in. You know, vote early, vote often. But we, we ended up getting a large number of people to do their absentee ballot voting, and during that session, in the 200session, our esteemed legislators from not the Democratic Party voted, they passed a law that made it illegal for us as community activists and social justice organizations to take those absentee ballots.

And we understood, you know, there was a worry about fraud, but we couldn't even take them to the people that we visit. And we'd go door knocking, we'd go door to door in the community.

So they didn't even want us handing the ballots. We had to go through this elaborate way to make sure that people would -- we did it all over the phone. So we were still able to do it, but they continued to put up these barriers.

And then finally just the tribal IDs, there was some -- like my tribe, the Northern Cheyenne, we don't have a picture on our ID. I just have a sheet of paper that says I'm an enrolled Cheyenne and I have a number. I don't have a picture.

I've been able to use that, you know, at banks and for other things and I have a driver's license, but they could not -- and this -- for the first time we had to present IDs. We've never had to before. I mean, you're talking about a state, we don't even have a million people, we got 950,000. We have a nice big state.

But with the tribal IDs, some tribes have pictures and others don't. There needs to be some sort of uniformity, some consistency across there. And finally, I think just that, you know, we in Montana work really work hard to get our Indian people out to vote. And for the powers that be to continue to put up these barriers, you know, just makes it harder for us to convince people that they need to get out and vote. But it doesn't stop us. We're going to continue to knock down these barriers. And if we, you know, if we can let people know what's going on then, you know, we have a greater chance to have a voice in the decisions that are made that directly affect our lives. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Ms. Robideau, you said "vote early," and then I think you paused and rolled your eyes and said, "vote often."

MS. ROBIDEAU: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: When you roll your eyes, it doesn't appear in the transcript. Did you mean to say vote often?

MS. ROBIDEAU: Yes, and I was joking. I apologize.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay.

MS. ROBIDEAU: I was using an old union phrase, but, no, you only vote once.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Why don't we go to Representative Carol Juneau. Are you still on?

MS. JUNEAU: I certainly am.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. And then what the commission will do is follow up with questions for the both of you at this point. And if Mr. Sayers comes back we can include him in the questions. Let me introduce you. The Honorable Carol Juneau of the Montana House of Representatives is a statewide leader for Indians in Montana, and an educator for legislators not familiar with the issues facing the state's tribes. She's a native of South -- of North Dakota, rather, and a member of the Mandan-Hidasta Tribe, and Representative Juneau is in her fourth term representing the Blackfeet reservation of Browning, District 85, in Northern Montana. Welcome, Representative Juneau.

MS. JUNEAU: Thank you very much. Am I speaking to Mr. Lann?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: This is Bill Lee.

MS. JUNEAU: Bill Lee, okay.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We also have Commissioner Joe Rogers, Commissioner Matthew Little, Commissioner Elsie Meeks.

MS. MEEKS: Hi, Carol.

MS. JUNEAU: Hi.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: And Commissioner Davidson.

MS. JUNEAU: I've got written testimony that I e-mailed earlier today. Maybe -- I don't know if you got it by now. They can copy it off and give it to you and --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We have the testimony --

MS. JUNEAU: -- and you can follow along.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We have the testimony and you can feel free to give us highlights.

MS. JUNEAU: I will. Okay, thank you very much. As I said, my name is Carol Juneau, for the record, and I currently serve as state representative for House District 16. The Blackfeet Indian Reservation makes up the majority of my house district. I'm an enrolled member of the Mandan and Hidasta Tribes of North Dakota, and I've been active in the political empowerment of Indian people for many, many years.

And I think that the previous person that testified, Janet Robideau, I would say ditto to almost, you know, almost everything she said. She's absolutely right on here in the state of Montana. I was a plaintiff in the Old Person versus Cooney, later called Old Person versus Brown, voting rights case that was filed after the 1992 redistricting process, and we spent many years on that case.

But after the 2003 redistricting plan was approved here in Montana, it really made our issue moot. So I would just really encourage the commission to take a look at that particular case, the issues we raised in terms of the dilution of the Indian vote in Montana.

Also, I wanted to ask the commission to include as part of your record the report that Dr. Janine Pease did for Yale University called Voting Rights in Indian Country, Lessons from the Past, Prospects for the Future. This is a real good comprehensive report on the history of voting rights here in Montana, as well as elsewhere, and so it would be a good document for your review.

Montana has had a long history of voter rights activities, such as voter registration drives, voter education projects. And we also have a long history of voter litigation that helped move us forward over the last probably 20 years. And the redistricting that was done after the 2000 census has allowed the opportunity for Montana to have eight American Indians serving in the state legislature at this time, six in the house, two in the senate. And we hope by 2006 to have three in the senate, so we would have a representation of nine Indians in the state legislature.

One of the issues, I think the issue of proportional representation for American Indians in the state legislatures throughout the United States, as well as proportional representation in the county, city, school boards and other local government systems needs to be addressed by this commission which deals right directly with voting rights. The progress that's been made in Montana in voting participation has not been without challenges or without very hard work by a lot of people who had to dance through a lot of hoops, as Janet Robideau talked about, placed in front of them by clerks and recorders, or laws passed by our state legislature on voting procedures.

Most recently in Blaine County in Montana, which includes the Fort Belknap Reservation, there was an election legal challenge filed by some Indian people in that community and they won. For 80 years, there has never been an Indian county commissioner elected, and that went to court. They got a district in the Fort Belknap community, and an election was held and a new district was added, that new district, and an Indian was elected, and so we're real proud of that action.

And in preparing this testimony, members of the commission, I did ask people in Montana to share some of their ideas and some of the concerns with me and I'll do that at this time. Dr. Janine Pease, she's a Crow Indian educator and voting rights activist, and has four issues for your attention.

In one of them she talks about the rural locations in reservations. Many reservation communities are rural and they don't have addresses. And so one of the things that the county clerks require is specific addresses on voter cards or also section, township, and range where people live, and not very many people know that, so that is an issue. And if the people don't put their correct address down, the clerk and recorders will toss the card officially and the people lose the right to vote. So that specific issue is something of concern. Janine also says the elections schemes in Montana are at-large systems, and most Indian voters are unaware that the election scheme dilutes their strength and make it nearly impossible to elect school board commissioners, county commissioners water board commissioners, city mayors and more. American Indian voters desperately need the chance for representation. And until American Indian people have a clear path to representation, many of these governmental entities will continue their practices that tend to exclude American Indians.

Gail Small from the Northern Cheyenne Reservation, who has been a voting rights activist for many years, stresses the importance of bilingual Cheyenne and English speaking people needed at the polls there in the Northern Cheyenne Reservation. She talks about a disenfranchised population who are already hesitant to vote due to backlash, and they have maybe one or no people who can speak the tribal language at the polls.

And some of our tribes in Montana have retained their language more than other tribes, and that's probably true in the United States, so that need would vary, I would imagine. But she talks about during the 2004 election they had a hard time with the bilingual issue in the Lame Deer community, the Lame Deer elections. She says it's very important for interpreting and explaining the numerous ballot initiatives that people had to vote for, so she explained them to her mother and then her mother went in with the tribal elders and spoke in Cheyenne to them about the issues of coal bed methane, about the issues of medical marijuana. And how to explain that in native language is a difficult process that we have to think about.

Anita Big Springs from the Flathead Reservation, who's been working issues for many years as well, brought some specific examples out at what happened on the Flathead Reservation in 2004.

And again, going back to clerk and recorders, that relationship, excluding our community, the clerk and recorders continues to be an issue. She said the clerk and recorder from Lake County, when they took in some voter cards due to changes of address, they said, "Oh, you moved again? We can't keep up with you."

And they sent -- in the voting they sent a Kootenai elder on a wild goose chase to vote. She went -- the elder went to Dayton to vote, which is a small community there. She was told to go back to Polson to vote. She went to Polson to vote, another community, and Polson told her to go back to vote in Dayton. So Anita called the clerk and recorder, and there was a reply that said, "That was my fault, Anita. She should be voting in Polson. And Polson sent her out a new card this morning."

And that was said on election day. And no election judge offered this lady an opportunity to vote provisional status, which she could have been provided that opportunity. Another thing that Anita brought up is election judge ID discrimination and not following the appropriate voter protocol, not asking their friends or relatives or community people for IDs and letting them vote. And that's one of the requirements here in Montana under HAVA. When an Indian went to vote who had been voting in the same precinct for 30 years, he was asked to produce an ID.

One of the things -- again sending people to different precincts because the voter card was wrong. They also -- Anita also raises the issue of not having election judges who can speak the native languages to people and not recruiting minorities to serve as election judges. One of the issues that I found out in Lake County, they had late voter registration lists. That is one of the things when you work voter participation, you need a voter list as soon as you can to work on getting people out to vote, and they had a difficult time getting election -- a current voter registration list there.

She recommends that chief election judges have more training in the Voting Rights Act just as a general thing because a lot people weren't familiar with provisional status or how to do -- what to do with spoiled ballots.

One of the things again, and it comes up and Janet brought it up, is that we get voter registration cards from the clerk and recorders maybe 20 at a time, maybe 10 absentee ballot requests at a time, telling them they don't like to use the kind you can download from the Net or the ones that are provided in the phone book because it does not fit into our their card file and it creates more work for them. Polling places was an issue of concern. There was a precinct who had 4non-Indian voters, and they had their own polling place.

Also on the Flathead, there was a district where there was 28voters with an Indian minority who had to travel 60 miles to vote.

Then, of course, there was the issue on the Flathead Reservation of mismarked ballots, what to do with them. And it's a big issue that created a lot of interest here in Montana. There were seven ballots that Anita Big Springs did go to court on and disputed, but in the district court they brought up 70 ballots that were mismarked, 70 ballots -- or 77 ballots should have been thrown out that were counted.

And so there has been in this state HAVA and the traditional ballot, voter -- the clerk and recorders, those kinds of barriers continue to make it difficult for Indian people to participate fully. I think we've come a long ways here in Montana, we still have a long ways to go, and so I do really appreciate this opportunity to testify before you and wish you the best with your work.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We just have a brief round of questions. Commissioner Meeks.

MS. MEEKS: Carol, do you know if there were federal monitors at any of these polling places?

MS. JUNEAU: I believe that -- one of the things that I know, there was a lawyer's group that brought in a number of lawyers to Montana at the various polling places, and I'm not certain where they all went. We had a couple here in one of our big group things on the Blackfeet Reservation that was just observers. And I don't know how but we did have -- I can't remember, from some lawyers group that said, "You know, we're available if you want us." And I know some of the reservations called and asked them to come in and be an observer. So we did have a couple of law students that came in from the University of Montana and observed here.

MS. MEEKS: Okay. But no one from the Department of Justice --

MS. JUNEAU: I'm not sure how many were on the other reservations.

MS. MEEKS: But no one was sent out by the Department of Justice.

MS. JUNEAU: Not that I'm aware of.

MS. ROBIDEAU: I got a call from the National Congress of American Indians who asked if I thought there should be federal monitors. I said, "If there's any place you should have them, it should be Lake County." And so I never did find out if they sent a federal person to Lake County because that's -- that place is right in the middle of the Flathead Indian Reservation and Lake County is one of the most racist in the state.

MS. JUNEAU: One of the difficulties, Elsie, is that there's so many voting precincts on some of these reservation communities.

MS. MEEKS: Right.

MS. JUNEAU: You'd have to have a large number of monitors available, you know, just even to our state with seven reservations. As an example, on the Flathead reservation, for the number of precincts that are on the reservation itself, there's 1voting precincts. On the Blackfeet there's 10.

MS. MEEKS: Right.

MS. JUNEAU: And if you only -- if you were going to cover the Blackfeet and the Flathead Reservations, you would have to have been, you know, accounting for every precinct, you'd have to have 20 people or so. It makes it difficult.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you, Representative -- I'm sorry, Commissioner Davidson does have a question.

MR. DAVIDSON: I would just like to know whether you feel Section 203, the language assistance provision, has been of any use to Indians in your state.

MS. JUNEAU: Tell me what specifically that provides.

MR. DAVIDSON: That provides language assistance for people whose first language is not English.

MS. JUNEAU: I think one of the things we see from the Northern Cheyenne comments and I think the Flathead Reservation comments, two of the reservations that I asked information on, and I think Crow as well, there has been attempts made to have maybe at least one person, I think, in the precinct that knows the native language. In some of the precincts I think it's still a weakness. I think it's very helpful to have a Native American that people recognize, more than one Native American that people recognize in the voting precincts that can speak the language of that reservation community or that tribal group, and to give voters a sense of ease when they show up to vote, particularly probably new voters and particularly our older voters that, you know, should be made welcome in that. So I do think it's very helpful, but we need more of it.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you. I just note for the record that Montana has bilingual election material requirements in Big Horn County and Rosebud County for the Crow and for the Cheyenne populations.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. Well, if there are no other questions, I'd like to thank Ms. Robideau and Representative Juneau. Thank you very much.

MS. JUNEAU: Thank you for allowing us to testify.

MS. ROBIDEAU: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We'll just take a break for just a second.

MS. MEEKS: Is someone else coming?

MR. GOGGLES: Patrick Goggles from Wyoming.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Mr. Goggles. And I understand Judson Miner is also on?

MR. MINER: I am.

MS. JUNEAU: I'm going to disconnect now.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay, thank you, Representative Juneau.

MS. JUNEAU: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Mr. Goggles. Is it okay with you if we hear Mr. Miner's testimony first?

MR. GOGGLES: That's fine with me.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay, thank you. It's my pleasure to now introduce Judson Miner. He's a partner in the law firm of Miner, Barnhill & Galland which has offices in Chicago and Madison, Wisconsin.

And since the firm was founded in 1971, it has done a lot of work in civil rights and neighborhood economic development. And it's also been Mr. Miner's counsel -- former colleagues, both African-American senators from the state of Illinois. Mr. Miners is a very well-known voting rights lawyer, and during his administration of Harold Washington he was the corporation counsel for the city of Chicago. Welcome, Judson Miner.

MR. MINER: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: One of the ground rules are if you could just testify for five or 10 minutes, we could have a quick line of questions and then move on to Mr. Goggles.

MR. MINER: Well, I can make my presentation short. To be honest, I was gone all week and I just got back in my office, so five minutes is plenty. But I --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We've had a long day too.

MR. MINER: Pardon?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We've had a long day too.

MR. MINER: I do think what I have to contribute is from the perspective of a person who has been litigating cases under the Voting Rights Act, principally Illinois, over the past two decades. And for someone who doesn't know much about Illinois, it is a state in which we have large ethnic racial minorities but they are very segregated. It's a state which, notwithstanding the fact that we have two elected African-American senators, on the local level is and remains very heavily polarized.

And our governmental structures of choice are single member districts. We have decades of tradition in Illinois of drawing wards and district boundaries in a way that creates or minimizes minority voting strength. And minimizing is an overstatement. Throughout the '80s and through the '80s and into the '90s, the tradition in Illinois was that you drew a map that created the smallest number of districts in which minorities could elect candidates of their choice. It was not until special elections were held in the mid-1980s that required a significant redrawing of districts that Hispanics obtained their first representatives in Elkton, Illinois and in Chicago, despite the fact that they had quite substantial populations. And, indeed, in the '90s the first Hispanic congressional district.

The process has been corrected, to the extent it has been corrected, only through litigation. In the 1980s, there were -- there was litigation over the congressional redistricting in which efforts were made to again create two African-American congressional districts in a jurisdiction in which it took a tremendous amount of energy to draw anything less than three districts. It was only after litigation that we succeeded in creating three districts that what we have today, in terms of litigation in Illinois in the '90s, was to create a Hispanic district. In the local scene in Chicago in the 1980s, it took four years of litigation to address a map that had the smallest number of African-American and Hispanic districts that could possibly be created. In fact, the city is so segregated that you were able to draw a boundary throughout the city that ran on both sides of the existing boundaries that would include potential populations that could have been put into a majority black ward or majority white ward.

In the 1980s, blacks in that area were 34 times as likely to be placed in majority white districts than whites were to be placed in majority black districts. And this area is due to virtually the penalty of whites in majority in minority districts. And it rarely happens unless it's absolutely necessary.

The result of the 1980 remap litigation ultimately led to special elections in which the city was required to redraw six of its 50 wards, and those six all elected minority representatives. And the consequence of that was quite profound in local government in that it created a total swing in our city council in Chicago and permitted Harold Washington to govern the city for two years, mostly being beaten up by the other forces.

Again in the '90s, the same thing happened, although in a much smaller scale. But once specific steps are taken to correct the imbalances, it's hard to go backwards in jurisdictions. There were still population shifts, and then the city was reluctant to make in this case even minor adjustments that would have provided equal voting opportunities for African-Americans. In this case, the City of Chicago, in an effort to prevent any increase in minority representation, was willing to spend $16 million in litigating its map. It ultimately lost.

The Tenth Circuit ordered a rehearing on a very limited issue of how many more districts had to be drawn. As a result of that, there was a redrawing and there were special elections in Chicago.

So that has been our history. And the hope is that because of the Voting Rights Act, these problems would slowly become less severe. And it is clear that the forces that are responsible for engaging in the redistricting process are well aware of what is required of them and increasingly becoming sort of mindful of this obligation. And the hope is that we will see much less of these problems.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you, Mr. Miner. We have a round of questions. Joe Rogers.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. Mr. Miner. Thank you for being with us. I had a very general question that I had for you because I'm curious. Illinois is a state that has elected two African-Americans to the United States Senate. And it was mentioned about your association with both, with Representative Carol --

MR. MINER: The law firm has produced two-thirds of all African-American senators since reconstruction.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. Absolutely.

MR. MINER: We're mighty proud.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We detect a note of pride in your comments.

MR. ROGERS: I have to ask a broader question because I think there are implications as it relates to the Voting Rights Act, but I'm curious about this.

Given, as you're mentioning, a series of polarizing politics as they take place essentially with respect to Chicago and perhaps some areas of the state, one might argue, well, how is it possible that Barack Obama, for example, would be elected to the United States Senate out of Illinois, or that Carol Moseley Braun would have been elected out of Illinois given the history and practices related to racial discrimination as they exist in Illinois overall. Can you more broadly comment about dynamics as they take place in Illinois given, as your testimony indicates, problems with respect to racial discrimination and particularly voting in the state?

MR. MINER: Oh, sure. The simple answer to that is that the problems are most profound at the most local level. It's one thing to be addressing this issue in a city government where these racial concerns are created mostly. The next level is the state level where the districts are much bigger and it is, it is still severe but not quite as severe.

When you get to the national level, you're dealing with a whole range of different issues. And you have also have to keep in mind that when African-Americans win, it is -- on occasion there are factors that obviously come in. When Senator Braun won, there were multiple candidates, there was a division of votes, and that was very helpful to her. And the simple answer with Barack Obama is that Barack Obama is extraordinary. So that any white in the state of Illinois who has any thoughts that he or she could vote for an African-American and didn't vote for Barack Obama would really have to examine themselves again. So he's very, very special. But he also ran in a race with seven candidates.

So I think the dynamics that goes on at the most local level is really much different. And there's much greater concern in the city of Chicago over whether we're going to be governed by an African-American mayor or non-African-American mayor, and who's going to be controlling the city government and the jobs and the services and so forth. So I think that race plays an even greater role at that level.

MR. ROGERS: And that race is such that you directly state that it's essentially whites who do not want African-Americans elected or representing them.

MR. MINER: Well, I think that's right, particularly at the local level. They play a more effective role in that process.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Little.

MR. LITTLE: No.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Davidson?

MR. DAVIDSON: No.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you, Mr. Miner.

MR. MINER: Thank you for having me.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: And actually I do have a question before you run off.

MR. MINER: Okay.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I understand that you've actually litigated cases in Missouri.

MR. MINER: I did bring a case in St. Louis.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Could you talk about that and particularly the issues that were raised?

MR. MINER: Well, the issue -- you know, that was a case that -- I was brought into a case that someone else had started. I can tell you about the problems that exist there. We never got that case back on track. The case had been dismissed when I got in and had been appealed, and it took an unfortunate course, and the state court had reversed it and we couldn't get it back to the trial level.

But in truth, the situation in St. Louis in the 1990 redistricting was indistinguishable from Chicago. They had drawn a map in St. Louis. St. Louis had many of the demographic characteristics that Illinois had. It was an incredibly segregated city with blacks living on one side, the whites being the other, and a small area in the middle that has overlapping racial communities. And they had drawn a map that had the smallest number of African-American districts that you could possibly draw. And, you know, unfortunately by the time we were asked to get into the lawsuit, the case had been dismissed, and the court had gone off on a proportionality theory that the supreme court rejected but we never got it back to the trial level. So the problems were, were indistinguishable. The degree of racially polarized voting was profound. The use of manipulating ward boundaries to absolutely minimize minority voting strength was -- seems to be the routine. But that is really all I can attribute to that situation.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: You know, just reflecting on your -- the colloquy you had with Mr. -- with Commissioner Rogers, I guess your answer for -- at the local levels should be that you have -- in the city of Chicago, as well as, I guess, St. Louis -- racially polarized voting.

MR. MINER: Correct.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: And you may not have it at the higher levels, at the statewide levels for instance.

MR. MINER: Well, I think that's clearly the case. All of our data shows that voting is far more polarized as you get into lower levels of government where people are more concerned about who's going to be their neighbor, what will be the consequence if they don't continue to control their local unit of government. Some of those concerns aren't quite as severe, don't dominate quite as much as you up the political process. I think there's -- I wouldn't be surprised if there's still polarized voting at every level in Illinois.

As I say, there are always exceptions, and Barack Obama is such an exception that it's hard to use him as a model to determine whether voting is traditionally polarized.

MR. ROGERS: Mr. Miner, I want to follow up on that point because that begs a couple of different questions. In essence, what you're saying is that Barack Obama is such an extraordinary human being that white people, of course, could not vote for him, in essence, because if they didn't vote for him, then they're, in effect, yielding to their most base instincts as racist human beings. However, with respect to local political personalities or at the more level, are you suggesting, in effect, that the individuals at the more local level are not as strong or capable or otherwise as articulate or compelling personalities, such that whites would not vote for individuals at the local level?

MR. MINER: All I can say is when you get into local politics, race becomes more important, seems to be. All of our voting analysis shows that race plays a more predictable, profound role in determining how people vote.

In biracial elections in Chicago, whites virtually never cross over and draft African-Americans at the local level.

MR. ROGERS: Let me ask you --

MR. MINER: That was true of Harold Washington who won an election with 36 percent of the vote, and it was virtually all of the black vote and didn't touch a white vote. It would have been interesting, had he not passed away, to see whether that might have changed, if there was someone on the scene who had been successful and had an opportunity to convince the white community that he could be an effective representative.

Harold used to go around the city, and he loved to say that "You can run and hide from me, but we're going to find you and we're going to be fair to you." And if he had had the opportunity to do that for another term, it may well be that it would have been less racially polarized voting. But as soon as he passed away, the voting in Chicago became as racially polarized as it was before.

MR. ROGERS: Let me ask you the question slightly differently Mr. Miner. If Barack Obama were running at the local level as opposed to the United States Senate, are you suggesting that he would not have been elected by white votes?

MR. MINER: Oh, you know, that's a very tough question. If Barack Obama had decided to initiate his political career at the local level and he had run in a white district against a white ethnic candidate, I think his chances would have been, he would have been lost.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you, Mr. Miner, and thank you for spending part of your Friday afternoon with us here. And if you need to go, you're free to do so.

We're going to move on to W. Patrick Goggles. Mr. Goggles is a member of the Arapaho Tribe and a member of the Wyoming House of Representatives where he is, I believe, the first Native American since Mr. Ratliff to be elected to the Wyoming legislature. Welcome, Mr. Goggles.

MR. GOGGLES: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: If you could testify for about between five and 10 minutes, that would be very helpful.

MR. GOGGLES: I would be glad to.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Before you testify, let me just say I understand Kat Choi is on the line.

MS. CHOI: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: So if you could be ready to testify after Mr. Goggles, that would be helpful also. Is that okay?

MS. CHOI: Okay.

MR. GOGGLES: Mr. Lee.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes.

MR. GOGGLES: For the record, my name is W. Patrick Goggles, Representative W. Patrick Goggles. I'm a representative for House District 33 which includes the County of Fremont and the Wind River Indian Reservation in the state of Wyoming. I'm currently the executive director for Northern Arapaho Tribal Housing in Wyoming. I was elected in November of 2004, and as you mentioned, I actually am the second Native American elected to the Wyoming legislature. Mr. Scott Ratliss was elected in 1980 and served until 1992. However, I am the first Native American residing on the Wind River Indian reservation.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Mr. Goggles --

MR. GOGGLES: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- we're having some transmission difficulties. This transmission is not coming across loud enough for the court reporter to get your testimony. We've had this difficulty before, and I just wondered is there any way you could pump up the volume?

MR. GOGGLES: I've got it pumped up all the way as far as it will go.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: If you could --

MR. GOGGLES: And it's right on the phone.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. My apologies, Mr. Goggles. We're having some difficulties at our end. And whatever you could do to increase the volume would be great.

MR. GOGGLES: All right. I'll speak as loud as possible if that's better. Are you hearing me any better at all?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes, we are.

MR. GOGGLES: Like I said, my name is W. Patrick Goggles. And I am the representative for House District 33 for the state of Wyoming. I currently am the executive director of the Northern Arapaho Tribal Housing. And as you mentioned, I am the second Native American elected to the Wyoming legislature. Mr. Scott Ratliss served as the first Native American, as a Shoshone tribal member from 1980 to 1992. However, I'm the first Native American residing on the Wind River Indian Reservation to serve in the Wyoming House. House District 33 is a very rural district in a very conservative Republican state of Wyoming.

All of my success was because of the 2000 census redistricting which allows Native American voters the probability of electing a Native American representative. However, up to that time many voters were not registered and many voters were complacent and had not voted in many years. The last election in 2004, with the help of Fremont County and their election clerk who was a Democrat, allowed us to register voters at the polls in our very rural district. And I have 10 precincts in my district, three of them are on the Indian reservation and seven are outside the boundaries. We registered a total of 898 new voters in our, in our district with a voter registration project. The Fremont County election office allowed us -- he recognized tribal identification as part of this process.

Now, that process recognized the tribal ID. We use a digital format here. The digital format meets the elements for a Wyoming driver's license. So we didn't have really much of a problem in dealing with election judges.

We were also able to have election judges from our native communities as observers and as leaders to help elders that didn't understand what they were voting for. So we did get some help from the Fremont County election clerk. She basically followed the elements of the Voting Rights Act which allowed tribal members to register at the polls on election day. As a matter of fact, we had one precinct where people voted until 9:00 that night. They had to close the doors at 7, but we had people inside the building and they were allowed to vote until 9:00.

The Fremont County clerk allowed that allowed -- they set up a registration date on our reservation and at our tribal facilities for tribal members to register. But that is not to say that this is a very rosy picture, because it's been a long struggle to get to this point. And I would like to echo the sentiments expressed by Ms. Juneau and Ms. Robideau and the struggles they continue to have in Montana. There are barriers and there are dilution of Native American voters.

One of the barriers in my locality is the Fremont County Commission. All the people are at large and it's virtually impossible for Native Americans to elect a commissioner. And some of the other barriers that we run into, some of our tribal members do not live on the reservation, they live in border towns. And they do find some problems with election clerks. The problems are not as significant as you heard from Mrs. Juneau and Mrs. Robideau, however.

But we did -- we did use our voting rights -- I mean our voting registration, a project to help educate those folks on what they needed to do to register to vote. And we encouraged them to vote early. You know, to vote early in the day rather than waiting until 6:30 to go to the polls. But fortunately many of our tribal members did do that.

In my precinct, I was able to defeat the incumbent. The reservation precinct, I had a 74 percent advantage to my incumbent 26 percent votes received on the reservation from non-Indians residing on our reservation.

Let me say a few other things about the Voting Rights Act. I believe the Voting Rights Act has been implemented well in Fremont County and has allowed tribal members to participate in voting. However, it's really incumbent upon the tribal members and leadership to get those voters out to vote and get them to understand what the franchise means to them. My election did pretty much that. We had many voters that didn't believe their one vote could make a difference, but, however, in this particular election it did through a voter registration drive mounted by the two tribes, Eastern Shinbone Tribe and the Norther Arapaho Tribe. And we canvassed the entire reservations for voters, many that were young and many that were old, and many that had not voted for years because of the complacency of not seeing their vote count in terms of a Native American candidate. But also a candidate makes a big difference as to how that person's going to be received.

I did receive approximately, I think, 38 percent of the precincts outside of the Wind River Indian Reservation. I did receive 38 percent, I received several crossover votes, and I received votes from many Anglo Americans living within the area. So by my election proved that the Voting Rights Act does work, that it should be maintained. And I would particularly stress that Section 5 needs to be reauthorized, and that was my purpose in calling. If you have any questions, I will end my testimony now. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. Questions? Commission Chandler Davidson.

MR. DAVIDSON: Representative Goggles, I have a couple of questions for you, and I'm just trying to get my facts straight. I'm not perhaps as good a note-taker as I should be, but I believe you said that the 2000 redistricting enabled the -- was it the first election of a Native American representative on a reservation?

MR. GOGGLES: On the reservation.

MR. CHANDLER: Okay. And the second otherwise.

MR. GOGGLES: Yes.

MR. DAVIDSON: How do you explain -- and so you see this as a favorable -- a redistricting that was favorable to Native Americans.

MR. GOGGLES: Absolutely.

MR. DAVIDSON: How do you explain that? Was it the result of a lawsuit or was it just the conservative Republican legislature acting on its own?

MR. GOGGLES: Actually, there were several members of the legislature and those several members appointed to the redistricting of the boundaries that actually looked at the Wind River Indian Reservation as part of a district.

And yes, there are many conservative folks in Wyoming. And I believe and -- you know, I'm not real sure about this, but I believe because of the complacency issues that many Native Americans didn't vote, that many people thought that it really didn't matter whether they made the reservation a district or not because many of the Native Americans wouldn't vote anyway.

MR. DAVIDSON: I see.

MR. GOGGLES: But this year was a different year. We got many young people out to vote. A lot of college age Native Americans, single mothers, young families.

MR. DAVIDSON: Could you tell me what percentage of your district is composed of Native Americans?

MR. GOGGLES: Well, out of the 10 precincts, three of those precincts are on the Wind River Indian reservation. The total elected -- the total vote on the reservation was right around 2,000 to 1,955. And there were a total of 3,197 votes, and the vote off the reservation was 1,419.

The numbers, you know, really tell the story here. The postelection -- or the preelection there were only 1,057 voters compared to the postelection which there were 1,955 voters. So we did a lot of work in registering voters to vote, especially Native American voters, but we didn't forget about the Anglo American voters out there; we included them in our drive to vote as well.

MR. CHANDLER: I see. So you're saying that the majority of the voters in that election in which you were elected were Native Americans?

MR. GOGGLES: Yes, for the first time --

MR. CHANDLER: Okay.

MR. GOGGLES: -- in many years.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, thank you very much, Representative Goggles for your testimony. And thank you for helping our court reporter.

MR. GOGGLES: My pleasure.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you. The next speaker is Kat Choi who is -- excuse me, I just have to get my papers. She's with the Korean American Resource & Cultural Center in Chicago. The center was founded in 1995 to empower Korean Americans in the greater Chicago area through community education, collaboration and organizing. And so I'd like to welcome

Ms. Choi, and please feel free to testify. I would like to just ask if Representative Thomas Van Norman is on the line? Okay, not. Okay, Ms. Choi, please go forward.

MS. CHOI: Okay.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Welcome.

MS. CHOI: Good afternoon. The 10 of you -- is it loud enough?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We're having some odd audio again. Let me just ask the court reporter.

(A discussion was held off the record about sound quality.)

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Why don't we take five minutes. Ms. Choi, can you wait a couple minutes before testifying?

MS. CHOI: Yeah, sure.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay, thank you very much. So we'll take a break for five minutes.

(A recess was taken.)

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you for bearing with us. We have our court reporter back and you're coming through clearer. So we thank you for your patience and please feel free to go ahead.

MS. CHOI: Okay. So good afternoon. My name is Kat Choi. I'm the director at Korean American Resource & Culture --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Ms. Choi, the court reporter is saying that you need to slow down. If you could speak slowly, that would help him. Your testimony is being transcribed and put in the public record.

MS. CHOI: Sure.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: But thank you for bearing with us.

MS. CHOI: Okay. Hi, my name Kat Choi. I am the director at Korean American Resource & Cultural Center. We are based in Chicago. And let me give you a brief outlook about Korean Americans living in greater Chicago area. So according to 2000 census --

THE COURT REPORTER: I'm not understanding her.

(A discussion was held off the record about sound quality.)

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: What we're going to do is record your testimony because -- well, it's too long to explain. But we'll record your testimony and do our best to get it transcribed.

MS. CHOI: Okay.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: So if you could speak slowly, that would be helpful. Thank you.

MS. CHOI: Okay. So let me talk a little bit about Korean Americans living in greater Chicago area.

So according to 2000 census, there are about 60,000 Koreans living in greater Chicago, and about, approximately about 7,000 registered voters live in Cook County. Cook County is a northwest suburb including the Chicago area. So since its inception in 1995, the Korean American Resource & Culture Center's central activities have been to provide comprehensive education for Korean American voters through registration campaigns, publications of voter guides, distribution of candidate sheets, and community workshops.

THE COURT REPORTER: Can we stop for a second?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Ms. Choi --

MS. CHOI: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Could you hang on just a second?
(A discussion was held off the record about sound quality.)
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Just continue. Again, I apologize. We're just trying to get the record made. The court reporter is struggling to get this. So if you could just continue.
MS. CHOI: Okay.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you.
MS. CHOI: So I'll go on. And so one of the activities we have dealt with a lot is for the last November election in 2004 which includes voter registration and also get-out-the-vote campaign for over 3,000 members in the community. And also exit surveys from five polling sites in the suburbs and Chicago area with assistance from Asian-American Legal Defense and Education Fund. While the numbers of Korean voters in Cook County has increased significantly over the last decade, there has been little bilingual materials available to Korean voters. It's also an expansion of Section 203 of the Voter Rights Act, so there is a trigger of 10,000. So only where there are more than 10,000 registered voters in certain counties speaking bilingual, the county clerk or county office is mandated to provide bilingual materials for those voters. But currently Cook County does not.
So last year for the first time, KRCC helped the Cook County clerk's office publish the very first voter registration brochure in Korean language provided by the county. But it was not widely promoted or distributed by, by the office. Also, that was the very first time voters have language in Korean, but it was only available on election day. As one of the most recent immigrant groups, Korean voters with limited English capacity face significant barriers to exercise their voting rights and to have their votes count.
So the following events were recorded by Korean voters in the greater Chicago area. So first, a lack of election judges providing bilingual assistance. All the cases had been made for other agencies to help recruit or promote election judges who speak Korean. And so in due time they were not really to be able to help out the voters in trouble. Also, the other thing that was noted was even though Korean voters have -- go to the right polling sites, and even though voters have all the right required information, including voter registration cards, so sometimes they were asked to vote by provisionary ballot instead of the usual ones.
And the third one is lack of sample ballots in Korean language, so that kind of impeded Korean voters to be able to choose -- vote candidates in their districts because they are not given information about candidates in -- for positions and what they run for in their districts. So as a recommendation, we propose for the commission to continue Section 205 of Voter Rights Act, and moreover expand Section 203 by lowering current trigger of 10,000 as it fails to include underrepresented migrant communities. So that was testimony. Thank you.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Choi. Do we have any questions from the commission members? Ms. Choi, thank you very much.
MS. CHOI: Okay, thank you.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: And we appreciate you putting up with the technical difficulties.
MS. CHOI: That's fine.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We're now going to go to the panel with -- hello.
MS. CHOI: Hello?
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Hello? Is that you, Ms. Choi? Okay. We're now going to go into the panel with people from the public who are testifying. And the first speaker is Kathy Dopp, who is going to talk I guess about the Open Voting Consortium and the National Election Data Archive. Is that correct?

MS. DOPP: That's correct.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Welcome.

MS. DOPP: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you for your patience.

MS. DOPP: Oh, thank you for having this hearing here. My name is Kathy Dopp. I have a master's degree in mathematics with graduate level computer science studies. And I am president and one of the founding trustees of an organization newly formed since the November '04 election called US Count Votes.

And we're a group of primarily mathematicians and statisticians. And we think we can apply our talents to solving any problems with elections systems in America today.

So I'd like to tell you why we need a nationwide database of mathematical -- of detailed election results data so that we can analyze it and what, what some of things we can do to help correct the problems of voter disenfranchisement and incorrectly counted elections in America. With a nationwide database of detailed precinct level data, we could analyze the various rates of provisional balloting in different counties and precincts, and the rate at which those provisional ballots got counted and show if there was some abnormalities in certain precincts of counties that were, you know, had a much higher rate or not counting their provisional ballots.

We could also collect and analyze demographic data so that we could tell if these trends were, you know, being -- going along racial lines or not. Mathematical methods can be used to do redistricting. Instead of the current system, we could minimize boundary perimeters of districts and make sure that redistricting was done in a mathematical formula that was fair to everyone. Our group, US Count Votes, has studied voting machine allocation and found that it does suppress voter turnout in places like Ohio.

All the mathematical studies we do, and we can produce court-worthy evidence for lawyers that is irrefutable. Some of the exit poll analysis that our group has done so far has yet to be refuted by even one Ph.D. statistician or mathematician in America at any major university. And we've got a group of about 24 Ph.D. mathematicians and statisticians at universities all across America that are associated with our group. We have analyzed data in New Mexico, for example. We can do analysis of whether machines with high error rates are deliberately allocated to disadvantaged or -- excuse me, certain ethnic groups or not.

And in New Mexico, it looks like machines that had extremely high error rates of undervotes in past elections were deliberately -- may have deliberately or were allocated to minority districts.

MR. ROGERS: These are computerized machines?

MS. DOPP: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: Interesting.

MS. DOPP: New Mexico is really interesting because it shows why you need to get the detailed election data that no state is currently releasing or will tell you. Because in New Mexico there were -- in just the presidential race alone, there were 2,000 more votes that were counted than were actually cast in the absentee ballot category.

But the way the data is normally reported, these were added together with the election day results. And election day voting on these electronic ballot machines with no paper had a very high rate of no votes registering for the presidential candidate in, in the election. In other words, supposedly up to 105 voters went to the polls on election day and voted for the downstream races but not for the presidential race, which is very suspicious. But when you report data the way election officials normally do, they add these together and then report them, and so you can essentially today -- in today's election reporting system, you can pad votes for one candidate in one vote type while you're simultaneously subtracting votes for a different candidate in a different vote type. And when you add them together and report them, neither problem is in evidence.

And I'm only picking on New Mexico because I'm very happy to report that the New Mexico governor and chief election official actually has made this data available. So this -- we have no idea of the extent of these kind of problems until we are able to build the system, collecting and analyzing this data in other states as well. Another thing that a group of mathematicians and statisticians can do to help achieve election integrity is to show -- in one of the handouts I have here shows how surprisingly good a probability you would get of catching any miscounted precincts if you conduct random routine audits in randomly selected precincts. In just a small percentage of precincts, it gives you a very hight rate of detecting vote miscounts, especially when it's a small amount of vote counts spread out among precincts.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: So what you're saying is anomalous results stick out?

MS. DOPP: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: When you do -- right after you do the random sampling?

MS. DOPP: Well, how the -- CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Or the outliers, I guess.

MS. DOPP: I'm actually talking about two different approaches, building a nationwide database and analyzing it mathematically for election results.

And also doing on the local level routine audits of randomly selected precincts, counting the paper ballot in, you know, maybe to 5 percent of the precincts. And by routinely auditing the paper record, you can catch -- if you -- you can -- if you detect a miscounted precinct, that should trigger a countywide recount of all the ballots. So in other words, you would randomly select maybe two small -- maybe to 5 percent of the precincts to hand-count, and then that would give you, depending on how you design your audit, maybe a 90, 95 percent chance of catching any miss -- miscounted precincts if there were some. And that would enable you to easily catch any -- especially vote counts that were strewn among all the precincts.

And the database of election results, when you collect those and analyze the detail election results, that would enable you to catch and detect any statistically anomalous results. So you might not catch a really small distributed result like you would with the paper audit, but you would catch anything that was, you know, really striking or statistically significant.

Like, for instance, in New Mexico it was very statistically significant, the fact that the counties in New Mexico that were counted with op-scan paper ballots had a very normal low percentage of undervotes in a presidential race. In other words, everyone -- less than -- fewer than percent on average went to the polls and neglected to cast a vote for president. Whereas if you voted in counties using the DRE electronic ballot machines, you had this very high rate, and it was -- and those machines were allocated more -- they -- the rate was particularly high of undervotes in the precincts where you had minorities, a higher portion of minorities. Another thing you can detect with statistical -- you know, a mathematical analysis of the election data, for instance in Florida in both the 2000 and 2004 election, the op-scanned counties looked like they were miscounted, the electronic miscounts.

A lot of you may remember that if Gore had requested a recount of all the counties in Florida, including the op-scan counties, he would have won Florida, because the Miami Herald recount of the op-scan ballots showed that enough votes shifted in the recount from Bush back to Gore that Gore would have won Florida.

What a lot of people don't realize is that the Miami Herald did a recount of 2.7 of the op-scan counties after the 2004 election, and in their own characterization of their report, they said it was an insignificant number of votes shifted back from Bush to Kerry. But some mathematicians in my group actually looked at the number of votes that shifted back from Bush to Kerry, and they found that enough votes shifted back from Bush to Kerry, those 2.7 counties that they counted, that if you multiplied that out based on a proportion of the population, Kerry would have won Florida again in 2004.

But that kind of gross calculation doesn't necessarily -- you know, isn't necessarily valid, so that this is not something that would, you know, necessarily mean that Kerry would have won Florida. But in the 2000 election in Florida, there was a very high rate of ballot spoilage or overvotes where, you know, there was more than one, you know, ballot -- ballots were spoiled because too many people were chosen for the same race on the ballot.

You know, what I find really interesting about that is supposedly this ballot spoilage rate was much higher in precincts where there was a high number of minority voters. And a lot of those precincts had precinct-based op-scan systems where supposedly you stick the ballot into the counter at the precinct and it spits it back at you if there's an overvote, so there should have been no overvotes in some of those districts. And so how did those overvotes get there? You might wonder if maybe, A, the, the feature that caught and detected and warned the voters of overvotes might have been turned off on those machines, or perhaps there was some insider that was spoiling the ballots after the fact.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes.

MS. DOPP: We don't know.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Ms. Dopp, I think if you could try to conclude your testimony, that would be great. But I'd say generally that I think what I would do -- what I will do is ask the staff if they could talk to you because I think the purpose of our hearing is slightly -- is somewhat different.

MS. DOPP: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: But it obviously is germane to the intense public interest about voting integrity and the use of these machines. And I, I think that --

MS. DOPP: Well, I think your focus is more on the Voting Rights Act --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Right.

MS. DOPP: -- and minority groups. And, you know, I apologize. I'm in town --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: No, no.

MS. DOPP: -- for a NASS conference and so I thought --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: It seemed a natural.

MS. DOPP: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I think what I would do is have you wind up. But also suggest that maybe the staff could identify some venues for, for these very important kinds of issues that you're raising, you know, because it's not quite germane.

MS. DOPP: Okay, well --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: But it sounds like it's very important and should be brought to light.

MS. DOPP: Well, that was my first point, that we need to create this nationwide database at precinct level elections to help identify all these issues. And --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes, I know exactly what you're proposing. You're proposing that there are certain mathematical ways to address these issues.

MS. DOPP: Right.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Because statisticians deal with anomalies all the time.

MS. DOPP: Right. And they can provide court-worthy evidence that is irrefutable if we have the right data. And the second --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, it would be important for secretaries of state to maintain integrity of their state system.

MS. DOPP: Well, unfortunately not one state in America makes this data available right now, so that's why I'm --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Right.

MS. DOPP: -- attending the NASS conference to try to see if --

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. So you're already working on this.

MS. DOPP: Yes. The second thing that we need to do that we haven't done enough in terms of -- you know, I guess I'm dealing more with the issues that disenfranchise not only minorities but all voters. And what I have seen a huge lack of is that people are not turning to the Ph.D. computer scientists that are voting systems experts, and therefore when they author legislation or try to, you know, fix the problem.

And that there's this group called the Open Voting Consortium, which is a group of Ph.D. computer scientists, who have been working since the year 2000 to develop better voter systems, and they have excellent recommendations and would be happy to help anyone with respect to legislation to fix voting systems.

And the third idea I have is -- you know, it's very timely right now -- I don't know how much time we have -- is that the Help America Vote Act funds, it actually turns out that the less expensive voting equipment is also much more trustworthy, the op-scan voting equipment that produces a paper ballot that's hand-countable and auditable. And the more expensive voting equipment is the, you know, electronic ballot voting that is the also not -- slightly trustworthy and can be easily used to embezzle elections or just any kind of error can cause election failure. And so if we could convince states to save money, they would have lots of Help America Vote Act funds left over to do things like hire experts to ensure that the electronic voter registration databases are handled correctly so that voters are not disenfranchised like they were in Florida.

And they could also create Web-based Internet databases that would keep voters, election officials and poll workers up to date on all the rules, regulations and procedures related to voting in their locales. And there would be a lot of other things that this money could be spent on that would really help solve a lot of the problems. And I guess my main points are that Get-Out-The-Vote efforts, although I think they're great, but in my opinion today from the mathematical analysis that my group has done, we find that there's so much evidence of vote miscounts that is so widespread around the country in many, many states that you could probably put out all the voters you ever wanted to to vote and you still might not be able to influence the results of an election until we fix election integrity that's disenfranchising everyone.

And that after decades of never doing any independent audits of our voting systems to check for accuracy, we've essentially given unlimited freedom to anyone on the inside to tamper with our vote counts. And we must, you know, do -- take these few actions to fix it, create the nationwide database, start consulting with computer scientists and, you know, require voting equipment that has voter verifiable paper ballots that are hand-countable and independently auditable. And I'm sorry if I'm a little off topic, but good luck with all your issues.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, no, I think you're adding a dimension --
MS. DOPP: That's right.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- that's actually not been raised in the public debate about integrity. I think it's only been about verifiability. It's not really been about the kind of issues you're raising.
MS. DOPP: Right, which I think are important.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Do you have any questions, Charles? Well, thank you very much.
MS. DOPP: Thank you.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We're going to move to have some testimony from some ACORN activists. Shade Buyobe-Hammond.
MS. BUYOBE-HAMMOND: Yeah, my name is Shade, S-H-A-D-E, Buyobe-Hammond. Buyobe, it's spelled B-U-Y-O-B-E Hammond, H-A-M-M-O-N-D.
MR. ROGERS: Where did you get that, where did you get the name Buyobe from? What is the origin?
MS. BUYOBE-HAMMOND: Shade Buyobe is my African name that I was awarded in -- like about 25 years during Kwanza, and I've used it ever since.
MR. ROGERS: Okay, thank you.
MS. BUYOBE-HAMMOND: I want to thank you for having us come tonight and testify from ACORN.
ACORN is an acronym that stands for Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now. We are a membership driven organization, and we focus on the issues and concerns of low and moderate income people. We are a national organization as well as an organization here in Minnesota, and nationally we are 34 years old, and in Minnesota we are just about 24 years old.
We're going to talk to you a little bit about voter intimidation which is a serious thing in our community. We have found that during the election -- the last election in 2004 that there were numerous problems around the state, challenges among the party that were harassing people of color. And this was an attempt to discourage voters from actually, you know, casting their ballot as well as -- in the city as well as in the Duluth and the Indian reservations that this was experienced.
ACORN, we supported efforts at the state level to require that challengers be Minnesota residents, not outstate people, and that the people making the challenge do that challenge in writing. Those are now part of the state law, but we're concerned that these protections are not being enforced. Shortly before the election, the secretary of state's office put out a ridiculous notice to county officials about how to spot a terrorist on election day. This is a disturbance to the well-being of the voting public, and therefore it could cause more misidentification, disturbance of the voting public coming in to cast their votes and disturbing the nature of the other vote. We need to be encouraging people to get out to vote and not scaring people without any reason.
The vote is a very basic unit of power in this country, and we're -- and ACORN is an organization that is about building power for our community so we can change the quality of life that we have in our community, so that we can lift our voice and be heard. It's important that the Voting Rights Act states about the past history of discouraging potential voters, getting approval from the US Justice Department before making any significant changes in how they administer the election. We're interested in maintaining our democracy, and the vote is key to making that happen. I appreciate your letting me make these comments. Are there any questions?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: I have a question. Do you have a copy of that notice that the -- about the terrorist.

MS. BUYOBE-HAMMOND: I don't have it with me, but I'm sure I could get it.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes, I think it would be very helpful if you could provide that to the commission. Sunday Alabi?

MR. ALABI: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay, thank you.

MR. ALABI: Sunday is like the Sunday, and the last name is A-L-A-B, as in boy, -I. I'm an ACORN member for quite a long time, and the most immigrants, especially in Minnesota here, live in the city. And I'm very interested to make sure that they don't treat the immigrants like they treat the people in the city, because it just takes for me two or three times to be frustrated and before you become nonvoters again.

And when you don't vote, the politicians don't listen to you. And when they don't listen to you, they do things to us -- it's like a dominos theory that, well, the politician will do whatever they want and do anyway. There's no need for me to vote. I've seen that in Minnesota here. When the immigrant first come, everybody's happy to vote. Some people are voting for the first time. I mean, it's an empowering situation that yes, you are the one who is picking the president of the United States. And it really gives you the power.

But when -- I remember this very well, because in the last election when ACORN registered over 36,000 new voters in Minnesota, we went and negotiate with the -- I mean, I actually talked to the secretary of state.

And he gave us the, the new registration form with so many duplications. You are to provide your travel license. You are to provide -- and if you move, if you move from where you live before -- I mean month before this, you get a new driver license, your ballot won't be counted because your address will be different from what is on your driver license. So there's so many obstacles that the secretary of state was trying to put in front of us, which is mostly is going to affect the immigrant mostly because a lot them aren't driving.

And when we talked to her, she said that, "well, that is the way it is." I told her that Minnesota has to take the secretary of state to court to stop that, that practice. And I think it really helped tremendously. I would really dare to say that maybe they should take the voting registration out of the secretary of state's hands and put it on national level where there would be one person who makes the final decision for the whole country and it not depends on the political whim of the secretary of state. That's my feeling.

And if you look at the light rail construction in Minnesota, actually it is -- they have it in English, in the Hmong language and in Somali language. Buy why can't we -- there shouldn't be any question about voting ballots also, it should be in the non-English languages those who cannot speak the English. Thank you very much for allowing me to speak here today. And I think it's very important we maintain these Voting Rights Act, that our rights are the same, all starting with and continue with a new immigrant who really wants to vote, who want to be part of the -- a society and want to contribute.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you very much, Mr. Alabi. Are there any questions?

MR. ROGERS: I did, actually. As you were speaking, I was punching something up on the Web because I was triggered by a thought. It's a very general thought. Some of the complaints that people might have about not reauthorizing the act is essentially this: why bother reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act if you don't vote anyway? I mean, if you look at the core -- if you look issues related to minority voters in particular, what you find across the country are poor registration rates of eligible voters and then poor turnout rates of those who are eligible to vote.

MR. ALABI: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: And I'm just very curious in a broad sense, what would be your response to a person who would say that?

MR. ALABI: You know, you see, that's --

MR. ROGERS: Why bother?

MR. ALABI: -- it's like what comes first chicken or the egg. You know, I mean, when you -- I totally -- I was thoroughly impressed in the last election that it taught to me a lesson that after we registered 36,000 new voters, we find a politician coming to our ACORN office for endorsement. And some of them never kept their promise to us. They never kept their promise.

So we told them that "The next election we are not voting for you." That, including our present mayor in Minneapolis here. He didn't keep it, he didn't that promise. And since we have a large number of voters, I'm sure the next time, once we get one out of office, we, we assume that they will listen to us.

But why would anybody want to vote? When you vote, the person promised you, they didn't do what you -- they asked you to do. You know, it's just sort of ridiculous to expect me to come and put all my efforts and energy to come and vote next time after I voted this time. You didn't do what you told me you're gonna do. What's the point of coming again next time? And when you do this to me two or three times, I'd be a fool to come and vote next time. And that's what politicians want us to do. And then people sit and complaining saying, well, if you don't vote. Why should I vote if it doesn't make any difference? Discouraging because it -- because people don't vote.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you. I think you have something to say?

MS. BUYOBE-HAMMOND: Well, I just wanted to add that that's the rationale, is to say that these are communities that have low voter registration. But you can't -- or low voter turnout. You can't say you want it and not -- you know, you can't justify one when you don't have the history behind that happening. With the disenfranchisement of these communities over and over again, of course they're going to have that.

But then you have the compilation of the people that are in power. Are they to widen the power? Is this supposed to be a democracy to all people of the country can participate and have a voice or is it just for a select few? That's not the tenet of our country. That's not the direction of our country. All people are created equal. Therefore, all the residents of this country have a right and responsibility to be able to participate in the political system by the way of having one vote per person. And taking that away is beginning to tear away from the building blocks, the very foundation of what this country stands for and which makes it free.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Hammond. Our last speaker is Sherill Morgan-Spencer. I was just pausing because I just wanted to know if you were ready to testify.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: I am ready.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. Thank you very much.

MS. SPENCER: Thank you for having me.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you for the testimony from ACORN.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: As I said, my name is Cheryl Morgan-Spencer, and I'm here speaking on behalf of the Minneapolis Urban League. The Minneapolis Urban League has a proud history of civil rights here in the great state of Minnesota. And we have just celebrated our 75th -- 76th anniversary, we're getting up there, and that's where I work. And over the last several years I've been fairly involved with voter registration.

And I guess my comments this evening are fairly succinct and they have more to do with, I think, just maybe three things I'd like to urge the commission to do. And one of them has to do with more community education around the Voting Rights Act itself. I think that more and more people -- I get many, many calls from people saying, African-Americans are going to lose the right to vote in 2007. We are angry, we are upset, what is going on. And so I think that more community education needs to happen around the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act that do guarantee African -- well, of course, the 15th amendment does, but I think a lot of folks don't understand that. And so it's -- this is more of a community education issue.

I think that clarification is very critical, particularly for communities of color, particularly for our immigrant communities, people who may just not just understand how the Act -- you know, how it works. Does that make sense?

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Yes.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: And then my only other comment --

MR. ROGERS: Just a quick thought on that.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: I'm sorry.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: How is that rumor being spread for the most part?

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: I think --

MR. ROGERS: Rather than disk jockeys on radio stations.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: You know, I've heard -- a woman called me and said, "I just heard on the radio that African-Americans are going to lose the right to vote in 2007."

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: This has been around for quite a while.

THE WITNESS: It has been.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: When I was at the Justice Department, we had to put something on our Web site.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: And I have it here.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Because it was so current, and that was, that was 19 --

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: '98.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- '98.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: I have it.

MR. ROGERS: I heard it was radio stations --

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: -- particularly in Minnesota.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: The radio stations, you get people, you know, who call intentionally trying to intimidate or to razzle you, to get you to respond a certain way by saying mean things. But -- so I think that that is something that really we collectively, I think, need to, to work on that issue because more and more people are confused. And then the only other thing that I really wanted to add, and maybe I can take my time because I'm the last one. I wanted to make sure that I made a comment about the use of the optical scan machine in terms of voting, and that was the machine we used here in Minnesota, and I wanted to support the comments of the first lady that spoke.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Catherine Dopp.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: Right. And say that we got reports people were mostly satisfied with the use of that machine. And not only folks from communities of color but also people from our disabled communities as well. And those are my comments. They are brief, they are succinct, and I am done. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We thank you for your testimony. We thank you for your succinctness. Any other questions? Actually, Jon, I think I neglected to ask Kathy Dopp for -- she did mention the study of the data voting data in New Mexico. You might want to --

MR. GREENBAUM: Okay.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- give her a call to see what it is. But I think that's the data that supports your statement.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: Uh-huh.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: We should take a look at it.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: We would recommend, I -- I would recommend that, that the optical scan machine might be the primary choice in elections.

MR. ROGERS: You found its accuracy to be --

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: The reports that I've read and what people say is that they're more comfortable with that machine, and it has less, less errors.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Are you able to get a verification of your vote?

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: I'm sorry, I can't hear you.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: After the use of that machine, do you get a verification?

MR. GREENBAUM: You don't need to.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: You don't need to because you feed it into the machine.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Oh, really.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: Right.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: So folks have a better sense --

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: Right.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: -- of what's happening.

MR. GREENBAUM: It's like saying --

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: It's optical scanner.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Oh, I got it.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: Yes.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Okay. And it's cheaper too.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: That's what they say.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Well, as the chair, I'm going to dispense with any closing comments I have.

MR. ROGERS: Also, yes.

MR. LITTLE: Ditto.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: I would also like to -- excuse me. I'm sorry, Mr. Little. It's just wonderful to see Matt Little. Here he's such an icon in our community. I would also like to take this opportunity to let the commission know that in the future if you should like to hold hearings, we have a wonderful facility at 2100 Plymouth Avenue North here in wonderful Minneapolis that you are welcome to use at any time.

MR. ROGERS: You are in the Urban League Building?

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: That's right. 2100 Plymouth Avenue North 55411.

CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Commissioner Davidson, any closing remarks?

MR. DAVIDSON: Yes, I have a prepared 30-minute statement. Just kidding.

MS. MORGAN-SPENCER: Thank you, gentlemen.
MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly.
CHAIRMAN LANN LEE: Thank you. That's it.

(The hearing was concluded.)

SPEAKER INDEX

SENATOR BROWN: Good afternoon, I'm Robert Brown, Community Connections Committee Chairman, Georgia Legislative Black Caucus, on behalf of Stan Watson, who's the Chairman of the Caucus.

I want to extend a welcome to those of you who traveled on the Commission to join us this afternoon. And we're very pleased that you would take the time out to come here for this what we think is going to be a very important hearing on the renewal of the Voting Rights Act.

And we're not going to at this point be that formal in terms of how we will proceed.

We would ask Jon Greenbaum and then following that the hearing officers to make some opening comments and then we'll have a panel that will start our discussion on the issues as we see them here in this state and to some extent we'll probably talk somewhat about some things that we've noticed on the recent poll, but for sure we're going to be very particular to what's going on in the State of Georgia. And with that, I'll ask Jon to have some comments and encourage everyone to when you speak, make sure you speak directly into the microphone or at least loud enough so that the court reporter can hear you cause we want to make sure that all of the proceedings are accurately transcribed, so Jon?

MR. GREENBAUM: Thank you Senator Brown. This is an unusual hearing for the National Commission.

Most of the time, we do a lot of legwork in terms of putting these hearings together. When Senator Brown called me a couple of months ago and said will I come down to south Georgia and I said, well, we'll probably get a couple of Commissioners to come down here with me, but you have to do all the work, which he agreed to do and he has done all the work.

I'm very appreciative of Senator Brown for putting together this hearing, and we're very appreciative also of the people who are here today and traveled to testify and to listen to the problems that have gone on in south Georgia, as well as the rest of Georgia and other areas of the south.

One of the reasons why Senator Brown chose Americus is the history of discrimination building in voting in south Georgia that some people consider it to kind of be the birthplace for where the movement for voting civil rights began. And we're quite honored to be here.behalf of the National Commission, the Commissioners are going to talk a little bit more about the purpose of the Commission which is basically designed to look at the current state of discrimination in voting and its relevance to the upcoming efforts to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act.

And I'm going to introduce each of the Commissioners and give a short introduction.

We have two of our Commissioners here today.

Chandler Davidson is one of our Commissioners who's here today who is perhaps the foremost political scientist in the area of voting rights. He was the former Chair of the Sociology Department at Rice University. He is a renowned author and is co-editor of perhaps the seminal work on voting rights in the last couple of decades. Mr. Chandler also was very involved in 1982 authorization of voting rights and in fact testified before Congress in relation to that.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you, Jon, Senator, Mayor Griffin and Representative James; Ladies and Gentlemen, it's a pleasure to be here today. I'm honored that I was asked to come down and listen to you give testimony on the subject of Voting Rights Act.

I've now been at several hearings that the Lawyers Committee has sponsored around the country, Montgomery, Phoenix and New York City and most recently Minneapolis and I've been struck by the diversity of the audience and by the diversity of the voting problems that racial and ethnic minorities in this country continue to face; and I've learned a great deal by listening to elected officials and also activists and simply men and women in all walks of life who have chosen to come forward and give testimony, and so I'm pleased to be here and look forward to hearing what you have to say.

MR. GREENBAUM: Another Commissioner that's here today is Joe Rogers. Joe is the former Lieutenant Governor for the State of Colorado. He was elected in 1998 and served through 2002. He was the only fourth African American to serve as a Lieutenant Governor in all the states of this country. And Joe was in fact President of the Lieutenant Governor's Association during his time that he served as Lieutenant Governor. Joe is an attorney who is a noted speaker. He does a program called "Keep the Dream Alive" where he speaks to audiences throughout the country about the legacy of Martin Luther King and civil rights. Joe.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, Jon. First of all, it's just a delight to be with you all, and I'm so glad that you are here today and I'm very pleased Senator, that it will be to some extent informal in terms of our time together. That's wonderful frankly to give us an opportunity to speak with you very frankly and to get some sense of the substance that not only you all experiences as it relates to voting, but your thoughts and perceptions in terms of what's going on here, obviously in this most critical region of the United States.

And Representative and Mayor, it's just a delight to be with you all.

In particular, I just mention the history as you all well know. There are so many of us that come from other parts of the world. Ionamin (Phonetically), Colorado. Have you all ever been there before?

SENATOR BROWN: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: You all have been there. Well, as I've commented previously we call it God's country in Colorado, and I know you all have certain claims here in Georgia.

MR. BROWN: We're reserving claims --

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. Well, we call it God's county for a little different reason. We're actually at the highest elevation state in the United States of America, as you all well know. And so we are different. We're a little closer to the good Lord, but it's a pleasure to be with you all here and obviously the substance in terms of Americus and Albany, this region of the United States being so central frankly to all of us throughout the country.

I am uniquely aware that I would never have been elected to serve the people of Colorado which is miles away from here were it not for so much that took place here in this region and that obviously helped it to develop so much of the substance in the civil rights movement and the Voting Rights Act in particular.

And so it's just a delight to be with you and we'll look forward to your thoughts and testimony.

SENATOR BROWN: Thank you. With that, we will move directly to the panel.

But just before doing that, I want to say, in Georgia, it's kind of like the best of times and the worst of times.

We in this state have probably the largest African American caucus in the State Legislature of any in the states, all 50 states. That is certainly the good side.

Yet, we are also a state where we recently have seen the law passed that's one of the restrictive laws in the nation as far as voter identification is concerned. And we really are concerned that without the Voting Rights Act being renewed, that we will see even more injurious and onerous kinds of legislation that will be passed but certainly if they would chance a pass of this kind of legislature while the Voting Rights Act is in force or enforced, it certainly would stand to reason that they would go even further if we did not have the Voting Rights Act.

So we want to make sure that that point is impressed upon all who will listen.

At this time, we have panel members and with us is Ms. Tallman, Mayor Griffin and Daniel Levitas, and we'll go in that order.

And as we do that, I want to also point out that Georgia is rapidly becoming one of the most diverse states as far as ethnicity is concerned. We're no longer just black and white, and again as we look at the provisions of the law that affect language minorities, we are going to have to be more sensitive to that.

Unfortunately, as I sit in the legislature, I see us becoming more sensitive to it but in the wrong direction. We are seeing people, we expect for example in this next legislative session to see some of the most virulent anti-immigrant legislation of anywhere in this country, and frankly the voter ID bill or voter restriction bill probably was more directed at Latinos and others than African Americans, but it certainly would have a negative effect on us and so with that introduction, I'll ask the panel to start as I suggested and state something about themselves individually and then provide whatever testimony they would like to.

My name is Ms. Tallman and I'm the Southeast Regional Counsel involved with Mexican American legal defense.

My name is Floyd Griffin. I'm the Mayor of the City of Milledgeville, Georgia and I'm a former State Senator and, Lieutenant Governor, as you well know, ran for Lieutenant Governor the same year that you did out in Colorado. I'm also a retired Army Colonel and I'll talk about my experience.

I'm Daniel Levitas with the American Civil Liberties Union Voting Rights Project based in Atlanta.

MS. TALLMAN: I'm very honored to be here and I'd like to personally thank Senator Brown for inviting us here to Georgia Legislature Black Caucus for recognizing that there are some issues that are very new for the first time in the south as we it relates to the Latino community. I'm very thankful for having that opportunity.

I know that the Commission has heard some examples already. Some specifically from Georgia; one of the representatives from my office presented in Alabama. I do want to briefly go over those scenarios again because we do have some updated information regarding the progress of those investigations and I also want to briefly talk about North Carolina because I don't believe it's yet been covered. A particular incident that we were involved with prior to the General Election.

I think what's really important for us to think about as we enter the debate for the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act as to whether or not communities of color have obtained equal access in voting. And I believe that the examples that have been presented to the Commission throughout the country and as you continue to hear examples that we have not yet achieved equal access in voting and of particular stories that I know, some of which you have heard, implicate certain provisions that will specifically be up for reauthorization in 2007. And I do believe that some of things that I'm going to be talking about is particularly relevant to the reauthorization of that important Act.

In Georgia, we were asked to come to the aid of particular voters and it was very similar in two counties in Georgia, Long County and Atkinson County, Georgia. And then something similar was about to happen in Alamance County, North Carolina. We were able to head off that particular example.

But what happened in Long County, Georgia is prior to the primary election some individuals came to the Registrar's Office in Long County and requested a list of all registered voters. From that list, the names of Latinos only were taken off of that list and were challenged. Nearly, two-thirds of the Latino voter registration list was in fact challenged in Precinct One.

Just by way of background, as of August 2004 in Long County, there were 122 registered Latino voters. In Precinct One, there were 64 registered Latino voters. Of the 64, 46 were challenged. They were challenged based on citizenship, but the only indication we have of evidence that was ever presented to the Registrar's Office is simply the Latino surname. Of the 46 challenged, what happened next is the Registrar's Office sent out notices to the challenged registered Latino voters stating that they had to show up at a hearing and prove their citizenship. Of the 46 that were given notice of a hearing, six attended the hearing. Another two showed up at the polling place to vote. We don't have any indication of what happened to the other two but we do know that out of 46 challenged voters, 64 registered voters, only ten voted in the primary. We will never know the complete chilling effect that these challenges had on the community, but we certainly do know that the numbers of these indicate that there may have been a chilling effect by this process. We believe that this process was in violation of Georgia law and potentially in violation of Section Two of the Voting Rights Act.

As soon as we heard of the incident which was following the hearing or following the primary election, we alerted the Secretary of State's Office that we believe that the Registrar's Office did not act according to Georgia statute and potentially contrary to federal law that the hearing should not have been called at all, that the individuals who challenged the registered voters based on citizenship solely on a surname should have been required to show some type of evidence or present any type of statement regarding why they believed the targeted voters to not be U.S. citizens. That to date we do not have any evidence that anything was required of them.

Despite our complaints following the primary, Atkinson County had a similar incident arise just before the General Election, and in Atkinson County as of October of 2004, there were 121 registered Latino voters. Of the 121 registered Latino voters, 96 were challenged very similar in regard to percentages of the registered Latino voting population in Long County and in Atkinson County.

In Atkinson County what transpired was a little bit more disturbing in that the individuals who made the challenges simply asked for the Latino registered voter list. They did not ask for a standard list, but they specifically asked for the registered list to be desegregated, specifically requesting the Latino list and from that list we know that the 96 were challenged, and we believe that it was solely by surname but no evidence once again was required of them, so we do not know if there was anything other than that.

We do know that the Registrar's Office provided that list to the citizens that were making the challenges and we have the specific notices that went out of the specific challenges that were made.

We know that the challenge that was presented in the Registrar's Office simply stated, we the undersigned registered voters of Atkinson County challenge the registration of and then the name was placed in the center and request the removal of this name from the voter's list in this country. The next sentence stating, this request is based on the U.S. Citizenship requirement before registering to vote.

And that was all that was presented by way of proof by the individuals who were challenging the voter registration of these individuals.

What we also know is that even though the procedure that was followed was one of two procedures under Georgia statute, the challenges were made to look like they were challenging the application of the registration of the individuals. Yet, we know from registered voters that we spoke with that many of them had been registered for many years and had voted in Georgia for many years, so they weren't actual applicants to the registration process.

And then we know because we do have the actual form letter that was sent out by the Registrar's Office that everyone received the same notice. It was in English and in Spanish, and it stated that they needed to show up at a hearing and that they had to bring evidence to prove their citizenship.

Yet once again, we know that no evidence was ever presented by the person who was making the challenges that the individuals were not U.S. citizens. Yet, the burden shifted and the individuals were supposed to bring proof at the hearing that they were U.S. citizens. Once again, we spoke with individuals in Atkinson County and because we were made aware of Atkinson County before the hearing transpired, we had more contact on the ground than for example, Long County that we heard of after it had happened. But in Atkinson County, for example, we know the individual who was born and raised in Texas and moved to Georgia several years ago had been voting in Georgia for a number of years was challenged simply because of his last name. We know that a pastor and the pastor's two brothers were challenged simply because of their last name. And these are small communities. These are not large communities. Individuals know each other in these communities and we also know that I believe in Long County specifically there had been newspaper articles that had described the tension between the white community and the Latino community, and members in the Latino community believe that this type of action that typically it was allowed to take place by the actions of the Registrar's Office just contributed to the tension that already existed in the community. And they felt not only as a challenge to their right to vote as U.S. citizens, but as a challenge to their community for simply being Latino and living in Georgia.

We do know that Georgia has had an exponential growth in our community for the first time in this part of the country, but we also know that we had a second and third generation Latinos who have made this their home and it's not recently that they've made us their home. They have been in small numbers but they do live here and they are similarly threatened by what has transpired which we believe to be intimidation and harassment of our community for the purpose of preventing them from accessing their rights to vote. And we know a right that was fought for.

Certainly, the African American community contributed substantially to that fight and have lost lives in the process and we know that on the 40th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act, we need to acknowledge that. We also need to acknowledge the fight that was launched in the southwest to preserve and to protect the rights of Latinos who are now residing in this part of the country.

So you know this is something that we can reduce it to numbers, we can reduce it to facts, but I don't want the stories of the individuals who are directly impacted by these circumstances to be lost. We do know that they will be struggling for years to come with what was allowed to transpire in these counties.

We also know that the same time Atkinson County was happening, a sheriff in Alamance County, Sheriff Terry Johnson, decided he wanted to engage in similar conduct. My office in particular had had previous dealings with this sheriff because of other instances that occurred in this county. So we were made aware of what was going on right away because of our prior contact in Alamance County, North Carolina.

But what had happened and this is documented in newspaper articles that the sheriff decided that he was going to enlist the assistance of the County Attorney in receiving the Latino registered voters list and he did obtain it from the County Attorney. And with that list, he publicly stated that he was going to go door to door to the house of every single registered Latino voter and to determine whether or not they were U.S. citizens and to systematically arrest every single person he did not believe to be a U.S. citizen.

Certainly, these acts are extremely disturbing but because they were made public, we will have no idea of what type of impact this may have had prior to the general election in Alamance County and in North Carolina. We found out about what had transpired and we intervened and we notified the Department of Justice. Again, I believe it was a direct result of the publicity in this matter and involvement of non-profits and the government alike that this was stopped before it started. But unfortunately, that didn't happen in Long County or in Atkinson County.

However, just by way of followup, what we do know that happened in Atkinson County is at the hearing and I want to point out that the hearing was not canceled but the hearing did take place, but at the hearing in dramatic fashion, a speech was read by the county and they stated that there would not be a hearing and that the electors had not met their burden of proof and that everyone was allowed to go home. However, it remains our contention that there should not have been a hearing to begin with, and certainly we won't know the impact of that.

I recently just last week testified before or made public comment rather before the State Election Board in Georgia regarding the Long and Atkinson County matters. I'm very disturbed that nothing has still been done to date in regards to action by the State of Georgia.

Following the Long County incident nothing has happened. We made contact with Registrars' Offices all across Georgia by letter and we tried to make some phone contact as well. There was nothing delivered by the state to the Registrar's Office regarding the clarification of what needed to be done in these instances and there was no guidance to our understanding presented to Atkinson County prior to the action that was taken by Atkinson County and following Atkinson County.

We still believe that nothing has happened following both of these instances, and we have urged the State Election Board and the Secretary of State to try to remedy the situation by guidance, do what needs to be done in order to ensure that this doesn't happen again and if it happens again for Registrars to know what to do in the next instance to preserve the right to vote of our Latino community.

At the State Election Board, one thing that did come out of it following my comments regarding these instances is there was a vote by the Board and the Board decided to have the State Attorney General's Office do an investigation of the actions of the Registrar's Office and also more specifically Long County and Atkinson County but also to send an investigation to generally determine or try to determine what the Registrar's Office has done in the past or may do in the future regarding these type of challenges. And certainly we plan on following up.

We've been in contact with the Department of Justice. I know that the Department of Justice is still continuing to investigate what happened in Long County and in Atkinson County, and we hope for a good resolve out of both of these instances.

But once again, we will never know the full impact of what was allowed to transpire.

Thank you.

MR. DAVIDSON: May I ask a question or should we go ahead now and hear other people testify before questions are asked? Do you have any preference there?

SENATOR BROWN: Why don't we go forward.

MR. DAVIDSON: Okay.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Once again, my name is Floyd Griffin, the Mayor of the City of Milledgeville, and I want to thank you all for coming down here in south Georgia today to get testimony from us concerning the Voter's Rights Act and some of the things that's taking place here in Georgia.

Let me kind of set the stage a little bit about before I really get into the meat of my testimony.

I served in the Georgia Senate and I was the first African American in modern times to serve in a majority white rural legislative district and when I was elected Mayor of the City of Milledgeville, I was the first African American to be elected in the city in 199 years' existence of Milledgeville at that time.

Now, Milledgeville is the old capital of Georgia. It was the capital of Georgia for some 63, 65 years prior to the Civil War and after the Civil War, the capital moved to Atlanta. So it's a lot of history there in Milledgeville and Milledgeville is my hometown. I grew up there and left and went off to college and came back 28 years later. So I've been back in Milledgeville about 15 years and got involved in politics.

But I want to give you some personal experience from the standpoint of why our Voter's Rights Act is important and especially in this case I think, Section Five, and it needs to reauthorized and it needs to be strengthened, needs more strength to it and the Justice Department needs to enforce the section, enforce what they are doing and we have seen in recent years that that has not been done especially under the present administration.

I ran for Mayor four years ago. Milledgeville had a strong Mayor system. During that election, two, the incumbent and another young white person ran. The incumbent is white also or the incumbent was white. And one of the issues in that election was changing the form of government to a management form of government from a strong mayor form of government. And I was for maintaining the strong mayor form of government with a City Administrator.

And the non-incumbent was for a management form of government. He lost in the runoff to me and I won by 21 votes. Now, you got to kind of look at the situation here. There was three of us in the election. Milledgeville is a majority white district, not city, about 43, 43, 44 percent registered black votes. So I had to get white votes to be able to win, not only in that race but also in the Senate race. So that's not the main question. I missed winning without a runoff by 78 votes okay. But now we go into the general election with the runoff at least and I win by 21 votes.

So you can basically see what had happened there. It's basically along racial lines, and I had to get some white votes to win. And some of the blacks didn't vote, all the blacks didn't vote for me and I understand that. It's never going to happen that way.

But nine months after being in office, the Council voted to change the form of government and it went to the legislature and the legislature approved that under the local legislation rules in Georgia, which is basically by virtue of serving in the legislature, you know if there is no problems with the local legislative delegation it's voted on on the floor of the Senate and the House without debate. So I understand that so I'm not concerned about that.

And in Georgia, because of a change like that, it had to go to the Justice Department, and the Justice Department re-cleared it you know. Now, on the Council is three blacks and three whites, and it was unanimously approved. So the three blacks went along with the three whites.

But some of the things the Justice Department looked at is you know you had the three blacks going along with it. Well as we all know with the history of this country and blacks in this country, we've had a number of blacks to go along with whites anyway. So that should not be a major factor. It should be a major factor that the Justice Department should take a very close look at this because where blacks are voting with whites in certain instances like that doesn't mean that it's right.

But the main thing here is that in my opinion we had an election. The election was overthrown because the people voted for me under a certain set of circumstances, and that circumstances was a charter that was in place that a strong mayor concept that had been in place for 199 years, that form of government and there was no referendum or anything of that nature.

So I filed two lawsuits. I filed a lawsuit in a Federal Court and that lawsuit pretty much dealt with you know the Voter Registration Act and I lost at the Federal Court level. But I did not appeal because first of all I didn't have the money and secondly, the issue was not necessarily, although the issue was the Voter's Right Act but the issue was that the Georgia legislature also should not have had the right to change the form of government during my administration. Not that they didn't have the constitutional authority to change the form of government, but I'm not during my administration.

We also filed a lawsuit in the Georgia Court System, and at the Superior Court level. I lost and I appealed to the Georgia Supreme Court where it is now and it's being taken under consideration and once again, we are only challenging the right for the Georgia legislature to change the form of government during my administration after I had gone in office because you know I had people voting for me based on the campaign we ran and the set of the circumstances in the charter.

And one of the things in the charter, we don't understand why the Justice Department did not take a very close look at this, is the charter states that, in part, that council and the Mayor, in the same oath of office at least that we will uphold the charter and other things in that charter, you know, the ordinances and et cetera during the ensuing term. Now, how can you uphold the charter, a new charter when you never was sworn in under the new charter; two different circumstances.

So that's where we are now. The Voter's Right Act definitely needs to be extended and reauthorized and then extended. That is extremely important.

This is just one case. This is my case but it is a personal situation that has cost me a lot of money, costing me a lot of money, paying for it myself and hopefully the Georgia Supreme Court is going to rule in my favor and I'll get my money back.

Secondly, we have individuals who voted for me questioning whether they should continue to vote or not because their vote didn't count. You know, and so one vote and one person kind of situation and they voted for the person they wanted to vote for. It has caused a lot of unnecessary problems in our community, emotional problems and other problems for people who was in support of our candidacy and it has not been a good three years from that standpoint.

So are there any questions of me before I have to take off? I'm sorry I have to do this.

MR. DAVIDSON: Yes, Mayor, I have a couple of questions.

Could you tell me how the Council is elected? Is it elected from districts or at large?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Districts.

MR. DAVIDSON: Districts.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Districts. And by the way, the Mayor and the Council are elected at the same time.

MR. DAVIDSON: And do I understand you to say that you were the first African American elected to the Mayorship in Milledgeville in 199 years and shortly after you were elected, the Council voted to abolish the strong Mayor system?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yes. They started working on it in nine months after -- well, they probably started thinking about it before then -- but they voted to recommend to the legislative delegation to change the form of government about nine or ten months after I was elected or went in office.

MR. DAVIDSON: In your opinion, was there a group or a person on the Council that took a leadership role in pushing for that change?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yes. I think it was a conspiracy from day one. From the time that I decided to run for Mayor and this is just my theory is, that the white community, individuals in the white community, knew that I had a 50 percent chance of winning this because of my background and experience of being in the legislature, running for Lieutenant Governor, a business person. We have a family business which is in funeral service, and I had been very much involved in the community so I had a good chance of winning this.

So I think it was somewhat of a conspiracy from the beginning, in case he does win, then we'll take away all of those powers from him and make him more of a figurehead which the Mayor is now pretty much a figurehead. We have a number, there are still responsibilities of the Mayor that doesn't make it truly a figurehead, a ceremony, but not the authority to carry that out. The charter is a very bad charter.

MR. DAVIDSON: During the campaign for your election, I believe you said that one of the candidates advocated a different form of government?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yes.

MR. DAVIDSON: One of the white candidates who was defeated?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Right.

MR. DAVIDSON: This was the challenger to the incumbent white --

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yes.

MR. DAVIDSON: -- candidate; is that right?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Right, and he was also, the incumbent lost in the General Election so the person that we're talking about was in the runoff with me.

MR. DAVIDSON: Okay.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: And one of the major topics and matter of fact, basically his only topic was or issue was a change in the form of government, but he lost.

MR. DAVIDSON: What was the primary reason or the reasons that were given by the incumbent Council once it was elected for changing the form of government other than the form of Mayorship?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Well, I think there were a number of reasons.

One of the reasons was they didn't like the Mayor. This particular Mayor and the extent I came in with an agenda. I was not a part of the good-old boy system and you have to understand to some degree that -- okay, on the Council there are six members, five of those members had been there, was in office, was re-elected or they didn't have opposition. There was only one new member on there. That new member had been in the administration or worked for the city for I don't know 15 or 20 years before she was fired. Okay. And so she ran for office so she knew a little bit about the strong Mayor form of government and et cetera.

So the primary reason in my opinion is that they did not like the fact that this African American Mayor had all of this, the same level of responsibility and powers that the other Mayors had. Here I am making the type of decisions that you make under a strong Mayor situation and they wanted to do like some of them had done before, instead of being policy makers, they wanted to be executors in the administration side of the house, and I would not allow that to happen.

MR. DAVIDSON: They didn't say that, I mean, they didn't say publicly that the reason that they wanted to change the form of Mayorship was because you were elected. They must have had some other reasons that they stated for --

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Well, their basic reason is that they just wanted to change to a manager form of government because they felt that would be a better form of government in carrying out the responsibilities, the day-to-day responsibilities of the city.

MR. ROGERS: I'd like to follow up on what Chandler just mentioned. What was vote of the Council that approved the change?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Unanimous.

MR. ROGERS: Was it a unanimous vote?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Right, yes.

MR. ROGERS: It was a unanimous vote.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Correct.

MR. ROGERS: And you said each of those members of Council elected by individual districts?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: And I am right in presuming that the African American members of the Council, three of the six, were elected from majority African Americans?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: You're absolutely correct, yes.

MR. ROGERS: But they had been on Council for years?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Two of them; well, one of them had been on for several years, maybe 12 or 13 years. One of them was in the second term and then one of them was in the first term.

MR. ROGERS: All right. So the bottom line argument to the Department of Justice and everybody is that they said listen, this is arguably race neutral.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Right. Absolutely.

MR. ROGERS: Essentially what we have here was a change in form of government that they argued takes place all the time and it's unfortunate that in this case you had to have been the person who's the victim of this change, but they said essentially no problem essentially as it related to race?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: Essentially that's what they came down with?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Basically, yes.

MR. ROGERS: It's fascinating to me because it's a classic case from your point of view and having run for office, and I understand exactly where you're coming from, it's sort of that classic notion of okay, I won playing by the rules. Now that I've won, now you change the rules which is a sort of a classic notion to how things work or play.

I had mentioned to you previously when we were talking that I was aware of a similar circumstance that occurred with respect to the Lieutenant Governor of Alabama who was elected I believe the same year I was elected back in 1998. And as soon as he was elected to office -- the Lieutenant Governor in Alabama essentially had the power position in the state in terms of legislation and what happened in terms of the agenda of the state. As soon as he was elected into office, he was stripped of all power as Lieutenant Governor.

In that case, he's white and he was a Republican who was elected into that position and was stripped of power by the Democratic legislation. And the question in that case was, I don't know that the Voting Rights Act claim arose as a basis for that, so I guess I was curious to some extent about how your Section Five claim was articulated, how you articulated the Section Five claim.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: How did I articulate it?

MR. ROGERS: Yes.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: And their response to it?

MR. ROGERS: How you in particular framed it as a Voting Rights Act issue in particular to the Department of Justice.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Okay. I understand. Well, we framed it in a couple of instances. One is that it was over -- and I'm not maybe using the exact word cause I haven't looked at this in quite awhile.

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: It's been about two years now. But you know, there was no referendum you know by the people to change this form of government because we went into the office with one set of circumstances, then it was changed. It was overthrown in election. The citizens didn't get a chance to speak to you know this issue and those kind of things. That was basically it.

MR. ROGERS: Okay. Thank you.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Okay.

SENATOR BROWN: Thank you Mayor.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Thank you very much. I hate to leave but I need to move on out. Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: I know you're getting ready to leave and I don't want to hold you more than a minute or so.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: That's okay.

MR. ROGERS: I am curious though. I wanted to get your own perspective. How far have things come so to speak in terms of Georgia in your perspective in terms of -- you mentioned and I am curious about this Senator -- you mentioned this -- that you have the largest contingent of African Americans who serve in the state legislature presumably as a percentage of any state in the country, but I am correct in presuming that they represent a majority African American districts or am I not correct in that assumption? Do you have African Americans here that represent in fact white citizens essentially or a majority of white districts here?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Well, I'm also the President of the Georgia Conference of Black Mayors. We have approximately 40 black mayors. I say that because they kind of change every so often on me.

MR. ROGERS: All right.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: But look at this way. I think we've come a long way in Georgia. But then again, maybe we haven't come as long as I alluded to. Okay. Out of the 40 black mayors, we may have two or three that represent majority white citizens. All of your large cities, Atlanta, Albany, Savannah. I'm not sure about Augusta now. We do have a black mayor in Augusta who was elected within the Council because the mayor resigned who happened to be a Republican going up to Washington to do some things. But all of your big city mayors except maybe Augusta because Augusta is a consolidated city. Augusta, what is that, Chatham County, not Chatham. Richmond County.

But we only have a couple of black mayors like myself who represent majority white citizens. Okay. Now, most, and I can't verify this, but I would think that most of the great majority of your city council and county commissioners which most cities and counties are by district, they represent majority white districts. Now, I didn't tell you that I ran, the first office I ran for when I came back to Georgia was the county commissioner's seat. The district I lived in was something like 75 percent white, and I missed winning that by about 68 votes. But it's very difficult for a black person to get elected in a Georgia white environment in Georgia unless you can get that black voter registration up to about -- what did we say, Robert, about 38 or 39 percent -- then you have a shot at it. That was the reason I wanted a Senate seat.

MR. ROGERS: Is that an assumption that you're carrying what, roughly 35 to 40 percent of the white vote?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Right.

MR. ROGERS: Is that what you had to carry.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yeah.

MR. ROGERS: You have to carry roughly --

MAYOR GRIFFIN: That's right.

MR. ROGERS: So in other words you can lose roughly 60 percent of the white vote as long as you carry roughly 35 to 40 percent of the white vote, you can win.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: And you get something like 90, 95 percent of the black vote too, yes.

MR. ROGERS: Yes.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: You had to get the black too then.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yeah.

MR. DAVIDSON: Okay. And you said that the majority of Commissioners in this state represent majority white districts.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: And Council persons.

MR. DAVIDSON: And Council persons.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Right. County Commissioners and city council persons. I would say and I couldn't put a percentage on it but I would say, I think I would be correct if I said 80 or 90 percent represent majority black districts. I'll put it this way, I do not know and I know a lot of elected officials. I do not know, personally I do not know a County Commissioner or a city council person who represent a majority white district.

MR. DAVIDSON: Okay. Okay. Again, I'm sorry I was hearing two different things. Now, you're saying that that's the majority of African Americans that serve as County Commissioners or council persons represent majority black districts --

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yes.

MR. DAVIDSON: -- not majority white districts?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yes. Okay.

MR. DAVIDSON: And you cannot think of an African American who represents a majority white district who is presently serving as a County Commissioner or a councilman?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Or City councilman.

MR. DAVIDSON: Okay. Okay.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: And when I served in the Senate, I was the only out of, I think at that time we had 13 African American I think. I'm not sure, 11 or 13. I was the only one that represented a majority white Senate district and in the house I think it was one over there, Keith Heard, at that time. And it's about the same thing now. I don't think -- do you have a black Representative in the Senate?

SENATOR BROWN: I think there may be two up on the House side.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: But not in the Senate. There's not one in the Senate, the Georgia Senate.

MR. DAVIDSON: Do you have any and this is concluding and I don't want to hold you up --

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Now, go right ahead. This is important. I can stay. Let's get your questions answered.

MR. DAVIDSON: I did want to get a sense because to begin the reauthorization of this Act is not going to take place for a number of years. The last reauthorization was a 25 year period. If I were to ask you to look in your own perspective at essentially Georgia 15 or 25 years from now, does that situation change? Do you have a situation here in Georgia in which African Americans can be elected essentially to represent white citizens here in majority white districts? Will that happen?

MAYOR GRIFFIN: I think it will as long as the Voter's Registration Act is in place. I think if we don't get reauthorization on that, we're going to see a significant decrease of black elected officials just in black districts. Okay. I think that we will see our Congressional, we are four black Congress persons now and I think we'll see that drop down to one, maybe two, but definitely down to one.

You know, this is really serious business. I know you all understand this and you heard, getting a lot of testimony, but this is really, really significant that we get this reauthorized. And I'm glad to see, Joe, I'm glad to see you on this Commission as a Republican, too. You know, I know you're African American and you're a Republican but sometime we all lose sight, we can lose sight of what's going on and see I'm a child of the Civil Rights years.

I went to Tuskegee back during the 60s and marched in Tuskegee, was on the march from Selman to Montgomery and so you know and I understand and appreciate where we have come from, but we still have a long ways to go and if we start taking away some of the remedies that are put in place to help try to make the field level, then we're going to be in tough shape and I really appreciate and understand what the Latinos are going for and the things that you talk about. It's absolutely ridiculous.

Now, you take the voter ID situation in Georgia. Let's assume that if the Justice Department approves that and I understand they're probably going to extend their deliberation until about another 60 days but let's assume that they do it on the 15th of this month and I run for office again. I won by 21 votes last time and the next election will be close also. With that voter ID situation, I probably will lose the election because we would have at least 21 black poor people, including white. This is not all about black now, would not be able to get the proper identification for a number of reasons.

One of them is birth certificates. In Georgia, you have to have a birth certificate to go to the Motor Vehicle office to get a driver's license and to get the ID. We have people in Georgia who don't have birth certificates. They were born way back when before they issued birth certificates.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you kindly, Mayor.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: Yes, sir.

MR. DAVIDSON: And I know you need to go now but I appreciate it.

MAYOR GRIFFIN: All right. If you have any additional questions, I'll be glad to stay to answer those because this is important.

SENATOR BROWN: Any more questions?

MR. DAVIDSON: I think that pretty well exhausts my questions, Mayor. Thank you very much.

SENATOR BROWN: I also thank you, Mayor, for taking the time to join us. Before the next speaker, I also want to give Dr. Johnny Vaughn an opportunity -- he's also going to be a presenter and give him an opportunity just to identify himself and then proceed.

MR. VAUGHN: I'm Johnny Vaughn from Dublin, Georgia. I am the President of District One Voter's Association. We are presently chartered in five middle Georgia counties.

MR. LEVITAS: Good afternoon. I want to echo the comments of the previous panelists and thank the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights for organizing this hearing, Senator Brown for bringing us all together and especially to you Lieutenant Governor Rogers for traveling so far to be here.

I want to do a number of things today, offer some brief comments about the significance of the Voting Rights Act, highlight specifically the issue of municipalities and counties here in Georgia utilizing at large voting as a deliberate mechanism to dilute the effectiveness of the minority community in seeking political representation. I want to comment on the direct relationship between Section Five enforcement here in Georgia and the need to restore or repair some of the original intent of Section Five of the Voting Rights Act as we approach renewal and also summarize overall some larger recommendations for what we at the American Civil Liberties Union Voting Rights Act believe Congress should do. But let me first begin with a brief story.

I moved to Georgia in 1989 to work for a nonprofit civil rights organization whose mission was to assist people who were victims of racial violence and I received a phone call at the office one day from some folks who lived not too far from here, about an hour south of here, from Early County from the town of Blakeley and they told me in quite frank terms that they needed help because the Ku Klux Klan was running the fire department in their town and had what they believed was a habit of letting homes in the black community burn for an unexcusably long period of time before they intervened. We investigated. To make a very long story short, we interviewed members of the Klan who provided to us and to me personally the membership records of the Klanmen; we subpoenaed subject to the Federal District Court Civil Rights lawsuit filed in the Southern District of Georgia, the telephone records of the firechief and we proved in fact that the city firechief, a man by the name of Franklin Brown, was indeed a dues paying member of the Ku Klux Klan, that he had hired other Klan members to run and worked in the Fire Department and what was notable about this case was that the city put on an extraordinarily vigorous defense and retained none other than the President of the Georgia Trial Lawyers Association to defend the city and during depositions, one in which I was present, during a break in depositions, the President of the Georgia Trial Lawyers turned to our counsel and said well, the way I see it the black folks have the NAACP and the white folks have the Klan and that's about equal.

The city vigorously defended this gentleman Franklin Brown until the telephone records that we produced by way of subpoena proved they had the unfortunate habit of making frequent phone calls to the state headquarters of the invisible empire Knights of the Ku Klux Klan and their defense fell apart. The result was the Klan was purged from the Fire Department and as part of that case, the American Civil Liberties Union through cooperating attorney, Christopher Coates, who now works as the Deputy Chief of the voting section in Washington of the Civil Rights Division created single member districts int he City of Blakeley.

So we not only succeeded in purging the city of the Klan running the fire department but in a political change which resulted in the creation of black representation on the city council. I also mention that Blakeley happens to be the hometown of former Secretary of Health and Human Services Lewis Sullivan who took an interest in this situation. Now, this was admittedly some years ago, 1990, but it was not 1970. It was not 1950. This was in the modern era here in the State of Georgia, and so I want to kind of begin by highlighting the fact that clearly the Voting Rights Act has been one of the most successful pieces of Civil Rights legislation ever passed. You've heard as members of the Commission I know in previous places the statistics that at the time of its passage, there were only about 300 African American elected officials throughout the nation, virtually none in the south. Today there are more 9100 black elected officials nationwide, 43 of whom serve in Congress and important to note if you subtract the 43 from the 9100, I believe its actually quite higher than 9100 but the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies is doing an update of the data. If you subtract the 43 from the 9100, you still have more than 9000 elected officials such as yourself or County Commissioners or Mayors or State Senators such as Senator Brown here and others and point of fact, one of the greatest if not the greatest impact of the Voting Rights Act has actually been at the local level, at the county level, at the municipal level. We sometimes get distracted by the big ticket items of federal representation and big fights over U.S. Congressional redistricting but really one has to focus on the light and the tempo of political change as it affects people where they live and work in places like Americus and places like Milledgeville.

Toward that end, I want to share with you some examples of some of the litigation that our office has brought. The Voting Rights project of the ACLU has only four full-time attorneys, eight full-time staff. I am not one of the attorneys. And we have filed since 1982 since the last reauthorization more than 300 separate legal actions to enforce the 1965 Voting Rights Act. Considerably more than the three dozen or so attorneys of the U.S. Department of Justice voting section. Considerably more legal actions that the entire U.S. Department of Justice.

So the first point I want to bring out is that as we look at the significance of the Voting Rights Act and its impact, we have to realize that the overwhelming bulk of enforcement and the burden and cost of that enforcement has fallen to private organizations like the ACLU, like MALDEF, like the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights under law, like the NAACP Legal Defense Fund and others. We have --

MR. ROBERTS: Let me interrupt you for a second?

MR. LEVITAS: Yes.

MR. ROBERTS: What percentage of those cases are Section Five or Section Two cases?

MR. LEVITAS: I don't have that specific breakdown right now, but I do have some additional data which we will present to you but many of them involve both Section Two and Section Five claims and clearly, I mean, of the 300 I would say there are at least 150 or so involve Section Five claims, Section Five enforcement actions. So what I'm speaking about here in this litigation is directly relevant to reauthorization.

As we know Section Two is a permanent provision and does not expire. Unlike MULDEF, which has brought litigation under the language minority provision, Section 203, that's not something that we have specialized in and I know the panel has heard previous testimony about this in other places, but it is clear from recent surveys that close to half of all the Section 203 jurisdictions in the country, and there are 466 of them locally, at least half of them are out of compliance with the mandate of the law. And that data that has been presented previously and will be presented additionally I'm sure. But --

MR. ROBERTS: But you said you all had not filed Section 203 --

MR. LEVITAS: Section 203 enforcement action. So these 300 cases that I'm describing are a mixture of Section Two and Section Five cases, the bulk of whom have been in the south. Most recently, many of them have been from your part of the country in the west and South Dakota, particularly, where since 1995, we have filed seven cases on behalf of native American voters, which we have won five. And one is on appeal and the seventh is pending. But to not get too far afield and to zero on here in Georgia, and this is simply data from 1974 to 1990, we sued 57 counties in Georgia. And Georgia has 159 counties, so to sue 57 of them in order to force the change from at large voting to single member districts and we sued 40 cities in 41 cases from 1974 to 1990. I don't know exactly how many municipalities there are in the state, but those are a lot of cases and I would argue that it was only if the action of bringing such a large volume of cases were we able to voluntarily force compliance upon the balance of the remaining jurisdictions but as was pointed out by the previous testimony just looking at the City of Milledgeville, the creation of those six single member districts were the product of a lawsuit brought by the ACLU in 1983. And it resulted in a consent decree which created the single member districts.

But I want to back up a little bit and highlight a dynamic here which does follow a bit on the previous testimony, that of the majority line jurisdictions changing the rules in the middle of the game specifically with the intent of depriving minority voters of access to political power when they see the tools like the Voting Rights Act enable them to have more of a voice.

And I'll use a brief example that is outside of Georgia, but there are other examples relative to Georgia I'll touch on, but this is a case that we brought in Edgefield County, South Carolina. It went all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court. The lawyers here and the litigators here are familiar with it, McCain v. Lybrand. I won't bore you with the disposition on the history of Edgefield County but if one reads any history of reconstruction in the State of South Carolina, the descriptions of the mob actions, the terrorism, the lynching and the unbelievable racial violence in Edgefield County will really make your blood run cold. This was a place where mobs of armed white people were in paramilitary brigades, forget about the Ku Klux Klan, pre-dating the formation of the clan, to murder black voters and freed slaves in scores to intimidate them from going to the polls in the presidential elections during the entire period of reconstruction. It was the site of some of the most vicious racial violence.

And it would come as no surprise that in 1966 after the Voting Rights Act was passed, the white power structure of Edgefield County went from single member districts to at large voting, specifically for the purpose of depriving the large African American population there from accessing the political process. This is a county which is 50 percent black. So there were single member districts, never a black person serving, the Voting Rights Act is passed, the county fathers turn around and vote into at large voting. We filed a lawsuit in 1980 and after four years of litigation, five single members districts were created and black candidates won three Council seats and ultimately in 1987 even though the defendants vigorously contested it, we finally won our attorney's fees in that case and today Edgefield County is tremendously transformed. The chair of the County Commission there is African American. The City Manager is African American. The City Manager in Edgefield County had been the leading defendant in a libel case brought against him by the school board because in his grassroots efforts to promote equal opportunity in the school, he held meetings and rallies where he criticized such things such as the playing of Dixie during high school athletic events, and in response to this, the county sued this gentleman for libel. And as an irony, he ended up, Mr. McCain, he ended up being actually the County Manager and one of his allies became the Chairman of the County Commission.

We have seen these kinds of things time and time again in Georgia. In Putnam County, we filed suit to challenge at large school board and County Commission elections.

In 1978, following the 1982 election under a new redistricting plan a total of seven African Americans were elected to three governing bodies.

In 1984, we brought suit challenging at large voting in Mitchell County, and the Board of Commissioners entered into a consent decree. Five single member districts were created, of which two were majority black and two African Americans were elected to the Commission. Those were the first African Americans elected in that century to the Mitchell County Commission, so this is not again a phenomena of something happening in the 1960s or the 1970s.

It was not until 1984 that you see a single African American being elected to the position of county government in a place like Mitchell County.

Some of these counties had substantial black population. In Boddie v. Hull, we filed a lawsuit in 1982 challenging at large elections for the Baldwin County Commission and the Board of Education. This is a county which is more than 37 percent African American. No African American had ever served on the Board of Commissioners. There had only been one African American serving on the Board of Education. The case was resolved with the creation of two majority black districts.

In 1983, we filed a lawsuit challenging at large voting in Johnson County, both for the Board of Commissioners and the Wrightsville City Council, and Wrightsville I might mention in the early 1980s for those of us who are native Georgians might remember there was a considerable amount of Klan activity. There was racial violence. The Klan was confronting black children as they would get off the school bus. Klan members were sued and found guilty of criminal violations of peoples' Federally protected civil rights and monetary judgments entered against them. So the climate in Wrightsville was not one of racial harmony, and the black population of Wrightsville was 38 percent African American. Despite 31 percent African American population in the city and the county, no black person had ever served on either governing body. Wrightsville also had a unique, I would say, situation. It was one of a few jurisdictions in the state where the school board was appointed by the grand jury, and the local grand jurys were all white at that time. We also sued under the Georgia Constitution, I mean this was a constitutional provision that allowed the appointment of school board members by grand juries. And we also sued to challenge that.

As a result of all this litigation, the city agreed to create three single member districts, including one majority black district, which for the first time in the history of Johnson County resulted in an election of an African American.

Now, these problems were not limited simply to small towns or rural communities. In 1983, we became engaged in efforts to encourage the City of Decatur which was then and still is probably the second largest metropolitan area, the second largest city in metropolitan Atlanta, to change from an at large election system to single member districts. We didn't have to sue. Ultimately, the local legislative delegation saw the handwriting on the wall, and they created a plan which ultimately resulted in a two-seat city Commissioner district which was majority African American and another two-seat city Commission district which was white.

I want to turn you now to some more recent examples. This is not just a phenomena from the early 1980s, and looking at the record that we need to create and support the call for reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act, we should look at present day examples, such has been cited by my colleague from MULDEF here.

In 1993, we brought suit on behalf of the residents of Terrell County, Georgia. Forty percent of them are African American. Both the County Commission and the Board of Education have five members each and only one African American has ever been elected to the County Commission, and there has never been more than one African American serving on the school board. Now, I don't have the statistics here right in front of me, but I'm sure as an elected official who's been involved in questions of public education, you know that it's axiomatic that the public school population tends to be disproportionately minority to the overall population. So if you're talking about a 40 percent African American population in the county as a rock figure, it wouldn't surprise me if 60 percent of the children in the school district would be black and yet you only have one African American serving on the school board.

The litigation ultimately was brought. It was settled and a racially fair plan was adopted.

In 1994, the ACLU brought suit in Soperton, Georgia which resulted in the creation of equal populace districts with African American majorities in two of the five districts. Prior to bringing this suit, there was a deviation of as much as 46 percent between districts. That means that if you had a you know a one county Commission district with a thousand people, you can have another county Commission district with 1,460 people with that being the majority black district so that you were essentially packing African Americans in one district instead of spreading those voters fairly around to allow for greater African American representation.

Finally, I mean, I could go on. I don't want to bore you, but just finally, in 1996, we brought suit against the City of Douglasville, which is now part of the growing Atlanta kind of metropolitan area if you will. It sits to the west of Atlanta. And for the city's failure to comply with Section Five by enacting a series of annexations that resulted in the severe malapportionment of city election districts. Again, the significance of the Voting Rights Act, you know, being at all levels, but when you look at Section Five with pre-clearance and you look at what local officials do, the majority white community, they see a growing African American population. Oftentimes, their solution to that is to look to the white part of the county so they can then annex that and increase the population and thereby dilute the potential political influence of black voters. This is what was going on in Douglasville. We brought suit. The litigation ultimately resulted in the protection of two of the majority minority districts that were there.

Let me conclude by offering some broader comments about the Voter Right E-bill and then what we need to see in terms of change.

So I just want to highlight you know for the purposes of the record, and I know that some panelists have this but can share it with you; that is, the copy of the letter that was sent by the ACLU and others on behalf of 25 different organizations to the U.S. Justice Department urging them to not pre-clear this photo identification bill. Some of the concerns have previously been expressed, but you know, under Section Five, it is the jurisdiction that bears the burden of proof to show that the change is not retrogressive and yet somehow we've entered into this Alice in Wonderland world where these jurisdictions now submit changes for pre-clearance and don't even bother to present evidence that recognizes their obligation to bear the burden of proof that they're not entering into a discriminatory voting change.

We have 159 counties in Georgia, only 100 Department of Motor Vehicle Service Centers, so that leaves 59 counties without a Department of Motor Vehicle Service Center and would you believe it, Mr. Rogers, the City of Atlanta does not have a single Department of Motor Vehicle Service Center within the city limits of Atlanta. Did the State of Georgia provide a racial or demographic analysis of the population served by the 100 Department of Motor Vehicle Service Centers to show that it was non-retrogressive to force people to go and get this photo ID. Absolutely not. Did the State of --

MR. ROGERS: You're saying that the City of Atlanta does not have a Motor Vehicle Department?

MR. LEVITAS: A county, that's right, Fulton County has one. But that Motor Vehicle Service Center is not located within the city limits of the City of Atlanta. They recently announced their intention to open a service bureau in the city, but there is not currently a -- cause it's organized by county -- and that one is in Fulton County, but it's not within the City of Atlanta.

And of course, I think you might have heard the statistics already, African Americans in Georgia according to the U.S. Census are five times less likely to have access to a motor vehicle, which means they're less likely to have a driver's license, even though the law, the legislation provides for a free photo ID, you have to sign an affidavit where you declare yourself a pauper. You have to humiliate yourself by declaring yourself a pauper in order to qualify for the free photo ID and if you don't want to humiliate yourself, you have to pay what is it $8.00 or $10.00 for the non-driver's license ID which we will argue in Court that if the DOJ does not pre-clear it, it is nothing more than the equivalent of a modern day poll

Finally, if my mother was serving as a poll watcher and I walked into the polling place as a local election official and I walked into the polling place without my photo ID and she knew who I was, she would have to deny me the opportunity to vote under that law if I didn't have an approved form of voter identification. We contend that that would be a violation of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, specifically provision 1971B, which says that no voter can be denied the opportunity to register or vote based on an immaterial defect in the voter registration or election process, meaning, it used to be the old trick. You know, if you didn't sign in black ink, we wouldn't accept your voter registration or you know some other ruse to throw out the registration or disqualify the voter. That was why the Civil Rights Act contained that provision.

So state legislators who enacted this bill had this information in front of them. They knew that they were passing legislation which was going to be challenged as racially discriminatory. There was a strong record made at the time of racially biased concerns and yet they went forward.

In closing, let me highlight. In 1982, litigation that we brought where we represented members of the Georgia Legislative Black Caucus. It was a Section Five issue and they had intervened in a pre-clearance lawsuit filed by the state seeking approval of the Congressional Reapportionment Plan in 1982. And at that time, Congressman John Lewis was not serving in the United States Congress and the Congressional redistricting plan that was drawn was drawn to create a majority black district in the City of Atlanta, Georgia U.S. District Five, in which John Lewis was going to run. During the redistricting process an incumbent U.S. Congressman by the name of Joe Matt Wilson declared publicly and on the record, I'm not going to draw a Negro District and he did not use the word Negro.

The U.S. Federal District Court in reviewing this made the unusual finding (quote), "Representative Joe Matt Wilson is a racist". In overturning the original plan and in embracing ultimately the plan in which he did create a majority black district which did allow that John Lewis will be elected. Now, we want to highlight that because this is a case where you have a redistricting plan, when you have clear evidence of racially discriminatory intent, clear evidence of racial bias in the redistricting process but there are no African American representatives serving in that particular area, and so you are not by failing to draw the majority black district, you're technically not hurting the black community. You are not retrogressing them, right. Because they had no black representatives in that particular -- there were African Americans I believe serving in Congress at the time -- but you weren't lowering the total number of African Americans so you weren't putting them in a retrogressive position.

Wisely, the U.S. Department of Justice intervened. Wisely, the Courts upheld our legal intervention and said basically that there was racially discriminatory intent and where you have racially discriminatory intent, you should not pre-clear such a plan.

John Lewis was elected to Congress from that majority black district and tying into something that you had been discussing earlier what you end up with today is a situation where Congressman Lewis can win in that district with substantially fewer African American voters.

But as was stated earlier, the overwhelming majority, and we can get these numbers for the panel if they would like, of African American representatives at the state and county municipal level here in Georgia serve from majority minority districts. Simply put, in the southern United States today, you cannot get elected to serve at the municipal county or state level without being from a majority black district you know overall in the majority; in as place as cultured and supposedly enlightened as Charleston County, South Carolina, the location of the Spiledo (Phonetically) Arts Festival and everything else.

The Federal District Court has entered findings which show in 2002 that 90 percent of white voters vote white and 90 percent, 85 percent of black voters vote black. The level of racially pulverized voting in the modern era in the south in so many places is so high as to virtually preclude the possibility of black political success without either a) a majority black district or without either b) the long term value of incumbency as voters you know get to know you over time. I point to Busby v. Smith. This case that I mentioned in which the finding was made that Representative Joe Mack Wilson was a racist because it ties directly to one of the most important changes we need in the reauthorization and that is the repair of the Bossier Parish decision coming out of Louisiana where you had a 12-member school board all white, a 20 percent black population in 1990, the ability to add two African Americans to that school board so that there could be some black representation but because no African Americans had ever served on that school board, it wasn't retrogressive to keep that school board all white. But there was evidence of racial intent, so thankfully the U.S. Justice Department interposed an objection and said this is not right. There is racially discriminatory intent here even though there isn't retrogression per se and do you know that the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in that case in a five, four decision that because there was not an intent to retrogress, right, you couldn't intend to make things any worse for black people because they didn't have any black representation to begin with so that decision should be pre-cleared.

So we're now faced with the truly bizarre and nonsensible proposition that when whites or blacks, whoever they might be, in control and in political power act with deliberately discriminatory intent, as long as they don't make things worse for minority voters, those changes should be pre-cleared. Yet that --

MR. GREENBAUM: Excuse me one second, please?

MR. LEVITAS: Yes.

MR. GREENBAUM: Is that one of the cases you handled?

MR. LEVITAS: Yes.

MR. GREENBAUM: You argued that case?

MR. LEVITAS: I did not argue in Court but I wrote the brief for the District Court when I was at the Justice Department.

And so just to conclude, if that logic had been reigning today, Congressman John Lewis, one of the stalwarts of the Civil Rights movement, one of the most articulate spokespersons in favor of these issues, would likely not be an elected Federal official.

There are other Supreme Court decisions which need to be repaired. Section 203 needs to be reauthorized. You asked about the timeframe. I would argue that just as Congress in a bipartisan fashion with strong Republican involvement in the last reauthorization did so for 25 years, Section Five and Section 203 should be reauthorized again for 25 years. James Sensinbrier (Phonetically), a Republican of Wisconsin, has indicated that it's his intent but the devil will be in the proverbial details.

And in closing, I apologize for taking so much time. I would close by citing the remarks of Dr. Martin Luther King upon his addressing President Lyndon Johnson declared in the wake of bloody Sunday, March 7th, 1965, that he would pursue a strong Voting Rights Act and that we as a nation should overcome.

As Dr. Martin Luther King said of that commitment it was indeed a shining moment in the conscience of man and that shining moment, it's our obligation to continue to illuminate it.

Thank you very much.

MR. LEVITAS: Pardon me?

MR. DAVIDSON: How close are you working on investigative information?

MR. LEVITAS: Well, we're working very closely. It's a question of timing and time table but everything that I have cited, these individual cases, the records, the comprehensive data, that will all be provided to President Davidson and to Mr. Greenbaum and the Commission.

MR. DAVIDSON: Will the comments that you have made today be available to us in hard copy?

MR. LEVITAS: I can try and do that for you, yes.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

SENATOR BROWN: Any other questions?

MR. ROGERS: Actually, I do have some other questions. Can we do that now? Are we okay in timing now or do we want to go forward with Johnny in terms of his statement?

SENATOR BROWN: Either way. If you want to go directly to him? Yeah, let's go directly with him and then we'll move to --

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. Can you give me your last name again?

MS. TALLMAN: T-A-L-L-M-A-N.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you. First of all, I'm delighted with your testimony. It's remarkable. Thank you kindly.

I had several questions. What is the percentage of the Latino population that exists here in Georgia?

MS. TALLMAN: Six percent.

MR. ROGERS: Six percent. Ten years ago, you were roughly two percent of the state's population.

MS. TALLMAN: I believe there's been a 400 percent increase in the last five years.

MR. ROGERS: What percentage of those account for people who are legally versus illegally?

MS. TALLMAN: It's difficult to say because there isn't anything that's been done -- it's very difficult to measure the Latino population and there hasn't been any studies in Georgia that's attempted to do that. I do though, I'm uncertain.

MR. ROGERS: I've seen a range of numbers, and I don't know what they are but I'm hearing that the numbers can be as high as 40 percent or so. And I don't know about this region in particular, but I do know that you've had a huge increase in particular of Mexican immigrants to the United States who have made Georgia and portions of the south increasingly home, substantial portions of which are not necessarily here documented or illegally in the United States.

MS. TALLMAN: Sure.

MR. ROGERS: But you're not sure exactly what that number is. I heard the number may be as high as 40 percent but I don't know.

MS. TALLMAN: Well, let me give to you these statistics.

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MS. TALLMAN: And we do have regular contact with the Mexican Consulate and I do know that the Mexican Consulate has a very different idea of how many people may actually be living in Georgia who are not, and we do believe that the numbers change every single day. And we are halfway through the last census so the last numbers we have aren't completely accurate to date, even though we think that they weren't accurate to begin with. I believe it's estimated that there are approximately 300,000 Latinos living in Georgia. However, some people have estimated that it might be double that, and we do know that there are particular counties and cities that have extremely large population of Latinos. In Dalton, Georgia is a perfect example of that where we believe about 20 percent was the last given statistics on the population of that particular community. We believe it's even more than the 20 percent.

And one example of how we know that the numbers are large and that the Secretary of State's Office is concerned with that in regards to Section 203 is that even though Georgia does not have one single Section 203 jurisdiction currently and that's why there are no Section 203 lawsuits in this part of the country. The Secretary of State's did a pilot project in Dalton where they did use ballots i n Spanish and English and I believe largely in preparation for perhaps a Section 203 jurisdiction in Georgia with h next census.

We also know that the Carolinas and Alabama do not have Section 203 jurisdiction. The last census, my jurisdiction consists of 11 states from Arkansas to Florida up to Maryland. Within that jurisdiction, there were only two counties in the southeast that were added as Section 203 jurisdictions. One was Montgomery County, Maryland and the other I believe was Broward County, Florida. So with the exponential growth of our community, we do believe there are going to be a number of Section 203 jurisdictions added, assuming that we get reauthorization in the next census and you know some Secretary of State offices are already thinking of that, are moving towards that.

It becomes even more critical as we look at cases of registration pending in Congress in regards to immigration reform or special populations with immigration reform with the agricultural sector, or our children, the Dream Act. And jobs under the Dream Act and also to some legislation that is currently, that's pending that has been introduced -- assuming that we get immigration reform any time in the near future, Section 203 is going to be extremely critical to preserving --

MR. ROGERS: You mean, amnesty essentially opening up. Okay, amnesty provisions that allow for folks who are illegally to become citizens?

MS. TALLMAN: Correct.

MR. ROGERS: Okay.

MS. TALLMAN: And even assuming that we don't have comprehensive immigration reform we just know that there will be immigrants who are currently here, unlawfully or not who will find some means whether it's through family sponsorship or employment sponsorship, as difficult as it may be for the majority of these immigrants, we will be looking at them eventually getting on a path towards becoming United States citizens. So certainly, Section 203 is going to be an issue for many, many years to come as our immigrant population continues to increase and grow in the southeast.

MR. ROGERS: And I understand some groups take the position and I don't know if all of them take the position. Do you all take the position that people who are here illegally in the United States should be able to vote?

MS. TALLMAN: We have not taken a formal position although we are quite aware of the issues that have been, particularly out in New York City of the noncitizen voting. Certainly, it's something that we continue to look at and an important issue for everyone to be looking at and addressing and we know that there has been a number of resolutions that there are -- Tacoma Park, Maryland is a perfect example of how individuals are allowed in specific elections to vote who are not citizens. And that's just a recognition that people are being taxed and aren't being represented, because we do know that there's a good majority of our Latino population that pays some type of taxes. And they do because of a case that MULDEF litigated that went to the Supreme Court in 1982, have children in schools so certainly school boards is something that the movement towards allowing for at least municipal or school board voting.

MR. ROGERS: You all have not taken a position yet on that?

MS. TALLMAN: Not taken a formal position.

MR. LEVITAS: If I could add Mr. Rogers, a historical perspective it sometimes quite interesting on this issue because you know there was a time when many places throughout the United States not only allowed noncitizen voting but political officials vigorously encouraged it that that is because in the late 19th Century with the large population of immigrants it was very much in the interest of political losses, for want of a better term, --

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MR. LEVITAS: -- in urban areas, like Chicago and New York and other places, --

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MR. LEVITAS: -- to encourage these various immigrant and ethnic communities to vote and particularly to vote locally, never really in Federal elections, but to vote locally and the trend against noncitizen voting in local elections according to the people who are experts on this issue, coincided very directly with anti-German sentiment during World War I and you saw a dramatic decline and a repeal of noncitizen voting in local elections, but it's funny today it's kind of a hot button political issue, noncitizen voting, where people stand on it, but in the past it was something that was actually much more of kind of a mainstream initiative. And the point that's made about even if people are here on an undocumented basis, we still have the 14th Amendment to the Constitution which guarantees citizenship to persons born within these United States and so if you have adult parents who come here be it illegally and convert the children here who are in the school system, what are the consequences of the disengagement of those parents in a school board situation where they might want to become involved in decisions that directly affect their children.

MR. ROGERS: Sure. Well, --

MS. TALLMAN: And there are an estimated 1.3 million U.S. citizens born to undocumented parents.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. Very familiar with the issue.

I have one last question. I just wanted to get your sense of -- you all describe it particular as a chilling process essentially. You essentially say okay, to the extent that we're required to come down and provide you with kind of information that is a chilling effect essentially on us voting, in effect, and would you describe that in particular. It's one thing to state that, but I think for purposes of our developing the record, it would be much more helpful to have, if you will as succinctly as possible a statement about what the nature of that chill is and how that takes place.

MS. TALLMAN: Well, I'd like to --

MR. ROGERS: I mean, basically what one might argue is, you don't have anything to worry about, why in the world would it be chilling to you at all?

MS. TALLMAN: I'd like to take it one step back if I may before we get to that point and that's just the fact that only Latinos were challenged based on U.S. citizenship, and the way I described this with the State Election Board is when you identify people solely based on their last name and only challenge them, nobody else. We know there are undocumented people here who are not Latinos, yet this is the only thing that we've seen. When I testified before the State Election Board, I said you know we have a name for that and that's call racial profiling, and we don't allow it in criminal law and we can't allow it in our election process either. When you identify individuals solely because of their heritage for the purpose of challenging the right that they have been given by virtue of being a U.S. citizen and that in and of itself was from, to have happened and then to have been given credit by the Registrar's Office as something that's valid that should warrant going on further with the first thing, and I think that shouldn't have happened. But when you get to the point where --

MR. ROGERS: Let me interrupt you.

MS. TALLMAN: Sure.

MR. ROGERS: Cause I want to play a little bit of a devil's advocate because I want to ask you the question in another way. If you know that you have a substantial portion of people who are illegally in the United States who are participating in elections and you know that those folks who are participating in elections are largely of Latino descent and you guesstimate that number is as much as 90 percent or so of the folks that are in the area doing that, how else are you able to determine whether or not the folks are or are not here in fact, in other words, how are you able to make the challenge except by the basis of a person's last name? How else can you do it?

MS. TALLMAN: That's the same argument --

MR. ROGERS: If you were allowed under the Constitution to make the challenge, how else are you able to make the challenge?

MS. TALLMAN: There's a reason why we have burdens, we have burdens of proof. We have standards. We have procedures. There's a reason why we have those. It's guaranteed in the United States Constitution. It's due process. If an individual is here and has a constitutional right to vote and there's a due process by which people must follow, the state officials must follow prior to depriving someone of the ability to vote, and there is a procedure set up in Georgia. There are two procedures set up depending on the circumstances. The burden is on the person making the challenge and in these particular instances they were never held to any burden. All they had to do was request a list, make a challenge to two-thirds of those individuals and say it's based on U.S. citizenship. They never had to provide anything, never have to say anything, never have to swear or attest to anything -- individuals who have fought hard for the right to vote and voted time and time again, who've always been nothing but U.S. citizens, in particular that have been impacted by what transpired. It was a huge impact on them for them to have to prove that they are U.S. citizenships because somebody down the street decided that their last name was reason enough to doubt their Constitution. The Constitution would guarantee the right, and that had a huge impact on those communities. The individuals in the community were challenged, were fearful that this may transfer into other areas of their life. They felt harassed and singled out which --

MR. ROGERS: What do you mean by transfer into other areas of their life?

MS. TALLMAN: That they may be more susceptible to harassment at work because they're Latinos or at school -- their kids at school -- because they've been identified as Latino and different and held to a different standard. If an individual were to request a list of registered voters and decided that they were going to identify and we can identify people by surname in regards to ethnic or racial heritage. If they decided that they were going to go down a list and we know that there are Canadians who are here undocumented, if they decided to try to identify all of the Canadians on that list and would challenge them solely based on their name, for some reason I think it's sometimes difficult to articulate and sometimes difficult for people to understand that identifying someone simply because of their last name is what we call racial profiling and especially in regards to a constitutional guaranteed right, it's extremely offensible and extremely chilling.

And in the particular instance of Long County, we know that only ten people out of 64 registered Latino voters actually voted in the primary. Those numbers in and of themselves without obtaining any voter information is quite significant and quite alarming. And I don't know that we'll ever know completely the chilling effect that it's had but certainly the individuals of those communities feel like they were singled out simply because of who they are and where they came from.

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MS. TALLMAN: And who knows what type of impact it will have for decades to come in regards to the U.S. citizens that reside in those particular jurisdictions. And we're really afraid of the copy-catting as well, and we do know that in this work -- I opened the office three years ago and we are not short on work, and I would constantly have to prioritize but one thing that we have noticed is whether it's in election protection issues or it's in employment discrimination issues or it's in racial profiling by law enforcement agencies, immigration enforcement by law enforcement agencies, we know that once something happens in one place in the south, we know that it's going to happen in other places in the south unless the message is sent by way of a state official coming down and saying no this is wrong or maybe by a court ruling because certainly when one county is able to do things one way, we know that it is seen in other places especially if the individuals get away with what is happening.

One of the things I told the State Election Board that's so important because one member of the Board was talking about election fraud and the likelihood of a documented individual person committing election fraud. One, we do not have any documented incidents of election fraud and we know that there have been some incidents that have been incidents that we can count on one hand that were brought to the attention to the Secretary of State and the State Election Board but there have been no findings to support them.

But even if we had findings of election fraud, what becomes so important that we remember that we have to do in this process is preserve the process that has been established because preserving the process preserves the right of everyone who is eligible to vote to vote. In my organization and the organizations like mine are here to ensure that that process is preserved so that the people who fought hard to obtain the right to vote continue to have that right to vote and that for the future of individuals who might be here who are not U.S. citizens or they become U.S. citizens, they have the ability to equally access their right to vote.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you.

MS. TALLMAN: Thank you.

MR. DAVIDSON: I'd just like to ask I guess one, possibly two, questions to you.

MS. TALLMAN: Certainly.

MR. DAVIDSON: I'm correct, aren't I, in understanding you to say that in Long County and in Atkinson County, there were no challenges made to voters aside from those with a Hispanic surname?

MS. TALLMAN: Correct.

MR. DAVIDSON: And this was in the 2004 election?

MS. TALLMAN: That's correct.

MR. DAVIDSON: Do you have any idea of whether the people who asked for and obtained those lists of Spanish-surnamed voters, who they were or was it an organized group, or was it some organization that took it upon themselves to enforce election integrity?

MS. TALLMAN: We do have that information but I don't know that I have it readily available. I do know in Atkinson County that there were three individuals and they were individuals who were I believe elected officials.

MR. DAVIDSON: I'm sorry. They were individuals who?

MS. TALLMAN: Who were elected officials who had been elected to some type of office.

In the Long County matter, I believe they were individuals that were running for office who were defeated in the primary and that's my best recollection. And I apologize that --

MR. DAVIDSON: That's okay.

MS. TALLMAN: -- but we can provide information.

MR. DAVIDSON: Okay. And my last question is the one that I asked Mr. Levitas; will we have access to a printed copy of your testimony here today?

MS. TALLMAN: I will provide a summary fashion of it.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: You know, I'm going to ask you the same general question that I asked previously cause I am curious about your perspective. Here in south, here in Georgia, how long have you been here did you say you'd been?

MS. TALLMAN: I've just been here for three years. I came here when I opened my southern office.

MR. ROGERS: Where did you come from?

MS. TALLMAN: I came from the mid-west.

MR. ROGERS: Mid-west; you were up in Ohio or some place?

MS. TALLMAN: I was last in Minneapolis.

MR. ROGERS: Minneapolis and you had just left there.

And you moved back here, Daniel, is that correct? You moved back to Georgia you said?

MR. LEVITAS: No, the first time I came here was in 1989. So I've been here for 16 years.

MR. ROGERS: For 16 years.

MR. LEVITAS: And prior to that I was in Iowa for eight years, Michigan and then New York.

MR. ROGERS: You briefly talked a bit toward the end of your testimony about essentially the perspective on John Lewis and whether or not he would have been elected here or not.

I did want to get some perspective from you about that. You mentioned obviously a number of cases in and of themselves as we can tell from your testimony was very helpful. In terms of a general perception about essentially the voters crossing the lines, voting in various fashions.

MR. LEVITAS: Right.

MR. ROGERS: You essentially indicated the blacks, 90 percent of blacks were voting for blacks and 90 percent of whites were voting for whites. That seemed to be a little bit different from the testimony as articulated by the Mayor who seemed to indicate and Senator did I hear you to state that roughly, you roughly need roughly 40 percent or so of whites to vote for you in order to succeed. Are those roughly the margins that are generally existing for African Americans who run for office in Georgia? Can you expect if you were a good candidate in Georgia running for public office to receive roughly 35 or 40 percent of the white vote or is it lower?

SENATOR BROWN: It varies. It's probably lower, but we have somewhat of a unique situation here in Georgia in that we do while we on legislative districts and city council districts and you know other local districts have that phenomena. On the other hand, we have four African Americans who were elected statewide. We have an Attorney General who was elected statewide. We have the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, an African American female who was elected statewide, a member of the Service Public Commission who was elected statewide and the Labor Commissioner who holds a statewide office. So there is some indication that you know that whites will vote for African Americans, but the point that I would make about all this is that that is after they have had an opportunity to demonstrate their capacity to govern.

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

SENATOR BROWN: And you often don't get that opportunity except for starting in a predominantly African American district. Michael Thurmond who is the State Labor Commissioner is somewhat of an anomaly in that sense in that he was initially elected from a majority white legislative district. But that district is somewhat unique in that it has the University of Georgia population which tends to have a more progressive electorate around it. The Chief Justice was initially appointed by the Governor, so she had an opportunity to perform in the position and then be elected. Thurgood Baker who is the Attorney General was elected from a predominantly African American district but he also had a very high profile as the floor leader for Governor Zell Miller who initially appointed him and then he was elected. And so those paths, there is some exceptions to having to have a predominantly black electorate in order to be elected but the general path to that is you initially have to have that opportunity that comes almost exclusively from a predominantly African American base and that holds true for even the Congressional district. We now have a -- well, Cynthia McKinney really does not have an overwhelmingly African American district now, but when she was initially elected, she had an African American district and when she was re-elected prior to this election now, once the district was changed she only had about a 49 percent POP district but she was able to I think be elected by that time because she had had that experience and that profile and that exposure of having come from the predominantly African American district. The same percent for Sanford Bishop. Sanford Bishop currently represents a predominantly white district but he had the opportunity initially that came from a predominantly African American district, and so your question also earlier about how do you see this going forward, that's why I think it's important to have it renewed because we're at a point now where we've made significant progress under the process that we have now, but I'm afraid that if we cut it off at this point that those opportunities for African Americans would be diminished and so you would not get the future statewide elected officials, the future Congress people who would have that experience of that opportunity to show their capacity to govern because if they relied solely on coming from these districts that were not African American, the chances would be significantly diminished as demonstrated by the record here in Georgia.

MR. LEVITAS: If I might add briefly. Each legislative district is in many cases unique and the facts specific to the ability of minorities to succeed depend on particular histories and contextual evidence which is why when one is bringing for example a Section Two lawsuit, one has to invest considerable resources in bringing forward factual evidence about the totality of circumstances and the history, even in discussing something like Cynthia McKinney's district and pointing out the fact that it is now not majority black. I believe if you look at the data and recent turnout one will still find that Cynthia McKinney was elected with a majority of African American voters because her presence is such a, she's a particularly charismatic and galvanizing figure in the African American community and so even though the black voting in each population is in the minority, the turnout and the excitement and the energy that she attracts as a candidate offsets the white antipathy towards her candidacy. And in fact, too complicated to get into now, when one looks at data regarding her race in the primary, the Democratic party primary, subsequent elections and the general election, there is strong evidence of racially polarized voting in her Congressional district over the past four to six years.

I used the example --I wasn't saying generically everywhere across the south 90 percent of whites vote white, 90 percent of blacks vote black, I specifically said in Charleston County, South Carolina, this is the data you know that was found. But if you look at these jurisdictions where there has been litigation in an effort to create majority black districts and to do as Senator Brown indicated, give African American officials t h e opportunity first to serve, one finds extraordinarily high levels of racially polarized voting and even when one talks about people like Thurgood Baker or Michael Thurmond our Labor Commissioner, those gentlemen were elected at a time of democratic Partisan here in the State of Georgia where once they were able to win in a primary context, they achieved higher office on the coattails of an extraordinarily popular Governor at first, you know Roy Barnes and also Zell Miller and what you have now in Georgia is an increased Partisan development where race is becoming quite a Partisan tool and I think that in fact it would be if you had an open seat for statewide office currently in Georgia, I think it would be extraordinarily difficult for an African American to succeed witness the fortunes of Denise Majek who ran for United States Senate in Georgia just recently.

And so these are complex matters but sadly we can't overlook the cooling and heating effect that when African Americans or Latinos or Asians see that the political process of native Americans is open to them whether it's by virtue of Section 203 language minority assistance or whether it's by virtue of seeing people that look like them in political office, that in turn inspires them to become more involved, to turn out, which helps elect more minority officials which gives them the record which then enables more whites to feel more comfortable electing them. But if you begin to take away these incentives and allow the barriers if you don't have Section Five pre-clearance as a deterrent, you allow these barriers to come in place, I believe without question you will see the opposite. You will see the cooling effect, participation, uninvolvement and indeed a diminution. You know, we once had large numbers of African Americans serving in the United States Congress and in state legislatures from the south during reconstruction and that ground to a screeching halt in 1901 with the last African American elected to Congress from North Carolina and it took 71 years for Barbara Jordan and Andrew Young to be elected in 1972 you know to serve once again; Andy Young, the first African American elected Mayor of a major city in the south. Maynard Jackson 1973 and one should not assume that simply because we've made this progress it would not be possible to you know it will begin to systematically eliminate 43 African American members in Congress or the 27 now Latino members serving in Congress. Those numbers could well turn backwards without the protection of the Voting Rights Act.

MR. ROGERS: That's very helpful.

SENATOR BROWN: If you don't have anymore immediate questions, I'm going to ask Dr. Vaughn.

DR. VAUGHN: Mr. Davidson, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Greenbaum -- I hope I pronounced that right -- thank you for giving me this opportunity. I wanted to give you a couple of scenarios which are personal and by no means -- I am a lay person -- I am not an attorney so therefore.

Back in 1993, I subjected my family to I guess you would say humility and some problems because of the a little law that the Voting Rights Act that I was reading one day and I discovered that based on what I was reading concerning the Voting Rights Act and there was a little that stated that if we have a certain amount of, a percentage of a certain amount of blacks in the community then we should have an extra district and with my being a lay person I called Chris Coates and I gave Chris Coates the percentage and he said hey you're supposed to have two districts based on the population, a County Commission district.

And I said well, what is my next step. He said, under the Voting Rights Act, I believe we have a pretty good chance if you want to be the plaintiff and file a lawsuit against your county, so why not.

So we filed a lawsuit and of course because of the Voting Rights Act, there was a little known law in there based on the percentages, we were victorious under Judge Baldwin over here in Savannah, Georgia, we won the case. The Laurens County presently have two black County Commissioner districts. Notwithstanding, the lines were redrawn again later; basically the Justice Department drew three maps to accept and we looked at them accordingly and we finally accepted one of the maps. We was tricked into accepting the map and that's why I'm into this thing now because we looked at the percentage. We didn't look at the voting percentage, the old trick, the numbers were there but the voting numbers were not there and we suffered from that one. But notwithstanding we do have two districts. That's one scenario why we need to keep the Voting Rights Act.

The second one is certainly one that I was involved in, a city election where I won in District One by 16 votes. Notwithstanding I had earlier walked into the city clerk's office and said now are there any new laws I need to know about over the voting procedure, and of course, he said no not that I know of. And so we went out and of course we worked diligently and I won by 16 votes and they had a recount and they had another recount and they counted the absentee ballots and then they reached under the table and pulled out a bag of votes and said these look, oh, these were the early votes, the early votes? But my job then was to get my people out to the polls because they was given a little heated there. My people failed and I believe they failed too but they was denied the right to vote because what I did again of course my family, I talked to my family, we sued. I sued them myself. I sued the city, the city clerk and in fact anyone else I could think about suing we sued them.

And basically, we went to Superior Court and the Superior Court Judge stated that there was no case law. The Clerk of Court of course he stated that he had no right to tell the public about the early voting. This was the first time it was used. So he had no right. What I'm saying if you're not going to tell them who is going to tell us. Of course, now everyone in Laurens County knows about early voting and in fact, the last election we just wiped out everything with the early voting, that's why I believe they came back with this new ID, identification voting, because we did such a tremendous job in Laurens County from this last election. We do need the Voting Rights Act. Of course, I lost by 31 votes when they pulled the bag out from up under the table of course. I lost also in Court. Then they sued me and wanted me to pay their, the city wanted me to pay their legal fees. And so I went back to Court and of course I won that case. I didn't have to pay their legal fees of course, but we need the Voting Rights Act from the Federal government. We need it because history has taught us that state rights will not be in our favor. History has taught us that but certainly in the city election, the people in rural areas -- and I'm from a rural area -- are being cleared from the list on a daily basis, misinformation concerning votes who have been incarcerated. And once you're incarcerated, you can never vote again. We do need that because certainly we do not have to go to litigation. We can just threaten to go to litigation and they'll come to the table but without this vehicle, without this vehicle, we have no recourse. There's no recourse anymore.

Of course, I've listened to the young lady and young man over there. I think, I can't call his name but I've seen them in Dublin of course. Certainly, we must understand that in Georgia our legislatures in Atlanta in order to get minorities and everyone I guess to participate in the election process, initiated a policy of law where it was called early voting so we can participate more you know because most people today are working two or three jobs and of course that would help the participation which it has. And then we turn right around or the legislature that has governed Georgia for so many years who saw nothing wrong with the way we was being identified at the polls especially in a rural area where I'm from because most of the poll workers we know. Everybody know everybody you know. I can't speak for the municipalities in Atlanta, but in the rural areas. And if there was something wrong with the process of identifying one, I believe the state representative that's been there so long years ago would have discovered it. I'm a little skeptical about how it came about. We have a Republican administration there and all of a sudden there's something wrong with the identification, the way we cast our ballots.

Now, I could have went along with it had they spoke about the absentee ballot. Now, that's the process that might possibly could be compromised, the absentee ballots, but it wasn't even in the equation. That's five pieces of ID, identification, we're going to have to have. We need the voting Rights Act. Just on this case alone, five pieces of identification. I believe it's driver's license, the military ID, passport I believe it is and there's one more. There's one more there. I can't call it. I had it on the tip of my tongue. But can you imagine, they told me earlier that in the City of Atlanta there's no State Patrol office. Can you imagine an 85-year-old lady standing in line in Fulton County waiting to get an ID card where you're standing in line waiting to get a driving license. So certainly, we need the Voting Rights Act to be extended.

Our organization is basically an organization of information. We do not endorse campaigns. We say meet the candidate of course. We will provide transportation for the candidate to all five of our counties, which consists of Twiggs, Johnson, Treutlen, Laurens and Emmanuel Counties. Of course, we try to look at the main information as simply we're going to introduce this fellow or this lady to you all. You make your decision. Voter participation during election, of course, we do our best to transport people to the polls there. They vote for w h o they want. But we want to make sure they're not hindered by transportation. Laurens County remember is one of the largest, third largest county in the State of Georgia. It's a rural area and certainly we do need this Federal Voting Rights Act to be extended because without it you know and I know state rights will not work. It will not work. Let's not fool ourselves here.

Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you.

SENATOR BROWN: At this time, we're almost at the end here if there are any members of the audience who have two or three minute statements that they would like to make we will entertain that at this point.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, sir.

MR. ROGERS: Mr. Vaughn, I wanted to ask you a question if I may. And I almost feel like I'm in this devil's advocate role to some extent and I know I am to some extent, but I wanted to ask you about the -- when you all got sort of duped into accepting that plan in particular you said you looked at essentially the percentage of the population. My guess is you all probably looked at the listings and the districts were divided based upon race. You saw the racial components and said ooh, that looks good. But then when you looked at the voting numbers, you saw what is a reality frankly all over the United States and that is that despite the existence of this Act, the sad reality is that many of us as African Americans in particular do not vote, don't register to vote, and don't engage in the process of voting on election day.

And as elected officials and certainly you know this Senator, our job is try to drive people out to vote. You try to get as many people as you can to show up to vote for you and there can be nothing more disconcerting to a person who's running for office, than to go to people, ask them for their vote. They say amen, hallelujah, thank you Jesus. And half of them don't even bother to vote or show up to vote for you. That is a sad reality that also existed in terms of this Voting Rights Act and so I mention that in the context if you're looking at the map and then having been sort of duped into accepting it if you didn't look at the voting patterns.

There are naysayers out there that would in effect say, listen, you had your shot. You wanted to act in a place that guarantees you the right to vote when you don't vote as a practical matter anyway, and I'm just very curious as a general matter what your response would be to that person who articulates that point of view. Not that anybody would necessarily do so. But I am curious as to what you know given the fact that --

DR. VAUGHN: They wouldn't necessarily, Mr. Rogers, they wouldn't necessarily do so. Yes.

We changed our attitude. Before we would say to one like that if you don't vote, you have no complaints. We have a new slogan now that we use. We don't ask them to vote initially. We ask them will you help us to help us. And it disarms them and the first thing that, well, they say well, I don't have any way to vote, but will you register to vote. Oh, yeah, I'll help you do that. So the old way doesn't work anymore. It's the new way. You have to let that individual know that you're helping us to help us. And with that statement, I can make that same statement in a trailer park at the white community, will you help us to help us. And I can make it at the country club, will you help us to help us.

SENATOR BROWN: Thank you. Mr. Sumblin.

MR. SUMBLIN: Yes, sir. Well, good afternoon everyone. And let me just especially thank Senator Brown and his colleagues and the Black Caucus of the Legislative Body of Georgia, and this distinguished panel of facilitators from Washington or wherever you're from who are concerned about the national Voting Rights Act.

My name is Charles Sumblin and I'm here to give testimony on a report of discrimination in voting experienced by minority voters or impediment to elect candidates of our choice. As the past President of SCLC City of Wrightsville, Georgia and you've heard a little bit about Wrightsville, Georgia tonight. And Johnson County, and as past President of the NAACP of Johnson County, Wrightsville, Georgia, now as the Chief Information Officer of District One Voting Association under the leadership of Dr. Vaughn.

I am vested with a wealth of experience and knowledge of various acts of racial discrimination that have existed over the years here in middle Georgia as it relates to the voting rights of minority citizens. For starters, a few years ago while serving as President of Johnson County SCLC, I qualified and ran for the Mayor of the City of Wrightsville, as a black candidate in the city that had experienced the last large scale civil rights demonstration in recent history. That's the one that the lawyer was talking about about the Klan and what happened. Well, I was one of those people there in 1982. I was one of the leaders on the front line that was beaten and jailed under the Sheriff Attaway over there because we were standing up for civil rights in Johnson County. Well, let me say this; I nearly became the target of large scale acts of racial discrimination. The most critical of all was the unjustified and illegal use of the system of Absentee Voting that became the deciding factor in the most publicized runoff election in middle Georgia. I made the runoff in that election.

The minority voter turnout and voter participation in that election was admirable but the illegal use of the absentee votes was rampant and widespread. A letter o f complaint from the Local Chapter of the SCLC and myself as a candidate did not result in any corrective action on the part of Election Division of the State of Georgia. As the Chief Information Officer for District One Voter Association, I am committing all of my interest and effort to the agenda of the Georgia Legislative Black Caucus and its stand against the injustices upon us by the remaining barriers that are before us as the result of the unfinished business of the 1965 Voter Rights Act.

And I say in conclusion that we need to preserve not only the Act but the integrity of the Act. We need to extend the Act and we need to make sure that the Act is properly enforced. I am saddened by the fact that even now we live with the question of whether or not the Justice Department is going to embrace or endorse the newly passed legislation on voter reform in Georgia that requires all these different pieces of identification now in a state that has 159 counties and 59 of those counties there's nowhere to go to get that ID made. So what I'm saying is that in closing is that we are facing very difficult times now. If Dr. King were living today, it is no doubt in my heart and my mind cause I marched with him that he would be organizing demonstrations and boycott all across the State of Georgia because of this injustice that has been put upon the people by the legislative body of the State of Georgia under the leadership of Sonny Perdue. It is despicable. It's unbelievable that they would try to undo all the hard work that that has gone into voter rights and just make a mockery of the lives of all those people that died for voter rights here in the State of Georgia and across this country by passing such a silly and ridiculous set of bills and laws. It's unbelievable and that's why we, it's not a matter of do we want to preserve or continue the Voters Right Act, we must in order to save the integrity of this nation and this state.

Thank you very much.

MR. DAVIDSON: Mr. Senator, I have some questions but you feel free to -- I believe Mr. Vaughn may have answered this question that I'm going to ask you, but I take it that the new voter ID law would not have in any way prevented this absentee voting fraud that you referred to earlier, is that correct? if it were to occur now once that voter ID law has gone into effect?

DR. VAUGHN: Well, as a matter of fact, the issue of course on the absentee ballot, it was not even considered in the implementation of the new Voter Reform Act in the State of Georgia. We raised complaints back in back when I ran for Mayor of Wrightsville --

MR. DAVIDSON: When was that, sir?

DR. VAUGHN: I believe it was '96 I believe. Yeah, it was '96 I believe. But we filed complaints with the State of Georgia, even the Justice Department. They came out and did an investigation and they concluded that yes, there are discrepancies in the law and its implementation. But we don't have anything to say it's illegal because the law itself is written so loosely, you know.

But you know in other words what we're saying in the civil rights community is that that was news to me to question the integrity of a voter's honesty in identifying oneself at the poll. That has not been the problem. The problem has been the rampant misuse of the absentee ballots where a given candidate can go into the Registrar's Office and just grab a handful of absentee ballots and go back home and fill them out and turn them back in.

MR. DAVIDSON: Do you still have in your files a copy of the complaint that you made in this regard?

DR. VAUGHN: It's with the SCLC Office in Johnson

County and I could make it available for you.

MR. DAVIDSON: It would be very helpful if you could send that. You can ask Mr. Greenbaum where to send it but I'd like to get a copy of that if I could.

DR. VAUGHN: Okay.

MR. SUMBLIN Mr. Davidson?

MR. DAVIDSON: Yes, sir.

MR. SUMBLIN: To answer the question would this new ID law have made a difference, no because it does not address absentee ballots at all. So this new --

MR. DAVIDSON: It will in effect would allow you to vote absentee without identification?

MR. SUMBLIN: Yes.

DR. VAUGHN: Oh, yes, absolutely.

MR. SUMBLIN: Yes. Yes. It was definitely. It's out there.

DR. VAUGHN: Absolutely.

MR. SUMBLIN: So therefore we feel that there are some, it appears and I've stated before the absentee process, a possibility could be compromised but it was never addressed in the new identification. You can continue to vote absentee as business as usual.

MR. DAVIDSON: I want to make sure about this because I'm a little confused about that. I want to make sure I understand that. You were telling me that you can vote absentee ballot in this state under this provision that is proposed --

MR. SUMBLIN: With no identification --

MR. ROBERTS: -- without identification for purposes of going to vote, physically going to vote, live, as opposed to mailing in your ballot --

MR. SUMBLIN: You need no identification.

MR. DAVIDSON: -- there's no requirement of identification?

MR. SUMBLIN: None whatsoever, sir.

DR. VAUGHN: That is correct. That is correct.

MR. DAVIDSON: Senator, I'm curious; is that accurate?

SENATOR BROWN: That is accurate. Not only can you mail it in but you can fax it in and request an absentee ballot and the ballot will be sent out to you.

MR. DAVIDSON: But it has to be sent to you as a registered voter?

SENATOR BROWN: Yeah.

MR. DAVIDSON: So in other words, proof has already been made that you are in fact a registered voter?

SENATOR BROWN: Yes. Right. The proof is that you are a registered voter as you are listed on the voter rolls, yes but there is no proof that you are in fact that registered voter --

MR. DAVIDSON: The one casting that ballot?

SENATOR BROWN: -- who was casting that ballot.

MR. DAVIDSON: Oh, okay, but that problem -- help me out here cause I'm trying to understand the difference -- that problem is true virtually everywhere you have absentee ballots. There's no guarantee that you send the absentee ballot to my home and my son is also 18, the voting age. He's a eligible voter. He's a registered voter. There's no guarantee that I'm not filling out his ballot and turning it in. As long as he's a registered voter in the state, that can happen anytime anywhere.

SENATOR BROWN: Sure.

MR. DAVIDSON: Are you talking about something other than what would normally occur?

SENATOR BROWN: No. No. We're not talking about something that would normally occur, and as a matter of fact, in Georgia, in order to, prior to this law, in order to vote absentee, you had to give a reason.

MR. DAVIDSON: Oh, you did.

SENATOR BROWN: But now they've removed that provision and just have --

MR. DAVIDSON: And just have early voting?

SENATOR BROWN: -- early voting by absentee ballots. As a matter of fact, they extended the period of time by which you can vote absentee which is not entirely bad.

MR. DAVIDSON: Right.

SENATOR BROWN: But the point about the ID issue is that if you can accept the possibility of someone not being legitimate with an absentee ballot, you certainly should be able to accept someone in the rural district where a poll worker is likely to know that person --

MR. DAVIDSON: Oh, sure.

SENATOR BROWN: -- walking into the polls.

MR. DAVIDSON: And you don't have a practice in Georgia whereby the poll worker can't attest to the voracity or what word am I looking for?

MR. GREENBAUM: Identity.

MR. DAVIDSON: Identity essentially of the person? There is no process? You don't allow for that?

SENATOR BROWN: As long as the proposal that's now the voter ID law does have a provision that you can go ahead and vote but you will have 48 hours to go -- you will have 48 hours to come back and present with a photo ID.

MR. DAVIDSON: Sure of yourself.

SENATOR BROWN: If you're living in a rural Georgia county, where you don't have the MVS office, it's not likely you're going to be able to get back in 48 hours with proof of an ID.

MR. SUMBLIN: Let me just say in conclusion --

MR. DAVIDSON: Yes.

MR. SUMBLIN: -- cause I raised this concern back in the '90s. The question of absentee voting in Georgia is an area that the state has systematically stayed away from. I don't know why. I don't know why, but no one wants to deal with it and it is the greatest infringement on the rights of the voters that you can speak of in the body of politics. There's nothing any more serious. Nothing any more unjustified and abused as the absentee voting process in the State of Georgia. And they know it. They know it. But see, it's just something that everybody can benefit by who are already in office if they use it to their own advantage. And I really do wish that the Federal government at some point would take a strong look at the State of Georgia and its abuse of the absentee voting process.

SENATOR BROWN: I think we're close to the end here. And again, I want to thank the Commission for coming here. I think you've gotten a good sense of where we are in Georgia in terms of some of the issues that we're concerned about. I'm going to encourage members of the panels as well as others to submit additional materials to you, some of which you've requested and some will be in addition to others that we're aware of. I am kind of encouraged by the fact that in Georgia, as I said earlier, resulting from the Voting Rights Act, we've had this tremendous increase in African American and to some extent a few other minorities elected to office. We have expanded to that extent but I am also equally convinced that if we do not have the continuing protection of the Voting Rights Act, that we will see those gains eroded, if not immediately but certainly in very short order.

We see much evidence of that in terms of the last redistricting process that we just engaged in, and historically Georgia has had some problems with the redistricting process but usually we try to resolve it at the time every ten years and exceptions to that have been that we've had some problems that were identified with the Department of Justice or some litigation. This last session of the legislature we saw redistricting at the Congressional level that was done for purely political reasons and when we look at the, not only the political aspect of it, but what happened in those non-majority African American districts, those districts that we have identified as influence districts, you will see that those districts, the influence of African Americans in those districts were ostensibly diminished.

The Court has not been very clear about defining the influence districts and how they should be determined but we think if the Voting Rights Act remains in place, that we can eventually force that issue to some greater clarity and that is again the results of some of the Congressional elections in Georgia where there was significant African American populations, we were able to have some gains not just in terms of African Americans but in electing the candidate of choice by African Americans.

So that's a little aspect that we have to keep in mind here because one of the questions that was raised earlier had to do with whether there were African Americans who represented predominantly white districts and there are a few, but there are also some predominantly African American districts that are represented by whites. And they've had significant challenges from high caliber or high quality African American candidates but African Americans in those districts for whatever reasons have decided that they wanted to have representation that was not African American and that is I think essentially what this whole thing is about is for people to have an opportunity to elect a candidate of their choice, no matter who that may be.

And so that's why I think it's also important for us to keep that in focus as we move forward and retain the Voting Rights Act.

MR. ROBERTS: You know, Senator, that's a good point actually that you just made there because it's fascinating to me. It can be articulated by others that essentially the Voting Rights Act is solely tailored to protect the interests of only of minorities to the exclusion of whites. And I think another argument could arguably be made that that is that the entire culture benefits from the existence of this Act and which you just indicated there to the extent that you have majority black districts that in fact have whites who represent those districts in and of themselves. We have not heard --

SENATOR BROWN: I can give you another kind of antidotal facts that support the notion that the whole culture benefits. I represent I guess you'd call it a small city, rural district. Macon, Georgia is a city of about 90,000 to 100,000 people and I have all of that city in my district. I also represent Twiggs County and about two-thirds of Wilkinson County that are really rural areas and I guess somewhere in-between, I think it's Irwin County and an area over in Houston County. Almost at least on a monthly basis, I will, through the constituency service work with someone who is not African American and in many cases I will have that person say to me, you have been more responsive to me than my other representatives or legislatures have been in the past. I tend to, in other words, if you come in and you were having a problem that many would characterize as something that really is more of a property issue than a government issue, I'd give you just as much attention as I would someone who would come in with a business interest, someone who was interested in trying to get some exemption, a tax exemption for a business, I would give just as much attention to that person who would come in and say, look I'm having a problem with the tax assessor with my property. I feel that I'm not being equally treated on this particular issue. And I've found that many white individuals will say to me that they've been trying to get through to their legislative white colleague of mine prior to that when they've never been able to do so; and that is what I mean by eventually as African Americans have more opportunity to serve and demonstrate the kind of constituency service that applies to everybody, then eventually we'll get to that point where there will be less of a consideration for race. But we're not there. We haven't had enough of a history and not of enough of experience with it in order for us to say that you know let bygones be bygones and let's start all over and cause everybody's now on an equal playing field. And I think we're years away from that being but it's coming as a result of the kinds of things that I just described.

MR. DAVIDSON: Senator, could I just say by way of thanking you for letting us down here that we are more than receptive for anything that you or people in the community want to send us by way of documentation, newspaper clippings, official documents, anything in your files that go to the question of vote discrimination. We don't have to get it here today.

SENATOR BROWN: Sure.

MR. DAVIDSON: You can send it in to us. It will be put to use.

SENATOR BROWN: Anybody else have any -- Thank you very much for this opportunity.

(HEARING CONCLUDED).

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS held on Thursday, August 4, 2005, beginning at 9:55 a.m., at the J. W. Marriott Hotel, 4040 Central Florida Parkway, Palazzo Salon F, Orlando, Florida, before Dawn R. Matter, Electronic Reporter and Notary Public, State of Florida at Large.

MS. ARNWINE: Good morning. Good morning. We're going to start. Please feel free to come to the front. We know people are going to have to come and go during the day. We're aware of that. You should make yourself comfortable. Please grab a seat. We know that with the party last night, that it was going to delay our starting somewhat, but we know people will trickle in as the day proceeds.

I wanted to start off by just thanking you all for coming. It's a real pleasure for you to be here. There's nothing, I think, right now in our country more important than the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act, and this panel, this distinguished commission has started this very critical process of hearings throughout the country.

Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. I am Barbara Arnwine, Executive Director of Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights under Law. On the eve of the 40th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act, I want to start by thanking everybody for coming to visit, the Florida hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act.

In particular, I want to extend a heartfelt thanks to the National Bar Association for hosting this hearing. I really think that's outstanding.

[Applause]

MS. ARNWINE: I also want to thank the co-sponsors of the National Commission, including the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the National Coalition on Black Civic Participation, the Rainbow Push Coalition.

I just did a radio interview with Reverend Jackson this morning on the march that's going to be held on Saturday and Rock the Boat. It is this coordinated effort on behalf of the civil rights community that helps the National Commission to accomplish its task.

We will introduce John Greenbaum who will introduce all of the commissioners, so I want you to please join me in recognizing these outstanding commissioners who have traveled already. This is the sixth hearing they have traveled all over the country and they have four more hearings to do and they are doing this unpaid. So please join me in thanking our distinguished and honorable commissioners.

[Applause]

MS. ARNWINE: I am always amazed everytime I come to the NBA to see our Congressmen and Congresswomen who join us, and I have been just delighted throughout this conference to have with us the presence of Congressman Bobby Scott of Virginia.

[Applause]

MS. ARNWINE: And testifying today is one of my favorite people, someone who I worked with for years in North Carolina, the Honorable Congressman G. K. Butterfield of North Carolina.

[Applause]

MS. ARNWINE: As I mentioned, this is the National Commission's sixth hearing since it was formed in the beginning of 2005. Its mission is to identify the continuing problems of discrimination in voting as Congress begins to consider the re-authorization of the key provisions of the Voting Rights Act. The findings of the National Commission hearings, their intent and plan is to write a report primarily authored by Dr. Chandler Davidson. Dr. Davidson, please raise your hand so people will know you.

[Applause]

MS. ARNWINE: Dr. Davidson will Chair today's hearing. This report will offer a comprehensive picture of the evidence uncovered through the hearing processes, as well as through studying the historic work of the Department of Justice and its voting rights enforcement responsibilities, cases filed by the files of individual voting rights attorneys like our distinguished guest commissioner, Fred Gray.

[Applause]

MS. ARNWINE: We notice that litigation has been done coast to coast for many years, and other relevant data that will help paint a complete picture of the role of the Voting Rights Act and how it is played in combating discrimination in voting during the past 40 years and how minority voters still depend on its protection to assure that everyone has equal access to the political process. And this report will be released in January 2006. The evidence we have collected so far is both hopeful and disheartening.

During the Commission's first hearing held in Montgomery, Alabama, during the 40th anniversary commemoration of Bloody Sunday, practitioners, advocates, educators, experts and citizens gave testimony about the all-too-familiar legacy of voting discrimination in the south.

We heard from citizens who have been active for over 40 years in a struggle to guarantee that African-American citizens can exercise the right to vote free of intimidation, administrative obstacles, and deliberate manipulation of the electoral system.

And, in fact, I remember one gentleman -- hearing the testimony of one gentleman from that time who came to that hearing in Montgomery and testified about how he used to have to help with the literacy test for the people in his area. That is the legacy that we're confronting.

We also heard from practitioners who were instrumental in the development of the Voting Rights Act and its implementation on the past for 40 years. We heard from citizens and experts who gave anecdotal and statistically significant evidence that proves that the Voting Rights Act, particularly Section 5, one of the central provisions of the Voting Rights Act that must be reauthorized, has been responsible for providing a voice to a formerly voiceless community.

Unfortunately, though, we also heard from advocates and citizens chronicling the continuing disparities in the voting experience between minority voters and other voters. Clearly work on the Voting Rights Act, while dramatic and powerful, is not completed, is not done.

This continuing disparity was highlighted again in our subsequent hearing in Phoenix, Arizona, where the Commission held a second hearing. We examined the legacy of obstacles to the ballot box that voters in the southwest faced. We heard from leaders and activists from Indian country who told stories of a dreadful lack of resources, including language assistance and culturally sensitive poll workers in the polling places of our first Americans.

The Commission also took testimony from experts, academics, voting rights practitioners and others in the Latino community who told of how Section 203 in the Voting Rights Act, another of the provisions up for reauthorization which requires certain jurisdictions to provide multi-lingual assistance to voters, has allowed many American citizens who speak Spanish to participate in the process.

Both of these groups told of the historic significance of the historical institutional discrimination in a process that is not set up for the demands of minority communities and illustrated that the Voting Rights Act has been central in addressing many of these concerns. But its work -- its work, it's critical work, once again, is not completed, is not done.

During the northeast regional hearing held in New York City, we heard again from a diverse array of witnesses representing the African-American, Asian and Latino communities who discussed again how the lack of proper assistance at the polls have hampered the ability of minority voters to gain full access to the polls.

We also heard about the difference that the Department of Justice objections under Section 5 in the application of needed resources at the polls can make and align minority voters full access to the electoral system.

We heard of intimidation. We heard testimony regarding New Jersey where an Asian-American candidate was running for office and how these DJs got on public -- I mean, got on radio and spoke about how these people were trying to take over and how good white Americans were losing their place in America.

This is, once again, the attitudinal and the intimidation factors that are so critical to keeping minority voters from exercising their full rights.

During the midwest regional hearings in Minneapolis, Minnesota, we heard about the new techniques used to disenfranchise minority voters such as deceptive flyers aimed at African-American voters in Milwaukee and challenges used to intimidate African-American voters in Ohio and American Indian voters in Minnesota.

Two days ago -- two days ago, this distinguished Commission held a hearing in Americus, Georgia. This hearing proved that powerful insights can be gained from an examination of the legacy of the Voting Rights Act in a region steep in the history that made the Voting Rights Act a reality.

Today we will hear from policymakers, advocates, activists and attorneys and many others who will detail the role of discrimination in voting here in Florida and throughout the country.

I look forward to hearing today's testimony and adding it to the already impressive record of this August body. When we put together this impressive group of commissioners, we did so knowing that theirs was not an easy task. What we were asking them for was nothing short of assessing the continuing importance of arguably the most important piece of civil rights legislation that ever passed Congress. They have responded with distinction.

I am proud to see this process unfolding and to have the opportunity to work with such a distinguished group. I am delighted that we have our distinguished guest commissioners, none less than the outstanding President of the National Bar Association, Kim Keenan.

[Applause]

MS. ARNWINE: As many of you will know -- will note that on Monday Kim Keenan filled the heart of Lawyers Committee by presenting us with a check for $10,000 which was absolutely outstanding.

[Applause]

MS. ARNWINE: I cannot begin to thank her enough, but I wanted everyone to know that that $10,000 will help to support the work of this Commission and the report of the Association and that we are so, so delighted.

[Applause]

MS. ARNWINE: The NBA is a powerful organization. Yes. You have vision and leadership and energy in your presidents. We can all make a difference. And this Commission and this joint hearing is yet another example of the kind of work that we can do, the kind of action that we could put into place as lawyers to transform our nation into guaranteed equal protection for our most distinguished citizens.

I will now turn this process over to the Commission's director, the project director for the Voting Rights Project of the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, Jon Greenbaum.

[Applause]

MR. GREENBAUM: Thanks, everyone. Thanks, Barbara. Good morning, everybody.

IN UNISON: Good morning.

MR. GREENBAUM: I want to echo Barbara's sentiments about the NBA. This is the second year that I've been the Director of the Voting Rights Project for the Lawyers Committee and I can only say that the NBA has come through for us in the most amazing way.

Not only have we gotten the financial support, but in addition to that, the NBA volunteers really were the backbone of our election protection program recruiting process last year and I really felt like this convention last year was almost a turning point for us in terms of being able to recruit the thousands of volunteers that we use for election protection.

And the same is true in terms of today, the NBA agreeing to allow us to come in here and hold the joint hearing with it. Mavis Thompson did an incredible job of putting together panels.

[Applause]

MR. GREENBAUM: You're going to see those panelists in this afternoon's panel which was pretty much put together by Mavis. And Kim's leadership has been amazing. She spent a lot of time with us last year with the election protection and, you know, in addition to having a law practice, we're very appreciative.

And now I want to introduce -- the Chair of the Commission, Bill Lann Lee, would love to be here with us today, but he's decided to brave the jungles of Peru instead and that's why he's not here. In his stead, presiding today is going to be Chandler Davidson who is going to talk in a little bit more specifics about what the Commission does, what the provisions of the Voting Rights Act that are scheduled for re-authorization and how the Commission's work folds into that.

Chandler is -- he's a retired professor of sociology at Rice University where he was a Radislaw Zanoff professor. He was the former chair of the sociology department and he is, in our view, the leading academic in the field of voting rights.

Chandler co-edited what's often thought of to be the seminal work on voting rights in the last two decades, Quiet Revolution in the South, and in addition to that, Chandler has been a text expert in several cases going back all the way to the 70s in voting rights, and he also testified before Congress in the 1982 reauthorization. Chandler Davidson.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, Jon. Good morning.

IN UNISON: Good morning.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: On behalf of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, I welcome you today to the sixth of ten public hearings that the Commission will be conducting. This regional hearing will look at the state of voting discrimination in two states, Florida and North Carolina, and it will hear from NBA practitioners around the country who have worked on behalf of minority voters.

Today's testimony will examine the experience primarily of African-American and Latino voters in Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Ohio and Texas.

The Voting Rights Act was signed into law in 1965 by President Lyndon Johnson in response to voting discrimination encountered by African- Americans in the south.

When Congress reauthorized the Voting Rights Act in 1975, it made specific findings that the use of English-only elections and other devices effectively barred minority language citizens from participating in the electoral process.

In response, Congress expanded the Act to account for discrimination against such citizens by enacting the Minority Language Assistance Provision found in Section 203.

The right to vote of African-Americans and other minorities is guaranteed by the 15th Amendment and this right is permanent. Further, permanent provisions of the Voting Rights Act ban literacy tests and poll taxes, outlaw voter intimidation, authorize federal monitors and observers and create various mechanisms to protect the voting rights of racial and language minorities.

However, several temporary provisions of the Voting Rights Act will expire in 2007 unless they're reauthorized by Congress. In particular, Section 5 of the Act requires certain states, counties and townships with a history of discrimination against minority voters to obtain approval or pre-clearance from the United States Department of Justice or the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. before making any voting changes.

These changes include, for example, redistricting, adoption of new methods of election and polling place changes.

Jurisdictions covered by Section 5 must prove that the changes do not have the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority. In Florida five counties are covered by Section 5: Collier, Hardy, Hendry, Hillsborough and Monroe Counties.

Second, Section 203 of the Act requires that language assistance be provided in communities with a significant number of voting-age citizens who have limited English proficiency. Four language groups are covered by Section 203: American Indians, Asian-Americans, Alaskan Natives and Latinos.

Covered jurisdictions must provide language assistance at all stages of the electoral process. As of 2002, a total of 466 local jurisdictions across 31 states were covered by these provisions. Ten of Florida's counties are subject to Section 203 requirements.

Third, Sections 6B, 7, 8, 9, and 13A of the Act authorize the Attorney General to appoint a federal examiner to jurisdictions covered by Section 5's pre-clearance provisions on good cause, or to send a federal observer to any jurisdiction where a federal examiner has been assigned.

Since 1966, 25,000 federal observers have been deployed in approximately 1,000 elections.

Let me say a few words now about the folks on this dies. The Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law acting on behalf of the civil rights community has created this non-partisan National Commission on the Voting Rights Act to examine discrimination in voting since 1982.

The Commission is composed of eight persons, including voting rights advocates, academics, former elected officials and civil rights leaders who represent the diversity that is such an important part of our nation.

The Honorary Chair of the Commission is the Honorable Charles Mathias, former Republican Senator from Maryland. The Chair is Bill Lann Lee, former Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights who is, as was said, in Peru right now.

The other National Commissioners are the Honorable John Buchanan, former Congressman from Alabama; Dolores Huerta, co-founder of the United Farm Workers of America; Elsie Meeks, first Native American member of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights; Charles Ogletree, Harvard law professor and civil rights advocate, and the Honorable Joe Rogers, former Republican Lieutenant Governor of Colorado.

In addition to myself, Commissioners Buchanan and Rogers are present today. We are also very fortunate to have as guest commissioners, Kim Keenan, President of the National Bar Association, and Fred Gray, a senior partner at Gray, Langford, Sapp, McGowan, Gray & Nathanson.

The Commission has two primary tasks. First to conduct regional hearings such as this one across the country to gather testimony relating to voting rights, and as Barbara said, to write a comprehensive report detailing the existence of discrimination in voting since 1982, the last time there was a comprehensive reauthorization of the temporary features of the Voting Rights Act. The report which will be released in January 2006 will be used to educate the public and policymakers about the record of racial discrimination in voting.

There will be three panels of speakers today. The first two panels will be composed of members of Congress, leading voting rights practitioners, and members of the community who have been active in voting rights issues. Each panelist will provide a five-to-ten minute presentation.

After all of the members of a panel have spoken, the Commission will address questions to the panelists. Because of time constraints, I urge panelists to stay within their time limits. If they do not, I may, in the gentlest and most encouraging way possible, ask them to hurry along.

We encourage members of the public who are here today to share their voting rights experiences in our third and final panel. If you would like to participate in that panel, please speak with a staff member in the back. If you would like to share your testimony, but cannot stay, please see one of the staff members in the back who will take your statement so it can be included in the record.

I will now introduce each of the commissioners present who will make a short opening statement. First, Commissioner John Buchanan on my left, is a Baptist minister who has served churches in Alabama, Tennessee, Virginia, and Washington, D.C. Commissioner Buchanan also represented Birmingham, Alabama, in Congress for 16 years. While in Congress, he was instrumental in the passage of Title IX, and also was a strong proponent of full voting representation in Congress for the District of Columbia.

After leaving Congress, he chaired the Civil Liberties Organization, People for the American Way.

Congressman, do you care to say a few words?

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As the Chairman has just said, I am a white, southern Republican who used to represent Birmingham, Alabama in the Congress. It might make you wonder, what in the world I'm doing sitting here. I will tell you.

I had just turned 21 and I just graduated from college. I went down to the courthouse, Jefferson County Courthouse in Birmingham to register to vote. When I walked into the room, I saw a group of black Americans sitting around a table all pouring over a thick tome. And I picked up a copy and began to read it, and to my dismay, I found that I'd need a Master's degree in political science and history and Lord knows what else to be able to pass a test on that tome.

I walked up to the registrar and I said: Sir, I just graduated from college and I can't even answer or pass this literacy test.

He said: Who was the first president of the United States?

I said: George Washington.

He said: You just passed the test.

That's how it was. I didn't know whether to walk out or register, but I decided it would not help anybody for me not to register, so I did.

I told that story when we were trying to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act in 1982 and I was speaking on a radio hookup statewide and afterward the people called in.

And one fellow called in and said: Well, you just proved we shouldn't have elected you to Congress or paid any attention to you because you just admitted you can't pass a literacy test.

I have a friend whose name is George Hughes, a lawyer and a civil rights advocate, who said something that I believe is worth listening to. He said: What we're trying to do in the United States in the Civil Rights Movement is to make the promises on paper of the Constitution, the Bill of Rights and the Declaration of Independence realities in the world for all Americans.

In 1965 -- I left out that I'm a slow learner. I didn't like this bill that was written. I was in Birmingham, Alabama, as a freshman the first month I was in office and I co-sponsored with Gerry Ford, the minority leader, a version that would have made everything national, no double standard, tough provisions that would not have done what Sections 4 and 5 do. I want to tell you here today we were wrong in that version and the version as passed was right for the historic circumstances.

[Applause]

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: And our job is to determine now from these hearings and these witnesses what is needed in this historic circumstance to continue to fulfill that proposition that George Hughes talked about.

If there's anything that a democracy, the world's greatest as we believe, owes its people, it is the right of all Americans to vote in free and fair elections. And we need to establish in these records whether or not that is happening and whether we need the provisions about to expire in 2007 to make sure it keeps to happening in the years ahead.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I apologize if I run over my time.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, Congressman.

Commissioner Joe Rogers completed his term as the Lieutenant Governor of Colorado in 2003 where he held the distinction of serving as America's youngest lieutenant governor and only the fourth African-American in U.S. history ever to hold the position.

He served as founding chairman of the Republican Lieutenant Governors Association and served on the Executive Committee of the National Conference of Lieutenant Governors. Mr. Rogers created the acclaimed: I Keep the Dream Alive program in dedication of the memory and legacy of Martin Luther King, Jr. and the leaders of the Civil Rights Movement.

Governor Rogers.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. Thank you, Chandler. Thank you so much. You all doing all right this morning? I understand you all partied a little bit last night so I understand there may be a little straggling.

I was bragging last night at dinner about how I was going to join you all at that party and I went to the room, hit the remote control and just went right to sleep. I don't know what happened. But it's a delight to be with you all here today. It really is. And I'm honored to join, obviously, the National Bar Association and Kim to be with you all here today.

We're here to get a census as clearly as has been articulated about the substance of testimony related to voting in the United States. There is no doubt without hesitation that I'm honored to be here on this distinguished panel; in particular, to be here with Fred Gray.

You all know Fred and there's going to be a wonderful event that's going to take place a little bit later here today, and you all know that Fred was so key in the context of the movement and working closely obviously with Martin Luther King, Jr. and so many key people throughout the movement, representing Rosa Parks and frankly, all of the great things that he has done throughout the years that helped to lead to opportunities for so many of you all who are here today, and certainly in terms of my election to serve the people of Colorado.

Now, I know when you all hear that I was elected to serve the people of Colorado in particular, you all might say: Well, wait a minute, Joe. You were Lieutenant Governor of Colorado. We didn't know there were black folk in Colorado.

I know that some of you all might say so. Believe it or not, there are. And you all may know there's a unique history to the western part of the United States. You all might know this, one out of every three cowboys in the United States was an African-American.

In the particulars, people left the south, in particular, and headed to places like California and otherwise Colorado was a stopping point along the way.

So my family has a long history in terms of the west and I'm deeply honored to be here with you today and to hear this critical testimony related to voting in the United States.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Commissioner Kim Keenan is the President of the National Bar Association, which is hosting its 80th Annual Convention here this week, in case you weren't aware of that fact. Ms. Keenan is a senior trial attorney at Olender & Associates and has settled and won malpractice cases for sums up to $10 million.

Ms. Keenan is the former President of the Washington Bar Association and former President of the Trial Lawyers Association of Metropolitan Washington, D.C. President Keenan.

MS. KEENAN: Thank you. Well, on behalf of the National Bar Association, I am extraordinarily proud to be able to say that we were able to host the Florida Hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act.

This year our theme has been building on the legacy equalizing justice for all. And as we all know, nothing has gone further to equalizing justice for all than the Voting Rights Act. But all too few people understand that the Voting Rights Act was born out of Bloody Sunday. And people died before people realized that this was such a fundamental right.

So when we think about the reality that we're living every day, we have to remember that while it's not Bloody Sunday any more, we still live in a country where we all think of the Voting Rights Act as one person, one vote, with the goal of making as many Americans as possible have the opportunity if they're eligible to simply be able to vote.

And as a person of color, as a lawyer, as a woman, as an American citizen, I want to make sure that we have done everything as a Bar Association to make that a reality because it is a fundamental American right to be able to vote.

When you think of America and you think of something uniquely American, you think of each person having the right to vote. It is very important that we get this right because people are watching us all around the world. And when we export our democracy to others, when we give people constitutional rights to one person, one vote, they're looking at us and they're saying: Well, if you're a person of color, you may be told the wrong date to vote; if you're a person of color, your machines may not work; if you're a person who speaks a different language, you may not be given the information that you need in the language that you speak even though you, too, are an American.

People are watching us. We have to get it right. We have to get it right because we know the American that we can be. Thank you.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Commissioner Fred Gray is a senior partner, as I said, at Gray, Langford, Sapp, McGowan, Gray & Nathanson in Alabama. His legal career spans over 50 years beginning with his representation of Mrs. Rosa Parks in the Montgomery bus boycott, and his position as Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s first civil rights attorney.

Mr. Rogers filed suits that resulted in the integration of all of Alabama state colleges and universities, and the vast majority of Alabama's elementary and secondary schools. Mr. Gray also served in the Alabama legislature and as a former National Bar Association president. Mr. Gray.

MR. GRAY: Thank you.

[Applause]

MR. GRAY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and fellow commissioners, ladies and gentlemen. Let me first acknowledge the presence of my law partner, Ernestine Sapp, who is here.

[Applause]

MR. GRAY: She helped to make it possible for me to be here and to do the things that I do and I appreciate Ernestine being here. She's an outstanding lawyer in her own right and served as the Alabama State Bar Association representative to the House of Delegates of ABA, a position to which she was appointed and later ran and was elected, so let's give Earnestine a hand.

[Applause]

MR. GRAY: I was born in Montgomery, Alabama, and now live in Tuskegee. We have officers in both of those cities and for the past 50 years, I have practiced law in and around Central Alabama. I'm not going to be a national lawyer. I'm an Alabama lawyer. And most of that practice, or a substantial part of it, has been devoted to civil rights.

I'm honored and humbled by the National Committee on the Voting Rights Act to serve as one of your guest commissioners today. Having been just recently appointed, you may consider me as a young kid on the block. I'm honored that I happen to be sitting next to John Buchanan, who I have heard about and read about for many years but have not had the privilege of personally meeting him.

As an Alabamian, and as one of the architects who planned and assisted in initiating the Civil Rights Movement as it evolved from Montgomery in '55, and even before -- and even before December 1st, I bring to this Commission a different perspective than the other commissioners.

And it may take me a little longer to let you understand my perspective because I think it's relevant as to why we need to extend the Voting Rights Act.

I'm a lawyer today because when I was a junior at Alabama State College for Negroes -- and that's what the name of it was in 1947 in December when I enrolled -- as the historic black institution that's still in Montgomery, I lived on one side of town, the west side. Alabama State was on the east. I worked with a newspaper and we had a real problem even then in '47 of having unfairness on the buses in our city, so it was a very soul item.

Out there with everything Alabama at that time was completely segregated and I made a secret commitment that I kept secret for some years; that is, I was going to leave Alabama, go to law school -- couldn't go to the University of Alabama because of my grades -- return to Alabama, pass the Bar exam and destroy everything segregated I could find.

[Applause]

MR. GRAY: Now, for a young Alabamian in Montgomery from the ghettos, that was almost unthinkable. But I love Alabama. I went to Western Reserve University, now Case Western in Cleveland, enrolled in September of '51, graduated in three years.

And there's a judge sitting back there from Cleveland who was a senior in the class at Case Western or Western Reserve then when I was a freshman. And so was her husband. They weren't married then. But he tells the story, I was just a little boy running around and none of them thought I had any chance of being much of anything. But there's someone who is back there and we're happy to have her with us today, too.

[Applause]

MR. GRAY: When I finished Reserve in June of '54, out of an overabundance of caution, I stopped by Columbus and took the Ohio Bar examination and in July I took -- I mean, I took the Alabama Bar in July, and was licensed to practice in both of those states in August and September, respectively. And Since September 8th of '54, I continuously have practiced in Alabama.

Now, my first case -- and I was then ready to go back to Alabama to begin doing what I had planned, and there were many people who were -- belonged to the Civil Rights Movement who got caught up in it, who were there. They happened to have been at a certain place at a certain time and because of that, they became involved.

But my involvement in civil rights was planned and I began to execute that plan once I got back.

And while all of you know about the Rosa Parks case and Dr. King and about Bloody Monday, most of you don't know about Claudia Carvin. Claudia Carvin was a 15-year-old African-American girl that I represented nine months before I represented Rosa Parks, so on March the 3rd, 1955, she was arrested under very similar circumstances and we came to her rescue.

We were talked out of receding at that time. But she was a model of courage to Mrs. Parks and to Joann Robinson and to myself. And Rosa Parks was a personal friend of mine. She lived about three blocks from the church that I attended. She worked a block-and-a-half from my law office.

She sometimes served as a part-time secretary to me. And we would have lunch every day. And I had lunch with her on December 1st, 1955, and probably was the last person who had a conversation with her before the arrest on that afternoon, even though at the time of her arrest, I wasn't even in town.

But I said that to you to let you know that there were things going on in Montgomery.

But I realized that long before Rosa Parks and long before Bloody Sunday, there were African- Americans in Macon County, Alabama, Tuskegee, who were highly educated. Some had two or more degrees but they couldn't become voters and they started filing lawsuits as early as 1945 and then later, even before even the Civil Rights Act was passed, were able to get the federal government to file some cases involving voter registration in Alabama at that time.

So this question of voter registration and what we're doing in Tuskegee now is in order to preserve some of this history and let people know about because most people don't know about it -- and they don't know about it because the folks involved were either at Tuskegee Institute, now Tuskegee University, who were getting annual appropriation from the legislature and if word got out, they would no longer have received it, or they worked at the VA Hospital which was then completely segregated and operated by African- Americans.

So we had a background and even before the Voting Rights Act of '65, the first Civil Rights Act in 1957, it was persons -- and I testified before the committee when they were -- when the bill was in the planning, and it was people from Tuskegee and from Macon County who really laid the foundation to show in documents what had happened in Alabama.

So, let me answer them and say if you want to know then what goes on and then later on you find out that in addition to voting registration, we had the privilege of filing suits in the healthcare field, you name it. During the last 50 years if it's something dealing with discrimination in Alabama, we had something to do with it. And all of it was a part of eradicating the effect of discrimination, really eradicating segregation.

The question you raised is: Commissioner, what in the world does all that have to do with the Voting Rights Act extension? It has everything to do with it. And I'll tell you why it has everything to do with it. It shows that we cannot rely upon -- Alabama I know about. These other states I read about. We cannot rely upon the power structure of the State of Alabama to protect the rights of African-Americans. They never have. There should have been no need for it in the first place once the 15th Amendment was adopted, but we cannot depend upon that.

So then if we're going to leave it up to the State of Alabama to decide and, you know, the Act that's helped us so much, and I was the one when they were beaten back on Bloody Sunday, I was called and went to Selma that night.

And in less than 24 hours, we filed a case of Jose Williams vs. George Wallace to make them protect the individuals.

So then what I'm saying to you, as a result of these provisions of the Act, when I served in the Alabama Legislature with Tom Reed from 1970 to 1974, I was the first African-American to serve in the Alabama legislature since reconstruction. We've come a long way.

We now have in Alabama more black elected officials than any other state in the nation.

[Applause]

MR. GRAY: And our legislature reflects the composition of the population of our state. We have African-Americans who head the finance committee in both the House and the Senate in Alabama.

And the only reason we have that is because of the Voting Rights Act they have now pending and it was just filed a few weeks ago by some Republicans in Alabama, as you probably know, to get the redistrict in the legislature. The whole purpose of it is to get some of those black votes out.

So I'm saying to you, if we don't have an extension of the Voting Rights Act, then we are at the mercy and we're going backwards and not forward and I certainly think that that needs to be extended. And I apologize to Mr. Chairman for taking this extra time. Thank you.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, Mr. Gray. Apology more than accepted.

The National Commission thanks the National Bar Association for hosting this hearing in such a wonderful setting and for all of its support. We also thank Bingham, McCutcheon for the excellent work of its associates in preparing the report for this hearing.

We're now ready to hear the first panel and if those panelists will come and take their seats, I'd appreciate it very much. That includes Debo Adegbile, Honorable G. K. Butterfield -- is that Marytza, Marytza Sanz?

MS. SANZ: Marytza.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Marytza Sanz and Courtenay Strickland, if I'm pronouncing that correctly, and Regine Monestime.

Let me introduce the panelists. Debo P. Adegbile is the Associate Director of Litigation at the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc. Bertie works for the Director of Litigation to oversee the organization's legal program while remaining actively engaged in voting rights litigation and advocacy.

Mr. Adegbile's voting rights experience with LDF encompasses constitutional cases and actions arising out of the Voting Rights Act and other federal and state statutes.

Recently he served as lead counsel for African-American Intervenors, the Louisiana House of Representatives versus Ashcroft, et al. The litigation resulted in the settlement through which Louisiana withdrew a redistricting plan that would have diminished the voting strength of its African-American citizens and adopted a plan that preserves their voting strength.

Congressman G.K. Butterfield represents the First District of North Carolina in the U.S. House of Representatives, the eastern part of the state, he tells me. He currently serves as a member of the House Committee on Agriculture and the House Armed Services Committee.

In addition, Butterfield also served on the prestigious Democratic Steering and Policy Committee. Prior to running for Congress, he served as a resident Superior Court Judge for 12 years before being appointed to the Supreme Court of North Carolina by then Governor Michael Easley.

Butterfield is a past president of the North Carolina Association of Black Lawyers and has filed several successful voting rights lawsuits that resulted in the election of black elected officials in eastern North Carolina.

Regine Monestime currently heads her own law firm, focusing on appellate and real estate law. Prior to this, she served as an Assistant Attorney General in the Criminal Appeals Division before the Eleventh Judicial Circuit, Third District Court of Appeals, the Florida Supreme Court, and the United States District Court for over two years. Ms. Monestime then joined the City of Miami's attorney's office where she was chief appellate counsel in the litigation division.

For the past five years she has been a core member of the Haitian Lawyers Association serving in numerous capacities and is currently the immediate past president of the association. She has volunteered in local, state and national elections to ensure that voting rights, particularly those of in the Haitian-American community in South Florida, are preserved.

Marytza Sanz is a President and CEO of Latino Leadership located in Orlando, Florida. Latino Leadership is a non-profit, non-partisan, community-based organization working to guarantee the welfare of children by pursuing the development of a strong, vibrant Hispanic community for Central Florida through leadership development and empowerment, education advancement and economic community development.

Courtenay Strickland is the Director of the Voting Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union of Florida. She is responsible for coordinating the Florida ACLU's legal, legislative, and grass roots efforts on a number of election reform issues. In 2001, she co-founded the Miami-Dade Election Reform Coalition, a leading advocate of progressive voting practices, particularly with regard to voting machine technology.

In addition, Ms. Strickland is the primary organizer of the ACLU's campaign to restore the voting and civil rights of its 600,000-plus citizens of Florida who have lost their rights due to a past felony conviction.

In that capacity, she founded the Florida Rights Restoration Coalition, a statewide group of nearly 40 local, state and national organizations dedicated to bringing an end to Florida's unjust voting ban through a state constitutional amendment.

What I'm going to do is to ask each of the panelists to give their statement and then after all of the panelists have spoken, the Commissioners will have a chance to pose questions.

So why don't we begin with Congressman Butterfield.

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and the other Commissioners. Thank you for inviting me to share in this program this morning and to talk about the extension of the Voting Rights Act.

First, let me bring greetings to you from the 43 men and women who comprise the Congressional Black Caucus. I want you to know that we're unanimous in our support of the extension of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act and so I start by bringing greetings to you from the Congressional Black Caucus.

[Applause]

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: Thank you. It is good to be at this program today with my colleague, Bobby Scott, from Virginia. Bobby serves on the Judiciary Committee along with three other CBC members, Maxine Waters, John Conyers , also serve on the Judiciary Committee there in the House of Representatives.

I represent the First Congressional District of North Carolina. The First District is the 15th poorest district in the nation and we're located in northeastern North Carolina.

When the Voting Rights Act was enacted in 1965, we had virtually no black elected officials in my Congressional district. Today, I'm happy to report to you that we now have 261 African- Americans serving in public office in my Congressional district alone. That includes five members of the general assembly, 14 judges, 51 county commissioners, some 80 or 90 municipal officials, 18 mayors, four sheriffs, three registered CBs [ph], two or three clerks of court. We have 261 black officials serving in my district and so we've come a long way since 1965. But this change did not come without a price. Most of this progress that we have benefitted from in northeastern North Carolina has resulted from voting rights litigation.

When I came out of law school, I had the same passion that Fred Gray had when he returned back to his home community. I had the strong desire to challenge the system and to improve electoral opportunities in my community. And so then when I went back to my home community, the first thing we recognized was that we had 23 miles of unpaved streets in the black community, one-half of a mile of unpaved streets in the white community.

My law firm did not have the financial ability to bring a lawsuit to challenge the unpaved streets and so we brought in the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and they filed the lawsuits and every street in my home community was paved within two years.

And so as I make my comments today, I just want to give kudos to this great organization because, but for this organization, it would not have happened.

[Applause]

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: And then after we challenged the unpaved streets, we next were interested to challenge the system of election for county commissioners, the city council and the board of education. We knew about the Voting Rights Act, but we did not have a full appreciation of how to utilize the Voting Rights Act and to make change happen.

And so we called in the NAACP Legal Defense Fund and Julius Chambers and others came to our rescue and came in and provided much needed resources.

And we filed a lawsuit against the county challenging at-large elections and in so doing, we discovered that there had been three changes in election procedures that had not been pre-cleared by the Justice Department. And so not only did we file a Section 2 claim, but we also asserted a Section 5 claim.

And because of the far-reaching effects of Section 5, we were able to stop the elections of the county commissioners and the Justice Department came in and objected to the changes that pre-dated our lawsuit and because of that, we were able to win the lawsuit and now we have three African-Americans on that board out of seven. The chairman is also an African-American.

And so we have come a long ways in the evolution of voting rights in eastern North Carolina. But I want you to know and I want you to understand that there continues to be great resentment among the white power structure in eastern North Carolina to the Voting Rights Act.

And I can assure you that if Section 5 is not extended, there will be a rush to change district elections back to at-large election systems. And so it is vitally important that we maintain and enhance Section 5 in every way that we can.

I know that Congress is going to be looking at evidence from 1982 forward, but I suggest that you cannot evaluate whether or not we need to continue Section 5 without looking at the period from 1899, which is when George White was in Congress. And incidentally, I represent the same district that George White represented at the turn of the century.

You cannot look at contemporary evidence without looking at the historical evidence. And from 1899 all the way down through the years to 1982, there was pervasive discrimination in voting in my Congressional district; not only my district, but throughout the State of North Carolina.

To give you an example: My father was elected as the fourth black elected official in North Carolina in 1953, the first in eastern North Carolina. How did it happen? He was a community activist. He was a dentist by profession. How did it happen?

Well, we had district elections in my home town in 1953 and they got busy and registered large numbers of African-Americans to vote in Ward 3, and he ran in 1953 and it was a tie vote and his name was selected from a hat and he was declared the winner.

Prior to the next election, my family was on vacation in New York, and while we were away, the city council called an emergency meeting and changed -- Fred knows what I'm about to say -- from district elections to at-large elections. And so at the next election he was defeated. Had we had a Section 5, that would not have happened.

And so I say all of that to say that if we eliminate Section 5, you will begin to see a mass movement to revert to at-large elections in the south. And at-large elections would, I suppose, be fine if we did not have racially-polarized voting.

But racially-polarized voting continues to be a very, very serious problem in the rural south. And so I want to thank you very much for the work that you're doing. I want to help you make a record for the extension of Section 5 because it is certainly needed. I will be delighted to answer any questions that you have.

I was in the Senate gallery in 1982 when this great debate was taking place and I saw my senator from my home state, Senator Jesse Helms, and the other Senator, John East. I saw them on the Senate floor doing everything within their power to keep this Act from being extended and to keep Section 2 from being amended to a result standard.

I saw that. I saw it personally and I know that there is a willingness and a desire on the part of local officials to revert to at-large elections if we just give them that opportunity. We've come a long ways in North Carolina. 261 black elected officials in one district is a phenomenal story and we're going to be celebrating that on August the 20th.

We're going to have the Voting Rights Act celebration and John Lewis is going to be our keynote speaker and we're ready to celebrate this progress, but we have a long ways to go. And we have 25 African-Americans serving in our general assembly. We have 53 judges in North Carolina.

When I was in law school 30 years ago, we had none. Today we have 53 African-American judges serving in our state. None on the State Supreme Court, I might say. We have an all Republican State Supreme Court except for one, and it's an all-white Supreme Court. We're going to work on that, but we have judges at all levels of government.

So thank you. Thank you very much for the work that you're doing. I look forward to working with you as we work to extend the Voting Rights Act.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, Congressman.

Ms. Sanz.

MS. SANZ: Good morning to the Chairman and all the Commissioners. I am honored. I am honored to be here with all of you and I am going to be talking from my heart.

I am a resident of this community for 19 years. I moved from San Juan, Puerto Rico. And I came to a country that elections were supposed to be easy and very fair for all. I come from a country that our main board is politics, elections. Everybody goes out and votes. We have our stores closed. Everything is stopped in the island for everybody to be able to go and vote because they understand the importance of that.

When I moved here, I started out as a community activist registering people to vote because I saw that the Hispanic community were not understanding why it was important for them to vote. Understanding that only you have a voice when in the numbers they show how many of your people came out and vote, and I took that as our flag and I said, everybody is going to be registered and everybody is going to vote.

The sadness of that is that after you motivate the people to come out and vote, it happens the thing that they're not in the list. They change automatically the place where they were supposed to go and vote. They vote and the votes, nobody knows where they went.

In this past election, people that were in line two and three hours, after they got there to the voting polls, they say: You're not supposed to be here.

So imagine if you're working for 6.15 an hour and you have to lose one full day of work. Do you think that you're going to be motivated to go back to another poll? It's going to be very, very devastating for the people.

Another thing that we have seen is that once that we teach the community the rules, an invisible hand of the good old boy system always change the rules. When everything -- we think that everything is going okay. We train our people everything is okay. Suddenly the hands, they change.

We have a people agent here in Florida and here in Osceola County with a single member district. How come a community that has 46 persons of Latino, they don't have one elected official there? They were able to vote by district and suddenly they changed and this is something that we have heard through the presentation of some of you that has been happening.

Here that is happening in Osceola County. And when we motivate the people to come out and vote, they tell you: Why do I have to go and vote if it's not going to be counted, if I am not going to be taken in consideration?

Another thing, we understand that the Hispanic community is a new community that has been growing very fast. We have been always in existence, but the thing is that we were a silent lion. Now, we're waking up and we are letting people know that not everybody that moves into their country, they're not undocumented.

Here in Central Florida, the majority of the community is a Puerto Rican community. They can come, they move, they register and they vote in the election. They don't have to wait for a long process. So that is something that we have to take in consideration.

The paper trail for these elections to come, I think that is something that is a big concern of our community. We see that the people say, how come we are going to vote? If you go to McDonald's and you receive a receipt, how come you're going to vote? That is something that's so important and you're not going to be receiving anything.

I please ask you that, I understand that we cannot change everything to accommodate maybe the diversity of nations that we have around the nation. But we understand that facilitating in the language of the people, the ballot, the material is going to really make a big difference. And it's not a big expense.

I think that if we all get together, we can get those expenses covered, and something that we have been observing here in Florida, our law is going to change in registration.

I am the president of a non-profit organization and those of you know about the non-profit organization. We have to be asking for dollars all the time. You're looking for money. In this new law, what it's telling you is that if you register a person and that person when he goes to the voting place and the name is not seen on the list, I can be fined as a non-profit organization.

What is that going to go? What it's going to do is that it's going to hold me back of me going out and doing voting registration and voting education because I will understand that I will be penalized.

So those are the things that are happening here in Florida, and I think that we are all the ones that are here from Florida. We have discovered that Florida is a state that everybody in the nation knows where it is around the country.

I was on vacation out of the country and what they told me, oh, you come from Florida. Do you still believe in the government? That is very sad.

So I ask for all of you to help us because the mighty dollars are the ones that are taking charge of the elections of the nation, and we want to give the voice because we understand that the voice is a vote and we need everybody to understand that and to help us bring that message out.

Thank you very much.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you very much.

Ms. Monestime.

MS. MONESTIME: Good morning, Chairman. Thank you so much for inviting me to be here, and I'm particularly pleased to be here. I represent the Haitian-American community in South Florida and I'm so happy that we have a voice at this table and to allow our concerns to be heard.

I'd like to focus my talk on the Section 203, the language assistance part because I think for the Haitian-American community, that's most relevant aside from the other issues that face other minorities.

And I'd like to just -- so that we are all on the same table, just to talk about, you know, what is the spirit behind this section and why it is so important for it to be extended. The guidelines start by saying, jurisdiction should take all reasonable steps to enable language minority voters to be effectively informed of and participate effectively in voting-connected activities.

The guidelines also say that a jurisdiction is more likely to achieve compliance if it has worked with the cooperation and to the satisfaction of organizations representing members of the applicable language minority group. So who are these minorities? Who are these South Florida Haitians?

A recent poll from the Sun Sentinel in Broward has stated that we have approximately two to 300 documented Haitians in that area. 91 percent of them are Haitian-born, seven percent are born in the United States, 67 percent of Haitians arrived in the United States in the '80s and '90s, 75 percent of them prefer to speak Haitian Creole, 60 percent of them live in Miami-Dade County, and the other 40 percent live in the surrounding counties, 26 percent of them have completed grade school, 22 percent have attended high school, 18 percent graduated from high school, 11 percent attended college, and 9 percent of Haitians have actually graduated college.

You know, these people, and it's important for us to understand who they are, come from a poor nation, indeed, the poorest nation in this hemisphere where over 90 percent of the country is illiterate. They do not read in their own language, Haitian Creole, much less the English language.

And it's because, particularly because of the political turmoil that has faced Haiti for so many years, they have a general distrust of politics and politicians. So that's the background and the backdrop for who they are and how they vote in the United States.

So why the need for this reauthorization given all of this? I think we need to again start talking about what are the conditions for the last three reauthorizations and whether those conditions still exist. I think that it's plain to see that, yes, they do, and I'm going to give you some personal experiences that I've had in helping and volunteering in elections as a member of the Haitian Lawyers Association.

You know, we all know that there's a need for a diverse elected official body. We all know that there's a need for us to be civically engaged in politics and so forth.

In Miami-Dade County where the Haitian- American community is most strong, we are so proud to have six Haitian-American elected officials and one Haitian judge. In the other counties, however, where the presence, and particularly in the political power, is negligible, we have none. So we need to have eyes on those counties.

We need to understand what are the more sophisticated ways that racism and discrimination persists.

From my organization, we've seen when we are in the polls, as either poll watchers or outside of the polls, Haitians don't have the education and because the language issue is so great, they oftentimes do not understand the basics.

Yes, they can tell you that they're going to vote for George Bush or Gore or whomever, but they're not going to understand a ballot question about transportation and whether gambling should be legalized or whether we should have a constitutional amendment about privacy if it's not in their own language. They don't understand that you can actually have someone come with you into the poll and assist you in translating.

One of the major problems that I found is that the poll workers themselves are not -- either are not educated about what their responsibilities are or just fail to adhere to the rules because I've seen where the poll workers have denied Haitians from allowing them to bring their son or their daughter or their cousin to help them translate the ballot.

And myself, as an advocate, I have to go through the steps of calling the State Department and calling, you know, making the requisite calls, and then finally after 30 minutes, one hour, you may get some assistance. But these people who do not speak the language are not sophisticated enough to do this. So absolutely, yes. We need to have this extension.

You know, Haitians again, they feel very intimidated by the entire process. They feel as though if someone questions them about how long have you been here, who are you voting for, they're going to naturally tend to shy away. There's not enough pre-election materials in Haitian Creole to inform them, this is the date that you're supposed to vote; this is the place where you're supposed to go.

The precincts may have changed or not and this information needs to be both in English and in Haitian Creole. It's not just a ballot at the time of the election, but they need to know where to go and what the rules are surrounding them. They don't know that they can ask for help. They don't know that the poll workers inside are there to assist them, rather than just to ensure that, you know, they cast their vote.

The other big issue that we have is many poll workers do not speak their language. So, again, it doesn't help them if they go into a poll even if they have someone that assists them, but if there's not poll workers that are able to translate and are able to tell them, this is where you go and this is how you punch it, it's really -- it's more than a chilling effect that you're effectively denying their right to exercise their constitutional right to vote.

So for all of these reasons and so many more -- I know I'm over my time -- I absolutely insist that we extend this Section 203.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you very much. You weren't over your time.

MS. MONESTIME: Oh, okay. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Ms. Strickland.

MS. STRICKLAND: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And thank you to the commissioners in this body for holding these very important hearings and taking and end-up at this issue.

As I pondered exactly what to bring here to you today given all the voting problems that Florida has experienced in recent years, I thought to look specifically at Section 5 and Section 203 and the important roles that those sections have played in very recent years.

We've all heard of the various problems that have occurred in Florida in recent elections, and we know that in Florida, it's not just about the machines.

In various elections, voting technology has gotten a lot of press. But as we've heard here today in testimony in 2000, in 2002, in 2004, there have been problems with identification requirements, problems with precinct changes without proper notice to the voters, problems with language.

We certainly received complaints from Osceola County, for example, in the 2000 elections where at the time, Osceola was not a language minority jurisdiction because the new census figures had not been calculated, and yet over one-third of the population was Hispanic and it was very obvious from a pure logic standpoint that the information for voting should have been available in Spanish as well as English.

Now, Osceola is a language minority jurisdiction and those requirements are in place. But it's clear that those sorts of actions cannot be assumed to happen without the legal requirements that they do so.

In Miami-Dade County you saw similar concerns where signs about where to park were posted in English and Creole, and yet you enter the polling place and the ballot itself was not available in Creole.

Fortunately that, too, has been corrected. Now, the trilingual ballot is available not just in a few dozen native precincts as it was at the time, but in all precincts in Miami-Dade County. The problem with assistance and having all voting materials in a trilingual format is another issue. But nonetheless, this headway could not have been made without the pressure put on our officials by legislation like the Voting Rights Act and Section 203.

I'm not going to get into the disproportionate ratio impact that so many of the voting problems that have occurred in Florida has had. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights has documented that extensively. You know, certainly it is the case that problems with identification requirements have existed in part because people within minority communities tend to move more often within the same county, which can lead to a host of problems at the polling place because people do not have to re-register if they move within the same county.

But they may, for example, show up at the wrong precinct, which can have implications if they're given a provisional ballot and all sorts of issues depending on that county's particular voting rules.

People within minority communities, likewise are more likely to be renters, which can also lead to increased moves and problems at the polling place. And certainly they're disproportionately represented among the impoverished who are also less likely to have things like photo identification which have been required at the polls.

As a result of all these problems, the State of Florida and its 67 counties have embarked on a number of changes. And with this push for better elections have come big opportunities; opportunities to make massive improvements and also opportunities to do damage. After the 2000 election, for example, the Florida Election Reform Act of 2001 contains some very problematic provisions about which the ACLU submitted comments to the Department of Justice after they were submitted for pre-clearance. For example, the Florida Election Reform Act of 2001 requires a posting of a list of voter responsibilities in every polling place.

Number one on this list was that each registered voter in the State has the responsibility to study and know candidates and issues. Well, this -- mind you, this is posted in the polling place at the time the person has already arrived to cast his or her ballot.

This is not something that's posted along with the mail order that goes out to alert you to where your polling place is or something like that. This is after the person has already arrived, and certainly can act as a large deterrent; in fact, someone not familiar with the process or could be misused by poll workers, for example, who seek to prevent certain voters from voting.

The Florida Election Reform Act of 2001 also included among these responsibilities for the voter to know his or her precinct and its hours of operation. In 2000, it certainly was very difficult for many voters to know that information despite their best efforts.

It also included to bring proper identification to the polling station which certainly at that time was a misstatement of Florida law because it was an affidavit process by which, if there was no other problem with your registration, one could fill out an affidavit and register to vote. And a whole list of other things.

We submitted comment to the Department of Justice confirming the voter responsibility list concerning the new felon purge process that was enacted as a part of the reforms in 2001, concerning the list maintenance procedure and the disqualification process for provisional ballots, by which if a person votes a provisional ballot in the wrong precinct, that provisional ballot is rejected as illegal and the person's choices, even in the races for which they would have otherwise qualified are not counted.

Despite the fact that the Department of Justice did pre-clear these very provisions to which we objected, the process was useful because in some cases they did so with the express understanding that the new laws would be implemented in such a way as to address many of the concerns that had been expressed by our group and others in as best a way possible given the law.

The request for more information on some of these laws also put the state and counties on notice of possible concerns in their implementation. With the passage of the Voter Responsibilities List, we also sued in a lawsuit that contained VRA Section 2 and Section 5 challenge over the Voter Responsibilities List.

And while the solution did not ultimately come through the courts, the Florida Legislature later went back and amended those voter responsibilities. They still may not meet exactly what we would want, but now posted in every polling place is the requirement that each registered voter in the state should, which is an important change in wording, familiarize himself or herself of the candidates and issues. It still says bring proper identification to the polling station.

Unfortunately, there no longer is an affidavit process. But importantly, at the very bottom of the sign it says, note to voter: Failure to perform any of these responsibilities does not prohibit a voter from voting.

That was a very important addition that was made precisely as a result of claims that were brought under the Voting Rights Act -- I should say, arguably, as a result of claims brought under the Voting Rights Act and of various pressure put on the state lawmakers to make those changes.

So those are just a few, I hope, fairly concrete examples of how these sections have helped. We now have two brand new election reform laws that have recently been passed, including House Bills 1567 and 1589, which have now been signed by the Governor.

And given some of what I've just gone over from reforms after 2000, I hope that it's certainly clear that these laws should be assessed and analyzed for any possible retroaggressive impact that they might have on minorities, and that given what we've seen happen in 2001, that certainly the time has not passed for that sort of scrutiny to occur in pre-clearance jurisdictions in Florida and elsewhere.

So with that, I will conclude. I think that Section 5 and Section 203 and the Voting Rights Act as a whole are as important now as they have ever been, and that Section 5 perhaps is absolutely crucial at this time, given the number of voting changes that are occurring around this entire country.

Thank you.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, Ms. Strickland. And now Mr. Adegbile.

MR. ADEGBILE: Thank you, Chairman Davidson. Good morning. I'm Debo Adegbile of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund and it's a pleasure to deliver testimony this morning before the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. LDF has been a pioneer and leader in the efforts to secure and protect minority voting rights in the United States and especially those of African- Americans.

LDF has played a major advocacy role in working toward the enactment of the VRA of 1965 and has been involved in every major legislative and administrative voting rights since, including the development, passage, implementation and defense of the 1982 amendments to the VRA.

A central question presented by the renewal of the expiring enforcement provisions of the VRA is whether recent experience within covered jurisdictions justifies the extension. A thorough review of that experience strongly suggests that it does.

Accordingly, for purposes of today's hearing, I will focus my testimony on the experience under the VRA and Section 5 in particular in the State of Louisiana since the time of the 1982 renewal. Although Louisiana has a very well-documented history of voting discrimination against its African-American citizens, the scope and persistence of those practices since the last renewal stand as powerful evidence of the pressing need for continued protection.

I believe that any fair reading of the experience makes it plain that voting discrimination in Louisiana persists and that if Section 5 is not renewed, the state will experience a sudden and avoidable reduction of African-American access to the political process at every level of government.

66 percent of the objections interposed under Section 5 in Louisiana have occurred since the 1982 renewal. These block changes have impacted every aspect of African-American voting, including redistricting, polling place relocation, changes in voting procedures, voter registration, annexations, and other alterations of elected bodies, and even an attempted suspension of a presidential primary election.

Discriminatory changes were proposed at every level of government, including the state legislature, the state court system, the state board of education, parish councils, school boards, police, juries, city councils, and boards of Aldermen.

In Louisiana, attempts to dilute black voting strength have been widespread. 33, more than half of Louisiana's 64 parishes and 13 of its cities and towns have proposed discriminatory voting changes since 1982, many more than one time.

The DOJ was also compelled to object 17 times to attempts by the state itself to make changes that would set back minority voting rights in congressional, state legislative, state board of education, and state court elections. And in a stark, statewide illustration of the persistence and hostility toward equal African-American participation in Louisiana's political process, since the VRA was passed in 1965, every proposed Louisiana State House of Representatives' redistricting plan has been objected to by the DOJ, including three since 1982.

No great progress has been made by black voters and elected officials in Louisiana due in significant part to the protections afforded by Section 5. The job is far from finished. As experience in Louisiana since 1982 shows, voting discrimination in that state remains entrenched and many white officials remain intransigent, refusing to provide basic information required under Section 5 to the Department of Justice, repeatedly excluding black communities from local decision-making processes and even retaliating against black officials who advocate for non-discriminatory changes.

These consistent efforts to diminish black voting power are not inconsequential remnants of the past that should or can be ignored. Beyond familiar Section 5 objections involving the failure of the state or its sub-jurisdictions to demonstrate the absence of discriminatory effects, Assistant Attorneys General in each of the past three decades have consistently noted evidence of Louisiana officials continuing intent to discriminate, including rejection of readily available non-discriminatory alternatives, inconsistent application of standard, drastic voting changes immediately following attempts by black candidates to win public office, and even candid admissions of racism by state and local officials as recently as 2001.

As Assistant Attorney General John Dunne said at the 1991 redistricting plan for the Louisiana House of Representatives: The departures are explainable, at least in part, by a purpose to minimize the voting strength of a minority group.

Although Louisiana is not alone in this regard, it is in part the persistence of purposeful discrimination in the state that requires continuing vigilance of Section 5.

The magnitude and breadth of objections is great, but the need for Section 5's ongoing protection is further enhanced when one considers that awareness of Section 5 has likely deterred even greater levels of voting discrimination.

This is because the rational public official is less likely to discriminate if he or she knows that they will be called upon to publicly explain and justify what it is they have done.

In a sense, Section 5 has served to clear away the weeds in Louisiana, but there is a strong likelihood that any lapse in its protection would let those weeds grow back from the roots and, once again, choke off meaningful political opportunity for African-Americans.

I want to pick up on what one of our distinguished commissioners said in his opening remarks and what the distinguished Congressman said and just share a word about Louisiana's history because we can't understand what occurs today without understanding where we've been in that state.

Louisiana's constitutional interpretation test was only one development in a long history of vote denials, suppression and dilution.

Until 1868, the state constitution simply limited the vote to white males. Following the Civil War, there were no legal impediments to black voting and black citizens made up 45 percent of the state's registered voters as compared to 29 percent at the time of the 2000 census.

But in 1898, Louisiana pioneered the use of the Grandfather Clause, which imposed complicated education and property requirements only on registrants whose fathers or grandfathers has not been registered to vote before January 1st, 1867.

I could go on with his history, but I want to bring it up to the contemporary because we are living history in Louisiana. Many of Louisiana's white officials have continued to be committed to repeated efforts to minimize black voting power.

From the first Section 5 objection until the most recent reauthorization in '82, the DOJ objected 50 times -- sorry, 50 attempts by state and local authorities to implement voting changes that would have diluted black voting strength.

Attempts at discrimination have not slowed since then. Indeed, it was a case involving a Louisiana parish school board that prompted Justice Souter of the United States Supreme Court to note in 2000, that 35 years after the enactment of the VRA, Section 5 must continue to be interpreted to prevent jurisdictions from pouring old poison into new bottles.

Against the backdrop of this legacy of discrimination, in the context of Section 5 litigation, Louisiana unsuccessfully attempted to win approval for its state legislative redistricting plan in 2002.

I had the opportunity to depose the Speaker of the House in that case and I had the opportunity to ask him whether Louisiana had ever passed laws that sought to diminish the opportunities of African-Americans to participate in the political process.

His response was: I wouldn't think.

Voting discrimination in Louisiana has been adaptive and persistent and that reality in Louisiana and elsewhere gave rise to Section 5 pre-clearance.

Notwithstanding this history, optimism, skepticism, or recent Supreme Court decisions cause some to ask whether the Section 4 coverage formula has grown stale. The original coverage formula was a legislative proxy designed to reach jurisdictions with some of the worst traditions of voting discrimination.

Section 5, in turn, provided a powerful remedy in recognition of the fact that these traditions were deeply rooted.

In the case of Louisiana, the history has proven to be a strong predictor of the present. A period of 40 years of VRA protection has been insufficient to erase the effects and ongoing practice of voting discrimination. Consequently, Louisiana strongly suggests that what the Section 4 coverage reached, the contemporary record continues to justify. The post-1982 renewal experience in Louisiana with Section 5 supplies important proof.

Since 1982, Section 5 objections have helped prevent discriminatory changes in every aspect of Louisiana voting. Section 5 has not only allowed the DOJ to nullify specific discriminatory changes, but has also helped to check the practices that some white officials use to promote such changes, including secrecy, exclusion of minorities from decision-making processes, manipulation of standards, invention of new strategies; pouring new poison into new bottles and persistent attempts to revive old diluted strategies.

Most of Louisiana's 96 Section 5 objections since 1982 have involved redistricting. Officials have time and again attempted to limit black voters' political influence by over-concentrating them into a few districts packing or fragmenting them among several majority-white districts to prevent them from achieving a majority that provides the opportunity for communities to elect candidates of their choice even in the face of extreme racial bloc voting cracking. This second generation form of discrimination known as vote dilution is designed to cabin minority voting power and pick up where the more outright vote denial left off.

Significantly, multiple Assistant Attorneys General have also noted the persistence of racially polarized voting in the state, most recently in April 2005. The state itself acknowledged the persistence of racial bloc voting in 1996, the same year that a Federal District Court in Louisiana agreed that racial bloc voting is a fact of contemporary Louisiana politics.

In 1993, the Bossier Parish School Board had cracked black population concentrations so effectively that the parish had no majority-black districts at all, despite a black population of 20 percent, a 12-member school board, and the availability of an alternative plan that would have drawn two compact majority-black districts.

The story of the Louisiana House of Representatives' conduct with respect to drawing district lines for the state legislature reflects some of the most flagrant instances of minority vote fragmentation and the lasting commitment to voting discrimination. In 1982, even as Congress debated the continuing need for Section 5, the Louisiana House submitted a redistricting plan that was crafted with the purpose of reducing black voting power in New Orleans.

Then Attorney General William Bradford Reynolds noted that the unexplained elimination of a majority-black district in New Orleans left only one majority-black district and four majority-white districts in a ward that was 61 percent black.

Violating purported traditional redistricting principles, white officials resorted to drawing a non-contiguous district in uptown New Orleans in order to dilute the black vote there. Louisiana again failed to gain pre-clearance for its House redistricting plan in 1991 when, despite intensive dialogue with the DOJ and the existence of alternative plans by the Legislative Black Caucus, state legislators insisted on submitting a plan that minimized black voting strength.

But I want to speak just quickly about a case that I litigated that I've alluded to before. The post-2000 census of the House of Representatives redistricting plan followed the familiar pattern except that Louisiana, in this case, opted to pursue a declaratory judgment before a three-judge panel in the D.C. District Court as opposed to seeking administrative pre-clearance which had been their previous pattern.

The DOJ, under the leadership of John Ashcroft, Ashcroft opposed Louisiana's efforts to obtain pre-clearance. And my organization, on behalf of a bi-racial coalition of voters and the Louisiana Legislative Black Caucus, intervened and litigated in cooperation with the Department of Justice.

The conduct of the Louisiana House during that redistricting litigation further illustrates its pattern of cloaking discrimination with pretextual justification. In that litigation the state sought Section 5 pre-clearance of its House of Representatives' plan and through plaintiff's Speaker Pro Tempore Charles Emile "Peppi" Bruneau sought to cover its tracks by improperly withholding documents that evinced the House's purpose to retrogress in its redistricting plan.

LDF secured a court order to require Bruneau and other plaintiffs to produce versions of the redistricting guidelines that were distributed at the outset of the line drawing process to facilitate their work. These documents revealed the Bruneau had overseen the process that culminated in the removal from the guidelines of a provision that reminded legislators of their obligation to comply with the Voting Rights Act.

Bruneau and other witnesses for the Louisiana House explains that they removed the provision, which had been included in the guidelines for decades before the process began, in order to make the guidelines, quote, plain and understandable to a layman. Of course, Bruneau himself understood that the plan that he ushered through the House eliminated an African-American opportunity district from Orleans Parish, despite growth in the black voting-age population percentage there.

Faced with a strong Section 5 defense by DOJ, LDF and others, the Louisiana plaintiff settled that case on the eve of trial by agreeing to restore the eliminated Orleans opportunity district, among other favorable concessions for Louisiana's minority voters.

The court's order that brought Louisiana to the settlement table in this statewide redistricting case read in part: Louisiana has, quote, subverted what had been an orderly process of narrowing the issues in this case by making a radical mid-course revision in their theory of the case and by blatantly violating important procedural rules.

I will direct the panel also to a section in the testimony about repeat offenders. The concept explored in that section is that many of the same jurisdictions resubmit changes that are inadequate even after they've been told that they're inadequate. They persist and it is in part that persistence which slows the pre-clearance process.

One of the claims made is that pre-clearance takes too long. A careful review of the record, most recently, the Georgia voter ID measure will show that it is often deficiencies in the state's submissions in the first instance which adds to the time in pre-clearance.

And so I won't share it orally right now, but it's in the written testimony so that I can move forward.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Okay. If you would move forward fairly quickly, we'd appreciate it.

MR. ADEGBILE: Okay. This is the conclusion. While black voters and candidates have made tremendous progress since 1965 in Louisiana and elsewhere, progress is not simply attributable to a change of heart in the practice on the part of white decision-makers. Rather, it has come about through the determination and hard work of African-American communities, their advocates, and the continual intervention by the federal government.

If Section 5 had not been renewed in 1982, 96 attempts to dilute black voting strength since then would have had the force of law in Louisiana, leading to the deprivation of our most fundamental right to tens of thousands of African-Americans.

The record shows that the need for Section 5 coverage in Louisiana has not declined since 1982. In fact, the average number of objections per year actually increased from 3.8 before 1982 to 4.2 since.

Examining Louisiana's conduct with regard to the House of Representatives redistricting plans from 1965 through the present, can be viewed as an unbrokable line of the pattern of discrimination. The record shows that President Johnson's 1965 challenge to change the attitudes and structures from which voting discrimination arises, is far from being met. Intransigent officials and elected bodies throughout the state at the highest levels of power are common and persist across the decades.

I would like to leave the panel commending them to look at the Appendices that I have included in my testimony which go through in detail some of the stories that underlie the numbers that I've shared with you today. And thank you for your time.

[Aapplause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: I want to thank this panel for giving us very interesting and diverse testimony and concrete examples of some of the problems that minority voters are facing, and I would now like to ask if any of our commissioners have some questions that they would like to direct at particular panelists and I'll start with Mr. Gray.

MR. GRAY: I think the panel has done a good job. I have no questions, Mr. Chairman.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Okay. Congressman?

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: It's a pleasure to say amen to Mr. Gray, but -- since I'm both a preacher and a politician, I will.

Congressman Butterfield, you and your colleague I know and Tatum both talked about the importance of looking at the whole historic scene, you said, from 1899, not just the more recent history.

It seems to me that looking upon that scene in 1965 and '70 and '75, the posture of the federal judiciary -- and this will be a bad question to ask to lawyers and I apologize -- the posture of the federal judiciary is clearly on the side of protection of the rights and extending the rights of citizens and it's pretty clear in the history of that period that just as I saw in my district and you've seen in yours, that Ahab in terms of a power structure of a place like in the south like I see in Birmingham, it would appear to me that there may be a different situation in the federal judiciary now and perhaps even more so in the future.

I wonder if you have any comment to make about the weight of responsibility you as a legislator and your colleagues might have to make the law clear, firm, soundly based on the constitution, especially in light of the fact that as a people's representative, you may be the primary ones to look to preserve their rights in the years ahead.

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: Well, I think you're exactly right. We cannot look at the post-1982 period in isolation without looking at the pre-1982 era. During the '80s and '90s, we had pretty good support from the federal courts. The Federal District Court judges were willing to entertain our claims and litigate them and give us favorable results. But the evidence was so overwhelmingly against the defendants.

In so many of our counties we just had pervasive discrimination and we were able to present that evidence to the court.

I'm not so sure that district judges who serve now on the federal bench will be inclined to give favorable rulings as we got in the past. I have not litigated a voting rights case in many years now, but I suppose that the mindset is now against voter rights claims.

The thought is that the problem has been resolved, but it has not been resolved. So I think with strong advocacy, you're going to see the Section 5 extended. We have dialogue that's ongoing and I hope that something good will come out of it and hopefully we will see it extended. But I don't want to depend on the federal courts entirely on our protection.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, sir. Any other comments?

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: I had intended to tell a brief story about Halifax County, North Carolina, and I can do it in 30 seconds or less, I think.

Halifax County was one of the counties that we sued in North Carolina. No African-American had served on the Board of County Commissioners since reconstruction, and as a result of that voting rights lawsuit, we now have six single member districts in the county; three African-Americans, three whites.

The white chairman of the county commission has recently retired. The question now becomes, who succeeds him as chairman? And so there's a loggershead of opinion on the Board. The longest serving African-American wants to be the chairman and he only has the support of the African-American members on the Board.

The three white members of the Board wanted a white Republican to be chairman and two of the three white members are Democrats. And so --

MR. ADEGBILE: A very good example of polarized voting.

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: Yes. That is another example of the hard attitudes that we face.

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: Thank you. One more thing on Section 2. Our country's not only a melting pot. It's the originalization for the world's peoples' cultures and faiths, and it appears to be increasingly so. It turns out it will make your people, the Europeans, and like me, a distinct minority before too many years have passed.

Hence, if we're going to have a true Democratic society, we have to think about things like Section 2. You've made a very clear case and I appreciate that for Section 2, as well as Section 5. I thank all the members of the panel for their very clear and strong testimony.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Congressman Butterfield, with regard to the lawsuits that you and fellow voting rights lawyers have brought in North Carolina, would it be possible for you to supply this Commission with a list of those cases in the not too distant future?

MR. BUTTERFIELD: Absolutely. I'll be delighted to do that. Legal defense fund had its0 hands in most of those cases, the most notable of which was Jingles versus Edmundson, which integrated our general assembly. Yes. I'll be delighted to get those to you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you very much.

MR. BUTTERFIELD: Yes.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Governor, would you like to pose some questions?

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Sure. Thank you kindly.

Congressman, I wanted to get a perspective from you in terms of -- because this is obviously coming up for a vote that will take place in the House and the Senate.

You've had some chance to discuss this among your colleagues. You mentioned in particular, unanimous support in terms of the CBC. I understand that also that the Chairman -- forgive me. Jon, give me the Chairman's name.

MR. GREENBAUM: Sensenbrenner.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Yes. Chairman Sensenbrenner, I think, has -- the Republican Chairman, in particular, of the House -- is that the judiciary?

MR. GREENBAUM: Judiciary.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Judiciary committee -- has indicated that he is making the Voting Rights Act a priority, a priority in terms of the judiciary committee, in terms of its passage.

Can you give me some sense about the bipartisan support that may exist in terms of the House with respect to Section 5 and Section 2 in terms of reauthorization?

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: Back in January the Congressional Black Caucus went over to the White House and met with President Bush in a very private discussion and during that meeting a question came up about whether or not the Voting Rights Act should be extended, and the President told us at that time that he did not have much knowledge about Section 5, but he would get -- start looking into it and see what he could find out. We were very disappointed with that response.

We felt that the President in a second term at least should know something about the Voting Rights Act. But be that as it may, I do not serve on the Judiciary Committee. We have four CBC members who do. The ranking member is John Coggins and Bobby Scott, Mel White and Maxine Waters.

And I can tell you that the four of them are actively pursuing this extension. I don't know the nature of their discussions. I don't want to second-guess what is going on. But I do know that they are being very proactive at this time.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Absolutely. So your sense is essentially that you believe that we will have passage with respect to the two provisions?

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: I think it's within the realm of possibility. Sensenbrenner made a speech at the NAACP convention a few weeks ago in Milwaukee and he did indicate that he has support for strong voting rights and I believe that at the end of the day there will be some type of bipartisan effort to extend the Voting Rights Act.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: When you look in particular on the horizon the basis for objection as may be expressed by some members of Congress as it relates to Section 2 -- excuse me, 203, the language provision perhaps or Section 5, what do you see in terms of the outlook?

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: One debate is whether or not to simply extend it as it now exists without making any amendments, without making any modifications whatsoever to the Act, or whether or not we have got to open it up for discussion and add some provisions that don't exist at the current time.

I think there will be some amendments and I think at the end of the day they will pass. Not serving on the Judiciary Committee, I don't have the inside information that my colleague, Mr. Scott, may have, but except to say that there are discussions that are ongoing.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: One of the things that's been fascinating to some extent as we've traveled throughout the country is that some of the objection, if you will, is expressed regarding the Voting Rights Act. In particular with respect to Section 5, the pre-clearance provisions have come, I understand, from white Democrats who are, to some extent, upset with either how things are taking place in terms of the south or perhaps some of the districts that they've been drawn or otherwise. Have you heard that, sir?

CONGRESSMAN BUTTERFIELD: Well, I think there's resistance on both sides of the aisle to the extent of the Voting Rights Act. I cannot say that it's primarily coming from the Democratic side. The Democratic Caucus wants this Act extended. Congressman Claiborne is going to be the chairman of our caucus starting next year. He's an African-American. He's from the south, He's from South Carolina.

And I can virtually assure you that the Democratic Caucus will nearly unanimously support the extension. I cannot imagine that it would not.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Absolutely. One final question, if I may and this is a very general question.

Debo, I was curious about your testimony in particular because you really mention Louisiana as really being the central point of your testimony and that being significant problems. In particular, you note the fact that there had been objections by the Department of Justice in each circumstance in which a plan has essentially been submitted.

When you talk about sort of the entrenched nature of sort of -- not sort of, but at the end of the day problems related to race in Louisiana, can you give us some perspective about how far things had come in terms of progress and where you see things going in terms of the future?

MR. ADEGBILE: Certainly. There has been progress. I don't think anybody who does the work that we do is not prepared to accept that there has been progress. Because of the Voting Rights Act and the sacrifices of brave individuals, legislatures, and legislative bodies, and courts have been diversified across the deep south.

And as we've heard some people say, many of the southern jurisdictions have the highest percentage of serving African-Americans in their legislatures, school boards and congressional delegations. So in terms of representation, the progress has been measured.

The central question, I think, for purposes of the renewal is, how has that progress come about and whether or not that progress can follow what's been the historical pattern of reverting back to a previous situation or circumstances, and I think the experience in Louisiana and in many other jurisdictions is that, that is a real possibility, which is not to suggest that murder would be the tactic or that violence would be the tactic.

But I think my testimony sets out that one of the problems with voting discrimination is that it's persistent and adaptive. It finds a new way to achieve the same end.

And so as we celebrate the progress, which is important for all of us, and it's not just an African-American story, obviously, my brothers and sisters in the Latino community and Asian communities, the whole country has benefitted from the Voting Rights Act and we celebrate that collectively. But we have to be vigilant and make sure that we look to continue these protections. Particularly, I think it's fair to say at a time when our country is suggesting that democracy is an important answer worldwide, we have to first protect our democracy at home and make sure that the promises of the Constitution continue to realized and not simply words on a piece of paper.

[Applause]

MS. KEENAN: I just have one follow-up question. I knew they were coming for me and I tried to wait, but I have one follow-up question to the excellent questions asked by the Governor.

I have great concern -- and I think the Congressman talked a little bit about this -- in May the National Bar Association hosted the Coalition of Bars of Color at their annual meeting in Washington, D.C., and one of the things we did was to go up on the hill and we met with the Attorney General.

We met with various members of the Senate staff, the judiciary staff, and we also met with the Deputy General Counsel for the White House, and when we posed this question just in May of this year, we received a similar response. And that question was, you know, what is the President going to do about the Voting Rights Act? And the response -- and I will say I took responsibility for raising this issue -- but the response, which was very troubling, was that they didn't know, and that they had no sense from the President and that they did not -- they didn't have any response.

In fact, when I pointed out to them that, you know, it could be a great legacy of the President because he has no further elections to run in and certainly this issue is as American as apple pie, if you will, and he has an opportunity to leave a legacy to all Americans that will certainly make a lasting difference, they simply reported to me that they would share my concerns with the President.

And so I said to them: But you know we've given constitutional rights to vote in Iraq and we've given them state-of-the-art voting rights in Iraq, and it would just be, oh, so lovely if we could have those here in America.

[Applause]

MS. KEENAN: My parents are from the south. I was very gracious when I said that. I was smiling.

And they indicated to me that -- I think at that point, they really said, we really will share your concerns with the President.

So I guess my question for the panel and any panelists that would like to respond: What can we do to make sure that the White House has the message that Americans all over the country of all colors are very concerned about this issue?

And that it is something that they need to put on their priority list and that it's something that they should focus on so that when people ask these questions -- because I confess to you that as an attorney and certainly as a leader of a national organization, I was deeply concerned that that was the best response that they could provide me in May of this year, 2005, when this issue is so close at hand.

So what can we do? I think that sometimes we ask so much of everybody else, but what can we do to make this issue more a focus of the administration?

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Ms. Sanz.

MS. SANZ: From the grassroot aspect that is the one that I represent, I think that we have to go back in those times of the phones and sending mail and sending e-mails and sending faxes. We can do a very great campaign if everybody starts sending faxes the same day. We will be heard and I think that we have to call our Senators, our local Senators, our Congressmen, I think that the whole community because this is not something about being Democrat or being Republican. And I think that that is a fairest message that we have to bring. This is about our rights.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MS. SANZ: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Godspeed.

MS. SANZ: I'll be back.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: I have one question that I would like to pose to the Floridians on the panel. I gather that the Justice Department has recently filed a Section 2 vote dilution case in Osceola County. Would someone like to simply speak to that fact?

MS. SANZ: This has been something that in 1990, we had in Osceola the first commissioner elected. And after he was elected, it was a Mr. Bob Gavida [ph]. He's not any more with us, the totally -- the law changed there in Osceola. It was a threat about the growth of the Hispanic community.

We in the Hispanic community, we see it that that was just changing the rules because the community was changing too fast. Just now we saw an election for the mayor of the city and we saw the same discrimination that we had before and it's very sad that at this time this is happening. This started in 2000 when the Justice Department, they saw what was happening and they were investigating it. It took a little bit of time, but we are happy that it was not too late, that we are right now with a lawsuit there in Osceola.

So I think that it's going to be a big change because it's not mainly Osceola the only one that is going through this. This lawsuit is going to wake up other counties or maybe other districts that are going through the same thing and they didn't know how to change that process.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you. Barbara Arnwine?

MS. ARNWINE: Yes. If I may, there's a gentleman here who'd like to give a few more details on that.

MR. BOSQUE: Yes. Basically, my name is Jose –

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Would you please state your name?

MR. BOSQUE: Jose Bosque. It's sad. It's sad, but we are in the year 2005 and what we're dealing is Alabama 1950 here. That's what the Justice Department just found out. They sued Osceola County Commissioners and like Marytza said, we've been years trying to move ahead with this and we always been limited. Now the Justice Department is giving us a hand and while we need some national attention because our county is growing real fast.

The Osceola County, Polk County, Orange County areas are full of Hispanics. The City of Kissimmee is 40 to 50 percent Hispanics and there's a lot of taxation, but representation is what we don't have. And we need support in that area. Right now the media is helping us out. The local media is helping us out, but we need to reach on a national level so we can get some help and some support with the other citizens of the United States because, again, it's Alabama 1950 here.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you so much. Would you please give your name to the court reporter so it's spelled correctly, please.

MR. BOSQUE: Jose Bosque.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Before we break for lunch, it has been called to my attention that the NBA President-Elect Reginald Turner is present in the room and we would like to recognize him. Would you please stand.

[Applause]

MR. TURNER: I plan to testify at 2:05 this afternoon, but thank you very much for your work and I appreciate your presence here today.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you.

Thank you very much for appearing on this panel and to those of you in the audience for being here and providing encouragement. We will break for lunch and reconvene at 12:45. Thank you.

[Whereupon, a luncheon recess was taken, after which the following transpired:]

- - - - -

AFTERNOON SESSION

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: This is the second panel of our hearing this day. I would like to begin by welcoming the panelists and I'm going to introduce you to them.

Meredith Bell Platts has been with the Voting Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union since 2001. As staff counsel, she litigates cases surrounding the redistricting of congressional, state legislative, county and city councils, and school boards.

One of her current projects concerns monitoring parts in redistricting which remained a threat to the maintenance of gains achieved in minority representation, a project that has led her to pen a Law Review article, "Extreme Makeover. Racial Consideration and the Voting Rights Act in the Politics of Redistricting", to be published this fall in the Stanford Journal of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties.

May I congratulate you on that title.

MS. BELL PLATTS: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Bradford Brown, Ph.D. Dr. Brown has been a civil rights activist for over 40 years in Alabama, Oklahoma, Massachusetts, and Florida. He is currently the Political Action Chair of the Miami-Dade branch of the NAACP and the immediate past president.

Throughout his career as a civil rights activist, Mr. Brown has served on the Oklahoma, Massachusetts and Florida advisory committees to the U.S. Rights Commission and remains on the Florida committee.

He also currently serves on the Board of Directors of Hope, Incorporated, a South Florida fair housing organization.

Reginald J. Mitchell is the Florida Legal Counsel in Tallahassee, Office Director of People for the American Way and People for the American Way Foundation. He is a registered lobbyist with the Florida legislature and a licensed Florida attorney.

He was formerly the Florida Election Protection Director of People for the American Way Foundation and previously served as an associate at Parks and Crump, L.L.C.

Constance Iona Slaughter-Harvey. Is that correct, Iona?

MS. SLAUGHTER-HARVEY: Yes. It is.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Ms. Slaughter-Harvey is an adjunct professor at Tougaloo College and currently serves as the President of Elections, Incorporated. She was the first African-American woman to receive a law degree from the University of Mississippi on January 27, 1970.

Upon graduation, Attorney Slaughter-Harvey joined the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law as a staff attorney and worked there until 1972 when she returned to Forest and established her private law practice.

She was Executive Director of Southern Legal Rights and later became Director of East Mississippi Legal Services in 1979.

Among her many accomplishments, Constance Slaughter-Harvey is a past president of the Magnolia Bar Association, a current president of Scott County Bar Association, a 1999 Mississippi Bar Foundation fellow, and vice-chair of the Mississippi Supreme Court Gender Task Force. She is also a member of the Eighth Judicial Circuit, District 14.

And we don't have a bio for Mr. Goodwille Pierre. All I can say about him is that he's a fellow Houstonian. I've known him in many different circumstances and I can speak highly of him and glad he's here.

We will follow the same procedure this afternoon as we did this morning. We're going to ask each of the panelists to make a statement and then I will ask our commissioners if they have any questions to pose. So let's begin with Meredith Bell.

MS. BELL PLATTS: Thank you very much for allowing me to come and speak to you this afternoon about the continuing need for Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. Mr. Gray, I have to tell you that I am truly a case baby. Both my parents went to school there and saw the first year of my life drooling on my father's law books, so I think a little bit of osmosis might come into play today.

I joined the ACLU Voting Rights Project which has brought over 300 voting rights lawsuits since the last re-authorization in the fall of 2001. And a large portion of my earliest responsibilities included monitoring redistricting efforts throughout the country, particularly in South Carolina and in Georgia.

In the interest of brevity today, I will address matters dealing with voter intimidation and willful attempts to restrict black political matters -- black political power in South Carolina. However, I just as easily have given examples and provide more examples from Georgia and the other states that I have looked at.

I also wish to focus on matters that did not lead to litigation, emphasize that one benefit of Section 5 has been the deterrent effect and mediation against changes that would have an immediate and lasting impact on black voting strength.

One can easily imagine what the delay and expense additional lawsuits would mean to communities that are already under-served and with so few resources. These examples demonstrate that much work still remains to be done in the counties, towns, cities, school boards and other localities throughout the so-named New South.

New South. In almost every community I visited since moving to Atlanta, the self-proclaimed capital of the New South, I've been educated on how much progress has been made in race relations. We've all heard of the great changes, the quiet revolution that has taken place in minority representation due to the Voting Rights Act. I have also observed, however, how much work remains and how discriminatory tactics may be less overt, but no less palpable today.

South Carolina found itself at the center of the clash of the New South mantras and the old Confederate history during a heated debate and boycott over the display of the Confederate flag on the State Capitol.

The conditions of blacks in South Carolina, however, remain disturbingly worse than those of their white neighbors. In every socioeconomic indicator reported in the 2000 census, every single one, blacks lagged far behind their white counterparts. The median income for a black family is slightly greater than one-half that of a white family.

And 26.4 percent of blacks live below the poverty level compared to 8.3 percent of whites.

Furthermore, as was reported by our experts in the case of Colleton versus McConnell, which was a three-judge panel, they have reached an impasse over the redistricting of South Carolina and so we were in federal court under malapportionate grounds to get them to redistrict their legislative and congressional districts.

Our expert, Dr. John Ruth found that South Carolina elections are marked by high levels of racial polarization. Black voters are very cohesive and white voters almost always voted blocks in opposition to black candidate choices.

Furthermore, black voters are rarely able to elect their candidates of choice in majority-white districts. In the face of such evidence, legislative Democrats led by then Governor Jim Hodges argued that black percentages in majority-black senatorial districts could be reduced in order to ward off further electoral failures for the Democratic party in senatorial elections, a position that was specifically rejected by this three-judge court.

Furthermore, during the trial it was reported that a collection of citizens in Lexington County, South Carolina, which is slightly outside the City of Columbia, informed one of their Republican representatives that they didn't want any, and they used a racial epithet, the "n" word, on the Lexington County delegation, referring specifically to a plan that had drawn a black representative into portions of Lexington County.

Our expert found that no black candidate of choice of black voters was elected in contested general elections to the general assembly from a district that was less than 43 percent non-white.

Indeed, South Carolina's Republic Governor Mark Sanford was asked in May of this year about the prospect of blacks winning a statewide office in South Carolina. He responded, quote: I don't think there never will be; end quote.

This was said with the recognition that South Carolina has one of the highest percentages of black population in the nation at just less than one-third of all residents. It is in this such new southern climate that I will discuss two compelling cases, one in Sumter County, South Carolina, and the other in Greenville County, South Carolina.

The City of Sumter, South Carolina's website greets visitors with the following: Welcome to the City of Sumter. Nestled in the heart of South Carolina, Sumter offers the best tradition of both the Old South and the New. It's a community where neighbors still greet each other from shaded front porches, high tech industries rise alongside the cotton fields and the iced tea is served sweet, which I appreciate.

I have a very different opinion, however, of Sumter during the last redistricting efforts for its County Council. Sumter County is 46.7 percent black. 12.3 percent of its black residents are unemployed, which is about four times that of whites, and a quarter of the households are below the poverty level.

Again, the median income for blacks is about half of what it is for whites.

Sumter has other disturbing traditions; namely, a history of Section 5 objections and intentional retrogression. In 1984, the District Court for the District of Columbia denied pre-clearance to a proposal to adopt an at-large method of electoral representatives to the County Council.

It found that Sumter County had failed to carry their burden of proving that the legislative did not pass their Redistricting Act in 1967 for a racially discriminatory purpose at the insistence of the white majority in Sumter County because the at-large method of voting may have diluted the value of an increasingly -- increasing voting strength for the black community.

It may have prevented the formation of a black majority senate district, and probably prevented apportionment -- prevented appointment, I'm sorry, by the Governor of blacks to the Sumter County Council. Sumter today remains a seven-person board now elected from single member districts, however.

In 1992, DOJ entered another objection to the redistricting efforts and I monitored the 2000 round of redistricting for the County Council. Either due to slightly greater increase in black population relative to white population and/or to the fact that housing remains highly segregated in Sumter County, the benchmark found in the 2000 census data show that Sumter had gained an additional majority-black district on County Council, increasing the number of majority-black districts from three to five.

In other words, there would be more majority-black districts on a seven-member plan than there would have been before.

Furthermore, there were partisan problems since the three black districts were represented by black Democrats and then the four districts that were majority-white previously were represented by white Republicans. District 7, the newly emerged majority-black district, had a black voting age population percentage of 58.6, and was almost at perfect population, meaning there was no need whatsoever to tinker with that district at all. At the outset of the redistricting efforts, white council members stated that they were going to create a plan that only contained three majority-black districts, three majority-white districts, and one, quote, even district.

The Department of Justice denied pre-clearance, and previously I sent copies of that letter to the Commission. I have extra copies if you did not receive them and I'll provide them afterwards.

Following DOJ's denial, politics on County Council became tense. County elections were fast approaching and the current plan was mal-apportioned.

County Councilman Rudy Singleton advocated that the Council take their position to the Supreme Court, challenging the constitutionality section by application here, claiming that the Constitution states: The majority will rule.

The sentiment was reiterated at council meeting I attended in 2003 when the council decided to consider redistricting yet again. The County offered up compromises claiming that black voters who are majority of District 7 should be content with a minor variation on the County's already original three-three-one plan, the one I was describing earlier where you had three majority-white districts, three majority-black districts, and one, quote/unquote, even district.

County Councilman Burr refused to vote for any plan that included in the four majority-black districts. More than a dozen proposals were reviewed by the community and County Council. Robbie Evans, the editor of the local newspaper, said, quote: The very fact that voting rights must be determined by race is inherently an insult to every Sumter resident who queues up at a polling place each November.

What it states bluntly is that 200 years after Abraham Lincoln, we, blacks and whites, still are unable to see past the color of a candidate's skin, unquote.

Following the Council's refusal to allow certain black citizens to speak during public comments, two black citizens from District 7 showed up at the next council meeting holding a sign saying, quote: Don't reduce the black vote. Chaos resulted with certain council members just getting up and leaving. A Sumter County resident yelled at council, quote: I didn't even know the NAACP was going to run it; meaning the meeting.

Councilman Burr tried to have the citizens forcibly removed from the chambers. Councilwoman, now Chairwoman Sanders, stated: They can remain.

Sumter County Council finally approved a plan that preserved District 7 at the majority-black district, and the DOJ granted pre-clearance. Sumter County now has four black council members and the representative for District 7, you might ask? The gentleman who fought so hard to speak to County Council, who carried protest signs into the Council meeting, is now known as Councilman Eugene Baker, representative for District 7.

And in the interest of time, I'm going to skip my Greenville example, but I can provide written remarks so that you can read that.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Good. Thank you very much.

[Applause]

Dr. Brown.

DR. BROWN: Yes. I want to thank the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and the Commission for the opportunity to speak here today.

President Keenan reminded us earlier this morning of the central role of Bloody Sunday in the 1965 Civil Rights Bill. I vividly remember spending an afternoon with Reverend James Reed just before he went to Selma to be assassinated, and so I speak here today for him and for all of those who are no longer alive and gave their lives so that we could be able to vote freely today.

I believe the extension effort needs not only to look at continuing the current bill, but also to add areas to it and I want to give Miami-Dade County as an example of one that should be considered in this light.

Few locations have been identified in the national conscience with voter rights obstructions as Miami-Dade County, Florida. The travesty of the 2000 election, the debacle of the 2002 primary and the immense effort on the part of white strong organizations in the 2004 election is overwhelming.

The 2000 election resulted in hearings of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights in Miami, a consent decree entered into with the U.S. Justice Department by the county and a suit by the AACP and supporting organizations against Miami-Dade County, which also resulted in a consent decree.

Since that time, a new threat to black voting empowerment has occurred. In the 1990s, a voting right suit was filed in federal court and a court decision rendered and upheld by the Eleventh Circuit, that declared that the at-large elections to the Miami-Dade County Commission deprived minority voters of their right to representation.

Now, there is a referendum to go before the voters to amend the County charter, to remove the executive powers of that Commission and give them to the County Mayor.

A simpler example of the impact will suffice. There are over 100 advisory boards and committees in Miami-Dade County, ranging from the community relations board to the hospital trust. The Mayor would be the sole selector of all these positions. This removes the ability of the current four black out of 13 total commissioners to ensure that their constituents have a voice.

Currently, their efforts to adjust the Commission numbers and boundaries to enable Haitian-American and non-Cuban Hispanic representation, but the strong Mayor would greatly dilute their impact. As the County Manager would then become essentially a staff assistant to the Mayor no longer reporting to the commissioners and the Mayor, rather than the County Manager, would have the power to hire, supervise and remove all department heads.

To understand how the situation came about, a little history is necessary. Through much of its life Miami-Dade County was predominantly an old south area despite the presence of tourism. Segregation was law and custom. The Ku Klux Klan rose to discourage black voting, including a major effort as late as 1939.

With this background, one might wonder why it did not meet the criteria for inclusion of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act in the first place. In the years following World War II, Miami boomed with persons moving to Miami, many of whom served part of the war there. Tourism expanded and the middle class grew more affluent.

With the rise of the 1960 Civil Rights Movement, Miami powers-to-be decided that if it followed the example of the Birminghams to the south, their growing tourism industry could be greatly damaged.

As a result, the Community Relations Board was established and desegregation tokenism was quickly agreed to, although not without a few bumps and disruptions. The civil eruptions in the black communities of Miami came in the 1980s, much later than other areas. However, the Anglo hegemony that ruled Miami in the '50s and '60s is gone.

The Cuban refugees began arriving in the 1960s and after a hiatus in the '70s, exploded again in the '80s and continues to this day. More recently the immigration of non-Cuban Hispanics has increased. Today the approximate population is 40 percent Cuban-Americans and the remainder divided approximately equally between non-Cuban Hispanics, blacks and Anglos.

The black population has shifted and now has large Caribbean components from both Haiti and English-speaking islands.

When the City of Miami district was filed, Anglos still had a controlling vote. Now, there are two Anglos, four black, and seven Cuban commissioners. Both of the mayors elected under the current executive mayor system have been Cuban-Americans. The residential segregation of Miami is such that the western half of the county is heavily Hispanic and tends to vote Republican, while the black population is primarily in the eastern part.

Highlights of the consent decrees following the previous election are constructive. The county agreed to an equitable distribution of laptop computers amongst polling place. This arose because telephone access to check on registrations so individuals could be directed to correct polling places was essentially non-functional in the black areas, while in the Hispanic-dominated western areas, every precinct had a laptop computer with immediate access.

Another agreement stated that duly qualified officials would be stationed at the end of the line at poll closing time so that every voter would be given the opportunity to vote who was already in line.

The closure of polling places in 2000 arbitrarily eliminated persons who'd been in line prior to closing. This took place predominantly in black precincts as with the increase of registrants and turnouts brought members of the election department was unprepared to handle, the lack of laptops, again, and computers.

In Hispanic areas, they did prepare for the increase due to persons becoming citizens, but not in the black areas. The problem was exacerbated in the Haitian areas because of the failure to provide assistance in Creole and the prevention of persons taking someone into the polling place to assist them.

The election department also agreed not to place signs stating that a photo ID was required to vote, and again, as we've seen elsewhere, photo IDs are less frequent in low-income black areas and Miami is noted as one of the poorest cities in the country.

An outreach in education effort was also agreed to and in 2004, did take place. However, it was not done fully in the manner I believe the consent decree called for; namely, a specific effort involving the NAACP named in the decree and others to request specific input as per the decree and to any proposed changes.

Also not fully carried out in our opinion were the efforts to contact persons who filed incomplete registration forms and those who have been wrongly removed from the voting lists by the state in 2000 under the rules of removing ex-felons.

These examples clearly indicate the differential treatment of black voters by Miami-Dade County election operations. The consent decree ends May 15, 2005. The consent decree with the Justice Department was based on allegations that Creole-speaking voters at several precincts were denied assistance from persons of their choice, and oftentimes the poll workers providing assistance did not speak Haitian Creole.

Initial concern in the termination of this agreement, which ends on December 31, 2005, is the spreading and increasing Haitian population and the increasing number of precincts becoming Haitian precincts. Of course, it was recognized that consent decrees make no stipulation of guilt.

Since 2000, the Miami Election Reform Coalition was founded and it concludes the NAACP and it continues to work today. The 2000 primary was a debacle as the new machines failed and the County Manager and the County Commission under pressure from citizens took the authority away from the Department of Elections and put the County Manager in charge.

America is very much involved in that effort. In addition, there was a significant election protection effort carried out on Election Day by the NAACP and People for the American Way. The County Manager then removed the Director of Elections and hired a replacement approved by the County Commission.

In the 2004 election, there was a massive election protection effort. Teams of lawyers were poised to act immediately on any violations. The Justice Department was also in town to monitor their consent decree. As a result, things generally went smoothly on Election Day, but there were issues in early voting.

Early voting resulted in extremely long lines and these seemed to be worse in black areas, so precise data are not available.

In one early voting site in a predominantly Haitian area, spurious challenges were made concerning persons giving assistance to voters, and held up voting so long that numerous persons left before voting. The Justice Department intervened and resolved this issue and the problem did not reoccur.

Nevertheless, there were enough issues that the County Manager has since removed that Director of the Elections Department and replaced her with, again, with the approval of the County Commission.

It should be noted that in most Florida counties, the Supervisor of Elections is an elected official, but in Miami, a single member district commission assures that the department director can be held to be responsible to all areas.

But in the future the Miami Election Reform Commission has been successful, but how long rely strictly on citizen volunteers. The tremendous election protection effort in Miami with volunteers coming in from all over the country, especially lawyers, is certainly not sustainable given country-wide demands.

Now, the county is faced with a referendum that will destroy the executive power of the County Commission. History has shown that left alone as it was in 2000, the Election Department will concentrate on the majority, now predominantly Hispanic Cuban areas, to the detriment of minority-black voting precincts, particularly Haitian precincts.

The results have shown that thanks to the presence of single member districts and the power of the four black commissioners, this emphasis can be shifted to better perform minority efforts when there's enough citizen pressure and continual vigilance.

Our citizens would be even more effective if the Justice Department were an ongoing presence. This would occur if Miami-Dade was added in counties covered under the extension of the expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

We in the Miami-Dade NAACP believe that if we were currently covered by pre-clearance, the obvious removing of black voting power provided by the single member districts would compel that the Justice Department intervene. In the worst case scenario, if the referendum passes, there would even be more need for the Justice Department to pre-clear future changes.

Having the mayor elected countywide for black focus, a distinct minority would remove any significant influences of black votes. The polarized voting in the first executive mayor's race where a strong black candidate who was a Republican was defeated by a solid Cuban vote, which normally votes Republican, supports this.

In addition, with our current executive Mayor, the NAACP still has not been able to achieve a meeting. A new strong mayor with not all the checks and balances of the Commission is just a county executive mayor, and the new mayor would hire and fire and supervise the director of the Election Department.

Human nature and history makes it obvious over time that the emphasis of the Election Department would be in providing efficient services to the majority and not in protecting the rights of black voters. And that is exactly why the voting rights bill was put into power in the first place. Thank you.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. Mitchell.

MR. MITCHELL: Thank you very much. Mr. Chairman. I'd like to thank the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law and this illustrious Commission for taking the time to deal with so important a subject at these incredible times in terms of voting power.

My name again is Reginald Mitchell and I'm a former Florida Election Protection Director of the People for the American Way and the People for the American Way Foundation.

I was introduced to election protection in a non-partisan effort to make sure all persons can vote in the 2002 elections as a volunteer. I then came on board with People for the American Way in 2004, and on a daily basis saw in the State of Florida all efforts and all challenges to voting in the State of Florida.

You would think that we should not have to talk about such an important subject in light of the 2000 and the 2004 elections. But we're constantly reminded every day in doing election reform or election protection, election reform after the November elections and everyday efforts to make sure citizens can vote, that the Voting Rights Act is a very important and integral part of voting for all citizens in this country, and particularly in Florida.

The VRA is an important symbol of the inclusiveness of the right to vote.

I'm reminded on a regular basis, we get the Internet e-mail of the urban legend which says that we will lose our right to vote in 2007, and as false as that statement is, and as many both Congressmen and Senators and groups have gone to great lengths to try and dispel that myth, I'm reminded as a former adjunct professor and a person who studied the Constitution that, you know, the 15th Amendment was voted upon a long time ago in the 1890s and there were a lot efforts despite the plain language of the 15th Amendment that says we have the right to vote, there were great lengths taken in times when it was very open and very clear, racial discrimination was being tolerated to prevent people from having the right to vote.

So sometimes I do believe, even though I suggested that statement as false, the premise of it has some merit to it.

The right to vote is a federal right that should be zealously guarded, but as we were reminded on the floor that sometimes that right is based on a state privilege, and many times the Voting Rights Act prevents very obstructive efforts of very specific acts that still where we see there are constant measures taken on a regular basis to prevent the right to vote and sometimes turning it into a privilege that's not yet always honored.

Florida Secretary of State Glenda Hood, who is the Secretary of State that reports to the Governor, constantly makes the claim that, despite my learning in law school that the right to vote is a right to vote, is a fundamental right, one that orders liberty could not exist without the right to have, she reminds us that it's a privilege in each state and sometimes that privilege can be taken away, and it is often taken away in the State of Florida, and it should not be granted based on a lot of contributing factors.

Some of those contributing factors that take away this right to vote can be race, the past commission of a felony, the neighborhood that one lives in, a person's economic class, the economic state of the county that they live in, the language they speak and their understanding of technology.

So to elucidate further, just as my wife generally urges me on today, our 15th anniversary, of the need to recommit to that sacred institution and to commit to our family, that we need to renew our vows and recommit to everything that we do. I'm reminded to the time that we need to recommit to the Voting Rights Act and not only just add further foundation to it as she urges me to do with our wedding rings, to talk about some of the things that need to be included in the Voting Rights Act. I'll talk about that briefly.

I would like to urge this Commission, thank you, to urge Congress to renew its commitment to the Voting Rights Act and to the minority voters it was intended to protect. I would urge the continued Section 5 pre-clearance of voting plans. I would continue to urge Section 2 of the requirements of language materials that we see very clearly in the State of Florida and we've had, you know, very recent incidents with the language materials in the State of Florida that I'll talk about briefly.

Continued Section 69 provisions for federal poll monitors that have been very instrumental in election protection in the State of Florida, and the urging of more carrots to protect race neutral obstacles that are not covered in the Voting Rights Act, but seemingly have a desperate impact on minorities in the State of Florida.

In terms of Section 5 pre-clearance, the general premises is that the minority voting strength should not be diluted.

Election protection that we worked in the primary, the general election, and we had public hearings in Orlando on January 27th, Jacksonville on February 1st, and Miami on February 3rd, time after time again we heard through incidents in election incident reporting systems that there were tremendous obstacles on racial lines and other factors to prevent the right to vote.

A lot of what we heard at those hearings with the Lawyers Committee, the NAACP, and People for the American Way and other groups, were some of the same things that we heard in many previous elections. Polling places are moved without prior notice; increased police presence at or near polling places.

I remember specifically in Jacksonville, Duval County, with Marcia Johnson Blanco connected to my hip, that all of a sudden it was amazing how in a number two African-American precinct, all of a sudden on Election Day there is this urge to pass out tickets and to have increased police presence at the voting places.

When asked -- we met at several meetings at the sheriff's office and the highway patrol, we were always assured that it was either -- obviously had nothing to do with race, but that there were other explanations for why this needed to occur, such as stop running a red light, traffic day, national holiday, or some other explanations. And so we constantly had to meet with law enforcement officers to make sure that this didn't pose an incidence of intimidation.

And also with the incidents of prevention of terror at schools where many of our polling places are located. There was an urge -- even though state law requires you to be back 50 feet from the polling place to pass out election protection materials, and under the guise of protecting children, election protection folks were sent hundreds of yards away from the polling places.

And so that generally has nothing covered and dealt with, but we were able to reach tacit agreements with law enforcement officials and school officials on this issue. But that needs to be looked at carefully to protect the First Amendment right to simply pass out materials that if some voters were not to receive.

Sometimes language materials are not made available, people's understanding of their right as a voter, what ID requirements are provided since ID requirements was very disseminatorily enforced in Florida, those became a problem in election protection and other folks need to be able to get to the polling places to inform voters of their rights.

But other general things like voter intimidation, redistricting in Florida is a major issue that's coming up on our November 2006 ballot issue. There is a committee for fair elections that proposes to say that districts should not be drawn based on furthering the position of incumbents.

And everybody agrees that no one party should have the power to just perpetuate itself forever, that the voters ought to have the right to vote. Even though the People for the American Way likes to do things in a non-partisan fashion and to promote opportunities for voters to have as much access as possible, there is concern that redistricting plans does not dilute current minority voting strength in Florida.

And so when talking with folks that represent the Committee for Fair Elections, they talk about redistricting in Florida that may or may not be a good idea. When asked how can they ensure that voters' minority strength is not diluted, they simply say: We will comply with current federal law, which includes the Voting Rights Act.

So those preventions are not there, that case level is away and it's important that those provisions be retained.

In terms of felon restoration, as you probably heard, I saw Courtenay Strickland and other folks representing the Florida Felon Rights Restoration Coalition, probably spoke at length to you.

It is a problem of felon restoration, of folks having their right to vote being restored. We saw in 2004 -- excuse me. In 2004, there was a conscious effort to, along racial lines -- well, I should say ethnic lines, to continue a suspect felon list that had many African-Americans that were included on the list, but to exclude Hispanic-Americans on the voting list who were also guilty of a felony.

It's almost -- as terrible as that was, the suspect felon list was thrown out because it was clearly -- went along racial and ethnic lines, but it has brought new attention to the problem of felons not having their right to vote restored.

In Florida we have a tremendous problem with clemency. Of the 50,000 felons that do not have the right to vote, about 80 percent of 40,000 still cannot continue to vote and there's all kinds of backlogs, and I'll send written materials on the statistics related to that. But that's a problem with folks having their rights restored and we know this traces back to the 1800s when African-Americans -- attempts were made to keep African-Americans from voting.

So lastly, language assistance materials. The People for the American Way supports under-represented groups, African-Americans, Hispanic- Americans, and Afro-Caribbean Americans to have language materials. And to the credit of the Justice Department, they have been great enforcement in this area of making sure that poll monitors are not using racist tactics to keep Hispanics from voting and other minorities from voting.

But the Voting Rights Act, however, does not include Creole, and we saw with the growing Creole population in Florida that that language either ought to be added to the Voting Rights Act or just provisions for any type of languages of minorities that enter this country where they are provided the language materials for Creole-Americans and other Americans.

In Dade County they have passed an ordinance to provide for that, but it does not include other counties, such as Broward County, Palm Beach County, Orange County, which has a large Haitian population, and since that's not covered under the Act, we have talked to as many of these counties to pass an ordinance just to say it, but it ought to be included in the Voting Rights Act.

And finally, poll monitors. I cannot overemphasize the tremendous help we've had from poll monitors in enforcing all of this, but that continues to be included. Many of the dirty tricks and the police presence we were able to nip in the bud through the assistance of poll monitors in Florida. I see my time has passed and so I'll be happy to answer any other questions about this issue. Thank you, Mr. Mitchell.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Ms. Slaughter-Harvey.

MS. SLAUGHTER-HARVEY: Mr. Chairman and Commissioners.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Could you bring that up just a little bit closer, please, for the court reporter there.

MS. SLAUGHTER-HARVEY: Is that better?

Well, first of all, I thank you for taking the time to share with us this commitment and your interest in areas that have occupied most of my life. I was introduced to problems in voting when I was in the eighth grade. I was cleaning out my father's wallet, without his permission, of course, and came across a poll tax receipt, and it bothered me.

I have the poll tax receipt in my office now and it's been with me since I graduated from law school in 1970. Everytime I look at that receipt it reminds me that I have work that still needs to be done.

I am really concerned and I have prepared a lot of materials, none of which I'll touch. I'm really concerned that we are involved in a very serious, serious survival game, and at my age, I have decided that I'm going to leave it to the younger man to come up with the means of responding to what I perceive as an attack on the sanctity of the ballot.

I started out practicing law with the lawyers committed to Civil Rights Under Law in 1970 and I inherited Conner versus Johnson. I left the lawyers committee in 1972 because I had some real serious problems with my own identity and what I could do to change our environment.

I entered the practice of law at home in Forest, Mississippi, and stayed there for almost eight years, and then I got an opportunity to work with legal services. I worked there and then got an opportunity to go to the Governor's office. I went there and each step I took, I became more disillusioned with meaningful participation in the democratic process.

I took a dare and accepted a challenge and became Assistant Secretary of State for Elections in 1984. And I prayed that I could make a difference and be true to Medgar Evers, who was one of my heroes, and try to make certain that I could do something individually that would give some credence and some support to all of us being citizens. I was, again, very supportive.

Legislation was hard to get through it and every case that we won, Marvin versus Elaine, and everybody suing Elaine and Henry Kirksey coming in doing what he could do, everything was -- nothing was really making a difference until we got an opportunity to be involved in judicial redistricting in Mississippi and we now have 25 African-American judges, and that to me was really the start of a real revolution. And I noticed that one of my heroes, Mr. Gray, this morning said that Alabama had the largest number of black elected officials.

Now, I've never disagreed with anything he said, but today Mississippi has the largest number of black elected officials.

MR. GRAY: I stand corrected.

MS. SLAUGHTER-HARVEY: I think he's right when it comes to legislators. You all have more than we do. But I say that to say that I started off practicing law and trying to bring about changes. That didn't work. And I went to the political process and as Assistant Secretary of State, we made some changes in the policy. We eliminated dual registration.

We made some changes and I felt pretty good about that to the point that I returned home to practice law in 1997. I am probably more disturbed now than I've ever been in my life as to what's happened. There's an effort now to change all election laws in the State of Mississippi in a very subtle way. There's a serious attack on the present judicial structure that we have. People are looking very seriously at redistricting certain judicial areas.

And I am the type of individual who never gives up. But at this point in time, I'm going to pass the baton on to young people so that they can come up with some suggestions as to how we best can preserve the victories that we put in our column of accomplishments in life.

I was asked to read several statements, and I'm not going to read those statements. I'm going to make copies and provide those to you for the President of the Magnolia Bar Association, J. Rupert Hill, Henry J. Kirksey, the man that I consider to be Mr. Voting Rights in Mississippi, Carol Rhodes, who is one of the renowned attorneys in the area of voting rights, Ellis Turner as well.

I ask you to use all of your influence and call on people who owe you across the aisle and ask them to re-authorize the Voting Rights Act. But also appeal to their spirit and ask them to do what is right.

And I applaud each of you. I checked your background because I did not talk to people who were just here. All of you gentlemen and the ladies who are not here have a record that you do care, and with that kind of commitment, I feel confident that we can make a difference, and that the Voting Rights Act will be re-authorized.

But I'm concerned about pre-clearance from an administration right now that bothers me. There's too much of a good-old-boy relationship between the Mississippi Gubernatorial Office and the Presidential White House.

I'm genuinely concerned about that, and to ask you to ask them to re-authorize the section that deals with pre-clearance, I'm not really that comfortable that someone who's now in a position to oversee the states, particularly the State of Mississippi. I'm not really comfortable that the fox can accurately and honestly guard the chicken house. So I'm in a dilemma.

But I do pray that we will do what's right and I know that with your leadership and with the leadership of the Lawyers Committee, that things will have to get better. I appreciate it.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you very much.

Mr. Pierre.

MR. PIERRE: Good afternoon. My name is J. Goodwille Pierre and I'm honored to be not only here, but on the panel with such wonderful, esteemed and very intelligent people. I want to echo once again the sentiments of all my fellow panelists, thanking the Lawyers Committee on Civil Rights and the Law, National Commission, on the Voting Rights Act as well as every one of you for taking the time out of your busy schedule and also for your continuing fight and quality of law.

When I think about working with each of you directly, Mr. Gray, John and Ms. Davis on different things not knowing how -- not knowing we will come to this particular point and never think about, I think about the collective collaboration of many, many different things that I've done over the past two years, and it's amazing how it comes to this particular point where you have to recall collectively all the things that you have seen and witnessed.

Briefly, I'm a licensed attorney, licensed with the State Bar of Texas, Southern District of Texas, and United States Patent Trademark Office. I am currently president of the Houston Black Lawyers Association. I'm Chair of the African- American Lawyers Section of the State Bar of Texas, and as of last Monday or Tuesday, I'm the director of Region 5 of the National Bar Association which composes -- consists of the regions of Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi.

I have worked as district director for the Honorable Congresswoman, Sheila Jackson Lee; deputy director for the Texas People for the American Way and People for the American Way Foundation. Also in that capacity, director for the Texas vote -- part of the right-to-vote program and coordinated the State of Texas election protection project 2004 where during that time we educated over 300 lawyers in the State of Texas on election law and election protection.

I was reminded prior to the start of this by my esteemed colleague, Ms. Harvey, of how young I am, how very young I am in the practice of law. And, you know, whereas I gladly accept that, I've done a lot, but it's quite disturbing that in 2005 all the things that we've attained that we are sitting debating on reorganization of the Voting Rights Act.

When I do public speaking and talk to young people, I often say that you should -- we should -- you should stand on the shoulders of your predecessors. And what I mean by that is for you to stand taller on the foundation that they've established and retire, and as you retire, everyone grows.

But it seems that we are constantly falling off those shoulders to fight those same fights that our foundation of those who have laid the paths has fought and it's quite disturbing. It's continually disturbing.

And in the very short time, I've experienced quite a few things all connected and I'm just going to communicate just a number of examples to you and then I'll be available, of course, for questioning and also to present anything that I've stated in writing.

In my capacity of service with the National Bar Association and the affiliate chapters, and I do want to thank the National Bar Association, again, for providing this day and for responding to the clarion call of Barbara Arnwine.

It's always been a concern for me that the lawyers, especially African-American lawyers, are not so much -- are too in tune of what goes on around them, and with the aid and collaborative effort of the Lawyers Committee on Civil Rights and the leadership of the National Bar Association, we are changing that, and I'm excited to be a part of that change.

But in my capacity in Texas, I've been the person who most people call for answers, and most of the time I don't know and I'm so glad that I can pick up the phone and get the answers to some of those election law questions.

But I have had the experience of seeing certain things through my life over the past three years that have been quite disturbing and it should be evidence enough that the Voting Rights Act, including Section 5 pre-clearance should not be disturbed. If anything, they should be tightened and enforced even more.

I want to start off, my term and my tenure with Congresswoman Sheila Jackson Lee close to the end of that tenure in 19 -- excuse me, 2003, I've dealt a lot with redistricting as it was reported by the panel and in that process in Texas it's unique because the impetus for redistricting comes from Congressman Tom DeLay who is in Texas.

And although it happens that election protection as stated by Reginald so eloquently is supposed to be non-partisan, a lot of the acts of the redistricting was created so that it could extend to a particular type of political party and, therefore, it could maintain power.

And so from that, and then my springboard to working with People for the American Way, I was immediately thrust into an incident in which was very disturbing and which from that and getting the phone call from students, I immediately communicated counsel, not only with People for the American Way, but also with Lawyers Committee on Civil Rights, and it's through that working with John Greenbaum and Lawyers Committee on Civil Rights and People for the American Way we found ourselves having to fight a fight that's been decided many times over, and that is where students have a right to vote on their college campuses where they have residence.

The District Attorney of Waller County, Oliver Kitzman, felt that he had to legislate policy from his position, insinuating that students who are at a predominantly black college, A&M University, did not have the right to vote because they were actually residents of their hometown. He also articulated, also in writing, has published on several occasions that most of the students were being misled by those individuals wishing to win their vote by providing them with CDs, barbecue sandwiches and other trinkets so that they could be misled to vote in a particular way and as a result, that they could not be trusted in voting. And if anyone should register to vote and actually vote, they would be duly arrested.

With that charge, the Lawyers Committee on Civil Rights and the Law immediately descended upon the State of Texas and Houston to assist with a lot of other civil rights activists to, not only march, but also file a lawsuit against the District Attorney of Waller County, Waller County, on behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People on the campus of Texas University, and won the lawsuit in the end through settlement and through the efforts of also Weil Gotshal.

But my concern with that is, one, it took a very, very long time for individuals in Waller to realize their error, if they ever did realize it. And, two, the fact that we had to call on so much power to do something which fundamentally is right.

And that is protecting the right of students to vote on college campuses. It was so disheartening being a lawyer practicing brand new, 39 years old, to still see this. Because it's such a distraction when there's so many other things going on.

If that wasn't bad enough, I was Director of Election Protection in 2004 and in my association with the minority bar counsels in the state as well as in the City of Houston and the other cities, including San Antonio and Dallas, I also had to mobilize the non-lawyers to be poll watchers and monitors, and I did this alongside with Houston Urban League and other people, so I was like the center of the wheel of the coordination effort for a lot of different things.

And while we were doing this for -- because we haven't gotten to Election Day yet, there was an incident occurred by one of -- a young gentleman who was empowered with helping register younger individuals to vote through Rock the Boat and it was a particular incident in October in Beaumont, Jefferson County, where he was -- and along with Rock the Boat, was doing a concert to register people to vote.

The election secretary was there. A lot of dignitaries were there to register to vote and what they normally do and did after it was over was take all the registrations that he received to bring them back to Houston so he could -- so that they could coordinate and tally the database and then send it in.

In the State of Texas, especially between Beaumont and Houston, the counties are so -- Jefferson County and Harris County are so close that they do have a relationship with each other that you can coordinate registration.

So it's not like a far out county where you have to submit it right there. They will accept Jefferson County registrations and then pass them onto Harris -- in Harris County pass them onto Jefferson County.

Well, the secretary, as he was leaving told Reginald Barclay, who was coordinating these efforts, that he could not leave with the voter registrations that were filled out and he communicated to him that, you know, he could and this is what he would normally do and he proceeded to get in his car. And she called the sheriff.

Then what happened was that while driving, Reginald, along with three other young ladies, all under the age, I believe, of 24, were pulled over by three Jefferson County Sheriff's vehicles, handcuffed to the steering wheel.

First they were taken out, frisked, handcuffed to the steering wheel, and then their voter registrations were removed from the trunk and they sat there on the highway for about three hours. I immediately received from the vice president of the Houston Urban League as I normally do, saying: What's happening? What's going on?

Got on the phone with several other people, Gary Bledsoe, the state NAACP director, Melanie, I can't think of her last name, out of D.C. --

MS. ARNWINE: Melanie Campbell.

MR. PIERRE: Melanie Campbell, yes. Claude Foster with the NAACP National Voters, and we were on a five-way phone call trying to see if we could resolve this while at times talking with Reginald. They allowed him to use the phone.

Well, actually he couldn't, but a young lady was on the phone. Reginald put her on the phone and they just did this to Reginald and, mind you, they did not handcuff or accost the women. They just did this, directed to the only black man in the vehicle.

To make a long story short for time, we had to call on -- of course, I called my former boss, Sheila Jackson Lee. She made a phone call. But Nick Lansing actually called. He was Congressman at the time prior to redistricting and because of relation they had, he ordered, demanded that they release him.

They released him actually with no apology, but just a threat, saying to him: Go straight --and they kept the registration cards, the registration material. Of course, they were very, very nervous. That incident rattled him. It was the first time that those individuals have experienced anything like that. They were very mean. They were not treated very well and it really put a negative image on the whole process in their mind.

The last thing I want to talk to you about is -- there's just a couple of things in my experience with Election Protection 2004, and also as pertains to my position: Unlock your Vote. Unlock your Vote, and Honorable Gray will attest to this, and his dealings with them was a process just like in Florida to give, alert formerly incarcerated persons and let them know they had a right to vote in Texas once they were off of probation or parole.

Well, in Texas, although they have the right, a bill to educate, mandatory education once it released, was vetoed by Perry, who came after Governor Bush, who's now our President.

And what this caused us to be on a mad scramble to make sure we alerted and reminded and educated not only those individuals who were formerly incarcerated, but individuals in the county because county officials did not know, even though they were officials responsible for the manning or doing an election or registering, did not know that former incarcerated people had the right to vote in Texas.

I always tell myself there's no way that people could not know. There is no way that people could not know. And I was reminded on a regular basis that I had to educate from lawyers to judges that they had the right to vote. And there were incidents in many different counties where so many formerly incarcerated persons were not allowed to vote.

I see my time is out and I'm allowing any questions you may have to continue. Thank you.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you. We'll go down the line again like we did last time.

MR. GRAY: Mr. Chairman, I want to express my appreciation to the panel and I'm glad that our president-elect has come in and I know he is on the next panel.

The National Bar Association, as one of its past presidents, I've always been interested in voter registration. My becoming involved in the political aspect of NBA occurred when Arnette

Hubbard became the first female president and I was tending to my business in the lobby of the hotel. She came up, told me she wanted me to be one of the presidential assistants.

At that time we had a voice, but not a vote on the board and she asked me to come up with a voter registration plan so that we, as lawyers across the country, would be able to help to get people registered to vote. And we came up with such a plan.

So my question to you is, what do you believe that members of the National Bar Association can do in their respective states to assist in getting Congressional approval for the extension of these provisions of the Voting Rights Act specifically?

MR. PIERRE: Well, as you know, being the past National Chair, National President, the lifeblood of the National Bar Association is in its chapters. This is where, not only where the dues come from, but where the message of the National Bar Association in the man and woman power to advance its ideas are thrusted. Without the affiliates, you know, the NBA couldn't exist.

Now, it's incumbent upon the affiliate chapters, those who get their benefit of being part of the National Bar Association, to become more responsible in nurturing and coordinating their members around the state.

Not only members of the National Bar Association, but also to be aware of the current events that are going on. The reality of being a lawyer, a young lawyer, the reality is that dealing with life, with family, it's very difficult to multi-task on different things outside billable hours or trying to get paid. So the leaders step into a leadership role.

As an affiliate chapter president, I've taken on the responsibility, the burden, to make it my job to bring the information to my fellow attorneys in my area. That is my role. That is my job. If I can't do it, then I don't need to be president. And it's through the power of a coordinated voice of lawyers in the affiliate chapters in the region that strengthen that voice, echoing out to particular leaders to come meet.

And have the database of knowing -- the fact that I know that I have 1,258 licensed attorneys in the City of Houston; I have a database that I can shoot out e-mails to them at a press, and excuse me, Senator Kay Bell Hutchison, you don't want to talk to us? I think that is one way to do it.

What it is, you're building a relationship, you coordinate, and you make these attorneys feel closer. Without communication, they feel distant, and they feel distant. They don't feel attached and they don't feel like they're part of the solution.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Do you want to add to that?

MS. SLAUGHTER-HARVEY: Yes. We've already started the State of Mississippi through the National Bar Association. We have Republicans and Democrats who are members of our organization and we challenge them to be responsible for delivering both sides of the aisle.

In addition to political conversation, we are also viewing options in the legal world as to lawsuits. So we've already started to accept the challenge.

MR. MITCHELL: Just quickly. I think through the civil rights action and through the bully pulpit of the president himself, the motto last year the day before the 2004 elections was election protection straight from the President's office. You can't exactly mandate to attorneys to do a certain thing, but I think it was unanimous consent that that was an important thing to do and through the affiliate chapters, through the civil rights law section of the National Bar Association, they came up with all kinds of plans to implement election protection and I see the same thing happening already.

This forum today is an example of that, and because of organizations like the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights and the Law, People for the American Way, ACLU, NAACP Legal Defense Fund, all of those groups are members. You know, they have members who are actively part of those organizations and members of this organization. They can use the resources that they have on a day-to-day basis to implement good-working solutions to implement this.

MS. BELL PLATTS: I'd just like to add that lawyers wear many hats and I always consider us, you know, quasi-public servants. And while we might be lawyers, we're also church members. We're leaders in the community. It's on us to go out and educate people about the importance of this issue and bring that message from the ground all the way up to the halls of Congress.

And letter writing, you know, someone talked about that this morning, letter writing, phone calls, we can help people craft the message that reaches the people who are going to make these decisions and with so many affiliated offices of the NBA, there's a lot of work to be done, but I'm confident that it can be done.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Congressman?

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: Mr. Chairman, I, too, want to join Mr. Gray welcome you and thank you for the contribution you've made to this hearing. Our job is to compile a record to provide Congress with the information they need and the records they need to determine whether those provisions from '82 forward and the situation from '82 forward would give us a reason to continue those provisions that do expire in 2007. I think you -- felt you made a very strong case in that regard.

Mr. Mitchell, as you may know, I'm a charter member for the chair of your organization. I want to express appreciation to you and your colleagues and the NAACP, ACLU, and the Lawyers Committee for what you have done in this area in the State of Florida. I think the effort has been outstanding.

And Commissioner Gray has rightly raised a question that I think -- it appears to be the case. It will take a maximum effort to continue the protections of voting rights in the years ahead and lawyers, as they have in the past, especially are going to be important and I'm sure you would agree.

Your wife sounds like mine as well. If nothing else in the world, I'm a women's rights activist. That's because I listened.

[Applause]

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: I listened first to my mother, but then I married my wife and she made it abundantly clear what the evils are of sexist thinking and what the personal consequences are and my continuation in that process.

Anyway, I do thank you for your testimony and especially for what you do. I would just raise a question. Your organization has not, as I understand it, taken a position on the present Supreme Court nominee, per se, but has urged that his record and that of any such nominee be very thoroughly searched and the Senate be very careful to look at anything that might impact questions like voting rights –

MR. MITCHELL: Exactly.

MR. BUCHANAN: -- in that record and I was thinking about he's going to be faced with questions in that area. Do you have any comments you want to make in that area, any of you?

MR. MITCHELL: Again, you know, I've been introduced to -- we have a very able person, the assistant dean, that's over the Supreme Court nominee effort by the -- I think, the National Bar Association also has taken the same position, the National Coalition for Fair and Independent Judiciary. And I think it's very critical that you not jump out there early and take criticisms against the person.

We understand the President has the right to make the nominee, but it's the constitutional job of the U.S. Senate to explore the record thoroughly and make sure that this person is ably qualified, not just in terms of qualifications and credentials, but in positions that they may take. And so we are encouraging folks to explore the full record and make a decision at the time of the judiciary hearings, when I guess this will start September 6th or so, around that time.

But there have been cases where they talk about restricting the Voting Rights Act that I hear of, and the positions taken as an Assistant Deputy Solicitor General and assistant to the President's office where the case is made like it was made previously, that, well, I was just -- you know, that wasn't necessarily my personal opinion. I was advocating for my client.

So we think it's important to explore the full record to get to the bottom of whether or not things like the Voting Rights Act and other federal acts will be the right of Congress and if necessary, proper clause can implement those kinds of federal acts and protect the rights of all Americans.

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: Thank you.

Anybody else on that subject? The posture of the federal judiciary obviously is the other thing that has great weight on what happens in voting rights –

MR. MITCHELL: Absolutely.

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: -- and I think Congress is going to have to do this job right to make sure that protection continues.

Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Governor.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Thank you kindly, Mr. Chairman.

Meredith, I wanted to ask you a question in particular. You were focused in particular on South Carolina. We are not holding hearings in South Carolina, but your focus was to some extent on South Carolina and on Georgia. And you were talking about your experience in both areas and the contrast essentially that exists there.

We were just in Georgia two days ago. We were over in Americus, Georgia, and part of the testimony that we received had indicated sort of a split, if you will, a dichotomy. There was some talk about sort of what happens at the local level and then what happens on a statewide basis.

You commented specifically that in the State of South Carolina, the ability of an African-American to be elected statewide is, I think you commented, that the Governor has indicated that that's not a possibility.

Georgia has four African-Americans that are elected statewide in George. And you've had an African-American who was the nominee of the Democratic Party for the United States Senate in Georgia, for example, also.

I'm just curious given the fact that we won't be in South Carolina, you mentioned that Georgia, and Atlanta, in particular, was sort of the model of the New South. I guess in a very short manner, if you could, describe for me the difference between South Carolina and Georgia from your point of view in terms of sort of this whole issue as it relates to the Voting Rights Act.

MS. BELL PLATTS: Well, some of it, I was saying, still has come down to partisanship. I think there's still some viability of the Democratic Party and white Democrats specifically in Georgia.

In South Carolina, the flight from the Democratic Party has sort of complicated matters where you don't have -- it is true. Racial-polarized voting, black candidates get black votes, white candidates, white votes. And if there are no whites in the Democratic Party fighting for that white candidate, they very often lose as you move from the primary to the general election.

So it's very hard to be more specific because so much of this is local. I can point to many places in Georgia, you know, maybe not statewide but at least at the local level, where you have the exact same problems that you have in South Carolina. And that's sort of why I took my focus back down to the local level.

And I don't know that Sonny Perdue has ever come out and said anything like Governor Sanford has done in South Carolina, but I think partisanship has something to do with it. I think voter registration rates are considerably different between those two states. I don't have the numbers with me. And voter turnout efforts are quite different in South Carolina than they are in Georgia, and I think all of those factors interact with each other.

And the fact that South Carolina is considerably more rural and more dispersed than -- you don't have a City of Atlanta, for instance –

GOVERNOR ROGERS: True.

MS. BELL PLATTS: -- in South Carolina. Columbia and Charleston are there, but they're not quite the same. You don't have that locus of concerted effort. I mean, that would be my best evidence on that point. It's very local.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Okay. Mr. Brown, I want to ask you in particular. You were commenting essentially about the dynamic as it takes place in particular with Hispanics and African-Americans. You know that particularly that here in Florida, essentially Hispanics were taken care of. They weren't problems in significant measure in terms of Hispanic areas, but you're talking about a discrepancy that existed among African-Americans.

The leadership, in particular, in Miami-Dade County is fairly significantly Hispanic in terms of its leadership base.

I want to get your comment, in particular, as it relates -- what you're essentially talking about is practices engaged by Hispanics which are adverse to African-Americans. And I'm curious about that, in particular, because our classic scenario is to talk about this issue as it relates to whites, in particular, and their adverse actions as it relates to blacks. But in this case, you're talking about the actions of Hispanics and the adverse impact of those actions upon African-Americans.

MR. BROWN: Right. Well, first let me just relate it a bit to the problems we heard earlier at the first panel about Hispanics in the central area of Florida.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Yes.

MR. BROWN: And, unfortunately, just like my colleague said here, it does get mixed up with partisan politics. In this particular area, many of the Hispanics are non-Cubans. They tend to be predominantly Democrat and they are receiving the kind of treatment that we heard about this morning.

In Miami, we have the dynamic of the power of the Cuban hegemony of Miami. Out of 13 county commissioners, you have a Cuban majority. You have a Cuban mayor. And it's predominantly the well-off Cuban areas that control the county and it's those areas that were taken care of appropriately well by the voting registration department, just like they used to take care of the well-off white areas when it was a white hegemony that ran in the county.

So -- but it also coincides with, in general, the Cuban voters are Republican and the black vote tends to be Democrat, except when we had one of the most powerful black political figures in the county who happened to be a Republican and happened to serve as an Assistant Secretary of Transportation in the Reagan administration and chair in the county, too.

He lost because the Republicans wouldn't vote for him.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Yes. Those were the Hispanics Republicans who would not vote for an African-American.

MR. BROWN: The Hispanics Republicans voted for a Hispanic who was a Democrat. Again, illustrating the polarization that, yeah, party is important, but it also tends to be that ethnic. And unfortunately, the plurality right now, there's still going to be some issues with non-Cuban Hispanics because things get subtle when you're moving in.

We have a very large growing Mexican American population which is very much politically powerless in Miami-Dade County. So it's typical of what you get. Majorities that have affluence and power, they act like majorities who have affluence and power to keep that power.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Absolutely. But it's a dynamic that is rarely discussed. It's essentially competition as it exists among Latinos versus African-Americans and how that even plays. And, in effect, what you're talking about is Latinos as you've just described it engaging in exactly the same conduct essentially as whites have engaged with respect to African-Americans, but Latinos doing the same as it relates to practices here in South Florida, and that is a dynamic that I don't think we quite hear about as much in terms of -- well, at least we don't hear it articulated. It goes unspoken.

MR. BROWN: But not articulated.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Okay. Thank you kindly. One last question, if I may, Mr. Chairman.

Constance, obviously I'm fascinated, first of all, by your experience and your background. I know about the substance in terms of your life and all the good things that you've done. I was struck, though, by your comment. I mean, you essentially said at the end of the day, I am more concerned now than at any point in time in my previous history.

Now, what I was concerned about is, I'm wondering whether you consider that to be an overstatement on your part or whether you consider that to be -- and I don't mean that to be anything other than -- I mean, I'm dead serious about it because you've been through extremely difficult times as we talk about the creation, in particular, of the laws related to the Voting Rights Act, and in your description of it being you're most concerned about it now than in years past.

And essentially what you said is, you're concerned about the fact that you got Haley Barbour sitting in the Governor's office there and his relationship with the President and that that forms the basis of your concern. But I'm wondering if there are other dynamics that are in place.

I guess I was struck by several things. On one hand you said, listen, Mississippi has got the highest registration and, I think, the highest number of African-American officials elected in the United States.

Of course, you've got the largest black population of any state in America also in terms of population, period. You've had extraordinary gains that have taken place in Mississippi as a result of the Voting Rights Act, but I'm curious about your comments because you say -- I mean, you said it directly, I'm concerned now more than ever.

MS. SLAUGHTER-HARVEY: And I mean it.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: And I want to get someone to explore that, but we seem to be short of time so I don't want to ask you a long question, Mr. Chairman. Forgive me for doing that.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: That's okay.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: I'm asking you because I'm struck by that. And I'm struck by your comment in that regard, and I'm assuming it goes beyond partisanship, this sort of Republican/Democrat stuff and all that kind of thing, but I'm wondering what the answer to that is.

MS. SLAUGHTER-HARVEY: Well, I guess I proved my point. I am truly frustrated. I feel now more pain than I felt when I went to the University of Mississippi School of Law and I was called a nigger.

I feel more pain now than when a judge called me a nigger from the bench in 1970. I feel pain because I sense that young African-Americans who are my age that's saying -- think that we have overcome. And I'm disturbed because I see so many young African-American lawyers who think that they've made it big time. And they tend to say, they have problems talking about our own people.

I'm disturbed because I see young black lawyers becoming members of predominantly white law firms who think that they are white. And I don't say it in a negative, mean spirit. I'm saying that I am so, so hurt.

And I think that I participated in that game. I fought and sacrificed and cried and cursed in order that young African-Americans would not have to endure the pain and indignities that I endured. And I see them now forgetting about the shoulders that we're talking about.
I see them saying: Those people have problems. Those people don't vote. Those people have children and they're not married. Those people are shiftless. Those people are lazy.

Yes. I'm hurt. See, when I was in Florida I understood that the Klan does not have to wear a sheet. I knew that. Now, I'm not certain young folks understand that you don't have to wear a sheet. It ought to be that God made a difference in his creation. So yes, at my age, I'm 58 years old and I have never been more concerned about the survival of this country and the mean-spiritedness that's hit. I am disturbed about Haley Barbour. Yes. I am. That bothers me. And when Haley can sit there and talk about being a Christian and then turn off poor people, black, white, old, young, children, and then to have young black people embrace him and saying the Governor, it bothers me. And then to see that Haley and the President can be friends and both of them to me have absolutely no heart when it comes to poor people.

Yes. It bothers me. And I think I'd rather go back to the days of Ole Miss when I was called a nigger because then I never slept. I had one eye always on you, but I did my thing. Now, I don't know who to watch.

And these young folks who are coming along who want to try to make a difference and they're black and they may forget that I'm black. I'm just really -- I'm glad that you sense my frustration. I just don't know what in the world to do. And that's why with you men, I know your background. God knows I hope you can tell us how to do it.

[Applause]

MR. GRAY: Mr. Chairman. I share Ms. Harvey's concern. I've been involved in it a little bit longer and -- but there is, and I say it all the time, that we are probably at the most critical point in the history of our nation from both black folks and white folks, respectively. And now I speak to almost as many white folks as I do black folks.

The white people, I have to educate them over why and how we have gotten to where we are and why it's necessary to be doing what we're doing.

And then I look at my own brothers and sisters, particularly lawyers who think they are so great and they enter these big law firms and they're making money and they're living high and they think they are there because they are bright and brilliant and owe nothing to nobody.

[Applause]

MR. GRAY: And it is frustrating. And what I told them is, they don't know it, but you're not as brilliant as you think you are, and if you don't believe it, let something happen in that law firm and there has to be a cut-back or something else, and you're going to be without a job and you're going to have to start all over somewhere working for somebody else.

So we have a two-fold issue and to have an administration -- and it's frustrating to have an administration who isn't sympathetic towards working people, poor people and people who need health care at all. And to look at the federal judiciary panel, when I came along, we had some hope with judges like Frank M. Johnson. But now we have district courts, courts of appeal, the Supreme Court packed basically with young white, male, high-income persons who have no knowledge and no concern about people. They are only there basically because of shear power.

So I think somewhere along the line -- and it's not just a racial matter and just not a political matter, it's a matter that you have a whole generation coming up without any concerns about anybody hardly other than themselves and what they can get out of it with power I have that I can exert.

[Applause]

MR. GRAY: But I don't want you to get discouraged. I've decided there's certain things I can do and certain things I can't. I don't worry about anything. I'm going to do the best I can in situations and do as you have said, tell these young people, I tell them that economic discrimination is one of the worst things in the world now.

There's a difference between the haves and have-nots and it's getting wider. I don't know the answer. But your bright Harvard and Ivy school graduates, black and white, ought to have enough sense to do something about it if we and our peers have come along who had all these adverse circumstances and be able to survive. So just hang in there.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: We really need to get on to the next panel. We're running behind. I want to thank this panel. I want to thank the commissioners who have interacted with it. I think, in particular, the combination here of youth and age on this panel has held it together in a very interesting and productive way.

And so we're going to get right on with the next panel at this point.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Welcome. We're pleased to have you here this afternoon and I believe I have a word or two to say about everybody on this panel here in terms of what I've got before me. Iris Green is a member of the National Bar Association. Monica Dula -- is that pronounced correctly, Dula?

MS. DULA: Correct.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: -- is a staff attorney with the Criminal Defense Division of the Legal Aid Society. Before joining that society, she worked for the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency.

Ms. Dula is currently the Vice President for Membership of the Metropolitan Black Bar Association of New York and recently served as the Chair of the Election 2004 Task Force of the National Bar Association.

Reginald Turner has already been introduced today. He's an NBA president-elect. And Marlon Primes has served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney in Cleveland for the past 13 years and is an Adjunct Professor at the University of Akron for the past five years. He's a National Vice President of the National Bar Association, a Master Venture in the William K. Thomas chapter of the American Ends of Court, a former chairman of the Cleveland Bar Association, Justice for All Committee, a former member of the Cleveland Bar Association Board of Trustees, and a member of their foundation.

So, again, we're very pleased --

MS. ARNWINE: Yes. Before you proceed, I just wanted to say that saying Iris Green is a member of the National Bar is like saying the President's a good guy.

Iris Green is, in fact, a former Justice Department attorney. She is also the chair of the NBA Civil Rights Section and she is responsible for most of the good civil rights learning and teaching and seminars that are held here every year. And I just want to give her her due.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you so much, Barbara.

Ms. Dula, would you care to begin?

MS. DULA: Thank you very much.

When I was asked to speak, I thought about the topics that I would like to cover and the topic that I chose was felon disenfranchisement. It's a topic that oftentimes gets little, if any, attention. Today's felon disenfranchisement stands as the biggest threat to the voting rights movement in decades.

The voting rights movement was birth during the time of poll tax, literacy tests and good old-fashioned racism. Today, the fight for full suffrage takes us to fighting for the rights of those who were previously incarcerated, are currently incarcerated, or will be incarcerated in the future.

Today, there are over four million individuals who are disenfranchised from their right to vote because of felony convictions. There are currently over two million individuals incarcerated today and over 600,000 of them are African-Americans.

In Florida alone there are over 800,000 convicted felons. In order for a convicted felon to be able to vote again, the Florida Board of Clemency must restore the right to vote.

In 1999, 54,661 felons completed supervision, but only 2,155 had their voting rights restored. Only 15.2 percent of those who received full restoration were African-American. The Governor and his cabinet constitute the Clemency Board, and as we all know, Jeb Bush does have his own interests.

The Governor has the ability to deny clemency, but a vote of the Governor and three cabinet members are required to restore voting rights. Voting rights in Florida can be restored in two ways.

First, the convicted felon could have their voting rights restored by submitting an application to the Clemency Board without a hearing.

If three or more members of the Clemency Board object to automatic restoration, then the individual must pursue restoration with a hearing. The $1,000 penalty and liability bar has since been amended and does not serve as a bar to restoration without a hearing as it did at one time.

Secondly, those convicted of certain drug offenses and those who do not meet the initial eligibility requirements must endure the hearing process.

Felon disenfranchisement statutes were first enacted in 1868 and the long-term effect of the enactment has disproportionately affected the African-American community. In 1968, the Florida Constitution was re-enacted.

During the 1960s, the rate of incarceration in the United States never rose above 200,000. Today the United States has one of the largest rates of incarceration in the world. There are over two million individuals incarcerated in the United States today. That is an approximately 900 percent increase.

In Florida over 48 percent of all convicted felons are African-American. These numbers beg the question: What does all of this disenfranchisement do to the impact that the African-American community has on the political process of the larger community?

From the beginning, felon disenfranchisement was well rooted in racism, the objective being to suppress the political power of newly freed slaves. In 1968, the law was re-enacted again to disenfranchise African-Americans right after newly won civil rights were gaining a foothold. Today Florida stands as only one of seven states who permanently disenfranchised felons.

The impact on my community will lead to the dilution of the voting power of the African-American community in Florida. And this is not just something that happens in Florida; it happens across this country.

When the Florida African-American community is analyzed, the picture of a largely poor, under-served, disadvantaged community is vividly drawn.

In 1990 over 40 percent of African-Americans over the age of 25 had not graduated from high school or achieved the equivalent. This compares to 23 percent of others. Less than 10 percent of African-Americans age 25 or over had received a college degree or higher, almost half the rate for non-African-Americans.

More than one in four African-Americans age 18 or older were living below the poverty line. That number is almost three times higher than other Floridians. In sum and substance, this is not a community that has been a beneficiary of all the privileges and gains of the Civil Rights Movement.

And we must be mindful of the fact that there are more African-American men going to prison than to college, and that means that more and more of the African-American communities will not be able to vote in Florida and around the country.

What are some of the things that we need to look at in terms of changing the laws on felon disenfranchisement? First, individuals who are convicted of crimes should be able to vote in all elections even while they are incarcerated.

Under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, we must look at the totality of the circumstance test to determine if the state enacted a law of any qualifications or prerequisites to vote that results in denial or abridgment of the right of any citizen of the United States.

Clearly, being a convicted felon prevents that individual from voting and there are so many convicted African-American felons who are unable to vote, no other conclusion can be drawn but that the state has engaged in vote dilution. This position may be uncomfortable for some in power. Reality has to dictate that we must move beyond our discomfort and think about the community at large.

The gains that we made during the Civil Rights Movement are now at stake and, unfortunately, there doesn't seem to be a steep decline in the number of felons in the future.

Second, not only should they be able to vote, but their vote should be counted in the community they come from. For example, if they are sent to a prison close to Tallahassee, but they come from Miami, then their vote should be counted in Miami.

This will allay the fears of those in largely non-minority communities where prisons are located who fear that minority members of the prison population will try to take over the political process. We must ensure that the right to participate in the political process is preserved at all cost.

I come from the State of New York and today in the State of New York there are 126,000 felons in prison and on parole. That's 126,000 people who cannot vote. If current trends continue, three in ten black men will be disenfranchised from their right to vote at some point in time in the State of New York.

80 percent of the prisoners in New York State prisons come from Harlem, Washington Heights, the lower east side, south Bronx, east Bronx, central Brooklyn, east Brooklyn, and southeast Queens. Those are predominantly African-American communities.

87 percent of the New York State prison population is African-American and Latino, and it begs the question: What impact does that have on the census?

The people who are incarcerated in upstate rural communities, these communities largely being white, are counted as part of that community, even though they have no roots there and they gain nothing from being incarcerated in rural upstate New York communities.

In conclusion, the African-American community has not fared so well since the gains that were made during the '60s. We see more and more African-Americans going to prison and fewer going to college. I don't see that trend being reversed anytime in the near future. That means that the African-American community will continue to lose its impact on the political process as more and more African-Americans are unable to vote because they are convicted felons.

I would hope that this Commission would have the courage to take the position that convicted felons should never lose their right to vote, and that those who are convicted have their vote counted in the community in which they resided before incarceration. This will prevent the dilution of the gains of the civil rights struggle. Thank you.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. Primes?

MR. PRIMES: Good afternoon. My name is Marlon Primes and you know my background. I'm originally from Akron, Ohio, and practice now in Cleveland, Ohio.

Before I touch base about my experience in working with election protection and a number of issues that arose in Ohio, I certainly would be remiss without giving proper kudos to the Lawyers Committee and the effort that they took in the State of Ohio, particularly Northeastern Ohio.

They had a command center there and it was beautiful in the sense that we had a large cross-section of community that volunteered to participate in this effort and work at various polls, places in East Cleveland and a number of community in Northeastern Ohio, and certainly we're very appreciative of that effort by Vicki Beasley and Barbara Arnwine.

In terms of the actual problems that took place in Ohio, prior to the election the affiliate chapter of the National Bar Association, normally that's Miami [ph] Bar Association, was mobilized in conjunction with the NAACP local chapter because immediately prior to the election, a number of African-American voters received postcards indicating that the election was held several days after it actually took place.

In addition to that activity, there are a number of concerns that a number of us noticed that were involved in the election protection effort specifically regarding the issue of provisional ballots and the issue of challenges.

I think you're all aware of the lawsuits that were filed and the very confusing issues regarding provisional ballots and challenges that took place in the State of Ohio. But I want to just focus my testimony and the observations that I made while serving as an election protection monitor with respect to those two particular issues.

And also I want to note that I'm testifying in my personal capacity and these are my particular views, and my particular views only.

I arrived at my particular station at 6:00 a.m. and I was stationed in East Cleveland, Ohio. And East Cleveland is one of the poorest communities in Ohio and probably one of the poorest communities in the United States.

A large portion of the population is on public assistance and that was a center of a number of our election protection efforts also in the east side of Cleveland which is predominantly African-American.

One of the things that I noticed and a number of the other volunteers noticed is that we had an extremely heavy turnout in the early morning hours of November 2nd, 2004, in those particular areas. We all communicated via cellphones so we're aware of the activities in our particular precinct and also at various precincts where equal protection workers were stationed.

One of the things we also noticed in addition to a very heavy turnout, we noticed later on in that afternoon that there were a significant number of provisional ballots in minority districts.

And a number of us began scratching our heads about this phenomenon and soon we learned that one of the potential reasons for this is that in East Cleveland, a number of the very poor communities, there are a large number of individuals that are renters and they move frequently during the election cycle. And fortunately in Ohio, there was an edict that was pronounced prior to election that if you cast a provisional ballot in the wrong precinct, your provisional ballot would not be counted. And I believe this had a substantial impact on minority voting districts because of the transient population and something that should be noted as well.

I think also one of the problems with respect to that is that with respect to the turnout, you had a large number of individuals that really had not participated in the process and that came with great hope that their vote would be counted and they truly would be able to make a difference on a very important election.

And I guess we'll never know until later in time whether or not these people will totally check out of the process. And the problem will be, what impact that would have on the rest of us in terms of willingness to participate in jury trials. Of course, if they're not registered, they can't participate as a juror. They can't participate in the process of electing law enforcement officials to ensure that they're representative juries.

Finally, I want to just touch base on the issue of challenges and just give you a few anecdotes based on my observation as an election protection worker. The election protection volunteers were a cross section of our community, not only African-American, but all types of races and backgrounds.

And one of the things that we noticed and shared amongst ourselves were the placement of challenges in election precincts.

I had the occasion of taking a break and going to my official site in Cleveland Heights, Ohio, which is predominantly an African-American site where there were a number of challenges inside the booth. And in sharing conversation with a number of election protection workers and also just touching base with other lawyers on cases that I was involved with and trying to handle during my course as a volunteer, I soon came to realize that they did not have a similar experience as those that were in less adverse precincts.

In fact, one lawyer commented to me on the telephone during a conference call that he had called a number of his friends and predominantly white communities and they all indicated that they had not seen any challenges, and it was totally different from our experience in Cleveland Heights and many of the other African-American communities in East Cleveland and Cleveland, Ohio.

With that, that concludes my testimony.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Ms. Green.

MS. GREEN: Good afternoon. I'm Iris McCullen Green and what you don't know is, I served as the civil rights attorney in the U.S. Department of Justice Civil Rights Division for 11 years. So if you care to ask me if I have any personal thoughts on the recent nomination, feel free to do so.

That said, I also want to commend the Lawyers Committee and People for the American Way for their excellent job in posting the non-partisan election protection effort. And I was privileged to work in that effort this past November, and I just want to relate to you some of my experiences while I was manning the hotline.

Even though I was stationed in Washington, D.C., I am a member of the Washington Bar Association and we were vigorous in that effort. Even though we were in Washington, D.C., I got quite a few calls from the State of Florida. One in particular came from a Florida A&M student, in fact, a number of students who, even though there was a polling place on the campus of Florida A&M, they were told that they were to vote someplace that was off campus.

They went to the polling place that was off campus only to be told that, no, your polling place is the polling place, the precinct on the Florida A&M campus. They came back to the Florida A&M campus and were once again told, no, your polling place is off campus.

By that time, they were really, really frustrated and desperately wanted to vote. For most of them, it would be their first time ever voting in a national election.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Are these predominantly African-American students?

MS. GREEN: Absolutely. Florida A&M is a predominantly African-American institution.

But since we had people located on the ground, I referred them to our local persons on the ground and hoped that they were able to help them. But those students were being denied the right to exercise their franchise, and they were right there on the campus where they had a polling place.

And these were not students who lived in the city. These were students who actually lived on the FAMU campus. There still exist many, many impediments to voting and the Voting Rights Act should be strengthened along with being extended.

Another call that I got also came from Florida, a gentleman whose house bordered two counties. He paid real estate taxes to one county and his trash was picked up by another county.

He received a letter in the mail telling him that he could no longer vote in the county that had been designated as his precinct. So he went to the other county and they told him, no, you can't vote in this county. So he was in a no man's land. And the interesting thing about that is, he was married and his wife did not have a similar problem.

So, once again, we referred him to our persons on the ground in Florida.

Another individual also in Florida, this gentleman called to say that he had registered no fewer than three times and had received a letter from the same individual each time telling him that he was not on the rolls, that he could come down and re-register.

And after that happened to him three times, he didn't know what else to do. So we called the election officials for him and hopefully it was resolved. Since we were in Washington and he was in Florida, we could not see it through, but I hope he got to vote.

I also got calls from Arizona. One lady had recently moved from one county to another county in Arizona, and there was a deadline for registration for voting in the new county. But she had apparently delayed attempting to register for more than 30 days after she moved to the new county, and she was told that because she had been moved from the new county for more than 30 days, she could not vote in the old county and she couldn't vote in the new county because she was not registered. So where was she to vote?

She and I had a private conversation about what she should do, but I do think she got to cast her vote.

Another problem was long lines, and even in Washington, D.C. we had a problem with long lines. I got a call from Ohio's Will Marlin from a nurse who said she had stood in line for several hours, including extra time that she'd been given to vote, and had not been able to advance far enough along in the line to cast her vote before she had to leave. And she said she did surgeries. So she had scheduled surgery, that she could not wait any longer and she had to leave.

And her fear was that she would not be able to get off soon enough in the afternoon to get back to vote before the polls closed. So what was she to do?

So I think I can say that there are a number of impediments that need to be addressed along with extending the Voting Rights Act so that some of these artificial impediments are removed.

The right to vote is a constitutional right to everyone and we really shouldn't have all of these state regulations that prevent a person from voting when all they should have to do is to show up and prove who they are by whatever means of identification they have and cast that vote. So those are a few of the instances that readily come to mind, and I just want you to pay attention when you are getting ready to extend the Voting Rights Act that perhaps you should write into the extension some provisions that will take care of some of these other artificial impediments.

Thank you very much for listening.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. Turner.

MR. TURNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I would like to thank all of the members of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act for taking this time to spend with us here at the National Bar Association's annual convention. Your presence here is really a statement about the importance of the work that we all must do in order to fully understand the factual predicate for renewal of the provisions of Section 5 and Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act.

And this is really, I think, an excellent means to go about building the record that will be required, and so you are to be commended and you have our gratitude.

[Applause]

MR. TURNER: Also, of course, we have to pay homage to the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

[Applause]

MR. TURNER: The long-time partnership between the National Bar Association and the Lawyers Committee is too rich to detail in the brief time that we have here. However, I would like to say that Barbara Arnwine has been of singular importance in maintaining --

[Applause]

MR. TURNER: We are extremely grateful to her and to all of her colleagues at the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. Extension of the Voting Rights Act of provisions of Section 5 and Section 203 are absolutely essential to protection of the democratic principles that are the bedrock of our Constitution. The right to vote is precious and should not be denied on any basis.

Unfortunately, although we have heard much about problems relating to interference with the right to vote in our southern states, the problem is not unique to the south. My own experiences in Michigan have demonstrated to me that wherever there are people of color who seek to exercise the franchise, there will be efforts to block those attempts to engage in participation in our democracy.

Although in Michigan only a small part of our state is covered by Section 5, we understand the critical importance of the pre-clearance provisions and there has been activity on the part of the Department of Justice with respect to Southwest Michigan in ensuring that election practices there are consistent with the Voting Rights Act and avoid both pollution or unnecessary packing with respect to voters of color.

Section 2 has also played a significant role in Michigan. I was involved in legislative redistricting and congressional reapportionment of litigation in 1992, and in the course of that, it became very clear that as we built the record in those cases, that Michigan has a significant problem with respect to racially-polarized voting.

And the other jingles factors having been met, we were able to convince both the federal court in the congressional case and the state court in the state legislative case that the interests of voters of color, African-Americans with respect to congressional districts and African-Americans and Latino voters with respect to the state legislative districts, should be protected on the basis of the satisfaction of the jingles factors in those cases.

And so Michigan, we strongly need the extension of the provisions of the Voting Rights Act and as my colleague, Iris Green, my esteemed colleague, our leader on civil rights issues in the Bar Association indicated, any modifications to the Voting Rights Act as it is being renewed should actually strengthen the Act to make clear that voter intimidation in any form will not be tolerated.

It should be made clear -- it should be made clear that attempts to block the exercise of franchise through arbitrary photographic ID requirements and other means of essentially reinstituting the old poll taxes and literacy tests of the Jim Crow era should not be tolerated, cannot be tolerated, and violate these bedrock constitutional principles to which I already referred.

Just recently again in my own State of Michigan in the so-called sophisticated north, we have a legislator, Chris Ward, who sent this letter to our Michigan Attorney General, and this letter is being made part of your record as well as the testimony by remarks about it.

The Michigan House Majority Floor Leader is a Republican from Livingston County, which is the headquarters for Klan activity in the State of Michigan.

It was written to Attorney General Mike Cox seeking to overturn a legal opinion issued by our former Attorney General, Frank Kelley, and renewed by our most recent Attorney General who's now our Governor, Jennifer Granholm.

He's requesting that a state statute signed by the former Republican Governor, John Engler, which required all voters in Michigan to present photo identification cards be implemented. He's requesting that that be implemented although it had been found to be unconstitutional in the opinion by Attorney General Frank Kelley.

We believe very strongly that this photographic identification requirement would severely and negatively impact the rights of voters of color. Those who do not drive, those who are poor, those who are handicapped, those who are homeless, those who are senior citizens and in nursing homes, and all of these categories are predominantly in Michigan are populated by people of color, in which people in these categories, people of color, are significantly over-represented.

The argument being advanced by Representative Ward that this photographic identification requirement is required -- is necessary in order to prevent fraud is absolutely invalid.

Michigan already has numerous statutory provisions to protect the integrity of the electoral process and protect against voter fraud. This voter fraud myth has been used repeatedly as a cover for efforts to suppress the vote.

In 2004, another Republican legislator in Michigan, John Papageorge, made clear that the Republican strategy in the 2004 election cycle would be to suppress the vote. He was widely quoted in the media, national media and international media, with his statement, and I quote: We are going to have a tough time if we don't suppress the Detroit vote.

Efforts to intimidate, coerce and otherwise restrict minority voters in the exercise of franchise are not limited to the south and they're not always limited to exercise by people of European descent. Make no mistake about it. In the National Bar Association, we don't care whether people's ancestors are from Europe, from Asia, from Africa, from Central America, from South America.

If they are attempting to suppress the rights of people of color, or any American, to vote, then in our view, they have violated the basic constitutional principles and the Voting Rights Act should not only be extended, but should be amended to make very clear that these efforts are illegal and not to be tolerated and sufficient criminal penalties should be put into place to deter this kind of activity from taking place in our nation.

And in response to -- further response to a question raised by Commissioner Gray who is also, of course, a distinguished leader of the National Bar Association and a hero of the --

MR. TURNER: -- I would just say that we will be lobbying at the local, state and federal level, to ensure that our representatives in Congress have an understanding of the issues that we are presenting to you today, the issues that you have taken this time out of your schedules to hear today because we want to make very, very clear our position that the Voting Rights Act is essential and we will be transmitting information through our esteemed vice-president for regions and affiliates, the former chair of our civil rights section, Mavis Thompson; Mavis, who helped to coordinate our election protection effort last year.

We will be encouraging our affiliates across the nation to make clear through their representatives in Congress in several states that our position is fully in support of renewal of Sections 5 and 2003, and fully in support of strengthening the provisions of Section 2 to reduce the trend toward packing minority voters into too few districts to elect a sufficient number of candidates of their choice and dilution of the minority vote.

Thank you very much.

[Applause]

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: All right. We will once more exercise our duty to ask a few pointed and succinct questions to the panelists and then move on. Mr. Gray.

MR. GRAY: Mr. Chairman, I don't think based on the testimony we've heard here today we have anyone who feels that the Voting Rights Act and its provisions obviously should not be extended. I think we all are in agreement on that.

My question to the panel is, considering the opposition that you may have in terms of strategy, do you think the primary effort should be to get the Act extended or should we use as much effort in getting it extended as we would to have to decide on these issues that you would want amended?

And even between testimony here today, I think there may be some differences of opinion about how far or exactly what area, if there are going to be some amendments, how far they should go.

MR. TURNER: If I may respond. Commissioner Gray, in my opinion, the transformation of federal judiciary from the era of the Warren report to the era of the Rehnquist Court has caused a truncated interpretation of the breadth of the Voting Rights Act in such a way as to allow practices to continue, which in my view as I just indicated unduly diluted minority voting strength or which packed minority voters into districts in ways that reduce the number of minority candidates who are present in our state legislatures and on our city councils around the nation.

To give you an example. In and around the City of Detroit, the majority of the state legislative districts for which there are African-American elected officials have as much as 90-95 percent minority voters in those districts.

By simply taking those districts down to 65-70 percent voting age population, you can create at least two additional legislative districts in which minority voters would have a significant chance of electing candidates of their choice because the other jingles factors are satisfied and do apply.

But unfortunately, the federal courts have not been willing to find this level of packing to be in violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. And we think the Act should be strengthened, and I should say, in my personal opinion, the Act needs to be strengthened in order to make clear that that kind of packing of minority voters in order to reduce the number of minority elected officials is illegal.

In addition to that, again, we think that these photo ID requirements which are being imposed, which have been successfully attacked by the Justice Department in pre-clearance jurisdictions, should have -- should require provisions that apply national such that it would be unlawful to impose a photo ID requirement in such a way as to restrict the ability of voters of color, of those folks that we just talked about, the least of these are senior citizens, are homeless, are handicapped, are poor, from full participation in the electoral process. And so, therefore, those are two issues that I think need to be addressed immediately and effectively.

MR. PRIMES: I would concur in those comments, and I think as a result of, you know, what I testified to before, there is a problem in terms of the acting, narrowly construed and there being different interpretations and different jurisdictions. So my personal opinion, I think we need to look at the problems that took place in 2004 and try to find solutions to those particular issues.

Particularly troubling is the issue of provisional ballots. Some interpretations are whether or not we should count a particular ballot if it's cast in the right county as opposed to the right precinct. National standards should really give us a clear understanding of that issue. I think it would be very helpful.

And as I testified before, voting is just very important and we want to make sure, particularly in contested -- how to contest the elections like we had in 2004, the people that do take the time to participate in the process for the first time aren't discouraged from the process.

So I think we need to do all that we can to address those concerns. If new legislation strengthen the Act, it's something that I believe that we need to do.

MS. GREEN: I concur both with Reggie and Marlon. And I think we should do something about registration, requiring advanced registration. It should be possible to register, if not the day of, up to the last minute to vote so that people are not turned away simply because, oh, you moved 30 days ago, 31 days ago, not 30, and now you can't vote.

And all of those artificial impediments -- I call them artificial impediments because they're just means to keep people from voting -- while I know we need to put our energies in extending the Act, I think at the same time at this stage in the game, we also need to write in as many national protections as possible.

And each state and each locality almost has a different rule on what one needs to do to be able to vote, and we should nationalize those things to make it uniform across the country. That, I believe, would enable more people to vote.

MR. GRAY: Mr. Chairman, I want to follow up with this. And that is, do you believe there should be some unified effort made about these proposed amendments so that when the bill is really presented, we will have, at least among ourselves, agreed upon the areas where we want it amended.

MS. GREEN: Certainly. I think we need to start talking about exactly what those are so we'll know we can present the package with a unified voice. And I think that's going to require a lot of discussion. I'm just touching on it now because those are some thoughts that readily come to mind. But there are a lot of areas out that that we need to look at so that we can remove the impediments to voting.

MS. DULA: If I can just say one thing. The dynamics of voting have become very sophisticated at this time and age. There are two states in this country that allow felons to vote no matter what. They never lose their right to vote in Vermont and Maine. Across the country there's some states where you will never get your right to vote back. There's some states where you can once you completed your probation or your parole.

There are four million disenfranchised people in this country. To me, this is the crux of the Civil Rights Movement at its worst. I mean, this is really the critical issue. People don't want to talk about it. People don't want to deal with the impact that it's happened on the African-American and Latino communities, to what point, eight million Latino and African-American voters are disenfranchised. And I think we already do think about amending the Act so that these people have the right to vote. And the numbers are only going to increase.

So there is going to be no regression from felons being disenfranchised. So I would hope that you'd consider an amendment to address that issue. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Congressman.

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: I gather that it would be your testimony that upon firm foundation of the 15th Amendment which is very clear about voting rights, you could find a basic constitutional argument for whatever may be in the Voting Rights Act or whatever amendment you may propose to it. You feel that it is strong enough from a conservative judicial point of view to give you a firm constitutional strength. I use the word conservative. I don't even know what that means.

MR. TURNER: I think I understand what you mean. I think we're all aware of the transformation again from the Warren era of the Supreme Court to the Rehnquist era of that court in terms of the narrow interpretation of the impact of the reconstruction era amendments to the United States Constitution and, in fact, turning the 14th Amendment on its head to a certain extent, particularly with respect to educational issues.

And so your question is a difficult one in the sense that a court that has essentially taken the 14th Amendment and turned it from a shield to a sword might very well find insufficient basis in the 15th Amendment to the Constitution to justify the provisions that we suggest need to be enacted to strengthen the Voting Rights Act and make clear that some of these practices which severely and negatively impact the right to vote as a color should be illegal.

I mean, those statutes make it clear that you can't pack 95 percent districts in order to reduce the number of minority legislators, making clear that you can't implement photo ID requirements that are onerous and burdensome on people of color, on homeless people, on handicapped people, people with disabilities.

I mean, these are not principles that are difficult or controversial principles for most people, but the fact is that people are getting away with violating the rights and truncating the ability of minority voters to vote in this nation almost at will.

Because my colleagues covered the election protection effort so much, I did not touch on it in my remarks. But I will say that I was involved in the initial planning with the National Bar Association and the coalition of organizations on election protection. I withdrew from that process when I was named as Michigan counsel for the Kerry/Edwards campaign because I was then engaged in a partisan role which would make it inappropriate for me to work with this non-partisan effort of the National Bar Association.

But we were monitoring the very same things and we saw an unprecedented effort by lawyers, staffed for the Republican party, in precincts in Detroit, in Pontiac, Michigan, in Flint, Michigan, in Latino areas, in the suburbs of Detroit, intimidating voters of color asking for identification outside polling locations, interfering with elections inspectors as they sought to move voters through lines in an orderly process, which greatly contributed to the lengthening of lines and discouragement voters from waiting two, three, and four hours in order to vote.

These kinds of practices should be patently illegal. I mean, these aren't close questions. Anybody has the right to vote is so fundamental to our American democracy, that any intent to restrict the rights of voters of any color by anyone of any color, should be illegal.

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: Thank you very much. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. Primes.

MR. PRIMES: I just want to briefly add that if you look at the text of the actual amendments and the discussion and debate historically as it relates to your particular argument, the whole basis was that you can't give someone citizenship without protecting their right to vote. So I do think there's a constitutional basis for advocating an amendment.

And also I think you have to look at the testimony, not only from this panel, but other panels and panels across the country about the problem. So you couple that with the text of the amendment, the discussion, when it was enacted, I do believe there's a constitutional basis for trying to promote legislation to deal with the problems that it addressed.

CONGRESSMAN BUCHANAN: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Governor, do you have some questions?

GOVERNOR ROGERS: I do. I guess I have more of a question than a comment to some extent. The job primarily of this Commission is a job of being a fact-finder, and not an advocacy role. Our job is literally to try to provide as best we can -- excuse me, I'm sorry about that -- essentially a record that would be made available obviously to the members of the House and Senate and to the extent that it's scrutinized by the Supreme Court, a record that essentially indicates the facts as they are.

Our job is not to be an advocacy body, but really to be a fact-finding body that simply presents the evidence as we find it to exist throughout the country, and I certainly want to encourage you all to the extent that you all take an advocacy role to the extent that the NBA takes the position or your various organizations are taking positions to advocate changes or other kinds of things with respect to the Act itself. I certainly want to continue to encourage that.

But one thing I would be cautious of, to be frank with you, Mr. President-Elect, is that you're going to want to make sure that to the extent that you're taking an advocacy role, you have a House and a Senate that are both governed by Republicans essentially. And the arguments have to be made in such a way that, obviously, your job is to persuade enough people.

You've been successful throughout that in the course of your career. And the ability is going to have to be to present those arguments in such a way that you are compelling to both political parties in that regard.

We heard testimony earlier in this day that indicates it clearly is going to be bipartisan support for the passage of these provisions, both 203 as well as Section 5, but there may well be strong bipartisan support that exists in that regard. So I just want to encourage you to the extent that the NBA takes a position in that regard, that you're cautious to make sure that you are taking a bipartisan to some extent position. I would encourage you in that role.

MR. TURNER: Thank you, Governor Rogers. We certainly appreciate that. The National Bar Association represents lawyers of both political parties and some minor parties as well.

And we certainly understand that the National Bar Association is not a partisan organization in any sense of that word. We have officers who belong to both political parties and my remarks in identifying the political party affiliations of some of the folks, the actors in a couple of the stories that I told, were not intended to suggest that only Republicans have ever interfered with, restrained, or coerced voters in the exercise of the right to vote. That is certainly not my experience nor my opinion on the basis of information and belief.

So I want to make that very, very clear. In fact, I think I did say, and I would say again, that whether your ancestors are from Asia, from Africa, from Europe, from Central America, from South America, or whatever your party affiliation, if you're interfering with the rights of people to vote, then you are, in our view, violating the Constitution of the United States and there should be clear provisions in law to prevent such interference and restraint. And that's not partisan. Those principles should be easily accepted and not controversial among Republicans and Democrats.

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Absolutely.

MR. TURNER: And we hope that there will be bipartisan support in the U.S. House and Senate for not only renewal of the provisions that are immediately at issue, but also a very careful review to outlaw these practices that continue to exist in the north and in the south, unfortunately, which seem to be intensifying rather than abating in our nation.

These practices should be ended and should be clearly in violation of the law, and we hope there will be bipartisan support for those changes.

[Applause]

GOVERNOR ROGERS: Thank you. Thank you, Mr. President, for pointing that out and I couldn't agree with you more. The whole tension, as you well know, in terms of voting in the United States has existed because of essentially a massive shift that's occurred in the United States. Elections are now closer than ever before literally because the country is literally, if you look at sort of a split along lines of being more to the right or more to the left, there's just been -- this energy at the middle, if you will. The realities are that elections are closer than ever so that's why there's so much focus, if you will, on this process of voting.

Elections are increasingly coming down to just a few. As you well know, Florida decided by 540 votes out of six million votes cast in the state. I mean, so you have these things that are going to take place all over the country.

I did have one question though, and it doesn't relate at all directly to what this Commission can do, but I'm fascinated by the subject, and that was, to some extent, this issue of identification.

Having been responsible for governing the state, there's no doubt that we have to protect, and I only say this from the standpoint of having governed. We want to be sure that people that are voting are, in fact, eligible to vote, registered to vote, and are properly voting. I mean, that's something that's important to do from a state level.

And in terms of responsibilities of individual states, each one of our states does, in fact, set its own policy related to voting because it recognizes the uniqueness, if you will, of individual states in this country. And to some extent, there's no doubt that I've been an advocate, having governed the state, of the ability for Colorado to set its rules rather than having the federal government necessarily dictate those things.

But I am concerned to some extent about -- we heard all throughout the country the issues related to this identification issue, and problems related to identification and otherwise. There seems to be mixed testimony around the country. People don't seem to be advocating the idea that nobody ought to be able to present an ID; in short, to be able to identify who somebody is to the extent that they're voting.

But when you hear your testimony as far as -- you don't necessarily qualify it that way and you all have not qualified your testimony by saying that you believe it's important to identify voters, that a person's properly identified as Iris Green showing up to vote, Reginald Turner showing up to vote, that you're showing up to vote, Mr. Primes, I mean, if that is taking place.

So I think that's important to qualify that I don't think you are meaning that you don't want us to properly identify people. You may have some differences as to how you believe it ought to happen, but identification, I believe, from a state standpoint, and looking at our election process, is critical to understand who is voting and making sure that we got a proper vote count.

MS. GREEN: I believe I did say exactly that, that a person should be able to present whatever kind of identification he has that properly identifies him, not specifically a driver's license or some other government-issued ID.

As you know, when you take an airplane nowadays, you've got to have a government-issued ID before you can board that plane. That discounts all other kinds of identification that a person might have that might properly identify him because so many people don't drive and don't bother to go down to get a non-driver's ID or have some other kind of acceptable government form of ID.

But there are other kinds of identification. Don't ask me to name them at the moment, that a person, as long as they can identify themselves, maybe two pieces of ID. You got a water bill and something with your name on it to show that you are you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: May I interject here just for a minute? This is a topic that we can talk at length about because it's an important topic. It's been called to my attention that there is another group that is waiting outside to occupy this office, this room, and they've given us five minutes.

MR. PRIMES: We're scheduled for 2:45. We're scheduled for 3:30, I'm sorry. We're scheduled for 3:30.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: If you can make a quick comment totaling altogether here about five minutes, I would appreciate it. Mr. Turner?

MR. TURNER: Thank you. Go ahead, Marlon.

MR. PRIMES: I just want to make a point, and I think it relates to what I had said before. I think when we think about rules, we have to also remember the least of those, particularly about the issue of provisional ballots. Sometimes we forget about the people that move frequently and may not understand what precinct they're at, and I think the same could be true with respect to the IDs. I mean, there are some people are just living on the edge and this may present a problem.

I think the overall goal is to ensure that people have the opportunity to participate in the process pursuant to their constitutional rights. So there has to be special attention made, not only to how it affects middle class Americans, but how it affects the least of those.

MR. TURNER: Agreed. Agreed. And I agree with the comments of my colleagues on the panel with respect to the ID requirements. This is a balancing test and as with any pattern or practice that would have impact on the fundamental right, one must lead to show that there's compelling governmental interest in maintaining the practice at issue.

And what has happened in my view is that the photographic identification requirement is distinguishable in such a way, or being proposed in such a way, it kind of has to, I think, go beyond the government's compelling interest and certainly it's not narrowly tailored to achieve that compelling interest in ensuring the integrity of the voting process because for many, many years, identification means other than a standard driver's license or state ID card, or in the case of this proposed national ID card, that's never been required.

It's never been necessary in most states in order to maintain the integrity of the voting process. And in my view, there is no new -- no evidence of any new fraud or types of fraud that would mandate this heightening of the requirements in ways that would negatively impact upon the poor, on the disabled, on people of color, on those without driver's licenses, et cetera. So that is the basis. And certainly we understand that the voting process must proceed with integrity, but we also believe that it's important not to unduly impinge upon the rights of voters. And so --

[Applause]

MR. TURNER: -- in conclusion, I would just like to say on behalf of our panel and on behalf of the National Bar Association, again, we thank you very much for your work in building this record, this factual predicate for a determination by Congress of the renewal of the Voting Rights Act.

Your time is very valuable. You're all eminent people in your respective fields and we know how hard you're working to ensure that this record is built and we thank you very much.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Let me say two things because I have not been as tough on enforcing time constraints as I implied this morning that I might be. I will take full responsibility for the fact that we have gone over a little bit. I recognize the possibility that those of you on the panel may still feel that you want to elaborate on your answers to the questions that were raised by the Governor here, and if you wish to do that, you're certainly free to send to us via the staff here any further comments that you want to make on the subject.

Along the same lines, I notice that some of you have typed prepared statements and others have handwritten prepared statements. We would very much like to get copies of all those statements, and if some of you want to type out your written statements and get them to us, we would really, really appreciate getting those.

And finally, the plans of this Commission were to hear anybody from the public-at-large who wish to make a statement. And we're not obviously able to do that in this venue. But if there are those of you in the audience who would like to meet with us, with the staff outside, we would be happy to tell you where you may direct personal statements that you would like to make that focus on voting discrimination against minority voters. That is the primary purview of this Commission.

Once again, thank you very much for being with us today and for inviting us to come and giving us the amazing testimony that you have.

[Whereupon, the foregoing proceedings were concluded at 3:45 p.m.]

MR. GREENBAUM: Good morning, everybody. Thank you for coming out this morning to come to the seventh hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. My name is Jon Greenbaum. I'm director of the Voting Rights Project for the Lawyers' Committee on Civil Rights Under Law in Washington, D.C., and the Lawyers' Committee created the National Commission on behalf of the civil rights community to examine the issue of racial discrimination in voting.

It's particularly relevant now because Congress is beginning to go through the process of reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act, or at least the temporary provisions of the Voting Rights Act which you're going to be hearing a little bit more about in a couple of minutes. And for Congress to reauthorize those temporary provisions in a constitutional way, it needs to make certain factual findings showing that those temporary provisions are still needed.

So the Commission's task has been to conduct hearings across the country, and in addition to that, to conduct research and get material on its own, and then in January of next year, the Commission will be issuing a report.

In a minute you're going to be hearing from Elsie Meeks, one of our commissioners who strongly encouraged us to come out to South Dakota and do a special Commission hearing here. Most of the Commission hearings we do are regional, but to do one focused on South Dakota because of the issues having to do with the voting rights of American Indian citizens in the state which, you know, have been a major issue.

And over the past -- in particular, over the past several years, some of the most active litigation as well as some of the most active voter engagement has gone on concerning the Indian community itself here in South Dakota, and we're very interested in hearing from people on it today.

We have two of our national commissioners here. Elsie Meeks, who was -- who I'm going to introduce right now. Ms. Meeks is the first American Indian member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights. She's also -- runs a nonprofit on behalf of the Oglala Sioux Tribe -- no? Let me --

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: That's okay. It's a national.

MR. GREENBAUM: It's a national nonprofit, First Nations Oweesta Corporation, a national financing intermediary that assists native communities in establishing community development financial institutions. And Elsie is going to talk a little bit more about the Commission's charge as well as introduce the other commissioners, and we have five -- we have one of our national commissioners here with us and five really tremendous guest commissioners who a lot of you in the room know who you're going to be hearing from as well. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Jon. My name is Elsie Meeks. Good morning. And just so that people aren't confused, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights is a different position than this Commission, and I am not on the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights anymore, but I am serving on this Commission, so I hope that really cleared things up.

I want to welcome you all today to this seventh of ten public hearings that this Commission has and will be conducting. As Jon said, the goal of the National Commission is to examine the record of discrimination in voting since the last major reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act in 1982. We're here today in Rapid City, and it was at my request, to hear about the American Indian experiences when voting and to examine the extent of discrimination encountered by -- or non-extent of discrimination encountered by American Indian voters in South Dakota.

In our previous hearings, we've heard some compelling testimony about voting discrimination in various parts of the country and the impact of the Voting Rights Act on minority voters in the South, Southwest, Northeast and Midwest, and specifically, Georgia and Florida. Today the focus is primarily on American Indian voters in South Dakota, although we will hear testimony about the challenges Indian voters face generally.

A little background about the Voting Rights Act. It was signed into law in 1965 by President Lyndon Johnson to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment in response to voting discrimination encountered by African Americans in the South. The Act is made up of both permanent and temporary provisions. When Congress reauthorized the temporary provisions of the Voting Rights Act in 1975, it made specific findings that the use of English-only elections and other devices effectively barred citizens who primarily spoke a language other than English from participating in the electoral process. In response, Congress expanded the Act to account for discrimination against these citizens by enacting the Minority Language Assistance Provisions found in Section 203.

Before discussing the expiring provisions of the Act in greater detail, I want to explain what is scheduled to expire in 2007 and what's not The right of minority voters to vote free from discrimination is guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment and it's permanent.

The permanent provisions of the Act include the prohibition against denying or diluting the rights of minorities to vote, a ban on literacy tests and poll taxes, the outlawing of intimidation, authorizes federal monitors and observers, and creates various mechanisms to protect the voting rights of racial and language minorities.

However, there are some temporary provisions of the Voting Rights Act and these will sunset in 2007 unless they're reauthorized by Congress. So the expiring provisions are these: There's three major protections under the Voting Rights Act and they will expire unless reauthorized. First, there's Section 5 of the Act that requires certain states, counties, and townships with a history of discrimination against minority voters to obtain approval or pre-clearance from the Department of Justice -- U.S. Department of Justice or the United States District Court in Washington, D.C., before they can make any voting changes. These changes include redistricting, changes to methods of elections and polling places.

Jurisdictions covered by Section 5 must prove that the changes do not have the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority. Two counties in South Dakota, Shannon and Todd, are covered by Section 5.

Second, Section 203 of the Act requires that language assistance be provided in communities with a significant number of voting-age citizens who have limited English proficiency. Four language groups are covered by Section 203: American Indians, Asian Americans, Alaska Natives, and those of Spanish heritage.

Covered jurisdictions must provide language assistance at all stages of the electoral process. As of 2002, a total of 466 local jurisdictions across 31 states are covered by these provisions. In South Dakota, 18 counties are subject to Section 203.

Third, Section 6B, 7,8, 9, and 13A -- you'll all remember that -- of the Act authorizes the Attorney General to appoint a federal examiner to jurisdictions covered by Section 5's pre-clearance provisions on good cause or to send a federal observer to any jurisdiction where a federal examiner has been assigned. Since 1966, 25,000 federal observers have been deployed in approximately 1000 elections.

The Lawyers' Committee on Civil Rights Under Law, acting on behalf of the civil rights community, created this nonpartisan National Commission on the Voting Rights Act to examine discrimination in voting since 1982. The National Commission is comprised of eight advocates, academics, legislators, and civil rights leaders who represent the diversity that is such -- that is so important to being part of our nation. The Honorary Chair of the Commission is the Honorable Charles Mathias, former Republican senator from Maryland. The Commission's chair is Bill Lee, former Attorney General for Civil Rights during the Clinton Administration.

The other five national commissioners are the Honorable John Buchanan, former Congressman from Alabama, Chandler Davidson, scholar and co-editor of one of the seminal works on the Voting Rights Act. Dolores Huerta, co-founder of the United Farm Workers of America. Charles Ogletree, Harvard law professor and civil rights advocate. And the Honorable Joe Rogers, former Republican Lieutenant Governor of Colorado, and myself, first American Indian to serve on the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights; it's written right here.

Today Commissioner Rogers and I are fortunate to be joined by guest commissioners, and we are indeed fortunate. We have Senator Tom Daschle who needs no introduction. Jacqueline Johnson, the Executive Director of the National Congress of American Indians. Jennifer Ring, Executive Director of the ACLU of the Dakotas. Chris Nelson, of course we can't forget Chris Nelson, Secretary of State of South Dakota.

The Commission has two primary tasks. First to conduct hearings, as Jon said, such as this one, across the country to gather testimony relating to voting rights, and second, to write a comprehensive report detailing the existence of discrimination in voting since 1982, the last time there was a comprehensive reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. This report will be used to educate the public, advocates, and policymakers about the record of racial discrimination in voting.

We will have three panels today. The first two panels will comprise of scholars, voting rights attorneys, and members of the community who's been active in voting rights issues. Each panelist will provide a five to ten-minute presentation. After all the members of the panels have spoken, the Commission will address questions to the panelists.

We encourage members of the public who are here today to share their voting rights experiences in our third and final panel. If you're interested in doing so, please speak with a member of the staff who are -- if you could just wave your hand or stand up, if you're interested in speaking on the third panel. If you would like to share your testimony but can't stay, please see one of the staff members who will take your statement so that it can be included in the record.

I'm now going to introduce each of the commissioners present today and ask that each one of you make a short statement about your interest or whatever it is you want to make a statement about.

Commissioner Joe Rogers -- I'll just read a short bio -- completed his term as the Lieutenant Governor of Colorado in 2003 where he held the distinction of serving as America's youngest lieutenant governor and only the fourth African American in U.S. history to ever hold that position. He served as founding chairman of the Republican Lieutenant Governors' Association and served on the Executive Committee of the National Conference of Lieutenant Governors. Joe Rogers created the acclaimed Dream Alive Program in dedication to the memory and legacy of Martin Luther King and the leaders of the Civil Rights Movement. Joe?

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Why, Elsie, thank you so much. Are you all doing all right this morning? Well, good. I'm glad to be with you and I'm so glad to have been invited. It's good that we're here in the West. As we've been traveling all throughout the United States, I remind folks that much of the heart of America is really where we are, as you all well know, here in the western United States. And given our special relationship with each other in particular, you all being here in Rapid City and South Dakota, we know you all venture through Denver on quite many occasions at least when you're heading out of town or traveling throughout the country. So it's just a delight to be here with you today.

We're excited frankly to hear your testimony and to get some sense about how these issues, in and of themselves, play out here in South Dakota, frankly, all sides of issues and how they play out. What's so important in terms of the Commission, as Elsie has already specified, is that we obtain the record in primary part because the Supreme Court of the United States has basically said this: Because you are dealing with issues that relate to race, essentially the standard of review of any law as it relates to race is the highest standard of review, and it's called strict scrutiny. And as a result of that, it's so important that to the extent that legislation deals with issues related to race, that there be a foundation to establish a basis for that legislation.

And as you all well know, the Civil Rights Act -- in particular, the three seminal pieces of legislation, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which during the time of Martin Luther King, Junior, sought to lead and create hope and opportunity for so many people throughout the country. And as you well know, the Voting Rights Act is thought to be perhaps the most effective piece of civil rights legislation in United States history. So we're here to make the record, we're here to receive your testimony, and just delighted to be with you all here today.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: And Commissioner Tom

Daschle needs no introduction, but just to let people know, he is the Special Policy Advisor at the law firm of Alston & Bird, and for 25 years, as we all know, represented the people of South Dakota in the U.S. House and the U.S. Senate and did that very well. In the Senate he served ten years as the Democratic leader, the second longest serving Democratic leader in history. Tom?

SEN. DASCHLE: Well, Elsie, thank you. I want to join with you in welcoming our fellow commissioners to this important hearing today and thank them very much for taking time out of their busy schedules to do this. We're very appreciative of the opportunity to share our stories and your recognition of the need to hear and address them.

I also want to thank all of the panelists who are coming to testify today. I know many of them, and it is a very important aspect of the success of this hearing to hear directly through people with the experience that they will share. It's an unfortunate distinction that the people of South Dakota have a great deal to contribute to this project. However, we are aware that it is only through firsthand accounts of discrimination that we can educate policymakers and the public about the importance of reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act.

And as the Supreme Court has made clear, a detailed record showing discrimination in voting since its last reauthorization is necessary for future reauthorization to withstand a constitutional challenge. I know that the report the Commission will put together will not take any position concerning whether the expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act should be reauthorized or what the reauthorized act should include. Instead these hearings will detail the facts so that they can be utilized as reauthorization is considered.

With that understanding, I want to share one thought that has been on my mind a lot lately. Forty years ago, this legislation was an integral part of forming that, quote, more perfect union our founders envisioned. I always found that wording from the Preamble to the Constitution prescient; that a perfect union may be out of the reach of each generation, but a more perfect union was something that could be achieved with each successive generation.

Those who came before us certainly did so in writing and passing the Voting Rights Acts, and I and many of my fellow South Dakotans are here today because that work, like the work of America, remains unfinished. I'm grateful that we have the chance to continue that work today.

Before talking about our experiences here in our state, let me just say a couple of words about the Voting Rights Act itself. It is a product of tremendous bipartisan cooperation as well as the blood, sweat, and tears of civil rights workers across this country.

Many of us reached adulthood in a country where poll taxes were collected, where grandfather clauses were imposed, where literary tests were actually allowed. Forty years ago America put a stop to it. The Voting Rights Act delivered the knockout punch to Jim Crow. It is universally recognized as one of the most successful pieces of civil rights legislation enacted in all of our history. My votes in favor of reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act in 1982 and ten years later in '92 are among the votes of which I am most proud, and while they're not here today, I would venture to say that Senator Mathias and Congressman Buchanan feel exactly the same way.

I also believe it is needed every bit as much today as it was 40 years ago on August 6 of 1965 when it was signed, as Elsie noted, by President Johnson. Over the years the Voting Rights Act has become an important institution in America's democracy. As we are learning daily, outside the United States from Moscow to Baghdad, no matter how strong the idea of democracy, it will not succeed without the institutions to sustain it. People disenfranchised by discrimination must be ensured that their vote is both uninalienable and enforceable.

The Voting Rights Act has done just that for two generations of voters, deepening confidence in a democratic system and serving as a vehicle for resolving conflicts as it did in the closest presidential election in our country's history in 2000.

Parts of our great state have been subject to three expiring provisions in this Act, as Elsie noted. Those provisions, among other important actions, have led to something of which I think all South Dakotans can be proud: a steady increase in the percentage of Native American participation in federal elections. In 2004 we saw Native Americans vote at a rate about 30 percent higher than in 2000, during the previous presidential contest.

In that context, it is important for the Commission to know that each of the expiring provisions has been exercised in South Dakota in the last several elections. The pre-clearance provision in Section 5 have helped ensure the changes to election law and procedure not discriminate, either overtly or subtly, against Native Americans.

Additionally, I can personally attest that the requirements for minority language protections have been widely exercised. That provision ensured that hundreds of Lakota-only speakers were able to participate last time in the election.

And in our most recent federal elections in 2002 and 2004, the Department of Justice sent examiners and observers under Section 6 through 9 provisions. I need not speak to the findings of those delegations as I am sure they will be produced in documentation about their trips that ought to be made available to the Commission. But the mere fact that the delegations were dispatched is, I believe, evidence of concern both on the ground in South Dakota as well as in the federal government in Washington.

Unfortunately, while the percentage of Native American voters is increasing, it is still well below the national average and even further below what we wish participation were for all voters, minority and otherwise.

So I look forward to hearing from the distinguished members of this panel this morning. We've come a long way in this country when it comes to the right to vote. Forty years ago those who marched for it were met with violence. Today that is not our fear. The fear is that those who seek to strengthen and extend the Voting Rights Act will be met by silence.

I'm confident that your knowledge and the experiences will help the Commission hear our concerns and in so doing, be able to provide Congress with a comprehensive report on discrimination in voting since the last reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. Thank you very much.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Senator. My next guest commissioner is Chris Nelson, and he is currently serving as South Dakota's Secretary of State, and we're very happy that he joined us.

He was elected in the 2002 general election. His responsibilities include overseeing the conduct of elections for South Dakota and a job that he takes very seriously. Prior to becoming Secretary of State, Chris held the position of State Election Supervisor in the Secretary of State's office for 13 years and was the Uniform Commercial Code supervisor in the same office for two years. Chris?

MR. NELSON: Thank you, Elsie. Good morning, and I would just like to first thank Jon Greenbaum and the folks at the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights for inviting me to participate in these proceedings as a guest commissioner. Having worked in election administration since 1989 and having been the Secretary of State since 2003, I think I bring perhaps a different perspective to this panel than the other panelists and one that I hope is helpful in the proceedings today.

I see my job as Secretary of State to oversee the election process in South Dakota and make sure that that process is free and fair for all candidates and all voters. As the senator has noted, the last four years have seen tremendous positive change in voter participation by Native Americans in South Dakota, and I want to give you just a couple examples, some numerical examples of that.

When we look at the increase in the number of people that have voted in the 2004 versus 2000 election in South Dakota, that increase was about 23 percent. When we look at the increase in the counties covered by Cheyenne River and Standing Rock, the increase is between 40 and 57 percent. When we look at the increase in Shannon County, 122 percent, and in Todd County, 139 percent, now almost six times the increase that we've seen elsewhere in the state.

When measuring the percentage of voting age population that's registered to vote, five of the top six counties in South Dakota are Native American counties and we see similar positive things for the voter turnout rate. Of the eight predominantly Native American counties in South Dakota, six of those have turnout rates higher than the state average, and so we've seen some good things happen.

Those positive changes are the result of changes in state election law primarily in the area of absentee voting and also the efforts of a lot of private organizations to encourage voter turnout among Native Americans.

It's my understanding today that the goal of this Commission is to document voting discrimination in light of the upcoming reauthorization of the pre-clearance, the minority language, and the election observer provisions of the Voting Rights Act. My interest today and my questions will primarily focus on the impact of these provisions on Native American voters in South Dakota. And in light of that, there are two key questions that I would hope each of the panelists today would answer during their presentation.

The first of those questions specifically is how has the Section 5 pre-clearance requirement impacted on the ability of voters in Todd and Shannon County to participate in the election process? And the second question is how have the minority language provisions impacted on Native American voters across South Dakota to participate in the election process?

With that, I look forward to each of the presentations today, and again, thank you for allowing me to participate.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Chris. I am very happy to introduce Commissioner Jacqueline Johnson who's the Executive Director of the National Congress of American Indians, the oldest and largest tribal governmental organization in the United States. Before joining NCAI in 2001, Ms. Johnson, Jacque, was the Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Native American Programs in the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

And on a personal note, I'd just -- Jacque is someone that I know there's two things that she really cares about developing in Indian country and that's voting and financial literacy, and we work very hard on those issues together. So thank you for joining us.

MS: JOHNSON: Thank you, Elsie. (Speaking in Native language.) I'm a Tlingit from Alaska. My Tlingit name is Ku seen. I'm from a village in Haines, Alaska called Dei Shu. I come from the Raven House, and I would like to thank the rest of the guest commissioners for the honor of being here today and the commissioners and also thank the National Commission for the hard work that they have done going from hearing to hearing to put together this very, very important record that I think will help us reconfirm the issues not only for Native Americans, but also for other minorities in this country as we try to address the important privilege that we have which is the right to vote.

Elsie said that the National Congress of American Indians is the oldest and largest advocacy organization in Washington, D.C., and recently we felt it very important for us to engage the Native vote, and we worked very hard across the country in many, many tribal communities to try to urge our citizens to exercise their right to vote and to get them out to the polls and to deal with just the whole engagement of getting out the vote, but also the protections, the voting protections rights to ensure that we had proper representation. Some of our friends who are part of this panel in the ACLU were very helpful in trying to make sure that we had the right protections in each of our communities as we continue.

And the other thing we're working on is trying to get more Natives to run for vote -- elections, local elections and national elections. So this project is not a one-year or two-year project for us. This is an ongoing project for us, and we're committed to helping our Native citizens engage in the political environment of this country.

Native Americans have had a long history of disenfranchisement, and we don't need to go through that history here today, but I want to just remind us of a couple things. That in, you know, 1924 when we were granted full citizenship rights, it took nearly 40 years for all 50 states to give Native Americans the right to vote. And then many of those states still had civilized standard tests. Sometimes it was a poll tax, sometimes it was a literacy test, sometimes through other kinds of intimidation. Many, many times you had to leave your reservation and your community to show that you were truly civilized before you had the right to vote.

And then -- you know, and then after we disengaged with that citizenship test, we still dealt with the same issues that many minorities in this country continue to face having to deal with voting. And so as we're here today, we're particularly interested in hearing the Native Americans' ongoing concerns with the right to vote. And I'm sure that we'll hear testimony not only from South Dakota, which I want to also note that in 1983 -- 1985, excuse me, three years after the last reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act, only 9.9 percent of Native Americans in South Dakota turned out to vote or engaged in voting and -- were registered, excuse me.

As we know and we heard from the Secretary of State and Senator Daschle, Native Americans in this state as well as throughout the country have really stepped up those numbers. And in the past 20 years, and particularly in South Dakota in the last federal elections, we have seen a tremendous turnout of Native Americans, and I think part of it is because of the Voting Rights Act and the ability it allows for us to continue to encourage our communities.

So I'm looking forward to today. I'm looking forward to the panelists and seeing what we can learn about the message that we can help with -- to continue to engage in our effort to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Jacque. Guest Commissioner Jennifer Ring, we thank you for being on this. She is the Executive Director of the ACLU of the Dakotas, and before joining the ACLU in 1999, she served for five years in the North Dakota State Legislature and was a field representative for the North Dakota Public Employees' Association, and she's been a real advocate for voting rights issues, and I'll let her give her statement. Thank you, Jennifer.

MS. RING: Yes. Thank you. I really want to thank the Commission for coming out here. This is a population that I deal with that have been waiting a long, long time to get their voting rights. I get a lot of calls and complaints from around the states, and when you go and find that somebody has a school board that is completely unresponsive to the Native community and yet the Native community is the majority in the school district, you have to wonder why. When you find a county Commission that is completely unresponsive and yet the Indians are the majority in the county, you have to wonder why.

I don't need to go over the long history of how Native Americans have been legally discriminated against. What I do want to say is a little bit about the local history. The Lakota, Dakota, Nakota people who are the majority Native American population of South Dakota have a long and proud history of serving this country. Every time this country has called, they have answered from the Lakota Code Talkers all the way to the military serving currently in Iraq and Afghanistan. And yet when they come home, they come home to a state that, in general, barely acknowledges their existence and local communities in particular that do not want them to, in any way, shape or form, participate in their community.

I want to acknowledge the presence in the room here today of several witnesses who, in my opinion, are heroes. They have fought for their voting rights when it meant facing official police intimidation to do so, and they fought for their voting rights against communities that would use any means possible to shut them down, and I thank you for coming and I thank you for hearing their stories.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Jennifer. The National Commission is pleased, very pleased to be here at the Journey Museum. I think it's a great venue for this. And we also want to thank the National Congress of American Indians for all it's done to assist us in planning this hearing.

So we're now running just a little bit late, but we're ready to hear from the first panel. So if Dan McCool, Bryan Sells, Theresa Two Bulls, and Raymond Uses the Knife, is that all -- would like to come forward? Oh, and Laurette Pourier, too, please.

We're very thankful for the people who have agreed to come give their testimony. It's your voices we want to capture in this report. I do want to remind the witnesses if they would try to keep their remarks to about ten minutes or so. And I also want to remind people that if you have cell phones, please put them on quiet or vibrate. I know it's always a reminder that I like, so thank you.

I'm going to --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Chair Meeks, may I interrupt just briefly? It just occurred to me that there's something that's happened that's critically important. This is the first time that the Commission meeting -- that this National Commission has actually hosted a hearing since the circumstances that have taken place with Katrina and the devastation that that's caused here in the United States, and as you all well know, that is the single worst disaster in the entire history of the United States of America.

And with thousands of our fellow citizens that have died, in particular, and the search still going on obviously in terms of survivors even today, I think it's appropriate that in light of our national role and the import to the role that we have throughout the entire country that we take just a moment in advance of the formal starting of the hearing, if we can, in recognition, a moment of silence, perhaps, in their honor. Would you all just join me in standing for a moment in a brief moment of silence?

(A moment of silence was observed.)

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you very much.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Joe. That's very appropriate. I am going to read the bios of the panelists that are on this panel, and then let -- then we'll start at this end.

Dan McCool is the -- is currently a professor of Political Science at the University of Utah and serves as the Director of the American West Center and the Environmental Studies at the University of Utah. Mr. McCool's research focuses on Indian voting rights, Indian water rights, water resource development, and public lands policy. He has appeared as an expert witness in several Indian voting rights cases and has written and published extensively on the subject. Mr. McCool is the co-author of a book manuscript currently under contract titled, I'm Indian and I vote: American Indians, the Voting Rights Act, and the Right to Vote.

His additional body of published work includes Native Waters: Contemporary Indian Water Settlement in the Second Treaty Era; Command of the Waters: Iron Triangles, Federal Water Development, and Indian Water; Staking Out the Terrain: Power and Performance Among Natural Resource Agencies; and Public Policy Theories, Models and Concepts. Mr. McCool received his Ph.D. from the University of Arizona in 1983.

Bryan Sells is currently staff counsel for the Voting Rights Project of the ACLU and specializes in Native American voting rights and ballot access litigation. In his five years with the ACLU, he has represented tribal members in more than a half a dozen notable cases in South Dakota, including Quiver v. Nelson, the largest voting rights lawsuit in history. Mr. Sells received his undergraduate degree from Harvard and law degree from the Columbia School of Law.

The Honorable Theresa Two Bulls is a state senator from South Dakota. In a legislature where both women and American Indians are in the minority, Theresa Two Bulls, one of the four Indian lawmakers in the entire legislature, stands out as the first Indian woman to serve as a state lawmaker in South Dakota. Ms. Two Bulls is a member of the Oglala Sioux Tribe. After serving as tribal secretary from 1990 to 1998, a job she did very well, and vice-president from 2000 to 2002, Ms. Two Bulls took a sabbatical from her post as tribal prosecutor to serve in the Senate. She represents the Pine Ridge Reservation and currently serves on the Health and Human Services and Local Government Committees.

Raymond Uses the Knife is the Tribal Vice-Chairman for the Cheyenne River Sioux Nation in South Dakota, currently serving his fourth term on the tribal council. Ray's been selected by his colleagues to serve as Vice-Chairman of the Cheyenne River Sioux Nation in South Dakota. He serves on the Claims and Legislations, Economic Development, Environment and Natural Resources, Health, and Wolakota committees. In addition, Ray also serves on the Voting Rights Commission.

And Laurette Pourier who was a recent -- we're very happy that she agreed to testify. I don't have her bio, but I can tell you anything you want to know about Laurette. She is the Executive Director or the Chair of SANI-T which is the Strengthening --

MS. POURIER: Society for the Advancement of Native Interests - Today.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: That's right. Thank you. And she has been an advocate for domestic violence and has been a community developer for many, many years. So thank you for all being here. Dan, would you --

MR. McCOOL: Thank you, Elsie. It's a pleasure and an honor to be here. It's rather difficult to sum up everything in ten minutes, but I'll do my best. We just finished a book manuscript on voting in Indian country. Most of the book is about the Voting Rights Act. That's because the Voting Rights Act has had a profound impact on the ability of Indians to vote.

We started with the history of Indian voting and things really pick up when the Voting Rights Act is passed. We collected every case we could find in Indian Country having to do with voting rights and we came up with a list of 66 cases which is far more than we had even anticipated when we started.

Let me just note that of those 66 cases, the Indian plaintiffs only lost four of them, and one of those is on appeal. So by and large, American Indians win voting rights cases, and I think that's a telling fact, in and of itself, that there is a problem out there, and the Voting Rights Act, including its renewable provisions, is the way to address those problems. 21 of the 66 cases involved the renewable provisions, Sections 5 and Sections 203. And South Dakota is tied with New Mexico for the greatest number of cases; they both come in at 17.

The book also includes a final chapter that looks at the elections of 2002 and 2004 to see if all the problems have been resolved and everything's working well. And the investigation of our -- myself and my two coauthors indicates there are continuing problems including the number problems in South Dakota. So we see some problems have been resolved and other problems continue to arise, and there are still challenges to American Indians in their efforts to try to vote.

There were also a number of widespread accusations about, quote, Indian voter fraud which proved to be inaccurate, and I think the level of accusations is indicative of the level of animosity and the hostility that has been created when American Indians register and try to vote.

I've also served as an expert witness on a number of cases and I'd like to just generally talk about the things that I've discovered in my work as an expert witness. When I do reports, I interview a lot of local people, both Anglo and Indian. I go through U.S. Commission on Civil Rights reports, court cases, the local newspapers, state and local law, state attorney general opinions, state constitutions, so I take a careful look at the entire context in which Indian voting takes place.

And in South Dakota, there is still a high level of racial polarization in a number of areas. It's not true everywhere, but it is true in a number of areas where there's a large number of Indians and they're attempting to vote. Polarization is still there. And, of course, this is especially true when Indians run against Anglos, we see a spike in that.

And there's a lot of racial animosity and it goes both ways. There's a lot of feelings of prejudice and a lot of feelings of -- that people feel like they're not being treated fairly, and again, it's both Anglos and Indians that are experiencing this. Once again, I think it's indicative of the level of polarization and hostility we see in some of these election environments.

There is still a widespread perception that Indians shouldn't even be allowed to vote especially in state and local elections. A lot of discussion among non-Indians that if they, quote, don't pay taxes -- which of course is not true -- but if they don't pay taxes, they should not be allowed to vote. So that's another level of resistance to Indian voting.

And there's still language barriers. There is still a significant portion of American Indian people who do not have the language skills to engage effectively in the political process including voting.

And there's a host of sort of practical problems that Indians have to face that makes it more difficult for Indians to vote: Long distances to polling places, often over bad roads; polls that are not located conveniently or not on Indian reservations; hostility among election workers and public officials; the purging of voter lists; a poor understanding of election laws and procedures; difficulties and resistance when attempting to register to vote; and efforts to dilute the impact of Indian voting. We see a whole series of Section 2 cases in that regard, and, of course, the language problems that I alluded to earlier.

In conclusion, let me -- let me just make four general points about what I've seen in 25 years of research in this area. Indian people still face significant hurdles when they try to participate in the electoral process. In some places it's much better. They're achieving remarkable gains in some areas, but there are still significant hurdles that are not faced by other people.

The Voting Rights Act and including Sections 5 and 203, that Act has played a pivotal role in providing American Indians with an opportunity to vote and elect candidates of their choice. The impact is enormous. Probably 90 percent of our vote -- our book on Indian voting is about the Voting Rights Act because that's what's happened. That's where the action is. That's where Indians have been effectively empowered; it's through the Voting Rights Act including the renewable provisions.

And I think, as we all know, Indians have played an important role in a number of recent elections, and I think the Voting Rights Act has helped them achieve that and helped empower them.

And finally, let me just say the Voting Rights Act has really given meaning and substance to democracy on the reservation. It's helped American Indians fulfill the most basic element of the American dream and that's the right to vote and have an impact on one's government through the electoral process. Did I finish in time?

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: You were just fine.

MR. McCOOL: Okay.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: I'm going ask the commissioners to hold votes until after all the testimony and then we'll be able to ask questions, but one thing I did want to ask Mr. McCool is if you would provide info about the 66 cases you mentioned to the Commission as part of the record so that they could have it as part of the record.

MR. McCOOL: We compiled them in a spreadsheet and I'd be most happy to share those with you. However, we are under contract with Cambridge University Press, so technically I'll have to get clearance from them, but with their permission, I'd be most happy to provide that to you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you. Bryan?

MR. SELLS: I, too, would like to thank the Commission for the honor of being here today and for coming out to South Dakota. I agree with those who have come before me who have said that it's important to be out here. I'd also like to thank each of the commissioners for their personal service on this important Commission.

As was mentioned in my introduction, I am a staff attorney with the Voting Rights Project with the American Civil Liberties Union, and over the last six years, the Voting Rights Project has represented tribal members in seven voting rights cases here in South Dakota, and I have been lead counsel in six of those seven cases.

I'd like to recognize Patrick Duffy of the Rapid City law firm of Duffy and Duffy who has been our local counsel in all seven cases at great personal and professional sacrifice. He's sitting right back there and deserves a lot of credit for the work that we've been able to do here in this state.

Our clients' litigation has challenged virtually every level of government in this state from the state legislature and the Secretary of State on down to county commissions, city councils, and school boards. To date, our clients have prevailed in five of the seven cases with one case still pending before the District Court and one case now pending before the United States Court of Appeals.

Together, these cases and the volumes of evidence that they have generated offer a compelling demonstration of the present-day violations of the Voting Rights Act and the need to renew and restore those important provisions of the Act which are set to expire in 2007.

Any discussion of Section 5 compliance in South Dakota has to begin with William Janklow. On August 23, 1977, then State Attorney General Janklow issued an official opinion in which he assailed Section 5 as a, quote, absurdity, end quote, that imposed an unworkable solution to a nonexistent problem. Janklow advised the South Dakota Secretary of State, Lorna Herseth, that he intended to pursue both litigation and legislation that would exempt South Dakota from the Voting Rights Act and that Herseth should therefore disregard the pre-clearance mandate in the meantime.

Janklow never did file a bailout lawsuit. Legislation was never passed exempting South Dakota from the Voting Rights Act, but Secretary Herseth and her successors in office followed Janklow's advice for more than a quarter century.

My office first learned of the state's intentional noncompliance with Section 5 in early 2002, and we spent the next six months identifying more than 600 unpre-cleared voting changes at the state level.

When we brought suit in August of 2002 on behalf of four tribal members, including Senator Two Bulls to my left, in a case entitled Elaine Quick Bear Quiver versus Secretary of State Joyce Hazeltine, that case was described as the largest voting rights case in history.

The State initially denied the plaintiffs' allegations. Secretary Nelson, who was then the long-time supervisor of the elections department within the Secretary of State's office, was quoted in the media as saying that his office was in full compliance with the Voting Rights Act, something that turned out not to be true.

The parties negotiated a consent order and a remedial plan in which the secretary eventually admitted to more than 800 separate violations of Section 5, and Secretary Nelson has been in the process of bringing the state into compliance with Section 5 for those past violations over the last three years.

Although he has made a lot of progress toward that goal, Secretary Nelson has twice been cited by the Court for noncompliance with the terms of the consent order. Just this year, the Quiver plaintiffs had to return to court after the Secretary refused to comply with the consent order with respect to a new law passed at the 2005 legislative session in response to our seventh lawsuit on behalf of Indian voters.

On January 27, 2005, the Voting Rights Project filed suit on behalf of four Native American voters in Charles Mix County alleging, one, that the county commissioner districts in Charles Mix County were malapportioned in violation of the one-person-one-vote standard. Two, that the commissioner districts had the effect of diluting Native American voting strength in violation of Section 2. And three, that the commissioner districts were adopted or are being maintained for the purpose of discriminating against Native American voters. That lawsuit is known as Evelyn Blackmoon versus Charles Mix County.

And in response to that lawsuit, members of the Charles Mix County Commission asked their state legislators to introduce emergency redistricting legislation that became House Bill 1265. House Bill 1265 enables counties to redraw the boundaries of their county commissioner districts more than once per decade under certain circumstances, but only after obtaining permission to do so from the governor and the Secretary of State. House Bill 1265 was designed to change the existing law which permits a county to redistrict only once per decade and only at the county commission's regular meeting in February in a year ending in the numeral 2.

House Bill 1265 passed both houses of the state legislature despite vociferous opposition from Native Americans who testified against the bill. The governor signed the law on March 7, 2005, the same day on which the Blackmoon plaintiffs filed a motion for summary judgment on their one-person-one-vote claim. Because House Bill 1265 contained an emergency clause, it went into effect upon the governor's signature, and Secretary Nelson began to implement the law immediately.

That is when the Quiver plaintiffs returned to court. They obtained a temporary restraining order enjoining the Secretary from implementing House Bill 1265 absent compliance with Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, and a three-judge court later turned that temporary restraining order into a preliminary injunction. In its unanimous decision issuing the injunction, the three-judge court noted that the state's -- noted the state's history of intentional noncompliance with the Act, including the Secretary of State's refusal to seek pre-clearance for the state's 2001 legislative redistricting plan, and the Court described House Bill 1265 as, quote, a rushed attempt to circumvent the Voting Rights Act. Secretary Nelson has appealed that decision to the Supreme Court, and the Blackmoon case remains pending before the district court.

Because my time is short, let me tell you about one more case just briefly. In 2003 the Voting Rights Project filed suit on behalf of three members of the Crow Creek Sioux Tribe in a challenge to the county commission districts in Buffalo County, South Dakota. The case was known as Crystal Kirkie versus Buffalo County. The plaintiffs alleged that the districts were malapportioned in violation of the one-person-one-vote principle and were adopted or maintained for the purpose of discriminating against Native American voters.

Buffalo County, which according to the 2000 census is the poorest county in the United States, has a population of approximately 2100 people, 85 percent of whom are Native American. The county commission's three districts which had been in use for decades contained populations of approximately 1700, 300, and 100 people respectively. Virtually all of the 1700 people in Commissioner District 1 were Native American while not a single Indian lived in the underpopulated District 3. The result was that the county's minuscule non-Indian minority had effective control over the county commission.

The parties settled the case in early 2004. The county agreed to redraw its commissioner districts and to hold a special election for two of the three seats. The county also agreed to relief under Section 3(c) of the Voting Rights Act, which effectively means that Buffalo County is now subject to the pre-clearance requirements of Section 5 along with Shannon and Todd Counties in South Dakota.

The Kirkie case is unique not only because of the severe extent of the malapportionment or the fact that the plaintiffs got relief under Section 3, but also because the case literally caused a revolution in control at the county commission. Most of our seven cases are simply about giving Native Americans a place at the table. But given the demographics of Buffalo County, justice required more in that case. The Kirkie case was about giving Native Americans the full opportunity to elect representatives of their choice, and that has resulted in control of the table. I'm pleased to report that a -- that Native American voters have elected representatives of their choice to two out of the three seats on the Commission with a third up for election next year.

In closing, let me just list the remaining casing that I won't have an opportunity to discuss so that you can ask me questions about them, if you're so inclined. Emery versus Hunt was a successful challenge in 2000 to the state legislature's decision in 1996 to abolish a single-member house district on the Cheyenne River Reservation that was specifically created in 1991 to avoid minority vote dilution.

Weddell versus Wagner Community School District was a successful challenge in 2002 to at-large school board elections in Charles Mix County, South Dakota, that resulted in the adoption of a cumulative voting scheme by consent of the parties.

Bone Shirt versus Nelson was a successful challenge to the state's 2001 legislative redistricting plan. The plaintiffs prevailed on both their Section 5 claim and their Section 2 claim, and the District Court's 144-page decision on the Section 2 claim is nothing short of historic.

And finally, Cottier versus City of Martin is a vote dilution challenge to the ward boundaries in the reservation border town of Martin, South Dakota. That case is currently on appeal after the District Court found that the plaintiffs had not satisfied the third Gingles factor required to prove a claim under Section 2.

And I want to leave you with this: Perhaps the person whose words best capture the state of Indian-white relations in South Dakota, in my view, is State Representative John Two Bull whose comments were cited in the Bone Shirt decision as part of the plaintiff's, quote, overwhelming evidence of the legislature's unresponsiveness to Indian concerns.

During the 2002 legislative session, Representative Two Bull made a lengthy speech in opposition to a bill which would have required state law enforcement officers to collect data on racial profiling. He said that he would be, quote, leading the charge to end racial profiling, to reduce alcoholism and poverty on the reservations, and to support Native American voting rights when Indians decide to be, quote, citizens, end quote, of the state by giving up their tribal sovereignty and paying, quote, their fair share of the tax burden. Rather than face censure from his colleagues for such openly hostile remarks, Representative Two Bull's colleagues elected him to the House Republican leadership in the following session.

That attitude toward Native American voting rights, I'm sad to say, is still shared by many in positions of power in this state. Until those attitudes change, Native Americans will continue to need every bit of protection that the Voting Rights Act affords to them.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Bryan. I'm sure there will be plenty of questions. Senator Two Bulls?

SEN. TWO BULLS: Good afternoon. It's an honor and a pleasure to be here today. The reason why I'm here today is to maybe open a few eyes and some ears to the problems that we have faced on the Indian reservations in South Dakota.

I guess you could label me as an old-timer. I've been involved in registering voters since 1980 when there was just a handful of us going across the reservation to get our people interested and to have them get involved in the state elections and the federal elections.

The first problem that I came across was why? Why should we vote? They don't listen to us. We don't get anything from them anyway. And I told them, that is not what we're about. We have a voice and our voice needs to be heard, regardless.

And I've come across prejudice, discrimination when I was registering voters. There was discrimination from the county officials. They put roadblocks up for us saying that we had to have limited cards. They had to be notarized. They gave us time frames which I felt was only imposed on the Indians in the counties and the state.

I think the first thing that we have to do, and it's continuing and I've been saying over and over, is that we have to educate the State of South Dakota about Native Americans. As Native Americans, we have always been taught to respect; to respect each other and yourselves, and that also means respect other nationalities, but first of all, to respect yourself.

I become involved in this voters' rights because I felt that even though we're a minority, we do have a voice. Our votes do count. Whatever decisions are made on the federal and the state level also affect the Native Americans in the State of South Dakota. I even came across comments made to me when I got elected into the State Senate that I -- why are you -- why did you run? What are you going to do in this state? And my thinking is, once our people step off the reservation, the state laws kick in. They have to abide by the state laws also, so we have to have input on the state laws also that's not going to discriminate against the Native Americans. So that was one of the main purposes.

And another was to bring education to the State of South Dakota, to the legislators that we are here, we're the first occupants, and we're not going away. We're going to always be here. This is our homeland from the very beginning, and we want to be heard, and we want to be treated equal and right just like everybody else. We want those rights that everybody else gets to have. We're no different than anybody else. We're Native Americans. We're educated. We have people that are educated.

We have our 18-year-olds coming up that are able to vote now, and I've seen them really being enthused about wanting to vote, wanting to get involved. That was a big issue that we had was getting our people involved because they didn't want to. They didn't trust the State of South Dakota. They didn't trust the United States Government because of all the sanctions, all the roadblocks they put on us on welfare, education, healthcare, all those blocks that were put -- that are still here today.

We're witteling away -- on these lawsuits that Bryan mentioned earlier, we're witteling away at these blocks, and we hope to get rid of them once and for all like they did the Berlin Wall. Let's get rid of all of that. Let's all work together. Let's work in a partnership. Let's work together and make life better for all the citizens. They include the Native Americans as citizens in the State of South Dakota. Let's make life better for everybody in the State of South Dakota. Let's don't discriminate. Let's don't be prejudiced. Let's just work together because we have future generations to look at to make sure that their lives are going to be fair and just, that they're going to live a good life here in the State of South Dakota.

I was -- I was honored to be asked to be part of these lawsuits because I am an advocate for the Native Americans' rights. We have rights. If I can be a voice anywhere, in any place, I'm going to be there to speak up that we have a right also and we have a right to be heard. We have younger generations coming up who I hope that would get involved in the state legislation, get involved in what's going on in federal government, and let's change these. Let's turn times around. Let's don't live in the past. Let's look at the future, what it's going to hold for all of us.

I think the rude awakening, I hope it is to everybody, is Nine Eleven. This world can be blown up in a matter of seconds and we're all going to be gone. Why not let's get together now. Let's get together and let's work with these laws. I'm for Section 5, Section 2 to be reauthorized. It has made a big impact on the elections, especially this last election, having our full-blooded Lakota people being able to finally understand why they are going to the polls and what they're voting for because they had people there that speak the language that can explain it to them. That has never happened before. That's why I think a lot of them stayed away because they didn't understand what was going on.

The polling places, yes, they changed some of that. They did allow some of the polling places to be put up so that it would be more accessible to the people, but that took, like, pulling teeth out to the county officials to even agree to put different polling places up so that our people could have easy access to them.

I really feel that this redistricting needs to be really looked at. We do -- as Native Americans, we do need more representation on the state level. Four of us today is not enough. We need more, and if everybody is saying that they want to work together, they want to make a difference, give us leeway. We have given leeway so many times before in the past and today, but yet, we're not given leeway in return.

It was stated earlier about the percentage of increase in the voting, and that goes back to the redistricting. We need to be redistricted. We need to have more positions in the counties that are 90 percent Native Americans. There's no harm in giving us another position. It's just to make us -- to assure our people that our -- we can be heard. Our concerns, our issues can be heard, and they will be -- laws will be implemented or created for our concerns. I really believe that we need to educate our people in the State of South Dakota and maybe in all the other states that have Native Americans in their state.

I want to tell you a story. I was -- I had the opportunity to have a little seventh-grader -- or a second-grader from Madison, South Dakota, she adopted me as her senator and she wrote me a letter. She pulled me up on the Internet and saw who I was, and she wrote me a letter, and it had "Wow" just written big on my letter, and it said, "Wow, you really are Indian," you know, and it made me think that, yes, they do need to be educated. They need to know who we are, what we're about. We're not here to cause problems. We're not here to disrupt anything. We just want to be a part. We want to be a part so our concerns and our issues can be dealt with.

I really feel bad that the -- after all these years that there's still prejudice and discrimination, but that also goes back to the person who feels the prejudice, who's showing the discrimination, that maybe something happened in their life that they haven't dealt with and they're taking it out on other people, but it isn't right to be taking it out on Native Americans just because we're a minority.

So there's a lot of education that needs to be done. I've been on this issue since 1980. I've tried to be involved as much as I can. Being on the state Senate was an eye-opener for me. It showed me that there's a lot to be learned out there, not only in the white society, but the Native Americans also on why this needs to be done, why we're talking about the voting rights today, why it's so important to the Native Americans, and important to the other minorities in the other states.

I'm not really sure what I was supposed to say, but this is what I'm saying from my heart. This is what I feel, and I just hope that you do reauthorize these sections. That we do need them. We do need the redistricting, the elections, the polling places, the language.

We did have poll watchers there, but even discrimination was there also. Our people were turned away. They weren't given reasons; they were just turned away. They set time limits. There was just -- it's still ongoing today in 2000 in the 21st century, and I think we need to change that. So I encourage the Commission to really take to heart what is being said here today, not only here, but the other places that you've attended and heard testimony, and we need to be just fair -- be treated fair and just. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Senator. Raymond Uses the Knife?

MR. USES THE KNIFE: Yeah. My name is Raymond Uses the Knife. (Speaking in Native language.) Friends and relatives, I want to thank you for allowing me to speak, and I want to welcome the Commission to Lakota Country. You've probably heard the term Sioux. Lakota is who we are, and we have seven bands of the Tetonwan Oyate and I represent four of them: Mnicoujou, Sihasapa, O'Ohenumpa, and Itazipco of the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe. And also remember that the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe, we're not Cheyenne. The river Cheyenne is what we were named after, so just some of the things I wanted to make clear.

I represent probably 19 communities on my reservation, and there are many, many communities and Eagle Butte is the hub of the reservation. That's where the Indian Health Service, Bureau of Indian Affairs and the tribal headquarters as well as many of the economic enterprises on the reservation are there.

It's sad to say, though, a lot of the testimony here given already is very true. Economics is one of the biggest problems that we're facing. Because of the economic stress, and you probably know about the gas gouging, I call it, going on here, everywhere. It's causing a lot of our people a lot of stress. So I'm glad that we're not right now in a current election year because it would have been pretty humbling for the leadership to try to get the folks to even a voting poll.

Voting polls on the reservation are again, as was mentioned, very limited. Accessibility is not there, and a lot of the issues pertaining to language proficiency is very, very real. A lot of my people are Lakota speakers. Lakota is our number one language and English is our number two language. So when it comes time to vote and you come to the voting poll and you don't understand the English, you want to ask questions, and the representatives from the poll watchers are there from the county governments or their representatives are there, and you want to know what's going on, it's sometimes -- sometimes you're made to feel like you have no business there, and sometimes you're made to feel like you're taking up too much of their time, you know. Wait in line, stand in line.

And I've also witnessed one of our tribal members didn't know how to read or write and he needed help from his wife. His wife was proficient in the English language, and that's what his request was, but it was denied. So he was so upset with this situation that he picked up his ballot and just tore it in half and threw it in the trash can. He said this is the second time that this is the way he was treated at the polls.

Another elderly woman, one of my aunts, the oldest living relative of mine in my tiospaye -- tisopaye is extended family where there's many of us, four or five hundred of us. And I remember she called and wanted to vote. So I said, "Okay. Can I help you in any way?" She said, "I can't get out of my bed." "Okay. So let me see if I can bring a ballot to you and see if the representatives from the poll can bring the ballot to you for you to vote."

But the poll watchers told me through -- told her through me that she has to -- "you're going to have to wheelchair her to the parking lot so we can bring out a ballot for her to vote." And this was very distressful for her at the time because she wanted to exercise -- simply exercise her right to vote, but was denied. So things like this are going on on the reservations.

And language -- the limited language proficiency also causes a lot of our people to have mistrust in the non-Native elections. A lot of the comments that I hear is that our Lakota people feel that they have no chance in the system that is there already, whether it's the state system or the federal system.

And I know Chris has been there -- Mr. Nelson's been at Cheyenne River working with us, and he's offered his hand to help us to work some of these things out, so I'm glad to see that, and these are some of the positive changes that I wanted to mention.

We also have the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribal Voters' Rights Commission that was established just within the last three years. I've been on the tribal council that was mentioned four terms now; that's going on 16 years. And there, I noticed that a lot of my people are telling me that we need a change. We need to do something because it's not -- nothing's happening in Indian Country. What happened 10 years ago, what we were fighting for 10, 20 years ago, we're still fighting for today: our health issues, economics, voting rights issues.

So I asked tribal council to implement a Voting Rights Commission. The languages, we're still working on it, but the commission has been active now for three years, and we've been involved in the last election in 2002, trying to educate our people. That's the -- our main focus in the commission is to educate our people because, as was mentioned earlier, our people feel disenfranchised, and they feel they have no say-so in the governments. They may have a -- they feel they may have a little say-so in the tribal governments because they get to vote for their tribal officials every two years, but they feel that the state elections and the county elections, sometimes they call it these are white elections and they don't belong to us. So this is the education that we have to do amongst our own people.

And limited tribal resources is another issue. Some of the ways that we thought that we could help our people is to get out into the communities and try and work -- try to have some visibility in the community so that our community representatives, the Lakota speakers can ask us questions, but because of our limited resources, it's hard.

When election time comes, people can't find rides. A lot of our people don't have transportation so it's known that it's a common fact that it costs $50 just to get a ride to the hub of the reservation some places. 80 miles from Bridger to the middle of the reservation, Promise, Black Foot also 80 miles to the central reservation. Lack of transportation, lack of transit systems, you name it.

One of the good things that we have coming for us, though, is our ability in communications. We own our own Cheyenne River Sioux Telephone Authority, and there we also own our Lakota Network. Our -- we're an Internet service provider for the communities. So a lot of the communications happened just recently through electronic communications now. And so a lot of things are opening -- the doors are opening now for us where we can try to get our communications out there, but we're still limited in a lot of areas.

One of the things that we have done was we have changed our Tribal Constitution to allow for the national elections to coincide with our tribal elections. This really puts an effort in not only the tribal leadership, but also the state representatives and the county representatives, the federal representatives. We've had examiners come out, thankfully, to the reservations helping us, letting us know what our rights are -- what our rights are under the Voters Rights Act.

And we need to support the Commission here in trying to keep these provisions alive and to work very hard not only with our communities there and our tribal governments and representatives such as the ACLU and the -- our state legislators to try to get the word out that we need to keep these provisions there so that we can be assured of our right to vote in national elections and county elections and state elections. I think my time is up. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you very much. Ms. Pourier?

MS. POURIER: Hello everyone. Thank you, commissioners and representatives for our people, for being here. Thank you to the National Commission for hosting this, and thank you, it's an honor for me to be here, and I really don't know why I'm here. Yes, I do. I believe in speaking for the people and for the people to have the rights that we deserve.

As Elsie mentioned, I am the cofounder of an organization called SANI-T or the Society for the Advancement of Native Interests - Today which we founded in 2002. We met for an entire year planning how to run that organization. It's a grassroots organization made up of Indians and non-Indians. It's patterned somewhat after the NAACP. However, we operate totally with volunteers and with absolutely no budget, so it's a little bit hard to do the things that we dream of doing for the people.

The organization believes in acting peaceful, constructive, and professional in every case that we handle. Since 2002 it's come to our awareness that racism in Rapid City and in South Dakota is rampant when actually you consider the years and the time that's gone by and education, that there should be some movement on non-Indians' part to accept us as people. And I could tell you stories that are absolutely horrible of reports that we've had. The areas of most concern in Rapid City are with law enforcement, medical treatment, in our education system, and voting rights.

So I just wanted to tell you a little bit about what we do. I had the opportunity to work with the Native Vote Project in South Dakota for the last election, and so what I am going to talk about is just personal experience in doing that, but I was one of 77 Native American poll workers that were placed in Montana, South Dakota, and North Dakota through the national Help America Vote Program. So that appealed to me when I was asked to do that because as a voter myself, what I had experienced when going to vote was being confronted by little old white ladies -- excuse the term, not to offend anyone, but that's what I saw -- and being questioned and being treated poorly.

And so when I was asked to participate or to volunteer, I was glad to do so to be -- and we just spread the word amongst the people, the women that were doing it, is we're going to be the little old brown ladies sitting there and at least make a statement that way. But our purpose was to help the Native American voters feel more comfortable, to have a recognizable friend or at least a greeter that they'd feel okay about, that they wouldn't have to be afraid or nervous.

So I guess I acted as an observer before that and -- at one precinct, and my experience in doing that, I did it for one full day, and, of course, the little old white ladies that were there gave me attitude, and I -- that's the only way to say it, and it was attitude. There wasn't specific words of put-downs or anything, but it was in a look or a gesture or a tone of voice.

And being somewhat frustrated by that and talking about it later, I told one of the other workers, I said, "You know, but it's nothing -- yes, it was racism, but it -- you know, it's nothing tangible that I can actually document." There was nothing that you can document.

And then we went back to what my friend Carol Maiki always told us, a friend and mentor who is now not with us any longer, but she always said to me, "If you feel it, it's real," and she was -- we were talking about racism. So it was definitely there.

As an observer, we were whispered about, told that we shouldn't be there. If -- you know, you sit close to the table where they announce the names, and you record that. They spoke quietly so that we couldn't hear them. They formed a huddle in the corner and were trying -- and then one came over to talk to us to tell us that they decided that we had to leave. So it was -- it took courage to be there, I guess, but we did it.

And then as a greeter in another precinct, I just -- I took a few notes of what I could observe when I wasn't busy, but I know that it was the same attitude, not on every worker's part, but there just seemed to be an attitude toward Native people, Indian people when they came in, and -- and some of them had a terrible time trying to vote. There was one voter that was from Lakota Homes that he had gone to one precinct. They sent him to the precinct -- they sent him to the courthouse, and then they sent him to the precinct I was working at, and they still denied his right to vote. And I don't know what that issue was. I think it was a discrepancy in his name and how it was spelled or something.

I know that there were three, at least, Indian voters who were registered, but they could not find their names in the registry so -- and they were not given provisional ballots. Now I went through the training to be a poll worker, and I think that they were supposed to have -- be allowed to have provisional ballots.

Then there were people who -- let's see. Oh, about the provisional ballots, they were told they can vote provisional ballots, some people. However, later I was told that those provisional ballots, that our local auditor makes the decision whether or not those votes are counted. The people are not informed of that, if that's the case. It's hard for me to believe.

There seemed to be -- oftentimes there was confusion between and among the people working at the voting table and checking the registry and the people handing out ballots, and the big confusion, I think, was around provisional voting and soiled ballots. So a lot of times, because of their confusion, there were people that were not allowed to vote.

There was one person that had signed up previously for an absentee ballot, but had cancelled it. She explained that to the people, but she was still not allowed to vote.

Those are the things that I observed, and I questioned my reason for being here because it doesn't seem like a lot, but it's my own experience. I guess that's all I have to share.

Oh, I wanted to ask Theresa about the translator at -- was that on the reservation?

SEN. TWO BULLS: Yes.

MS. POURIER: Oh. Because it seemed odd to me because we did not have translators in Rapid City, and Rapid City's population is 10 percent Indian, and in light of the fact that at least -- almost 60 percent of the Native American population are now urban residents, it seems that they should have translators in the cities also.

Another thing that causes concern among the people that I know is requiring picture IDs. So many of our people do not have picture IDs, and it's a real hardship on them to get them.

I guess the -- my comment about the voter -- the reports of voter fraud, I think that it was a campaign to discredit Indians, and it was just taken and run with by the media, and it discredited Indians to the utmost. So I think that's all.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you. Thank you. We'll take questions now for any of the commissioners, or I can start to my left and work down.

SEN. DASCHLE: I want to thank all of our panelists for your testimony and for sharing your views with us in such an eloquent way this morning.

I have two questions. First, you all have articulated a number of ways that the current system isn't working as well as it should. Either through personal experience or through your research, you have acquired an understanding of the current circumstances that I think exceeds that of most people.

I guess the question is, have you come to the conclusion whether it is a matter of enforcement or whether new law has to be created beyond the renewable provisions of the Voting Rights Act to deal with the circumstances that you have all outlined? In other words, where is the law deficient if it's not just a question of enforcement?

MR. SELLS: I have a couple of answers to that question, Senator Daschle. I think enforcement is a -- of the current law is a huge part of it, and we're doing everything that we can to do that. But I'm just one person. I've got the able assistance of Mr. Duffy and -- but still, it's just a few of us doing the enforcement work. The Department of Justice hasn't been out here doing that work. They joined our lawsuit in 90 -- in 2000, but since then, they have not joined our other litigation. So I think enforcement is key.

The one gap that I see over and over again in South Dakota is that there -- Section 5 doesn't cover enough places. As you know, there was a -- a formula, a coverage formula based on the Census and turnout in a presidential election. Well, as a result of federal policy, there was an exodus of Native Americans from the reservations at that time. There was also an undercount in the Federal Census, and as a result, places like Bennett County, Buffalo County, Dewey County, Ziebach County, which probably should have been covered if the formula were applied fairly, are not, and that would save us a lot of headaches.

Just for example, in Bennett County, the county commission this year has chosen to decrease the number of polling places so that Native Americans in Batesland have to drive all the way into Martin to cast their votes, and they drive right past a polling place on the other side of the street. And so it's that sort of a change that I think should be covered. It's not so much a new -- a new provision, but it's just an expanding coverage of the current provisions, and I know I'm a bit of a heretic for saying that, but that's what I think is needed in South Dakota, based on my experience.

SEN. DASCHLE: Thank you, Bryan.

MR. USES THE KNIFE: My answer is money.

SEN. DASCHLE: Money.

MR. USES THE KNIFE: I wanted to mention that I know -- I know about unfunded mandates, and a lot of times when Tom was a senator, we went to him many, many times to help us with funds. But if there could be new language to allow for funds that could be accessed by tribes who have limited resources where we could contract these funds and maybe try to get some educational programs going on the reservation, is one thing.

MS. POURIER: In my opinion, along with enforcing the current law, education is where it's at. Education for all the people that work the elections, work in the polls, have any contact at all with Native American voters, and that would be around cultural competency, getting to know who we are better, to eliminate that feeling that we're so different. So education.

MR. McCOOL: May I say that I think it's important to look at the history of the Voting Rights Act as it was passed. Racists proved to be ingenious people when it came to trying to figure out ways to get around the actual impact of the minority voters. And as they developed schemes to essentially deprive the Voting Rights Act of its power, the Act was amended to essentially plug those holes.

And what gives the Voting Rights Act power today is that it has all these various sections. Each one is designed to come at this at a different angle to keep people who, for one reason or another, do not want minorities voting, and it's designed to try to prevent them from doing that. That's why it needs to be considered as a whole, and that's why renewing the renewable sections is so important because that is part of the whole of the Act designed to prevent people from finding new ways to stop minorities from voting.

SEN. DASCHLE: One other question. I know that -- oh, I'm sorry, Theresa, go ahead.

SEN. TWO BULLS: Yes. I wanted to answer in regards to the enforcement. I think the clarification -- clarification needs to be given to the county officials or the other entities that are -- that have these -- this voting because they seem to interpret the laws the way they want to interpret them when we as Native Americans, we abide by the laws. We try to do what they ask, like, getting picture IDs or making sure we're at the right polling places and stuff.

So I think the enforcement part of it, the shoe's on the other foot where it's the Native Americans that are trying to abide, but it's the officials that aren't abiding and interpreting the laws the way they want them in order to put barriers before us.

SEN. DASCHLE: I'm on a commission on election reform, and one of the things that has been discussed and proposed by some in Washington is a national picture ID requirement for all who vote. Laurette mentioned the impact that that has in the Native American community in particular, but I think other minorities might have similar concerns. But could you just elaborate, anybody, a little bit about the implications for a national picture ID and how it would affect people, especially the elderly on reservations?

MR. USES THE KNIFE: I could answer a little bit about that, Tom, because on Cheyenne River, when we heard news that -- or it was a -- I think it was a -- they told us -- I think, Chris was there at the meeting when we asked this question. I think it was a Congressional act that changed the laws and the voting laws, and so this -- so this picture ID was required.

And so a lot of our Lakota people didn't have picture IDs, and it became such an issue again, when some of the people are on limited fixed income again, and if they don't have $5 for a picture ID, they're not going to vote, okay? Simple as that. So it did have a very big impact on us, and I think a lot of people didn't vote because of that requirement, and they just threw up their hands again. Another roadblock for the Lakota people; that's how they took it.

And what we did at Cheyenne River to try to address the issues, we made free photo ID cards for any tribal member who registers in the national elections, and that's how we were able to address some of these issues.

MS. POURIER: I think part of the hardship, too, is not just monetary, but according to a person's beliefs. And for myself, I feel like it's kind of a contradiction to my rights and what I choose to do, but I do have a photo ID.

I do know several people who are friends or acquaintances that just refused to vote and it was their way of protesting the way the government has treated Indians, but also in all these little obstacles to vote. So they just said, "I'm not going to vote," and there was -- that was, like, about seven people. It makes a difference.

SEN. TWO BULLS: In regards to the picture IDs, like Mr. Uses the Knife stated earlier, there probably is no money. Sure we have an enrollment office who offers -- gives us picture IDs, but we have to pay $8. I took my grandson to the motor vehicles yesterday to get a picture ID for him so he could present it at the airlines to get to school in California, and all I had was a photocopy of his birth certificate, and they refused to give us an ID because the birth certificate needed to be an original and it's $15, and I think for the State of South Dakota it's $8 to get an original birth certificate.

And so the one issue is getting the money not only to the elderly, but from the 18 on up, those who are eligible to vote. So that needs to be looked at as to how we could take the dollar signs away so they can get their IDs.

SEN. DASCHLE: Thank you very much.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Can I interrupt just to make sure that the witnesses speak into the microphones.

MS: JOHNSON: I, too, have a couple questions. My first question, and I'd like to ask Bryan, if you could talk a little bit about redistricting, we know that's an important part of the Voting Rights Act, the -- to be the oversight of that issue, and it's certainly something that Indian Country globally hasn't probably paid attention to as much as it impacted us, and I know with the Bone Shirt case, that was an important case along those lines. Could you talk a little bit about what you see for Indian Country as far as the issues around redistricting and some of the challenges?

MR. SELLS: Well, I think the one challenge is knowledge and information. Oftentimes redistricting does not go on under the brightest of lights. In South Dakota there are publication requirements, but, for example, in Buffalo County, the county chose a newspaper that wasn't even widely distributed on the reservation, so the publication there didn't help. And it's only when you change them after you have to publish it anyway, so a lot of people don't know where district lines are. They don't know what the populations are within the -- within the district lines.

One of the things that I do -- that's challenging with what I do is people don't know when their rights are being violated by things like redistricting, and that's hard oftentimes to overcome. We provide technical assistance to any community that asks, by and large. We'll analyze maps. We'll help draw new maps, but getting the word out there to folks is tough. That's the big challenge that we face with redistricting.

And then the process -- even if a community is active and has the information, the process is often -- often doesn't allow a lot of room for public input. Indian communities can propose maps, but there's nothing other than a long and expensive lawsuit that is available to them to get the power structures to adopt those maps.

And oftentimes what we've experienced in South Dakota is we propose a map on behalf of a tribe or tribal members, and the redistricting bodies simply ignore them. It happened at the state level where amendments that we helped Indian legislators to propose were voted down. It's happened at county levels, and it's happened at city levels as well. Does that answer your question?

MS. JOHNSON: Yeah. I guess the other point that I was curious about is the pre-clearance requirements, and although we know in many cases, you know, South Dakota hasn't always felt the need to comply with those, currently I'm expecting that, you know, those are. What would happen if we lost the pre-clearance requirements that the VRA requires?

MR. SELLS: Well, then states would be free to retrogress to make things worse. The State of South Dakota would be free to do that in any covered jurisdiction: Buffalo County, Shannon County, Todd County. Now there is Section 2, but it's quite possible with computers these days to draw districts in such a way that they will be hard and expensive to challenge under Section 2, but which would be clearly retrogressive under Section 5.

So Section 5 is absolutely critical in South Dakota and, I believe, across the country to maintain the gains that we've achieved through these lawsuits. Bone Shirt we filed in 2001, and we just got the remedial order about two weeks ago, and if we had to do that every time, it would not only deprive South Dakotans of a lot of budget money that could be used for better things like teachers and firemen, but frankly, it would be exhaustive for us as well.

MS. JOHNSON: Okay. Many of you mentioned education as being a major issue, and we see, you know, nationally I'm concerned about the information or how informed the Native voter is on their rights. I guess I would like to -- a few of you to perhaps respond to how informed do you think your community is on the rights? What do you think that's in the VRA reauthorization having to deal with the education components? What are some of the areas that we should look to? Or is there any recommendations that you could give to us that could help us with just the basic education of what the voter rights are?

MR. USES THE KNIFE: Some of the areas that -- I know it's ladies first, but I wanted to answer. Some of the education that you mentioned is very important because some of the media that's there on the reservations, their television, newspapers, whatever's there, they feel -- the Lakota people feel they're left out of the whole picture against mainstream America.

And the impediments that are there because of the lack of information that's provided by the county governments, so to speak, to the people, there's a big gap there. No education between the grassroots people and the county governments, and thereby we in the commission, some of us who are trying very hard to make that connection.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Raymond, can you speak into that microphone?

MR. USES THE KNIFE: Yeah, some of us are trying very hard to make that connection and bring that gap a little closer. A lot of the pamphlets and literature, the maps, the maps are so, so discriminatory because you don't know where -- which precinct you're in. They tell you which one you're in, and when it changes, you have to find your right precinct again. I think in one county, there's 15 precincts.

So this is a big problem, this education. The counties need to get out there into the communities in an off-election year. Let's work on that because we're trying to do everything in a bottleneck fashion. We're trying to educate people two, three weeks just before election, and if we can make that change, that would really, really help. Off-year elections, if we can emphasize some of the impediments that we've had, minority voters, I think we can make big advancements.

MS. POURIER: You know, the Native Vote Project that worked here in Rapid City and actually used the SANI-T office worked long and hard, but again, it was too little too late. It would be nice to see some education that started sometime before election time, you know, and to see how many people it could reach, but there are many, many of our people who need education about what's going on and that can be around language barriers, but also some people don't have telephones, some people don't have televisions, some people don't have transportation. So I don't think that our country really realizes what poverty is like here.

Yeah. So I guess that Native Vote Project helped, but it was funded by a private foundation. So is that something the government should look at in educating voters? Thank you.

MR. McCOOL: Perhaps we can address the question of education on a broader level. In the political science literature, there's a very powerful correlation between income level and education level. So at an elementary foundational basis, educating people empowers them to take the next step and get involved, and it's voting, but it's all forms of political participation.

Ideally one encompasses this whole panoply of political action from voting to participating in elections and running for office, and that is very education-dependent. So you've raised a really important point. It's a great place to start, and it helps people realize how to get involved and, you know, why they need to get involved.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: I want to make sure that people speak into the microphones so people -- I noticed when I was walking by that people behind us really can't hear if you don't speak loudly into the microphone. Chris?

MR. NELSON: I've got several questions and it's kind of a compilation of everything you all have told us this morning, and I've got a few comments also. The first question is in the area of the language barrier, and I think almost every one of you have mentioned that. And for my information, do you perceive -- is the language barrier because so many of the Lakota people speak Lakota fluently or is it more a case of not being able to speak English well? Which of those two is it or is it a combination of both? And I'd take an answer from whoever or everyone.

MS. POURIER: Oh, I just naturally think it's a combination of both of those, and I think, Theresa?

SEN. TWO BULLS: That's what I would state, it's a combination of both. They feel more comfortable speaking and being talked to in their own language, and we have to realize that especially our elderly don't speak English good or fluently, so they're kind of embarrassed about it, and so they don't want to speak at all. So it's a combination of both.

MR. USES THE KNIFE: I think if we had all Lakota speakers in the polls 100 percent, that would make a big difference, but then we'd have to be translating to the non-Lakota speakers, so that might be the next problem. But I think it would be a good idea to have a good percent of the Lakota speakers in the polls. Assurance of that would probably really help.

MR. NELSON: If I could follow that up with looking ahead in 2006, the Help America Vote Act that was referenced earlier is going to require every polling place in America to have a touch screen voting machine, and that will certainly happen in South Dakota. The particular machine that we're going to be using in South Dakota will have the capability for -- not only to see the ballot on the screen, but also for the ballot to be heard. A person would be able to put on headphones and have the ballot read to them either in English or Lakota, and in the Lakota areas we're going to have that option available. With the language problem we've talked about today, do you foresee this machine-type solution helping that or do you foresee people being scared of it perhaps?

MS. POURIER: I guess just my idea there or thoughts is that they would be maybe freaked out by it. However, I think it's a good idea and something that would really help if people will approach and try it. Perhaps there's a way where there could be a person stationed there to help --

MR. NELSON: Yes, yes.

MS. POURIER: -- to help them, you know, get acquainted with the technology.

MR. USES THE KNIFE: If you brought a bunch of video machines out to the reservations, maybe we can all learn how to gamble at the same time. But the touch screen that you're talking about would be a good idea, but again, if you brought it out there two weeks before the election, you know, she mentioned freaking out, you know. Maybe that -- that's going to be the case, so if you're going to bring it about this election year, I would caution you, you know, wait till the next -- next go-round, you know, but in the meantime, have some educational things going out there, you know.

MR. SELLS: Yeah. I want to commend you, Secretary, for choosing a machine that has that capability. I think it will help, as you've heard, particularly with the ballot issues. South Dakota's one of those states that seems always to have a handful of ballot issues, and talking with some folks just this week, translating those has been the biggest -- where the biggest need for language assistance comes in. So I think that if you can get over the hurdles that have just been described of familiarity with the technology, those new machines will be of tremendous benefit, provided that there are enough of them that -- so that there aren't long lines at the polls, but I think that can be managed.

But I want to emphasize that that's just one step in the process because language assistance is needed, based on my experience and the people that I've spoken with, at every step in the process. It's when you come up and talk with the little old white ladies all the way till you get to the polls and then get home. And so it's not a substitute for in-person language assistance, but it's -- I think it's going to be a tremendous benefit.

MR. NELSON: If I could move on to the next question and it deals with your repeated mention of the need for educational efforts, and I certainly would agree with that. During the last election year, I made an offer to go out to -- and I made this to all the tribal chairmen, to go out and do a presentation on it because we'd had a lot of election law changes. And Mr. Vice Chairman of the Cheyenne River invited me to come up there, and I think we had a good meeting and we probably should have had maybe more than one, but we had a good meeting.

As we look at educational efforts for 2006, would you foresee those being most effective between my office and individual tribes, or do they need to come from the local county auditor to tribal governments? What's going to be the most effective way of making that happen?

MR. USES THE KNIFE: I think for me it's fairly simple. I think if you had some folks on the reservation working with the people directly. Let's say, for instance, the Voting Rights Commission authorized individuals on the reservation to help the State of South Dakota get some education out there, that would probably work the best because we could hire our own Lakota language speakers to help be the mouthpiece, I guess, for the commission. Through our commission, we could do that.

MS. POURIER: Well, I just need to say one thing: That you focused on the reservations and tribes -- tribal entities, and please don't forget about the urban Indians.

MR. NELSON: Okay.

MS. POURIER: There's a big population here, and there's a lot of community organizers, Indian that would help do that.

SEN. TWO BULLS: I want to thank you for putting that before us. I think that's a good idea. This is why I talked earlier about partnership, working together so -- for this voting to be worked out, and it could be good for the people. I stated earlier there's a lot of dishonesty, and I think by working together and using our own people and your office, it could become a success.

MR. NELSON: Thank you.

MR. McCOOL: When I've interviewed people in various locations where these cases occur, it seems to me that when we talked about voter education, we're usually talking about educating American Indians about the process. There also needs to be an education process for non-Indians. A handout or a pamphlet that explains, yes, Indians do have a right to vote, they do pay taxes, and explain to them what treaty rights are because there's a basic misunderstanding out there among a lot of people about the basic rights of American Indians to vote. Yes, they are citizens. They're citizens of the state as well as the nation. A lot of people don't understand this, and there might be less hostility to American Indians voting if people had a better understanding.

MR. NELSON: If I could just make one comment, I know our time is moving on, but during Mr. Sells' presentation, he and I have been on the opposite sides of issues going back too long, but I'd just like to make a couple comments based on the Section 5 issues that he and I have been going back and forth on.
The implementation of House Bill 1265 that he talked about, we have not in any way attempted to implement that in Shannon or Todd County, the two covered counties. Our attempt to implement that was solely in Charles Mix County, a non-Section-5-covered county, and that is the current issue of dispute between us, whether or not Section 5 can be extended to that other county. And so for those of you from Shannon and Todd County, be assured, we have not attempted to implement it there.
The other comment and the last one that I will make, on the Quiver case that was brought in 2002, over the last two and a half years, I have worked diligently to bring up the 30-year backlog of pre-clearance items to the Department of Justice, and over the last two and a half years, we have pre-cleared 2300 election law changes. That's significant.
I also need to mention that we have not been denied pre-clearance on a single change over the last two and a half years. And so what that means is that the Department of Justice has not found any of those 2300 changes to retrogress the voting rights of Native Americans in Todd and Shannon County. And those 2300 include all of the general election laws for the State of South Dakota, and I just wanted to throw that into the record. With that, we'll move on.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Ready for me?
COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Yeah.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you. I have just a couple of questions, but I'm trying to make sure I get the facts, if I can. Senator, you may be most helpful on this in particular. I'm trying to get a sense of the demographics here. I do not know them here in South Dakota, but I'm trying to get a sense about voting patterns in particular. Whites in large part, white citizens account for nearly 90 percent of the population here in South Dakota?
SEN. DASCHLE: (Nodding head up and down.)
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: What's the typical voting pattern of white voters here in the state? What percentage vote Republican versus Democrat?
SEN. DASCHLE: I think Chris can answer that.
MR. NELSON: You know, I don't break those down by race and so I don't have those. Now I suspect in some of the litigation that we had, that's probably part of the record, at least in the counties that were in question, but I don't have that.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Professor, would you know that by chance?
MR. McCOOL: I don't know that.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: In particular, there was a comment that was made regarding race bloc voting, so I'm trying to get a sense about what the patterns are in particular. Among Native Americans voters here in the state, what percentage vote typical Republican versus Democrat?
MR. NELSON: You're saying there was a comment from the audience?
MR. SEMANS: It's nine to one.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: A nine to one. So 90 percent of Native Americans will vote for a Democratic candidate; ten percent roughly will vote for the Republican candidate?
MR. SEMANS: Yes.
COMMISSIONER MEEKS: We can't hear you without the microphone.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Okay. So in terms of the voting in terms of white voters, you all do know what the numbers are in terms of white voters in the state and how they split the votes, one way or another?
MR. McCOOL: I made a reference to racial bloc voting because it's well-documented in the cases that I've worked on, both in my expert witness reports and the quantitative analyses done by other professors. So there's a well-documented record of racial bloc voting in specific areas of South Dakota.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Okay. And by that racial bloc voting, you're not talking about exclusively because it sounds like among Native Americans, there's significant voting among -- obviously in terms of the Democratic party versus the Republican party, and you're saying that essentially the same thing exists among white voters. Is that pattern typically Republican voting here in the state or is it split? I don't even know what your the numbers are. Are your governor, your Secretary of State is obviously Republican. Is the treasurer Republican? Is it a generally Republican state in terms of the legislature?
MR. McCOOL: It's hard for me to respond to that in regard to the entire State of South Dakota because the work I've seen is specific to the areas affected by these cases.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Okay. Okay.
MR. SEMANS: I think the last time we checked, it's about 65 to 70 percent of the non-Indians vote Republican.
COMMISSIONER MEEKS: From the audience, you're going to get a chance to testify and you're not hooked into a speaker, so we're going to limit the answers to the panel.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: And thank you and I appreciate it. I understand that you all may not know this information. I was trying to understand the substance of your --

MR. SELLS: I might be able to add a word of clarification. I think it's -- if you want to make general statements, South Dakota is a very red state. The legislature is overwhelmingly Republican, but I think certainly in the areas that we have seen voters, both Indian and non-Indian, will cross party lines for certain candidates. Senator Daschle had a long history of getting a lot of Republican votes in this state, I think it's fair to say, or else he wouldn't have been elected.

In Bennett County, for example, the Indian activist group that I've worked with has endorsed Republican candidates, and Bennett County is also known as a Democratic candidate -- county among white voters.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Yeah.

MR. SELLS: So the partisan lines in South Dakota, I think, are not as clear as your question may suggest or as may be the case in other states.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you. That's very helpful. I did want to get a sense because the tone of your testimony, in terms of everybody's testimony, I was writing down the remarks and I was trying to get a sense about essentially what's happening here in South Dakota because that really is important and that's the reason we're here is to get a sense of what's happening here.

The terms as used by a number of you all described it as essentially a hostile race environment. Another person said essentially it's disturbingly bad in terms of the relationships between whites and Indian people here. I heard obviously comments about essentially -- Laurette, you were talking about essentially they're not necessarily spoken, but it sort of goes unspoken here in terms of sort of attitudes or beliefs --

MS. POURIER: Uh-huh.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: -- and the situation regarding race and race relations here.

MS. POURIER: Yes.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I guess what I'm really trying to get at at the end of the day is to try to get a real core sense from you all about the consciousness of the race environment as it exists in South Dakota. I mean, your comments, in and of themselves, evidence or seem to indicate that this is a fairly hostile place in terms of relationships between white people and Native Americans. I mean, you all don't seem to differ in that perception or thoughts about that. Senator, is that also your perception?

SEN. DASCHLE: I think there is a good degree of discrimination that exists, and I think you've seen evidence from the witnesses today that address it very well.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: And I guess in that sense, because the substance of the Voting Rights Act at the end of the day goes to -- it deals with two aspects: intent and effect. We live in a world nowadays in which essentially unless somebody's burning a cross or otherwise engaged in saying certain things, you have a tendency not to believe that somebody is invoking race as a basis for treating you wrong. In other words, it must be just something -- your sixth sense must be picking it up, but that may not be accurate, so to speak. You know, some people might argue that to be true, but I am trying to get that sense about at least how you all describe the overall consciousness regarding race and race relationships and how that plays out in everything from the districting decisions here, obviously, and voting patterns and the cases that you've filed in particular and how that all plays out.
So the general description of this being hostile, as you describe it generally as an environment, you all generally stand by and do not move away from that general position?
MS. POURIER: (Nodding up and down.)
SEN. TWO BULLS: (Nodding up and down.)
MR. SELLS: Absolutely.
MR. McCOOL: Could I just respond that documenting racial hostility is not like counting widgets. As a researcher, it requires a considerable effort to document it. So we typically look at everything from hard data to implications of racism in written documents, in presentations, as well as interviews.
When I interview leaders in a community and both the white people and the Indian people tell me there's a lot of animosity here, there's a lot of hostility, and then I see that reflected in other sources, in comments made in newspapers or comments made in hearings, after a while all this cross-validation of different sources leads me to the same conclusion, that there's a lot of racial hostility here, and that's what I've found in my research.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: And it -- okay, yes.
MR. SELLS: I'd like to share just a couple of anecdotes with you that may get at your question. In one of my cases, Cottier versus City of Martin, one of the largest landowners in the city, Dale McDonald, was on the stand and he owned up. He adopted his deposition testimony in which he described Indians as lazy, dirty, and irresponsible freely on the stand in federal court. So the sorts of taboos that we in South where I'm from now, in our discussions of race, haven't yet kicked in in parts of this state, anyway.

I hate to keep bringing the discussion back to Secretary Nelson, but in our Bone Shirt case, the state's main defense was the same defense that was used across the South in the early '80s: Blacks don't care about voting. That was the state's defense in the Bone Shirt case. Indians don't care, so it was appropriate for the legislature to pack a district with 90 percent Indian voters. That's a defense that they made with a straight face and quite vigorously, and the Court rejected it as such, noting the parallels to Alabama in 1984.

And I think Senator -- excuse me, Representative Two Bulls' comments that I quoted in my testimony harken back to those days. If he were to give that speech on -- in the Georgia Legislature and substitute African American instead of Indian in those -- in his comments and maybe draw on some of the black stereotype instead of the Indian stereotype, he would be immediately censured for such comments, I have to say.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: But yet that same environment does not exist here in South Dakota such that that censure would be taken seriously, if it is expressed?

MR. SELLS: I think a censure would be taken seriously if one were forthcoming, but I think my point is that it's not forthcoming because that level of hostility is tolerated yet by the people who are in power.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Jennifer, I'll give you the first chance to ask questions of the next panel, but this time, I'm going to limit this to five minutes to finish the questioning because we're running fairly late at this point.

MS. RING: Thank you. I will have to limit the questions I ask. I wanted to ask very briefly, Ms. Two Bulls and Mr. Uses the Knife, let's for the moment exclude the young people, so let's look at people 30 and over which is, in most parts of the country, the heaviest voting bloc anyway. What percentage of the population on your two reservations in that age group are more comfortable speaking Lakota and more able to understand what somebody says to them if they are told that in Lakota?

MR. USES THE KNIFE: I would say predominantly the Lakota speakers are probably -- I always use my generation as a -- as the point where I'm kind of in between. The younger generations from me are having a hard time with the language, the Lakota language, of course, but the older population are very fluent in understanding the culture and the ways.

MS. RING: Would you say 40 percent, 60 percent, 80 percent of them are more comfortable in Lakota?
MR. USES THE KNIFE: I would say -- I would say 80 percent would be more comfortable if the -- if the literature was in Lakota and the education was in Lakota.
MS. RING: Thank you. Ms. Two Bulls?
SEN. TWO BULLS: I think I'd have to agree with Mr. Uses the Knife. Our elderly from 40 on up would be kind of a high percentage that they do understand and speak the language.
MS. RING: And they're more comfortable with --
SEN. TWO BULLS: Yes, they're more comfortable.
MS. RING: And they would understand better what somebody says?
SEN. TWO BULLS: Yes, they would.
MS. RING: Thank you. I guess I'll ask the same question of Ms. Pourier. For the older population of Sioux Falls who are Native American, what percentage would -- I mean Rapid City, what percentage would you say are more comfortable in Lakota?
MS. POURIER: That would really be difficult for me to say. I'm just going to guess maybe 40 percent. But as we talk about language here, it's bothering me because I think the majority of Lakota people speak English. However, the Lakota language, what they -- which they may have grown up with is so different and white people don't understand that that one word in Lakota can mean a whole paragraph of meanings in English and be descriptive of so many things, you know. So that's hard to say. And so even though we speak English or they -- you know, the speakers speak English, many many things are hard to understand.
MS. RING: Yes. Thank you. My next question is for Mr. Sells. The Secretary of State raised the issue in his comments that pre-clearance on the bill out of the last session, that it was not implemented in the two covered jurisdictions; that it was only implemented in another one. Can you address a little bit the equal protection issues involved in having certain election laws only apply in portions of the state and not others?
MR. SELLS: I can and I'll try and be very brief. Bush versus Gore, if it says anything, says you can't apply different voting laws in one county versus another county, and that's precisely what the state was hoping to do by pledging not to implement House Bill 1265 in Shannon and Todd Counties, but going ahead and implementing it elsewhere.
The Secretary's also glossed over the distinction between enabling legislation, which is House Bill 1265, and particular implementing the legislation.

Enabling legislation applies at once to the entire state and not -- and that's separate and apart from individual efforts to implement it in a county. If Pennington County were to implement this law or Charles Mix County, those are not covered counties, but the power to do so applies statewide. So when you turn that power on, that's the change that needs to be pre-cleared.

And state law, the State Constitution, would not allow the sort of patchwork implementation of the law that the state proposed, and certainly Section 5 doesn't allow them to override state law to that extent. So those were our --

MS. RING: I have one other question, if I've got time. Professor McCool, in your interviews with people, either through your personal knowledge or through your interviews, can you speak about intimidation efforts aimed at voters or at people encouraging or working on the Native American vote? Thank you.

MR. McCOOL: Intimidation has become a much more subtle activity, and a number of people that I've interviewed felt intimidated. People are not usually standing out there with torches or burning crosses or hoods on their head, but they engage in a more subtle form of that. It's episodic and it still happens, and again, it's one of those things that is often difficult to quantify, but I still hear repeated references to it, so it's happening.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you. I apologize for having run late, but this was very good testimony and very good discussion. So thank you all for coming. I want to say that we're inviting all the commissioners and panelists to join us in the library for lunch, and we will return for the second panel at 2:15, if that's okay for the people on the second panel. Senator Daschle has to leave us, I believe, before lunch?

SEN. DASCHLE: I do, unfortunately.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: But we really want to thank you for taking part in this and being a guest.

SEN. DASCHLE: Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you very much.

(A recess was taken from 1:32 to 2:20.)

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Okay. I think we'll go ahead and get started again. Thank you, panelists, for being here. I'm going to introduce them and tell their bios, and then I'm going to let Richard Guest start, and then we can ask questions of him directly because he has to leave. I mean, he may be able to stay for a while, but I want to give him time to -- time for us to ask questions.

I'm actually going to start with introducing Craig Dillon because it's first on my list. Craig is a councilman from the Oglala Lakota Tribe in LaCreek

District in South Dakota. In 2002 Craig helped organize the LaCreek District Civil Rights Committee, a movement that's registered thousands of Indian voters and one that has since emerged as a major factor in state and national elections. Prior to his voting rights work, Mr. Dillon worked as a tribal officer and deputy sheriff for 15 years and later served in South Dakota's Social Services and Economic Assistance Office for six years. In 1999, Mr. Dillon was elected to the Oglala Sioux Tribal Council, the position he currently holds. So thank you. Adelade Enright is the county auditor in --

MS. ENRIGHT: That would be Adele.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Oh, Adele, I'm sorry. Since 1987 Ms. Enright has served as the Dewey County Auditor of which some of her duties include maintaining voter registration records and conducting elections. Over the years, she has been a strong advocate for Native American Indian voting rights, working to ensure that translators are available at polling places and on the Cheyenne River Reservation, and that the recruitment of Native American poll workers has increased.

O.J. Simmons -- Semans, I'm sorry, is a member of the Rosebud Sioux Nation. He's a member -- and lives on the Rosebud Reservation. He's a field director for Four Directions, a nonprofit group focused on Indian voter registrations and rights, a committed activist for Native American voter rights since 1984. Mr. Semans has testified extensively before the South Dakota State Senate Committees on proposed laws that would adversely affect the voting rights of Native Americans. Mr. Semans has continuously worked on increasing voter turnout throughout the State of South Dakota and contributed to the 117 percent increase in voter participation of Native American Indians during the 2004 elections.

And, Jesse Clausen, I don't have your bio, but I know Jesse personally, and I know he's a businessman and a voting rights activist as well as a civil rights activist from Bennett County, so that alone probably speaks for itself, but if you want to say more later, you can.

Richard Guest is currently a staff attorney in the Native American Rights Fund (NARF) in Washington, D.C. Prior to joining NARF, Mr. Guest was a senior associate with Troutman Sanders, LLP, in their Indian law practice, focusing on environmental issues, energy projects, economic development, financial institutions, and telecommunications services in Indian Country. Previously, he served as the on-reservation tribal attorney for the Skokomish Indian Tribe and worked as an associate attorney for Morisset, Schlosser and some other guys located in Seattle, Washington.

Mr. Guest has represented Indian tribes on a broad range of issues in federal, state, and tribal forums. He has provided legal counsel to tribal leaders and administrative staff in government to government proceedings including co-management of fish, timber, and wildlife, as well as the development of intergovernmental agreements on jurisdiction over natural resources, law enforcement, taxation, and social services.

So thank you, panelists, for being here. And, Richard, I'll let you start the testimony.

MR. GUEST: Thank you, Elsie. On behalf the Native American Rights Fund and the National Congress of American Indians, I would also like to thank the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act for holding this important hearing to examine the degree of racial discrimination in voting and the impact of the Voting Rights Act since 1982.

Again for the record, my name is Richard Guest. I'm a staff attorney with the Native American Rights Fund in the Washington, D.C., office, and I work -- in that capacity, I work very closely with Virginia Davis, Assistant General Counsel for NCAI on the Native Vote Project.

We are honored to join together with other distinguished witnesses to provide a perspective from Indian Country on the need to strengthen and extend the most effective civil rights law in U.S. history. Since 1944, the National Congress of American Indians has worked diligently to strengthen, protect, and inform the public and Congress on the governmental rights of American Indians and Alaska Natives. NCAI is the oldest and largest national organization addressing American Indian interests, representing more than 250 American Indian tribes and Alaska Native villages.

Since 1971 the Native American Rights Fund has provided legal and technical services to individuals, groups, and organizations on major issues facing Native people. NARF has become one of the largest Native nonprofit legal advocacy organizations in the United States specializing in Indian law, dedicating its resources to the preservation of tribal existence, the protection of tribal natural and cultural resources, the promotion of human rights, and the accountability of governments to Native Americans.

Now as you've heard from other witnesses today of the tremendous struggle of Native Americans to exercise their right to vote, having experienced a long history of disenfranchisement as both a matter of law and practice. Although the Indian Citizenship Act of 1924 declared all non-citizen Indians born in the United States to be citizens, you have heard how many western states actively resisted granting suffrage to Indian people.

Some states required that Indians be civilized, renouncing their tribal membership, moving away from their reservation communities before being permitted to vote, and when permitted to vote, Indian people faced the same discriminatory mechanisms that kept many African Americans and other minorities from exercising their right to vote, including poll taxes, literacy tests, and acts of intimidation.

This discrimination in voting persists. Following the dramatic electoral results in Washington State in 2000 and the similar results in South Dakota and Arizona in 2002, Native Americans became aware of the power of the Native vote in American government. By exercising their right to vote, Native Americans realized that they could have a say in who makes the laws, sets the policies which affect their everyday lives.

In 2004 the National Congress of American Indians spearheaded a groundbreaking campaign to register and turn out a record number of American Indians and Alaska Native voters. Through Native Vote 2004, NCAI in collaboration with National Voice, Native American Bar Association, the Native American Rights Fund, various regional organizations, local tribal governments, urban Indian centers and most important, many grassroot organizations throughout Indian Country, coordinated an extensive national nonpartisan effort to mobilize the Native vote and to ensure that every Native vote was counted.

The culmination of the efforts of Native Vote 2004 on November 2nd was a resounding moment for tribal governments nationwide as it empowered Native voters and raised the profile of Native issues in the eyes of politicians. In appendices to our testimony that I have provided to each of you, we have included two reports which were published shortly after the November 2004 elections. The first, "Native Vote 2004, a National Survey and Analysis of Efforts to Increase the Native Vote in 2004 and the Results Achieved," and the second report, "Special Report: Native Vote 2004 Election Protection Project."

To our knowledge, these reports are the first of their kind in Indian Country. We anticipate that the substance of these reports will provide in part the evidentiary basis underlying the need to strengthen and extend the Voting Rights Act.

The rest of my testimony is simply a summary of these two reports, and the first, The Native Vote 2004 Survey and Study was conducted to examine the state of Native participation in the American electoral process generally and the specific impact of the efforts of Native Vote 2004 to dramatically increase that participation.

The primary data was collected from the U.S. Census Bureau, individual Secretaries of States' offices, and county auditors which provided the numerical underpinnings for this study, while secondary sources including tribal leaders and activists provided background and anecdotal information. The purpose of the report is to educate Native Americans about their role in determining who makes the rules and sets the policy and to encourage their full participation in the American electoral process.

Traditionally, election turnout by Native Americans has always been among the lowest of all communities within the United States. Many factors already discussed here today have had an obvious influence on that result. What this study reveals is that while registration and turnout by Native American voters is still below non-Native averages in many parts of the country, many Native communities saw increases of 50 to 150 percent in their turnout.

Further, while Native -- while many Native favored federal candidates lost their races, many Native and pro-Native candidates fared far better in their local races. The tremendous success of Native candidates elected to the Montana State Legislature is testament of the power of Native voters in the communities.

The research conducted for this report shows a direct correlation between focused localized commitments to increasing participation rates in Native communities and the actual increases that result.

This study provides background information, Native voter participation data, and election results for eight states: Alaska, Arizona, Minnesota, Montana, New Mexico, South Dakota, Washington, and Wisconsin. Each assessment -- each individual assessment provides invaluable information regarding how the Voting Rights Act is working within Indian Country and the challenges which still lie ahead.

The second report, "Native Election Protection Project", was a legal component of Native Vote 2004. The primary goals of the Election Protection Project were to ensure that each state's voting rules were fair for Native voters, that every Native voter who was eligible to vote was -- who was eligible to vote was able to vote and to have their vote fairly counted. The election protection was active in 13 states: Alaska, Arizona, Colorado, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Washington, and Wisconsin.

Now the level of presence ranged from comprehensive coverage of poll precincts on or near Indian reservations in states like Minnesota to a single representative available by phone for emergencies in states such as Oregon where votes are cast by mail-in ballots. A state-by-state breakdown of deployment strategy is included in the special report at pages 8 to 11.

For purposes of this hearing, I would just like to quickly draw your attention to three problem areas identified in the special report, and they've been touched on today already; the allegations of voter intimidation and fraud. And the examples here in South Dakota, the lawsuit that was filed against one senatorial campaign by another campaign based on reports that non-Indian volunteers were following cars of Indian voters and writing down their license plate numbers.

On one reservation in Minnesota, tribal police were forced to eject a partisan poll watcher based on his ongoing intimidation of poll workers and voters.

Other reported incidents include photographs being taken of Native voters by poll watchers, Indian voters in border towns being told by non-Indians to go vote on the reservation, Indian voters being told to wait while non-Indian voters were helped with their provisional ballots, unsubstantiated charges that Indian voters were being paid for their votes.

A second problem area was the area of absentee ballots, and just very quickly, the area of concern that we're focused on is in the State of Alaska where we're investigating allegations that state election officials placed insufficient postage on absentee ballots. Over 65 percent of the calls on election day from Alaska Native voters to the Election Protection Hotline were complaints regarding absentee ballots that were never received. The issue is whether Alaska Native voters were disproportionately impacted.

In other reported incidents, Native voters who did not recall requesting an absentee ballot, as in many states, were marked as such on voter rolls and then experienced trouble in being allowed to vote.

The third final area of our concern is discriminatory election laws. NCAI and NARF both filed separate lawsuits, one in Minnesota, one in New Mexico, basically forcing the Secretary of State in the State of Minnesota to enforce tribal -- the use of tribal IDs both on and off the reservation. The second in New Mexico had to do with a county clerk who, in contravention of the Secretary of State's interpretation of law, decided that he was going to force photo ID requirements on first-time voters in the state.

Just in closing, as Jacque mentioned earlier, the Native Vote Project is a permanent project now within NCAI and NARF. Our next step is to protect the incredible strides that we have made and to be proactive in our approaches. With each new election cycle, we're required to mobilize or get out the Native vote in our election protection efforts.

We look forward to working cooperatively with secretaries of states and election boards to maximize accessibility to the polls. We're heartened by our court and legislative victories that guarantee the right to use tribal ID to vote. But as other witnesses have testified here today, our work is just starting. Despite our efforts, discrimination in voting persist. The reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act is an important component of the Native Vote Project and a necessary step to maximize the power of the Native voice in American government. Thank you for your time.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Richard. Any questions?

MS. RING: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Guest. You deal with tribes all across the country, correct?

MR. GUEST: That's correct.

MS. RING: One of the things that has been mentioned here today and certainly in the work I'm doing that has come up prior is the issue of the photo ID requirement and the alternatives to the photo ID requirement in terms of evidence that you actually live somewhere as real problems for people on the reservation. I'm wondering how broad you think that problem is in Indian Country. Specifically how many places -- how many tribes do you think it's going to be difficult to prove -- for a significant number of people to prove that they live at a place, and in how many tribes do you think there's likely to be some objection, maybe spiritual or religious, to the photo ID?

MR. GUEST: Well, I think that there are several layers to the concerns regarding photo identification in voting. I think that on one level, Indians are generally placed in the -- you know, in the same place as others are with respect to photo IDs. Those of low socioeconomic means may not be able to obtain photo identification simply based on the cost.

But as we go deeper into the layers, we see that there may be cultural reasons for Indians, Native Americans, Alaska Natives to not want to have a photo ID. Again, there may be others of a religious nature that are non-Indian who for religious reasons don't want to have a photo ID.

We're going to have to take a look at whatever circumstances in each individual situation. The situations that we've confronted thus far, as you've indicated earlier, there are equal protection concerns where there are tribal ID photos -- photo IDs available, but where the states have chosen not to permit their use on the same basis that other photo IDs from college universities, military IDs, even library cards could be used, but not tribal IDs, or they would not accept a tribal ID, and in many cases for reservations, if the tribal ID did not have a street address on it, then you would bring a utility bill. Well, many utility bills go to P.O. boxes on reservation. They don't have street addresses for mail. That presents a problem.

I think that what we look forward to, again as I said at the end of my comments, is working with secretaries of state, working cooperatively ahead of time to address these issues with state election officials so that we can find the resolution, not have, you know, us filing lawsuits the day after election when the votes weren't counted. You know, our purpose is to get the votes counted. So we look towards a more cooperative resolution as opposed to seeking redress through the courts after the fact.

MS. RING: Thank you.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Yes, Mr. Guest, thank you for your testimony, but just a very basic question. Just assume this: Given your experience and background and looking at issues throughout the United States, if the provisions of the Voting Rights Act are not reauthorized, what happens, in your opinion, and why?

MR. GUEST: Well, I think the impact would be the same in Native American communities as it would in other minority communities is we would see retrogression. We would see a withdrawing by state if the state's not required to provide language assistance.

If there is no pre-clearance requirement, that we start seeing the states, not necessarily intentionally, but just as a matter of fiscal policy, you know, why spend the money to pay for translators, you know, in the voting, you know, in the polling places if it's not required?

And we would see a -- you know, Professor McCool and I were talking about this earlier is what would the effect be? You know, I said, "Well, it would be a slow erosion," and he said, "No, I think it would be a quick erosion." It depends. It depends on the state you're dealing with. A good example in New Mexico. New Mexico is now held up in the Section 203 context as the model. They have an entire program set up under state law where under state law, a language interpreter is in every polling place. That's required under state law where they have an agency that's staffed that's specific to target Native American communities for education. It's staffed by Native Americans, and it was all the result of the lawsuits that were filed in the mid-1980s around language assistance.

Now would those programs continue to exist if they weren't required? Well, our problem is is that they would be at the whim of who's ever in the governor's office or of the makeup of a particular legislature, and that's where the danger lies is that we would start to have inconsistency. We believe that they would -- you know, that they would begin to erode. The rate of erosion depends on the state, depends on the circumstances.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: But you seem to describe it, as you said, not necessarily as a matter of intent, but you describe it as a -- it was kind of interesting to hear your analysis there because in essence you said, it may be fiscal concerns or perhaps it's partisan concerns or who's sitting in the governor's chair, but as it relates to the issue of intent, which was to some extent the subject of the first panel talking about a hostile environment that may well exist here in South Dakota as it relates to Native Americans. That was not necessarily the focus of your comments.

MR. GUEST: I think that I would leave that -- you know, the issue of the hostility, we certainly experience, you know, throughout Indian Country, here in South Dakota, in the State of Alaska, in New Mexico, in Arizona, wherever you go in Indian Country, there is a level of hostility that exists based on many factors. I'm not an expert in terms of evaluating why that level of hostility exists. Merely to say that in general, whenever we deal across the table with individuals, in my capacity as a tribal attorney sitting in a major water adjudication with non-Indian farmers and non-Indian county commissioners and state representatives, nobody has hostility there with respect to an individual that they don't like, and whenever we can work through our issues together, we seem to be able to come to a general consensus and a resolution that works for everyone.

The kind of hostility that we experience here based on lack of understanding, fear, you know, it's something that again I don't know that I would necessarily characterize it, but I'm still an optimist and idealist, as intentional, but that it is still a part of the system. It's structural. It's just in the structure, you know. It's in the institutions, you know, and it's something that is very much present, but I still hold out that it's -- you know, that it's not necessarily intentional.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Okay.

MR. NELSON: Just one question. In your handout, there are a couple of incident reports from 2004 from South Dakota. Who put these together? Who made the documentation?

MR. GUEST: Well, the Native Vote Project was a part of the larger Election Protection Project that was coordinated through the Lawyers' Committee on Civil Rights. We did not have a direct presence with Native

Vote in South Dakota. We were not coordinating, but we had a number of grassroots organizations here in South Dakota. There were a number of other organizations who came in from out of state to monitor and to offer poll watchers.

So we just asked folks who had participated in election protection efforts in the State of South Dakota to forward, you know, their statements of incident reports. We provided them with copies of what we had used as a part of Native Vote in the other states, and they responded and returned them. They were just individuals who had volunteered their time as a part of Native Vote or as a part of other election protection efforts.

MR. NELSON: Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: You know, this is to follow up on Commissioner Rogers' question and he asked it earlier to the panel before, about this hostility that, you know, people were pretty free about talking about. And I don't want you guys, the other panelists to answer this right now, but to be thinking about it later, but I want to address it specifically to Richard right now, and that is -- so I was thinking about this and there is this hostility. I mean, I've been in South Dakota all my life, and I just wonder what you think that because so many people in South Dakota really -- Native Americans are the only minority that they have to deal with, and so they're really not as exposed to African Americans or Latinos or -- and so therefore, haven't learned to be as tolerant of other types of people, and if you see that, you know, in other states like Arizona where there's, you know, a pretty good mix as opposed to South Dakota or other rural states like South Dakota? Did I make my question clear?

MR. GUEST: I didn't catch the thrust of your question.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Well, I'm just wondering if you see the sort of hostility that was talked about today in other states with Native American populations? I'm really trying to answer this question of why is there so much hostility in South Dakota?

MR. GUEST: Well, I spent election day in New Mexico off of the Navaho Reservation in border towns monitoring the poll watchers there. I was chasing down report after report of pickup trucks with armed ranchers sitting outside polling precincts. You know, we caught a number of reports. The reason why they don't appear is because we were never able to confirm those reports.

Absolutely. I think that, again, one of the major areas of concern and focus for us are the border towns, you know, the towns that -- the communities that have sprung up on the reservations, those that have sprung up just off the reservations where at least within the confines of those border towns, the majority population is non-Indian, but there is a large portion of Native Americans, and we see the hostility.

Now again, I think that the point that has already been made here is that hostility oftentimes is more subtle. It's not as direct. It exists, there's no doubt about it, but how far -- you know, I think again, the other panelists are in a better -- are in a better position, you know, to evaluate that than I am sitting in Washington, D.C., you know, being out, you know, in Indian Country on election day.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thanks, and I will ask that question --

MS. JOHNSON: I'll pass since he's testifying on behalf of both of us.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: I guess that's it. Thank you very much. Craig? Make sure that you all are speaking into the microphone.

MR. DILLON: Okay. I guess I don't know where really to start because I am from a border town. I know that -- what exists out there. I had a black gentleman in 1990 talk to me one day when I was a deputy sheriff, and what he said to me woke me up, but it took ten years to actually really wake up as a result of that conversation. He said, "Do you know that you people are really segregated in this town?" And I'd lived there all my life, and I couldn't figure out what he was talking about.

But that stirred something inside me, and over the years I've realized that I didn't see the forest because of all the trees. I accepted being oppressed. It was part of life. It was part of our mother -- or my mother's life, my grandmother's life, and that was just to be subservient and not question anything that happens in a border town because that's the way it's always been and that's the way it always should be.

Over the years, however, I've changed. I've learned to question these issues. I've learned to question why we don't have Indian candidates that get elected in these elections in our hometowns. I question why we have elections on days when there's a winter storm when nobody can get out and travel. And there's low voter turnout for school board election, but they go ahead and have it anyway. That's because they wanted to maintain status quo. They wanted to keep in control, and that's the key to the whole election process, in my opinion, is control, be it a state election, a national election, or a city/county election.

And it scares me because for so many years, we let this happen, and my -- my view of the future is kind of foggy yet because I'm waiting for more laws to come out, I guess, that will impede the process of being able to get out and vote. And the reason I say that is because we've made some steps, some great, great steps in South Dakota, I think, and I think Chris has been part of that. And I think that to really -- to change our process in South Dakota, we're going to have to do it on a legislative level instead of a court level because courts, to me, build animosity. They build hard feelings, and we have enough of those in Indian Country to go around for generations yet.

I just hope that someday we can all be equal. All sit at a table and have common goals that we can reach. But I don't -- again, I said my view of the future is somewhat foggy yet. I'm afraid for my children, for what I have done, and stood up and then said, "Hey, I'm not taking this anymore." I'm afraid for my friends that are on the commission, and I would like to say that -- I mean, on our LaCreek District's Civil Rights Committee. I would like to feel that this group of people that we put together changed Indian Country and America forever, this little ragtag group of people that came together, and I'd like to name them for you, the individuals today: Jess Clausen, Alice Young, Sandy Flag, Valentina Janis, Leonard Janis, Donald Cuny, Charles Bettelyoun, Joe Bettelyoun, Charles Cummings, Agnes Cummings, Bob Fog, and Jeb Bettelyoun.

This group of individuals, to me, have changed South Dakota forever. It's the LaCreek District Civil Rights Committee and what happened is this is a result of an individual who was appointed sheriff in Bennett County, Russel Waterbury. And what happened is Russel was acting inappropriately for the sheriff of a small mixed community like we had. A number of individuals came to us and expressed concerns why they're being stopped and why their vehicles were being searched. Records -- I mean, warrant checks being done on them. They were pulled to the side of the road. A lot of times for up to and over an hour, they had to sit while warrant checks were done. They had to have their license plates right, they had to have their insurance.

And what happened is the people came to us and wanted answers. So we formed this group, and we went to the city fathers, city council, we went to the county commissioners, we went to anybody that would listen to us. The Department of Justice sent out a mediator, and what was really strange about that, we were the ones crying for change, and they went and met with the City of Martin. It's strange that we're the ones that were being oppressed, but they went and met with the oppressors, in my opinion.

Well, all we wanted was equal justice, equal time, and just to be heard, our concerns heard. A lot of people were affected by Mr. Waterbury in negative ways. We have individuals who lost their businesses as a result of joining our committee. We have an individual who gave up a career in the Indian Health Service so he could run for county commissioner.

But we've made some headway. We've made some headway in our election processes, and I would like to think that we helped Tim Johnson get elected in 2002, this little group of people that came together and, in my opinion again, changed South Dakota forever.

And it's my sincere hope today that this Commission will continue to support the law that is in effect and that we can maintain that for generations to come because racism doesn't just die. First and foremost, we have to all admit that we are biased. We have racism in us and that we're willing to change. And the biggest part of my life, I think, now is that I know I have prejudice. I know I have shortcomings, but I'm willing to work on those and change, and it's my hope that South Dakota will be a better place for everybody in years to come. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thanks, Craig. Jesse?

MR. CLAUSEN: Good afternoon. It's an honor to come here, to listen to all this testimony, and to see something finally starting to happen after years of trying to find some solutions to some of the problems that we see going on right in front of our faces to our families, to our friends, and if we don't do things to change it and work at this thing, to our children.

Me and Craig has worked together on these issues down in Bennett County and it's spreading out into the rest of our reservation, the Pine Ridge Reservation, and going over when we can to help the Rosebud or the Yankton Sioux Reservation or wherever else we're asked to go to help. We were forced into it. We -- Craig didn't hit on all the stuff.

Bennett County is part of the Pine Ridge Reservation. Federally it's recognized as the Pine Ridge Reservation. State-wise it's not recognized as the Pine Ridge Reservation, and then we lost jurisdiction; it's state jurisdiction there, and it really become a huge huge mess. My ancestors were all born in Bennett County, my Native American ancestors. The graveyards in Bennett County are full of my ancestors.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Could you hold up one second? I think your microphone isn't on. Sorry about that.

MR. CLAUSSEN: Most of the time I don't need a microphone anyway. But after all that history of my family's, my great-grandparents and further back living in that county, I was finally forced out of the county last year for my political beliefs. My thought was that by getting out and helping our people vote, we could stop sheriffs like we had in Martin from killing our own people right there in front of us. We had four Native Americans die at the hands of this Sheriff Waterbury.

We had 27 different individuals have their homes ransacked and stuff without search warrants, without any regard for their civil rights. I mean, we were forced to have to do something. We couldn't just sit there and let our people be terrorized on a daily basis. It wasn't weekly or anything; it was daily. The sheriff's department just got away and was running wild.

Like Craig said, when we went to the county commissioners, when we went to the city council, we got fed lip service. We worked for a week and put together packages and mailed them off to every possible address we could get ahold of: the Department of Justice, the ACLU, to your office, Elsie, and your office responded. Everybody -- after all that work, and it takes a long time, we did get the Department of Justice to not only send out mediators, but to come out and have two days of hearings. Their people that came out said they'd never been to a place anywheres in the United States, down South with every populations with all their racial problems, everywheres else in the country they've ever been to, they'd never been to a place where people showed up to these hearings at such a high rate per capita. I mean, people just would, a day or so's notice, would come to these hearings and five, six percent of the county showed up to these hearings to testify about the racial profiling and the stuff that was going on in Bennett County. So the good point is is we were forced into doing something. We had to. Your lives were at stake -- or our lives were at stake.

Then when you get involved and started into that, then you run into the politics. The big thing in the -- in our community -- it's not a border town, it's Pine Ridge Reservation. The big deal in our community was they did not want to let go of the political control that they had a stranglehold on since maybe back in the early 1900s. When we tried to take a little bit of that back, we become public enemy number one, public enemy number two of our county and of our place where we was born and raised and where our ancestors were born and raised.

With that, we were attacked every possible way they could think of. We'd have a meeting out at my place. As soon as it even started, a sheriff's car would pull in over on the top of the hill and they would sit there taking pictures, watching us through binoculars every time, too. This went on week after week. When people would leave my place to go home, they would be stopped before they could get to their homes or back out of the community. We were stopped ourselves numerous times, ticketed for real petty things or whatnot.

And finally, that wasn't doing enough to shut us up. We just kept on going year after year. It finally got to the point for myself, to shut me up, the city fathers of the Bennett -- or the city fathers of the town are also the board of the bank in Martin where I did my business at. I'd done business there for years, but to shut me up, they foreclosed on a bank note of $120,000 where I had $350,000 in contracts in hand at the time. They was sitting on top of $650,000 worth of my assets, and they still foreclosed on me, drained my checking account, drained my savings account and put me out of business and forced me from my home. I now live in Kyle, South Dakota because the Bank of Martin has my home because of my political beliefs.

You know, that's my opinion, too. If you ask the president of the Bank in Martin and that board of directors of that bank over there, they'll say, "No, it was the way he was handling his business" and whatnot and stuff. The problem is is I believe it's a case that needs to go to court, but when you get drained totally and you want to go back and fight, you don't have the resources to get back in there and hire the attorneys it takes to fight a big major battle like that.

I wasn't the only person that got harmed in this. Everybody I did business with. The 50 employees I used to employ all don't have them jobs anymore. The other suppliers and other businesses I did business with all got hurt and stuff all over politics. Now that's intimidation to the maximum.

You know, Craig didn't bring up this deal. We had times in Bennett County where we'd have poll watchers. Our poll watchers was like Charles Bettelyoun, 67 years old, little old gray-haired man. His brother Joe Bettelyoun, another little old man. Alice Two Bulls, a 70-some-year-old lady would sit and do poll watching and let us know which of our people came and which hadn't so we'd know who to go hunt for to try to beat the rush and get them to the polls.

On the other hand, on the non-Indian side of the deal, Danny O'Neill, which makes me look real scrawny, Bob Bucholz, which makes me look scrawny again, five or six of these guys standing at the door of the polling place, and when our people came in, they had to say, "Excuse me," and then they wouldn't move; they'd have to walk around them. When the white people come in, it's, "Hi, how you doing?" shake their hand and step aside and let them come in. That was just blatant intimidation.

Other times we had people come there to do exit polling and stuff. We had people attacking these people, non-Indians that came from outside the area that were trying to help us with the ACLU or whatnot. We had city councilpeople pulling up in vehicles and stopping them people -- or stopping the guy and not wanting to let him to get back to the polling place.

Me and Craig had to leave. We was organizing and calling people on the phone tree and calling our workers and sending them here and there and whatnot and stuff like we always do. Me and Craig had to jump in my vehicle and beat it down to the polling place as fast as we could and rescue this gentlemen, a little elderly white gentleman that was down there. I mean, we seen a lot of intimidation. The stories could go on and on. We could spend the rest of the day just telling you these stories, you know. And that goes on to this day. It may be the worst in Bennett County, but not just in Bennett County.

When I worked in other parts of the reservation, some of the same stuff was happening across the Pine Ridge Reservation. I'm sure it happened on the Rosebud Reservation, the Eagle Butte Reservation, and the border towns around them places. And I guess my time is up. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: There will be questions. Okay. Adele?

MS. ENRIGHT: My name is Adele Enright. I've been the Dewey County auditor for 18 years. During that time, I've conducted nine June primaries, nine general elections, plus early presidential primaries and various special elections as needed for a total of at least 23 elections.

Since I took office in 1987, the number of registered voters was 2960. It is now 4240. My first election there were 11 precincts. We currently have 14. Of those 14 precincts, the three newest ones were put in as a result of redistricting of commissioners and due to tribal requests for more precincts. Of the 14 precincts, five do not have interpreters, a/k/a translators.

And I should point out, I'm not an activist like these other people. I'm just an auditor doing elections, so I don't have any -- you know, I don't have any real strong opinions one way or the other. Well, I do, but that's another issue.

Of the 14 precincts, five do not have interpreters. All of these five are in the northern end of Dewey County which have either a small Native American population or no Native Americans in their precinct. Only four of the precincts had no Native American polling place workers, and two precincts had all Native American polling place workers.

I was invited here to talk about my work in recruiting Native American poll workers and interpreters.

First of all, I do not specifically recruit poll workers by racial makeup. I'm looking for competent, reliable poll workers I can trust to do the best possible job.

To do that, I started first using the pool of workers in place as used by the previous auditor. Since her hand-picked people -- and by the way, she was a Republican and she hated everybody -- had conducted the election that put me in office, I figured that made them honest and very capable. When some of those people were unwilling or unable to work later, I looked at the list for each precinct and started calling friends and acquaintances on those lists. Those people either agreed to work or suggested friends and relatives who would work, and that's how I got my current pool. I also keep a list of people who come through the courthouse and mention to me that they're willing to work elections. I refer to that if needed.

But to the racial part of this, I live and work in Dewey County; been there all my life. 2000 Census says we have a population of 5972 people. According to that Census, 4429 of them are Native American. Obviously the majority of the people that I know are going to be Native American. I've been very fortunate in having good friends become faithful election workers and have election workers become good friends. Together we've gone through some very trying times, but we're just ordinary people taking part in an extraordinary process, and we do the best we can to conduct elections.

In the time that I have been in office, when I started, every office-holder in the courthouse was a Republican. They are now -- now there's only one Republican left in there. At the time that I started, there was one Native American county commissioner. There now are two of those, and our state's attorney is Native American as well. I can't say I personally accomplished this, but, you know, things have turned around, things are changed, people have come forward. I think we're making progress where we're at.

But we are not a border town. Our entire county is on the reservation, and there's dual jurisdiction -- not really dual, but the tribal government has jurisdiction over the tribal members, the sheriff county officials have jurisdiction over every non-tribal family. And I hope and I think that we're working well together. I hope we are. Now I'm starting to wonder. As I listen to everybody else, I'm getting bad vibes.

But before I talk about the process of finding the interpreters, when I started as auditor, I had no idea there was a Voter Rights Act, let alone that it covered what I was doing. My first clue was when I got a letter from the chairman of the tribe, Greg Bourland.

That letter was dated November 6, 1991. He told me I was required to provide forms and assistance to voters in the Lakota language, and I was horrified that I was supposed to be doing this and it wasn't being done.

After researching it, I found the South Dakota law S.D.C.L. 12-3-9 defining Lakota as an unwritten language and saying that it's basically impossible to provide forms in an unwritten language. After we discussed that, we decided, okay, we weren't going to do that, and I discussed that with the tribal officials.

I immediately began the process of finding the best Lakota speakers and, most importantly, finding people who felt they spoke the language well enough to interpret complicated ballot issues into Lakota while still keeping the text as confusing in that language as it was in English. Most people were reluctant to serve as interpreters because they did not feel they were competent enough in Lakota, first of all, to give an unbiased translation because that's hard to do if you feel strongly about an issue.

They also worried that there were no words in the Lakota language for the language of some of the issues raised. The people who worked for me early on were the elderly, and they had the strong work ethic, and they were not comfortable accepting pay as they said they were not asked for assistance, and several of my interpreters questioned my authority to spend the county's money like that.

As the years have gone by, though, I have found willing workers who can do the polling place work on -- sit on the actual polling place board and have Lakota language skills. This is the best solution for all.

In some precincts, I do still need to have interpreters on hand to fill in as needed, and I get these names from friends and from contacts in tribal government. Finding Lakota-speaking people seems to get more challenging as the best speakers were the elderly and many have now passed on.

The past general election brought a new challenge as I was required to provide election notices in Lakota in an audio version over the radio. I found Mr. Leonard Curley at Eagle Butte and he was willing to help me. He and I worked together. He'd tape my notices in Lakota, I took them to the radio station where a gentleman there helped us clean our background noise off of it, and I put an introduction on it, and we were able to get those out on the radio. Dewey County paid for the ones that were on the private radio stations and KLND and some of those radio stations used them as public notices, and basically that was not a terribly expensive process.

It was interesting to me, though, that the Indian community and the white community both had pros and cons. Some of each thought it was good, some of each didn't like it. The pros and cons were about equal in both areas, which I thought that was interesting.

We also had early voting at the courthouse this year. That was an exceptionally good deal. A lot of people came in and voted for the very first time, and we were able to, when they brought them in, especially before the voting deadline had come about, we were able to register them if they weren't, we were able to change them into the correct precinct if that needed to be done. We looked at their photo IDs. If they didn't have a photo ID, we used the little certification process where basically you sign your name, you say, "I certify I am who I say I am," and it really isn't a problem.

The main reason -- the main focus of our photo ID thing was we have had people come in to South Dakota and specifically to Dewey County registering voters, getting paid by the voter registration and setting somewhere and making up -- making up actual fake people, and I do still have a list of those people. I realize that lady was not charged, but I'm holding a grudge and I am keeping my materials, and I don't think that's right to do to anybody.

I feel we don't have any problem with the pre-clearance part of this and as far as with the language part of it. If we need to keep doing it, we will keep doing it. I wouldn't want to take a chance that anybody needed it and didn't get it, but I also think -- excuse me, I'm having voice problems. I also feel that the observer and examiner part of this law is very important because we have had a lot of problems with stories showing up long after elections of alleged incidents that happened in our polling places. Since we've had the observers and examiners, we have implemented a sign-in sheet where if you're an observer, an examiner, a poll watcher, anybody hanging around, we have them sign in, give us a name and address so later on if one of these alleged incidents comes about, we know whether that person was actually in the polling place in Dewey County, we know where they were, we know who they talked to, and it's gone very well for us that way. Unless there is something in some of these reports that I'm not aware of, I think we got by pretty good in 2004. And I guess that's really about all I have to say. Thank you.

COMMISSIONERS MEEKS: Thank you. I want to take this time, Jacqueline Johnson has to leave and --

MS. JOHNSON: I apologize.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Yeah, she has to go back to D.C., so I want to thank you for sitting in on this and helping us plan this. We very much appreciate it.

MS. JOHNSON: Thank you, and I'd like to thank the panelists. Although I didn't get to ask any questions, the information that you have shared -- and I've talked with O.J. before, but the information you have shared has been just really valuable, and I really appreciate the effort and am very interested in how do we make the poll watching and the other work, you know, the things that happen on the ground work. I appreciate the work that you've done. It certainly is a model to be replicated. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: O.J.?

MR. SEMANS: Thank you. First of all, I'd like to welcome you to Paha Sapa. (Speaking in Native language.) That means I wish you all health and help. There's some of you that aren't from here and that's one of our greetings; we wish everybody health and help. That's just part of our culture. We want everybody to get along and have a good life. So on behalf of the Dakota, Lakota, and Nakota people, we welcome you here.

What is kind of funny is that where you're actually sitting, I used to live. Back in before the Rapid City flood, my house was located here, so you're probably in my living room, so it's just a coincidence, I guess.

But I just want to say that racial discrimination in South Dakota is alive and well. It's not divided by political parties, whether it's a Democrat or whether it's a Republican. Since becoming involved in this, I have butted heads in Charles Mix County, a Democratic stronghold, and we've butted heads in, you know, Republican strongholds. It don't matter what party you're in or who you are when it comes to discrimination, racial discrimination. There's no party lines. Don't think there is because instead of black and white, in South Dakota it's black and red.

And, you know, we had a lot of problems here in 2002. After the election of Senator Johnson which, you know, the Native American Indians never labeled Senator Johnson as the Indian senator. That was from different news media outlets throughout the United States. But we realized that once he was elected and Native Americans Indians were identified as being part of the people that elected him, that we would receive some type of backlash from the State of South Dakota.

You know, I want to tell you something and I'm kind of using it as two things that really, really hurt Native American Indians are circumstances and perception. Any time laws are passed in South Dakota, it's because the circumstances are different for us and the perception that we give other people require new laws to be made.

Well, every Native American Indian in the State of South Dakota did not want to have photo IDs. Now there's some that it really didn't matter or whatever, but the basic cry from every reservation in the State of South Dakota is, "We do not want to have photo IDs." They went and sent letters and they -- to the governor's office, I believe, at that time. I testified before the Senate Committees on the tribal IDs. We said that it was going to do nothing but turn away Native American voters and disenfranchise them more so than they are now. We said that it would create problems and -- but we also knew it was coming because of the 2002 election.

Now the State of South Dakota basically changed that on the Help America Vote Act which doesn't require photo IDs under the Help America Vote Act because basically what happens is if you give somebody or require somebody to have an ID to vote, you're causing them to pay to vote. And so they threw in this little line at the very end of it saying, "or file an affidavit." But that filing of an affidavit was the very last line of the law in very small print, as far as I'm concerned.

And so what happened was is in 2000, the June election and the special election in 2004, we had individuals putting up different signs saying you needed to have a photo ID in order to vote. These signs were posted, and they weren't uniform signs. They were different individuals that put up signs, and we presented that to the State of South Dakota when we testified on this matter.

And again, in some circumstances it might have been a lack of knowledge, but in a lot of circumstances, it was to keep Native American Indians from voting. That was the sole purpose, and that's my feeling, and that's the feeling of people I've talked to throughout the reservation and the State of South Dakota.

So what happened was is the special election happened. We had -- and again, we got affidavits on this and we turned it in to the State of South Dakota and I believe we turned in anywhere from 12 to 14 affidavits of Native American Indians that were refused the right to vote. And, you know, people say, "Ah, just 14?" One person not allowed to vote in this country is against everything that this Constitution and this country is based on. So finding 14 people that would fill out an affidavit and saying, "You know what, they wouldn't let me vote," I think is a major, major, issue.

I will give to you letters from the Sisseton-Whapeton Sioux Tribe, a resolution from the Rosebud Sioux Tribe on the latest bill passed by the South Dakota State Legislatures, HB 1085, which basically says that -- it's going to describe how people can be -- can haul voters to the polls. And let me -- in case you're not aware of it, the only thing that Native American Indians in South Dakota fight over is who's going to be in the top ten poorest in the United States in counties. That's the only thing that we can actually fight over. If it isn't the Oglala in first place, it's Rosebud, and if it ain't Rosebud, it's Buffalo County. In South Dakota our reservations are always in the top ten poorest counties in the whole United States. And so our people going to vote sometimes had to travel over a hundred miles to vote, and this is part of the testimony before the state.

The absentee voting has really changed things so it's better for us, but you have to understand this: Every household has three to four families in it. One household, I can tell you right now, in St. Francis alone has 22 people living in one house. Of every three houses, you have one car. So what you have here is you have not only people that can't afford to buy an ID, but they can't afford to put gas in the car they don't even have to go to vote.

And so what we did through different projects with Jesse and Craig and different ones back there, Tom, different advocates to try to get Native Americans to vote is we took people to the polls to vote. Well, the State of South Dakota perceived that we were being fraudulent in doing so, and they passed a bunch of laws basically saying, "Well, if you Indians are going to take people to vote, you're going to have to pay them the way we want you to pay them."

So I'm going to give to you a couple of articles from the Rapid City Journal. Also the letter from the Sisseton-Whapeton Sioux Tribe and the resolution from the Rosebud Sioux Tribe opposing HB 1085 and that's basically directed at Native Americans. The person that introduced that legislation basically said that there was no wrongdoing as far as Native Americans were concerned, but we could be perceived as creating fraud or committing fraud, so therefore, we're going to pass a law in the perception that you guys are creating fraud. And it passed.

And as far as -- I'll hit the provisions real quick here. Can you imagine what it would be like if we didn't have the Voting Rights Act? I mean, the State of South Dakota alone with it didn't submit 2300, that we know of, ordinances for pre-clearance. What would it be like if the government wasn't there saying, "You have to do this"? It wouldn't be 2300; it would be 23,000. This would affect every Native American, not just in South Dakota, but throughout the United States. We are less than one-tenth of 1 percent of this population, and yet, we are looked upon for every law that's possibly created.

It used to be that they didn't feel that Native Americans, we existed. I think most people can look at us as a drawing from Remington where you see that one lone Indian on a hill. Well, after 2002 they looked over that hill and they saw there was actually thousands, if not thousands and millions of us, our grandpas, our grandmas, our grandchildren, and we do exist. And once we started to be recognized as existing, the law started changing to try to keep us from voting.

This act, the Voting Rights Act is detrimental if it is not put back into law. We have so far used the pre-clearance. We have used the people coming here. We have used the language barriers. We've used everything that's in this, and it is very important to give our people, again who's less than 1 percent. If we don't have it, we're not going to vote, and you are going to lose a part of -- a part of that actually as the founding of this country. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you. Thank you. Jennifer?

MS. RING: Yes.

MR. SEMANS: And that time really goes fast.

MS. RING: Thank you. I have a question for Mr. Dillon and Mr. Clausen. You're both members of the LaCreek District Civil Rights Committee. One of the things that I wish you would -- well, first of all, I'll ask you a very brief question. In your opinion, do most Indian voters vote based on party or based on their perception of whether the candidate will be responsive to Indian issues?

MR. CLAUSEN: I believe traditionally, and I'm one of them, my mother years ago worked at voter registration trying to mobilize the vote years ago, and so my mother registered me as a Democrat. I didn't know the difference. And then whenever they caught me and made me go vote, I went and voted or whatnot. I always tried to, you know, think that, you know, my mother probably had some insight that I didn't, but the problem is, like in Indian Country, when you're out there working day after day trying to get people to register to vote, and then they want to know why, then you've got to go into a voter education. This is, you know, kind of what the different parties represent or whatnot and giving them examples and whatnot and stuff like that.

So, you know, like a lot of the people I talked to didn't have really an idea. They -- a lot of people wanted to go and register as an Independent or whatnot, and then you tell them, "Well, then you can't participate in the primary if you register that way." They didn't under -- but they didn't want a Republican and they didn't want a Democrat, either one. To them, almost all the politicians were bad or whatnot, and that's just due to -- when you ain't got a loaf of bread in your cupboard, what difference does it matter which politician is sitting in Washington, D.C.? None of them are helping you get that loaf of bread there, and that's gone on for

So the way I've seen it, most of the time you got to do a lot of voter education to start with, just to teach them, you know, if you want to look at maybe lower taxes like the big Republican sales pitch, lower taxes, less government, maybe that's the way you want to vote. If you want to look at more social aid and stuff, more help with our federal programs here on the reservation, maybe you want to look at the Democratic party and just little things like that.

But a lot of the people just don't know, you know. They've never -- and, you know, like, you know some of our stats down in Bennett County. We were -- we're 66 percent of that county, but yet we was only about 15 percent of our whole population registered to vote. We went to work back in 2000 and started on that and started registering voters clear for the 2002 election. I mean, we worked on it over a year in advance, and so when it finally come time to go to the polls, we were well registered to vote, and all of a sudden, we shot from, like, 180 voters or so in that county, Native American voters in that county to over 800 which kind of alarms people, you know, when you're starting to do four, five, 600 percent voter increase in one election cycle in 2000 and 2002.

And with that, you know, we've gotten national coverage and all kinds of different things happen because of that. We ousted in one -- in a primary election we ousted a mayor, three county commissioners was the top vote-getters for the sheriff and all kinds of different things all just at one time and we just set all different kinds of alarms and stuff off down in Bennett County. And then we got all the other stuff going on.

But back to your question, Jennifer. I think a lot of times that our Indian people -- and I've said this myself and I've heard this one more than anything, "I'm Oglala first, and then I'll worry about being a Democrat or Republican depending on the situation when that comes to us."

MS. RING: Okay. That was a bit of a lead-in to -- I would love for you to tell this panel what happened in that first election with the Democratic primary and the Democratic District Chair of Bennett County. I think that's an important story for this panel to hear.

MR. DILLON: What happened in the primary election was that two incumbents, Democratic candidates, were unseated, and the Democratic chair at that time, Gary Nelson from Martin, actively went out and recruited individuals to get on the -- as Independents to run against the Democratic candidates that had won the primary election.

MS. RING: And what race were the primary victors?
MR. DILLON: They were -- who were they, is that what your question is?
MS. RING: What race?
MR. DILLON: It was in the county commission race.
MS. RING: No, no, what racial group?
MR. DILLON: Native Americans.
MS. RING: And the people he recruited to run against them were what race?
MR. DILLON: They were Caucasians, whites.
MS. RING: Thank you.
MR. DILLON: And it's well-documented and -- that this did happen so we're not just making this up as we go.
MS. RING: Let's be clear. The Democratic District Chair recruited Independents to run against the Democratic nominees for the offices, correct?
MR. DILLON: Yes.
MR. CLAUSEN: Jennifer, in that June primary, we had six candidates for three positions.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: They want you to pull the mic a little closer.
MR. CLAUSEN: Excuse me. We had six candidates for three county commissioner seats. All six candidates were Democrats, but three of the candidates were Indian, three were white. In the primary, we just blew them away. They came out of the primary without a candidate for a county commissioner, and so after the primary, then you can go back and -- and pull a ballot as an Independent for the general election. So Gary Nelson, the county chair, went out and recruited more candidates to come back against us in the second go-round, and actually any other time, if it would have been any other kind of situation, our candidates that made it through the primary should have just already went on to the general election unopposed.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you. Forgive me, Madam Chairman. The one thought that's going through my mind consistently as I'm listening to you all on this particular panel -- and first of all, I'd like to compliment you as a panel and individually just in terms of your testimony. I've just found it to be compelling in many respects to hear your individual stories about the circumstances related to voting here.
I was struck also, Mr. Clausen and Mr. Dillon -- Mr. Dillon and Mr. Clausen. I'm sorry, I crossed the two of you. Forgive me. Mr. Dillon, you had mentioned a particular circumstance where you said essentially life for you growing up was a little different in that you sort of accepted things, and then over the course of times, things essentially changed for you here where you really gained an activist instinct and role as it related to Indian people here in this state.

I'm just curious overall, based upon the entirety of your testimony as a panel, how does this translate with respect to young people, and in particular, among children in particular? As they become of voting age, do you see the same level -- I know this may not be directly related, but I just wanted to ask the question. Do you see a level of activism among your children or other young people in the community overall, or is there generally a level of apathy among young people in the Native American community overall here in South Dakota?

MR. DILLON: I think that with what's happened in the past and the changes that have taken place, I think our younger people now are going to get out, and there's an awakening that it's okay to be an Indian. It's okay to vote. You know, we stress this. Every place I go and talk to, I stress the importance of voting. I think that the Indian people out there are -- it's an awakening, and I think our youth, and we've had -- we had our last tribal election and we actually had 18-year-olds who had set up panel discussions and stuff and wanted to talk to the candidates at the tribal level.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Yes.

MR. DILLON: And to me, that is the most powerful thing that's happened in a long time is that these young people are taking an active role in politics. And I think and I hope that it's going to spread, you know; that they're going to stay active, and they're going to want to have a voice in government, both state, tribal, and federal government.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Let me ask another question, if I can. In terms of its implications to the Voting Rights Act, you all seem to be supportive of expanding -- excuse me, supportive of reauthorization of the Act, in and of itself. And we've heard testimony that indicates essentially if you do not pass this Act, then you have retrogression that you think largely occurs. I'm curious about your perspective if this is passed, we do reauthorize, Congress reauthorizes, the Supreme Court approves, the Act is reauthorized for another 25 years.

Twenty-five years from now when we come back to South Dakota, just 25 years from now, what will happen as a result of passage, indeed reauthorization of the Act? Will we be talking about these same problems? And I mention that in particular in light of your testimony. You've said, Mr. Dillon, that you felt that things were foggy at best. Ms. Enright, you testified essentially that the circumstances -- you're fine with compliance with the Act, you're fine with complying with the various provisions, you believe that it's helpful in terms of the individuals that come into -- in the process of voting?

MS. ENRIGHT: I'm not really sure that I'll be able to comply with the interpreter part of it very easily. I'm having more and more problems with that as these elderly people pass away.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Yes.

MS. ENRIGHT: But on the other hand, I think first of all, the people that grow up anywhere on the reservation or in South Dakota are going to schools that are predominantly English-speaking, so I think you're going to see -- unless something changes with the way they preserve the Lakota language, you'll see less and less need for an interpreter. I can't see it going any other way.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: So in 25 years, less need for interpreters?

MS. ENRIGHT: I would think so.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: So the provisions of 203 --

MS. ENRIGHT: I would think there would be. I was particularly disturbed by their idea that the elderly started at age 40. So really I think people -- people that I think of as elderly Lakota speakers, I'm thinking of age 75 on up would be my perception of the elderly speakers who that was -- that is some of the people that work for me are in that age group, and I don't see much -- not many people come to me and request assistance that are younger than that so -- and maybe they just don't come to me. You know, that's possible.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Okay. And in terms of that -- and forgive me, I don't want to belabor this at all. I really don't want to, but we hear so much testimony as it relates to what happens if we don't do it, but I'm absolutely curious about what you say happens if reauthorization does happen? The end goal of this legislation, and it was described by Madam Chairwoman in particular as the most successful piece of legislation in civil rights, meaning that we have come from somewhere. We're not quite where we were. We're not at the place we were back in '65 when this Act was passed. Things are -- have progressed, to some extent, and what will happen as a result of the reauthorization?

MR. DILLON: I've got a comment. You know, we never had interpreters at our polls until 2002. So see, my fogginess is is this is just hitting home on the Pine Ridge Reservation, in my opinion. You know, we've never had interpreters. We've never had any -- until 2002 people didn't care if the Indians got out and voted at all. I'm being totally honest with you. And I think anybody that's been active in voting registration and stuff prior to 2002, it was hit and miss. If you voted, fine. If you didn't, fine. The state wasn't in compliance with this at all, and it's as a result of the 2002 election when the Indians showed up and voted that it's finally taking place that it's going to be a part of the election process from that point on. Am I right, O.J.?

MR. SEMANS: Yep, yep. Well, and one other thing, too, is somewhere along the line, and I think earlier they talked about it as far as --

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Please use the microphone.

MR. SEMANS: -- including additional laws or strengthening the law itself. Somewhere in there is -- Native American people are a different ethnic group. We are treaty -- most of us are treaty tribes where we signed treaties with the United States.

And I guess what I'm getting at is that under the pre-clearance, I know my tribe and other tribes have submitted to the Justice Department their opposing of a state regulation or a state law and basically is not even given the time of day. And I think somewhere in there that the tribes within the State of South Dakota or other places need to be given some type of consideration when they are opposing a law passed by the state. And I don't know if that can be in there or not, but something where the minority issues that they feel are going to affect them can actually be addressed and heard.

And, Jennifer, I'm not sure if that's actually going in place now because I know on this photo ID deal, we opposed -- our tribe opposed it, Pine Ridge opposed it, and we have to produce IDs. And so basically that tells me that the input by my tribe and by the Pine Ridge Tribe didn't matter; it was the state. And although pre-clearance can get through there and it doesn't, you know, keep it from going to court, we can't afford it. We cannot afford to fight the State of South Dakota. We as tribes, Indians, our Indian tribes cannot afford to fight the State of South Dakota over every law.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.

MR. SEMANS: I mean, we just can't afford it, and so we need somewhere where it's recognized. Sorry.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: That makes sense, but if I can follow it up, I wanted to ask you this: Why are you not saying in response to that question -- as directly as I can state it, why are you not saying, "Twenty-five years from now, we'll have expanded opportunities in terms of Native Americans voting in this state. You're going to see an increase in terms of participation of people showing up to the polls. You're going to see a dramatic increase in the number of people who will serve as everything from county commissioners here in this state to people elected to the legislature to people elected to the Senate of this state and perhaps on to statewide offices or federal offices."

Why aren't you saying at the end of the day -- and maybe forgive me for asking it this way, but why are you not saying at the end of the day that as a result of this legislation, a series of things happened which are its goals, its goals being expanded opportunity, full presence, full participation in the culture, a reduction in terms of discrimination, full access to opportunity to vote for either Indian people or non-Indian people? Why aren't those things expressed by you, because I understand clearly what you're saying when bad things happen that we don't like. These incidents are being done to us. It shouldn't happen this way, but to the extent that reauthorization happens, then you're happy. You're excited. We got what we wanted. What's the end result of that?

MR. SEMANS: I apologize because I didn't answer the question right, and you're 100 percent right, and we can show you from 2002 to 2005 with this Voting Rights Act that we have increased voter turnout on Indian reservations by 133 percent; unheard of in Indian Country. And it's because of this law, and this law, like Craig said, we're not going back 25 years. We're going back to 2002. We're going back three years. Look at the progress under this -- the Voting Rights Act that we have made in three years. I dare you to give us 25. We may have this country back.

MR. CLAUSEN: Mr. Rogers, I had one comment to kind of add to O.J.'s, but he about hit the nail on the head there. This is a new process for our people. Ten years ago we were such a low percent at the polls, nobody even cared, you know, and nobody ever said nothing. But when you have issues, you want to address them issues, and you go to elected officials, but you're not voters. I did that. I went to the mayor of Martin, South Dakota and I told him our concerns. He said, "Well, bring me a petition of registered voters." It wasn't just -- I couldn't go out and get 500 signatures. I had to go out and register people, then get them to sign the petition, then go back to him. So we was forced in to have to doing something at that time. And then you go out and you start, "Are you registered to vote? Could you sign this petition?" And you're getting one out of every 10 or 15 people you talk to.

So then you go get a bunch of voter registration cards, then you get them to register to vote, then you get them to sign the petition. But again, that was the time we was fed lip service, too. And so after we got the petition, they still didn't do nothing. So then the next election come along and we ousted him. We got rid of him as a mayor with our voter registration efforts and stuff.

But it's a learning process and with this short period of time -- and then when -- just about the time we think we're going to take a step forward, then a bunch of new legislation is passed in the state with the photo IDs, and to me, the early elections was really a bad deal because what happens out on our reservation is they pick and choose days. They'll come to Kyle from 10 in the morning until 2 that day, and it'll change from one week to the next. One week it's Tuesday and Wednesday. The next week it's Thursday and Friday. And so you can't really plan and schedule around that and try to get advertisement out and say, "People come out and try this" or whatever.
Now if you're back over in Martin where the courthouse is open from 8 to 5 every day, early elections work. Then you can go gather up people and try to get them up to early vote and stuff. Out in Kyle or over at Manderson or Porcupine or across the reservation, it don't work for us, and so I believe the early voting was another attempt at countering our Indian vote here in the state. So that's just my belief, but I know a lot of other people that agree with that on the Pine Ridge Reservation, anyway.
MS. ENRIGHT: May I speak about that?
COMMISSIONER MEEKS: I would actually like to go on with some other questions and get through this because we're running behind. Sorry.
MS. ENRIGHT: In that case, if there's not going to be anything further from me, am I -- COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Well, actually I do have one question for you, but --
MR. NELSON: As do I.
MS. ENRIGHT: Yes. Okay.
MR. NELSON: If I might, Adele, if I understood correctly, you've got nine precincts where you've got interpreter services available, correct?
MS. ENRIGHT: Yeah, that's right.
MR. NELSON: How many voters did those interpreters assist in 2004?
MS. ENRIGHT: To my knowledge, it was minimal. I don't know. I don't have a list. They don't keep a list of who they assist. I assume that's probably a privacy issue anyway, but it's minimal.
MR. NELSON: Thank you. The other question, you mentioned that when you were putting the ads on radio in Lakota, you had some Native Americans that thought it was good and some that thought it wasn't good. Why would any think it wasn't good?
MS. ENRIGHT: Well, they thought it was unnecessary for -- you know, they didn't feel it was needed. They felt that KLND had had me come up there, and we had done several discussions. We did a discussion of over an hour of issues in English, and we have had -- we had had several open meetings with tribal members and myself and anyone who was interested in coming, and they didn't feel it was needed. I don't really -- you know, I don't really understand all the ramifications why they didn't think it was necessary, but --

MR. NELSON: Okay. Thank you. Mr. Clausen, one question: Did I understand you correctly that you feel that the ability to vote early absentee without giving a reason is not positive for Native Americans?

MR. CLAUSEN: Yeah, because over on the reservation, it isn't handy enough for our Indian people to do it. Now in Shannon County, the bulk of the Pine Ridge Reservation, our reservation, the county seat is clear back in Hot Springs.

MR. NELSON: Right.

MR. CLAUSEN: From where I live at now in Kyle, South Dakota, it's over a hundred miles to go early vote, except for the days that they come out to Kyle and set up out there. And back in 2004, that changed days. You know, the first day they was -- I think it started off they went to Pine Ridge Monday and Tuesday, then they came to Kyle Thursday -- Wednesday and Thursday or something like that, or Pine Ridge Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Kyle Thursday and Friday. And then something happened to their schedule so a week later or two weeks later it changed and they flip-flopped that around.

And then also it was from 10 in the morning, because they had a long ways to drive from Hot Springs down to Kyle, it was from 10 in the morning till 2 in the afternoon and then they leave. And so it ain't the same level playing field for the non-Indians sitting there as what it was for the Indians.

Now like over in Bennett County, though, you could go into Martin and vote, okay, but if you lived in Allen or a community in Bennett County, you had to drive to Martin and vote so it wasn't convenient for our Indian people. Now Allen's 90 percent Indian population. Martin's about split. So one of our big voting precincts coming in from Allen to early vote didn't happen. We got buses. We went out and tried to haul them in and get them to early vote and did all kinds of stuff, paid people to -- knocked on doors and make people -- tell them how important it was to try to get a jump start, to try to come in there with three or 400 votes before election day. You know, we tried all kinds of stuff, but it just didn't work. It was too hard. It was too much of an inconvenience to give up three or four hours of your time to go in to early vote. You take a bus out, you load 20 people on it or whatever. You finally get them loaded up, head into Martin, they all go in and vote, then they come out, then you take them back. So I think it's a hardship against us Indians.

Now for the non-Indians over in Bennett County, it's a convenience, and me and Craig both early voted. We went up and did it together to make sure the system works or whatnot. We walked in and we had no problem. And I think Craig even made them let him do the affidavit deal. "I don't have an ID." He does, but he made them do it just to make sure that was going through, too.

MR. DILLON: Tested the system.

MR. NELSON: Thank you. Just one last question. Mr. Semans, would you share that characterization or do you have a different view on that?
