MR. SEMANS: Well, I can understand what Jesse's saying, and first of all, we were responsible for getting the satellite voting stations in Pine Ridge and in Kyle. We paid the county commissioners for the auditors to be in those places. Unfortunately, we weren't -- we didn't have the money to put them in both places, one in Kyle and one in Pine Ridge. I would have liked to see satellite clinics in Allen, in Kyle, and in Pine Ridge, but we couldn't afford to have auditors at that time.

Absentee voting turned voting around in Indian Country. In Todd County I think 46 percent -- I could be wrong -- of our people voted before election day. And one of the things that I see is the fact that, you know, when you live on an Indian reservation, you don't know one day from the next what is going to happen, and so on election day, which by the way when the election falls on either the 2nd or the 4th, we're talking social service days where people are going to get their groceries, people are going to be hiring people to pay their bills because that's the only time they get it in 30 days, so they're not going to vote, and early voting enabled them to take care of voting prior to any social service day where they got their one month time to get their groceries and pay their rent and leave. So in a sense, I disagree, but I understand what he's saying. There wasn't enough people there to make it really work there.

MR. CLAUSEN: You know, and he mentioned Kyle and Pine Ridge, but we also got Porcupine, Batesland, Manderson, Wounded Knee, Oglala, Red Shirt, Cuny Table, all brother communities across -- Potato Creek, Wanblee, all brother communities across the Pine Ridge Reservation. And so, you know, it don't help the people over in Wanblee or wherever else, Manderson or wherever they put an early voting poll in Kyle when you still -- for somebody to get over to Kyle is still a long ways away for them.

MR. SEMANS: I agree.

MR. CLAUSEN: And if it was fair and right, made it so it was convenient for all of our people, then it -- and maybe at a future point, that could happen. That's a deal to work for, a goal to look at and stuff.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Well, I want to thank this panel. I actually am going to not ask my questions in the interest of time because the last panel is -- we need to take a real short break, and then get the other panel up here.

MR. DILLON: Can I say one thing?

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Yes, Mr. Dillon, you may, one short statement.

MR. DILLON: Yes. You know how I believe my future -- that fog could go away is if we leave the Voting Rights Act as it is and that we can expand upon it in Indian Country because my beliefs are is when something's working good in Indian Country, it gets changed, you know, and it's my hope and dream that we'll leave it the way it is and hopefully the next 25 years, and then you can come back and we'll discuss how it improved Indian Country. Thank you.

MR. SEMANS: Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you very much.

(A recess was taken from 3:49 to 3:57.)

MR. KATUS: I'm Tom Katus. I'm a second generation settler on Standing Rock, noted activist, and sometimes folks in Rapid City don't want to note me at all. I was going to talk to some of the demographics that Mr. Rogers asked about. I'll try to do that quickly, the voting trends going back a full century here. Native Americans have always been engaged at a much greater level than most white folks think even now.

I'd like to talk a little bit about the Contract with Native America. The Native Americans themselves developed an issues forum, nonpartisan, to keep elected officials and candidates honest.

And then finally I'd like to talk about the HAVA Project because we've had some real successes in this region, but we really need some help from South Dakota yet, Chris.

I was born and raised on the Standing Rock Sioux Reservation from a settler family. My father was actually the campaign manager for a young man by the name of Lloyd McLaughlin in 1932. While he happened to be the only college graduate, homegrown in Corson County first, he also happened to be an enrolled member of the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe.

He was elected to county register of deeds in at that time about a 90 percent white electorate because Native Americans had only become citizens in '24, but there hadn't been an established voting record, but because of the Roosevelt landslide in part, he won handily with the poor settler villages to the west, Morristown, McIntosh, etc., and the Native villages to the east, Little Eagle, Kenel, etc.

We were up against the more established "Rooshans," they're called affectionately, the German Russians, the settler farmers, who were rock grip Republican and normally controlled the county. This was also the county of E.Y. Berry who later became a Congressman.

In any case, while he won in 1932, made my campaign manager father his deputy, got tired of white man's politics, resigned. My father came in on his own right, got reelected with the same constituency. The poor white eastern European settler communities and the Native American communities. And then E.Y. Berry comes to him and said, "Hey, you're a young man on the go, but you're in the wrong party, and you ought to be a Mason." Well, my dad was a Wisconsin Synod Lutheran. My mother was --

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Tom, I hate to interrupt, but is this going to get to your point?

MR. KATUS: Well, it may not. In any case, long and short of it, he was defeated by three votes. E.Y. Berry bought off Little Eagle Village with half-pints; that's how it was done in the 1930s. And as we grew up as kids, there were good Indians, bad Indians, good white folks, bad white folks. Then there was those darn Little Eagle Indians and that SOB E.Y. Berry. So that's just the background, but I've been involved my entire life.

Demographically, O.J. was right. When you come back in 25 years, this is likely to be a near Native state. I track demographics. The pace is very rapid. The population has doubled. The Indian population in all three states in the last 30 years, the percentages have doubled. Any decent demographer, if they're following the trends, will indicate that South Dakota probably will be majority Native Americans, not in 25 years, but in about 50. So clearly things are changing very rapidly. I give a presentation called "The Browning of America with the Reddening of the Northern Plains." It's happening very, very rapidly, and we're just starting to see the tip of the iceberg.

Voting-wise, Native Americans have always been engaged in local politics here. It's kind of a myth that it's only been since 2000. In my own lifetime, you go back to '72, they were the swing vote for Jim Abourezk, for McGovern, for Daschle, for Johnson, and even the occasional decent Republican. They were solidly behind George Mickelson because George Mickelson was a decent guy and reached out. So the Native vote has been a continuous growth pattern and yes, it's spiked in the last couple of years, but it's been there a long, long time.

Way back in '78 was the largest voter registration drive in the history of the state. For the first and only time, the state became a majority Democratic party, and that was the result of the Democrats working, but especially the nonpartisan Native groups working, not in coordination, you can't do that, but working the same constituencies. 15,000 people were registered statewide; 10,000 of those were Native Americans. So that was way back in '78 and that was the biggest best ever.

The gap now is 40,000 between Republicans and Democrats, so if Mr. Rogers were here, the only way a Democrat gets elected in this state, those of us who know it, is by the skin of your teeth, and then with incumbency sometimes. Thus, a Johnson, thus a Daschle, thus a McGovern, thus an Abourezk. But clearly this is Republican country and is likely to be in the foreseeable future, except for Native Americans, and this is where demographics could change dramatically.

Already there's been a number of Native American elected officials. Ben Riffel was a Congressman for ten years, Republican. Ron Volesky's been Democrat, Republican, elected sometimes, not elected, has already declared for governor this next time around, Native American. So Native Americans are coming into their own, and they're coming quickly.

We have worked, the Rural Ethnic Institute, for 20 years in nonpartisan voter registration. I am a Democrat. I used to be a real active Democrat, but got very turned off with the party because the party would always promise, especially during election time, and then for the most part, not deliver. Now that has changed in more recent years, especially as the vote's been building. So you find Tim Johnson, a very good supporter of Native American issues. John Thune, who never even visited the reservations in that race in 2002, made 29 appearances this time around; cut his losses. Nonetheless, Daschle got 4000 more votes statewide in Indian Country than Johnson did two years ago. So it was the white reaction, especially in Minnehaha and here, that put John Thune in.

So you're getting increasingly a polarized electorate. Whites tend to be conservative Republican, Natives overwhelmingly Democrat, probably even more so than blacks historically, and it's going to continue. But the dynamic is that the Native population is growing very, very rapidly. So those Democrats, whether they're white or Indian, the only future they're going to have in the state is if, in the future, they're working closely with the Native candidates.

Our nonpartisan effort is a regional one, Northern Plains Tribal Voter Education Project. It's been going for ten years. We've worked for 20 years in nonpartisan efforts. So we get to see what happens in Montana, get to see what happens in North Dakota, get to see what happens here because we've always worked in those states simultaneously.

And believe you me, I was born just barely in South Dakota in Corson County on Standing Rock. Bismarck was my big town, and I always say when I'm in North Dakota, I quite prefer the weather, the physical weather of the Black Hills, but I quite prefer the political climate of North Dakota because it's a much more progressive state.

And we have in this room today -- she's probably a little embarrassed -- but Danette Odenbach is the HAVA coordinator for North Dakota. And I'll bet you she's probably the top HAVA coordinator in the entire United States. She put together an education program that enabled Native Americans to receive $53,000 to educate their own people, go out into the reservations and, I believe, spent a total of about 200,000. Underserved other groups also received this support. In Montana, the same quantity was spent, but done differently. They gave small grants here in South Dakota. We did nothing, but we did get a national HAVA college grant.

You saw Laurette Pourier earlier. Laurette was one of the people that was trained as a poll watcher. We had 77 people that we were able to train and place in a month's time because that program wasn't even signed off till the 1st of October. Adele Enright who you saw was our star auditor. She was just wonderful. And for the most part, the county auditors in all three states were very responsive to having someone help them identify and bring into the polling places Native Americans so that no longer did folks have to deal with just the little old ladies in blue hair, I call them.

And I've covered a lot, probably wasted too much time. One final thing, I'm always on the reservations during election day. I was on Pine Ridge in a number of precincts, and in a Porcupine precinct, you had tribal elections going simultaneously with federal elections to align and get better turnout, but we had two separate polling places, one for tribal elections three blocks away, one for state and federal. Not surprisingly, you had a great deal of dropoff between the tribal election polling place and the state and federal, and I sure hope in the future, we can align those. That's just absolutely crazy. It just defeats the whole purpose of trying to align elections.

And, Chris, I sure hope that we can get some HAVA funding educationally for all our people in South Dakota, not just Native Americans. But listen, if North Dakota can lay out 200,000 and Montana can lay out 200,000 for underserved groups, it's about time South Dakota did the same. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you. I will let --

MR. KATUS: I've also got a lot of research material to leave with you, but you'll read about the demographics, Mr. Rogers. It's all there.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: I actually did not catch your name and so if you want to introduce yourself.

MS. BLUE ARM: Brenda Blue Arm.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Brenda Blue Arm, okay, from Cheyenne River. Okay.

MS. BLUE ARM: Yes, I'm Brenda Blue Arm from the Cheyenne River Reservation, and I've been working with the tribe. I've been Tom Van Norman's campaign manager, and I've gone door-to-door on the reservation. And I'm sorry, I have to apologize, but I need to say something in Lakota. (Speaking in Native language.) Thank you.

And I went door-to-door and I speak Lakota, so I explained everything I could to whomever I'd find and gave information out explaining about Democrat and Republican and the difference of how they could go and vote for the Republican or the Democrat, but I told them it was a choice and -- which was very hard to do, but I had to let them know that they have a choice. And a lot of them were confused because they've never had to vote before. And I told them, I said, "You don't have to vote now, but I think you should, and that's my opinion, but I think it's very important that you do vote."

And I explained a lot of things to them and they were questioning why they were so in the dark all the time. Nothing was ever brought to their homes. So I would explain to them, you know, because the power was held by Republicans in the state legislation. And I'm a lobbyist, too, for the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe, and I explained to them that nothing was ever passed down to the reservation and nothing was ever explained because we never did have an office. And the county -- my understanding is the county has this responsibility, and they never did. They never went out to the districts and explained things because we do have district meetings. Nothing was ever explained.

And when I first walked in to county, I ran into Adele and I said, "Can I have this?" or "Do you think I could get a copy of this stuff?" And I just had to tell her that I'm here. I'm here to stay. I'll be back. We need to work together.

And so a lot of things were so negative when I first started working in that area because even our enrolled members, some of them have been brought up to be prejudiced against their own culture, their own nationality, you know. And so this is where the -- I think the Republicans come in because they taught. Most of them were the teachers in the schools, and so I think a lot of this came about.

But when I started campaigning for Tom Van Norman, I would go back every week and say, "Well, this happened. This happened." And he would say, "Okay. Okay. Well, see if you can get more information with Adele." So I'd go back and visit with Adele, and it was really hard; it was so hard. And then I went before legislation, and I told legislation, I said, "You know what," I said, "this is as high as you go. This is the highest you go," I said, "and you've kept us people in the dark. Why?" you know.

And the prejudice is still going on here in the State of South Dakota, and I said, "That really makes me unhappy," I said, "but I live in it so I'm more or less used to it, you know, but I recognize it, I pick up on it so much more."

But we are trying to start an office on Cheyenne River, an ongoing office. It's going to be called the Voter Rights Commission, and we're trying to find monies within our own group there. And I go way out to the districts so I'm even asking for a car, you know, but -- and equipment, but they -- they're working with me. They are -- they're trying to find something, even an office space so that we can have an ongoing office because we want to keep track of all of our votings that go on on the reservation, like the school board and the county commissions and all of that, and we've been having meetings to try to put our own people into county offices. And we're doing a lot of work, and it's -- right now it's all kind of volunteer work, and we just want to have this reorganization act come about. Maybe the next 25 years it will be different. Hopefully it is, and I think it will be if we all stay working together. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you. Thank you. Patrick?

MR. DUFFY: My name is Patrick Duffy, and when I woke up this morning, I had absolutely no idea I was coming here, and as I waited, I had absolutely no idea I would be called upon to speak.

A quick biography. All four of my grandparents got off the boat from Ireland -- which explains all my hair and rapidity of my speech -- and homesteaded here in South Dakota. I'm educated here in South Dakota. I left South Dakota, became a Russian linguist for the Navy. I went to the Naval Academy Prep School, attended the United States Naval Academy, graduated from South Dakota

State University, attended Harvard for a couple of summer sessions. I was the editor-in-chief of my Law Review in college -- or in law school.

I get to say the one thing I always wanted to say, and for any of you on the panel who are lawyers, you know how hard it is to say, I'm a trial lawyer. That's what I do. I have participated in every voting rights case in South Dakota. I've tried the two longest voting rights cases in the country's history. I have had the privilege, and I say privilege, distinct privilege of cross-examining Chris Nelson. I say it's a privilege because Chris, particularly when he worked for Joyce Hazeltine, was the most knowledgeable person about voting matters I have ever encountered. He is almost honest to a fault.

But I want to point out with the only way I suppose a trial lawyer can, some stories, lay out a couple of vignettes to confirm some of the things that you've heard here today.

First of all, I want to drive home what I think was the ghastly significance of the Gary Nelson story. You've heard it once and I want to tell it to you again. When the Indians finally mobilized themselves and won seats, it did not take -- this is not -- Mr. Rogers, this does not come down to partisan politics alone. This isn't just Republicans and Democrats.

When Indians finally got their hands on a little bit of power, and we're not talking about a very much, it did not take the Democratic establishment in Bennett County, it did not take them a week, and it wasn't limited to Gary Nelson, to go out and recruit a whole slate of white people to run against those folks.

The story isn't completely told, however, because that just wasn't it. You just didn't need white people to run. You needed to start what you always need to start in a race campaign. You needed a whispering campaign, and the whispering campaign, of course, took the form that it always takes in South Dakota, and that is, if you let these Indians on the county commission, are they going to put all our land into trust? They're going to break us. Crazy stuff like that.

Moreover, two of those candidates, one of them was his own client; he's an insurance man. He specifically filed complaints with the federal government under the Hatch Act alleging that they could not hold their jobs as custodians and run for public office at the same time. One of them, Jeb Bettelyoun, God bless him, gave up his job to serve. Another one just couldn't do it. You've heard about the poverty endemic in Indian Country. That's one story.

The second story that I want to tell you is the story of Steve Cole. You think you've seen anything, folks? You've just fallen down a rabbit hole, those of you who have come here from out of state. You think you've seen anything? If you watched the movie Walking Tall, go back and watch it again.

Steve Cole sat outside the polling places in Martin, South Dakota, working for us, working for me, doing an exit poll, and a couple of crackers in those big pickups that everybody seems to get to drive now drove up and squealed their tires and flipped off the young Indian women who were working with him and harassed them. And then they chased him as he walked back to his hotel and screeched those pickups up and stopped him in the parking lot of his hotel and got out and demanded to know who he was, what he was doing. "We want your name. We want to know who you're working for."

This stuff happens in the United States of America today. I've been all over the country. This would -- if you do this in Atlanta, you pull these kind of shenanigans any place else in the United States, you're going to get your clock cleaned, but Indians have to take it.

Now why am I so interested in this? Why do I seem passionate about it? I don't -- I'm not a wannabe anything. I'm passionate about it because to the extent we do this, this whole state diminishes itself. Every single one of us lose a tiny little bit of something that ought to sit in our throats and it sits in mine and makes us feel sick to our stomachs.

The comments of Representative Two Bull were loathsome. There are even more, and you know who they are. We all know who they are. I won't even name names. Some of them are philanthropists. Some are people who masquerade as pseudo-liberals, but you get them loose on the floor of the South Dakota State Legislature and they'll say just about anything like, "Maybe we don't want those kind of people in the polling booth."

Craig Dillon asked me to tell a story that he's so embarrassed about or so emotional about that I elicited from him during these two cases where Martin -- Bennett County used to have one heck of a football team, big football team, and they used to all go over to the house of the president of the bank and hang out and do what Indian kids don't get to do very much, and you know that I'm telling the truth when I say this: play a little pool, go to the refrigerator; it's got all kinds of stuff in it, and just hang out.

About three, four days after the first hangout, he gets a call from the father. Wants him to come on down to the office, wants to talk to him. And as he said, it's about halfway through that interview, he realized he was getting interviewed to see if he was the right kind of Indian to be able to come over to his house.

That stuff happens over and over again, but for me as a trial lawyer, a lot of this is my involvement. The Janet Speidel incident. I hope it gets back to her that I've testified this way. Janet Speidel, the auditor down in Bennett County, perjured herself on the stand, clearly. The judge found she perjured herself, scolded her before she left. She was a liar. She should have left in shame. People from Bennett County should have covered their heads in shame. Oh, no. Within six weeks they had -- the mayor declared it Janet Speidel Day. Back at you.

The racial tension in South Dakota that still exists is unlike anything anybody from the outside looking in can imagine. To come here, I almost didn't come because the whole idea of not reaffirming the Voting Rights Act to me just seemed utterly insane. I'm also general counsel for Four Directions. Thank God for the people at the Department of Justice who helped us set up those satellite voting offices, and thank God for Chris Nelson who helped us do it, too. But without the Voting Rights Act, without my friends at the ACLU, and to be really honest with you, without a heck of a banker because I've gone eight years now with this, without one heck of a banker, we couldn't get anything done.

If anybody with some libertarian notion of law and order thinks that the engines of change are not trial lawyers, they've got another think coming. If they think that even somebody like me can accomplish anything without a little bit of legal wind at my back, they've got it wrong. Without the Voting Rights Act -- without the Voting Rights Act in South Dakota, we're not going to retrogress 10 years or 15 years or 20 years. We're going to go back to 1957 when it was a felony for an Indian man to marry a white woman. We're going to go back to 1923 when Indians, after having sent boatload after boatload of Indians to die in France and other places, were denied citizenship, and it's all just that close to happening.

Finally, without the Voting Rights Act in this state, the most powerful card that can be played politically in South Dakota is the race card. It is waiting to be picked up. Bill Janklow played it like a maestro and others came in behind him. I don't care if Bill knows that I say this. I'd like to cross-examine Bill sometime. But the truth of the matter is, the God's Gospel truth of the matter is there's a whole deck of race cards waiting to be played. Time's up. Can you give me one more minute to finish up?

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: One more.

MR. DUFFY: There's a whole deck of race cards waiting to be played, and they work and they get votes, and whether it's Thune-Johnson or Thune-Daschle, the poor Indians once again are compressed right in the center, and the demographics are such they will be compressed in the center politically for a long time.

Without the Voting Rights Act to protect Indians, this state is in trouble, and I don't just mean in terms of voting. I can't believe that the political structure of this state is so committed to freezing out such a tiny fraction of the population from meaningfully participating in the political process. It makes absolutely no sense. You can't draw on the same kind of sense you could in Atlanta or L.A. or Chicago or God only knows any place else where at least you can talk about economic competition as a basis for it. This is just a straight freeze-out. It's wrong. It should make us all feel bad. We should all try to redress it, but we ain't going to redress anything if the Voting Rights Act disappears. Thank you for letting me speak.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you, Patrick. Any questions?

MS. RING: I always have questions.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Okay. We'll start with Ms. Blue Arm.

MS. RING: Ms. Blue Arm, I understand that you've worked on Representative Tom Van Norman's campaigns?

MS. BLUE ARM: Yes, yes.

MS. RING: And just so the panel is aware, Representative Van Norman represents a single-member house district, does he not?

MS. BLUE ARM: Yes.

MS. RING: Which was achieved by a lawsuit of which Mr. Duffy, I believe, was one of the attorneys involved.

MR. DUFFY: (Nodding head up and down.)

MS. BLUE ARM: Yes.

MS. RING: When you were registering voters as part of that campaign the first time, did you experience any difficulty getting voter registration cards to take to people?

MS. BLUE ARM: Yes, I did.

MS. RING: Can you tell us about that?

MS. BLUE ARM: They would give me, like, five, and you had to fill out those five and then turn that in, and then you could get five more. That happened, like, probably three or four times. I finally went up there with Tom, and then we got -- we ordered some books, some packets from the state department.

MS. RING: Which county audit office was that?

MS. BLUE ARM: Dewey County and Ziebach.

MS. RING: And Ziebach. So two separate county offices were both doing that?

MS. BLUE ARM: Yes.

MS. RING: Thank you. Mr. Duffy, you've talked a little bit about voter intimidation, and you've dealt, I'm sure, with Native American clients in various legal aspects. Do you think that the issue of whether or not they might be committing a felony and the threat that if they fill in a form wrong it's a felony has an intimidating effect on them? And that's the last question.

MR. DUFFY: Other than to speculate, I can't -- everyone's afraid of committing a felony. But the truth of the matter is the warm-up began back in 2002 when the press -- and the press is much to be faulted for this, all the way from the Rapid City Journal to the National Review. When the press began to pick up and beat the drum of voter fraud in Indian Country, it was not only an insult, it was a threat that you might get in trouble if we catch you. It was designed to intimidate.

MR. NELSON: I've had the experience of being cross-examined by Mr. Duffy on more times than I can count, so I cannot pass on this opportunity to ask a question or two. You mentioned several times that without the Voting Rights Act that we would retrogress our election laws in this state back to 1957, etc. Were you speaking of the Act as a whole or can you narrow that to Section 5? If Section 5 wasn't in place, would you still make that statement?

MR. DUFFY: I don't understand why anybody would want to remove anything from the Act vis-a-vis South Dakota. I cannot for the life of me -- particularly, Chris, I know that you ended up as the defendant in that case, but all one has to do is take a look at that memo that Bill Janklow wrote when he was Attorney General. It would have made George Wallace blush. And no, wait a second now. So why on earth would anybody get rid of Section 5?

It just seems to me that there's a real artificial sense of tinkering going into this that somebody ought to go in and pull out one section or another. Why bother? If anything, I'd like to dream up some new sections for the Voting Rights Act, but the truth of it is, I can't imagine anybody pulling any out. We've certainly chronicled enough transgressions of all sections of the Voting Rights Act here in South Dakota to suggest that it ought to be left intact.

MR. NELSON: Just one final question. I mean, we've got 30 years where we were not following the pre-clearance process, 30 years where the legislature was making election law changes, board of elections was making changes. Now that we've gone through that process, we've found that none of those changes retrogressed voting rights, so why would you think all of a sudden if Section 5 went away, we would all of a sudden start that process of going backwards?

MR. DUFFY: To be really honest and completely blunt with you, Bone Shirt, one, Bone Shirt, two, and Bone Shirt, three. The fact that over and over again in every single case that the ACLU and I have worked with at a cost of almost nothing, we've provided a legal memorandum and a demographer's map that says, "This is the way you have to do it." And the Bone Shirt case in particular, the resistance in Bone Shirt, I'm going to say it was futile, but I'm going to say that by the time we got to the end of it, it ended up going to the South Dakota Supreme Court, and now some of the motions that I have seen recently in Bone Shirt, if anything, suggest that nothing should be changed in South Dakota. It is the conduct of the Attorney General's Office in defense of Bone Shirt, period. That's my opinion.
MR. NELSON: Thank you.
COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Thank you. Thank you very much.
MR. KATUS: Could I make a final comment?
COMMISSIONER MEEKS: One final comment.
MR. KATUS: The demographics really are going to change things and we still need the law, but the demographics in Montana and South Dakota ought to be looked at very closely. The states are very similar in population. We actually have slightly more Native Americans in a slightly larger percentage in South Dakota. We have exactly four Native American legislators, Montana has eight.
Part of the reason for that is that Jeanine Pease, who was invited here, but is not here, sits on my Rural Ethnic Institute Board, became the commissioner under a constitutional revision, much the same thing that Schwarzenegger is trying to bring into California, a public commission that redistricts, and she did an excellent job of crunching the data and making sure that Native Americans and other groups were treated fairly.
It's not at all surprising that two sister states so similar, one has exactly twice the representation, and the demographics are virtually the same, but the way legislature has redistricted in Montana and the way it's done with the legislature here is what packs districts to keep people from having their fair share of the pie.
COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Are there any closing comments from any of the commissioners?
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I would make just a note of apology, if I can. I hated to miss a portion of the first -- the first two of you who were testifying in particular in this proceeding. I wanted to apologize formally. I've had to step out a number of different occasions. It turns out that in Colorado, we're dealing with a number of folks that are coming in from New Orleans, and I'm helping to coordinate part of an effort there which has necessitated that I had to leave a little bit.

So I just wanted you to publicly know that I wanted to hear from you and I'm sorry I didn't get a chance to hear from the two of you directly. But otherwise, I'm certainly appreciative of the opportunity to be here in South Dakota, and it's been fascinating, frankly, Elsie, to be here to learn some perspectives and to hear your comments about issues related to the Voting Rights Act. I dearly appreciate it.

MR. NELSON: I would just like to say thank you. I've certainly enjoyed and learned from each of the participants today, and I know a number have departed, but thank you. And thank you again, Jon, for including me.

MS. RING: I also thank the Commission again for coming here. There's a population here that has desperately needed the Voting Rights Act for 30 years. They've had it functionally for something like five now, and even though all those laws have pre-cleared, the fact that there is pre-clearance is a prevention of certain other laws being enacted.

The fact is that the state did try and retrogress when it tried to reverse the single-member house district on Cheyenne River Standing Rock, and it took a lawsuit to get it back. The fact is that this state needs help from the federal government to be the kind of state a democracy requires where every citizen has an equal opportunity to vote.

COMMISSIONER MEEKS: Well, I was very pleased to be asked to preside over this. I've participated in a number of the other hearings, but of course, this one was near and dear to my heart anyway. But what Craig Dillon said, I think, is really true is that, you know, we have just -- yes, we've been voting for many years, but in some ways, I think politically we really just participated over the last few years.

And so I think -- I mean, we have -- the only way we have is up from this point, and I think we'll see more Indians in the state legislature, which was a point that Craig made also that, you know, it's through the legislature that we're going to see the most impact rather than through the court systems, although that's certainly an important tool, important weapon.

So I thank you all for the work you've done for all these years and for testifying. And thank you, Jon, for all your work and the rest of the staff.

MS. BLUE ARM: And we need more women in legislation.

(The hearing was adjourned at 4:34 p.m.)

COURT REPORTER'S CERTIFICATE STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA) )SS COUNTY OF PENNINGTON)

I, Carol A. Matt, Registered Merit Reporter, DO HEREBY CERTIFY that I acted as such reporter at the hearing of the within-entitled action, and that the foregoing transcript, pages 1 to 187, inclusive, is a true and complete transcript of my stenograph notes taken at said hearing.

That I am not of kin or in anywise associated with any of the parties to said cause of action, or their counsel, and that I am not interested in the event thereof.

Dated at Rapid City, South Dakota, this 4th day of October, 2005.

Carol A. Matt
Registered Merit Reporter

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT
LAWYERS' COMMITTEE FOR CIVIL RIGHTS UNDER LAW
 WESTERN REGIONAL HEARING ***

CALIFORNIA AFRICAN AMERICAN MUSEUM
600 STATE DRIVE
LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 2005
10:30 A.M.

REPORTED BY:
SUSAN NELSON
C.S.R. No. 3202

National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, Western Regional Hearing, commencing at 10:30 A.M., on Tuesday, September 27, 2005, at the California African American Museum, 600 State Drive, Los Angeles, California.

APPEARANCES OF NATIONAL COMMISSIONERS:

BILL LANN LEE, CHAIRMAN
JOHN H. BUCHANAN
CHANDLER DAVIDSON
JOSEPH B. "JOE" ROGERS
JONATHAN GREENBAUM

LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA;
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 2005;
10:30 A.M.

MS. ARNWINE: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. I am Barbara Arnwine, Executive Director of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. We begin this, the eighth of ten hearings of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, days after James Sensenbrenner, Chair of the House Judiciary Committee of the United States Congress announced that he plans to begin hearings next month on the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act.

Interestingly, in addition to the hearing that will go from October until November, there will be hearings after January, so a total of ten hearings at the beginning, ten hearings later, for a total of twenty hearings by the Congress. It has not been surprising that they have said continually that they are very interested in the record of these hearings.

We expect that the report that will be written by the National Commission to greatly inform the record of discrimination of voting that Congress will consider as it debates its conscience, as it looks at the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act.

The National Commission's report will assess the impact of the Voting Rights Act as handled combatting discrimination of voting and allowing minority voters to vote for their candidate of choice. It will offer a comprehensive picture of the state of discrimination in voting today by reviewing the enforcement record of the Department of Justice, cases litigated by voting rights attorneys, and, of course, the testimony from our regional hearings.

Together this data will paint a complete picture of the role that the Voting Rights Act has played in combatting discrimination of voting during the past 40 years and how minority voters still depend on its protections to ensure that everyone has equal access to the political process.

The Commission's report will be released on January 2006. The National Commission has had hearings in Montgomery, Alabama; Phoenix, Arizona; New York; Minneapolis, Minnesota; Americus, Georgia; Orlando, Florida; and Rapid City, South Dakota.

The evidence so far has been both hopeful and disheartening. During each hearing, we hear from voting rights litigators who have been instrumental in the development of the Voting Rights Act, ensuring that its protections reach those at risk of discrimination.

We have heard from experts who have studied the impact of the act on affected communities and we have heard from community activists and citizens who have given powerful anecdotal evidence that proves that the Voting Rights Act, particularly Section 5, one of the central provisions of the Voting Rights Act, which must be reauthorized, has been responsible for providing a voice to all formerly voiceless communities. Unfortunately they don't.

We also heard from advocates and citizens the continuing disparity of the voting experience between minority voters and other voters. Clearly the work of the Voting Rights Act, while having a powerful effect on minority voters, is not done.

We have heard from African-American and Latino voters in the South who still struggle against discrimination, from American Indians in the Southwest and Midwest who tell of a dreadful lack of resources including language assistance and culturally insensitive poll rooms. And we have heard testimony about the impact of the Department of Justice observers and subsequent enforcement have had in forcing jurisdictions in the Northeast to make our democracy accessible to Asian-Americans and Latinos resulting in members of those communities winning election to local government.

I am grateful for the assistance that the National Commission has received from the Commission's many co-sponsoring organizations. It is through the coordinated effort by members of the civil rights community that we have helped the National Commission accomplish its tremendous task.

Today we will hear from policy makers, experts, attorneys, and advocates who will examine the challenges that minority voters here in the Western region of our nation face. I look forward to hearing today's testimony and adding it to the already impressive record of this august body.

When we put together this impressive group of commissioners, we did so knowing that theirs is not an easy task. While we were asking them for nothing short of assessing the continuing importance of arguably the most important piece of civil rights legislation that ever passed Congress, they have responded with distinction.

I am proud to see this process unfolding and to have the opportunity to work with such a distinguished group.

It is my pleasure to introduce to you the Commission's Chair, Bill Lann Lee. Bill Lann Lee is a partner at the law firm of Lieff, Cabraser, Heimann & Bernstein in San Francisco. He is the former Assistant Attorney General for civil rights in the United States Department of Justice. He has extensive experience in litigation in civil and human rights causes and has received numerous honors and awards for his work in these areas. Ladies and gentlemen, join me in welcoming Bill Lann Lee.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, Barbara. Happy to be back in Los Angeles where some of you know I was one of the heads of the U. S. Regional Office of the NAACP Defense Fund.

Good morning. I welcome you on behalf of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. As you heard from Barbara, this is the eighth of ten public hearings that the Commission has been conducting. This hearing is the Western regional hearing and covers Alaska, California, Hawaii, Oregon, and Washington.

In past hearings we've heard some compelling testimony about voting discrimination and the impact of the Voting Rights Act on African-American, Latino voters in the South, and Latino and American Indian voters in the Southwest, and minority voters in the Northeast and American Indian and African-American, Asian, and Latino voters in the Midwest.

Today we are having our Western region hearing, one of the most diverse areas in the nation, and I personally look forward to today's testimony.

But first, I wanted to give a bit of background on the Voting Rights Act and the provisions that will expire in 2007.

First, as to the background, the Voting Rights Act was signed into law in 1965 by President Lyndon Johnson in response to voting discrimination encountered by African-Americans in the South.

When Congress reauthorized the Voting Rights Act in 1975, it made specific findings that the use of English-only elections and other devices that effectively barred minority-language citizens from participating in the electoral process. In response, Congress expanded the act to account for discrimination against language-minority citizens by enacting Section 203.

Before discussing the Voting Rights Act in greater detail, I want to explain what is scheduled to expire in 2007 and what is not.

The right of African-Americans and other minorities to vote is guaranteed by the 15th Amendment and is permanent. Permanent provisions of the act ban literacy tests, poll taxes, outlaw intimidation, authorized federal monitors, observers, and create various mechanisms to protect the voting rights of racial and language minorities.

However, there are some provisions in the Voting Rights Act that will sunset in 2007 unless they are reauthorized by Congress. Our primary focus today is on those provisions. First, Section 5 of the act requires certain states, counties, and townships with a history of discrimination against minority voters to obtain approval or pre-clearance from the United States Department of Justice in the United States District Court in Washington, D. C. , before making any change. These changes include redistricting, changes to methods of election, polling place changes, things of that kind. Jurisdictions covered by Section 5 must prove that the changes do not have the purpose or effect of denying an individual the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership, or a language barrier.

Of the states being examined today, the entire state of Alaska and four counties in California are covered by Section 5.

Second, Section 203 of the act requires that language assistance be provided in communities with a significant number of voting age citizens who have limited English language proficiency. Four language groups are covered: American Indians, Asian-Americans, Alaskan natives and those of Spanish heritage. Covered jurisdictions must provide language assistance at all stages of the electoral process.

As of 2002, a total of 466 local jurisdictions across 31 states are covered by these provisions. In this region 14 census areas with boroughs in Alaska, the state and 24 counties in California, two counties in Hawaii, one county in Oregon, and four counties in Washington state are subject to Section 203.

Third, the act authorizes the Attorney General to appoint a federal examiner to jurisdictions covered by Section 5's pre-clearance provisions on good cause to send a federal observer to any jurisdiction where a federal examiner has been assigned. Since 1966, 25,000 federal examiners have been deployed in approximately 1,000 elections.

The Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, acting on behalf of the civil rights communities, created the nonpartisan National Commission of the Voting Rights Act to examine discrimination in voting since 1982.

The National Commission is comprised of eight advocates, academics, and legislators and civil rights leaders who represent the diversity that is such an important part of our nation.

The Honorary Chair of the Commission is the Honorable Charles Mathias, former Republican Senator from the state of Maryland.

The other six National Commissioners are the Honorable John Buchanan, former congressman from Alabama; Chandler Davidson, scholar and co-editor of one of the most seminal works on the Voting Rights Act; Dolores Huerta, co-founder of United Farm Workers of America; Elsie Meeks, first Native American member of the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights; Charles Ogletree, law professor and civil rights advocate; and the Honorable Joe Rogers, former Republican Lieutenant Governor of Colorado.

Commissioners Buchanan, Davidson, and Rogers are present today.

The Commission has two primary tasks: First, to conduct regional hearings, such as this one, to gather testimony relating to voter rights. As Barbara Arnwine mentioned, the work of this Commission in that respect is keenly being watched by the Congress.

And, secondly, this Commission is going to write a comprehensive report detailing the existence of discrimination of voting since 1982, the last time there was a comprehensive reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. And Barbara gave you some details about that report, which may very well be the only piece of evidence Congress has of existence or not of discrimination in voting in our area.

The report will be used to educate the public advocates and policy makers about the record of discrimination in the room.

Now today is here. We're going to have four panels of speakers today. The first three panels will be comprised of policy makers, leading experts, voting rights practitioners, activists.

Each panelist will provide a five- to ten-minute presentation. After all the members of the panel have spoken, the Commission will address questions to the panelists.

We encourage members of the public who are here to share your voting rights experiences in our fourth and final panel of the day. If you're interested, please speak with a staff member on the left over there. If you would like to share your testimony but cannot stay, please see one of the staff members in the back who will take your testimony and make sure that it's included in the record.

I'd now like to introduce each of the Commissioners who each in turn will make a short opening statement.

Commissioner John Buchanan. He's an ordained Baptist minister and has served churches in Alabama, Tennessee, Virginia, and Washington D. C. He also represented Birmingham, Alabama, in the Congress for 16 years and was involved personally in the 1965 enactment of the Voting Rights Act and the 1970 and 1975 reauthorizations. He's a historic figure. From the outset of his career, he's worked for and been a strong proponent of full voting representation in Congress for the District of Columbia. After leaving Congress he chaired similar duties of the organization People of the American Way for ten years.

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to welcome our distinguished panelists.

As is no secret in this country, I was born into a part of the country that's systematically discriminated against voting rights of a large block of our citizens through generation after generation. The civil rights act -- Voting Rights Act of 1965 transformed the political structure and life of Alabama and has been a force for good and for better government through all the years since.

Our job is to simply, with the help of people like you, our distinguished panelists, determine whether those provisions that are set to expire in 2007 should be continued and to look at how much do we need a legislation that was critically needed in 1965.

I think you'll help us answer that question. We welcome you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: It's now my honor to introduce Commissioner Chandler Davidson. He is the Radoslav Tsanoff Professor of Public Policy Emeritus, has served as chair of the Department of Sociology in Rice University. Dr. Davidson was the co-editor of the "Quiet Revolution in the South. " The definitive work had an impact on the Voting Rights Act in the South. Dr. Davidson testified before Congress during the 1982 reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act.

Dr. Davidson.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Thank you. It's a pleasure to be here in Los Angeles today. I look forward to your testimony. I have, as Mr. Lee said, spent a good part of my career doing research on voting, voting problems, Voting Rights Act. I became a commissioner with the understanding that my mind was not made up as to whether the nonpermanent features of the act were still needed. I wanted to listen to testimony around the country and to get a sense of what people in different areas felt was still needed by way of protections of their voting rights. And I've learned a lot over the last few months in hearings such as these, and I'm sure that I will learn more as I listen to you today. So I look forward to your testimony.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Commissioner Joe Rogers served as chairman of the Lieutenant Governor -- completed his term as Lieutenant Governor of Colorado in 2003 where he held the distinction of serving as America's youngest lieutenant governor and only the fourth African-American in U. S. history ever to hold the position. He served as the founding chairman of the Republican Lieutenant Governors' Association, has served on the executive committee of the National Conference of Lieutenant Governors. Joe created the acclaimed Dream Alive Program in dedication to the memory and legacy of the Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. , and the leaders of the civil rights movement. Commissioner Rogers.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you very much Mr. Chairman. First of all, it's just good to be here with you all here in California. I've enjoyed it. It's good to be here. It's good to be in a little different from our part of the country periodically during the time. I'm excited, though, in particular to be able to hear your testimony and your thoughts as to in particular to, as the chairman has pointed out, it is often noted one of the seminal pieces of the legislation to have impacted the entire country and frankly our livelihood.

Issues relating to our voting, our ability to exercise our right to vote, as you well know, as has been pointed out by the three pieces of key legislation that really transform the lives for people all throughout our country -- the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the subsequent act in 1968 -- all have to bring about fundamental changes in terms of America and our lives as a whole. And so we're excited just to be here today. I'm excited to hear your thoughts and your testimony in particular as it relates to whether this act ought to, in fact, be reauthorized and under what circumstances it ought to be reauthorized. The key about all of this, as you all well know, is that basically the Supreme Court has set a certain standard. There's some people who wonder, well, why just perpetuate reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. Isn't it so fundamental.

Well, the Supreme Court basically says because it is dealing with issues relating to race, the standard is subject to Supreme Court scrutiny, which is the highest standard the court can vote on, and, as a result of that, because it's particularly measured to the standard toward race, we have to have a substantial justification for that legislation being reauthorized once again if it were measured by the court's standards.

And so in this case we're excited to hear your testimony. We're looking forward, frankly, to understanding about the positive aspects of this act and how it is worded and your sense about some of the challenges that may, in fact, remain.

So, again, we're delighted to be with you. It's good to be here in California. We look forward to hearing from you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Last, the fourth gentlemen sitting there is Jonathan Greenbaum, the staff director.

Just before starting, I wanted to thank particularly the law firm of Kirkpatrick, Stockton for preparing the state report for this hearing. Actually, it's a regional report. The Commission is very grateful also to be in this beautiful setting and in this wonderful museum and we're now ready to hear from the first panel. I will be begin by introducing the panelists. Conny McCormack is the Registrar Recorder and County Clerk of Los Angeles County. This is no small thing. Ms. McCormack is responsible for conducting elections for the largest electoral jurisdiction in the United States, composed of over 4 million registered voters and 5,000 voting precincts. She conducts federal, state, and county elections, and by contract supports or conducts local elections for 88 cities, 100 school districts and 149 districts. Ms. McCormack has the extensive background in election administration and the use of voting systems and election reform initiatives. Prior to coming to L. A. County, she served as the registrar of voters in San Diego County, and before that, as the elections administrator for Dallas County, Texas.

Apparently, Ms. McCormack, you only work for large jurisdictions.

Joaquin Avila is a professor at the Seattle University School of Law. His current incarnation as a law professor -- actually, we -- most of us in this field know Joaquin as a -- because of his efficacy for minority rights. He's been a fearless lawyer in voting rights cases, employment discrimination cases, educational and interrelation cases. It's hard to talk about such an illustrious career, but I'd like to point out he had a lot to do with the security passage of California State Voting Rights Act in 2003 and that act may actually aspire -- be looked to as being a source of some changes in reforms to the Voting Rights Act.

In 1982 Professor Avila vote -- he didn't vote -- he testified in Congress about the extension of the Voting Rights Act. He was also president and general counsel of MALDEF and was responsible for the formulation and permutation of the National Latino Civil Rights that generally resulted in major legislative and legal victories. This guy has litigated a lot of very important cases. He's also received the McCarter Fellowship in recognition of his work. The third member of our panel is J. Morgan Kousser, Professor of History and Social Science at the California Institute of Technology. Professor Kousser currently teaches history and social science at Caltech. His extensive body, of course, centers on minority voting rights, the history of education, and the legal and political aspects of relations in the 19th and 20th centuries. Professor Kousser's testimony as an expert was accepted in 21 federal and state voting rights cases and he's been a consultant in eight others. Among the cases he's testified was the 1981 case of Garza versus County of Los Angeles.

I don't think you did that in 1981.

MR. KOUSSER: 1991.

CHAIRMAN LEE: You did that in 1991. 1991. And he was also an expert for the University Department of Justice in United States versus Memphis. Both of those are leading cases. He was also an expert in trial issues. Professor Kousser is the author of numerous publications including "The Shaping of Southern Politics," "Colorblind Justice," and his works have won numerous awards.

Welcome, Professor Kousser.

Why don't we start with you, Ms. McCormack.

MS. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much. Good morning.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Do we need to take a break for moving the camera? Okay.

MS. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much, Mr. Lee, and all members of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act.

It's a privilege and an honor for me to appear before you today to share a little bit about Los Angeles County's program regarding Section 203 compliance, the minority language compliance of the Voting Rights Act. I just would like to clarify Los Angeles County is not covered by Section 5. We are covered by Section 203.

And also, just as a personal note, thank you for the introduction, but 24 years I've been an election official, as Mr. Lee mentioned, in larger jurisdictions, but he didn't mention that I also lived in Alabama in the 1950s where I was going to school as a young person back then and personally witnessed the situation in Alabama in the 1950s, '58, '59 when I was in school, and that left a lasting impression on me regarding the discrimination in the school systems.

Just to repeat, Los Angeles County is the largest election jurisdiction in the United States. We do have almost 4 million active registered voters, another million-and-a-half inactive registered voters that still appear on the list making our elections about 5-and-a-half million registered voters. And we have the only jurisdiction in the United States that prints our ballot in six languages in addition to English by the minority Voting Rights Act. And these would include Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Spanish, Tagalog, and Vietnamese.

We also assist in other languages because Los Angeles County certainly has over a hundred languages spoken in it, and we have some major concentrations of Armenian, Russian, and Cambodian citizens, and so -- Americans who are previously from those countries, and so that we do offer assistance in these languages as well. It's not as extensive because we're not required to do it, but we think it's important to mention we believe in this program and the importance of serving voters. One of the reasons for that is California is known for our lengthy ballots. We don't just have candidates and contests on the ballot. We often have long, lengthy initiatives and ballot propositions. The languages of -- the language of these initiatives and propositions for a native English speaker are very complex. They're hard to understand what you're voting for, and we think it's especially difficult if you are limited-English proficiency, or LEP, for a voter who is trying to understand these complex issues in a language that is not their first language.

So we think it's absolutely essential that people have the opportunity to both receive written translated materials and also oral assistance in the polling places, and both of those are key components in the election process.

I'd also like to mention that we believe our program has been, partially at least, responsible for the large voter turnout we had in Los Angeles in the November 2004 election.

Los Angeles County typically runs 3 to 4 percent lower in voter turnout than the rest of the state due to our urban nature and just the mobility of our citizens. And we are very proud of the last numbers in our election.

We exceeded the statewide average -- the statewide average was a 76 percent turnout -- by 3 percentage points. We had a 79 percent voter turnout in Los Angeles County. And that was over 3 million voters going to the polls the first time ever in our county. And we think the fact that we had a major advertising campaign in all the languages really made a huge difference.

And we advertised -- for the first time, we were able to do paid advertising about our services, including our multilingual services, with the help of the Help America Vote Act funding. We've always had to rely on the impact on Public Service

Announcements, which, of course, are very important on radio and television and cable, but by no means is the program on which we spent about $8 million-and-a-half for a multimedia advertising campaign.

We think that was crucial, and we went to the unusual expense of these multimedia campaigns, and we have samples of all kinds of things and materials for you so you'll be able to see what we actually produced and the success rate of it.

There are actually three key facets of our program on the multimedia program. We have the translated written materials. We have oral assistance. And very equally important is our collaboration with the key community-based organizations, known as the CBOs. And, just briefly, our translated materials are everything that we produced. I've brought them in packets, all the languages, from voter registration forms to sample ballots to voter guides to posters. Polling place posters in each polling place are printed in all the languages. It's just a plethora of material. Provisional ballots, voter survivor's guide. It lets you know about the election process. All of those and more are available in the six languages and some of them are available in the additional languages, as I mentioned before.

In terms of the oral assistance, we feel like this is a huge component of our program. And I don't think anything matters -- when we walk into the polling place, if they feel comfortable, they feel like their polling place where people are -- are like their neighborhood. If they speak a foreign language, and a lot of people in that neighborhood speak that language, they want to walk in, and they should be able to walk in the polling place and find somebody to assist them in that language.

We are very committed to this. We think it's absolutely essential in the very diverse community we have in Los Angeles. So we have gone beyond what the legal requirement of the Voting Rights Act Section 203 requires that we use as census data, and we do use census data. We take the census data and overlay it in our precincts and we determine which areas and concentrations of those language needs. However, we go way beyond that.

We actually have a four-part program we've designed within the last few years that encompasses -- it ends up targeting about three times as many precincts as we would be targeting of those languages that only the census had.

For example, we have something called requests on file. If individuals would like to get written materials, all they have to do is call our office and we put them, in a permanent way, in the database, so that for every election, from then on out, they will get these sample ballots mailed out to them before going to the polling booths. Everyone gets them in English, but there's an additional cost to that and that adds to the cost of the election. When we used this, there was at least twenty requests on file from additional precincts -- we targeting the precincts -- increasing the recruitment for poll workers.

For example, last year's election we were actually, census alone, targeting 170 of our 4,835 precincts, 170 of them were targeted for Chinese language. However, by adding the requests on file from the callers requesting materials in other languages, we found another 254 precincts for a total of 424 precincts. So it was much more expanded than the census had led us to believe.

Another issue is the census is -- as we all know, people know neighborhoods change over a ten-year period. Early after the census, it's probably pretty accurate, but we've had some communities move from being Spanish in one decade to Chinese or Japanese or Korean in another area, and we want to capture that information so it's accurate. We don't want to be relying on the old census data, so we also have the requests from the voters on file. Another component of the four-part component we're targeting is the community representatives. We also meet with MALDEF, NALEO, APALC, and with each community's resource center, a huge number of organizations. We have 104 organizations where the members are on the Community Voter Outreach Committee. We meet with them quarterly. And every time they come back from the polls, we have a formal meeting where we ask for input, what areas of the neighborhoods that you know of need to have assistance, and through that, we add additional targeted precincts.

For example -- I'm using the Chinese example -- in the packet is all of them from last November. We added an additional 27 precincts based on the 424 that were targeted for Chinese because of the community saying I know there are a lot of Chinese in that area. Even though they hadn't requested it, even though the census doesn't say so, we know this area needs Chinese assistance. So we add that onto our list.

We also have something called a multilingual tally card at every precinct and every election, and the poll voters mark down every time they offer oral assistance to anyone in the polling place. If any time in the past, at least five people have requested oral assistance, we add that as a targeted component. Because of that, we added 61 additional precincts last November on top of the other precincts, and that was just for Chinese.

For Spanish, out of our 4,835 precincts last November, we had a total of 3,041 precincts that were targeted for Spanish. So it's understandable that a lot more are in the Spanish language. And so therefore we have other languages as well.

Our final issue is that CBOs is I think key. We have really found that since we started the program -- we have a whole packet in here of what the organizations we work with, that collaborating with a partner is the way to make these programs successful. Just working in a vacuum does not work in this area, so we work on that.

Also our training for poll workers and -- we are training in about 400 separate classes in advance of every major election, and certain ones of those we have translators, and they are targeted in advance so that the poll workers know where they are. They get a list in advance. It's on our Web site, so they can see there are only going to be 15 classes in my area and three of them are going to be translated into other languages. So they can pick and choose if that makes it easier for them.

Our precinct coordinators receive extensive training, responsible for between 10 to 15 precincts, receive an 8-hour extensive training program of which about 3 hours of this is cultural sensitivity on working with a multi-unit community. This is making a huge difference in making sure that when we go out and check the polling places on election day we don't have a problem with people not being sensitive to the needs of the community. How do we get the word out? We mentioned our sample ballot. It goes out three to four weeks before the election. We also have the advertising campaign.

How do we measure our success? How do we know if we're doing a good job or not? I think this is key. What's the point of doing a program if you don't know it's successful or not. So we've actually, in the packet, provided some of the targeted precincts. Well, how many did we actually put with multilingual speakers who speak those languages out there, and it's a chart that describes all of that in here. And it shows that over 90 percent of our goal was achieved from the November election.

In other words, we targeted 500 precincts for Chinese even though we only needed to legally talk about 170, but our target was 500. We met 90 percent of that goal. And all of those percentages are in the packet. All of them are at least 75 percent.

Japanese seems to be our most difficult. We really have a problem with finding Japanese poll workers, but we're still looking, we're still working on it.

We also have people on our staff, because of the quota, we can now have employees for the whole department who have been identified to speak all the languages. And so they, in advance of the election day, are available to help people in language assistance.

We've also received very positive feedback from the U.S. Department of Justice regarding our program. Indeed we've been told by other jurisdictions, when the DOJ comes to visit them, you should look at the Los Angeles program. So we're very proud of that. In conclusion, I really think that we have a very comprehensive, multifaceted program that has shown to be successful, both through our voter turnout, through our advertising campaign, and in the make-up of our poll workers at the polling locations where we've met 90 percent of our goals to have a multi-faceted program work.

Thank you for this opportunity.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you. The Commission looks forward to accepting that large packet of materials.

MS. MCCORMACK: All of this, it's all yours. A lot more than what I mentioned.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you very much. Thank you very much, particularly for that testimony about the proactive targeting. I also noticed you we had a written statement, appears to be more extensive, and we'd be interested in having that as well.

MR. AVILA: Good morning. It is indeed a privilege and honor to be here before this Commission testifying on such an important issue such as reauthorization of special provisions of the Federal Voting Rights Act. I'm also here speaking on behalf of the Mexican American Legal Educational Fund. I have provided your staff with a copy of my written testimony and have asked that copies be made for the Commissioners, for you. What I'd like to do is to give you a snapshot, and I'd like to begin by saying that California is a land of extremes. There are extremes in weather. There are sunny warm days, like today, disrupted by thunderstorms and tornadoes. There are extremes in geography with mountain ranges and the snow-capped peaks and deserts with temperatures in the hundreds.

And there are also extremes in politics. The governor's office is held by a Republican and the legislature's controlled by Democrats. And so it is with voting. A legislature is represented by minorities in unprecedented numbers, and yet, racially polarized voting continues to prevent minority representation at local governmental levels. In painting this snapshot for you, I'd like to just give you some very basic figures.

According to the year 2000 Census, California had approximately 32.4 percent total Latino population in the state. And when we look at the level of Latino/Latina political representation at the county level, at the city council level, the school board, special election district level, we found there is a significant disparity between the level of minority representation in the jurisdictions and the level of minority representation on these elected boards.

If you just look at just the counties, there's close to 60 counties in California, over a dozen of them have attained significant, substantial Latino/Latina populations and yet we find that there is in some instances, at least as of 2004, a paucity, a complete absence in some instances, of Latino/Latina board of supervisors in these counties.

When we look at the city councils, we find similar levels of underrepresentation. There are close to 454 cities in California, about 1,100 school districts, about -- close to a thousand water districts, about 500 special election districts. And when you look at representation for those areas, we find that, for example, with the city councils, there's close to 10 percent of all the city council members are Latino/Latina extraction. When you look at school boards, you find similar levels of underrepresentation. So what is the cause of this, what is the snapshot, what's the basis for this snapshot? The basis for this snapshot is racially polarized voting and at-large elections.

In California there are close to 3,000 political entities that elect the governing boards, and out of that 3,000 number of political entities, close to 90 percent end up elections on an at-large basis. And many of those political subdivisions have substantial and significant Latino/Latina minority populations.

In a special study that I cite in my written testimony that's going to be published in conjunction with other researchers, we looked at various school districts in the Central Valley of California, and we found that there were about 100-and-some-odd school districts that had over 10 percent Latino/Latina population, close to 80 percent in population, and yet, there was no Latino/Latina representation on the school boards.

So how do we address this problem?

Well, when I started working at MALDEF back in 1974, one of my first cases was an at-large election challenge against the City of San Fernando here in Los Angeles. And at that time, back in 1974, it was a year after the landmark White versus Regester decision came out, of which Commissioner Davidson was clearly involved with in many instances, in many respects, and it was that constitutional standard that the Supreme Court for the first time held that at-large election systems can't operate and dilute minority voting strength that we utilize here in California and in the Ninth Circuit back in the 1970s to dismantle at-large election systems.

But unfortunately, as a result of that City of San Fernando case, the Federal District Court there adopted a very restrictive evidentiary standard. We almost had to prove a discriminatory intent. This is back in 1974.

As a result of that, we lost the case in the trial court level, we lost it in the Court of Appeals, the circuit -- the petition was denied in the Supreme Court. As a result of that decision, there were no more at-large election challenges in California or the Ninth Circuit until 1982 when -- well, actually, 1985 when -- after the 1982 Amendment to the Federal Voting Rights Act.

As you recall, there was a decision by the U.S. Supreme Court involving the City of Mobile which establishes discriminatory intent for purposes of challenging at-large election systems.

As a result of that decision, Congress made two adopted section -- amendments to Section 2 which permitted us to go into court based on these other discriminatory intent standards.

The first case that was filed under Section 2 involved the City of Watsonville in California, involving a case which I was privileged to be lead counsel on. In that case, we lost it at the trial court level, but we were successful at the Court of Appeals, and it's a classic case, a classic case where you had a substantial Latino/Latina population, close to 50 percent. There had been a history of Latinos running for office, close to nine times over a period of time, and yet, there were business people, there were teachers, there were community activists and they all lost. They all lost because of racially polarized voting. We were successful ultimately in that case.

As a result of that case, we started filing additional cases challenging at-large election systems. Those cases are listed in my written testimony. And then, as a result, two cases, one involving the City of San Marino and El Centro School District, federal courts started to establish very restrictive evidentiary standards again.

As a result of those standards, since 1994, there have been no Section 2 cases that have been filed by private parties in California. And we are looking at the substantial disparity between the representation of the Latino/Latina communities and the levels of political representation that just simply is appalling.

As a result of the difficulties that we were having with the Federal Voting Rights Act, we initiated an effort to adopt a state in the California Voting Rights Act. And I'm happy to report that the Lawyers' Community for Civil Rights from the San Francisco Bay area instituted two cases, one against the city -- one against the school district in Kings County, another against the City of Modesto, the Hanford Joint Union High School District. The case settled. As a result of that, we now have a district, possibly two, where Latinos can have an effective opportunity to secure representation on the board of supervis- -- on the school board.

The City of Modesto, in that particular case, the Superior Court has concluded that the State Voting Rights Act was unconstitutional, so we are pressing forward with an appeal along with the law firm of Heller, Erhman to assist us in that effort. So that's the at-large part, that's the Section 2 part.

The other snapshot deals with Section 5. In California we have four counties that are subject to Section 5: Yuba, Kings, Merced, Monterey. And since 1982 there's been four letters of objections that have been issued by the Department of Justice.

Now, one would ordinarily think that four letters in 1982 is such a small number, that there's really no need for a continued Section 5 clearance. But, on the contrary, those letters have substantial impact, not only in changing the political demography in changing the politics of those counties, but it also served as a deterrent. It prevented jurisdictions in many of those counties from adopting discriminatory voting changes that ordinarily they would have adopted if they had not -- if there was no Section 5. And in that testimony we provide examples of that.

To give you an illustration, Kings County, the City of Hanford, there was a letter of rejection dealing with annexations. As a result of that letter of objection, there were district -- a district system was implemented in place.

Several years later there had been discussions among the political power structure in the establishment that, if we could get out of Section 5, we could go back to the at-large election system. So in Kings County, at some point, was conducting a very informal inquiry about seeking exemption under bailout or seek an exemption out from Section 5 pre-clearance. So this is a very real scenario. It's not a hypothetical situation.

Another example which clearly demonstrates that if there was any doubt about the effectiveness of Section 5 dealt with a letter of objection that was issued against Chualar Elementary School District in Monterey County.

There in 1995, what happened is, the Latino population became a majority in this elementary school district. They decided to implement district elections. They had one multi-member district that consisted of three members that were majority Latino. And, as a result of disputes with the Anglo population in this area, there was a petition to change the system from an at-large -- to change it from district elections, which when the majority Latino board took, over they changed it from the district election, they wanted to go back to an at-large election system. And there was a petition that was filed, and I believe an election was held, which it passed. And if it had not been for Section 5, we would be having at-large elections in this school district.

So there's still a definite need for Section 5 in California.

Another problem that -- and I'll close with this. Another problem is the lack of compliance by jurisdictions. In California we have documented many instances where covered jurisdictions like Monterey County have not submitted -- the City of Hanford have not submitted voting changes for decades. Decades. Not one year, but decades. We simply cannot permit this to go on. So there has to be an aggressive enforcement of Section 5. And in closing, in summary, there continues to be a need for Section 5 pre-clearance. At a minimum, efforts should be undertaken to ensure that jurisdictions have fully complied with Section 5. More importantly, these special provisions should be extended for another 25 years. In California Section 5 will be very effective in preventing the implementation of discriminatory voting changes.

Since the founding of this nation to the culmination of the second reconstruction of the passage of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, minorities were effectively excluded from the political process and body politics. For close to two centuries there was a struggle to expand the franchise and provide that most fundamental of all rights.

The problems of voting discrimination continue to this day, especially as evidenced in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections. Unfortunately, the well-documented history of voting discrimination in this country has clearly demonstrated that there's still much work to be done.

Without the protection provided by the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act, we will simply retrogress in our efforts to expand the right to vote. As a society, we cannot continue to have in our midst political outcasts who have no vested interests in the well-being of our community.

Access to the ballot provides a powerful tool for the development of politically vested stakeholders who will not only protect the community but will serve as role models for the next generation of political leaders.

This, Commission, is why we still need the Voting Rights Act.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, Professor Avila. That was well phrased. It was very targeted testimony.

Professor Davidson has admonished me, Professor Kousser, that I tried to be lenient several times. I apologize.

Please welcome, if you'll welcome -- since your colleague went on past the time, I guess we will extend the same courtesy to you.

MR. KOUSSER: Thanks very much. I appreciate being here. In many of the California cases, I've sort of followed Joaquin Avila around working for a lot of the research, et cetera. And I'm doing the same thing today, so it feels familiar.

I want to make three recommendations and then I want to talk about cases from two counties.

The three recommendations are -- I think of four recommendations. The recommendations are for changes in Section 5 coverage which for us is key.

They are related to cases that have taken place or they're related to changes that I think are necessary to satisfy the City of Burney questions.

The first that I would hope that the report will make and the Commission would recommend, is that there should be a unified purpose standard for Section 2 and Section 5. And the purpose standard should be that, which was essentially enunciated in Garza versus Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors.

Let me quote from Judge Kenyon's opinion in the District Court case. He said that he thought it sufficient to find that the board, the L.A. County Board of Supervisors, has redrawn the supervisorial boundaries over the period 1959 to '71 at least in part to avoid enhancing Hispanic voting strength in District 3.

The supervisors appeared to have acted primarily on the political instinct of self-preservation. The quote finds, however, that the supervisors also intended what they knew to be the likely results of their actions and the prerequisite for self-preservation, continuing from the quotation, was at a core and the dilution was in voting strength.

You know, affirming this unanimously, the Ninth Circuit wrote that the discrimination need not be the sole goal in order for it to be unlawful. And in a concurring opinion, Judge Kozinski, a regular appointee often mentioned as a conservative appointee for the Supreme Court, talked about whether there could be, quote, intentional discrimination without an invidious motive. I'll give an example, and I'm quoting here, assume you're an Anglo homeowner who lives in an all-white neighborhood. Suppose also that you harbor no ill feelings towards minorities. Suppose further, however, that some of your neighbors persuade you that having an integrated neighborhood with local property values, that you stand to lose a lot of money in your home. On the basis of that belief, you join a pact not to sell your home to minorities. Have you engaged in intentional racial and minority discrimination? Of course you have. The personal feelings toward minorities don't matter. What matters are that you intentionally took actions calculated to keep them out of the neighborhood. So from having testimony on intent in the Garza case, and I was the chief expert witness for the ACLU, MALDEF, for the Justice Department on intent in the Garza case, which is to say also the only expert witness on intent in the Garza case on either side, but I think "chief" sounds better, so I usually say that.

From that experience, in writing a very long report, which was put into Judge Kenyon's opinion largely, I became convinced that it was very important -- it is extremely important in Western jurisdictions, not in Southern -- any of the non-Southern jurisdictions, that in mixed-motives cases where there is intentional or ethnic discrimination, intentional discrimination on racial grounds, the standard ought to be that that is sufficient. That you do not have to prove that people discriminated and said they discriminated purely because of race. We don't have to have it. It shouldn't be up to Congress to state that we do not have to have a standard which would only fit things like Busbee versus Smith in Georgia in 1981 in which the head of the Georgia State House Committee said, with regard to whether he would draw a district which would have elected eventually John Lewis from Fulton County, "I am not going to draw any nigger districts." That sort of smoking gun evidence ought not to have to be collected in order to satisfy an intent standard.

The second thing is that I think and -- again, this is particularly for non-Southern jurisdictions -- the coverage formula for Section 5 needs to be changed. There are areas in the South that --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Say that again.

MR. KOUSSER: The coverage formula that relates to Section 5 needs to be changed. It needs to be changed for City of Burney reasons and it needs to be changed for efficiency reasons. There are places where -- in the South where there has not been very significant discrimination against minorities for a substantially long period of time. There are places outside the South which are not now covered where we have learned through extensive litigation and where we've learned through Commission reports and some other things that there has been a tradition of discrimination. There has been extensive discrimination.

In Los Angeles County, for 116 years we did not elect a Latino member to the board of county supervisors. From 1874 through 1991, when, as a result of Garza, we finally put into effect the district where it was possible for Latino voters to elect candidates of their choice, between those two periods, despite the fact that L.A. County was in 1980, 36, 37 percent Latino, we did not have a member on the board of county supervisors.

There needs to be a standard which is based partly on the proportion ethnic in a county's population, because my experience and research shows that anywhere there is a substantial proportion in the population, and it doesn't have to be terribly substantial, there is likely to be discrimination in the voters. And so that standard would cut out a lot of the southern counties in the mountains and hills. It would add some counties, particularly with growing Hispanic and Asian-American populations, and that's particularly important in the Western United States, but it's also important in the South.

The third thing -- and this, again, is particularly important for Hispanic populations. Some of the states in which the Hispanic population is growing fastest now are North Carolina and Georgia and Arkansas. And in those places they've never elected Hispanics to almost anything.

So a retrogression scheme -- a continuation of the retrogression standard would allow the continuation of that towards elections, towards other discriminatory electoral structures which allow for continually to shut out those new emerging ethnic populations in those areas. And those demographic shifts make it particularly important that Congress would weaken or get rid of fear perhaps through a restored purpose standard of to try to overturn the Mosier cases in Louisiana.

The fourth thing -- and I just say this because every once in a while I disagree with Joaquin, and this is one of those instances.

I don't think that the Section 5 ought to be extended for 25 years. I think that on two grounds: One, it endangers the status of the act under City of Burney. And, two, I finished a paper, which is about 80 pages long, on Section 5 for a Russell Sage volume, which will be upcoming.

One of the things that I learned from that is that it was very fortunate that after Roman versus Balding, decided April 22, 1980 -- I testified in the Bermuda case which was on intent -- immediately after Roman versus Balding, we had to revisit the Voting Rights Act. And that made it possible -- because we had to revisit the Voting Rights Act in Section 5 to make it possible to change Section 2 -- to amend Section 2 to outflank Roman versus Balding. There had been other cases which have occurred from 1982 to the present. It would have been a good thing had Congress had a -- forced some action which would have invited voting rights forces to try to make some changes in the interpretations of the law that the Supreme Court voice powers, which often seem to me to be incorrect.

So there are advantages both from a legal standpoint and making the law something that would pass the Supreme Court and also from a tactical standpoint in constraining the Supreme Court by forcing Congress to act in a more timely fashion that argue for a shorter period of time for renewal.

Just quickly to say something about cases from L.A. County and from Monterey County.

The Garza case in L.A. County was a huge case. It cost about $12-and-a-half million, I think, all together to litigate. MALDEF was involved. ACLU Justice, the outside attorneys for the County of Los Angeles. There was -- there were very extensive -- it was a very extensive trial. It lasted for two-and-a-half or three months. A great deal of statistical testimony. Some of it -- a very small part of it intent testimony, but the intent testimony eventually became determinative.

There was continuing discrimination, continuing drawing of district boundaries in an effort to ensure that Latinos could not elect a candidate of choice. This in a relatively enlightened community where Latinos otherwise were able to be elected to office, but what you had here is Anglo supervisors who again and again and again changed the boundaries so that they would keep Latinos from getting up to the threshold where they would be sufficient to challenge.

I hope that your report makes clear that there are instances like this, even in the enlightened state of California, where you have a history of discrimination and very important and powerful discrimination.

It's also true in Monterey. In Monterey I was involved in a couple of cases with Joaquin and the -- one of them didn't go to trial. The other, the judge didn't publish the facts, so I have two very long reports that I wrote about discrimination in Monterey which I'll leave with Chandler.

When Californians think of Monterey County, they think of Big Sur, they think of Pebble Beach Golf Course, they think of Monterey Bay Aquarium. They don't think of the North County areas. They don't think of the terrible strikes that we've had, the long history of the farm worker, anti-farm worker violence in Monterey County. They don't think of the degree of discrimination on the county level in drawing the supervisorial districts. It looks just like L.A. County and it looks just like several southern counties in cities that I've worked in.

Again and again, they drew boundaries to ensure that Latinos had no opportunity to elect candidates of their choice, and this went through the 1990s. And they abolished local courts to allow only the countywide Anglo-majority voters to elect, then, virtually all whites to the -- to the judgeships.

They did not make clear that from 1968 on, when Joaquin brought Lopez versus Monterey County, that was litigated up to the Supreme Court level several times. It never went to trial. The Justice Department punted, in my view, and pre-cleared the actions finally.

But the point here is that there is very extensive discrimination. It's different from Southern discrimination in the seventies and sixties in that you don't have a lot of smoking gun statements, but it's still very effective discrimination. And I hope that your report will make it possible to continue to show that there is purposeful discrimination in lots of places where you might not otherwise expect it.

We've got lots of discrimination in California under -- which could be covered by the Voting Rights Act and sometimes has been covered by the Voting Rights Act in the past. I would hope it continues to be and we need to change the Voting Rights Act to ensure that it's so. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, Professor Kousser.

Professor Davidson, do you want to begin your questioning? Well, you're checking your notes. Professor Kousser, you had Monterey reports and you also referred to a Russell Sage Foundation report.

MR. KOUSSER: That I don't have with me, but I'll send it to Chandler.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Okay. Thank you.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: I have a couple of questions and the first is to Ms. McCormack.

I found your testimony very, very interesting. I was struck by the extent with which your office has reached out to language minorities and it does sound as though your program is a model of how that outreach should be -- should be conducted.

I noticed at one point that you said that you offered a great deal of assistance to other language-minority groups that were not offered by Section 203, but that your outreach was not as extensive because it was not required.

And am I correct, in inferring from your statement there, that Section 203 really does have an impact in terms of requiring officials, such as yourself, to do what needs to be done to make the ballot accessible to language minorities?

MS. MCCORMACK: Absolutely. And I do believe that's the case. The cost component, which I did not include in my testimony -- it's a legal requirement, but the cost component translating the -- we had 818 different ballot combinations on the November election last year. And that's what part of the geographic precinct you live in -- with the Congressional District -

- we have 17, as you know -- which state assembly, which local district creates all these different ballot combinations.

Translating all the materials of that into the required languages runs about 3 to 5 million per major election in Los Angeles County. That's a significant portion of our budget which is usually between 18 and 20 million to conduct a county election.

So when that amount of money can get as high as 5 million, which it has, just to reach the -- to meet the minimum legal requirements, and that would be the translated materials, which are definitely legally required, that's not even the oral assistance. The oral assistance is on top of that. To extend translation of written materials in those other languages, we've just simply have not had the budget to do that, and so we've gone to community groups and we've had volunteers who work with us in Russian, Cambodian, and Armenian because we have such large pockets of those, and any other language which will assist us in doing some minimal translations. We've accepted that from them without cost because it would cost millions more to do that.

So it really is a financial limitation, but we don't like to think that that would mean that we can't provide the materials, but certainly oral assistance, which I think is the most needed, is not the expense of translation so that we do go out to the community groups and ask them to help us find poll workers who speak those languages so we don't have to rely so much on bringing in -- a voter doesn't have to rely on bringing in a family member or someone else. They can actually go to the polling place and find that there's someone there who can assist them. So that's the main barrier to the extent it even further is the financial component.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Thank you.

I have a couple of questions for Mr. Avila. And we have developed a tradition, I think, on the Commission of encouraging our panelists to disagree among themselves where they have disagreements to express. And given Dr. Kousser's belief that the extension of the nonpermanent features should only be for ten years and your belief that it should be a 25-year extension, do you have a response to Dr. Kousser on that?

MR. AVILA: Yes. I respectfully disagree, of course, but I -- I'm really just taking the lead with Justice O'Connor in the Weir case where she first felt it was going to take about a generation or 25 years to sort of correct the problems.

Based on what I've seen in terms of just talking to other voting rights litigators, talking with organizations, there is a very well-documented, very extensive record that's being developed now. And that record demonstrates that we have still a long way to go. And when you compare 35 to 40 years to 200 years, there's just simply no comparison.

And not only do you have to deal with just outright racism in some instances, you have to deal with a lot of institutional structures. And when you're talking about close to 3,000 jurisdictions in California, that's not going to be done in seven years or ten years.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Okay. The second question has to do with your statement that, as I understood it, at least one of the jurisdictions that covered -- is covered by Section 5 has not made submissions for pre-clearance in decades.

MR. AVILA: Yes.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Could you be a little bit more specific? You may have been specific and I was just taking notes and I didn't hear what you had to say, but would you consider this to be the wild card here, or are there other jurisdictions that you think may not have been making these submissions? This has been a problem that has worried me for some time. And I don't believe that the Justice Department has a standard procedure for systematically determining whether jurisdictions have made pre-clearance submissions, and I've just wondered if you could expand a bit on that with your remarks there.

MR. AVILA: Yes, it's just not me saying it. In 1968 you had the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights stating that there was a high degree of noncompliance with the Section 5 pre-clearance requirements. In my written testimony I highlight congressional testimony from 1970 where Congress indicated that there was a high degree of non -- a nondegree of Section 5 compliance. The same testimony was repeated, observations were repeated in 1975. There was a GAO report in 1978 that talked -- that documented how many jurisdictions were just simply not complying with Section 5.

In 1982 you had then Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Commission for two days testified that even though there was a very strong period of enforcement during that time period, his department did not have the resources or the time to go and even secure an adequate compliance. Now, that's the background. When we look at Monterey County, we look at Lopez versus Monterey County. You had voting changes that occurred in 1968 to 1983 that had not been submitted, and it took two U.S. Supreme Court cases until 1999 -- the year 2000 when they were actually submitted. You would think that Monterey County would have learned.

In the past recall election against where the present governor was elected, there was a consolidation of voting precincts in Monterey County. They went from 180 or so polling places to about 80 or so polling places. Half -- just close to half of all the polling places were closed.

In investigating that case, it was discovered that Monterey County had not submitted their voting precinct consolidations for many years from at least 1995 to the year 2000. So that's just one instance.

In Merced County, several years ago, I personally went out and looked at minutes for special election districts and found that there were a series of annexations to these special election districts that had not been submitted.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in Perkins versus Matthews, documented how the -- there were many instances where there was noncompliance. So it's not anything that's just happened, you know, or that I'm just saying. It's well documented. The research is out there. And my greatest fear is that the Section 5 provisions will simply expire and you'll have these hundreds if not thousands of voting changes that have not been submitted.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Thank you.

And now a question for Dr. Kousser. Your research has been -- on voting rights has been widespread and you have focused a good bit on the South as well as on the Southwest. And as I understand you, you are saying that some of the problems that racial or ethnic minorities encounter in Los Angeles, in California today are in many respects as serious as those which blacks have traditionally faced in parts of the old South. Am I correct there?

MR. KOUSSER: That's correct. And there are analogies in the sorts of arguments you used. I testified in Dallas County, Alabama -- Selma -- in U.S. versus Dallas County in the early 1980s, and the judge in the case was W. Rivard Hand, who is well-known, shall we say, in civil rights circles. Judge Hand ruled against the Justice Department in that case, and he said that when the at-large system of elections was set up in Dallas County for the board -- I've forgotten whether it's called board of county supervisors, board of directors -- anyway, the county governing body, it was not so much that they wanted to discriminate against blacks and keep blacks out of office, they simply wanted to keep all the offices for themselves.

The same sort of argument was made by the attorney for Los Angeles County, a mixed-motive argument in the L.A. County Board of Supervisors case. It was not so much that they wanted to discriminate against Latinos and set up districts that Latinos could not win in as that they wanted to keep all the offices for themselves, then an all-white board of county supervisors.

I found that fairly striking. Los Angeles is like Selma. It's a good tag line anyway. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Mr. Buchanan.

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: There's an area of American history that the slaveholder, Tom -- and founder of our country, Thomas Jefferson said, "We must bind men with the chains of the law." Basketball coach -- former basketball coach of Georgetown University, John Thompson, Sr., said, "The world's a pretty nice place if you got a hammerlock on it and force it to be."

I feel pretty secure about the state of the law pertaining to rights -- voting rights of American citizens, Mr. Chairman, if we would just clone this panel and put the people across the country in counties, like Ms. McCormack, and let these two debate with each other in the Congress and in the courts and life would be secure. In reality we must live with how things are.

Now, you've said very clearly, you believe these provisions are needed, and I gather the three of you feel that as -- Chairman Sensenbrenner and his committee and their counterparts in the senate are looking at this legislation and coming up with something that will stand in the courts and determine whether what is there is needed, in a revised fashion or as it is, to be extended, I gather you would all say there needs to be extension of the provisions of the Voting Rights Act either in present form or in amended form in 2007; is that correct?

MR. AVILA: That's correct.

MS. MCCORMACK: Yes.

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: Thank you,

Mr. Chairman.

COMMISSIONER: I think the answer "yes."

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: I heard "yes." Thank you.
CHAIRMAN LEE: Commissioner Rogers.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Absolutely. Thank you kindly. First of all, I appreciate very much your testimony. I'm glad you all were here today.
I'm just curious, I wanted to get a sense -- your cost as it relates to this program that you all have put in place, I'm assuming that your costs have to be significantly higher than if you just had an English-only ballots.
MS. MCCORMACK: Yes, absolutely. Our expenditure for the translated materials that we're required to supply in a major -- every election, but for a countywide major election costs between 3 to $5 million to both translate it and print and distribute and mail these materials. Clearly with -- I don't -- I can't project what my bosses would say if we weren't required to do it, but we all know election budgets are not something that is the first order of priority for most governments so -- CHAIRMAN ROGERS: Sure.
MS. MCCORMACK: -- I don't think that we would see this amount of budget if we were not required, and indeed, as much as we'd like to provide more services in other languages, we really have a limited budget to do that without a requirement. So for the costs of a major election like last November, which was somewhere around 20 million for our county to administer, somewhere in the vicinity of $4 million of that was for the translation and provision of materials under Section 203.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: In addition to that, the costs related to the oral component and otherwise paying folks essentially to be there, that's included within the $4 million figure that you --
MS. MCCORMACK: Well, actually, that 4 million is pretty much just the translation. We'd have poll workers anyway, so we --
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.
MS. MCCORMACK: -- when we recruit, and we had about 30,000 poll workers that we recruited -- and we pay very little to our poll workers. Probably less than almost anywhere in the country --
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.
MS. MCCORMACK: -- so it's very much a volunteer -- we recruit based on these criteria I mentioned to have individuals there who speak those languages and can assist in those languages, so we would have that cost regardless. We have to have people there. We simply find people who speak those languages rather than hiring someone who doesn't. So I don't really consider that an additional cost.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.
MS. MCCORMACK: There is an additional cost in terms of finding them, the recruitment aspects. We have several staff people who are out recruiting, trying to find multilingual speakers, so there is a cost there, and that is included in the 4 to $5 million.
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: What's your overall budget?
MS. MCCORMACK: Our overall budget -- well, for each election, major election, it's somewhere around 20 million but -- COMMISSIONER ROGERS: 20 million.
MS. MCCORMACK: -- because I'm the registrar, the recorder, the county clerk, a lot of my budget has to do with property records and --
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.
MS. MCCORMACK: -- other things, so it's about hundred million --
COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Absolutely.

MS. MCCORMACK: -- but, you know, election budget for each election is about 20 million.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Absolutely. When you think about the provisions in particular with respect to Section 203, the idea behind the provisions was that they would provide some assistance to people as they're essentially transitioning into the United States. In other words, you have new immigrant groups that come into the country, they may be speaking a native language from wherever country they're from, but the idea is ultimately that you transition into essentially English as a language that you primarily use in the United States. That can be one of the assumptions that's behind the law in and of itself.

Does Section 203, in your opinion, create a situation where you have sort of a permanent separation of cultures? In other words, because the ballot is always in Chinese, the ballot will always be printed in Spanish, or the ballot will always be printed in Japanese, that you will, in effect, not encourage people to assimilate generally into the United States culture overall or will you maintain separation, in your opinion, with 203?

MS. MCCORMACK: I think regarding voting, because of the complex ballots in California, it's very difficult to understand these propositions. We're about to have a statewide election on November 8th on very complicated issues, including redistricting, and they're very hard to understand if it's not your native language. So I do think it's really important that we provide that service. I don't really think that's a determinant, though. I think -- I think what you're describing is much more neighborhoods and schools and assimilation is an everyday event --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.

MS. MCCORMACK: -- versus voting, which is an infrequent event. It doesn't occur that -- although it seems in California it occurs all the time. In my life it seems to be, but relatively you don't go to an election booth every day the way you go to a school or to a neighborhood or the other aspects of life that -- as assimilation of culture. So whether or not we will ever get to the point where people won't need this service, which I think what may -- you maybe heading to --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.

MS. MCCORMACK: -- I do think that we find a lot of the poll workers that we recruit are younger, a lot of students that speak these languages, and what we've observed is that the -- most of the need is the older voters who come in, but it's surprising how many of the younger voters are bilingual --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.

MS. MCCORMACK: -- but, again, maybe their native language at home is primarily one of the foreign languages.

So it is -- I think there is some transition that you're describing, because, again, we see most of the need, as they come into the polls, are the older voters, but then older people vote more. So it's kind of a skewed analogy as well. But with the poll workers, we're finding -- we find the multilingual workers primarily from students, college students, and high school students who speak those languages at home.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Absolutely. Thank you kindly, Ms. McCormack. Professor, I wanted to ask you a question particularly. You talked about essentially block voting, you talked about racial block voting, and you also mentioned about at-large elections. Are you generally opposed to all at-large elections?

MR. AVILA: No.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Which at-large elections are you not opposed to?

MR. AVILA: The ones that don't have racially polarized voting.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: By that, you mean -- essentially you're talking about white folks that vote for white folks, black folks that vote for black folks, and Hispanics that vote for Hispanics, and Asians that vote for Asians.

In voting patterns here in California, is it generally true that Asians will vote for Asians, that white people will generally vote for white people, blacks will vote for blacks, and Hispanics will vote for Hispanics?

MR. AVILA: There's -- yes, generally. I can't give you specific instances. I can say that in the Garza versus L.A. County Board of Supervisors there were findings of racially polarized voting back in 1990. I can tell you that in Tulare County and Fresno County in cases that at-large election challenges where I commissioned studies to look into racially polarized voting, there were very significant and substantial degrees of racially polarized voting. When we've had --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Where do you not find racially polarized voting?

MR. AVILA: Where do you not.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Where do you not find circumstances in which Hispanics vote for Hispanics, blacks vote for blacks, Asians vote for Asians, whites vote for whites?

I guess I'm trying -- what I'm trying to do, Professor, is just -- I understand the context of your comments, and we've heard these comments throughout the United States to some extent, but I guess I'm trying to understand the nature of the comment as you make it 'cause you essentially say racially polarized voting is the basis for why it is that we should not have at-large elections, and we ought to maintain essentially the -- you know, relations that are broken down in a non-at-large basis. But I'm just trying to understand where the opposite occurs.

MR. AVILA: Well, I'm sure it does in some communities. I -- see, I don't conduct investigations where there isn't a problem. And usually my investigations have been as a result of people coming to me, to my office when I was practicing, and saying, you know, we have a problem with this particular system, so we investigate and we conduct a -- conducting racially polarized voting studies is a very expensive proposition.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.

MR. AVILA: So to do it for all jurisdictions would be just prohibitively impossible for someone like myself.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure. Thank you kindly, Professor. Thank you very much.

CHAIRMAN LEE: I hate to interrupt. Isn't part of the answer to Commissioner Rogers' question --

UNIDENTIFIED PERSON: Speak up.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Isn't it part of the answer to Commissioner Rogers' question your testimony that you thought that the impact of racial polarization was mostly at the local levels rather than the statewide levels?

MR. AVILA: Yes. Because I have not done studies at the state levels, I can't really speak with any authority on that, but I can speak with authority at the local levels.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, what is it -- so is the statewide levels races, do they approximate with Commissioner Rogers is talking about, the kinds of elections where racial -- racially polarized voting doesn't have the bite that it --

MR. AVILA: No, no, I --

CHAIRMAN LEE: Why is that?

MR. AVILA: Well, I think -- no. I think there are -- there are racially polarized voting patterns even in state legislative races and congressional races and it may not rise to the level in some instances. I know that Professor Kousser could probably speak more on that because he did some analysis of statewide -- correct me if I'm wrong. He did some analysis of statewide races.

But to look for an example of where there is no racially polarized voting means that there is no racially polarized society in that local community. And it's becoming increasingly more difficult to find the absence of racially polarized societies. And so, for that reason, it's going to be very difficult not to find patterns of racially polarized voting.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you very much. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

MR. KOUSSER: In California -- well, to give you an example of a place where the -- there seems to be relatively little racially polarized voting in at-large elections, the Pasadena Unified School District, where my kids went, has --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: And you give an example of what was it? I'm sorry. I missed what you said.

MR. KOUSSER: There is -- there is not racially polarized voting --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.

MR. KOUSSER: -- in voting for the Pasadena Unified School District. It's not so clear to me why that's so.

This is -- the community in general is still pretty polarized. It's segregated to a fairly large extent. The schools are predominantly black and Hispanic now. Whites generally do not go to Pasadena Unified School District. But there has been relatively little polarization. I think one of the things that happened, just to talk about the development of it, is that we had a big integration battle in the 1960s and seventies, a case -- Spangler -- went all the way to Supreme Court, decided in '76. And there were -- when I got to Pasadena in the 1960s and seventies, it seems like there was a school board election every year during the 1970s. There was either an election or a recall election. And there were huge battles between the integrationists and the segregationists.

One of the things that came out of that was that the people who continued to support the schools and continued to vote in the school board elections didn't discriminate, and so there have been -- the integrationist leader in the seventies was a Chinese-American. One of his allies was African-American. One of his opponents, one of the anti-integration candidates, was African-American. We've now elected Latinos to the school board, et cetera. It's the experience of going through a sort of racial crisis that made that possible in a way. With regard to statewide elections, famously in California, the Bradley-Deukmejian election, particularly the 1982 election, was clearly very racially polarized in that the -- at the end of the election, very close to the end, Bradley was nine points ahead in the pre-election polls, and he won -- on election day, he lost on absentee ballots, but there was clearly racially polarized voting at a statewide there.

There have been subsequent elections in which there has not been racially polarized voting. Lieutenant Governor Bustamante has been elected --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Sure.

MR. KOUSSER: -- without racially polarized voting. Generally African-Americans attract more opposition from Anglos than Latinos or Asian-Americans in California, but they still -- the other two groups still very often attract that. Another thing that is important is clearly whether there is -- whether the elections are partisan or not. The more partisan the elections, the less racially polarized voting there is. Whites will vote for an African-American who gets nominated --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Wait, let me make sure I understand this. You said the more partisan the election, the less racially polarized voting you find here in California.

MR. KOUSSER: White Democrats will vote for an African-American or a Latino who's on the Democratic ticket more easily than they would in an election which didn't have any party ballots on it. And since most local elections are nonpartisan, you find more racially polarized voting in nonpartisan elections and more on the local level therefor.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Okay.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Do you have anymore questions?

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I just had one question in particular for Professor -- forgive me.

MR. KOUSSER: Kousser.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: -- Kousser, but I wanted to ask you this question because it is unique. As we travel throughout the United States, there is no doubt that, as we've talked about issues at the end of the day, the ultimate issue is one of discrimination. Do you like me or not like me, are you going to hurt me or not hurt me because of the color of my skin, or will you not vote for me or vote for me because of it, or restrict me from voting because of it.

Ultimately this stuff all comes down to race wherever we are throughout the United States. But in particular I'm struck by two things: Conny, you mentioned in particular your thoughts as having grown up in the South and having come from Alabama and now been here in Los Angeles, you were mentioning in particular, as Professor Davidson was pointing out, Chandler was pointing out, your background in terms of having written about Southern politics, yet at the same time commenting here in Los Angeles. I was struck by your comment in particular saying that L.A. was not that different perhaps from Selma in particular as it relates -- I'll take it your comments relate to Hispanics. I haven't heard any testimony about African-Americans in particular here in California.

But I guess what I'm trying to get a handle on is to try to understand exactly what the nature of that discrimination as you describe it to be here in California is. It seems that you're saying a couple of things.

On the one hand, you're saying nobody uses the word "nigger," so -- because we don't use the word "nigger" out here and nobody says it, we don't have the sort of smoking gun of it having been intent.

And then at the other -- on the other hand, you sort of say, well, the effect of it is the following, because I want to preserve my position, I'm not anti-Hispanic, I'm not anti-black, I just want to preserve my position which happens to be all white. And yet, at the same time, you described the world in which you have, quote, enlightened communities -- that's the way you used your phrase -- that seemingly describes a community in which you believe that white folks are somehow enlightened as it relates to issues relative to race, but yet you describe a world in which they engage in the same kind of discrimination that you describe takes place in the South. I'm struck by that.

How can you have enlightenment on one hand and discrimination on the other, as you describe it, because I'm trying to get a sense about how it is that we articulate your point of view as you've expressed it here regarding what discrimination is here in California vis-a-vis the rest of the country. If it's not Southern discrimination, yet it is discrimination without the obvious factors of intent, how do you all describe it? And forgive me for that long question.

MR. KOUSSER: No, no.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I did not mean to be that long about that.

MR. KOUSSER: It's a wonderful question. I wish I'd fed it to you. My dissertation was called "The Shaping of Southern Politics: Disfranchisement and the Establishment of the One-Party South, 1880 to 1910." And the thesis of that, more than anything else, is that the disfranchisement devices that were adopted in the South in the classic period of disfranchisement were adopted more out of a concern for power than they were out of a concern -- out of an enmity, an antipathy for people.

This was a question of the preservation of a white power structure and of the -- particularly the power structure of the people who were in then and who wanted to ensure that they and their children and their grandchildren would control politics forever. And the way that they did it was to discriminate against people who were poor and who were -- lacked education.

Most of them were black, and certainly the object of it more than anything else was to discriminate against black people. But it was a question not of hatred. The policy makers there, then, and here now don't do things out of hatred. It's not that they hate black people. It's not that they hate Latinos. It's not that they even hate -- or in the late 19th Century, Chinese in the Northern California. It's not so much that. It's a question of power. And in that sense, it's the same thing. They're preserving -- they're using the political structures and the rules of politics to preserve power for themselves and people like them. And that's what it's about. That's what it's always been about.

And so, in that sense, it's very similar in the Western United States and in the South, it's very similar in this century and in the last century. I've written a good deal about the two reconstructions and the measures that ended the first reconstruction, and many of the same things were used and are used to have the same effects now.

When I see the Georgia voter ID bill and the $35 charge for a ten-year or twenty-year identification card in Georgia, it looks to me awfully much like the poll tax in the late 19th Century.

When I see redistricting changes in Los Angeles County and redistricting changes in Brighton County, North California, they look -- Brighton County, North Carolina looks very similar to me. So it's a question of power and that's what ties the two together.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Commissioner Buchanan, would you like to say something?

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: Well, I just want to add a footnote. There was no question, as Ms. McCormack would agree, that in 1950s and thereafter was a great deal of racial prejudice in states like Alabama. It was there. But there is also great merit, Professor Kousser, as I believe in what you say.

When we try to make a breakthrough as young Republicans in a state that has been in the hands of Dixiecrats most of -- Democrats for 100 years, the people were -- who held the power in counties around Alabama -- it was run by county courthouse police and political machines in one party -- they were in mortal fear of the fact that there were counties that were majority black in Alabama, which would, in their view, guarantee they'd be thrown out of office and lose their power. So I think what you say has to have merit, that power has a lot to do. And if you don't take that into account in looking at voting rights questions, you're missing a very important point.

The prejudice was clearly there, too, there's no question about it. But the loss of power was clearly a strong motivation in trying to keep things as they were.

CHAIRMAN LEE: This is a new trend. We have commissioners testifying now. Ms. McCormack -- That was good. That was good.

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: There is my case, Mr. Chairman.

CHAIRMAN LEE: I was complimenting you.

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Ms. McCormack, from your vantage point as an election official, what changes would you like to see in the Voting Rights Act? MS. MCCORMACK: I really directed my testimony very narrowly to Section 203 and what most of this testimony has been on -- a lot of it has been on Section 5, and certainly in terms of redistricting, I'd like to make sure everyone in this room knows that our office has nothing to do with the board of supervisors' lines, which is not always the case. There are counties where the registrar is involved in that process. I'm glad to say ours is not one of them. Clearly that's a very political process. I'd rather keep my testimony on -- based on obvious need.

Los Angeles County is the most diverse county in the country and the obvious need that arises through not just, you know, activists, you know, that there's always a couple of activists, but a real community need has been expressed that individuals simply cannot -- who have limited-English proficiency try to deal with the ballot -- the complex ballots that we have in this state. Perhaps that would be different if we didn't have

-- like if we were in a state without initiatives or propositions, because I think, you know, names on a ballot, people can learn an office and a name. But when you get into the complex ballots, the need for it is dramatic. And so I think that in term -- and I don't see it going away. If anything, it seems to be increasing.

Whether that's -- what Mr. Rogers indicated, whether that's a cultural phenomenon, I don't know, I'm not an expert and don't have any background in that. I just know that we have a very recognized need for these services and I also know that county governments or any government rarely funds a need unless there's a requirement. So it really base -- it boils down to, without a requirement, I don't know whether or not we would be able to sustain the level of services that we're providing in this area.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Let me -- well, I didn't mean to put you on the spot. I just wanted to ask -- I want to start with this observation. I noticed that when I was at the Justice Department, state and local officials actually sort of liked technical assistance, and the technical assistance they liked most from the Justice Department was funding. And with respect to the testimony you've given about Section 203 and the high cost of the admirable programs you have, that outreach and targeted advertising and things of that kind, I wonder to -- I can't get any closer to this.

MS. MCCORMACK: There you go.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Should there be a funding component --

MS. MCCORMACK: No.

CHAIRMAN LEE: -- to Section 203 because --

MS. MCCORMACK: We've obviously never had a funding component to Section 203, and prior to HAVA, we never had any ability to do any advertising at all in our office --

CHAIRMAN LEE: Right.

MS. MCCORMACK: -- or in my 24 years of being a registrar in Dallas, Texas, and San Diego and here. I never had anything, not even an outreach coordinator that would be funded, so we were reliant on developing PSAs and using that avenue, which often we didn't even have the resources to put together PSAs.

So this last year was a new revelation to us because, as part of our Help America Vote Act funding, we were eligible in our state to apply for grants through the Secretary of State's office to improve the process of voting and educating the public. And California, of course, is required to provide everyone a sample ballot, which is very unusual in most states. They do not have this service, which is a very wonderful service that's mandated by state law. But to go beyond that and actually be able to run paid advertisements in newspapers, I think it has to had -- had to have some impact on the fact that we had this remarkable voter turnout. I don't know. I don't have a way to prove that.

But I do think that it made a difference to the community, that they knew what their options were for the voting systems, 'cause we're all in the process of changing voting systems, which is very difficult for voters when you start introducing that level of change, and the whole country's doing that right now, which is complex, to say the least. And so a lot of our advertising dealt with how to use the voting system, you know, how to -- what are the deadlines, how do I get there, what are my options, can I vote absentee. People don't always know these things. And, of course, all of us have Web sites but not everybody has access to that, so I think it made a huge difference.

As to whether or not it should be funded, obviously, I think that all the local jurisdictions would love to see federal dollars behind federal programs. I mean, that's a standard recommendation of certainly our board of supervisors and I bet any board of supervisors, so certainly we would love to see federal funding coming for federal requirements, yes.

CHAIRMAN LEE: I thought you'd say that. With respect to -- Professor Avila, with respect to the State Voting Rights Act, do you think there are any lessons in that Voting Rights Act for where we are in the federal act which is thinking about some worthwhile amendments?

MR. AVILA: Well, there are several. Perhaps the most significant one dealt with the bill of costs, and that is whenever a winning party wins a case, they can automatically file their bill of costs, and that includes defendants, which would be cities or jurisdictions. And in the seventies, when I was litigating these cases, the bill of costs would just be filing fees, copies, and so on, which would probably be just a couple hundred bucks, especially in Texas. It was no higher than that.

But in California, as a result of jurisdictions spending over a million dollars in fighting these cases, the copying charges and all of the ancillary charges that are subject to a bill of costs were in the hundreds of thousands.

And what happens is that -- and this is documented in my written testimony -- is that when a case is lost, as it was in Santa Maria, as it was in El Centro, the jurisdiction filed a bill of costs against clients that were very scared as a result of statements made by the jurisdiction that they were going to lose their homes. And so, as a result of that, an appeal was dismissed in the El Centro case and an appeal was not pursued in the Santa Maria case. So in the State Voting Rights Act, there is no provision for the recovery of bill of costs by a winning jurisdiction in a case. That's one.

The second part of it and -- because, as a result of that -- it's a chilling factor. People are not going to be filing these cases because they don't want their homes to be taken away from them if they lose, and we can't guarantee -- right? -- that we're going to win. The other more substantive area is that under the Federal Section 2 Act, you have like close to nine different factors that courts look at. You have the three precondition factors under Thornburg, and then, if you're able to survive that, you get into the totality of circumstances. In the State Voting Rights Act, we don't require that. All we need to demonstrate is that there is racially polarized voting plus dilution in -- dilution of minority voting strengths. The two go together, so.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you.

Professor Kousser, I have some questions, but I'm told -- I've been told that we have to pretty much end this session because we're running out of tape. But I wonder if -- oh, I wonder -- this is my question.

With respect to the standard for coverage, it would be very nice if we could get some more details of what your thoughts are on that as well as the other recommendations that you made. And I wonder if you could supplement your testimony in some way.

MR. KOUSSER: I will send you something.

I think that there should be coverage wherever there is -- you gather information about what the exact percentages should be, but if a group or a set groups in a county is more than 20 percent or is 20 percent, say, then it seems to me that there are -- that Section 5 coverage ought to be extended.

If it's less -- and the figure is somewhat arbitrary. You may be able to hone that figure better, make it larger or smaller. Or if there has been a successful case or a Section 5 objection over the last X period of years -- and, again, your evidence will probably be able to fill in that X better than I.

The object of this is to say here is where we expect to see voting structures or voting rules adopted which are likely to be discriminatory and in other places it's less likely to occur. And that makes very much more than a rational basis. It may make -- it may be something that will survive strict scrutiny under City of Burney. It's -- but it would enable the Commission to say that we have very good reasons for the -- because of the evidence that we have gathered, to try to modernize the Voting Rights Act and make sure that it covers exactly who it ought to cover.

In 1970 and 1975 there were proposals to make Section 5 national, universal coverage. The purpose of that was really to flood the Justice Department with so many voting changes, that it would not be able to make distinctions between them and enforcement would go out the window. That's the wrong thing to do, but there should be more nationalization of the Voting Rights Act than there is today.

Those two sorts of provisions with numbers to be filled in and exact provisions to be made on the basis of your more extensive experience than mine seem to me to be the right way to go.

CHAIRMAN LEE: I think that the effect of -- I think some of the testimony we've heard from the Northeast in particular places does indicate the unhappily the national persistence of vote -- of polarization but also, you know, supports I guess the argument you're making. I don't know, Chandler. Do you think that's true? That there seem to be -- you know, we're not talking about that fact it's focused on the South anymore.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Yeah, I think that's true.

CHAIRMAN LEE: That was eloquent. Okay.

So we're done and we're breaking for lunch. And we have lunch -- where, Chandler?

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Over there.

CHAIRMAN LEE: -- over there for everybody, and we'll start up again at 1:05.

Thank you very much for this panel. And it's been one of the more instructive panels we've had actually.

Thank you very much.

(At 12:28 P.M., the hearing was adjourned for noon recess.)

(At 1:18 P.M., the hearing was reconvened.)

CHAIRMAN LEE: Okay. We're now going to resume the hearing in the Western Regional Hearing of the National Commission on Voting Rights Act. Our second panel consists of three guest panelists: Robert Rubin. He's the legal director of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights of San Francisco.

Notwithstanding his youthful appearance, Mr. Rubin has been a civil rights lawyer for 25 years, specializes in immigration and voter rights. He's done many cases on the Voting Rights Act, but also under the National Voter Registration Act of Law. And he was counsel to Latino voters in the Monterey County case that was earlier discussed. And more recently, he was counsel to minorities voters challenging the elimination of community-based voting precincts during the 2003 California gubernatorial election. And he has testified numerous times before the California Legislature and the United States Congress. Prior to coming to the Lawyers' Committee, he was ACLU staff counsel in Jackson, Mississippi.

Debbie Hsu Siah is the fund developer of the Chinese Information and Service Center of Los Angeles. Ms. Siah works for the Service Center, which is a nonprofit social service agency, as a housing and urban development fellow at the University of Washington. Ms. Siah documented voter access issues and conducted voter outreach projects for local nonprofit organizations.

I think I moved you to Los Angeles when you're actually from King County in Washington state. Sorry.

Since July 2002, Ms. Siah has helped coordinate the King County Section 203 Community Coalition that monitors bilingual voter access in King County.

The third member of our panel is Rosalind Gold, the senior director of NALEO. She's a senior director, policy research and advocacy for NALEO. NALEO is the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials.

I guess you're with the educational fund.

Ms. Gold has worked there for over a decade on policy analysis and research for the naturalization and Latino power empowerment efforts of NALEO. Her areas of expertise include election reform, a census, and the restructuring of the nation's immigration bureaucracy. Welcome. Why don't we begin with you, Mr. Rubin.

MR. RUBIN: Thank you very much. Again, I'm Robert Rubin with the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights in San Francisco. Am I doing okay on sound? Morgan Kousser talked about how he followed Joaquin Avila and how difficult that was. Well, I've been following Joaquin Avila and Morgan Kousser around voting rights issues for the better part of ten or fifteen years now, and I'm not sure what I have to add, but I will try to make it as informative and interesting as possible.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Mr. Rubin, could I interrupt and ask you if you could move the microphone just a little bit closer. I know it's close now, but I'm having a hard time hearing everybody on the panel. And speak clearly and -- and keep on going. Sorry to interrupt.

MR. RUBIN: No problem.

CHAIRMAN LEE: We ourselves are going to try to do that also.

MR. RUBIN: I think the acoustics are challenging in this room. What I'd like to try to focus on is, not so much some of the legal standards that I think you heard a lot about in the earlier panel, but some of the things that I've observed and learned just about voting behavior in California, and around the issues that we've litigated.

As my written testimony connotes, there's essentially four areas that I'd like to focus on. One of them I think I'll probably skip, given the earlier discussion, which is Lopez versus Monterey County. That was a case that Joaquin Avila and I cocounseled to the Supreme Court, actually twice. Once, it didn't quite feel like a voter rights victory, because Clarence Thomas voted for us. The second time it was eight to one. It felt a lot better when he dissented.

But having prevailed on that, that was a fairly clean legal issue, although I should say, just in terms of voting rights behavior, is that we had a very interesting reaction from our District Court panel. Of course, there is a Section 5 case, so it was a three judge panel. And the judges were really quite incredulous that we could be alleging discrimination and retrogression in the Section 5 context.

And there really was that attitude of, well, that's -- that's Alabama, that's Mississippi, that's not the enlightened state in which we live here in California. And it's required quite a bit of education.

So, as I talk about some of these issues, I'd like to talk, not just about the behavior of voters, but the reactions of behavior of judges, particularly state court judges that we're trying some of these cases in front of now.

One of the other issues that we've addressed in our office is the special elections, and what happens when special elections are called. I'm not sure, is there one this week, Rosalind? Or is it -- it almost seems as if we're dealing with it on a weekly basis. We, of course, had the gubernatorial election, and on that I think I would ascribe to Morgan Kousser's views that, well, it wasn't as blatant as literacy tests and poll taxes, we did have an extraordinary reduction and consolidation of voting precincts. We noted at least 17 instances in which voting booths were being moved out of Latino neighborhoods to remote areas. In one instance, it was being moved to the sheriff's posse clubhouse, an Anglo hunting club that was not known for particularly friendly attitudes towards Latinos. And these changes were being adopted, were going forward, without Section 5 pre-clearance. This was in Monterey County as well as in several other of the other four counties in California that are covered jurisdictions.

We sued on that, we got a temporary restraining order, and the court was just about ready to hold up the whole gubernatorial election itself, when Monterey County and the other counties finally did exceed to the provisions of Section 5 and submit on their changes for pre-clearance. I should add, as to the efficacy of Section 5, it wasn't just a procedural submit and pre-clear process, but that, what the county ultimately acknowledged, is that several of those changes -- those closing of voting booths, the moving of those voting booths out of predominantly Latino neighborhoods into areas that, if they weren't hostile to Latinos, they were miles away, not accessible by public transportation and had a clear chilling effect on their voting rights, that those -- that those changes could be found to be retrogressive and the County, in fact, withdrew those voting precinct consolidations and restored the polling places in those various places in the Latino neighborhoods. So, that was one instance in the gubernatorial election.

Another instance I think that's particularly important, is the letter of objection that we received involving the Chualar School District. And, again, my colleague, Joaquin Avila, because we work in tandem on a lot of these issues, has stepped on my lines and I won't bore you with the details of that. But I think it's important to know that the Justice Department in 2002 issued a letter of objection to this school district that has a 75 percent Latino voting age population, 55 percent registration rate. And, despite these figures, DOJ issued a letter of objection because of the strong evidence of discrimination against Latino voters. Quoting a little bit from their findings, the DOJ found evidence that the petition drive -- this was a petition drive to recall the elected official -- the Latino elected officials -- that the petition drive to -- was, quote, motivated, at least in part, by discriminatory animus. The cover letter for the petition drive, quote, attacked the credibility of the districts of the trustees from the district citing the language skills of one trustee and making unfavorable references to the language preferences of another.

And so, here, it wasn't the -- the "N" word being spewed about by a Southern Secretary of State or a Registrar of Voters, but it was a ridiculing of one's language preference, of an elected official's language preference, that was relied upon by the Justice Department for its finding, that these proposed changes would be retrogressive.

The Justice Department actually determined that the proposed change would have a retrogressive effect on Latino voting strength and noted these two points: One, that despite the 75 percent Latino voting age population, that the Latino voters had experienced some mixed success in voting and, when they were successful, they faced constant and sometimes successful, as in this instance, efforts to recall the candidates that they had elected.

So, even once they'd elected them, they would then resort to recall elections in which there would be lower turnout, and the Anglo voters would recall the Latino elected officials.

So the DOJ did confirm that, during that referendum election, the Anglo proponents easily defeated the Latino opposition under, quote, highly charged, racially polarized circumstances.

Okay. So I think that you have there the reasons why we need Section 5. And it's a little different than I think it was in the South, and I've got some experience with that, having spent the first couple of years of my practice, when I really was young, in Mississippi. And here, it's more about changing demographics. And, although I have the utmost respect for Morgan Kousser, I would suggest, it's not quite simply about power -- that there is a racial element here involved. We've analyzed these recent elections.

We've analyzed elections like Proposition 187, which is a statewide referendum that would have denied education to immigrant children. This was one of the most -- in fact, he did some of the analysis for us, Dr. Kousser did. This was one of the most racially polarized votes that we've ever seen.

It was -- it was incredible, the kind of numbers that we got out of that analysis.

The California voters were not concerned about immigrants coming across the Canadian border. They were not concerned about the Western Europeans that had overstayed their tourist or student visas, who I might add, comprise 50 percent, that's correct, one-half of the undocumented immigrant population in this country is made up of overstays, people who are typically from Western Europe, that come in on tourist visas and student visas. Yet, that was not what propelled the California electorate in 1994 to vote almost 60 percent in favor of Proposition 187. It was the fear of the brown immigrant coming across the Mexican border. Dr. Kousser is absolutely correct, however, that there is a power element here and we've seen it in local jurisdictions, in Kings County, in Monterey County, and that these changing demographics, and the potential attendant power shifts that they bring, may create and do create a temptation for incumbents to make those kinds of voting changes that we typically only associate with the South.

So we saw it in Chualar, where changes are made quickly to a voting schedule and a recall -- a referendum election is held to, essentially, recall previously elected Latino officials. That would be a change that would be subject to Section 5.

Or, as in Hanford, California -- Hanford is in Kings County, the San Joaquin Valley -- we recently filed one of the only two lawsuits that have been filed under the California Voting Rights Act. The suit was against the high school board, one of the largest school boards in the State of California.

Hanford, although they quickly settled because it was a dead-bang winner for us and they didn't want to pay our attorney's fees, has fought tooth and nail on how the district lines are going to be drawn. They're incredibly hostile to this and, in that case, Dr. Kousser's absolutely correct. They see power slipping away. In some cases they may be evil, but they are not stupid.

They realize the reality of the demographics. And, when Latinos are coming in, in the kind of numbers that they are to our state, when people are becoming naturalized citizens, when the citizen voting age population is getting to the levels that it does, entrenched power is fearful. And so, when we were in Hanford, I was accused of playing games with the law for having filed a suit under the California Voting Rights Act that you heard described earlier. Why? Because we relied on the law. I didn't think that was playing games. I thought that the school district that had long since shut out the Latino community, such that there were no Latino elected official on the school board, despite a 40, 50, almost 60 percent school attendance rate, that there was not a single Latino elected official on that board until very recently, that that was a school board -- that was a local jurisdiction playing games and playing very serious games with the lives and the educational aspirations of these children. And so that is why we need Section 5 so that when influenced districts in places like Hanford, influenced districts being anywhere from a 35 to 40 percent -- lower 40 percent district, in which, with minimal crossover votes, Latino and minority candidates can get elected. When those influenced districts threatened to become the majority minority districts, we're going to see these last-minute changes in voting procedures that Section 5 needs to be able to cover.

And when special elections are called, we're going to see long-standing polling places moved. We're going to see polling places consolidated. We're going to see people inconvenienced and, indeed -- in perhaps more subtle ways, but no less effective ways, shut out of the voting process. That is why Section 5 is still needed here in our enlightened State of California and that's why the Congress ought to be reauthorizing Section 5 and ensuring the important protections remain main in effect. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, Mr. Rubin. Ms. Siah.

MS. SIAH: I thought he was going to have questions afterwards.

CHAIRMAN LEE: We're going to have questions at the end of --

MS. SIAH: At the end. Okay.

CHAIRMAN LEE: If possible, try to restrict your comments to between five and ten minutes.

MS. SIAH: Sure. Well, I want to thank the Commission for inviting me here today. And I represent the Section 203 community coalition in Seattle, Washington or King County, Washington. And we're a coalition of nonprofit organizations that are involved in voter outreach efforts in King County. So all of us are volunteers and we all have different jobs during the day, but we're really excited to be part of this hearing today.

We learned about our Section 203 distinction in King County in July of 2002. And the Coalition has worked pretty closely with our elections office to ensure full compliance and has been quite successful. Besides scheduling, sort of, the monthly meetings with our elections office, we've worked together to produce an impressive array of bilingual materials. This is the first time that King County's had to implement any type of bilingual voter assistance, so they were starting from zero, and we've been with them since that process.

So we're very happy to report that, because of our advocacy efforts, we've hired a minority language coordinator -- or our elections office has -- and been able to implement a good program. We've also conducted six successful poll monitoring projects at polling sites, with the help of the National Asian Pacific-American Legal Consortium, and also the Asian Pacific-American Legal Center here in Los Angeles.

We've also sent bilingual mailings to about a hundred -- to -- excuse me -- to 20,000 registered voters with Chinese surnames, to tell them about the bilingual ballot availability. We've designed script for the elections office for their poll worker training so that they are able to educate their poll workers about Section 203 and also some of the questions that voters may have on the polling day. And the video was watched by all 3,000 of the King County's schoolworkers and judges.

We've conducted poll worker surveys to find out their impression of interactions between poll workers, since a lot of them have -- most of the poll workers, at least that I've witnessed, are not minorities, and so we wanted to get impressions from some of the minority poll workers in terms of their interactions, and also the training that they received. And we also sent out mass mailings to over 8,000 families requesting assistance for bilingual poll workers to recruit them for the important job on election day.

So these projects and outreach efforts have made voting -- legal voting -- accessible for the English limited proficient community in King County. And our work with the elections office started with 278 voters that requested bilingual assistance. And that number's grown to 1,415, so we still are small in the numbers, just emphasizing the need for outreach in our community. I guess it's sort of been a work in process and we've had a couple years to strengthen this program, but we have had instances where we've run into miscommunication at the polling sites as well as other problems surrounding written materials, on-line materials, and oral language assistance.

In particular there was no effort from the elections office to recruit bilingual poll workers and it remained inconsistent. Also, once they were recruited, they weren't sent to the targeted sites where help was most needed.

In addition, voters were unable to identify bilingual poll workers at polling sites. They didn't know who to go to when help was needed. And we addressed this at several of our poll monitoring projects in King County.

In terms of our on-line assessment of materials, many of the different things posted on the Secretary of State Web site were translated incorrectly. We found that the Secretary of State would use software which translated English directly into Chinese using English syntax, so it didn't make any sense, so it was just gobbledygook, I guess you could say, and so when someone tried to read information on-line, they wouldn't weren't able to. And when we talked to the Secretary of State about this issue, they took it off their Web site and they never put anything else back on, because they thought that they weren't required to do any type of translation and the translation they did do was out of courtesy for the community. And this was also evident in the Korean community as well.

And the Secretary of State also translates the voter pamphlets every, I think, other year, and then King County will translate it. They share the translation responsibility and the printing responsibility. And when they did translations, we also found a lot of different problems with the translations and had -- which caused a delay in sending out of the Chinese mail ballots, so folks that voted with the bilingual ballots got their ballots later, meaning that less people had a chance to turn them in and, therefore, vote for candidates of their choice.

We found that in many of the polling sites a lot of poll workers did not know or were unaware of where to put signs, you know, which way was up, which way was down, in terms of Chinese characters, so things were all in the wrong places. They also had Chinese language ballots that were still sort of in the shrink-wrap on the table or underneath the table, and weren't visible for folks to look at.

We also found, because the County didn't have a way to track or to send out bilingual voter materials in the beginning, we've had voters that would receive Chinese language ballots for primary election, but when the general election came around, they didn't get the Chinese ballot and they'd call the elections office multiple times to request the materials, and it just never came. So finally they'd have to go into the elections office themselves to pick things up, which made it difficult for many people, and thus, discouraging them to go out and vote even though they were registered. We also found just numerous translation issues that we've struggled with.

And the other thing that I wanted to talk about was just reminding us about some of the state initiatives and -- state initiatives that have been passed to try to make voting harder for immigrant communities. In Seattle we have initiative 313, if passed -- this is a current legislation, that voters can vote on in the general election. If passed, the aggressive initiative would require voters provide proof of citizenship, telephone number, occupation, former residence, and evidence -- different evidence pieces in order to vote. So consequently we'd see that immigrants and refugees, many who are already fearful of, you know, providing information to the government, would be discouraged from voting. Also, last year our Senate Bill 5499 on Section 7 required additional identification upon every visit to the polling site, making this process tedious and repetitive for no apparent reason. This would increase the wait time during voting and also encourages voters to leave polling sites without voting. Unfortunately the Senate Bill was approved in May 2005. And those are the two sort of big legislative piece that we've seen affect the community.

And each time we conduct poll monitoring, we always run into poll monitors and judges that are exceptionally rude and harass poll workers and they always question why there is a need for bilingual assistance. I mean, I've observed, personally, poll workers intimidate voters by making side comments like, you know, why don't you read English or, if a poll -- if a bilingual person comes up and needs extra assistance or extra time to fill out a ballot, poll workers will not be patient with them. And also we've had some elderly poll workers just mention that this is just not -- that the hostile environment makes it difficult to vote. And I think those -- our poll monitoring just shows us a lot, we're at the polls, and we do see things happen every day.

In general, the Coalition, though, is confident that the Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act has helped King County. Many of these instances that I've mentioned happened throughout the past two years. However, our agenda's always full of advocacy items when we do talk to the elections office.

We wanted to just really emphasize the need for Section 203 in our community and we hope that the Commission continues to advocate for its reapproval in 2007.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Siah. Now we'll hear from Rosalind Gold of NALEO.

MS. GOLD: Thank you. Chairman Lee, commissioners, fellow panelists and invited guests, I'm Rosalind Gold. I'm the senior director of policy research and advocacy, with the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials, which is NALEO Educational Fund. And I also want to thank the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law for inviting me to testify today.

The issue that this hearing is addressing is very, very critical for our community and we really welcome the opportunity to share information that we have gained from over two decades of work with the Latino community in California.

The NALEO Educational Fund is a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization and our mission is to empower Latinos to participate fully in the American political process on the full spectrum from citizenship to public service. Our constituency includes the more than 6,000 Latino elected and appointed officials nationwide, and about one-fifth of them are Californians. So, you know, California's a very, very critical state for Latino political progress in Latino political participation. In 2001 we launched our Voces del Pueblo program, which is a comprehensive effort to mobilize Latino voters across the country who do not yet fully participate in the electoral process. And through our Voces program, we've conducted several voter forums in California, and we've also done mobilization where we've reached more than 350,000 California Latinos with motivational and informational materials through the media, through the phone, and through the mail.

And our Voces program also includes a national bilingual voter information hot line called VE-Y-VOTA or come and vote which has provided assistance to more than 1,300 callers since September 2004, including about 3,500 in California.

Most recently, in the May 2005 municipal elections that were held in Los Angeles, we conducted a survey and monitoring of 89 polling sites to evaluate their accessibility to Latino and other language minority voters. And through all of our mobilization and our Voces activities, we've really gained valuable knowledge about the barriers Latinos face in voting and registration. Although the written testimony that I'll be submitting will cover a wider range of issues than my spoken testimony to you today, I just want to focus on what we've learned through our voter engagement programs about the importance of the language provisions of the Voting Rights Act, the importance of the Latino participation, the challenges Latinos have experienced in obtaining that assistance in California, and the impact on their ability to participate.

First of all, just some basic information about coverage of the Voting Rights Act, Section 203, and other language assistance, Section 4, for Spanish in California. The entire state is covered for Spanish under the Voting Rights Act. And under Section 203, 25 of the state's 58 counties must provide a language assistance in Spanish to voters. That's only 25 out of 58 counties, but those 25 counties are home to 95 percent of the state's Latino population. So, essentially, every -- virtually every Latino in California really lives in a county that's covered under Section 203 for Spanish.

With regard to the language ability of California Latinos, according to data from the Census 2000, about 15 percent, which is a little bit over more than 1 out of 7 of California Latino adult U.S. citizens, report that they have limited proficiency in the English language. And that's about 419,000 Latinos in the state.

When we look at what we've learned from our voter engagement activities, again, we really believe that the language assistance required under the Voting Rights Act is critical to ensure that Latinos can surmount the barriers to political participation in the state. And when we look at this assistance, we really see that it's important that it be provided at all stages of the voting and registration process.

You know, many folks just focus on the informational materials that are provided in the polling booth. But when we look at the process of being able to participate, you need a certain set of skills to sort of navigate the electoral bureaucracy, just to get registered to vote, just to get information about voting, and it's very important that language assistance be provided in all of those stages.

For example, some of the callers to our VE-Y-VOTA hot line reported that they had problems obtaining information about voter registration or resolving registration problems. And they couldn't obtain assistance in Spanish when they would call up phone numbers established by election officials. They would call the local election office or the number that would be publicized by election officials and they were told that there was no one available to help them in Spanish. Other callers were just put on hold until they could try to find somebody who would speak Spanish. Other callers, the minute they asked for assistance in Spanish, basically, they just got hung up on. So, like I said, it's really important even at the initial contact that folks have with the electoral process that the requirements of Section 203 are complied with.

From our work we also found that these kinds of challenges also confronted Latinos in the voting booth in election day 2004. And, again, what we learned is that Latino voters with limited-English proficiency have real challenges casting ballots because they can't get Spanish language voting informational materials. Also, in some cases, and this is very similar to what Debbie found in Kings County, they were found that there were no bilingual poll workers available to help them. We've also had reports from Spanish-speaking voters that they were treated rudely or they were ignored by poll workers.

When we've talked to Latino voters at some of our informational forums -- you know, there's a real sense that, if you need language assistance in Spanish in some polling sites, the poll workers treat you like a problem voter. You're seen as a problem. You need more time. They have to go to extra steps to take care of you. And that poll workers are less amicable and more impatient with Spanish-speaking voters and they do not get the same quality of assistance as English-speaking voters.

When we actually surveyed polling cites in the 2005 Los Angeles municipal elections, we also found some problems with the availability of Spanish language informational materials. About 15 percent of the polling sites did not have Spanish language sample ballots available, and a larger percentage also lacked other important informational forms materials.

For example, in California the Secretary of State puts out a Voters Bill of Rights, which is supposed to be available at every polling place under the Help America Vote Act. There is just supposed to be basic information about your rights as a voter that is available at the polling place. About one-third of the sites that we surveyed didn't have Spanish language Voter Bill of Rights. About one-half of the sites had -- lacked Spanish language information on provisional voting and 80 percent of the sites had no information on how to contact election officials if you had complaints or concerns.

The NALEO Educational Fund strongly supports the reauthorization of all of the Voting Rights Act provisions that are up for renewal, because we believe they're critical to ensure that the state's growing Latino electorate become fall participants in California's democracy. Certainly we have seen progress in terms of Latino participation in California. For example, if we look in November 1992 presidential election, there were about 1.1 million Latino voters. Compared to November 2004, that number almost doubled to reach 2.1 million. We also know, if we look at just the number of Latino elected officials, in 1984 there may be in California about 400 or so. That number is now topping a thousand. But we really have a lot more progress to make and a lot more challenges to face.

For example, if we look at the last presidential election, Latinos were 31 percent of the states' adult U.S. citizen population, but they were only 16 percent of the actual voters who went to the polls. And we know, generally, even though the numbers of Latino voters continue to rise, the participation, the percentage of Latinos who are actually getting to the polls of the citizen population still is staying between 40 to 50 percent of adult Latino citizens who are actually getting out and voting.

And the language assistance provisions are also particularly important because of the critical role that Latino naturalized citizens play in the state. According to 2000 Census data, while naturalized Latinos are about 40 percent of all adult citizen Latinos, naturalized Latinos are 80 percent of those who are not fully proficient in English. Yet we know from our experiences working that Latino naturalized are a growing segment of the overall Latino electorate and they're very eager to participate in the electoral process.

In 1996 Latino naturalized citizens were about 25 percent or about one out of four Latino voters in California were naturalized citizens. In 2004, they were about 31 percent, nearly one out of three of Latino voters. Ensuring that these voters continue to obtain the language assistance required by the Voting Rights Act is really the key to the future growth and vitality of the Latino electorate in California.

When Congress first extended the protections of the Voting Rights Act to Latinos and other language minorities in 1975, Congress recognized that lack of access to educational opportunities and limited-English proficiency prevented minorities from exercising their fundamental right to vote.

It's 30 years later and we acknowledge that our community have, indeed, made significant progress, but we still confront barriers in making our voices heard on election day. Reauthorization of the provisions of the Voting Rights Act that are up for renewal will not only ensure that our communities can surmount those barriers, but it will strengthen our democracy and ensure that it's responsive to all of the citizens in our state and in our nation. Thank you for the opportunity to testify.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Gold. Now, at this point, we're going to have -- Jonah is going to read some testimony that will be received from Hawaii.

MR. GOLDMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My name is Jonah Goldman. I'm with the Voter Rights Project for the Lawyers' Committee. I have two testimonies to read, both coming from Hawaii. The first one comes from Wing Tek Lum, who is the cochair of the Voter Registration Committee for the Chinese Community Action Coalition in Honolulu. The subject of the testimony is actually about mail-in voting. And the reason why it's appropriate for this commission is because -- Wing Tek Lum suggests that it's because of the language barriers that -- that Chinese voters encounter in voting in the -- rather, voting in Honolulu, is the reason why his organization suggests that most voters should be voting by mail instead of voting in the polling place, at least most Chinese voters.

"Chinese Community Action Coalition operates programs directed towards Chinese immigrants: A citizenship tutorial, voter registration, and a candidates forum. For the past five election years it has conducted drives to help citizens in Chinatown register to vote and/or apply for absentee ballots. In 2004 it served nearly 600 registrants, a 40 percent increase from the previous election year.

"Chinatown's immigrants primarily come from parts of Asia lacking traditions of democratic elections and voting. Nonetheless, after arriving in America they have worked hard to become citizens, especially passing the citizenship exam, and are now proud to exercise their voting franchise. In addition, once they have discovered Voting by Mail, they make sure they reapply for this friendly method in subsequent years.

"Voting by Mail encourages voting especially by immigrants, the elderly, the disabled, and those who may not be able to easily take off work to go to their polling places on election day. By voting at home voters feel freer to consult with family and friends, are able to deliberate on whom to vote for without rushing, and can carefully make sure that the actual casting of the ballots are without mistakes which would validate their votes. Furthermore, the Chinese translation to the absentee ballot instructions, which CCAC initiated in 1996, but which is now being undertaken by the City Clerk, provides an extra measure of assistance to those voters who do not feel confident about their English language ability.

"More and more voters are realizing that Voting by Mail is both convenient and reliable. However, state laws and regulations could be even more application friendly. Three suggestions are as follows:

"Number one, at present, although Deputy Voter Registrars may collect and deliver to the City Clerk on behalf of registrants the application for voter registration, they cannot do the same for the absentee ballot application; only the registrant himself can personally send in or deliver his own absentee ballot application. However, many new registrants wish to apply for both at the same time. Also, those already registered may feel it easier to apply for absentee ballots if a Deputy Voter Registrar assists in the delivery. Since the Deputy Voter Registrars are already under oath to obey all laws with respect to the collection and delivery of voter registration applications, they should be entrusted under the same oath to collect and deliver absentee ballot applications.

"At present, absentee ballot applications must be applied for each election year, primarily because this method of voting was initially established to accommodate travelers. But now more nontraveling voters want to take advantage by Voting by Mail in their homes, not just once but in each election year. Accordingly, Voting by Mail should be a right which after the first request is automatically carried over to subsequent election years. "Number three, at present, absentee ballot applications can be received by the City Clerk no earlier than 60 days prior to the primary election. Yet the City Clerk now sends its yellow postcards notifying voters of their polling places and election districts in the spring; at that time many voters begin thinking about the voting process and have wanted to make sure that they are able to apply for Voting by Mail early. They should be accommodated by allowing the City Clerk to receive absentee ballot applications up to 180 days prior to the primary election."

The second testimony, Mr. Chairman, is from Patricia McManaman, who is an attorney and the Chief Executive Officer of Na Loio, which is Immigrant Rights and Public Interest Legal Center, also in Honolulu.

"Founded in 1983, Na Loio is a nonprofit legal services association that provides free legal services for indigent immigrants, simple advice and counsel, community education and advocacy in the public interest. Over the past six years Na Loio has gathered anecdotal information regarding voting procedures and on several occasions has submitted complaints to election officials or spoken with the press concerning voting irregularities. Those irregularities include:

"In the late 1990s, polling sites in Hawaii Kai failed to post multilingual materials at the poll places. At one polling site, the worker expressed surprise when advised that the law required the posting of multilingual material. After spending several minutes searching her supply boxes, the poll worker found the materials and posted the same. In speaking with her, she noted that multilingual materials were not identified in English anywhere and she was, in fact, reluctant to post them not knowing with they were for. She called her office to verify the posting requirement. I, in turn, phoned in a formal complaint. When the Office of Elections returned my telephone call, I discussed the matter with them for several other calls. I suggested they place an English translation of the limited-English proficient materials in a prominent place to provide notice to English speakers and to create a check-off box on the set-up sheet to note that all the multilingual materials had been posted. They did not appear to welcome my suggestions. "In early 2000, I again visited one of the Hawaii Kai polling stations and noted that the station workers had failed to post a multilingual informational piece on a hotly contested constitutional amendment question, despite an order from the Hawaii Supreme Court directing all polling stations to post the specified materials. When the matter was brought to the attention of the poll captain, the materials were posted. "In 2003, I contacted city and county officials regarding my daughter's absentee ballots. The election was rapidly approaching and she had not received the same. She is attending school in Canada and it normally takes an excess of ten days for mail to reach her. She was eventually able to vote by phone, but only because I was here to facilitate the same and was quite adamant in my request that she be allowed to vote. My daughter is part Japanese. Hawaii law needs to be amended to allow earlier mail out of absentee ballots to ensure that those who live abroad or in remote areas of the United States have the ability to cast a timely ballot. "Thank you for your work on behalf of voting rights. Sincerely, Patricia McManaman." Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well read, Jonathan.

MR. GOLDMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

CHAIRMAN LEE: We'll start the questioning with Commissioner Rogers.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Yes, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Hispanics, as a percentage of California's population, are what percentage?

MS. GOLD: It's about a third.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: About a one-third of California's population is Hispanic? Of the third of the population of California that is Hispanic, what percentage of the population is undocumented or considered to be illegal?

MS. GOLD: You know, there's estimates that really range all over the place for that. So I really can't give you a precise number on that.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: What's the low and the high?

MS. GOLD: You know, I would want to get back to the commission on that.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Do you know that number, by chance? Robert, do you think that --

MR. RUBIN: The percentage of Latinos in California --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: -- who are considered to be undocumented or illegal, as a basis of the population.

MR. RUBIN: The raw number is anywhere between 2 to 3 million.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I've heard that number. I didn't know -- so, if it's 2 to 3 million Hispanics that are here and -- or Latinos that are here in California that are undocumented or illegal, what is the overall number of Hispanics that are in the State of California?

MR. RUBIN: It's about 30 percent of -- what do we have? -- 30 million?

MS. GOLD: You see, that would be a very high percentage. That would probably be between -- that would be about 10 percent of the Hispanic population, if that's the case.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: You're saying it's about 10 percent of the overall Hispanic population.

MS. GOLD: I'm sorry, excuse me. Hold on a minute.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I'm sorry, I don't mean -- I am -- I do mean to be specific, but I didn't want to put you on the spot too much. I thought you all might know those numbers.

MS. GOLD: Like I said, I would like to get back to you on specific ranges and percentages, if that would be okay.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Okay. It's helpful to answer one particular question because I know in California politics are often shaped by both immigrant-related issues as well as race issues and the power issues that we've talked about. And, given that California, obviously a border state, and Mexico, in particular, composing such a substantial portion of the Latino immigration population, and the undocumented or illegal immigration population that composes part of the state, how much does the issue, in terms of illegal immigration, undocumented workers or undocumented people here in this state, in particular, impact issues related to voting and voting rights under both provisions related to Section 203 and Section 5?

MS. GOLD: Um --

MR. RUBIN: Well, I mean --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I'm asking you all these questions -- you all look a little bit irritated by the question, but I'm asking you the question because I am trying to get a sense from you all to try to understand about the impact of issues related to undocumented and illegal folks who are here in the United States, in particular from Mexico, as that relates to issues related to Section 203 and Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. I don't see how we can talk about this issue without also talking about the fact that issues related to illegal immigrants in the United States is a significant issue as it relates to the politics of this state and issues related to voting rights in particular.

MS. GOLD: I think that the issues regarding undocumented immigration certainly have played an overall role in shaping the discussion in the state on immigrant integration and the impact of things that are done to assist immigrants in integrating into California society. So that, in some cases, people who are very ignorant about the Voting Rights Act and the history of the Voting Rights Act, think that Section 203 -- they have misinformation that Section 203 somehow provides undocumented immigrants with the right to vote or some -- I actually saw an editorial in the "L.A. Times" where someone was claiming that, because of Section 203, U.S. citizens, Latino U.S. citizens didn't have to learn English as part of the naturalization process. So, on one hand, the dialogue and the discussion about illegal immigration sadly and unfortunately feeds into a lot of misconceptions and a lot of misunderstandings about the Voting Rights Act.

Another challenge, and Robert really was very articulate about this, if you look at signposts of discrimination against Latinos and Asians in California, and you're looking for ways to gauge how that comes out in public discourse, a lot of the discussion of illegal immigration serves as a pretext for people to really express racially discriminatory or ethnically discriminatory attitudes. So that is another way that the discourse on undocumented immigration plays a role as we go forward with our work on the Voting Rights Act and as we look at the history of discrimination against Latinos and Asians in California. I think it's very, very critical that as we work to talk to the public about the Voting Rights Act that we dispel these myths, that we really address exactly what the Voting Rights Act does. Talk about exactly why Congress thought the Voting Rights Act act was a good idea and extending those predictions to Latinos and Asians with language minorities -- so, yes, this is something we're going to have to face as we move forward. But, you know, it's not -- even though it's very much a hot button issue in states that, you know, have borders with Mexico or states that are high immigrant population states, this is really an issue that we're going to have to have a discourse in, in any place where there are merging language minority community. And, again, I think what we're going to really need to do is to stay focused on why we have Section 203 in the Voting Rights Act and what the purpose is and how it brings down barriers for democracy -- democratic participation.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: And I certainly don't disagree with any of that, but I'm begging the question -- forgive me for being piercing about it, but I am trying to get the distinction. Because, again, it seems to me that the issue of -- in particular of illegal immigration or undocumented folks here in this state in particular as it impacts issues which you've just mentioned, for example, misunderstanding, related to the application of the Voting Rights Act or Section 203.

When you talk about issues related to discrimination, as it relates to Latinos in California, can you draw a distinction between individuals who may have a problem with undocumented or illegal immigration versus problems with Latinos period? Or do you simply say that, if you have a problem with folks based upon issues related to undocumented or illegal immigration, that you also have a problem related to the issues related to Latinos as a whole? Or can they be separated?

You seemed to suggest, Mr. Rubin, earlier that they could not be separated; that an individual, for example, if you had a problem with illegal immigration or if you had a problem with folks being undocumented, that you would also have a problem with Latinos, period.

MR. RUBIN: Well, first of all, I am fascinated by the discussion, not irritated, so, if I was the provocation for your comment about irritated look, it's maybe a wrinkle in my brow that's -- that doesn't reflect my mood.

I think these are compelling issues. What I meant to say, if I didn't, is that I believe that that is how the issue is perceived. I would not say that that is how the issue must be seen. I think that there is a legitimate difference between someone who might have a legitimate concern about illegal immigration versus somebody who is flat out racist towards Latinos.

At the same time I will tell you that that line gets blurred quite a bit. And, frankly, we have experienced political leadership in this state that likes to blur that line. And when a governor in 1994 is running on a campaign in which his primary ad is his video of these grainy -- this grainy video of brown faces flooding across a highway and saying, "They're coming," that plays on fears the same way that Jesse Helm's famous ad shown in North Carolina played on fears of, they're coming and they're coming to take your jobs away, because that was exactly what was going on.

We were in a deep recession at the time here in 1994 and there was this sense, amazingly bought by the California electorate, that the reason that we were in the rescission is because the undocumented were taking their jobs. Well, those were jobs in aerospace and the defense industry, which were downsizing. I don't think that's where we found populations -- heavy populations among the undocumented, yet that was the sense that was left. And so, to answer the question again -- I'm a civil rights attorney, I'm not an a sociologist, but I do spend a lot of time actually around immigrant issues as well as voting rights issues, and I will tell you that a lot of the woes of this state, including voting fraud, has been laid at the feet of undocumented and, by association, Latinos.

And so that, when people talk about voting fraud, they're saying, well, can't these Latinos use all the documents that they have, that they get all their free welfare benefits, as if -- can't they also be used to vote? And so we have, you know, voting fraud that sort of clouds, I think, voter access issues, again being laid at the feet of Latinos.

MS. GOLD: And just as a quick follow-up, I mean, I certainly think that it is possible, in the abstract, to have a discourse on -- a public policy discourse -- on the impact of undocumented immigration in places like California, that is completely free from racial or ethnic discriminatory undertones or overtones. But I would sadly say from our experience looking at the type of public outreach and ads that were done in Proposition 187, looking at some other propositions that have been before the state, looking at the discussion of other public policy issues affecting immigration in California, we have found, you know, a very, very narrow group of people who engage in that dialogue in a way that separates it from issues of anti-Latino or anti-Asian sentiment.

MR. RUBIN: In our voting rights litigation -- I think I may have mentioned this -- some of the strongest exogenous elections demonstrating racial polarized voting are the 187, the denial of education to immigrant children, and 225, the bilingual education initiative, both of which passed overwhelmingly. So that tells you something about how charged and how racially charged issues around immigrants are.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: No doubt about it. Thank you very much.

MR. DAVIDSON: Could I interject a question here?

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Please.

MR. DAVIDSON: I grew up, for the most part, in southern New Mexico, in a little community that was about half Hispanic and half Anglo. And back in those days, the word "wetback" was bandied around by the Anglos, and it was a common term of derogation, somewhat along the lines of "nigger," that was sometimes meant to talk about undocumented people and at other times just a common term of derogation that was focused on Hispanics in general. And I wonder, is there still a language of that sort that you encounter today that blurs that distinction between undocumented people and Hispanics, or is that pretty much a relic of the past?

MR. RUBIN: I would certainly not condemn it to a relic of the past as much as I'd like to. I think it's alive and well. I think the language -- I mean, we deal with a lot of issues in our office around harassment in schools, racially hostile atmospheres, and so we deal with issues where kids, fellow students, are using those kinds of epithets toward each other in environments in which the schools aren't doing anything about it. It's a separate legal issue, but it does speak to your point as to whether or not those racially charged items are still used. Sadly, I would say that it's not always Anglo against kids of color. It is oftentimes, you know, black against brown, brown against Asian. But, no, it is, unfortunately, not on the dust bins of history.

MS. GOLD: I can't speak specifically to language or terms that are used, but I know that, in general, Latinos encounter incredible confusion about the fact that there's enormous diversity in the Latino community with respect to immigration status. You've got everything from people who have been here for six to seven to eight generations to folks who are undocumented, to folks who have gone through the citizenship process, to folks who are legal permanent residents, to folks who are otherwise authorized to work, you know, to folks who are here, you know, from Central America, from other Latin American countries and, you know, there's just, in some cases, an assumption that if you are Latino, you are an immigrant and, you know, we've had Latino elected officials who, like I said, have been here for five or six generations and get told that, why don't you go back to Mexico where you came from. It's heard very commonly.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, I think it's a fascinating subject that I'm not sure we're going to fully address. I would note that there's a school of thought that our immigration laws came into existence as a way to deal with the problem of the Chinese in California. There was a time when the most popular slogan in San Francisco is that the Chinese had to go, and it was California -- California Congressional delegation that was very big on establishing immigration naturalization services as a way to deal with the Chinese problem in California -- Northern California, I would add. Talking about enlightened parts of the state.

So I'm not sure that it's something we could solve today, but it is pretty interesting to hear testimony about the fact that you said, 50 percent of the undocumented population was actually Western European?

MR. RUBIN: Are -- actually are overstays, and the majority of the overstays. Mexicans typically do not come in with visas.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, when we talked about the undocumented, we are thinking of a brown population.

MR. RUBIN: Yeah.

COMMISSIONER LEE: Is that factually correct?

MR. RUBIN: No, no, it's not. And I think another thing, another misperception is that people stay undocumented. I mean, probably when we were litigating 187, which blessfully never did go into effect because we did tie it up in the courts in 1994, we dealt a lot with the sociological and demographic experts on that. And they were telling us that upwards of 60 to 70 percent of all documented persons lived in what we call mixed families. That is, they had citizen brothers and sisters or permanent residents who were mothers and fathers. And so what that tells us is, maybe undocumented today, but legal tomorrow.

But this is a thornier issue and there's some legislation pending in Congress on immigration, but that's obviously for another subject. One other point I would make, unless people do want to continue on the immigration point, is a fairly positive note, which is how civil rights laws have tended to have a salutory effect on immigration laws. And I would note that it was in 1965, at the height of civil rights legislation, that the Immigration Act of 1965 was enacted. The significance of that is that the -- prior to the Immigration Act of 1965, you had national origins quotas and those quotas were based on the existing population of the United States, which, of course, was heavily influenced by discriminatory policies of the previous 150 years, which favored white Western Europeans. So those national origin quotas basically allowed the Irish and the British and the Italians to come in, and they discriminated greatly against Latinos and Asians. As a result --

CHAIRMAN LEE: They discriminated also against Eastern Europeans and Southern Europeans.

MR. RUBIN: Yes. Thank you for reminding us of that, particularly since my family comprises some of those Eastern Europeans.

And, it was in that same mood of, you know, the 1964 Civil Rights Act, that this immigration law was passed. So I would say that civil rights laws have tended to have that positive impact and have brought along the debate in immigration, which is so charged on a racial basis, as is, of course, the mainstream civil rights issues.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, implicit in what -- some of what Commissioner Rogers was asking is, should Section 203 deal with this issue of immigration? I don't know if you were asking that. It had occurred to me during your colloquy that, but -- but, you know, it's a rather common phenomenon for people to say, oh, yeah, they're just undocumented and try to dismiss the need for 203.

MR. RUBIN: Well, I'm not sure exactly what it's done. I think that there is attention, and I think Commissioner Rogers asked about it in the earlier panel, which is, does it serve as a disincentive to immigrant families learning -- not immigrant families, of course -- recently naturalized families, immigrant families to their desire to learn English.

I've spent the better part of 25 years working with immigrant families as well as in the area of voting rights. I've never met an immigrant family that didn't want to desperately learn English as fast as they possibly could. They see the advantages that the kids have over the parents because the kids typically are more fluent in English and they desperately want to learn English.

And so I think that we need not fear that the extension of 203 would serve as a disincentive to anybody's desire or willingness to learn to speak English.

MS. GOLD: I would not only want to echo that particular point, but again, go back to Congress's initial intent with creating Section 203 and extending the protections of the Voting Rights Act to language minorities. Actually, Congress really heard testimony about the challenges that many different groups face in terms of educational opportunities, not only immigrant but native born.

So, for example, one of the largest group of language groups that get coverage under Section 203 are native Americans, who are arguably definitely not immigrants, and what Congress had in mind, really, was looking at what kind of educational opportunities do both the native born have in the United States and the fact that people lack access to educational opportunities, as well as the educational opportunities that are available to immigrants. So that, for example, in some of the states that have Latinos who have been living, you know, born in the United States, have very, very poor educational systems, where students may be born in the U.S., but they still are experiencing challenges in being fully proficient in English, even after going through the U.S. educational system. I think that we want to really keep that idea in mind in Section 203 of the challenges that both the native born and immigrants have in terms of access to educational opportunities.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Ms. Siah, I was wondering if in your work in King County have you encountered some of the issues we've been talking about?

MS. SIAH: Sure. A lot of people respond very negatively to Section 203. When we sent out mailings to different -- to registered voters, we have a lot of people sending things back that say, you should speak English to vote, very negative sentiments. And I think, as my fellow panelists, I agree with them, that it's very hard to differentiate when someone sees that you look different, that they can't tell whether you're an immigrant or not, and there is really no way -- unless -- I mean unless you talk to them, there really is no way to find out.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: I would like to ask any of the panelists who want to respond to this, I remember reading recently in the newspaper that a congressman from, I believe, Georgia -- he called himself a conservative Republican -- said he was going to vote in favor of renewal of Section 5, but he simply could not bring himself to vote for the renewal of Section 203 simply because he believed that, in order to -- in order to vote, one ought to be able to speak and read the English language and that that should be a minimal qualification for casting a ballot. And I would just like to hear any response you might have to that obviously sincerely made argument.

MR. RUBIN: Well, I would just take a first crack at it and that my brief answer is, I would invite him to take a look at some of the California ballots that some of us native English speakers have trouble wading through. The ability to speak and understand English is one thing. The ability to read and understand complex legal jargon, oftentimes in the kinds of initiatives that we have on the California ballot, is --

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: I gather there's a proposition now before the voters that's rather daunting to make sense of.

MR. RUBIN: Many.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Pardon?

MR. RUBIN: There are six, I think. [Voices in background.] Eight?

MS. GOLD: And, in addition, both to the point that Robert made, and Conny McCormack also had addressed this point, talking about the complexity of our ballot, again, we also look at the level of English you need to navigate the election bureaucracy. That's not just a basic level of English that's required to basically get along in day-to-day affairs, but to really try to talk about complex things like, you know, what do I have to do when I have to change my address in the voter registration forms, and a lot of just the bureaucratic navigation skills and abilities that require a higher language -- much higher language proficiency than basic speaking and writing English.

MS. SIAH: And in King County we've seen that many of the people requesting bilingual assistance and bilingual ballots are elderly, so many of them naturalized when they were quite a bit older, and learning a second language to the degree that you do need to learn would be very, very difficult for them.

And we also remind folks that, you know, language ability is something -- it's something that a person has difficulty overcoming, especially when they're a lot older, just as a person's eyesight gets worse as they get older, yet we still provide assistance for folks who have difficulty reading the ballot. Well, you know, if you go to a polling site, someone will go with you into the polling booth and read the ballot for you word for word for you if you have bad vision. However, we feel that's the same disability that someone has as a person that can't read or write English as well as they'd want to.

MS. GOLD: And this is actually recognized in our naturalization law, that most of legal, permanent residents have to show basic proficiency in English in order to become a U.S. citizen. But if you're elderly and you have long-standing permanent residency, you're allowed to take the civics part of the citizenship exam in your native language.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Question for both Ms. Gold and Ms. Siah. Do you have copies of your prepared testimony that you'll give to the commission here?

MS. GOLD: I will be submitting it. I do not have it, but I will be submitting it.

MS. SIAH: I will be submitting it, as well.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: To your point, Mr. Rubin, about the complexity -- well, your point and the point made by others about the complexity of our election materials, actually, I think it might be useful for you to see what a California voter pamphlet looks like. I think the last one I saw was about a hundred pages long. And I assumed that the upcoming one's going to be way longer. Do you have any spare voting voter pamphlets?

MR. RUBIN: I think you lost your opportunity with Ms. McCormack.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Maybe we can follow-up with her, because I think it actually would be interesting. The complexity point is actually a pretty good one, when you see what our ballot pamphlets are like.

MR. RUBIN: You should get one from the general election, though, not the special election because, I mean, eight initiatives is light action. I mean, we can have upwards of 20, 25 initiatives, plus a full slate of candidate elections.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Okay. Any more questions?

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: No, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

MR. RUBIN: Can I make one other comment back on -- I'm sorry, do you have a question?

I just had one other comment that I wanted to make on -- sort of back on voting rights issues or more traditional ones, which is that I know Joaquin Avila talked a little bit about it, but I think that it should be emphasized that the California Legislature, just a few years ago, recognized the ongoing problem with racially polarized voting in at-large election systems, and noted that upwards of 80 percent of all local jurisdictions conduct their elections pursuant to an at-large system.

As a result of the combination of those two factors, that prevalence of at-large systems with racially polarized voting, it enacted this California Voting Rights Act that we've already filed two cases under, as we speak. But I think that that recognition is important and I would hope that, whoever the emissary is from this commission to the Congress and the powers that be that are going to be considering the reauthorization, should take that, because I think that -- because it comes from a somewhat unsuspected place because people don't feel that California is Alabama or Mississippi. I think it may come with, you know, clothed in that much more credibility than California -- the California legislature has recognize this ongoing problem associated with at-large election systems and the evil of racially polarized voting.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, Mr. Rubin, if you can't provide the voter pamphlet, can you provide the findings underlying the California Voting Rights Act?

MR. RUBIN: That I can.

CHAIRMAN LEE: I think it might be helpful. Thank you. Thank you panelists, Ms. Gold, Ms. Siah, Mr. Rubin.

MR. RUBIN: Thank you very much.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Reverend, would like to testify?

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: I just want to observe that, it appears to me that, many of the problems of this and other societies, is a problem of race. We're all a part of the human race. We have a certain tendency, I think, with respect to my state, that you take the worst characteristics of the -- of the given element of the population and attribute them to the whole ethnic group. That seems to be a really common human practice.

I am sure there must be an element of that in this area of discussion, which is one reason I'm thankful the Bill of Rights guarantees our individual rights, regardless of the degree of prejudice it makes against us, ethnically. And I see, when we talked about voting rights, that question -- the tendency -- of human tendency to attribute, if you're Hispanic, that means you're an undocumented alien. If you're Middle Eastern, you're probably a terrorist. That tendency is there, but it should not impact the law in terms of the right of people to vote. It seems to me that's true of the language requirement, as well as Section 5. Thank you. End of testimony. Thank you very much.

CHAIRMAN LEE: You can testify whenever you want.

MR. RUBIN: I'd only respond that, other than with regard to the right to vote, our founding fathers did find it appropriate that most of our protections do apply to persons, not citizens, and so the discussion that we're having here, with regard to due process, equal protection under the laws, applies to persons without regard to immigration status. And we are thankful for that.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Do you have a response, Commissioner Buchanan?

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: No. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, panelists. We're going to be taking a short break for about ten minutes.

(Recess taken.)

CHAIRMAN LEE: Okay. We're going to get started with the third and last panel of today's hearing. We thought there would be four, but we've collapsed them into three. Carolyn Fowler has graciously consented to be on the third panel. I'll introduce the panelists. Eun Sook Lee is executive director of the National Korean American Service and Education Consortium. The Consortium was founded in 1994 to protect a progressive Korean-American voice on critical civil rights issues through education, organizing and advocacy. Previously, Ms. Lee was the executive director of Korean-American Women in Need, a bilingual domestic violence service agency. She's also a board member of a lot of organizations, which I won't read. But welcome.

Eugene Lee is a staff attorney at -- in the Voting Rights Project of the Asian Pacific-American Legal Center. Eugene Lee has work deals with API voters, overseeing poll monitoring efforts, engaging in policy advocacy at the state, local, and federal levels. And Mr. Lee works with many local and state coalitions focused on promoting access and participation in elections, and provides training to community-based organizations on the language assistant provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

The Asian Pacific-American Legal Center is now the country's largest organization focused on providing multilingual, culturally sensitive legal services, education and civil rights support for one of the nation's fastest growing populations.

Kathay Feng is the executive director of California Common Cause. Under her leadership, Common Cause is taking a leading role in election and redistricting reform, government sunshine, and accountability laws, campaign finance reform, media access, and championing the voting rights of traditionally disenfranchised communities. Prior to joining Common Cause, Ms. Feng was the project director of Voting Rights of Hate Crimes in the Asian Pacific-American Legal Center, where she worked on a number of areas, including voting rights redistricting, hate crimes, police accountability, and antidiscrimination. Carolyn Fowler of Los Angeles is the -- is with the California Election Protection Network, an organization of over 300 organizations statewide. It's a bipartisan outfit that are working to ensure election integrity and security in the state of California. She's a founding member of that organization. She's also a member of the L.A. County Central Committee and a poll watcher and a member of the County Voter Outreach Committee. She is also a very public, spirited citizen of L.A. County and has been for many years. Welcome, panel. And, I believe we start with Eun Sook Lee.

MS. LEE: Good afternoon and thank you. Thank you to the members of the commission and the staff for inviting me to speak today. Let me begin with a brief introduction of my organization, the National Korean-American Service and Education Consortium, NAKASEC. We were established ten years ago as a consortium by local community centers that realized that only by coming together can we build a national movement and progressive Korean-American voice for social justice. Our issued priorities since our formation have been immigrant rights and immigration reform, as well as other major civil rights issues, including voting rights.

Hence, since the 1996 presidential elections, NAKASEC and our three affiliates in New York City, Los Angeles, and Chicago, have coordinated a multifaceted civic engagement and voter empowerment project that includes voter registration, voter assistance, voter education, voter mobilization, voter research, and voter rights advocacy. I'm here today to state our support for the reauthorization of the three key provisions of the Voting Rights Act that are scheduled to expire in August 2007.

Furthermore, we are seeking to see those provisions strengthen through the expansion of coverage. The Voting Rights Act is widely understood to be among our nation's most effective civil rights legislation. Key provisions authorizing the federal government to monitor polling places and, specifically, Section 203, which requires counties to provide multilingual materials and services to certain language minority groups, have been instrumental in enabling Asian Pacific-American voters to vote free from discrimination. As a result, the Voting Rights Act has contributed to the noticeable increase in the electoral participation of the Korean-American and Asian Pacific-American voting population. Korean-Americans are a minority population that now number more than 1.2 million, according to the 2000 Census. More than 70 percent or 865,000 are foreign born or immigrants. Finally, 72 percent of those who are 25 years or older, speak or read English not well. Moreover, in the major cities that Korean-Americans reside, the level of linguistic isolation that has been documented is considerable, ranging from 35 to 42 percent. Linguistic isolation means that, in a given household, all family members over the age of 14 years have some difficulty with the English language.

The short profile that I provide shows that, as a voting population, Korean-Americans are ethnic minority voters, immigrant voters, limited-English proficient voters, and new voters.

For this reason, Section 203, coupled with other provisions in the Act ensures that Korean-American voters are not discriminated and that language access is appropriately provided.

Currently the Korean language is covered in three counties: Los Angeles, Orange, and Queens County.

In speaking on the importance of continuing the provisions in the Voting Rights Act that will expire in 2007, we also know that we have yet to achieve full compliance. We base this statement on the decade of poll monitoring that we have conducted in New York and Los Angeles. The results are our poll monitoring efforts indicate that Korean-American voters will be discriminated against because they are minorities, foreign born, and limited-English proficient.

For example, during the 19- -- 2004 November elections, a precinct inspector at a polling place in Koreatown was documented to have given certain voters time limits and sent one Asian Pacific-American voter to the back of the line.

Broadly, the shortcomings have also included the failure of certain counties to translate all materials, to translate inaccurately, or not in a timely manner. And on election day, polling places have had too few interpreters or missing multilingual materials.

It is this reason that Asian Pacific-American organizations have worked with local candidates to advocate for full compliance, as well to donate their services to increase the number of poll workers or to review translated materials.

In short, our communities have developed strong working relationships with local counties, because we share the common goal of ensuring full access to minority voters.

As we approach the sunset date for key provisions in the Voting Rights Act, with regard to Section 203, we understand that there are several proposals to decrease the threshold for coverage from 10,000 voters to 7,500 or 5,000 voters.

Currently, Section 203 covers counties that have 5 percent or 10,000 voting age citizens who speak the same language, are limited-English proficient and, as a group, have a higher illiteracy rate than the national illiteracy rate.

In our opinion, measures that would allow counties to capture as many language minority voters as possible are both meaningful and necessary. For this reason, we reiterate our support for, first, the reauthorization of key provisions in the voting rights act, and second, we seek to strengthen these provisions by expansion of coverage for language minority voters under Section 203. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you very much, Ms. Eun Sook Lee. This is a nice panel. It's virtually impossible for me to mangle these names, since half of you is named Lee. Eugene Lee.

MR. LEE: Good afternoon. Thank you for inviting me to testify at this hearing. My name is Eugene Lee and I'm a staff attorney with the Asian Pacific-American Legal Center or APALC. APALC is affiliated with the National Asian Pacific-American Legal Center, or NAPALC, from Washington, D.C.

For over two decades APALC has engaged in community education, advocacy, and poll monitoring, to secure the rights of Asian Pacific-Americans, guaranteed by law. APALC sends poll monitors to polling sites throughout Los Angeles and Orange Counties during major elections, particularly in areas with significant API populations. Most recently, APALC monitored 60 poll sites for the March 2004 primary election and over 115 poll sites during the November 2004 general election. APALC uses the poll monitoring results to advocate for systemic performance and improvements for API voters.

In addition to its voting rights work, APALC conducts large-scale exit polls of voters in major elections. APALC also recently launched a series of demographic vote reports on API communities in California and in three Southern California counties. All four of these reports used this aggregated Census 2000 data to provide information on 20 API ethnic groups. Just a note before I go further, a lot of my testimony here today does include a lot of data and I note that I include further data in the written testimony that I'll submit after I'm finished. I'd first like to talk about the impact of Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act. In the 30 years since Section 203 was added to the Voting Rights Act, there have been substantial gains, both in API electoral representation, and also on levels of voting participation and voter registration. Many of these gains have occurred since Section 203 was amended in 1992, to add a numerical threshold for when a jurisdiction is covered by language assistance.

Talking about gains and API electoral representation, with the recent election of Ted Lieu to the State Assembly, there are now nine API state legislators in California. This stands in marked contrast with 1990, when that number was zero. One factor in the success has been Section 203, allowing limited-English proficient voters, or voters who speak English less than very well, to fully exercise their right to vote.

Eight of these nine legislators represent legislative districts located in counties that are covered under Section 203 for at least one Asian language. These seven counties represent all of the counties in California that are covered under Section 203 for an Asian language. Put differently, every county in California that is covered under Section 203 for an Asian language has at least one API legislator from a district in such county. These counties each have significant Asian-American populations that are limited-English proficient, ranging from San Francisco County, with the 34 percent Asian-American population that is 50 percent limited-English proficient, to San Diego County, with a 11 percent Asian-American population that is 32 percent limited-English proficient.

In California there have also been increases in both number of API registered voters and in API turnout. Again, language assistance under 203 has been a factor in this success. According to census data, the number of API registered voters has increased by 61 percent, from the November '98 election to the November 2004 election. In this same period, the number of API registered voters who vote has increased by 98 percent. Both of these increases have outpaced the increase in the overall API voting age population and also the overall API citizen voting age population.

I'd like to talk about the need for language assistance and Section 203 as an appropriate remedy for discrimination. Because of the high rates of limited-English proficiency among API voters and other language minority voters, the language assistance under 203 is an appropriate remedy for racial discrimination against such voters.

As Congress found in 1975, racial discrimination against such language minority voters has resulted in high illiteracy rates. This aggregated Census 2000 data indicates that the language minority in population in California does, indeed, have a high limited-English proficiency rate.

In California, the Asian-American population is nearly 40 percent limited-English proficient. A number of these groups are majority or near majority limited-English proficient or -- or LEP. I'll use that term now, LEP, as a shorthand for limited-English proficient, including Vietnamese at 62 percent, Korean at 52 percent, and Chinese at 48 percent. The Latino-American population is 43 percent LEP.

During major elections, APALC conducts exit polls, as I mentioned before. These poll results show that the LEP rate of API voters mirrors the LEP rate of the general API population. For example, in 2000 -- in November 2004, 40 percent of API voters surveyed in the exit poll indicated that they are LEP.

These exit poll results illustrate that language minority voters have a need for language assistance. These results also show that Section 203 is an appropriate remedy. Exit poll results show that many API and Latino voters in Los Angeles and Orange Counties would benefit from language assistance during the voting process. For example, in November 2000, 54 percent of API voters and 46 percent of the Latino voters indicated that they would be more likely to vote if they received language assistance.

Another measure of the appropriateness of Section 203 as a remedy is the number of voters who have requested language assistance. According to data tracked by the Los Angeles County Registrar of Voters, the total number of voters in L.A. County who have requested language assistance has increased by 38 percent from December '99 to August 2005. This increase reflects increased outreach by L.A. County. It also illustrates the reliance of language of minority voters on language assistance.

These data indicate that, because of voter outreach and education by both the county in Los Angeles and community advocates, many LEP API and Latino voters are using the Section 203 remedy. These data also indicate that, as a number of requests for language assistance increases, language minority voters have a continuing need for Section 203 assistance. In addition to Section 203, API voters and other language minority voters have benefited from the federal examiner and observer provisions contained in Section 6 through 9 of the Voting Rights Act.

Earlier this year, the Justice Department filed suit against three cities in Los Angeles County for alleged violations of Section

203. The Justice Department complaint against City of Rosemead, alleged that during its March 2004 primary election, the City failed to provide bilingual assistance to Latino, Chinese, and Vietnamese-American voters. The Justice Department's complaints against the Cities of Paramount and Azusa contain similar allegations with regard to bilingual assistance for Latino voters.

The Justice Department entered into consent agreements with each of these three cities that authorize federal observers to observe future elections held by the cities. These federal observers will help to ensure that LEP language minority voters in Rosemead, Paramount, and Azusa, and Rosemead, receive adequate language assistance under Section 203. Despite these gains and the protections of the Voting Rights Act, discrimination against language minority voters still occurs in the voting process. Evidence of this discrimination can be seen both in demographic research and anecdotes from poll monitoring efforts. I'd first like to talk about demographic efforts and again, I noted before that a lot of this testimony of is data heavy and I have -- again, it's in the written testimony that I'll submit later.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Commissioner Davidson likes data.

MR. LEE: That's great.

In 1975 Congress passed Section 203 after concluding that English-only elections and voting practices effectively denied a right to vote to a large segment of the nation's language minority population. Congress found that this result is directly attributable to the unequal educational opportunities afforded to language minorities, resulting in high illiteracy and low voting participation.

Current demographic data indicate that these discriminatory conditions, including unequal educational opportunities, still exists. Using high school completion as a measure, this aggregated Census 2000 data show that a number of Asian-American groups in California have low rates of education attainment, compared with the California population as a whole.

These data also show that Asian-Americans, as a whole, have lower rates of educational attainment than white Americans. For example, 36 percent of Vietnamese-Americans have less than a high school degree, compared with 23 percent of the overall California population. 19 percent of Asian-Americans, as a whole, have less than a high school degree, compared with 10 percent of white Californians.

These low rates of high school completion are a contributing factor to continuing high LEP rates among API children, defined as children age 17 years and younger. According to this aggregated census data, over 20 percent of Asian-American children in California are LEP. In the majority of counties covered by Section 203 for an Asian language, these rates are higher. For example, 30 percent of Asian-American children in San Francisco County are LEP and 24 percent of Asian-American children in Los Angeles County are LEP.

In sum, current demographic data indicates that discriminatory conditions cited by Congress in 1975 such as unequal educational opportunities still exist, and that the results of these conditions, such as high limited-English proficiency, still also exist.

I'd like to talk now about anecdotal evidence of discrimination. Despite improvements in poll training, racial discrimination against API voters still occurs in the polling place. Over the years, APALC poll monitors have observed a number of instances of racial discrimination. A few -- one example in California is -- occurred in the March 2000 primary election at a polling site in Santa Ana, Orange County.

The poll inspector was reluctant to help LEP voters and, inappropriately, asked some young API voters for identification. The APALC poll monitor at the site heard the poll inspector comment, "Everyone wants to come to America and take what is ours, our land." In the November 2004 general election, API advocacy groups in other parts of California conducted poll monitoring in their regions. These organizations include the Asian Law Alliance, the Asian Law Caucus, Center for Asian American Advocacy, Council of Philippine American Organizations and the Orange County Asian and Pacific Islander Community Alliance. Poll monitors deployed by these organizations observed similar instances of discrimination.

For example, at a polling site in San Diego County, one poll worker talked to minority voters as if they were children. At a polling site in San Mateo County, a poll worker questioned the competency of a voter to vote because of the voter's limited-English proficiency.

APALC poll monitors have also seen recurring problems at poll sites, including problems in Section 203 implementation. These same problems have been observed in other parts of California by poll monitors deployed by other API advocacy groups.

With regards, specifically, to Section 203 implementations, these problems include, as Ms. Lee alluded to before, poll sites lacking sufficient number of bilingual poll workers and interpreters, multilingual materials not being supplied, or, if supplied, poorly displayed. Also, poll sites lacking multilingual signage or -- or instruction cards directing voters where to vote, explaining what their rights are, and how to vote.

These recurring problems in Section 203 implementation, reflects the failure of county registrars to educate the poll workers about language assistance.

Many of these problems are a result of poll worker training, or poll workers not attending training sessions at all. However, even the most comprehensive poll worker training program will not completely eliminate discriminatory attitudes obtained by some poll workers. These recurring problems are the result of some poll workers having a cavalier attitude about language assistance. Or, even an attitude that language assistance should not be provided at all to voters. This ambivalence about providing language assistance, reflects a view of society that excludes nonmainstream voters from the political process. APALC poll monitors have observed poll workers expressing these attitudes, either verbally or in their obvious refusal to provide language assistance. I'll give you a few examples. For example, in the March 2000 primary election at a polling cite in Monterey Park, the inspector said that these bilingual materials are a waste of time and money. She pulled them out at the request of the APALC poll monitor, but then put them back in the envelope. Again, in March 2000, in the primary election at a polling site in Westminster, Orange County, when the APALC poll monitor noted that no translated materials were displayed, the poll workers looked around and discovered that the poll site did have translated materials and displayed them. However, when the poll monitor returned to the poll site in the afternoon, she found that the poll workers had put the translated materials back into their storage envelope instead of keeping them displayed.

In March 2004, in the primary election, in Artesia, Los Angeles County, after the APALC poll monitor discussed the translated sample ballots with the poll inspector, the inspector said, "One day, I wish we can have all English," motioning to the sample ballots with his hand.

Poll workers also express these attitudes in their dealings with poll monitors. For example, at polling sites in Santa Clara County, during the November 2004 election, poll monitors experienced rude, difficult, and uncooperative poll workers, refused the monitors' entry into the polling site, or did not allow the monitors to inspect the translated materials. In addition to these individual instances of discrimination in polling sites, there have also been instances of schemes of voter discrimination.

Section 6253.6 of the California Government Code is a reminder of such instances. Enacted in 1982, this section requires government officials to maintain confidentiality of information in voter files that identifies voters who have requested bilingual voting materials. This section was enacted to protect language minority voters from being targeted with allegations of voter fraud. As detailed in the legislative history of Section 6253.6, the section's enactment arose out of an investigation conducted by U.S. Attorney's Office in nine Northern California counties. The U.S. Attorney's Office randomly investigated voters who had requested Spanish and Chinese language materials and arranged for the immigration and naturalization service to cross-check the voters' records with citizenship records.

This investigation followed on the footsteps of INS raids on factories and businesses, in most part of a larger scheme to scapegoat language minority and immigrant communities for economic woes.

The investigation also occurred during voter registration drives among minority language communities in Northern California. Amidst concerns that this investigation would intimidate language minority voters, the ACLU and MALDEF filed suit understand the Voting Rights Act. There was also a large amount of public outcry against the investigation, including censures by a number of city counselors.

The U.S. Attorney's Office abated its investigation and Section 6253.6 was passed overwhelmingly by the Legislature, by a 54 to 7 Assembly vote and a 38 to 0 Senate vote. To briefly conclude this testimony, the Voting Rights Act has had a marked impact on the ability of API and other large minority voters in California to participate in the electoral process. Section 203 has been of particular benefit to API voters who are limited-English proficient. Unfortunately, voting discrimination continues to exist, and API and other language minority voters have a continuing need to receive the protections of the Voting Rights Act, including the special provisions that are scheduled to expire in 2007. Thank you for this opportunity to provide testimony.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, Mr. Lee. Kathay Feng.

MS. FENG: Good afternoon. Is it on?

Good afternoon. My name is Kathay Feng and I am the executive director of California Common Cause, a state organization with over 35,000 members in California alone, dedicated to being a government watchdog group throughout the nation.

In addition to working on government ethics, media reform, and campaign finance, California Common Cause has had a long and proud history of championing voting rights and electoral reform, to make sure that our ballots and our voting process are as open as possible. Prior to joining Common Cause, I was the lead attorney and headed up the voting rights work for the Asian Pacific American Legal Center for over seven years.

In the days when the Voting Rights Act had just been extended to cover discrimination and barriers faced by the Asian Pacific American community, I led efforts to push Los Angeles County and Orange County to comply with the bilingual language requirements of Section 203 of the voting Rights Act.

In the two counties that had the largest and most diverse Asian Pacific American communities, the experience that we gained in implementing bilingual ballots and providing voter assistance in over -- in five Asian languages was invaluable.

When the 2000 Census revealed that seven counties in California and 16 counties nationwide were covered for Asian language provisions, we used that experience to take it to other counties around the nation, to make sure that those counties complied with Section 203. And, more importantly, we gave the tools to communities to be able to monitor and be very active in their advocacy for full bilingual coverage. Those counties included Seattle -- Seattle's King County, Chicago's Cook County, Houston's Harris County, and, of course, five counties in California.

I wanted to talk a little bit about punch card voting. November 7th, 2000, was a real eye opener for a lot of Americans who I think, up until then, really wanted to believe in the integrity of our voting process. And, as a result of a very, very close presidential election and, more specifically, irregularities that were revealed in the state of Florida in their voting practices, America woke up to the very real reality that our democracy was both fragile and chipped at the edges. In Florida, we learned of examples after examples of punch cards machines malfunctioning, African-American and minority voters being turned away from the booths, and irregular practices from one county to another surfacing, such that you couldn't find a single standard on various election and voting practices within even one state. The nation learned an entirely new vocabulary.

All of a sudden, we understood that the things that were inside our punch card voting ballot were called chads, and that those chads could become pregnant sometimes and that there were such things as butterfly ballots. And all of this new vocabulary was part of an awakening process that, in fact, we had to be very vigilant about our electoral process, if we were to fix it.

Here in California, unfortunately, we suffered from many of those same problems. Millions of voters used those exact same faulty punch card voting machines. Over 53.4 percent of voters in California used them in the presidential elections of 2000. And, yet, those punch card machines accounted for 74.8 percent of all ballots that didn't even register a single vote for a presidential candidate. The combined overvote and undervote for punch card voting machines was more than double the error rate of other types of voting machines. And so in counties like Los Angeles County, Sacramento, San Diego, San Bernardino, Santa Clara, Solano, Shasta, Mendocino that used punch card voting machines, we found error rates of between two and three times as high, compared to counties that didn't use those types of machines.

In L.A. alone, 72,000 ballots suffered from under- or overvoting, and in many cases resulted in those ballots being thrown away. Essentially, those people tried to vote and were disenfranchised because of faulty voting machines. California Common Cause investigated and found that the error rate of punch card voting machines had a disproportionate effect on African-American, Asian-American, and Latino communities. In a state where no one group is the majority, these communities comprise a sizeable portion of the state's population and certainly part of its electorate. And these voting communities tended to live in counties that were using these more error prone punch card machines. I can personally attest to being a poll monitor in over a dozen elections, where I observed example after example of Asian-American voters trying to use these punch card voting machines, taking a ballot, not knowing what to do with it, not knowing how to insert it. If they were lucky enough to be able to insert it correctly and line it up, they still had the challenge of taking this and poking it through the whole.

The challenge was that if they didn't line it up correctly, or if there was some kind of slight malfunction because it hadn't been cleaned recently, the entire ballot would be misaligned and their entire ballot would be mismarked. One vote down meant that it was -- they had either voted for the wrong candidate or overvoted or undervoted, and the ballot could be thrown away. As you can see from this machine, it is in English only. And all punch card voting machines were designed in such a way that the maximum of languages that they could accommodate was two languages.

In California, we have such a diverse population, that many of our counties require the provision of three, four, and five, or six languages, on the ballot. In L.A. County, those six languages include English, Spanish, Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Tagalog, and Vietnamese. You can't even accommodate that on this kind of machine.

And so it was the case that these kinds of punch card voting machines had a disproportionate impact on disenfranchising minority and language minority communities. Until 1999, it was a total crapshoot for a voter to be able to walk into a poll site that was in a county that was required to provide bilingual poll workers and assistance, as to whether or not they would actually get that assistance. In L.A. County, for instance, there was no system of targeting. They had no system of recruiting bilingual poll workers, and so if you walked in, you were lucky if you had those bilingual materials, you were lucky if you had a bilingual poll worker, but more likely than not, you walked into a poll site where neither of those were available, and you were left to try to decipher how to use this machine.

Using both the Voting Rights Act and the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, California Common Cause challenged the certification and the use of punch card voting.

CHAIRMAN LEE: You know, Ms. Feng, I wonder if we could take a short break. I was trying to find a natural point to ask you to stop, because we need to do something to the tape.

MS. FENG: Change tape?

CHAIRMAN LEE: Yes, and so, if we can take a short break right now, before you -- how many minutes? You want her to continue? Yeah. If you could stop, because I think you're getting to the culmination of your testimony.

(Off the record.)

MS. FENG: I was just getting to the good stuff.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Ms. Feng, you can now get to the good stuff. I realize you were building up to a grand climax of some kind, so here we go.

MS. FENG: Well, we used the Voting Rights Act and also the 14th Amendment to bring a lawsuit against the State of California in order to decertify these punch card voting machines, and we won. And so, in a seminal case, California became one of the first states to decertify punch card voting machines and to require all of its counties to switch to new and more accurate voting machines by the 2004 elections.

As it turns out, the rest of the country ended up implementing similar types of provisions with the passage of the Help America Vote Act, but it's important to note that we use the Voting Rights Act in order to make that statement to the -- the California Secretary of State, that it was important for them to look at the discriminatory impact of certain voting machines and to decertify them on that basis.

In 2002, and I mentioned the Help America Vote Act and I think that's a good segueway, we created a coalition of organizations that includes many of the organizations that have testified here today. That organization's called the California Voting Empowerment Circle and it includes, for instance, ACLU, Asian Pacific American Legal Center, MALDEF, NALEO, and, of course, Common Cause and League of Women Voters. Some 40 organizations come together in that year in order to address the new requirements that were coming down from the Feds as a result of the passage of the Help America Vote Act and, specifically, the Help America Vote Act would have given millions of dollars to states in order to implement certain reforms that were in response to the 2000 elections and the problems that were uncovered then.

In order to receive that money, states had to develop a cohesive state plan to address problems like discrepancies between provisional voting requirements between different counties to require there to be a statewide voter database. And some of the things opened up the door and other things closed the ballot booth to voters. And what we came together as a coalition to do was to really look at all of the potential changes and advocate very vigorously for regulations and new laws to be implemented in the State of California that would maximize the ability of traditionally disenfranchised voters to be able to vote as well as to minimize the potential negative impact of certain provisions of the Help America Vote Act. Specifically, let me give a couple of examples. One of them was that we worked with the Secretary of State and a lot of us actually were active in the advisory committee that wrote the language of these regulations and the laws that were eventually passed to create a state plan that would soften the blow of new voter ID provisions. And we created policies that had a very broad definition of what voter IDs could be accepted that had a very broad definition of what the certification and the verification standards would be for that ID, and also created very extensive county poll worker training standards. Because what we knew, from experience, was that when it all came down to it, you could have the perfect policies in place at the state level, and even great policies at the county level, but the person who was interacting at front line with the voter could be the person who would decide, on their own, that they were going to have a discriminatory choice about who to ask for ID from.

And, in fact, before we had implemented some of those, I had been a poll monitor and seen firsthand many examples of poll workers who discriminatorily chose to tell Asian-American voters, or other voters who they considered to be less legitimate than white voters, to go to the back of the line or to present proof of citizenship, or to show something besides the driver's license because they didn't think that the driver's license was valid and could possibly be faked.

And so it was very important for us to make sure that there were new state provisions from all the way from the top to the bottom that were implemented to ensure that these new voter ID provisions would not have a discriminatory impact on Asian-American voters, Latino voters, African-American voters, senior citizens, youth, people who tended not to have -- or tended to be more likely to be disenfranchised.

Another example of some of the changes that we use that we implemented invoking the Voting Rights Act, were also implementing standards for the statewide database and creating new uniform purging standards. We saw in Florida that there were some very shaky examples of using faulty databases in order to clean lists that had a disparate impact of cleaning more African-Americans or minority voters from those lists. And what we were particularly concerned about was, with the requirement of the Help America Vote Act, to implement a new statewide database and to verify voters' names more strictly that we might have a situation where, voters whose names were, for instance, Chun Swai Hsieh Binh, been might be inputted in the wrong way. It might be misspelled where the first name might be juxtaposed with their last name or their surname might be juxtaposed with their family name, and, as a result, there might be a disparate impact on people who had, quote unquote, foreign sounding names. Similarly we were also concerned about the potential that purging practices could be implemented where people who were irregular voters might not be notified before their names were purged off the list, and we knew that minority voters tended to be less regular voters than white voters. And so we secured standards that were, I think, some of the model standards in the country to require that precautions be taken before names were purged from lists; that there were several checks before a name could be considered to be irregular, and that, before a name was removed from a list, that the voter had to be contacted and given a number of opportunities to indicate that they wanted to stay on the list and that maybe there was some way to correct the voter files by presenting additional information.

A third example of some changes that we implemented with the Help America Vote Act by invoking the Voting Rights Act was in advocating for the allocation of millions of federal HAVA dollars for voting technology improvements. And, as I said before, in California we really do have a unique situation where the interplay between the language requirements of Section 203 and the constantly changing demographics requires that many of our counties have to look at voting technology that maybe other counties in other parts of the state don't need to.

Questions about how you can put five, six languages onto a single ballot, so that from the very first screen, a voter can see the ballot entirely in their language, or the instructions entirely in their language, or where voters with disabilities can vote with the assistance of sip-and-puff technology or audio, or where people who are semi-literate, or people who need visual assistance can enlarge the text or listen to the ballot read to them. All of those were questions that were very much at the crux of which machines were going to be certified in California and whether we were going to move from the old and outdated punch card voting machines to newer technologies like electronic voting or optical scan voting that were hybrid.

Since then, we have actually created landmark regulations in California that are,both respectful of security concerns but also, more importantly, that protect traditionally disenfranchised communities, because the Voting Rights Act proved to be a very effective tool in making sure that any of those legal changes took into consideration these particularly vulnerable communities.

And so I just wanted to end by saying that with the potential expiration of the Voting Rights Act in 2007, it's absolutely important that we remain vigilant and do everything that we can to improve voting participation by minority and language minority communities. It is unquestionable that the Voting Rights Act has made meaningful access to the ballot a reality for thousands of African-Americans, Asian-American, Latino and Native American Californians. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Feng. And in clean up, Carol Fowler.

MS. FOWLER: Wow. Kind of a tough act to follow. Carolyn Fowler, as Bill had shared with you, California Election Protection at Work. A lot of what Kathay and Eugene have talked about, our organization has been hand in hand with them in state testimony, et cetera, and working in partner with them. I think, first, I want to thank the Commission, definitely, for this opportunity to testify. Particularly, I was fortunate enough to run into Barbara last week in D.C., so I knew about this. The California election protection network certainly supports the reauthorization and the strengthening, we hope, of the Voting Rights Act, particularly Section 5, Section 203, and the Department of Justice participating and observing and monitoring in elections.

One of the main places that I did meet Eugene and Kathay was with Conny McCormack's CVOC organization which she spoke to this morning, the County Voter Outreach Community section. While there have been positive gains in the multilingual area, much is to be done still throughout our state. Conny is to be commended for the progress that's been made, but I think I would be remiss if I didn't discuss some of the areas that our organization has a concern that are not being met.

When you're talking to some of these registrars around the country, I think some of the key things when you talk to them about what sounds like a model program, which is a model program, but I think you need to understand, I'd be asking what percent of the poll workers that they have in place are bilingual, because you can't get a true picture unless you know the numbers.

Also, when they do the outreach, from a media standpoint -- which they do have a media component and they have spent money in preparing the brochures and so forth -- you need to understand the outreach needs to be more, what percentage is in the minority publications, their radio programs -- this is a very radio-focused community, especially in the State of California -- what percentage of those dollars are being spent in those communities to reach out. I mean, the "Los Angeles Times" everybody just does not read. It's not -- it is in English. However, there's still many other networks and mediums that the minority communities, whether it's African-American or Asian or Latino, that's where they get their information.

When we talk about training -- this is my pet peeve -- I think I'm going to say this is systemic from the training of the election administrators from the beginning. Not so much at the county level, but certainly, I think you need to understand how many municipal elections take place, and I'll just speak to the State of California.

The registrars and city clerks in those areas -- there are many of them -- in some cases, don't even have a high school diploma. So you have to understand, how can they be training the appropriate training of poll workers and everything else. And they're managing records. Some of them hire people to come in and do the training for them, so they don't know. And more importantly, which is significant to me, there is no certification. And by that, I mean -- I'm a notary. I'm background checked, I'm fingerprinted, the works. I pass a test to certify in this state to be a notary. Those requirements don't even exist for these registrars. I know it's a frightening thought, but it's a fact.

And I've shared some of this with the Secretary of State's office and they say they're looking into it. But this creates systemic problems in terms of, if there's no certification for them when they go to train these people or their lack of training, how does that translate into the treatment from the individual coming to the polling place. And there is a linkage, I do believe, from being a poll observer, a poll inspector. In the most recent Los Angeles city election, I was a team leader, so I was responsible for several election sites.

So I do want to comment on the fact that, people are kind of -- if they have a language problem, are kind of pushed to the side or acted like, you don't know what you're doing. And I think I'm going to speak to translate that into intimidation, intimidation as a senior, intimidation as a person of another language, to even think about coming to the polling place in terms of not feeling comfortable about knowing what to do, as Kathay pointed out, with that voting system.

When we changed voting systems, there was no significant outreach to train the public ahead of time that we were changing systems, how you use that system. Yes, they may have put a publication with the sample ballot, but that does not give me an ease of walking to a polling place and perhaps feeling uncomfortable or being embarrassed about how to use that system. Very significant that people don't think about and some -- a lot of times when we talk about our disability community, we just think of those that maybe have hearing impaired or visually impaired or because they're in a wheelchair. But there are a lot of voters, particularly in the African-American community, that maybe have arthritis or they have trouble walking or they need a walker. And so, to stand in long lines, when they've consolidated the polling places, which happens frequently when it's not a, quote, unquote, major election -- in fact, we are trying to meet and understand what that consolidation is going to look like for our special election because -- because of that, many of us are advocating that we do consider, as the gentleman in Hawaii said, an absentee ballot. But yet and still, and with all due respect to Mr. Rogers's comment earlier, in English some of these measures are hard to understand what to do, let alone in a multilanguage situation.

In fact, the English language, you still wonder, well if I vote "yes" what does that mean, if I vote "no" what does that mean, let alone if it was in Spanish or Chinese, I'm sure they don't have a clue. And then again, the uncomfortability of seeming like you're an ignorant voter. Who wants to come to a poll -- or, at best, you get the sample ballot, you go to the polling place, and you feel the rush to vote because there's a line five miles behind you of people waiting to cast their ballot.

So, in speaking to that, I also want to transition to the fact that I think the level of change impending for voters around the country, while it's in L.A. today the amount of diversity, as someone spoke to earlier, whether you see it in North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, I think it's going to increase, and that being the case, these measures are going to be instrumental in keeping, as you heard my registrar say, if it wasn't required, the County, the Board of Supervisors, probably would not authorize the budget to do that.

And I'm glad to hear you ask, Bill Lee, about additional funding, because I think additional funding is needed to do the level of training for not only the poll worker but for the public on these issues, the public on how to use the systems and being comfortable with using these systems. We treat the training as a -- whenever there's an election -- although, however, in California it is getting more frequently. However, voting and training and recruitment of the appropriate people should be all year long.

When I went to the session for the March election, they had several of us there. They talked about -- they had a book this thick about all the changes that took place. Yet, they did not bring every inspector in for the training. They were only training the team leaders over the various precincts.

Now, I had to question that, and I even asked the city clerk there, why would you do that with that amount of change. And they don't know about it. That means there's a high probability whether, you're a minority or not, you're going to be disenfranchised when you get to that polling place because they're not aware of that change.

My observations also were that many of them had no clue about the provisional ballot and when to use it. So people could come to that polling place -- say they were to vote, and there might be four precincts in one section. First you got to figure out which one is yours. Then when you go to that one, if you're not on that list, some people were turned away. Not even given an opportunity to vote. And a lot of people, particularly if they are of another ethnicity, they just do what they're told. They don't want to make a fuss, they don't want to cause any attention or create a problem, so they just move along and don't vote at all. I observed that. So these voting rights cannot go away by any stretch of the imagination. We've got a long way to go.

I want to share with you, when we talk about some specifics for Section 5, one community that I know, specifically Inglewood, has a high percentage of Latino in their school district. They have been unable to elect a Latino school board member in all this time. And it's not that no one has run. I guess it's a combination of power, it's a combination of retaining, but it also clearly becomes discrimination whether the preponderance of students attending that school district are Latino and they cannot get one representative to sit with them on their behalf on that school board. So I watched these practices continue on a daily basis.

I would also suggest that when you want to understand what's going on here we have a fair political practices commission. I suggest you seek to see some of their complaints. A lot of them are discriminatory and I think we have maybe four or five people to handle the volume of complaints for the State of California, which is ludicrous. They cannot get back to you. The first response you get is, we have your -- if you're lucky, in two weeks, you get a letter saying, we did receive your complaint. And in many instances, people that have complained -- and they've testified to this at the Secretary of State -- they never get a response. Well, that's because you've got a few people trying to manage volumes of information and complaints.

So I would suggest that you check that source to get another understanding or picture of what may be happening in the State of California along discriminatory voting practices. I also wanted to discuss the fact that accessibility can become a big problem as well. When I was observing the polling places, many of them not only did not have the Voting Rights Act in multiple languages, but there was nowhere to park. I mean, while we have what they call -- you can just drive up if you're a disabled voter. I forget what they call that motor -- motor something, motor voter, I think, and you can get your ballot -- curb-side voting, thank you -- I didn't want to say drive-by voting. Curb-side voting.

But I wanted -- two of my polling places, the traffic -- there was clearly -- there was nowhere to park and you really had to walk at least five or six blocks even to pay to park. And so the accessibility becomes an issue for many voters. And I myself, who was supposed to check the poll, almost said, well, forget this. But I did, of course, I went ahead and parked and walked back. But just think what it is to a voter that's just coming to vote.

At that same municipality that I spoke to earlier, I was able to observe polls not open on time. And in some cases I did feel the candidate was a Latino candidate, and it was interesting that the two polls that didn't open in time were in his precinct. And not only did they not open on time, they moved -- one never opened, they put signs up. The other, they moved the poll to a separate precinct where his voters would never go that far to vote for him. And, needless to say, he did lose the election.

There are just -- and this has been written to the fair political practices and I'm just telling you that if we did not have these voting rights in place, I shutter to think what else might go on in terms of voting.

The Department of Justice should have in place -- I spoke to you at lunch about how what it seems like a small number of observances they made considering the problems we've been having for the last couple of years in elections. I think they should have in place a standard audit and observer process that randomly spot-checks various election activities. And it should be at a far greater number than I see today here.

We need that level of protection and maybe as a balance or a check point maybe the Department of Justice should be checking with these fair political practices agencies and reviewing some of these cases and seeing if there's any trend on certain areas or certain things that have happened. That might be a place for them to start to check. I know we're trying to keep our government down, but at the same time, if voters cannot view that their votes are counted as cast, we will have a huge, huge deluge of problems moving forward. We really will.

In conclusion I'd just like to say, these Voting Rights Act provisions and their reauthorization strengthening are tantamount to restoring voter confidence and participation, not only in California, but the entire country and particularly especially for the minority communities. Thank you again for this opportunity and I look forward for your questions.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Thank you, Ms. Fowler. Well, Commissioner Rogers, do you want to start or --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you.

First of all, thank you all for your testimony, compelling testimony, and I appreciate that. I did have a couple of questions that I wanted to try to get a sense about, in particular, as it relates to the Asian population as it exists here.

I found the document that you produced, by the way, Mr. Lee, remarkable in terms of just the data about educational attainment and poverty and all of those issues as they were in play in terms of the Asian-American communities as a whole. I did want to ask you all, you in particular gave some numbers that you talked about this. You said there was a 61 percent increase in terms of registration of Asians essentially between 1998 and presently. Is that right? Is that a correct figure? Or did I get the number wrong? Was it 1994 or 1998 you were talking about?

MR. LEE: November 1998 to November 2004

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: So, from November 1998 to 2004, a 61 percent increase in registration among Asians or, excuse me, of API, as you described. And then you said there was a 98 percent increase in terms of voting in those -- in that six-year time frame, essentially.

MR. LEE: That's according to the census data.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: What you seem to be doing is, you're attributing that to -- as I heard your comments, to the productiveness essentially of Section 203 in allowing for that to happen. Is that accurate?

MR. LEE: My testimony was that Section 203 was a factor in that, and I think a large factor.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Now, I'm curious about that, because you say it's a large factor. Section 203 has been around for a number of decades and, yet, you haven't had this dramatic increase that you're talking about essentially that occurs in a six-year time frame. And 203's has been along since how long? Bill, what's the exact date of 203?

MS. FENG: As you know, and I hope I get the dates right, but the Voting Rights Act was passed in the 1960s and then it was amended to add Section 203 in the 1970s. But what happened was that the thresholds that were created, specifically, that I think you had to have a certain percentage of the population that was illiterate in a particular language, and that it constituted a certain percentage of the overall county's population.

Those thresholds were so high that it excluded Asian-American communities across the nation. We couldn't meet those thresholds. And so in the 1980s we pushed for amendments to the Voting Rights Act and specifically Section 203's threshold requirements, so that besides proving that we were a certain percentage of the population of that county, we could also show that if a minority -- a language minority community constituted 10,000 people or more within that county, they could trigger it.

And so that was changed and the first time that you saw those new census data being applied to the -- or the -- well, the 1990 census data being applied to the new formula that was passed in the 1980s was in the 1990s. And as we got through the 1990s, we had a couple of counties that were covered and counties were very clearly -- I would say not until 1996, 1997 did counties start to really think about how to make the law that they had to implement truly effective.

And the examples that I gave of people showing up to poll sites where you could go to a poll site in Chinatown, for instance, and anybody on the street and certainly anybody who had worked with these communities could tell you that these particular communities had a need for Chinese language or, specifically, particular dialects like Toi San or Cantonese. The county had no idea. They would send a Spanish speaker, a Tagalic speaker, if they were lucky. Somebody who was bilingual. If they weren't, just any old poll worker to work in those poll sites. And so you end up with a system where they knew they had to provide bilingual assistance. They had no way of targeting where that bilingual assistance should be put to, and, more importantly, they didn't consistently translate all of their materials into the required languages and put them out in targeted poll sites.

So it really wasn't until the late nineties that, for instance, L.A. County and other counties like L.A. started developing more refined ways of knowing where to put that material, of recruiting bilingual poll workers, of doing outreach into minority language minority communities, so that you started to see that change, that title change that Eugene talked about in the 2000, 2001, and so on, elections.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Well, to me that's remarkable, in particular -- and I wanted to try to understand the linkages you were attributing it related to 203, in particular, and that language, in and of itself, is confirming in what we've heard in various places around the country that essentially it's opened up the door of opportunity for more people to participate in the electoral process.

But looking at those numbers in and of themselves without that context, you'd have to say, well, wait a minute, that's got to be due to something else. Something else has to be attributable as to why you've got that -- such a dramatic increase in that period of time.

COMMISSIONER GREENBAUM: Joe, I can give you some more technical information on that.

Kathay's right in that the original formula used had to do with having 5 percent minority language citizens who are limited in English proficient in a particular group. And, for the most part, if you look at where most of the Asian population is congregated and where the -- it tends to be in larger urban areas and that -- while there might be a significant number of Asian-American citizens in those areas, they wouldn't make that 5 percent threshold.

So, as Kathay was saying, in the beginning in the eighties, there was a move to add a number in there, a threshold number. And in the 1992 reauthorization, the threshold was added of 10,000 voting Asian citizens, or 5 percent. And a number of counties we covered for the first time in the Asian language, and it took -- whenever the census does it, does the updating every decade, it requires a special tabulation. And that special tabulation, I don't believe, was done until 1993.

So while the -- even after Congress changed the statute in 1992, the coverage didn't actually become effective until 1993 because you didn't have any numbers to actually base it on. So that's a little bit of the history, just in terms of the technical --

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, this demonstrates the importance of the coverage formula; doesn't it? I mean, because what -- this demonstrates the importance of the coverage formula, 'cause what Commissioner Rogers' point is, is really that the formula sort of makes real these rights, and that only happened for Asians in these communities less than ten years ago. And I assume -- is it the case that the same thing happened in these -- let's say, these communities outside of New York City in the northeast?

COMMISSIONER GREENBAUM: Which communities are you referencing?

CHAIRMAN LEE: Massachusetts, Connecticut, those small cities where there's been this recent activity.

COMMISSIONER GREENBAUM: Most of them, some of them began being covered in the nineties and some of them began being covered in the eighties and some of them became covered for the first time in 2002. But, you're right, in that there was a dramatic increase between 1984 when the post-1980 coverage formula came out and 1992 in terms of the number of jurisdictions even under the 5 percent threshold that a lot of the jurisdictions in the northeast that became covered for the Spanish language, that happened in the nineties.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Okay.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you.

Mr. Lee, one quick question. I was looking through your data. I'm trying to get a sense about this. As I look, in particular, on page 7 of the document that you had given us, it is essentially a document about educational attainment and, in many respects, that document is remarkable. It testifies to the fact that there have been remarkable levels of achievement essentially by Asians in the United States. Asian and Pacific Islanders, in particular, you note, for example, people with associate degrees and bachelor degrees and master's degree. If you're Chinese it's roughly 53 percent of the population. If you're Japanese, it's 54 percent of the population. If you're Korean, it's 52 percent of the population. If you are Asian, Indian, 63 percent. Pakistani, 59 percent.

I found those numbers to be remarkable, because they're extraordinarily high, first of all. But, at the same time, you pointed out problems in particular communities.

So, I mean, you referenced the Hmong population, there might be 12 percent, according to the data, who have advanced degrees or college backgrounds or otherwise. Laotian communities, 12 percent. Cambodians are 15 percent. Tongans are 11 percent, Vietnamese, 30 percent. Fijians, 16 percent. So you point out those as examples or groups of sub-peoples, as examples of problems as it relates to the language minorities.

What I didn't see was what percentage of the population they represent as a percentage of the API population that you're referring to. In other words, the people that you identify as having problematic LEP problems, as you talk about them, what percentage of the overall Asian population do they constitute? Is it less than 10 percent? Is it less than 5 percent? Is it 20 percent? What's the number of the problematic groups that you're speaking of, given the fact that you have such extraordinary achievement among other Asian groups? MR. LEE: Mr. Rogers, I don't know that number off the top of my head. I would point out that in my testimony I talked about the measure -- using a measure of high school completion, which I think is the most relevant thing to look at, as opposed to educational achievement beyond high school. And the reason I say that is, for most people, I think, for all people, the learning process until the age 18 is the key process where one either learns or does not learn a language, including English.

So when I pointed out rates of educational attainment, I used high school completion as a measure, because I thought that was the most relevant measure for looking at the Congressional findings back in 1975 of unequal educational opportunities leading to high illiteracy and high limited-English proficiency rates.

So Mr. Rogers, when you pointed out educational achievement beyond high school level, it is true, certainly many API groups have achieved educational successes beyond high school. For example, bachelor's degrees or master's degrees or professional degrees. But with regards to high school attainment, Asian-Americans in California, as a whole, have rates that are lower than white Californians and there are a number of groups that are below the overall California population.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Okay.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, one answer to your question is the high school -- the number -- the comparative number for less than high school in the white population is 10 percent?

MR. LEE: That is correct.

CHAIRMAN LEE: So the Asian not having less than high school education is -- I mean, that's true for every Asian group except Japanese which is 7 percent. So since I know as a matter of fact that, I mean, most of the Asian population is not Japanese-American, I mean, it's going to be overwhelmingly more, you know -- this is a population that has less high school attainment than the white population. I think the Hmong population would be rather small, so I'm not sure it's going to be the 30s range probably will be the -- the teens or 20s.

MS. LEE: We were just going to add that often, cases, when they do try to enumerate -- in cases where they are documenting levels of educational attainment, often cases for Asian Pacific Americans and, specifically, even for Korean-Americans, if they were to have post-secondary degrees, oftentimes they would be in the home country and not necessarily in the U.S. Therefore, I'm not quite clear about the page that you're specifically looking at, but we have asked for and called for that. When we looked at language ability or English ability, we don't look at it just based on educational attainment because oftentimes they may have graduated from their home country with a degree, but when they immigrate here, they're still limited-English proficient.

And when I look at the Korean-American population, less than 10 percent are under the age of 18. For example, I'm just speaking broadly, because I'm also not very good with numbers, but I know the general numbers. In other words, very few are U.S. born and of age to vote. And, of those under 18, 5 percent are LEP. But any of those over 25, that LEP population rate goes up higher by about more than 70 percent. So I think that when we look at education attainment, we have to break it down in terms of whether they graduated from U.S. high school and also whether they graduated from U.S. college and university and so on.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Absolutely.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Is there LEP information in this book?

MR. LEE: There is LEP information in the book that, both for California as a whole, and looking at -- it breaks it down by county and breaks it down by region in California.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Okay.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you. Thank you very much. I appreciate your responses. Carolyn, I had a question for you and I -- I'm sorry. I didn't mean to hit the microphone.

I had two questions, actually, for you. I guess I'm struck to some extent -- I appreciate your testimony. Essentially, you indicate there are problems that take place in the polling place. I'm an observer. I see these problem as they take place. I'm curious as to whether or not you describe the problem -- and I wasn't quite as clear about this. You describe it essentially as people can be, one, made to feel uncomfortable, as you said, embarrassed or uncomfortable or made to feel this way. You feel the rush to vote, as you described it, because of the line behind you. You see all those folks and everything else in between. You don't want to be a problem and you don't want to create a fuss, because you do want to vote and you don't want all those folks waiting on you, whatever. And you describe it as -- essentially, as a problem that takes place in that way.

You also mentioned there were voter training issues, recruitment issues, and those kind of things, and what kind of people were in the polls. You reference that there was discrimination, particularly, as you see it, vis-a-vis Latinos, but I am curious as to how you describe it. I don't get the absolute sense that this is, one -- a pervasive problem, one, from your testimony. I don't know that to be true. And it may well not be true. This may be isolated cases in which you were seeing this occur as opposed to what you'd view as to be a pattern or a practice or simply the way it is here in California. I don't know that I know that for sure. And I'm trying to understand the balance between, as you describe it, a sort of -- I think, the problems -- a lot of this experience in voting, you don't want to wait, you don't want to hold up the line. Naturally, as a matter, you don't want to be a problem in not understanding something. And you don't want to ask a question about it because you got all those folks waiting behind you.

How much of that is race and how much of that is just plain the process of voting?

MS. FOWLER: Okay. I think I understand your question or your concern in terms of it. When I speak to the fact of -- I want to go back to the training. And I started with, in some instances, which we take our eye off the ball from the city clerk level, which they run a lot of elections that, like our county registrar may not have anything to do with, period. And there are a lot of those here in California. I'm not sure what part of the country you're from, but there's --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Colorado. Denver.

MS. FOWLER: Yeah. There's tons of those in the State of California as you might observe. And when I say it's systemic in terms of, there is no standardized training throughout our state that is required for a poll worker, an election administrator, for that matter. And my sense to you, in terms of the voter, on the receiving end is, because there is no training in many instances or it's a short training which does not consist of a customer service component, maybe that's the best way to articulate that. And in some instances, these poll workers have worked at that same poll for years, year in, year out, never been retrained, if you will, to the changes that are happening from the system perspective and so their patience is short.

Why they have the expectation that the voter should come in and know, when they don't, I don't understand. So when I say these things about that and how people are treated, my observation is, it is more -- in some instances, it is not necessarily race, to your point. It is systemic in the lack of training and how to treat people, period. It also lends to, though, race when you don't know what to do and there's a language issue, and I'm not understanding what you're saying. Here, take this, do that, whatever, and making the voter feel very uncomfortable with even coming there to vote.

And you're right about, you know, the lines. I get irritated in standing in a long line, but I'm talking about from an election administration standpoint, I believe that with proper training, proper planning, not just only at election time, the recruitment and training of qualified people is an on-going basis which I had here. Voter registration should be year-round. Recruitment should be year-round. Training should be year-round, so that there's maybe a posted, for lack of a better term, we're going to do these six trainings this year for recruitment. It's almost like they post it on their Web site, but what it's really done to recruit people to vote. And we have shortages now. And I'm not sure I'm still answering you, but I'll go back to my instance of the example where there is no Latino member in Inglewood and they have ran and ran and ran, and the observation of the polls closing. I'll go a step further. I just was trying to keep my comments -- and I didn't want to repeat all the things they said either.

The candidate -- the Latino candidate's name was on the ballot. The sample ballot went out. There was an English portion of the ballot showing the candidate with the candidates true numbers -- we use numbers here to identify the candidates -- so let's say she was number two. In the bilingual portion of the sample ballot, the Latino candidate was number four. When asked, the city clerk was asked -- so if you voted number four, you were going to be voting for another candidate. And if you're, you know, Spanish and that's what you're reading, you're going to say, okay, that meant that's person number four. So when asked, the city clerk asked to re-send another sample ballot with the correction or to send out the correction, refused to do so, understanding that that was a significant difference to that population in that community.

Now, it's difficult for me to believe that that is just, oops, and this is a person that's been city clerk for a little while. So I'm saying that, in my opinion, is racial discrimination. And you can't call it anything else. So when you ask for specifics, I could probably give you a lot of them, but in the interest of time, I'm just citing examples that I have observed and these have been documented and written. That's why I'm saying the fair political practices might give you another vision of what's going on, you know.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: And I absolutely appreciate that. The most important reason why I asked you that question is that we're creating a record. Everything we're saying is all being recorded and this record, in and of itself, I think it's important that it be factually specific, so that we are not just making general statements, but have a factual basis for the statements that you all have been all kind enough to make. Last question. This will be it. I'm sorry, my fellow commissioners, but I have to ask you this question. We haven't heard anything today, all day long, about African-American participation in terms of --

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Amen. That was my question.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Chairman, you want to jump in?

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: No, ask the question. Have the problems of African-Americans in California been solved?

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, there was a brief mention of Tom Bradley this morning.

MS. FOWLER: I think what happens in terms of African-Americans I'll speak more to -- and I still can't even solely make this African-Americans. In this state, once you've had a felony and served your time, which really includes a high percentage of African-American and Latino population, more so men than women at this point, they are -- at one point we're not even told that, if you're not on parole, you're not on probation, you do have the right to vote. They were never even told that, that they had that right restored. In my opinion, that's discrimination. They -- in fact, they were led to believe they still could not vote when they were released and not on probation and not -- not on parole. So I think that impacts the African-American community severely.

We've made a lot of strides, as Kathay has talked about, in many of us lobbying at the state level, and now you must inform these people. Several of us are in different groups and organizations that particularly reach out to that community and try to ensure that they are registered to vote if they are eligible and that they can either do absentee, if they are fortunate enough to be working, et cetera, but to understand their responsibility and how that looks in them being coming back as a citizen, meaning to do well and good in their, you know, community. So that's one key thing I would say as far as the African-American.

The other piece, which I find, I'll say for African-Americans gets back to this intimidation piece in terms of being comfortable going to the poll and feeling comfortable knowing what to do once the system has changed. Particularly the seniors.

Like I said, everybody is not necessarily classified disabled, but many of them, particularly, like I said, we have complex issues. And that tends to make people very uncomfortable in going to the polls and knowing what to do. But now the seniors as a rule, as you probably do know, particularly an African-American, do want to vote and a lot of the senior housing centers now are starting to hold sessions about -- and they're asking the county registrar, or whatever, to come out and talk about what is the voting going to be like, bring a sample, bring something to them.

So that was a big problem for the African-American community, particularly as systems change. We had the early voting and they were very uncomfortable, the seniors particularly in African-American community, with that electronic -- if they weren't computer savvy, et cetera, and what does that mean, how do I do that. Just a little more sensitive to not wanting to be embarrassed. Just like I said earlier, I find that, particularly in our community, those two key things.

As far as -- I have not heard of anyone in an African-American community saying they were turned away and were not able to vote. Perhaps if their addresses change, I haven't heard anybody saying, "Where's your ID?" So I'm not aware of that as being a problem. But I have the prison piece and the -- if things have changed and they're not notified.

I would say another complaint, though, is what they feel is proper notification of the polling place changes. For example -- and it will happen like a special election like this, where they know there's going to be a low turnout, they'll do a significant consolidation of polling places. And, now, places that they are familiar with, maybe it's further to go to. So in some ways that can compromise their ability to go and vote. Many of them maybe not having the ability to drive or have to rely on someone to take them there, and which is why you'll find a lot of organizations offering to give rides in our community, in South Central particularly, so that they can get people to the polls.

So I do know that becomes a problem, and issues like this, when they do that consolidation, because typically that puts our community further away, you know, to go and vote and I don't -- and it's not that it's necessarily intentional, but that's exactly a reality of what happens. Therefore, given the appearance of disenfranchising.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I understand black folks, as a percentage of California's population, are actually declining as a percentage of the population.

Is that true?

MS. FOWLER: I haven't seen the latest census so I don't know.

MS. FENG: I think that the numbers are that in the 2000 Census, white Americans were approximately 45 percent of the state's population. Latinos were about 35 percent. Asian-Americans were 13. And African-Americans were about 8 percent. And what it is, is that certain groups like Latino and Asian-Americans are growing at a much faster rate than the general population, and African-American population, while it's not shrinking, it's not growing as fast.

MS. FOWLER: That's it. It's not growing.

MS. FENG: And so, as a percentage, it is true that it's declining in percentage, if you're looking at the overall state numbers. And I just wanted to say, to echo Carolyn's observations, that a number of organizations did election protection hotlines during the 2004 elections and received thousands of calls coming in from voters who had problems that they faced because of the very issues that Carolyn raised, like poll sites that were consolidated or had been moved from where the poll site had originally been located and people just entirely lost and not knowing where to go.

Another example that seemed to have more instances of this happening in low-income and particularly in African-American communities, was poll sites running out of the ballots. This thing. So when you got their -- if you showed up because you were working late and you couldn't get to the poll site until 7:30 and they had run out of the packet of ballots, you might have either been stuck or asked to wait for several hours while they -- while somebody ran to get some new ballots. And that seemed to happen in a number of communities, particularly in African-American communities in Los Angeles.

And I think the third example that I have that I understand happened significantly in the African-American community was not being fully informed about provisional voting. There's a lot of people who move from one place to another, who, because you get married, you change your name, for whatever reason, their name did not appear in the roster when they went to check in at the poll site that they usually voted at. And what they found was that, for whatever reason, if the poll workers were not informed of provisional voting procedures, that, instead of being given the opportunity to vote on provisional ballots, they would be turned away or sent to another poll site.

And, I regret that my colleague, Erika Teasley, who is with the NAACPLDF, who normally would be the person who give all of this testimony could not be here, but she has a good reason. She recently gave birth to a healthy baby boy, Isiah, so she couldn't join us. But I'm sure what she would say is that a lot of the kinds of problems, while somewhat different, that impact on African-American communities, still exist. And as recently as 2004, they received hundreds of thousands of calls attesting to those kinds of problems. So it wasn't just singular isolated incident, but a pattern.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Thank you. Mr. Chairman, thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Commissioner Buchanan.

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to observe that Commissioner Roger's penetrating questions constitute a real service to the Commission in helping us accomplish our purpose.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Amen.

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: And, an essential function, I think, and questions like this will be raised in the Congress and courts, and they need to be raised and answered, and your responses have, I think, contributed invaluably to the Commission. So I want to thank both sides of that conversation.

I've long believed that our country is not just a melting pot, but a rich mosaic of the world's peoples and cultures and faith. And I feel it's a great strength of this country, and it seems to me that this has been well-demonstrated in this hearing room this day, the very -- the strength of -- the diversity of our country and the quality of both the questions and the answering by my colleague and answers by you. So I just want to express my appreciation. You have enriched our record and I thank you for it.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Commissioner Davidson, do you have any questions?

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: I would just like to ask Ms. Feng if there's any way that I can get a copy of the revised purging requirements. That's an interest of mine, and if I can get my hands on that, I would be grateful.

MS. FENG: I'll be happy to e-mail you a copy.

COMMISSIONER DAVIDSON: Thank you.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Incidentally, you mentioned that this issue of the threshold that was later mentioned by others, the 10,000 numbering. You said that there were -- thought there were proposals or some people had some proposals, rather, that that trigger number should be 7.500 or 5,000. Do you have a -- do you want to expand your comments on that? Do you have a particular recommendation?

MS. LEE: Well, again, there are different proposals. One is to reduce the threshold to 7,500 and the other is to 5,000. And in each case, it obviously captures more Asian Pacific Americans and increase -- including not only Korean-Americans in certain counties, but also emerging populations of Asian Pacific Americans, like Cambodian and so on. So, we do think it's a good thing.

The reason why I said there are differing proposals is that different groups are still not coming into common in terms of what would be the better number, but we definitely do think that decreasing the threshold, just because, again, it includes a larger percentage of LEP voters, would be beneficial. And what I could do is send you information about what more counties and what languages would be captured if we were to go -- to be down from 7,500 and, again, to 5,000. And I'm getting that data, actually, from other groups, not only our APALC, but the Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund, which is also calling for, specifically, 5,000, but then a lot of the D.C. groups who are working on this are calling for ####### And I don't think it's -- it's not a conflicting request. It's more about what could be possible. And I think we feel that whatever that could, again, capture, more is better, but there is just difference in terms of how much we can do. So can I submit that afterwards?

CHAIRMAN LEE: Oh, yes, we'd like that very much. As a matter of fact, I was going to ask you if you would submit it, do you know what the implications would be for the Hispanic community?

MS. LEE: I do not know about that, but we can send you information about that as well.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Oh, good. It occurred to me, in listening to this testimony today, that maybe that threshold issue is very important because, if it's true that so many of the at-large elections are at the local level and at the city levels and the reach of the Voting Rights Act is, in a sense, been greater at the statewide levels. And I guess Congressional elections, it would make some sense, from that point of view, not just for the Asian-American community, but for other communities.

I wonder also if putting together some testimony I'd heard earlier, particularly in the Northeast, how about the rate of change? I've heard testimony that when communities seem to have a big infusion of, whether it be Asian-Americans or African-Americans or Latinos, so that the rate of change is very fast, voting rights issues seem to arise. Could any of you address that? I guess Inglewood might actually be an example.

MS. FOWLER: I think Inglewood would probably be a very good example because when you look at the electorate there, they do, but this was just this -- the term before last, have one Latino on the city council. But, like I said, no one on the school board. I'm trying to think even if there are commissioners.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, of course, these lower -- these lower offices are feeders for the higher offices, also.

MS. FOWLER: Exactly. And I submit to you, and this is just my observation, that just so happened that that candidate was nominated and supported by what I consider the power structure, so, okay, we'll have you and that's it. So I don't see that candidate going any higher, if you want to know the truth.

In fact, I think they spoke to me not too long ago and said that they were talking about taking a job somewhere else even outside of the state. So that is my point.

Those are feeder positions for the next level if you're in public service and you plan to move up. And so, if they don't even get an opportunity to enter, how does that ever change? And how do you stay in a community where you feel you have zero representation? And it's not to say that the people in place are not looking out for the community at whole but, particularly from a minority standpoint, you look to seeing someone that you think maybe looks at your issues a little differently.

I guess my example is, women in the Senate and the State Assembly, and to date, there's only one African-American woman, and that's recently, in the State Assembly. And I just feel that men look at issues differently than women look at issues. And so we worked very hard to get that candidate elected, I might add. And it was a struggle. And so when you do look at those positions and how do you move up, you do get a sense of -- and I think you're right. When the demographics have changed dramatically, that seems to be when that occurs, if I use Inglewood as an example. I personally live in Hawthorne. Now, the demographics have changed recently there and electorally.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Where's Hawthorne?

MS. FOWLER: Yeah, by the airport, right by the airport. Just south of the airport. And there is the city clerk is a Latino. But he's the only one, but now he's running for city council. Now, I don't know whether he'll make it or not. There are no African-Americans. In fact, there's one woman. There is one woman. So, but the Latino population is growing very rapidly in Hawthorne.

So it will be interesting to see. That's just starting to happen. So it will be interesting to see if that turns out like -- like Inglewood. But these positions are power, but there are term limits in some cases. In some cases they're not. And that's -- you know, that plays into it, you know, as well.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Kathay, did you want to come in and just -- some of this is informed by Morgan Kousser's testimony, his recommendation that maybe we should -- he wasn't talking about 203. I think he was talking about Section 5 -- have a 20 percent sort of trigger as -- for Section 5 coverage.

MS. FENG: Okay. I guess what I wanted to maybe point to was an example in Orange County where the largest expatriate community of Vietnamese outside of Vietnam lives. And they live in what's commonly known as Little Saigon. And it covers three different cities: Westminster, Fountain Valley, and Garden Grove. It's a community that, when we first did exit polling they were about 91 percent Republican. More Republican than the surrounding Orange County area, largely because, like many Cubans, they had a history of coming from a communist country and aligning themselves with the party that they felt was anti-communist.

I only say that because I think what's important is that in the eighties and early nineties was probably one of the fastest growing times of this area, Little Saigon. So much so that they became much more visibly present. There are streets that you could drive through, where all of a sudden it went from Ralph's and Albertson's to Saigon and Pho 99 stores, lining up and down where there were visible signs that were in Vietnamese, and people in the neighborhood who were walking were clearly all not the homogenous white population that had lived in that area before.

There is -- there were a couple of examples of Vietnamese-Americans who ran for elected office and who faced incredible discrimination. Some of the campaign signs that they had up would have swastikas drawn on them. And this was in the late nineties, so it's not like it was, you know, fifty years ago or a hundred years ago. And where people would get threats. Where people would show up to poll sites and they would be told, you know, if you're an American, you should be voting in English. If you can't speak English, you shouldn't be voting.

And it's really -- we saw this big change happening around the late nineties and the 2000s when we started being much more present. And what we had been doing in terms of poll monitoring was being present in between 50 and a hundred, sometimes even over that, poll sites in Los Angeles and Orange County. And changing literally poll site by poll site, poll worker by poll worker, where there were changes, documenting them and giving them to the counties so that they would remove those problematic poll workers or relocate a poll site so that it would be in a more friendly venue.

And that's all just to say that I think that you see that kind of very harsh reality manifest itself where communities are changing demographically, where you have an influx of a new population that is very different from who used to live there. Sometimes it's white on minorities. Sometimes, as in Inglewood, it could be African-American on Latino. So the race lines are not necessarily, you know, between majority/minority. It's just that there used to be a homogenous group and it's becoming increasingly heterogenous. And that results in, oftentimes, discrimination at the polling place or discrimination against candidates of that -- of a particular race -- of the new influx group. And it means that the Voting Rights Act becomes all the more important because if you don't have something like that, you have no way of challenging discrimination at the poll site, discrimination by poll workers, or practices that may inadvertently have a disparate impact on a community.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Well, also, it doesn't sound partisan, I mean in Orange County, and it doesn't sound partisan in Hawthorne and in Inglewood either.

MS. FENG: No.

CHAIRMAN LEE: I'm just saying, in the two-party sense.

MS. FOWLER: Yeah, no, it's not partisan in either case. And I was going to speak to, too, in Orange County, if you'll remember, the same thing happened when there started to be a large influx of Latino population. And, as you'll recall --

MS. FENG: I might have been a little partisan.

MS. FOWLER: Yeah. -- Congresswoman Sanchez now, Loretta Sanchez, ran into some severe discrimination in terms of people -- even the literature was unbelievably discriminatory against an incumbent candidate. I don't know, you might want to say that was partisan, I don't know, but it was clearly discriminatory.

But, by the same token, that large flux of population, once you got past that, and there were reports reported to the registrar, reported to here, changing poll workers, changing polling places, et cetera, in more friendly areas, that probably did allow her to get that Congressional seat. And then, because of that volume, then her sister in that Congressional district, because the two sisters are still serving.

MS. FENG: And as I recall, the first time that Loretta Sanchez ran for Congressional office, there were people who staked out poll sites and hung banners up that said "citizens only," with the specific intent to send a message to -- I don't know -- whoever they considered to be more likely to be fraudulent voters. But trying to send an anti-immigrant message that, you don't belong here. And, certainly, that had an intimidating effect on many Latino and Asian-American voters who were trying to vote.

Eventually, within the day, those banners were pulled down, and it was because we had close cooperation with voter registrars, and said hey, you know, that would be a violation of the Voting Rights Act as well as any number of California and local laws. But that kind of voter intimidation certainly has reared its ugly head in a lot of instances in California.

MS. FOWLER: That was along the time of Prop 187, as well, so, it was almost like, if you were Latino and you were here, you were illegal, period, especially in Orange County. That was the perception.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Any more questions? Commissioners? Oh, come on. Come on.

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: I'm fascinated. I have to ask another question. I'm fascinated, you all, I really am, because, first of all, we're in California and there's that old saying that, as California goes, so goes the country. Now, that's good or bad.

In our part of the world, we have a whole lot of you all Californians who make Colorado home, who leave and come work in Colorado. But I'm fascinated because this is a state where you noted this fascinating thing that just happened that doesn't -- that has not happened in any other state. You now have no majority population. You're the first state in the country to be in this new status of not having a majority population. And I'm fascinated as to what that will mean in terms of the dynamics of you all getting along with each other. Have lessons been -- this is more philosophical in nature, and forgive me for asking it, but you're all here, so I've got to ask it.

We've had this cross-section of people who have been here. Latinos have been here. Asians have been here. Various representations of various factions of the Asian community. You, as an African-American, are here. We've had white folks that are here. And you're all here in the state in which you now no longer have a majority, absolute majority. And the question is, in terms of the relationships as they'll exist, or do exist, among you all together as a whole here in California.

I've heard, in my part of the world, that there are classic tensions that exist between black folks and Hispanics here, that folks just can't stand each other at times. That there are real core issues about, you know, the native Latino population here and new immigrant populations, that a substantial portion of Hispanics who lived in California voted in favor of Proposition 187 and said, no, we don't want more folks streaming across the border illegally here into our country, quote, unquote. And so you've got all of those things that are sort of interplay, but now that you have no absolute majority as a population, just very generally, and I want to limit your answers just to a few seconds, if I could.

MS. FENG: Let me just say, I wear another hat, which is I sit on the L.A. County Human Relations Commission, and there is no doubt that racial tension is still alive and well. In Los Angeles, for instance, I think it was 26 of our high schools recently suffered from some crazy rash of racially based violence, where shootings or attacks between one group and another escalated and --

COMMISSIONER ROGERS: Between various minority groups.

MS. FENG: -- between various minority groups -- escalated and then jumped from one school to another because, unfortunately, text messaging between groups. But, let me end with, I think, a note of hope, which is -- I know that we're not talking about Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, but in the most recent restricting process, the African-American, Latino and Asian-American community worked very closely.

And one of the abiding principles that we all sat down and agreed on was that we wanted to make sure that our communities had representation, and, to the extent possible, that our communities weren't divided and that we could advance more districts that could be created, that would have or preserve minority communities, but in no circumstances would we do it at the expense of another community.

And that took a lot of negotiation behind the scenes for us to work out, but for the first time, we actually went to the Senate hearings of the Election and Reapportionment Committee and presented a unity map. And that map -- for instance, in Oakland, we met with Latino and Asian-American communities. And they decided that instead of trying to maximize their community and build a district that would take what is Assembly District 16 south to extend Oakland's district into a city called San Leandro that has a higher population of Asian and Latinos. Instead what they were going to do was reach north, keep the district whole within Oakland and reunify a community of African-Americans that had been split right down the middle by the 1990 lines.

That was of no, quote, unquote, racial political advantage to African-American or Asian-Americans but, in their minds, their community was about being Oaklanders, sharing issues of transportation, of environment, of, you know, issues about city development, that they felt that they had a greater alliance with the African-American community that had been split than Asian-American or Latino communities to the south.

And, I would say, that in example after example in California, when asked where do your communities lie, people who are given the ability to draw the redistricting lines and think about race, but also beyond race, oftentimes chose to be very respectful of other communities of color and many times would build alliances so that they could create districts that would both enhance their community's ability to have a candidate of their choice elected, but also another community's ability.

And can I give you a dozen examples. We can also probably e-mail that to you, because I think in California it certainly is a potential model for other states where, when you give the ability to draw redistricting plans to community groups or to people who live in those communities and not just incumbents, you can have a very different result.

MS. FOWLER: I don't want to dismiss, though, while she painted that very good picture of collaboration on that, the racial tension, as she did say, still exists very well, but it is typically at the younger population. I don't know what this text message -- I thought it was a good thing, but now I'm concerned. It's the -- the education with our youth, I think, that we have a lot of work to do in terms of, one, their self-esteem and their importance on this earth and their purpose, along with, not only the education of that, I think we've missed a lot in terms of who we are as a people individually, culturally, and what we all need to be doing.

And this whole idea of, I'm in your set, not in your set, this street belongs to this gang, this street belongs to that gang, a lot of that comes from, in my opinion, the -- a clue on the economic and the poverty level that has set in where we have reduced -- no programs, no fundamental leadership roles, and things for youth to do once they leave, should they go, to the school that they're supposed to be educated in on a daily basis.

We do have a lot of racial tension. Why that is, I think we're losing some things at home with more families working, where both parents working, or some people working two jobs to try to meet. Much to the chagrin of us, a high percentage in our schools in the minority population are foster children, and that is a frightening and shocking thought for us moving forward in terms of educating our children and having people that are going to be able to move this country in the direction that it needs to be in.

And until one of the schools recently lost their accreditation -- it's back now -- did that fact come out about the high number of foster children that were in that school and not getting the leadership and guidance that they needed. And it's not just -- you can't blame it on the teachers and the school board. They -- there has to be parental or some type of family or some sustaining thing for them -- for them to move forward. And so, when they get to school, they've got these built-up tensions, frustrations, et cetera. And, then, combine that with those that are not going to school, hanging around at the schools, no matter how much security the schools are trying to set up to protect the children that are there, there are always those on the outside that aren't doing the right thing that are there to make trouble. So we do have a long way to go in terms of race relations, but we, hopefully -- we have a new mayor. He's trying to set some standards. The school board is trying to take a different tact. But that's almost like a different group when you start talking about redistricting, you know, and so forth. It's California. It's -- we've got some of everything. Welcome.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Eun Sook or Eugene, do you want to take a crack at that?

MS. LEE: I'd say something really short, which is I felt that it's pretty -- I see signs and I see potential, and in the short amount of time that we have, it would be hard to answer fully, but I do feel that in also the work that we're doing, not only allow around civic engagement and voter empowerment but around, say for example, immigration reform and immigrant rights issues, I have seen the coming together of communities, Asian Pacific American, Latinos and so on.

So I think and -- at the same time, we're also trying to reach out to the African-American community and trying to see the common links. So I think that in a few years we would probably -- I feel I would be able to give a more informed answer about how California will look, given that it's no longer a majority state.

MR. LEE: I don't have much to add. I think Carolyn said it well. When there are a lot of problems, especially young people, with insensitive attitudes -- APALC has a leadership development promise that does a lot of work in high schools in the San Gabriel Valley. And we see a lot of tensions there, from time to time, between Asian and Latino students. And I think a lot of work needs to be done. There's also a lot of potential for good things to come about it. As Kathay mentioned, in 2001, a number of groups worked very well together in making sure that they didn't really step on each other's toes. And I think that's an example in the voting context where groups working together can overcome racial tensions.

CHAIRMAN LEE: Okay. With that, we bring this panel to a conclusion. I'd like to thank the panelists. This has been an exceedingly thoughtful panel, actually, and I think that the -- I think you've touched some really deep issues -- goaded by Commissioner Rogers, of course. But, you know, we thank you very much for your answers and I think all of us believe they were very thoughtful answers. So thank you. [Applause] We should applaud. We have on the schedule closing statements. Does anyone feel the need to have a closing statement?

COMMISSIONER BUCHANAN: Amen.

CHAIRMAN LEE: "Amen" it shall be. Okay. Thank you very much.

(Whereupon, at 5:05 P.M., the hearing was adjourned.)

LAWYERS' COMMITTEE FOR CIVIL RIGHTS UNDER LAW

National Commission ON the Voting Rights Act

MID-ATLANTIC REGIONAL HEARING

October 14, 2005
10:00 a.m.
Arnold & Porter, LLP
555 12th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C.

P R O C E E D I N G S

MR. JOSEPH: Welcome. I'm Jimmy Joseph from Arnold & Porter and I wanted to welcome all of you here today for your participation in this very important ongoing effort by the Lawyers' Committee For Civil Rights. I'm very proud to be a member of the Lawyers' Committee board of directors and to have participated in several of their voting rights projects over the last year. And this is a wonderful service that the Lawyers' Committee is doing and I know that the commissioners appreciate the input from everyone who is testifying around the country and we look forward to a successful outcome of this hearing. Barbara?

MS. ARNWINE: Thank you. Good morning, everyone. I am Barbara Arnwine, executive director for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. I welcome you to this, the ninth of 10 hearings of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. I first want to thank James Joseph and the law firm of Arnold & Porter for hosting today's meeting, commission hearing, in this wonderful space. It's quite great to be here.

We begin this hearing a week before the House Judiciary Committee begins hearings on the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. We expect the report that will be written by the National Commission to greatly inform the record of discrimination in voting that Congress will consider as it debates the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act.

The National Commission's report will assess the impact that the Voting Rights Act has had on combating discrimination in voting and allowing minority voters to vote for their candidate of choice. It will offer a comprehensive picture of the state of discrimination in voting today by reviewing the enforcement record of the Department of Justice, cases litigated by voting rights attorneys, and of course the testimony from our regional hearings.

Together this data will paint a complete picture of the role that the Voting Rights Act has played in combating discrimination in voting over the past 40 years and how minority voters still depend on its protections to ensure that everyone has equal access to the political process.

The commission's report will be released in January 2006. Don't quake too much, Chandler. The National Commission has had hearings in Montgomery, Alabama; Phoenix, Arizona; New York, New York; Minneapolis, Minnesota; Americas, Georgia; Orlando, Florida; Rapid City, South Dakota and Los Angeles, California.

The evidence so far has been both helpful and disheartening. During each hearing, we heard from voting rights litigators who have been instrumental in the development of the Voting Rights Act, ensuring that its protections reach those at risk of discrimination.

We have heard from experts who have studied the impact of the Act on affected communities and we have heard from community activists and citizens who have given powerful anecdotal evidence that proves that the Voting Rights Act, particularly Section 5, one of the central provisions in the Voting Rights Act, which must be reauthorized, has been responsible for providing a voice to formerly voiceless communities.

Unfortunately, however, we also heard from advocates and citizens chronicling the continuing disparity in the voting rights experience between minority voters and other voters. Clearly the work of the Voting Rights Act, while having a powerful effect on minority voters, is not done.

We have heard from African-American and Latino voters in the South who still struggle against discrimination, from American-Indians in the Southwest and Midwest that tell of the dreadful lack of resources, from Asian-Americans and others in the Northeast and all of them pointing to the need for language assistance and culturally sensitive polls.

And we have heard testimony about the impact the Department of Justice observers in subsequent enforcements have had enforcing jurisdictions in the Northeast to make our democracy accessible to Asian-Americans and Latinos, resulting in members of those communities winning elections to local government mostly for the first time in history.

I am grateful for the assistance that the National Commission has received from the Commission's many cosponsoring civil rights and civic organizations. It is this coordinated effort by members of the civil rights community that has helped the National Commission to accomplish its immense task.

Today we will hear from policy makers, experts, attorneys and advocates who examine the challenges that minority voters have faced in Virginia and Maryland as well as an analysis of how well the aspiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act has served minority voters nationwide, including a look at the enforcement record in the Department of Justice.

I look forward to hearing today's testimony and adding it to the already impressive record of this august body. When we put together this impressive group of commissioners, we did so knowing that theirs was not an easy task. In fact, as you heard about the other eight hearings, we have literally had these commissioners traveling all over the country, sometimes having hearings within days of each other and going from one extreme to another. Nevertheless, they have done an impressive job.

What we were asking of them and what we have asked of them has been nothing short of assessing the continuing importance of arguably the most important piece of civil rights legislation that has ever passed Congress. They have responded with distinction. I am proud to see this process unfolding and to have the opportunity to work with such a distinguished group.

It is my pleasure to introduce you to the Honorable Joe Rogers, who is the commissioner who is going to preside over today's hearing. The Honorable Joe Rogers completed his term as the lieutenant governor of Colorado in 2003 where he held the distinction of serving as America's youngest lieutenant governor and only the fourth African-American in U.S. history ever to hold that position.

He served as founding chairman of the Republican Lieutenant Governor's Association and served on the executive committee of the National Conference of Lieutenant Governors. He created the acclaimed Dream Alive program in dedication to the memory and legacy of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and the leaders of the civil rights movement. Today it is my pleasure to turn this program over to Commissioner Joe Rogers.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, Barbara. Good morning, everybody. Is everybody all right? We are glad to be with you here in Washington, a bit of a ways away from Colorado. But you all saw a snowstorm that hit our state just the other day.

What you didn't see was about eight hours later, all the snow went away. We're fortunate we live in that part of the country where things just sort of come and go in terms of the weather, but very much delighted to be with you all here today. Barbara, thank you for the gracious introduction, and we're delighted to be with you here and the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act.

This morning I would like to provide you with some introduction as to the substance of why we're here and frankly what we seek to do here this morning. On behalf of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, I want to welcome you today to the ninth of 10 public hearings that the Commission is conducting. This hearing is the Mid-Atlantic Regional Hearing where we will be looking at the effect of the Voting Rights Act on Maryland and Virginia, hear from voting rights advocates and from experts who have studied various aspects of the Act.

In past hearings, we heard some compelling testimony about voting discrimination and the impact of the Voting Rights Act on African-American and Latino voters in the South, Latino and American-Indian voters in the Southwest, African-American, Asian and Latino voters in the Northeast and American-Indian and African, Asian and Latino voters in the Midwest. Today here in Washington, D.C., we will be able to hear from the former Department of Justice attorneys who will talk about the enforcement of various provisions of the Act.

Before we start, I wanted to give you a bit of background on the Voting Rights Act and the provisions that will expire in 2007. The Voting Rights Act was signed into law in 1965 by President Lyndon Johnson in response to voting discrimination encountered by African-Americans in the South. When Congress reauthorized the Voting Rights Act in 1975, it made specific findings that the use of English-only elections and other devices effectively barred minority language citizens from participating in the electoral process.

In response, Congress expanded the Act to account for discrimination against language minority citizens, by enacting the Minority Language Assistance Provisions found in Section 203. Before discussing Section 5 and Section 203 in great detail, I want to expand on what is scheduled to expire in 2007 and what is not.

The right of African-Americans and other minorities to vote is guaranteed by the 15th Amendment and is permanent. Permanent provisions of the Act ban literacy tests and poll taxes, outlaw intimidation, authorizes federal monitors and observers and creates various mechanisms to protect the voting rights of racial and language minorities.

However, there are some temporary provisions of the Voting Rights Act that will sunset in 2007, unless they are reauthorized by Congress. Our primary focus today is on these temporary provisions, the expiring provisions. In 2007, three major protections of the Voting Rights Act will expire unless Congress acts to reauthorize these sections.

First is Section 5 of the Act requires certain states, counties and townships with a history of discrimination against minority voters to obtain approval or preclearance from the United States Department of Justice or the United States District Court in Washington, D.C. before they make any voting change. These changes include redistrictings, changes to the methods of election, polling place changes. Jurisdictions covered by Section 5 must prove that the changes do not have the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on the account of race, color or membership in a language or minority.

Virginia is covered by Section 5. However, nonpolitical jurisdictions have successfully bailed out of their obligations under Section 5 here in Virginia. This is a provision of the Act that specifically allows for this option to exist where essentially a locality has successfully complied with the terms of the Act.

Second, Section 203 of the Act requires that language assistance be provided to communities with a significant number of voting age citizens who have limited English proficiency. Four language groups are covered by Section 203. American-Indians, Asian-Americans, Alaskan natives and those of Spanish heritage. Covered jurisdictions must provide language assistance at all stages of the electoral process. As of 2002, a total of 466 jurisdictions across 31 states are covered by these provisions. In this region, Montgomery County, Maryland is subject to Section 203 for Spanish language citizens.

Third, Section 6B, 7, 8 and 9 and 13A of the Act authorize the attorney general to appoint a federal examiner to jurisdictions covered by Section 5's preclearance provisions on good cause or to send a federal observer to any jurisdiction where an examiner has been assigned. Since 1966, 25,000 federal observers have been deployed in approximately 1,000 elections throughout the United States.

The Commission's purpose of its membership. The Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, under the direction of Barbara Arnwine, acting on behalf of the Civil Rights Committee, created the nonpartisan National Commission of the Voting Rights Act to examine discrimination in voting since 1982. The National Commission is comprised of eight advocates, academics, legislators and civil rights leaders who represent the diversity that is such an important part of our great nation.

The honorary chair of the Commission is the Honorable Charles Mathias, former Republican United States Senator from Maryland. The other six national commissioners are Commissioner Chair Bill Lann Lee, who could not be with us here today; the Honorable John Buchanan, former congressman from Alabama; Professor Chandler Davidson, who is to my right, distinguished scholar and coeditor of one of the seminal works on the Voting Rights Act; Delores Huerta, cofounder of the United Farm Workers of America; Elsie Meeks, the first Native-American member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights; and, as you all know, Professor Charles Ogletree, the distinguished Harvard professor and civil rights advocate.

Joining me today are Commissioners Davidson and Ogletree. We are also fortunate to have two regional guest commissioners, one of which is here with us today, Karen Narasaki. Karen, we're delighted to have you here today and thanks so much for being with us.

I want to give you a little bit of Karen's background, by the way. We'll come right back to you, Karen, I promise.

The Commission has two primary tasks. First, to conduct regional hearings such as this one across the country to gather testimony relating to voting rights. And, second, to write a comprehensive report detailing the existence of discrimination in voting since 1982, the last time there was a comprehensive reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. The report will be used to educate the public, advocates and policy makers about the record of racial discrimination in voting.

I also wanted to share with you some information about our hearing purpose and how today's hearing will work. There will be three panels today. The first two panels are comprised of policy makers, leading experts, voting rights practitioners and advocates. Each panelist will provide a 5 to 10-minute presentation. After all the members of the panel have spoken, the Commission will ask questions of the panelists.

We encourage members of the public who are here today to share their voting rights experiences in our third and final panel of today. If you are interested in participating in this panel, please speak with one of our staff members who is here today. If you would like to share your testimony but cannot stay, please see one of the staff members who will take your statement so that it can be included in the record.

Just so you all know, we have members who are here as a part of our staff. Would you all the just stand or raise your hand so that everybody can see you and knows who to come to? Absolutely. And Barbara, I guess we should give everybody a round of applause. We appreciate you being here.

(Applause.)

MR. ROGERS: Congressman Watt, I know that your schedule requires that you leave today so we wanted to, if we could, just break a little bit in terms of our overall pattern in terms of the time for testimony and our panel discussions today. Congressman, if you would come forward, we would appreciate that. We understand that you have to run in terms of your schedule and we would appreciate the opportunity to hear from you directly.

I would like to provide you with some background information as it relates to Congressman Watt. First of all, it's good to see you. In 1992, Congressman Melvin Watt was elected to the United States House of Representatives from North Carolina's 12th congressional District and became one of only two African-American members elected to Congress from North Carolina in the 20th Century.

The 12th district is North Carolina's most urban congressional district. Currently Congressman Watt is a member of the House Financial Services Committee where he serves on the Financial Institution Subcommittee, the Domestic and International Monetary Policy Subcommittee and the Capital Markets, Insurance and Government Sponsored Enterprises Subcommittee.

Congressman Watt is on the House Judiciary Committee also where he serves as ranking member on the Subcommittee on Commercial and Administrative Law. In December of 2004, Congressman Watt was elected as chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus.

We're so delighted to have you with us today, Congressman Watt, and thank you for being with us. We would appreciate hearing your thoughts and answering any questions that we might have.

CONGRESSMAN WATT: Thank you so much and thank you all for inviting me to be here today. I'm usually sitting on the opposite side of this hearing process and I'm trying to enforce some time constraints so I'll try to be cognizant of time constraints sitting on this side also because I know you all have a substantial amount of work and testimony to hear today.

Let me start by applauding the work of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act for the important role that you all are playing in this process as we move to an effort to try to reauthorize the expiring provisions of the Act. Most people kind of take for granted that, well, you can just vote and extend the provisions of the Voting Rights Act that are expiring.

But those of us who know the legal and legislative process know how important it is to build a record that substantiates the necessity of what we are doing in the expansion and extension of the expiring provisions lest the Supreme Court look at what is being done or has been done and say there was no legal, constitutional, historical justification for this kind of affirmative action in the voting rights area.

So the role that the Commission is playing in helping to build the record and substantiate the continuing discrimination and exclusion of African-American voters from the -- and other minority voters from the electoral process is an extremely important one.

In the 40 years since its passage, the Voting Rights Act has come to be regarded as one of the most effective civil rights laws in our nation's history. The Voting Rights Act has safeguarded the right of millions of minorities to have their votes counted and consequently to have their voices heard. Today's hearing focuses on Virginia and Maryland and I know that there are panelists here with specific data on voting practices in those states, but I'm here to applaud the Voting Rights Act for its impact nationally on protecting and preserving the rights of minorities to vote free from discrimination.

Prior to the passage of the Voting Rights Act, there were fewer than 300 African-Americans in public office in all of the Southern states. This figure rose to 2,400 by 1980 and stands at more than 9,000 today. Similar increases have been seen in other racial groups. For example, the Act has facilitated access to the political process for many of the 4,853 Latinos who now hold public office. The Act has similarly benefited Native Americans, Asians and other minority groups that have historically encountered many barriers to full political participation.

But the success of the Act is not cause for its demise as some have argued. When something works, you run with it, not away from it, especially when the purpose has not yet been fully fulfilled. And we have the opportunity, this Congress, to extend and strengthen the Voting Rights Act to ensure that the democratic process continues to evolve and be protected in its fullest aspects.

The trends in increased voter registration, not only minorities serving in political office, may also be attributed to a substantial degree to the existence of the Voting Rights Act. These gains are a testament to the effectiveness of the Act as well as its continued necessity. Although there are only certain provisions of the Voting Rights Act that are scheduled to expire, I believe that the structure of the Act in its totality is what has made it the success that it is.

Section 2 of the Act applies nationwide and prohibits all forms of voting discrimination on the basis of race, color or membership in a language minority. Because of Section 2, violations of voting rights may be challenged whenever and wherever they occur.

Section 5 forces jurisdictions with a historical record of discrimination to preclear any voting changes to ensure that those changes will not disenfranchise minority voters. But those jurisdictions covered by Section 5 may also bail out from coverage by demonstrating that they now facilitate equal opportunity at the ballot box. The bail-out process undercuts any argument that the Voting Rights Act is an intrusion on states' rights.

I support states' rights but we also know that states also violate the Constitution and some of them have a long and persistent history of doing so. Other expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act help ensure that voters are free from discrimination on election day. The federal examiner or observer provisions are key when effectively utilized by the Department of Justice. These provisions ensure a federal presence in areas that are suspected of inappropriate discriminatory or other activity.

Section 203 is also vitally important. The significant increase in the Latino and Asian population since 1975 when the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act were first adopted makes these aspects of the law even more significant today. Native-American language groups and Alaska natives also benefit from the language assistance provided in Section 203.

Based on testimony and other evidence showing how gerrymandering, annexation, adoption of at-large elections and other political maneuvers that have been used to discriminate against and disenfranchise minority voters, Congress voted three times to extend Section 5 in 1970 for five years, 1975 for seven years and 1982 for 25 years. I know that through these hearings of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, that some of that similar evidence will be entered into the record, evidence that discrimination, exclusion and failure to make every vote count still persists, that the job of the Voting Rights Act is not yet done.

Much progress has been made in minority voting rights and office holding in recent times, but it has been made in large measure because of the existence of Section 5 and the other provisions of the Voting Rights Act. Racial bloc voting and polarization continue to exist. In fact, those who think the purposes behind the Voting Rights Act and the Act itself have outlived their usefulness need only look to my own state and the story behind my eventual run and election to Congress.

We're not talking about problems that occurred 40 years ago. Many of you may recall the races for the U.S. Senate that Harvey Gantt launched against Jessie Helms in 1990 and 1996. In those two contests, racially divisive ads helped seal Harvey Gantt's defeat. And prior to my election in 1992, no African-American had been elected to Congress from North Carolina in the 1900s, since 1898, despite the fact that the African-American population in North Carolina was approximately 20 percent.

So I don't believe the Voting Rights Act requires proportional representation, nor do I believe that every racial and language minority who runs must or should win. But without the protections of the Voting Rights Act, more elections may be tainted by blatantly divisive tactics. Without the protections of the Voting Rights Act, the people who deserve and require representation most will be misinformed, intimidated or simply deterred from exercising their right to vote.

You were generous in your introduction to indicate that I am now serving as chair of the Congressional Black Caucus, an honor that I am proud to have, and I can tell you that the majority of our members, the majority of our members would not be members of the Congressional Black Caucus, would not be serving in the Congress of the United States but for the provisions of the Voting Rights Act. And most of them are there because of the aggressive enforcement that has occurred since 1990 when the Voting Rights Act started to be aggressively enforced more vigorously.

And discriminatory acts still continue, exclusion still continues and until we root every aspect, every nuance of discrimination out of the process, our democracy cannot be the true democracy that we expect it to be.

I was in South Africa before the election occurred there, the free election, and I remember leaving and thinking that, at that time, perhaps the United States was still the model of democracy throughout the world. Since then, I've come to question that with the large participation in South Africa, the lack of impediments to voting there, pictures on ballots to help people who can't read. There are a number of things that we could do. Doing away with voter registration. I never have quite understood why, in a democratic, free society like America, you need to register voters, especially with advanced technology that allows us to check and cross-check whether people are double voting or not.

I think our democracy needs the Voting Rights Act to assure the level of participation that we have today. And to do away with the Voting Rights Act, in fact, not to strengthen the Voting Rights Act, to make it live up to its real promise, I think would be a blow to our democracy and would substantially erode our ability to say to the world that we have the most effective democracy in existence in today's world.

So I applaud your efforts to build this record. I assure you that we will be working, as members of Congress, to take the record that you are building, and to get it into the congressional record as part of what we're doing. We were fortunate recently to have the chair of the Judiciary Committee in the House just a week and a half ago attend the brain trust, the Congressional Black Caucus brain trust on voting rights that I chair, and to get his pledge that there would be 10 or 12 hearings conducted by the Judiciary Committee in preparation for drafting a bill that reflects current day conditions. And the hearings that you all are conducting will be made a part of that congressional record.

I applaud you for it, thank you for it, and thank all of you for the wonderful work that you are doing to help make our democracy viable by justifying and documenting the ongoing need for the expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act. Thank you so much.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely.

(Applause.)

MR. ROGERS: Congressman, thank you so much. I did want to ask you, do you have a moment that we could ask you a few questions?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: I would be happy to.

MR. ROGERS: Wonderful. There may be commissioners who have questions for you. We'll start with Commissioner Davidson.

MR. DAVIDSON: Congressman, it's a pleasure to hear you speak today. I've read about you over the years but this is the first time I've actually met you face to face.

CONGRESSMAN WATT: Just don't believe everything you read.

(Laughter.)

MR. DAVIDSON: You made the statement a few minutes ago that the majority of the Congressional Black Caucus wouldn't be serving in Congress today were it not for the Voting Rights Act. My first question is, would you be one of those Congresspeople?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: I would definitely be one of those Congresspeople. If you look at the history of the districts in North Carolina, if race and the Voting Rights Act -- if the Voting Rights Act were not in place, there simply never would have been created the opportunity for African-Americans to be elected.

And when you've got 20 percent of your population being African-Americans and you take that 20 percent and disperse it into other congressional districts and make it an effective minority or an ineffective minority, you simply don't have the right to have the African-American community elect the representatives of their choice. So I would certainly not be here today but for the Voting Rights Act.

MR. DAVIDSON: If I understand you, then, the premise of your explanation for your being elected is that there is a high degree of racially polarized voting in North Carolina?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: There is a very high degree of racially polarized voting and we like to think that the racially polarized voting is decreasing. It should be decreasing over time.

But if you took a blind poll today, as was done 25 years or so ago in preparation for Gingles versus Thornburg, and you ask white voters whether they would vote for a black candidate, there would still be today a substantial minority of white voters who would say that under no circumstances would they consider voting for an African-American candidate.

It got so bad in North Carolina really that the dramatic example that I point to all the time, we had -- in North Carolina, our court system is an elected system. We had an African-American lawyer who had practiced law, distinguished record. At that time, you weren't even required to be a judge to be on the appellate courts of -- you weren't required to be a lawyer to be on the appellate courts of North Carolina.

And a fireman ran against him. No legal background, no experience, nothing to commend him for the court except that he was white, against a well-qualified, seasoned African-American lawyer who had been practicing law for years in North Carolina.

MR. DAVIDSON: What was his name?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: I can't remember his name. I can get that for you. But the fireman won the election. And, I mean, there is just no more dramatic example of the impact of racially polarized voting. And when I say racially polarized voting, I'm not talking about people who prefer one race over the other. I'm talking about people who will tell you that under no circumstances will they consider voting for a minority candidate, an African-American candidate.

All voters have preferences. You know, most voters would prefer to vote for a white candidate, black voters might prefer to vote for a black candidate. That's not evidence necessarily of racial polarization. But when you get white voters who are in a substantial majority saying that they will, under no circumstances, consider voting for an African-American candidate, those voters need to be factored out of the equation. The playing field needs to be leveled to factor them out because you know they are voting solely on the basis of race.

And that's where the Voting Rights Act comes into play. It allows those voters who are themselves taking race into account affirmatively by saying they are not, under any circumstances, going to vote for a minority candidate. They're taking race into account.

All the Voting Rights Act does is say you can take race into account on the opposite side to balance that equation. That's what the Voting Rights Act has done over the years. And as long as there are still people out there who are saying, I won't vote for a minority candidate under any circumstances, the Voting Rights Act will always be needed.

Now, I hope, at some point in the life of my children or, if I have grandchildren, at some point in their lives, that those attitudes will change. But they have not yet changed sufficiently to allow us to do away with the Voting Rights Act yet. Long answer. I'm sorry. I get on my soapbox.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, Congressman. Professor Ogletree?

MR. OGLETREE: Good morning, Congressman Watt, and congratulations --

CONGRESSMAN WATT: Good morning. My hero, Professor Ogletree.

MR. OGLETREE: Thank you for your excellent leadership on the Congressional Black Caucus and all that you've done. And we've really appreciated being here in Washington and that you could join us knowing your busy schedule.

I just wanted to touch upon a point that you made in your written presentation this morning that should be underscored. The significance of this Act reauthorization could not be clearer when we look at the state of North Carolina. Perhaps the most dispiriting piece of legislation on the voting rights, the case of Shaw versus Reno, comes out of North Carolina despite the able and legendary work of both of our mentors, Judge A. Leon Higginbotham, who fought very hard to try to ensure that sort of representation. And it's underscored by other factors. It's not simply the right to vote but all the benefits of voting.

For example, because of the power of members of the Senate, a President of this country is unable to express his will to diversify the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in the 1990s because a Senator from the state of North Carolina prevented that from happening. A well-qualified, capable individual who should have been appointed a decade ago, that never happened because of the implications of voting.

And finally, it ties in today's issues with Hurricane Katrina. As we think about the impact on Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida, it is ironic that, by my count, we have one African-American in the state of Louisiana in the House, that's Congressman Bill Jefferson, one in the whole state of Mississippi, that's Congressman Bennie Thompson, and yet we have substantial representation of African-Americans in all of those states.

The question, with that background, is, is it your sense that if we strengthen the Voting Rights Act, that we may be able to address the underrepresentation of African-Americans, particularly in those regions of the South where we have substantial voters but very little actual representation in Congress?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: You actually pointed to one of the concrete examples where the Voting Rights Act should have had, did have and then had the Supreme Court undercut some of its provisions by court rulings and then you go back in the opposite direction.

You pointed to Louisiana. You had Bill Jefferson, you had Cleo Fields. Cleo Fields and I came in to Congress in 1992. We both were elected. Both of us were elected because of the benefits of the Voting Rights Act. A court case was filed. A provision of the Voting Rights Act was undercut by a Supreme Court interpretation of the provision. Cleo Fields' congressional district was redrawn to substantially reduce the African-American population in his congressional district.

The next election, Cleo Fields, seeing -- running polls, understanding that he simply was not going to be re-elected in that congressional district as it had been reconfigured, decided he had a better shot at running statewide in Louisiana for the United States Senate. Ran for the U.S. Senate, lost. White person elected to the newly drawn district.

So you end up with a state -- Louisiana probably has 25, 30, 35 percent African-American population. Instead of having two African-American representatives, they have only one and that one is from New Orleans which, because of Katrina and the mass exodus of African-Americans from the city, if those people don't come back, there may not be any African-American representative in Louisiana in the House.

So race, a dramatic factor. And part of that is simply because folks will -- white people will not -- all of them will not consider voting for an African-American candidate. Some of them will. Attitudes are changing. This is a transitional remedy. That's why we come back periodically and renew the provisions of the Act rather than making it permanent. So we're doing it the right way. We're doing it in the legal context but the way we do it and whether we do it or not has a dramatic impact.

And if we don't strengthen -- restrengthen the provisions that have been undercut by the Supreme Court, then you're going to see more erosion of minority representation in this country, I believe.

MR. OGLETREE: Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Commissioner Narasaki?

MS. NARASAKI: Thank you. I have two questions, Congressman Watt. The first is, North Carolina was the third fastest growing Asian-American population, grew by over 127 percent. I'm wondering whether any Asian-Americans have been elected to office in North Carolina. And the second question is, in your testimony, you talked about the need to strengthen the Act and I'm wondering what things you think need to be done in order to do that.

CONGRESSMAN WATT: I can't tell you that I know an Asian-American who has been elected in North Carolina. That doesn't necessarily mean that none has, but I can try to research that and put it into the record.

MS. NARASAKI: I'm not aware of any either.

CONGRESSMAN WATT: But I'm not aware of any Asian-Americans who serve in elected office in North Carolina. And the number is growing. The number is not growing as fast as the Latino/Hispanic population in North Carolina and there are a few Latino or Hispanic representatives yet being elected in North Carolina, although I think it's a coming thing.

Most people don't realize, in my congressional district alone, I had the first -- the highest percentage increase of Latino voters of any congressional district in the country. I went from under 1 percent to over almost 9 percent, like 900 percent increase in a 10-year span. So minorities, Latino, Asian-Americans are growing in North Carolina.

The second question was --

MS. NARASAKI: You had said there was a need to strengthen the Act and I'm wondering what you would --

CONGRESSMAN WATT: You want to know what -- well, there are two important cases that have been decided over the last 10-15 years by the Supreme Court, actually over the last 10 years, I guess, by the Supreme Court that have substantially undercut the provisions of Section 5 and we think that those -- Section 5 needs to be restored so that the intent that was there by Congress when those provisions were passed would be implemented.

So that's probably the most important set of changes that we are proposing to try to just get us back to what we understood and what the courts were saying at that time was the meaning of Section 5. If we could just get back to that. We're not trying to strengthen it beyond that but certainly get back to that original intent.

Now, there are other things that are being discussed but that's the primary thing. There is some discussion of maybe expanding the coverage but I won't wade off into that more controversial territory. I personally would like to see us expand the coverage to include jurisdictions where there has been a finding of racial discrimination in the last 25 years since the last extension of the Act was, to add them to the covered jurisdictions that would be required to get preclearance.

I don't think you can have a clearer indication of the effect of racial discrimination than in the jurisdictions that have been found by a court to have violated the Voting Rights Act in the last 25 years. It just seems to me like a no-brainer but it's also very controversial. And I'm speaking for myself now. I'm not talking for any organization, I'm not talking for the CBC, I'm not talking for anybody. I'm just talking about from my own personal perspective, that seems like it would be a no-brainer for me.

MS. NARASAKI: Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly. Thank you for joining us. We're glad to have you with us.

MR. RABEN: I don't have a question but if I could comment.

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MR. RABEN: Thank you.

CONGRESSMAN WATT: I know they say things about me.

MR. RABEN: You may be sorry you said that. I was going to, on behalf of La Raza, thank you for your leadership on this. I heard you say we're going to have 12 hearings, or I heard that you said we're going to have 12 hearings in the House and La Raza will be there supporting you and working with you. No good deed goes unpunished and we're going to have a busy year. That's all. Thank you for allowing me to say that.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. Thank you very much.

CONGRESSMAN WATT: I thought Robert was going to say something about me and I was trying to stop that from happening. He wasn't going to put anything bad on the record.

MR. RABEN: I hear you well.

CONGRESSMAN WATT: He and Charles Ogletree know me well enough that they could put some bad things on the record.

MR. ROGERS: Professor Davidson, do you have a question?

MR. DAVIDSON: If you've got the time, Congressman, I would like to ask just a couple more questions and it goes back to this issue of racially polarized voting. And I guess my first question is, wouldn't some people say, in response to your claim that there are a lot of white people who wouldn't vote for blacks in your state, 40 counties of which are covered by the Voting Rights Act, that this is just a matter of partisanship. You're a Democrat. A lot of whites are Republican and that we're not talking about racial animus here but we're simply talking about a partisan animus. How would you respond to that?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: Well, I've heard that argument. Every time I make the statement, in fact, I usually hear that argument on the other side and I try to remind people that the Voting Rights Act has nothing to do with partisan politics. I've seen a number of instances where African-American Republican candidates have not gotten the support from Republicans that would allow them to win. I've seen a number of African-American Democrat candidates who have not gotten the level of support they need from white electorates to win. So it cuts --

MR. DAVIDSON: Are there nonpartisan elections in your state at the city level, for example, or at the county level?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: There are a number of jurisdictions in North Carolina that have nonpartisan elections. We still have partisan elections, in Charlotte where I live, for city council and county commission. We have nonpartisan elections for the school board.

MR. DAVIDSON: How have African-Americans faired in those kind of elections?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: African-Americans don't fair well in those except in minority voting rights districts. Don't have to necessarily be majority black districts but race has to be taken into account enough to factor out the people on the opposite side who will not, under any circumstances, take race out of their equation.

I was sitting here running through the political equation of whether I should give you a specific example of this partisan thing. Professor Ogletree will know that after Judge Gregory went to the Fourth Circuit in a recess appointment and became the first African-American on the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, there was a woman after that who was appointed named Alyson Duncan.

MR. OGLETREE: Right.

CONGRESSMAN WATT: Alyson Duncan is a Republican. She served on the North Carolina Court of Appeals and our court of appeals runs state-wide.

MR. DAVIDSON: This is an elective post?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: Elective office. She was appointed to the court. When she ran the next time, she was defeated.

MR. DAVIDSON: By a white?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: By a white person, yes. White male, right? This is a woman who now is the Republican's appointment to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, Federal Circuit Court. So you could not argue about her imminent qualifications. We didn't even argue about her qualifications. We thought she was imminently qualified. There was not a whimper of opposition to Alyson Duncan when she was nominated to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, Democrat or Republican.

So there is nobody in judicial legal circles who could argue about it. But because she was black, she wasn't qualified enough for the voters, Republican or Democrat. So this is not a partisan issue. This is a race issue that we're talking about here.

MR. DAVIDSON: My last question, and I'm sorry to kind of hog the questions here, but do you have very many African-American elected officials at the statewide level in North Carolina?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: Well, we had a state treasurer -- I'm sorry, state auditor who was just elected and just defeated. He had been in office for a number of terms and we think that race was the decisive factor. It was a very close race. So now we have I think the only state-wide elected official, African-American elected official in North Carolina, is one of the judges on the court of appeals. So you could argue that things have gotten worse, not better, in terms of racial attitude.

And perhaps some of that is attributable to partisan politics. I'm not suggesting that partisan politics doesn't play some role but, most importantly, normally the decisive factor is race. It's not whether you're Republican or Democrat. The decisive factor is race. And race, even in the world of the United States Supreme Court, in the world that all of us aspire to, race should not be a factor.

But when the real world is taking it into account in the way they cast their votes, the only way you can counteract that is to make it a factor in the legal framework because it has to be offset. Otherwise, our society, our electoral process becomes a slave to racism, to racially polarized voting. And we have to move beyond that point. So I just want to emphasize that this is transitional. We're not talking about a permanent remedy here. The transition, the duration will be there only as long as these racial attitudes persist that make it impossible for African-Americans and other minorities to be playing in the political arena on a level playing field.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MR. OGLETREE: I would just want to make a comment to respond to Congressman Watt's comment about racism being the most significant factor. It's ironic in the state where I now live where we've had the largest number, I think in the history of the country, the largest number of unsuccessful candidates for the President of the United States -- we did have John Kennedy in 1960 but we've had many failures since then -- that we see a state that was able to elect Edward Brooke, the first African-American as a Republican, a moderate, in the history of the Senate.

And yet our delegation today in 2005 is all white, all male and all Democratic. So race does matter. In one of the most quickly diversified states in the country, it still matters. It's not in the South. We're the bluest of the blue states, having -- along with Wisconsin, the only two states that elected George McGovern. That tells you how blue we are.

But you touched an important principle, that people should be elected across the country without regard to race and I hope that through the educational provisions of the Voting Rights Act and other things we can do to elect people based on qualifications and not just on race, because we have outstanding candidates who are not being elected because of their race and not because of lack of qualifications. And hopefully the hearings on October 18th will allow us to get underneath some of these factors that are preventing us from having a much more diverse Congress.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly, Professor. Congressman, I'm so tempted to ask you questions but we're tough on time at this point in terms of other members. What I did want to do is -- I can't help myself. I've got to ask you one question. I do want to get a sense about the pulse that you have on Congress right now. These expiring provisions, Section 5, Section 203, what's your pulse or sense about reauthorization at the present time?

CONGRESSMAN WATT: I don't know that I can give you a pulse of the Congress as a whole. I think we're trying to build a bipartisan, bi-racial, bi-ethnic coalition to do what needs to be done and where everybody is now is kind of on a superficial level because everybody is saying, yes, let's reauthorize. But what's behind that is not clear. Is it just a straight reauthorization, is it to try to get us back to where we were before the Supreme Court started chipping away at the foundations of -- or actually taking an axe to the foundations. Chip wouldn't be accurate or descriptive enough. Taking an axe to some of the provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

And I think that's when you start to test the willingness of people to be committed to it. When you start talking about a possibility of bringing some more current day jurisdictions who have violated -- the Supreme Court and the courts have found that they've violated the Voting Rights Act, will that support be there, if you get to talking about that.

Example: Massachusetts. And some of the jurisdictions in Massachusetts have been determined to be in violation of the Voting Rights Act. Will the folks in Massachusetts be willing to subject themselves to the same kind of preclearance requirements that some of the Southern states have? It's hard to gauge because the discussions are taking place on this kind of global superficial level and until you get down into the guts of what is needed to make the Voting Rights Act a continuing effective mechanism to level the playing field, it's just hard to assess where people are because you don't know how deep and wide the level of support is. It's wide now. We're wondering how deep it is.

MR. ROGERS: Congressman, we're so appreciative of you taking the time to be with us here this morning. I know your schedule. Your staff will indicate it's time for you to probably head on but we very much appreciate you spending the time with us today.

CONGRESSMAN WATT: He doesn't get to ask any questions today.

MR. GREENBAUM: No, I'm just the staff director.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, Congressman Watt. We appreciate you --

(Applause.)

MR. ROGERS: I wanted to give you all a quick update in terms of what we're doing on time. As you can all see by your watches, we are tough on time at this point but we are going to move things along quickly. I'm going to ask the remaining members of the panel if they would please come up to the area that we have set for you here and look for your name tag, if you would. I would like to now -- thank you for kindly coming up.

I would like to now introduce each of the commissioners who are at the hearing today. Each will make just a brief -- actually what we're going to do is we're going to waive the opening statement right now. We'll come back to it in a moment, if that's all right. But I would like to make sure that you all have an understanding at least of the commissioners who are here.

Commissioner Chandler Davidson is the Radoslav Tsanoff Professor of Public Policy Emeritus and served as chair of the department of sociology at Rice University. Dr. Davidson was the coeditor of the Quiet Revolution in the South, a definitive work on the impact of the Voting Rights Act in the South. Dr. Davidson testified before Congress during the 1982 reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act and we're so glad to have you here.

Commissioner Charles Ogletree, the Harvard law school Jesse Climenko professor of law and founding and executive director of the Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race and Justice. He's a prominent legal theorist who has an international reputation of examining the complex issues of law and working to secure the rights guaranteed by the Constitution for everyone equally under the law.

Commissioner Karen Narasaki is the president and executive director of the Asian-American Justice Center, formerly the National Asian Pacific American Legal Consortium. The AAJC is a nonprofit, nonpartisan civil rights organization whose mission it is to advance the human and civil rights of Asian Pacific Americans through advocacy, public policy, public education and litigation.

Ms. Narasaki is a nationally recognized leader in the Asian-American community where she serves as the chairperson of the National Council of Asian Pacific Americans and the chairperson of the Asian Pacific American Media Coalition.

Commissioner Robert Raben is with us right there on the end. Glad you're here. He is representing the National Council of La Raza. He is the principal of the Raben Group, a legislative consulting and lobbying practice that specializes in intellectual property issues and civil rights issues. Mr. Raben, a former attorney, senior Hill staffer and assistant attorney general, creates bipartisan legislation and communications for clients using law and public policy to meet the needs of voters.

Before starting, I also wanted to make sure -- and forgive me for not doing this initially -- to thank the law firm of Arnold & Porter. We're so --

(Interruption.)

MR. ROGERS: I'm not sure what's going on in our room. You guys want to buzz in for a moment?

Before starting, I want to make sure that we thank the law firm of Arnold & Porter. We're so glad to be here. This is obviously a wonderful and impressive location and honored to be here in terms of having our hearing here today.

I would like to now introduce, if I can, each of the panelists who will be with us here. The sound that you're hearing, by the way, is we're trying to get one of our panelists with us by phone so please excuse that technical difficulty that we're having for the moment.

I would like to introduce Sam Hirsch. Sam is right in the center. Sam, thank you for being with us. He is a partner in Jenner & Block. Mr. Hirsch is currently a partner at Jenner & Block's Washington, D.C. office. He's a member of the firm's litigation and dispute resolution and appellate and Supreme Court practices. And his litigation focuses primarily on election law, redistricting and voting rights. Mr. Hirsch graduated from Rice University, Chandler Davidson's school, in 1984 and received a J.D., his law degree, from Harvard Law School in 1993.

We're also pleased to have Jeff Wice with us, Jeffrey Wice, who is here. Jeffrey Wice is an adjunct professor of law at the Touro Law School in New York where he teaches election law and is also a practicing attorney specializing in redistricting, census and voting rights law. During the 1980s, he created the first redistricting program for the Democratic National Committee and served as redistricting counsel to the DNC through the 2000 redistricting process. Mr. Wice is a graduate of the George Washington University Antioch School of Law.

Gerald, it's good to have you here with us. Gerry Hebert is here with us also. Gerald Hebert is executive director and director of litigation of the Campaign Legal Center. For the past 10 years, Mr. Hebert has served as -- has had an active federal court litigation practice specializing in redistricting and voting rights cases and has worked on cases in more than two dozen states around the United States. Mr. Hebert is also an adjunct professor of law at Georgetown University Law Center in Washington, D.C. here in Washington where, since 1995, he has taught courses on voting rights, election law and campaign finance regulation.

You all, we're delighted to have all of you with us here this morning but because of our time consideration, I wanted to try to do this, if we could. I wanted to try, if we could, to narrow down our testimony this morning and to try to narrow down our questions if we can for you to just get precisely, if we can, to the substance of what you have to offer. We're thankful for the time you have with us here today. And if we can, we'll start with Mr. Hirsch.

MR. HIRSCH: Thank you very much. Thank you for having me. It's a particular honor to be here. Although I'm sure he doesn't remember it, Professor Ogletree was actually my 1L advisor. Although he was phenomenally busy, he always had time. I remember having dinner at your house one time and you made law school a wonderful experience for me.

MR. OGLETREE: Thank you. And I do remember. You graduated the year I got tenure, you remember?

MR. HIRSCH: 10 years earlier, Professor Davidson was my informal advisor at Rice undergrad. So I may be the only person coming before this panel who has been advised by two of you academically. Professor Davidson really changed my life by getting me involved in voting rights during the '82 reauthorization. I was a sophomore and a former member of the CDC on the Hill and from there I was interested in this and it has never left. So thank you very much, Chandler.

I have worked in the last 10 years in redistricting litigation in about 20 states. Sometimes the cases involve a protection clause of a state law but many of them involve Section 2 or Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. And in my experience, there are politically significant statistical levels of racial polarization in voting between Anglos and Latinos, as between whites and blacks, in almost every locale which I have experienced.

That fact is, of course, for many reasons, one of which is if there was no differentiation between white or Anglo voting and minority voting, then the way the district lines were drawn would not have such a great potential impact in diluting minority voting strength.

So I'm here to talk primarily about the degrees of racial polarization that we have seen empirically, particularly in Section 2 litigation that I've been involved with. And I've chosen to focus on a couple of states because I think they're particularly interesting.

I brought with me here -- and the staff can distribute these to the folks in the back. Unfortunately I have only four copies for six of you. I apologize. But I brought three expert reports you'll see are quite voluminous. I think they're terrific reports in and of themselves. They're also good examples of how useful Section 2 expert reports can be in the work that this Commission has ahead of it.

As you'll see in a moment, one of these reports is from Maryland here in the Mid-Atlantic region subject to today's hearing. Two of the reports deal with Texas. Obviously, you know Texas is a covered jurisdiction under Section 5 and Maryland is not. I think Maryland, though, is relevant not only because it's here in this region where we're testifying today, but also because the coverage scope of the Act is potentially subject to change in the course of reauthorization and, therefore, I think it's useful we get evidence from noncovered jurisdictions as well as covered ones. Thank you, Professor.

These are, as you'll see, enormous reports with tons of tables, tons of data. I'm going to take one or two very quick examples and see how they operate. The thing you should know about these three reports is that they were not substantially contradicted at all by opposing experts or through cross-examination at trial. They withstood the trial and pretrial processes very, very well. The attorneys who hired them and who hired opposing experts very much disagree about the legal conclusions to be drawn from the data but the data and the analysis was largely uncontroverted.

Let's begin with Maryland. Here my clients were primarily African-American and Latino voters of Prince George's County, which, of those of you who are from here, largely wraps around the District of Columbia. Our expert was Dick Engstrom, a very well respected political scientist from the University of New Orleans who unfortunately, due to the events down there, is settling now in Georgia.

Prince George's County is a very Democratic jurisdiction. I think it gave 82 percent of its votes to Senator Kerry during the Presidential election. So the focus here is not so much on voting behavior in general elections but in Democratic primaries because winning a Democratic primary is tantamount to winning office.

The most probative elections in this state dealt with state legislative districts or state legislative Democratic primaries from the two most recent cycles from the time of litigation or in 1994 or 1998. There were five such primaries and in four of those five, the preferences of white voters and the preferences of black voters diverge in 80 percent of the instances.

I'll show you one example so you can see how the tables can be read. These are at the bottom of page 14. It's complicated here because it's a three-seat district so everyone gets three votes and three candidates ultimately get elected. If you look at the next to right-hand column, you're looking at the nonblack voting behavior and what you see there is the three white incumbents, Hubbard, Conroy, Pitkin, who are preferred by white voters. African-American voters, on the other hand, gave their highest percentage of the vote to Holmes, who was an African-American candidate but who lost because the district was heavily white. Whites participated in the Democratic primary and, as this data shows, they voted quite heavily against the African-American candidate preferred by African-American voters.

We thought this was kind of prevalent throughout the litigation, for example, at the county level as well.

In Texas --

MR. ROGERS: Mr. Hirsch, I'm sorry, I want to look at that sheet again. I'm trying to understand exactly what the percentages are.

MR. HIRSCH: It's difficult to read. The candidates are listed on the left column. The next column over shows African-American voting behavior and the next column over shows nonAfrican-American voting behavior, which in that area is also overwhelmingly Anglo white.

MR. ROGERS: So that when we're looking at the numbers, it says Holmes, Hubbard, Conroy, Pitkin, Armen and Noland. The number right next to that is 26.4?

MR. HIRSCH: Yes.

MR. ROGERS: What does that indicate?

MR. HIRSCH: That means that candidate Holmes, who is in boldface here, meaning that he's an African-American candidate, got 26.4 percent of the black vote. He got -- it's listed here as negative 2.2 percent of I'll call it the white vote, just for shorthand. Of course that's not literally true but it means he got virtually none and when they run the regression analysis, literally the line came below zero percent. He got virtually no white vote.

Hubbard is not in bold face but he's a white candidate. He has an asterisk next to his name which means he's an incumbent. So he's a white incumbent and he also got a high percentage of the black vote, 25 percent, but he got 21 percent of the white vote, which was enough to put him back into office. The same thing was true of Conroy, a white incumbent, got the least amount of the black vote, 17.8 percent of the black vote, got 29.8 percent of the white vote. He was put back in office. I'm saying he. I may be forgetting the gender of some of these candidates. It's been a few years.

Pitkin, another white incumbent with the asterisk, would not have won if this was a heavily black district because Pitkin finished fourth on the black vote with only 13.5 percent of black support but prevailed nonetheless with 29.6 percent of the white support. Pitkin was basically tied for the first choice among whites, the fourth choice among blacks, just as Holmes, the first choice among blacks, was a very distant, basically last place finisher among white voters.

So here you see what is truly polarization because if you have an all black electorate you have different office holders than when you have an all white electorate, that meets the definition of polarization. I'm not going here to racial animus necessarily or the source of this behavior. I'm just looking at the behavior itself as we do in Section 2 litigation.

Now, I want to switch gears to Texas. Texas being, at least in certain areas, a much more competitive area in the general elections, we have to look at both general election behavior and primary behavior. I brought two reports just to show you a couple of different approaches. One is the 2000 report from Dr. Jonathan Katz, who is a political scientist from Cal Tech. This was a report that had a lot of good data, particularly on the general elections.

Dr. Katz studied 113 different general elections in the U.S. House alone in the 1990s. These were in districts with large black or Latino populations. And he found a virtually universal pattern of racially polarized voting with the Latino and black voters overwhelmingly preferring Democratic voters and Anglo voters -- and by Anglo, I mean nonHispanic/white voters -- heavily preferring Republican candidates for Congress in Texas.

Just to give you one concrete example, switching from the House to the Senate, the only federal statewide campaign in the '90s in Texas that involved a Hispanic candidate and an Anglo candidate was the U.S. Senate race in 1996 where Phil Gramm defeated Victor Morales 55/44. But if you break it down by race across the entire state of Texas, Morales won 83 percent of the Latino vote, 77 percent of the black vote but lost because he got only 34 percent of the Anglo vote.

These patterns are -- the numbers vary from contest to contest but that sort of pattern with very high percentages of the black/Latino vote going Democratic and a third or a quarter or it just varies from place to place, but certainly well under half of the Anglo vote going Democratic is a standard feature you see in Texas general elections in partisan contests.

Now, in areas where there is enough Democratic presence that winning the Democratic primary matters, which includes a lot of these more heavily minority areas of Texas, it's important to look at polarization in Democratic primaries. There I'm going to direct your attention to the last item in the pile I handed you, which is the thick report, which is a 2003 report from Professor Lichtman who is a well regarded quantitative historian from here in Washington, D.C. at American University. There are literally dozens and dozens of interesting tables, these tables of data all involving recent elections.

I'll give you an example. Table 3 on page 9 goes on for a couple of pages but it shows 27

Democratic primaries that had at least one Anglo candidate and at least one Latino candidate and 7 Democratic primaries or runoffs that had at least one Anglo candidate and at least one African-American candidate. And what you see is high degrees of polarization. I'm just going to give you some summary figures on average.

In the Anglo versus Latino contests, Latinos were supporting Latino candidates on average with about 61 percent of their votes while Anglos were supporting those same Latino candidates with only 18 percent support. So a gap between 61 and 18. On the black versus white campaigns, highlighted in that same table, black voters on average were giving about 72 percent of their support to black candidates while white voters were giving 21 percent. So again you see an enormous gulf between the voting behavior.

(Interruption.)

MR. ROGERS: Excuse me just a moment. Our chairman is gracious to be here. Senator Mathias, we're thankful to have you present with us today. Thank you for coming.

SENATOR MATHIAS: Well, I am thankful that all of you are here.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. I'll do a formal introduction in just a moment if I can and presently we're hearing testimony from Sam Hirsch. Thank you kindly. Please excuse us. Thank you.

MR. HIRSCH: So generally you see very high levels of polarization in Democratic primaries and Democratic runoffs in Texas for legislative seats. There are times, for example, in statewide contests where you see regional factors overriding to some degree racial factors. One example being the -- you can piece this together from the reports, table 6 and table 18, but just to summarize, you have a three-way contest with a Latino candidate and an African-American candidate, both from roughly the Dallas area, and an Anglo candidate from the Houston area.

And the Anglo candidate, for example, carried the black vote in the Houston area. The minority candidates carried about two-thirds of the Anglo vote in the Dallas area so there was some regional home field advantage sort of phenomenon going on there that, in a Democratic primary, not a general, Democratic primary, could somewhat override that general statewide pattern of voter polarization. But that tended to be, again, limited to these home field effects where you have candidates from opposite ends of the state or competing like in farm areas. Generally we had high levels of polarization.

These are just two examples. And obviously they don't speak directly to the 48 states but these studies were comprehensive. They withstood the test of cross-examination. They withstood attack from some very good attorneys on all sides. And they are a rich source of very up to date and very carefully executed social scientific analysis and data gathering.

So one thing I would like to do today is to encourage the Commission to look at this body of literally hundreds of expert reports that exists -- these are all public documents -- in the litigation files of courts around the country where there has been Section 2 Voting Rights Act litigation. It is a wonderful source of data, way beyond what you could get despite plucking through political science journals. It's fresh, it's often well done and when it's not well done, you can tell by looking at the transcripts of the trial that the expert is eaten alive.

The other thing I would like to say, to encourage the Commission to think about based on this, is about background to the basic argument you may hear, which is maybe we don't need Section 5 because we have Section 2. These were expert reports delivered in Section 2 cases that, despite lawyering that I thought was pretty good, I lost. We lost in Maryland where the Court found that voting was not racially polarized even though we showed that in fact it was in 4 out of 5 of the most probative contests.

We lost in Texas, even though there they agreed it was racially polarized. The court did not substantially, significantly disagree with that conclusion but for other reasons, they found reason not to award relief to our clients, including African-American clients, in Fort Worth who were egregiously disturbed by the 2003 mid-decade gerrymandering in Texas as well as Latino plaintiffs throughout the state who were very well represented at trial.

So the point here is, one, take advantage of this great source of expert analysis that is available to you through Section 2 litigation; two, take with a big grain of salt the argument that Section 2 solves all our problems. Section 2 is a wonderful law. It does a lot of good for this country and there has been a lot of terrifically important victories, as you heard from Congressman Watt this morning, that have really changed American politics based on Section 2 as well as Section 5. But Section 2 alone, just like the 14th Amendment alone, is not enough because this is a difficult problem for which we need many, many tools. Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, Mr. Hirsch. Mr. Wice?

MR. WICE: Thank you very much for the opportunity for being here today. My two colleagues, Sam Hirsch and Gerry Hebert, in the late 1990s --

MR. ROGERS: Mr. Wice, please excuse me. Forgive me for a moment. Mr. Aguilar is on the phone and I understand there is a time limitation on him.

Do you mind if I interrupt very briefly?
MR. WICE: Not at all.
MR. ROGERS: Please forgive me for that. Mr. Aguilar, are you with us?
MR. AGUILAR: Yes, I am.
MR. ROGERS: I wanted to make sure we got you in for the moment if we can. We thank you kindly for the ability to appear with us by telephone and I wanted to give a brief introduction of Mr. Aguilar.
Juan Aguilar works as a citizen volunteer for the Sunnyside Voter Restoration Project. He works on developing and implementing a strategy to get Hispanic voters in Sunnyside, Washington, Yakima County, get involved in the electoral process. He is part of a team of volunteers who seek out technical and financial assistance to assist the Hispanic population. Mr. Aguilar has worked with the Department of Justice to ensure that monolithic Spanish language speakers get the assistance they need when voting.
Thank you kindly for joining us and I'll need you, if I can, Mr. Aguilar, to speak directly, if you would, into the centerpiece of your phone. Thank you kindly.
MR. AGUILAR: Thank you, Joe. Thank you, ladies and gentlemen. I honestly don't know who is in the room this morning but I'm very honored to be invited to speak on behalf of the people in our general area. The gentleman that introduced me mentioned, we knew that in Yakima County, and that is in Washington State, our recent demographics indicates that we have an exclusion of Hispanic populations, the people that are coming into our areas and have been in our area for some time. The demographics have changed significantly to the point in which we have larger populations of Hispanic people than any other race in our general area, not just our city but also in Yakima County.
MR. ROGERS: Mr. Aguilar, let me have you, if I can -- I'm sorry to interrupt you. I'm going to ask you to speak a little louder in terms of the phone that you're speaking into so that the court reporter can hear you a little better.
MR. AGUILAR: Thank you. Hopefully this is a little better. Can you hear me better now?
MR. ROGERS: Yes.
MR. AGUILAR: Wonderful. Thank you. The reason that I'm here today is I wanted to share with the Commission that we currently -- I should say in the last three years we have been engaged with the Yakima County auditor's office which runs the elections in our county.
They had no bilingual coordinators, they had no bilingual programs established, they had no information in Spanish, brochures, literature, et cetera. The announcements on the multimedia outlet did not exist for the Hispanic population base and so we were seeking out how do we change those things and how do we enhance that communication to the population that I'm speaking of.

And so we were actively engaged in speaking with those folks. We ran across several voters with some reluctance on their part to participate and so we sought out Department of Justice assistance. They were very active in contacting the Yakima County auditor's office and promoting that activity. And ultimately we have now a bilingual coordinator, one bilingual official on staff to assist in translation and trying to get all those pieces out.

They're at the beginning stages of getting those things implemented but they're actually doing a pretty fair job of getting the 100 percent bare minimum pieces out. I'm not saying that they're dragging their feet. They just haven't really contributed the amount of efforts and resources that would dictate reaching out to the larger population. We're hopeful that will change. We're hopeful that we will do a lot better job of getting people, one, registered and, two, out to vote. But that's been our largest focus area is to get the message out, get people registered and get people out to vote.

Now, we've done the first piece in getting the message out. We've also done the second piece which doubled our voter registrations in our state and I believe also in the Yakima Valley, which is the primary population base. So I think we're headed in the right direction. We're on the verge of seeing some good things happening and getting some candidates that represent the population in positions of power and that's ultimately what our goal is, is to have fair representation.

We've run across many obstacles. We've changed the registration location from traditional places that the current population base will not visit or it can't. We've changed those to the Hispanic restaurants and the locations that they frequent. We ran across some opposition there with the auditor's office and the local businesses and were able to overcome those.

There are a number of things. I'm sure you've heard many of these kinds of stories and I just want to let you know that we're in full support of the Commission's activity. Discrimination still exists. Discrimination will continue for a great deal longer. We all understand that and we're really glad that you're doing this effort for all the American people, not just a certain group of individuals. There are a number of different minority groups and this work is very important and we support you.

MR. ROGERS: Mr. Aguilar, thank you so much for appearing with us and being with us right now. I wanted to ask my remaining commissioners if they have any questions at all for you. Panel? I'll begin with -- Commissioner Narasaki has a question for you.

MS. NARASAKI: Mr. Aguilar, I'm actually originally from Seattle, Washington so I'm very familiar with Yakima and I know it's a fairly rural community. But what I'm not sure about, is Yakima covered by Section 203 for Spanish?

MR. AGUILAR: I believe that we are.

MS. NARASAKI: So were you able to get the Department of Justice to come in and require better enforcement?

MR. AGUILAR: The Department of Justice has been playing a pretty good role in regards to oversight of the elections but really not playing a hands-on role in regards to the years prior to the election. And that's kind of what we're looking for is we're looking for organizations that can come in and give us a hand effectively with other things that we don't know. It paves the way, makes it a little easier for people to come in and not be frightened of the whole process.

MS. NARASAKI: Thank you.

MR. AGUILAR: By the way, thank you for letting me know that you're from Seattle. We're very happy to know that.

MR. GREENBAUM: Let me just add a point of clarification. Yakima County became covered under Section 203 for the Spanish language in 2002.

MR. AGUILAR: Thank you very much.

MR. ROGERS: Commissioner Ogletree?

MR. OGLETREE: No questions.

MR. ROGERS: Wonderful. Mr. Aguilar, thank you for being with us. We appreciate you taking the time for being with us by phone.

MR. AGUILAR: Thank you very much for inviting me. I'll be happy to see you in person one day, hopefully.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you. We'll look forward to it. Thank you kindly. We'll move forward. Mr. Wice? Thank you.

MR. WICE: I'll pick up where I left off. Thank you again for the opportunity. My two colleagues here, Sam and Gerry Hebert, coauthored a booklet before the 2000 redistricting cycle called the Realist's Guide to Redistricting, giving you some hands-on advice before the line drawing took place in the post-2000 census.

I'll try to take a realist's view of the Voting Rights Act because we're still in a state of flux now with renewal before Congress and a lot of action in the states which will also play out in the political dynamic of the states in the post-2010 world, especially with some of these states having term limits which are impacting the face of legislative bodies at the state and local level as well as the changes going on in redistricting itself, whether it leads to the creation of commissions where we're seeing major efforts now in four or five states to change the way line drawing is done which will also impact the Voting Rights Act, and how to deal with those aspects as well as the redistrictings. I'll touch upon Georgia in a few minutes and how that impacts the Voting Rights Act as well.

In an effort to be brief, I'll summarize experiences that I've had working as the counsel to the Democratic National Committee with three redistricting cycles as well as my work in private practice focusing in a national context on New York, Louisiana and Georgia. But the cases I'll cite really reflect on all states' applicability.

I started this work in New York for the legislature in the late 1970s. And in the 1980s redistricting, three counties in New York are covered by the Voting Rights Act. Brooklyn, New York and Bronx Counties. The Justice Department, in its Section 5 review of state legislative districts -- this is going back again to 1982 -- was looking at a 65 percent number for the required population of minority districts to be effective under Section 5 review to avoid retrogression.

We tried to argue -- "we" being the legislative leadership -- that often, going back in the early '80s, you had so low a number of minority elected officials that to create an effective opportunity for the minority communities to elect candidates, you had to go into the 80 and 90 percent range. And it took a lot of local effort to help convince the Justice Department to preclear those plans after the '80 census because of local factors in that a 65 percent rule which had come out of a Chicago court case around the same time was too low a number and actually would have perpetuated the nonpreferred candidates to win.

Using the same set of lines post-2000 in New York looking at the state senate in particular, things have changed a lot. And I'll just preface by saying that State Senator David Patterson, the Democratic leader of the New York Senate who I also do work for, testified before this commission in New York in June and talked in more detail about the state legislative situation.

But in a nutshell, the lines redrawn in the 80s/90s percent range which perpetuated a larger number of minority-free candidates to be elected but also ended up in creating white gerrymanders in surrounding areas by actually packing as many minority voters and residents into as few districts as possible where the state senate used the Voting Rights Act as a sword to make the argument that historically in the '70s, '80s and '90s, you had to have higher numbers of residents and voters in districts to maintain them.

But now you also have a situation where you have many more African-American and Latino elected officials. The numbers in essence don't need to be as high. And there may be political goals elsewhere in the jurisdiction to create opportunities for nonminority candidates whose districts are not as overpopulated as the minority districts are.

So essentially you had a situation in New York City of overpopulating minority districts compared to nonminority, but also creating as high a number of packed populations as possible and against that that the methodologies from the 1980s to the 2000s have really changed significantly.

I also worked on the New York City council redistricting in 2003 and that was a bipartisan commission to redraw 51 city council districts. As the counsel to that commission, one of the things that we did was to require the use of racially polarized analysis data, similar to what Sam had talked about, before the plan was agreed to, before the lines were actually drawn.

We went in and looked to see, in the three covered counties, what is an effective district, what is the bright line minimal number of minority residents or voters needed to maintain the status quo of the Section 5 situation. I found generally across the country, working at the legislative level, that legislative line drawers tend to -- finger to the wind -- hope that the figure that they reach will meet the nonretrogression test of Section 5.

The Justice Department, on the other hand, does the analysis on the front end to know what they determined to be an effective district and the legislators often don't do that and end up fighting over it in court, similar to the Maryland and Texas data that you've been provided.

So in the New York City Council, where now 25 of 51 members are Latino or Hispanic, I found that many of the members themselves wanted to perpetuate their own districts, albeit that they are term limited, and that many of them are not running for re-election two years later this year in this next month's election.

But I found that Section 5 is a very powerful tool because New York City is still polarized and New York City fell under the Voting Rights Act because of a low voter turnout in 1968 Presidential elections coupled with New York state's literacy test that was used through the 1960s, which was later eliminated. But people now ask, with many of the leaders of the legislature, city-wide elected officials, city council members, city-wide elected officials being Latino or African-American, why does New York state still need Section 5 coverage? But we found that by doing the racially polarized voting analysis prior to council managed redistricting, it was a very good tool and demonstrates the continuing need for Section 5.

Let me jump over to two other states. In Georgia, the Supreme Court's major case of Georgia v. Ashcroft from a year or two ago told us that influence can also be used in the determination of Section 5 retrogression, that while you may have X numbers of districts going into the plan, the final plan may better reflect the fact that minority elected officials are in a controlling seat of power in that legislative body. But after the subsequent nonrelated case of Larias v. Cox on population standards, the Democrats lost both the Georgia House and Senate.

I served earlier this year as outside counsel to the Georgia Democrats in the House and Senate. You had an African-American minority Senate leader. He had no power. You had a situation in the Georgia v. Ashcroft, the Supreme Court saying that Section 5 retrogression benchmark standard can factor in the use of influential leadership.

But now the Democrats have lost everything. They've lost both chambers and I can't see how going into the 2010 process that you can use the same relevant benchmark because of the lack of power that the Supreme Court supposed was there even though the straight number changes were different. So I really question -- give you time to think about how to best apply the Georgia v. Ashcroft case to a retrogression benchmark standard in Section 5.

I also want to touch base on Louisiana. In the 2000 redistricting, I served as counsel to the Legislative Black Caucus. The state of Louisiana went to federal district court in Washington to seek preclearance rather than go through the Justice Department process which they thought would be biased against them, in a similar way as had Georgia also went to the federal district court for preclearance approval.

And the Georgia legislature tried to make the argument that not only was the benchmark field unlawful that was being applied to 2001 because the Justice Department, in their view, required, quote, unquote, additional African-American districts to be created back in 1991 but they ended up trying to make the case that because a white Democrat represented a black district in New Orleans, that really wasn't an effective district and shouldn't be held part of the benchmark. They lost on that and the district was maintained.

But now Louisiana also provided Katrina. No one ever figured, in the history of the Voting Rights Act, that this kind of awful disaster could come upon us where thousands and thousands of people might not be there the next time. Now, as a covered jurisdiction in this entirety of Louisiana, I don't want to throw numbers out because it's way too early to even guesstimate. But when you have a seven district congressional delegation which is already looking at losing one seat going down to a loss of possibly two seats and whereas the African-American majority seat now held in Louisiana is in New Orleans, it might shift over to Baton Rouge. The numbers might not be there. We don't know that yet.

But should that occur and, under the current Justice Department procedure in reviewing claims, you would have the same number in, the same number out and you can replace the district if population changes elsewhere in the same jurisdiction. You simply draw someplace else. But we're looking at a situation in Louisiana where we don't know yet where that might be.

Similarly, for the state house and senate, these are smaller population numbers. The three or four African-American House districts, state House districts in New Orleans, might not be there. Similarly, one or two state Senate districts might not be there. And whether you can simply move them to Baton Rouge or to a different part of the state, there is really food for thought as to how to address this.

And the question also, do you want to replace a district in New Orleans with Shreveport, hundreds of miles away, and then the question becomes, if you do that, would you then run afoul of a Shaw v. Reno type situation on a race-based district. It's going to vary jurisdiction to jurisdiction but it is going to be an issue there as well as possibly other states where you have these kind of shifts.

But there is time from the 2007 renewal perspective to the 2010 census to consult with officials from Louisiana. If you haven't had the hearing there yet, you might want to revisit that. New Orleans is planning a city-wide election in February of next year and the jury is still out as to whether they can effectively still hold that election. They're planning it but that's going beyond anyone's power to determine if they can have it or not.

So in closing, I would suggest that Section 5 be renewed but in light of the proper benchmarks to be used. Also I would give some thought to a proposal of opt-in type review where not every single change from the location of polling places, to access ramps, to other matters need to be precleared. But certainly I think major redistrictings, other kinds of major impacts on voters still needs to go through a preclearance process.

Professor Gergen has suggested recently in the Republic of a plan where you have jurisdictions posting or announcing the fact that an election was to be changed and providing an opportunity for the public to participate in that process. And should something go awry at either end, then petition DOJ for proper remedy or to go to the courts. I think that's also food for thought and I want to look into it more myself as to how that would work in practice. And so I want to thank you very much for the opportunity and in brevity, I'll end here. Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly, Mr. Wice. And I know we'll have questions for you in just a moment. Mr. Hebert, before we get to you, I wondered if I could do a quick introduction of our honorary chairman. We're honored to have Senator Mathias be with us here today. We are so glad that you could be with us here this afternoon or morning. I want to make a quick introduction, if I may.

The Honorable Charles Mathias serves as the chair of the National Commission of the Voting Rights Act and serves as honorary chair. He's a former United States Representative and United States Senator from Maryland. He was born in Frederick, Maryland on July 24th, 1922 and graduated from Haverford College in Pennsylvania. He served as assistant attorney general for Maryland from 1953 to 1954, city attorney of Frederick from 1954 to 1959 and is a member of the Maryland House of Delegates from 1959 to 1960.

Senator Mathias was elected as a Republican to the 87th Congress and served four terms between 1961 and 1968. In 1968, he was elected to the United States Senate and subsequently re-elected in 1974 and 1980. Senator Mathias served in Congress when the Voting Rights Act was originally enacted in 1965 and, during the 1970, 1975 and 1982 reauthorizations, again, he was present in Congress.

We're so delighted to have you with us today, Senator Mathias, and delighted to have you with us and we appreciate perhaps any remarks you would like to share with us.

MR. MATHIAS: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. You're very generous. I principally wanted to express my appreciation to everyone who is involved in this effort and extension of the Voting Rights Act in the current phase. It's so important.

It was clear when the original Voting Rights Act was adopted that this was going to be a major influence in the development of American society, and it has been. And it's no less so today than it was in 1965. And so it's very important that this effort be made and I am grateful that you have the foresight and the interest and the conviction to go forward with this effort and I hope that we can successfully push it through to a conclusion before too long. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. Senator, thank you kindly for being with us today.

(Applause.)

MR. ROGERS: And Senator, we understand that your schedule may be limited today so we're just delighted that you could spend this time with us here this morning and certainly give us the history and substance that you bring to this entire process. Again, we could not be more honored to have you with us here today.

Gerald Hebert, we're delighted to have you with us also and appreciate your thoughts.

MR. HEBERT: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and thank you to the National Commission on Voting Rights Act for inviting me to be with you today and talk about the crown jewel of civil rights, the Voting Rights Act of 1965 as amended. I'm going to talk primarily today about the bail-out provisions of the Voting Rights Act and I'm also going to relate, as you'll see in a moment, justifiably, I think, why Virginia plays an important part in the bail-out provisions and how they've operated up to this point.

As originally enacted in 1965, the Voting Rights Act permitted covered jurisdictions to exempt themselves from coverage by initiating bail-out litigation against the United States in the federal court in Washington. An importable subdivision in a jurisdiction designated for coverage was the only entity that was allowed to initiate bail-out litigation. Now, that's significant because what that meant was that if a state was covered under the Voting Rights Act in 1965, an individual county or a city would not be eligible to seek a bail-out exemption if the state within which it was located had been designated for coverage.

Bail-out lawsuits were to be heard and determined by a court of three judges. And as originally formulated in the Act, a state or a county, if it was within a state that was not entirely covered and could pursue a bail-out on its own as some did, they had to demonstrate that in the last five years preceding the filing of the bail-out lawsuit, the jurisdiction had not used any test or device as a prerequisite to registration of voting for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color.

Now, what that really had the effect of doing is really preventing all the jurisdictions essentially that fit covered in the states where the state in itself was covered in its entirety from bailing out. For example, in Virginia, Virginia had used a test or device and had used it with the intent and with the effect of discriminating on account of race and so therefore the state was not eligible to bail out. However, there were a number of counties that were covered under the original '65 Act and they did in fact bail out from coverage in that '65 to '70 period. Baltimore County, Idaho; Wake County, North Carolina and a couple of others state of Alaska, Navaho County, Arizona and several others.

Now, what happened was that in 1970, Congress amended the Act, as you know, and also had the effect of amending the bail-out provisions by extending for an additional five years to 10 years the time period that covered jurisdictions had to demonstrate in a bail-out lawsuit that they hadn't used a prohibited test or device.

In 1972, Alaska and New York successfully maintained bail-out actions on behalf of the jurisdictions that had been newly covered. And subsequently New York was recaptured in 1973 when the attorney general of the United States moved to get it re-covered because it had been shown to use a prohibitive test or device in a discriminatory manner and there was an actual court finding to that effect in a case called Torres versus Sachs in 1974.

In 1974 also, my home state, the state of Virginia, was unsuccessful in its attempt to seek a bail-out from coverage in a case called Virginia versus United States. The reason for that was because the D.C. Court found that Virginia had maintained inferior schools with black citizens and that had a discriminatory effect on blacks because it prevented them or lowered their ability at least from passing the literacy test that had been imposed in Virginia in a discriminatory way. And so the D.C. Court denied Virginia a bail-out on that basis.

In '75, as you know, the bail-out amendments were extended for an additional seven years, for 17 years, the time period that covered jurisdictions had to show that they had not used a prohibited test or device. And consequently, jurisdictions that had been originally covered in '65 or had been additionally covered in '70 or additionally covered as a result of the amendments in '75 had to show that over a 17-year period, they had not used a discriminatory testing device.

As you also know, the '75 amendments effectuated a change in the minority language provisions and under those, additional jurisdictions became covered. I'm going through this I know quickly because I want to really get to the 1982 amendments because they effectuated really the greatest change in the bail-out law and is the bail-out law that we have today.

Under the '82 amendments to the bail-out provisions, they were the most significant and what they really did was they did two principal things. First, they allowed counties and cities within covered jurisdictions to seek a bail-out for the first time if they were within a state that was entirely covered. And they also recognized -- and this is probably the most important thing Congress did in 1982 insofar as the bail-out provisions were concerned. They really rewarded good conduct. There was an incentive for jurisdictions to end the discriminatory practices of the past and rather than simply requiring them to wait for some expiration date with a fixed period and instead focused on the actual record.

Now, here is how that actually happened. Jurisdictions had to show, in order to get a bail-out as a result of the '82 amendments, that, first of all, that no test or device was being used within the last 10 years to determine voter eligibility. Because the Voting Rights Act had suspended those, that was largely a fairly easy thing for most jurisdictions to prove. They also had to show that no federal examiners had been assigned to the jurisdictions. For many, many jurisdictions, over 90 percent of them, that was easy to prove because federal examiners had not been sent to the locale as a result of the certification by the attorney general.

They also had to show -- and this was probably one of the more nitty-gritty provisions -- that they had made a timely submission to either the Justice Department or the D.C. Court of any change that they had made that affected voting. And I want to pause for a minute here and say that that was a particularly interesting provision because in a county, for example -- and I will in a moment just list a couple of examples of counties that I've represented where this issue has come up.

And one county, for example, was Kings County, California where you have political subdivisions within the county that can make all kinds of changes that affect voting, changes that the county may not even know about or have any ability to control. A town or a school district or a city within a county can go ahead and schedule an election, can run an election and can effectuate voting changes and yet, for the county to get a bail-out -- and the county is the only entity in California, for example, that could get a bail-out -- they would be required to not only show that they have made a timely submission of the voting changes but that all the cities and towns and other political subdivisions within the county have made a timely submission of voting changes.

So that's something that I think needs to at least be studied to see whether or not there could be a change in the bail-out law there that would allow perhaps -- and I say perhaps, underscoring -- local jurisdictions within that covered county to in fact seek a bail-out on their own.

The other provision you have to show within the last 10 years is that you've had no objections by the Justice Department or denials by the D.C. Court for preclearance. In order to get a bail-out, you have to show all of what I just mentioned as a result of the 1982 amendments. You have to show all of that within the last 10 years. So that's why I mentioned earlier that the amendments focused on a record of good behavior rather than just some arbitrary time period.

Then you also must show, in addition, to get a bail-out, that if there had been any diluted voting procedures, that they've been eliminated. And you have to show that at the time you're seeking the bail-out. You also have to show at that time that there -- if there had been any harassment or intimidation of voters.

And unfortunately there are some places in this country where voters are still being harassed and intimidated. You have to show that you've taken constructive efforts to eliminate it. And you must also show that you've expanded the opportunities for convenient registration and the opportunities to vote and you must also show that you've appointed minority citizens to participate in all aspects of the voting process from registration to voting conducted in the election.

Now, what I've done is, since 1982, I've represented 10 jurisdictions that have now sought, in the D.C. Court, a bail-out. One is pending and the other ones have all been granted with the consent of the United States. They all happen to be in Virginia, which is where I'm licensed to practice law.

The interesting thing there -- and I know that we're running out of time so I'm going to cut right to the chase. The interesting thing about the Virginia bail-outs is that in a number of the jurisdictions in Virginia, you had unprecleared voting changes within the county that existed at the time the jurisdiction sought a bail-out.

And what the Justice Department did was they looked at the bail-out provisions and they said, you know, we're going to approach these with a heavy dose of common sense. We're going to say, well, let's look at these unprecleared changes and have you submit them now and see if any of them are objectionable. And if they are, then you won't be eligible to bail out. But if there are minor, de minimis changes that merely were overlooked and there was no intent to invade Section 5, we'll go ahead and review those now nun pro tunc and then perhaps you'll be eligible if you meet the other criteria.

So since the 1982 amendments, you've had jurisdictions that have bailed out, nine so far, the 10th is pending, all in Virginia. I'm often asked two questions -- and I see my time is up so let me just summarize the conclusion here that I have seen in handling these bail-out cases.

First of all, the jurisdictions that want to seek a bail-out are not trying to invade coverage under the Voting Rights Act. They are in fact jurisdictions that are proud of the fact that they do have equal opportunity in the voting process and they want to demonstrate it to the satisfaction of the Justice Department and their own citizens.

They also want to be able to implement voting changes without having to wait for preclearance to occur. Oftentimes the changes they want to implement expand the opportunity to register to vote. I had, in Frederick County, Virginia, for example, I had a registrar tell me that a black pastor came to him and asked on a Friday if he could go out on Sunday, if the registrar could go out on Sunday and register people after church service. And he said, well, that would be a special voter registration drive that I can't do without preclearance and that takes more time than just Friday to Monday.

And so he wanted -- that's why Frederick County cited to me as examples of why they wanted to get a bail-out, so they could do those kinds of things. They had never experienced problems there with minority voting. The minority population in all of the jurisdictions in Virginia where I've represented has been less than 10 percent minority. So there really isn't a cutting edge issue about balance of political power between minority citizens and whites as you see in so many other jurisdictions.

And then the final question I'm often asked is, well, why haven't more people bailed out? Well, first of all, I think the provisions show that they are well tailored to meet what I would call the City of Boerne test. There is a congruence in proportionality between the medial provisions of the bail-out law and what they are actually intended to cure and eliminate and foster.

And so I think that a lot of jurisdictions believe that they are going to have to come clean and they don't really know what that process is all about and what the burden might be. They also don't know what its costs would be and many of them don't know that the bail-out provisions exist because, in some of the rural places, they simply haven't been advised in it and they think it's too costly.

I will tell you I don't think it's too costly, I don't think it's too onerous and I do think that it's well suited for extension largely as is, subject to reviewing some of those things like political subdivisions within a covered county or the issue I cited earlier. That's really the gist of my testimony. Thank you again for the opportunity to testify. I look forward to your questions.

(Applause.)

MR. ROGERS: I'm going to start with Professor Ogletree. Do you have any questions?

MR. OGLETREE: I actually want to commend all the members of the panel and hope that in addition to what they have said today, that they will add their testimony to the official record of what we've done, the longer presentation. And I don't know how to ask one question that gets at all three of you, but I'll do it and then there are related questions on the specifics of your presentation.

The first is the question about -- one of the reports talk about Congressman Bonilla, the Republican in Texas who was elected despite large Hispanic opposition. The question is whether that's a bad thing under the Voting Rights Act, that people express their will for a candidate. Is that a bad thing based on the report that you submitted, number one? Let me get all the questions out.

And then for Jeff Wice, the question I have is, with Hurricane Katrina and with congressional elections happening a year from today basically, is there anything that can be done strategically to make sure that Louisiana doesn't have an all white congressional delegation as early as next year when it has had a very diverse delegation in the past?

And the final question, Mr. Hebert, you cited Virginia versus United States which is an important case that talks about Brown and it talks about the irony that after Brown, Virginia is one of those states that closed down their entire public school system so blacks weren't even able to even attend the public school system, whether that logic is relevant to many other states that did similar things, where the reaction to Brown was massive well into the '60s.

And the question is whether or not that has any relevancy now. Have those states been able to avoid being responsive, to being accountable for the post-Brown denied basic rights through education that have some impact. We'll start with Mr. Hirsch.

MR. HIRSCH: Professor, let me address the point about Congressman Bonilla and it could be that Mr. Hebert will want to follow up because I think he's quite knowledgeable on this too. Congressman Bonilla was elected as a Republican Latino candidate in '92 running against -- I believe it was '92, running against a scandal-plagued Democratic Latino candidate. It was a close election.

Congressman Bonilla had been a TV anchor in the media market. He was very well-known. In that election, the Democratic Latino incumbent got a majority of Latino vote but lost because the Republican Latino candidate, Bonilla, got an overwhelming majority of the Anglo vote.

What happened over time to that district was two things. One, the percentage of registered voters with Spanish surnames, which is a good surrogate for the percentage of the voters who are Latino, went up quite steadily. At the same time, the degree of Latino support for Congressman Bonilla, which was never more than half, was always less, as I recall, dropped quite steadily and, for example, in '96, he had 30 percent Hispanic support. I apologize. I switch back and forth between Hispanic and Latino. I don't mean any distinction there.

'96 was 30 percent, '98, 26 percent and in 2000, 20 percent. By 2002, he was getting only 8 percent of the Hispanic vote in his own district. He was winning very narrowly because he was getting about 88 percent of the non-Hispanic vote.

His district, by the end of the decade, the beginning of the next decade, was a Hispanic opportunity district. It was majority Hispanic by any definition and it was soon, in my view, going to elect a Hispanic-preferred candidate who likely would have been a Hispanic Democratic challenger who would have beaten Bonilla. Nothing is wrong about that.

What's wrong is what happened in 2003. His district could have been redrawn so that his house was in a heavily Anglo, heavily Republican, heavily suburban district full of the kinds of voters who had always supported him. But they didn't do that. Instead, the Republicans who engineered the 2003 gerrymander wanted to maintain him but they also wanted to maintain him in a technically majority Hispanic district.

So effectively what they did is they trapped almost 400,000 Hispanics, including some who are noncitizens and some who have a history of low voting percentages, in a district that was actually a Republican district that could re-elect him. So they added 100,000 people who are overwhelmingly Anglo from the San Antonio suburbs to the district. They cut 100,000 heavily Democratic, overwhelmingly Hispanic constituents out of his district.

So they took an effective Hispanic opportunity district and ruined it. It is no longer an effective Hispanic opportunity district. It is virtually impossible for a Hispanic-preferred candidate to win that district now. He can win it because he was never a Hispanic preferred candidate. He was always the Hispanic-opposed candidate. So it's good for him, it's good for the Republicans who now have -- he is the only Mexican-American Republican in the United States Congress.

They can parade him around as their poster child for what a wonderful party they are but meanwhile, rather than giving him the district he wanted and giving Hispanic voters in South and Central Texas and West Texas what they wanted, they wanted to preserve this mirage that he was actually a Republican winning in a majority Hispanic district.

So they have violated the voting rights of between three and 400,000 Hispanics who are trapped in this district and can't quite get rid of them even though 92 percent of them are voting against him.

MR. ROGERS: What's the percentage of Hispanic population in this district?

MR. HIRSCH: It is majority Hispanic in total population. It is not majority Hispanic in terms of the citizen voting age population. It is not majority Spanish surname in terms of the registered voters. And it consistently, in statewide elections, votes Republican. And this is a part of Texas, like most of Texas, where Hispanic voters are very consistently Democratic. So it is a district designed to be technically majority Hispanic but effectively Anglo Republican controlled.

MR. ROGERS: Do you know what his vote margins were in his last election?

MR. HIRSCH: Right before the change in 2002, I believe he was between 51 and 52 percent. He was about to topple over. And what the gerrymander did was to bump him up. And I think there are problems with that from a partisan standpoint.

But from a voting rights standpoint, what makes it so offensive is they didn't give him a heavily Anglo suburban Republican district full of his supporters. They gave him a district that was controlled by those voters but still contained hundreds of thousands of Hispanic voters who have consistently said we don't want this guy representing us in Congress. I think it's a terrible story. It should have been struck down by the three-judge court, which split two to one. And those issues are now on appeal in the Supreme Court. Conference is scheduled for two weeks from today and we expect to see some kind of decision from the U.S. Supreme Court this term.

MR. HEBERT: Sam covered everything. I have nothing to add. It's a classic case of fragmenting Hispanic population. Laredo split basically down the middle and it's an issue that a number of groups attacked and it's really up to the Supreme Court as the last stopping point to rectify one of the most egregious voting rights violations affecting millions of minority voters in the state.

MR. HIRSCH: I apologize. Can I say, what the state then did was they created a new majority Hispanic district elsewhere that stretches from the Mexico border on the river 300 miles north to the Hispanic neighborhoods of Austin and Central Texas. This district is more than 300 miles long and in places less than 10 miles wide. They did that because they thought if they didn't do that, they for sure would lose under the Voting Rights Act.

Now, if that doesn't violate the Shaw versus Reno doctrine, I don't know what does. And that is yet another question pending before the U.S. Supreme Court right now.

MR. HEBERT: And that district did not elect a Latino, by the way, when it was up. It elected an Anglo Democrat, Lloyd Doggett.

MR. WICE: On your question on Louisiana, what I can tell you is what I'm hearing or have been told, that Mayor Nagin is making every effort conceivable to reach residents/registered voters throughout the country. I think he said there are four New Orleans voters in Boise and he would like to find them so they can vote next year in the February elections, that he's working with his own city administrative elections board with the State Board of Elections, with the existing voter reach-out as best he can.

And of course if he needs to have any laws changed, whether he has to go to Baton Rouge for approval or then to DOJ is another question of the short time frame, but they're thinking about it. I think as we've all learned under the circumstances, that every plan that has been announced can't actually be implemented. But having said that, and should there be an election next year for Congress, which I think itself could be delayed, is a case that talks about delaying congressional elections.

We have learned in other parts of the South that incumbency has its assets. Mel Watt, who was here earlier, Sam Bishop. Members who are elected and build up some incumbency and have several years in office often overcome the antagonism to first get elected and whether or not they still have a majority or effective minority district, they are able to win re-election in a differently configured and populated piece of geography.

So the answer is we don't know yet, but I think the government from Louisiana will do all it can at the state and local level. And I've talked to people in Baton Rouge about this and they can best hope that what they've announced will work out but we won't know until next year.

MR. OGLETREE: Thank you.

MR. HEBERT: Professor Ogletree, you are correct, of course, that there are a number of states where the same type of a finding that was present in the state of Virginia versus the United States could have been and has been in fact demonstrated in other court cases.

The interesting thing about that insofar as it relates to the bail-out provisions is that we all remember what we really thought were the best test of vote dilution which were the Zimmer factors. And one of those factors which I always thought was one of the more appropriate ones was whether or not the jurisdiction had a history of discrimination that affected or that was aimed at the right to vote.

And it seems to me that if we consider ever altering the mathematical formula that exists under Section 4 of the Voting Rights Act, that perhaps we ought to look at some of those factors, including whether the jurisdictions had a history of discrimination, whether there is racially polarized voting, whether the minority population continues to suffer the effects of socioeconomic disparities and so on that impact their ability to participate and so on and so on.

Because I think if you do that, you kind of meet the City of Boerne test which is that there has to be, as I said earlier, a congruence of proportionality between the injury that's to be prevented and the remedy that is being offered.

MR. OGLETREE: It would be great if, in the short time that we have, if you could submit some information, it would be helpful to Professor Davidson in preparing our report because I think that's something Congress would love to hear on Section 4 that could be relevant to the other issues that we consider as well.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. We would appreciate that very much, sir. We'll move on to questions from Professor Davidson as well as Commissioner Narasaki. We will break for lunch in just a few minutes and so we wanted to make sure that everybody knew that lunch will be available. We're a little bit over -- obviously more than a little bit over in terms of the time but because of several issues we had to deal with, we'll make sure that that's squared out this afternoon. So we'll move forward. Commissioner Davidson?

MR. DAVIDSON: I wanted to express my frustration, first of all, at having the vast repository of knowledge that's represented by these three gentlemen this morning and not having time to really ask about 20 questions of each one of them, but I'm simply going to ask one question of all three of you and it ought to be easy to answer because it's really a data gathering question.

Mr. Hirsch has suggested that we take a look at the data that are provided in Section 2 cases that have been tried around the country to get a fuller grasp of the extent of vote discrimination in the country and, as you may know, Professor Katz at the University of Michigan and her law students are in the final stages of compiling a database of all reported Section 2 cases in the country since 1982.

However, as you also know, there are a lot of these cases that are not reported. And I'm wondering if you can give me suggestions as to how one might systematically or even unsystematically gain access to those unreported cases that we all know are out there but are difficult to track down.

MR. HEBERT: Well, let me start. I think I'm responsible for some of those so let me give you an example. In Alabama in the late 1990s, I was retained by the Alabama Democratic Conference to determine whether or not -- which is a black Democratic organization that's statewide. It has chapters in every single county in the state of Alabama.

And they said, you know, we're curious as to whether or not the preclearance provisions are really being followed in each and every jurisdiction. Would you be willing to do somewhat of a survey in some of our less active areas as to whether or not preclearance is being obtained and sought by jurisdictions.

And so I went in and represented -- I think we filed 10 Section 5 enforcement lawsuits and all 10 places we went to, we found a series of voting changes that had not been submitted for preclearance. And we filed a lawsuit against each and every one and they all settled and submitted their voting changes.

Now, as it turned out, none of those changes ultimately was objected to, although there were a couple that raised some serious issues. But what it illustrated to us is that there was a lack of compliance even with the fairly routine voting changes that everyone knew should have been submitted but hadn't been.

Now, I say that, Dr. Davidson, because what you could do, I think, would be to contact -- the Voting Rights Bar is not that big but it runs deep and you could actually, I think through going to the various groups as well as the Voting Rights Bar members, actually get us to produce our complaints and our consent decrees that were actually filed.

And all those 10 or 12 cases that I just mentioned in Alabama are all reported as far as I know so that's certainly one method to gather information on not only Section 5 enforcement cases, which I also think is pretty relevant to the extension, but the vote dilution cases.

MR. HIRSCH: Three ideas. One, I agree we need to reach out not only to national civil rights groups but to local and state civil rights organizations around the country because they are either involved or at least have knowledge of the bulk of this.

Two is, I believe when you file a complaint in federal court, that the standardized federal civil cover sheet has a checkoff which says not -- I believe not civil rights but voting rights. I think there is actually a separate check box for it. If that is right, then that gets reflected in the docket sheets submitted to the federal district courts and you can run computer searches on those, although they're not free and I don't know if Professor Katz's group has access to databases but she might actually and not even realize that.

MR. GREENBAUM: They're all in the published opinions.

MR. HIRSCH: The question is how to reach the unpublished ones. And I think that any good law firm librarian can find cases according to which category they checked on the civil cover sheet, which is a standardized form. It doesn't cover state courts.

The third thing I would say, and this goes back to my initial testimony, is you could look up -- I'll use two examples. You could look up and find a published decision in Maryland that will tell you there is not racially polarized voting in Prince George's County, but the report I just handed you tells you the opposite and the report of the winning expert tells you the opposite.

So don't stop at the judicial opinions. Look at the reports and look at the actual transcripts of expert testimony because the judges get one of these cases in a lifetime and they often get them wrong. Obviously they try to get them right. Whereas the experts are repeat players, to some extent the attorneys are repeat players and if you look beneath the opinions, you can get different answers.

You can look at the Texas case and they'll tell you, well, yeah, there is actually polarized voting but there is no Voting Rights Act violation and I just described to Professor Ogletree why I believe that was wrong in the case of Texas congressional district 23. So I think that you need to dig one level deeper.

MR. WICE: I'll add to that. I'll volunteer the trial analyses done in the unreported case of Louisiana House of Representatives versus Ashcroft which is where the House of Representatives, in 2001, sought preclearance. We were in court two years. The state lost but the Legislative Black Caucus who I represented as intervenor as well as the NAACP Legal Defense Education Fund, retained experts to produce reports which were quite accurate and ended up in helping settle the case that we could offer.

I also suggest that there are many -- well, there aren't that many but should be reports done by experts during the Section 5 preclearance process that I often always will use as an expert for submitting a plan rather than waiting until the tail end to have to catch up and fix things later. So some of those reports might be useful and I would be glad to help put those together.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Commissioner Narasaki?

MS. NARASAKI: Thank you. I have two questions, one which I suspect will have a short answer. The first question is, what studies are you aware of that exist regarding looking at Asian-Americans and racially polarized voting? A lot of you have talked about Latinos and African-Americans but I haven't heard anyone mention Asian-Americans and I know, Mr. Wice, you were talking about New York City, which has 8 to 9 percent Asians and finally has an Asian on the city council and the state legislator. So I'm interested to know because we've had a hard time finding that kind of data.

The second is, I was a little alarmed, I have to say, by Mr. Wice's suggestion that there be some more limited opt-in review, that maybe things that seem less important, like moving polling places, might not require preclearance. And it's highlighted by my recent experience with Hurricane Katrina and the fact that we've had a hard time getting FEMA and Red Cross to open stations where there are North Vietnamese communities, for example.

So this notion that it's not a big deal where these things are placed I think is of concern to us. So I'm wondering if the panel now has any reaction to this suggestion and if Mr. Wice wants to elucidate a little more on that.

MR. WICE: Let me answer -- let me address both of yours. First the second question. I do agree with you about being -- I would be alarmed too at a minor change not being precleared in a situation with a specific language minority problem. If I was too broad, I'll clarify.

If a jurisdiction, as we discussed on bail-out, has a very good record, then maybe not every change need be precleared but certainly I have had experiences working in New York City with the Asian-American community and I've seen ongoing to this day violations of rights being disregarded at the polling place, people being told -- you know, Koreans speaking to Americans being told, that's in Chinese, you can read that in totally different languages. So I've seen that in Queens County as recently as a year or two ago.

So I was discussing opt-in in the instances of where maybe not every change need be addressed but changes would be broadcast or posted to the civil rights community and others to know that a change would take place. If a jurisdiction in a problematic area made a change and didn't publicize it in advance, I think that would be a problem. I share your ongoing concerns and wouldn't want to reflect anything differently.

Again, this is a subject that needs more attention and analysis as to how it might work. So it's just an idea that one professor has put forward but is a good idea to at least look at. But certainly I think in the instance of the language minority community being disenfranchised, it would not apply or at least be an instance where the kind of dialogue would need to take place.

In terms of analyses, I work very closely with the American-Asian Legal Defense Fund in New York. And Glenn Magpantay has done the best analyses recently on the Asian-American vote. And I think to wit the New York City council, in Queens County, which was not covered, we felt it important to create the opportunity for John Liu to be elected to the city council. Even though it wasn't a Section 5 county, it was the politically right thing to do.

And in New York county where you have a large Asian population, the numbers are there. I think at some point soon, whether it be for the state assembly or city council, in lower Manhattan you will see more of an opportunity to create it. And maybe the 2010 census will reflect that.

MR. HIRSCH: As to the data question on Asian voting behavior, it's tricky for two reasons, I think. One is you need to focus on areas where the Asian population is large and large relative to the size of districts. So, for example, even in California where there is a large Asian population, because the congressional districts are 6 or 700,000 people, the state legislature is even larger, the issue of Asian opportunity in congressional and state senate districts is quite limited because you would have to have an enormous concentration of Asian voters to control a district. So therefore you don't get as much litigation at the congressional or state legislative level.

A long-winded way of saying I think you have to look -- if you're looking for litigated cases that lend themselves to expert reports, you would have to look mainly at county and local elections that were the subject of Voting Rights Act challenges under Section 2 and that's going to be a limited universe.

The other problem is that the methodologies used in these three reports and other reports -- they're very different, by the way. For example, Katz uses a different method than the one that Engstrom and Lichtman uses. But they all rely on having some precincts that are overwhelmingly white and some precincts that are overwhelmingly Latino or black as the case may be in Maryland or Texas.

And you would need to have a body of precincts that are heavily Asian in order to run these kinds of calculations because you not only polarize voting to find these sorts of patterns, you need residential segregation. It's actually a combination of those two things that allows for minority voter issues. It's also a combination of those two things that allows for these political science methodologies to operate correctly.

If you have a community that has a large Asian percentage and it's fairly dispersed, you won't be able to calculate Asian voting. That's a long-winded way of saying you may need to go away from these traditional Voting Rights Act methodologies and more towards public opinion polling and exit polling, which means you should reach out to pollsters who actually have a lot of data on Asian voting behavior but it's mostly confidential and you have to get their clients, political candidates and political parties, to listen to you. That's tricky.

MR. WICE: And one thing. Also in Queens County, Jimmy Meng, an Asian-American candidate, did win a state assembly district by ousting an Anglo incumbent last year. And I don't believe that was a majority Asian-American district but the opportunity was there. So now in New York you have two Asian-American elected officials.

MR. HEBERT: I would just add to what Sam said. There are some local jurisdictions where there is a sizable enough Asian-American community where -- and Houston, Texas is a good example. I represent the City of Pasadena, Texas, right on the edge of Houston. There is a sizable Asian-American community there to the point where if you were doing extreme case analysis or homogeneous placing, you could actually at least see their voting behavior vis-a-vis other groups.

And oftentimes as part of a Section 5 submission -- I know I represented the City of New York's charter review commission. We were considering some nonpartisan election changes and we did some analysis there and you might find them in those files. But I'm not really aware of -- because of the problems that Sam identified -- any real systematic review.

On the issue of the opt-in provision, I wasn't really tracking a lot of what Jeff was saying about his definition of an opt-in provision. I have read Professor Gergen's that he referenced. The one thing I'm not enamored with as far as opt-in provisions are concerned is I think it has a tendency to take Section 5 and flip it on its head because it puts the burden on the minority, sort of seems to opt the jurisdiction in, when right now the burden is on the perpetrator of discrimination in the past, which is where I think it should be.

MR. WICE: I just read a piece recently so that's why I'm saying it's one idea that I think should be discussed. I'm not endorsing it but I think it's an idea that's worth looking at.

MS. NARASAKI: The concern I have is I work -- as you know, the Asian-American community is largely an immigrant one and a third or more of the voters now, the new voters, are actually recently naturalized citizens and their ability to pay attention to a notice that something is going to be happening and then be able to react to that is I think unrealistic. So I'm very concerned about putting -- as Gerry said, shifting the burden onto the community.

MR. WICE: Right. In the Northeast, I think it's Glenn Magpantay and Margaret Fung.

MS. NARASAKI: Yes, but unfortunately, the most fastest growing Asian-American populations are in places like Atlanta, Houston and Nevada where we don't have that kind of infrastructure.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you very much. I was tempted to ask you questions but we're not going to do that, but I want to at least pose a thought. My hope is that you all will be able to join us for lunch as it's going to take place. Everybody is certainly invited to lunch. Lunch will be provided right next door. But there are two thoughts I wanted to have you think about in advance of us going to lunch that I wanted to ask you about.

First of all, I wanted to go back, to some extent, to your analysis related to Texas, Bonilla's district. I have some thoughts there in particular about -- or at least your testimony as it relates to performance patterns or vote patterns by ethnic groups, white folks or Hispanics in terms of that district, thoughts about racial polarized voting as you characterize it and otherwise.

And I also want to make sure also that I talk to all three of you all to some extent about this notion of retrogression or what happens in a world to the extent that the provisions of this Act, Section 5, for example, to the extent that it is not reauthorized, what would happen in that world.

And in particular, it might be very interesting to speak with you, Mr. Hebert, about your experience with jurisdictions where you've sought bail-out and been successful on bail-out and ideas or notions perhaps of what might happen over the long run. So we'll deal with that over lunch. Everybody, let's take a break. Thank you kindly. We'll come back at just after 1:30.

(Whereupon, at 1:05 p.m., the hearing in the above-entitled matter was recessed, to reconvene at 1:30 p.m., this same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(1:45 p.m.)

MR. ROGERS: I would like to welcome everybody back to our second panel here at the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act in our ninth regional hearing. We're delighted to have members of our second panel to be here with us this morning. Thank you all this afternoon. I keep saying morning. It actually is morning in my time of the world. Colorado is two hours behind you here, as you know. But in any event, we'll make sure we begin.

We're delighted to have with us Rick Valelly who is here with us now. Rick, you've had to correct people your whole life. I know you have.

MR. VALELLY: I'm used to this now.

MR. ROGERS: I'll try to get it right. We're delighted to have with us Mark Posner. We're also pleased to have Robert Kengle, Kent Willis and Margaret Jurgensen with us today. Brief introductions if I may.

The one thing that we did not have an opportunity to do during the course of the last hearing because of time constraints was we didn't have open remarks by commissioners who were all present with us here today.

And at the very least, what I wanted to do was to give each one of our commissioners a quick minute or so to perhaps introduce themselves in their own words or any comments or thoughts they might have which were supposed to be open remarks to this hearing but we'll do this now in the midway portion of this proceeding. And I will start with you, Professor Ogletree. Do you have any brief remarks or rolling remarks that you want to share with us this morning?

MR. OGLETREE: Well, thank you, Commissioner Rogers. I want to thank you for the very effective monitoring and managing of this hearing. You did a great job of giving everyone a chance to be heard and yet making sure we get many voices in within our allotted time. I'm delighted to be here with the Commission. This work is, in my view, the most important work that one can imagine in terms of voting rights.

The 1965 Voting Rights Act was the most significant piece of legislation in the 20th Century and, in my view, achieving reauthorization is the most important challenge of the 21st Century. As much as we can applaud what happened 40 years ago as a major step forward in equalizing justice for all of our citizens, we now see various issues, national, local and regional that undermine the right of every citizen to vote.

The work that we're doing here allows us to collect a large amount of information that we think can help the Congress think constructively and thoroughly about it and there will be a substantial legislative record. There will be a sense of some data being presented. And as you look at Supreme Court precedents, it's clear that the Supreme Court looks favorably upon efforts like this to make sure things have been discussed, debated and resolved.

So I look forward to hearing the testimony. I look forward to helping us ensure that every voter in this country, without regard to race or class or religion or region, will be able to have the benefits of having their votes count, having their votes counted and having their voices heard. And I appreciate all that you are going to do to help us to make sure that that happens. Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you. Commissioner Narasaki?

MS. NARASAKI: Good afternoon. I would like to thank the Commission and the Lawyers' Committee for inviting me today to serve as a guest commissioner. I'm honored to be on the Lawyers' Committee board and I think this work that these hearings are doing is very critical to document the landscape of voting rights and the current malady of discrimination facing so many of our communities.

As you heard, I'm president and executive director of the Asian-American Justice Center which is based in D.C. We have three affiliates in Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco as well as over 100 community based organizations for our local partners in 24 states, many of whom have been very engaged in the issue of protecting the voting rights of the Asian-American community and have witnessed firsthand the importance of the Voting Rights Act provisions and how they affect our ability to vote as a community.

And while California and New York and Hawaii account for over half of the Asian-American population, the fastest growing regions are places like Nevada, Florida and North Carolina. In this region, the D.C./Maryland/Virginia region, metro region, has the fifth largest metropolitan concentration of Asian-Americans, yet only two of the 141 of Maryland state delegates are Asian and there are no Asian-Americans in the Virginia state house, although we do share Bobby Scott with the African-American community.

Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act has been particularly important to the Asian-American community because New York is covered and the expansion of the Asian-American community in Texas and places in the South has meant that it's increasingly relevant and I just want to give one example.

In Bayou LaBatre, Alabama, which is a fishing village, about one third of the 3,000 residents are Vietnamese fishermen and their families, many of them who went there right after the Vietnam war. During the 2000 elections, an Asian-American candidate ran for city council and during the primary, supporters of the white incumbent city council challenged the eligibility of every single Asian-American voter, clearly without any individualized basis.

The Department of Justice investigated and resulted in sending monitors down for the general election and I'm happy to say Alabama had its first Asian-American elected official after that election. And the importance of that in the wake of Hurricane Katrina and what it's done to Bayou LaBatre has shown the need to hear voices in the rebuilding and recovery.

I just want to point out one other case, which is Harris County, Texas, which is where Houston is. We worked with the Justice Department and the local Asian-American Center for Justice because that county was newly covered for Section 203, which is another key provision to the Asian-American community. After we finally got better enforcement and compliance of that law, the turnout among Vietnamese-American eligible voters doubled and, as a result, in November 2004, the first Vietnamese-American won state legislative seat in Texas beating an incumbent by 16 votes. So we very much applaud this Commission and look forward to hearing the rest of the panel. Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly, Commissioner Narasaki. Commissioner Davidson?

MR. DAVIDSON: I have attended all but one of the nine hearings, including this one, which has been held so far since March and have listened to people from around the country talk about problems that they have encountered with voting rights, listened to experts, listened to lawyers and some of the most eloquent and moving testimony that I've heard has come from the public, just ordinary folks who have come in to express their views on the need for continued monitoring of their voting rights. I've learned a lot already today. I look forward to hearing the testimony of the remaining panelists. I'm honored to be a member of this Commission and I welcome you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, Commissioner Davidson. I would like to now introduce members of the panel who are present with us here today. I forgot, you all know Jon. Jon Greenbaum serves as executive director of the Voting Rights Project at the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. Everybody knows Jon. Everybody knows you here. You all know Johnny. He's whispering in my ear.

Rick Valelly, a recognized expert of the Voting Rights Act, is currently a professor of political science at Swarthmore College in Swarthmore, Pennsylvania. Professor Valelly is author of The Two Reconstructions: The Struggle for Black Enfranchisement and Radicalism in the States (The American Political Economy and the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party). The Two Reconstructions won the 2005 Ralph J. Bunche prize of the American Political Science Association which honors excellence in scholarship on racial, ethnic and cultural hurdles. We're delighted to have you with us today, Rick.

Mark Posner. Mark is currently the adjunct professor of the Washington College of Law at American University and University of Maryland Law School where he teaches election law and legal writing. He has also worked as an independent consultant for the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. Mr. Posner has worked -- is a graduate of the University of California at Santa Cruz and the Bolt School of Law at the University of California, Berkeley. We're again very delighted to have you here.

MS. POSNER: Thank you very much.

MR. ROGERS: Robert Kengle served with the Voting Section of the Department of Justice after joining the civil rights division in 1984 as an honorable graduate of the Antioch School of Law. A trial attorney, he litigated minority vote dilution claims under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, enforcement and preclearance actions under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act and constitutional claims of unconstitutional racial gerrymandering. We're very delighted to have you here with us today and thank you for being with us.

Kent Williams. Kent serves in particular as the executive director of the Civil Liberties Union of Virginia. And again, we're very delighted to have you here with us today.

Margaret Jurgensen. Margaret has served as the elections director of the Montgomery County Board of Elections since August 2001. Ms. Jurgensen has a master's degree in public administration from the University of Nebraska at Omaha. That's my part of the world. I'm born in Nebraska, of all places. And a bachelor's degree. I'm into that, as an aside.

In our state, if I told folks I was from Omaha, I would have never been elected as lieutenant governor. But in any event, I'm delighted that you're here with us. You have a bachelor's degree in journalism from the University of Nebraska at Lincoln. So thank you kindly for being here with us today.

Margaret, we are going with your testimony first. I understand that there are time considerations that are important. Thank you for being with us.

MS. JURGENSEN: Good afternoon. For the record, my name is Margaret Jurgensen. I'm the election director for Montgomery County, Maryland Board of Elections. We conducted an election in November of 2004 in which 518,000 registered voters participated. This included a dramatic increase in the number of registered voters and the introduction of touch screen voting systems, the Department of Justice voting rights under the Section 203 for the bilingual voting as well as the Help America Vote mandates or provisional voting.

The multicultural voter empowerment community engaged over 100 community representatives and volunteers as election information guides and we designed the election judge training module to incorporate the legal and technical voting system requirements and this program was unique as well as successful. Our election judge training was redesigned and delivered by experienced election judge trainers. This program included hands-on experience, take-home videos, a quick reference guide and open the door refresher.

Election judges, experienced and first timers gained from this multifaceted information delivery system. In the process of recruiting approximately the needed 3,200 election judges necessary to conduct the election on November of 2004, our goal was to make certain that we had at least one individual that spoke Spanish in every precinct.

We achieved that goal in all instances and it was the decision of our multicultural voter empowerment committee to also reach out to other members of our community that spoke other languages. And we ultimately represented 17 different languages in our county that were placed at the polling place.

Additionally, our election judges were informed that if, for some reason, they were to have a difficulty working with an individual with a second language that was -- English was the second language, they were informed to call the Board of Elections and we would have language banks standing by to be able to assist them.

The challenge for -- the biggest challenge for the Board of Elections, besides the language requirements, we were having to implement technology on a level that we had never seen before. And this forced the Board of Elections to examine the entire system and, in that process, we brought in our members of our committee to help us devise the best means to inform the voters of the voting system and the voting procedures.

This challenge required us to look at every aspect of our functions, beginning with the process of the actual voter registration form to the way we notified voters in what language, what the expectations of a potential voter are when they come into the polling place, the sample ballot that we have traditionally sent to the voters. In our discussions with our committee members, they brought to us a lot of disinformation or information that quite honestly I put in the same category as urban myths.

One of the things that probably, as an election director who has served for 16 years, I was informed by members of my committee that, well, of course you don't count absentee ballots if the election is a clear-cut winner on election day and we said, no, that's not the case. It's very important for you to understand that you have the right to vote absentee, you have to meet certain legal qualifications and after -- according to the laws of Maryland, whether John Smith wins 99 percent of the way, we will count every ballot.

And also it was really critical for our committee as well as our board to educate individuals on the new procedure of provisional voting and that every person, even if their name didn't appear, they weren't a resident of Montgomery County, was afforded the opportunity to vote a provisional ballot in the State of Maryland.

The cost of implementing this program and obviously, on the local level where -- that is where the service is delivered and we, by many standards, we have a small budget. It's approximately $2 million. And what we did was convinced -- and this was a county effort. So we went to our county and said -- we went to the county council and stated, in order for our office to succeed in implementing the requirements of Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, we need to be able to have one individual help us look at this. So we hired one individual and then we provided the committee a budget as to what they could spend to help them spread the word. So these monies included salary, overtime, voting units and cell phone costs and things like that.

And then, again, you have to keep in mind that besides meeting the requirements of the Voting Rights Act, we were also looking at this huge shift in the technology. We went from the old data mode punch cards to this touch screen voting system. So we looked at the entire process and said, we need to examine the way everything is delivered.

And so this meant that election judge training, which had been a simple one and a half, two-hour program, now needed to be ramped up to four to five hours' worth of training, making certain that besides the technology requirements, the importance of integrating the requirements of sensitivity, the importance to lay out a polling place so that the signage -- I mean, these things -- in terms of my colleagues who are sitting here on the panel, they're way up here. These gentlemen probably are very, very well-meaning.

But I'm kind of on the street level. I have to make sure that the men and women that are serving in the polling place treat every individual walking through that schoolhouse door or going through that recreation center the same equal opportunity that every other voter should have across the country. And that means making sure that there is equal access, that the signage is very clear, that they feel comfortable asking the questions and we have those languages available.

Montgomery County was identified by the National Association of County Officials for their multicultural voter empowerment committee in 2005 and every dime we spent was well worth it and I think it's an effort that we need to continue reaching out toward. Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, Ms. Jurgensen. Do the commissioners have any questions for Ms. Jurgensen? Because she needs to leave.

MS. NARASAKI: I really want to commend Montgomery County for going beyond the requirements of Section 203 which only mandates, I believe, Spanish for Maryland, and for doing the other languages. I'm wondering how much it cost to do that and whether the touch screen technology has helped in that regard.

MS. JURGENSEN: I think that the touch screen technology definitely helps on the election day level in improving everyone's opportunity to vote. We currently have two languages on that particular ballot station. I know that it can go up to seven, I believe is what our manufacturer can do. And I think that anything that enhances the opportunity to execute your vote in privacy, whatever language you want.

And one of the things I would ask in your making your recommendations is I have been approached on several different instances by the media and elected officials and they say, well, can't you tell us how many people are actually voting on those languages? And I don't think that that's a good idea. I think that that would have a chilling effect because let's say you're one of 200 and you're the only person that selects one language. I don't want any opportunity for anyone to be able to go back and check whether that individual vote could be identified by a person.

MS NARASAKI: And the cost?

MS. JURGENSEN: Well, the cost of the entire technology, I can get that for you.

MS. NARASAKI: Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Commissioner Davidson?

MR. DAVIDSON: You mentioned, I believe, that the multicultural empowerment committee reached out to 17 different language groups?

MS. JURGENSEN: Yes.

MR. DAVIDSON: Did those language groups have their own -- I mean, ballots in their own languages?

MS. JURGENSEN: No. The only languages that are on the ballots currently are English and Spanish and then we also have written instructions in Vietnamese, Korean and Mandarin Chinese.

MR. DAVIDSON: So what was the nature of the help that was given to the other languages?

MS. JURGENSEN: We had election judges that were bilingual in, say, English and Russian or Chinese and English, Vietnamese and English, and then if you did have an individual, let's say, show up at a polling place that their primary language was Vietnamese, then they could call into the Board of Elections on a special phone line and we would have an individual affiliated with the language bank there to talk to the voter and talk to the chief judge.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Margaret, I have a question for you. I'm curious about this. Let me assume, for example, that 203 does not exist. If you assume that Section 203 is gone, that it's not reauthorized, what happens under those circumstances with voters as you described at the base level where folks are going and do vote? What happens?

MS. JURGENSEN: Well, one advantage for myself would be that -- I mean, I've already invested the money into all the translation services so I would continue to do it. But I will tell you that when I was the election commissioner in Omaha, Nebraska, and that was back in the '80s, early '90s, and one of the very first things that I tried to do and was very simple was to create a sample ballot in both English and Spanish.

I was really met with a lot of resistance. That was considered not a good investment of the public money and all of the things that come with that. And so I think it would be harder on the local level to convince the public policy makers, your county commissioners, your town councils that that is an important investment of public dollars.

MR. ROGERS: Some minority, for example, by asking you to take a look at the numbers, that if you have a circumstance in which only one out of, let's say, 500 voters needs the language assistance that you're talking about, or maybe that's why they're asking you for those numbers in the first place, that you really don't need to have essentially taxpayer dollars being spent in that regard to aid one out of 500 people. Your response to that would be what?

MS. JURGENSEN: Well, it's my understanding that according to the Census Bureau that the reason Montgomery County moved into that particular category is that we had individuals that were not -- the literacy in English was so low that it was better to have the ballot available in Spanish. So again, while it is important to vote, to be able to understand what you're voting for is just as important.

MS. NARASAKI: To be covered, you have to have 10,000.

MR. ROGERS: Exactly. Well, thank you very much. We appreciate you being with us today and I understand that you may need to leave. Thank you kindly.

We'll move forward, if we can. Rick Valelly. I'll get it right. You just have to forgive me on it, please.

MR. VALELLY: Absolutely. For the record, I'm Rick Valelly, professor of political science at Swarthmore College and I have a last name that is hard to pronounce.

I'm here because I'm one of three coauthors on an article which has not yet appeared but we hope it will appear in either a law review or in some kind of journal that lawyers read and we also have some expectation of publication with a volume that's coming out of the Russell Sage Foundation.

Some years ago, I was at a panel of the American Political Science Association and one of the panelists leaned into the microphone when it was his turn to speak and said in a very low voice, "I'm here because I have some very important discoveries to share with you."

This was obviously a facetious way of introducing what I think is worthwhile about this article. The article involved reading and systematically quoting over a thousand objection letters that the Department of Justice issues to covered jurisdictions under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. And as you know, Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act is one of the sections which is a temporary section and is up for reauthorization.

And the purpose of the investigation that the three of us did in looking at these objection letters was to get a sense of the structure and evolution of Section 5 enforcement, looking at the information contained in the objection letters. And the objection letters are public so our findings can be replicated by anyone who cares to look at the letters. And these letters spanned a period of three and a half decades from the 1970s to 2004. And to repeat, it's a sample of over a thousand letters.

And when we finished the work, we were struck by -- because we did the work both before and after the Supreme Court's decision in Bossier 2, the second Bossier Parish case. As you know, the section -- meaning of the purpose prong of Section 5 changed as a result of the 5/4 decision of the Supreme Court in that particular case.

The opinion of the Court written by Justice Scalia holds that the purpose prong of Section 5 does not in fact have any constitutional meaning so that if there is any evidence of discriminatory purpose in the record, the Department must nonetheless preclear the proposed change.

If there is no intent to retrogress, so, that is to say, the record might show that local elections officials have an intent to limit or contain the influence of minority voters on public policy and on the election of officials or on access of ballots and to the polling place. But if the change is not retrogressive, that is to say, does not make their position worse off than it was before, that is to say, there is no change in the status quo and a roll-back, if you will, the Department of Justice is required, despite the evidence of discriminatory purpose, to preclear that proposed change.

And that is, according to the opinion of the Court, to adjust the meaning of the effect prong and the purpose prong so that they're both about retrogression. And our findings from our data had a very clear implication when we took a look at Bossier. And what we found was that up until the holding in Bossier, there was a great deal of objection activity from the Department of Justice under Section 5 preclearance that objected on the basis of evidence of discriminatory purpose.

And after Bossier 2, the number of objections which are issued under the new doctrine that you can only object to retrogressive intent dropped to some 25 objections relative to -- and if you compare that four-year period to a four-year period from the 1990s, there were 250 objection letters on the basis of intent under the prior standard. So this is a huge shift. It's sort of like dropping off a cliff.

Now, actually, things change all the time and perhaps there are other explanations other than the other factual explanation which seems to be coming at us from the data, namely, that because there was a new standard, there was a narrowing, therefore, of Section 5 clearance. It could be that there were other reasons for why there wasn't evidence of discriminatory intent to retrogress. But because the Department is barred from considering anything except retrogressive intent and retrogressive effect, essentially the number of objection letters really shrank from a modest-sized stream to a trickle.

And we think that that has very important implications for the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act. We think that Section 5 not only needs to be reauthorized, and I'm just going to give a sense of the deterrent effect of Section 5 in just a second in the sense of qualitative evidence, but we also think that Section 5 not only needs to be reauthorized but, when it's reauthorized, it needs to address this problem that Bossier 2 creates.

Bossier 2 narrows what can be done with Section 5 to a point that -- one wouldn't go as far as to say it eviscerates Section 5, but it actually weakens Section 5 and so the language of Section 5 has to also be amended in order to cope with and correct the finding in Bossier 2.

Just to give a sense of what Section 5 does, and this is familiar to all of you but it's often incredibly helpful to realize. I particularly have objection letter evidence that comes from the 1990s. So this is recent evidence. There is a ballot access case that comes from Georgia in 1995. A Georgia county tried to switch from a polling place in an urban black neighborhood with sidewalks, crosswalks, street lights and a speed limit of 35 miles per hour to land outside the city limits in a predominantly white neighborhood on a blind curve on a highway with a speed limit of 55 miles per hour and the Department saw this as retrogressive.

The black community had no opportunity for input, moreover, and the county provided no nonracial explanation for the change, leading the attorney general to object on purpose grounds as well.

My point here is -- I'm disconnecting my first point with my larger point here which is important to Section 5. Here is an example from 1995 of an apparently minor but subsequently enormously important change in ballot access. Section 5 allows the United States to object to a change of this sort and is, therefore, a deterrent.

So not only has Section 5 been weakened but it also -- that needs to be addressed. But here is a clear example of the kind of thing Section 5 can prevent and deter. Take Section 5 away and these kinds of things -- I mean, obviously I can't predict that this will happen but this is evidence from 1995.

To give another example, there is an annexation case from Lamesa, Texas in the late 1990s. The city of Lamesa, Texas where Hispanics and blacks together form 51 percent of the population, Lamesa de-annexed an area only a year after initially bringing it into the city. So again, this is evidence of a discriminatory purpose.

White residents of a particular election district with new areas where a low and moderate income housing development was to be placed mounted a major effort to block the arrival of, quote, undesirables, quote, HUD people and, quote, Section 8 people who would allegedly bring, quote, criminal activity to the neighborhood. The city bowed to this pressure and de-annexed the development one year later. The Department objected on purpose grounds.

So just two examples from two different places just to underscore the absolutely fundamental point that Section 5 is an extraordinary deterrent and these are examples of behavior from -- official behavior from the 1990s.

The second point, which I led with, is that Bossier 2 weakens Section 5 and it essentially says the Department can only object to a tiny sliver of official behavior that has a discriminatory purpose, that is to say, behavior that is retrogressive. And not only does Section 5 need to be reauthorized, it needs to be strengthened. Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, kindly. We appreciate it. We'll come back with some questions in a moment. Mr. Posner?

MS. POSNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Let me just add, in terms of my background, that after I left California and graduated from various University of California institutions, I then joined the Voting Section of the civil rights division, like Mr. Kengle, and I was a member of the Voting Section from the day after President Reagan was elected in 1980, or actually the day before, until 1995.

And for many of those years, particularly from the mid-'80s until I left in 1995, I was the supervisor handling Section 5 submissions, for example, from '92 to '95, I had the title of Special Section 5 Counsel. So I was involved in the interposing probably of scores of Section 5 objections and really God knows how many preclearances that went through my desk.

Also, before I left California, I'll also mention that I share something with one of your panelists having clerked for the Honorable Harry Pregerson, who was then a district court judge in Los Angeles.

So turning now to my testimony, which I'm very honored to provide to this Commission, sort of taking off from where Professor Valelly was discussing, two themes I believe stand out above all others as this Commission and members of Congress examine how Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act has been enforced since its most recent authorization in 1982.

First, as Professor Valelly described, prior to the Supreme Court's January 2000 decision in the Bossier Parish case, discriminatory purpose increasingly has become the principal basis on which the Justice Department was basing its Section 5 objections. And this in turn was mostly a function of the Department's redistricting objections.

According to the analysis that Professor Valelly prepared with his coauthors, about three quarters of all Section 5 objections in the 1990s were based by the Department in whole or in part on the finding of discriminatory purpose where the voting change was not retrogressive. Furthermore, among those purpose objections, about three quarters were to districting claims. So these redistricting purpose objections played a central and substantial role in the Justice Department's enforcement of the preclearance requirement in the 1990s.

Second, a majority of the Supreme Court in recent years has been highly distrustful of the manner in which the Justice Department applied the Section 5 purpose test to redistrictings and it's been hostile to the purpose test itself. In 1995 in the Miller versus Johnson decision, the Supreme Court blasted the Department's conduct, concluding that the Department was using the purpose test as a cover for the implementation of a near unconstitutional policy of maximization.

Then in the Bossier Parish 2 decision, the Court essentially read the purpose test entirely out of the statute by keeping the purpose inquiry within the narrow confines of the retrogression analysis. Thus, the discriminatory purpose under Section 5 is no longer coextensive with discriminatory purpose under the 14th and 15th Amendments.

Putting these two things together or, more accurately, subtracting the second from the first, the Justice Department and the District Court for the District of Columbia had been left uncomfortably close to zero. The authority of the Department and the District Court under Section 5 to bar the implementation of discriminatory changes is now highly circumscribed.

The bottom line question posed by this history is whether Congress should legislatively reverse the Bossier Parish 2 decision as part of an extension of Section 5. This question in turn presents two critical subsidiary questions. Did the Justice Department in fact overstep and misuse its authority in the 1990s when it interposed numerous purpose objections to redistricting plans? And was the Supreme Court correct in the Bossier Parish 2 decision that Congress meant for the Section 5 purpose test to be limited to the issue of retrogressive purpose?

In my testimony today, I will focus on the former question. However, I know that I also strongly am of the view that the Bossier Parish 2 majority misstated what Congress intended the purpose test to mean. The plain meaning of the word purpose encompasses any and all discriminatory purposes, not merely a purpose-caused retrogression.

Moreover, it is implausible, if not unbelievable, that Congress in 1965 meant to adopt such a small definition of purpose when, as the Supreme Court noted in 1966, Congress had adopted Section 5 to respond to exceptional circumstances by acting in a decisive manner to an uncommon exercise of congressional power.

The question of whether, in the recent past, the Justice Department followed a constitutionally suspect or prohibited path is directly relevant to the legislative reversal issue because when we now look to the future, it presents the question whether the Department may be trusted to properly apply the purpose test if the pre-Bossier 2 law is reinstated. In other words, if the Department badly handled this authority in the past, one could ask whether it is appropriate to again give the Department that authority in the future.

In examining the Justice Department's application of the Section 5 purpose test in the 1990s, it is important at the outset to place the 1990s objections in context in terms of how and when did the Department develop its purpose analysis. As a threshold matter, by the 1990s, the courts clearly had held that the Department had the authority to pose objections to nonretrogressive voting changes based upon discriminatory purpose.

The Supreme Court had so held in the City of Richmond case, the District Court for the District of Columbia underscored this in the Section 5 decision in Busbee and the Supreme Court again so held in the City of Pleasant Grove. The Department began to interpose a significant number of purpose objections to nonretrogressive changes in the 1980s under the leadership of then assistant attorney general William Bradford Reynolds.

These objections first took full flower in the Department's reviews of post-1980 redistrictings by Mississippi counties. During Mr. Reynolds' tenure, the Department imposed about 25 objections to such plans based upon purpose. Thereafter, Mr. Reynolds expanded the application of the purpose test to review covered jurisdiction changes from an at-large method of election to a mid system of districts and at-large seats.

In the 1980s, many covered jurisdictions were abandoning their at-large systems in response to the amendment to Section 2 in 1982 creating the results test. In the context of racially polarized voting, the new mix of election systems clearly weren't ameliorative, but the concern was that some jurisdictions nevertheless were intentionally seeking to minimize the minority voting stream by adopting such things as a majority vote requirement or antisingle shot provisions for the remaining at-large seats.

The modes of analysis forged under Mr. Reynolds then were applied by the Justice Department to the post-1990 redistricting. Indeed, about a fifth of the total number of 1990 purpose objections to redistricting plans were against plans enacted by Mississippi counties. Overall, the Department interposed objections to 1990 census plans at almost exactly the same rate it interposed objections to the post-1980 census plans.

I previously have published a comprehensive and detailed analysis of the Department's post-1990 redistricting plans in a book edited by Professor Bernard Groffman. I concluded that in interposing these objections, the Department followed the well-established framework for conducting purpose analyses set out by the Supreme Court in the Arlington Heights decision and also followed the factors set forth in the Department's procedures for the administration of Section 5. I guess I have a little bit more if I could continue. We're past the time limit.

MR. ROGERS: That is fine, although we would have to have -- could we have a copy of your actual testimony?

MS. POSNER: Yes, I gave that to Mr. Greenbaum.

MR. ROGERS: Wonderful. We'll move forward.

MS. POSNER: I then go on to describe the factors that the Department used in applying the Arlington Heights framework to the purpose analysis following judicial precedent, looking at the impact of the plan as court decisions have indicated the Department should in studying discriminatory purpose, and then studying the rationales used or put forward by the jurisdictions to see if the justifications they have -- they were submitting for adopting a plan that diluted the minority voting stream, whether those justifications in fact were mutual justifications or really they were just a cover for an intent to discriminate in adopting these redistricting plans.

In sum, what I conclude and what I lay out in some more detail in my written testimony is that the Department's approach in interposing the 1990s purpose objections was, as I said, a continuation of the modes of analysis begun in the 1980s and involved, on the one hand, a tough and assertive use of the Section 5 preclearance authority and, on the other, abuse of the authority that was well grounded in judicial precedent. In other words, the claim made by the Supreme Court I believe is incorrect and the claim also made by conservative commentators, and that the Department in fact did not abuse its authority when it enforced the pre-Bossier 2 purpose standard.

What this means, then, is this. The Justice Department's conduct in enforcing the purpose standard fully supports the purpose of returning that authority, the purpose authority, to the Department as well as to the District Court for the District of Columbia through a reversal of the Bossier Parish 2 decision.

And finally, in order to provide further assurance that the Department and the district court will employ the purpose standard in an appropriate manner in the future, Congress should consider including statutory language and/or legislative history that will guide the Department and the district court much like Congress did when it enacted the Section 2 results test in 1982. Thank you again for providing me the opportunity to testify before this Commission.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you again, Mr. Posner. We'll come back with a question. I know we have plenty for each one of you that are here. Mr. Kengle, are you ready?

MR. KENGLE: Yes. Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission. I thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today. I've been asked to discuss the Supreme Court's decision in the Georgia versus Ashcroft case from 2003. Usually I work from an outline. Today I'm going to try to stick to the script in order to make time. There is a fair amount of ground to cover and if you need to cut me off, go ahead but I do want to try to address these issues because I think they're fairly important.

Until April of this year, I have had the privilege to serve as a deputy chief of the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division at the United States Department of Justice. In that role, I supervised the voting sections trial team for the Ashcroft case in the District Court for the District of Columbia. I also played a limited direct role in the litigation of the case by handling the cross-examination of the State of Georgia's expert witness at trial. My remarks today are based upon the public record and my own personal views and they do not disclose the internal deliberations within the Department of Justice on the Ashcroft case or any other matter.

The Ashcroft case involves Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act which, as you know, Congress first enacted in 1965 and extended in 1975 and 1982. Section 5 was one of the provisions of the Voting Rights Act that was set to expire in 2007 and much already has been written about the Ashcroft decision and its implications, raising more issues than I can hope to cover today. So what I'm going to try to do today is to provide an outline of the Ashcroft decision and to provide some additional context comment on the case, time permitting.

Under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, certain covered jurisdictions are required to obtain preclearance before they enforce any changes affecting voting. Examples of these changes would include polling place changes, voter registration hours, voter registration procedures as well as more complicated complex changes such as legislative redistricting plans. That's what was at issue in the Ashcroft case.

A jurisdiction may obtain Section 5 preclearance by making an administrative submission to the United States attorney general, after which the attorney general has 60 days in which to interpose an objection. If the attorney general does not interpose an objection within 60 days, the changes are deemed precleared.

A covered jurisdiction also has the option, which is used in only a very small number of cases, to seek judicial preclearance by filing a lawsuit in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. The United States and the United States attorney general are named as defendants in all of those lawsuits which are known as Section 5 declaratory judgment actions and those lawsuits are decided by panels of three judges.

Appeals from declaratory judgment actions go directly to the Supreme Court. They bypass the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Prior to the Ashcroft case, Section 5 declaratory judgment actions involving redistricting plans almost always were filed only after the attorney general had interposed an objection to an administrative submission, meaning that the Department of Justice had already received, analyzed and reached a determination about the plan before the cases that were filed.

In either an administrative preclearance decision or a declaratory judgment lawsuit, the jurisdiction is required to prove that its proposed voting changes do not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or membership in a language minority. The Department of Justice follows, in its administrative determinations, the holdings of the District of Columbia Court and, of course, the Supreme Court.

The Georgia versus Ashcroft case determined the question of how to apply the portion of Section 5 which prohibits voting changes having the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race. Ever since 1976, the District of Columbia Court and the Department of Justice have been guided by the leading decision of the Supreme Court on this point which was a case named Beer versus United States.

The Beer case involved the redistricting of New Orleans City Council districts. In the Beer case, the Supreme Court interpreted the term effect, under Section 5, to mean a voting change which leaves minority voters in a worse position than they presently occupied. That prohibited type of change, that is, a change to a worse position, became known as retrogression.

When the Supreme Court looked at the facts of the Beer case, it found that the city's proposed redistricting plan would create more districts with black voter registration majorities than the plan in effect at the time and, therefore, that there was no retrogression because black voters would have a better chance to elect black-preferred candidates under the new plan as compared to the old plan, which is known as the benchmark plan. The existing plan is known as the benchmark plan under Section 5.

Somewhat surprisingly, between the time of the Beer decision in 1976 and 2001, there were very few judicial cases directly involving retrogression in redistricting plans. That changed in October 2001 when the State of Georgia filed a declaratory judgment action in the D.C. Court seeking Section 5 preclearance for its 2001 congressional, state senate and state house redistricting plans.

A declaratory judgment action involving three statewide redistricting plans for which there had been no administrative submission was unprecedented. I raised this point to illustrate to the court the current Section 5 scheme under which a jurisdiction may perversely gain an advantage by waiting to seek judicial preclearance until the last possible minute without first having made an administrative submission. This seriously limits the ability of the Justice Department to develop a comprehensive record in a highly complex and significant type of case which, after the Ashcroft decision, has become significantly more complex.

In Ashcroft, the state demanded final judgment from the D.C. Court before the end of 2001, which the D.C. Court rejected. But the court did set a firm trial date for the first week in February 2002. The Voting Section assigned a trial team of four attorneys to the case full time and they immediately began an intensive investigation and analysis of the three statewide plans at issue.

Recalling, we had no information about these plans at the time the lawsuit was filed and the section was handling hundreds of other redistricting submissions which were pending at the time. If we could have put more than four attorneys on it, I would have requested that we do so but there were other pressing issues that had to be addressed as well. The voting sections trial team did an incredible job of meeting this most demanding schedule.

Now, the United States ultimately challenged the state senate plan as retrogressive. Our theory was simple, that the state had made retrogressive changes to three specific state senate districts, in Albany, Macon and Savannah, that were not offset elsewhere in the plan. In each of those three districts, black voter registration had been reduced from above 50 percent to below 50 percent and, in each of those districts, our evidence shows that voting was racially polarized.

Furthermore, although each of those three districts was underpopulated and needed to add population in order to achieve one person/one vote compliance, majority black precincts had been taken out of each of those districts unnecessarily.

Now, the United States did not object to the court granting preclearance for the state congressional and state house plans. However, the United States was not the only defendant in the Ashcroft case. The D.C. Court permitted a group of Georgia citizens to intervene in the case and to defend against the state's claims, not only for the senate plan but also for the congressional and state house plan to which the United States had no opposition.

I believe this right of a private citizen to challenge voting changes to which the United States did not object is significant because it provides a potential ground for Congress to grant a private right of action to individual citizens to enforce the substantive provisions of Section 5 which currently is foreclosed by the Supreme Court's decision in the case of Morris versus Gressette.

As I noted previously, the DOJ challenged three senate districts. One point that is often missed or misunderstood is that there have been significant reductions in the black VAP voting age population in every majority black district in the benchmark senate plan, yet those other districts did not prompt a challenge from DOJ.

In thinking about what the Ashcroft decision did and did not change, it's important to bear in mind that DOJ did not take the position that Georgia was locked into maintaining the current black percentage in each of the majority black districts in the benchmark plan. However, the Ashcroft case brought out just how limited the precedent was for applying Section 5 retrogression standards to redistricting plans. The jurisdictions really did not have much in the way of precedence to give them guidance on what to do.

Ultimately in 2002, the D.C. Court ruled against the state, agreeing with the Department of Justice that three challenged districts were retrogressive and that the state had not shown any offsetting increases in the black voting stream. For those reasons, the state failed to meet its burden of proof.

The D.C. Court did rule in favor of the state and granted preclearance to the congressional and state house plans which the intervenors had challenged. The state appealed the senate plan judgment to the Supreme Court and in 2003, the Supreme Court vacated the district court's judgment and remanded the case.

In its decision, the Supreme Court touched upon numerous points. The main point, however, was its conclusion that in deciding whether effective black voting strength was being reduced in Georgia, the D.C. court should have looked at factors beyond the number of districts in which black voters had the ability to elect candidates of their choice. These factors included the creation of additional districts in which black voters could influence the outcome by, for example, helping to elect a white Democrat candidate, even if they could not elect the candidates of their choice, the candidates they would most prefer.

The Supreme Court also held that the district court should consider whether helping Democrats retain control of the senate would help advance black voters' interests by maintaining the seniority of current black representatives, some of whom were committee chairs.

I will stress the Supreme Court merely vacated the district court's judgment and remanded the case for further consideration. It did not reverse the case, nor did the Supreme Court reverse any of the district court findings of fact. Thus, the district court's specific findings that the three senate districts challenged by DOJ were retrogressive remained the law of the case. I see that I've got the time flag.

MR. ROGERS: Go ahead and finish.

MR. KENGLE: The fact that the case was remanded is important to a full understanding of Ashcroft because the Supreme Court never found that Georgia had met its burden of proof. Certainly there is language in the Ashcroft decision which suggests that the Supreme Court majority expected the state to be able to meet its burden of proof based on the record that it had at the time. On the other hand, the Department of Justice's brief on remand contains several supporting demonstrative exhibits which I'm appending to my testimony. And I've passed copies of those out previously.

With 20/20 hindsight, I wish that we had introduced those exhibits during the initial trial because they illustrate how, when you compare the benchmark plan in that case with the proposed plan that was challenged, it immediately becomes questionable whether any additional new influenced districts were in fact created by the senate's proposed plan, by the state's proposed plan.

I think the Supreme Court thought that there were new districts that had been created but when you look at the actual numbers side by side, I think it's hard to come to that conclusion. Now, whether this would have affected the Supreme Court's view of the facts, I can't be sure. I do suspect that it might have tempered some of the Court's observations that it made.

Ultimately, the case was dismissed on remand back down to the district court because of the Larios case that was going on in Georgia. It effectively rooted out the state's case. Before the case was dismissed, though, the D.C. Court had decided to reopen the record, allow additional discovery and allow an additional evidentiary hearing. So the Court, in looking at the evidence and the arguments that we made, agreed that there was more to it than simply entering a judgment in favor of the state. There was more of a case there than what might have initially met the eye.

On the Ashcroft case, my personal view is that the Supreme Court prematurely and unnecessarily, if not incorrectly, introduced factors into the retrogression analysis that make the Section 5 process more complicated and burdensome for everybody, not just for the Department of Justice but for the jurisdictions that have to comply with it as well. Furthermore, I think decisions will become less predictable and more open to subjective judgements, individual preconceptions and even political biases as a result of the Ashcroft decision.

In any event, there are important unresolved issues resulting from Ashcroft. The most vexing -- there are any number that we could talk about but the most vexing, I think, is exactly how one should quantify the creation of new influence districts to offset the loss of districts where minority voters are no longer going to be able to elect candidates of their choice.

Now, I could suggest a numerical rule. For example, I could say the rule should be that you have to create three new influenced districts in order to offset the loss of one district of minority voters to previously elect their candidates of choice. The problem is I don't know how to make a principal distinction between that rule and a rule that was based on a two-to-one ratio or a four-to-one ratio. It's very hard to know that.

And that's left completely unclear by the Supreme Court's decision. And the fact that there is not a clear standard on that now is to me the best reason for Congress either to act in some way to clarify this or to repudiate the holding in the Ashcroft decision.

Let me conclude with this. My initial reaction to Ashcroft was somewhat akin to Charlie Brown flopping down as his friend Lucy once again pulled the football out from under his feet. Over time, however, I've come to believe that Ashcroft may turn out to have more limited effect than was often thought. This may sound somewhat surprising so let me quickly try to explain.

The essence of Ashcroft is that majority-minority legislative districts are not necessarily the only means by which minority voters can effectively exercise the electoral franchise, especially where partisan elections may encourage cross-racial electoral lines as implicating control of legislative bodies. This could include, depending on how broadly one defines an effort to control a legislative body, as most legislative and congressional redistricting plans.

Now, for many people, I think this is what they think of when they think of Section 5. The impact on power politics, high profile statewide redistrictings. And that's understandable. Those things are very important. But it's my firm conviction, based on two decades of experience with the entire range of Section 5 issues, that in terms of the day-to-day effect upon the average citizen in a covered jurisdiction, Section 5 is equally important, if not more important, to local government and local elections as it is to high profile statewide redistrictings.

Even if the statewide plans were excluded from Section 5 coverage, which I'm not suggesting at all but even hypothetically, if they were not under Section 5 coverage, Section 5 would nevertheless continue to play a vital role in preventing retrogressive changes at the local level. Many local governments are nonpartisan. Even localities with partisan elections may not reflect cross-racial alliances that occur at the statewide level, which the D.C. Court actually found in the Ashcroft case based on the voting history in Georgia. Thus, Ashcroft's emphasis on partisan alliances may only prove to have a passing impact in local elections, local cases.

I think there are several other reasons that Ashcroft may be more limited than people think.

But for time purposes, I'll let my written testimony cover those things. Once again, I thank the Commission for the opportunity to testify and for the work that the Commission is doing in going across the county to support public service.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you, Mr. Kengle. We appreciate that. We're asking you all, by the way, just so you know this, you all have spent a lot of time to prepare your remarks as they relate to this hearing today and I understand that and we're talking about complex issues that the court obviously has taken some time to deal with and years' worth of substance that goes into the substance of your testimony.

We're sorry about the short time frame that we're working with but we're very appreciative of having your written remarks or any summaries or outlines that might be available to make that all part of the record. But I know that we'll all have tons of questions for you so I don't want you to feel the need to necessarily get every word in now because we have tons of questions to ask you.

All right. Mr. Willis? Thank you. Administratively, I do want to check on one thing. I know we've gone over time. Are you okay on time for questions? Okay, wonderful. As a practical matter what we'll do, and I'll let the fellow commissioners know this, we will not likely have public testimony.

And so what we would like to do is to take the additional time that would have been allotted related to public testimony and spend the time in terms of questions and answers for this panel and then we will likely have closing remarks and move forward with the end of this proceeding.

So you are likely to be our final panel today unless there are members of the public that I'm unaware of who may well be here to share remarks or thoughts. Mr. Willis, please.

MR. WILLIS: Thank you. I would like to begin by letting you know that I am absolutely not an expert on the Voting Rights Act. I'm much different than the folks up here and I'm quite impressed with what they've had to say. I'm someone that's worked at the ground level with the Voting Rights Act for the last 18 years in Virginia as the executive director of the ACLU of Virginia. I've been involved directly with organizing citizens and preparing information for more than a dozen Section 2 lawsuits that were filed in Virginia. Most of those lawsuits challenge local electoral print-ins. Generally we're talking about at-large claims that through Section 2 were moved to redistricting plans.

I've also worked extensively with Section 5 comments. Our office produced, in the early '90s and again in early 2001, manuals for localities to follow. When they were -- for minority use in localities to follow when they were following the redistricting plans taking place under the bicennial redistricting in their localities. And I worked very closely with those groups, helped them write comment letters under Section 5 and helped them draw up alternative voting plans in those districts.

I also, in 1991 and again in 2001, was the lead person for the ACLU lobbying the Virginia General Assembly on the redistricting of state senate and delegate seats as well as congressional seats. I'm proud to say, by the way, that it was the ACLU in Virginia that stood before the Virginia General Assembly in 1991 when the privileges and elections committees for both the House and the Senate said that it was impossible to draw a majority-minority congressional district. We held the plan up and said, here it is. We were working on a $3,000 computer. They were working on $500,000 worth of computer equipment and personnel and we managed to do it when they didn't.

I bring that up because I think part of my theme today is not about some of the details of Section 5 or Section 2 or other factors of the Voting Rights Act, but how people feel about it at the ground level and the forces that exist. And these are forces against full implementation of the Voting Rights Act or full implementation of the quality in voting by minorities and what that might be like without the Voting Rights Act, particularly Section 5.

I've witnessed, during my time in Virginia, a dramatic shift in the political landscape. In the mid-1980s in Virginia, there was 75 minority-elected officials. That's local and state level both. Of course there was no -- there were no minorities in the congressional delegation at that time.

By 1991, after a series of voting rights cases filed under Section 2 and after dramatic changes with redistricting under -- in 1991 when localities through the Section 5 process submitted plans that really redrew very, very significantly the local political landscape, Virginia moved from 75 to 150 African-American elected officials by the mid-'90s.

By the late '90s, that had moved to about 300. And there is a distortion in the figure but one of the things we were working on all of this time is that Virginia was the last state in the nation to allow school boards to be elected. Our lawsuit actually challenging that was based on the 1902 Virginia Constitutional Convention, at least partly based on information at the convention in which the record showed that Virginia purposely excluded -- purposely prevented elected school boards to make sure that blacks were not elected to the school board. Through the appointing process, there was much greater control. And that's on the record, for the record.

So this is the long history of race discrimination you have in Virginia. What I have handed to you is a document we call a compilation of laws, legislative reports and initial decisions demonstrating the presence of government-sanctioned racial discrimination in Virginia. This is a report we actually compiled originally a few years ago to send to the governor of Virginia during the 2001 redistricting process to remind him of the long history of racial discrimination in Virginia, particularly official government sanctioned race discrimination.

One of the things this report does, though, that is particularly relevant to what you are looking at is it does list all of the Section 2 cases in Virginia where racially polarized voting was found. Among the expert testimony that was accepted by the courts related to racially polarized voting, I think probably most dramatic is the testimony that came out in Moon v. Meadows. That was the case challenging the constitutionality of the third congressional district, Virginia's one majority-minority congressional district.

In that case, the court accepted the testimony that within that congressional district, in 35 elections between 1986 and 1991, that in head-to-head local elections between black and white candidates, there was significant racially polarized voting. 78 percent of blacks voted for blacks and 87 percent of whites voted for whites. And that's just part of the sort of broad landscape of racially polarized voting that's been documented in Virginia with these cases.

One of the cases I wanted to mention too about racially polarized voting was a case against Henrico County, Virginia. Henrico County, Virginia was about 20 percent African-American, had never had a black elected official, had never had a black appointed official, yet it had a district that was 43 percent African-American, largely by luck of the draw. We challenged that plan in a redistricting lawsuit and in it found that there was significant racially polarized voting in Henrico County and that a district in which an African-American had a fair opportunity to be elected could be created.

What I like about that case is in the first election ever under the new plan, the African-American candidate, Dr. Frank Thorton, lost by six votes. Now, while this was a defeat for Dr. Thorton, it actually was a victory for the Voting Rights Act. This said that you could indeed draw a plan in which an African-American candidate had a fair chance to be elected.

Dr. Thorton was elected during the next election. That was in 1996. And eight years later, his peers on the city council of Henrico elected him to be chairman of the board of supervisors there. A nice success story of the Voting Rights Act.

The two other issues I would like to bring up and I'll just bring them up anecdotally primarily because I'm not an expert but I think these are issues that are important. In Fredericksburg where I live, in 2002, the city had to redistrict because of changes in the population that came about as a result of the census. Fredericksburg has long had one African-American majority district in its system and from that district, an African-American has been elected.

But the discussion -- and I attended these meetings because, one, I tend to do it and, two, I live in Fredericksburg. The discussion was entirely about how do we eliminate this district. And the instructions to the city attorney was, look at the recent Supreme Court case, you know, look at the cases that are taking place in the mid-'90s and early 2000, and tell us if there is a way we can eliminate the African-American majority district. And that was the thrust.

All of the original plans produced by the planning department and by the planning commission were plans that eliminated the African-American majority district. Only when the city attorney said, listen, you can't do it, under Section 5, under any interpretation of it, even the most recent ones by the Virginia Supreme Court, you have to draw this district or it's retrogressive. Then the city council drew the district.

But what I'm indicating to you is, despite the successes of the Voting Rights Act, there are still strong forces looking to take us backwards. And Section 5 is one of the great powers of the Act that prevents us from moving backwards.

The last thing I wanted to mention is something that I only know about because I've only seen it happen one time in Virginia and I don't know how it works elsewhere and how often and this was in 2004 Presidential elections. The Chesterfield County registrar announced that he was going to fight terrorism by putting armed police guards at every polling place. This drew outrage from the minority community. Even the state Board of Elections told him not to do it and the state Board of Elections in Virginia is not one to get involved in this sort of thing.

The registrar, despite our objections -- and I'll be just a few more minutes with this. Despite our objections, decided to go ahead and have the police, the armed guards at the polls. But what the Department of Justice decided to do was to send people to monitor the situation.

Once that was announced that the Department of Justice would have monitors on the scene, that's what changed significantly the way people reacted to this. The grave concern, of course, was that Chesterfield County, a very white county with a long history of race discrimination, was reinstituting a process and that is putting armed guards at polls that had been used earlier to prevent African-Americans from voting.

The concern was African-Americans, particularly older African-Americans who were aware of this long history, might not show up to vote. Once it was announced that the federal government, in this case the friendly federal government, would be at the polls to monitor the situation, it seemed to at least calm people's nerves and we think that maybe the armed guards didn't have the effect that possibly the registrar intended them to have.

So it's a single anecdote but it is something about the effect of monitoring and how it can be ameliorative. Anyway, I thank you very much for listening to my testimony.

MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly. I appreciate it and thank you very much. We'll now go to questions from members of the Commission. I will start to my right, actually, with Commissioner Narasaki. I wanted to note, by the way, that Commissioner Raben had to leave. You saw him a bit here earlier at the end. He had a family emergency which required that he leave the Commission hearing but we certainly wanted to acknowledge and appreciate him for having been here for the time that he was able to be with us here today.

Commissioner Narasaki?

MS. NARASAKI: Yes. I want to ask about a topic that wasn't necessarily covered by your testimony and generally that is there is a debate about the jurisdictions that are actually covered by Section 5 and I'm wondering if any of the panelists have a thought about whether it should remain the same jurisdictions. A congressman earlier this morning talked about perhaps there should be an adjustment where you would add jurisdictions who have been found by a court to have violated voting rights in the last 10-15 something years. So I'm wondering if any of the panelists have thought about that question.

MR. WILLIS: Obviously I'm probably the last person to answer because I know Virginia only. Virginia, as you may know, is entirely covered and the only thing that's happened in Virginia, and I think you heard testimony from Gerry Hebert earlier so he probably talked about the fact that there are options that are not particularly difficult to get out of the Section 5 coverage of the Voting Rights Act.

But I would say in Virginia, based on my experience, this is a place that, unless it can formally -- unless a jurisdiction can formally find its way out through this process, it ought to remain covered.

MR. POSNER: I guess I would just add there are sort of two aspects to the question. One is, of course, policy and the other is the constitutional question and I'm not sure I'm prepared to offer expert advice on either. But I guess my concern on the constitutional side is of course there has been quite a lot written by various law professors and others about the pending constitutional questions that might be posed by an extension.

But if you separate the basis for coverage from the history that preceded the '65 adoption of the Act, I guess I am worried about the extent to which or whether the courts would see it as constitutional because the benchmark might be the kind of history that justified coverage back in 1965.

If you then try to base coverage on something more recent, of course there is the argument, well, pre-'65 history is now receding in time and this is recent history. But that recent history is inevitably not going to be of the same level of discrimination that was involved. And then to the extent that falls short might be seen as an inadequate basis to have this special kind of coverage.

I would also note that there is another option for coverage under Section 3 of the Act which has been used to some extent where, as relief in a voting rights lawsuit, one of the things that the court can do is order Section 5 type coverage. And that's been used not a whole lot but I think there have been something like maybe 15 jurisdictions. So that's not a whole lot.

But there have been 15 jurisdictions that have been covered for specified periods of time. And I suppose another option as opposed to changing the Section 5 coverage formula, we need to look at somehow augmenting that Section 3 provision and making that more powerful and making it more direct.

MR. KENGLE: To add to what Mark said, to answer your question, I have a lot of thoughts about it. I'm not sure that they really congeal into what I think is the right answer. I identify generally the dichotomy of issues and basically breaks down to underinclusion and overinclusion.

Underinclusion would mean, are there jurisdictions that ought to be covered under Section 5 currently that are not and overinclusion would be are there jurisdictions currently covered under Section 5 which should not be. Are they in there as a historical artifact, is there any reason to continue to require them to obtain preclearance based upon the events that have occurred since the time they came under Section 5 coverage.

MS. NARASAKI: I'm most concerned about the second category because there is the opt-out provisions. So if you truly don't belong there, if you can work your way out conceptually but the question is more of the issue whether we're being underinclusive at this point.

MR. KENGLE: Just to pull out two anecdotal examples of noncovered jurisdictions that raise questions to my mind about retrogression, I would point to two things.

One, the Department of Justice recently has filed a Section 2 vote dilution lawsuit against Osceola County, Florida and the case is not resolved yet but it was filed. As far as I know, there appears to be no settlement in the case. But the United States complaint makes the allegation that Osceola County had gone from a single-member district system electing its county commission to an at-large system.

Now, if the county had been covered under Section 5, the odds are really pretty good that there would have been a Section 5 objection there had it been covered. But it was not covered and so now Section 2 is being used in order to challenge that at-large system as violating the Section 2 results test. But also there is the claim that it had a discriminatory purpose which, in this context, would be a retrogressive purpose. So that's an example of the kind of change that even under the Bossier 2 standard, it would, I think, be highly subject to Section 5 objection.

The other instance that I would point to, a type of change -- a change that did not actually go through but would have created real potential for retrogression occurred in November 2004 in the City of Philadelphia. You may recall, having read about this, about a week before the election, roughly, I don't know exactly how many days at this point, about a week before the election, the city Board of Elections received a request from one of the state political parties -- I'll pick on the Republicans but it was from the state Republican party.

They requested that 80-some precincts have their polling places reassigned for the November election. And the Board of Elections told them no. They were threatened with a lawsuit but they said no. Now, if that had been a Section 5 covered jurisdiction and it had been proposed to move all of those polling places a week before the election and, as it turned out, almost all of those precincts were over 90 percent minority in their racial composition, that again would have seriously implicated a Section 5 objection. I think it would have been very hard to justify that under the circumstances by the jurisdiction.

Now, as I said, the city did not implement that change but the request was made. And so I think that's an illustration of the type of voting change that may be happening in noncovered jurisdictions and if there is a way to pick those up, to identify those jurisdictions where it has been a problem, where it's likely to be a problem, then those are the jurisdictions I think obviously that would address the underinclusion. There are also jurisdictions where the minority population has grown recently, you know, since the time of the last determinations and so clearly finding some way to take that into account I think would make sense.

MS. NARASAKI: Thank you.

MR. OGLETREE: I have a question for actually all of the panelists, but I want to ask Professor Valelly first. I listened very carefully and I did not hear the title of the article that you coauthored. Can you tell me what that's going to be, for our purposes?

MR. VALELLY: Thanks for asking that. Variously it's either The Law of Preclearance as the main title or The End of Preclearance As We Knew It. And the subtitle is the same, Enforcing Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. The other two authors are Peyton McCrary of the U.S. Department of Justice and Christopher Seaman, who is currently in private practice.

MR. OGLETREE: Can you spell those two last names for the court reporter? Because she's going to ask me later.

MR. VALELLY: Sure. McCrary is -- P-e-y-t-o-n and then capital M, small C, capital C-r-a-r-y and Christopher Seaman and that's as in a seaman that sails on a ship, S-e-a-m-a-n.

MR. OGLETREE: The related question was are the 1,000 letters that I assume you discussed thoroughly in the report, are those available anywhere as a public document?

MR. VALELLY: Not to my knowledge, no.

MR. OGLETREE: You just selected them?

MR. VALELLY: As it happens, Peyton is here. Are they available?

MR. DAVIDSON: And our Commission has them.

MR. OGLETREE: Great.

MR. VALELLY: I had to think.

MR. OGLETREE: The question that I have for all of you, without having to give your own personal views but we've identified thus far some particular aspects of the 1965 Voting Rights Act that are the subject of much debate, Section 5, Section 203.

From your sort of collective experience, practice and otherwise, without giving away any trade secrets, what's your sense today, if you have any, of the greatest hurdles one might imagine in Congress reauthorizing the aspects of the Voting Rights Act that seem to be debated so vigorously today? Do you have any thoughts on that, any of you?

MR. KENGLE: Of obstacles?

MR. OGLETREE: Yes.

MR. KENGLE: Well, I think one of the things that I've found in attempting to enforce Section 5 consistently and fairly over the years is that it's been necessary for the Department of Justice Voting Section to, by experience, come up with a set of administrative rules which are reflected in the C.F.R., the federal guidelines, as reflecting our practice. Mr. Posner really is quite the expert on the C.F.R. guidelines. They reflect the experience.

But the statutory language is very -- if you looked at the statute, you would know that there is little statutory guidance and so trying to address some of the technical points that arise in Section 5 administrative practice is difficult in bringing people up to speed that don't live and breathe it every day because there are so many informal things that are done by practice and necessity that are reflected in the guidelines, to some extent.

But you would be surprised how many other issues have to be dealt with sort of informally and trying to get across how an entire system works. And everything that is looked at during the administrative process, there tends to be a lot of misunderstanding about what the Department actually does in the course of making those reviews and factors that are looked at.

I can't give you the memos that are done internally but I find that part of the difficulty in trying to make changes to understand why -- to explain why a particular change might need to be made or not made, it will implicate a lot of things that just aren't really reflected in the public record very well.

MS. POSNER: I think one issue certainly that goes to the testimony that I gave and Professor Valelly's is sort of the second level problem in the sense of Congress in fact saying, okay, we'll extend Section 5, but an extension that simply is an extension of Section 5 as it currently exists. As we both expressed, I think there is quite a bit of concern that that kind of extension would be of value but it would be of limited value because of that Bossier Parish 2 decision in 2000.

In fact, just to give you some numbers, between the '75 and '82 -- Section 5 was extended until '82. At that time, there was an average of 39 objections each year. From '82 when it was extended most recently in I think the end of June, the 1st of July of '82 through 1995, again, 43, an average of 43 a year. So 39, 43. Since 1996, the average has sort of fallen off the cliff. It's down to 17 a year.

So that doesn't address the deterrence issue which has been discussed previously but certainly there are very, very few objections being interposed and maybe that's a good thing. It shows that maybe people are living up to their obligations. In fact, this year I think there has been one objection in nine and a half months, which is just extremely remarkable.

But it isn't just because jurisdictions are somehow doing a better job of documenting their changes. It's that the rules of the game have changed and the rules changed most significantly in January of 2000 when the Supreme Court adopted that restrictive view or approach.

So for Congress to say, well, we're going to extend Section 5, that on its face sounds like a very, very positive statement. But underneath, there is this other issue which I think people know is of tremendous importance and would have a huge impact on the course of enforcement in a renewed Section 5.

MR. VALELLY: I would like to follow up on that. I think that a key problem at this level of argument which is that there is a point of view which is that the Voting Rights Act has worked and it was meant as temporary, indeed, emergency legislation, the emergency is over and there is no need to renew it. And survey evidence shows that the attitudes of -- racial attitudes of whites have changed and so people bring political science into the equation and they bring in the most scientific aspect of political science which is survey evidence.

For me, when I see what happened in 2000 and 2004 in uncovered jurisdictions, in terms of selective disenfranchisement and problems with voting, it gets me to thinking about the deterrent effect of Section 5. It's interesting that the evidence of selective disenfranchisement of -- and I'm not talking about anything of the kind of conflict and intimidation that used to exist in the United States at least in the '70s, but nonetheless there was trouble for minorities in key electoral college states in 2000-2004. Those happened to be in covered jurisdictions and interestingly, in none of the covered jurisdictions did you see anything similar.

So it seems to me that my fear is if you take away the deterrent effect of Section 5, even a fairly toothless Section 5 -- and I completely agree with Mark Posner that that's of some value but that's not of enough value. If you take away Section 5, the selective disenfranchisement spreads from the uncovered jurisdictions to the previously covered jurisdictions. I can't prove that but that's what I worry about.

MR. OGLETREE: Which takes me to the second and final question that I want to ask along those lines. I didn't hear in your testimony and your responses the sense that things have changed and I worry about the transparency of that view. You don't have the Bull Connors, you don't have the hoses, you don't have the dogs and so visually it seems as if we've overcome the barrier of discrimination in voting that we witnessed in the early '60s that led to the Voting Rights Act in some respect.

And yet what I see is all sorts of psychological factors, psychological coercion that prevents voter turnout and it's been viewed as apathy rather than objective fear about there is a police officer there, you have to show your ID, the voting places have been moved. All those things to me are very troublesome and I worry that if the experts think that things are better, how can we convince a skeptical Congress and certainly a skeptical court that there is a problem if we've solved that problem. That's my major question.

And the underlying example that I give that is related to it, the difference between state interest and federal interest. The federal interest is that every vote should be counted. The state interest is that everybody in this state should speak English and if they can't speak English, they shouldn't have a right to participate in democracy, is another example of how far we can go or how far we're willing to go to make the polling place accessible to the very different diverse community we have in 2005 than we had in 1965.

It's a world that was black and white then and that's all that seemed to count and it's so multiracial and multilingual now. Whether that problem is being understated, even with Section 203 being understated, that creates another problem. Complacency is my concern, or apathy, whatever you want to call it, about the urgency of the concerns. Any thoughts on either of those questions?

MR. VALELLY: I think that -- one way I think about it is that we don't say that we have a sort of zone of indifference about voting. In other words, the Court has always been clear, whenever it has to speak to the -- the chief justice is very clear about this even in his memorandum in 1982 which is that the right to vote is the central right and other rights come out of the right to vote. So we don't say, well, it's good enough.

So just because the urgency has subsided doesn't mean that we've said that things are okay. On the contrary, we're so far from being -- when you think about it, we've only been a fully functioning democracy for 20 or 30 years and, ironically, we're the first country in the world to have created mass electoral politics in the 1820s and 1830s with the Jacksonian party system, which was extraordinarily exclusionary.

At the same time, it was the first wave of black disenfranchisement. And yet we're among the last of the major democracies, if not the last, to be at the business of fully including every single American citizen that is entitled to vote. So either we take the Constitution seriously or we don't.

And it's not a matter of, well, 85 percent fulfillment or 90 percent fulfillment. Things are better since -- before, we had 50 percent fulfillment and now we're up to 85 so we don't need to have any kind of regime of enforcement. That argument strikes me as substantially implausible if not ludicrous.

MS. POSNER: I guess part of my concern is the premise to the question. I have heard it described as, quote, unquote, the Bull Connor problem, that Bull Connor is dead so there is no problem. I think that problem has been gone for quite some time in most jurisdictions and I think that sort of, in a sense, feeds into the argument that Abigail Thurston was most known for in terms of arguing the limited nature of the purpose of Section 5 in its adoption in '65.

There certainly has been quite a bit of change and I think we should celebrate that. I don't know if it was Dr. Davidson's choice or his publisher's choice, the name of the book he published or edited in the 1990s, but it was called Quiet Revolution in the South.

So certainly that indicates the nature of changes that occurred. But the issue is never simply Bull Connor preventing people from registering to vote. The question has always been, from the beginning, the ability to have an effective voice in the political system so that in the 1990s and today, redistricting is the question.

It isn't whether you can simply have -- whether minorities can achieve one majority-minority district. That doesn't mean that that problem has completely gone away. I mean, that unfortunately was the issue in Bossier Parish which makes the Supreme Court's contrary opinion so striking in terms of it being wrong.

I think Justice Souter indicated that in his dissent. But the issue is not simply whether you're at the table and you can eat the first course and the fifth course. But the question is whether you're fully entitled to participate. And if you have a situation where a fair plan might have two majority-minority districts and the jurisdiction adopts one and they do that for discriminatory reasons because they wanted to minimize the influence of minorities, maybe that's not the Bull Connor issue but it's still very much an issue. So I think there are many issues left. And to frame it as Bull Connor is to frame it in a way that makes it, yes, difficult to justify a renewal of Section 5.

MR. WILLIS: Can I add something to that?

MR. ROGERS: Sure. Go ahead.

MR. WILLIS: I think something that's important here is to realize that part of what's happened is the strength of the Voting Rights Act has changed the way people act and what they do. One thing to do, I think, and maybe you're doing this to some extent, is to look to collect evidence of policies and laws outside the voting arena that show that race discrimination is still a strong force in this nation. And maybe if it's not as strong as it was or as blatant as it was in voting, it's only because the Act exists.

But look around and look at the state of anti-immigration laws that have appeared in the last few years. In Virginia, I know, and unfortunately I can't speak beyond my own state, there have been a spate of laws, English-only laws, related to things like welfare, whether the welfare department would be required to give out documents in other languages. And these sorts of things clearly show a deep stream of prejudice and discrimination that still exists.

And even within the voting arena, I have a report that you may have seen recently that was just reported in a Virginia newspaper that the registrar in Norfolk, Virginia has rejected 50 percent of the voter applications that have been submitted to him in the last six months. 50 percent rejection of voter application. This is in a city that is majority African-American. Something is going on there. We haven't gotten to the bottom of it because we just heard about it. That's not the same thing as standing in front of the polling booth but it's a great way to prevent people from getting to the polls, particularly minorities.

MR. ROGERS: I think to some extent, this begs the question, though, in terms of this whole notion of purpose and effect. As we've been all throughout the country, we've tried to get a sense or a handle about what this really means at this time. We live in a day and age in which, frankly, unless you're burning a cross or unless you use a word or unless you are sort of caught in the act, so to speak, of engaging in a formal prejudice or an "ism" in one way or another, that folks don't believe it anymore. Either there has been too much of a crying of wolf or there is just a general attitudinal change in terms of the country.

And I say that after having traveled all over the United States trying to get a handle around this issue of sort of purpose or intent or otherwise. And I am curious and I wanted to follow up on Commissioner Ogletree's question about that in that regard. Given your analysis in particular in having to work these cases and trying to establish issues related -- I understand effect, discriminatory effect but talking about purpose in and of itself, whether there is deliberate intent to hurt or to disenfranchise minorities, what is your analysis showing and is there empirical data to show your analysis one way or another?

MR. KENGLE: If I could just start off, generally some of the major cases that I've worked on dealt with intent in one form or another and, as the previous testimony indicated, many of the Section 5 objections that have been interposed over time were based upon purpose.

Generally speaking, I would say that the conclusion of purpose or contention of purpose that would be made in a lawsuit or a Section 5 objection would generally not be based upon direct statements by an individual. It generally more is a circumstantial case and the way that it generally works is that you see an official action that has been taken that seems to have a direct and a disparate impact on the minority population, whether it's splitting their neighborhood with a redistricting boundary or adopting some procedure that appears to bear more heavily on minority voters and citizens as opposed to white citizens. You see that impact.

And then you look at the proffered justifications for it and the question is, are any of those proffered justifications really going to stick. And so what you go through is this sort of process of elimination. In other words, here we see this impact. Is there any plausible justification for it that could be advanced. And if, at the end of that process, you say no, and you have some other indicia that the jurisdiction knew about the impact that it was going to have and it didn't, because that's the ultimate conclusion that needs to be done to satisfy the purpose test that's adopted now, you have to show that the jurisdiction was aware of what was going to happen and took the challenged action because it was going to have that effect.

It's a difficult thing to do. It is a very fact-intensive process to gather that information. It requires a very nuanced consideration of all the possible inferences that might be drawn from somebody's statement or actions. It takes a lot of effort. It can be done. It has been done.

I think that those who would like to take a narrow reading of civil rights laws would like to focus exclusively on those actions where a plaintiff in a lawsuit or DOJ or whomever can go ahead and make that showing and satisfy the constitutional standard for intentional discrimination. And clearly that ought to be part of the equation.

But the courts have recognized, commentators have recognized repeatedly, Congress has recognized in adopting 1982 amendments to Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, proving potential discrimination is an extremely difficult thing to do. And if the goal is to prevent racial discriminatory practices in election systems, limiting the inquiry simply to purpose is not necessarily the best way to achieve that end because intentions can be disguised. With a little bit of forethought and a little bit of planning, one can put lipstick on the pig, as the expression goes, and yet still achieve the same end.

And so in applying the results test, courts have been careful to look at all of the circumstances and not jump to premature conclusions. But the results tests that have been included in Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act and the effect test in Section 5 have proven to be workable and they're not limited just to that intentional discrimination.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. Thank you very much. I didn't mean to interrupt but I'll come back to a few final questions of my own. Commissioner Davidson?

MR. DAVIDSON: Just as a point of information for Mr. Posner, I would never let a publisher tell me what the title of my book should be. Quiet Revolution in the South was actually plagiarized from a Laughlin-McDonald's Law Review article by the same title.

MS. POSNER: So we have a different problem.

MR. DAVIDSON: And I must share with you this anecdote. Not long after the book was published, I met, at a conference, a legendary federal court judge, William Wayne Justice from Texas who presided over a number of very important voting rights cases in the '70s and I gave him a copy of that book. He lives in a small town in East Texas, heavily black part of the state, old slave-owning part of the state.

And he suffered tremendously personally in terms of being isolated from his neighbors and church members and so forth when he handed down some of his decisions. And I gave him a copy of that book and he looked at the title of it and he said, "Well, it may have been a quiet revolution for you but it sure wasn't for me." And I'm sure a lot of other people could testify as he did.

I would like to address this question primarily to the former Justice Department lawyers but anybody else is free to jump in if they want to. We've focused this afternoon, it seems to me, to some considerable degree on the declining number of objections that have been interposed by the Voting Section and that is taken I think generally as one index of the -- all kind of qualifications around the statement, but it has generally been taken as one index of the extent of discriminatory behavior that is still extant.

There are a couple of other measures that I would like to at least have your input on. One of them is what is known as a withdrawal. And a withdrawal, as you know, is a phenomenon whereby a given jurisdiction makes a submission to the Justice Department for preclearance and the Justice Department responds to the jurisdiction by asking a number of questions and, in some cases where there are questions about whether discriminatory behavior is being engaged in here and once the question is answered, as I understand it, often the Justice Department will then go ahead and say, okay, we understand the situation now and we give you preclearance.

But in other cases, it becomes pretty obvious, in the back and forth between the Justice Department and the jurisdictions, that an objection is probably going to be interposed and, in some cases, the jurisdiction, when it sees that red flag, will withdraw its submission. And I guess another phenomenon that I would like your opinion about has to do with observers being sent out. And there has been a good deal of testimony today about observers being sent out all over the country.

And with regard to both of these, perhaps more the withdrawals than the observers, but to some extent both of them, can one make the case that these also, as well as objections, are indicia of either actual or potential discrimination that one might want to consider as part of the evidence as to the extent to which jurisdictions are still involved in discriminatory, potentially discriminatory behavior?

MS. POSNER: I'll start out. To take your last one first, I certainly agree that observers are an important addition of concerns that just -- there are standards set forth in the statute for designating counties as being eligible for observers and the Department goes through a detailed process when it looks -- when elections are upcoming to try to identify problems.

And of course observers are not sent out willy-nilly but are sent out after the Department identifies potential problems on election day and they're a way to try to prevent those problems from occurring, to try to have people on the ground should problems occur, that those people then can discuss issues with, bring issues to the attention of election officials for them hopefully to resolve and potentially wait to gather data for filing lawsuits in the future.

In fact, there has been a close connection between observer activity, for example, in Navajo areas and other areas of Arizona and New Mexico where Indian populations live and subsequent lawsuits and enforcement actions and work under 203 with regard to requiring that that information be provided in other Indian languages as required by 203.

So I think that's very definitely an example. It's not something where it's an absolute clear standard like in a Section 2 case so it can be a little bit -- there is not a bright line that says, well, the Justice Department sent observers here and that means X, Y and Z. But if you take it as a whole, I think it is a clear indication of the presence of problems.

I don't recall that many withdrawals of submissions after additional information being requested. Now, that is the subject -- one can get numbers on that by making a request to the Justice Department, at least the data that exists in the Justice Department computers after 1990. It would be a simple matter of just simply finding out --

MR. DAVIDSON: I have them.

MS. POSNER: Okay -- how many requests have there been for additional information where there subsequently was a withdrawal. The other thing that -- I'm not sure if it's directly on point with what you're saying but there are quite a few redistricting cases -- well, instances where the Justice Department filed objections to redistricting plans where those jurisdictions filed lawsuits in the district court and they never were litigated.

And I know Bob worked on at least one if not more where the jurisdiction then ultimately sort of withdrew its lawsuit, so to speak, and ultimately changed to make a different plan in response to various pressures and didn't try to prove its case. And the kind of objections, there are various reasons. It's not something that's a simple answer. Certainly Bossier Parish is an issue. But I think there are also other issues that indeed the change in district elections has maintained a difference in.

MR. DAVIDSON: Let me just put the question like this. Leaving aside the number of withdrawals, would you put a withdrawal in the same category as an objection in the sense that a jurisdiction, when confronted by a letter from the Justice Department, decides that that's probably not the way to go so far as the change that had been submitted?

MS. POSNER: I agree. I think it heads in that direction, yes. It's not quite the same as an objection but withdrawing it after the questions, specific questions have been raised about why lines are drawn in a certain way or why the changes are adopted or the impacts of the change, I think this is evidence that the jurisdiction decided that those concerns were things they wouldn't be able to meet and they would -- it's the same as any kind of settlement to the lawsuit. People argue about what settlements mean. You know, we just settled because it's too much trouble to defend and that's certainly what jurisdictions are saying, but I don't think that's the whole story.

MR. DAVIDSON: Thank you. Mr. Kengle?

MR. KENGLE: Well, to take the withdrawals first. That reminds me of the semi-statistic that they used to keep on Patrick Ewing when he played at Georgetown where they tracked the "almost" shots. I think that Mark is right that under the recordkeeping system, you should be able to get fairly easily a precise listing of those submissions that were withdrawn following the request for additional information. I don't know the numbers.

My sense is that the number is small enough that you should be able to go through it on a case-by-case basis to try to get a better sense of what happened because it may have been withdrawn for reasons that were not directly related to the information.

In other words, they may have found out that they violated state law when drawing a redistricting plan. There is not necessarily a nexus between that and the request for additional information, although I would think that in many, if not most cases, it is related. But I think the numbers are such that you could get enough background to be able to ascertain that more directly and not infer it simply from the mere fact that it's withdrawn.

MR. GREENBAUM: The answer is we're talking about a couple hundred since 1982.

MR. KENGLE: Oh, it is?

MR. GREENBAUM: Yes.

MR. KENGLE: I know Chandler Davidson is a very hard worker so that's not a big number for him. To respond on the observers, certainly the fact that observers have gone out to a jurisdiction is something that, again, is very relevant to the question of whether there was the potential for continued discrimination in that jurisdiction. The absence of observers in a particular jurisdiction over time I wouldn't necessarily take as the same quality as there is not a problem. It just may mean the situation is stable.

But let's say that Section 5 coverage were withdrawn, this situation could change radically. If the jurisdiction knows that federal observers are no longer able to be sent, the situation could change dramatically. I think the experience in the Voting Section has been that many times -- that, for example, in a primary election, we get reports of all kinds of things going wrong and it could be documented so that you know that things went wrong. The observers show up for the runoff election or the general election and things are smooth as glass. So the presence of the observers can have -- the threat of observers can also have that kind of effect.

One thing that I would know that I think you want to take into account is that presently, in the past several years, there has been an increasing willingness on the part of the Civil Rights Division to send out attorneys for what's called attorney coverage in elections. Now, that always was an option but there has been an increasing, I think, use of that practice.

Now, attorney coverage does not involve federal observers. The federal observers of course are recruited and supervised by the Office of Personnel Management. There is a very formalized procedure under which they are dispatched and the jurisdictions to which they were sent have to be certified either by court or by the attorney general before the observers are eligible to be sent out.

MR. DAVIDSON: Can I interrupt you right at this point just for purposes of clarification? When observers are sent to a locale, are Justice Department lawyers also sent?

MR. KENGLE: Yes. They work hand in hand with the supervisors from the Office of Personnel Management. Generally the observers are investigators who are low key and there are captains and cocaptains who supervise them and they are senior investigators. They work hand in hand with the DOJ attorneys. But in terms of direct supervision, the reporting chain goes up through OPM and then their supervisors work with DOJ.

But there has been an increasing use of attorney coverage and so there will be DOJ personnel present in jurisdictions on election day that will not be reflected in the numbers of federal observers that are sent out.

MR. DAVIDSON: Is there a way that one could obtain information on the number of civil rights attorneys who are sent out without observers? I mean, I have data on observers but I don't have any data on just --

MR. KENGLE: As I recall the practices, prior to the election, there will be a press release issued by the public affairs officer who handles the Civil Rights Division and the press release will identify those jurisdictions in which attorneys will be present. It doesn't identify them by name and I don't think it identifies the number that will be present in the particular jurisdiction, but it will at least identify those states and I think counties in which they'll be present.

MR. GREENBAUM: The answer is that since 2001, you can get that information in terms of where attorneys were sent for attorney coverage. Prior to 2001, that information is not available.

MS. NARASAKI: Can I ask a related question on the observer issue? Because that's obviously one of the sections that also might sunset. So is it your sense that that section is fine as it is? Do you feel like -- are there cases where you wish that you had more ability to send out -- is it too narrowly drawn, in other words, in terms of your ability to send out observers?

MR. KENGLE: Well, presently the ability to send out observers was conditioned either upon the jurisdiction being subject to the special provisions in Section 4 of the Act which would lead to Section 5 coverage or a certification by Federal District Court.

And the Department has been able to use the certification by federal court as a way to get out for -- let's say Section 203, in those cases where we have a consent decree in the Section 203 enforcement case, we've been able to have those jurisdictions certified by the federal court for federal observer coverage for a number of years and it really has been invaluable.

I've spent a lot of time working on a case involving Passaic County, New Jersey and we've sent observers there repeatedly. They would not have been eligible to go there but for the consent decree and the lawsuit, and their presence really was invaluable in turning that situation around and in bringing the county up to Section 203 compliance.

MS. NARASAKI: I know, but I think part of the challenge, I know for Asian languages in the early days, it was hard to get litigation -- it was hard to get to the consent decree and -- for the Asian languages are often not in the Section 5 covered jurisdictions and so then we're kind of stuck with knowing there is a problem and trying to get Justice to come out but under what authorization did they come out.

MR. KENGLE: This could be -- it's trying to address situations like those is one of the reasons why attorney coverage has become more popular. But that is more limited because the federal observers have a statutory right to be present in the precincts and to observe the voting process at all stages, whereas the attorney coverage is outside their jurisdiction and if they want to throw you out, they can throw it out. They don't want to let you in in the first place and you pretty much have to respect that. And so there is a sort of qualitative difference in what could be achieved with those two types of coverage.

In terms of making federal observers available in additional jurisdictions, I haven't really thought about whether or how to do that outside of -- if Section 4 is revisited and additional determinations are made, then I think the current system would certainly want to keep that and jurisdictions that want to be covered would also be eligible for federal observers.

MS. POSNER: If I could just add a brief comment to your question. I do think there is a strong case to be made for extending the ability to assign observers. Right now, as Bob said, the ability to send observers is a subset of the Section 5 jurisdictions. It's not every Section 5 jurisdiction. It's those Section 5 jurisdictions which are separately certified by the attorney general.

But certainly 203 is pretty much tied to the question of how elections are run and very much that has, of course, to do with a lot of things that go on before you actually vote, but has a lot to do with what goes on in the polling place. So it would seem like it would make a lot of sense to add and say that observers also can be assigned to 203 jurisdictions perhaps again pursuant to that certification process that the attorney general uses so it wouldn't be automatically all 203 jurisdictions but that would be a further qualification.

Furthermore, the Justice Department recently has been sending observers to other places throughout the country if the jurisdiction agreed. And just as a matter simply of constitutional law, I would think that observer coverage could be assigned -- that ability even beyond 203 could be extended throughout the country, at least when you're dealing with federal elections, just like the National Voter Registration Act applies to federal elections, a specific constitutional authority that gives Congress the right to extend it.

So I think it is unreasonably limited based upon the fact that the way it was drafted, it was drafted with what people were thinking about in '65-'70. Certainly we've gone beyond that, especially with 203.

MS. NARASAKI: Thank you.

MS. POSNER: The examiner part hasn't been used much at all. The last time we actually sent people out to register to vote was in the '80s.

MR. ROGERS: I'm going to really press you for quick answers if we can, only because of time. And it turns out we do have a public testimony portion. So let's try, if we can, to be as precise as we can with questions.

MR. VALELLY: With your permission, I was wondering if I could address the question that Commissioner Davidson asked about other indicia because there was -- I didn't want the premise -- and I couldn't tell if there was a premise -- that there has been a decline or tapering off in objection letters or in other kinds of evidence that would show evidence of discrimination. I just wanted to -- so I don't know if this is the right time.

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MR. VALELLY: Okay. In this piece that I'm a coauthor with Peyton McCrary and Christopher Seaman, table 2 is legal basis for objection decisions and the number of letters that were sent out in the 1970s that were based on intent was 2 percent. I mean, the percentage. In the 1980s, that rose to 25 percent and by the 1990s, that rose to 43 percent.

This is picking up with Ken's earlier point about how smoking gun evidence is one thing but intent evidence is something that can affect -- that is shown. And what our survey of the objection letters showed was that the Department was able increasingly to interpose objections on the basis of intent evidence. So that's one important factor.

MR. ROGERS: That is all preclosure 2.
MR. VALELLY: That's all preclosure 2, exactly.
MR. ROGERS: In a post-closure 2 world, that is a significant, as you pointed out, decline.
MR. VALELLY: In a four-year period, and so these aren't entirely comparable but -- and this is what Bossier did. Two letters. And we're not even talking about percentages. So in other words, it's implausible to think that official behavior drastically changed from 1999 to 2001. In other words, in the 1990s, the Department was predominantly showing in its objections that it was concerned about intent. In other words, over half of the letters, it was intent.
And then suddenly in the four-year period after Bossier, it can only issue two letters regarding retrogressive intent. It's just impossible to believe that we're talking about a transformation of attitudes or intentions. We're talking simply about an artifact of the requirement imposed by the Court. So I just wanted to stress that what you actually see is more like a peak and then a crash in the data that we sent.
MR. ROGERS: That's very helpful.
MR. DAVIDSON: I want to ask one more question here to Mr. Willis and it has to do with the -- refresh my memory here. Was it the voter -- a voting official who asked for armed guards in what places in -- what was the town?
MR. WILLIS: This was Chesterfield County, Virginia and it was the voter registrar who announced that he was going to hire police officers, that he was going to ask the county to send police officers or he would hire them outside the normal duty hours.
MR. DAVIDSON: And what was his purpose in doing that?
MR. WILLIS: Ostensibly, his purpose was to fight terrorism and this was to deter a terrorist attack on Chesterfield County, Virginia. And given -- who knows exactly what was motivating him to do this and I guess you get to some of the issues of purpose here but he did announce it.
He was roundly criticized for it from the state Board of Elections to -- even all the other registrars in the state of Virginia announced that they would not be doing anything like that. This is an instance of actually isolating someone but he stuck to his guns on it.
MR. VALELLY: So to speak.
MR. WILLIS: Yes, so to speak. Stuck to his many guns on it.
MR. DAVIDSON: So there were armed guards at the election sites?
MR. WILLIS: Yes.
MR. DAVIDSON: But there were also observers who were there?

MR. WILLIS: That's right. There were observers from the Justice Department.
MR. DAVIDSON: Was there any suggestion that this was racially motivated or was it against Arab-Americans or anything of that sort?
MR. WILLIS: Like many of these issues, there are so many nuances to it and people are careful with their language. He simply announced it as a measure to fight terrorism. It certainly caused the African-American community to respond but also the Arab-American community.
And in fact, we worked with the Muslim coalition in the area who decided to send out its own monitors to the polls as well and I talked to some of those people afterwards and there weren't any incidences. This was largely a symbolic act on the part of the registrar.
And whether it intentionally targeted race or not, it was at the very at least a grossly insensitive move that indicated no knowledge of the past history of discrimination that had taken place, not just in this country but Chesterfield is a nearly all white, suburban county with a very long history of its own problems of race discrimination.
MR. ROGERS: Thank you kindly, Commissioner Davidson. Before we did close, I did have a couple of questions. And I wanted to go back -- Georgia v. Ashcroft I'm fascinated by. And I've read over the opinion and I wanted to get, in particular a sense -- there was testimony earlier from the other panel of what happened in the post-Georgia v. Ashcroft world and I guess I'm trying to understand the facts about this.
The whole design of that plan was that it was initiated essentially by African-American legislators in Georgia who essentially devised a plan that would help to assure their own continued success perhaps as well as continued Democratic success in Georgia, that they wanted to essentially begin to unpack overly packed districts there and essentially spread its voters out so that they would increase the odds or the likelihood of long-term Democratic dominance with respect to the state legislature in Georgia. That's my own summary. I know it's not half as good as the one you all might provide.
But I understand generally that that may perhaps have been the goal and that it was initiated, at least the plan that was objected to was in fact a plan that was sanctioned by I believe over 90 percent of the African-American legislators in Georgia. I may be incorrect about that. I understand also that John Lewis testified in favor of the plan as articulated by Georgia, which I understand again was opposed by the Department of Justice.
In a post-Georgia v. Ashcroft world, you have a circumstance in which there has been a reversal of that to some extent. Democrats have lost both houses of the legislature despite the plan in effect -- the plan being in effect as articulated by the proponents in that case, is that correct? Please forgive me. My recitation of the facts may not be half as good --

MR. KENGLE: Clearly in the South there has been a very large partisan realignment and all the social science literature election results indicate that. And so I think a lot of transition has occurred in terms of control of legislatures in most jurisdictions. That is the way that was occurring. And then the impact of voting rights laws interacts with that to some extent and I think it's hard to distinguish those.

In terms of what was happening in Georgia, the plan that ultimately was adopted and litigated in the Georgia case actually was drawn in a relatively closed setting among a relatively small handful of individuals, some of whom were African-American.

But the plan itself was unveiled on the day of the vote to the remainder of the members, including members of the black caucus, and there was testimony that went into the record from -- I think it was Vincent Fort who made the speech from the well saying that I've only just seen this plan, I don't know -- I don't really know what it is or not. I have concerns about it but I'm going to let the Justice Department make up their minds about what it means and whether it's retrogressive.

So in that particular case, I would distinguish that plan from those in which the black caucus or the black community generally had been more broadly involved in the inception of the plan and had full understanding of what was occurring with the district boundary changes. Those particular facts I think were probably not the best ones for the general desire on the part of anyone in the Democratic Party.

MR. ROGERS: There was clearly a split in the minority community in a post world after that vote, but I understand the vote as at least recited in the Ashcroft opinion by the Supreme Court indicated that there was only one objector in the legislature who objected -- African-American who objected to that plan.

MR. KENGLE: Yes. She was the representative from -- in the Senate, she was the Senator from the Savannah district that was at issue. But to put it bluntly, my belief is there was a fair amount of nose holding in that vote, in other words, that we're going to vote for it. They did in fact vote for it. That is clear. But in terms of making an informed decision, I had serious questions about whether it was an informed decision as it affected their districts and other African-American controlled districts.

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. All right. One other question about language in and of itself. Again, we've heard this term polarized voting throughout the United States in terms of people and commenting about it. It's framed interestingly to me.

Essentially, the term racially polarized voting essentially refers to pattern of whites as it relates to voting and not necessarily to minorities as it relates to voting. Is that generally accurate? In other words, the description of the fact that 80 percent of African-Americans may be voting for the Democratic candidate, for example, in an election and that 80 percent of whites vote for a Republican candidate in an election, the label of being racially polarized, I guess in its generic sense, applies to both groups. But the thought is that the animus may reflect attitudes or thoughts as it relates to whites in voting for minority candidates as opposed to minorities voting for white candidates. Is that generally true?

MS. POSNER: I think racially polarized voting really refers to both sides of the equation but there are several terms used there which I think reflect a lot of dispute about what polarized voting means. I think what Justice Brennan tried to describe in the Gingles case was something that reflects a correlation between votes and race and it doesn't try to get at the reason why, in terms of whether there is animus or whether there is some political party or explanation for it. It is simply a descriptive term of what is occurring.

You try to identify who is the minority-preferred candidate, which involves some dispute. But once you do that, you look at, okay -- you can do various analyses, you can do statistical analyses which can show you, with a great deal of certainty, that indeed minority voters voted one way, party voters voted another way. Of course you want to look at the extent because that can make a difference. Whites voting 90 percent for the white candidate would be very different than whites voting 60 percent for the white candidate. But it's simply a description of votes being divided between the racial groups.

Since then, there have been various efforts to try to undermine the ability of minorities to show that kind of polarized voting by trying to look at, well, what is the best explanation, so that if you have a situation where minorities are voting for the Democratic candidate and whites are voting for the Republican candidate, the argument has been made and the Fifth Circuit has so held and it said, well, maybe that's not polarized voting. That's simply partisan voting and that's, quote, unquote, the better explanation. So I'm not sure -- that may go way beyond what you were asking me.

MR. ROGERS: No, to some extent that does go to the point because it's an interesting analysis. I mean, if you know that you have demographic patterns that indicate that groups of people vote by and large -- now, this isn't necessarily true among white voters. But among minority voters, there are pretty clear patterns of voting in large numbers exceeding 50 percent for a particular party or orientation.

And so the idea of -- this begs questions about what's involved in terms of -- as you point out, that the court may note, issues relating to partisanship, issues related to race and how you draw lines and boundaries and otherwise. But there is no doubt that this is part of this sort of general policy debate about sort of what goes on as it relates to the Voting Rights Act, should there in fact be reauthorization of the provisions of it that we're dealing with and otherwise. Is it race or is it party at the end of the day.

MS. POSNER: I guess I would explain to you that that's not an appropriate question, that that's not what's at issue. What's at issue is whether you could simply describe it in terms of polarization. In fact, everybody knows there is a close correlation throughout the country, particularly in the South, between race and party. To try to untangle the two I think is to try to do something that's very difficult to do and is simply not something that leads to any helpful result.

MS. NARASAKI: Could I clarify that?

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MS. NARASAKI: That's actually -- I don't understand how parties get separated from race if the reason why racial groups are voting among party lines is because they perceive one party to represent their interests more than the other party. To me, that would be in fact evidence that people are voting what their perceived interests are and your the ability to get what you think -- your inability to really elect the candidate of your preference. Am I missing something?

MS. POSNER: No. We had a situation of course in the South where, in 1965 and continuing up until the 1990s, certainly at the local level, where the Democratic Party was the party that controlled all elections. If you hypothesize two situations, you have the Democratic Party and you have the white faction and the African-American faction. If African-Americans voted for the African-American faction of the party and the whites voted for the white party, that's polarized voting. That's not a partisan explanation.

But if suddenly you take that same situation and you simply rename those into two different parties, suddenly people say, no, that's a partisan issue. I think it's the same wine in a different bottle.

MR. VALELLY: Would it be appropriate for me to raise a couple of points?

MR. ROGERS: Sure.

MR. VALELLY: I think there is a history here which is the 15th Amendment was written initially with an explicit right to office and it was from that right to office was -- this was in response to the expulsion of black legislators from the Georgia legislature. And that right to office was taken out in order to aid the ratification process. And I think that that's cast a shadow over these issues.

In other words, I think that racially polarized voting also refers to, and I picked this up in some of the prefatory comments you made, which is that a lot of white voters just really have a hard time voting for an African-American or minority candidate. They just can't do it. And they don't think of themselves as racist. In response to the survey, no, of course, I'm not racist. But they often will say, ahead of election, they don't know who they're going to vote for. And it turns out if you take the -- Thomas Pedigree, who is a sociologist, pointed out that if you take the "don't know" percentage and you add it to the percentage that is going to vote for the white candidate, you get a perfect prediction of who it is that is actually going to win the election when it's a minority candidate running against a white candidate.

A colleague of mine at Swarthmore, Keith Reeves, did a terrific simulation for his Ph.D. dissertation which got tendered into a book. It's called Voting Hopes, Voting Fears and what it did was it showed a sample of people -- he created a simulation in which it was revealed to them that after they had expressed a preference for a liberal Democrat, that liberal Democrat they had expressed a preference for before the poll, the person was an African-American.

When they were told that the person was an African-American, the significant percentage changed their voting predictions to "don't know." They weren't sure how they were going to vote. And so the clinical simulation -- it's not a real world test but it does get at this issue of taking out policy preferences and party preferences and being able to control for policy preferences and party preferences and see the role of racial effect and switching people's decision to "I know who I'm going to vote for" to "I don't know who I'm going to vote for."

MR. ROGERS: Absolutely. I won't belabor the point anymore, but I think it's sort the crux of what this stuff is all about at the end of the day. This provision of the Voting Rights Act is designed to remedy the issues related to problems related to race. We live in a time at which we no longer describe the terms in the same way as they were in the past.

The behavior in and of itself may well still be the same, i.e., as you described it, I'm not going to vote for you, period, and it doesn't have anything to do with your qualifications. It's just because of what you look like, period. And yet it's not formally described that way.

And so now we live in a world in which we try to call something what it is, what it appears to be or at least is articulated as something else. And from a public policy standpoint, when you get folks who are sitting on the Hill, it's interesting to again hear opponents or proponents for or against this, those who may be against reauthorization basically say, listen, it's been a great Act, it's accomplished its purpose, we're a different society now, the world has changed, people are no longer caught up in emotions of the past and let's start from a level, quote, playing field.

Folks on the other end say, wait a minute, it's not right. The world hasn't fully changed. These are circumstances that are different today, that are still evident today, maybe couched differently but are still the same. I won't belabor the point. Thank you kindly. Any other questions from the members of this panel?

You all, I wanted to thank you personally. You all bring obviously a level of sophistication and substance that is remarkable. Given the fact that you all are involved in the substance of actually litigating these cases, you've taken the provisions articulated to the Congress and then you are responsible for their implementation and enforcement. And in that sense, it's remarkable getting a chance to talk with you. I just wish we had a few more hours to be with you, frankly.

It's very helpful having -- and I don't know that we've had as much because we've had very practical testimony in our fact-finding role which is what we have to do as a Commission. But it's certainly extraordinarily helpful to have the analysis point of view that you all bring as a result of sort of the legal minds that have been involved in challenging or dealing with factual cases involving the substance of what we're asking may be considered. So thank you.

(Applause.)

MR. ROGERS: We'll now move to the public portion of our testimony today and we have one individual in particular who has been gracious enough to wait and to be present with us here today. We are honored to have Mr. Luther Lowe who has joined us. Luther, you are a student, of all things, at the College of William & Mary. I'm not sure what year you're in. You're a sophomore?

MR. LOWE: I'm a senior.

MR. ROGERS: You're a senior. You're a senior this year at the College of William & Mary and we are pleased that you've taken some time to come and join us here and we look forward to frankly any statement that you might have to offer.

MR. LOWE: Well, thank you. And I'll try to keep my statements brief knowing that we're running into a late part of the day. But good afternoon, Commissioners. Thank you for being here today and the important work that you all are doing. I'm Luther Lowe. I'm a senior at the College of William & Mary.

Now, my comments today reflect, I would say, another aspect of disenfranchisement but our efforts are alike and intersect in many ways. And I'll get back to that. My reason for attending is to discuss a serious problem I see in Virginia and around the country, the problem of college student voter disenfranchisement.

Nearly two years ago, I attempted to register in the town where I live, Williamsburg, Virginia. As a senior of the College of William & Mary, I believed it was necessary that I register to vote where the local democracy had the greatest impact on me. After submitting my application to register to vote, I was sent a two-page questionnaire that I would later find out was sent to all students who attempted to register. Among the questions included are you a student, do you live on campus, are you active in local civic activities such as church, and many others.

I filled out the questionnaire honestly and to the best of my ability. A few days later, I received a letter notifying me that my right to register had been denied. The reason? I lived in a dormitory and the city considered this a temporary address. Though I, like so many other college students, live with my parents for less than six weeks out of the year, I was told I needed to register where my parents lived in Arkansas.

With the help of Kent Willis and the ACLU I challenged the decision of the local registrar. Ultimately, I was able to win my individual right solely on the basis that I also happen to be a member of the Virginia National Guard. But it did not set the precedent needed to protect the right of franchise for my peers. For example, students have been denied in the last month in Williamsburg alone attempting to register to participate in a gubernatorial election.

My case is not unique. In Virginia and nationally, students are either denied the right to vote because of confusing laws, antistudent administrative practices or statutes or acts of blatant disenfranchisement. And really it shifts the focus to the question of the 26th Amendment and, when it was ratified in 1971, the ratifiers really failed to consider where do 18 to 20 year-olds live in small to mid-size college towns such as Williamsburg and how could this affect the makeup of the world of democracy. As I said before, my comments today reflect another aspect of disenfranchisement but our efforts are like and intersect in many ways.

For example, a similar situation to mine occurred less than two years ago at Paraview A&M in Texas, a historically black university. Indeed, the problem of student voter suppression often affects a different kind of minority, young people. As students, we are held to a higher standard as voters.

Often those who are against allowing students to register in their college communities say that students are transients and have no vested interest in the long-term outlook of the community. But if you look at the U.S. Census data for 2000, you'll find that 47 percent of the U.S. moves every five years. To penalize some group with a defined transient behavior seems antidemocratic.

Some further argue that this is not true disenfranchisement. After all, students mostly retain their right to vote where their parents live. I raise an objection to this as well. It makes no sense for me to be voting in a community where the local democracy affects me three months out of the year or less. Indeed millions of students opt to take on internships or jobs here in the summer months away from where their parents live. It doesn't make sense for me to be voting in a place where I only visit during Christmas vacation.

As opening this forum, Commissioner Rogers spoke of two primary objectives of this Commission. First, to conduct regional hearings with regards to voting rights problems and, secondly, to create a comprehensive report. The purpose of the Voting Rights Act is to identify threats to a healthy democracy. I believe it is relevant to this panel to bring this troubling issue to light. Thank you for your consideration and thank you again for the important work that you all do.

MR. ROGERS: Mr. Lowe, thank you so much. We appreciate your testimony and sharing your thoughts about your experience. Do any commissioners have any questions at all for Mr. Lowe?

MR. OGLETREE: I have a comment. I appreciate what you have to say and your deep interest in voting and in fairness and I think you probably represent a generation of young voters who face the same dilemma.

The irony of being disenfranchised for you is that our funny voting process now actually enfranchises political figures through our prison system. What I mean by that, there are thousands of residents of the District of Columbia who are incarcerated. There is no prison at all here in the District of Columbia where they can be housed. So when they're sent to Oklahoma or Colorado or California, those local members of Congress get credit for voters. They're considered voters where they live, where they're imprisoned, and not at their home, which is an irony the other way, because it helps people to have a captive audience in some sense where people don't have any rights.

But I think your testimony raises important issues. Both of my children went through the same thing. One was in New York and one was in Florida and they're voting. They kept coming to Massachusetts and they always had to be absentee voters, which made no sense to them. They would have to go through a whole lot of rigamarole but they really lived 90 percent of the time outside the place of their birth and their permanent residence. And I think what you have raised gives us much room to think about that, how to make that part of the broader agenda. I appreciate your comments.

MS. NARASAKI: I have a short question. My organization helped participate in the 1-800-VOTE hotline in the last election and a lot of the calls we got over the enforcement or the compliance with the Help America Vote Act identification requirements, a lot of calls we were getting were complaints from students who felt like they were being asked to give not just one but two or sometimes three forms of identification.

And Georgia just passed a law trying to implement how they're going to accept identifications from the state schools but not from the historically black colleges. I'm wondering if, as a student, do you experience or do your friends experience any issues around identification requirements?

MR. LOWE: I don't know specific examples but I do know of anecdotal reports in the City of Williamsburg where students were turned away from the polls. I'm not sure if those were as a result of ID now today. I had a conversation with our registrar who -- it's funny, we do actually get along even though we were on opposite sides in a lawsuit.

He instructed me that if students were to be registered at -- now he's allowing off-campus students to register and on-campus students to not register. But if on-campus students register, that they need -- or if off-campus students register, they need to change their driver's license if they're an out of state and they need to change their driver's license to Williamsburg and it was a warning because I guess in January, he said that in Virginia, they're going to cross-reference it with DMV records so that essentially if you're a student from Michigan, an out of state student from Michigan who is on the voter rolls and you present a Michigan driver's license, then that wouldn't be valid ID, was essentially his point.

So I think that there have been problems with that and there will probably continue to be problems with that. And I also heard reports around the country of students facing similar issues.

MS. NARASAKI: Thank you.

MR. ROGERS: Do we have a copy of your written testimony or can we receive a copy?

MR. LOWE: I'll submit that. And also there is a study by Michael Laughlin from Salisbury University on this and if there is no objection, I'll submit those for the record as well.

MR. ROGERS: We would be delighted to receive that. Thank you very much, Mr. Lowe. We've reached our closing portion in terms of our ninth commission hearing. Are there any closing remarks by any of the commissioners that you would like to share? Well, then, we are so delighted to close this ninth hearing of the National Commission on Voting Rights Act and I thank you kindly for attending. We are now closed.

(Whereupon, at 5:30 p.m., the hearing was concluded.)

LAWYERS' COMMITTEE FOR CIVIL RIGHTS
ON THE VOTING RIGHTS

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

EXAMINING THE DEGREE OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN VOTING AND THE IMPACT OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT SINCE 1982

MISSISSIPPI HEARING

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

Taken at the Marriott in Jackson, Mississippi, on Saturday, October 29, 2005, beginning at approximately 9:30 a.m.

PRESENT:
Chandler Davidson, Chairman
Marjorie Lindblom, Co-Chair
Barbara Arnwine, Executive Director
John Buchanan, Commissioner
Joe Rogers, Commissioner
Fred Banks, MS Supreme Court Justice
Armand Derfner, Commissioner
PANELISTS:
Robert B. McDuff
Carroll Rhodes
Brenda Wright
Deborah McDonald
Ellis Turnage
Lawrence Gill
John Walker
Carlton Reeves

REPORTED BY: ROBIN G. BURWELL, CSR

MS. LINDBLOM: Good morning. My name is Marjorie Lindblom. I'm one of the co-chairs for the Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. I'd like to welcome you this morning to this the 10th hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. These hearings have been held all around the country, and this is the final public session of this group. We appreciate your coming, and I'd like to introduce the first speaker of the day, our executive director, Barbara Arnwine.

MS. ARNWINE: Good morning, everyone.

ALL: Good morning.

MS. ARNWINE: Good morning. Welcome, welcome, welcome. I am Barbara Arnwine, Executive Director of the Lawyers' Committee For Civil Rights Under Law. Welcome to the final hearing of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. For the staff, please clap, because that's a great accomplishment.

(APPLAUSE.)

MS. ARNWINE: We have had ten of these hearings all over the country. We've been in Montgomery, Alabama. We've been Rapid City, South Dakota, New York City, Minneapolis, Washington, D.C., Los Angeles, California, Phoenix, Arizona. We have been all over the country. We had many hearings in Georgia, in America's Georgia, and we had a hearing in Orlando, Florida. So we have literally traveled the country. And the people who have done that work, who have brought us here this day, not only has been our talented staff who worked on this program, and may I see -- I don't even think she's in the room. She's probably running around, Marcia Johnson-Blanco, who has done so much work. But, also, I really want to thank the Commission, the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act who has just been outstanding in doing all of this incredible hearing work.

It is fitting that we should have this final commission hearing in the place where it all began for the Lawyers' Committee. We begin the final hearing of the National Commission at the House of Representatives, is in the middle of oversight hearings on the impact of the Voting Rights Act. We have been assured by the members of the House Judiciary Committee that the National Commission's report will be entered into the congressional record. In fact, Comissioner Joe Rogers testified at the first hearings about the Commission's activities and the trends that we have absorbed over the course of the hearing.

Indeed, Jon Greenbaum will tell you that Congressman Mel Watts, who is also the chair of the Congressional Black Caucus, always says, well, we're going to do nine hearings, and the Lawyers' Committee has already done their ten, so if you add it together we've got 19. So in -- also, I would like to tell you that when Joe Rogers testified and electrified the congressional hearing room that both Republicans and Democrats talked about how important these commission hearings were.

So I just want to again to salute the Commission for its great work. The National Commission's report will assess the impact that the Voting Rights Act has had on discrimination in voting and allowing minority voters to vote for their candidate of choice. It will offer a complimentary picture of the state of discrimination in voting today by reviewing the employee records of the Department of Justice, cases litigated by voting rights attorneys, and, of course, the testimony from our regional hearings.

Together this data will paint a complete picture of the role that the Voting Rights Act has placed in combatting discrimination in voting for the past four years and how minority voters still depend on its protection to ensure that everyone has equal assess to the political process. The Commission report will be released in January 2006. The evidence so far has been both hopeful and disheartening from these hearings. During each hearing, we hear from voting rights litigators who have been instrumental in the development of the Voting Rights Act ensuring that its protections reach those at risk of discrimination.

We have heard from experts who have studied the impact of the Act on effected communities, and we have heard from community activists and citizens who have given powerful antidotal evidence that proved that the National Voting Rights Act, particularly Section 5 under the Central Provisions in the Voting Rights Act, must be reauthorized has been responsible for providing a voice to formally voice the community.

Unfortunately, though, we have also heard from advocates and citizens chronicling continuing disparity in the voting experience between minority voters and other voters. Clearly the work of the Voting Rights Act, while having a powerful effect on minority voters, is not done.

We have heard from African-American and Latino voters who still struggle with discrimination. From American-Indians who tell of lack of language assistance, discrimination in culturally insensitive poll workers. And we have heard about the impact in the Department of Justice observers that have made our democracy accessible to Asian Americans and Latinos. We have heard from elective officials grateful for the mandate of the language of citizens provision.

We have heard from former Department of Justice attorneys who testified about the impact the preclearance provision have had on jurisdictions. I am grateful for the assistance that the National Commission has received from the Commission's many cosponsors. It is through the coordinated effort by the members of civil rights communities that have helped the national commission to accomplish this audacious task.

I look forward to hearing today's testimony and adding it to the already impressive record of this august body. When we put together this impressive group of commissioners, we did so knowing that theirs was not an easy task. What we were asking of them for was nothing short of assessing the continuing importance of arguably the most important piece of civil rights legislation that ever passed Congress. They have responded with distinction.

I am proud to see this process unfolding and to have the opportunity to work with such a distinguished group. It is my pleasure before I introduce the Commissioner, I just wanted to recognize in the room our other co-chair, Robert Herrington, who is with Robinson, Bradshaw in Charlotte, North Carolina.

I'm also happy to see in the audience and who will be testifying today our board member and distinguished civil rights attorney in Mississippi, Carroll Rhodes, and it's just great to see you, Carroll, and to have you with us here today.

So now I want to introduce to you to our presiding Commissioner, Chandler Davidson. Professor Davidson is the Radoslav Tsanoff Professor of Public Policy Emeritus and served as chair in the Department of Sociology at Rice University. Dr. Davidson was the coeditor of the "Quiet Revolution in the South," a definitive work on the impact of the Voting Rights Act in the South. Professor Davidson.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you. Good morning. On behalf of the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act, I welcome you today to the last of the ten public hearings that the Commission will be conducting. The Voting Rights Act was signed into law in 1965 by President Lyndon Johnson in response to voting discrimination encountered by African-Americans in the South.

When Congress reauthorized the Voting Rights Act of 1975, it made specific findings that the use of English only elections and other devices effectively barred minority language citizens from participating effectively in the electoral process. In response, Congress expanded the Act to account for discrimination against language minority citizens by enacting the minority language assistance provisions found in Section 203.

Before discussing Section 5 and Section 203 in greater detail, I want to explain which protection are scheduled to expire in 2007 and which are not. The right of African-Americans and other minorities is guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment, and this right is permanent. Permanent provisions of the Voting Rights Act ban literary tests and poll taxes, intimidation, authorized federal monitors and observers, creates various mechanisms to protect the voting rights of racial and language minorities.

However, several temporary provisions of the Voting Rights Act will sunset or expire in 2007 unless they are reauthorized by Congress. Three major protections of the Voting Rights Act will expire. First, Section 5 which requires certain states, counties, and townships with a history of discrimination against minority voters to obtain approval or preclearance from the United States Department of Justice or the United States District Court in Washington, D.C. before making any voting changes.

These changes include redistricting, changes to methods of election, and polling place changes. Jurisdictions covered by Section 5 must prove that the changes do not have the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, and membership in a language minority. The entire State of Mississippi, of course, is covered by Section 5.

Second, Section 203 of the Act requires that language assistance be provided in communities with a significant number of voting age citizens who have limited English proficiency. Four language groups that are covered by Section 203, American Indians, Asian Americans, Alaskan natives, and Latinos. Covered jurisdictions must provide language assistance at all stages of the electoral process. As of 2004, a total of 466 local jurisdictions across 3states were covered by these provisions. Two Mississippi counties are covered by Section 203 for Choctaw Indians.

Third, section 6(b), 7, 8, 9, and 13(a) of the Act authorize the Attorney General to appoint a federal examiner to jurisdictions covered by Section 5's preclearance provisions on good cause or to send a federal observer to any jurisdiction where a federal examiner has been assigned. Since 1966, 25,000 federal observers have been deployed in approximately a thousand elections. The Lawyers' Committee For Civil Rights Under Law acting on behalf of the civil rights community created the nonpartisan National Commission on the Voting Rights Act to examine discrimination in voting since 1982, the last time Section 5 was reauthorized. The National Commission is comprised of eight advocates, academics, legislators, civil rights leaders who represent the diversity that is such an important part of our nation.

The honorary of the Commission is the Honorable Charles Mathias, former Representative and Senator from Maryland. The chair is Bill Land Lee, former Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, who unfortunately cannot be here today.

The other national Commissioner is the Honorable John Buchanan, former Congressman from Alabama. On my far right, Dolores Huerta, co-founder of the United Farm Workers of America. Elsie Meeks, first Native American member of the US Commission on Civil Rights. Charles Ogletree, Harvard law professor and civil rights advocate. And the Honorable Joe Rogers, to my immediate right, former Republican Lieutenant Governor of Colorado.

In addition to myself, Commissioners Buchanan and Rogers are present here today. We are also fortunate to have Mississippi Supreme Court Justice Fred Banks, and leading voting rights attorney, Armand Derfner as Guest Commissioner here today. A hearty welcome to both of the gentlemen on my left.

The Commission has two primary tasks: First, to conduct regional hearings, such as this one, across the country to gather testimony relating to voting rights; and, second, to write a comprehensive report detailing the existence of discrimination in voting since 1982. The report, which will be released in January of 2006, will be used to educate the public, advocates, and policymakers about the record of racial discrimination in voting.

I would now like to ask the members of the first panel if they would come up and be seated, please, and I'll give a brief description of how we will work this. There will be only two panels today, and the panelists of the first panel, who are now being seated, will be described in a minute. And we will then have a second panel in which we encourage members of the public who are here today to share their voting rights experiences.

If you like to participate in the second panel, please speak with a staff member in the back. This is our primary staff member that you would speak to. If you would like to share your testimony but cannot stay, please see a staff member who will take your statement so that it can be included in the record.

I would now like to introduce the commissioners who are present here today. Commissioner, John Buchanan, who is a Baptist minister who has served churches in Alabama, Tennessee, Virginia, and Washington, D.C. Commissioner Buchanan also represented Birmingham, Alabama in Congress for 16 years.

While in Congress, he was instrumental in the passage of Title 9, and also was a strong component of the full voting representation in Congress for the District of Columbia. After leaving Congress, he chaired the civil liberties organization, People for the American Way. John, would you like to make a statement at this time?

MR. BUCHANAN: Thank you, Mr. Chandler. It's a pleasure to be here in Jackson, Mississippi and to be a part of this celebration this weekend, this week of those who made the effort and made the sacrifices so that the promises on paper of the Bill of Rights, the Constitution, and the Declaration of Independence might become realties of the world for black Americans and all Americans.

I salute those who are here from all over the country. We have continued in that similarly important task and those who came before. It's also a pleasure to be in Jackson. Both my parents were born in Mississippi, in Blue Mountain, Mississippi, and if you folks in Jackson have never heard of Blue Mountain, you're culturally deprived. But it's a suburb of Cotton Plant in northeast Mississippi.

It was there I held my first job, and I earned $2.50 a week as a boy in Uncle Sam's General Store, and I got $2.50 plus room and board at Aunt Nattie's house. So that explains my credentials for being here. It was here in Mississippi that I had my first encounter with the South as it was in attending a trial for a young man on trial for his life for the death of another young man. And the whole thing was treated as a great joke by the prosecutor and the court appointed defense attorney.

It was a great amusement to the judge and the jury that the man was on trial for his life. I was stunned as a teenager at that performance. I do not celebrate the Mississippi or the Alabama that it was. We have reason to celebrate the Mississippithat has it become because of efforts of people like you, the Mississippi that's trying to make itself a place of hope and opportunity for all of its people.

And I share with you the dream of the Mississippi that yet can be. It is a pleasure to be with you this morning and to listen with interest and attention to your testimony, because you're helping make a record that needs to be made so the law can be as it ought to be in the 21st century as it's trying to become in the 20th. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: I've enjoyed being a member of this Commission for several reasons, but I think after hearing Commissioner Buchanan's testimony, you can infer one of the reasons for my enjoying being on this Commission so much.

Commissioner Joe Rogers completed his term as Lieutenant Governor of Colorado in 2003 where he held the distinction of serving as America's youngest Lieutenant Governor, and only the fourth African-American in US history ever to hold the position. He served as founding chairman of the Republican Lieutenant Governors' Association and served on the executive committee of the National Conference of Lieutenant Governors.

Mr. Rogers created the acclaimed Dream a Life program, dedicated to the memory and legacy of Martin Luther King, Jr. and the leaders of the civil rights movement. I must say I have really enjoyed getting to know Mr. Rogers over the course of the last several months as well. Mr. Rogers, would you like to make a statement?

MR. ROGERS: Thank you. Mr. Chairman, thank you kindly. First of all, it's just good to be with you all here in Mississippi, and I hope I said that as well coming from Colorado. How many of you all are here from Mississippi, by the way? I know there are people who were not -- most people are. I know we went to dinner last night there were a number of folks who had come from various parts of the country that have obviously been committed to the issues of Justice and hope for people all around this State for a number of years.

It was a pleasure to be with you all last night and to hear, Barbara, the number of accomplishments, and, frankly, the sense of family that seems to exist among many of you all that you all have together in terms of this meeting this weekend that you call Justice weekend. So I'm delighted to be with you all here today. The substance and obviously our purpose in terms of being here is credible.

And I wanted to explain in particular to the members of the panel that are here, your testimony is really incredible, and I know that you all have been (inaudible) here today. All of what you're saying on the panel will all be recorded. Everything will be recorded, all that information will be provided to the members of the United States Congress who are considering the issue of reauthorization, and reauthorization is something that we don't necessarily at all take lightly.

The Supreme Court has set a standard. Basically what they've said is if you can't find a factual basis for the continuing existence of provisions like the Voting Rights Act, if you don't have a tactual basis for its continual existence, then there may not be a constitutional basis and need for going forward with reauthorization of the key provisions. The bottom line is that the facts are what are critical in terms of our whole analysis taking place.

And so, in that sense, we're delighted to be here today. We're pleased to have the opportunity to hear from you all as individual panelists, and our hope is that we will also hear from members of the public more generally in our open session. So it's just good to be here from the mile high city of Denver, so to speak, the highest elevation peak in America. So good to be here. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Now let me introduce our guest commissioner Fred Banks, a partner in the general litigation group in the Jackson office of Phelps Dunbar. Commissioner Banks is a former presiding Justice of the Mississippi Supreme Court, and before his service on the Mississippi Supreme Court, Commissioner Banks served as a circuit judge in Hinds and Yazoo Counties for six years. From 1976 to 1985, he served in the Mississippi House of Representatives. Judge Banks.

HONORABLE BANKS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm honored to be invited to be a guest Commissioner here with these distinguished Commissioners, and I welcome them to the State of Mississippi and thank them for their service in this important work. As you can tell from what the Chairman just said, I was a beneficiary.

I was elected a total of eight times during 1975 and 1976, and I'd like to think that my service was beneficial. Minority voters were given a chance to select persons of their choice through the operations of the Voting Rights Act. I testified in the last reauthorization process before Congress and (inaudible) my role in this authorization process.

I also served as chair of the relief (sic) committee of the national NAACP, and as you all know, the Washington Bureau of the NAACP will be (inaudible) securing reauthorization by this Commission (inaudible). I thank the panelists for coming to give us those facts to get the job done. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Commissioner Armand Derfner is preeminent voting rights attorney. He's worked to ensure the promise of the Voting Rights Act from its exception to working as a federal examiner to working as an attorney on voting rights cases and testifying before Congress to ensure its reauthorization. Commissioner Derfner.

MR. DERFNER: Thank you all. It's good to be home. The time that I spent here, like many of you, both homegrown and from far away, changed my life. And I was privileged to begin then some opportunities to participate in dealing with the right to vote and helping, I think, to expand the right to vote.

These hearings involving the reauthorization of the Act which have taken place several times, you know, the temporary provision keeps expiring and keeps getting renewed, because it becomes clear each time that we still need them. And so, events like this hearing and the series of hearings that the Commission has conducted are vital in carrying out a national dialog that tells us exactly where we are and exactly how far we need to go.

So we hope to hear today from distinguished panelists who are both lawyers and lay people and those involved in the struggle who will tell you exactly where we are and where we have to go. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you. I'm going to introduce our panelists now. I've been told that Representative Chuck Espy is here, and if he is, we'd certainly like to recognize him. He's in the back. We're really privileged to have you here.

Robert B. McDuff is a civil rights and criminal defense attorney practicing in Jackson, Mississippi. He has represented black voters in several cases in the South, seeking to increase the number of black majority election districts through public officials, including members of Congress, state legislators, and state court judges.

Prior to opening his practice in Jackson in 1992, Mr. McDuff was an attorney with the Lawyers Committee For Civil Rights Under Law in Washington, D.C., a member of the faculty at the University of Mississippi Law School where he directed a federal court public defender program, an attorney with the civil rights law firm of Bradford and Sugarman in Memphis, Tennessee, and a law clerk to the Honorable William Wayne Justice, a United States district judge in the eastern district of Texas and something of a legend in my home state of Texas.

Mr. McDuff is a recipient of the pro bono service award with the National Human Rights Law Group. He currently serves as advice chair of the board of directors of the Mississippi

Center For Justice and is a member of the board of directors of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

Carroll Rhodes, solo practitioner in Hazlehurst, Mississippi, has been instrumental in the effort to enforce the Voting Rights Act in Mississippi and in establishing black majority judicial districts. He has served as lead counsel in numerous precedents setting voting rights cases, including the Magnolia Bar Association, Incorporated versus Lee case, and first of its kind in which Section of the Voting Rights Act was used, challenging the method of election for state Supreme Courts Judges.

Before establishing his own practice, Mr. Rhodes served as a judge in the municipal court in Hazlehurst and also worked as a staff attorney for the Central Mississippi Legal Services.

Brenda Wright is the managing attorney for the National Voting Rights Institute in Boston, Massachusetts, where she directs the nationwide litigation program. She served as the lead counsel for NVRI in its landmark cases in Vermont and New Mexico defending the constitutionality of campaign spending limits.

Before joining the Institute in 1997, Ms. Wright served as director of the voting rights project at the Lawyers Committee For Civil Rights where she successfully argued her Supreme Court case involving in the 1993 motor voter law Young versus Fordice, which challenged Mississippi's efforts to establish a racially discriminatory view on registration requirement for voting in federal and state elections.

Ms. Wright has testified before Congress and the state legislatures and authored numerous publications on voting rights and campaign finance reform issues.

Deborah McDonald is a municipal court judge in Fayette, Mississippi and has a law practice in Natchez. She has served as the executive director, managing attorney and staff attorney of Southwest Mississippi Legal Services. She has been involved in several redistricting cases, including Watkins versus Fordice and Smith versus Arnold. She is also an active member of the Magnolia Bar Association.

Ellis Turnage is a voting rights attorney. I have his curriculum vitae before me, and I'll just try to wing it a little bit. Mr. Turnage here has been legal counsel of Bolivar County, Mississippi Board of Election Commission since 1989. Duties include in court legal representation, training election officials and workshops, administrative supervision of elections and resolution of election contests and challenges.

Private consultant in election contests, racial black voting demographics and reapportionment cases and issues under the United States Constitution and Voting Rights Act of 1965. He also was a Cleveland, Mississippi Board of Aldermen elected in 1988 and served through 1993. He was not here last night, I understand, at the celebration, because he was involved in a law case.

So he's a working attorney, and we're pleased to have him here. We're pleased to have all of you here. And let me simply spell out to you our procedure, which I've found in the past hearings sometimes changes from moment to moment, but at least at the beginning it will be the following.

I will ask each of the panelists to give their testimony, and after all of the panelists have completed giving their testimony, the Commissioners will then ask them questions individually. So we're honored at this point to begin with Mr. Rob McDuff.

MR. MCDUFF: Thank you, Commissioner Davidson. Thank you all that are from out state for coming to Mississippi for holding these important hearings. I am a native of Mississippi. I was raised in Hattiesburg. I've been back and been living in Jackson the last 15 years.

So as so many people in this room know, it's a remarkable struggle in the 1950s and 1960s by black citizens throughout the State to obtain the right to vote, to break down the manifestation of segregation and white supremacy. But even with the right to cast a ballet, very few black citizens were elected to public office in Mississippi in the 1960s.

The first member of the Mississippi Legislature who was black was elected in 1967, and no additional black members of the Legislature were elected until eight years later in 1975, and as a result of enforcement of Section 5 by the Justice Department and litigation in the federal courts subject to the 14th Amendment.

There was no black member of Congress in Mississippi for the first 85 years of the 20th century. The only reason that change was because of the enforcement of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act by the Justice Department and litigation under the amended Section 2, as it was amended in 1982, of the Voting Rights Act, leading finally to the creation of the majority black congressional district and the election of the first black Congressman from Mississippi in 1986. That same year, 1986, of the 100 Chancery, Circuit, and County Court judges in Mississippi, those are the trial courts of record in Mississippi, out of a hundred only one, Fred Banks, was African-American. As a result of the litigation filed under Section and Section 5 and enforcement of Section 5 by the Justice Department, that was changed. Judicial districts were redrawn, and a significant number of African-American judges were resulted.

So that -- the same story is true for city councils, county supervisors, county election commission. The integration of those bodies in any significant numbers resulted only after enforcement of Section 5 and litigation under Section in the 14th Amendment.

There has been a lot to change in Mississippi, but without Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, much of that change would not have come about. Much of it would not have occurred, and we would still be living -- most of the citizens of this State would still be living under governmental bodies that are all white.

People often talk about the fact that Mississippi has the highest number of black elected officials of any state in the country. The last time the Joint Center for Political Studies did report the number of 892. And, now, see, it's a remarkable change from 1965 when the Voting Rights Act was passed.

But two things need to be kept in mind. Number one, Mississippi does have the highest African-American population percentage of any of the 50 states. So it should have the highest number of black elected officials. But even that number was only 18.7 percent of the total number of elected officials in Mississippi in a state where over 33 percent of the voting age population is black.

So 33 percent of the voting age population is black, but less than 19 percent of the elected officials are black here in the beginning of the 21st century. We do -- one other thing I want to add. Nearly all of those officials were elected. Nearly all of those black officials were elected from majority black jurisdictions. Only a handful have been elected from a majority white voting district.

I think when we start talking about the need for renewal of Section 5, some people are going to say, well, we don't need it anymore. Discrimination is behind us. That's all ancient history.

I remember once when I was -- prior to the time I attended law school, I was in Washington, D.C. and went to the United States Supreme Court to hear the argument in a case called Conner versus Finch, which was one of the manifestations of the law running Mississippi legislative redistricting litigation, which so many of you were a part of.

And Frank Parker was arguing the case on behalf of black voters in Mississippi, and the attorney for the State of Mississippi kept saying, you know, that's all ancient history. That's all ancient history. And that was before we had an African-American member of Congress. That was before we had any black judges in the State of Mississippi. That was before there was integration of the law of a number of accounting boards of supervisors and city councils. And so, it wasn't all history in 1977, and it's not all history now. There are no statewide black elected officials in Mississippi. In 2003, there was an election for state treasurer. One of the candidates, African-American, had been the director of the State Department of Economic Development. He had a number of qualifications for the job that made him clearly the best choice, and he was defeated by a 29-year-old white man who had no relevant experience in the area in an election that was characterized by severe racially polarized voting.

Until elections in Mississippi are not characterized by extreme levels of polarization that exist here, Section 5 must remain in place. They say that those who fail to understand history are doomed to repeat it, and I do fear that if Section 5 is not renewed, we are going to see a repeat of a lot of bad history in Mississippi, as well as in other states throughout the country. So I urge you to recommend to the Congress that for the sake of people in Mississippi and throughout the country, that Section 5 of the Voting Right Acts be renewed. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, Mr. McDuff. Mr. McDuff has set a good example of staying within the allotted time limit. We can applaud him for that, and we now move forward to Mr. Rhodes.

MR. RHODES: Thank you, Chairman Davidson and the Commissioner. I, too, welcome you to Mississippi, and thank you for taking the opportunity and the time to vote through this important subject. I, myself, like Rob McDuff, Deborah, McDonald, Ellis Turnage --

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. Rhodes, can I ask you please to bring your mic just a little bit closer? Thank you.

MR. RHODES: I, myself, like Rob McDuff, Deborah, McDonald, Ellis Turnage, am a native Mississippian, and I have been involved in voting rights litigation ever since I have been a lawyer. I want to talk about the Voting Rights Act, though, in a little bit different context than what Rob did. When the Voting Rights Act was initially enacted, the Section 5 provision was initially enacted in 1965, the thought was that if black people were given the right to vote in Mississippi, that all would be well.

And so, from 1965 until 1975, the emphasis of civil rights people in this State and the Justice Department was on gaining access to the battle, making sure that black people could register and vote. Before the Voting Rights Act was enacted, there were only like 6.7 percent of African-Americans registered to vote. After Section 5 was enacted, that number went up dramatically to over 58 percent, and by 1975, had increased to over 75 percent.

And when the first sunset of Section 5 came up in 1975, we knew that there was more to be done because just gaining the access of the ballet was not enough, because black voters went to the polls between 1967 into 1970 and voting but they could not elect candidates of their choice.

And the reason they could not was because white elected officials in Mississippi who controlled all branches of the government from the state level down to the counties and the municipal level came up with new and ingenuous methods to keep blacks from being elected to office.

So the emphasis for Section 5 enforcement from 1975 to 198sort of changed a little bit from just getting blacks elected to -- from just giving blacks the ballet to making sure that they could be elected to office, striking down a lot of those new barriers that came up. And one of the things that elected officials did, they changed from district elections to at large. They did -- they changed some positions from elected positions to appointed positions.

And because Section 5 was there, it required these officials to seek free clearance and prevent occasional Justice Department objections. And in 1982, everybody thought that all was well. We were getting blacks elected to office. We had blacks be elected to every position except for Congress and statewide positions in the State. And people thought that the Voting Rights Act was affective, and Section 5 was no longer needed.

But then, the reauthorization came in 1982. And after the reauthorization in 1982, there was a vigorous effort of enforcement by civil rights groups in the State and by the Justice Department to make sure that all of these voting changes that Mississippi was enacting was pretty clear. And that's when we had a dramatic increase in the number of black elected officials. As Rob said, the Joint Center for Political Studies most recent report states that there are 89black elected officials in Mississippi. The total number of elected positions in Mississippi is 4,761. Of that 892, most of them, as Rob said, are from majority African-American areas, but they also are from areas where there's less population.

The larger areas where they are greater population, the more difficult it has been to elect black officials. After the 198reauthorization of Section 5, there was a dramatic increase in the number of black elected officials, due primarily to litigation. And some of that litigation was geared just at Section 5.

There had been more than 300 acts of the Mississippi Legislature that had been enacted before 198that had never been submitted for preclearance. Those were acts that dealt with changes in voting, but had never been submitted for appropriate clearance. And there was a case that was brought, Murphy versus Pitman, that required Mississippi to submit all of these different laws to the Justice Department.

And some of those laws that were submitted dealt with the election of judges. And the Justice Department objected to many of those laws, because what Mississippi had done had been to change from single member election districts with chancery and circuit court judges who are judges at the trial level in Mississippi to multi-member districts. And by changing to multi-member districts with at large method of elections, it made it more difficult for blacks to be elected.

Because the Justice Department objected to those voting changes, we were able to have litigation under Section of the Act that resulted in, as Rob said, an increased number of blacks being elected to trial judgeship. The same thing is true for the state legislature. Litigation as a result of being -- more blacks being elected to the Mississippi Legislature because of Section 5 provisions requiring preclearance.

There are 12House members. In 1982, there were 20 blacks. Because of litigation and efforts of preclearance, today there are 35 black members of the House. In the Senate, there are 52 members in the Senate, and in 1982, there were only two African-Americans Senators. Today, there are ten, and that's a result of litigation and Section 5 emphasis.

Out of a total of 174 state legislatures, the number went up from 2in 198to 45 today. On the Supreme Court in 1982, there weren't any African-Americans, and today's there's one. At the Court of Appeals level -- there wasn't a Court of Appeals in Mississippi in 1928, but it was created in the 1980s, and there are two African-Americans there.

The Circuit Court judges, there are 49. Out of that 49, in 1982, one was African-American, and that was Reuben Anderson. He was the first African-American appointed as a Circuit Court judge. Today there are eight. That's an increase of seven. Chancery Court judges, there were 45. In 1982, zero. Today, there are seven.

And there are 26 County Court judges. In 1982, one was African-American, and that was Reuben Anderson. He was appointed to the Hinds County court first in 198-- '77, excuse me, 1977. And he served from '77 until '8on the Hinds County Court, and in '82, he was appointed as a Circuit Court judge. So he was that one person to serve in both positions --

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Then he was elected after he had been appointed?

MR. RHODES: He was elected after he was appointed. And, today, there are four African-American County Court judges. And I say that because these efforts of preclearance and litigation have lead to the increase in people holding office, and people might think that, okay, now, things are all well. But they're not.

This past year, the Mississippi Legislature enacted judicial redistricting for circuit, chancery court justices. Litigation that Rob and Ellis and I were involved with, Martin versus Allain and Martin versus Mabus litigation, led to the election of African-American trial judges, and it struck down, the litigation struck down the multi-member numbered post election feature. The litigation was brought between 1985 and 1989.

In 1994, there was a threat of bringing more litigation so that we can have more blacks elected, but legislative leadership at the timedecided to avert litigation and sit down with us, and we were able to draw up districts where we increased the number of black circuit and chancery judges. And we eliminated the numbered post. That feature had been struck down by federal court in Kirkland versus lane, Martin versus Lane litigation.

And so, for the first time, African-Americans throughout the State could vote for judges, either in single member districts or if there were multi-member districts, they could use single shot voting instead of having to vote for the numbered post election feature. This past year, the Mississippi Legislature went back and enacted legislature and reinstituted the numbered post election feature in 19 districts.

We need Section 5 to be reauthorized so that there could be an impartial and independent review of election features such as this that election officials in Mississippi might want to revive that once were dead. Just because they think that we have got as many African-Americans elected as possible does not mean that we will not try to revive some of the election features that have been struck down in the past. And I urge you to urge Congress to reauthorize Section 5. Thank you.

MR. RHODES: Thank you, Mr. Rhodes. Ms. Wright.

MS. WRIGHT: Thank you. And I greatly appreciate the opportunity to be here with you this morning. It's an honor to testify before a distinguished panel such as the one that is assembled here today. I can't claim to be a native of Mississippi, and that's certainly a disadvantage in this group.

I have had some occasion to study the history of Mississippi, however, and given that history, it's clear that the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is inextricably tied to the history of the State of Mississippi. This State's record with respect to voting rights was a primary impetus for Congress' enactment of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which you can see if you go back and reread the Supreme Court's decision in South Carolina versus Catenback (sic) at any time. And Mississippi's continued resistance to the requirements of the Act has been part of the important considerations for Congress and several reauthorizations of the Act since 1965. Since these hearings are primarily focused on the post-1982 record, I thought I would focus my testimony here today on a battle that started in the 1980s here in Mississippi and continued into the late 1990s over the requirement of dual registration in Mississippi.

Dual registration refers to the practice of requiring citizens to register more than once in order to vote in different categories of elections. And although that battle concerns just one racially discriminatory barrier, I think it's illustrative of several things that are important for the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act.

One of those is that the dual registration battle illustrates how registration requirements that are facially neutral have been used time and again in states like Mississippi to disapportionately disenfranchise minority citizens. It also illustrates the critical importance of Section 5 in preventing backsliding.

And third, this battle over dual registration shows how Mississippi, even in its more recent history, has continued to defy even the basic requirement of submitting voting changes for preclearance, requiring federal court intervention even to get that review mandated by Congress.

The original form of dual registration in Mississippi was a requirement that in order to vote in local elections, voters had to register twice: Once with the county registrar to be eligible for federal, state, and county elections, and then, separately, with the municipal registrar in order to be eligible to vote in local elections.

And this requirement was part of a package of voter registration barriers adopted by Mississippi in 189to implement provisions of the 1890 Constitutional Convention, who's overall purpose was to disenfranchise black citizens to the greatest extent possible. By 1984, Mississippi still had this requirement, and it was the only state in the Union still to require dual registration.

So in 1984, a group of plaintiffs represented by the Lawyers' Committee and the NAACP legal defense fund and Greenville attorney Johnny Walls challenged this requirement under Section 2 and under the Constitution. And in a decision issued in 1987, the district court found that this requirement did have both a racially discriminatory purpose when it was enacted and a continuing racially discriminatory effect.

The findings of court concluded that as of 1987 there was still a 25 percentage point disparity between the registration rates of white voting age citizens and black voting age citizens in Mississippi. And with respect to the dual registration requirement, the court found that more black citizens than white had been denied the right to vote in municipal elections because their names could not be found on the municipal voter registration rolls.

This was in part due to many factors, including the fact that because of past discrimination, blacks had lower income and educational levels than whites in Mississippi, making it more difficult for them to overcome administrative barriers, such as dual registration requirements.

Many communities, particularly small communities in the Delta, were located far from the nearest registrar's office. Blacks were far less likely than whites to have access to an automobile, and many other findings that documented the discriminatory effect of this dual registration requirement. So as a result of the litigation, the requirement was eliminated, and Mississippi went to a unitary system where registering once would make you eligible for all elections.

Unfortunately, that situation did not last, because in 1994, Mississippi began preparations to implement the requirements of the newly enacted National Voter Registration Act of 1993, the motor voter law, which required states to offer registration at driver's license offices, public officials offices, and so forth.

And although the requirements of the NVRA applied directly only to federal elections, virtually every state decided to implement those provisions fully for all elections, because they recognized that a system of dual registration is not only confusing to voters, but is incredibly expensive, cumbersome, and inefficient to run.

Well, in Mississippi, things turned out a little bit differently. The State actually started out with the intention of creating a unitary system and began conducting registration under a unitary system believing that the Legislature in Mississippi would pass implementation legislation. Several thousand voters were registered in the first part of 1985 under a unitary NVRA system believing that this legislation would pass.

And the Justice Department precleared the administrative manual that provided for these procedures. Unfortunately, the Legislature never did pass the implementing legislation. State Senator Kay Cobb, the chair of the Mississippi Senate Elections Committee, unexpectedly tabled the bill.

She later explained her position on this in part by focusing upon the registration opportunities offered to welfare recipients under the NVRA saying that people who, quote, "care enough to go get their welfare and their food stamps but not walk across the street to the circuit clerk should not be accommodated."

Then Governor Kirk Fordice later sounded the same theme in opposing NVRA implementation saying the legislation should be called welfare voter rather than motor voter because of the assistance it provided to public assistance recipients.

And, of course, when white politicians in Mississippi started invoking the image of lazy welfare recipients, everyone understands that this is an appeal to racial prejudice. And, in fact, editorial writers around the State condemned this as racist, rather.

So the result of this legislative impasse was that Mississippi implemented the NVRA procedures only for federal elections, because that was required by federal law, but not for state elections. And this, of course, changed the entire nature of their process, because no one had ever contemplated that this system would be implemented only for federal elections, and their administrative procedures did not contemplate that.

The State certainly never sought Section 5 preclearance for a dual system of that nature. But the State, nevertheless, went forward with a set of instructions at that point to the circuit clerks and to the county election commissions announcing that Mississippians who have registered to vote under NVRA will also need to register under Mississippi election law to be eligible to vote in all elections.

They directed the registrars to set up separate poll lists segregating the names of NVRA only registrants from those who would be eligible for all elections. In other words, Mississippi once again was going to have a dual registration system, and the electorate was divided into two groups: One of which could vote in all elections, and the other of which could only vote in federal elections, even though these voters have exactly the same qualifications for voting. All of them were required to be 18, to be citizens of the State for a certain period, and so forth. In other words, this was a system that simply had no logical or rational purpose, other than to disenfranchise people.

What should have happened next was for Mississippi to submit this system of dual registration to the Department of Justice for preclearance review to determine if it might have a racially discriminatory purpose or impact. The State refused to do so, and have refused to do so even after the Department of Justice formerly wrote to them and said this system has to be submitted for preclearance.

So accordingly, the only way to force the State to comply with Section 5 was once again to go to federal court, this time with a Section 5 enforcement action. And I think the fact that we had to do this 30 years after the Voting Rights Act was first enacted speaks volumes about the State's history of resistance to the requirements of the law.

We had to litigate the Section 5 enforcement action all the way to the Supreme Court, which unanimously held that Mississippi had violated Section 5 by refusing to submit its federal election only plan for preclearance review.

And when after almost two years of litigation Mississippi was forced to submit it for preclearance, the Justice Department objected and found that the confusing system had, in fact, a disproportionate impact on black citizens and had been enacted for what appeared to be a racially discriminatory purpose.

So the department Section 5 objection meant that Mississippi had been conducting voter registration for over two years under a patently unlawful system, but even then, the State did not cure the problem. Governor Fordice vetoed legislation in 1998 that would have created a unified system in order to cure the Section 5 violations.

And, therefore, in the summer of 1998, we had to return to the federal court once again to urge and to get a remedy. And, finally, the three judge district court noting the failure of the State of Mississippi to enact remedial legislation after full and fair opportunity to do so entered an order enjoining the State from denying the right to vote in any state, county or municipal election to any voter who is registered and qualified to vote in federal elections under the NVRA. And as a result of the order, thousands of voters in Mississippi were restored to the voting rolls for full eligibility in all Mississippi elections. So as I mentioned at the outset, this battle over dual registration is just one small chapter in the struggle for voting rights in Mississippi. But I think it's a good illustration of the State's entrenched resistant to full voting rights, a persistence in State officials in finding new excuses to create barriers to the right to vote, the critical role of Section 5 in protecting the right to vote, and the continued need for reauthorization to protect the hard won gains that have been made. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, Ms. Wright. Ms. Deborah McDonald.

MS. McDONALD: Thank you very much. I am a practicing attorney in Natchez, and I'm still practicing in election contests, as well as Carroll and I have done some reapportionment. And what I want to speak to is to bring up to today, this year, a case that I was involved in, and we're still looking at it down in Woodville, which there are several reported decisions of cases Carroll and I have done in that area. That's in southwest Mississippi. There was a mayoral election in Woodville this year of a black candidate, which that particular county and the city is probably 75 percent black, he lost the election by 13 votes. We looked at it as an impossible election contest. What had occurred is that for some reason, and I still haven't been able to understand, there's an election commission in the city that is five whites.

And at the polls, there were people who were -- and it was that same dual registration problem. They had been voting in the county for just ever, and they go to the city to vote, and they'd say, well, you're not on the voter rolls. So for whatever reason, the people were told, well, you got to prove that you can vote. You need a voter registration card or you need a utility bill to show us that you live in the city.

Some of these people who we have -- we do have a transcript of that. Some of them would come, present themselves. You can't vote. It's 6:30 in the evening. They just got off work. Go home and get a utility bill. They would go home to try to get the utility bill, and, of course, by the time they got back, the polls were closed.

Those people were verified voters of the City of Woodville, but they were denied the right to vote. It was our understanding that there was as many 75 people. So in other words, there's never been a black mayor in the City of Woodville, and there was no black mayor then, but I think the election was stolen.

These are the types of impediments that I have encountered in my practice in southwest Mississippi. There has been illegal purging. There was a case of Hunter versus whoever the governor was then. I can't remember. But there was a case that would have been in the early '90s where the sheriff of Wilkinson County was -- the black gentleman who was running for office won the election by about 16 votes.

There was an election contest. He ended up having to run -- having to run again. And, basically, what occurred was a situation where black voters were purged. All of this since 1982. There were purged due to the fact that they had misdemeanor convictions. Now, if you're aware that there is a case and that the 1890 Constitution, as Brenda stated, dealt with the issue of being purged because of these types of crimes.

Now, that particular case, I think it was like 1898, talked about white people being convicted of robust crimes, and we'll put the category of rapes and murders. That's not a disenfranchising offense at that time. But petit theft and petit crimes were crimes that were disenfranchise. So as a result, these people were purged, and that is one of the things that is still going on. People are stilling purged from the voter rolls.

And now, young black men who get incarcerated at higher rates, they're being told when they're incarcerated that you can no longer vote, no matter what the conviction is. And that is a really bad problem, I think, with judiciary action, informing or misinforming young black men and women that they cannot vote. And we have a real bad problem in our area, and I think in the entire State with that.

So -- and I would like to mention another case that I was involved in, just giving you antidotal information. It was in Amite -- well, it was actually in that same county, Wilkinson County, a young lady ran for the city council or the board of aldermen, and she lost by three or four votes.

And what we ended up finding up is that the powers that be had intimidated white people by calling and saying, you better get over here and vote, even though they lived outside the city limits. It was a city election. You better get over here and vote. And the chief of police was doing that, and we found it out.

So we subpoenaed the lady who we knew had been intimidated into voting in the city election, even though she lived in the county. She moved out a year or so ago. We subpoenaed her to trial. Once we subpoenaed her to trial, they basically backed off and agreed to a new election. But these are the kind of things that have been going on, are still going on. The racial appeals are still there. There's no question about it. Rob mentioned the treasurer's race in Mississippi. Gary Anderson was the gentleman's name, black gentleman. He was doing just fine until there were television commercialsshowing his picture. Once that occurred, then all bets were off, and he ended up losing the election, and I think that was very crucial.

So I guess what I would state that there's no question in my mind that the Voting Rights Act, in particular Section 5 enforcement, is very necessary. We are in a regressive state in Mississippi. We need stronger enforcement. Carroll's statement about the judicial elections. Here we have now again at large elections in the judiciary.

And I would submit to you that blacks will not be able to vote to win any of those at large positions. Now, you say, well, most of those, the black judges are in -- still in the single member districts, but the problem is we're heading down a slippery slope. And I think Section 5 is necessary to stop that slippery slope.

Now, with that said, we still have to have strong enforcement of Section 5. That's nothing that we can, I guess, deal with here today, but that is really, really important, because we're not getting the support at the state or the national level that we need. As a matter of fact, at the state level, these disenfranchising felonies, when these young men go to vote, they're told you can't vote because of the -- because you've been convicted.

But some of these, the Secretary of State continues to expand the list of what comes under a disenfranchising felony. So to that extent, you know, I'm troubled by it, and I see it. And I have people call me about representing them in various ways. And for those reasons, I think that Section 5 needs to be reauthorized.

I think the dual registration is a problem, and people are being turned away due to the fact that they are registered one place but not registered another. The circuit clerks and the municipal clerks aren't doing what they need to be doing to make the connection, because once you're registered in the county, you should be on the city rolls, but they're requiring more. Just like Brenda said.

And I guess with that the only thing I would say is it's a travesty to the extent that I remember as a child sitting in these mass meetings, because I grew up in Fayette, Mississippi, that's where Charles Evers was elected in 1969, the first black mayor since reconstruction of a biracial town. But, anyway, I was -- my parents, I used to sit with my parents in these mass meetings, and we used to talk about things, impediments to voting.

And what I see now is the same thing. I see it all over again. I think we're in a second reconstruction. And for that reason, I think we need to be very forceful about the reauthorization of Section 5 and these other sections of voting rights. And I thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak, and I would just like to say to Brenda that you're an honorary Mississippian.

MS. WRIGHT: Thank you very much.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. Turnage, Mr. Ellis Turnage.

MR. TURNAGE: Thank you. Welcome to Mississippi. Glad to have you here. Chairman, I wish you had been there for the recent Blues festival. The Chairman and I attended the Mississippi Blues Festival a number of years, so I just thought about you in that sense.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: I still got my T-shirt, by the way.

MR. TURNAGE: I thank you for the opportunity to come and discuss the Voting Rights Act of 1965. I am a native of Mississippi. I was born in 1956 in Rankin County, just east of here. I attended an all black elementary school out at Goshen Springs, Mississippi in Rankin County. From 1970 to '74, I attended an integrated school, high school, Pisgah High School in Rankin County.

I left high school and served in the United States Army in the Military Police Corps from 1974 to '76. I returned to Mississippi, obtained a BS degree from Jackson State in 1980, and went on to Ole Miss Law School, and I graduated with a Juris Doctorate in 1982. Was admitted to the Bar on December the 20th, 1982.

While at the University of Mississippi, I attended a national Frederick Douglas moot court competition in 198involving the case of Rogers versus Lars, which was pending before the US Supreme Court at that time, involving the proper legal standard in adjudicating cases arising out of the 14th and 15th Amendment. They ultimately held that it had to be intentional, purposeful racial discrimination.

In the same year, Congress submitted the Voting Rights Act to apply the result tests on. All of this happened -- that was my date with the destiny of the Voting Rights Act. That's where it all started. Since then, I have litigated six Section 5 cases and over a hundred Section cases here in Mississippi involving mostly municipalities, county jurisdictions, and other cases. The State court judge case that we had, I remember the day I talked to Fred Banks about filing that case. You were in private practice that day. I talked to Frank Parker, and both told me, Mr. Fred -- Fred told us that it didn't apply. At least it hadn't ever been applied, and I said, well, maybe that might be a good reason to apply it now or at least ask it. And that was how that case got started in 1983 or '84, somewhere along in there.

But, anyway, I'll move on. I want to talk specifically about the six Section 5 cases I was involved in. And by the way, I have one set for a three judge court hearing on Monday here in Jackson at 9:00 o'clock. So I'll proceed with that.

Basically what I have seen is cases where the Attorney General fails to object. And I've been involved in several cases of determining whether or not he timely objected, because if he let the 60 days pass, it's going be precleared by law.

And there's a 1977 Supreme Court case, Morris versus Versett, that holds that the Attorney General's failure to interpose Section 5 objection is not judiciary reviewable, even if he said I'm going to let -- I'm not going to object, and I'm going to sit back and do nothing, because your state voted right in the last election. I'm just going to let it go. It's nonrenewable.

The fact that that changes is very significant. It puts the burden on the individual voters to now go forward and prove the case, rather than keeping the burden on the State jurisdiction to prove that it does not have effective discrimination under Section 5. It's a big difference. In addition to reauthorizing, in my view, the issue of judicial reviewability needs to be reconsidered and argued before Congress.

They need to make clear that the burden will remain with the jurisdiction, the submitting jurisdiction, rather than shifting it to the poor protected voter. You can see that from a case that I was involved in recently, Public versus Grenada. This is a published opinion, but in essence, what happened, the city of Grenada had become majority black. The whites recognized it, and they ran out and did a big annexation.

And it got tied up in court. They didn't get it through in time for the next election, because if the election had been held, African-Americans were going to have a majority on the city council, and they knew that. They went to state court and got an order from the Mississippi Supreme Court to stay that election.

After we filed the Section 5 case in federal court, the federal court eventually let the election go forward. Yes, it was a Section 5 violation. Ordered the election held, and guess what happened? More blacks got elected. They took control of the city.

Well, they then -- the Bill Clinton Justice Department objected to this Section 5 annexation that brought in about 1300 more white voters than black voters. So it was 54, 55 percent majority black from a special census that was done in 1977. This annexation would have returned the city to being majority white.

Now, this year the courts ordered Grenada to make a submission -- no, they didn't order Grenada to make a submission. The Attorney General on his own, the Republican Justice Department, the Bush Justice Department say we're going review -- we're going to rereview this matter. And guess what? They withdraw the objection, and the annexation goes through. The election is set for Tuesday, and you had an African-American mayor that was elected. Grenada did not have a majority vote requirement. Two whites ran, one African-American. Ms. Freelon won the election. Come back now the Justice Department has withdrawn its objection. The federal court -- the white voters got the federal court in Oxford to order a new election, to clear and vacate all the seats, to give the voters in the annexedarea an opportunity to vote. In this case, even though it has been Grenada's past practice to use a plurality win, this election by federal court order imposes a majority vote requirement, by court order, federal court order. Even though the city's own practice had been to use only a plurality. They didn't conduct primary elections. They only hold one election, a general election. And if two whites ran and one African-American ran, you could win with a plurality of the vote. And that's how Ms. Freelon got in.

So my point of all of this is that with the Republican Justice Department overruling I guess a Clinton Justice Department decision, the federal court coming in, applying a majority vote where there had been done, there's definitely a need for continuing to enforce the Voting Rights Act. And I would urge you to argue for a change in the judicial reviewabilities. And I'll tell you, that trend of state courts' decrees stopping elections. I ran across that is Kilmichael, Mississippi. Section 5 violation was adjudicated. Kilmichael was another interesting situation.

The majority -- the black voters in Kilmichael decided they wanted to change it, and they went down and registered. They got almost everybody in town registered. And the whites realized what was fixing to happen, and they go to the Montgomery County Circuit Court and get a court order stopping the election. A clear Section 5 violation.

We go to federal court, prove the Section 5 case, order the election. Guess what happens? Just what they predicted -- the blacks were going to take over. In McComb, Mississippi, this is the interesting case for Monday, a state representative also serves as city council member in McComb, David Meyers.

Due to -- on the city council, McComb wanted to have some type of tax that municipalities were authorized to have, a tourism tax, by state statute, but in order to get it, you've got to have a private deal, which requires all the state representatives and state officials from that county to sign on to it.

David would not sign on to it, because he knew that all the money was going to be spent over the white part of town, and he pleaded with them to set aside one-third of it for some parks over in the black part of town. They didn't want to do that, so he didn't sign off on it.

So what they did was they started and went to state court, filed a lawsuit against him saying that his dual service as state representative and city councilman in McComb violated the Mississippi Constitution of 1890, separation of powers doctrine and the ancient doctrine of common law of incompatibility to hold office.

Guess what? State court obliged him. Gave it to him. June 13th of this year, or May 13th of this year, found that his dual service violated the Mississippi Constitution of 1890, and the doctrine of incompatibility, vacated his seat, refused the state order pending appeal, and the Mississippi Supreme Court refused the State order pending appeal.

So we filed in federal court saying, hey, this is a Section 5 change. It changes who can serve as a candidate. It's a candidate qualification and requirement case. So that's what we're set for. The precedent here is now you go to state court and get you a friendly judge to sign off on whatever voting procedure you want to implement. That has been the practice here. Luckily we've been able to stop all the ones so far, but it's a trend. Those are my comments at this time about Section 5. And I, again, thank you for giving me the opportunity to come forward and glad that you came down to address this important issue.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, Mr. Turnage. Before we begin asking the panelists questions, I would simply like to recognize the presence of US Representative Benny Thompson here in the audience. And, Mr. Thompson, would you stand in case there's somebody who might not recognize you?

(APPLAUSE.)

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Well, we will begin with Judge Banks. Do you have any questions that you would like to ask any of the panelists?

HONORABLE BANKS: One question to Mr. Rhodes. What's the status of the change in the judicial election prior to preclearance?

MR. RHODES: It was submitted to Justice back in July for Section 5 review. The Magnolia Bar and others submitted comments urging the Justice to object. But on September the 15th, Justice precleared, and what I can't understand why they precleared it is because Justice had initially entered a Section 5 objection to the numbered post feature in 1986.

And when the State first submitted this voting change during the Kirkland versus Allain and Martin versus Allain litigation in 1986, Justice objected to the numbered post feature. And a three judge federal court entered a permanent injunction permanently barring the State of Mississippi from using the numbered post feature for judicial election. The same Justice Department precleared it on September 15th.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. Derfner?

MR. DERFNER: I guess I'm just taken aback. I thought I had a skeptical view of how much peoples hearts and minds have changed over the years. The hearts and minds of those who are in control and determined to remain in control, but I'm just blown away by this testimony. Witness after witness has talked about things in the past year, in the past two years in which changes that have a -- that are identifiably and well known to be discriminatory, they go back and do them again and again and again.

I guess the one question I would have, Mr. Turnage referred to a question about reviewability. Do any of the panelists have any other thoughts about ways in which the Act might in fact be strengthened? Do you think that an extension of the Act as it is is satisfactory? Will that do the job, or are there other things that we ought to consider?

MS. WRIGHT: I'll jump in on that. I think there are definitely a couple of areas where I would hope to see the Act strengthened, or actually I would probably say restored, to what it's original intent was. One of those areas would be to undo some of the damage that was done by the Supreme Court's Bossier Parish decision in January 2000 where they essentially, you know, without going into a lot of detail, simply read the purpose test out of Section 5. They said that even if you have a voting change that is intentionally racially discriminatory, the Justice Department has to preclear it unless it was infected by a so-called retrogressive intent. So, in other words, if you have -- if you had a jurisdiction that had been successful throughout history in drawing redistricting plans that prevented blacks from ever electing a candidate of choice, and after the new census results come out and they submit a new redistricting plan, they deliberately go out and create a plan to maximize white voting strength and minimize minority voting strength, the Justice Department has to preclear it, because although the intent may have been racially discriminatory, it wasn't actually retrogressive.

Since blacks had no power to begin with, it wasn't retrogressive of black voting strength. And that, you know, is a very, very shorthand description of the 2000 Bossier Parish decision. I think that has done a lot of damage to the Justice Department's ability to properly review Section 5 and object to racially discriminatory voting changes.

The other area is probably Georgia versus Ashcroft where the court really created a very confusing set of standards that make it much more difficult now to determine when a plan is, in fact, retrogressive. The one thing we all thought we understood pretty well that made it much easier for jurisdictions to reduce black voting strength in legislative districts, and I think that's had a very harmful effect as well.

MR. RHODES: I would like to add in addition to restoring the original intent, I think the Section 5 review process needs to be amended or expanded to include also the ability of both the three judge district court in D.C. and the Attorney General to review voting changes to determine whether or not they result in discrimination and know that the US Supreme Court says that the results of the test should not be used.

And the reason I say that is because it's terribly expensive for litigants to litigate under Section 2, and a lot of voting changes do result in discrimination, and they might very well have the intent to discriminate. But officials in the South have changed from the 1960s.

In the 1960s, they would say the reason they were doing something they did not want blacks to be in office. They would just come out and say it. But somewhere along the line, they've got it into their heads that they can't say that anymore, because they would automatically lose whatever they're trying to do.

So they have developed more sophisticated ways of still getting the results that they want by discriminating without actually coming out with the purposeful language or intentional language. The intent to discriminate is awful hard to prove. Results is easier to prove.

And I think that if Justice could review changes to determine if they result in discrimination, it would lessen litigation and, for the most part, these enforcement efforts are now brought by poor people. Individuals, they can't afford to litigate this stuff in court. So if they go back to restore the intent test, but also add the results test as well. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. Rogers, do you have some questions?

MR. ROGERS: I do. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As I was listening to all of your testimony (inaudible) testify, because there's a commonality that runs across the board to each of your testimony regarding essentially the way you all see Mississippi in existence today. And I'm struck by that, given to some extent your comment that you made just there, Mr. Rhodes, and I'm trying to testify to this. Essentially you described a world in which you have change in language. Folks can't just say outright I don't want black folks to be elected to office anymore. So the language has changed, but you said the purpose is still the same.

So it's difficult to prove intent necessarily. They intended to do this based upon the fact they just didn't want me in office. But it's easier to prove a fact, so to speak. That's what the result of it is. What I found interesting, though, in listening to all of your testimony, you all essentially described this as being purpose.

The purpose is to limit black folks from opportunities, the purpose is to change the rules of the game continually so that you don't have access to opportunity in terms of black folks being elected to various positions here.

You describe a world in which that is the absolute purpose, not effect. But you describe it as the purpose of what is taking place here. But I kind of think to some extent what you just said just there, Mr. Rhodes. You said essentially if they came out and said what they really meant, if we used the language, so to speak, in this instance we don't want black folks going into office that they would automatically lose.

I'm trying to contrast that statement with Mr. McDuff's statement about racially polarized voting, (inaudible) on statements about the fact that essentially white folks don't cross over to vote for black folks, period. How do you automatically lose in this State today in Mississippi if the result is still racially polarized voting as you all described in a world in which you do not use that language?

Do you have a world here where white folks essentially say we don't want to use the language anymore, but we still want to essentially practice the same? Practicing the same. Forgive me that long question, but it represents to some extent what I think is to some extent the messages that you all are bringing, which is a common message.

I'm sorry I'm not as articulate on this question. There's kind of message that you all are bringing without necessarily using the language to describe, if you will, what is exactly going on here. Forgive me, Mr. Chairman. I need to ask that question better.

What I really want to ask here I guess at the end of the day is: What is happening in Mississippi? Do you have a (inaudible) effect? Are white folks here essentially saying, listen, this is what we do to conspire to prevent blacks folks from obtaining power? Is there private meetings that take place among white folks here that essentially work in fact to say this is what we will do, and they do that in fact?

Is there just sort of blatant understanding among white folks in Mississippi non-spoken of that essentially says this is what we do as it relates to black folks in Mississippi? Can I ask you that question in that way, if you don't mind? And forgive me for the introduction that I gave you to that, but in the essence of the end of the day, I'm really trying to get the essence of what you all are saying.

MR. RHODES: I'd like to taking a stab at trying to respond, and go back a little bit further in history in Mississippi. After Brown versus Board of Education was decided in 1954, there was a real uproar in Mississippi, because at the time, separate but equal was the law of the land. There was no mixing of the races, as white politicians say.

And almost every politician who ran for governor in 1955 would say that we're not going to allow race mixing. We're going to maintain separate but equal. But there was one candidate running for governor who was a brilliant lawyer, and he had been a circuit judge. He had been a district attorney. He had been an Associate Justice of the Mississippi Supreme Court. His name was J. P. Coleman.

And J. P. Coleman, at the time, said that you do not have to use all this rhetoric that these people are running around using. But he said that there are ways to do things without coming out and actually saying it. I remember one instance in his inaugural address in 1956, he said it would be easier to dip the Atlantic Ocean dry with a teaspoon than it would be to allow mixing of the races in Mississippi.

He said one of the things you do is you enact laws, and before they can have those laws struck down by the federal court or the Supreme Court, you come back and enact new laws. So he was telling white people in Mississippi then you don't need to be hotheads and go out here and use all of this language of intentional discrimination, because you're going to lose those battles, but you can get the same thing accomplished without using that language.

And I think J. P. Coleman was one of Mississippi's most effective leaders as far as maintaining racial discrimination in this State, because after that -- the climate changed after then and into the '60s, white politicians moved away from blatant race discrimination. But white voting ballots had not changed over this period of time.

Primarily in most elections, we have an African-American candidate running against a white. You're going to have probably 90 percent of white voters voting for that white candidate, or higher. You're not going to have any of the white voters cross over and vote for the black candidate.

Will Kalone was a black Republican in Mississippi who ran for state treasurer I believe in 1983, and he received the Republican nomination, but he did not receive the votes of white people. They voted for the Democratic nominee.

We've talked about the race that was in 2003, Gary Anderson. He was an African-American that received the Democratic nomination, and people said he was far more qualified than Tate Reeves, who was 29-years-old, a Republican. But Gary Anderson did not get the overwhelming majority of the white vote; Tate Reeves did.

I guess I'm saying that white folks don't have to come out and say we're not going to put black folks in office. If you look at the results, if you look at the elective returns in whitemajority precincts, you see that that is what has happened, that they did not vote for. And there has been some discussion within the last few years, and I do not buy into it, that it's not race based voting, but it's party voting. People vote along partisan lines, as opposed to racial lines. But in Mississippi, there's not that much difference between a white Republican and a white Democrat. But when you have a black in the race, that black would get far fewer votes than the white, whether that white person be Democrat or Republican.

MR. TURNAGE: I would like to address that briefly as well. You know, in 1964, when Fannie Lou Hamer challenged the all white Republican delegate to the national convention in Atlantic City, that same year the white folks really left the Democratic party. They wanted to be Republican.

They had always been closet Republicans, or at least -- well, not -- I won't say closet Republicans. They had voted for in 1948 the governor Strom Thurmond and Fielding Wright, who was the Governor of Mississippi, was his vice presidential candidate, they voted for the Dixiecrats. They were Dixiecrats. That's really what they were. They weren't Democrats. They were Dixiecrats.

So after that, the '64 election, in '68, Nixon saw the strategy. I mean, it was simple. They said exactly what they wanted to say. We're against bussing. We're against all of these blacks running around up there in the streets in Chicago. No law and order. We want law and order. They adopted -- we don't want bussing. We think you should have neighborhood schools. We against that. And they all voted for the Republicans. They've been voting for them ever since. Now they don't say we don't want the blacks. They'll fly President Bush down here to DeSoto County and Rankin County in Airforce One and tell them vote Republican, vote Republican. National Democrat party, they for abortion. They want Ted Kennedy. He's a Liberal. A white Democrat running Mississippi, they trying to tie the National Democratic Party around his neck. Haley Barbour was running with Amy Tuck as Lieutenant Governor, they had never ran as a team, you know, before.

But now you had Musgrove, the Democratic governor candidate, incumbent, running with Barbara Blackmon who was running for lieutenant governor. Now all the sudden every time you see Musgrove's face, you see Barbara Blackmon's black face sitting right beside him. And so, now they say, okay, vote Barbour and Tuck. We're Republican. We ask for your vote. Well, now there's a correlation. Mississippi Republican party's almost all white. Very few blacks in the Republican party. So they switched from being Dixiecrats to full out Republicans. Now all they have to say is that vote Republican, because there's a correlation between Republicans and racists. It's all white. That's how they do it. It's easy.

Todd McGinnis (sic) is a Democratic candidate saying that he's for abortion and has no moral values and all of this stuff on the socially conservative issues, you've got 95 percent of the white voters lined up in your pocket. That's the way it works.

MR. MCDUFF: Let me add one thing if I can. I think Ellis' description of the creation of the Mississippi or the rise of the Mississippi Republican party as a refuge for white people who did not want integration in this State, Democrats, who left -- in mass left the Democratic party in 1964 and joined the Republican party, and the continued growth of the Republican party in Mississippi, the policy that it has adopted to depress poor people to prevent serious economic racial integration in this State is just one of the major problems we're dealing with right now in Mississippi.

I think Ellis hit the nail on the head when he talked about that as a real impediment to progress. There has been progress. There is integration of some governmental bodies. There is some integration in the workplace, not nearly as much as there should be, and as a result, some people's attitudes have changed.

Over-racial comments and racial actions characterized as such by the promoters are fewer and further between than they were before. They still occasionally happen. We saw Senator Lott say a couple of years ago that he wished Strom Thurmond had been elected president in 1948.

We see what's happening in Grenada that Ellis described, where as soon as the city becomes majority black, or as it is about to become majority black, the majority of white city councilmen annexes white areas and gets state courts to go along with it.

And although the Clinton Justice Department, we see 13 years later, aided and abeted by the Bush Justice Department and a Reagan appointee to the federal bench, that gets undone. And what was nationally a majority black city has now become a majority white city because of very over-racial actions taken by the white -- former white city council members in Grenada.

So it still happens. But I think another part of the problem is when people get into voting. The majority of the white people in this State, unfortunately, even though they may not admit it to others and some may not even admit it to themselves, will still fall back on those old habits of voting for their own kind. And, unfortunately, we still in this State, and in so many parts of the country, still look at it as our own kind along racial lines.

And political and economic lines correlate with racial lines. And so, that is still a major problem. And we see what happened in 2003 with this treasurer's election which we've talked about so much.

And I can tell you, if the races of the two candidates were reversed -- the 29-year-old white candidate who won, if he were black, and the 47-year-old black candidate were white, the guy who ended up winning the election wouldn't have gotten 15 percent of the vote. He was so unqualified. He shouldn't have even been in the election, but he won because he was white. There's no question about it. No question about it.

So we've still got these problems. The Voting Rights Act has brought a lot of change to Mississippi, but we've got to do everything we can to keep it from slipping back. And Section 5 of the Act is such an important part of the change that has occurred here. We cannot let it slip back.

MS. McDONALD: Let me just add. Also the flag vote, I don't know if you all are familiar with it, but the flag vote came in, what, 2002? Whatever the year. It's been in the last five years. And basically, it was to retain the Mississippi flag which has the Confederate emblem on it. And that vote also was along racial lines. It's no question about it, you know. It reflected the black/white split.

And there may have been -- I would say maybe 5 to 10 percent, and I may be off on that, but I think it was somewhere in that range, of white people who actually did vote against the flag. But for the most part, it was along racial lines. Some of the organizations which supported that flag vote Governor Barbour appeared on a website with them when he was running for office, and people asked him to renounce the group, and he refused to do so.

So that is the kind of thing that we're dealing with. I got appointed to a judicial recommendation commission here a year or so ago. And I was appointed from the wrong Supreme Court district. I immediately notified the Governor who had issued my commission, and nobody did anything. Nine or ten months later, I called to find out how a candidate would go about applying for a judicial position that had come open, and the next day, I got a call removing me from the commission.

So, I mean, nothing has really changed. I mean, things have changed -- like Rob said, things have changed. There are more blacks elected, and that's a good thing, because we need diversity in this State. I mean, I think that the black population in this State is probably more like40 percent. A lot of people don't get counted in the census.

But be that as it may, there is a lot that needs to be done. And the extension of the Voting Rights Act I think is crucial, is absolutely crucial to the work that we're trying to do and to the continued existence of blacks in the political system, because we're being weeded out. We're being weeded out by the convictions.

In the criminal justice system, Rob can speak to this, a lot of times young white men that do things don't even get to the system. It's taken care of before it gets to the system. But the black young men and women go through the system, and as a result, they're disenfranchised, or they're told they're disenfranchised even if they're not.

So to that extent -- you know, I'm not saying -- and your question is, you know, are you telling me that things haven't changed and there's been no progress? No, we're not saying that, but we're saying that if the Voting Rights Act is not extended, you're going to see a serious regression of what has been accomplished in the last 40 years.

MR. ROGERS: I have to tell you that that of all the states we've been to throughout the United States, Mississippi in and of itself is unique to some extent, and this is why I find this panel and your conversation about this to some extent so unique.

Martin Luther King described Mississippi as a place unlike any other state, that there was something so unique about this State and it's intrinsic sort of holding on to, if you will, segregation, noticeable separation of races, implicit superiority in white folks as it relates to black folks. An implicit almost assumption, if you will, even by many blacks in this State to a status of (inaudible). Those things, as I remember, in particular as talked about by Martin Luther King made this State so unique in and of itself.

And yet, to hear your descriptions of Mississippi today, the numbers that you talked about before, one black person elected in 1967 to the State Legislature, the number of black elected officials as you described it, going up to, as you described it, virtually none in the 1960s up to 19 percent or so the State is now -- not consistent, Mr. Rhodes, with what you're talking about, what the numbers ought to be, 4,76elected officials, only 89of which are black.

But even when I consider the dramatic progress (inaudible) minority that's been made here, you've had -- here are you with the state with the largest black population in America. You've had a significant increase in black elected officials. Mr. Espy, as you serve in your capacity, Mr. Thompson, you inherited Mr. Espy's seat previously.

So you've had these gains arguably that have been made in this State, and yet, you still talk about a world in which despite that progress, you are holding on to notions of the past. And to me, it's an interesting -- it bodes interestingly perhaps for the rest of the country as we begin to become more of a culture in which you will have minorities continuing to increase in the basic population.

And if you want to talk about a world of retrogression or regression, in which essentially even though you've made progress, you have this inclination to still go back, if we don't reauthorize Section 5, then we see a world in which we're going to go back in time. You all said that. Things go backwards, not forwards. I find that remarkable.

And this is too long of a comment on my part, and I don't want to do that at all, but I find it remarkable given the substance of Mississippi in the country in our view of issues.

MS. McDONALD: Let me just say that almost every issue that comes to the forefront in Mississippi, the issue of race underlies it. I mean, almost every -- if there are ten issues, nine of them are going to be based on race as to what position the political leadership will take. Wouldn't you agree with that, Carroll?

MR. RHODES: Yes. And I would also like to add that Mississippi politicians, black politicians in the past have fought every effort to get black majority districts and to get blacks elected. But then, they also go out and tell the nation that we have more black elected officials than anywhere in the nation. But they fought that.

And in 1999, there was a black Republican running for agricultural commissioner, Roger Crowder, and he lost, and essentially political proponents (sic) said he lost because he ran against Lester Spell, who was more qualified.

2003, Gary Anderson, more qualified black elected official -- I mean, black candidate running for state treasurer, but he lost, and he lost to a white Republican and political proponents say he lost because he was running against a Republican. So when a black run as a Republican, they can't win, and when they run as a Democrat, they can't win for a statewide office. And the reason they can't win for a statewide office is because black's only 33 percent of the population, and you have to have white votes in order to win. You have to -- you need a significant number of white votes to win in a state that's 33 percent. And if you still have white black voting in extremely high numbers, then it is difficult.

And what we are saying is that those patterns, those voting patterns haven't changed much since the Voting Rights Act was initially enacted. And if those voting patterns haven't changed, if Section 5 is not reauthorized, you're going to have stuff like the Mississippi Legislature coming back and saying, well, we need to go back and have at large election for judges.

That's something that the Legislature, the state Attorney General agreed to strike down in a federal court case in 1989 and in Legislature they enacted in 1994, but then they come back and reintroduce it in 2005, just 1years later.

MR. TURNAGE: Carroll, I would point out also, and that this is what you said, Roger Crowder did run. He ran twice. The first time a Democrat, second as a Republican. They beat him out of the Democrats. Then they come back and beat him out of the Republicans. And Will Kalone ran for Attorney General in addition to the treasurer's race, and they beat him down both times.

So the message is this, and it's plain to see. With statewide offices, white voters in Mississippi don't want integration. And they haven't given any. I mean, on the Supreme Court, nine positions, we've never had more than one at a time. That's 1percent. One out of nine is 1percent. And we can't get anymore.

Three highway and public service commissioners, three of them, each one of them, that's six offices, we've never been able to elect any. They don't want any diversity. They don't want any integration. And all you've got to do is go and look at the voting returns in these heavily white precincts, and you've got a whole bunch of them. Some counties in Mississippi have probably less than 500 blacks.

It was told to me yesterday, the judge from Tishomingo County, she said I think we've got 167 blacks in my county. And all you've got to do is go and look at these returns. If it's two white candidates running, white voters will sometimes split, but usually they go 95 percent the same way.

Now, you get down on the local level, you know, like state representative, we have races that we were able to win to put a Democrat in office in Cleveland, because it was two white guys that were running, and they both were local, and they knew everybody. They split their vote, the black voters went in and lined up behind the Democratic candidate, and we was able to win that election.

But for statewide races, and the higher you go up the ballot, there's no integration, and they don't want any. 95 to 98 percent of them voting the same way with 70 percent of the turnout being white, the result is predictable. We already know what the outcome is going to be. So, yeah, it happens. And we made progress, but the federal court drug them all the way. So it wasn't like it was voluntary that white voters gave black voters all of these offices. We had to drag -- the federal court dragged them across the line. So it's still here. It's stillgoing on. I was in a case yesterday in Como, Mississippi that I tried an election contest up there. Como is probably 65 percent African-American, but it's a poor town. A lot of poor people.

The election -- my candidate John Walton, was certified the winner with 253 votes. This is an at large position for alderman. The other candidate, the white candidate, Dr. Ruell, who is a medical doctor, had 244. So it was a nine vote margin. And it was 53 absentee ballots voted in that election.

And in Mississippi law, certain people have to go to the clerk's office and vote. That's the only place you can vote under the present law. But certain people who are 65 years and older and who have physical disabilities can call in and request a ballot, the clerk can mail it to them, and it has to be attested by a person 18 years or older. And if any voter assistance was given, he's got another certificate that has to be filled out.

Well, they left off the certificate for voter assistance. And it turned that all 33 voters that needed assistance were black, they voted for the black candidate. The judge threw the election out, because these 33 ballots that were printed did not have that last form on it, the attestation for the person providing voter assistance, and they threw it out.

So now, you tell me, do we still need it. They purged -- testimony came up in the trial that they had purged at least 50 African-American voters from the list right up before the election. There's no Section 5 preclearance for it at all. This came up during the State court case. So, now, next week I got to go back and work on the Section 5 issue.

It's still going on. All you got to do is go around and watch the election, municipal elections, county elections, state elections, whatever level. 95 to 100 percent of the white voters are going to go the same way, unless it's two white candidates running. You may get some split. But on the statewide level, if it's a Democrat, 95 percent of white folks are going Republican. That's it. Thank you for listening.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Congressman, do you have any questions?
MR. BUCHANAN: Mr. Chairman, it's time for me to testify.
CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: We have this moment (inaudible).
MR. BUCHANAN: I had a question, but Commissioner Derfner, being highly intelligent and perceptive, he read my mind and answered my question, because I wanted to hear what you all think might need to be strengthened in the Voting Rights Act. Late President Lyndon Johnson I think was the one who said politics is the art of impossible.

And I don't know whether it's impossible, but it seems to me we do need as a part of the record of this Commission to have people like you tell us what you think needs to be strengthened, not what needs to be sustained. But he stole my question, so I have to testify. When I was a freshman my first in the conference I helped the steering of the investigation of the Klu Klux Klan, and I really felt (inaudible). There was a newspaper editor, an African-American whom I highly respected, he said, you know, I'm not so worried about those with hoods over their heads. The ones that really worry me are all those with hoods over their hearts.

I'm afraid that still exists in your state and mine. And it makes me heartsick, Commissioner Derfner, to hear that testimony. I wish I heard something else that doesn't ring true to me. I think we ought to hold our Bibles a little more closely. It does appear that what you are saying is accurate, and I wish we could clone (inaudible). I know cloning is supposed to be wrong.

I wish we could clone you. I wish you were sitting here in the United States Senate or the United States House of Representatives as a committee that would be dealing with this legislation, because I think your testimony has been clear, and I thank you for it. I wish I believed that we had improved as much as I think we should have improved and not look toward each other.

It hasn't completely happened yet. I think it's not quite as dark as has been portrayed by this panel, but when it comes to what the law should be, John Thompson, Senior, the former basketball coach at Georgetown University, said the world is a pretty nice place if you've got a hammerlock on it and force it to be. The father of the Declaration of Independence ironically said, Thomas Jefferson said, "You must define men by the chains of law."

It would appear to me that it's necessary -- from your testimony one can get a clear impression it is necessary to have the law as it is and possibly strengthened in order to (inaudible) purposes of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and then through the years, and make sure that -- that pressure is privilege and (inaudible) basically Democrat society of every person having the right to vote and every vote being counted.

And it seems to me that if we're going to have that in the 21st century, you make a strong case that we need to sustain the laws (inaudible). And I just want to thank this panel. You represent -- I started out talking about the Mississippi that was and the Mississippi that is and the Mississippi that it yet might be. Seems to me you represent the Mississippi that ought to be, including you honorary Mississippians. Thank you. End of testimony.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: I have a few questions here before the panel ends, and they're mostly efforts to just get my notes straight here. One of the reasons I became a university professor is because I much preferred lecturing people than taking notes, and I'm not a very good note taker.

And the first question here is for Mr. Rhodes. You mentioned, as I understood you, 300 acts of the Legislature before 198that were not submitted for preclearance. Did I get that right?

MR. RHODES: Yes, between --

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: 65.
MR. RHODES: 1965 --

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: And '82. Do you have any estimation of how many acts of any governmental body in Mississippi that have not been submitted for preclearance since 1982? And let me put it slightly differently. Are you confident that jurisdictions in Mississippi are now abiding by the law that requires them to submit all proposed changes?

MR. RHODES: Unfortunately most -- I think most jurisdictions, they would think certain things will need to be submitted, like redistricting plans. But they don't view everything as a change in voting, so they don't submit everything. So there are a lot of voting changes that have not been submitted, and as we catch them, like Ellis said, then we bring litigation to try to force them to be submitted.

But they only submit that that have been tested time and time again, and they know that that needs to be submitted along the local level, and even in the Mississippi Legislature. Even after we brought the lawsuit Murphy versus Pitman to force them to submit all those changes. Since then, there have been voting changes that slipped through the crack.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Along the same lines, let me simply pose this question to Ms. Wright, and that's with regard to the motor voter dual registration requirement there. You said, I believe, that when the Legislature went to the dual system, or passed a bill to that effect, that it was not submitted, and so you had to then institute an enforcement action to get them to submit it, and it went all the way to Supreme Court.

And I'm just curious as to what their reasons were at the beginning as to why it was not necessary to submit that change for preclearance in a Section 5 state.

MS. WRIGHT: Well, to be accurate, they didn't -- the legislature didn't enact a dual system. What they simply did was administratively -- there was no new legislation. They simply administratively started implementing the NVRA for federal elections, and not for any other elections, but using all of the same forms and procedures that have been set up in contemplation of a unified system.

For example, the voter registration form that they were using for NVRA registration was entitled something like "Mississippi Voter Registration Form." It was nothing on it that would tell you that if you use that form to register, you were only going to be registered for federal elections and not for all elections.

But this was not done by the Legislature. It was done administratively. However, it's absolutely clear, and it has been since Allen versus Board of Election in I think 1969, that even administrative changes, all kinds of changes, no matter who makes them, have to be submitted for preclearance.

Another reason they gave for not submitting this program for preclearance was that it wasn't really a change because we're just trying tocomply with a federal law, the motor voter law. But as we pointed out, that argument also had been disposed of in the Allen versus State Board of Elections case, because one of the changes that the court in that case held to be covered by the preclearance requirement was a change that Virginia enacted for the very purpose of complying with the Voting Rights Act itself.

And the reason that even those changes that are meant to comply with federal law have to be submitted for preclearance is that there's always a lot of discretion in the way, you know, a particular law might be implemented. There's always room for doing it well, doing it poorly, doing it in a way that fully enfranchises people or in a way that it doesn't.

And so, there were a series of arguments that if you ignored all past Supreme precedents, you know, they sounded plausible, but they were really we felt foreclosed by precedents. And, you know, we did get a unanimous decision in the Supreme Court, which is not -- you know, when you get Justice Cooley and Justice Thomas on your side together with all the other justices, you feel like you probably have had a pretty good case going in.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you. I'm struck in listening to the testimony of several of you with regard to Section 5 enforcement that while this Commission has a good comprehensive list of Department of Justice enforcement actions, we don't have anything approximating a good list of enforcement -- Section 5 enforcement actions that have been brought by individual citizens.

And I would very much hope that each of you could submit to us after your testimony today any list that you might have or be able to compose without too much difficulty of Section 5 enforcement actions here in Mississippi, or for that matter elsewhere, but particularly Mississippi that you have been involved in. That would be very helpful to the Commission.

I know Mr. Turnage mentioned several of those actions that he personally had been involved in, and I would really like to get a list of cases if I could.

MR. TURNAGE: Tim, I think it was a list attached to my CV that I think that --

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Good, thank you. Thank you very much. That may be the easiest way for each of you to get a list to me here.

MR. BUCHANAN: Mr. Chairman, while you're looking, may I make one more brief comment?

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Certainly.

MR. BUCHANAN: I just want you Mississippians to know you may be unique, but you got a lot of kissing cousins in Alabama.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: This question is again for Mr. Rhodes. You mentioned I believe it was this past year that the Legislature reinstituted a number of posts in 19 -- was that legislative districts or some kind of districts.

MR. RHODES: That was a judicial district.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Judicial districts. And I take it that that change was submitted to the Justice Department for preclearance.

MR. RHODES: It was submitted in July of this year, July 2005, and Justice precleared it September the 15th.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: They precleared it.

MR. RHODES: They precleared it, even though it was retrogressive. And several organizations and individuals submitted comments to the Justice urging an objection because it was retrogressive, and Justice had objected to these same changes that were submitted in 1986. On July the 1st, 1986, they entered an objectional letter to Mississippi's change from single member districts to at large with a numbered post feature.

And they objected as it being retrogressive. And then we obtained a federal court injunction with the State of Mississippi agreeing and Justice being a party in 1989 outlawing the numbered post feature. And then, the Mississippi Legislature enacted legislation increasing the number of districts and outlawing the numbered post feature in 1994. But when they came back and submitted it in 2005, Justice precleared it.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Would it be possible for you to send to the Lawyers' Committee, mainly the Commission here, the comments that you mentioned that various organizations made about the appropriateness, or lack thereof, of that failure to object on the part of the Justice Department.

MR. RHODES: I'll be more than happy to.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Okay. Thank you.

MR. GREENBAUM: Mr. Rhodes, did that apply to all of the judicial districts in the State or just those that did not have a majority of black districts?

MR. RHODES: That applied to the ones that did not have a majority of black districts. What had happened, Mississippi had a hodgepodge election mechanism after the Kirkland versus Lane and Martin versus Lane case. In areas where you had sufficiently large black population where you could draw single member districts, you had sub-districts divided for election purposes.

But in areas where you did have sufficiently large black populations to draw a single member sub-district, then single shot voting was permitted. The numbered post feature was outlawed, and people were allowed a single shot vote. And blacks were elected as judges in those areas where they could single shot vote between 1989 and 1994.

MR. MCDUFF: There were some -- were and are some majority white judicial districts that did have numbered posts, because there had been no objection under Section 5 to the numbered posts in those districts in the late '80s, because there hadn't been seats added to be precleared and that sort of thing. So it isn't every majority black district from which numbered posts were abolished, and there were 19 of them.

MR. RHODES: There were 19.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: And I have a question for Ms. McDonald who talked at some length about the purging of African-American voters from rolls, and I believe you referred to some of those as illegal purges. Has there been any legal action taken to get the people back on the rolls who have been purged?

MS. MCDONALD: Well, Carroll and I, the case I mentioned, we had a case where the sheriff in Wilkinson County was -- they did -- mounted an election contest, and he had to run again.

But the problem was there had been 60 or 70 voters purged. He lost -- well, he won by 16 votes anyway, but there had been 60 or 70 black voters purged a couple of weeks before the election. And as a result, we filed a lawsuit challenging that action under and stating that Section 24of the Mississippi Constitution was -- the whole basis of it was intent, the 1890 Constitution.

And there was a case out of Alabama, I believe, that had declared the same statute in Alabama unconstitutional. But it's interesting to note that constitutional provision is still -- you know, it's still a valid constitutional provision that is used by the Secretary of State to determine which are the disenfranchising actions.

And basically, I mean, there's -- they're expanded as a municipality or a county rights end to say is this a disenfranchising action under 24or a crime under 241. Then the Secretary of State sends back and says, oh, yes, it is. And when we call, and we say, well, now, that's not specifically stated in Section 241. And then the Secretary of State said, well, that's been the interpretation.

So that is, I guess, the Attorney General and the Secretary of State. So we have a problem of, I guess like Brenda said, these -- and Carroll -- there are a lot of Section 5 changes that aren't called Section 5 voting changes by the Legislature. They're administrative changes, and they go on from the election commissioners all the up to the Secretary of State's office.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: You obviously consider these to be changes that should be precleared. Are they ever submitted, or do you try to enforce preclearance with regard to this expanding list of disenfranchising measures you're talking about.

MS. MCDONALD: I don't think there's been any organized effort to say write Justice and say that there's been a change here, and this needs to be precleared, or you need to interpose an objection. I don't think there is that mechanism in place. But there needs, I believe, to be a comprehensive study of the types of administrative changes.

Because I think they're more -- I think they're more hurtful to the voting process really than these overt changes that the Legislature does. You know, the Legislature writes up a bill, and they send it into Justice, and whether it's in force or not, a lot of them aren't, but there are lots of other things that are going on. There are impediments to voting that are just as bad as pre-'65 impediments.

MR. TURNAGE: Jim, I had -- on the same note, I had a case -- it wasn't to the voter. It was to the candidate, alderman candidate in Canton, Mississippi. It's a published opinion. McLaughlin versus The City of Canton.

What this case is about, my client beat an incumbent alderman in the primary election, and she found out that he had pled guilty. He wrote a bad check to -- well, his wife wrote the bad check to one of her employees. It was cashed at a grocery store in Canton.

And the lady that he beat found out about this check, and she went to justice court and got a copy of his record and gave it to the City of Canton Election Commission, and said, hey, he's a convicted felon -- I mean, false pretenses, even though it's a misdemeanor charge in Mississippi.

But the underlying fact in the case is that it was a bad check charge, which is a separate statute. False pretenses, what they charged him with falls within Section 241, and it is disenfranchising. But Judge Wingate found that to deprive a misdemeanor of the right to vote is inconsistent with equal protection laws, and he struck it down. But now, that was the only time I've run into that.

But I'm sure, I'm confident, and I hear in a lot of towns that like people who have been to the penitentiary -- and this is -- it's only nine under Section 241, if I remember, murder, rape, bigamy, false pretenses, and I can't tell you all of them. Theft, which would be a misdemeanor as well.

But, basically, the point I'm getting at is these correctional officers, these parole officers telling these people, hey, you can't vote. You've been convicted of a felony, even though it's not one in Section 24that's enumerated. The word is out there if you've been to prison, you can't vote.

And since we disproportionately go to prison, especially in the Delta counties I see it all the time, the people are being told that they can't vote for those reasons.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: This, to me at any rate, raises an interesting legal question. If people make these statements to prisoners more or less on their own. I mean, they're prison officials, I gather, of some kind or other, it in some sense or other becomes a practice or a quasi-legal or administrative decision.

And in some sense or other, you would read Section 5 to say that that kind of an administrative interpretation ought to be precleared, but how you would go about enforcing that kind of an administrative decision that may be the work of one person or a few people just kind of taking the law into their hands is a mystery to me. As a non-lawyer, I just don't have any idea how you would deal with that.

MR. MCDUFF: Well, we're actually hoping in the near future to deal with a larger problem, because we're doing some historical research right now on the 1890 constitutional provisions and the amendments to it in 1950 and 1968 to try to mount a 14th Amendment equal protection challenge against the entire constitutional provision, which tells people they can't vote if they've been convicted, similar to the one that succeeded in Alabama.

There's a Fifth Circuit precedent that creates a problem, but we're trying to put together the research to work around that, and hopefully we'll be filing a court action in the near future. If we read the whole thing, then, yeah, maybe the word will get out that once people -- that people are not necessarily disenfranchising because they've been convicted of a felony in Mississippi. But that's an obstacle we've got to overcome or work on.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: On behalf of the Commission, I want to thank you from the bottom of my heart for appearing here today and giving such excellent testimony. I assure you it will be made use of as we prepare a report, and I just thank you, and I know that all of the other Commissioners thank you as well, and it's a pleasure listening to you testify. Thank you.

(APPLAUSE.)

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: If there are people now who would like to testify, members of the public to the Commission, I urge them to come forward and do so.

(Off the record.)

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Ladies and gentlemen, we're ready to convene our second panel consisting of people who have come forward with testimony to give to our Commission. The three panelists are Lawrence Gill, John Walker, and Carlton Reeves. We will try to keep each person's testimony to ten minutes or less. If you have any prepared or written comments that you would like to also give to the Commission, we would be very happy to receive those. And I would like each of you to begin by telling us a little bit about yourself and then giving us your testimony. So I will begin. You're Mr. Gio; is that right?

MR. WALKER: No, I'm John Walker.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Wrong end. All right. I'm sorry. You're Gyot? Gyot, I'm sorry.

MR. WALKER: That's all right. You're in a lot of company.

MR. ROGERS: How do you spell that, Mr. Gyot?

MR. GYOT: G-Y-O-T.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: So it's Mr. Reeves?

MR. WALKER: Mr. Walker.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. John Walker, would you commence, please.

MR. WALKER: I just want to thank the members of the Commission. My name is John Walker. I'm an attorney here in Jackson, Mississippi. I'm what I would call a blue collar, shirt sleeve lawyer in Jackson, Mississippi, and have been since 1971, and have been involved in Mississippi elections since '71.

I came here this morning just to hear this testimony, but after hearing it, I felt compelled to step forward to buttress some of the testimony that was presented here this morning. Since 1973, I also started representing now Congressman Thompson. When he was the Mayor of Bolton, I served as his city attorney until '79, and then helped with his campaign when he became a Hinds County supervisor, and then worked on his campaign when he was elected in 1993 to Congress.

I've been actively involved in Mississippi elections since 1971, and I would just echo what the first panel stated, and this -- I would also say this for the record. The members of the first panel, these were the cream of the crop. These were probably the -- if not the best, some of the best lawyers in the areas voting rights in this country, and they have had remarkable success and achievements in that area. And I think that their testimony is testimony that is very credible and very worthy of consideration.

But in terms of the Voting Rights Act, I cannot urge the importance of it being reenacted. I would say that the Voting Rights Act is the 5,000 (inaudible), and we've seen all in the news about Hurricane Katrina. Well, I would say that the Voting Rights Act are the levees that keep repression out of Mississippi.

If not for the Voting Rights Act, if that levy is broken, New Orleans would look like a Sunday School picnic compared to what will happen in Mississippi, because the oppression will rain down. And what I'm saying is that the forces are here to come forward with oppression. We only have to look at the -- and as Carroll Rhodes accurately described, the Mississippi power structure now knows not to use the "N" word, and basically, you know -- basically screw folks with a smile.

And so -- but as you can see in their actions that if the Voting Rights Act is not reenacted, it will be a whole cascade of repressive actions and activities. You don't have to look at the recent Supreme Court raised up Justice James Graves where the advertisements of his opponents was that he was one of us. And this was the message. His -- the white opponents campaign, where all of his campaigners were each one of us.

At every election there's voter intimidation in the blacks precincts. You know, I'm where the road meets the road in the elections. I'm on the ground in the precincts during elections. And in the black precincts -- and it starts back in the early '80s when Nora (sic) Stewart, who was Justice Banks former law partner, she ran for county judge here in Jackson. And in the election, her opponents, they came in with all these security guards into the black precincts and was stopping black voters as they were coming into the precinct asking for IDs, where there was no ID requirement. They had video cameras to intimidate voters. And this thing is just -- this is an intimidating thing for people who are not used to confronting the power structure to go exercise their right to vote, and it's a deterrent.

But, fortunately, because of the fact that we had some organization, we were able to bring a counterforce up of community folks who confronted these security guards and ran them off. But, I mean, this should not have to happen. And what I'm saying is because of the Voting Rights Act, people, you know, sometimes -- are sometimes reticent to do, engage in this conduct, because they don't want to end up in some sort of lawsuit.

What Deborah McDonald stated is very true about the administrative changes. I think she and Carroll were mentioning that. That really changed voters procedures and have an impact on voting. And one of them is for instance a situation of what they call affidavit ballots. The law is -- it goes back and forth on these affidavit ballots.

An affidavit ballot is basically where when a person goes to the poll to vote, and for whatever reason, his or her name is not on the poll vote there, they have to vote what's on the affidavit ballot. Well, whether or not that affidavit ballot is counted is determined by the election commission after the poll closes.

And what is supposed to be the determining factor, if that person's name is -- if that person is actually registered, but it was inadvertently left off the role. Well, one of the issues that comes up with these affidavit ballots is whether the poll manager initials that ballot.

And in many instances, poll managers don't know of any requirement to initial the ballot. Therefore, do not initial it, put it in the envelope, the voter doesn't know any better, and the ballot goes down to the election commission, and the election commission -- depending on the mindset of the election commission, it will determine whether or not they're counted depending on whether they're saying it should be initialed.

In 1991, we had a situation here in Hinds County when Benny Thompson was still the supervisor, there was a lady, a black lady by the name of Peggy Hopson who ran for supervisor, she lost on the machines. She lost on the machines in Hinds County in a supervisor race. However, then Benny Thompson at that time was a supervisor. He was at the election commission, saw all of the boxes coming in, and saw a large number of affidavit ballots out of her precincts.

And so, therefore, we monitored that process and found out that she had enough votes to win if those affidavit ballots were counted. And the long and short of it is a decision was made by the election commission that they would not count those affidavit ballots, because they were not initialed.

A court challenge was brought, and eventually there was a ruling by the Supreme Court that they did not have to be initialed. They were counted, and she was -- became the victor by about five or six votes. Now, since that time -- I mean, that's a reported Supreme Court case. But since that time, election commissioners in this State still do not count affidavit ballots unless they are initialed. I mean, they'll make that decision. Unless the candidate is there and has an aggressive force of people with him or her, they will not count it. And even if they have an aggressive force, they will say they aren't going to count it, you can take it to court. And that shouldn't be.

But because of the Voting Rights Act, some election commissions when you bring that up, say, we're going to -- we're going to bring a suit, they'll back off and go ahead and do the right thing. So, as I said, it's the levees that keep the repression from raining back and running back into Mississippi.

And, I mean, that's something that has, you know, been a major problem in terms of the powers of these election commissioners to make decisions in which -- and many times are changes in the voting laws in terms of the decisions that they make whether or not to count these votes, because, I mean, that's where a lot of discretion and judgment exists.

And the law is not clear, and -- I mean, there's a probably a lot of Section 5 violations going on in those areas. And they also depend on interpretations of the law by the Secretary of State. And the interpretation you get from the Secretary of State depends on who's giving the interpretation. You know, one person in that office will give one interpretation, and another one will give a different one.

So I would say that it's very important. And just in terms of improvements, that was a question that was asked before, I mean, one thing that's always I guess concerned me and puzzled me is, you know, when you have these federal reserves. And, you know, who basically come and take notes, and you never know what happens after they take the notes.

First of all, I think that when you have the federal observers, it's important that the people that they send to be federal observers are people who are supportive of the objectives of the Voting Rights Act, who are interested in seeing it, as opposed to I've seen where people say, you know, a federal observer, they say, I'm here because I was told to be here. And they have no interest in making sure that the purposes of the Voting Right Acts are carried out.

But over and above that, they have no power. All they can do is take notes. In terms of any observable abuses that are going on in their presence, they have no power to act or do anything at that time to curtail that particular practice from going on. So I think it would be important that -- you know, that would be a positive change that where the observers would be people who are supportive and would have some power or authority to do something to curtail the practice that's going on.

Like, for instance, I stated about Nora Stewart, there were federal observers there, and they were just taking notes. And we said, well, do something about this. We can't do anything about this, except take notes. So I urge you that the -- for the record to reflect that the Voting Rights Act needs be reenacted and strengthened to keep the repression from returning. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you, Mr. Walker. Mr. Reeves.

MR. REEVES: Yeah. I'd like to thank the Commission for being here. My name is Carlton Reeves, and I'm here in a couple of different capacities. I am the secretary of the Magnolia Bar Association, which is a bar association of mostly black attorneys in the State of Mississippi.

Although we're primarily black attorneys, we're certainly not exclusive for black attorneys, and any white attorneys who are also members of the Magnolia Bar. The Magnolia Bar Association has stood on the forefront of fighting the battle toward reenactment of the Voting Rights Act of 1982, as well as our efforts through election contests and otherwise. Since that time, we're making sure that the right to vote for African-Americans is protected.

So I come in that capacity. In my personal capacity, I'm from Yazoo City, Mississippi, a native of Yazoo City, having lived there through the '60s and '70s and been involved in elections in my hometown in the State of Mississippi since the 1970s as a young kid, and further -- and even today.

I have served as the -- I have served as an associate in a private law firm in town, and after having a stent at the State Supreme Court where I was a law clerk and staff attorney. My other jobs included chief of the civil division for the United States attorney's office here in Jackson, Mississippi from 1995 to 2001.

Since 2001, I've been in private practice of a small law firm here in Jackson. I just want to emphasize a couple of things. We understand that you cannot look at political races and political things in a vacuum. We cannot look at things in a vacuum. There was much talk earlier about the Gary Anderson race, for example. The Gary Anderson and Tate Reeves race. You talked about the schism between the experiences of the two candidates and all everyone is emphasized the relatively inexperience of Tate Reeves of whom there is no kin. I'm not any kin to him all. And the inexperience of Tate Reeves versus Gary Anderson.

We can look at another race at that election cycle. Two guys with about the same amount of experience in different capacities, and that was the Attorney General's race between Jim Hood and Scott Newton. And they're relatively about the same age. Scott Newton being the Republican candidate who lost resoundly to Jim Hood, the Democratic candidate. And Jim got those votes in Rankin County and other counties that Gary Anderson did not get. MR. ROGERS: Was Scott the black candidate?

MR. REEVES: No, Scott was a white candidate. So these are two white candidates. So do not be confused about whether or not there would be crossover votes, because I think if you look at the Tate Reeves and the Gary Anderson race, people say, well, it's not about race. It's about experience or whatever it's about.

You just look at a race on the Attorney General side where you have a former district attorney, Jim Hood, running in his first statewide race against Scott Newton, the Republican guy who is former a assistant US attorney, former FBI agent, and you put those two candidates and the scores that they got in their elections, and you will see that white people will vote for experience on the state side, because they voted overwhelming for Jim Hood, who was a Democratic candidate, for Attorney General.

And, obviously, he had some appeal to people who voted Republican for the governor's race, people who voted Republican for the lieutenant governor's race, and people who voted Republican in the treasurer's race. So it's not solely experience when you look at the Gary Anderson race. Obviously, Gary was far more experienced than Tate Reeves, but for some reason, white people did not vote for Gary Anderson, and those same people voted for Jim Hood.

With respect to the race that Mr. Walker talked about with -- the Supreme Court race of Justice James Graves, it's interesting that his challenger, Samac Richardson who is a Circuit Court in Madison, Rankin County areas did say that -- in his brochures and filings said that he was one of us, and it's so interesting that Judge Richardson comes from and is a native of Neshoba County, Mississippi and the City of Philadelphia area.

We know what those signals mean, being one of us. Well, we know what that association is. And so, the other thing you look at in these other judicial races on the Supreme Court, all the black justices of the Supreme Court were first appointed. No Justice has been elected first. There comes -- something comes with incumbency, for example, and people might otherwise vote for Supreme Court justices who have been there for a period of time.

And, you know, there's -- if an election is started with two new candidates, one black and one white, it may not end in that same result with the black candidate having won. Reuben Anderson was first appointed, Justice Fred Banks was first appointed, and so was Justice James Graves.

Each one of them brought incumbency into their first election. And that, I think, sort of begs the question of whether or not whites will vote for black candidates. And also, there is a commitment among, as quiet as it kept, the business community and otherwise.

Some people sort of stay out of those races, because I do believe that Mississippi does not want to give the image that it's reverting back to an all white Supreme Court, an all white Supreme Court. So you might not see as much effort to de-elect or de-select the black incumbent in those circumstances.

The Court of Appeals in the Mississippi Supreme Court, initially that is a new creature. It is about -- it is less than 15-years-old, and when there was an opportunity to carve out or to create the new Supreme Court, the -- excuse me, the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court initially went to a magistrate system first, a three judge magistrate system.

And I do believe those three judges back in the 1990-9were appointed by the Supreme Court to serve in that gap filling capacity, and those were three white males who served as the magistrates prior to the formation of the Court of Appeals.

I also bring to you some practical experience as and some antidotal stuff. I served as co-counsel with Rob McDuff on at least a couple of cases. One of which is the case of Johnny Johnson up in Drew, Mississippi. Drew, for those who don't know, is in the area with Fannie Lou Hamer comes from. But Drew being a city that's probably about 80 percent African-American have never had a majority black city council.

Johnnie Johnson ran for alderman at large. Her race, several of her votes were thrown out, and we mounted an election contest, and eventually we challenged some of the votes that the other side received. But more interestingly, we got votes counted that had been rejected by the local commission. The end result was it ended in a tie after the trial. It ended in a tie, so the judge ordered a new election.

The most striking thing for me having grown up in the '70s and '80s was to bring forth black women who obviously still worked. Some of whom still worked for many people in power in Drew and Sunflower County, to come forth during the trial and testify, I cast my vote, and I intended for my vote to count, because the election commission had actually thrown out some of their votes because you did not have signatures and because you did not have -- well, because you did not have initials.

Those people cast their votes, came to the voting polls, did everything that they were supposed to do, so why should their vote have been rejected because a person in power or a person in control did not do what he or she was supposed to do, i.e., initial the ballot?

They had done everything else. They'd signed their ballot, they gave it to them, they put it in their control. It should have been counted. Eventually, after the new election, Johnny Johnson became the alderman at large, and the City of Drew had its first African-American predominant city councilman.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Mr. Reeves, at this point I have to tell you that we've got ten minutes before we have to leave, and if you can wrap it up and go on to Mr. Gyot I'd appreciate it.

MR. REEVES: Okay. The final case is the Michael Cathey case up in Senatobia, Mississippi. Michael Cathey was the only black African-American on the city council there, and there was a movement among the other members of the city council to have him removed from the board and claimed that he had moved outside of his district. Obviously, a challenge had to come on that, and we prevailed for Mr. Cathey, and he still serves.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you very much. I'm sorry to push you here, but we're just running out of time. Mr. Gyot.

MR. GYOT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am Lawrence Gyot. I'm a citizen of the State of Mississippi and a resident of the District of Columbia, citizenship by affirmation. I know of no greater state who has fought. Mississippi is why the Voting Rights Act exists. We attempted to bring the federal government into the voting question in the case of United States versus Woods in 1962.

We then got them committed to the United States versus Mississippi, which incidentally challenged the legitimacy and the constitutionality of all the voting laws in the State of Mississippi. At the same time, the State of Mississippi was attacked by the Mississippi Democratic party under Section of the 14th Amendment challenging the constitutionality of the seating of the Congressional Delegation of the State of Mississippi.

To his credit, Congressman McMullough, a Republican from Ohio, said this when the challenge was considered: We have a choice. We can unseat the Mississippi delegation, or we can strengthen the Voting Rights Act. That's how Section 5 came into existence. Let us understand that the fight to create Section 5, the fight to utilize it, Allen versus The Board of Elections was my idea, and Armand Derfner helped implement it.

We filed the suit here. So let's be very clear. The whole -- and, Mr. Rogers, I'm glad you asked the question that you asked. I want to quote a couple of people to you. Mr. Wilkins, the head of NAACP and the documentary eyes on the price said Mississippi is such a (inaudible) state, committed to savagery, that it should be cut off and allowed to drift into the sea. Lyndon Johnson said, there's America, there's the South, and there's Mississippi. The uniqueness of Mississippi is its total commitment. See, the reason I'm so proud to be a Mississippian is in Mississippi, throughout its history, everything has been political. Whether you got pavement, whether you were in jail, whatever you wanted was framed -- that could be framed in a political lexicon was deliverable here.

So this State has been challenged on the Fannie Lou Hamer and others joined with the Mississippi Democratic party. We challenged the seating of the regular Democratic party at the National Democratic Convention. Now, various people give various reasons for the passage of the Voting Rights Act. Mary King in her book, "Freedom Song," said it was a congressional challenge that passed the Voting Rights Act.

John Lewis -- we all know who they are -- said that it was a summer project. Julian Bond says it was a combination of the two. But there's -- I'd like to refer you to the galleys of the book now being written called "Authors of the Liberation of the Mississippi Freedom Democrats and the Redefinition of Politics." It's written by --

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Who's the author of this.

MR. GYOT: By Michael Paul Sistrom.

MR. ROGERS: Who was that?

MR. GYOT: The author. I'm sorry, hold on. Yes, "Authors of the Liberation of the Mississippi Freedom Democrats and the Redefinition of Politics" by Mike Paul Sistrom. He says, since 1965, the consensus has been to incorrectly give the Selma march (sic) sole credit in prompting Congress to pass the Voting Rights Act, while taking almost no notice of the contribution of the 1964 Freedom Summit and the Mississippi Freedom Democratic congressional challenge.

Historian David Garros (sic) observed that scholars have suggested, often with decrepitation, that had it not been for Selma, there would have been no initiative on voting rights in 1965. Such an account, Garros concludes, is not implausible, but when the actual evidence weighed, it is clearly incorrect.

Now, let us be clear. In my opinion, Lyndon Johnson could have given this speech. He could have said, I'm supporting the passing of the Voting Right Acts because of the State of Mississippi that has fought for years, that has been the most oppressed. I fought the Klan. The Klan burned torches in 6of 8counties in Mississippi in 1964 when the Selma project was announced. Selma project brought America to Mississippi.

Lyndon Johnson could have given credit to Mississippi, but he had a problem, because in '64, who did we have to fight in Atlantic City? Lyndon Johnson. Read "Judgement Days" by Nick Kotz. He documents the relationship between Martin Luther King and Lyndon Baines Johnson. He talks about the need for Lyndon to stop us in '64. Why? Because he thought he would lose the white vote himself. Preposterous, but that was Lyndon.

Now, my concern is if you -- and I want to point out. You've heard from two -- you've heard Neshoba County and you've heard McComb. I want to make it very clear: I don't contradict. I don't dilute in any way the testimony of all previous witnesses, because I think it's been excellent.

But I want to say to you, there's a coalition in Neshoba County of blacks, whites, and they did a couple of things. They said we're going to reopen the Schwerner, Chaney, and Goodman convictions, and that led to the conviction of Mr. Killen. They said more than that. Said we're going to change the name of the highway to Schwerner, Chaney, and Goodman Highway.

They brought it to the State Legislature. Not one member voted against it. I'm saying in McComb, this book is the foundation for education, in Neshoba County and in McComb. This book is created by us. It's called putting the movement back into civil rights teaching, which demonstrates how to teach the civil rights movement from K through 1 with all of the myths removed.

So let me say this, it is -- William Winter and I were on a panel in Minnesota, and we were talking Mondell's roll in Atlantic City, and William Winter said it was a civil rights movement in Mississippi that freed me and other white people. Now, all of you know William Winter is the former governor and a member of President Clinton's commission on race. Let me say that there is a possibility of racial reproach tomorrow in Mississippi, but it will only remain a possibility as long as Section 5 exists. I don't want you to leave, Mr. Rogers, with the feeling that there is no racial possibilities of reproach anymore in Mississippi, but they only exist because of the political nightmare created by Voting Rights Act.

And if you remove Section 5, the day you remove -- Section 5 is weakened or removed, we will have a return that will make savages shudder, because the fight in Mississippi is about raw political power. But I wanted to say to you, if the collision in Neshoba County can come out openly on the question of race, I think they're leading the country on the question of race. If McComb can say this is going to be the foundation for the educational system, I think what we've hit up on is that education might be the antidote around -- the solvent around which we can all galvanize, because I can say to you confidentially, young white Mississippians are no better educated than young black Mississippians.

And unless this country can deal with the question of race, and I think this is an opportunity. I think it is in the national interest to see that Section 5 is passed, that it's intact, because until we solve the question of racial in American, not only do I support the testimony of everyone here, but it could be universal in this application.

We're becoming a country that is more racially polarized, and there are very few people who are prepared to speak out on it. So this is about race, it's about fairness, it's about the most successful legislation ever designed by the Congress. And it is in the national interest to preserve, protect and correct it.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: What a note to end these hearings on, folks.

(APPLAUSE.)

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: I want to thank each of you for your testimony. It's moving. I have a hard time controlling my own emotions, but thank you.

MR. GYOT: Mr. Chairman, I want to do one thing. I want to enter this testimony by Meredith Bell Flats in your record. It's the best I've heard on why Section 5 should be continued.

HONORABLE BANKS: Just one question to Mr. Reeves, because he's contrasted the race between Attorney General Hood and his opponents, and Mr. Anderson and his opponents. He said it wasn't about experience. I think the statement was it wasn't about experience, it was about party. And the contrast there does belie that claim in that Attorney General Hood was experienced as a former Assistant Attorney General and a District Attorney, and he was a Democrat, and he won over.

And the candidate Anderson was experienced in governmental financial affairs, and he was a Democrat, and he lost pretty clearly to a person that was clearly less qualified than him. So it could not have been his party. Is that what you --

MR. REEVES: Thank you, Justice Banks, for that clarification. That is absolutely what I was referring to.

CHAIRMAN DAVIDSON: Thank you very much.
(Hearing concluded at 12:30 p.m.)

Documenting Discrimination in Voting: Judicial Findings Under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act Since 1982

Final Report of the Voting Rights Initiative
University of Michigan Law School

Ellen Katz

with Margaret Aisenbrey, Anna Baldwin, Emma Cheuse, and Anna Weisbrodt

November 10, 2005

The University of Michigan Law School
Ann Arbor, Michigan

Citations to this report:
Ellen Katz et. al., Documenting Discrimination in Voting: Judicial Findings Under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act Since 1982, www.votingreport.org

Citations to the data contained in the VRI database:
Ellen Katz and the Voting Rights Initiative, Voting Rights Initiative Database, www.votingreport.org

Endnotes to this report are available at www.votingreport.org.

FACULTY DIRECTOR: Ellen Katz

LEAD STUDENT DIRECTOR: Emma Cheuse

TECHNICAL DIRECTOR: David Geerdes

REPORT CONTRIBUTORS: Margaret Aisenbrey, Anna Baldwin, Krista Caner, Emma Cheuse, Kyle Faget, Joel Flaxman, Alaina Fotiu-Wojtowicz, Adam Gitlin, Dana Kaersvang, Elizabeth Liebschutz, Daniel Pearlberg, Liz Ryan, Jeremy Suhr, Rachel Warnick, Anna Weisbrodt, Sarah Wohlford

DATABASE EDITORS: Krista Caner, David Jones, Anna Weisbrodt

DATABASE RESEARCH DIRECTORS: Anna Baldwin, Kristen Boike, Sarah Bookbinder, Jennifer Carter, Natalia Cortez, Rachel Dobkin, Bernard Eskandari, Alaina Fotiu-Wojtowicz, Akilah Green, Sonah Lee, Benjamin Potter, Jeremy Schwartz, Rebecca Teitelbaum, Rebecca Torres McNeill, Laura Yockey

RESEARCHERS: Bethany Ace, Margaret Aisenbrey, Lara Anthony, Sosun Bae, Adam Blumenkrantz, Kristen Boike, Marisa Bono, Adrienne Brooks, Timothy Caballero, Lucas Caldwell-McMillan, Krista Caner, Ramsey Chamie, Joann Chang, Daniel DeLorenzo, Kyle Faget, Esther Farkas, Thomas Ferrone, Joel Flaxman, Alaina Fotiu-Wojtowicz, Matthew Fox, Mitoshi Fujio-White, Amanda Garcia, Adam Gitlin, Jenna Goldenberg, Arielle Greenbaum, Kyra Hazilla, Jennifer Hill, Sarah Hinchliff, Millicent Hoffman, Neal Jagtap, David Jones, Shari Katz, Craig Komanecki, Poonam Kumar, Joseph Lake, Jeffrey Landau, Grace Lee, Michael Lee, Julianna Lee, Elizabeth Liebschutz, Zachariah Lindsey, Alexandra Magill, Melissa Manning, Megan Mardy, Vannesa Martinez, Kerry-Ann McLean, Mary Mock, Jaime Olin, David Osei, Daniel Pearlberg, Amanda Pedvin, Amanda Perwin, Benjamin Potter, Jennifer Reid, Eunice Rho, Elizabeth Richards, Abby Rubinson, Elizabeth Rucker, Elizabeth Ryan, David Sack, Monica Saxena, Elizabeth Seger, Maneesh Sharma, Karen Shen, Elizabeth Simson, Mia Solvesson, Jessica Stoddard, Jeremy Suhr, Daniel Tenny, Cathy Tran, Genevieve Vose, Kyle Walther, Thomas Ward, Rachel Warnick, Anna Weisbrodt, Jamie Weitzel, Larissa Werhnyak, Cyrus Wilkes, Sarah Wohlford, Joe Wright

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE: Thomas Ferrone, Nicholas George, Adam Gitlin, Naomi Goldberg, Christopher Kirkwood-Watts, Shelley Merkin, Molly Moser, Katherine Redman, Taylor Rielly, Amethyst Smith, Susan West

Contents

Introduction

This year marks the fortieth anniversary of one of the most remarkable and consequential pieces of congressional legislation ever enacted. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 ("the VRA") targeted massive disenfranchisement of African-American citizens in numerous Southern states. It imposed measures drastic in scope and extraordinary in effect. The VRA eliminated the use of literacy tests and other "devices" that Southern jurisdictions had long employed to prevent black residents from registering and voting.[1] The VRA imposed on these jurisdictions onerous obligations to prove to federal officials that proposed changes to their electoral system would not discriminate against minority voters.[2]

Resistance was immediate both in the streets and in the courts, but the VRA withstood the challenge.[3] The result was staggering. The VRA ended the long-entrenched and virtually total exclusion of African Americans from political participation in the South. Black voter registration rose and black participation followed such that, by the early 1970s, courts routinely observed that black voters throughout the South were registering and voting without interference. That increased participation exposed less blatant inequalities and problems-complex issues such as racial vote dilution, the contours of which courts are still tackling today.

These persistent problems have led Congress to extend and expand the VRA each time its non-permanent provisions were due to expire. The ban on literacy tests, as well as the "preclearance" provisions contained in Section 5, initially were enacted to last for only five years. Nonetheless, Congress decided to extend these provisions in 1970, again in 1975, and for twenty-five more years in 1982. During the last renewal, Congress also expanded the terms of the core permanent provision of the Voting Rights Act-Section 2.

Four decades after their original enactment, the non-permanent provisions of the VRA are once again set to expire.[4] Congress must once again determine whether it should renew these provisions, make substantive alterations to them, or simply let them lapse. To make this determination, Congress needs information about the past and present status of minority participation in the political process.

The Voting Rights Initiative ("VRI") at the University of Michigan Law School was created during the winter of 2005 to help address this need and to help inform the nationwide discussion on voting rights now under way. A cooperative research venture involving 100 students working under faculty direction set out to produce a detailed portrait of litigation brought since 1982 under the core permanent provision of the Voting Rights Act. This Report evaluates the results of this survey. The comprehensive data set may be found in an analytically structured as well as searchable form at http://www.votingreport.org. The aim of this report, the accompanying website, and the project as a whole is to contribute to a critical understanding of current opportunities for effective political participation on the part of those minorities the Voting Rights Act seeks to protect.

The Project: Background, Goals, and Methods

STATUTORY BACKGROUND

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 was enacted in response to the continued, massive, and unconstitutional exclusion of African Americans from the franchise. Despite the ratification in 1870 of the Fifteenth Amendment, which prohibits denying or abridging the right to vote on the basis of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, state voting officials continued to devise mechanisms to exclude African-Americans from the franchise.[5] Judicial invalidation of one such practice prompted the creation of another to achieve the same result. Moving from outright violence to explicit race-based exclusions to "grandfather clauses," literacy tests, and redistricting practices, many former Confederate states (and several others) successfully prevented African-Americans from participating in elections for nearly a century.[6]

Prompted by several notorious attacks on civil rights activists and recognition of the scope of African-American disenfranchisement, Congress and the President acted to remedy the ineffectiveness of existing anti-discrimination provisions in 1965. The statute they created would both reaffirm the basic constitutional prohibition against race-based exclusions from the franchise and make those constitutional prohibitions effective.

The central provision of the Voting Rights Act is Section 2, which, as originally enacted, closely tracked the wording of the Fifteenth Amendment.[7] To this Congress added Section 4, which suspended the use of particular exclusionary practices, and Section 5, which demanded that jurisdictions with extremely low levels of voter registration and turnout seek "preclearance" from federal officials before implementing any changes to their voting laws and procedures.[8] The non-permanent provisions of the Voting Rights Act, including Section 5, were extended in 1970, 1975, and 1982, and are due for re-authorization in 2007.

Congress enacted the current version of Section 2 when it amended the statute in the course of reauthorizing the nonpermanent provisions in 1982. The amendment was a response to the Supreme Court's interpretation of the VRA in a case brought by African-American residents in Mobile, Alabama.

By the summer of 1975, black citizens in Mobile were registering and voting without hindrance, a feat that would have seemed impossible a decade earlier. And yet, ten years after passage of the Voting Rights Act, black residents in Mobile noticed that their participation seemed to be making little difference to the substance and structure of local governance. At the time, African Americans comprised approximately one third of the city's population, white and black voters consistently supported different candidates, and no African-American candidate had ever won a seat on the three-person city commission. Housing remained segregated, black city employees were concentrated in the lowest city salary classification, and "a significant difference and sluggishness" characterized the City's provision of city services to black residents when compared to that provided to whites.[9] Since 1911, Mobile had chosen its commissioners in city-wide at-large elections.

In June of 1975, African-American residents in Mobile filed a class action lawsuit challenging the city's at-large electoral system. Two lower federal courts held that this system unconstitutionally diluted black voting strength.[10]

In 1980, the Supreme Court reversed. In City of Mobile v. Bolden,[11] the Court held that neither the Constitution nor Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act prohibited electoral practices simply because they produced racially discriminatory results. The Court determined that these provisions proscribed only those rules or practices enacted with racially invidious intent. Mobile's at-large system remained permissible unless the plaintiffs could demonstrate that the city adopted the at-large system for the purpose of diluting black voting strength.[12]

In 1982, Congress responded to Mobile by amending Section 2 to create an explicit "results"-based test for discrimination in voting. As a result, Section 2 provides today:

> No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or [on account of statutorily designated language minority status].[13]

Determining whether a particular electoral rule results in a denial or abridgment of the right to vote is a complex inquiry. The statute indicates that to prevail under Section 2, plaintiffs must demonstrate that, "based on the totality of circumstances...the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a [racial or language minority]." Plaintiffs must show that members of these protected classes "have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." Relevant to the inquiry is "the extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State or political subdivision," although the statute is explicit that it creates no right to proportional representation.[14]

The Senate Judiciary Committee issued a report to accompany the 1982 amendment to Section 2, now known as the Senate Report.[15] The Supreme Court has since described this report as "the authoritative source" on the meaning of the amended statute.[16] The Report identified several factors, now known as "the Senate Factors," for courts to use when assessing whether a particular practice or procedure results in prohibited discrimination, in violation of Section 2. Derived from the Supreme Court's analysis in White v. Regester,[17] and the Fifth Circuit's subsequent decision in Zimmer v. McKeithen,[18] these "typical" factors are:

> 1. The extent of any history of official discrimination in the state or political subdivision that touched the right of the members of the minority group to register, to vote, or otherwise to participate in the democratic process;
>
> 2. The extent to which voting in the elections of the state or political subdivision is racially polarized;
>
> 3. The extent to which the state or political subdivision has used unusually large election districts, majority vote requirements, anti-single shot provisions, or other voting practices or procedures that may enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority group;
>
> 4. If there is a candidate slating process, whether members of the minority group have been denied access to that process;

> 5. The extent to which members of the minority group in the state or political subdivision bear the effects of discrimination in such areas as education, employment and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process;
>
> 6. Whether political campaigns have been characterized by overt or subtle racial appeals;
>
> 7. The extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction.[19]

The Senate Report also identified two additional factors that have "probative value" in establishing a plaintiff's claim under the amended statute, often considered Senate Factors 8 and 9, namely whether "there is a significant lack of responsiveness on the part of elected officials to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group"; and whether the justification for the policy behind the practice or procedure is "tenuous."[20]

The 1982 amendment to Section 2 dramatically altered voting rights litigation nationwide. While prior to 1982 plaintiffs had rarely invoked Section 2 in its original form, most plaintiffs alleging racial vote dilution since 1982 have consistently brought their claims under Section 2.[21]

In 1986, the Supreme Court issued its first major decision addressing the 1982 amendments to Section 2. In Thornburg v. Gingles, African-American voters in North Carolina challenged a state-wide legislative districting plan, seeking to replace some of the plan's multi-member districts with single-member districts in which black voters would comprise a majority. The Court used the case as a vehicle to articulate a three-part test for bringing a Section 2 claim: the minority group must demonstrate that, first, it is "sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district;" second, that it is "politically cohesive;" and, third, that "the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it—in the absence of special circumstances, such as the minority candidate running unopposed—usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate."[22] The Gingles case itself involved a challenge to multi-member districts, but courts soon extended its framework to cases where plaintiffs challenged single member districts.[23]

Eight years later, the Supreme Court decided Johnson v. De Grandy, which made clear that the Gingles' preconditions were precisely that, preconditions, and not a substitute to adjudication under the totality of circumstances test. Courts that find the preconditions met must proceed to evaluate whether under the totality of circumstances relief is warranted. De Grandy found such relief unwarranted in the case before it-a challenge to statewide districting plan brought by African-American and Latino plaintiffs. The Court concluded that plan achieved "proportionality" because "both minority groups constitute effective voting majorities in a number of state Senate districts substantially proportional to their share in the population."[24]

Two years ago, the Supreme Court handed down Georgia v. Ashcroft, in which it evaluated whether Georgia could replace several of its majority-minority districts with districts where minority voters constituted only a plurality. In concluding that nothing in Section 5 of the Act prevented Georgia from doing so, the Court relied significantly on its own precedent construing Section 2.[25] Recent Section 2 decisions now discuss Georgia v. Ashcroft when assessing challenges to various districting practices.[26]

RESEARCH OBJECTIVES

A detailed understanding of Section 2 litigation informs several issues Congress must confront as it evaluates the reauthorization of the expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act. First, the record of judicial implementation of Section 2 will inform the question whether the auxiliary provisions, such as Section 5, are still helpful today. To be sure, Section 5 is distinct from Section 2 in that compliance with Section 2 is neither necessary nor sufficient to obtain preclearance from the federal government. Nonetheless, analyzing the judicial record of Section 2 decisions-including the structured nature of the judicial inquiry under the Senate Factors-helps illuminate the extent to which meaningful minority participation in elections has been a reality in recent times. Put another way, Section 5 was originally enacted because "Congress had found that case-by-case litigation was inadequate to combat wide-spread and persistent discrimination in voting, because of the inordinate amount of time and energy required to overcome the obstructionist tactics invariably encountered in these lawsuits."[27] Even though the Voting Rights Act successfully reduced the incidence of those tactics, the persistence of many such "obstructionist tactics," as this study documents, suggests that Section 5 remains a useful tool today to protect the basic right to political participation.

Second, the record of judicial implementation of the core provisions of the VRA provides helpful evidence in determining whether the constitutional predicate necessary for Congress to exercise its legislative powers in this area exists. Recent Supreme Court decisions have demanded increased scrutiny of the connection between the perception of a constitutional evil and the remedy enacted under Congress's power to enforce the Civil War amendments. In City of Boerne v. Flores, the Supreme Court announced a rule that Congress could only invoke its legislative powers under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment where the Congressional legislation was "congruent and proportional" to "remedy or prevent" an underlying constitutional violation.[28] The same is true for the power to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment pursuant to Section 2 of that amendment.[29]

To be sure, Section 2 prohibits more than the Fifteenth Amendment itself prohibits. In particular, Section 2's "results-based" test goes beyond what the Fifteenth Amendment alone commands. As a consequence, the record of Section 2 violations does not necessarily indicate the existence of constitutional violations, and therefore does not necessarily provide the proper predicate for Congress's exercise of its enforcement powers under the Fifteenth Amendment.

And yet, an examination of Section 2 cases can provide the requisite foundation for Congress's exercise of its enforcement powers. As an initial matter, some Section 2 violations are constitutional violations.[30] These may figure directly into the calculus of whether the predicate for Congress's exercise of its enforcement powers exists. Moreover, courts assessing the Senate Factors in the course of adjudicating Section 2 cases have documented evidence that reveals a wide range of unconstitutional conduct by state and local officials in specific regions across the Nation. While these judicial findings are not formal adjudications of unconstitutional conduct, they represent the considered judgments of federal judges nationwide that the evidence they reviewed reveals conduct that runs afoul of the Constitution. These findings accordingly provide a basis on which Congress can rely in determining the scope of unconstitutional conduct and the need for a federal law that goes beyond the simple prohibition of the unconstitutional act itself.

Third, Section 2 decisions tell a powerful story about the health of minority political participation throughout the United States since 1982. And they do so in Congress's own terms—in the way Congress asked courts to assess political equality and to determine whether to issue a remedy. Any examination of Congressional policy in this area should therefore begin with how the courts have addressed minority political participation in the course of implementing the VRA.

Fourth, an examination of these decisions illustrates how both claims and remedies have changed over the years. Enacted by Congress in 1965 to address the specific problem of black disenfranchisement in the South, the Voting Rights Act has been amended to protect language minorities and today is invoked by several different minority groups to challenge a host of electoral practices throughout the country. The findings in these cases offer a lens, that Congress itself defined, through which variations in political participation over time and region may be viewed and evaluated. Finally, the re-authorization of the Voting Rights Act's non-permanent provisions provide an opportunity for Congress to give further guidance on how it believes the law as a whole should operate. Documentation of the judicial record in Section 2 cases — in particular, courts' analysis of the various Senate Factors and the judicial choice of remedies — therefore may be useful to inform Congress on how federal judges have understood the instructions contained in the VRA and whether those instructions are in need of revision.

RESEARCH PROJECT AND DESIGN

The Voting Rights Initiative is a faculty-student research collaborative established in January, 2005 at the University of Michigan Law School. Working under the direction of Professor Ellen Katz, a group of more than 100 Michigan law students set out to document the nature and scope of litigation brought under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act since 1982.

Researchers began by searching the federal court databases on Westlaw and LexisNexis to identify electronically published decisions addressing a Section 2 claim. To develop this list, researchers searched these databases for every federal court decision that cited 42 U.S.C. § 1973 since June 29, 1982, when Section 2 was amended. The resulting list was then narrowed by identifying cases in which plaintiffs had filed an actual claim under Section 2, and removing all decisions that merely reference Section 2 without involving a claim brought under that provision.[31]

Researchers then located on these databases all related decisions and organized them by lawsuit with a single "litigation" title for quick reference.[32] Within each lawsuit, researchers determined which opinion provided the "final word"[33] for the purposes of this project, since many lawsuits included multiple appeals and remands. The final word case in each lawsuit is usually the last case in the lawsuit that assessed liability on the merits and determined whether Section 2 was violated. If there was no such case to analyze, researchers coded as the final word the last published case in the lawsuit making some other determination for or against the plaintiff, including whether to issue a preliminary injunction, whether to order a settlement, what remedy to order, and whether to grant fees.[34] In these latter cases, the contours of the underlying Section 2 claim group and the court's analysis of it were often difficult to discern as the reported decision was addressing a distinct question. Still, these cases, especially preliminary injunction cases, sometimes included reference to some Senate Factors or other substantive Section 2 criteria, and where possible researchers documented these findings. Even where nothing more than the fact of decision could be discerned from these decisions, researchers included the lawsuit in the overall list of lawsuits to attempt to give as broad a picture as possible of Section 2 litigation.

Researchers reviewed each case within a litigation string and followed a standard checklist (see Data Key located at www.votingreport.org) to catalogue the information discussed and determine the outcome in each lawsuit analyzed. Researchers recorded which of the nine Senate Factors, if any, the reviewing court found to exist, and whether the court ultimately found a violation of Section 2. Researchers also tracked how courts have treated the so-called "Gingles" threshold test (set forth by the Supreme Court in its 1986 opinion Thornburg v. Gingles[35]), the law or practice challenged in each lawsuit, the implicated governing body, the state of origin, the minority groups bringing the claim, the involvement of expert witnesses, and other basic case data such as the judges and lawyers involved with the case.

Each case was read and catalogued by multiple researchers working independently — then by research directors and then checked for consistency by editors. The case reports are available at: http://www.votingrights.org.

Since the completion of the case reports, searches have been designed and the database used to document and analyze the particular findings in this report. All of case reports and searches to access this data are available at www.votingrights.org. This site includes lists of cases, organized by lawsuit and by state, that: identify a violation of Section 2; identify such violations in covered jurisdictions; find each of the Senate Factors; challenge specific types of electoral practices; challenge certain governing bodies; and involve particular minority groups.

The Findings: Documenting Discrimination

OVERALL RESULTS

The Numbers

This study identified 323 lawsuits, encompassing 748 decisions that addressed Section 2 claims since 1982.[36] These lawsuits, of course, represent only a portion of the Section 2 claims filed or decided since 1982. Of the total number of cases filed, some plaintiffs failed to pursue their claims, many settled, and others saw their cases go to judgment, but the courts involved did not issue any published opinion or ancillary ruling published on the electronic databases surveyed (i.e., Westlaw, LexisNexis). The total number of claims filed under Section 2 since the statute was amended is accordingly not known.

The ACLU has recorded that approximately 1 out of 5 of their plaintiffs' Section 2 cases filed in Georgia and in South Carolina ended with a reported decision.[37] In Texas, the Section 2 litigation record of attorney Rolando Rios shows that 8 of 211 or 3.8% of his law firm's filed Section 2 lawsuits ending with a reported decision.[38] Insofar as these ratios of filings to reported decisions are at all representative, this study's compilation of 323 lawsuits suggests more than 1600 Section 2 filings nationwide with filings in covered jurisdictions possibly exceeding 800 filings.

Of these lawsuits, 208 produced at least one published liability decision under Section 2. The remaining 115 include lawsuits in which the only decisions published on Westlaw or LexisNexis addressed preliminary matters (74 decisions) or fees, remedy, or settlement issues (41 decisions).[39] Of the 208 lawsuits that ended with a determination of liability, 97 (46.6%) originated in jurisdictions covered by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, and 111 (53.4%) were filed in non-covered jurisdictions.[40]

Of lawsuits identified, 86 documented a violation of Section 2 — either on the merits or in the course of another favorable determination for the plaintiff. Another 28 lawsuits made a favorable determination for the plaintiff (such as issuing a preliminary injunction, granting a settlement, awarding fees, or crafting a remedy) without deciding whether Section 2 was actually violated. Plaintiffs accordingly succeeded in 35.3% of the lawsuits identified in this study.[41]

Plaintiffs won more Section 2 lawsuits in Section 5-covered jurisdictions than they did in non-covered jurisdictions. Of the 114 successful plaintiff outcomes documented, 64 originated in covered jurisdictions and 50 elsewhere,[42] even though less than one-quarter of the U.S. population resides in a jurisdiction covered by Section 5.[43] Plaintiffs in covered jurisdictions also won a higher percentage of the cases decided than did those in non-covered ones. Thirty percent of the 164 lawsuits published in non-covered jurisdictions ended favorably for plaintiffs, while 40.5% of the 158 lawsuits from covered jurisdictions produced a result favorable to the plaintiffs.
Courts identified violations of Section 2 more frequently between 1982 and 1992, than in the years since. Of the 86 total violations identified, courts found 61.6% of them during the first period, 38.4% since then.[44]

In all, 138 of the 323 total lawsuits challenged at-large districts, and of these, 52 held the practice to violate Section 2.[45] In addition, 8 lawsuits challenging at-large election systems otherwise ended with a favorable outcome for the plaintiff (such as a settlement, remedy or fees case if not a published violation finding). A total of 106 lawsuits challenged reapportionment, i.e., multiple district plans. Of those, 42 ended with a favorable outcome for the plaintiffs (of which 30 found a violation of Section 2). Thirty challenged election procedures (e.g. voter registration or residency requirements, polling place action by election officials), and 13 of these ended with a favorable outcome for the plaintiff (including 7 violations found). Eleven lawsuits challenged majority-vote requirements, such as a run-off requirement, anti-single shot provisions, or numbered-place system.[46] Six of these held the practice to violate Section 2; with no other favorable outcomes reported.[47] Thirty-two challenges addressed annexations, felon disfranchisement provisions, and appointment practices and none of these ended with a favorable outcome for the plaintiff. In some lawsuits, plaintiffs challenged multiple electoral practices.

The nature of Section 2 litigation has changed during the past twenty-three years. There were 142 lawsuits that ended during the first decade after the 1982 Amendments, the most common among those lawsuits were challenges to at-large elections (76 or 53.5%). Since 1992, there have been 181 lawsuits with published opinions. Of these lawsuits, 65 (35.9%) challenged at-large elections, and 67 (36.8%) challenged reapportionment plans with multiple, single-member districts.
African-American plaintiffs have brought the vast number of claims (250) under Section 2 since 1982, with an increasing number of cases involving Latino (91), Native American (12) and Asian American (8) plaintiffs. African-American plaintiffs remain most likely to win, and were plaintiffs in 96 (84.9%) of the successful decisions (and 74 of the violations) overall, and 47 (81.6%) of the 59 total successes for plaintiffs since 1990. Of all successful lawsuits, 12 involved multiple minority group plaintiffs[48] — including only African Americans and Latinos. In addition, Latino plaintiffs won 7 lawsuits independently. Native American plaintiffs won an additional 5 published lawsuits. Sixty-six lawsuits identified the remedy granted for a Section 2 violation. Of these, 25 (38%) replaced an at-large system with a single district system;[49] 27 (40.9%) ordered new multi-district lines to be drawn; [50] 15 (22.7%) ordered something else, such as changes to election administration procedures,[51] changes to the actual outcome of an election,[52] or affirmative steps (such as targeted community voter registration and education) to encourage minority political participation.[53]

In several lawsuits, courts addressed the constitutionality of Section 2 and all upheld that statute.[54]

The Trends

The Persistence of Discrimination

Four decades after the enactment of the Voting Rights Act, racial discrimination in voting is far from over. Federal judges adjudicating Section 2 cases over the last twenty-three years have documented an extensive record of conduct by state and local officials that they have deemed racially discriminatory and intentionally so. Judicial findings under the various factors set forth in the Senate Report reveal determined, systematic, and recent efforts to minimize minority voting strength.

Examples abound.[55] Last year's decision in the Bone Shirt litigation documents how county officials in South Dakota have purposely blocked Native Americans from registering to vote and from casting ballots. The Charleston County, South Carolina litigation reveals deliberate and systematic efforts by county officials to harass and intimidate African-American residents seeking to vote. The North Johns litigation in Alabama describes the town mayor's refusal to provide African-American candidates registration forms required by state law. The Harris litigation in Alabama tells of Jefferson County's refusal to hire black poll workers for white precincts — and the blind eye state government turned to the voting discrimination perpetuated at local polls. A Philadelphia lawsuit describes a deliberate and collusive effort by party officials and city election commissioners to trick Latino voters into casting illegitimate absentee ballots that would never be counted. The Town of Cicero litigation categorizes an 18-month residency requirement deliberately designed to stymie Hispanic candidacies. A dozen more cases tell of state and local authorities drawing district lines for the express purpose of diminishing the influence of minority voters, or to protect partisan interests knowing that doing so will hinder minority voting strength.

Section 2 lawsuits also catalogue formal and informal slating procedures implemented by party officials and private associations that function to deny minority candidates meaningful access to the ballot — from the local Democratic party in Albany, NY, the Republican party in Hempstead, NY, informal groups in Texas and Louisiana, to the state-funded firefighters on the Eastern Shore of Maryland.[56] Federal judges further have identified a host of campaign tactics nationwide designed to appeal to base racial prejudice, tactics that include manipulating photographs to darken the skin of opposing candidates, allusions or threats of minority group "take over," or imminent racial strife, and cynical attempts to increase turnout among voters perceived to be "anti-black."[57]

Courts have also documented some instances of suspicious or "tenuous" policies guiding jurisdictions' intentions — as when the legislature in Alabama removed the only majority-minority district from its reapportionment plan after the governor threatened a veto.[58] Courts also carefully considered the ways in which local and state governments responded to minority needs — noting, for example, a Colorado school board's refusal to provide requested bilingual and Native American educational programs in order to keep the curriculum "ethnically clean."[59]

The Power of Partisanship

Courts adjudicating Section 2 claims must confront the significance of the tight linkage between race and party in many parts of this county. This issue has taken on greater importance with the emergence of the Republican Party as a vibrant and influential force in the Southern United States, a development that complicates claims of racial vote dilution, as traditionally alleged. Courts must now assess how partisan affiliation affects minority electoral success and the legal significance to accord to that relationship.

Courts adjudicating Section 2 lawsuits confront this issue at numerous junctures, but do so most prominently when assessing racial bloc voting. The LULAC v. Clements litigation famously declared that Section 2 is "implicated only where Democrats lose because they are black, not where blacks lose because they are Democrats."[60] The majority of courts today will examine the claim that party, rather than race, causes minority electoral defeats. Many Section 2 plaintiffs falter on this requirement, particularly as numerous Section 2 lawsuits document the increasing willingness of white Democrats to support minority-preferred candidates in the general election.

Concerned that party affiliation masks instances of racial discrimination among voters, some courts are looking more frequently to the primary elections as a gauge of minority political opportunity. A host of recent Section 2 lawsuits document that significant racial polarization in voting remains prevalent at this juncture of the electoral process, notwithstanding the willingness of voters, minority and nonminority alike, to support the party nominee in the general election. With the proliferation of noncompetitive districts in the United States, the primary now forms the critical locus for political participation today such that the racial composition of the primary electorate is often critical to minority electoral opportunity than is the composition of the district as a whole.

Emphasis on the centrality of party as an organizing principle in American politics may also obscure the ways in which partisan conduct itslef may diminish opportunities for minority political participation. State-mandated white primaries are long gone, but party officials, acting formally or ad hoc, continue to implement slating procedures that stymie minority candidacies. Some lawsuits document what might aptly be labeled backstabbing by party officials who omit minority candidates from party campaign literature or otherwise fail to support their party's minority candidates. Numerous courts now label the knowing sacrifice of minority interests to the quest for partisan gain a form of intentional race discrimination.[61]

THE GINGLES THRESHOLD

The Supreme Court's 1986 decision Thornburg v. Gingles distilled three "preconditions" from the totality of the circumstances test that Section 2 requires. Satisfaction of these conditions does not establish a Section 2 violation, but failure to meet them almost always brings a plaintiff's case to an end.

Since the Court decided Gingles, 163 lawsuits addressed its preconditions, and 64 lawsuits found them to be satisfied.[62] Most (52) of these suits proceeded to a favorable outcome for the plaintiff. In many of these cases, courts have engaged in only a perfunctory review of the Senate Factors. Since Johnson v. De Grandy, moreover, a number have restricted their inquiry to assessing whether the challenged practice achieved "proportionality," and finding a Section 2 violation only if it did not.[63]

In 99 lawsuits, courts held that plaintiffs failed to establish one or more of the Gingles factors.[64] A few of these courts nevertheless proceeded to evaluate plaintiffs' claims under the totality of the circumstances, typically finding that plaintiffs lose under this test as well.[65] In a few cases, courts have analyzed claims under the totality of circumstances without engaging in review under Gingles at all.[66]

Since Gingles, only 7 cases have identified a violation of Section 2 without addressing the Gingles factors.[67] Some courts acknowledge that the Gingles factors may "foreclose a meritorious claim," but find that they serve a useful gate-keeping function because "in general they will ensure that violations for which an effective remedy exists will be considered while appropriately closing the courthouse to marginal cases."[68]

Plaintiffs crossing the Gingles threshold are more likely to prevail in covered jurisdictions than in non-covered ones. Twenty-seven lawsuits originating in covered jurisdictions found the Gingles factors, and, of these, 24 (88.8%) also held Section 2 to be violated.[69] In non-covered jurisdictions, 37 lawsuits found all three Gingles factors, of which 26 (70.2%) found a violation.[70]

Gingles I: Sufficiently Large and Geographically Compact

Sufficiently Large

The first component of the Gingles test requires a minority group to demonstrate that it is "sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single member district." Courts addressing Gingles I have generally engaged in two inquiries: (1) assessing when the minority population is "sufficiently large," and (2) determining whether a proposed district encompassing that population is "geographically compact."[71]

Discussion of the "sufficiently large" prong has focused primarily on the size of the population needed to establish a majority in a single member district. Most courts define the relevant majority to be the voting age population, reasoning that absent a majority among voters, the minority group will not be an effective majority.[72] Where, however, the minority group contains a large proportion of non-citizens, some courts have required that plaintiffs demonstrate the feasibility of creating a district in which the group constitutes a majority of the citizen voting age population.[73] Finally, a few courts rely on the overall minority population when assessing Gingles I.[74]

Lower rates of voter registration and turnout in some minority communities have led some courts to require that minority voters (or the minority population overall) constitute more than simply a majority, but in fact a supermajority. Some courts have suggested that population percentages as high as 65% are needed to constitute an effective majority.[75] Others, however, expressly reject an assessment of likely turnout among minority voters when assessing the size of an effective majority under Gingles.[76]

Several lawsuits involved claims brought by more than one minority group. These plaintiffs argued that, if members of the two (or more) groups were placed together in a single district, they would constitute an effective majority within the meaning of Gingles I. The vast majority of courts view this type of claim as cognizable under the statute, so long as the groups can demonstrate political cohesiveness under the second Gingles factor,[77] a requirement on which many aggregation claims falter.[78]

Influence Districts: In an increasing number of lawsuits, plaintiffs are raising Section 2 claims on behalf of minority groups too small in number to constitute a majority in a single-member district. Typically, these plaintiffs take issue with district lines that divide the minority group members among several districts, and argue that the challenged districting plans hinder their ability either (1) to elect representatives of choice by forming coalitions with other voters ("coalition districts"), or (2) more amorphously, to influence elections ("influence districts").[79]

Some courts reject the notion of influence entirely.[80] These courts express concern that allowing influence claims will eviscerate the gate-keeping function performed by Gingles I and open federal courts to inundation by "marginal" Section 2 claims.[81] As such, no plaintiffs have succeeded on an influence claim absent an indication that they would have the ability to elect candidates of choice. Courts have shown more openness to coalition claims, but still cite two key problems. For some, the cross-over votes that define coalition districts suggest that voting is not polarized, and thus present an obstacle for plaintiffs trying to establish white bloc voting under Gingles III.[82] Other courts require assurance that minority-preferred candidates will prevail, something they maintain a coalition district cannot provide. These courts thus conclude that plaintiffs suffer no injury when a jurisdiction fails to include a sufficient number of minority voters to give rise to a coalition district.[83]

In recent years, courts have been increasingly receptive to the viability of coalition districts.[84] In the Armour litigation, for example, the appellate court suggested that African-American voters in a 36% black district might be able to elect their preferred candidate, given that Democratic primaries in the region typically determined the winner in the general election, and at least some white voters were willing to support the black-preferred candidate.[85] In this circumstance, the court held, the jurisdiction's decision to split the black community between two districts might violate Section 2.[86]

Employing similar reasoning, the Page litigation rejected a Section 2 challenge to New Jersey's decision to replace several majority-minority districts with districts in which African-American voters constituted a mere plurality.[87] The court noted that support from Latino and white voters meant that black-preferred candidates could win elections in districts where the African-American population was less than fifty percent.[88] In this circumstance, the state's decision not to create majority-black districts, even though such districts were feasible, did not violate Section 2.[89]

In the Martinez v. Bush litigation,[90] black plaintiffs challenged a redistricting plan that replaced majority-minority districts with districts in which the black voting age population was less than fifty percent. Plaintiffs argued that, as a result of the change, they were no longer assured that their preferred candidate would win in the affected districts. The court held, however, that because blacks were the majority of Democrats, and Democrats were the majority of the district, blacks were likely to elect their candidate of choice even when comprising only 41.8% of the voting age population. The district court deemed Gingles I satisfied, arguing that the Gingles I "majority" requirement should not be interpreted literally,[91] but rather that it defines any situation where the district is likely to result in the election of minority candidates of choice in most elections.[92]

The courts in Armour, Page, and Martinez all recognized that in safe Democratic districts, the Democratic primary dictates the outcome of the general election such that the racial composition of the primary electorate is a more probative gauge of minority voting strength than is the racial composition of the general electorate. Minority voters in safe Democratic districts need not constitute a majority of the district's electorate to elect candidates of choice, particularly when they represent a majority of voters eligible to participate in the primary. Such majority-minority primaries yield results much like majority-minority districts, but do so with fewer minority voters overall. The efficacy of the majority-minority primary in this regard suggests a Section 2 claim might lie where jurisdictions opt to create or maintain majority-minority districts, notwithstanding the ability of minority voters to elect preferred candidates from plurality districts where the primary is majority-minority

Black plaintiffs unsuccessfully pursued a related claim in the Perry litigation where they challenged a districting plan that reduced the black population in a district where black voters previously had comprised 21.6% of the voting age population.[93] The plaintiffs argued that, prior to the redistricting, they constituted an effective majority for purposes of Gingles I notwithstanding their minority status because they controlled the Democratic primary and Anglos and Latinos voted "either in the Republican primary or not at all, but return[ed] home out of party loyalty in the general election."[94] The Perry court, however, viewed black influence exerted through the majority-minority primary simply as a facet of party politics rather than a locus for meaningful black political participation that the courts in Armour, Page, and Martinez viewed as worthy of cognizance under Section 2.[95] For the Perry court, the primary was relevant only insofar as it showed that black and Latino voters did not vote cohesively and hence could not combine their strength for the purposes of claiming entitlement to majority-minority district.[96]

The plaintiffs in Perry relied on the Supreme Court's statement in Georgia v. Ashcroft that a coalition district may sometimes provide effective representation to minorities[97] to argue that the requirements of Gingles I had been "effectively overruled" and that influence districts are entitled to protection under Section 2.[98] The Perry court read Ashcroft differently, finding in it no obligation for states to preserve coalitions: "[t]o so conclude would have profound consequences, freezing ephemeral political alliances, which are the bull's eyes of partisan redistricting."[99]

In the Rodriguez litigation, plaintiffs were similarly unsuccessful in seeking to establish that New York violated Section 2 by "cracking" the minority population among several districts, in a context were a majority-minority district was not possible.[100] Unlike Perry, the claim here was not that an existing coalition district had been destroyed, but instead that district lines continued to divide rapidly growing minority communities.[101] The court found no injury, and, like the Perry court, held that Georgia v. Ashcroft, while recognizing the ability of states to create influence districts, "does not broaden the power of federal courts under section 2 of the VRA to require state legislatures to protect or create such "ability to elect" districts."[102] To hold otherwise would open a "Pandora's box" because "'[i]nfluence' cannot be clearly defined or statistically proved."[103]

Thus, Perry and Rodriguez read Ashcroft to provide authority for jurisdictions to choose between influence and majority-minority districts,[104] but neither court interprets Ashcroft to require that jurisdictions protect these districts where they already exist.[105] In dicta, however, the Perry court evinces a preference for the creation of influence or coalition districts where possible.[106] Some other courts have displayed a similar preference for influence over minority-majority districts[107] but doubts remain about determining when an influence district should be created and whether it will better serve minority voters.[108]

Geographically Compact

Courts have consistently used a few different criteria for assessing compactness under Gingles I, and have often used them in combination. Courts examine the proposed district's shape,[109] the extent to which it comports with the jurisdiction's traditional districting principles,[110] and how it compares to other proposed or existing districts.[111] Some courts view compactness as a "practical or functional" concept to be assessed in terms of whether the district captures a community.[112]

Since 1994, courts have invoked Shaw v. Reno and its progeny[113] when discussing compactness under Gingles I.[114] The Shaw cases require close scrutiny of districting plans in which racial considerations predominate over traditional districting principles in the drawing of district lines. An oddly shaped district is not a prerequisite to a Shaw claim, but courts often look to shape to assess whether race was the primary consideration when the district was drawn. Since Shaw, some courts have invoked bizarre shape to measure compactness under Gingles I,[115] and generally consider districts compact when they appear more compact than those struck down in the Shaw cases.[116] Some courts have, moreover, invoked Shaw and its progeny to voice concern that plans seeking to increase minority voting strength do not pay adequate heed to traditional districting principles.[117]

Gingles II and III: Racial Bloc Voting

Racial polarization in voting, also known as racial bloc voting, constitutes a critical component of a Section 2 claim.[118] The vast majority of Section 2 violations identified in this study found legally significant racial bloc voting.[119]

Racial bloc voting factors into the evaluation of Section 2 claims at two junctures. The second and third of the Gingles "preconditions" to a Section 2 claim call for an inquiry into racial polarization in voting. They require courts to determine whether minority voters are politically cohesive, and whether white voters vote sufficiently as a bloc to defeat the minority-preferred candidate.[120] Courts who so find (and also find the first Gingles factor[121]) must then evaluate whether the plaintiffs can sustain their claim under "the totality of circumstances."[122] This inquiry includes analysis of the Senate Factors, one of which is the extent of racially polarized voting.[123]

In practice, however, the majority of courts that consider racial bloc voting engage in one inquiry, typically under the Gingles factors.[124] Of those that deem Gingles satisfied and proceed to the totality of circumstances review, some simply refer back to their previous analysis of racial bloc voting under Gingles, if in fact they return to racial bloc voting at all.[125]

Of the lawsuits analyzed, 186 considered the extent of racially polarized voting, 91 found the factor to exist, and 65 of these identified a violation of Section 2 (another 3 granted a preliminary injunction). In covered jurisdictions, 44 lawsuits found racial bloc voting; 47 in non-covered. Of the 27 lawsuits that found racial bloc voting but not a Section 2 violation, three deemed plaintiffs likely to succeed on the merits of the Section 2 claim. The 23 remaining lawsuits found racially polarized voting but ultimately did not end in a favorable outcome for the plaintiffs.[126] Eight deemed Gingles I or II unsatisfied,[127] eight identified "rough proportionality" as defined in Johnson v. DeGrandy,[128] two remanded the case for further review,[129] six declined to find a violation under a more general totality of the circumstances review.[130]

Several recurring issues pervade judicial analyses of racial bloc voting. The first concerns the identification of the minority-preferred candidate, the second, the role of causation, and the third, the existence of "special circumstances" that might warrant disregarding particular elections. These are discussed below.

Identifying the Minority-Preferred Candidate

Courts assessing racial bloc voting must identify the minority-preferred candidate in order to determine whether "the white bloc usually votes to defeat" this candidate. In making this determination, courts overwhelmingly agree that the race of the candidates must inform the analysis at least to some degree. Courts have thus flatly rejected Justice Brennan's position in Thornburg v. Gingles that a candidate's race should be irrelevant when assessing racial bloc voting.[131]

Most courts, for example, more easily identify a minority candidate as minority-preferred than a non-minority candidate, while some implicitly or explicitly assume the minority candidate is the minority-preferred candidate.[132] Others demand some evidence on point, although typically far less than what they require to demonstrate a white candidate is minority-preferred.[133] No court today holds that white candidates cannot be minority-preferred.[134]

Decisions in the Third, Eighth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits hold that courts there will engage in a searching inquiry before they will identify a white candidate as minority-preferred. This approach, typically associated with the Jenkins litigation that articulated it, deems election results only a preliminary component of the inquiry.[135] Courts must determine not only who gets minority votes, but also the depth and vigor of minority support for that candidate, the scope of that candidate's interest in the minority community, whether and why a viable minority candidate did not run, and whether minority candidates had run previously.[136] This approach implicitly imports into the racial bloc voting inquiry some of the Senate Factors such as candidate slating typically reviewed only after the Gingles threshold is crossed.[137]

Courts in the Second, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits expressly reject this approach, maintaining that this "subjective" inquiry into minority preferences is inappropriate and impractical.[138] These courts posit that the inquiry should be limited almost exclusively to election results to identify the minority-preferred candidate. With a few caveats, these courts define the preferred candidate as the one who receives the most votes from minority voters.[139] While the Fourth Circuit has not explicitly followed this approach, recent decisions suggest it may be using an analogous approach.[140]

In practice, however, many courts have not strictly adhered to one or the other of these tests.[141] For instance, after adopting the Jenkins approach,[142] the Eighth Circuit in Clay v. Board of Education of St. Louis, noted "it is a near tautological principle that the minority-preferred candidate "should generally be one able to receive [minority] votes."[143] Likewise, the Eleventh Circuit facially relies on the totality of the circumstances to demonstrate that a white candidate is minority-preferred, but its most recent decisions treat the candidate who receives the majority of the minority vote and election results as minority-preferred.[144] In the context of multi-seat elections, moreover, where voters are permitted to cast as many votes as there are seats, both the Fourth and Eleventh circuits have combined the quantitative and subjective approaches to assess the status of candidates that do not place first among black voters, but do receive a substantial percentage of the black vote.[145]

Probative Elections: Courts in most circuits generally place more weight on elections involving a minority candidate than on those involving only white candidates.[146] Some courts discount elections out of concern that the candidate receiving minority votes is not truly minority-preferred.[147] Other do so because of concern that these elections mask polarized voting patterns that should be deemed legally significant.[148] Not infrequently, candidates preferred by minority voters in elections between white candidates prevail. These victories suggest that white voters are not voting sufficiently as a bloc to defeat minority-preferred candidates. And yet, minority candidates in the same jurisdictions are often defeated even though they receive overwhelming support from minority voters.[149] These elections suggest white voters are voting as a bloc within the meaning of the third Gingles factor. Discounting elections between white candidates consequently helps courts discern polarization of a sort that might otherwise be obscured.

For similar reasons, courts have increasingly looked to primary elections to determine which candidate is minority-preferred. Because primary elections remove party as a causal explanation for voting patterns, some courts view these elections as allowing better focus on the role of race in voter decisionmaking.[150] Primaries, moreover, are increasingly the only election of consequence as noncompetitive districts have proliferated nationwide.[151]

Many courts, consequently, discount minority support for a particular candidate in the general election where minority voters supported another candidate in the primary.[152] A few courts have also held that white support for a minority-preferred candidate in the general election does not bar finding the third Gingles factor, where white voters supported a different candidate in the Democratic primary.[153] Highlighting this point, the district court in the Black Political Task Force litigation observed that "black and white voters in Boston preferred the [black] Democratic candidate at a general election is hardly news....[and] says less about race than partisan politics."[154]

Courts have also relied on primary election results to examine whether two minority groups seeking to aggregate their voting strength in a Section 2 claim share a preferred candidate. Several decisions find that party affiliation masks a lack of cohesiveness between, for example, black and Hispanic voters. In this context, evidence that members of the minority groups supported different candidates in the primary weighs against finding political cohesion, even if voters from both groups supported the same candidate in the general election.[155] As such, voting patterns in primary elections are probative on the issue of cohesion because such elections remove partisanship as a cause explanation for voting behavior.[156]

Although no court has expressly rejected consideration of primary elections, some courts have identified reasons that suggest caution in weighing primary elections too heavily. For example, some courts have expressed concern that the preferences of politically active members of the minority community should not define the candidate preferred by the minority community as a whole.[157] To the extent that primary voters are fewer in number and more extreme in political persuasion than those participating in the general election, the candidate who garners minority group support in the primary may not be the preferred candidate of most minority voters.

Finally, some courts have questioned whether general election results should be discounted simply because minority voters supported a different candidate in the primary. These courts suggest that doing so privileges minority voters to an improper extent, effectively relieving them of the obligation to "pull, haul, and trade" that all voters confront.[158]

Causation

The justices in Thornburg v. Gingles disagreed about the role causation should play in the racial bloc voting inquiry. Justice Brennan rejected causation in his plurality opinion, arguing that "it is the difference between the choices made by blacks and whites — not the reasons for that difference" that is important.[159] Justice O'Connor, however, thought the inquiry should address "evidence that the divergent racial voting patterns may be explained in part by causes other than race, such as an underlying divergence in the interests of minority and white voters."[160] Justice White was the critical fifth vote on the issue and his separate opinion did not definitely resolve the question.

Lower courts ever since have disputed the role causation should play in the racial bloc voting analysis. Courts in nine judicial circuits now expressly incorporate causation in the racial bloc voting analysis, either under the third Gingles factor or as part of the totality of circumstances.[161] Two circuits have not expressly adopted an approach to causation,[162] while the Ninth Circuit appears to reject causation, though not explicitly.[163]

When courts consider causation, they all ask the same underlying question: namely, whether race, as opposed to partisanship or some other factor, best explains why white voters failed to support the minority-preferred candidate. And yet, courts suggest that the juncture at which they ask this question matters. A finding that political party best explains divergent voting patterns under Gingles means that the court will not find legally significant racial bloc voting and necessarily that plaintiffs' claims fail.[164] Consideration of causation within the totality of the circumstances review means that the plaintiffs have already satisfied the Gingles preconditions and, as a result, an inference usually comes into play that "racial bias is at work."[165] In the Mount Holyoke litigation, the appellate court posited that "cases will be rare in which plaintiffs establish the Gingles preconditions yet fail on a Section 2 claim because other facts undermine the original inference."[166]

In practice, however, the juncture at which courts consider causation may matter less than these courts suggest. Regardless of where they consider causation, courts do not typically require that plaintiffs disprove that factors other than race caused divergent voting patterns,[167] but most require that plaintiffs demonstrate that race is the causal linkage when defendants proffer evidence supporting an alternative explanation.[168] Proving the linkage is difficult regardless of the juncture, and numerous lawsuits have held that plaintiffs failed to meet their burden on this point.[169] Plaintiffs rarely succeeded in rebutting defendant's evidence.[170]

Political Cohesion and multi-race claims

Several courts confronted Section 2 claims where the plaintiffs argued that the injured minority included members of two or more minority groups. Often, these claims arose where a single minority group would not satisfy the size and compactness requirements of Gingles I.[171] Most courts that faced a multi-minority claim concluded that these coalition claims were permissible and could result in a finding of a Section 2 violation provided that 1) together the minority groups satisfied the requirements of Gingles I and 2) they demonstrated political cohesiveness under Gingles II.[172]

To determine whether minority groups were politically cohesive, courts examined varied types of evidence, including electoral results, defendants' stipulation, testimony from community leaders, and evidence of social interaction.[173] Some courts concluded that elections that pitted one minority candidate against another minority candidate may indicate an absence of minority political cohesiveness.[174] Evidence that members of the minority groups supported different candidates in the primary weighed against finding political cohesion, even if the groups supported the same candidate in the general election.[175]

Other courts have confronted the claim that one minority group is part of the white bloc.[176] Thus, in some multi-race claims where the plaintiffs can establish Gingles I, the categorization of the other minority group remains a hindrance on their ability to satisfy the preconditions. A failure to find the other minority group votes cohesively with the white bloc makes it significantly more difficult to prove that the white bloc usually votes to defeat the minority-preferred candidate.[177]

Special circumstances

Courts have identified a variety of "special circumstances" that influence the racial bloc voting inquiry and have excluded or discounted elections involving such special circumstances as distinct from the "usual predictability" of voting patterns.[178] Some circuits have identified numerous special circumstances, others few or none. Typically, the recognition of special circumstances makes an ultimate finding of racial bloc voting more likely. A few cases, however, have discounted elections where the minority-preferred candidate was defeated due to special circumstances, thus having the opposite effect.[179] Some recent decisions voice resistance to discounting elections because of special circumstances, preferring instead to consider all the evidence presented.[180]

Incumbency: Numerous courts have held that legally significant white bloc voting may exist, notwithstanding white support for a black candidate, if the black candidate is an incumbent.181 Others disagree, finding that "incumbency plays a significant role in the vast majority of American elections," such that it use as a special circumstance "would confuse the ordinary with the special."[182]

The majority-minority district: Several courts have identified the majority-minority district as a "special circumstance" that alters the conventional racial bloc inquiry. In such districts, white voters, are by definition, a minority of the population, and thus, these courts have reasoned that their inability to defeat the minority-preferred candidate is less probative evidence of a decline in racial bloc voting than it would be elsewhere. The Ninth Circuit said that "[t]o do otherwise would permit white bloc voting in a majority-white district to be washed clean by electoral success in neighboring majority-Indian districts."[183]

Post lawsuit elections: Some courts discount the results of elections occurring after the lawsuit at issue had been filed. This approach is premised on the view that the very filing of a Section 2 lawsuit makes white voters more likely to support the minority-preferred candidate and that this support is somehow not genuine. The concern is that post-lawsuit elections might "work a one-time advantage for [minority] candidates in the form of unusually organized political support by white leaders concerned to forestall single-member districting."[184] Other courts will consider such elections, either outright,[185] or with the caveat that plaintiffs are unable to show unusual white support for the minority-preferred candidate.[186]

Unusual Elections: Courts have held that the success of minority-preferred candidates may be discounted when reason exists to view voting behavior as unusual. Courts have excluded elections based on a plurality victory,[187] an atypical primary,[188] an unopposed candidacy,[189] or a candidacy against only a third-party candidate.[190] Courts have also excluded elections based on unusual political circumstances (i.e., a minority candidate who is seen as "anti-busing" while local school desegregation lawsuit was pending,[191] a candidate under federal indictment at the time of the election,[192] a winning black candidate who had been a professional athlete,[193] or a well-financed campaign amidst anti-incumbent sentiment.[194]) Further, courts discount elections not involving serious or well-known candidates,[195] and some have approved discounting minority success when the race of the candidate was not widely known.[196] Courts are often skeptical, however, of special circumstances that simply illustrate good campaigning on the part of the minority candidate. [197]

Low turnout: Several courts have been unwilling to find white bloc voting where minority voters did not turnout to vote in substantial numbers.[198] Some courts phrase this issue as one of causation: namely, those plaintiffs must establish that white bloc voting caused the minority defeat, as opposed to an independent cause such as low turnout.[199] The premise is that if there had been higher minority turnout, the minority-preferred candidate might have been elected. Other courts warn that indicators of vote dilution, such as official discrimination, may contribute to low turnout.[200] A third approach does not consider turnout a special circumstance, but views it as relevant to an evaluation of other factors, such as minority candidate success.[201]

THE SENATE FACTORS

SENATE FACTOR 1: History of Official Discrimination that Touched the Right to Vote

The first factor listed in the Senate Report asks courts to assess "the extent of any history of official discrimination" in the jurisdiction that "touched the right of the members of the minority group to register, to vote, or otherwise to participate in the democratic process."[202] Courts assessing Factor 1 have documented scores of instances in which state and local officials engaged in intentional race discrimination in recent years. These judicial findings record the nature, frequency, and recentness of this conduct.
One hundred and forty-eight lawsuits considered Factor 1.[203] The lawsuits that did not consider this factor generally never reached the Senate Factors at all, finding instead that Section 2 did not apply to the plaintiffs' claim,[204] or that, if it did, the plaintiffs had failed to satisfy the threshold Thornburg v. Gingles test.[205]

Of the lawsuits considering this factor, 137 (or 92.5%) found that there was a history of official discrimination. Of these, only 107 lawsuits actually found that Factor 1 was met.[206] The remaining thirty cases concluded that plaintiffs had failed to establish that the identified history "touched" the present-day ability of members of the minority group to participate in the political process.[207]

Of the 107 lawsuits that found Factor 1, 65 also found a violation of Section 2 or otherwise issued a decision favorable to the plaintiffs.[208] Seven lawsuits found a violation of Section 2 without considering Factor 1 at all.[209] Ten others identified a violation of Section 2 after considering but not finding Factor 1.[210]

Lawsuits finding Factor 1 most often found that three additional Senate Factors were satisfied: 66 found racially polarized voting (either in the Gingles threshold test or when considering Factor 2), 70 found ongoing socioeconomic effects (Factor 5), 67 found lack of candidate success (Factor 7).[211]

Many courts assessing Factor 1 discussed instances of discriminatory conduct dating from the nineteenth century and through much of the twentieth. These accounts addressed literacy tests, grandfather clauses, poll taxes, white primaries, racially discriminatory voter registration requirements as well as state laws mandating segregation, the separation of names by race on voter registration lists, and other official discriminatory practices in education, employment, and housing.[212]

Seventy lawsuits considering evidence of Factor 1 identified official discrimination post-dating the enactment of the VRA.[213] A number of these focused on instances of discriminatory conduct during the period between 1965 and the 1982 amendments to the VRA. These cases cited official resistance to school desegregation orders, employment discrimination settlements and judgments against local governments,[214] and violations of the VRA itself.[215] Courts took note of various states' and counties' failure to hire minority poll officials,[216] a county registrar's refusal to register black citizens as voters,[217] the "hostility and uncooperation" displayed by public officials in Texas when Mexican-American candidates ran for office,[218] and the race-based retention of a majority-vote and post system in Georgia.[219] The City of Starke litigation noted the City's failure to repeal unenforceable statutes mandating segregation.[220]

Official Discrimination Since 1982

Twenty-four lawsuits identified more than one-hundred instances of intentionally discriminatory conduct in voting since 1982.[221] Eight of these lawsuits originated in covered jurisdictions; 14 in non-covered. While several findings identified intentional discrimination in the drawing of state reapportionment plans, conduct by local governmental officials accounted for the vast number of instances of official discrimination identified, as described below.

Judicial findings documenting official discrimination occurring since 1982 encompass a wide range of conduct by public officials. Public conduct found by courts to constitute intentional race-based discrimination is listed below, with the findings from jurisdictions covered by Section 5 cited first, followed by findings in non-covered jurisdictions.

Findings of Intentional Discrimination in Section 5 Covered Jurisdictions Since 1982

IN CHARLESTON COUNTY, SOUTH CAROLINA

— The "consistent and more recent pattern of white persons acting to intimidate and harass African-American voters at the polls during the 1980s and 1990s and even as late as the 2000 general election," including "significant evidence of intimidation and harassment" that was "undeniably racial" and that "never occurred at predominantly white polling places, including those that tended to support Democratic candidates."[222]

—The harassment by county officials, including at least one member of the Charleston County Election Commission and at least one county-employed poll manager,[223] as participants in the Ballot Security Group which, in the 1990 election, "sought to prevent African-American voters from seeking assistance in casting their ballots."[224]

—The county's assignment of white poll managers, described by some as "bulldogs," in unspecified recent elections since 1982, to majority African-American precincts, where they "caused confusion, intimidated African-American voters, . . . had the tendency to be condescending to those voters," and engaged in "inappropriate behavior."[225]

—The "routine" assignment by "the Election Commission...[of] one particularly problematic poll manager to predominantly African-American polling places in different parts of the County during the 1980s and early 1990s. At the polls, this poll manager, who is white, routinely approached elderly African-American women seeking to vote." He would often "make a scene:" approaching them, putting his arm around them and speaking loudly, when "[t]hey just wanted to come in and sign up and vote. And it happened repeatedly just to that class of voter."[226]

—The "recurring" official harassment of elderly African-American voters during the 1980s and 1990s, so severe that that the Charleston County Circuit Court "issue[d] a restraining order against the Election Commission requiring its agents to cease interfering with the voting process."[227]

—The persistence of problematic "treatment of African-American voters by some white poll managers, even though the Election Commission has provided training to poll managers on this subject."[228]

—The refusal of county workers at the polls to provide African-American voters with legally required voting assistance, in elections from 1992–2002; including:

> the discriminatory practice employed by white poll managers working at black-majority precincts of hassling African-American voters who asked for > help voting, including "asking questions such as: 'Why do you need assistance? Why can't you read and write? And didn't you just sign in? And you know how to spell your name, why can't you just vote by yourself? And do you really need voter assistance?'"[229]

>
> the absence of comparable questioning of white voters who were allowed to have their voting assistor of choice without being challenged: "no evidence exists of any instances of harassment, intimidation, or interference directed against white or African-American voters at predominantly white polling places."[230]

— The county's retention of a poll manager who had exhibited a "threatening attitude" toward black voters at the Joseph Floyd Major Precinct in the 1996 election, after his refusal to respond to a county election commissioner's reprimand; and the retention of this poll manager as a county employee at majority-African-American polls in Charleston County in 2004.[231]

— The decision of "the Charleston County Council [to reduce] the salary for the Charleston County Probate Judge in 1991, following the election of the first and only African-American person elected to that position" from $85,000 to $59,000 annually."[232]

—The state legislative delegation's proposal to replace single member districts with an at-large system following African-American success in School Board elections in 2000, without communicating at all with members of the School Board at the time.[233]

IN THURSTON COUNTY, NEBRASKA

—The County's refusal to adjust its 1990 redistricting process to address a documented increase in the Native American population, and instead to maintain its existing districting system, a course of action found to embody discriminatory intent.[234]

IN SOUTH DAKOTA[235]

—The display of discriminatory, "negative reactions" by county voter registrars to Native Americans during voter registration drives in the 1980s, ranging from the "unhelpful to hostile."

—The limitation imposed by county officials on the number of voter registration forms given to people intending to register Native Americans voters despite the absence of a legal limit on the provision of such forms;[236]

—The refusal of county officials to accept Internet voter registration forms from Native American voters.[237]

—The "erroneous rejections of registration cards" by county officials whom, later (after apparent protest) accepted them without explaining why they had first been rejected.[238]

—The 1986 refusal of the Dewey County Auditor to provide Native Americans with sufficient voter registration cards to conduct a voter registration drive on the Cheyenne River Reservation, conduct that prompted a court order instructing the auditor to supply 750 additional cards and extend the registration deadline.[239]

—The 1984 refusal of the Fall River County Auditor "to register Indians who had attempted to register as part of a last-minute voter registration drive on the Pine Ridge Reservation," a refusal that led to a court order the day before the election requiring that voters be allowed to register and cast their ballots.[240]

—The 2002 refusal of Bennett County commissioners to move two polling places to Indian housing areas that would "increase convenience for Indian voters," after Indian residents petitioned the County for the stations.[241]

—Wholly unsubstantiated public claims made by Bennett County officials just before the 2002 election that Indians involved in voter registration were engaged in voter fraud; and investigations that followed these claims in Pine Ridge and Rosebud, that produced no actual charges but "intimidated Indian voters."[242]

—The state's requirement that voters have photo identification and other new voting requirements enacted by the South Dakota legislature following the 2002 election,[243] passed after a legislative debate that included the following:

> Statement by Rep. Van Norman that in passing these provisions, "the legislature was retaliating because the Indian vote was a big factor in new registrants and a close senatorial race."[244]
>
> Statement by Rep. Ted Klaudt defending driver's license requirements by referring to Native American voters: "The way I feel is if you don't have enough drive to get up and drive to the county auditor ... maybe you shouldn't really be voting in the first place."[245]
>
> Statement by Rep. Stanford Adelstein opposing provisions that would have made voting registration easier and, in reference to Native American voters, claiming: "Having made many efforts to register people ... I realize that those people we want to vote will be given adequate opportunity. I, in my heart, feel that this bill ... will encourage those who we don't particularly want to have in the system.... I'm not sure we want that sort of person in the polling place. I think the effort of registration ... is adequate."[246]

—The state legislature's 1996 decision to replace two single-member house districts with a multi-member at-large house district for District 28, an action that rendered District 28 as a whole a majority-white district and that was taken soon after an Indian won the Democratic primary in 1994 in majority-Indian District 28A.[247]

—The discriminatory retention by Buffalo County of "[a] redistricting plan, which had been in use for decades, confined virtually all of the county's Indian population to a single district containing approximately 1500 people," leaving white voters in control of the remaining two districts, "which essentially gave them control over the county government," an arrangement that prompted a lawsuit settled in 2004, in which the county "admitt[ed] that the plan was discriminatory."[248]

—The 1999 refusal by Day County officials to let Native Americans vote in a sanitary district election, an action that prompted a lawsuit which ended in a settlement under which "the county and the district admitted that the district's boundaries unlawfully denied Indian citizens' right to vote."[249]

IN BLECKLEY COUNTY, GEORGIA

—The county's 1984 decision to replace numerous polling places that "provid[ed] ready access to voters in the outlying areas," with a single precinct for the 219 square mile county and to locate this single precinct in an "all-white civic club" (the Jaycee Barn in Cochran); and the county's decision to use the precinct as the sole polling place for county commissioner and county school board elections throughout the 1980s and up to the court's 1992 decision.[250]

IN DALLAS, TEXAS

—The city's attempts to keep a partially at-large election system after minority voters petitioned for its change and city officials recognized the existing system "denied both blacks and Hispanics access to any of the 3 at-large seats."[251]

IN NORTH JOHNS, ALABAMA

—The town mayor's 1988 selective refusal to provide registration forms required by state law to two African-American city council candidates, the first African-Americans to run for town office after the entry of a consent decree that replaced an at-large regime with a districted one, where "[t]he mayor was aware that Jones and Richardson, as black candidates, were seeking to take advantage of the new court-ordered single-member districting plan and that their election would result in the town council being majority black." [252]

—The town's prosecution of the two successful black candidates for failing to file the forms required by state law that the mayor refused to give them, a failing a federal court later found occurred only because of the mayor's intentionally discriminatory actions

—The town's refusal to seat the candidates after they were elected in 1988 until a federal court ordered the town to do so.[253]

IN BIG HORN COUNTY, MONTANA[254]

—The use of a voter registration process, and the appointment of deputy registrars and election judges in 1986 with "an intent to discriminate" against Native Americans.[255]

—The county's failure to include "the names of Indians who had registered to vote .... on voting lists in 1982 and 1984" and the county's removal of the names of Indians who had voted in primary elections from voting lists such that they were not allowed to vote in the subsequent general election.[256]

—The county's refusal to provide "[a]n Indian candidate for the state legislature ... voter registration cards in 1984, forcing her to obtain them at the State Capitol."[257]

—County officials' refusal to provide a Native American man more than a scant number of voter registration cards based on the claim that few cards remained, even though the official shortly thereafter provided a white woman with fifty more cards than the man.[258]

—The subjection of Native Americans to a more technical and more difficult voter registration process than whites, in which county officials "looked for minor errors in [Native American] registration applications and used them as an excuse to refuse to allow registration."[259]

IN JEFFERSON COUNTY ALABAMA (AND THE STATE OF ALABAMA)[260]

—The express refusal of Jefferson County officials to appoint black workers in white precincts in 1984 on the ground that white voters will not listen to black poll officials, a refusal found to amount to "open and intentional discrimination" that "is lawless and inexcusable." The court stated that "try[ing] to excuse the practice under cover of the purported intolerance of their own constituents is indefensible and repugnant."[261]

—The intentional failure of the Governor and Attorney General of Alabama to remedy past discrimination or ongoing racial harassment at the polls.[262]

—The conduct of white poll officials who "continue to harass and intimidate black voters" including "detailed numerous instances of where white poll officials refused to help illiterate black voters or refused to allow them to vote, where they refused to allow black voters to cast challenged ballots, and where they were simply rude and even intimidating toward black voters."[263]

IN MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA

—City ordinance proposed by mayor in 1981, following a series of annexations, to lower the African-American population in majority-black district 3 to "the lowest level he understood to be legally possible in order to reduce the possibility that district 3's council member could be reelected."264 The ordinance was still in place as of 1983 and was found to be "in substantial measure the product of a scheme purposefully designed and executed to decrease the voting strength of the black electorate in district 3."[265]

IN TERRELL, TEXAS

—City's reliance on at-large elections with staggered terms for five member city council, adjudicated on the merits to constitute intentional racial discrimination.[266]

—The city's settlement of a lawsuit "alleging that poll workers improperly refused to let certain black citizens vote."[267]

—The city's refusal in 1983 to establish a polling place repeatedly sought by black residents[268]

Findings of Intentional Discrimination in Non-Covered Jurisdictions Since 1982

IN BERKS COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA[269]

—Hostile public statements by officials at the polls to Hispanic and Spanish-speaking voters,[270] statements such as 'This is the U.S.A.-Hispanics should not be allowed to have two last names. They should learn to speak the language and we should make them take only one last name,' and 'Dumb Spanish-speaking people ... I don't know why they're given the right to vote.' "[271]

—The subjection of Hispanic voters: "to unequal treatment at the polls, including being required to show photo identification where white voters have not been required to do so."[272]

—The county's refusal to "appoint[] bilingual persons to serve as clerks or machine inspectors, and to fill vacant elected poll worker positions" showing an "apparent unwillingness to ensure that poll workers included persons reflective of the community ....Berks County did not provide bilingual oral assistance at the polls prior to this Court's preliminary injunction" ordering Defendants to translate all written election-related materials and appoint bilingual interpreters.[273]

—The conduct of poll officials in the City of Reading, who "turned away Hispanic voters because they could not understand their names, or refused to 'deal' with Hispanic surnames."[274]

—The County's imposition of more onerous requirements for applicants seeking to serve as translators at the polls than those applying to be other types of poll officials, a requirement that impeded the court's order requiring the County to hire bilingual poll officials.[275]

—Boasts by county officials and poll workers, flaunting their racial discriminatory motivations and practices to federal officials observing elections in May 2001, November 2001, May 2001 and November 2002, including statements from poll officials in the City of Reading to Justice Department observers "boast[ing] of the outright exclusion of Hispanic voters...during the May 15, 2001 municipal primary election."[276]

IN MONTEZUMA COUNTY, COLORADO

—The refusal of county officials during the 1980s-early 1990s to allow residents to register to vote at Towaoc on the Ute Reservation, even though the county created satellite registration in the non-Indian communities of Mancus and Dolores.[277]

—The county's imposition of significant limitations on the hours it would make available mobile voter registration on the Ute reservation, after the County decided to allow such registration in the 1990s.[278]

IN PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

—The operation by city election commissioners in conjunction with campaign workers of a fraudulent "minority absentee ballot program" to manipulate the outcome of a 1993 city election; efforts that included "specifically target[ing] Latino and African-Americans as groups to saturate with the illegal absentee ballot program;"[279] and "deceiving Latino and African-American voters into believing that the law had changed and that there was a 'new way to vote' from the convenience of one's home."[280]

ON THE EASTERN SHORE OF MARYLAND

—The operation of "a kind of unofficial slating organization for white candidates" by some all-white, but state-funded, volunteer fire departments on the Eastern Shore" until at least the mid-1980s.[281]

—The failure of the State of Maryland to stop funding departments engaging in this practice, until an amendment to the Code of Fair Practices the Governor made upon the recommendation of the Attorney General in 1988.[282]

—The discriminatory location of polling places, that continues "[e]ven today, [of] counties on the lower Shore...in white-dominated volunteer fire companies, a hostile environment that may depress black electoral participation."[283]

IN LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS

—Decisions in recent years (1980s) by county officials to move polling places on short notice.[284]

—The county's appointment, "with isolated exceptions," of deputy voting registrars "only as a result of litigation;" other recent, unspecified efforts to "intimidate black candidates."[285]

—The intimidation in 1986 by an unnamed white county sheriff of a black lawyer, Roy Lewellen, running for State Senate, including:

> first, warning him "not to run," and,
>
> second, when that advice was ignored, an unnamed prosecutor's "institution [of] a widely-publicized criminal prosecution against Mr. Lewellen for witness bribery";[286] treatment that "a white lawyer, even one who opposed the political powers that be" would not have received;[287] and conduct amounting to "racial intimidation" that shows "that official discrimination designed to suppress black political activity is not wholly a thing of the past, at least not in the Delta."[288]

IN BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

—The enactment of a redistricting plan described by the court as "a textbook case of packing...concentrating large numbers of minority voters within a relatively small number of districts," devised by the House leadership, which "knew what it was doing."[289]

—The manipulation of district lines "to benefit two white incumbents" where the State House did not "paus[e] to investigate the consequences of its actions for minority voting opportunities," thereby using race "as a tool to ensure the protection of incumbents."[290]

IN NEW ROCHELLE, NEW YORK

—The enactment of a city council redistricting plan that diluted minority voting strength by replacing a majority-minority district with a plurality district, a plan reflecting "a course of conduct which can only be characterized as intentional and deliberate."[291]

IN LOS ANGELES COUNTY, CALIFORNIA

—The County's reliance in 1990 on a districting plan that had been found to be discriminatory[292] because it "intentionally fragmented the Hispanic population among the various districts in order to dilute the effect of the Hispanic vote in future elections and preserve incumbencies of the Anglo members of the Board of Supervisors."[293] A concurring judge observed that this conduct illustrated the County's "single-minded pursuit of incumbency," which led it to"run roughshod over the rights of protected minorities."[294]

IN CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

—The retention and defense in a 1984 lawsuit of a city districting plan that "packed" and "fractured" minority voters to ensure the reelection of an incumbent senator, a plan that exposed how "the requirements of incumbency are so closely intertwined with the need for racial dilution that an intent to maintain a safe, primarily white, district for Senator Joyce is virtually coterminous with a purpose to practice racial discrimination."[295]

IN ILLINOIS

— The state legislature's retention and defense in a 1983 lawsuit of its districting plan for the state legislature, which diluted minority voting strength in order to protect two incumbent white senators in Chicago.

— The state redistricting commission's drawing of district lines with "the immediate purpose...to preserve the incumbencies of two white state Senators."[296] "[T]his process was so intimately intertwined with, and dependent on, racial discrimination and dilution of minority voting strength that purposeful dilution has been clearly demonstrated in the construction of Commission senate districts 14, 17 and 18."[297]

IN WESTERN TENNESSEE

— "[V]oting rights violations by public officials in rural west Tennessee as late as the 1980's....Official discrimination not only prevents blacks from electing representatives of their choice, it also leads to disillusionment, mistrust, and disenfranchisement. These feelings last beyond the current election, and can cause black voters to drop out of the political process and potential black candidates to forgo an election run." [298]

—The city council's amendment of the Bolivar city charter creating a majority-vote requirement for mayoral elections "in response to the success of two black candidates for mayor," which was challenged in a 1983 lawsuit against the city of Bolivar. "The district court approved a class action settlement setting up a new 'system which will ensure the opportunity of black citizens of Bolivar to meaningfully participate in the political process'....[C]ases challenging newly adopted election systems indicate to the court that official discrimination against blacks in voting is not entirely a thing of the past in west Tennessee."[299]

In addition, some courts have credited allegations of current official discrimination in the course of issuing Section 2 plaintiffs a preliminary injunction, action that reflects the view of these courts that plaintiffs were highly likely to prevail on their claims, but that did not reach the question of whether Section 2 had been violated on the merits.[300]

Examples include:

IN CICERO, ILLINOIS

—Town board's adoption in January 2000 of an 18-month residency requirement to register to vote, and placement on the March primary ballot, a requirement that "was adopted, at least in part, with the racially discriminatory purpose of targeting potential Hispanic candidates for disqualification and thereby seeking to prevent Hispanic voters from having the opportunity to vote for and/or elect candidates of their choice, in violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act."[301]

IN CRENSHAW COUNTY, ALABAMA

— The consistent and repeated creation of at-large systems for local governments by the Alabama legislature, "during periods when there was a substantial threat of black participation in the political process."

—Barriers "consistently erected" by the state "[f]rom the late 1800's through the present [1986] to keep black persons from full and equal participation in the social, economic, and political life of the state," where these systems "are still having their intended racist impact."[302]

— The creation of these "systems...in the midst of the state's unrelenting historical agenda, spanning from the late 1800's to the 1980's, to keep its black citizens economically, socially, and politically downtrodden, from the cradle to the grave."[303]

IN HAYWOOD COUNTY, TENNESSEE

— The 1982 decision by the Haywood County Commission to replace 10 district seats for the Road Commission with 9 seats elected at-large after the first black road commissioner was elected, a decision the court "finds from the evidence in the record . . . occurred as a result of the purposeful intention to dilute black voting strength in Haywood County, Tennessee."[304]

Sources

Of the 107 lawsuits finding Factor 1, 32 lawsuits (30%) did so without reference to any evidence,[305] and another 7 (6.5%) did so based upon defendants' stipulation to a history of official discrimination.[306] Courts addressing lawsuits in Section 5-covered jurisdictions were no more likely than those in non-covered jurisdictions simply to assume or take judicial notice of Factor 1, without any evidentiary discussion. Most courts assessing Factor 1 examined various types of evidence. Sixty-five (or 60.7% of those considering Factor 1) cited statutes or other official policies.[307] Thirty-five (or 32.7%) noted actions and statements taken by public officials;[308] 24 (22.4%) cited expert testimony;[309] sixteen (14.9%) mentioned history books, newspapers or scholarly articles,[310] fifteen

(14%) mentioned other witness testimony.[311] Some listed the jurisdiction's status as a covered (or non-covered) jurisdiction under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.[312]

Fifty-six lawsuits (52.3% of those finding Factor 1) looked to prior judicial decisions identifying official discrimination in a range of conduct.[313] Some of these decisions found such discrimination in education, housing, employment. Others specifically addressed claims of discrimination in voting, including a jurisdiction's failure to comply with the requirements of Section 5 of the VRA.[314] Numerous cases addressing Factor 1 cited as evidence the Factor 1 findings from a prior Section 2 case in the same state or jurisdiction.[315] This earlier decision typically engaged in lengthy analysis of the historical record, and the subsequent suit in the state cited back to that decision, sometimes without making further findings.[316]

Some lawsuits (23 or 21.5% of all lawsuits finding the factor) included within their Factor 1 analysis examples of private or unofficial discrimination, although no court relied exclusively on such evidence in finding Factor 1.[317] For example, in the Armour Litigation in Ohio, the court included within Factor 1 the media's use of racial labels to describe an African-American candidate in 1985, the failure in the same year of party officials to support a minority candidate[318] and the 1970 bombing (allegedly by private individuals) of the house of the first African-American member of the Youngstown School Board in Youngstown, Ohio.[319]

Discounting History

Forty-one lawsuits addressed but did not find Factor 1.[320] Some courts deemed instances of discrimination too remote in time to count towards Factor 1.[321] Six lawsuits found that plaintiffs presented no evidence of official discrimination, and refused to take judicial notice of this factor without such evidence.[322] Several courts deemed Section 5 coverage alone insufficient to satisfy Factor 1, and instead have demanded evidence of official discrimination in the specific locality in question.[323]

Courts in covered and non-covered jurisdictions alike have deemed evidence of intentional discrimination in a neighboring locality inadequate, even when that discrimination was of recent vintage.[324] Three lawsuits specifically found evidence insufficient because it was not linked to the specific, local jurisdiction. In the Alabama lawsuit Chapman v. Nicholson, the court found Factor 1 absent because "[t]here was certainly no evidence that black citizens in Jasper have had as much difficulty in voting as has been experienced by black citizens in some Southern communities."[325] Similarly, in the Rodriguez litigation, the court acknowledged as "troubling" the evidence of discrimination from recent litigation in the City of Yonkers, but deemed this evidence insufficient to establish Factor 1 in a challenge to a proposed state senate district, because only a fraction of the challenged district's residents came from Yonkers.[326] Most lived in the Bronx, where, the court noted, "Hispanics — and the various ethnic groups that fall under that label — have very actively participated in local Bronx politics."[327] Finally, in the Kent County litigation, the district court found that evidence of a city's official discrimination was not relevant to a Section 2 challenge to a county's actions.[328]

Thirty of the lawsuits addressing but not finding Factor 1 parsed the factor into two components. These cases all identified a history of official discrimination, but deemed insufficient evidence showing that this past history "touched" on the right to vote today.[329] All read Factor 1 as requiring a showing that the official discrimination hindered present-day minority political participation.[330] Under this approach, much evidence of historic discrimination in voting is irrelevant absent linkage to contemporary problems. Thus, in the Liberty County Commissioners litigation the defendants conceded an extensive history of official discrimination and the court recounted this history in detail.[331] The court then assessed "the extent to which that discrimination still affects the rights of blacks to have equal access to the political process,"[332] and, on this question, the court concluded that it did not. The primary example of more recent official discrimination was a school employment lawsuit decided in 1986, which "indicate[d] lingering prejudice on the part of whites even in their official capacity ... did not touch the issues involved in a determination of whether the Voting Rights Act is being violated."[333]

For some courts, affirmative steps taken by a jurisdiction to improve voting rights ameliorated evidence of historical discrimination. The Aldasoro litigation, for example, recounted thirty years of California legislation designed to "improve minority voting participation and to liberalize the political process."[334] Some deemed the absence of contemporary examples of discrimination reason to discount past evidence. The court in City of Woodville, for example, acknowledged a past history of discrimination and the fact that the city "remains a place of almost total racial segregation on a social level," but it nevertheless minimized this finding because "Blacks and Whites are operating a government which is fair and responsive to Blacks in a community atmosphere of cooperation between the races and devoid of intimidation."[335] So too, the court in a 1997 case in Massachusetts noted that "[t]he 1995 election witnessed the complete absence of election-related problems that plagued elections in the 1980's."[336]

For other courts, the very prevalence of discrimination meant it should be discounted. Thus, while courts in southern States assumed or outlined a long local and state history of official discrimination,[337] some maintained that this discrimination was too common and too widepsread to weigh heavily within the Section 2 analysis.[338] The court in City of Woodville explained that the city "has a past history of racial discrimination as does every other Mississippi town or city," thus minimizing that history.[339]

Some courts in Northern states minimized a local history of discriminatory practices by contrasting that history what the record of what occurred in the South. In the Butts litigation, for example, the appellate court took issue with the district court's identification of numerous official practices targeting black and Hispanic voters and its suggestion that racial discrimination in voting is hardly confined to the South.[340] The appellate court stated that "[u]nlike many of the jurisdictions typically involved in Voting Rights Act cases, New York has ensured to black citizens the right to vote on the same terms as whites since 1874 (when the fifteenth amendment was ratified)."[341] In another New York lawsuit against the Town of Babylon, the district court noted that "[no]thing in the history of New York even remotely approaches the systematic exclusion of blacks from the political process that existed in the South."[342]

SENATE FACTOR 2: Extent of Racially Polarized Voting

Senate Factor 2 calls for an evaluation of the extent of racially polarized voting. As discussed above, courts analyzed this issue typically do so when evaluating the Gingles factors.

SENATE FACTOR 3: Use of Enhancing Practices: At-large elections, majority vote requirements

Factor 3 inquires about the "extent to which the state or political subdivision has used unusually large election districts, majority vote requirements, anti-single shot provisions, or other voting practices or procedures that may enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority group."[343] Section 2 did not categorically outlaw the practices identified in Factor 3, even though numerous decisions have invalidated specific uses of such practices as violations of the statute.

Fifty-three lawsuits found that at least one enhancing practice existed in the jurisdiction.[344]

Of those finding Factor 3, 35 (or 66.0%) also identified a violation of Section 2 (and 1 additional lawsuit ended with a settlement favorable to the plaintiffs). Thirty-two lawsuits found majority-vote requirements,[345] 26 found anti-single shot provisions, such as staggered terms and/or numbered-place requirements,[346] 23 found the use of at-large elections,[347] 11 found unusually large districts,[348] and 6 found other enhancing practices, including the use of an automatic voter removal or "purge" law (based upon voting frequency), a short interval between an initial election and the runoff election, candidate registration fee, candidate residency requirement, or low financial compensation for elected officials.[349]

Thirty-four (64.2%) of the lawsuits finding Factor 3 arose in covered jurisdictions.[350] Of these, 23 also found Section 2 was violated.[351] Of the 19 lawsuits (35.8%) finding this factor in non-covered jurisdictions, 12 also found a violation of Section 2.[352]

Factor 3 differs from the other Senate Factors in that courts addressing it usually engaged in virtually no analysis. Unlike, for example, identifying a racial appeal (Factor 6) or an exclusive slating process (Factor 4), identifying Factor 3 devices is almost always perfectly obvious. The jurisdiction either uses an at-large system or it does not. Most courts have found little to analyze and little to say apart from identifying the practice.

Even so, some courts that found Factor 3 discounted its import, typically by deeming the identified practice as having a minimally discriminatory effect on the ground.[353] These courts suggested that while Factor 3 practices may generally foster discriminatory results, no evidence establishing that effect was presented in the particular case.

The Senate Report's inclusion of the practices identified in Factor 3 in the totality of the circumstances recognizes the history underlying these practices. Legitimate reasons may exist for their continued use, but numerous notorious and historic examples attest to their adoption and use as devices for limiting political participation by racial minorities, and, in particular, participation by African Americans in the South.[354] The Senate Report recognizes this by providing that a jurisdiction's decision to use of such practices is evidence, albeit hardly dispositive standing alone, that Section 2 may have been violated.

SENATE FACTOR 4: Candidate Slating

Factor 4 asks whether members of the minority group have been denied access to a candidate slating process, assuming such a process exists in the jurisdiction. A denial of such access was an important component of a Section 2 claim prior to the 1982 amendments,[355] but the factor appears to be of diminished importance under the amended provision. Sixty-four lawsuits determining Section 2 was violated did not find Factor 4.[356]

More than 20 lawsuits specifically addressed evidence relating to Factor 4. Ten of these found the existence of a discriminatory slating process. Of these 10 lawsuits, 4 originated in jurisdictions covered by Section 5. All but one also found a violation of Section 2. Five of the 10 involved challenges to at-large districts. Eight also found racially polarized voting existed; all courts in these 10 lawsuits also found that the minority group had difficulty getting elected.[357]

While the term "slating" is not defined by the Senate Report, the Fifth Circuit has described it as "a process in which some influential non-governmental organization selects and endorses a group or 'slate' of candidates, rendering the election little more than a stamp of approval for the candidates selected."[358] Courts finding the factor have identified slating in four general circumstances.

Official Slating

Three courts identified instances where official party conduct constituted discriminatory slating. The Town of Hempstead litigation documented a slating process under which the Republican Party Chairman for the County selected candidates to run for office subject to approval by the Party's 69-member executive committee.[359] Deeming this process racially exclusive within the meaning of Factor 4, the district court noted that the executive committee invariably approved the Chairman's selections without debate, making the participation of three African Americans on the committee of little consequence. The only African-American candidate ever slated was not initially supported by a town-based organization of African-American Republicans, but instead was "a close friend and tennis partner" of the party chairman.[360] These circumstances led the appellate court to observe that, in this predominantly white, predominantly Republican town, the lack of access to the Republican slating process meant that "blacks simply are unable to have any preferred candidate elected to the Town Board."[361]

Similarly, in the City of New Rochelle litigation the district court found that candidate selection by party members placed barriers on non-party affiliated candidates and limited the prospects for candidates preferred by the African-American community to gain access to the ballot.[362] Finally in the Albany County litigation the district court found a lack of access based on anecdotal evidence coupled with the major parties' failure ever to nominate a minority candidate for county-wide office.[363]

Unofficial Party Slating or Backstabbing

Two courts found unofficial conduct by party officials to constitute slating.[364] In the City of Springfield litigation, the court called unofficial party endorsements and support in ostensibly nonpartisan elections "a subtle and covert" form of slating, one that contributed to the failure of African-American candidates to be elected.[365] In the Bone Shirt litigation the court found that informal activities by the party organizations stymied Native American candidacies. The court highlighted as evidence the conduct of the chairman of the Democratic Central Committee, who campaigned against his own party's nominees for county commissioner in the 2002 general election after Indian candidates unseated non-Indian incumbents in the primary.[366]

Although not characterized as "slating," conduct documented in two other lawsuits may be similarly understood. In the Armour litigation, the court cited the failure of party officials to support minority candidates despite rules requiring such support.[367] The City of Philadelphia litigation cited campaign materials distributed by the Democratic Party listing all city council candidates running at-large except for one African-American and one Latino candidate.[368]

Private Slating

Three courts found that conduct by private organizations denied minority candidates access to slating processes.[369] In the City of Chicago Heights litigation the court identified such conduct in the activities of an organization called the Concerned Citizens Group, a group that had no African-American members and chose candidates for city council elections. The court noted the absence of evidence showing either that black voters had input into this slating process or that they could gain access to the ballot absent access to that process.[370] In the City of Gretna litigation, the district court found that electoral success hinged on the endorsement of a local political faction known as the Miller-White Ticket, and that the Ticket routinely blocked black candidates.[371] In the Pasadena Independent School District litigation, the court noted that essential campaign contributions flowed to candidates endorsed by a group called Communities United for Better Schools ("CUBS"). Since a CUBS endorsement typically led to candidate success on election day, and because CUBS had only once endorsed a Hispanic candidate, the court concluded that Factor 4 was satisfied.[372]

In the City of Dallas litigation the district court noted that an organization known as the Citizen's Charter Association had denied black and Latino candidates access to slating through 1977.[373] Because the group no longer existed, however, the factor was not found.

Inference of Slating

One court inferred a denial of access to slating processes given the absence of African-American candidates running for office.[374]

Slating Not Found

In an additional 13 cases, plaintiffs introduced what they contended was evidence of slating but courts did not find that minority candidates had been denied access. Courts in 5 cases rejected evidence regarding private slating processes either because the slating organizations were defunct by the time litigation was initiated[375] or because the activities of the group in question did not fit the court's definition of a slating organization.[376] Anecdotal evidence of slating was conclusorily rejected in another two lawsuits.[377]

Three lawsuits viewed electoral success by minority candidates as evidence of access to slating processes. Additionally, in the Alamosa County litigation,[378] the court assumed without deciding that the Democratic Central Committee played a functional role in the selection of county commission candidates, but concluded that anecdotal testimony about ethnically biased comments and "boorish behavior" by some members of the committee was insufficient to establish a "policy or practice" that denied non-white candidates access to slating. Finally, 2 lawsuits attributed the exclusion of minority candidates from slating processes to partisanship rather than race.[379]

SENATE FACTOR 5: Ongoing Effects of Discrimination (Education, Employment, Health)

The fifth Senate factor calls for evaluation of "the extent to which members of the minority group bear the effects of discrimination in such areas as education, employment and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process." Of the 129 lawsuits addressing this factor, 84 found the factor to be met. Forty-five lawsuits finding Factor 5 originated in jurisdictions covered by Section 5 of the VRA. In 50 lawsuits finding Factor 5, Section 2 was violated, and an additional 4 lawsuits ended favorably for the plaintiffs.[380] Courts have evaluated Factor 5 in several different ways.

Depressed Socio-Economic Status Alone

Several courts found Factor 5 based on a finding of historic discrimination and some showing that the minority group experiences comparatively low socio-economic status. In 12 lawsuits, courts used this approach and found the factor met.[381]

Nexus Between Discrimination and Participation

Most courts require some kind of nexus not only between a history of discrimination and lowered socio-economic status, but also between depressed socio-economic status and the ability to participate in the political process. In 31 cases, courts assumed or deduced, sometimes aided by expert testimony, that lower socio-economic status hindered the minority group's ability to participate effectively in the political process and found the factor met.[382] These courts pointed out, for example, that depressed socio-economic status hinders one's ability to raise money and mount a campaign,[383] and to campaign in large districts.384 Moreover, lower socio-economic status often creates geographic and social isolation from other members of the community, connection with whom may be critical to engage in effective political action.[385] One district court specifically noted that depressed socio-economic status makes it difficult for minority candidates to run for particularly low paying public positions.[386]

Proof of Depressed Participation

In the majority of lawsuits, however, courts concluded that Factor 5 requires concrete evidence of depressed participation as measured through voter registration and turnout statistics. Out of the 35 cases quantifying minority political participation according to voter registration and turnout statistics, 24 found Factor 5 based on depressed minority registration and turnout,[387] while eleven courts found the factor unsatisfied when presented with nearly equal voting participation rates.[388] As a measure of political participation, several courts view turnout as more probative than registration rates.[389]

In an additional 2 cases, the courts made conclusory assertions that socio-economic disadvantage did not hinder political participation by the minority group in question.[390] In another 10 cases, the court did not find Factor 5 met because plaintiffs had not presented sufficient evidence to show whether or not the minority group actually suffered from lower political participation.[391]

Holistic Approach to Participation

Other courts considered statistical measures of voting participation but did so in combination with significant testimonial evidence. Five courts, for example, examined under Factor 5 the effect of various forms of de facto racial segregation on the ability of minority groups to participate in the political process.[392] For example, the district court in the Charleston County litigation noted severe societal and housing segregation and found that this ongoing racial separation "makes it especially difficult for African-American candidates seeking county-wide office to reach out to and communicate with the predominately white electorate from whom they must obtain substantial support to win an at-large elections [sic]."[393] The district court in the Neal litigation likewise concluded that similar segregation meant "that whites in the County have historically had little personal knowledge of or social contact with blacks...Quite simply, whites do not know blacks and are, as a result, highly unlikely to vote for black candidates."[394]

Causation and Voter Apathy

Five courts refused to find Factor 5 even in the face of specific evidence of both depressed socio-economic status and low levels of political participation.[395] These courts required additional evidence showing that discrimination directly caused depressed participation.

Some defendants have argued that low participation is not the result of discrimination, but is instead caused by voter apathy. Courts have disputed the relevance of voter apathy within this inquiry into causation. Four courts concluded that voter apathy, as opposed to socio-economic status, best explained low levels of political participation by minority voters in the jurisdiction.[396] At least 5 other courts, however, attributed voter apathy to the very sources of discrimination Factor 5 identifies.[397] In the City of Gretna litigation, for example, the district court held that voter apathy was not an independent cause of low political participation, but was instead a product of the very discrimination that depressed black socio-economic status. The court noted that "[d]epressed levels of participation in voting and candidacy are inextricably involved in the perception of futility and impotence" engendered by "severe historical disadvantage."[398] The court concluded that "[t]hese historical disadvantages continue through the present day and undoubtedly hinder the ability of the black community to participate effectively in the political process within the City of Gretna."[399]

Significance of Past Discrimination

In one case, the district court required plaintiffs to establish that official discrimination caused the current socio-economic disparities.[400] In another, the district court concluded that plaintiffs had not carried their burden of proof because they could not show that socio-economic disparities were the specific result of discrimination within the challenged jurisdiction itself.[401] In three cases, district courts discounted evidence of low socio-economic status amongst Latinos because the evidence did not distinguish recent immigrants from longstanding residents. This approach posits that new immigrants cannot bear the effects of discrimination in housing, employment or health within the meaning of Factor 5 and thus the failure to distinguish them from other members of the minority group leaves courts unable to find the factor satisfied.[402]

Intransigence of Inequality

Some courts discounted evidence of low socio-economic status because they determined that the status was too intransigent to receive significant weight.[403] In the Magnolia Bar Association litigation, the district court found sufficient evidence to establish the factor,[404] but concluded that Factor 5 described a condition too common to weigh heavily in plaintiffs' failure. The court observed that because "the socioeconomic standing of blacks vis-a-vis whites has changed little and it is unlikely that standing will improve markedly in the foreseeable future," continuing socio-economic effects of discrimination "will be a factor on which the plaintiffs in voting rights cases will always win in the foreseeable future. The issue thus becomes one of weight to be afforded this factor.[405]

SENATE FACTOR 6: Racial Appeals in Campaigns

The sixth factor in the Senate Report instructs courts to assess whether political campaigns have been characterized by overt or subtle racial appeals. Of the cases surveyed, 48 lawsuits considered evidence addressing this factor. Thirty-one of these identified such an appeal and found the factor met. Seventeen (or 54.8%) of these 31 lawsuits were in covered jurisdictions, while 14 were in non-covered jurisdictions. Eighteen also held that Section 2 was violated and another issued a preliminary injunction. Of the successful lawsuits finding this factor, 12 (or 63.2%) occurred in covered jurisdictions.[406]

Some courts noted that campaigns generally have been marked by racial appeals,[407] but most decisions finding Factor 6 identified appeals in specific campaign years. These courts have identified racial appeals in 59 specific elections occurring in 1950, 1954, 1960, 1968, 1970, 1971, 1972, 1975, 1976, 1977, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990, 1991, 1992, 1995, 2000 and 2002.[408] Courts finding Factor 6 identified 42 specific racial appeals or campaigns characterized by racial appeals since 1982.[409] Of these, 27 occurred in covered jurisdictions.[410]

While some courts have stated without elaboration that elections have been marked by racial appeals,[411] others have identified racial appeals in a wide range of conduct. Courts have disagreed, however, as to whether any particular conduct should be considered a racial appeal.

Identification of the candidate's race

In 6 lawsuits, courts identified as racial appeals a variety of statements in which a candidate's race was identified, including comments by white candidates or their campaign workers that their opponent was black,[412] statements by minority candidates in which they identified their minority status,[413] and newspaper articles that mentioned the race of the candidates.[414]

Photographs

Numerous courts have identified the use of photographs in campaign flyers and advertisements as racial appeals. The majority of these cases involved campaign materials distributed by a white candidate or the candidate's supporters that featured the photograph of an African-American opponent.[415]

No court has deemed the decision by a newspaper to publish candidates' photographs a racial appeal.[416] In the City of Jackson litigation, for example, the district court acknowledged that the publication of candidates' photographs might prompt "some white voters [to] vote for a white candidate and some black voters [to] vote for a black candidate," but, the court concluded, "that is merely a fact of political life in Jackson."[417] Two lawsuits characterized as racial appeals the manipulation of photographs to darken the skin of opposing candidates, be they minority or white.[418] The Charleston County litigation recounted the use of this tactic in three separate campaigns occurring in 1988, 1990, and 1992. In each instance, white candidates and their campaigns distributed official campaign literature or placed newspaper ads featuring the darkened photos of African-American opponents.[419] The City of Philadelphia litigation discussed the use of similar tactics in two different campaigns. In a state senate campaign in the early 1990s, one white candidate published a brochure containing a darkened photograph of his white opponent next to a photograph of Philadelphia's black mayor.[420] The other involved a televised campaign advertisement in the 1985 district attorney campaign that portrayed light-skinned African-American candidates as having much darker skin.[421]

The Specter of Minority Governance

Courts have held Factor 6 satisfied by a variety of allusions or threats of minority control of government. Conduct of this sort includes references by white candidates or their campaigns that minority voters will engage in "bloc voting" and turn out in high numbers,[422] that a minority will be elected if whites don't turn out,[423] and that minority candidates, when elected, will appoint other minorities to positions of power.[424] Similarly characterized are statements by white candidates that the minority community wants to "take over" the local government, and the country.[425]

In the Armour litigation, for example, campaign workers for a white 1985 mayoral candidate went door to door telling voters that if the black candidate was elected, "his cabinet would be black." They also drove a sound truck around Youngstown announcing that should the minority candidate be elected "we will have a black police chief, we will have a black fire chief," and adding "we cannot have that."[426] More recently, in the Bone Shirt litigation, the district court identified racial appeals occurring during the 2002 primary elections for county commission, in which three Native American candidates confronted accusations that Indians were seeking to "take over the county politically...[and] trying to take back land and put it in trust."[427]

In-group and Out-group

Two courts identified as racial appeals campaign advertisements making reference a candidate's being "one of us"[428] or promising to stand against vandalism and crime that "drive our people and our businesses out" of the community.[429] In the City of Holyoke litigation the district court categorized as a racial appeal the "us versus them" sentiment featured in one candidate's 1987 campaign materials where "the 'us' was fairly clearly the longtime white residential community, the 'them' the more recent Hispanic minority."[430] The district court noted, for example, the campaign's focus on "teach[ing] the 'Spanish' English ...as an answer to increasing crime and vandalism" and featured an advertisement with a "large picture of an Hispanic young man, cigarette dangling from his lips and the caption 'The people who really should read this, can't.' "[431]

Race-baiting

In the Charleston County litigation, the district court identified as a racial appeal the efforts to increase turnout among voters perceived to be "anti-black."[432] In 1990, the campaign of a candidate for Lt. Governor of South Carolina paid Benjamin Hunt, Jr., "a nearly illiterate African-American man" to run in a congressional primary.[431] The candidate took no part in the campaign beyond allowing his picture to be taken while standing in front of a Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant. A consultant hired by the would-be Lt. Governor's campaign mailed out thousands of leaflets featuring this picture with the caption "Hunt for Congress."[434]

The Portent of Racial Strife

Also counting as racial appeals are statements suggesting racial strife or even violence will ensue if minority candidates or candidates associated with minority interests were supported or elected.[435]

Guilt By Association

Efforts to link a candidate with polarizing figures or organizations have been deemed racial appeals. Four courts, for example, have identified as racial appeals statements by white candidates linking a minority candidate with Jesse Jackson[436] or Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam.[437] Another characterized as a racial appeal statements by an African-American candidate that his white opponent was supported by the Ku Klux Klan.[438]

Courts have also found evidence supporting a finding of Factor 6 in efforts to link a white opponent with minority elected officials or issues of minority concern. For example, two district courts classified as racial appeals the campaign literature of white candidates who featured photographs of their opponents, also white, alongside pictures of unaffiliated African-American elected officials.[439] Another district court identified as a racial appeal a private slating organization's reference to a white candidate's association with a black candidate and his support for voter registration in the minority community.[440]

Discussion of Racially Charged Issues

In 5 lawsuits courts identified as racial appeals candidates' statements on certain racially charged issues. These issues included illegal immigration,[441] low income housing,[442] busing and school desegregation,[443] and crime.[444] In the Town of Hempstead litigation, the district court found a racial appeal in a campaign brochure distributed by a candidate for town council in 1997. The brochure noted the candidate's awareness of "his community's proximity to the City of New York," his opposition to those who would seek to "Queensify" the town, and his concern about the danger of "urban crime spilling over the county border." The brochure celebrated the candidate's efforts to "sensitize[] local patrolmen to the special concerns of the community," a statement the court identified as a reference to an "unofficial border patrol policy" under which the police were to stop black youth from Queens, "find out their business and ensure that they 'go back where they belong.'"[445]

One district court identified as a racial appeal public debate on a racially charged issue, absent any linkage to any particular candidate or campaign.[446] Another viewed such debate as evidence supporting the inference that other campaigns are characterized by racial appeals.[447]

Not all courts treat the presence of racially charged issues in campaigns or general public debate as racial appeals. Three district courts rejected plaintiffs' contentions that candidates' discussion of busing and school desegregation should be classified as racial appeals.[448] The district court in the City of Norfolk litigation stated that the inclusion of such issues in campaigns was of "legitimate public concern and not an appeal to racial prejudices," and noted that both black and white candidates addressed the issue of busing "reluctantly and often only when questioned by the public about their stance."[449] Similarly, the court in the City of St. Louis litigation stated that while school desegregation has "an undeniable racial dimension," plaintiffs presented no evidence that the issue was raised "in an effort to appeal to members of a particular race."[450] In the Red Clay School District litigation, plaintiffs introduced into evidence a candidate's flyer that warned of increasing percentages of minority students at local high schools and the potential for "major disruption for our children." The flyer stated that "Bill Manning is the only candidate who has said over and over again that he favors stability. To deal with overcrowding, he supports change within our same feeders, keeping our children together." While the court characterized the flyer as "shrill," it declined to characterize it as a racial appeal because it does not identify the race of any candidate nor does it "malign one of the candidates or his supporters because of race."[451]

One district court refused to characterize debate about at-large and single-member districts as a racial appeal.[452] Another district court refused to "consider every discussion of or question about" Indian exemption from certain taxes a racial appeal, notwithstanding the district court's recognition that "white voters harbor a resentment over this issue, making white support for Indian candidates unlikely."[453]

Racial Bias in Press Coverage

Racial bias exhibited by the press has been deemed a racial appeal in 2 cases. In the Bone Shirt litigation, the court credited as evidence of racial appeals unsubstantiated and false news stories circulating throughout 2002 linking Native Americans to voter fraud.[454] Likewise, in the City of Dallas litigation, a 1989 newspaper column warning that a vote for the African-American candidate running against the incumbent white mayor "could lead to racial violence and white flight" was classified as a racial appeal.[455]

Candidate Intimidation

Some courts have characterized as racial appeals conduct directed at minority candidates as opposed to voters. In the Jeffers litigation, for example, the court termed a racial appeal a black candidate's receipt of anonymous calls where the caller used obscenities and racial slurs as well as a later incident in which the same candidate was run off the road by a group of individuals wearing hoods.[456] Jeffers also deemed a racial appeal government retaliation against an unsuccessful minority candidate. Prior to his political involvement, the candidate had enjoyed a business relationship with the county that was terminated after his campaign.[457]

In the Garza v. Los Angeles litigation, the district court cited "substantial evidence" of racial appeals including hostility directed at a Latino candidate for city council who "had doors slammed in his face" while campaigning in a predominantly white neighborhood.[458] It similarly characterized the destruction of the candidate's campaign literature.

Racial Slurs or Stereotypes

Courts have also deemed a racial appeal the public use of racial epithets and slurs by white candidates running against black candidates.[459] One district court found a white official's admission before the court in 2002 that he casually and regularly uses the word "nigger" to be a racial appeal, even though the plaintiffs made no allegation that racial appeals existed.[460]

So too, courts have identified condescending stereotypes about minority candidates' lack of qualifications as racial appeals. For example, the district court in the City of Dallas litigation so classified a 1970 ad where the white incumbent described his opponent simply as "A black man (no qualifications of any kind)."[461] In the same case, the district court also noted a boast made by a white female candidate and printed in the League of Women Voters 1972 voter guide that "evidence of [her] proven ability" was the fact that no white men opposed her, and that her only opponents were black men.[462] Although more subtle, the district court in the Neal litigation identified a similar type of racial appeal in an editorial run in the local newspaper. The editorial announced the race of two black candidates only to go on to urge voters "not to vote on account of race, but rather on merit." Still, the editorial noted that one of the races involving an African-American candidate was "of great concern to many county residents" because the black candidate could win "solid black support" and defeat the white incumbent. The editorial weighed in for the re-election of the "more experienced" incumbents.[463]

Sources of Evidence

In most cases, plaintiffs seeking to prove Factor 6 introduce earlier campaign literature and advertisements, documentation of media coverage, and witness testimony from minority and non-minority candidates, elected officials, and community members. In two cases, however the court looked beyond these normal sources of evidence in finding the presence of racial appeals. In the Wamser litigation, the district court found the defendant's expert testimony attempting to refute plaintiffs' showing of racial appeals not to be credible seemingly on the basis of the Judge's own experiences —"Dr. Wendel's observation that other political campaigns are devoid of racial appeals would be most credible perhaps to persons who were not in St. Louis during the recent campaign for the City school board."[464] In the City of Philadelphia litigation, the court credited as Factor 6 evidence complaints of racial appeals received from voters and investigated by a local non-profit commission.

Discounting Racial Appeals

Several lawsuits identifying racial appeals discounted their import. Some characterized the appeals as merely "isolated" incidents.[465] Others called the appeals ineffective because the targeted candidate was elected, at times with significant white support.[466] In the Alamosa County litigation, the court identified "a fundamental electoral truth — that to be elected in Alamosa County, a candidate must appeal to both Anglo and Hispanic voters," such that racial appeals by Hispanic candidates certainly did not weigh in favor of a finding of vote dilution.[467]

Eight lawsuits held that racial appeals occurred too long ago to be probative in contemporary claims.[468] Appeals deemed too remote include ones occurring more than thirty years earlier,[469] as well as ones occurring a decade past.[470] Two courts discounted evidence of racial appeals as dated by noting a new political reality characterized by "racial harmony."[471]

In the Charleston County litigation, the court identified numerous racial appeals, but concluded without explanation that "[e]vidence of racial appeals has not materially assisted the Court in reaching a conclusion" on Section 2 liability.[472] Likewise, in the Magnolia Bar Association litigation, the district court acknowledged the presence of both overt and subtle racial appeals in campaigns, while concluding that "the appeal for voters by both black and white candidates crosses racial lines, thereby minimizing the importance of this factor under the totality of the circumstances."[473]

SENATE FACTOR 7: Success of Minority Candidates

Under Senate Factor 7, courts must evaluate the "extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction."[474] Of the lawsuits analyzed, 137 specifically addressed this factor, and 85 found a lack of minority candidate success. Of these, 60 (71%) also found a violation of Section 2. Two additional lawsuits ended in outcomes favorable to plaintiffs, albeit not with an adjudicated Section 2 violation. Twenty-five lawsuits found Factor 7 but did not find a violation of the statute. Fifty-two lawsuits addressed but did not find Factor 7, and of these,[475] only one found a Section 2 violation. Forty-nine (57.6%) of the Factor 7 findings were in covered jurisdictions, while 36 (42.4%) were in non-covered jurisdictions.[476]

Courts evaluating Factor 7 looked primarily at election results and counted the number of minority candidates elected. Courts generally examined minority success over the course of several elections, typically occurring over decades.[477] Several cases distinguished election results occurring before the lawsuit was initiated and those afterward, and often discounted evidence of post-filing minority success as strategic efforts to frustrate the lawsuit.[478]

Unsurprisingly, Factor 7 weighed heavily in the plaintiffs' favor in cases where electoral results revealed a total failure or near total failure of minority candidates to be elected. Courts have repeatedly found a lack of minority success in this situation.[479] On the other hand, Factor 7 favored defendants where electoral results showed significant success of minority candidates.[480]

Electoral results do not constitute the entire inquiry under Factor 7. Numerous courts have also considered the record of minority electoral success in conjunction with population statistics. Because Section 2 is explicit that the statute provides no right to proportional representation,[481] some courts have deemed an absence of proportional representation irrelevant to the Factor 7 analysis.[482] Others, however, have viewed proportional minority representation (or its absence) as informing the Factor 7 inquiry. Several courts deemed the absence of such representation to suggest a lack of minority electoral success under Factor 7,483 while others viewed evidence that minority officeholders approached or exceeded the proportion of minorities in the electorate as proof of minority electoral success.[484] Still, some courts concluded that greater-than-proportional electoral success did not compel a finding that Factor 7 was unsatisfied.[485]

The nature and prominence of the offices to which minority candidates had been elected also informed the Factor 7 inquiry. Some courts deemed the absence of minority candidates in top offices evidence of a lack of minority success, notwithstanding minority election to "lesser" positions.[486] Other courts viewed minority success in these "lesser" elections as sufficient evidence of minority electoral success, even where minority candidates did not win top offices.[487] For some courts, the success of minority candidates in exogenous elections was sufficient evidence of minority electoral success, even where minority candidates did not win any office in the challenged jurisdiction.[488] Many courts compared minority electoral success in endogenous elections to other elections for city, county or statewide offices. Most, however, emphasized that exoge-nous elections were less probative of electoral difficulty or success.[489] Some courts accorded almost no weight to exogenous electoral evidence,[490] and several appellate courts reversed district court decisions finding that plaintiffs failed to meet Factor 7 based on exogenous electoral success.[491]

Some courts cited the appointment of minority officials to support a finding that Factor 7 had,[492] or had not been met.[493] For instance, in the Town of Hempstead litigation, the appellate court acknowledged that black Republicans had been appointed to various offices in the surrounding area and to "a number of positions" in the Town, but emphasized that the "only one black... elected to Town office since the establishment of the Town Board . . . [was] a Republican who was appointed to the Board in 1993 and elected the same year."[494] Thus, where minority electoral "success" hinges on the advantages of incumbency secured through appointment, some courts have found that such "success" has little bearing on the ability of minority candidates to win elections generally.

Several lawsuits looked beyond electoral results to assess the number of minority candidates participating in given races. Some courts noted that the failure of minority citizens to "offer themselves" as candidates weighed against finding a lack of minority electoral success.[495] In the Red Clay School District litigation, for example, the district court noted the absence of black candidates running for the school board in several elections. Although it acknowledged that "a sustained inability to elect black preferred candidates could create an atmosphere" that might discourage African-American candidacies, the court found evidence supporting the existence of such an "atmosphere" lacking in the case before it. It noted in particular the success of one black candidate and the absence of an onerous slating process.[496] Other courts, however, considered the possibility that a dearth of minority candidates might itself stem from "the very barriers to political participation that Congress has sought to remove" and weighed the small number of minority candidates in favor of plaintiffs.[497]

A few lawsuits included within the Factor 7 inquiry an examination of the qualifications of successful and unsuccessful minority candidates. Evidence suggesting that minority candidates were not serious or viable weighed against plaintiffs in the Fort Bend Independent School District litigation,[498] while the defeat of well-qualified minority candidates contributed to findings of a lack of minority electoral success in a small number of cases.[499] The failure of prominent white Democrats to rally behind a minority candidate contributed to finding Factor 7 in at least one case.[500]

In 12 lawsuits, courts distinguished minority candidates from minority-preferred candidates. Seven of these courts seemed willing to gauge minority electoral success based on the success of minority-preferred candidates, even when those candidates themselves were non-minority.[501] In 5 lawsuits, courts were more skeptical about whether non-minority candidates were minority-preferred.[502] In the City of Cincinnati litigation, for example, the appellate court stated that "the Act's guarantee of equal opportunity is not met when . . .'candidates favored by blacks can win, but only if the candidates are white.' "[503] The court suggested that the inability of black voters to elect their preferred candidate unless that candidate is white signals that black voters have been denied an "opportunity enjoyed by white voters, namely, the opportunity to elect a candidate of their own race."[504]

Under certain circumstances, courts discounted evidence of minority electoral success or an apparent lack thereof. Some lawsuits, for example, viewed the defeat of minority candidates by relatively small margins as mitigating evidence of limited minority electoral success.[505] At least one lawsuit discounted the election of a minority candidate where that candidate was "emphatically not the candidate of choice of the county's African-American voters."[506]

Several courts examining Factor 7 tended to discount minority electoral success absent evidence that the minority candidate received the support of white voters. Apparently agreeing with the Supreme Court's characterization of the majority-minority district as the "politics of second best,"[507] these courts seemed to place more weight on minority success in at-large elections than in majority-minority districts.[508] So too, a few courts discounted as evidence of minority electoral success the experience of an African-American official, first appointed to the city board and then re-elected because the official not only enjoyed the benefits of incumbency but also never faced a white opponent.[509] Conversely, another court credited as evidence of minority electoral success the election of candidates who had originally been appointed to office where evidence established that these candidates subsequently developed "sustained biracial coalitions" and retained their positions through more than "sheer power of incumbency."[510]

SENATE FACTOR 8: Significant Lack of Responsiveness

In addition to the seven "typical" factors listed above, the Senate Report adds two additional factors "that in some cases have had probative value" in establishing a Section 2 violation. The first is whether there "is a significant lack of responsiveness on the part of elected officials to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group."[511] Of the lawsuits surveyed, 106 lawsuits addressed this factor and 19 (or 17.9%) found responsiveness lacking.[512] Of those finding the factor, 13 (or 68.4%) ended favorably for the plaintiffs.[513] Thus, only 4 lawsuits (21%) that found a significant lack of responsiveness found in favor of the defendant. Thirty-two lawsuits that addressed but failed to find Factor 8 also held Section 2 to be violated.[514] Thirteen cases considered lack of responsiveness but made no finding.[515]

Nine (47.4%) of the lawsuits that found a significant lack of responsiveness were in jurisdictions covered under Section 5; ten (52.6%) were not.[516] Of the 19 lawsuits that found a significant lack of responsiveness, all found a history of discrimination, 14 found Factor 1 was met, 15 found the minority candidate had difficulty getting elected, and 14 found racial bloc voting.[517]

Courts addressing responsiveness took varying approaches to evaluating the factor and what it encompasses. The Senate Report did not define the term, and courts have rarely attempted a general definition, opting instead to evaluate the factor based on specific examples presented in any given case.[518] Nevertheless, the cases suggest that courts view responsiveness as having two distinct components: substantive and procedural.

Substantive responsiveness

In the majority of lawsuits addressing Factor 8, courts viewed the responsiveness inquiry as requiring examination of the substantive policies enacted or implemented by the jurisdiction at issue. Courts applying this approach nevertheless disagreed significantly about which substantive policies signal responsiveness and which do not.

Numerous courts have held that evidence of affirmative discrimination directed at the minority group established a lack of responsiveness to that community.[519] Courts have cited adjudicated court decisions addressing school desegregation, employment discrimination and a violation of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act;[520] resistance to school desegregation orders;[521] evidence of disparate treatment;[522] and instances of racial hostility.[523] In making this determination, courts generally restricted their inquiry to conduct within the jurisdiction of the governing body, be it a school board[524] or a general local government.[525] Courts generally did not consider discriminatory conduct when outside the jurisdictional authority of the challenged governing body.[526]

In 25 lawsuits, courts held that elected officials are responsive absent evidence they engage in affirmative discrimination against the minority group.[527] In this context, courts have cited the absence of evidence establishing such discrimination, including the nondiscriminatory provision of city services,[528] and in particular road paving policy.[529] Courts have also deemed as responsive efforts by local officials to address or correct discriminatory practices. For instance, courts have deemed "responsive" governing bodies that achieves "unitary" status for previously de jure segregated schools,[530] that enters into consent decrees,[531] or that change to randomized selection of jury roles from a system where commissioners choose who will serve on grand and petit juries.[532] For other courts, the failure of localities to make similar efforts to remedy past discrimination is evidence of unresponsiveness.[533] Courts have also held that a jurisdiction's failure to remedy evident inequalities absent a court order or other compulsion suggests unresponsiveness,[534] while a willingness to provide such remedies absent legal compulsion favors finding the jurisdiction responsive to minority needs. Thus, the Red Clay School District's recalcitrance in implementing a school desegregation plan signaled its unresponsiveness, while Monroe County's initiative in being one of the first Mississippi counties to implement randomized jury selection weighed in its favor.[535]

In lawsuits challenging judicial elections, courts also equated nondiscrimination with responsiveness. None of the 8 lawsuits to address unresponsiveness in this context found the factor to be present.[536] Four expressly state that the only type of responsiveness a judge may properly demonstrate is to be fair and impartial,[537] and 3 deemed the absence of evidence suggesting judges were unfair or biased proof that Factor 8 was not met.[538]

Thirty-one lawsuits suggested that nondiscrimination alone was insufficient to establish responsiveness.[539] These courts looked for evidence of affirmative measures serving the minority community before finding responsiveness.[540]

A few lawsuits deemed the failure to adopt an affirmative action policy evidence of unresponsiveness;[541] while others cited such a policy to support finding responsiveness.[542] Several courts viewed the failure to hire or to appoint minority employees evidence of a lack of responsiveness,[543] while in 16 lawsuits, courts viewed jurisdictions as responsive because they employed or appointed minorities or were making a good faith effort to do so.[544] Further, the provision of bilingual education supported a finding of responsiveness.[545]

Numerous courts have focused on funding decisions in assessing responsiveness.[546] As noted above, several courts have held that failure to provide equal funding for projects in minority neighborhoods shows unresponsiveness,[547] while others courts cited the absence of discrimination in funding decisions sufficient to establish responsiveness.[548] Some courts, by contrast, have suggested that equal funding of particular projects, road paving in particular, insufficient to establish responsiveness, where the needs of minority communities had long been neglected.[549] Six courts found a lack of responsiveness where elected officials failed to fund projects in minority neighborhoods,[550] (particularly while funding comparable projects in white neighborhoods[551]), or failed to participate in federal programs which would fund such projects for the minority community.[552] In 14 lawsuits, courts have found responsiveness where officials provided minority communities disproportionately large amounts of funding[553] and directed funds to minority neighborhoods for improvements.[554]

A few courts viewed the acceptance of federal aid or efforts to secure such aid directed to minority interests as evidence of responsiveness.[555] In other lawsuits, however, courts viewed the same conduct as bearing little weight on the responsiveness inquiry. The Fifth Circuit suggested such evidence was "suspect" in making a responsiveness finding because the funding showed no actual commitment on the part of the jurisdiction to minority interests.[556]

Finally, some courts have discounted conduct that might otherwise count as responsive when the jurisdiction implementing it does so under legal or economic compulsion.[557] Thus, increased efforts toward hiring minorities do not establish responsiveness where the threatened withdrawal of federal funds propelled the action.[558] Similarly, desegregating long-segregated schools does little to show responsiveness where the school board pursues this course only after threats from the state board of education.[559]

Procedural responsiveness

A number of courts viewed responsiveness more as a question of process than of outcome. Here, courts focus on communication between elected officials and their minority constituents and the extent to which elected representatives advocate for measures that serve the particularized needs of the minority community. The effort to secure enactment or implementation of such measures matters as much as, if not more than, achieving the desired outcome.

Officials are unresponsive under this model when they actively oppose or otherwise evince hostility to the desires of minority community.[560] They are also unresponsive when they fail to address policies that the minority community seeks to have addressed, or do not respond to requests from or advocate for needs of the minority community.[561] For instance, in Jeffers litigation, the district court considered under Factor 8 the reluctance of white legislators to co-sponsor "bills of interest to black voters-for example, the bill to create a holiday in honor of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr."[562] The district court noted the difficulties faced by both black constituents and black members of the Arkansas State Legislature when lobbying for such support.[563]

By contrast, evidence that an official supports causes championed by minorities weighs in favor of responsiveness. The focus is less on securing the desired outcome than on the official's engagement with the issue.[564] In the Cincinnati litigation, the court considered that the minority community "vocally protested that the at-large election system dilutes their voting strength, and has demanded change," and found "the City Council has debated the issue a number of times and several proposed ordinances have been before the Council. Council-members have made statements supporting change and decrying the lack of minority proportional representation on City Council."[565] This provided evidence of the city's responsiveness.

A lack of responsiveness is also displayed when an elected official simply ignores minority requests or complaints,[566] or refuses or otherwise fails to meet with minority constituents.[567] The district court in the Jeffers Litigation, for example, recounts an incident in which at least one white state representative referred black constituents to black members of the state legislature, rather than meeting with them.[568] Similarly, courts have found evidence of unresponsiveness when white elected officials were unable to identify any concerns particular to their constituent minority community.[569]

Meeting with or generally being available to meet with minority constituents, by contrast, favors of responsiveness,[570] as does seeking out minority groups or purposely including them in the decision making process.[571] For instance, in the Terrazas litigation the court considered the process the county went through to adopt a redistrict plan and found "far from evidencing official discrimination, [the plan] convincingly evidences full minority access to the redistricting process and a willingness on the part of almost all involved in that process to consider and effectuate minority proposals."[572]

In 13 lawsuits, courts found responsiveness when an elected official was dependent on minority votes either for election or to implement a desired policy.[573] Many of the courts simply asserted that officials dependent on minority voters will be respondent to these constituents. Similarly, courts considering this dependency often consider Factor 8 based on electoral mechanisms such as a plurality feature,[574] or racially polarized voting.[575] These electoral mechanisms affect the chances that a candidate will be "dependent" on them. Implicit in some of these cases and explicitly stated others is the observation that dependency on minority votes prompts responsiveness largely of a procedural sort. These "dependent" officials will meet with their minority constituents, seek out their views, be familiar with their concerns, and advocate on their behalf.

In related reasoning, four lawsuits suggest that responsiveness is shown by candidates who actively solicit minority votes, either via "door-knocking," or seeking endorsements from minority organizations.[576] Further, 6 lawsuits held that evidence that elected officials promoted voter registration, or otherwise encouraged political participation by the minority community established responsiveness.[577] Thus, efforts to facilitate black voter registration through home visits and special assistance available at voting precincts demonstrated that jurisdiction's responsiveness.[578]

Finally, courts in 4 lawsuits found a significant lack of responsiveness where jurisdictions did not facilitate minority political participation by failing, for instance, to establish a polling place in a minority community or appoint as volunteer registrars minority community members offering their services.[579] All of these lawsuits happened within the first five years of the passage of the 1982 amendments to Section 2.

SENATE FACTOR 9: Tenuous Policy Justification for the Challenged Practice

The second additional factor the Senate Report lists for consideration, called in this report Factor 9, is "whether the justification for the policy behind the practice is tenuous."[580] Governmental policy underlying a practice is "less important under the results test" than it was under the intent test. It remains relevant, however, both because a bad purpose or policy "is circumstantial evidence that the device has a discriminatory result," and because "the tenuousness of the justification for a state policy may indicate that the policy is unfair."[581]

Of the lawsuits analyzed, 66 lawsuits considered whether the policy underlying the challenged practice or procedure was tenuous. Twenty-two of these lawsuits held the identified justification to be tenuous, twelve coming from Section 5-covered jurisdictions and 10 from non-covered. Of this total, 20 lawsuits also held Section 2 was violated.[582] Of the lawsuits that found this factor, 20 also found Factor 1, 20 found legally significant racial bloc voting, 19 found Factor 5, and 21 found Factor 7. Sixty-six lawsuits found a Section 2 violation or ended with a successful outcome for the plaintiffs without finding Factor 9. Of these, 55 did not consider tenuousness, and the remainder accepted the justification proffered.[583]

Twelve lawsuits addressed Factor 9 in cases where defendants offered no justification for the challenged policy.[584] In this circumstance, 8 courts deemed the justification (or lack thereof) tenuous.[585] Four did not, either because the plaintiffs presented no evidence on tenuousness, or because the court itself came up with a legitimate justification for the policy.[586]

Defendants offered a number of substantive justifications for plans challenged under Section 2. Most courts accepted these justifications as not tenuous. Those that did not generally deemed the reason proffered to be (1) false, (2) impermissible, or (3) outweighed by other considerations.

In a number of cases, for example, defendants claimed challenged districting plans preserved municipal and other political boundaries. Most courts accepted this justification as nontenuous,[587] although one deemed this goal tenuous where the jurisdiction did not consistently adhere to it.[588] So too, when defendants claimed the challenged policy was based on political will, some courts accepted this justification,[589] but others did not where they found it was not the true underlying reason for the policy.[590]

Several jurisdictions defended their at-large districts on the ground that the practice fostered accountability and responsiveness among elected representatives. Many courts accepted this policy justification as nontenuous,[591] but some did not, including a few that rejected the argument because they had already found the jurisdiction was unresponsive under Factor 8.[592] Courts, however, have consistently upheld as nontenuous the claim that defendant jurisdictions designed at-large systems for electing judges to prevent judges from being too accountable or responsive to particular constituents.[593]

Many jurisdictions defended their districting choices or other electoral practices on the ground that the plans or practices protected incumbents or other political allies. Some courts accepted this justification as nontenuous.[594] A number of courts, however, deemed this justification tenuous when protecting white incumbents necessarily diluted minority voting strength and the jurisdiction knew of this consequence.[595] Indeed, some courts have concluded that these policies amount to intentional racial discrimination.[596]

In several lawsuits, jurisdictions defended challenged practices on grounds of efficiency or ease of administration, and many courts accepted these justifications.[597] The court in the Operation Push litigation, however, deemed administrative ease tenuous as a justification for a dual registration system, concluding that "[m]ere inconvenience to the state is no justification for burdening citizens in the exercise of their protected right to register to vote."[598]

In several lawsuits, jurisdictions invoked historical practice to justify challenged electoral practices. Most courts accepted this justification as nontenuous.[599] In Milwaukee NAACP litigation, for example, the court noted that Wisconsin's historic practice of electing judges at-large, a practice dating to 1848, set the default basis for what was reasonable in the state.[600] In the Kirksey v. Allain litigation, however, the court deemed historic practice a tenuous justification for using a numbered post system because other judicial bodies in the state no longer used it.[601]

Some jurisdictions defended challenged practices on the ground that the Fourteenth Amendment and Voting Rights Act required the adopted policy. Some courts have held such claims to be nontenuous,[602] but, in the Bone Shirt litigation, the district court found this justification to be tenuous, holding that Section 2 did not require South Dakota to create a district that was 90% Native American, and rejecting the State's claim that low turnout among Native American voters rendered such a district necessary in order Native Americans to elect their preferred candidate. Bone Shirt held that not only does Section 2 not compel a district with this concentration of minority residents, but that the statute in fact prohibits packing of this sort as a form of racial vote dilution.[603]

Proportionality as a Tenth Factor?

Eleven years ago, Johnson v. De Grandy introduced "proportionality" as a consideration in the totality of the circumstances analysis.[604] The Court stated that proportionality, which "links the number of majority-minority voting districts to minority members' share of the relevant population," is not a "safe harbor" insulating a jurisdiction from liability under Section 2, but that its existence weighs against a finding of vote dilution.[605]

Seventeen lawsuits both considered and made a finding on proportionality or the lack thereof, treating it as a distinct factor under the totality of the circumstances test.[606] The eleven lawsuits that found proportionality identified no violation of Section 2.[607] Five lawsuits found a lack of proportionality,[608] and of these 4 identified a Section 2 violation.[609] One lawsuit found neither proportionality nor a violation of section 2.610 Most courts considered proportionality one of many factors, though in the City of St. Louis litigation, the appellate court affirmed the grant of summary judgment in favor of defendants solely on the basis of "sustained proportionality."[611]

De Grandy spoke of proportionality as involving districts with a "clear majority" of minority voters.[612] One court has consequently refused to consider the presence of "opportunity" or "coalition" districts when assessing proportionality.[613] Another deemed an absence of "mathematical" proportionality inconsequential where the proposed additional majority-minority district was one with a bare 50.3% Hispanic majority, and consequently not one the court thought would yield "effective" electoral opportunity.[614]

De Grandy found proportionality by comparing the number of majority-Hispanic districts to the proportion of Hispanics of voting age living in the Miami-Dade area, as opposed to making that comparison statewide.[615] The courts in the Rural West I and II, Bone Shirt and Austin lawsuits followed this approach and limited the proportionality inquiry to subregions of the state, rather than applying the concept statewide in challenges to statewide districting plans.[616] The Rural West I court acknowledged the difficulty it faced "in using regional statistics. . . because there are several equally valid ways to decide precisely which districts should be included in a regional analysis."[617] In Rural West II, a subsequent challenge to a redistricting plan for the Tennessee House of Representatives, the Sixth Circuit explained its regional, rather than statewide, focus, finding that "neither over-proportionality in one area of the State nor substantial proportionality in the State as a whole should ordinarily be used to offset a problem of vote dilution in one discrete area of the State."[618] The district court in Austin offered a distinct explanation for its regional focus, pointing out that it limited "the geographic scope of [its] assessment to Wayne and Oakland Counties, because the plaintiffs d[id] not dispute the State's drawing of district lines except in those areas."[619] Still, not all courts addressing statewide districting plans examined proportionality only by region. The district court in Perry examined proportionality statewide[620] while the appellate court in Old Person found disproportionality under both regional and statewide analyses and thus found it unnecessary to choose between the two.[621]

Two courts substituted proportional representation for proportionality when confronted with challenges to at-large elections for which no majority-minority districts existed.[622] The district court in the Liberty County litigation made the same substitution,[623] but the appellate court reversed, emphasizing that proportionality and proportional representation are distinct concepts, and that "[s]ection 2 explicitly disclaims any 'right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population.'" [624]

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The Voting Rights Initiative (VRI) is the product of the extraordinary efforts of many people. We are particularly grateful to University of Michigan Law School Dean Evan Caminker and Associate Dean Steven Croley, Deans of Students David Baum and Charlotte Johnson, Michael Barr, Amy Bishop, Daniel Halberstam, Mary Lebert, Margaret Leary, MaryAnn Sarosi, Sandy Zeff, and Shawn DeLoach, Kurt Kaiser, Diana Perpich and the entire Sitemaker team at the University of Michigan, Westlaw, LexisNexis and Toree Randall, and web designers Jeff Christy and Travis Schau. VRI also thanks the Michigan Election Law Project for supporting this research.

VRI benefited immeasurably from guidance given by several experts in the voting rights field: Debo Adegbile, Chandler Davidson, Jon Greenbaum, Danny Levitas, Peyton McCrary, Laughlin McDonald, Nina Perales, and Julie Fernandes.

For financial support, VRI thanks the Law School Fund at the University of Michigan Law School, and the Earl Warren Institute for Race, Ethnicity and Diversity, Boalt Hall School of Law, U.C. Berkeley.

VOTING RIGHTS INITIATIVE ENDNOTES AS OF 11/17/05

Endnotes are still being fully integrated into the final report – if you have any questions about any endnotes, please email: echeuse@umich.edu. The final edition of the report and notes will be available on-line soon after Thanksgiving.

1. As originally enacted, the Act banned the use of any "test or device," such as a literacy test for five years, in areas of the country where a significant portion of the voting age population either was not registered to vote or failed to vote in the 1964 presidential election. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973b (2000) as amended Pub. L. 94-73, tit. I, § 101, tit. II, §§ 201-203, 206, Aug. 6, 1975, 89 Stat. 400-402 (making ban permanent and nationwide).
2. Section 5 of the Act required that these so-called "covered" jurisdictions obtain federal "preclearance" before they changed any aspect of their electoral rules. 42 U.S.C. § 1973c (2000). Covered jurisdictions may obtain a declaratory judgment to this effect from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, or, alternatively, submit a preclearance request to the United States Department of Justice. Id. § § 1973b, 1973c. The Act required that these jurisdictions demonstrate that the new practice did "not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote based on race." Id. § 1973c.
3. See South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966) (upholding constitutionality of major portions of VRA of 1965).
4. These provisions are the preclearance requirements of Section 5, the federal election monitoring and observer provisions set forth in Sections 6, 7, 8 and 9 federal election monitoring, and the language minority ballot coverage provisions of Sections 203 and 4(f). See 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(a)(8) (setting 2007 as the next required reauthorization date).
5. U.S. CONST. amend. XV.
6. See generally QUIET REVOLUTION IN THE SOUTH: THE IMPACT OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT 1965-1990, at 3 (Chandler Davidson & Bernard Grofman eds., 1994) [hereinafter QUIET REVOLUTION].
7. "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." U.S. CONST. amend. XV § 1.
8. 42 U.S.C. § 1973c (2000).
9. Bolden v. City of Mobile, 423 F. Supp. 384, 391 (S.D. Ala. 1976).
10. Id., aff'd 571 F.2d 238 (5th Cir. 1978), rev'd 446 U.S. 55 (1980).
11. City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 60-61 (1980) ("[I]t is apparent that the language of § 2 no more than elaborates upon that of the Fifteenth Amendment,... [and] that it was intended to have an effect no different from that of the Fifteenth Amendment itself.").
12. Id. On remand, the district court struck down the at-large system based on evidence of such intent. See SAMUEL ISSACHAROFF, PAMELA S. KARLAN & RICHARD H. PILDES, LAW OF DEMOCRACY 711 (2d ed. 2002) [hereinafter ISSACHAROFF, KARLAN & PILDES]; Peyton McCrary, The Significance of Mobile v. Bolden, in MINORITY VOTE DILUTION 47, 48-49 (Chandler Davidson ed. 1989).
13. 42 U.S.C. § 1973(a) (2000).
14. Id. § 1973(b).

15. S. REP. NO. 97-417 (1982), reprinted in 1982 U.S.C.C.A.N. 177 [hereinafter "SENATE REPORT"].
16. Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 43 n.7 (1986).
17. 412 U.S. 755 (1973).
18. 485 F.2d 1297 (5th Cir. 1973) (en banc), aff'd sub nom, East Carroll Parish Sch. Bd. v. Marshall, 424 U.S. 636 (1976) (per curiam).
19. SENATE REPORT at 27-30.
20. Id.
21. ISSACHAROFF, KARLAN & PILDES, supra note 12, at 747.
22. Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 50-51 (1986).
23. See Emison v. Growe, 507 U.S. 25, 39-40 (1993).
24. Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1024 (1994).
25. Georgia v. Ashcroft, 539 U.S. 461 (2003).
26. See, e.g., Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 481 (E.D. Tex. 2004); Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 384 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).
27. South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 327-28 (1966).
28. City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 519-20 (1997).
29. Id. at 518 (discussing "Congress' parallel power to enforce the provisions of the Fifteenth Amendment" as co-extensive with Section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment).
30. See, e.g., Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004) (finding the state legislature had used race as a proxy to protect incumbents, and in so doing had engaged in an intentional violation of Section 2, therefore not reaching the constitutional claim also raised by the plaintiffs); Harris v. Graddick Litig., 695 F. Supp. 517 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (finding intentional and results-based discrimination under Section 2 in the Governor's failure to remedy the lack of African-American poll workers); Harris v. Graddick Litig., discussion at 601 F. Supp. 70 (M.D.Ala. 1984) (enforcing a preliminary injunction against Jefferson County for failing to hire African-American poll workers).
31. The resulting list includes decisions also published in the federal reporters, as well as some only published on the electronic databases. The list also includes a few lawsuits decided after the 1982 amendment to Section 2 but which did not apply the new results test. See, e.g., Brown v. Board of School Comm'rs, 706 F.2d 1103 (11th Cir. 1983) (finding that the at-large system to elect the Mobile, Ala. School District was enacted with unconstitutional intent and consequently not evaluating it under the new results test); Cross v. Baxter, 704 F.2d 143 (5th Cir. 1983) (remanding case for consideration under newly amended results test, outcome unclear).
32. The Master Lawsuit List, located at: www.votingreport.org or www.sitemaker.umich.edu/votingrights/files/masterlist.xls, sorts all lawsuits by state, and then by the shorthand litigation title given each lawsuit. The litigation title includes the jurisdiction challenged wherever possible; if not included as a party name, however, one or sometimes both of the party names is used as the litigation title. Note that this Report regularly cites to a litigation as a whole using these titles. This Report also cites sometimes to the discussion of a factor or issue within a litigation by naming the litigation and then citing to the case that includes that discussion.
33. Most litigation strings have only one final word case. In the rare situations in which merits issues were severed (e.g. by racial group or by practice challenged) and addressed in separate proceedings, a lawsuit may have more than one "final word" case, each corresponding to the final decision on one such issue. Many lawsuits may also contain decisions subsequent to the final word opinion, that addressed other matters, such as fees, remedies or other related claims. VRI has included these other cases to give a full view of the lawsuit as a whole.

34. These miscellaneous types of cases were coded as falling into four main categories: 1) preliminary (only deciding whether to issue a preliminary injunction, whether to dismiss for failure to state a claim or some other pre-merits question), 2) settlement (only deciding whether to allow a case to settle by consent decree or other agreement), 3) remedy (only deciding, after a violation found, how to fix it), or 4) fees (only deciding whether to grant attorney's or expert fees or both).
35. Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30 (1986).
36. See Master Lawsuit List.
37. See American Civil Liberties Union Voting Rights Project, Post-1982 Litigation Report, 2005 (forthcoming) (on file with the Voting Rights Initiative).
38. See List of Cases Litigated by Rolando L. Rios, Law Office, sometimes in cooperation with the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund or with Texas Rural Legal Aid (on file with the Voting Rights Initiative).
39. See Master Lawsuit List.
40. Id.
41. Id.
42. See Master Lawsuit List.
43. The raw numbers are 67,767,900 out of 281,421,906. See U.S. Census 2000 Data, www.census.gov (last visited Nov. 1, 2005).
44. Of these 86 lawsuits, 53 found violations between 1982 and 1992, 25 between 1993 and 2002, and 8 from 2003 through the date of this report. See Master Lawsuit List.
45. See Master Lawsuit List.
46. See infra, discussion of part III.C.3 (Use of Enhancing Practices).
47. See Master Lawsuit List.
48. See Master Lawsuit List.
49. Charleston County Litig. (SC), 365 F.3d 341 (4th Cir. 2004); Blaine County Litig. (MT), 363 F.3d 897 (9th Cir. 2004); Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), 180 F.3d 476 (2d Cir. 1999); Pittsburgh litigation in PA, 686 F. Supp. 97 (3d Cir. 1998) (approving single member district plan settlement agreed to by defendant and class counsel); Marylanders Litig., 849 F. Supp. 1022 (D. Md. 1994) (ordering the state to submit proposal that creates a single-member district with a majority African-American voting-age citizen population); Autauga County Litig., 859 F. Supp. 1118 (M.D. Ala. 1994) (approving single member district settlement in determining attorney fees); Fort Lauderdale Litig. (FL), 985 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1993); Kershaw County Litig., 838 F. Supp. 237 (D.S.C. 1993) (ordering a combination of at-large and single districts in remedy proceedings following earlier determination of liability); Love Litig., No. CV 679-037, 1992 WL 96307 (S.D. Ga. Apr. 23, 1992) (approving the settlement plan which created single member districts); Clark Litig., 777 F. Supp. 44 (D. La. 1990) (ordering sub-districts in the "guilty districts"); City of Norfolk Litig. (VA), 883 F.2d 1232 (4th Cir. 1989); Bladen County Litig., No. 87-72-CIV-7, 1989 WL 253428 (E.D.N.C. Dec. 11, 1989) (ordering a combination of at-large and single districts and determining whether Plaintiffs are entitled to attorney's fees); Dillard v. Chilton litigation in AL, 699 F. Supp. 870 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (approving settlement plan to create single member districts and establish cumulative voting); Granville County Litig., 860 F.2d 100 (4th Cir. 1988) (approving the county's single district remedial plan in remedy proceeding following determination of liability); Dillard v. Baldwin Board of Ed Litig., 686 F. Supp. 1459 (M.D. Ala. 1988); Smith-Crittenden County Litig., 687 F. Supp. 1310 (E.D. Ark. 1988) (ordering the parties to submit proposals for single election districts); LULAC-Midland litigation in TX, 829 F.2d 546 (5th Cir. 1987); County of Big Horn Litig., 647 F. Supp. 1002 (D. Mont. 1986); Washington County litigation in FL, 653 F. Supp. 121 (N.D. Fla. 1986) (approving defendants single member district plan in remedial proceeding following determination of liability); City of Stateville litigation, 606 F. Supp. 569 (W.D.N.C. 1985) (ordering a combination of at-large and single districts in a consent decree); Marengo County Litig., 623 F. Supp. 33 (S.D. Ala. 1985); City of Greenwood I Litig., 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (ordering the city to submit a proposal for the election of council members other than the mayor by single districts or wards); Lubbock Litig. (TX), 727 F.2d 364 (5th Cir. 1984); Mobile School Board Litig. (AL), 706 F.2d 1103 (11th Cir. 1983) (affirming trial court remedy of dividing county into 5 single member districts, 2 of which were majority African American).

50. Bone Shirt Litig. (SD), 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004); Black Political Task Force Litig. (MA), 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass 2004); City of New Rochelle Litig., 308 F. Supp. 2d 152 (S.D.N.Y 2003); Rural West II Litig. (TN), 209 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 2000); Bonilla-Barnett Litig., 17 F. Supp. 2d 753 (N.D. Ill. 1998) (ordering legislature to come up with new lines); Wilson Litig. (LA), 135 F.3d 996 (5th Cir. 1998) (ordering new district lines in determining attorney fees); Lafayette County Litig., 20 F. Supp. 2d 996 (N.D. Miss. 1998); Chickasaw County II Litig., No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997) (ordering parties to attempt to reach agreement on a plan with a majority African-American district); Walthall County Litig., 157 F.R.D. 388 (S.D. Miss. 1994) (approving new district lines in settlement plan); Texarkana Litig., 861 F. Supp. 756 (W.D. Ark. 1992); Elections Board Litig., 793 F. Supp. 859 (W.D. Wis. 1992); Wesch Litig., 785 F. Supp. 1491 (S.D. Ala. 1992) (approving new districting plan in settlement proceedings following determination of liability); Jefferson Litig. (LA), 926 F.2d 487 (5th Cir. 1991); Armour Litig., 775 F. Supp. 1044 (N.D. Ohio 1991); Garza Litig. (CA), 918 F.2d 763 (9th Cir. 1990); Monroe County Litig., 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990); Gretna Litig. (LA), 834 F. 2d 496 (5th Cir. 1987); Mehfoud Litig., 702 F. Supp. 588 (E.D. Va. 1988); Neal Litig., 689 F. Supp. 1426 (E.D. Va. 1988); Reyes v. Stefaniak Litig., No. 93 C 308, 1995 WL 38958 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 30, 1995) (finding that the new single district plan with one majority-minority district entitled Plaintiff to attorney fees); Chickasaw County I Litig., 705 F. Supp. 315 (N.D. Miss. 1989); Fifth Ward Litig., CIV.A. No. 86-2963, 1989 WL 3801 (E.D. La. Jan. 18, 1989) (approving single district settlement plan following determination of liability); City of Crystal Springs, 626 F. Supp. 987 (S.D. Miss 1986) (ordering new district lines in determining attorney fees); Rybicki Litig., 574 F. Supp. 1147 (N.D. Ill. 1983); Buskey v. Oliver Litig., 565 F. Supp. 1473 (M.D. Ala. 1983); Major Litig., 574 F. Supp. 325 (D. La. 1983); Grenada County Litig., No. WC84-136-S-O, 1989 WL 251321 (N.D. Miss. Sept. 13, 1980) (approving new district lines in settlement plan).

51. Beaufort County Litig. (NC), 936 F.2d 159 (4th Cir. 2004) (approving consent degree agreed to by parties which created staggered elections with limited voting); Common Cause Litig., No. 01-03470 SVW(RZX), 2002 WL 1766436 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 19, 2002)

(approving consent decree for punch-card systems to be replaced); Town of Cicero Litig., No. Civ.A. 00C 1530, 2000 WL 34342276 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 15, 2000) (ordering a preliminary injunction preventing the town from enforcing certain requirements on absentee voting and candidacy requirements); Dillard v. Chilton Litig., 699 F. Supp. 870 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (approving settlement plan to create single member districts and establish cumulative voting); Madison County Litig., 610 F. Supp. 240 (S.D. Miss. 1985) (ordering the Board of Election Commissioners to convene and make a determination as to which absentee ballots were properly cast); Dean Litig., 555 F. Supp. 502 (D.R.I. 1982) (ordering polling place not to be moved from public housing community center by preliminary injunction).

52. Williams Litig. in TX, 734 F. Supp. 1317 (W.D. Tex. 1990) (ordering special election to remedy effects of the at-large system); Dillard Litig. in AL, 717 F. Supp. 1471 (M.D. Ala. 1989) (ordering that plaintiffs be certified as elected members of the city council); Marks-Philadelphia Board of Elections, No. CIV. A. 93-6157, 1994 WL 146113 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 26, 1994) (enjoining the certification of one of the candidates and ordering the certification of another, ordering changes to the processes used for absentee ballots).
53. Berks County Litig. in PA, 277 F. Supp. 2d 570 (E.D. Pa. 2003) (ordering county to allow federal officials to oversee election processes, provide election material in Spanish, and provide bilingual poll officers or interpreters); White v. Alabama Litig., 867 F. Supp. 1519 (M.D. Ala. 1994) (held that the settlement reached by the State and plaintiffs was reasonable, ordering the following: 1) each appellate court's size would increase by 2 seats, 2) a new "judicial nomination commission" would recommend 3 African-American judge candidates to the Governor & the Governor would choose to appoint 2 to each court, and they would serve a 6-year term, before standing for re-election under state law) (this remedy was later found unconstitutional under Holder v. Hall); City of Tampa Litig. in FL, 693 F. Supp. 1051 (M.D. Fla. 1988) (approving settlement by parties which agreed to provide voter instructions, voter education programs, and outreach); Harris v. Graddick Litig., 695 F. Supp. 517 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (ordering state to have African-American poll workers and submit proposals to rectify the current effect of discriminatory laws and procedures); Campaign for a Progressive Bronx Litig. in NY, 631 F. Supp. 975 (S.D.N.Y 1986) (ordering bilingual voter education, outreach, and election officials in fees proceeding following liability determination); Citizen Action Litig., Civ. No. N 84-431, 1984 U.S. Dist. Lexis 24869 (D. Conn. Sept. 27, 1984) (ordering registrar to authorize volunteers to conduct registration drives and provide materials Spanish in preliminary injunction proceeding).
54. Blaine County Litig. (MT), 363 F.3d 897, 904 (9th Cir. 2004) (declining to consider whether Section 2 is constitutional because of the summary affirmance in Mississippi Republican Executive Committee v. Brooks, 469 U.S. 1002 (1984), and further stating "in the Supreme Court's congruence-and-proportionality opinions, the VRA stands out as the prime example of a congruent and proportionate response to well documented violations of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. Most tellingly, when the Supreme Court first announced the congruence-and-proportionality doctrine in City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997), it twice pointed to the VRA as the model for appropriate prophylactic legislation."); Alamosa County Litig., 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016 (D. Colo. 2004) (declining to reopen the issue, finding both the Tenth Circuit and the Supreme Court had affirmed its constitutionality); Sanchez-Colorado, 97

F.3d 1303, 1314 (10th Cir. 1996) ("Just as the Court has affirmed its unfailing championship of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments in Shaw II and Bush, it has also declared the constitutionality of § 2 of the VRA, observing, "it would be irresponsible for a State to disregard the § 2 results test." Bush, 116 S. Ct. at 1969. (O'Connor, J. concurring, joined by Stevens, Ginsburg, Breyer, Souter, JJ.)."); Elections Board Litig., 793 F. Supp. 859, 868-69 (W.D. Wis. 1992) ("The Voting Rights Act authorizes and in some instances compels racial gerrymandering in favor of blacks and other minorities. Because the Act implements the Fifteenth Amendment, it is constitutional despite its discriminatory character. United Jewish Organization v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 159, 51 L. Ed. 2d 229, 97 S. Ct. 996 (1976)."); Wesley Litig., 605 F. Supp. 802, 808 (M.D. Tenn. 1985) (citing Marengo County); Lubbock Litig., 727 F.2d 364, 375 (5th Cir. 1984) (considering the record before Congress in 1982 and stating "Where Congress, on the basis of a factual investigation, perceives that a facially neutral measure carries forward the effects of past discrimination, Congress may even enact blanket prohibitions against such rules. See South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. at 334, 86 S. Ct. at 821 (literacy tests). Here, Congress has taken the more modest step of shifting to states and municipalities the burden of accommodating their political systems when that system seriously prejudices minority groups, even though the result is either unintended or, at least, not demonstrably intended."); Jordan Litig., 604 F. Supp. 807 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (citing Major v. Treen and declining to re-open the question); El Paso Independent School District, 591 F. Supp. 802 (W.D. Tex. 1984) (following Lubbock); City of Greenwood Litig., 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (citing Lubbock and Marengo County); Marengo County Litig. (AL), 731 F.2d 1546, 1558 (11th Cir. 1984) (considering Congressional enforcement power in Katzenbach v. Morgan, South Carolina v. Katzenbach, and Oregon v. Mitchell and holding, "The 1982 amendment to Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act is clearly within the enforcement power. Congress conducted extensive hearings and debate on all facets of the Voting Rights Act and concluded that the "results" test was necessary to secure the right to vote and to eliminate the effects of past purposeful discrimination. The Senate Report explains in detail why the results test was necessary and appropriate." The court further considered congressional findings in the Senate Report); Major Litig., 574 F. Supp. 325, 345 (E.D. La. 1983) (citing Katzenbach v. Morgan and Fullilove v. Klutznick for the proposition that "congressional authority [embodied in § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment] extends beyond the prohibition of purposeful discrimination to encompass state action that has discriminatory impact perpetuating the effects of past discrimination.").

55. See infra, part III.C.1 (History of Official Discrimination that Touched on the Right to Vote Senate Factor)
56. See infra, part III.C.4 (Candidate Slating Senate Factor).
57. See infra, part III.C.6 (Racial Appeals in Campaigns Senate Factor).
58. See infra, part III.C.9 (Tenuous Policy Justification for Challenged Practice).
59. See infra, part III.C.8 (Significant Lack of Responsiveness Factor).
60. LULAC v. Clements, 999 F.2d 831, 854 (5th Cir. 1993).
61. See, e.g., Garza v. Los Angeles Litig. (CA), 918 F.2d 763 (9th Cir. 1995); City of New Rochelle Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 152, 158 (S.D.N.Y. 2003); Ketchum Litig. (IL), discussion at 740 F.2d 1398, 1408 (7th Cir. 1984).
62. See Master Lawsuit List.

63. See, e.g., Little Rock Litig. (AR), 56 F.3d 904, 910 (8th Cir. 1995) (assuming that plaintiffs can meet their burden on the Gingles threshold factors, equating proportionality with the presence of proportional representation, and ultimately finding in favor of defendants); Austin Litig., 857 F. Supp. 560, 569-570 (E.D. Mich. 1994) (assuming for purposes of this challenge that the Gingles factor can be met, equating proportionality with the presence and continued likelihood of proportional representation, and ultimately finding in favor of defendants); see also City of St. Louis Litig. (MO), 54 F.3d 1345 (8th Cir. 1995) (holding that the district court properly granted summary judgment in favor of defendants on the basis of substantial proportionality alone).
64. Alamosa County Litig., 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016 (D. Colo. 2004); Bexar County Litig., 385 F.3d 853 (5th Cir. 2004); City of Cleveland Litig., 297 F. Supp. 2d 901 (N.D. Miss. 2004); City of Minneapolis Litig., No. 02-1139(JRT/FLN), 2004 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19708 (D. Minn. Sept. 30, 2004); Meza Litig., 322 F. Supp. 2d 52 (D. Mass. 2004); Perry Litig., 298 F. Supp. 2d 451 (E.D. Tex. 2004); Rodriguez Litig., 308 F. Supp. 2d 346 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); South Carolina Democratic Party Litig., No. C/A 4-04-CV-2171-25, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27299, 2004 WL 3262756 (D.S.C. Sept. 3, 2004); Sensley Litig., 385 F.3d 591 (5th Cir. 2004); Forest County Litig., 336 F. 3d 570 (7th Cir. 2003); Kingman Park Litig., 348 F.3d 1033 (D.C. Cir. 2003); Parker v. Ohio Litig., 263 F. Supp. 2d 1100 (S.D. Ohio 2003); Campuzano Litig., 200 F. Supp. 2d 905 (N.D. Ill. 2002); Cano Litig., 211 F. Supp. 2d 1208 (C.D. Cal. 2002); Hamrick Litig., 296 F.3d 1065 (11th Cir. 2002); Balderas Litig., 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25006 (E.D. Tex. 2001); Page Litig., 144 F. Supp. 2d 346 (D.N.J. 2001); DeSoto County Litig., 204 F.3d 1335 (11th Cir. 2000); Anthony Litig., 35 F. Supp. 2d 989 (E.D. Mich. 1999); Belle Glade Litig., 178 F.3d 1175 (11th Cir. 1999); France Litig., 71 F. Supp. 2d 317 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); Mallory-Ohio Litig., 173 F.3d 377 (6th Cir. 1999); Pasadena Independent School District Litig., 165 F.3d 368 (5th Cir. 1999); African American Legal Defense Fund Litig., 8 F. Supp. 2d 330 (S.D.N.Y. 1998); Bradley v. Work Litig., 154 F.3d 704 (7th Cir. 1998); Brooks Litig., 158 F.3d 1230 (11th Cir. 1998); Cousin Litig., 145 F.3d 818 (6th Cir. 1998); Davis v. Chiles Litig., 139 F.3d 1414 (11th Cir. 1998); African-American Voting Rights LDF Litig., 994 F. Supp. 1105 (E.D. Mo. 1997); Campos v. Houston Litig., 113 F.3d 544 (5th Cir. 1997); City of Holyoke Litig., 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997); City of Miami Beach Litig., 113 F.3d 1563 (11th Cir. 1997); City of Rome Litig., 127 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997); Lulac v. Roscoe I.S.D. Litig., 123 F.3d 843 (5th Cir.1997); Milwaukee NAACP Litig., 116 F. 3d 1194 (7th Cir. 1997); Alamance County Litig., 99 F.3d 600 (4th Cir. 1996); St. Louis Board of Education Litig., 90 F.3d 1357 (8th Cir.1996); Fort Bend Independent School District Litig., 89 F.3d 1205 (5th Cir. 1996); Kent County Litig., 76 F.3d 1381 (6th Cir. 1996); Town of Babylon Litig., 914 F. Supp. 843 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., 922 F. Supp. 339 (S.D. Cal. 1995); Al-Hakim Litig., 892 F. Supp. 1464 (M.D. Fla. 1995); Little Rock Litig., 56 F.3d 904 (8th Cir. 1995); Southern Christian Leadership Litig., 56 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 1995); Armstrong v. Allain Litig., 893 F. Supp. 1320 (S.D. Miss. 1994); Cincinnati Litig., 40 F.3d 807 (6th Cir. 1994); City of Columbia Litig., 33 F.3d 52 (4th Cir. 1994); Howard Litig., Civ.A. No. 93-900 SSH, 1994 WL 118211 (D.D.C. Mar. 31, 1994); Nipper Litig., 39 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir. 1994); Emison Litig., 507 U.S. 25 (1993); Lulac v. Clements Litig., 999 F.2d 831 (5th Cir. 1993); Magnolia Bar Association Litig., 994 F.2d 1143 (5th Cir. 1993); Quilter Litig., 507 U.S. 146 (1993); Rangel Litig., 8 F.3d

242 (5th Cir. 1993); San Diego County Litig., No. 92-55661, 1993 WL 379838 (9th Cir. Sept. 27, 1993); Fund for Accurate and Informed Representation Litig., 796 F. Supp. 662 (N.D.N.Y. 1992); Harrison Litig., Civ. A. No. 92-0603, 1992 WL 95909 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 21, 1992); Nash Litig., 797 F. Supp. 1488 (W.D. Mo. 1992); National City Litig., 976 F.2d 1293 (9th Cir. 1992); Orange County Litig., 783 F. Supp. 1348 (M.D. Fla. 1992); Stockton Litig., 956 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1992); SW Texas Juinor College Dist. Litig., 964 F.2d 1542 (5th Cir. 1992); West Litig., 786 F. Supp. 803 (W.D. Ark. 1992); Turner Litig., 784 F. Supp. 553 (E.D. Ark.. 1991); Hardee County Litig., 906 F.2d 524 (11th Cir. 1990); White Litig., 909 F.2d 99 (4th Cir. 1990); Bond Litig., 875 F.2d 1488 (10th Cir. 1989); Chula Vista Litig., 723 F. Supp. 1384 (S.D. Cal. 1989); City of Austin Litig., 871 F.2d 529 (5th Cir. 1989); City of Woodville Litig., 881 F.2d 1327 (5th Cir. 1989); Brewer Litig., 876 F.2d 448 (5th Cir. 1989); Houston v. Haley Litig., 869 F.2d 807) (5th Cir. 1989); Pomona Litig., 883 F.2d 1418 (9th Cir. 1989); Williams v. State Bd. of Elections Litig., 718 F. Supp. 1324 (N.D. Ill. 1989); Springfield Park District Litig., 851 F.2d 937 (7th Cir. 1988); Carrollton NAACP Litig., 829 F.2d 1547(11th Cir. 1987); Sisseton Independent School District Litig., 804 F.2d 469 (8th Cir. 1986).

65. See, e.g., Town of Babylon Litig., at 914 F. Supp. 843 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Meza Litig., discussion at 322 F. Supp. 2d 52, 69 (D. Mass. 2004) (declining to find for the defendant based solely on plaintiffs' failure to meet the third Gingles factor and instead "turn[ing] to the totality of the circumstances.").
66. Lucas Litig. (GA), 967 F.2d 549 (11th Cir. 1992); Marks-Philadelphia Litig., No. CIV. A. 93-6157, 1994 WL 146113 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 26, 1994); Maxey Litig., No. 91 Civ. 7328 (TPG), 1996 WL 529024 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 18, 1996); Montiel v. Davis Litig., 215 F. Supp. 2d 1279 (S.D. Ala. 2002); Muntaqim Litig. (NY), 366 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2004); Salt River Project Litig. (AZ), 109 F.3d 586 (9th Cir. 1997); Operation Push Litig. (MS), 932 F.2d 400 (5th Cir. 1991); Osburn Litig. (GA), 369 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2004); Prejean Litig. (LA), 83 Fed.Appx. 5 (5th Cir. 2003); Prewitt v. Moore Litig., 840 F. Supp. 436 (N.D. Miss. 1993); Town of North Johns Litig., 717 F. Supp. 1471 (M.D. Ala. 1989); U.S. v. Jones Litig. (AL), 57 F.3d 1020 (11th Cir. 1995); Varner v. Smitherman Litig., CIV. A. No. 92-0586-BH-M, 1993 WL 663327, 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17721 (S.D. Ala. Dec. 8, 1993).
67. Berks County Litig., 277 F. Supp. 2d 570 (E.D. Pa. 2003); Arakaki Litig., 314 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2002); Marks-Philadelphia Litig., No. CIV. A. 93-6157, 1994 WL 146113 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 26, 1994); Elections Board Litig., 793 F. Supp. 859 (W.D. Wis. 1992); Harris v. Graddick Litig., 695 F. Supp. 517 (M.D. Ala. 1988); Operation Push Litig., 932 F.2d 400 (5th Cir. 1991); Town of North Johns Litig., 717 F. Supp. 1471 (M.D. Ala. 1989).
68. See, e.g., City of Springfield Litig. (IL), discussion at 851 F.2d 937, 943 (7th Cir. 1988).
69. See Master Lawsuit List.
70. See id.
71. Other courts have simply asserted in conclusory terms that Gingles I is, or is not, satisfied, or have noted that the parties stipulated to its existence. See e.g., Rural West II Litig. (TN), discussion at 209 F.3d 835, 839 (6th Cir. 2000) (noting that the parties stipulated that Gingles I and II were met); City of LaGrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 774 (N.D. Ga. 1997) ("Plaintiffs have established the first Gingles factor—that the African-American community in LaGrange is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single member district.");

Blytheville School District Litig., discussion at 759 F. Supp. 525, 526 (E. Ark. 1991) ("The black population in the School District is geographically compact."); Chattanooga Litig., 722 F. Supp. 380, 390 (E.D. Tenn. 1989) ("There is no doubt whatsoever that the black population of Chattanooga is sufficiently compact and numerous as to be an effective majority in various combinations of single member districts.").

72. See, e.g., Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 300 (D. Mass. 2004) (using voting age population statistics in the Gingles I analysis); Hamrick Litig. (GA), discussion at 296 F.3d 1065, 1067 (11th Cir. 2002) (finding that ""it is clear that blacks could not constitute a majority of the voting age population in Proposed District 3, and, thus, plaintiffs have failed to satisfy prong one of Gingles"); Old Person Litig. (MT), discussion at 230 F.3d 1113, 1121(9th Cir. 2000)(upholding the district court's finding that Gingles I was met where "American Indians would represent 55% of the voting age population" in the proposed district); Marylanders Litig., 849 F. Supp. 1022, 1051 (D. Md. 1994) (finding the first Gingles prong met where "African-Americans comprise well over 50% of both the total population and the voting-age population"); Brewer Litig. (TX), discussion at 876 F.2d 448, 452 (5th Cir. 1989) ("Only voting age persons can vote. It would be a Pyrrhic victory for a court to create a single-member district in which a minority population dominant in absolute, but not in voting age numbers, continued to be defeated at the polls. Thornburg implicitly recognized this fact..."); Springfield Litig. (IL), discussion at 851 F.2d 937, 945 (7th Cir. 1988)("The threshold requirement roughly measures minority voters' potential to elect candidates of their choice. Because only minorities of voting age can affect this potential, it is logical to assume that the [Gingles] Court intended the majority requirement to mean a voting age majority."); cf. Dickinson Litig. (IN), 933 F.2d 497 (7th Cir. 1991) (finding that the lower court erred in finding the first Gingles factor not met where plaintiffs were 50.27% of the total population and observing that the Gingles court required only a simple majority, but indicating that the court should explore the "facts surrounding the proposed district.").
73. See, e.g, Meza Litig., discussion at 322 F. Supp. 2d 52, 59 (D. Mass. 2004); Pasadena Independent School District Litig. (TX), discussion at 165 F.3d 368 (5th Cir. 1999); City of Chicago-Bonilla Litig. (IL), discussion at 141 F.3d 699, 705 (7th Cir. 1998); Nipper Litig. (FL), discussion at 113 F.3d 1563, 1569 (11th Cir. 1994); Pomona Litig., 883 F.2d 1418, 1426 (9th Cir. 1988); see also Suffolk County Litig., discussion at 268 F. Supp. 2d 243, 263 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) (holding that plaintiffs' two plans both failed to consider citizenship of Latino population, and that even if they had they could not show Latino VAP in the proposed districts), Cano Litig., discussion at , 211 F. Supp. 2d 1208, 1234 (C.D. Cal. 2002) (noting that the Ninth Circuit considers CVAP the proper measure, but holding that, where CVAP data had not yet been released by the census bureau, "the ability to construct a district that is so substantially Latino both in overall population and in VAP is sufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to the first Gingles pre-condition.").
74. See, e.g., Albany County Litig., discussion at No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820, at *5 (N.D.N.Y. Jul. 7, 2003) ("[A] majority group is sufficiently large if it comprises more than 51% of the population of the voting district"); City of New Rochelle Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 152, 159 (S.D.N.Y. 2003)(finding Gingles I "clearly established" where 60.5% black district was replaced by a "mere plurality district"); see also Thurston County Litig. (NE), 129 F.3d 1015, 1025 (8th Cir. 1997) (finding Gingles I not met in part because "[u]nder the proposed plans, if 4 or 5 Native Americans moved from the proposed majority-minority districts created for the School Board and Village Board, respectively, and they were replaced by non-Native Americans, the majority-minority composition would be destroyed."); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., 922 F. Supp. 339, 372 (S.D. Cal. 1995) (finding Gingles I not met because at the time the white bloc voting occurred Hispanics did not constitute a majority).

75. See, e.g. Campuzano Litig., discussion at 200 F. Supp. 2d 905, 910 (N.D. Ill. 2002) ("In the absence of more reliable data regarding African-American voting strength, courts employ the general guideline that African-Americans must comprise 65% of a district's total population to control the electoral outcome in that district...When reliable VAP statistics are available, we may instead evaluate minority voting strength by using a 60% VAP rule of thumb."); African-American Voting Rights Legal Defense Fund Litig. (MO), discussion at 54 F.3d 1345, 1348 n.4 (8th Cir. 1995) ("We conclude that either 60% of the voting age population or 65% of the total population is reasonably sufficient to provide black voters with an effective majority."); Elections Board Litig., discussion at 793 F. Supp. 859, 869 (W.D. Wis. 1992) (adopting 60% voting age population as the size required "to give blacks a reasonable assurance of obtaining a majority of votes in a district"); City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 679 F. Supp. 557, 566 (E.D. Va. 1988) (finding Gingles I met, but holding that the black population was sufficiently large and compact to create only two, rather than three, "safe" districts with 65% black population); United Jewish Org. v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 163-64, 51 L. Ed. 2d 229, 97 S. Ct. 996 (1977) (reasoning that at 65% minority population in a district is required to yield a majority of minority voting age population), cf. Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1028 (D. Colo. 2004) ("Although the current precinct lines cannot be used to create a single-member district with a majority of Hispanic registered voters, the Government has proposed three hypothetical districts in which Hispanic residents would comprise at least 60% of the voting age population."); Kingman Litig., 348 F.3d 1033, 1042 (D.C. Cir. 2003) (assuming without deciding Gingles I was met while noting that a reduction of the black population from 68.7% to 62.3% in D.C's Ward Six "might deprive African Americans of an 'effective' or 'safe' voting majority").

76. See,e.g., Old Person Litig, discussion at 230 F.3d 1113, 1121-23 (9th Cir. 2000) (upholding district court finding that rejected defendants argument that proposed district would "be insufficient to confer effective voting power" because of low turnout); Red Clay School District Litig., 780 F. Supp. 221, 226 n.9 (D. Del. 1991) ("n3 Although the Defendants agree that the Plaintiffs' evidence satisfies the first Gingles factor, they question whether such a district would allow the black citizens to consistently elect one candidate of their choice. This concern, however, does not negate a finding that the Plaintiffs have proven the first Gingles factor.") (citation omitted); Mehfoud Litig., discussion at 702 F. Supp. 588, 592 (E.D. Va. 1988) ("Plaintiffs need not demonstrate that blacks could comprise a majority of those actually turning out to vote, but rather, must show that blacks would comprise a majority of the voting age population.").

77. See, e.g., Albany County Litig., discussion at No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820, at *6 (N.D.N.Y. July 7, 2003); City of Baytown Litig. (TX), discussion at 840 F.2d 1240, 1244 (5th Cir. 1988); Hardee County Litig., discussion at 906 F.2d 524, 526 (11th Cir. 1990); cf. Brewer Litig. (TX), discussion at, (5th Cir.1989)(finding Gingles I unsatisfied because no district could be created large enough to have clear majority-minority voting age population, even if black, Hispanic, and Asian populations were combined). But see Kent County Litig., 76 F.3d 1381 (6th Cir. 1996) (en banc)(not allowing multiple minority groups for purposes of the Gingles I analysis).

78. See e.g., Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451 (E.D. Tex. 2004) (acknowledging that the Fifth Circuit precedent permits plaintiffs to combine minority groups to satisfy Gingles majority requirement provided the groups are politically cohesive, but concluding that plaintiffs failed to demonstrate political cohesiveness); Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 409 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (allowing coalition claim, but concluding that plaintiffs failed to show that blacks and Hispanics were cohesive); Forest County Litig.(WI), discussion at 336 F.3d 570, 575-76 (7th Cir. 2003) (finding that blacks and Indians had clearly divergent interests); San Diego County Litig., discussion at 794 F. Supp. 990, 998 (S.D. Cal. 1992) (allowing aggregation, but concluding that plaintiffs had failed to show that Hispanics, African Americans, and Asian Americans were politically cohesive); Stockton Litig. (CA), 956 F.2d 884, 886 (9th Cir. 1992) (affirming the district court's finding of lack of Hispanic-black political cohesion); Hardee County Litig. (FL), discussion at 906 F.2d 524, 527 (11th Cir. 1990) (finding that blacks and Hispanics were not sufficiently cohesive to satisfy Gingles II); Pomona Litig. (CA), 883 F.2d 1418 (9th Cir. 1989) (assuming "aggregation theory" is cognizable but finding no cohesion between the minority groups). Plaintiffs do sometimes succeed in proving cohesiveness, however, and are thus allowed to proceed to the first Gingles precondition. See, e.g, County of Albany Litig., discussion at No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820, at *11 (N.D.N.Y. July 7, 2003), France Litig., 71 F. Supp. 2d 317, 327 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); LULAC-North East Independent School District Litig., discussion at 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1092 (W.D. Tex.1995); Baytown Litig. (TX), discussion at 840 F.2d 1240, 1248 (5th Cir.1988); cf. De Grandy Litig., discussion at 815 F. Supp. 1550, 1570-71 (N.D. Fla. 1992) (finding that Cubans and non-Cuban Hispanics were cohesive in spite of party differences, because Hispanic democrats will vote for Hispanic republicans and because both groups have similar views on education, housing, medical aid, and civil rights).

79. Gingles itself expressly left open this question. See Gingles Litig., discussion at 478 U.S. 30, 46 n.12 (U.S. 1986) (reserving the question of "whether § 2 permits, and if it does, what standards should pertain to, claim brought by a minority group, that is not sufficiently large and compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district, alleging that the use of a multimember district impairs its ability to influence elections"). The Supreme Court again reserved the question in the Quilter litigation, 507 U.S. 146 U.S. (1993) (assuming but not deciding that influence districts are a cognizable claim under Section 2).

80. See e.g., Fifth Circuit: Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 485 (E.D. Tex. 2004) ("Considering that District 24 as a pure influence district is unprotected by § 2, we are persuaded that alterations to it raised questions primarily of § 5, which have been answered by the Department of Justice."); Alamo Heights Indep. School District Litig. (TX), discussion at 168 F.3d 848, 853-54 (5th Cir. 1999) (rejecting plaintiffs' claim that they can satisfy Gingles I with less than a 50% majority and reaffirming Fifth Circuit precedent requiring plaintiffs to prove that they constitute more than 50% of the relevant population in their demonstration district"); Concerned Citizens Litig. (TX), discussion at 63 F.3d 413, 416-17 (5th Cir. 1995) ("As blacks do not constitute a majority in any of the four extant JP Precincts in Orange County, CCE cannot satisfy the first Gingles precondition."); Brewer Litig. (TX), discussion at 876 F.2d 448, 450 (5th Cir. 1989) (affirming district court's requirement that plaintiffs present evidence that they can constitute more than 50% of voting age population in a proposed district); Kirksey v. Allain Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1183, 1204 (S.D. Miss. 1987) (declining to "design single- member districts to raise the black voter percentage by concentrating blacks in order to 'influence' the outcome of the elections" in districts where "black majority single-member sub-districts" could not be drawn); Sixth Circuit: Parker Litig., discussion at 263 F. Supp. 2d 1100, 1105 (E.D. Ohio 2003), summarily affirmed by 540 U.S. 1013 (2003), ("Because influence claims are not cognizable in our circuit and the plaintiffs have failed to establish the first Gingles precondition…[t]he plaintiffs' claim under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act must fail."); O'Lear v. Miller Litig., discussion at 222 F. Supp. 2d 850 (E.D. Mich. 2002) (following Cousin Litig.); Cousin Litig. (TN), discussion at 145 F.3d 818, 828 (6th Cir. 1998) ("As the following analysis will indicate, we would reverse any decision to allow such a claim to proceed since we do not feel that an "influence" claim is permitted under the Voting Rights Act."); Seventh Circuit: LaPaille Litig., discussion at 786 F. Supp. 704, 715 (N.D. Ill. 1992) (citing McNeil v. Springfield Park District and refusing to recognize "influence districts" because of the "lack of an objective limit to such claims."); City of Springfield Litig., discussion at 851 F.2d 937, 947 (7th Cir. 1988) (refusing to "consider claims that multi-member districts merely impair plaintiffs' ability to influence elections. Plaintiffs' ability to win elections must also be impaired."); Williams v. State Bd. of Elections Litig., discussion at 718 F. Supp. 1324, 1333 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (rejecting influence districts because "even if all eligible black voters supported a single candidate in the proposed single-member district, that candidate would not be assured of electoral success" (emphasis in original)). But see Elections Board Litig., discussion at 793 F. Supp. 859, 869 (W.D. Wis. 1992) (distinguishing Springfield Litig. and considering the creation of a "stronger influence district . . . .a modest plus" in favor of a proposed redistricting plan). Ninth Circuit: San Diego County Litig., discussion at 794 F. Supp. 990, 996 (S.D. Cal. 1992) (following Chula Vista Litig.); Chula Vista Litig., discussion at 723 F. Supp. 1384, 1392 (S.D. Cal. 1989) ("Accordingly, the Court finds that there exists no legally cognizable "influence" claim under § 2 that would require a lesser standard of proof than set forth in Thornburg.").

81. Baldwin County Comm'n Litig. (AL), discussion at 376 F. 3d 1260, 1268-69 (11th Cir. 2004) (finding that "an unrestricted breach of this precondition 'would likely open a Pandora's box of marginal Voting Rights Act claims by minority groups of all sizes,"' and seeing no way to award plaintiffs relief "without awarding similar relief to even smaller minority groups in future cases."). See also Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 379 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) ("Allowing influence claims would open the door for a legal challenge any time a minority population could be shifted to increase the minority population in a nearby district. It would open the door for cases like this one, where the plaintiffs are arguing that the defendants had an affirmative obligation to create a district that has never existed in order to unite all minority communities in a particular region to maximize the proportion of a minority in at least one district."); City of Springfield Litig., discussion at 851 F.2d 937, 947 (7th Cir. 1988) ("Courts might be flooded by the most marginal section 2 claims if plaintiffs had to show only that an electoral practice or procedure weakened their ability to influence elections.").

82. See e.g., Metts Litig. (RI), discussion at 363 F.3d 8, 12 (1st Cir. 2004) ("To the extent that African-American voters have to rely on cross-over voting to prove they have the "ability to elect" a candidate of their choosing, their argument that the majority votes as a bloc against their preferred candidate is undercut."); Turner Litig., 784 F. Supp. 553, 570-71 (E.D. Ark. 1991) ("[P]laintiffs argue here, contrary to the position of the plaintiffs in Jeffers, that if the percentage of black voters in District Four is increased from 27 percent (as it is under Act 1220 of 1991) to 38 percent (as it would be under plaintiffs' proposal), it will be easier for black voters to "elect representatives of their choice" by forming coalitions with white voters. n15 Their argument not only ignores the need to prove under Gingles that polarized voting prevents this from happening, but it directly undercuts their Section 2 claim by showing that even absent a majority, they could elect candidates of their choice if they sought alliances and coalitions with other voters in the traditional political manner."); cf. Brooks Litig. (GA), discussion at 158 F.3d 1230, 1237 (11th Cir. 1998) (noting, in the context of a challenge to runoffs in democratic primaries, the "fine line" between plaintiffs' argument that minority candidates would be able to garner enough support to win the general election if they could succeed in the primary and plaintiffs' claim of white bloc voting); City of Chicago Litig. (IL), discussion at 141 F.3d 699, 703 (7th Cir. 1998) (stating that the court is not rejecting the notion of the influence ward by requiring majority minority districts to have a 65% minority voting age population, but finding the concept "inapplicable" to the facts of the case "because of the rigid racial bloc voting on all sides").
83. See e.g., Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 379 (E.D. Tex. 2004) ("If a minority population is too small to elect candidates of choice in a reconfigured district even with the assistance of reliable crossover voters, then it is the size of the population and not the voting practice or procedure that is preventing the minority group from electing representatives of their choice. Dilution of the ability to influence representatives is not an injury cognizable under section 2(b) of the VRA."); Hall Litig. (VA), discussion at 385 F.3d 421, 430 (4th Cir. 2004) ("[T]o establish a vote dilution claim under Section 2, minorities must prove that they have been unlawfully denied the political opportunity they would have enjoyed as a voting-age majority in a single-member district: namely, the opportunity to 'dictate electoral outcomes independently' of other voters in the jurisdiction.").
84. See also Jefferson Parish I Litig., 691 F. Supp. 961, 1006 (E.D.La. 1988)("[P]laintiffs may have the legal ability to seek and obtain some relief if they prove that they are politically cohesive, that a majority voting bloc usually defeats its preferred candidates, and that they are geographically compact so that a proposed remedy will insure them equal access to the political process and provide them the ability to influence elections. The court possesses the equity power to fashion the relief to remedy the effects of the prior dilution and to give the minority group the opportunity to participate equally in the electoral process." But "such relief does not mandate a safe district with a super majority of 60%.")
85. Armour Litig., discussion at 775 F. Supp. 1044, 1059-60 (N.D. Ohio 1991) ("In a reconfigured district plaintiffs will constitute nearly one-third of the voting age population and about half of the usual Democratic vote. Therefore, the Democratic Party and its candidates will be forced to be sensitive to the minority population by virtue of that population's size.").

86. See also Metts Litig. (MA), discussion at 363 F.3d 8, 11 (1st Cir. 2004) (articulating the court's unwillingness "to foreclose the possibility that a section 2 claim can ever be made out where the African-American population of a single member district is reduced in redistricting legislation from 26 to 21 percent.").
87. Page Litig., 144 F. Supp. 2d 346 (D.N.J. 2001).
88. Id. at 362.
89. Id.
90. Martinez Litig., discussion at 234 F. Supp. 2d. 1275, 1316 (S.D. Fla. 2002).
91. Id. at 1321 n.56.
92. Id. at 1322. This court considered Gingles I in order to determine that the plaintiffs were protected by Section 2, before concluding that the districting plan did not violate Section 2.
93. Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 484-85 (E.D. Tex. 2004).
94. Id at 484.
95. Id. at 481.
96. *Id.*at 484-85.
97. Georgia v. Ashcroft, 539 U.S. 461, 481 (2003).
98. Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 480 (E.D. Tex. 2004) .
99. Id. at 481.
100. Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 373 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).
101. Id.
102. Id. at 384.
103. Id. at 379.
104. Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 481 (E.D. Tex. 2004); Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 384 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (stating that, under Ashcroft, "states have the flexibility to choose between safe majority-minority districts...and "coalitional" districts").
105. Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 481 (E.D. Tex. 2004); Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 384 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) ("While Ashcroft allows crossover districts under Section 5, its reasoning does not broaden the power of federal courts under section 2 of the VRA to require state legislatures to protect or create such "ability to elect" districts.").
106. Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 485 (E.D. Tex. 2004).
107. Rural West I Litig., discussion at 877 F. Supp. 1096, 1104 (W.D. Tenn. 1995).
108. West Litig., discussion at 786 F. Supp. 803, 807 (W.D. Ark. 1992) ("If the Act does not always require the maximization of minority voting power, how do we distinguish those cases in which an "influence" district should be created, from those in which it should not? Plaintiffs have suggested no legal standards to differentiate these two kinds of cases...They are not numerous enough to elect a representative without help, and there is no proof that they would have enough help to elect a different representative, nor even that the same representative would behave differently in some relevant way."). Still other courts faced with influence claims have failed to address them, resolving lawsuits on other grounds. See e.g., Meza Litig., discussion at 322 F. Supp. 2d 52, 64 (D. Mass. 2004) (declining to decide whether plaintiffs may satisfy Gingles I without a numerical majority because the case could be resolved on alternative grounds); City of Minneapolis Litig., No. 02-1139(JRT/FLN), 2004 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19708 (D. Minn. Sept. 30, 2004); Hardee County Litig. (FL), discussion at 906 F.2d 524 (11th Cir. 1990).

109. See e.g., Sensley Litig. (LA), discussion at 385 F.3d 591, 596 (5th Cir. 2004) ("[I]t is clear that shape is a significant factor that courts can and must consider in a Gingles compactness inquiry"); Mallory-Ohio Litig. (OH), discussion at 173 F.3d 377, 382-83 (6th Cir. 2000) (upholding district court's decision that plaintiffs "had the burden of showing that those minority voters lived in a geographically compact pattern such that it would be possible to draw a "majority-minority" district with a rational shape" and stating "But the only evidence submitted by the class to demonstrate geographical compactness was a set of maps that purported to show the concentration of African-American populations within each of Ohio's largest counties."); Montezuma-Cortez, Colo. Sch. Dist. Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1167 (D. Colo. 1998) (considering an existing plan in a case where defendants sought to get out of a settlement and return to an at-large system: "A simple visual inspection shows that District D is compact, normally shaped, completely rationale [sic] in appearance and similar to all other districts contained in the existing plan.); Jefferson Parish I Litig., 691 F. Supp. 961, 1007 (E.D.La. 1988) (criticizing plaintiffs' proposed plan: "[t]he district contains no less than 35 sides..."), Worcester County Litig., discussion at 840 F. Supp. 1081, 1086-87 (D. Md. 1994), rev'd in part on other grounds by 35 F.3d 921 (4th Cir. 1994) ("The plaintiffs' proposed Plan 1 is not unreasonably irregular in shape, considering the population dispersal within the County...The districts may not be symmetrical, but they are compact. They do not rely on districts that run through several "tentacle-like corridors' nor are the district's boundary lines so unreasonably irregular, bizarre or uncouth as to approach obvious gerrymandering.").

110. See e.g, City of Minneapolis Litig., No. 02-1139(JRT/FLN), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19708, at *10 (Minn. Sept. 30 2004) (considering any plan must conform to a 2:1 length to width ratio to comport with the city charter), Sensley Litig. (LA), discussion at 385 F.3d 591, 597-98 (5th Cir. 2004) (concluding that there was no clear error where the district court held the proposed districts not compact where they ignored traditional districting principles); Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 989, 992 (D.S.D. 2004) (that the proposed plans adhered to state's traditional redistricting principles, including respect for geographical and political boundaries, and protection of minority voting rights."), Montezuma-Cortez, Colo. Sch. Dist. Litig., 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1167 (D. Colo. 1998) (finding the district was drawn in adherence to traditional districting principles); Town of Hempstead Litig., discussion at 956 F. Supp. 326, 350 (E.D.N.Y. 1997) ("[P]laintiffs have amply demonstrated that a majority-minority district can be fashioned without subordinating traditional districting principles to racial considerations).

111. See e.g, Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 989, 992 (D.S.D. 2004) (stating that there was no Shaw problem where districts, while irregular in shape, were no more irregular than those in the state's plan); Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 492 (2d Cir. 1999) ("This proposed District 3 was found to be more compact than the average congressional district."); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 413 (D.S.C. 1993) (finding compactness where "Plaintiffs' single-member district plans are reasonably compact and are no more irregular in shape than the districts actually in use under the existing 4-2-1 plan.") Nash Litig., 797 F. Supp. 1488, 1497 (W.D. Mo. 1992) ("A visual inspection of the two plans demonstrates Dr. Jones' plan is less compact than the Commission's plan."); Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196 (E.D. Ark. 1989) (noting plaintiffs' proposed districts "look rather strange" but that they "are not materially stranger in shape than at least some of the districts contained in the present apportionment plan.").

112. See e.g., Albritton Litig. (LA), discussion at 385 F.3d 591, 597-98 (5th Cir. 2004) (concluding that there was no clear error in the district court's holding that compactness was lacking where proposed districts separated distinct communities); City of Chicago-Bonilla Litig., discussion at 17 F. Supp. 2d 753, 758 (N.D. Ill. 1998) (considering and rejecting claims that displacement of part of the community "into another aldermanic ward will result in the destruction of the community."); Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991) (finding compactness where the districts were not "so spread out as to prevent the constituents and their representative from communicating with each other" and "none of these districts are so convoluted that its members and representatives would not be able to tell who actually lived in each district."); Jefferson Parish I Litig., 691 F. Supp. 961, 1007 (E.D. La. 1988) ("A proposed district is sufficiently compact if it retains a natural sense of community. To retain that sense of community, a district should not be so convoluted that its representative could not easily tell who actually lives within the district.") Baldwin County Board of Education, 686 F. Supp. 1459 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (applying a functional approach and suggesting that a district would not be sufficiently compact, the court suggested, if it destroyed all "sense of community.").

113. Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952 (1996); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900 (1995); Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 600 (1993).

114. Sensley Litig. (LA), discussion at 385 F.3d 591, 596-98 (5th Cir. 2004); City of New Rochelle Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 152, 159 (S.D.N.Y. 2003); France Litig., discussion at 71 F. Supp. 2d 317, 325-26 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); Town of Hempstead Litig., discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 492 (2d Cir. 1999); Lafayette County Litig., discussion at 20 F. Supp. 2d 996, 999-1000 (N.D. Miss. 1998); Davis v. Chiles Litig., discussion at 139 F.3d 1414 (11th Cir. 1998); City of Rome Litig., discussion at 127 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997); Chickasaw County II Litig., No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 WL 33426761, at *1 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 873 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Calhoun County Litig., discussion at 881 F. Supp. 252, 253-54 (5th Cir. 1996); Marylanders Litig., 849 F. Supp. 1022, 1056 (D. Md. 1994); Hamrick Litig. (GA), 296 F.3d 1065 (11th Cir. 2002).

115. See e.g., City of Minneapolis Litig., discussion at No. 02-1139(JRT/FLN), 2004 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19708, at *50-51 (D. Minn. Sept. 30, 2004) ("[E]xamination of the redistricting maps clearly demonstrates that the ward shapes in this case are neither bizarre nor irregular. The Court is not alone in reaching this conclusion. Plaintiffs' expert testified that "it would be hard to conclude that either [the previous wards or the redistricting plan wards] are bizarre." (Charles Dep. at 220.) Similarly, defendant's expert testified that, based on his review of numerous redistricting plans, he did not find any of the districts to be "bizarre in terms of their shapes."); Thurston County Litig. (NE), discussion at 129 F.3d 1015, 1025 (8th Cir. 1997)

(holding no violation of Section 2 for either the school board or the village board of elections because of their bizarre shape).

116. See e.g., Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 115, 1168 (D. Colo. 1998) ("A simple visual inspection shows that District D is compact, normally shaped, completely rationale [sic] in appearance and similar to all other districts contained in the existing plan. It is plainly not the kind of district criticized in Shaw v. Reno and Miller v. Johnson."); Lafayette County Litig., discussion at 20 F. Supp. 2d 996, 999-1000 (N.D. Miss. 1998) ("[T]he question is not whether the plaintiff residents' proposed district was oddly shaped, but whether the proposal demonstrated that a geographically compact district could be drawn." While both of plaintiffs' plans had some "ragged edges," and one district "even contain[ed] three thin appendages that reach[ed] awkwardly into minority communities located in and around the City of Oxford" the court found Gingles I met because "the Fifth Circuit has also reviewed the plans and concluded that at least one of them 'is not nearly as "bizarre" as those rejected in Shaw v. Reno."); Sanchez-Colorado Litig., discussion at 97 F.3d 1303, 1315 (10th Cir. 1996) ("We would also note by comparison to the districts the Court recently found 'bizarre' in Shaw II and Bush, plaintiffs' proposed district is nonobjectionable."); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 873 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (noting although the districts were oddly shaped, they were not as odd as the ones in Shaw, so the district would not fail on this alone; it failed because the expert failed to adequately take traditional districting principles into account, including a consideration of similarity to existing districts in the county); Little Rock Sch. Dist. Litig. (AR), discussion at 56 F.3d 904, 912 (8th Cir. 1995) ("[A]lthough the plaintiffs' proposed zone boundaries are nowhere nearly so bizarre as the ones held presumptively unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in Shaw, they are markedly less regular and compact than those in LRSD's adopted plan.).

117. See e.g., Sensley Litig. (LA), discussion at 385 F.3d 591, 596-98 (5th Cir. 2004) (citing Vera and Abrams v. Johnson, the court focused on the district's odd shape and plaintiffs' failure to observe traditional districting principles in holding that Gingles I was not met); France Litig., discussion at 71 F. Supp. 2d 317, 325-26 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (finding that plaintiffs' plan was "primarily driven by considerations of race" and that plaintiffs "failed to meet their burden of showing that their districting plan takes into account traditional districting criteria such as compactness, geography, and the integrity of political subdivisions;" applying strict scrutiny and finding that the district was not narrowly tailored because it failed on the Gingles factors); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 873-74 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (declining "to find that plaintiffs have met their burden of proof of showing that their districting plan, drawn with a near-exclusive focus on race, by chance adequately takes into account districting criteria such as compactness, respect for the Town's geography, contiguity and the integrity of political subdivisions and communities of interests."). But see City of New Rochelle Litig., 308 F. Supp. 2d 152, 159 (S.D.N.Y. 2003)(maintaining that a return to a prior districting plan would not be contrary to Shaw and Vera and that it was not "directing such a race conscious gerrymander; instead it is directing the restoration of the status quo ante, which was unnecessarily disrupted in violation of Plaintiffs rights under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.").

118. Unlike the other Senate Factors, which were largely derived from judicial decisions predating the 1982 amendments, racial bloc voting emerged as a formal element of the Section 2 inquiry for the first time in 1982. See, e.g., Lubbock Litig. (TX), discussion at 727 F.2d 364, 384 (5th Cir. 1984). Supporters of the 1982 amendments to Section 2 invoked racial bloc voting as the critical restraint that would keep the amended statute from devolving into a mandate for proportional representation. "[O]ne factor that emerges as central in the Senate Report is the extent to which voting is 'racially polarized.' This factor is nowhere directly mentioned in the White/Zimmer line of cases; it starts to rise in the Senate debates when proponents are forced to respond to Senator Hatch's argument that the amended Section 2 will guarantee proportional representation along racial lines." ISSACHAROFF, KARLAN, PILDES, supra note 12, at 741.

119. The exceptions are cases involving challenges to specific voting procedures that identified Section 2 violations without considering racially polarized voting, see Berks County Litig., 277 F. Supp. 2d 570 (E.D. Pa. 2003) (poll official conduct); Marks-Philadelphia Litig., No. CIV. A. 93-6157, 1994 WL 146113 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 26, 1994) (absentee ballots); Operation Push Litig., 932 F.2d 400 (5th Cir. 1991) (voter registration system); Town of North Johns Litig., 717 F. Supp. 1471 (M.D. Ala. 1989) (withholding of candidacy filing forms); Harris v. Graddick Litig., 695 F. Supp. 517 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (policy of appointing only white poll officials); Madison County Litig., 610 F. Supp. 240 (S.D. Miss. 1985) (invalidation of absentee ballots), and two cases that found a violation of Section 2 based on invidious intent without considering racially polarized voting. See Arakaki Litig. (HI), 314 F.3d 1091(9th Cir. 2002); Rybicki Litig., 574 F. Supp. 1147 (N.D. Ill. 1983).

120. See Gingles Litig. (NC), discussion at 478 U.S. 30, 50-51 (1986).

121. See id. at 32; see also supra Part III.B.1.

122. See, e.g., City of Holyoke Litig. (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 983 (1st Cir. 1995); De Grandy Litig. (FL), discussion at 512 U.S. 997, 1011-12 (1994); LULAC v. Clements Litig. (TX), discussion at 999 F.2d 831, 850 (5th Cir. 1993).

123. See SENATE REPORT at 28-30.

124. Decisions decided between the 1982 amendments and the Court's decision in Gingles obviously do not employ the Gingles test. Instead, these courts applied varied standards to evaluate racial bloc voting under Senate factor 2. See, e.g., Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 348-49 (N.D. Tex. 1983) ("Typically, the degree of racial polarity in voting is determined by examining election races in which blacks opposed whites, taking the percentage of voters who supported a candidate of their own race, and subtracting the percentage of voters who voted for a candidate of another race, to obtain a "racial polarization score.").

125. See, e.g., Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 277-78 (D.S.C. 2003) (discussing racially polarized voting in totality review via a brief recap of experts' statistics already analyzed under Gingles); Westwego Litig. (LA), 946 F.2d 1109, 1116 (5th Cir. 1991) (referencing Gingles analysis in totality of the circumstances review). But cf. Chickasaw County II Litig., No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 WL 33426761, at *3 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997) (briefly concluding racial bloc voting under Gingles, with more discussion in the totality review). Many courts also hold that causation should be decided in the totality of the circumstances, see infra discussion on causation. Some courts then import the causation question into a consideration of factor 2, see, e.g., Alamosa County Litig., 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1029-

33 (D. Colo. 2004) (finding Gingles met, but no racially polarized voting due to causation), while others simply consider causation as a different part of the totality of the circumstances see e.g., Alamance County Litig. (NC), discussion at 99F.3d 600, 604 (4th Cir. 1996)("[T]he best reading of Gingles...is one that treats causation as irrelevant in the inquiry into the three Gingles preconditions but relevant in the totality of the circumstances inquiry.").

126. See Master Lawsuit List.

127. See e.g., Baldwin County Commission Litig. (AL), 376 F.3d 1260 (11th Cir. 2004) (defendant conceded that racial bloc voting existed); Sensley Litig. (LA), 385 F.3d 591 (5th Cir. 2004) (parties stipulated that racial bloc voting existed); Baldwin County Commission Litig. (AL), 376 F.3d 1260 (11th Cir. 2004) (defendant conceded that racial bloc voting existed); DeSoto County (FL), 204 F.3d 1335 (11th Cir. 2000) (finding of Gingles I reversed thus appellate court never addressed district court's finding of Gingles II or III); Pasadena I.S.D. Litig. (TX), 165 F.3d 368, 371 (5th Cir. 1999) ("Although the district court found that plaintiffs failed to meet the first Gingles requirement, the court exhaustively considered the evidence presented, addressed the remaining two Gingles requirements, and considered the 'totality of circumstances' using the Zimmer factors."); Davis v. Chiles Litig. (FL), 139 F.3d 1414, 1416 (11th Cir. 1998) (finding Gingles threshold met, but no remedy therefore modifying Gingles I to state it unmet); Hall Litig. (GA), 512 U.S. 874 (1994) (reversed on another factor and did not address bloc voting).

128. See infra part III.C.10 (cases that found Gingles threshold but no violation due to proportionality).

129. City of Chicago-Bonilla Litig. (IL), 141 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 1998) (remanding for review of totality of circumstances); Carrollton NAACP Litig. (GA), 829 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987) (remanding for a finding on the other two Gingles factors).

130. Old Person Litig. (MT), 312 F.3d 1036, 1050 (9th Cir. 2002) ("This is one of those not unusual cases where our decision is controlled by the proper standard of review. On one side of the scale lies a history of official discrimination, the presence of racially polarized elections, the presence of socioeconomic factors limiting Indians' political participation, the use of racial appeals in elections, and disproportionality. On the other side of the scale we see the absence of discriminatory voting practices, the viable policy underlying the existing district boundaries, the success of Indians in elections, and officials' responsiveness to Native Americans' needs. We have fully considered the legal issues presented and the detailed factual record with which the district court grappled. We cannot say that the district court's determination that there was no vote dilution, considered in the totality of circumstances, was clearly erroneous."); NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), 252 F.3d 361, 374 (5th Cir. 2001) ("In summary, the district court found that, although Mississippi has an undeniable history of official discrimination from which its African-American citizens still suffer the effects, Wilson failed to demonstrate that this reality hindered the ability of Mississippi's African-American citizens to participate effectively in the state's political process. Moreover, the court determined that the factors of majority vote requirement, the size of the contested electoral districts, candidate slating, responsiveness, and tenuousness did not favor Wilson. The record before us supports the district court's determinations regarding these factors. As such, we cannot conclude that these findings were clearly erroneous."); Liberty County Commissioners Litig. (FL), 221 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2000); Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), 65 F.3d 1002 (2d Cir. 1995); Democratic Party of Arkansas Litig. (AR), 902 F.2d 15 (8th Cir. 1990); City of Boston Litig. (MA), 784 F.2d 409 (1st Cir. 1986) (finding "moderate racially polarized voting" does not establish a Section 2 violation when coupled with the lack of voting practices that minimize minority votes, the absence of racial motivation, the plan includes two minority districts, the results of the 1983 elections, in which several minorities were elected, and without clear proof an alternative plan would increase minority vote effectiveness without sacrificing other districting considerations).

131. Gingles Litig., 478 U.S. 30, 68 (1986).

132. First Circuit: City of Boston Litig. (MA), discussion at 784 F.2d 409, 413 (1st Cir. 1986) (assuming that black candidates are the preferred candidates of black voters); cf. City of Holyoke Litig. (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 988 (1st Cir. 1995) (considering only elections in which Hispanic candidates ran for office); Second Circuit: Albany County Litig., discussion at No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820, at *10-11 (N.D.N.Y. Jul. 7, 2003) (equating minority candidate with minority-preferred candidate by noting the absence of minority candidates for county-wide office and concluding that "no evidence exists as to whether white voters County-wide supported a minority-preferred candidate"); Green Litig., discussion at No. CV-96-3367 (CPS), 1996 WL 524395, at *10 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 5, 1996) ("[N]o evidence has been presented that plaintiff voters and registered voters have been outvoted by a white majority class. According to the defendants, eight of the nine newly elected board members are African Americans . . . ."); cf. Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1018-19 (2d. Cir. 1995) (holding that a white candidate may be minority-preferred and adopting a race-blind bright line rule for the Second Circuit); Third Circuit: Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 4 F.3d 1103, 1126 (3d Cir. 1993) (adopting presumption that the minority candidate is minority-preferred and noting that "experience does demonstrate that minority candidates will tend to be candidates of choice among the minority community," but nevertheless insisting that plaintiffs must present some evidence establishing this presumption); Harrison Litig., discussion at Civ. A. No. 92-0603, 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5315, at *7-8 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 21, 1992) (agreeing with defendant expert testimony that African Americans tend to vote for African-American candidates); Fourth Circuit: Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1100-02 (E.D.N.C. 1991) (considering only black-white elections). But see City of Hampton Litig., discussion at 919 F. Supp. 212, 214 (E.D. Va. 1996) ("[T]he focus of the Plaintiffs' presentation was the race of the candidate elected, whereas the focus of the Voting Rights Act is upon the opportunity of a minority to elect the candidate of its choice . . . ."); Fifth Circuit: St. Bernard Parish School Board Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 02-2209, 2002 WL 2022589, at *6 (E.D. La., Aug. 26, 2002) ("In assessing whether racial bloc voting occurs, the appropriate focus is on elections in which a minority group member is a candidate"); LULAC v. Clements Litig. (TX), discussion at 999 F.2d 831, 864 (5th Cir. 1993) (citing City of Gretna for proposition that elections without a minority candidate are less probative because they do not provide minority voters with the choice of a minority candidate); Gretna Litig. (LA), discussion at 834 F.2d 496, 503 (5th Cir. 1987) ("We consider Jones to be an aldermanic candidate sponsored by Gretna's minority group because he received a significant portion of the black vote, and because he is black.") (footnote omitted); Sixth Circuit: Anthony Litig., discussion at 35 F. Supp. 2d 989, 992 (E.D. Mich.

1999) (finding all African-American candidates but one were the minority-preferred candidate); Rural West I Litig., discussion at 877 F. Supp. 1096, 1108 (W.D. Tenn. 1995) ("As a practical matter . . . in most racially polarized districts where white voters prefer white candidates (as is effectively required by the third Gingles precondition to find a § 2 violation), black voters will choose to vote for black candidates. This is certainly true in Tennessee."); Seventh Circuit: Campuzano Litig., discussion at 200 F. Supp. 2d 905, 914 (N.D. Ill. 2002) ("The parties agree that, with few exceptions, African-Americans overwhelmingly prefer representation by African-American candidates); City of Chicago Litig. (IL), discussion at 141 F.3d 699, 703 (7th Cir. 1998) (dismissing arguments that white candidates in some areas with substantial minority populations are responsive to minority interests and explaining that "[i]t may be highly regrettable that a candidate's race should matter to the electorate; but it does; and the cases interpreting the Voting Rights Act do not allow the courts to ignore that preference."); Eighth Circuit: Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), discussion at 71 F.3d 1382, 1387-88 (8th Cir. 1995) (adopting Jenkins methodology for determining the minority-preferred candidate which includes a presumption in favor of the minority candidate). The Eighth Circuit, however, requires additional evidence to establish the minority-preferred candidate Ninth Circuit: The Ninth Circuit always requires evidence to establish the minority-preferred candidate. Tenth Circuit: Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1029-33 (D. Colo. 2004) (permitting presumption that the minority candidate was the minority-preferred candidate to stand without independent evidence because both plaintiff and defendant expert agreed); Eleventh Circuit: Brooks Litig. (GA), discussion at 158 F.3d 1230, 1235, 1240 (11th Cir. 1998) (assuming without discussion that all black candidates are minority-preferred and all white candidates are majority preferred); Southern Christian Leadership Conference Litig. (AL), 56 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 1995) (same); Holder v. Hall Litig. (GA), discussion at 955 F.2d 1563, 1571-72 (11th Cir. 1992) (same); Baldwin Board of Education Litig., 686 F. Supp. 1459 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (same); Dillard v. Crenshaw, 640 F. Supp. 1347 (M.D. Ala. 1986) (same).

133. The following circuits allow for a lesser burden to establish a minority candidate is minority-preferred: Third Circuit: Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 4 F.3d 1103, 1129 (3rd Cir. 1993) (adopting a presumption that the minority is the minority-preferred candidate but allowing white candidate to be minority-preferred and adopting different tests for both); Fifth Circuit: Pasadena Indep. School District Litig., discussion at 958 F. Supp. 1196 (S.D. Tex. 1997) (discussing several elections in which, despite evidence of consistent Hispanic support for the Hispanic candidate at the polls, the plaintiffs' expert witness could not identify the Hispanic preferred candidate); LULAC v. Roscoe I.S.D. Litig., discussion at Civ. A. No. 1:94-CV-104-C, 1996 WL 453584, *2 (N.D. Tex. May 14, 1996) (struggling to identify the minority-preferred candidate in an election with multiple Hispanic candidates.); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1393, 1395 (N.D. Tex. 1990) (suggesting that voting patterns and witness testimony can help identify the minority-preferred candidate); Gretna Litig., discussion at 636 F. Supp. 1113, 1133 (D. La. 1986)("Unless it can be shown that an election occurred in which a white candidate ran on issues strongly affecting the black community and with an open, positive and strong identification with the black community -- which has not been shown in this matter -- candidacies of black persons are the proper focus of inquiry concerning the extent to which elections are polarized."); Seventh: Rockford Board of Education Litig., discussion at Civ.A. No. 89 C 20168, 1991 WL 299104, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 12, 1991) ("The African Americans in the School District have tended to vote as a group and to vote for African American candidates."); Springfield Park District Litig. (IL), 851 F.2d 937 (7th Cir. 1988) (citing trend in minorities voting for the minority candidate found in district court); Tenth Circuit: Sanchez-Colorado Litig. (CO), discussion at 97 F.3d 1303, 1320-21 (10th Cir. 1996) (adopting Jenkins methodology); Bond Litig. (CO), discussion at 875 F.2d 1488, 1495 (10th Cir. 1989) (holding the minority-preferred candidate does not have to be a minority and elections with only white candidates should be given "such weight as the circumstances warrant"); Eleventh: De Grandy Litig. discussion at 815 F. Supp. 1550, 1572-73 (N.D. Fla. 1992) (presuming that minority candidates are minority-preferred after reviewing evidence that blacks and Hispanics generally prefer candidates of the own race). But see, City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1377, 1379 n.9 (11th Cir. 1997) (finding that all black candidates were strongly supported by the black community and were black preferred, including one black candidate who did not receive a plurality of the black vote, and then finding that white candidates minority where they had almost as much support as black candidates).

Other circuits require the same evidence regardless of the candidate's race: First Circuit: Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004) (relying on regression analyses of minority voting patterns to identify the minority-preferred candidate); Meza Litig., 322 F. Supp. 2d 52 (D. Mass. 2004) (same); Second Circuit: Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 388, 389 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (noting that the "minority-preferred candidate is generally the candidate that receives the most votes from the relevant minority group" and citing Niagara Falls for the proposition that the courts must consider elections where the white majority defeats a minority-preferred white candidate); Fourth Circuit: Alamance County Litig. (NC), discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 615 (4th Cir. 1996) (holding any candidate who receives the plurality of the minority votes is the minority-preferred candidate); Sixth Circuit: Quilter Litig., discussion at 794 F. Supp. 695, 701 (N.D. Ohio 1992) (criticizing plaintiffs expert for merely stating that "given the opportunity there is a much higher percentage of black vote for black candidates than white vote for black candidates" and not finding racial bloc voting); Armour Litig., discussion at 775 F. Supp. 1044, 1057 (N.D. Ohio 1991) (finding the minority candidate was the preferred candidate because of testimony that the "the relationship between the candidate's race and the race of the voter was consistently near linear"); Eight Circuit: While the Eighth Circuit expressly follows Jenkins and allows a presumption that the minority candidate is the minority-preferred, this presumption is insufficient to establish the minority-preferred candidate alone. See City of Minneapolis Litig., discussion at No. 02-1139(JRT/FLN), 2004 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19708, at *28-32 (D. Minn. Sept. 30, 2004) (demanding evidence that the minority candidate is minority-preferred); Clay County Board of Education Litig., discussion at 90 F.3d 1357, 1362-64 (8th Cir. 1996) (refusing to presume minority candidate was minority-preferred absent independent evidence but acknowledging the candidate's race should be considered); Nash Litig., discussion at 797 F. Supp. 1488, 1503 (W.D. Mo. 1992) ("We have, for purposes of this opinion, arbitrarily deemed any candidate receiving more than 65% of the black vote "minority-preferred." There was some testimony to the effect that black voters, given a choice, would vote only for black candidates, and that a white candidate receiving a majority of the black vote was probably not a "true" preference. There was also testimony indicating that if a white person received a majority of the black vote, any black candidates probably were not viable candidates. We refuse to impart these individual witnesses' views to black citizens as a whole. Absent some indication that a particular white candidate was truly not preferred despite receiving over 65% of the black vote, or that a particular black candidate was not viable, we will not assume that the voters in a particular political contest would have voted for someone other than the person they voted for, nor will we assume that a white candidate receiving over 65% of the black vote was not preferred by the minority voters."); Ninth Circuit: City of Santa Maria Litig. (CA), discussion at 160 F.3d 543, 549-50 (9th Cir. 1998) (rejecting that only minority candidates could be minority-preferred and adopting a "bright-line" test for determining the minority-preferred candidate); National City Litig., discussion at No. 88-301-R(M), 1991 WL 421115 (S.D. Cal. May 16, 1991) (looking at voting patterns and using regressions to determine the minority-preferred candidate); Watsonville Litig. (CA), 863 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1988) (holding courts should not look beyond voting patterns to determine the minority-preferred candidate, but not differentiating between the race of the candidates).

134. Most circuits now hold that the minority-preferred candidate does not have to be a minority: First Circuit: Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 304 (D. Mass. 2004) ("We understand that black voters sometimes may consider a white candidate their representative of choice and vice-versa."); Second Circuit: City of Niagara Falls Litig., discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1016 (2d Cir. 1995) (refusing to "adopt an approach precluding the possibility that a white candidate can be the actual and legitimate choice of minority voters."); Third Circuit: Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion in 4 F.3d 1103, 1126 (3d Cir. 1993) (allowing either minority candidates or white candidates to be minority-preferred but adopting different tests for each); Fourth Circuit: Alamance County Litig., discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 608 (4th Cir. 1996) (stating that the minority-preferred candidate may sometimes be a white candidate); Fifth Circuit: LULAC v. Clements Litig. (TX), discussion at 999 F.2d 831, 882-83 (5th Cir. 1993) ("The black-preferred candidate in Harris County, regardless of race, was always the Democratic candidate."); Sixth Circuit: Cincinnati Litig. (OH), discussion at 40 F.3d 807, 813 (6th Cir. 1994) (adopting a colorblind approach to determining the minority-preferred candidate); Seventh Circuit: Williams v. State Bd. of Elections Litig. (IL), 718 F. Supp. 1324, 1325-26 (7th Cir. 1989) (finding that white candidates that earned a majority of the minority vote were minority-preferred candidates in spite of evidence of discrimination in the candidate slating process); see also City of Chicago Heights Litig. (IL), discussion at 824 F. Supp. 786, 791 (N.D. Ill. 1993) (finding, in multi-member districts, candidates who receive the majority of the vote are not minority-preferred where "other candidates, preferred by a significantly higher percentage of the minority community. . . . were defeated in the same election"); Eighth Circuit: Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), discussion at 71 F.3d 1382, 1387-88 (8th Cir. 1995) (adopting the Jenkins methodology); Ninth Circuit: City of Santa Maria Litig. (CA), 160 F.3d 543, 549-50 (9th Cir. 1998) (rejecting that only minority candidates could be minority-preferred and adopting a "bright-line" test for determining the minority-preferred candidate); Tenth Circuit: Sanchez-Bond Litig., 875 F.2d 1488, 1495 (10th Cir. 1989) (holding the minority-preferred candidate does not have to be a minority); Eleventh Circuit: City of Rome Litig. (GA), 127 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997) ("[W]here every voter has to vote for three candidates, a white candidate is considered to be a black preferred candidate if (s)he receives nearly as much support from the black community as does a black preferred black candidate in that election.").

135. Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 4 F.3d 1103, 1129 (3rd Cir. 1993).

136. See, e.g., Third Circuit: Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 4 F.3d 1103, 1129 (3rd Cir. 1993) (Evidence showing non-minority candidate to be minority-preferred includes evidence of minority "sponsorship" of the candidate, the level of attenuon the candidate pays to the minority community, the level of minority turnout for white-white elections compared to elections involving a minority candidate, the disincentives minority candidates confront and difficulties they face in qualifying for office, and the extent minorities candidates have run in the past); Eighth Circuit: Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 997-1017 (D.S.D. 2004) (considering anecdotal evidence such as the formation of advocacy organizations, political parties targeting the minority group, get out the vote efforts, and politicians testimony as well as statistical evidence in determining cohesion and bloc voting); Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), discussion at 71 F.3d 1382, 1386 (8th Cir. 1995) (stating circuit will follow Third Circuit's approach in Jenkins); Tenth Circuit: Sanchez v. Colorado Litig. (CO), discussion at 97 F.3d 1303, 1321 (10th Cir. 1996) (adopting approach from Jenkins); Eleventh: Nipper Litig. (FL), discussion at 39 F.3d 1494, 1540 (11th Cir. 1994) (requiring evidence of "strong preference" before white candidate will be considered minority-preferred and permitting such evidence to include anecdotal evidence, polling and turnout data, and a review of appeals made during the campaign). But see supra note 134 (discussion of City of Rome litigation).

137. Bond Litig. (CO), discussion at 875 F.2d 1488, 1496 (10th Cir. 1989) (determining that white candidates are minority-preferred based on Hispanic influence over the candidate slating process); City of St. Louis Litig. (MO), discussion at 90 F.3d 1357, 1362 (8th Cir. 1996) (suggesting slating informs inquiry into minority-preferred candidates by stating: "Absent a showing that minority-preferred candidates are, for some reason, excluded from the ballot, it is a near tautological principle that the minority-preferred candidate 'should generally be one able to receive [minority] votes.' "); see also Williams v. State Bd. of Elections Litig., discussion at 718 F. Supp. 1324, 1329-30 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (refusing to consider the slating process in Gingles inquiry as "turn[ing] the Court's language on its head and would have it refer to circumstances explaining the defeat of the minority's candidate, such as exclusionary slating").

138. See, e.g., City of Santa Maria Litig. (CA), discussion at 160 F.3d 543, 549-50 ("[M]any of the extrinsic factors relied upon by the courts adopting the totality of the circumstances analysis do not necessarily bear a correlation with how all minority voters feel about a candidate, only how activist groups feel. Whether minority voters mobilized to support a white candidate, a factor considered relevant by the Third Circuit, Jenkins, 4 F.3d at 1129, only indicates how those minorities willing to become politically active feel about a candidate; not all minorities may have the time or inclination to take such steps, even though they support that candidate. A bright-line rule, on the other hand, is based on the premise "that the ballot box provides the best and most objective proxy for determining who constitutes a representative of choice." Niagara Falls, 65 F.3d at 1019."); Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1018 (2d Cir. 1995) ("We sympathize with these Circuits in their efforts to grapple with the often-conflicting requirements of the Voting Rights Act, but we believe that evaluating whether a person is, 'as a realistic matter,' minority-preferred -- based on subjective indicators such as "anecdotal testimonial evidence' -- is a dubious judicial task, and one that can degenerate into racial stereotyping of a high order. Questions such as whether a candidate, in a campaign, 'addressed predominately minority crowds and interests' suggest the existence of a racial political orthodoxy that courts should not legitimate, much less profess or promote.").

139. See, e.g., Second Circuit: Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1018-19 (2d Cir. 1995) (defining the minority-preferred candidate as the candidate that receives more than fifty percent of minority votes in the at-large, general election, while providing that courts need not consider such a candidate minority-preferred if either (1) another candidate received more than fifty percent of the minority vote in the primary and failed to reach the general election; or (2) another candidate received significantly higher support); Sixth Circuit: Cincinnati Litig. (OH), discussion at 40 F.3d 807, 810 n.1 (6th Cir. 1994) (The Sixth Circuit has simply adopted this approach stating "courts generally have understood blacks' preferred candidates simply to be those candidates who receive the greatest support from black voters."); Ninth Circuit: City of Santa Maria Litig. (CA), discussion at 160 F.3d 543, 552 (9th Cir. 1998) (adopting a rule that any candidate who received the largest plurality of minority votes was the minority-preferred candidate); Watsonville Litig. (CA), discussion at 863 F.2d 1407, 1416 (9th Cir. 1988) ("The court should have looked only to actual voting patterns rather than speculating as to the reasons why many Hispanics were apathetic. In fact, there is nothing in the record to support the district court's apparent conclusion that lack of enthusiasm for Hispanic candidates was responsible for the low rates of voter registration among Hispanics.").

140. Earlier cases in the Fourth Circuit allowed more room for subjective inquiries. See Norfolk Litig. (VA), discussion at 816 F.2d 932, 937 (4th Cir. 1987) ("In elections in multimember systems, where successful candidates receive support from more than 50% of minority voters, but an unsuccessful candidate has received more minority votes, a court must "review[]" the situation "individually" to determine whether successful candidates "can be fairly considered as representatives of the minority community. The presumption must be that they cannot, if some other candidate has received significantly more minority votes."); City of Norfolk Litig. (VA), 883 F.2d 1232, 1238 (4th Cir. 1989) (adding that in such a situation, "in addition to the bare statistics, it is appropriate to consider testimony revealing how political observers and the candidates themselves viewed the city's claim that Howell and Staylor were the minority's preferred candidates and representatives of choice.") More recently, however, the Fourth Circuit has moved closer to the Second Circuit's approach. See Alamance County Litig. (NC), discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 615 (4th Cir. 1996) ("Where the first choice of black voters was successful, there is simply no reason to presume that the minority community has been unsuccessful in electing representatives of its choice. . . . we now hold that, in multi-seat elections in which voters are permitted to cast as many votes as there are seats, at the very least any candidate who receives a majority of the minority vote and who finishes behind a successful candidate who was the first choice among the minority voters is automatically to be deemed a black-preferred candidate, just like the successful first choice...Candidates who receive less than 50% of the minority vote, but who would have been elected had the election been held only among black voters, are presumed also to be minority-preferred candidates, although an individualized assessment should be made in order to confirm that such a candidate may appropriately be so considered."); see also Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 278 (D.S.C. 2003) (following Alamance County), and discussion at 318 F. Supp. 302, 310 (D.S.C. 2002) (focusing on the weight of the statistical data, rather than on defendants' "anecdotal, deposition testimony of candidates who testify to being minority-preferred candidates").

141. While courts in the Fifth and First Circuits do not expressly adhere to the Jenkins approach, they consider some similar factors (voting patterns, testimony from the community, and evidence of active minority support for a particular candidate). These courts do not state a presumption in favor of the minority being the preferred candidate, but they weigh elections with minority candidates more heavily. See First Circuit: Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004) (relying on regression analyses of minority voting patterns to identify the minority-preferred candidate); cf. City of Holyoke Litig., (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 988 (1st Cir. 1995) (considering only elections in which Hispanic candidates ran for office); Fifth Circuit: LULAC v. Roscoe I.S.D. Litig. (TX), discussion at 123 F.3d 843, 848 (5th Cir. 1997) (relying on testimony from minority residents); LULAC v. Roscoe Independent School District Litig., discussion at Civ. A. No. 1:94-CV-104-C, 1996 WL 453584, at *2 (N.D. Tex. May 14, 1996) (listing election results and political activism in favor of a particular candidate as potential indicators that the candidate was preferred by the minority community); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1393, 1395 (N.D. Tex. 1990) (suggesting that voting patterns and witness testimony can help identify the minority-preferred candidate); Cf. LULAC-North East I.S.D. Litig., discussion at 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1092 (W.D. Tex. 1995) (explaining decision to discount results of Anglo v. Anglo races on the grounds that "such elections fail to provide minority voters with the choice of a minority candidate").

The Seventh Circuit typically does not engage in any such inquiry analysis to identify the minority-preferred candidate. Rather Seventh Circuit courts typically assume that the minority candidate is the minority-preferred candidate. See, e.g., Campuzano Litig., discussion at , 200 F. Supp 2d 905, 914 (N.D. Ill. 2002) (finding that districts with between 50 and 60 percent minority voting age population are likely to perform for minorities in part because "evidence that African-American candidates enjoy greater support than white candidates within a district would suggest that the district provides African-Americans with effective opportunities to elect the candidate of their choice"); City of Chicago Litig. (IL), discussion at 141 F.3d 699, 702 (7th Cir. 1998) (dismissing arguments that white candidates in some areas with substantial minority populations are responsive to minority interests and explaining that "[i]t may be highly regrettable that a candidate's race should matter to the electorate; but it does; and the cases interpreting the Voting Rights Act do not allow the courts to ignore that preference"); Bradley v. Work Litig. (IN), discussion at 154 F.3d 704, 710-11 (7th Cir. 1998) (finding that it is not clear that the third Gingles factor has been met because two black candidates won retention elections, without any discussion of whether those candidates were minority-preferred). Those cases that do consider the question, however, have relied on objective indicators of voting, even where there are other indicators of lack of access. See, e.g., Williams v. State Bd. of Elections Litig. (IL), discussion at 718 F. Supp. 1324, 1325-26 (7th Cir. 1989) (finding that white candidates that earned a majority of the minority vote were minority-preferred candidates in spite of evidence of discrimination in the candidate slating process); see also, City of Chicago Heights Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 786, 791 (N.D. Ill. 1993) (finding, in multi-member districts, candidates who receive the majority of the vote are not minority-preferred where "other candidates, preferred by a significantly higher percentage of the minority community,...were defeated in the same election").

No D.C. Circuit case has had the opportunity to consider this issue.

142. Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), 71 F.3d 1382 (8th Cir. 1995).

143. Clay County Board of Education (MO), discussion at 90 F.3d 1357, 1362 (8th Cir. 1996); see also City of Minneapolis Litig., discussion at No. 02-1139(JRT/FLN), 2004 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19708, at *28-32 (D. Minn. Sept. 30, 2004) (noting the plaintiffs "did not otherwise explicitly identify candidates of choice or a methodology for making such a determination," and therefore because plaintiffs failed to prove who the minority-preferred candidate was on an election-by-election basis, the court relied on the defendant's statistical analysis which showed significant white cross-over votes.)

144. Hamrick Litig. (GA), 296 F.3d 1065 (11th Cir. 2002) (treating minority-preferred candidate as candidate who receives majority of minority votes); Davis v. Chiles Litig. (FL), discussion at 139 F.3d 1414, 1417-18 (11th Cir. 1998) (considering white on white elections where blacks and whites supported different candidates rather than looking to subjective indications of minority support); City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1377, 1379 n.9 (11th Cir. 1997) (holding that white candidates can be considered minority-preferred based on anecdotal evidence, turnout, polling data, and campaign appeals, but then assuming, in the absence of other information, that any white candidate receiving nearly as much of the vote as a black candidate is minority-preferred).

145. Fourth Circuit: Alamance County Litig. (SC), discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 614 (4th Cir. 1996). (presuming minorities to be minority-preferred candidates, looking only at election returns and requiring an "individualized assessment" of all candidates who "receive less than 50% of the minority vote, but who would have been elected had the election been held only among black voters."); Eleventh Circuit: City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1379 n.9 (11th Cir. 1997) (requiring typically a subjective assessment of the candidate's support in the minority community, and holding the circuit will treat a white candidate as black preferred if that candidate receives "nearly as much support from the black community as does a black preferred black candidate in that election." In the absence of other information, support can be measured by the percentage of minority vote received.).

146. See First Circuit: City of Holyoke Litig. (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 988 n. 8 (1st Cir. 1995) ("[E]lections in which minority candidates run are often especially probative on the issue of racial bloc voting."); Second Circuit: The Second Circuit does not explicitly place more weight on elections with minority candidates. See Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1018-19 (2d. Cir. 1995)

(holding that a white candidate may be minority-preferred and adopting a race-blind bright line rule for the Second Circuit); Butts v. NYC Litig., discussion at 614 F. Supp. 1527, 1546-47 (S.D.N.Y. 1985), rev'd on other grounds, 779 F.2d 141 (2d Cir. 1985) (considering only black-white elections); Third Circuit: Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 4 F.3d 1103, 1128 (3rd Cir. 1993) (noting that elections involving only white candidates are "much less probative of racially polarized voting" such that plaintiffs need not present evidence on these elections "if they do not believe those elections are probative."); Fourth Circuit: In general, the Fourth Circuit does not place more weight on racially contested elections. See, e.g., Alamance County Litig. (NC), discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 608, 610 (4th Cir. 1996) (holding that because the minority-preferred candidate may sometimes be a white candidate, district courts in determining whether such candidates are "usually" defeated "must consider, at a minimum, a representative cross-section of elections, and not merely those in which a minority candidate appeared on the ballot, at least where elections in which minorities were on the ballot do not constitute a substantial majority of the total number of elections;" not deciding if or to what extent white-white elections were entitled to less weight: "[i]t seems to us, however, that if white-white elections are entitled to less weight, then they are so only on the question of whether racial polarization exists, not on the question of whether, because of that polarization, minority-preferred candidates are usually defeated."); Fifth Circuit: Gretna Litig. (LA), discussion at 834 F.2d 496, 503-04 (5th Cir. 1987) ("Gingles is properly interpreted to hold that the race of the candidate is in general of less significance than the race of the voter--but only within the context of an election that offers voters the choice of supporting a viable minority candidate...[t]he various Gingles concurring and dissenting opinions do not consider evidence of elections in which only whites were candidates. Hence, neither do we."). Although cases immediately following Gretna only considered elections in which a viable minority candidate ran, see e.g., Baytown Litig. (TX), discussion at 840 F.2d 1240, 1245 (5th Cir. 1988), later Fifth Circuit cases have considered white-white elections, though still viewing them as less probative. See, e.g. Magnolia Bar Association Litig. (MS), discussion at 994 F.2d. 1143, 1149 (5th Cir. 1993) (stating that white-white elections will be considered if evidence is presented, but that black-white elections are more probative); Sixth Circuit: Cincinnati Litig. (OH), discussion at 40 F.3d 807, 813 (6th Cir. 1994) (holding the race of the candidate can matter); City of Jackson Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1531 (W.D. Tenn. 1988) (giving more weight to elections involving black and white candidates); cf. Cousin Litig. (TN), discussion at 145 F.3d 818, 825 (6th Cir. 1998) (criticizing plaintiffs' expert analysis because it excluded white on white elections); Seventh Circuit: City of Indianapolis Litig. (IN), 976 F.2d 357 (7th Cir. 1992) (finding no racial bloc voting where black Republicans are elected because it will not "disregard the race of the victors" but acknowledging that the minority community may prefer another candidate); Eighth Circuit: Texarkana Litig., 861 F. Supp. 756 (W.D. Ark. 1992) (finding racially polarized voting without examining elections involving only white candidates because neither side presented this evidence); Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 209 (E.D. Ark. 1989) ("Where two white candidates are running, for example, black voters can hold the balance of power. We do not wish to minimize this aspect of political reality, but we do not believe it has sufficient weight to negate the clear proof of polarization...White voters, in short, can elect white candidates against black opposition, but black voters cannot elect black candidates against white opposition, with insignificant exceptions."); Smith-Crittenden County Litig.,687 F. Supp. 1310 (E.D. Ark. 1988) (considering that minority candidates lose even if white minority-preferred candidates win evidence of racially polarized voting); Ninth Circuit: Old Person Litig. (MT), discussion at 230 F.3d 1113, 1127 (9th Cir. 2000) ("contests between white and Indian candidates . . . are most probative of white bloc voting."); Santa Maria Litig., discussion at 160 F.3d 543, 553 (9th Cir. 1998) ("minority vs. non-minority election is more probative of racially polarized voting than a non-minority vs. non-minority election"); Tenth Circuit: Sanchez-Colorado Litig. (CO), discussion at 97 F.3d 1303, 1307-08 (10th Cir. 1996) (adopting Jenkins methodology); Bond Litig. (CO), discussion at 875 F.2d 1488, 1495 (10th Cir. 1989) (holding the minority-preferred candidate does not have to be a minority and elections with only white candidates should be given "such weight as the circumstances warrant"); Eleventh Circuit: Southern Christian Leadership Conference Litig. (AL), discussion at 56 F.3d 1281, 1293 (11th Cir. 1995) (upholding district court decision to consider elections generally, but give greater weight to white on black elections, as a "searching and meaningful evaluation of all the relevant evidence"); see also Hamrick Litig. (GA), discussion at 296 F.3d 1065, 1076, 1078 (11th Cir. 2002) (finding that district courts may, but are not required to, give additional weight to elections involving minority candidates and upholding the decision of a district court assigning equal weight to elections involving minority candidates where all such elections involved two minority candidates running against each other).

147. See, e.g., Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 304 (D. Mass. 2004) ("[T]he choice presented to minority voters in an election contested only by two white candidates is somewhat akin to offering ice cream to the public in any flavor, as long as it is pistachio."); City of Chicago Litig. (IL), discussion at 141 F.3d 699, 703 (7th Cir. 1998) (recognizing that white aldermen may be responsive to blacks, but asserting that "blacks would prefer to elect black aldermen"); Metro Dade County Litig., discussion at 805 F. Supp. 967, 984 (S.D. Fla. 1992) (finding that "when elections do not include minority candidates, some Non-Black candidates will receive more of the black vote than other candidates, but this does not automatically make that candidate the minority-preferred candidate" and analogizing this "strained choice" to "Henry Ford's statement that 'any customer can have a car painted any color he wants so long as it is Black.'"); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1388 (N.D. Tex. 1990) ("[W]hen there are only white candidates to chose from, it is virtually unavoidable that certain white candidates would be supported by a large percentage of...black voters" (internal citations omitted)); cf. Old Person Litig. (MT), discussion at 230 F.3d 1113, 1126 (9th Cir. 2000) (in a claim brought by Native Americans, excluding evidence of white on white elections where the minority-preferred candidate was the same as the white preferred candidate because those elections did not "touch[] on issues of heightened concern to the [minority] community").

148. See LULAC-North East I.S.D. Litig., discussion at 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1092 (W.D. Tex. 1995) (noting that races that include a minority candidate "provide the most direct test of the hypothesis that race is a factor in the election system under scrutiny"); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 416 (D.S.C. 1993) ("If the whites who finished first among blacks are, however, considered the blacks' candidates of choice, then blacks' candidates of choice have not usually been defeated. Indeed, their choices in at-large contests have been elected three out of three times for mayor and four of eight times for the at-large seats. Thus, whether blacks' candidates of choice have usually been defeated depends upon whether the white candidates count as 'candidates of choice.'"); Jeffers Litig., 730 F. Supp. 196 (E.D. Ark. 1989) (considering that in all white elections the African-American vote holds the balance of power, but finding polarization because minority candidates regularly lose); Smith-Crittenden County Litig., 687 F. Supp. 1310 (E.D. Ark. 1988) (finding racially polarized voting because while the minority-preferred candidate sometimes wins in all white elections, s/he never wins when the candidate is a minority).

149. See Smith-Crittendon County Litig., discussion at 687 F. Supp. 1310, 1316 (E.D. Ark.1988) (no black candidate had ever been elected, in spite of nine recent candidacies supported by an average of 89% of the black vote, but majorities of whites and blacks had voted for the same candidate in 54 out of 65 of the county-wide elections in the preceding 12 years); City of LaGrange Litig., 969 F. Supp. 749 (N.D. Ga. 1997) (only one black has won a contested election when not running as an incumbent, but the candidate receiving the majority of the minority vote was elected in 6 of the last 10 elections.); Southern Christian Leadership Conference Litig. (AL), 56 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 1995) (The majority of blacks vote for the winning candidate in over 75% of elections, but black candidates rarely win); City of Starke Litig., discussion at 712 F. Supp. 1523 1530 (M.D. Fla. 1989) (finding racial bloc voting in black on white elections even though the candidate receiving the majority of the black vote won 78% of the time); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 416 (D.S.C. 1993) (If the whites who finished first among blacks are, however, considered the blacks' candidates of choice, then blacks' candidates of choice have not usually been defeated. Indeed, their choices in at-large contests have been elected three out of three times for mayor and four of eight times for the at-large seats. Thus, whether blacks' candidates of choice have usually been defeated depends upon whether the white candidates count as 'candidates of choice.' "); Nipper Litig., discussion at 795 F. Supp. 1525, 1534, 1548 (M.D. Fla. 1992) (All six black candidates have lost, but blacks vote for the winner 68% of the time.); Jeffers Litig., 730 F. Supp. 196 (E.D. Ark. 1989) (considering that in all white elections the African-American vote holds the balance of power, but finding polarization because minority candidates regularly lose); Smith-Crittenden County Litig., 687 F. Supp. 1310 (E.D. Ark. 1988) (finding racially polarized voting because while the minority-preferred candidate sometimes wins in all white elections, s/he never wins when the candidate is a minority).

150. See, e.g., Perry Litig, discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 478 (E.D. Tex. 2004) (highlighting evidence gleaned from primary elections where minority voters "allegiance is free of party affiliation"); Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 305-06 (D. Mass. 2004) (noting that general elections in Boston are not helpful to the racially polarized voting analysis because the vast majority of voters vote Democratic); Anthony Litig., 35 F. Supp. 2d 989 (E.D. Mich. 1999); Cousin Litig. (TN), 145 F.3d 818 (6th Cir. 1998); LULAC v. Clements Litig. (TX), discussion at 999 F.2d 831, 884 (5th Cir. 1993) (relying on evidence from the Democratic primary, "where party affiliation plays no part," to refute plaintiff's claim that racially motivated voting accounted for black Democrats' failure to achieve the electoral success of their white counterparts); Chattanooga Litig., 722 F. Supp. 380

(E.D. Tenn. 1989); City of Starke Litig., discussion at 712 F. Supp. 1523, 1534 (M.D. Fla. 1989) (discrediting testimony from defendant's expert because he failed to consider a number of primary elections in a "heavily Democratic community" where "it would be expected that in general elections both white and black voters would register as Democrats and would generally vote for the same Democratic candidate"); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., discussion at 647 F. Supp. 1002 (D. Mont. 1986).

151. See, e.g., City of Starke Litig., 712 F. Supp. 1523 (M.D. Fla. 1989); Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 305-06 (D. Mass. 2004).

152. See Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1019 (2d Cir. 1995) ("When a candidate receives support from 50% or more of minority voters in the general election, a court need not treat the candidate as minority-preferred when another candidate receiving greater support in the primary failed to reach the general election."); see also Nash Litig., 797 F. Supp. 1488 (W.D. Mo. 1992). But see Alamance County Litig. (NC), discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 616 (4th Cir. 1996) ("The statute thus requires that minorities have an equal opportunity to participate not only in primary elections but also in general elections. From this, we believe it follows that the results in these two phases of the single election cycle must be separately considered and analyzed, and, in recognition of this statutory requirement, that Gingles' third precondition can be satisfied by proof that, in either the primary or the general election, the minority-preferred candidate is usually defeated by white bloc voting. Not to separately consider primary and general elections risks masking regular defeat in one of these phases with repeated successes in the other, and thereby misperceiving a process that is palpably in violation of the Voting Rights Act, as not violative of the Act at all.").

153. See, e.g., Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 305-06 (D. Mass. 2004) (discounting evidence of white support for a minority candidate in the general election because the candidate represented the dominant political party in the area); Garza v. Los Angeles Litig. (CA), 918 F.2d 763 (9th Cir. 1990) (excluding Republican Primary results because all Hispanic candidates who had won in the district did so running as Democrats). This approach attempts to address the same concerns that the courts address in limiting consideration of white on white elections in single party districts, see supra note 149 (discussing the impact of giving equal weight to white on white elections).

154. Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 3006 (D. Mass. 2004).

155. See, e.g., Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 389, (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (primaries more probative in determining black/Latino cohesiveness since members of both groups generally vote for Democrats); Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 478 (E.D. Tex. 2004) ("Here, there is no serious dispute but that Blacks and Hispanics do not vote cohesively in primary elections, where their allegiance is free of party affiliation."); Pomona Litig. (CA), discussion at 883 F.2d 1418, 1426 (9th Cir. 1989) (considering the Hispanic and black minorities voted differently in the primaries and finding no political cohesion). But see France Litig., discussion at 71 F. Supp. 2d 317, 327 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (finding political cohesion among black and Latino voters despite testimony from plaintiffs' expert witness that black and Latino voters were "more likely than not to support different candidates in primary elections").

156. See Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 379, 421 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., 647 F. Supp. 1002 (D. Mont. 1986) (refusing to consider defendant's argument that it was party, not race because defendant did not evaluate the primary elections where party wouldn't be an issue); see also Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 478 (E.D. Tex. 2004); Page Litig., discussion at 144 F. Supp. 2d 346 (D.N.J. 2001) (considering only Democratic primaries in determining racial bloc voting).

157. City of Santa Maria Litig. (CA), discussion at 160 F.3d 543, 552 (9th Cir. 1998) ("[w]hether minority voters mobilized to support a white candidate, a factor considered relevant by the Third Circuit, Jenkins, 4 F.3d at 1129, only indicates how those minorities willing to become politically active feel about a candidate; not all minorities may have the time or inclination to take such steps, even though they support that candidate. A bright-line rule, on the other hand, is based on the premise 'that the ballot box provides the best and most objective proxy for determining who constitutes a representative of choice.' Niagara Falls, 65 F.3d at 1019."); Nash Litig., discussion at 797 F. Supp. 1488, 1503 n.29 (W.D. Mo. 1992) (considering primary elections but noting "[t]here was some testimony to the effect that black voters, given a choice, would vote only for black candidates, and that a white candidate receiving a majority of the black vote was probably not a 'true' preference. There was also testimony indicating that if a white person received a majority of the black vote, any black candidates probably were not viable candidates. We refuse to impart these individual witnesses' views to black citizens as a whole. Absent some indication that a particular white candidate was truly not preferred despite receiving over 65% of the black vote, or that a particular black candidate was not viable, we will not assume that the voters in a particular political contest would have voted for someone other than the person they voted for, nor will we assume that a white candidate receiving over 65% of the black vote was not preferred by the minority voters.").

158. City of Rome Litig. (GA), 127 F.3d 1355, 1378-79 (11th Cir. 1997) (following De Grandy reasoning that the Voting Rights Act does not exempt minority candidates from the requirement to "pull, haul, and trade" because if black preferred candidates must represent the needs of the black community "without regard for the white community, the white community is quite naturally going to vote against the black preferred candidates almost every time."); Alamance County Litig. (NC), discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 615, (4th Cir. 1996) (rejecting the proposition that the success of a minority-preferred candidate in a general election is entitled to less weight when a candidate with significantly more minority support was defeated in the primary, the court stated: "Such a view is grounded in the belief that minority voters essentially take their marbles and go home whenever the candidate whom they prefer most in the primary does not prevail, a belief about minority voters that we do not share. And such a view ignores altogether the possibility that primary election winners will become the minority's preferred candidate during the general election campaign, or that where, as here, the overwhelming majority of blacks vote in the Democratic primary, that a Republican could in fact become the black-preferred candidate in the general election by addressing himself to issues of interest to the minority community in a way that appeals to them as participants in the political process.").

159. 478 U.S. 30, 64 (1986).

160. Id. at 100 ("Evidence that a candidate preferred by the minority group . . . was rejected by white voters for reasons other than those which made the candidate the preferred choice of the minority group would seem clearly relevant in answering the question whether bloc voting by white voters will consistently defeat minority candidates.").

161. See, e.g., First Circuit: City of Holyoke Litig. (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 983 (1st Cir. 1995) (stating that satisfying the Gingles factors gives rise to inference of racial animus; if defendants present evidence that facts other than race caused the polarization, the court must still "determine whether, based on the totality of the circumstances (including the original inference and the factual predicate that undergirds it), the plaintiffs have proven that the minority group was denied meaningful access to the political system on account of race.");cf. City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 960 F. Supp. 515, 521-25 (D. Mass. 1997) (Upon remand, the district court pursued its causation inquiry under the third prong of Gingles rather than under the totality of the circumstances analysis.); Second Circuit: Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 493 (2d. Cir. 1999) (We think the best reading of the several opinions in Gingles...is one that treats causation as irrelevant in the inquiry into the three Gingles preconditions...but relevant in the totality of circumstances inquiry"); see also Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 393 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (acknowledging that Town of Hempstead controls but warning that, in the context of such a rule, relaxing the first Gingles precondition may cause the third precondition to be "effectively eviscerated"); Fourth Circuit: Charleston County Litig. (SC), discussion at 365 F.3d 341, 348-49 (4th Cir. 2004) ("Legally significant" white bloc voting thus refers to the frequency with which, and not the reason why, whites vote cohesively for candidates who are not backed by minority voters," but "the reason for polarized voting is a critical factor in the totality analysis"); Alamance County Litig. (NC), discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 604 (4th Cir. 1996) ("[T]he best reading of the several opinions in Gingles...is one that treats causation as irrelevant in the inquiry into the three Gingles preconditions...but relevant in the totality of the circumstances inquiry."); Fifth Circuit: Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 478 (E.D. Tex. 2004) (requiring demonstration of causation in minority political cohesiveness inquiry); Attala County Litig. (MS), discussion at 92 F.3d 283, 290 (5th Cir. 1996)(considering causation as part of Gingles, but holding that the district court erred in placing the burden of disproving that factors other than race caused the polarization); LULAC v. Clements Litig. (TX), 999 F.2d 831 (5th Cir. 1993) (requiring consideration of causation under the third Gingles precondition); Sixth Circuit: The Sixth Circuit has never squarely addressed causation on the circuit level, but has affirmed a district court case that found a lack of racial bloc voting in part on causation grounds without addressing the causation argument. See Mallory-Hamilton County Litig., 38 F. Supp. 2d 525 (S.D. Ohio 1997) ("In this case, numerous factors, other than race, explain losses at the polls by particular minority candidates. . . Two factors in particular, "partisanship" and "incumbency," accurately explain electoral outcomes in numerous judicial elections involving African-American candidates.") aff'd at 173 F.3d 377 (6th Cir. 1999); see also Cincinnati Litig. (OH), discussion at 40 F.3d 807, 813 n2. (6th Cir. 1994) ("Given [the lack of white bloc voting in this case], we need not consider whether a showing that the minority-preferred candidates" lack of success is "somehow tied to race," League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Clements, 999 F.2d 831, 850 (5th Cir. 1993) (en banc), cert. denied, 127 L. Ed. 2d 74, 114 S. Ct. 878 (1994), is a prerequisite to a finding of "legally significant white bloc voting." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 56 (emphasis supplied). See generally Clements, 999 F.2d at 850-63 (concluding that such a showing is necessary)."); Seventh Circuit: Milwaukee NAACP Litig. (WI), discussion at 116 F.3d 1194, 1199 (7th Cir. 1997) (holding that "a district judge…should not assign to plaintiffs the burden of showing why the candidates preferred by black voters lost; it is enough to show that they lost, if white voters disapproved these candidates en masse" but that it was proper for the district court to consider non-racial explanations for election outcomes though "it would be best for district judges to postpone this kind of inquiry to their consideration of the totality of the circumstances"); City of Indianapolis Litig. (IL), discussion at 976 F.2d 357, 361 (7th Cir. 1992) (stating that the victory of black Republicans in "Marion County illustrates Justice White's observation, 478 U.S. at 83, that losses by the candidates black voters prefer may have more to do with politics than with race."); Eighth Circuit: While the Eighth Circuit has never held that causation should be a part of the analysis and even defined racially polarized voting in terms of correlation, see, e.g., Little Rock Litig. (AR), discussion at 56 F.3d 904, 910 (8th Cir. 1995) (rejecting Section 2 claim based on totality review while noting that "racially polarized voting is without doubt present to a degree," that the presence of "a high correlation between the number of voters in a precinct and the number of votes cast for African-American candidates" while citing "some decisive cross-over voting of whites for African-American candidates"), district courts have considered causation. See, e.g. Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1008 (D.S.D. 2004)("While causation may be relevant to the totality-of-circumstances review, it is not relevant in the inquiry into the three Gingles factors"); Democratic Party of Arkansas Litig., discussion at 686 F. Supp. 1365) (considering whether low voter turnout is why the candidates lost); Smith-Crittenden County, 687 F. Supp. 1310 (E.D. Ark. 1988) (calling the materiality of evidence regarding other reasons voters may have voted as they did, specifically incumbency, "questionable"); cf. Texarkana Litig., 861 F. Supp. 756 (W.D. Ark. 1992) (refusing to consider defendant's causation argument because no evidence was presented on point); Tenth Circuit: Sanchez-Colorado Litig. (CO), discussion at 97 F.3d 1303, 1307-08 (10th Cir. 1996) ("[A]t the threshold, we are simply looking for proof of the correlation between the race of the voter and the defeat of the minority's preferred candidate. We do not, therefore, reject multivariate regression analysis but prefer to reserve its use, if at all, to the more global picture plaintiffs must establish."); Bond Litig. (CO), discussion at 875 F.2d 1488, 1493 (10th Cir. 1989) ("we agree with appellants that a court may not explain away evidence of racial bloc voting by finding that such voting is caused by underlying differences between the minority and white population. The reasons why minority voters may vote alike is unimportant in determining whether in fact the minority group votes as a bloc. Racially polarized voting, which indicates political cohesion, exists when there is a consistent relationship between the race of the voter and the way in which the voter votes or, in other words, where minority voters and white voters vote differently"); see also Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1039-40 (D. Colo. 2004) (noting in the totality of the circumstances review of racial polarization that "No witness testified as to how he or she voted or why, not a single witness testified that he or she did not participate in the electoral process due to a perception of futility based upon ethnic discrimination. To the contrary and without exception, Hispanic witnesses demonstrated their extensive knowledge about and active participation in the political process in Alamosa County. In discussing election outcomes, they assessed the effect of incumbency, candidate qualifications and election strategy."); Eleventh Circuit: Southern Christian Leadership Litig. (AL), discussion at 56 F.3d 1281, 1293-94 (11th Cir. 1995) (finding ample evidence "that factors other than race, such as party politics and availability of qualified candidates, were driving the election results and that racially polarized voting did not leave minorities with 'less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice.'"). But cf. City of Rome Litig. (GA), 127 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997) (adopting verbatim district court's finding that (1) plaintiffs need not "prove racism determines the voting choices of the white electorate in order to succeed in a voting right cases" and that (2) it was nevertheless "necessary to evaluate the level of racism in the electorate in the instant case" to gauge the relevance of appointment and incumbency was to minority electoral success).

162. Third Circuit: Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 4 F.3d 1103, 1124 n.19 (3rd Cir 1993) (finding no need to reach the "difficult question of what evidentiary weight, if any, should be given the election of minority candidates who are not the minority voters' candidate of choice" while noting division on this issue in LULAC v. Clement); D.C. Circuit: In the two published cases from the District of Columbia, the plaintiffs failed to allege racial bloc voting, and thus the court did not confront this issue. Klingman Park Litig., discussion at 348 F.3d 1033, 1042 (D.C. Cir. 2003); Howard Litig., Civ.A. No. 93-900 SSH, 1994 WL 118211 (D.D.C. Mar. 31, 1994).

163. See Blaine County Litig. (MT), discussion at 363 F.3d 897, 912 (9th Cir. 2004) (rejecting the argument that plaintiffs must show racial bias among the white bloc suggesting such a requirement "would be divisive and would place an impossible burden on the plaintiffs"); see also City of Santa Maria Litig. (CA), discussion at 160 F.3d 543, 558 (9th Cir. 1998) (rejecting that plaintiffs must prove an intent to moot pending litigation when excluding a minority candidate victory under the "special circumstances" doctrine because of the pending litigation). But see Brief in Opposition to Cert., filed by DOJ, in Blaine County, characterizing Ninth Circuit's decision in Blaine as applying well-established rule that Section 2 does not require a showing of racial animus, and arguing that Blaine raises no conflict with either LULAC v. Clements or Nipper.

164. See LULAC v. Clements Litig. (TX), 999 F.2d 831, 850 (5th Cir. 1993) (en banc) ("Unless the tendency among minorities and whites to support different candidates, and the accompanying losses by minority groups at the polls, are somehow tied to race...plaintiffs' attempt to establish legally significant white bloc voting, and thus their vote dilution claim under § 2, must fail.").

165. See, e.g., Nipper Litig. (FL),discussion at 39 F.3d 1494, 1525 (11th Cir. 1994); City of Holyoke Litig. (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 983 (1st Cir. 1995) (noting that Gingles preconditions "rise to an inference that racial bias is operating through the medium of the targeted electoral structure to impair minority political opportunities.").

166. City of Holyoke Litig. (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 983 (1st Cir. 1995). See also Nipper Litig. (FL), discussion at 39 F.3d 1494, 1514-15 (11th Cir. 1994) (noting that "the existence of [the Gingles] factors, and a feasible remedy, generally will be sufficient to warrant relief").

167. Compare, for example, City of Holyoke Litig. (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 983 (1st Cir. 1995) (examining causation in the totality of circumstances of review and stating that plaintiffs need not "affirmatively . . . disprove every other possible explanation for racially polarized voting") with Attala County Litig., (MS) discussion at 92 F.3d 283, 290 (5th Cir. 1996) (considering causation as part of Gingles, but holding that the district court erred in placing the burden of disproving that factors other than race caused the polarization).

168. See, e.g., Mallory-Ohio Litig., discussion at 38 F. Supp. 2d 525, 539, 575-76 (S.D. Ohio 1997) ("In this case, numerous factors, other than race, explain losses at the polls by particular minority candidates. As previously noted, Drs. Asher and Tuchfarber, and all of the witnesses who testified herein, identified a number of such factors. Two factors in particular, "partisanship" and "incumbency," accurately explain electoral outcomes in numerous judicial elections involving African-American candidates."); City of Holyoke Litig. (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 983 (1st Cir. 1995) ("[O]nce the defendant proffers enough evidence to raise a legitimate question in regard to whether nonracial factors adequately explain racial voting patterns, the ultimate burden of persuading the factfinder that the voting patters were engendered by race rests with the plaintiffs."). But see Smith-Crittenden County Litig., discussion at 687 F. Supp. 1310, 1317 (E.D. Ark. 1988) ("The defendants have offered evidence of other reasons, such as incumbency, for the choices made by voters in the district. The materiality of this evidence is questionable. See Thornburg, 106 S. Ct. at 2773 (focus of case under Voting Rights Act is difference in choices made by voters, not reasons for this difference) (opinion of Brennan, J.). In any event, we assume for present purposes that this evidence may have some bearing on whether the particular election results on which we focus stem from the multimember structure of the district. We find this evidence insufficient to compel a different result in this case, given the sharp polarization in races involving black candidates for State Representative.").

169. See e.g., First Circuit: City of Holyoke Litig., 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997); Second Circuit: Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 493 (2d Cir. 1999) (holding that causation was appropriately considered in the totality of the circumstances); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 814 F. Supp. 843, 881-84 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (considering causation as part of the third Gingles precondition and finding that party not race explained the voting polarization). Plaintiffs in the Second Circuit have not clearly lost on causation since Town of Hempstead litigation. Fourth Circuit: City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 418, 420 (D.S.C. 1993) (not explicitly mentioning causation but concluding that plaintiffs' evidence was "simply not sufficient to overcome the evidence that the blacks who lost owe their losses as much to blacks' failure to vote more cohesively or to turn out at all as to failure to achieve white support"); Fifth Circuit: Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 478 (E.D. Tex. 2004) (concluding that minority groups are not politically cohesive because they "do not vote cohesively in primary elections, where their allegiance is free of party affiliation."); Rodriguez v. Bexar County, 385 F.3d 853 (5th Cir. 2004) (requiring more than mere correlation between minority electoral success and a minimum threshold of minority voter registration); City of Cleveland Litig., discussion at 297 F. Supp. 2d 901, 907 (N.D. Miss. 2004) (plaintiffs relied on the defeat of three minority candidates, the court said they were defeated "not only due to any white bloc voting that may have taken place, but also because they failed to receive sufficient support in the majority-minority wards;" concluded that the plaintiffs had failed to satisfy the third Gingles precondition); NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), discussion at 252 F.3d 361, 370-71 (5th Cir. 2001) (plaintiffs established racial bloc voting and all three Gingles factors but lost on minority electoral success, the case came down to whether the election of two African-American Supreme Court justices could be explained by special circumstances); Sixth Circuit: Mallory-Ohio Litig., discussion at 38 F. Supp. 2d 525, 539 (S.D. Ohio 1997) ("The 'clear partisan patterns' reflected in Dr. King's Report suggest that party affiliation is a, if not the, predominant factor in Ohio judicial elections."); Seventh Circuit: Bandemer Litig., discussion at 603 F. Supp. 1479, 1489-90 (S.D. Ind. 1984) (finding that minorities in Indiana vote as a bloc for the Democrat candidate and that therefore "the voting efficacy of [minorities] was impinged upon because of their politics and not because of their race."); Tenth Circuit: Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1039-40 (D. Colo. 2004) ("The anecdotal evidence does nothing to buttress the statistical conclusions as to polarization. No witness testified as to how he or she voted or why, not a single witness testified that he or she did not participate in the electoral process due to a perception of futility based upon ethnic discrimination."); Eleventh Circuit: Hamrick Litig. (GA), discussion at 296 F.3d 1065, 1078 (11th Cir. 2002); City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1083 (11th Cir. 1997); Southern Christian Leadership Litig. (AL), discussion at 56 F.3d 1281, 1293-94 (11th Cir. 1995); Nipper Litig. (FL), 39 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir. 1994); Liberty County Commissioners Litig. (FL), discussion at 899 F.2d 1012 (11th Cir. 1990).

170. Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 495-96 (2d. Cir. 1999) (rejecting defendants' argument that minority-preferred candidates were defeated because of party not race; even if minorities were Republicans they would not have been able to elect their candidates of choice because of the unique slating process of the town's Republican party, which effectively excluded minorities).

171. See e.g., Fifth Circuit: City of Austin Litig. (TX), discussion in 871 F.2d 529, 529 (5th Cir. 1989) (noting that, because plaintiffs could not create a district where Mexican-Americans enjoyed a voting age majority, they must demonstrate political cohesiveness with the Black population); Seventh Circuit: Forest County Litig. (WI), discussion at 336 F. 3d 570, 575-76 (7th Cir. 2003) (rejecting an "Indian/black district" that would pair a longstanding Indian community with a transient black community at the local Job Corps center, because the idea that their local interests coincided struck the court as "ludicrous"); Ninth Circuit: Stockton Litig. (CA), 956 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1992) (amended later at 1992 U.S. App. LEXIS 7738, but same finding on racial bloc voting); National City Litig., discussion at No. 88-301-R(M), 1991 WL 421115 (S.D. Cal. May 16, 1991) (affirmed at 976 F.2d 1293 (9th Cir. 1992)); Watsonville Litig. (CA), 863 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1988) (noting minority population statistics); Pomona Litig., discussion at 665 F. Supp. 853 (C.D. Cal. 1987) (affirmed at 883 F.2d 1418 (9th Cir. 1988)) (Neither Black nor Hispanic group was sufficiently large on its own to satisfy Gingles I. The court concluded the two groups were not politically cohesive and, thus, failed to meet Gingles II.); Eleventh Circuit: De Grandy Litig., discussion at 815 F. Supp. 1550, 1572-73 (N.D. Fla. 1992); Metro Dade County Litig. (FL), discussion at 908 F.2d 1540, 1545-46 (11th Cir. 1990) (affirmed in part, reversed in part at 985 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1993).

172. See e.g., Second Circuit: Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 443 (S.D.N.Y. 2004);

173. Fifth Circuit: City of Baytown Litig. (TX), discussion at 840 F.2d 1240, 1244-45 (5th Cir. 1988) (concluding that, where two minorities make up the minority group, "the proper standard is the same as Gingles: whether the minority group together votes in a cohesive manner for the minority candidate."); Eleventh Circuit: Hardee County Litig. (FL), discussion at 906 F.2d 524, 527 (11th Cir. 1990) (needed to survive the first Gingles factor). But see Kent County Litig. (MI), discussion at 76 F.3d 1381, 1386 (6th Cir. 1996) (en banc) ("Nothing in the clear, unambiguous language of § 2 allows or even recognizes the application of the Voting Rights Act to coalitions as urged by plaintiffs.").

174. See, e.g., Second Circuit: Albany County Litig., discussion at No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820, at *9 (N.D.N.Y. July 7, 2003) (considering defendants' stipulation in a 1991 consent decree and joint political and social activities of the Latino and African-American communities); Third Circuit: Page Litig., discussion at 144 F. Supp. 2d 346, 364-66 (D.N.J. 2001); Fifth Circuit: Brewer Litig. (TX), discussion at 876 F.2d 448, 453 (5th Cir. 1989) (citing Campos for the proposition that "the most persuasive evidence of inter-minority political cohesion for Section 2 purposes is to be found in voting patterns"); LULAC—Midland Litig., discussion at 648 F. Supp. 596, 606 (W.D. Tex. 1986) ("Testimony presented showed that Blacks and Hispanics worked together and formed coalitions when their goals were compatible. Additionally, the bringing of this lawsuit provides evidence that Blacks and Hispanics have common interests that induce the formation of coalitions."); Ninth Circuit: San Diego County Litig., 794 F. Supp. 990 (S.D. Cal. 1992) (looking at primary results) (affirmed without opinion at 5 F.3d 535 (9th Cir. 1993), unpublished opinion at No. 92-55661, 1993 WL 379838 (9th Cir. Sept. 27, 1993); Stockton Litig. (CA), 956 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1992) (considering expert and lay testimony regarding cohesion between the minority groups); Pomona Litig. (CA), 883 F.2d 1418 (9th Cir. 1988) (looking at evidence of exit polls in the 1985 primary); Eleventh Circuit: Hardee County Litig. (FL), discussion at 906 F.2d 524, 527 (11th Cir. 1990) (considering voting patterns that whether blacks and Hispanics "worked together and formed political coalitions").

175. See City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1392 (N.D. Tex. 1990) (weighing political cohesiveness within a single minority group, the court noted that "[t]he presence of more than one black candidate in a race may indicate a lack of cohesion, but it does not always do so"); City of Austin Litig., discussion at CIV. No. A-84-CA-189, 1987 WL 54389, *14 (W.D. Tex. Sept. 15, 1987) (affirmed at 871 F.2d 529 (5th Cir. Tex. 1989)) (citing polarized voting patterns in an election that featured a black and a Hispanic candidate as evidence that the two minority groups were not politically cohesive).

176. See, e.g., Second Circuit: Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 421 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (where, as here, the two minority groups are generally affiliated/registered with the same party (Democratic) and vote for that party's candidates at high rates, primary elections for that party's candidate are by far the most probative evidence of cohesion); cf. France Litig., discussion at 71 F. Supp. 2d 317, 327 (S.D.N.Y 1991) (finding political cohesion among Black and Latino voters despite testimony from plaintiffs' expert witness that Black and Latino voters were more likely than not to support different candidates in the primary); Ninth Circuit:

Pomona Litig., discussion at 665 F. Supp. 853 (C.D. Cal. 1987) (using exit poll data from the 1985 primary to determine Hispanic and Black voters were not cohesive).

177. See Cano Litig., discussion at 211 F. Supp. 2d 1208, 1235-42 (C.D. Cal. 2002) ("Most probative evidence is that relating to the non-Latino voters' willingness to support Latino candidates for office & white cross-over voting."); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339, 343-63 (S.D. Cal. 1995); Garza v. Los Angeles Litig. (CA), discussion at 756 F. Supp. 1298 (C.D. Cal. 1990) (affirmed at 918 F.2d 763 (9th Cir. 1990)); Watsonville Litig. (CA), discussion at 863 F.2d 1407, 1417 (9th Cir. 1988) ("Although the court did not separately find that Anglo bloc voting occurs, it is clear that the non-Hispanic majority in Watsonville usually votes sufficiently as a bloc to defeat the minority votes plus any crossover votes."); De Grandy Litig., discussion at 815 F. Supp. 1550 (N.D. Fla. 1992) (approving a "majority" bloc made up of black and white voters against Hispanic candidates, and Hispanic and white voters against black candidates).

178. See, e.g., Cano Litig., discussion at 211 F. Supp. 2d 1208, 1235-42 (C.D. Cal. 2002); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339, 343-63 (S.D. Cal. 1995). It remains possible to prove minorities can vote as part of the white bloc. See e.g., Garza v. Los Angeles Litig. (CA), 918 F.2d 763 (9th Cir. 1990); Watsonville Litig. (CA), 863 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1988).

179. Gingles Litig. (NC), discussion at 478 U.S. 30, 57, n.26 (1986). Gingles recognized a list of potential special circumstances, "such as the absence of an opponent, incumbency, or the utilization of bullet voting...this list of special circumstances is illustrative, not exclusive." Under the facts of the case, Gingles considered "an election that occurred after the instant lawsuit had been filed -- and [held the district court] could properly consider to what extent 'the pendency of this very litigation [might have] worked a one-time advantage for black candidates in the form of unusual organized political support by white leaders concerned to forestall single-member districting.'" Id. at 76. See, e.g., Hamrick Litig. (GA), 296 F.3d 1065 (11th Cir. 2002) (using incumbency to dismiss the loss of the minority-preferred candidate); Fort Bend Independent School District (TX), discussion at 89 F.3d 1205, 1217 (5th Cir. 1996) (discounting a minority loss because the candidate lost to an incumbent).

180. See, e.g., Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 422 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (noting that it would be possible to find anomalies in most elections and refusing to discount three elections because of low turnout, little known candidate, controversy); cf. Cincinnati Litig. (OH), discussion at 40 F.3d 807, 814 (6th Cir. 2000) ("incumbency must play an unusually important role in the election at issue; a contrary rule would confuse the ordinary with the special, and thus 'make practically every American election a 'special circumstance.'"); Alamance County Litig. (NC), discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 617 (4th Cir. 1996) (incumbency is very common in US elections, it alone cannot be a special circumstance, and if it were used to discount the success of a minority candidate, it would also have to be used to discount the defeat of minority candidates by white incumbents).

181. See, e.g., Gingles Litig. (NC), discussion at 478 U.S.30, 76 (1996); First Circuit: Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 306 (D. Mass. 2004) ("Incumbency is a special circumstance that must be weighed, sometimes heavily, in assaying the probative value of election results. [citations omitted] Consequently, we decline the defendants' invitation to treat this election as disproving the plaintiffs' allegation that legally significant white bloc voting exists in Boston."); Second Circuit: Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 879, 881 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 346, 422 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); Fourth Circuit: City of Norfolk Litig. (VA), discussion at 883 F.2d 1232, 1342 (4th Cir. 1989); Fifth Circuit: Fort Bend School District Litig. (TX), discussion at 89 F.3d 1205, 1217 (5th Cir. 1996) (discounting a minority win because the minority ran against an incumbent and there was "anti-incumbent sentiment"); cf. Magnolia Bar Association Litig. (MA), 994 F.2d 1143 (5th Cir. 1993) (rejecting plaintiffs argument that two elections in which black candidates were elected Supreme Court justices were attributable to special circumstances because both were incumbents: "both of the elections were high profile and involved well-known white candidates" and "neither of the two black candidates had been incumbents for very long"); Sixth Circuit: Chattanooga Litig., 722 F. Supp. 380 (E.D. Tenn. 1989); Eighth Circuit: Little Rock Litig. (AR),, discussion at 56 F.3d 904, 911 (8th Cir. 1995); Texarkana Litig., 861 F. Supp. 756 (W.D. Ark. 1992); Jeffers Litig.,730 F. Supp. 196 (E.D. Ark. 1989); Eleventh Circuit: Metro Dade County Litig. (FL), discussion at 985 F.2d 1471, 1483-83 (11th Cir. 1993) ; City of LaGrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 775-76 (N.D. Ga. 1997).

182. Cincinnati Litig. (OH), discussion at 40 F.3d 807, 813 (6th Cir. 2000); Second Circuit: Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 346, 422 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (noting that it would be possible to find anomalies in most elections; refusing to discount three elections because of low turnout, little known candidate, controversy); Fourth Circuit: Alamance County Litig. (NC), discussion at 99 F.3d 600, 617 (4th Cir. 1996) (incumbency is very common in US elections, it alone cannot be a special circumstance and if it were used to discount the success of a minority candidate, it would also have to be used to discount the defeat of minority candidates by white incumbents); Sixth Circuit: Cincinnati Litig. (OH), discussion at 40 F.3d 807, 814 (6th Cir. 2000) (finding no special circumstance where minority candidate who was appointed and subsequently won an election as an incumbent, noting "a contrary holding would punish the city for its commendable efforts to increase black representation on the city council by means of the appointment process."); Seventh Circuit: Milwaukee N.A.A.C.P. Litig. (WI), discussion at 116 F.3d 1194, 1198-99 (7th Cir. 1997) (rejecting incumbency as a special circumstance in judicial elections when minority judges ran unopposed because "these judges' color did not lead the voters to turn them out"); Eleventh Circuit: City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1382, 1384 n.18 (11th Cir. 1997) (incumbency after appointment is relevant only where there is racism in the electorate [presumably overcome by the endorsement by white community leaders] because otherwise the advantages of incumbency can be overcome through "hard work," at least in communities where it is possible to form biracial coalitions); But see Hamrick Litig. (GA), 296 F.3d 1065 (11th Cir. 2002) (allowing consideration of incumbency where the court "reflected on the substantial length of [the candidate's] service").

183. Old Person Litig. (MT), discussion at 230 F.3d 1113, 1122 (9th Cir. 2000).

184. Gingles Litig. (NC), discussion at 478 U.S. 30, 76 (1986). See, e.g., City of Santa Maria (CA), discussion at 160 F.3d 543, 549-50 (9th Cir. 1998) (discounting the election because "Days before the election, Maldonado told a local newspaper that his victory would prove 'Santa Maria is not racist.' "); Davis v. Chiles Litig. (FL), discussion at 139 F.3d 1414, 1417 n.2 (11th Cir. 1998); City of LaGrange Litig.,

discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 775-76 (N.D. Ga. 1997); City of Indianapolis Litig. (IN), 976 F.2d 357, 361 (7th Cir. 1992); City of Norfolk Litig. (VA), discussion at 816 F.2d 932, 938 (4th Cir. 1987) (discounting an election where the mayor had for the first time supported two black candidates for city council and had made a public statement suggesting their election could moot the pending litigation).

185. See, e.g., Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1033 (D. Colo. 2004); NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), discussion at 252 F.3d 361, 370 (5th Cir. 2001).

186. See, e.g., Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339, 376 (S.D. Cal. 1995); National City Litig. (CA), discussion at 976 F.2d 1293, 1297-98 (9th Cir. 1992) (refusing to discount these elections because plaintiffs had not brought forth evidence regarding other elections); City of Norfolk Litig. (VA), discussion at 816 F.2d 932, 938 (4th Cir. 1987) ("If voting patterns show unusual white support for the black candidate...the legal significance of his success should be diminished.").

187. Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), discussion at 71 F.3d 1382, 1387-88 (8th Cir. 1995) (excluding elections where the minority-preferred candidate won on a plurality because the challenge was to the imposition of a majority vote requirement); Little Rock Litig. (AR), discussion at 56 F.3d 904, 910 (8th Cir. 1995); Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 4 F.3d 1103, 1126 (3rd Cir. 1993) (reversing district court conclusion that special circumstances were not at work in the Roberts election because this election involved largest field of candidates to ever win, and Roberts was the only candidate to ever win on a plurality); see also City of Jackson, TN Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1522-1531 (W.D. Tenn. 1988) (refusing to consider elections where minority-preferred candidate won a plurality when the candidate lost the run-off); Neal Litig., discussion at 689 F. Supp. 1426, 1431 (E.D. Va. 1988). But see National City Litig., discussion at No. 88-301-R(M), 1991 WL 421115 (S.D. Cal. May 16, 1991) (finding no special circumstances where there was a plurality victory because there were usually more than two candidates for city elections).

188. Jordan Litig., discussion at 604 F. Supp. 807, 813 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (concluding that the primary was "atypical" because of "a variety of factors, including uncertainty about election dates, the recent realignment of the district...the lack of an incumbent" and "a court order allowing Republican voters to participate in the democratic primary").

189. Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), discussion at 71 F.3d 1382, 1387-88 (8th Cir. 1995); cf. Clark Litig., discussion at 777 F. Supp. 445, 40 (M.D. La. 1990)(observing that a situation in which a black lawyer was appointed as a district judge, then elected without opposition and later reelected without opposition "do[es] not reveal very much about the electorate"). But other courts do consider these elections on the grounds that the candidate would not be unopposed if not supported by the white voters. See Milwaukee N.A.A.C.P. Litig. (WI), discussion at 116 F. 3d 1194, 1199 (7th Cir. 1997) ("One good measure of white voters' willingness to support black candidates is the failure of white candidates to present themselves for election even when a majority of the electorate is white. Potential opponents concede the election only when they face certain defeat. That 6 black candidates ran without opposition therefore is highly informative."); Al-Hakim Litig., discussion at 892 F. Supp. 1464, 1475 n.15 (M.D. Fla. 1995)(considering victories by minority-preferred candidates running unopposed, although recognizing that this is a special circumstance under Gingles); Southern Christian Leadership Litig., discussion at 785 F. Supp. 1469, 1475 (M.D. Ala. 1992); Bond Litig. (CO), discussion at 875 F.2d 1488, 1490-91 (10th Cir. 1989) (holding it not clearly erroneous to consider unopposed candidacies).

190. Old Person Litig. (MT), discussion at 312 F.3d 1036, 1048 n.13 (9th Cir. 2002) (discounting election where minority candidate won a bare majority against a third-party candidate).

191. Chattanooga Litig., 722 F. Supp. 380 (E.D. Tenn. 1989).

192. Kirksey v. Allain Litig., 658 F. Supp. 1183 (S.D. Miss. 1987).

193. Chickasaw County II Litig., No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 Dist. LEXIS 22087, 1997 WL 33426761 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997).

194. Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 858 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) ("In 1987, Democrats gained a majority of the Town Board for the first time since at least 1967. Shaffer and Bachety testified to the causes leading to the defeat of the incumbent Republican Town Supervisor and his two incumbent Republican running mates competing for the Town Board seats. A private citizen unhappy with a Board decision affecting his business launched a well-financed campaign to defeat the incumbents. The personal popularity of the Democratic candidate for County Executive, who won a landslide victory in that election, further aided the Democratic Town Board candidates."); Fort Bend School District Litig. (TX), 89 F.3d 1205 (5th Cir. 1996) (affirming the district court's decision to discount evidence of a black candidate's loss because he was an incumbent running during a year marked by anti-incumbent sentiment).

195. Attala County Litig. (MS), 92 F.3d 283 (5th Cir. 1996) (criticizing the district court for looking to an election in which less than 10% of the total voting population voted for the black candidate as evidence of black crossover); Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1101 (E.D.N.C. 1991) ("The failure of black voters to support the black candidate in the seventeenth election, that of Freeman running for the Board of Education for seat 5 in 1988, can be explained by the fact that Freeman was new to the county and not well known."). But see Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 422 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (noting that anomalies could be found in most elections, the court rejected "the plaintiffs' suggestion that we should exclude three of these elections either because the candidate was little known, or because there was low turnout, or because controversy touched the election").

196. Carrollton NAACP Litig. (GA), 829 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987). But see Alamosa County Litig., 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016 (D. Colo. 2004).

197. See e.g., Anthony Litig., discussion at 35 F. Supp. 2d 989, 1006 (E.D. Mich. 1999) ("obtaining name recognition and professional success prior to a candidacy are not 'special circumstances'; they are ordinary and necessary components of a successful candidacy"); Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), 65 F.3d 1002 (2d Cir. 1995) (finding plaintiffs' attempt to characterize a minority candidate's election due to the candidate's outstanding credentials and popularity as special circumstances "absurd").

198. See, e.g., Meza Litig., discussion at 322 F. Supp. 2d 52, 65 (D. Mass. 2004) ("These elections on their face provide evidence of ethnic voting polarization by both Hispanic and non-Hispanic voters in Chelsea. We note that the force of this evidence is diminished to some extent because the election results reveal low turnout rates for Hispanic voters in these elections."). But see Rodriguez Litig., 308 F. Supp. 2d 346 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).

199. See, e.g., City of Holyoke Litig., 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997); SW Texas Junior College District Litig. (TX), 964 F.2d 1542 (5th Cir. 1992); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 418, 420 (D.S.C. 1993) (observing that "the ultimate reason voter cohesion is significant is because it directly bears on the issue of causation" and concluding that plaintiffs' evidence was "simply not sufficient to overcome the evidence that the blacks who lost owe their losses as much to blacks' failure to vote more cohesively or to turn out at all as to failure to achieve white support").

200. See Blaine County Litig. (MT), 363 F.3d 897 (9th Cir. 2004); Sanchez-Colorado Litig. (CO), 97 F.3d 1303 (10th Cir. 1996) (considering low turnout may be probative of "disincentives" for minority candidates to run); Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), 71 F.3d 1382 (8th Cir. 1995) (suggesting lower turnout may follow from the moving of a polling place in a minority area, a sense of defeat, or the absence of ballot issues that may turnout the minority vote); City of Holyoke Litig. (MA), discussion at 72 F.3d 973, 986 (1st Cir. 1995) (noting that "low voter turnout in the minority community sometimes may result from the interaction of the electoral system with the effects of past discrimination, which together operate to discourage meaningful elector participation"); Watsonville Litig. (CA), 863 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1988).

201. See e.g., Democratic Party of Arkansas Litig. (AR), 902 F.2d 15 (8th Cir. 1990) (low turnout appropriate to minority candidate success). Other courts have found low turnout was inappropriate for determining minority cohesion in the Gingles inquiry. See, e.g., Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004) (refusing to find low voter turnout demonstrates a lack of cohesion); Watsonville Litig. (CA), 863 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1988) (holding low turnout not relevant to determining the minority-preferred candidate).

202. SENATE REPORT at 28.

203. See the Master Lawsuit List.

204. See, e.g., Montero Litig. (CO), 861 F.2d 603 (10th Cir. 1988) (finding Section 2 inapplicable to challenge to collection of signatures on a petition to make English Colorado's official language because state action was lacking); Democratic Party of Virginia, 323 F. Supp. 2d 696 (E.D. Va. 2004) (finding that an African-American candidate who failed to become party nominee did not have standing, as a candidate, to challenge party nomination process under Section 2); Guy Litig., No. Civ.A. 00-831-KAJ, 2003 WL 22005853 (D. Del. Aug. 20, 2003) (dismissing for failure to satisfy Gingles factors a claim by an African-American candidate, Samuel Guy, who had won at-large city council seat in 1996, then lost in 2000, where another African-American candidate had won an at-large seat in 2000 and won reelection).

205. See supra Part III.B.

206. See Master Lawsuit List.

207. In California: Pomona Litig., 883 F.2d 1418 (9th Cir. 1989) and Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., 922 F. Supp. 339 (S.D. Cal. 1995); in Florida: Liberty County Commissioners Litig., 221 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2000); City of Fort Lauderdale Litig., 804 F.2d 611, 1986 U.S. App. LEXIS 37448 (11th Cir. 1986); Metro Dade County Litig., 985 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1993); Nipper Litig., 39 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir. 1994); in Georgia: Carrollton NAACP Litig., 829 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987); in Illinois: Jones

v. Edgar Litig., 3 F. Supp. 2d 979 (C.D. Ill. 1998); City of Chicago-Bonilla Litig., 141 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 1998); City of Chicago Heights Litig., Nos. 87 C 5112, 88 C 9800, 1997 WL 102543 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 5, 1997); Rybicki Litig., 574 F. Supp. 1147 (N.D. Ill. 1983), in Massachusetts: Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004); City of Holyoke Litig., 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997); City of Boston Litig., 784 F.2d 409 (1st Cir. 1986); Meza Litig., 322 F. Supp. 2d 52 (D. Mass. 2004); in Mississippi: Chickasaw County I Litig., 705 F. Supp. 315 (N.D. Miss. 1989) (though Chickasaw County II found this factor met in a later 1997 case); Monroe County Litig., 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990); Armstrong v. Allain Litig., 893 F. Supp. 1320 (S.D. Miss. 1994); Calhoun County Litig., 88 F.3d 139 (5th Cir. 1996); Lafayette County Litig., 20 F. Supp. 2d 996 (N.D. Miss. 1998); NAACP v. Fordice Litig., 252 F.3d 361 (5th Cir. 2001); in New York: France Litig., 71 F. Supp. 2d 317 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); Niagara Falls Litig., 65 F.3d 1002 (2d Cir. 1995); in Ohio: Cincinnati Litig., 40 F.3d 807 (6th Cir. 1994); in Texas: McCarty Litig., 749 F.2d 1134 (5th Cir. 1984); Southwest Tex. Jr. College Dist. Litig., 964 F.2d 1542 (5th Cir. 1992); LULAC v. Clements Litig., 999 F.2d 831 (5th Cir. 1993); LULAC - North East I.S.D. Litig., 903 F. Supp. 1071 (W.D. Tex.1995); in Virginia: City of Norfolk Litig., 883 F.2d 1232 (4th Cir. 1989); Jones v. Edgar Litig., 3 F. Supp. 2d 979 (C.D. Ill. 1998).

208. See Master Lawsuit List.

209. Jefferson Parish I Litig. (LA), 926 F.2d 487 (5th Cir. 1991) (not considering evidence of Factor 1 for unclear reasons, but finding the policy behind the practice was tenuous, that there had been racially polarized voting in 15 of 20 Parish elections from 1980-88, plaintiffs had shown a lack of candidate success and enhancing practices); Corbett Litig., 202 F. Supp. 2d 972 (E.D. Mo. 2002) (finding the plan in place violated 1-person, 1-vote and the VRA due to the significant census changes that had occurred, the opinion mainly dealt with the remedy); Garza v. Los Angeles Litig. (CA), 918 F.2d 763 (9th Cir. 1990) (finding that the county board of supervisors had intentionally drawn district lines to reduce minority voting power and protect white incumbents in violation of Section 2 and so not reaching any of the Senate Factors); Madison County Litig., 610 F. Supp. 240 (S.D. Miss. 1985) (not considering Senate Factors after finding that the county's arbitrary invalidation of 200 ballots cast by African-American voters sufficed to establish a violation); Marks-Philadelphia Litig., No. CIV. A. 93-6157, 1994 WL 146113 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 26, 1994); Lawrence County Litig., 814 F. Supp. 1346 (S.D. Miss. 1993); Elections Board Litig., 793 F. Supp. 859 (W.D. Wis. 1992).

210. Watsonville Litig. (CA), 863 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1988); Metro Dade County Litig. (FL), 985 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1993); Rybicki Litig., 574 F. Supp. 1147 (N.D. Ill. 1983); City of Chicago Heights Litig., Nos. 87 C 5112, 88 C 9800, 1997 WL 102543 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 5, 1997); Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004); Chickasaw County I Litig., 705 F. Supp. 315 (N.D. Miss. 1989); Monroe County Litig., 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990); Calhoun County Litig. (MS), 88 F.3d 1393 (5th Cir. 1996); Lafayette County Litig., 20 F. Supp. 2d 996 (N.D. Miss. 1998); LULAC - North East Independent School District Litig., 903 F. Supp. 1071 (W.D. Tex. 1995).

211. See Master Lawsuit List.

212. See, e.g., Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1013-34 (D.S.D. 2004); Emison Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 427, 439 n.35, 440 n.39 (D. Minn. 1992); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1320-21 (W.D. Tex.

1990); Chattanooga Litig., discussion at 722 F. Supp. 380, 385-89 (E.D. Tenn. 1989); Neal Litig., discussion at 689 F. Supp. 1426, 1428 (E.D. Va. 1988); Dillard v. Crenshaw Litig., 640 F. Supp. 1347, 1356-60 (M.D. Ala. 1986); Gretna Litig., discussion at 636 F. Supp. 1113, 1116-18 (E.D. La. 1986); Edgefield County Litig., discussion at 650 F. Supp. 1176, 1180-87 (D.S.C. 1986); Butts v. NYC Litig., discussion at 614 F. Supp. 1527, 1544-45 (S.D.N.Y. 1985), overturned and Factor 1 finding criticized in 779 F.2d 141 (2d Cir. 1985); DeSoto County Litig., discussion at 995 F. Supp. 1440, 1442-1450; Major v. Treen, 574 F. Supp. 325, 339-40 (E.D. La. 1983).

213. See, e.g., Abilene Litig., 725 F.2d 1017, 1022 (5th Cir. 1984) (Latino city council candidate "encountered hostility and uncooperation from the County Clerk's office in Abilene when she attempted to file as a candidate for Justice of the Peace in 1976 and for County Clerk in 1978"); Hamrick Litig., discussion at No. Civ. 2:91-CV-002-WCO, 1998 WL 476186 (N.D. Ga. June 10, 1998) ("The 1976 Georgia Constitution still required the completion of a literacy test and good character test as prerequisites to registering to vote, even though such barriers were nullified by the Voting Rights Act of 1965"), overturned on other grounds, 296 F.3d 1065, 1224 (11th Cir. 2002) (overruling the district court due to lack of racially polarized voting and minimizing finding of Factor 1 below, since the history of official discrimination shown below "does little to distinguish Gainesville or Georgia from any other Southern state or city"); Mehfoud Litig., discussion at 702 F. Supp. 588, 594 (E.D. Va. 1988) ("state constitutional requirement, in effect until 1974, that all persons registering to vote present proof of literacy").

214. See, e.g., City of LaGrange Litig., 969 F. Supp. 749, 757 (N.D. Ga. 1997) ("Vestiges of segregation remained into the 1970s. The black schools during the era of segregation were run down, overcrowded, and only went through the eleventh grade. Throughout this time period, the African-American schools enjoyed significantly less resources than the schools attended by white students."); City of Springfield Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1023 (C.D. Ill. 1987) (finding city school district entered into a consent decree in 1974 to end school desegregation); Marengo County Litig., discussion at 731 F.2d 1546 (11th Cir. 1984) ("in 1978, while this case was being tried, the district court characterized the Board of Education as 'obdurately obstinate' in its opposition to desegregation."); Dillard v. Crenshaw, 640 F. Supp. 1347, 1359-60 (M.D. Ala. 1986).

215. See, e.g., City of Greenwood Litig., 599 F. Supp. 397, 400-01 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (Department of Justice objected to two annexations in 1984 as violating the Section 5 preclearance requirement).

216. See, e.g., Edgefield County, 650 F. Supp. 1176, 1182 (D.S.C. 1986) (first black poll officials not hired until 1970).

217. Columbus County Litig., 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1103 (E.D.N.C. 1991) (also noting that the county did not begin appointing African Americans as special registration commissioners until the 1980s).

218. City of Abilene Litig. (TX), 725 F.2d 1017, 1023 (5th Cir. 1984).

219. City of LaGrange Litig., 969 F. Supp. 749, 767 (N.D. Ga. 1997) (also noting school segregation until 1970).

220. City of Starke Litig., 712 F. Supp. 1523, 1537 (M.D. Fla. 1989).

221. See discussion infra; see e.g., Charleston County Litig., 365 F.3d 341 (4th Cir. 2004); Rural West II Litig. (TN), 209 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 2000); Holder v. Hall Litig.

(GA), 512 U.S. 874 (1994); Big Horn County Litig., 647 F. Supp. 1002 (D. Mont. 1986); Marengo County Litig., discussion at 731 F.2d 1546, 1568 (11th Cir. 1984) ("The historical record of discrimination in Marengo County is undisputed, and it has *1568 not ended even now. The county school system remains under judicial supervision...."); Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152 (D. Colo. 1998); Marylanders Litig., 849 F. Supp. 1022 (D. Md. 1994); City of Starke Litig., 712 F. Supp. 1523 (M.D. Fla. 1989).

222. Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 286 n.23 (D.S.C. 2003); see also id. discussion at 365 F.3d 341, 353 n.4 (4th Cir. 2004) (affirming district court's fact findings and finding of a violation).

223. In Charleston County, the court noted: "[t]he Election Commission pays poll managers to setup the books, operate the voting machines and count the votes in polling places on election day." In contrast with poll watchers, who are provided by the private political party on election day to observe elections, poll managers are paid county employees, assigned by the county to work at particular precincts, for whose actions the county itself has legal responsibility. Id. discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d at 286 n.23.

224. Id.

225. Id.

226. Id.

227. Id.

228. Id.

229. Id.

230. Id.

231. Id.

232. Id.

233. Id.

234. County of Thurston Litig., discussion at 129 F.3d 1015, 1022 (8th Cir. 1997).

235. Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004).

236. Id. at 1025.

237. Id.

238. Id.

239. Id. at 1024-25.

240. Id. at 1024.

241. Id.

242. Id. at 1026.

243. Id.

244. Id.

245. Id. (alteration in original).

246. Id. (alteration in original).

247. Id. at 1028.

248. Id. at 1024.

249. Id. at 1023-24.

250. Holder v. Hall Litig., discussion at 955 F.2d 1563, 1566 (11th Cir. 1992) (later overturned by the Supreme Court on the question of whether plaintiffs could challenge single commissioner form of government, but the fact-finding was not affected).

251. Id. at 1324.

252. Town of North Johns Litig., 717 F. Supp. 1471, 1477 (M.D. Ala. 1989).
253. Id.
254. 647 F. Supp. 1002 (D. Mont. 1986).
255. Id. at 1007.
256. Id.
257. Id. at 1008.
258. Id.
259. Id. ("The court was not persuaded by defendants' explanation that these acts were caused by a shortage of registration cards and an increased concern about voter fraud.").
260. Harris Litig., discussion at 593 F. Supp. 128, 133 (M.D. Ala. 1984).
261. Id.
262. Harris Litig., discussion at 695 F. Supp. 517, 527 & n.8 (M.D. Ala. 1988) ("The defendants' argument that they have abandoned their past discriminatory policies and that local rather than state government is responsible for any discrimination occurring today, misses the point. The critical question is whether the State of Alabama has redressed the present-day effects of its own past discrimination, and the answer is that it has not.")
263. Id. at 524-25.
264. Buskey v. Oliver Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 1473, 1483 (M.D. Ala. 1983).
265. Id. at 1483.
266. Terrell Litig., 565 F. Supp. 338, 349 (N.D. Tex. 1983).
267. Id. at 341.
268. Id.
269. Berks County Litig., discussion at 277 F. Supp. 2d 570, 580 (E.D. Pa. 2003).
270. Id.
271. Berks County Litig., discussion at 250 F. Supp. 2d 525, 529 (E.D. Pa. 2003).
272. 277 F. Supp. 2d at 580.
273. Id. at 577.
274. 250 F. Supp. 2d at 529.
275. 277 F. Supp. 2d at 577.
276. Id. at 575-76.
277. Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1162 (D. Colo. 1998).
278. Id.
279. Marks-Philadelphia Litig., No. CIV. A. 93-6157, 1994 WL 146113, at *11 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 26, 1994).
280. Id. at *12.
281. Marylanders Litig., 849 F. Supp. 1022, 1061 (D. Md. 1994).
282. Id.
283. Id.
284. Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 210 (E.D. Ark. 1989).
285. Id.
286. Id. at 210 n.8.
287. Id. at 211. The court found that "[t]his kind of intimidation no doubt had a powerful chilling effect." Id.
288. Id. at 210.

289. Black Political Taskforce Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 314 (D. Mass. 2004).

290. Id. at 315.

291. City of New Rochelle Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 152, 158 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

292. Garza v. County of Los Angeles Litig. (CA), discussion at 918 F.2d 763, 766, 768, 772 (9th Cir. 1990) (The Ninth Circuit affirmed district court's intent-based Section 2 violation finding, also deciding that where intentional discrimination had occurred there was no need to meet the Thornburg v. Gingles test in the current challenge).

293. Id. at 769.

294. Id. at 778-779 (Kozinski, J., concurring on liability question).

295. Ketchum Litig. (IL), discussion at 740 F.2d 1398, 1408 (7th Cir. 1984).

296. Rybicki Litig., discussion at 574 F. Supp. 1147, 1151 (N.D. Ill. 1983).

297. Id. (citing pre-amendment district court opinion in 574 F. Supp. 1110, 1112 (N.D. Ill. 1983)).

298. Rural West II Litig., discussion at 29 F. Supp. 2d 448, 459 (W.D. Tenn. 1998).

299. Rural West I Litig., discussion at 835 F. Supp. 453, 460-61 (W.D. Tenn. 1993).

300. See also Hudson County Board Litig., discussion at 714 F. Supp. 714, 715 (D.N.J. 1989) (where a lawsuit settled, in the last published opinion making findings, the court decided that the county defendant's insurer would have liability if the plaintiffs succeeded in proving their intent-based Section 2 claim; in this lawsuit, the court took notice of the alleged coordinated effort in 1985 by the chair of the Hudson County Democratic Party, a campaign consultant, and the city Director of Housing and Economic Development, "to undercut Cucci's [the incumbent's] strength that would impede or prevent voting in the election districts in neighborhoods that were heavily black or Hispanic." As part of this "strategy," 1) letters were sent to residents of public housing projects with significant African-American and Latino populations informing them "that unless their names appeared on leases, they would be not be permitted to vote and would be prosecuted if they attempted to do so"; 2) the placement of five to six thousand voter names on the county's official "challenge registry" without notification, and despite the fact that some of these people had known good addresses and the "color-coding" of the challenge list; 3) instructions were given to all district board members (who were running the poll operations for the county) to prevent any individual whose name was on a challenge list from voting unless the voter produced a current lease (if the voter was a resident in public housing), or a phone, gas or electric bill in the voter's name; and 4) the county's "failure to provide adequate bilingual assistance both at polling places and at the courthouse for those individuals that attempted to obtain court orders permitting them to vote." Id. at 716. The plaintiff also alleged that the Democratic Party chair had appointed off-duty Jersey City police officers to serve as poll challengers in heavily minority districts. Id.).

301. Town of Cicero Litig., No. Civ.A. 00C 1530, 2000 WL 34342276 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 15, 2000) (granting preliminary injunction to stop the certification of the referendum results on this question, scheduled to take place 6 days after this decision, due to likelihood the United States could prove intent).

302. Dillard v. Crenshaw Litig., 640 F. Supp. 1347, 1356, 1360-61 (M.D. Ala. 1986) (emphasis added) (granting preliminary injunction) (this finding was later cited in many other Alabama cases, including Baldwin County Board of Education Litig., 686 F. Supp. 1459, 1466-67 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (finding that "this court demonstrated in Crenshaw County that from the late 1880's to the present the State of Alabama and its political subdivisions have 'openly and unabashedly' discriminated against their black citizens by employing at different times such devices as the poll tax, racial gerrymandering, and at-large elections, and by enacting such laws as the anti-single-shot voting laws, numbered places laws, and the Sayre law").

303. Id. at 1357.

304. Haywood County Litig., discussion at 544 F. Supp. 1122, 1131, 1135 (W.D. Tenn. 1982).

305. City of Minneapolis Litig., No. 02-1139(JRT/FLN), 2004 WL 2212044 (D. Minn. Sept. 30, 2004); Perry Litig., 298 F. Supp. 2d 451 (E.D. Tex. 2004); City of New Rochelle Litig., 308 F. Supp. 2d 152 (S.D.N.Y. 2003); Albany County Litig., No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820 (N.D.N.Y. July 7, 2003); Hamrick Litig. (GA), 296 F.3d 1065 (11th Cir. 2002); St. Bernard Parish School Board Litig., No. CIV.A. 02-2209, 2002 WL 2022589 (E.D. La. Aug. 26, 2002); Old Person Litig. (MT), 312 F.3d 1036(9th Cir. 2002); Davis v. Chiles Litig. (FL), 139 F.3d 1414 (11th Cir. 1998); City of Chicago-Barnett Litig., 17 F. Supp. 2d 753 (N.D. Ill. 1998); Red Clay School District Litig., 116 F.3d 685 (D. Del. 1997); African-American Voting Rights LDF Litig., 994 F. Supp. 1105 (E.D. Mo. 1997); Chickasaw County II Litig., No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 WL 33426761 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997); Attala County Litig., 92 F.3d 283 (5th Cir. 1996); Fort Bend Indep. School District Litig. (TX) 89 F.3d 1205 (5th Cir. 1996); U.S. v. Jones Litig. (AL), 57 F.3d 1020 (11th Cir. 1995); Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), 71 F.3d 1382 (8th Cir. 1995); Rural West I Litig., 877 F. Supp. 1096 (W.D. Tenn. 1995); De Grandy Litig. (FL), 512 U.S. 997 (1994); Texarkana Litig., 861 F. Supp. 756 (W.D. Ark. 1992); Rockford Board of Education Litig., Civ.A. No. 89 C 20168, 1991 WL 299104 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 12, 1991); Democratic Party of Arkansas Litig., 902 F.2d 15 (8th Cir. 1990); Holbrook Unified School District Litig., 703 F. Supp. 56 (D. Ariz. 1989); Baldwin Board of Education, 686 F. Supp. 1459 (M.D. Ala. 1988); Smith-Crittenden County Litig., 687 F. Supp. 1310 (E.D. Ark. 1988); Baytown Litig. (TX), 840 F.2d 1240 (5th Cir. 1988); Dallas County Commission Litig., 636 F. Supp. 704 (S.D. Ala. 1986); Marengo County Litig., 623 F. Supp. 33 (S.D. Ala. 1985); Opelika Litig. (AL), 748 F. 2d 1473 (11th Cir. 1984); Abilene Litig. (TX), 725 F.2d 1017 (5th Cir. 1984); El Paso Independent School District Litig., 591 F. Supp. 802 (W.D. Tex. 1984); Lubbock Litig. (TX), 727 F.2d 364 (5th Cir. 1984); Dean Litig., 555 F. Supp. 502 (D.R.I. 1982).

306. 5 of these 7 were in Section 5-covered jurisdictions: Edgefield County Litig., 650 F. Supp. 1176 (D.S.C. 1986); Mehfoud Litig., 702 F. Supp. 588 (E.D. Va. 1988); City of Woodville Litig. (MS), 881 F.2d 1327 (5th Cir. 1989); Chisom Litig. (LA), 501 U.S. 380 (1991); Westwego Litig. (LA), 946 F.2d 1109 (5th Cir. 1991). The other 2 were these: Rockford Board of Education Litig., Civ.A. No. 89 C 20168, 1991 WL 299104 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 12, 1991); Texarkana Litig., 861 F. Supp. 756 (W.D. Ark. 1992).

307. See, e.g., Dillard v. Crenshaw Litig., discussion at 640 F. Supp. 1347, 1356-60 (M.D. Ala. 1986).

308. See, e.g., Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1026 (D.S.D. 2004); Jeffers Litigation, 730 F. Supp. 196, 210 (E.D. Ark. 1989) (criminal prosecution the sheriff instituted against a black lawyer when ran for office).

309. Courts identified dozens of expert witnesses by name in their Factor 1 discussions, some of whom were repeat players on behalf of the plaintiff or defendant. Examples include: Chandler Davidson, Dick Engstrom, Morgan Kousser, Peyton McCrary, Raphael Cassimere, Jr., David Sansing, Allan Lichtman, Jerrell Shofner, Dr. Mormino, Dr. Hofeller, Philip Hauser, William Rogers, Stephan Thernstrom, Abigail Thernstrom, Dr. Mollenkopf, Lilian Williams. Most experts cited by courts in their Factor 1 discussion were trained historians, university professors with degrees in history or sociology.

310. Some books included: MORGAN J. KOUSSER, THE SHAPING OF SOUTHERN POLITICS: SUFFRAGE RESTRICTION AND THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE ONE-PARTY SOUTH, 1880-1910, (1974) (cited in Harris v. Graddick Litig., at 695 F. Supp. 517, 525 n.5 (M.D. Ala. 1988)), Chandler Davidson, The Voting Rights Act: A Brief History, in CONTROVERSIES IN MINORITY VOTING 7, 25 n.63 (Bernard Grofman & Chandler Davidson eds., 1992) (cited in Marylanders Litig., 849 F. Supp. 1022, 1062 (D. Md. 1994)), ABIGAIL M. THERNSTROM, WHOSE VOTES COUNT? AFFIRMATIVE ACTION AND MINORITY VOTING RIGHTS (1987) (cited in Town of Babylon Litig., at 914 F. Supp. 843, 885 n.36 (E.D.N.Y. 1996)). Some cases also cited newspaper documentation of discrimination. See, e.g., Berks County Litig., at 277 F. Supp. 2d 570, 577 (E.D. Pa. 2003) ("Numerous articles have appeared in local newspapers outlining Hispanic residents' concerns about equal treatment at the polls.").

311. See, e.g., Charleston County Litig., 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 286 n.23 (D.S.C. 2003) ("Nettles also provided additional uncontradicted testimony about intimidating and harassing conduct by other poll managers aimed at African-American voters seeking voting assistance....Conversely, Nettles testified that, based on his observations, white voters needing voting assistance at predominantly African-American polling sites were permitted their assistor of choice without challenge."); Harris Litig., 695 F. Supp. 517, 525 (M.D. Ala. 1988) ("Witnesses detailed numerous instances of where white poll officials refused to help illiterate black voters or refused to allow them to vote, where they refused to allow black voters to cast challenged ballots, and where they were simply rude and even intimidating toward black voters."); Terrazas Litig., 581 F. Supp. 1329, 1349-50 (N.D. Tex. 1984) ("Several witnesses, both for the MALDEF Intervenors and the State Defendants, testified that discrimination against hispanics has not only occurred in the past, but continues at least in parts of Texas. E.g., IV Trial Transcript 1117 (testimony of Paul Ragsdale). Still other witnesses testified about the feeling among hispanic candidates and voters in Dallas County that political action is futile.").

312. See, e.g., City of Greenwood Litig., discussion at 599 F. Supp. 397, 401 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (mentioning non-compliance with the preclearance requirement of Section 5); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 886 n.38 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (noting that the Town of Babylon was not in a county targeted as a Section 5-covered jurisdiction, and minimizing the Section 5 coverage of the three New York counties (Bronx, New York and Kings) that are covered: defendants' expert "testified that she found no indication that the New York counties were targets of the 1970 amendments. In fact, Dr. Thernstrom hypothesized that the extension of Section 5 coverage to these New York counties may have simply resulted from lack of voter interest in the 1968 presidential election.").

313. See, e.g., Marengo County Litig., discussion at 731 F.2d 1546, 1568 (11th Cir. 1984) (citing many recent lawsuits).

314. See, e.g., City of Greenwood Litig., 599 F. Supp. 397, 401 (N.D. Miss. 1984) ("[T]he City of Greenwood acted contrary to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act...by implementing two annexations (in 1967 and 1979) without obtaining preclearance").

315. See, e.g., Mallory-Ohio Litig., at 38 F. Supp. 2d 525, 541-42 (S.D. Ohio 1997) (recounting history of Section 2 lawsuits in the state of Ohio, as evidence of how much weight to give Factor 1).

316. See, e.g., Clark Litig., discussion at 725 F. Supp. 285, 295 (M.D. La. 1988) ("[A]dopt[ing] by reference" the findings made in Major v. Treen, 574 F. Supp. 325 (E.D.La.1983)); Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 204 (E.D. Ark. 1989) (taking judicial notice of a 1982 Arkansas decision, and stating "[w]e do not believe that this history of discrimination, which affects the exercise of the right to vote in all elections under state law, must be proved anew in each case under the Voting Rights Act."). But compare Chickasaw County II, No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 WL 33426761, at *3 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997) (finding Factor 1 and "tak[ing] judicial notice of Mississippi's and Chickasaw County's history of discrimination in the area of voting.... through the use of poll takes, literacy tests, good moral tests, and other policies and laws," without requiring plaintiffs to establish contemporary political effect) with Chickasaw County I, 705 F. Supp. 315, 320 (N.D. Miss. 1989) (finding Factor 1 not met because plaintiffs had not shown current "political detriment").

317. See, e.g., De Grandy Litig., discussion at 815 F. Supp. 1550, 1573-74 (N.D. Fla. Jul 17, 1992) (citing both English-only legal initiatives and "suspension of a supermarket clerk for speaking Spanish in front of customers and the refusal of a personnel agency to refer people with foreign accents to job openings at a Miami bank" as relevant to showing a history of official discrimination against Hispanics in Florida).

318. Armour Litig., discussion at 775 F. Supp. 1044, 1055 (N.D. Ohio 1991).

319. Id.

320. Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016 (D. Colo. 2004); Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004); Meza Litig., discussion at 322 F. Supp. 2d 52 (D. Mass. 2004); Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); Suffolk County Litig., discussion at 268 F. Supp. 2d 243 (E.D.N.Y. 2003); NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), discussion at 252 F.3d 361 (5th Cir. 2001); Liberty County Commissioners Litig. (FL), discussion at 221 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2000); France Litig., discussion at 71 F. Supp. 2d 317 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); Belle Glade Litig., discussion at 178 F.3d 1175 (11th Cir. 1999); City of Chicago-Bonilla Litig. (IL), discussion at 141 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 1998); Jones v. Edgar Litig., discussion at 3 F. Supp. 2d 979 (C.D. Ill. 1998); Lafayette County Litig., discussion at 20 F. Supp. 2d 996 (N.D. Miss. 1998); City of Chicago Heights Litig., discussion at Nos. 87 C 5112, 88 C 9800, 1997 WL 102543 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 5, 1997); Milwaukee NAACP Litig. (WI), discussion at 116 F. 3d 1194 (7th Cir. 1997); City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997); Milwaukee NAACP Litig. (WI), discussion at 116 F. 3d 1194 (7th Cir. 1997); Kent County Litig. (MI), discussion at 76 F.3d 1381 (6th Cir. 1996); City of St. Louis Litig. (MO), discussion at 90 F.3d 1357(8th Cir. 1996); Calhoun County Litig. (MS), discussion at 88 F.3d 1393 (5th Cir. 1996); Green Litig., discussion at 1996 WL 524395 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339 (S.D. Cal. 1995); Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002 (2d Cir. 1995); LULAC - North East I.S.D. Litig., discussion at 903 F. Supp. 1071 (W.D. Tex. 1995); Nipper Litig. (FL), discussion at 39 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir. 1994); Armstrong v. Allain Litig., discussion at 893 F. Supp. 1320 (S.D. Miss. 1994); Cincinnati Litig. (OH), discussion at 40 F.3d 807(6th Cir. 1994); City of Philadelphia Litig. (PA), discussion at 28 F.3d 306 (3d Cir. 1994); Metro Dade County Litig. (FL), discussion at 985 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1993); Lulac v. Clements Litig. (TX), discussion 999 F.2d 831 (5th Cir. 1993); SW Texas Junior College District Litig. (TX), discussion at 964 F.2d 1542 (5th Cir. 1992); Monroe County 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990); Pomona Litig. (CA), discussion at 883 F.2d 1418 (9th Cir. 1989); Chickasaw County I Litig. (MS), discussion at 705 F. Supp. 315 (N.D. Miss. 1989); Watsonville Litig. (CA), discussion at 863 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1988); Carrollton NAACP Litig. (GA), discussion at 829 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987); City of Fort Lauderdale Litig. (FL), discussion at 804 F.2d 611 (11th Cir. 1986); City of Boston Litig. (MA), discussion at 784 F.2d 409 (1st Cir. 1986); Wesley Litig. (TN), discussion at 791 F.2d 1255 (6th Cir. 1986); Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., discussion at 579 F. Supp. 1504 (N.D. Ala. 1984); McCarty Litig. (TX), discussion at 749 F.2d 1134 (5th Cir. 1984); Rybicki Litig., discussion at 574 F. Supp. 1147 (N.D. Ill. 1983).

321. Cousin Litig. (TN), discussion at 145 F.3d 818, 832 (6th Cir. 1998) (including in Factor 1 only examples occurring within the last thirty years); City of Chicago Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 1359, 1446 (N.D. Ill. 1997) (considering evidence of discrimination dating back twenty-five years "too remote in time" for purposes of Factor 1).

322. Suffolk County Litig., 268 F. Supp. 2d 243 (E.D.N.Y. 2003); Belle Glade Litig., 178 F.3d 1175 (11th Cir. 1999); Salt River District Litig. (AZ), discussion at 109 F.3d 586, 596 (9th Cir. 1997) (finding no evidence presented that African-American landowners experienced discrimination, but suggesting that the case might have gone differently if the plaintiffs had alleged that non-landowners who were disproportionately African American had experienced discrimination based upon the landownership voting requirement); St. Louis Board of Education Litig., 90 F.3d 1357 (8th Cir. 1996); City of Watsonville Litig. (CA), discussion at 863 F.2d 1407, 1419 (9th Cir. 1988) (finding a violation without Factor 1 met; criticizing the district court for refusing to hear evidence outside of Watsonville and stated that it would have taken judicial notice of the "pervasive" discrimination against Hispanics in the State of California, if this were needed to find a violation).

323. Other courts considered evidence of recent official discrimination, but decided that not enough had been presented to show more than mere disparate impact on the basis of race – therefore, Factor 1 was not met. For example, in the City of Philadelphia Litigation challenging Pennsylvania's voter purge law, the court found that the removal of African-American and Latino voters from the voter registration rolls at higher rates than white voters combined with the "correlation between older machines being allocated to neighborhoods with significant minority populations" did not, without more, rise to the level of official discrimination. City of Philadelphia Litig., 28 F.3d 306, 312 (3d Cir. 1994).

324. See, e.g., Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., discussion at 579 F. Supp. 1504, 1510 (N.D. Ala. 1984) ("While the court might assume that, at some point in history, black citizens were discouraged by poll taxes and other means from registering, several of the black witnesses testified that they voted up to 30 years ago without difficulty. There was certainly no evidence that black citizens in Jasper have had as much difficulty in voting as has been experienced by black citizens in some Southern communities."); see also cases cited supra note 314.
325. Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., 579 F. Supp. 1504, 1510 (N.D. Ala. 1984).
326. See, e.g., Rodriguez Litig., 308 F. Supp. 2d 346 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).
327. Id. at 434-45.
328. Kent County Litig. (MI), discussion in 790 F. Supp. 738, 745 (W.D. Mich. 1992).
329. See cases cited supra note 207.
330. Id.
331. 957 F. Supp. 1522, 1557-59 (N.D. Fla. 1997) (findings upheld by 221 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2000), also affirming the court's finding of no violation).
332. Id. at 1557.
333. Id. at 1559 n.86.
334. Aldasoro Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339, 363-64 (S.D. Cal. 1995) (citing "the numerous laws enacted by the California Legislature in the last 30 years to improve minority voting participation and to liberalize the political process. These laws included: County clerks could not refuse to deputize registrars because of race (1961); prohibition of election day challenges based on literacy (1961); requirement that a copy of the election ballot in Spanish be posted in each polling place where the language minority population was greater than 3% (1971); law allowing the use of languages besides English in polling places (1973); law requiring county clerks to recruit bilingual deputy registrars and precinct board members (1973); registration allowed by mail (1975); and the ability of voters in California to vote by absentee ballot for any reason" along with the state law requirement that "[w]here more than 3% of the voting age residents of a California county lack English skills, the County Clerk is required to recruit interested citizens and organizations to assist in the registration of individuals lacking such English skills") (citations omitted); see also Butts Litig. (NY), discussion at 779 F.2d 141, 150 (2d Cir. 1985) ("[T]he City has taken affirmative steps since 1975 to encourage minority voting, including mail registration (N.Y. Election Law § 5-210(1)) and a Registration Task Force appointed by Governor Cuomo").
335. City of Woodville Litig., discussion at 688 F. Supp. 255, 260 (S.D. Miss. 1988).
336. City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 960 F. Supp. 515, 526 (D. Mass. 1997); see also Tensas Parish Litig., discussion at 819 F.2d 609, 612 (5th Cir. 1987) (noting that "[t]he historical tensions between the races in Tensas Parish, albeit ameliorated, have not disappeared" and that it is "fervently hoped that District Six will provide the occasion for the final rejection of regrettable legacies of the past and the nurturing of more worthy legacies for the future."); Latino Political Action Committee Litig., discussion at 609 F. Supp. 739, 745 (D. Mass. 1985) (noting individual instances of intimidation while noting that "[t]here was, in fact, testimony that the theme of racial harmony played a major role in the campaigns of some candidates in the 1983 elections.").

337. For a detailed description of the history of official discrimination in the Southern States, see: Alabama: Dillard v. Crenshaw Litig., 640 F. Supp. 1347 (M.D. Ala. 1986); Mobile School Board Litig., discussion at 706 F.2d 1103, 1104-07 (11th Cir. 1983) (not reaching amended Section 2 question, but finding an intent violation); Florida: DeSoto County Board of Commissioners Litig., 204 F.3d 1335 (11th Cir. 2000) (finding law enacted with discriminatory purpose and remanding for Section 2 results test hearing); Georgia: Brooks Litig., discussion at 158 F.3d 1230, 1233-34 (11th Cir. 1988); Ben Hill County Litig., discussion at 743 F. Supp. 864, 865-68 (M.D. Ga. 1990); Louisiana: Gretna Litig. (LA), 834 F.2d 496 (5th Cir. 1987); Major Litig., 574 F. Supp. 325 (E.D. La. 1983); Mississippi: Kirksey v. Allain Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1183, 1192-93 (S.D. Miss. 1987); Texas: City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1320-33, 1401-03 (W.D. Tex. 1990); LULAC-Midland Independent School District Litig., 648 F. Supp. 596 (W.D. Tex. 1986).

338. See, e.g., NAACP v. Fordice Litig., 252 F.3d 361 (5th Cir. 2001); Lafayette County Litig., 20 F. Supp. 2d 996 (N.D. Miss. 1998); Calhoun County Litig. (MS), 88 F.3d 1393 (5th Cir. 1996); Fort Bend Indep. School District Litig. (TX), 89 F.3d 1205 (5th Cir. 1996); LULAC - North East I.S.D. 903 F. Supp. 1071 (W.D. Tex. 1995); Armstrong v. Allain Litig., 893 F. Supp. 1320 (S.D. Miss. 1994); Lulac v. Clements: Litig. (TX), 999 F.2d 831 (5th Cir. 1993); Southwest Tex. Jr. College Dist. 964 F.2d 1542 (5th Cir. 1992); Tensas Parish School Board Litig. (TX), discussion at 819 F.2d 609 (5th Cir. 1987) (referring to "historical tensions," and seeming to blame both Blacks and Whites equally for these tensions); U.S. v. Jones Litig. (AL), 57 F.3d 1020 (11th Cir. 1995) (noting that one "cannot ignore" the history but finding that it does not weigh in favor of a violation); Little Rock, 56 F.3d 904 (8th Cir. 1995) (any history of discrimination is "remote in time" and so had minimal value in the results test).

339. City of Woodville Litigation, discussion at 688 F. Supp. 255, 260 (S.D. Miss. 1988); see also Calhoun County Litig., discussion at 88 F.3d 1393, 1399 (5th Cir. 1996) (finding a violation but not relying on history of official discrimination affecting political participation); Johnson v. Hamrick Litig. (GA), discussion at 296 F.3d 1065, 1224 (11th Cir. 2002) ("The State of Georgia and Gainesville have a history of official discrimination against blacks. Of course, that does little to distinguish Gainesville or Georgia from any other Southern state or city.").

340. Butts v. NYC Litig., discussion at 614 F. Supp. 1527, 1544-45 (S.D.N.Y. 1985) (noting that "[c]ontrary to the popularly held belief that racial discrimination only takes place within the Fifth and Eleventh Circuits, plaintiffs exhibits... support the finding that Black and Hispanic voters in New York City have been subject to various procedures ... which have had the effect of abridging their voting rights").

341. Butts v. NYC Litig., discussion at 779 F.2d 141, 150 (2d Cir. 1985) (overturning district court's prior finding of a Section 2 violation); see also France v. Pataki Litig., discussion at 71 F. Supp. 2d 317, 330 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (finding no history of official discrimination, and noting that "[i]n fact, New York City has taken steps to encourage minority voting including mail registration and a Registration Task Force appointed by Governor Cuomo. Furthermore, defendants' expert, Dr. Mollenkopf, acknowledged that the election practices in question were not adopted as a part of a racist historical tradition" (citation omitted)).

342. Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 886 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); see also Latino Political Action Committee Litig., discussion at 784 F.2d 409, 412 (1st Cir. 1986) (finding "that Boston's history of discrimination in the area of voting rights was less egregious than in certain other parts of the country").

343. See SENATE REPORT at 28-30. Single shot voting is a practice by which voters can direct their votes to a single candidate running in a multi-member district, and choose not to cast their remaining votes for other candidates running at the same time. Doing so increases the relative weight of their votes by reducing the number of votes other candidates receive. An anti-single shot provision may prevent voters from doing this, typically by disqualifying any ballot where a voter has not used all available votes. See QUIET REVOLUTION, supra note 6, at 46 (Chandler Davidson & Bernard Grofman eds., 1994) (explaining the numbered place ballot system, a common type of anti-single shot provision: "[s]ingle shot voting is impossible if each candidate is required to qualify for a separate place or post (i.e., place no. 1, place no. 2, and so forth). Because every seat on the governing body is filled through a head-to-head contest in which only one vote can be cast, there is no way to increase the mathematical weight of one's ballot by denying votes to other candidates.") See also Marengo County Litig., discussion at 731 F.2d 1546, 1570 n.45 (11th Cir. 1984) ("When voters can cast more than one vote in the same race, an anti-single-shot provision can force minority voters to vote for majority candidates.")

344. Id. Of the 53 lawsuits finding Factor 3, 25 were decided in the 1980s (20 violations), 22 in the 1990s (12 violations), and 6 since 2000 (3 violations).

345. City of Cleveland Litig., 297 F. Supp. 2d 901 (N.D. Miss. 2004); Charleston County Litig. (SC), 365 F.3d 341 (4th Cir. 2004); Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004); NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), 252 F.3d 361 (5th Cir. 2001); Brooks Litig. (GA), 158 F.3d 1230 (11th Cir. 1998); City of LaGrange Litig. 969 F. Supp. 749 (N.D. Ga. 1997); City of Rome Litig. (GA), 127 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997); Chickasaw County II Litig., No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087, 1997 WL 33426761 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997); Calhoun County Litig. (MS), 88 F.3d 1393 (5th Cir. 1996); Southern Christian Leadership Litig. (AL), 56 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 1995); Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), 71 F.3d 1382 (8th Cir. 1995); Stockton Litig. (CA), 956 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1992); Jefferson Parish I Litig. (LA), 926 F.2d 487 (5th Cir. 1991); Columbus County Litig., 782 F. Supp. 1097 (E.D.N.C. 1991); Monroe County Litig., 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990); City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317 (W.D. Tex. 1990); City of Starke Litig., 712 F. Supp. 1523 (M.D. Fla. 1989); Baldwin Board of Education Litig., 686 F. Supp. 1459 (M.D. Ala. 1988); City of Jackson Litig., 683 F. Supp. 1515 (W.D. Tenn. 1988); Gretna Litig. (LA), 834 F.2d 496 (5th Cir. 1987); Kirksey v. Allain Litig., 658 F. Supp. 1183 (S.D. Miss. 1987); Dallas County Commission Litig., 636 F. Supp. 704 (S.D. Ala. 1986); Gingles Litig. (NC), 478 U.S. 30 (1986); Edgefield County Litig., 650 F. Supp. 1176 (D.S.C. 1986); LULAC – Midland Litig., 648 F. Supp. 596 (W.D. Tex. 1986); Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., 579 F. Supp. 1504 (N.D. Ala. 1984); Escambia County Litig. (FL), 748 F.2d 1037 (11th Cir. 1984); City of Greenwood Litig., 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss. 1984); El Paso Independent School District Litig., 591 F. Supp. 802 (W.D. Tex. 1984); Abilene Litig. (TX), 725 F.2d 1017 (5th Cir. 1984); Major Litig., 574 F. Supp. 325 (E.D. La. 1983); Terrell Litig. 565 F. Supp. 338 (N.D. Tex. 1983).

346. Charleston County Litig. (SC), 365 F.3d 341 (4th Cir. 2004); Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004); Red Clay School District Litig., 116 F.3d 685 (D. Del. 1997); City of LaGrange Litig., 969 F. Supp. 749 (N.D. Ga. 1997); City of Rome Litig. (GA), 127 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997); Town of Babylon Litig., 914 F. Supp.

843 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Southern Christian Leadership Litig. (AL), 56 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 1995); Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), 71 F.3d 1382 (8th Cir. 1995); Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), 65 F.3d 1002 (2d Cir. 1995); Stockton Litig. (CA), 956 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1992); Columbus County Litig., 782 F. Supp. 1097 (E.D.N.C. 1991); City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317 (W.D. Tex. 1990); City of Starke Litig., 712 F. Supp. 1523 (M.D. Fla. 1989); Brewer Litig. (TX), 876 F.2d 448 (5th Cir. 1989); Baldwin Board of Education Litig., 686 F. Supp. 1459 (M.D. Ala. 1988); City of Jackson Litig., 683 F. Supp. 1515 (W.D. Tenn. 1988); City of Springfield Litig., 658 F. Supp. 1015 (C.D. Ill. 1987); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., 647 F. Supp. 1002 (D. Mont. 1986); Gingles Litig. (NC), 478 U.S. 30 (1986); Edgefield County Litig., 650 F. Supp. 1176 (D.S.C. 1986); Sisseton Independent School District Litig. (SD), 804 F.2d 469 (8th Cir. 1986); Escambia County Litig. (FL), 748 F.2d 1037 (11th Cir. 1984); City of Greenwood Litig., 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss. 1984); Lubbock Litig. (TX), 727 F.2d 364 (5th Cir. 1984); El Paso Independent School District Litig., 591 F. Supp. 802 (W.D. Tex. 1984); Terrell Litig. 565 F. Supp. 338 (N.D. Tex. 1983).

347. Alamosa County Litig., 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016 (D. Colo. 2004); Bone Shirt Litig. (SD). 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004); City of Chicago Heights Litig., Nos. 87 C 5112, 88 C 9800, 1997 WL 102543 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 5, 1997); Southern Christian Leadership Litig. (AL), 56 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 1995); Blytheville School District (AR) Litig., 71 F.3d 1382 (8th Cir. 1995); LULAC - North East I.S.D., 903 F. Supp. 1071 (W.D. Tex. 1995); Worcester County Litig. (MD), 35 F.3d 921 (4th Cir. 1994); Stockton Litig. (CA), 956 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1992); SW Texas Junior College Dist. Litig., 964 F.2d 1542 (5th Cir. 1992); Columbus County Litig., 782 F. Supp. 1097 (E.D.N.C. 1991); City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317 (W.D. Tex. 1990); Jeffers Litig., 730 F. Supp. 196 (E.D. Ark. 1989); City of Starke Litig., 712 F. Supp. 1523 (M.D. Fla. 1989); Brewer Litig. (TX), 876 F.2d 448 (5th Cir. 1989); Harris v. Graddick Litig., 695 F. Supp. 517 (M.D. Ala. 1988); Gretna Litig. (LA), 834 F.2d 496 (5th Cir. 1987); Dallas County Commission Litig., 636 F. Supp. 704 (S.D. Ala. 1986); LULAC – Midland Litig., 648 F. Supp. 596 (W.D. Tex. 1986); Marengo County Litig., 623 F. Supp. 33 (S.D. Ala. 1985); Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., 579 F. Supp. 1504 (N.D. Ala. 1984); Abilene Litig. (TX), 725 F.2d 1017 (5th Cir. 1984); Lubbock, 727 F.2d 364 (5th Cir. 1984); Mobile School Board Litig. (AL), 706 F.2d 1103 (11th Cir. 1983).

348. Blaine County Litig. (MT), 363 F.3d 897 (9th Cir. 2004); Charleston County Litig., 365 F.3d 341 (4th Cir. 2004); Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), 180 F.3d 476 (2d Cir. 1999); Stockton Litig. (CA), 956 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1992); Jefferson Parish I Litig. (LA), 926 F.2d 487 (5th Cir. 1991); City of Jackson (TN), 683 F. Supp. 1515 (W.D. Tenn. 1988); City of Springfield, 658 F. Supp. 1015 (C.D. Ill. 1987); LULAC – Midland Litig., 648 F. Supp. 596 (W.D. Tex. 1986); Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., 579 F. Supp. 1504 (N.D. Ala. 1984); Escambia County Litig. (FL), 748 F.2d 1037 (11th Cir. 1984); City of Greenwood, 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss. 1984).

349. City of Philadelphia Litig. (PA), 28 F.3d 306 (3d Cir. 1994) (voters automatically removed from the registration list, and required to re-register if they had not voted in 4 years); City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317 (W.D. Tex. 1990) (negligible compensation for elected officials); City of Jackson Litig., 683 F. Supp. 1515 (W.D. Tenn. 1988); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., 647 F. Supp. 1002 (D. Mont. 1986); Sisseton Independent School District Litig. (SD), 804 F.2d 469 (8th Cir. 1986) (apportionment based upon voter registration, not population); Escambia County (FL), 748 F.2d 1037 (11th Cir. 1984) (registration fee for candidates); Lubbock Litig. (TX), 727 F.2d 364 (5th Cir. 1984).

350. See Master Lawsuit List.

351. Id.

352. Id.

353. Alamosa County Litig., 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016 (D. Colo. 2004); City of Cleveland Litig., 297 F. Supp. 2d 901 (N.D. Miss. 2004); NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), 252 F.3d 361(5th Cir. 2001) (finding that majority-vote requirement was not in itself discriminatory); City of Rome Litig. (GA), 127 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997); Chickasaw County II Litig., No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087, 1997 WL 33426761(N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997); Town of Babylon Litig., 914 F. Supp. 843 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Southern Christian Leadership Litig. (AL), 56 F.3d 1281(11th Cir. 1995); Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), 65 F.3d 1002, 1020 (2d Cir. 1995); SW Texas Junior College Dist. Litig., 964 F.2d 1542 (5th Cir. 1992); Jeffers Litig., 730 F. Supp. 196 (E.D. Ark. 1989) Kirksey v. Allain Litig., 658 F. Supp. 1183, 1194 (S.D. Miss. 1987) ("Although it is obvious that abolition of the majority vote requirements and post system without adoption of anti-single-shot voting laws would make it easier in some situations for black candidates to be elected, this Court cannot hold that these provisions as they now exist discriminate against blacks per se."); Terrell Litig., 565 F. Supp. 338 (N.D. Tex. 1983).

354. See, e.g., Dillard v. Crenshaw County Litig., 650 F. Supp. 1347, 1357 (M.D. Ala. 1986) (ordering a preliminary injunction against the at-large election systems in the 5 counties, finding that "the Alabama legislature . . .has consistently enacted at-large systems for local governments during periods when there was a substantial threat of black participation in the political process . . . enactment[s] . . .[that were] not adventitious but rather racially inspired."); Major Litig., 574 F. Supp. 325, 340 (E.D. La. 1983) ("As a further obstacle to minority access, the legislature established a majority-vote requirement for election to party committees in 1959."); Mobile School Board Litig. (AL), 706 F.2d 1103, 1106-07 (11th Cir. 1983) ("The 1876 act which reenacted the 1852 Act of at-large voting procedures was a convenient method of making the election of a black board member unlikely. . .[and when] the Alabama legislature reinstated a law which suited the purpose of discrimination, the law may be said to have been a product of discriminatory intent."). See generally QUIET REVOLUTION IN THE SOUTH, supra note 6.

355. See, e.g., Hendrix v. McKinney, 460 F. Supp. 626, 631-32 (M.D. Ala. 1978) (describing the slating inquiry as ascertaining "the ability of blacks to get on the ballot" and finding that slating existed where no blacks had run for county-wide office); Turner v. McKeithen Litig. (LA), discussion at 490 F.2d 191, 195 (5th Cir. 1973) (reasoning that slating is a particularly salient factor in situations where "the black vote has been solicited at a stage when the actual candidate selection has already occurred and the possibility for meaningful influence is significantly diminished"); see also White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 766 (1973) ("[S]ince Reconstruction days, there have been only two Negroes in the Dallas County delegation to the Texas House of Representatives and that these two were the only two Negroes ever slated by the Dallas Committee for Responsible Government (DCRG), a white-dominated organization that is in effective control of Democratic Party candidate slating in Dallas County. That organization, the District Court found, did not need the support of the Negro community to win elections in the county, and it did not therefore exhibit good-faith concern for the political and other needs and aspirations of the Negro community.").

356. See Master Lawsuit List

357. See Master Lawsuit List.

358. Westwego Litig. (LA), discussion at 946 F.2d 1109, 1116 n.5 (5th Cir. 1991).

359. Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 483-86 (2d Cir. 1999)

360. Id. at 486.

361. Id. at 496.

362. City of New Rochelle Litig., 308 F. Supp. 2d 152, 161 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

363. Albany County Litig., No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820, at * 44, 46 (N.D.N.Y. July 7, 2003) (concluding that the evidence "demonstrates that minorities have generally been excluded from candidacy for County offices except in majority/minority districts.").

364. City of Springfield Litig., 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1030 (C.D. Ill. 1987).

365. Id.

366. Bone Shirt Litig., (SD), 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1036 (D.S.D. 2004).

367. See Armour Litig., discussion at 775 F. Supp. 1044, 1056 (N.D. Ohio 1991) (noting such rules and observing that "although each precinct had committeemen who were paid to campaign for the endorsed candidates, Starks received zero votes in four precincts, including one precinct where two party officials resided. No sanctions were taken by the party against the officials or the committeemen who refused to support Starks.").

368. City of Philadelphia litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 537 & n.22 (E.D. Pa. 1993).

369. See City of Chicago Heights Litig., Nos. 87 C 5112, 88 C 9800, 1997 WL 102543 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 5, 1997).

370. See also Abilene Litig. (TX), discussion at 725 F.2d 1017, 1022 (5th Cir. 1984) (remanding to district court for additional findings on whether private citizen group known as Citizens for Better Government denied black candidates access to slating; endorsement of this "white-dominated" organization was essential to win and three minority candidates endorsed by organization had not been shown to be "true representatives" of the minority population).

371. Gretna Litig., discussion at 636 F. Supp. at 118 (D. La. 1986) (affirming district court and noting that "[a]n unofficial slating system excludes black candidates from Gretna city elections").

372. Pasadena School District Litig., discussion at 958 F. Supp. 1196 (S.D. Tex. 1997).

373. City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317 (W.D. Tex. 1990).

374. City of LaGrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 777 (N.D. Ga. 1997) (describing the virtual absence of African-American candidates for city council as "striking" and observing that support received by the few black candidates to run suggested "a lack of opportunity, rather than a lack of inclination, to sponsor minority candidates."); see also U.S. v. Marengo County Comm'n (AL), 731 F.2d 1546, 1569 (11th Cir. 1984) (stating that broadly understood, "the term 'access to slating'--that is, the ability to run for office--there does not appear to have been any substantial formal or informal impediment to black candidacies."); Hendrix v.

McKinney Litig., discussion at 460 F. Supp. 626, 631 (M.D. Ala. 1978) ("[t]he core of the inquiry as to slating is the ability of blacks to get on the ballot.").

375. City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317 (W.D. Tex. 1990) (finding the factor not met as the organization that denied access to black and Latino candidates through 1977 no longer exists); County of Big Horn, discussion at, 647 F. Supp. 1002, 1016 (D. Mont. 1986) (assigning no weight to a now-defunct slating organization that was never successful in having endorsed candidates elected).

376. City of Rome Litig., discussion at 127 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997) (holding that informal "tickets" were not a slating device given their infrequent use and non-official nature); City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at (concluding that the organization alleged to engage in discriminatory slating did not qualify for the factor because it did not run candidates for all open seats); Westwego Litig., discussion at (finding that although there were local organizations which played a central role in political life from which African Americans were excluded but not finding slating because there was no official endorsing of candidates).

377. Little Rock Litig., discussion at 831 F. Supp. 1453, 1460 (E.D. Ark. 1993) (dismissing plaintiffs' claim that the "white power structure" throws support behind particular candidates as both untrue and not pertaining to slating); City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 533 (E.D. Pa. 1993).

378. Alamosa County Litig., 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016 (D. Col. 2004).

379. See, e.g, McCord v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 617 F. Supp. 1093 (11th Cir. 1999) (no denied access to slating where citizens' committee exclusively endorsed Republican candidates and no African American ever ran as a Republican); LULAC (CA5 87) (slating not found where no evidence was presented suggesting that African Americans could not run as Republicans if they wanted to).

380. See Master Lawsuit List

381. See Blaine County Litig. (MT), discussion at 363 F.3d 897, 914 (9th Cir. 2004) (finding socioeconomic disparities as a result of a history of discrimination); Albany County Litig., discussion at No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820, at *12 (N.D.N.Y July 7, 2003) (finding that minorities continue to bear the effects of discrimination in almost all aspects of life); City of New Rochelle Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 152, 159-60 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (finding the continuing socioeconomic effects of historical discrimination); Montezuma Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1169-1170 (D. Colo. 1998) ("There is no doubt that this depressed status was caused, at least in part, by the history of mistreatment alluded to in this order."); Emison Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 427, 438 (D. Minn. 1992) (finding the factor met based on extensive housing segregation in the city as well as educational performance differences arising from historical discrimination); Westwego Litig. (LA), discussion at 946 F.2d 1109, 1115 (5th Cir. 1991) (noting that Westwego's black citizens continue to bear the effects of a history of discrimination--"[b]y almost any measure, the black families of Westwego are less well off than their white neighbors."); Garza v. Los Angeles Litig., discussion at 756 F. Supp. 1298, 1339-1341 (C.D. Cal. 1990); Houston v. Haley Litig., discussion at 663 F. Supp. 346, 352-54 (N.D. Miss. 1987) (finding past discrimination led to continuing socioeconomic disparities); Wamser Litig., discussion at 679 F. Supp. 1513, 1531 (E.D. Mo. 1987) (finding present socioeconomic disparities as a result of past discrimination); Baytown Litig., discussion at 696 F. Supp. 1128, 1132, 1136 (S.D. Tex. 1987) (finding that minorities lag significantly behind whites in education, income, occupational status, and employment--"the Court concludes that the minorities in Baytown carry with them the results of past discrimination to a substantial extent."); City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 880 F. Supp. 911, 917-19 (D. Mass. 1995); Halifax County Litig., discussion at 94 F. Supp. 161, 166-171 (E.D.N.C. 1984).

382. See Metts Litig. (RI), discussion at 347 F.3d 346, 2003 WL 22434637, at * 2 (1st Cir. 2003) ("The state's African-American citizens continue to suffer from past official discrimination in housing, education, health care, and employment. By common measure of socio-economic status, educational attainment, and access to political resources, they continue to lag behind the rest of the state."); Berks County Litig., discussion at 277 F. Supp. 2d 570, 575, 581 (E.D. Pa. 2003) ("Hispanics in Reading suffer from significant socioeconomic inequality, which is ordinarily linked to lower literacy rates, unequal educational opportunities, and depressed participation in the political process."); St. Bernard Parish School Board Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 02-2209, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16540, at *31-32 (E.D. La. Aug. 26, 2002) (finding socioeconomic discrepancies and then quoting language from the Senate Report linking socioeconomic depression to lower political participation); Old Person Litig. (MT), discussion at 230 F.3d 1113, 1129 (9th Cir. 2000) ("American Indians have a lower socioeconomic status than whites in Montana; these social and economic factors hinder the ability of American Indians in Montana to participate fully in the political process."); Davis v. Chiles Litig. (FL), discussion at 139 F.3d 1414, 1419 & n.10 (11th Cir. 1998) ("Florida has had a history of racially discriminatory voting practices and . . . continuing socio-economic disparities are hindering blacks' participation in the political process in these districts."); Rural West II Litig., discussion at 29 F. Supp. 2d 448, 459 (W.D. Tenn. 1998) (linking low socioeconomic status with inability to fundraise and fully participate in politics); Chickasaw County II Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087, at *10-11 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997) (linking low socioeconomic status with lack of access to telephones and vehicles, which "translates into lower voter participation and heightens a finding of vote dilution"); City of LaGrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 757, 776 (N.D. Ga. 1997) ("These lingering effects of Georgia's history of discrimination continue to translate into diminished political influence and opportunity for LaGrange's African-American citizens."); City of Rome Litig. (GA), 127 F.3d 1355, 1370-1371, 1385-1386 (11th Cir. 1997) (linking low socioeconomic status with depressed political participation as shown by the positive statistical correlations between status and participation); Sanchez-Colorado Litig. (CO), discussion at 97 F.3d 1303, 1322-1324 (10th Cir. 1996) (deciding that the lower court's finding of roughly equivalent political participation was not enough to refute the massive quantity of evidence showing current socioeconomic depression that could not be explained other than by a history of discrimination); LULAC - North East Independent School District Litig., discussion at 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1085-1086 (W.D. Tex. 1995) ("Blacks and Hispanics still bear the effects of past discrimination in such areas as education, employment and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process."); Cousin Litig., discussion at 904 F. Supp. 686, 708-710 (E.D. Tenn. 1995) (linking low socioeconomic status with isolation "from the economic and political main stream" and inability to "fund and mount political campaigns"); Marylanders Litig., discussion at 849 F. Supp. 1022, 1060-61 (D. Md. 1994) (finding depressed socioeconomic status and quoting the Senate Report for the proposition that depressed socioeconomic status tends to depress political participation); Rural West I Litig., discussion at 836 F. Supp. 453, 461-62 (W.D. Tenn. 1993) ("In west Tennessee, black citizens are more likely than white citizens to live in poverty, to be unemployed, and to live in substandard housing. Black citizens are less likely to have completed high school, to own their own homes, to have access to a car, or to have telephones in their homes. As the Senate Report recognizes, educational and economic disadvantages can translate into political disadvantage."); Brunswick County Litig., discussion at 801 F. Supp. 1513, 1518, 1524 (E.D. Va. 1992) ("[B]lacks in Brunswick County bear the lingering effects of this discrimination by experiencing lower education levels, poorer housing and lesser earning power. This Court finds that these conditions dramatically hinder the ability of African Americans to participate fully in the political process in Brunswick County."); Magnolia Bar Association Litig., discussion at 793 F. Supp. 1386, 1409 (S.D. Miss. 1992) ("A person with less education is less likely to vote than one with more education. A person with less money is less likely to own an automobile and therefore less likely to make the effort to go to the polls to vote or to the courthouse to register."); De Grandy Litig., discussion at 794 F. Supp. 1076 (N.D. Fla. 1992) (linking low socioeconomic status to depressed political participation as shown by voting studies that consistently show a positive correlation between socioeconomic factors and voter participation); Hall Litig., discussion at 757 F. Supp. 1560, 1562-1563 (M.D. Ga. 1991) ("The depressed socio-economic status of black residents, including particularly the lack of public or private transportation, telephones and self-employment, hinders the ability of and deters black residents of Bleckley County from running for public office, voting and otherwise participating in the political process."); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1403-1405 (N.D. Tex. 1990) (linking low socioeconomic status with an inability to fund an effective campaign as well as the inability to afford to hold office because of the small amount of financial compensation Counsel Members receive); White Litig., discussion at 1989 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16117 at *9-11, 22-23 (E.D. Va. 1989) (finding that the lingering effects of past dscrimination hinder the political process); Clark Litig., discussion at 725 F. Supp. 285, 290-91, 299 (M.D. La. 1988) ("The stipulated facts establish the substantial socio-economic disparities which exist in Louisiana today between blacks and whites. These disparities are a vesture of past discrimination and they do hinder the ability of blacks to effectively participate in the political process."); Smith-Crittenden County Litig., discussion at 687 F. Supp. 1310, 1317 (E.D. Ark. 1988) ("T]he history of discrimination has adversely affected opportunities for black citizens in health, education, and employment. The hangover from this history necessarily inhibits full participation in the political process."); Baldwin Board Education Litig., discussion at 686 F. Supp. 1459, 1466-67(M.D. Ala. 1988) ("The evidence . . . reflects that this discrimination has resulted in a lower socio-economic status for Alabama blacks as a group than for whites, and that this lower status has . . . depressed levels of black voter participation and has thereby hindered the ability of blacks to participate effectively in the political process."); Mehfoud Litig., discussion at 702 F. Supp. 588, 594-595 (E.D. Va. 1988) (linking low socioeconomic status to depressed political participation, which credits expert testimony that "participation in the political process is positively correlated with socioeconomic status," and also linking low socioeconomic status with the ability to raise enough funds to effectively run for political office); City of Jackson Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1533-1534 (W.D. Tenn 1988) ("White collar workers can more easily register and vote than blue-collar workers since they have a greater ability to take time off from work. Since black citizens earn less money than white citizens, it is more difficult for a candidate favored by the black community to raise campaign funds. Due to their depressed socioeconomic status, it is more difficult for the black community to mobilize and get black voters to the polls than it is for the white community to do so with white voters."); Chisom Litig., discussion at CIV. A. No. 86-4057, 1989 WL 106485 at *8-9 (E.D. La. Sept. 19, 1989) (linking low socioeconomic status with the inability to finance effective campaigns.); Kirksey v. Allain Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1183, 1194-1195 (S.D. Miss. 1987) (linking low socioeconomic status with depressed political participation and crediting expert testimony linking lower socioeconomic status with lower rates of registration and voting); Operation Push Litig., discussion at 674 F. Supp. 1245, 1253-1254, 1264-1265 (N.D. Miss. 1987) (linking low socioeconomic status with the lower availability of automobiles making it harder for poor blacks to register during working hours); Gretna Litig., discussion at 636 F. Supp. 1113, 1116-1120 (E.D. La. 1986) ("[D]epressed levels of income, education and employment are a consequence of severe historical disadvantage. Depressed levels of participation in voting and candidacy are inextricably involved in the perception of futility and impotence such a history engenders. These historical disadvantages continue through the present day and undoubtedly hinder the ability of the black community to participate effectively in the political process within the City of Gretna."); Lubbock Litig. (TX), discussion at 727 F.2d 364, 383 (5th Cir. 1984) (finding that a history of discrimination combined with socioeconomic depressing led to a decreased ability of minorities to participate in the political process); cf. Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), discussion at 71 F.3d 1382, 1390 (8th Cir. 1995) (holding that the district court did not give enough weight to the effect that socioeconomic depression caused by past discrimination has on current political participation).

383. See, e.g., Rural West II Litig., discussion at 29 F. Supp. 2d 448, 459 (W.D. Tenn. 1998) ("Money has a prominent role in American politics. Campaigning is expensive and all candidates are aware of the need to raise money. Financed electorate groups can exert influence by sponsoring their own candidate or gaining the ear of another through contributions. The economic and educational isolation of African-Americans described by the Rural West I court limits their ability to fund and mount political campaigns. In this sense therefore, blacks are not able to equally participate in the political process."); Cousin Litig., discussion at 904 F. Supp. 686, 708-710 (E.D. Tenn. 1995) (finding less ability to fund a campaign); Mehfoud Litig., discussion at 702 F. Supp. 588, 594-595 (E.D. Va. 1988) (finding less ability to fund a campaign); Chisom Litig., discussion at CIV. A. No. 86-4057, 1989 WL 106485 at *8-9 (E.D. La. Sept. 19, 1989) (finding less ability to fund a campaign).

384. See, e.g., City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1370-1371, 1385-1386 (11th Cir. 1997) ("Rome's at-large electoral systems, moreover, have the effect of increasing the importance of money in the electoral process by enlarging the electoral district."); Cousin Litig., discussion at 904 F. Supp. 686, 708-710 (E.D. Tenn. 1995) (finding less ability to ability to fund and mount political campaigns); Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1103-1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991) (finding a large district, an at-large challenge, and a large area in which to campaign disadvantages minority candidates who are likely to have less access to necessary resources for travel and advertising); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1403-1404 (N.D. Tex. 1990) ("[Socioeconomic]disparities provide a distinct advantage to white at-large candidates in terms of financial and other support.").

385. See, e.g., Charleston County Litig., 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 291 (D.S.C. 2003) ("The on-going racial separation that exists in Charleston County—socially, economically, religiously, in housing and business patterns--makes it especially difficult for African-American candidates seeking county-wide office to reach out to and communicate with the predominately white electorate from whom they must obtain substantial support to win an at-large elections [sic]."); Cousin Litig., discussion at 904 F. Supp. 686, 708-710 (E.D. Tenn. 1995) (noting isolation from economic and political main stream); Neal litig., discussion at 689 F. Supp. 1426, 1430 (E.D. Va. 1988); cf. Terrell Litig., 565 F. Supp. 338, 342 (N.D. Tex. 1983) ("It is clear to the Court that a major reason for the white majority's lack of familiarity with many black candidates is the severe de facto segregation of housing in Terrell.").

386. City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1403-1405 (N.D. Tex. 1990) ("The ridiculous pay for Council Members– $50.00 for each meeting – further exacerbates the discriminatory effect of these disparities by limiting the pool of African-Americans and Hispanics who can financially afford to serve on the Council where they would, in effect, volunteer their full time service.").

387. See Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1037-1041 (D.S.D. 2004) (finding Factor 5 met based on evidence of depressed socioeconomic status, differentials in voter turnout statistics as well as by expert testimony that "'[p]eople living on a day-to-day basis wonder if they can heat their home'"--"[t]hose are not the kinds of people who are the most predisposed to go out and engage in a great deal of political campaigning or activity"); Red Clay School District Litig., discussion at Civ. A. No. 89-230-LON, 1996 WL 172327, at *19-20 (D. Del. Apr. 10, 1996) (finding both depressed socioeconomic status and lower levels of political participation by African Americans and overturning the lower court's determination that a 2% difference in voter turnout was insignificant); Attala County Litig. (MS), discussion at 92 F.3d 283, 293-295 (5th Cir. 1996) (finding depressed socioeconomic status and depressed political participation); Nipper Litig. (FL), discussion at 39 F.3d 1494, 1507-1508 (11th Cir. 1994) (overturning the lower courts finding that voter registration and turnout were equivalent and finding that while voter registration was roughly equivalent, black voter turnout still lagged); City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 533-535 (E.D. Pa. 1993) (finding depressed socioeconomic status and depressed voter registration and turnout rates); Little Rock Litig., discussion at 831 F. Supp. 1453, 1460 (E.D. Ark. 1993) (finding lower socioeconomic status as well as depressed levels of voter registration and turnout. Although in upholding the District Court's finding, the 8th Circuit held that less weight should be given to this factor because differences were not as great as in other areas.); Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1103-1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991) (finding depressed socioeconomic status and lower levels of voter turnout despite finding roughly equivalent voter registration numbers); Armour Litig., discussion at 775 F. Supp. 1044 (N.D. Oh. 1991) (finding depressed socioeconomic levels as well as lower rates of political participation); Democratic Party of Arkansas Litig. (AK), discussion at 890 F.2d 1423, 1431-1433 (8th Cir. 1989) (finding lower voter turnout and socioeconomic disparities); City of Springfield

Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1024-1027 (C.D. Ill. 1987) ("The lingering effects of segregation and racial isolation are seen in the statistics of black turnout at the polls. The voting participation of blacks continues to lag well behind that of whites. Blacks participate at a rate of one-third to one-half of white voters."); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., discussion at 647 F. Supp. 1002, 1016-1017 (D. Mt. 1986) (finding that although voter registration between Native Americans and whites was roughly equivalent, Native American voter turnout still lagged.); Gretna Litig., discussion at 636 F. Supp. 1113, 1116-1120 (E.D. La. 1986) (finding continued socioeconomic disparities, and noting that although blacks and whites register to vote in roughly equivalent numbers, black voter turnout still lagged behind that of whites.); Edgefield County Litig., discussion at 650 F. Supp. 1176, 1180-1189 (D.S.C. 1986) (finding socioeconomic disparities and lower voter turnout for blacks than for whites); Dillard v. Crenshaw Litig., discussion at 649 F. Supp. 289, 295 (M.D. Ala. 1986) (finding both current and past depressed socioeconomic and political participation); Jordan Litig., discussion at 604 F. Supp. 807, 812 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (finding depressed socioeconomic status and decreased voter registration rates); Terrazas Litig., discussion at 581 F. Supp. 1329, 1348-1351 (N.D. Tex. 1984) (finding depressed political participation due to low voter registration and turnout number.); Gingles Litig., discussion at 590 F. Supp. 345, 360, 363 (E.D.N.C. 1984) ("[There are] continued relatively depressed levels of black voter registration." "[African Americans'] lower socio-economic status gives rise to special group interests centered upon those factors. At the same time, it operates to hinder the group's ability to participate effectively in the political process and to elect representatives of its choice as a means of seeking government's awareness of and attention to those interests." The court also noted depressed levels of voter registration.); Marengo County Litig. (AL), discussion at 731 F.2d 1546, 1551, 1567-1570 (11th Cir. 1984) ("Past discrimination may cause blacks to register or vote in lower numbers than whites. Past discrimination may also lead to present socioeconomic disadvantages, which in turn can reduce participation and influence in political affairs."); Dallas County Commission Litig. (AL), discussion at 739 F.2d 1529, 1537-1538 (11th Cir. 1984) (overturning the lower court's finding that equivalent voter registration rates showed effective political participation despite persisting socioeconomic disparities because blacks continued to turn out at lower rates than whites); City of Greenwood Litig., discussion at 599 F. Supp. 397, 400-401 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (finding that plaintiffs showed depressed socioeconomic status as well as depressed political participation as demonstrated by lower voter turnout rates); Escambia County Litig. (FL), 748 F.2d 1037, 143-144 (5th Cir. 1984) (finding depressed socioeconomic status and political participation and expressly rejecting the proposition that plaintiffs must prove causation between the two); Buskey v. Oliver Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 1473, 1475-1476 (M.D. Ala. 1983) (finding socioeconomic disparities and low voter registration); Major Litig., discussion at 574 F. Supp. 325, 339-341 (E.D. La. 1983) (finding that a "legacy of historical discrimination" caused lower socioeconomic status of blacks, and finding lower registration and turnout in the black community); Mobile School Board Litig., discussion at 542 F. Supp. 1078, 1093 (S.D. Ala. 1982) (finding socioeconomic disparities and depressed registration and turnout rates).

388. See NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), discussion at 252 F.3d 361, 367-368 (5th Cir. 2001) (refusing to find inequality of political access where evidence showed that registration and turnout rates were nearly equal); Southern Christian Leadership Conference Litig., discussion at 785 F. Supp. 1469, 1473, 1486 (M.D. Ala. 1992) (finding that despite depressed socioeconomic status, blacks are registered to vote in approximately equal numbers to whites and in some areas black voter registration exceeds that of whites); Monroe County Litig., discussion at 740 F. Supp. 417, 423-424 (N.D. Miss. 1990) (finding no evidence of a disproportionate level of black voter participation in Monroe County, and noting that "the black turnout in the 1989 alderman election in Aberdeen was higher in the 93% black ward than the white turnout in more affluent wards"); City of Starke Litig., discussion at 712 F. Supp. 1523, 1529 (M.D. Fla. 1989) (finding that black and white voter registration and turnout numbers were nearly equivalent); Liberty County Commissioners Litig. (FL), discussion at 865 F.2d 1566, 1582 (11th Cir. 1988) (finding socioeconomic disparities, but that on the whole black voter registration was generally high and often even exceeded that of whites); City of Boston Litig., discussion at 609 F. Supp. 739, 744-745 (D. Mass. 1985) (finding that blacks and whites register and vote at "basically similar" rates); City of Fort Lauderdale Litig., discussion at 617 F. Supp. 1093, 1104-05 (D.C. Fla. 1985) (finding that despite depressed socioeconomic status, blacks still turned out to vote in equal or greater numbers than whites and therefore Factor 5 was not met); City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 605 F. Supp. 377, 391-392 (E.D. Va. 1984) ("Blacks are registering to vote and turning out to vote at rates equal to or greater than the rate for whites, based on a percentage of the voting age population."); Rocha Litig., discussion at No. V-79-26, 1982 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15164 at *21-22 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 23, 1982) ("[T]he past discrimination does not appear to affect the political participation of minorities." They freely register to vote and do vote in the same ratio as do the Anglos."); cf. France Litig., discussion at 71 F. Supp. 2d 317, 332 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) ("Minorities have not been excluded from participating in the political process as is evident by their climbing voter registration rates, turnout at the polls and their success in the electoral process."); Metro Dade County Litig., discussion at 805 F. Supp. 967, 981, 991-992 (S.D. Fla. 1992) ("[D]espite the depressed levels in [education, employment and health], Blacks are making great strides in overcoming these obstacles as evidenced by their high registered voter turnout levels.").

389. See, e.g., Nipper Litig. (FL), discussion at 39 F.3d 1494, 1507-1508 (11th Cir. 1994) (overturning the lower court's finding that voter registration and turnout were equivalent; finding that while voter registration was roughly equivalent, black voter turnout still lagged); Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1103-1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991) (finding depressed socioeconomic status and lower levels of voter turnout, despite roughly equivalent voter registration numbers); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., discussion at 647 F. Supp. 1002, 1016-1017 (D. Mt. 1986) (finding that although voter registration between Native Americans and whites was roughly equivalent, Native American voter turnout still lagged); Gretna Litig., discussion at 636 F. Supp. 1113, 1116-1120 (E.D. La. 1986) (finding continued socioeconomic disparities, and noting that although blacks and whites register to vote in roughly equivalent numbers, black voter turnout still lagged behind that of whites); Dallas County Commission Litig. (AL), discussion at 739 F.2d 1529, 1537-1538 (11th Cir. 1984) (overturning the lower court's finding that equivalent voter registration rates showed effective political participation despite persisting socioeconomic disparities because blacks continued to turn out at lower rates than whites).

390. See Town of Hempstead Litig., discussion at 956 F. Supp. 326, 342 (E.D.N.Y. 1997) (noting that in comparison to other parts of the country, socioeconomic differences in Hempstead, while present, were not as severe as in other parts of the country and that "differences in the socioeconomic status of blacks do not significantly impair their relative ability to participate in the political process"); Fort Bend Independent School District Litig. (TX), discussion at 89 F.3d 1205, 1220 (5th Cir. 1996) (finding that socio-economic disparities "do not prevent meaningful participation in the political process").

391. See Rodriguez Litig., discussion at 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 435 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (finding that minorities in New York bear "to some extent" the effects of past discrimination, while finding no "substantial or adequate showing" that the "socioeconomic status of minorities significantly impairs their ability to participate in the political process in the relevant geographical areas"); Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1035-1038 (D. Colo. 2003) ("[T]he Court concludes that notwithstanding historical ethnicity-based discrimination, there is insufficient evidence to conclude that socioeconomic or educational conditions currently hinder Hispanic residents in Alamosa County from participating in the electoral process."); City of Chicago Heights Litig., discussion at Nos. 87 C 5112, 88 C 9800, 1997 WL 102543, at *10 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 5, 1997) ("This factor requires a showing that, as a result of past discrimination, African-Americans in Chicago Heights suffer from lower socioeconomic conditions than whites and that African-American political participation is depressed."); Mallory-Hamilton County Litig., discussion at 38 F. Supp. 2d 525, 542 (S.D. Oh. 1997) ("Plaintiffs have submitted no evidence which establishes that the effects of past discrimination deny African-Americans equal access to the political process or actually hamper the ability of African-Americans to participate in the political process. The Court hereby makes these same findings with respect to Summit County in general, and with respect to the Court of Common Pleas for Summit County, and the Akron Municipal Court in particular."); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 887-889 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (noting absence of evidence on depressed socio-economic status and insufficient evidence of depressed political participation); Kent County Litig., discussion at 790 F. Supp 738, 744, 749 (S.D. Mich. 1992) (finding that notwithstanding socioeconomic disparities, there was no showing of less opportunity to participate in the electoral process in Kent County); Turner Litig., discussion at 784 F. Supp. 553, 576-577 (E.D. Ark. 1991) (finding that the factor was not met because there was no evidence that black voters had "less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process"); McCarthy Litig. (TX), discussion at 749 F.2d 1134, 1135-1137 (5th Cir. 1984) (holding that plaintiffs must present evidence to show that there are actual obstacles or hindrances to minority political participation); see also Suffolk County Litig., discussion at 268 F. Supp. 2d 243, 265 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) ("[T]he plaintiffs have not established, in any manner, that Hispanics' lower socioeconomic condition in Suffolk County, if such is the case, has deprived them of their right to participate in legislative elections."); c.f. Chickasaw County I Litig., discussion at 705 F. Supp. 315, 320-321 (N.D. Miss. 1989) (finding insufficient evidence showing actual depressed political participation and citing some testimony suggesting that registration and turnout may be higher among black voters than white.).

392. See Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 282-292 (D.S.C. 2003); LULAC v. Clements Litig. (TX), discussion at 986 F.2d 728, 782 & n.41, (5th Cir. 1993); Neal Litig., discussion at 689 F. Supp. 1426, 1428-1431 (E.D. Va. 1988); Terrell Litig., 565 F. Supp. 338, 341-342 (N.D. Tex. 1983) (finding that although blacks are registered in equal or greater numbers than whites past discrimination lingers in housing segregation, which makes winning the white crossover vote nearly impossible because of the white majority's lack of familiarity with many black candidates.); cf. Terrazas Litig., discussion at 581 F. Supp. 1329, 1348-1351 (N.D. Tex. 1984) (crediting lay testimony concerning "the feeling among Hispanic candidates and voters in Dallas County that political action is futile").

393. Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 291 (D. S.C. 2003).

394. Neal Litig., discussion at 689 F. Supp. 1426, 1430 (E.D. Va. 1988); see also Terrell Litig., 565 F. Supp. 338, 342 (N.D. Tex. 1983) ("It is clear to the Court that a major reason for the white majority's lack of familiarity with many black candidates is the severe de facto segregation of housing in Terrell.").

395. City of St. Louis Litig., discussion at 896 F. Supp. 929 (E.D. Mo. 1995) (finding depressed socioeconomic status and voter turnout is not sufficient to satisfy this factor when difference in turnout could be attributable to voter apathy); Armstrong v. Allain Litig., discussion at 893 F. Supp. 1320, 1332-1333 (S.D. Miss. 1994) (finding that although significant socioeconomic disparities between whites and blacks exist, that the lack of vote turnout could be attributable to voter apathy and noting that when a black candidate is up for election, "the turnout of black voters increases dramatically"); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp 404 (D.S.C. 1993) ("Based on these registration and turnout statistics, the court rejects the notion that lower black turnout in city elections is attributable, to a significant degree, to the inability of blacks to learn of the election, to obtain transportation to the polls, or to mobilize in support of candidates and issues. A far more plausible explanation for low black turnout in city elections is the same as that for low turnout generally: voters are either satisfied that the City is working well, thus little interest is generated by the campaigns, or they are generally uninspired by some of the candidates."); SW Texas Junior College Dist. Litig., discussion at Civ. A. No. DR-88-CA-18, 1991 WL 367969, at *3-7 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 25, 1991) ("[T]his Court is hesitant to intervene when those same Hispanics could readily solve this problem by simply running candidates and turning out to vote."); Carrollton NAACP Litig. (GA), discussion at 829 F.2d 1547, 1561 (11th Cir. 1987) (upholding the District Court's finding that the defendant had sufficiently carried its burden to disprove "any causal connection between economic disparities and reduced political participation by minorities" and finding that there had been significant efforts to ensure that voter registration facilities were equally dispersed and available to all without regard to race).

396. See City of St. Louis Litig., discussion at 896 F. Supp. 929 (E.D. Mo. 1995) (finding evidence of depressed socioeconomic status and voter turnout was not sufficient to satisfy Factor 5 when difference in turnout could be attributable to voter apathy); Armstrong v. Allain Litig., discussion at 893 F. Supp. 1320, 1332-1333 (S.D. Miss. 1994) (finding that although significant socioeconomic disparities between whites and blacks exist that it could be attributable to voter apathy--when a black candidate is up for election, "the turnout of black voters increases dramatically."); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp 404 (D.S.C. 1993) (finding lower black voter turnout attributable to voter apathy as opposed to the "inability of blacks to learn of the election, to obtain transportation to the polls, or to mobilize in support of candidates and issues;" and concluding that black voters "are either satisfied that the City is working well, thus little interest is generated by the campaigns, or they are generally uninspired by some of the candidates"); SW Texas Junior College Dist. Litig., discussion at Civ. A. No. DR-88-CA-18, 1991 WL 367969 at *6-*7 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 25, 1991) (blaming low voter turnout on voter apathy and suggesting that "those same Hispanics [who are currently underrepresented] could readily solve this problem by simply running candidates and turning out to vote").

397. See, e.g., Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1040 (D.S.D. 2004) ("People living on a day-to-day basis wonder if they can heat their home. Those are not the kinds of people who are the most predisposed to go out and engage in a great deal of political campaigning or activity."); Attala County Litig. (MS), discussion at 92 F.3d 283, 293-295 (5th Cir. 1996) (overturning lower court's attribution of lower black voter participation to voter apathy, which affected both blacks and whites because to "conclude that black voter apathy is the reason for the failure of blacks to elect the candidates of their choice when apathy affects all voters is counterintuitive"--"[t]he fact that blacks and whites in Attala County are going to the polls in decreasing proportions does not explain why blacks alone are essentially shut out of the political processes of the county." (emphasis in original)); Gretna Litig., discussion at 636 F. Supp. 1113, 1120 (E.D. La. 1986) ("Depressed levels of participation in voting and candidacy are inextricably involved in the perception of futility and impotence" engendered by "severe historical disadvantage."); Terrazas Litig., discussion at 581 F. Supp. 1329, 1348-1351 (N.D. Tex. 1984) (finding Factor 5 based on depressed political participation as shown by low voter registration and turnout number, and "the feeling among Hispanic candidates and voters in Dallas County that political action is futile."); Major Litig., discussion at 574 F. Supp. 325, 339-341 (E.D. La. 1983) (finding both lower socioeconomic status of blacks and lower registration and turnout in the black community, and concluding that "[a] sense of futility engendered by the pervasiveness of prior discrimination, both public and private, is perceived as discouraging blacks from entering into the governmental process").

398. Gretna Litig., discussion at 636 F. Supp. 1113, 1120 (E.D. La. 1986).

399. Id.

400. Cincinnati Litig., discussion at No. C-1-92-278, 1993 WL 761489, at *11 (S.D. Ohio July 8, 1993) ("While the effects of discrimination in such areas as education, employment and housing do hinder the ability of some African Americans personally to finance political campaigns, the defendants have neither created these conditions nor do they intentionally maintain them.").

401. Milwaukee NAACP Litig., discussion at 935 F. Supp. 1419, 1427, 1433 (E.D. Wis. 1996) (finding no evidence had traced the continuing socioeconomic disparities to discrimination in the challenged county or state of Wisconsin).

402. See Pasadena Independent School District Litig., discussion at 958 F. Supp. 1196, 1225 (S.D. Tex. 1997) ("The socioeconomic data does not distinguish between Hispanics who are recent immigrants and those who have been in this country for longer periods, particularly those who are citizens. This information is important to this analysis, but was not presented."); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339, 365 (S.D. Cal. 1995) ("Hispanics are characterized by lower socioeconomic status than Anglos, but many Hispanics in El Centro have immigrated recently from Mexico, a third world country, and naturally are characterized by lower socioeconomic status . . . Therefore, it is critical to distinguish between foreign born and native born Hispanics in addressing this Senate Factor. Plaintiffs' evidence failed to make this distinction."); El Paso Independent School District Litig., discussion at 591 F. Supp. 802, 807, 809-810 (W.D. Tex. 1984) (finding discrepancies in socioeconomic status between Hispanics and whites, but holding that the "record fails to show how many of those affected by unemployment are recent immigrants or resident aliens as opposed to citizens" as well as that "[t]he evidence . . . fails to show how many residents of South El Paso were educated (or not educated) in Mexico rather than in the United States").

403. See, e.g., Magnolia Bar Association Litig., discussion at 793 F. Supp. 1386, 1409 (S.D. Miss. 1992) ("[B]lacks in Mississippi continue to bear the effects of discrimination in critical areas of socioeconomic attainment and this continues in some ways to affect their opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice."). See also Calhoun County Litig., discussion at 813 F. Supp. 1189 (N.D. Miss. 1993) (finding that repercussions of discrimination against African-Americans continues to effect political participation).

404. See Magnolia Bar Association Litig., discussion at 793 F. Supp. 1386, 1409 (S.D. Miss. 1992) ("[B]lacks in Mississippi continue to bear the effects of discrimination in critical areas of socioeconomic attainment and this continues in some ways to affect their opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice.").

405. Id.

406. See Master Lawsuit List.

407. See, e.g., Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991) (noting the long history and continuing practice of using racial appeals in campaigns in Columbus County and North Carolina generally).

408. Racial appeals found in 1950 (Gingles Litig.), 1954 (Gingles Litig.), 1960 (Gingles Litig.), 1968 (Gingles Litig.), 1970 (City of Dallas Litig.), 1971 (Garza v. Los Angeles Litig. and City of Philadelphia Litig.), 1972 (City of Dallas Litig. and Gingles Litig.), 1973 (Charleston County Litig. and Butts v. NYC Litig.), 1975 (Jeffers Litig. and City of Dallas Litig.), 1976 (Jeffers Litig. and City of Dallas Litig.), 1977 (City of Greenwood Litig.), 1979 (Town of Babylon Litig.), 1982 (Southern Christian Leadership Litig. and Jordan Litig.), 1983 (Garza v. Los Angeles Litig., Clark Litig., Neal Litig., Mehfoud Litig., and City of Philadelphia Litig.), 1984 (County of Big Horn Litig., Gingles Litig., Town of Babylon Litig.), 1985 (Armour Litig.), 1986 (Armstrong v. Allain Litig.), 1987 (Clark Litig., Mehfoud Litig., City of Philadelphia Litig., Town of Hempstead Litig., Town of Holyoke Litig., and Wamser Litig.), 1988 (City of Dallas Litig. and Charleston County Litig.), 1989 (Magnolia Bar Association Litig. and City Dallas Litig.), 1990 (Southern Christian Leadership Litig., Metro Dade County Litig., Magnolia Bar Association Litig., and Charleston County Litig.), 1991 (Magnolia Bar Association Litig. and City of Philadelphia Litig.), 1992 (Charleston County Litig. and Alamosa County Litig.) 1995 (City of LaGrange Litig.), 2000

(Charleston County Litig.), 2002 (Bone Shirt Litig. and St. Bernard Parish School Board Litig.).

409. See Master Lawsuit List.

410. See Southern Christian Leadership Litig., Jordan Litig., County of Big Horn Litig., Gingles Litig., Armstrong v. Allain Litig., Clark Litig., Mehfoud Litig., Magnolia Bar Association Litig., City of LaGrange Litig., Bone Shirt Litig., St. Bernard Parish School Board Litig.

411. See, e.g., Crenshaw County Litig., discussion at 649 F. Supp. 289, 295 (M.D. Ala. 1986) (finding that "white candidates have encouraged voting along racial lines in Calhoun, Lawrence, and Pickens county by appealing to racial prejudice."); Clark Litig., discussion at 777 F. Supp. 471, 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14322, *80 (M.D. La. 1991) ("She [an African American judicial candidate] also testified about the overt and covert racial appeals in both elections by candidates and the public [in 1983 and 1987 campaigns]."); Magnolia Bar Ass'n., 793 F. Supp. 1386, 1409-10 (S.D. Miss. 1992) ("Supreme court and other judicial campaigns in Mississippi have been characterized by overt and subtle racial appeals. For example, in the 1986 Supreme Court Central District, Place No. 2 election, avowed segregationist Barrett relied on overt racial appeals in his unsuccessful attempt to defeat black former Justice Anderson."); Martin v. Allain, 658 F. Supp. 1183, 1195 (S.D. Miss. 1987) ("Plaintiffs, however, presented proof of racial appeals . . . by Richard Barrett in his 1986 challenge of Mississippi Supreme Court Justice Reuben Anderson.").

412. See LULAC v. Clements Litig., discussion at 999 F.2d 831, 879 (5th Cir. 1993)(finding that a judicial candidate had been labeled a "Black Muslim" by his opponent); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1339 (N.D. Tex. 1990)(finding in the 1972 Precinct 7 Constable's race, the incumbent used ads describing his African-American opponent in this manner: "A black man (no qualifications of any kind)").

413. See Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1025-26 (D. Colo. 2004)(identifying as a "subtle ethnic appeal" Marguerite Salazar's 1992 campaign for county commission in which "she ran as a designated Hispanic role model immediately after joining the Hispanic Leadership Institute").

414. See Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1041 (D.S.D. 2004) (characterizing as a racial appeal the headline in the state's largest newspaper, trumpeting "HUNHOFF PICKS INDIAN WOMAN AS RUNNING MATE"); Armour Litig., discussion at 775 F. Supp. 1044, 1056 (N.D. Ohio 1991) ("[T]hroughout the [1985] primary race, the media focused on Starks' race, consistently describing him as the black candidate for Mayor."); Neal Litig., discussion at 689 F. Supp. 1426, 1431-32 (E.D. Va. 1988) (identifying a racial appeal in an editorial that identified two candidates as black and "urged voters not to vote on account of race, but rather on merit. However, the editorial also said that the race from District 3, involving Jack Green, 'is of great concern to many county residents' because Green could earn 'solid black support' to defeat the veteran incumbent. The editorial clearly favored the re-election of the 'more experienced' incumbents."). But see City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 605 F. Supp. 377, 392 (D.C. Va. 1984) (deciding that news accounts discussing the race of candidates and the issue of black representation in the 1982 campaign were not racial appeals where court found that black candidates has raised the issue and no evidence the issues was used to appeal to racial prejudice of voters).

415. See Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 294-97 (D.S.C. 2003); Southern Christian Leadership Litig., discussion at 56 F.3d 1281, 1290 (11th Cir. 1995) ("One . . . subtle racial appeal was in the Democratic Party primary in 1982 which involved a newspaper ad run by a white candidate contrasting the pictures of the white candidate and Justice Adams [who is African American]."); LULAC v. Clements Litig., discussion at 999 F.2d 831, 879 (5th Cir. 1993); Mehfoud Litig., discussion at 702 F. Supp. 588, 595 (E.D. Va. 1988) (citing selective use by white candidate of flyer with black opponent's photograph, and failure to use similar photograph in campaign against a white candidate); Magnolia Bar Litig., discussion at 793 F. Supp. 1386, 1410 (S.D. Miss. 1992) (citing the white candidate's campaign flyers with pictures of African-American candidates used in judicial elections in 1989, 1990, 1991). But see Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 295 (D.S.C. 2003) (classifying as a racial appeal a campaign flyer from a race involving two white candidates that featured the photograph of an African-American elected official unassociated with either of the white candidates).

416. See, e.g. Red Clay School District Litig., discussion at 780 F. Supp. 221, 237 (D. Del. 1991) (concluding that the a newspaper article with accompanying photographs of black and white candidates was not a racial appeal because the "candidates [were] not referred to in any disparaging manner"); City of Jackson Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1534-35 (W.D. Tenn. 1988) (rejecting the argument that a newspaper's publishing of candidate photographs was a racial appeal).

417. City of Jackson Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1534-35 (W.D. Tenn. 1988); see also Red Clay School District Litig., discussion at 780 F. Supp. 221, 237 (D. Del. 1991) (finding no racial appeal where newspaper published pictures of the candidates, stating that race may be an issue in the 1985 election, and noting concerns expressed by sole black board member that the black vote might be split).

418. Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 294-97 (D.S.C. 2003) (finding that darkened photographs of African-American opponents were run by white candidates in their campaign materials in 1988, 1990, 1992); City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 537 (E.D. Pa. 1993) (finding that a white candidate's photograph had been darkened by her opponent and used in the opponent's campaign literature).

419. Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 294-97 (D.S.C. 2003).

420. City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 537 (E.D. Pa. 1993).

421. Id.

422. See, e.g., City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1348 (N.D. Tex. 1990) (Noting that a white slating group warned of the "Mass Block Voting Tactics" in the black areas of South Dallas in 1970 and noting that "Folsom also distributed a leaflet charging that Weber was attempting to win the election with a 'massive black turnout,' and threatening that 'Garry Weber's South Dallas Machine is going to elect the next mayor' thanks to the efforts of 'professional black campaigners who will turn out unprecedented numbers of blacks voting for Weber.'"); Neal Litig., discussion at 689 F. Supp. 1426, 1431-32 (E.D. Va. 1988) (identifying a racial appeal in an editorial stating that the race from District 3, involving Jack Green, 'is of great concern to many county residents' because Green could earn 'solid black support' to defeat the veteran incumbent.").

423. See, e.g., Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 212 (E.D. Ark. 1989) ("In the Mayor's race in Pine Bluff in 1975, for example, a supporter of a white candidate publicly warned that if white voters didn't turn out, there would be a black mayor.")

424. See, e.g., Armour Litig., discussion at 775 F. Supp. 1044, 1056 (N.D. Ohio 1991) (finding that a black mayoral candidate's opponents emphasized that if the black candidate was elected, he would have a black cabinet, and that the police chief and fire chief would also be black).

425. See, e.g., Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1041 (D.S.D. 2004) ("During the 2002 primary election for Bennett County offices, Indians were accused of 'trying to take over the county politically, . . . [and] trying to take land back and put it in trust.'"); City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, n.19 (E.D. Pa. 1993) ("In the 1983 mayoral election, Mayor Goode testified that his opponent, former Mayor Frank Rizzo, attempted to associate Mayor Goode with Jesse Jackson and Harold Washington, implying that Mayor Goode's candidacy was part of 'a movement by blacks to take over all across the country.'").

426. Armour Litig., discussion at 775 F. Supp. 1044, 1056 (N.D. Ohio 1991).

427. Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1041 (D.S.D. 2004).

428. Jordan Litig., discussion at 604 F. Supp. 807, 814 (N.D. Miss. 1984) ("One campaign television commercial sponsored by the white candidate whose slogan was 'He's one of us' opened and closed with a view of Confederate monuments accompanied by this audio message: You know, there's something about Mississippi that outsiders will never, ever understand. The way we feel about our family and God, and the traditions that we have. There is a new Mississippi, a Mississippi of new jobs and new opportunity for all our citizens. [video pan of black factory workers] We welcome the new, but we must never, ever forget what has gone before. [video pan of Confederate monuments] We cannot forget a heritage that has been sacred through our generations.").

429. City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 880 F. Supp. 911, 922 (D. Mass. 1995).

430. Id.

431. Id.

432. Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 296 (D.S.C. 2003).

433. Id.

434. Id.

435. See, e.g., City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1368 (W.D. Tex. 1990) (counting as a racial appeal a 1989 newspaper column indicating that "a 'protest vote' for lawyer and 'civic gadfly,' Peter Lesser ... could lead to racial violence and white flight," citing leaflet that accused opponent's campaign of "planting lies and rekindling old fires that could set Black/White relations back 20 years," and told black voters "No one, Black or White, will benefit from the hostilities between the Races [that] Garry Weber's hate-campaign is trying to force.").

436. [1] See, e.g., Metro Dade County Litig., discussion at 805 F. Supp. 967, 981-82 (S.D. Fla. 1992) ("Recent elections demonstrate how successfully candidates and their supporters have engaged in a tactic of 'guilt by association' to defeat Black opponents. This tactic is utilized at the end of the campaign period, immediately prior to election day. For example, voters have been told that Black candidates share common goals with Jesse Jackson or Nelson Mandela, two political figures strongly supported in the Black community, but opposed in some Cuban and Jewish communities.").

437. See, e.g., City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 537 n.19 (E.D. Pa. 1993) ("Mayor Goode testified that in the 1987 mayoral primary election, Ed Rendell, Goode's opponent, attempted to associate Mayor Goode with Louis Farrakhan, a controversial Muslim leader."); City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1365 (W.D. Tex. 1990) ("On March 4, 1988, a Dallas Morning News article reported that a candidate for Criminal District Court No. 2, who was running against the African-American incumbent, mailed 77,000 fliers criticizing her opponent because he had changed his name to 'Baraka' after converting to Islam and becoming 'a follower of Malcolm X, the slain Islamic leader and black nationalist.'").

438. Wamser Litig., discussion at 679 F. Supp. 1513, 1527 (E.D. Mo. 1987) ("In his 1987 primary campaign, Roberts[, an African American,] made overt racial appeals to black voters. Roberts accused a white opponent -- Osborn -- of being backed by 'the Klan.'").

439. See Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 295 (D.S.C. 2003) (noting a campaign flyer from a 2000 race involving two white candidates that featured the darkened photograph of an African-American school board member from a separate district whose permission to use the picture had neither been sought nor granted); City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 537 n.20 (E.D. Pa. 1993) (noting campaign material distributed in an early 1990s state senate race between two white candidates where one candidate published a darkened picture of his white opponent side-by-side with the picture of Philadelphia's black mayor).

440. City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1339 n.34 (W.D. Tex. 1990) ("During the run-off election for two State Representative districts in June of 1970, the 'Democratic Committee for Responsible Government' attacked a white candidate... because he was 'running in South Dallas . . . as a team' with a black candidate -- and because he had raised money for voter registration activities, mostly in predominately Black or Latin-American neighborhoods."); see also Gingles Litig., discussion at 590 F. Supp. 345, 364 (E.D.N.C. 1984) (noting crude cartoons and pamphlets of the campaigns marked by outright white supremacy in the 1890's which featured white political opponents in the company of black political leaders and later appeals of same spirit).

441. Garza v. Los Angeles Litig., 756 F. Supp. 1298, 1341 (C.D. Cal. 1990) ("In the 1971 runoff for the 49th Assembly District, Richard Alatorre ran against William Brophy. Mr. Brophy distributed mailers which included Mr. Alatorre's photograph and alluded that Alatorre was sympathetic to undocumented aliens.").

442. City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 880 F. Supp. 911, 922 (D. Mass. 1995) ("Proulx, for his part, attacked Dunn for not calling for a moratorium on all subsidized housing programs in Holyoke. Proulx explained that he supported such a moratorium with one important exception -- subsidized elderly housing. The vast majority of government subsidized elderly housing in Holyoke was occupied by white non-Hispanic senior citizens."); Butts v. NYC Litig., 614 F. Supp. 1527, 1531 (S.D.N.Y. 1985) ("Badillo's opponents distributed literature misrepresenting or emphasizing Badillo's position on issues said to have racial connotations, such as scatter site subsidized housing.").

443. Town of Hempstead Litig., discussion at 956 F. Supp. 326, 342-43 (E.D.N.Y. 1997) ("In a late 1970s campaign for a State Senate seat from an Assembly District within the Town, the incumbent Republican appealed to the fears of Town residents that black students from Queens would be bused to schools in the Town. The campaign literature used pictures of black children in school buses to convey the message that voting for the Democratic opponent would result in such busing."); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, n.64 (W.D. Tex. 1990)("In Place 9 [city council elections in 1976], Jesse Price campaigned against Bill Blackburn on a platform that included opposition to busing for school desegregation -- and opposition to any court order requiring busing -- saying he intended to 'hang Blackburn's stand on busing around his neck.'").

444. Town of Hempstead Litig., discussion at 956 F. Supp. 326, 342-43 (E.D.N.Y. 1997); City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 880 F. Supp. 911, 922 (D. Mass. 1995) ("Dunn's campaign literature featured the slogan 'It takes guts,' coupled with a teach the 'Spanish' English theme as an answer to increasing crime and vandalism").

445. Town of Hempstead Litig., discussion at 956 F. Supp. 326, 342-43 (E.D.N.Y. 1997).

446. City of LaGrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 777 (N.D. Ga. 1997) ("[P]ublic debate about the consolidation of the local schools was marked by racial appeals and arguments.").

447. City of Greenwood Litig., discussion at 599 F. Supp. 397, 403 (N.D. Miss. 1984).

448. City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 605 F. Supp. 377, 392 (E.D. Va. 1984); City of St. Louis Litig., discussion at 896 F. Supp. 929, 943 (E.D. Mo. 1995), discussion at Red Clay School District Litig., discussion at 780 F. Supp. 221, 237-38 (D. Del. 1991).

449. City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 605 F. Supp. 377, 392 (E.D. Va. 1984).

450. City of St. Louis Litig., discussion at 896 F. Supp. 929, 943 (E.D. Mo. 1995).

451. Red Clay School District Litig., discussion at 780 F. Supp. 221, 237-38 (D. Del. 1991).

452. City of Austin Litig., discussion at 871 F.2d 529, 534 (5th Cir. 1989) (noting the lower court's dismissal of "appellants' contention that subliminal racial appeals accompanied the voters' rejection in 1985 of an amendment proposing single-member districts.").

453. County of Big Horn Litig., discussion at 647 F. Supp. 1002, 1017-18 (D. Mont. 1986) ("Unlike plaintiffs, this court does not consider every discussion of or question about the taxation issue to be a racial campaign appeal.").

454. Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1041 (D.S.D. 2004) ("Media outlets across the state ran numerous articles about alleged voter fraud prior to the general election. None of the allegations were actually proved to be true. Bennett County's local newspaper ran a large, front page headline announcing, 'LOCAL VOTER FRAUD LOOKED AT BY FBI,' despite the fact that no fraudulent activity was alleged to have occurred in Bennett County. Similar voter fraud allegations made the headlines in 1978.")(internal citations omitted).

455. City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1368 (W.D. Tex. 1990)

456. Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 212-13 (E.D. Ark. 1989).

457. Id.

458. Garza v. Los Angeles Litig., discussion at 756 F. Supp. 1298, 1341 (C.D. Ca. 1990).

459. Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 212 (E.D. Ark. 1989)("[A]t a public rally [a white candidate running against a black candidate] used profanity and a racial epithet -- not in his actual speech, to be sure, but in open conversation").

460. St. Bernard Parish School Board Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 02-2209, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16540, *33 -34 (E.D. La. Aug. 26, 2002).

461. City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1339 (W.D. Tex. 1990).

462. Id.

463. Neal Litig., discussion at 689 F. Supp. 1426, 1432-33 (E.D. Va. 1988).

464. Wamser Litig., discussion at 679 F. Supp. 1513, 1527 (E.D. Mo. 1987).

465. LULAC v. Clements Litig., discussion at 999 F.2d 831, 879 (5th Cir. 1993)(en banc)("Nothing in the district court's opinion indicates that these racial appeals were anything more than isolated incidents."); City of Springfield 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1032 (C.D. Ill. 1987)(noting racial slur directing at black candidate at luncheon meeting in 1982 and stating that this "single occurrence cannot support a claim that political campaigns in Springfield are carried out through subtle or overt racial appeals."); Milwaukee NAACP Litig., discussion at 935 F. Supp. 1419, 1433 (E.D. Wis. 1996)("While the plaintiffs insist that this factor supports the inference of vote dilution, they are able to point to only one judicial election which appears to have involved racial appeals: the 1996 general election between Judge Stamper and Robert Crawford. Assuming that the Stamper/Crawford election did, in fact, involve hostile racial conduct, one election in the past 25 years is hardly enough to prove a pattern.").

466. Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1025-26 (D. Colo. 2004)(noting ethnic appeals only by minority candidates who subsequently lost their elections); Southern Christian Leadership Litig., discussion at 56 F.3d 1281, 1290 (11th Cir. 1995)(finding that appeals were "ineffective" as targeted black candidates won their races); LULAC v. Clements Litig., discussion at 999 F.2d 831, 879 (5th Cir. 1993)(en banc)("In the only judicial election affected by a racial appeal, Judge Baraka, the black candidate, won both the Republican primary and the general election, winning a majority of the white vote in both elections.").

467. Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016, 1025-26 (D. Colo. 2004).

468. Liberty County Litig., discussion at 957 F. Supp. 1522, 1565 (N.D. Fla. 1997); City of Chicago Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 1359, 1449 (N.D. Ill. 1997); Town of Babylon Litig., 914 F. Supp. 843, 889 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Sanchez-Colorado Litig., discussion at 861 F. Supp.1516, 1529 (D. Colo. 1994); El Paso Independent School District, discussion at 591 F. Supp. 802, 810 (W.D. Tex. 1984); City of Columbia Litig., 850 F. Supp. 404, 424 (D.S.C. 1993); Chattanooga Litig., discussion at 722 F. Supp. 380, 396 (E.D. Tenn. 1989); City of Boston Litig., discussion at 609 F. Supp. 739, 744-45 (D. Mass. 1985).

469. El Paso Independent School District, 591 F. Supp. 802, 810 (W.D. Tex. 1984)("The next factor to be considered is whether political campaigns for the office of trustee have been characterized by overt or subtle racial appeals. Mrs. Maxine Silva, a candidate for trustee in the 1948 school board election, testified that during her campaign she received telephone calls in which she was accused of being a 'wet-back,' and subjected to other ethnic slurs. The Court accepts the testimony of Mrs. Silva, and finds it to be quite credible. It was her further testimony, however, that times have changed, and that the same atmosphere does not exist today. In fact, Mrs. Silva is again a candidate for trustee in the 1984 school board election.").

470. Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 889 (E.D.N.Y. 1996)("The African-American candidates that were the targets of these racial appeals lost. While deplorable, these racial appeals occurred ten years ago, and plaintiffs presented no evidence as to more recent racial appeals.").

471. City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 424 (D.S.C. 1993) ("the court finds that the racial harmony exhibited in the more recent campaigns is more indicative of the present-day political climate within the City. Accordingly, these two instances in which racial appeals were made are, by modern standards, rather isolated incidents and are not indicative of current attitudes."); see also City of Boston Litig., discussion at 609 F. Supp. 739, 745 (D. Mass. 1985) ("Other than an incident of verbal intimidation directed at a campaign worker in 1983, the record in this case contains no indication that the use of racial tactics has been a part of the City's elections since 1977. There was, in fact, testimony that the theme of racial harmony played a major role in the campaigns of some candidates in the 1983 elections.").

472. Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 304 (D.S.C. 2004).

473. Magnolia Bar Association Litig., discussion at 793 F. Supp. 1386, 1410 (S.D. Miss. 1992).

474. SENATE REPORT at 28-30.

475. Id.

476. See Master Lawsuit List.

477. See, e.g., Sanchez-Colorado Litig. (CO), discussion at 97 F.3d 1303, 1319 (10th Cir. 1996) (noting that no Hispanic candidate had won election to state legislature from the district since 1940); Jefferson Parish I Litig. (LA), 926 F.2d 487 (5th Cir. 1991) (discussing expert's analysis of the 20 elections in which blacks have sought office in Jefferson Parish since 1980).

478. See, e.g., City of Santa Maria Litig. (CA), discussion at 160 F.3d 543, 548 (9th Cir. 1998) (noting that "[i]t was well-known throughout Santa Maria that the district court was awaiting the results of that election. Days before the election, Maldonado told a local newspaper that his victory would prove 'Santa Maria is not racist,' " and concluding that "[p]laintiffs have raised a triable issue of fact in whether the 1994 city council election was representative of typical voting behavior in Santa Maria"); Chickasaw County II Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 WL 33426761, at *4 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997) (finding the election of black candidate to constable an anomaly where he "won the election by only 8 votes and his prestige was heightened by the fact that he is an ex-pro athlete. Moreover, this election occurred during the pendency of this lawsuit"); Clark Litig., discussion at 725 F. Supp. 285, 299 (M.D. La. 1988) (discussing Judge Pitcher, who "was elected in East Baton Rouge where this litigation is pending and after this litigation commenced. While the term 'aberration,' used by one witness to describe Judge Pitcher's victory, is too strong, it is clear that the election must be considered as one under unusual circumstances"); City of Springfield Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1031

(C.D. Ill. 1987) (noting that "[s]ince this suit was filed, Candice Trees, a black woman, was elected Clerk of the Circuit Court of Sangamon County in a county-wide general election in November of 1986," and "find[ing] that the majority citizens in power sought to evade Section 2 'by manipulating the election of a "safe" minority candidate' to an office that has no policymaking power" because the "result is sudden and aberrant and logically can be attributed primarily to the concern generated by this litigation within the power centers of the City of Springfield") (citation omitted).

479. See, e.g., Albany County Litig., discussion at No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820, at *11 (N.D.N.Y. July 7, 2003) (noting that "[s]ince the County was incorporated in 1788, no minority has ever been elected to a County-wide office"); Mehfoud Litig., discussion at 702 F. Supp. 588, 590 (E.D. Va. 1988) (noting that "[n]o black has ever been elected to the Henrico Board of Supervisors. Prior to 1979 no black had ever run for the position, and since that date there have been three black candidates . . . All three were defeated. In addition, as of the date of the trial in this case, no black had ever been appointed to the Henrico County School Board"); Seastrunk Litig., discussion at 772 F.2d 143, 153 (5th Cir. 1985) (observing that "no black had ever held office of any sort in the Parish"); City of Jackson Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1535 (W.D. Tenn. 1988) (stating that of the Senate Factors, "perhaps the most significant in Jackson is the fact that no black candidate has ever been elected to, or served on, the City Commission" and pointing out that "[a] politically cohesive, geographically compact minority which exceeds 30% of the population of the City has been unable for over seventy years to have a member of the minority serve upon the governing authority of Jackson").

480. See, e.g., African-American Voting Rights LDF Litig., discussion at 994 F. Supp. 1105, 1125 (E.D. Mo. 1997) (finding that "[t]he seventh factor also weighs in defendants' favor because African-Americans have been generally successful in reaching the bench in the jurisdictions in question; and, to whatever extent it is relevant, African-Americans have also been successful in reaching nonjudicial public office in Missouri of late"); Little Rock Litig., discussion at 831 F. Supp. 1453, 1460 (E.D. Ark. 1993) (noting that "[b]lack candidates won ten of the twenty-five races in which one or more blacks participated" for "the position of Little Rock City Board of Directors from 1962 to 1992"); Magnolia Bar Association Litig., discussion at 793 F. Supp. 1386, 1410 (S.D. Miss. 1992) (finding that "blacks have enjoyed considerable electoral success in Mississippi" from facts that "two blacks. . . have been elected to the Mississippi Supreme Court," that "United States Congressman Mike Espy . . . is black [and that] numerous blacks have been elected to judicial offices and non-judicial offices throughout" the state).

481. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b) (2005) (providing that "nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population").

482. See, e.g., Old Person Litig. (MT), discussion at 312 F.3d 1036, 1048 (9th Cir. 2002) (finding that the Voting Rights Act does not "require any precise mathematical calculation of percentages of success in election," suggesting that "[s]uch calculations may be misleading or give undue weight to what is only one of many factors" and that "[w]hat is important is that the district court consider the success in elections of the protected class," and concluding that "neither the statute, nor the Senate report pertinent to its interpretation, nor the Supreme Court's teachings in Gingles or De Grandy require any particular form for the district court's assessment of election success"); Cincinnati Litig., discussion at No. C-1-92-278, 1993 WL 761489, at *24 (S.D. Ohio July 8, 1993) (noting minority successes fall short of proportional representation and finding "there is no constitutional or statutory right to proportional representation"); Terrazas Litig., discussion at 581 F. Supp. 1329, 1355-56 (N.D. Tex. 1984) (observing that "[o]ne would expect greater hispanic representation for a population group of its size," but concluding that there are "limits . . . to the probative value of this inference. A lack of proportional representation has no independent constitutional or statutory significance.").

483. See, e.g., Bridgeport Litig., discussion at Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 WL 742750 at *3, (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993) (noting discrepancy between percentages of voting-age populations of blacks and Hispanics, roughly twenty-two percent for each, and election to thirteen and sixteen percent, respectively, of city-wide offices, lowered if ceremonial and uncontested offices are removed); Operation Push Litig., discussion at 674 F. Supp. 1245, 1265 (N.D. Miss. 1987) (observing that "Mississippi has some 521 black elected officials, including one State Supreme Court Justice, one U.S. Congressman, and two State Senators. On the whole, these 521 black officials as of January 1986 represented approximately 9.9 percent of the total number of elected officials--approximately 5,278 in all. The black population of Mississippi is approximately 35 percent of the total population. Most of these black officials were elected from black majority districts"); Jordan Litig., discussion at 604 F. Supp. 807, 812 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (noting that "[b]lacks hold less than ten percent of all elective offices in Mississippi, though they constitute 35% of the state's population and a majority of the population of 22 counties); Major Litig., discussion at 574 F. Supp. 325, 351, 341 (E.D. La. 1983) (describing a fifteen percent success rate for black candidates at the polls as "substantially lower than might be anticipated" given the parish's fifty-five percent black population, and also noting that "[n]otwithstanding a black population of 29.4%, only 7% of Louisiana's elected officials are black") (citations omitted).

484. See, e.g., Suffolk County Litig., discussion at 268 F. Supp. 2d 243, 266 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) (finding that Factor 7 "favors the defendants" where "there is one Hispanic legislator in Suffolk County which is 6% of the legislators" and "the percentage of Hispanic voting age citizens in Suffolk County is 6.67%"); City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1381 (11th Cir. 1997) (noting that "[b]lack preferred candidates . . . filled 45% (22/49) of the positions available in the races in which they ran [which] is a higher percentage of positions filled than the percentage of Rome's population which is black").

485. See Southern Christian Leadership Litig., discussion at 785 F. Supp. 1469, 1477 (M.D. Ala. 1992) (stating that "strict proportionality between blacks and whites eligible for election does not preclude a finding that blacks have not been able substantially to influence elections," noting that Justice Brennan's direction in Gingles to "look beyond the single question of the degree of success of black candidates is particularly required where the minority candidate pool is so small").

486. See, e.g., City of Bridgeport Litig., Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 WL 742750 at *3, (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993) (stating that "[u]nderticket offices are often filled on the coattails of the mayoral candidate and election of minorities so such offices do not clearly reflect the ability of minorities to elect their choices").

487. See, e.g., Butts v. NYC Litig. (NY), 779 F.2d 141, 150 (2d Cir. 1985) (disapproving district court's "decision to disvalue the electoral success that minorities have had in New York City simply because these victories did not involve the City's three top offices").

488. See, e.g., Meza Litig., discussion at 322 F. Supp. 2d 52, 72 (D. Mass. 2004) (acknowledging "a number of unsuccessful campaigns by Latino candidates in [the] Chelsea" portion of the 2d Suffolk District in a lawsuit challenging the redistricting of State House districts, but finding that "the success of the Barrios 2002 senate campaign in the relevant portions of the 2d Suffolk District suggests that attractive Hispanic candidates with well-run campaigns are currently quite competitive within the Enacted Plan's configuration of the 2d Suffolk District") (emphasis added).

489. See, e.g., NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), 252 F.3d 361, 370 (5th Cir. 2001) (noting that "exogenous elections are less probative than elections for the particular office at issue," but also asserting a "critical evidentiary reality that the exogenous character of . . . elections does not render them nonprobative") (citation omitted); Lafayette County Litig., 20 F. Supp. 2d 996 (N.D. Miss. 1998) (finding that "[w]hile blacks have enjoyed somewhat better success running for other county offices such as constable and board of education members, those exogenous elections are not as probative as the supervisory elections at issue here").

490. See, e.g., Smith-Crittenden County Litig., discussion at 687 F. Supp. 1310, 1317 (E.D. Ark. 1988) (finding non-persuasive "evidence of some success by black candidates in school-board elections or other local races, because the electoral structure at issue here has no effect on these candidates"); City of Jackson Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1535 (W.D. Tenn. 1988) (declining "to consider the election of a black candidate to the Madison County Commission as being relevant to an inquiry of whether black candidates have been elected to the Jackson City Commission, the only political subdivision which is the subject of this litigation" and noting that county commission "a different governing body, with many more commissioners than the City, elected from a different group of voters, and having different duties and responsibilities.").

491. See, e.g., Sanchez-Colorado Litig. (CO), discussion at 97 F.3d 1303, 1324 (10th Cir. 1996) (finding that "the record does not justify the district court's credit of the extent to which minorities have been elected to public office in HD 60" and stating that "exogenous elections-- those not involving the particular office at issue-- are less probative than elections involving the specific office that is the subject of the litigation") (quotation omitted); City of Carrollton NAACP Litig. (GA), discussion at 829 F.2d 1547, 1560 (11th Cir. 1987) (holding that "[t]he district court's reliance on municipal elections in Carroll County as proof of minority electoral success of a county electoral scheme is obviously misplaced. The political jurisdiction in question here is the county, not the cities of Villa Rica, Whitesburg, or Carrollton. The record plainly demonstrates the clear lack of minority electoral success in Carroll County.").

492. See, e.g., Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1042-43 (D.S.D. 2004) (finding that "electing fewer than thirty Indians in nearly 100 years in a majority-Indian county does not demonstrate a long history of Indians being elected to office. Several positions listed, moreover, were appointed, which detracts from their probative value"); Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 495 (2d Cir. 1999) (noting that "[a]lthough black Republicans have been appointed or elected to other offices in the surrounding area, and blacks have been appointed to a number of positions in the Town, the fact remains that until the election of Curtis Fisher in 1993, no African-American was ever elected to the legislative body at issue in this case.") (quotation omitted); Texarkana Litig., discussion at 861 F. Supp. 756, 764 (W.D. Ark. 1992) (discounting as evidence of minority electoral success experience of plaintiff Londell Williams, who was appointed to the city board of directors in 1978, has never had a white opponent, and when he was opposed by a black candidate, was an incumbent."); Metro Dade County Litig., discussion at 805 F. Supp. 967, 982 (S.D. Fla. 1992) (commenting that since 1968 "no Black candidate preferred by Black voters has ever been elected to the County Commission without first being appointed to the Commission. Therefore, although Blacks have been elected to the County Commission, this seeming electoral success does not demonstrate that Blacks are able to elect their preferred representatives in the absence of special circumstances").

493. See Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1021 (2d Cir. 1995) (finding Factor 7 unsatisfied, citing evidence that "blacks have held several elected positions on the Board of Education, they have been appointed to other local boards and commissions, and they have held positions on the Niagara Falls Democratic Committee"); City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1384 n.18 (11th Cir. 1997) (finding subsequent electoral success of minority candidates first appointed to office probative of minority electoral success where evidence indicated that the appointed candidates had been able to develop sustained biracial coalitions" and have not simply maintained "their elected positions because of the sheer power of incumbency").

494. Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), 180 F.3d 476, 495 (2d Cir. 1999).

495. See, e.g., Red Clay School District Litig., discussion at 780 F. Supp. 221, 226 (D. Del. 1991) (noting that "[s]pecifically, in 1986, 1987 and 1989, no black candidates ran for a seat on the Red Clay Board and, as indicated supra, there are virtually no procedural restrictions in the system which would chill or frustrate black candidacy…The Court finds, therefore, that on the whole this Senate Factor does not weigh heavily in favor of the Plaintiffs."); McCarty Litig. (TX), discussion at 749 F.2d 1134, 1135 (5th Cir. 1984) (noting that "[o]nly two black candidates sought election to the Board of Trustees" and that "Black voters register and vote in Lamar County without hindrance, as each plaintiff testified, and there is no hindrance or obstacle to the candidacy of black persons for the Board").

496. See Red Clay School District Litig., discussion at 780 F. Supp. 221, 226 & n.2 (D. Del. 1991).

497. See, e.g., Calhoun County Litig. (MS), discussion at 88 F.3d 1393, 1397-98 (5th Cir. 1996) (noting "[t]hat few or no black citizens have sought public office in the challenged electoral system does not preclude a claim of vote dilution . . . To hold otherwise would allow voting rights cases to be defeated at the outset by the very barriers to political participation that Congress has sought to remove.") (quoting Westwego Citizens For Better Government v. City of Westwego, 872 F.2d 1201, 1208 n. 9 (5th Cir.1989)); see also City of LaGrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 776 (N.D. Ga. 1997) (noting testimony from African-American candidates that they "would not even run for at-large City-Council seats because of the perception that such campaigns would not succeed" and finding that this "testimony comports with the strikingly low number of African-American candidates for the LaGrange City Council over the last one hundred years."); LULAC – Midland Litig., discussion at 648 F. Supp. 596, 604 (W.D. Tex. 1986) (noting that "only three minority candidates have been elected" since formation of the school board, that "[f]ew minority members have dared to try to be elected," and that "no minority member has been elected" since the adoption of majority vote requirement); cf. Cousin Litig. (TN), discussion at 145 F.3d 818, 833 (6th Cir. 1998) (acknowledging that "no black has ever run for a county judgeship, a phenomenon surely attributable at least in part to the perception that it is very difficult for a black candidate to win a countywide election," but ultimately concluding that Factor 7 did not clearly weigh in plaintiffs' favor; finding the fact that "political success is difficult . . . does not mean it is unmanageable" and observing that three of the 27 black lawyers in the county already held "lawyer-qualified" offices).

498. Fort Bend Independent School District Litig. (TX), 89 F.3d 1205, 1215 (5th Cir. 1996) (crediting defendants' expert testimony that "a serious candidate must raise and expend considerable sums of money for his campaign" and that "the failure to do so renders the candidate non-serious and non-viable" and noting that plaintiffs' concession that "several minority candidates who lost were not 'serious' candidates either because they spent little money or were not supported by the minority community").

499. Blaine County Litig. (MT), discussion at 363 F.3d 897, 900, 914 (9th Cir. 2004) (noting that "no American Indian was ever elected to the Blaine County Commission under the at-large voting system" and also noting evidence "demonstrat[ing] that there is a pool of qualified American Indian candidates [who] also testified that they were currently unwilling to run for County Commissioner because white bloc voting made it impossible for an American Indian to succeed in an at-large election"); Gretna Litig., discussion at 636 F. Supp. 1113, 1122 (E.D. La. 1986) (commenting that "despite the strong candidacies of two qualified blacks on three separate occasions, no black has ever won an aldermanic election" and concluding that "[t]his evidence can be interpreted only as strong evidence of dilution").

500. See Bridgeport Litig., Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19741, 1993 WL 742750 (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993); 26 F.3d 271 (2d Cir. 1994) (noting that a black candidate won the mayoral primary, that an "influential" group called the Democratic Town Committee failed to endorse him, and that the candidate lost the general election in an overwhelmingly Democratic city).

501. Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004), Charleston County, 365 F.3d 341 (4th Cir. 2004), Valladolid Litig. (CA), 976 F.2d 1293 (9th Cir. 1992); Romero Litig. (CA), 883 F.2d 1418 (9th Cir. 1989), Sanchez Bond Litig. (CO), 875 F.2d 1488 (10th Cir. 1989), Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), 116 F.3d 685 (3d Cir. 1997), County of Big Horn Litig., 647 F. Supp. 1002 (D. Mont. 1986).

502. Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), 180 F.3d 476 (2d Cir. 1999); Cincinnati Litig., 40 F.3d 807 (6th Cir. 1994); Collins Litig. (VA), 883 F.3d 1232 (4th Cir. 1989); Collins Litig. (VA), 883 F.3d 1232 (4th Cir. 1989); Campos v. Baytown Litig. (TX), 840 F.2d 1540 (5th Cir. 1988); Rocha Litig., No. V-79-26, 1982 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15164 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 23, 1982).

503. Cincinnati Litig. (OH), discussion at 40 F.3d 807, 812 (6th Cir. 1994) (quoting Smith v. Clinton.).

504. Id.

505. See, e.g., Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1022 (2d Cir. 1995) (describing Kimble, a candidate who "failed by only six votes to win one of the available nominations in the 1987 Democratic Party primary for the City Council. To be sure, Kimble only placed sixth in a contest of nine, and she received the least white-voter support of all the candidates. Nevertheless, she received more white-voter support than any other black candidate had before, and the crossover vote was nearly enough to secure a seat."); Bond Litig. (CO), discussion at 875 F.2d 1488, 1492-93 (10th Cir. 1989) (basing the conclusion that "Hispanics have the ability to elect commissioners under the at-large system currently in use in the county" in part on finding that "in two recent elections in which Hispanics had run for the county commission, the Hispanic candidate had lost by only 53 votes in one race and by 22 votes in the other."); Pomona Litig., discussion at 665 F. Supp. 853, 861 (C.D. Cal. 1987) (noting that although "no black has been elected to the Pomona City Council, in 1983 black candidate Willie White, despite the small size and dispersion of the black community in Pomona, lost by only 71 votes. His near miss, which could not have been achieved without substantial white cross-over support, demonstrates the potential electability of black candidates").

506. Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d at 278-79 & n 14 (noting that in the 1997 and 2000 elections, the minority candidates at issue received only 7% and 2.8% of the non-white vote).

507. See Johnson v. De Grandy 512 U.S. 997, 1020 (1994) (internal citation omitted).

508. See, e.g., City of Cleveland Litig., 297 F. Supp. 2d 901, 908 (N.D. Miss. 2004) (finding no violation of Section 2 where, "while the three minority candidates in the above-denoted races lost, the record demonstrates that African-American candidates in many other City and county wide elections have prevailed. Three of the City's current aldermen, two of the at-large members on the City School Board, the Superintendent of the School Board, the Circuit Clerk, a Circuit Court Judge, a County Court Judge, and a majority of the County Election Commission are African-American, thus demonstrating that minority candidates are fully capable of winning City and county-wide elections, and that the City's minority citizens can fully participate in the political process"); NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), discussion at 252 F.3d 361, 371 (5th Cir. 2001) (noting that minority candidate "Antwinette McCrary ('McCrary') won an at-large council position in the City of Quitman, a town with a 26.88% black voting age population" and concluding that "absent any other countervailing evidence in the record, we cannot say that [the court below] erred by relying on these elections to ultimately conclude that the electoral success of African-Americans in Mississippi militates against a finding of vote dilution"); City of Niagara Falls, discussion at 913 F. Supp. 722, 748-49 (W.D.N.Y 1994) (noting, in lawsuit finding neither Factor 7 met nor a violation of Section 2, that "African Americans have been elected to the Niagara Falls Board of Education in significant numbers . . . Elections to the Board are at-large and are non-partisan"); Stockton Litig. (CA), discussion at 956 F.2d 884, 891 (9th Cir. 1992) (noting that "[t]he statistical data before the district court reflected that while in past elections minorities had been elected, those elected were for the most part not elected by minorities. Of the three black representatives in office at the time Measure C was adopted, two were elected from districts that were overwhelmingly (more than 70 percent) white. Prior to 1971, when an at-large system was in effect, [H]ispanics had been elected by white majorities, further indicating that the minority representation before Measure C existed because whites voted for minorities"); City of Boston Litig. (MA), discussion at 784 F.2d 409 (1st Cir. 1986) (finding that "the success of minority candidates and the influence of minority voters were not confined to the two districts having Black majorities," noting that "[t]wo Blacks were chosen by the City as a whole to be at-large members of the School Committee").

509. See, e.g., Texarkana Litig., discussion at 861 F. Supp. 756, 764 (W.D. Ark. 1992) (concluding that the successful black candidate's "experiences do not support the notion that minority voters have the ability to elect representatives of their choice in at-large elections in Texarkana" where "[h]e has had the advantages of appointment and incumbency and the lack of a white opponent"); Columbus County Litig., 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1102 (E.D.N.C. 1991) (noting that in "three of the four elections in which the black candidate won, he was an incumbent, and in two of the four elections the black candidate had no white opponent" and that "[o]nly once, in 1980, has a non-incumbent black beaten a white opponent"); Clark Litig., discussion at 725 F. Supp. 285, 299 (M.D. La. 1988) (finding factor met and noting that "[i]n the case of Judge Collins, there were special circumstances because he was first appointed to a vacancy and then elected as an incumbent in 1978 in an election in which he had no opposition"); Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 347-48 (N.D. Tex. 1983) (finding that "a disproportionately low number of blacks have been elected as Terrell officials," that black official first appointed to the city council "now runs from an essentially all black residency district, and has never had a white opponent," and that "[t]here has never been more than one black representative on the five member city council").

510. See, e.g., City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1384 n.18 (11th Cir. 1997).

511. SENATE REPORT at 19 n.116.

512. See Master Lawsuit List.

513. One of these found a likelihood of success on the merits and granted a preliminary injunction, see Bridgeport Litig., Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19741 (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993), and another found a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, and did not reach the merits of the Section 2 claim. See Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N. D. Tex. 1983). In addition, in one lawsuit, the appellate court reversed as clearly erroneous the district court's finding that plaintiffs failed to show a lack of responsiveness. See Marengo County Litig. (AL), 731 F.2d 1546, 1572 (11th Cir. 1984). Four appellate courts remanded cases for more particularized findings on responsiveness. See City of Chicago-Bonilla Litig. (IL), 141 F.3d 699, 703 (7th Cir. 1998); Westwego Litig. (LA), 872 F.2d 1201 (5th Cir. 1989); Liberty County Commissioners Litig. (FL), 865 F.2d 1566, 1582 (11th Cir. 1988); City of Norfolk Litig. (VA), 816 F.2d 932, 939 (4th Cir. 1987). Nine appellate courts criticized district court findings of affirmative responsiveness, finding that the lower court either gave the factor too much weight in the totality of the circumstances review or did not properly account for evidence that would weigh in finding unresponsiveness. See Calhoun County Litig. (MS), 88 F.3d 1393, 1400 (5th Cir. 1996); City of Chicago-Bonilla Litig. (IL), 141 F.3d 699, 703 (7th Cir. 1998); Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), 71 F.3d 1382, 1390 (8th Cir. 1995); Westwego Litig. (LA), 872 F.2d 1201 (5th Cir. 1989); Carrollton NAACP Litig. (GA), 829 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987); City of Norfolk Litig. (VA), 816 F.2d 932, 939 (4th Cir. 1987);

Sisseton Independent School District Litig. (SD), 804 F.2d 469, 477 (8th Cir. 1986); Escambia County Litig. (FL), 748 F.2d 1037, 1045 (5th Cir. 1984); Lubbock Litig. (TX), 727 F.2d 364, 381 (5th Cir. 1984).

514. Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 313 (D. Mass. 2004); Albany County Litig., discussion at No. 03-CV-502, 2003 WL 21524820, at *13 (N.D.N.Y. July 7, 2003) (magistrate opinion); Charleston County Litig., 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 297 (D.S.C. 2003); St. Bernard Parish School Board Litig., No. CIV.A. 02-2209, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16540, at *27 (E.D. La. Aug. 26, 2002); Cousin Litig. (TN), 209 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 2000); City of Chicago-Bonilla Litig. (IL), 141 F.3d 699, 703 (7th Cir. 1998); City of Lagrange Litig., 969 F. Supp. 749, 770 (N.D. GA 1997); Chickasaw County II Litig., Civ. No. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997); Calhoun County Litig. (MS), 88 F.3d 1393, 1400 (5th Cir. 1996); Blytheville School District Litig. (AR), 71 F.3d 1382 (8th Cir. 1995); LULAC - North East I.S.D. Litig., 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1087 (W.D. Texas 1995); Texarkana Litig., 861 F. Supp. 756, 765 (W.D. Ark. 1992); Westwego Litig. (LA), 946 F.2d 1109, 1122 (5th Cir. 1991); County Litig., 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990); Jeffers Litig., 730 F. Supp. 196, 213 (E.D. Ark. 1989); Chattanooga Litig., 722 F. Supp. 380 (E.D. Tenn. 1989); Baytown Litig. (TX), 840 F.2d 1240, 1250-51 (5th Cir. 1988); Watsonville Litig. (CA), 863 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1988); Monroe Smith-Crittenden County Litig., 687 F. Supp. 1310, 1318 (E.D. Ark. 1988); Kirksey v. Allain Litig., 658 F. Supp. 1183 (S.D. Miss. 1987); City of Springfield Litig., 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1032 (C.D. Ill. 1987); Sisseton I.S.D. Litig. (SD), 804 F.2d 469, 477 (8th Cir. 1986); Edgefield County Litig., 650 F. Supp. 1176, 1204 (D.S.C. 1986); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., 647 F. Supp. 1002, 1020 (D. Mont. 1986); McCarty Litig. (TX), 749 F.2d 1134, 1137 (5th Cir. 1984); Ketchum Litig. (IL), 740 F.2d 1398, 1405 (7th Cir. 1984); Lubbock (TX), 727 F.2d 364, 381 (5th Cir. 1984); El Paso I.S.D. Litig., 591 F. Supp. 802, 811 (W.D. Tex. 1984); City of Greenwood Litig., 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss 1984); Rybicki Litig., 574 F. Supp. 1147, 1151 (E.D. Ill. 1983); Rocha Litig., No. V-79-26, 1982 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15164, at *18 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 23, 1982).

515. Charleston County Litig., discussion at 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 297 (D.S.C. 2003) ("Although the Court received evidence on both factors, the United States has not put them at issue....The Court has considered all of the evidence related to the factors of tenuousness and responsiveness and finds that they do not materially contribute to the Court's conclusion.); Suffolk County Litig., discussion at 268 F. Supp. 2d 243, 266 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) ("The plaintiffs' only evidence is that the Committee of Reapportionment for the Suffolk County Legislature and the Legislature did not respond to the PRLDEF's letters and proposed Latino redistricting plan. This alone, does not show a significant lack of responsiveness. As such, this factor is neutral at best."); Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1170 (D. Colo. 1998) (discussing evidence including the use of federal funds to implement programs that will be responsive to Indian student needs, though noting these programs have not been wholly successful, and considering the school board's negative response to an Indian community attempt to get bilingual and Native American education programs but not concluding whether the body was responsive); City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997) ("The significant lack of responsiveness of Holyoke officials to the needs of the Hispanic community, the eighth factor, was evidenced in the 1980's and is significantly diminishing in the 1990's, if not disappearing."); Rural West I Litig., discussion at 836 F. Supp. 453, 463 (W.D. Tenn. 1993) (characterizing evidence as "equivocal. We do not, therefore, place much weight upon this factor."); Kent County Litig., discussion at 790 F. Supp. 738 (W.D. Mich. 1992) (noting evidence "raises serious concerns" about responsiveness but making no finding); City of Springfield, discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1032 (C.D. Ill. 1987) (considering testimony of county board member that he has difficulty getting city officials to listen to him regarding minority needs but making no finding because responsiveness is a "peripheral issue"); Chickasaw County I Litig., discussion at 705 F. Supp. 315, 321 (N.D. Miss. 1989) ("The only area in which plaintiffs have demonstrated a lack of responsiveness is in the employment of blacks in non-elected official positions in county and municipal government. The parties could point to only one black person employed in the government in Chickasaw County, outside of an elected or appointed public office; one black person was hired in 1988 in the tax assessor's office...Of those factors which plaintiffs have failed to prove, none weighs strongly against the plaintiffs' case...A general history of responsiveness, if established, would fail to rebut the evidence of a Section 2 violation...A benevolent monarchy would be nonetheless non-democratic."); Carrollton NAACP Litig. (GA), discussion at 829 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987) (remanding to the district court noting that "the lack of black teachers in the Carroll County school system was a factor bearing on unresponsiveness, and that this had caused the court deep concern, but, the court nonetheless ruled that the plaintiffs did not prove what steps defendants should have undertaken to increase the number of qualified black teachers. We do not understand that the plaintiffs must carry as part of their burden, establishing what measures the county should have taken to correct alleged unresponsiveness by school administrators."); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., discussion at 647 F. Supp. 1002, 1020 (D. Mont. 1986) (finding officials were "without a doubt" more responsive to the Indian community than before the institution of the lawsuit, but noting that courts were often skeptical of steps taken during litigation); City of Boston Litig., discussion at 609 F. Supp. 739, 748 (D. Mass. 1985) (noting "the parties offered conflicting evidence concerning the extent to which Boston's government has attempted to alleviate minority problems" but also noting the factor only has "marginal significance"); Escambia County Litig. (FL), discussion at 748 F.2d 1037, 1045 (5th Cir. 1984) (Circuit noted that responsiveness was less important under Section 2 and stated "Although the court found that the commissioners had generally been responsive to the interests of black citizens, it noted two areas in which they had not: appointments of blacks to committees or boards and housing policy."); Haywood County Litig., discussion at 544 F. Supp. 1122 (W.D. Tenn. 1982) (crediting expert testimony which notes racial bloc voting may create a less responsive governing body but does not make a finding).

516. The lawsuits in covered jurisdictions were Marengo County Litig. (AL), 731 F.2d 1546, 1572 (11th Cir. 1984); Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1043 (D.S.D. 2004); City of Dallas Litig., 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1406 (N.D. Tex 1990); Baldwin Board of Education Litig., 686 F. Supp. 1459, 1467 (M.D. Ala. 1988); Operation Push Litig., 674 F. Supp. 1245, 1265 (N.D. Miss. 1987); Terrell Litig., 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N.D. Tex. 1983); Rocha Litig., No. V-79-261982 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15164, at *18 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 23, 1982); Mobile School Board Litig., 542 F. Supp. 1078 (S.D. Ala. 1982). The other lawsuits that found a significant lack of responsiveness were Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), 180 F.3d 476, 487 (2d Cir.

1999); Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), 116 F.3d 685, 698 (3rd Cir. 1997); City of Holyoke Litig., 880 F. Supp. 911, 927 (D. Mass. 1995); Bridgeport Litig., Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19741 (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993); City of Philadelphia Litig., 824 F. Supp. 514, 538 (E.D. Penn. 1993); Metro Dade County, 805 F. Supp. 967, 987 (S.D. Fla. 1992); Columbus County Litig., 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991); Armour Litig., 775 F. Supp. 1044, 1058 (N.D. Ohio 1991); City of Starke Litig., 712 F. Supp. 1523, 1538 (M.D. Fla. 1989); Mehfoud Litig., 702 F. Supp. 588, 595 (E.D. Va. 1988); City of Jackson Litig., 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1535 (W.D. Tenn. 1988).

517. See Master Lawsuit List.

518. Exceptions to this include Holder v. Hall Litig. (GA), discussion at 117 F.3d 1222, 1227 (11th Cir. 1997) ("An official is responsive if he/she ensures that minorities are not excluded from municipal posts, evenhandedly allocates municipal services, and addresses minority complaints.") and Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1023 (2d Cir. 1995) ("The "responsiveness" inquiry here involves review of tangible efforts of elected officials and the impact of these efforts on particular members of the community.").

519. Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 116 F.3d 685, 698 (3d Cir. 1997); Town of Hempstead Litig. (AL), discussion at 956 F. Supp. 326, 344 (E.D.N.Y. 1997); City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 538 (E.D. Penn. 1993); Bridgeport Litig., discussion at Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19741, (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993); City of Jackson, TN Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1535 (W.D. Tenn 1988); Baldwin Board of Education Litig., discussion at 686 F. Supp. 1459, 1467 (M.D. Ala. 1988); Marengo County Litig. (AL), discussion at 731 F.2d 1546, 1572 (11th Cir. 1984); Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N.D. Tex. 1983); Mobile School Board Litig., discussion at 542 F. Supp. 1078 (S.D. Ala. 1982); Cf. City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997); Kent County Litig., discussion at 790 F. Supp. 738 (W.D. Mich. 1992) (noting that "serious concerns about responsiveness" raised by districting plan that heavily concentrated minority population into a single district and left them with little voice in others but making no express finding on factor 8); Carrollton NAACP Litig. (GA), discussion at 829 F.2d 1547, 1561 (11th Cir. 1987) ("[T]he lack of black teachers in the Carroll County school system was a factor bearing on unresponsiveness."); But see Fort Bend Independent School District Litig. (TX), discussion at 89 F.3d 1205 (5th Cir. 1996) (achieving unitary status weighs in favor of responsiveness); LULAC – North East I.S.D. Litig., discussion at 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1087 (W.D. Texas 1995) (flying a confederate flag and naming a school after an alleged racist does not prove lack of responsiveness); Monroe County Litig., discussion at 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990) (switching voluntarily to randomized jury roles evidences responsiveness); Dallas County Commission Litig., discussion at 548 F. Supp. 794 (S.D. Ala. 1982) (considering improvements made after judgment against the town in segregation lawsuit to be evidence of responsiveness); Cf. infra note 531 (consent decrees do not establish a significant lack of responsiveness).

520. See, e.g, Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 487 (2d Cir. 1999) (considering employment discrimination judgment entered against the town); Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 116 F.3d 685, 698 (3rd Cir. 1997) (noting seven years to comply with desegregation order); Bridgeport Litig.,

Discussion at Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19741, at * 16-17 (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993) (citing judgments in school desegregation and fire department employment lawsuits as showing a "disservice to minority interests."); City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 538 (E.D. Penn. 1993) (taking judicial notice of a judgment for plaintiff Latinos in an unlawful arrest lawsuit); Baldwin Board of Education Litig., 686 F. Supp. 1459, 1467 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (finding "[T]he Baldwin County Board of Education has been particularly unresponsive to the black citizens' concern about race relations in the county's schools, in particular concerns arising out of school desegregation and the apparent resulting displacement of black administrators."); Mobile School Board Litig., discussion at 542 F. Supp. 1078, 1095 (S.D. Ala. 1982) (readopting earlier findings that "as recently as 1970, another judge of this court was forced to threaten members of the Board of School Commissioners of Mobile County with $ 1,000 per day contempt fines for their refusal to comply with orders to desegregate the public schools."). But cf. Dallas County Board of Education Litig. (AL), discussion at 739 F.2d 1529, 1540 (11th Cir. 1984) (holding evidence of both a desegregation and a faculty hiring lawsuit not sufficient on record before appellate court to render district court's finding of responsiveness clearly erroneous); City of Greenwood Litig., discussion at 599 F. Supp. 397, 403 (N.D. Miss 1984) (considering a violation of Section 5 of the VRA to weigh against finding responsiveness, but did not suffice to establish factor eight).

521. See, e.g., Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), discussion at 116 F.3d 685, 698 (3d Cir. 1997) (noting that despite a school desegregation plan one year after an adverse judgment, the town board took seven years to desegregate its schools, and then desegregated in the same year the state board of education insisted the racial composition to be corrected); Mobile School Board Litig., discussion at 542 F. Supp. 1078 (S.D. Ala. 1982) (considering that the School Board has only acted in response to numerous restraining and injunctive orders throughout more than a decade).

522. See, e.g., City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 538 (E.D. Penn. 1993) (considering testimony of a former mayor and a city councilmen that the police and fire department discriminates against minorities); City of Jackson, (TN) Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1535 (W.D. Tenn 1988) ("The fact that ninety-one of 103 inadequate streets in 1978 were located in black neighborhoods, the fact that in 1955 and prior thereto the City of Jackson employed no black supervisors, black policemen, or black firemen, and the fact that no black has ever been appointed as head of any department make it painfully obvious that the City Commission has not always been responsive to the needs of black citizens."); Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N. D. Tex. 1983) (finding a law that disproportionately affects African-American neighborhoods in street paving decisions establishes a significant lack of responsiveness); cf. Sisseton Independent School District Litig. (SD), discussion at 804 F.2d 469, 477 (8th Cir. 1986) (remanding to district court for particularized findings on evidence of disproportionately low employment of minority teachers, failure to appoint minority voting registrars or establish polling places despite minority requests). But see Fort Bend Independent School District Litig. (TX), discussion at 89 F.3d 1205, 1209 (5th Cir. 1996) (citing anecdotal testimony of disparate treatment insufficient to show unresponsiveness).

523. See, e.g., Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 487 (2d Cir. 1999) (noting placement of Ku Klux Klan insignia in town's fire department); But see LULAC - North East I.S.D. Litig., discussion at 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1087 (W.D. Texas 1995) (discounting plaintiff's assertions that a school athletic center had been named after a racist and that the Confederate flag was flown at the high school until 1993 because minority community did not bring these complaints to the attention of the board).

524. See, e.g., Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1170 (D. Colo. 1998) (discussing evidence only in terms of the School Board and efforts made by it in evaluating whether there was a significant lack of responsiveness); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339, 366 (S.D. Cal. 1995) (considering evidence regarding school policies in evaluating the responsiveness of defendant school district); Sisseton Independent School District Litig. (SD), discussion at 804 F.2d 469, 477 (8th Cir. 1986) (considering only evidence about the school system and school board in responsiveness inquiry); Dallas County Commission Litig. (AL), discussion at 739 F.2d 1529 (5th Cir. 1984) (noting the responsiveness inquiry rests on different evidence for the County Commission and for the School Board); See also Liberty County Commissioners Litig., discussion at 957 F. Supp. 1522, 1566 (N.D. Fla. 1997) (considering evidence of school board and county commission separately).

525. See, e.g., Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1043 (D.S.D. 2004) (looking at a wide range of issues in considering whether the state legislature was responsive including legislation about gaming, racial profiling, and legislation regarding negotiations between the state and the reservations); Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1023 (2d Cir. 1995) (discussing a wide range of evidence in determining responsiveness including hiring practices by the city, a school integration program, seeking grants for increased community policing in the city, and the adoption of a fair housing law in determining whether the city was responsive.); City of Austin Litig. (TX), discussion at 871 F.2d 529, 534 (5th Cir. 1989) (discussing evidence regarding the number of parks in minority areas, mortgage loans to low-income families, shelter operations, job training, and medical services in making a responsiveness determination.); Baytown Litig., discussion at 696 F. Supp. 1128 (S.D. Tex. 1987) (considering evidence in the areas of employment, appointments to boards and commissions, housing rehabilitation, streets and drainage improvements).

526. See e.g., Hamrick Litig., discussion at 155 F. Supp. 2d 1355, 1378 (N.D. Ga. 2001) ("Significantly, the city manager also testified that Gainesville's attorneys had advised the city that it lacked the power to issue a moratorium on new industry which may contribute to the environmental concerns of Ward 3 residents, and that certain of these areas were both geographically and legally beyond the scope of city control."); Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 213 (E.D. Ark. 1989) (discounting evidence regarding poor quality roads in minority areas because the state legislature did not have jurisdiction over this issue).

527. Alamosa County Litig., discussion at 306 F. Supp. 2d 1016 (D. Colo. 2004); NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), discussion at 252 F.3d 361 (5th Cir. 2001); Hamrick Litig., discussion at 155 F. Supp. 2d 1355, 1378 (N.D. Ga. 2001); City of LaGrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 770 (N.D. Ga. 1997); Holder v. Hall Litig. (GA), discussion at 117 F.3d 1222, 1227 (11th Cir. 1997); Harris v. Houston Litig.,

discussion at 10 F. Supp. 2d 721, 726 (S.D. Tex. 1997); Texarkana Litig., discussion at 861 F. Supp. 756, 765 (W.D. Ark. 1992); Westwego Litig., discussion at 1989 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7298, at *14 (E.D. La. 1989); City of Woodville Litig. (MS), discussion at 881 F.2d 1327, 1335 (5th Cir. 1989); Chickasaw County I Litig., discussion at 705 F. Supp. 315, 321 (N.D. Miss. 1989); City of Starke Litig., discussion at 712 F. Supp. 1523, 1538 (M.D. Fla. 1989); Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 213 (E.D. Ark. 1989); City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 679 F. Supp. 557, 585 (E.D. Va. 1988); City of Woodville Litig., discussion at 688 F. Supp. 255, 257 (S.D. Miss. 1988); Houston v. Haley Litig. (MS), discussion at 859 F.2d 341, 347 (5th Cir. 1988); Baytown Litig. (TX), discussion at 840 F.2d 1240, 1250-51 (5th Cir. 1988); Pomona Litig., discussion at 665 F. Supp. 853, 862 (C.D. Cal. 1987); City of Fort Lauderdale Litig., discussion at 617 F. Supp. 1093, 1107 (S.D. Fla. 1985); City of Austin Litig., discussion at CIV. No. A-84-CA-189, 1985 WL 19986, at *12 (W.D. Texas Mar. 12, 1985); Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., discussion at 579 F. Supp. 1504, 1512 (N.D. Ala. 1984); Escambia County Litig. (FL), discussion at 748 F.2d 1037, 1045 (5th Cir. 1984); Dallas County Board of Education (AL), 739 F.2d 1529, 1540 (11th Cir. 1984); Opelika Litig. (AL), discussion at 748 F.2d 1473, 1476 (11th Cir. 1984); Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N. D. Tex. 1983); City of Greenwood Litig., discussion at 534 F. Supp. 1351 (N.D. Miss. 1982); see also Calhoun County Litig., discussion at 813 F. Supp. 1189, 1201 (N.D. Miss. 1993) (criticizing district court on this point but letting finding stand as not clearly erroneous); infra note 537 (nondiscrimination in the context of judicial elections); cf. Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., discussion at 579 F. Supp. 1504, 1512 (N.D. Ala. 1984) ("Evidence shows that the city had spent an appropriate amount of resources on the African American neighborhoods in Jasper.").

528. See, e.g., Holder v. Hall Litig. (GA), discussion at 117 F.3d 1222, 1227 (11th Cir. 1997) (stating "municipal services are not allocated in a race based fashion"); Houston v. Haley Litig. (MS), discussion at 859 F.2d 341, 347 (5th Cir. 1988) (noting city services are available to everyone regardless of race); City of Woodville Litig., discussion at 688 F. Supp. 255, 257 (S.D. Miss. 1988) (considering services "are provided equally"); Pomona Litig., discussion at 665 F. Supp. 853, 862, 868 (C.D. Cal. 1987) (citing testimony that city "makes every effort to provide services equally to all citizens, regardless of race, color or creed").

529. See, e.g., Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., discussion at 579 F. Supp. 1504, 1512 (N.D. Ala. 1984) ("Evidence shows that the city had spent an appropriate amount of resources on the African American neighborhoods in Jasper"); Chickasaw County II Litig., No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997) (Responsiveness finding based in part on testimony of Supervisor John Moore that at least half of the roads paved in the last five years have been in predominantly black areas); Dallas County Board of Education Litig. (AL), discussion at 739 F.2d 1529, 1540 (11th Cir. 1984) (Found responsiveness in part because the "roads have been maintained on a non-discriminatory basis"); Hamrick Litig., discussion at 155 F. Supp. 2d 1355, 1378 (N.D. GA. 2001) (finding responsiveness based on city manager testimony that numerous programs which the city has adopted which directly benefit the black community, including a road repaving project); see also Calhoun County Litig. (MS), discussion at 88 F.3d 1393, 1400 (5th Cir. 1996) (discussing equality in road paving but noting that current equality may not be afforded much weight under totality of the circumstances when there is a history of discrimination in road paving).

530. See, e.g., Fort Bend Independent School District Litig. (TX), discussion at 89 F.3d 1205 (5th Cir. 1996) (defendant's evidence of achieving unitary status characterized responsiveness); cf. Dallas County Board of Education Litig. (AL), discussion at 739 F.2d 1529, 1540 (11th Cir. 1984) (declining to review district courts finding of responsiveness based on improvements made in a lawsuit involving school desegregation and faculty hiring because record not included on appeal); see also cases considering consent decree note, see infra note 531.

531. See, e.g., Cincinnati Litig., discussion at No. C-1-92-278, 1993 U.S. Dist LEXIS 21009, at *36 (S.D. Ohio July 8, 1993) (taking notice of four consent decrees Cincinnati has entered into: the Cincinnati Metropolitan Housing Authority had entered into a consent decree that it had provided housing on a discriminatory basis prior to 1984, the Cincinnati Police Division operates under two consent decrees regarding racial discrimination lawsuits, and the Cincinnati Fire Department also operates under a consent decree stemming from a racial discrimination lawsuit. The court does not fault Cincinnati "for resorting to the Courts to settle disputes. This pattern of behavior on the part of the City to settle these lawsuits constitutes significant responsiveness to the issues of concern to the African American community."); Houston v. Haley Litig., discussion at 663 F. Supp. 346, 355 (N.D. Miss. 1987) (finding responsiveness in part on the provision of city services, noting the city was under a consent decree to pave certain roads, provide parks in black areas, and construct a swimming pool but noting the city manager testified the projects "were not entirely the result of the lawsuit"); City of Fort Lauderdale Litig., discussion at 617 F. Supp. 1093, 1107 (S.D. Fla. 1985) (considering the city responsive in part due to recruitment efforts for minority police and fire departments, despite its efforts being in part to a consent decree that mandated the city try to hire 11.25% minorities); City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 605 F. Supp. 377, 394 (E.D. Va. 1984) (although city's hiring of police and firefighters was controlled by a consent decree, the city's efforts weighed in favor of responsiveness); Dallas County Board of Education Litig., discussion at 548 F. Supp. 794, 821 (S.D. Ala. 1982) (finding a school desegregation case where County entered into a consent decree and then, after the Department of Justice sought to have the decree judicially enforced, the county entered into a new consent decree "affirmatively shows, and the Court therefore finds, that the School Board's operation of the transportation system has been fair, without discrimination, and responsive to the needs of all students, both black and white.").

532. Monroe County Litig., 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990).

533. Operation Push Litig., discussion at 674 F. Supp. 1245, 1265 (N.D. Miss. 1987) (finding unresponsiveness where officials did not conduct precinct registration, or appoint deputy registrars because it demonstrated a failure by the state to act to overcome past discrimination); Citizen Action Litig., discussion at Civ. No. N 84-431, 1984 U.S. Dist. Lexis 24869 (D. Conn. Sept. 27, 1984) (finding unresponsiveness because officials "have failed to utilize any of the available tools to increase registration."); Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338 (N. D. Tex. 1983) (finding unresponsiveness based partially on evidence of a history of unequal funding of white and black cemeteries, despite current equality of funding); see also Calhoun County Litig. (MS), 88 F.3d 1393, 1400 (5th Cir. 1996) (criticizing district court finding of current non-discrimination in road pavement shows responsiveness when there is a past history of discrimination nevertheless affirming as not clearly erroneous).

534. See e.g., Red Clay School District Litig., Civ. A. No. 89-230-LON, 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4747 (D. Del. Apr. 10, 1996) (evidence that the school board took more than seven years to desegregate showed unresponsiveness); Bridgeport Litig., Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19741 (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993) (evidence of lawsuits against the town established lack of responsiveness); Mobile School Board Litig., 542 F. Supp. 1078, 1106 (S.D. Ala. 1982) (readopting earlier findings that school board only reacted to numerous restraining and injunctive orders by the court in a desegregation lawsuit); Cf. Baldwin Board of Education Litig., discussion at 686 F. Supp. 1459, 1467 (M.D. Ala. 1988) ("The Baldwin County Board of Education has been particularly unresponsive to the black citizens' concern about race relations in the county's schools, in particular concerns arising out of school desegregation and the apparent resulting displacement of black administrators."); see also supra note 531. (discussing evidence of consent decrees). Also, courts generally discount evidence of responsiveness that occurs under either the threat of withdrawal of funds or legal compulsion. See infra note 556.

535. Red Clay School District Litig., Civ. A. No. 89-230-LON, 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4747 (D. Del. Apr. 10, 1996); Monroe County Litig., discussion at 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990).

536. Cousin Litig. (TN), discussion at 145 F.3d 818, 833 (6th Cir. 1998); Mallory-Ohio Litig., 38 F. Supp. 2d 525, 543 (S.D. Ohio 1997); Bradley v. Work, 916 F. Supp 1446, 1467 (S.D. Ind. 1996); Milwaukee NAACP Litig., discussion at 935 F. Supp. 1419, 1433 (E.D. Wis. 1996); Lulac v. Clements Litig., discussion at 999 F.2d 831, 857-58 (5th Cir. 1993); Magnolia Bar Ass'n v. Lee, 793 F. Supp. 1386, 1410 (S.D. Miss. 1992); Kirksey v. Allain Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1183, 1195 (S.D. Miss. 1987); Chisom Litig., discussion at CIV. A. No. 86-4057, 1989 WL 106485, at *11 (E.D. La. Sept. 19, 1989). Some jurisdictions claimed to have crafted their systems for electing judges expressly to prevent judges from being too responsive, and they cited this goal to defend these systems from challenge under Section 2.

537. Cousin Litig., discussion at 145 F.3d 818, 833 (6th Cir. 1998); Mallory-Ohio Litig., discussion at 38 F. Supp. 2d 525, 543 (S. Ohio 1997); Bradley v. Work Litig., discussion at 916 F. Supp 1446, 1467 (S.D. Ind. 1996); Milwaukee NAACP Litig., discussion at 935 F. Supp. 1419, 1433 (E.D. Wis. 1996); See also Nipper Litig. (FL), discussion at 39 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (holding that responsiveness is less important in the context of judicial elections but not resolving whether factor 8 was met).

538. Mallory-Ohio Litig., discussion at 38 F. Supp. 2d 525, 543-44 (S. Ohio 1997); Milwaukee NAACP Litig., discussion at 935 F. Supp. 1419, 1433 (E.D. Wis. 1996); Southern Christian Leadership Litig. (AL), discussion at 56 F.3d 1281, 1295 (11th Cir. 1995) (en banc); see also Kirksey v. Allain Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1183, 1195 (S.D. Miss. 1987) (discounting idea that more minority judges would improve the minority community's perception of the judicial system).

539. Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1043 (D.S.D. 2004); France Litig., discussion at 71 F. Supp. 2d 317, 333 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1170 (D. Colo. 1998);

Rural West II Litig., discussion at 29 F. Supp. 2d 448, 459-60 (W.D. Tenn. 1998); Chickasaw County II Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 890 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Sanchez-Colorado Litig. (CO), discussion at 97 F.3d 1303, 1325 (10th Cir. 1996); Calhoun County Litig. (MS), discussion at 88 F.3d 1393, 1400 (5th Cir. 1996); Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1023 (2d Cir. 1995); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339, 366 (S.D. Cal. 1995); Rural West I Litig., discussion at 877 F. Supp. 1096 (W.D. Tenn. 1995); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 425 (D.S.C. 1993); Cincinnati Litig., discussion at No. C-1-92-278, 1993 U.S. Dist LEXIS 21009, at *36 (S.D. Ohio July 8, 1993); Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1406 (N.D. Tex 1990); City of Austin Litig. (NY), discussion at 871 F.2d 529, 534 (5th Cir. 1989); Monroe County Litig., discussion at 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990); City of Starke Litig., discussion at 712 F. Supp. 1523, 1538 (M.D. Fla. 1989); Operation Push Litig., discussion at 674 F. Supp. 1245, 1265 (N.D. Miss. 1987); Baytown Litig., discussion at 696 F. Supp. 1128 (S.D. Tex. 1987); Edgefield County Litig., discussion at 650 F. Supp. 1176, 1204 (D.S.C. 1986); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., discussion at 647 F. Supp. 1002, 1020 (D. Mont. 1986); Lubbock Litig. (TX), discussion at 727 F.2d 364, 381 (5th Cir. 1984); McCarty Litig. (FL), discussion at 749 F.2d 1134, 1137 (5th Cir. 1984); Dallas County Board of Education Litig. (AL), 739 F.2d 1529, 1540 (11th Cir. 1984); El Paso Independent School District Litig., discussion at 591 F. Supp. 802, 811 (W.D. Tex. 1984); Citizen Action Litig., discussion at Civ. No. N 84-431, 1984 U.S. Dist. Lexis 24869 (D. Conn. Sept. 27, 1984); Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N. D. Tex. 1983); Rocha Litig., discussion at No. V-79-26, 1982 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15164, at *18 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 23, 1982); Cf. City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 679 F. Supp. 557, 585 (E.D. Va. 1988) (finding on remand that a housing policy that displaced a disproportionate number of African-American families was "aimed at ensuring that public services were adequately provided" and "encouraging a higher quality of life, re-integrating the inner city area and providing more job opportunities;" that the new development racially inclusive, and thus that the policy was responsive.); Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., discussion at 579 F. Supp. 1504, 1512 (N.D. Ala. 1984) ("Evidence shows that the city had spent an appropriate amount of resources on the African American neighborhoods in Jasper. ").

540. Calhoun County Litig. (MS), discussion at 88 F.3d 1393, 1400 (5th Cir. 1996) ("[W]e offer no brightline here. We are content to note that paving roads left unpaved by years of discrimination and appointing a biracial redistricting commission do not reflect the comprehensive and systematic responsiveness to minority needs that is entitled to substantial weight in the totality of the circumstances"); City of Norfolk Litig. (VA), discussion at 816 F.2d 932, 939 (4th Cir. 1987) (remanding district court finding the East Ghent Housing policy was nondiscriminatory asking whether the policy was not responsive). Courts have also credited as responsive efforts to increase minority political participation. See infra note 577.

541. See, e.g., Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 487 (2d Cir. 1999); Bridgeport Litig., discussion at Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19741 (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993).

542. See, e.g., Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1023 (2nd Cir. 1995); El Paso Independent School District Litig., discussion at 591 F. Supp. 802, 811 (W.D. Tex. 1984); Cf. Lubbock Litig. (TX), discussion at 727 F.2d 364, 381 (5th Cir. 1984) (criticizing the district court's finding of responsiveness and noting the affirmative action policy has "increased the number of minorities in public employment, but not necessarily in the best positions.").

543. Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 487 (2d Cir. 1999); City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 538 (E.D. Penn. 1993); Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1406 (N.D. Tex 1990); City of Starke Litig., discussion at 712 F. Supp. 1523, 1538 (M.D. Fla. 1989); Chickasaw County I Litig., discussion at 705 F. Supp. 315, 321 (N.D. Miss. 1989) (considering only one black person employed in government, outside of an elected or appointed public office); City of Jackson, TN Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1535 (W.D. Tenn. 1988); Operation Push Litig., discussion at 674 F. Supp. 1245, 1265 (N.D. Miss. 1987); Carrollton NAACP Litig. (GA), discussion at 829 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987); Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N. D. Tex. 1983); Mobile School Board Litig., discussion at 542 F. Supp. 1078 (S.D. Ala. 1982); Cf. Escambia County Litig. (FL), discussion at 748 F.2d 1037, 1045 (11th Cir. 1984) (noting that "[A]lthough the court found that the commissioners had generally been responsive to the interests of black citizens, it noted two areas in which they had not: appointments of blacks to committees or boards and housing policy" but not resolving the question of responsiveness); But see LULAC-North East Independent School District Litig., discussion at 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1087 (W.D. Texas 1995) (considering failure to recruit minority teachers insufficient to show non-responsiveness); NAACP v. Fordice Litig. (MS), discussion at 252 F.3d 361 (5th Cir. 2001) (finding minorities making up less than 15% of entire Department of Transportation does not show unresponsiveness); City of Greenwood Litig., discussion at 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss 1984) (stating low percentage of minorities appointed to boards does not establish unresponsiveness).

544. See, e.g., Holder v. Hall Litig. (GA), discussion at 117 F.3d 1222, 1227 (11th Cir. 1997) (minorities hired); City of Chicago-Barnett Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 1359, 1450 (N.D. Ill. 1997) (minorities "hold important and influential positions of power within the City's government," including appointive positions); Niagara Falls Litig., discussion at 913 F. Supp. 722, 749 (W.D.N.Y. 1994) (established affirmative action task force); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 425 (D.S.C. 1993) (minorities "well represented" on boards); Calhoun County Litig., discussion at 813 F. Supp. 1189, 1201 (N.D. Miss. 1993) (minorities appointed); City of Austin Litig. (TX), discussion at 871 F.2d 529, 534 (5th Cir. 1989) (minorities hired and appointed); Houston v. Haley Litig. (MS), discussion at 859 F.2d 341, 347 (5th Cir. 1988) (minorities appointed); McCarty Litig. (TX), discussion at 749 F.2d 1134, 1137 (5th Cir. 1984) (recruitment attempts, minority appointments); City of Woodville Litig., discussion at 688 F. Supp. 255, 257 (S.D. Miss. 1988) (minorities appointed to commissions and hired as police officers); Houston v. Haley Litig., discussion at 663 F. Supp. 346 (N.D. Miss. 1987) (minority leadership on appointive boards); Baytown Litig., discussion at 696 F. Supp. 1128 (S.D. Tex. 1987) (minorities participate on boards and hired as city workers); Edgefield County Litig., discussion at 650 F. Supp. 1176, 1204 (D.S.C. 1986)

(minority teachers hired); County of Big Horn (Windy Boy) Litig., discussion at 647 F. Supp. 1002, 1020 (D. Mont. 1986) (minorities appointed); City of Fort Lauderdale Litig., discussion at 617 F. Supp. 1093, 1107 (S.D. Fla. 1985) ("intensive efforts" to hire minority police officers, even though under a consent decree); City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 605 F. Supp. 377, 394 (E.D. Va. 1984) (minorities hired and appointed); City of Greenwood Litig., discussion at 534 F. Supp. 1351 (N.D. Miss. 1982) (minority appointments).

545. Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1170 (D. Colo. 1998) (considering the lack of a bilingual education program despite minority requests, but not finding a lack of responsiveness); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339, 366 (S.D. Cal. 1995) ("Despite some deficiencies in the District's bilingual program in 1990-91, it is responsive today because it recruits teachers and while it has no bilingual stipend, it pays more than adjacent school districts that have a bilingual stipend); El Paso Independent School District Litig., discussion at 591 F. Supp. 802, 811 (W.D. Tex. 1984) (considering that El Paso County was a pioneer in bilingual education); Rybicki Litig., discussion at 574 F. Supp. 1082, 1122 (C.D. Ill. 1982) (noting the democratic party in Illinois "supported bilingual education, an issue of particular importance to Hispanics.") Cf. Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1170 (D. Colo. 1998) (considering the absence of a bilingual education program as evidence of unresponsiveness but making no finding).

546. See e.g., Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 313 (D. Mass. 2004); Hamrick Litig., discussion at 155 F. Supp. 2d 1355, 1378 (N.D. GA. 2001); Town of Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 487 (2d Cir. 1999); Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1170 (D. Colo. 1998); Rural West II Litig., discussion at 29 F. Supp. 2d 448, 459-60 (W.D. Tenn. 1998); Chickasaw County II Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997); City of LaGrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 770 (N.D. GA 1997); Liberty County Commissioners Litig., discussion at 957 F. Supp. 1522, 1566 (N.D. Fla. 1997); Holder v. Hall Litig. (GA), discussion at 117 F.3d 1222, 1227 (11th Cir. 1997); Calhoun County Litig. (MS), discussion at 88 F.3d 1393, 1400 (5th Cir. 1996); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 890 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., discussion at 922 F. Supp. 339, 366 (S.D. Cal. 1995); Niagara Falls Litig. (NY), discussion at 65 F.3d 1002, 1023 (2nd Cir. 1995); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 425 (D.S.C. 1993); City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 538 (E.D. Penn. 1993); Texarkana Litig., discussion at 861 F. Supp. 756, 765 (W.D. Ark. 1992); Monroe County Litig., discussion at 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1406 (N.D. Tex 1990); City of Starke Litig., discussion at 712 F. Supp. 1523, 1538 (M.D. Fla. 1989); Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 213 (E.D. Ark. 1989); Westwego Litig., discussion at CIV. A. NO. 84-5599, 1989 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7298, at *14 (E.D. La. June 28, 1989); City of Austin Litig. (TX), discussion at 871 F.2d 529, 534 (5th Cir. 1989); City of Woodville Litig.(MS), discussion at 881 F.2d 1327, 1335 (5th Cir. 1989); City of Norfolk Litig., discussion at 679 F. Supp. 557, 585 (E.D. Va. 1988); City of Jackson, TN Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1535 (W.D. Tenn 1988); Springfield Park District Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1032 (C.D. Ill. 1987); Baytown Litig., discussion at 696 F. Supp. 1128 (S.D. Tex. 1987); Pomona Litig., discussion at 665 F. Supp. 853, 862 (C.D. Cal. 1987); Houston v. Haley Litig. (MS), discussion at 859 F.2d 341, 347 (5th Cir. 1988); City of Fort Lauderdale Litig. (FL), discussion at 787 F.2d 1528, 1533 (11th Cir. 1986); Dallas County Board of Education Litig. (AL), discussion at 739 F.2d 1529, 1540 (11th Cir. 1984); Lubbock Litig. (TX), discussion at 727 F.2d 364, 381 (5th Cir. 1984); McCarty Litig. (TX), discussion at 749 F.2d 1134, 1137 (5th Cir. 1984); Escambia County Litig. (FL), discussion at 748 F.2d 1037, 1045 11th Cir. 1984); Opelika Litig. (AL), discussion at 748 F.2d 1473, 1476 (11th Cir. 1984); Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., discussion at 579 F. Supp. 1504, 1512 (N.D. Ala. 1984); City of Greenwood Litig., discussion at 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss 1984); El Paso Independent School District Litig., discussion at 591 F. Supp. 802, 811 (W.D. Tex. 1984); Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N. D. Tex. 1983); Rocha Litig., discussion at No. V-79-26, 1982 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15164, at *18 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 23, 1982).

547. See supra note 528.

548. See supra note 541.

549. See, e.g., Calhoun County Litig. (MS), discussion at 88 F.3d 1393, 1400 (5th Cir. 1996) ("We offer no bright line here. We are content to note that paving roads left unpaved by years of discrimination and appointing a biracial redistricting commission do not reflect the comprehensive and systematic responsiveness to minority needs that is entitled to substantial weight in the totality-of-circumstances inquiry."); City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1406 (N.D. Tex 1990) (finding while city's spending of equal resources "may be enough to defeat a claim of current racial discrimination in the allocation of resources, it certainly does not show responsiveness to the particularized needs of the minority community -- which would often require unequal and higher expenditures of City resources in minority areas to remedy the effects of past discrimination.); See also supra note 530 (discussing road paving policies).

550. See, e.g., Town of Hempstead Litig., discussion at 956 F. Supp. 326, 344 (E.D.N.Y. 1997); Columbus County Litig., discussion at 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991); But see City of LaGrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 770 (N.D. Ga. 1997) ("Several of Plaintiff's witnesses testified that the council had failed to address certain problems within the African-American community. However, these examples seemed to reflect the typical shortcomings of government entities rather than an institutional unresponsiveness to the minority community."); Texarkana Litig., discussion at 861 F. Supp. 756, 765 (W.D. Ark. 1992) ("In all of these issues...the Court believes the essential culprit is the same encountered by most cities in this country -- lack of sufficient money to address all of the city's problems."); Chapman v. Nicholson Litig., discussion at 579 F. Supp. 1504, 1512 (N.D. Ala. 1984) ("While there may be evidence of isolated incidents of specific requests not receiving immediate attention, said inattention appears more typical of a municipality being financially unable to immediately react to all its citizens' perceived needs, rather than being based on race.").

551. See, e.g., City of Philadelphia Litig., discussion at 824 F. Supp. 514, 538 (E.D. Penn. 1993); See also City of Jackson Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1535 (W.D. Tenn 1988) (historical evidence).

552. See, e.g., Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N. D. Tex. 1983); Rocha Litig., discussion at No. V-79-26, 1982 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15164, at *18 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 23, 1982).

553. See, e.g., Rural West II Litig., discussion at 29 F. Supp. 2d 448, 459-60 (W.D. Tenn. 1998) (considering representatives seeking appropriations for black constituents to illustrate, in part, their responsiveness); Chickasaw County II Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997) (asserting responsiveness to be shown when at least half of the roads paved in the past five years were in predominately minority areas); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 890 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (considering responsiveness shown in part by the fact that development funds are directed toward the minority community); Sanchez-Colorado Litig., discussion at 861 F. Supp. 1516 (D. Colo. 1994) (noting Representative Entz working in the state legislature to obtain funding for minority constituents); City of Columbia Litig., discussion at 850 F. Supp. 404, 425 (D.S.C. 1993) (stating a disproportionate amount of city budget spent in minority communities demonstrates responsiveness); Monroe County Litig., discussion at 740 F. Supp. 417, 424 (N.D. Miss. 1990) (observing a disproportionate amount of funds directed toward paving minority roads demonstrated responsiveness);.City of Austin Litig. (TX), discussion at 871 F.2d 529, 534-35 (5th Cir. 1989) (considering as evidence of responsiveness that, "Sixty percent of the city's $ 273,000,000.00 in community development bloc grant funds between 1979 and 1984 was related to housing. The city also funds a corporation to make mortgage loans to low-income persons, provides essential medical services for the poor, operates a shelter for transients and constructed a job training center. Forty-two percent of the city's parks and recreation facilities and forty-five percent of all city facilities are located in the three of Austin's eight fiscal districts having the highest minority populations.").

554. See, e.g., Hamrick Litig., discussion at 155 F. Supp. 2d 1355, 1378 (N.D. GA. 2001) (surface pavement improvement, community policing and the development of a community service center); Liberty County Commissioners Litig., discussion at 957 F. Supp. 1522, 1566 (N.D. Fla. 1997) (bulk of grant money for water project and housing upgrades in African-American areas); Houston v. Haley Litig., discussion at 663 F. Supp. 346 (N.D. Miss. 1987) (city provided a swimming pool, baseball fields, a gym, tennis courts, and a recreation center in an area that is predominately black); Baytown Litig., discussion at 696 F. Supp. 1128 (S.D. Tex. 1987) (street and housing improvements, though this was criticized in the circuit opinion, it was affirmed as not clearly erroneous); City of Springfield Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1032 (C.D. Ill. 1987) (Fair Housing Board work and neighborhood renewal attempts through the Pioneer Park Project); Opelika Litig. (AL), discussion at 748 F.2d 1473, 1476 (11th Cir. 1984) (development funds, such as matching city water board funds directed at minority community); McCarty Litig. (TX), discussion at 749 F.2d 1134, 1137 (5th Cir. 1984) ("participation in funding programs for disadvantage students").

555. See e.g., Hamrick Litig., discussion at 155 F. Supp. 2d 1355, 1378 (N.D. GA. 2001) (efforts in applying federal, state and local funds to improve housing conditions for certain lower income residents weighed in favor of responsiveness); Houston v. Haley Litig. (MS), discussion at 859 F.2d 341, 347 (5th Cir. 1988) (City has used federal grants to upgrade housing in minority neighborhoods); Dallas County Commission Litig. (AL), discussion at 739 F.2d 1529, 1540 (11th Cir. 1984) ("The Commission has funded or sought federal funding for a variety of projects that have benefited the black community, including drainage projects, water service, site preparation for industry, a regional comprehensive mental health center, the county health department, and recreational facilities."); El Paso Independent School District Litig., discussion at 591 F. Supp. 802, 810 (W.D. Tex, 1984) (federally funded programs illustrate responsiveness because the school "must to administer them for the benefit of the students.").

556. City of Dallas Litig., discussion at 734 F. Supp. 1317, 1406 (N.D. Tex 1990) (discounting evidence of capital expenditure project because there was no showing of how much money came from the federal government); Lubbock Litig. (TX), discussion at 727 F.2d 364, 382 (5th Cir. 1984) ("The City cannot take credit entirely for the equal provision of City services; the funds for these derived largely from federal programs aimed at economically depressed areas."); See also, Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1170 (D. Colo. 1998) (noting some of the attempts to implement changes to help meet the needs of minority community were federally funded but making no finding).

557. See, e.g., Sisseton Independent School District Litig. (SD), discussion at 804 F.2d 469, 477 (8th Cir. 1986) (considering the few number of Indians on boards or commissions was due to federal mandates).

558. Hall Litig. (GA), discussion at 117 F.3d 1222, 1227 (11th Cir. 1997).

559. See Red Clay School District Litig. (DE), 116 F.3d 685, 698 (3rd Cir. 1997).

560. Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1044 (D.S.D. 2004) (discussing numerous legislative bills that affect the Indian community and the consistent opposition of certain members of the legislature to any legislation that the Indian community lobbied for including voting against bills with overwhelming support and no organized opposition and keeping bills that affect only the minority community from reaching a floor vote).

561. See e.g., Town Hempstead Litig. (NY), discussion at 180 F.3d 476, 487 (2d Cir. 1999) (considering denial or disregard of requests to fund minority community centers shows lack of responsiveness); Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., discussion at 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1170 (D. Colo. 1998) (considering school Board refusal of request of Indian community for bilingual education program and Native American education programs as wanting the curriculum to be "ethnically clean" but not finding a significant lack of responsiveness); Holder v. Hall Litig. (GA), 117 F.3d 1222, 1227 (11th Cir. 1997) (finding that nondiscrimination in road work where official campaigned on that issue established responsiveness); Ward v. Columbus County, 782 F. Supp. 1097, 1105 (E.D.N.C. 1991) (considering that minorities "particular requests have gone unmet."); Sisseton Independent School District Litig. (SD), discussion at 804 F.2d 469, 477 (8th Cir. 1986) (considering refusal to establish polling places despite Indian requests); Cf. Montezuma-Cortez School District Litig., 7 F. Supp. 2d 1152, 1170 (D. Colo. 1998) (noting "Parent Advisory Committee request for development of a mission statement for bilingual education and Native American education programs," and school board's response that its "District mission statements must be 'ethnically clean,'" but making no finding on responsiveness either way). Other courts not following this model have simply considered services in terms of what was provided to the minority community. See e.g., City of Austin Litig. (TX), 871 F.2d 529, 534 (5th Cir. 1989) (considering the city had constructed a job training center but not discussing minority input); Dallas County Commission Litig. (AL), 739 F.2d 1529, 1540 (11th Cir. 1984) (finding roads have been maintained on a non-discriminatory basis).

562. Jeffers Litig., 730 F. Supp. 196, 214 (E. Ark. 1989).

563. Id.; see also Sanchez-Colorado Litig., 861 F. Supp. 1516, 1530 (D. Colo. 1994) (plaintiffs argued Representative Entz did not "speak out in favor of bilingual education for non-English speaking children" but court noted "Representative Entz has worked on education issues, housing issues, and economic development issues. He worked against the English Only Amendment, has worked to obtain funding through grants for local governments within H.D. 60 (Defendants' Exhibit B), has worked on a 1994 school financing act to obtain equality in school financing, and has helped constituents obtain jobs.").

564. See e.g., Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 313 (D. Mass. 2004) (evidence that officials sought out minority groups and implemented policies to address their concerns); Rural West II Litig., discussion at 29 F. Supp. 2d 448, 459-60 (W.D. Tenn. 1998) (considering representatives seeking appropriations for black constituents to illustrate, in part, their responsiveness); Rural West I Litig, discussion at 877 F. Supp. 1096 (W.D. Tenn. 1995) (supporting Martin Luther King holiday evidenced responsiveness); Cincinnati Litig., discussion at No. C-1-92-278, 1993 U.S. Dist LEXIS 21009, at *37 (S.D. Ohio July 8, 1993) (debating changing to a district-by district plan evidenced responsiveness); Monroe County Litig., discussion at 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990) (plaintiff testified board of supervisors has "always been responsive to his requests."); Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 213 (E.D. Ark. 1989) (noting that while the minority voters feelings of unresponsive were "not without basis…Members of the House like Representatives Cunningham, McGinnis, Flanagin, and Dawson are anything but unresponsive. They are well aware that a large proportion of their constituency is black, and they make assiduous and sincere efforts to represent these voters.").

565. Id. at *37-38.

566. See e.g., Bridgeport Litig., discussion at Civ. No. 3:93CV1476(PCD), 1993 U.S. Dist. Lexis 19741 (D. Conn. Oct. 27, 1993) (no action taken on repeated minority community requests for a community center); Sisseton Independent School District Litig. (SD), discussion at 804 F.2d 469, 477 (8th Cir.1986) ("Appellants offered substantial evidence that the District was unresponsive to the Indian community…the District failed to establish additional polling places despite the request of appellants. The district court may not ignore this evidence."); See also LULAC – North East INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT Litig., discussion at 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1087 (W.D. Texas 1995) (considering the failure of minority community to request the school not fly a confederate flag not to indicate a lack of responsiveness); Little Rock Litig., discussion at 831 F. Supp. 1453, 1461 (E.D. Ark. 1993) (noting the President of Local NAACP brought up issues to the School District in a letter but received no response).

567. See e.g., Jeffers Litig., discussion at 730 F. Supp. 196, 214 (E. Ark. 1989) ("Some white members, on being approached by black citizens in their own districts for help, referred these constituents to black legislators representing other areas."); City of Springfield Litig., discussion at 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1032 (C.D. Ill. 1987) ("County Board member testified that he has had no success having city officials listen to him when he brings complaints from Springfield's black citizens about housing, employment and other government matters."); See also Suffolk County Litig., discussion at 268 F. Supp. 2d 243, 266 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) (considering a failure to respond to plaintiff's letter regarding redistricting plan "neutral at best").

568. Jeffers Litig., 730 F. Supp. 196, 214 (E. Ark. 1989).

569. See e.g., Mehfoud Litig., discussion at 702 F. Supp. 588, 595 (E.D. Va. 1988) ("[N]one of the five sitting members of the Henrico Board of Supervisors could identify a single issue of unique concern to the black community -- despite notable publicity of, among other things, black efforts to have a black appointed to the school board. In fact, two of the five Supervisors had no idea what percentage of their constituencies are black."); See also Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 313 (D.Mass. 2004) (plaintiffs provided testimony that officials were unaware of their concerns); Cf. LULAC - North East INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT Litig., 903 F. Supp. 1071, 1087 (W.D. Texas 1995) (finding no lack of responsiveness because the minority community had not brought their concerns to the attention of the school board).

570. See e.g., Holder v. Hall Litig. (GA), discussion at 117 F.3d 1222, 1227 (11th Cir. 1997) (county board advertises monthly public meetings); Liberty County Commissioners Litig., discussion at 957 F. Supp. 1522, 1567 (N.D. Fla. 1997) ("Blacks have no problem approaching county commissioners, and even those commissioners elected from other residential districts (outside of residential district 1, where most blacks are concentrated) listen to their complaints and are responsive to their needs."); City of Holyoke Litig., discussion at 960 F. Supp. 515, 524 (D. Mass. 1997) ("The administration of the new Mayor has witnessed a greatly increased effort to recruit Hispanic officials, include Hispanic viewpoints, and address the interests of all the citizens of Holyoke, Hispanic and non-Hispanic."); Niagara Falls Litig., discussion at 913 F. Supp. 722, 749 (W.D.N.Y. 1994) (city officials have an "open door" policy).

571. See e.g., Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 313 (D. Mass. 2004) (considering "evidence of instances in which legislators sought out minority groups and instituted programs designed to address the groups' requests."); Calhoun County Litig., discussion at 813 F. Supp. 1189, 1201 (N.D. Miss. 1993) (noting county made efforts to include black participation in the redistricting process through its biracial commission); Terrazas Litig., discussion at 581 F. Supp. 1329, 1350 (N.D. Tex. 1984) (considering the inclusion of minorities process of redistricting).

572. Terrazas Litig., discussion at 581 F. Supp. 1329, 1350 (N.D. Tex. 1984)

573. City of Rome Litig. (GA), discussion at 127 F.3d 1355, 1386-87 (11th Cir. 1997) ("Both voting statistics and testimonial evidence conclusively reveal that Rome's black community has political influence. This political influence naturally translates into political responsiveness.") (footnote omitted); Hamrick Litig., discussion at 155 F. Supp. 2d 1355, 1378 (N.D. Ga. 2001) (finding "there is evidence of record that the city council members are responsive to the black community and that many of them have been supported by the black community."); City of Chicago –Bonilla Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 1359, 1450 (N.D. Ill. 1997) (noting African-Americans and Latinos holding many positions within Cook County government, and Latino and African-American aldermen testified that they found other white officials to be responsive.); Town of Babylon Litig., discussion at 914 F. Supp. 843, 890 (E.D.N.Y. 1996) (finding town board "very responsive" to minority concerns, partially because the two Democratic members of the board "owe their election to the African-American vote."); Attala County Litig., discussion at 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21569, at *19 (N.D. Miss. Mar. 20, 1995) (weighing "political veterans" testimony of the importance of the need for to get black support in favor of responsiveness); Rural West I Litig., discussion at 877 F. Supp. 1096, 1106 (W.D. Tenn. 1995) ("A serious political candidate cannot ignore such a sizeable portion of the electorate."); Cincinnati Litig., discussion at No. C-1-92-278, 1993 U.S. Dist LEXIS 21009, at *36 (S.D. Ohio July 8, 1993) (considering officials need support of black community on a variety of issues, including any time they want to pass a tax levy, and many need it to get elected); Calhoun County Litig., discussion at 813 F. Supp. 1189, 1201 (N.D. Miss. 1993) (officials need minority vote to win elections); Ketchum Litig. (IL), discussion at 740 F.2d 1398, 1405 (7th Cir. 1984) (finding elected officials and the Democratic Party responsive to black and Hispanic concerns because of the number of minority candidates elected); Rybicki Litig., discussion at 574 F. Supp. 1147, 1151 (N.D. Ill. 1983) (considering many officials in the Chicago area are minorities, and the Democratic Party needs their votes to get elected); City of Greenwood Litig., 534 F. Supp. 1351 (N.D. Miss. 1982) (finding candidates must actively seek and gain the support of blacks to be elected); Cf. Kent County Litig., discussion at 790 F. Supp. 738, 749 (W.D. Mich. 1992) (evidence of racial appeals in campaigns "raises serious concerns about responsiveness."). But see Armour Litig., 775 F. Supp. 1044, 1058 (N.D. Ohio 1991) (considering that black voters always vote for the Democrat and the white voters swing between the two parties, so no candidate needs to be responsive to their concerns).

574. Armour Litig. (OH), discussion at 895 F.2d 1078 (6th Cir. 1990) (citing Marengo County) ("A plurality feature is of course more responsive to minority voter groups."); Brewer Litig. (TX), discussion at 876 F.2d 448 (5th Cir. 1989) (same).

575. City of Chicago-Barnett Litig. (IL), discussion at 141 F.3d 699, 703 (7th Cir. 1998) (remanding and criticizing the responsiveness finding as "flawed methodology of relying on its own estimation of the responsiveness of particular incumbents to particular groups" because of the extent of racial bloc voting); Metro Dade County Litig., discussion at 805 F. Supp. 967, 987 (S.D. Fla. 1992) (finding lack of responsiveness on remand because "there is severe racially polarized voting in Dade County Commission elections."); Haywood County Litig., discussion at 544 F. Supp. 1122 (W.D. Tenn. 1982) (not making a finding on responsiveness but crediting expert testimony that officials would not have to be responsive because of the polarization in voting).

576. Rural West II, discussion at 29 F. Supp. 2d 448, 459-60 (W.D. Tenn. 1998); Rural West I, discussion at 836 F. Supp. 453, 463 (W.D. Tenn. 1993); City of Jackson Litig., discussion at 683 F. Supp. 1515, 1535 (W.D. Tenn. 1988); Houston v. Haley Litig., discussion at 663 F. Supp. 346, 354 (N.D. Miss. 1987).

577. See France Litig., discussion at 71 F. Supp. 2d 317, 333 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (substantial responsiveness demonstrated by congressman's testimony about voter registration drives, efforts to establish local political clubs, and initiatives to add minorities to the Democratic party's county executive committees); Chickasaw County II Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997) (lack of responsiveness not found because of efforts to facilitate black voter registration through home visits and special assistants available at voting precincts); City of Lagrange Litig., discussion at 969 F. Supp. 749, 770 (N.D. GA 1997) (formation of biracial committee to study redistricting process weighs in favor of responsiveness); Calhoun County Litig., discussion at 813 F. Supp. 1189, 1201 (N.D. Miss. 1993) (appointment of biracial redistricting committee partial evidence of responsiveness); El Paso Independent School District Litig., discussion at 591 F. Supp. 802, 811 (W.D. Tex. 1984) (deputizing high school principals as voting registrars so that they could register students upon turning 18 was evidence of responsiveness); Terrazas Litig., discussion at 581 F. Supp. 1329, 1350 (N.D. Tex. 1984) ("The process by which, following the 1980 census, the State of Texas drafted and adopted redistricting plans, culminating in the 1983 House plan, far from evidencing official discrimination, convincingly evidences full minority access to the redistricting process and a willingness on the part of almost all involved in that process to consider and effectuate minority proposals.").

578. Chickasaw County II Litig., discussion at No. CIV.A. 1:92CV142-JAD, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22087, at *8 (N.D. Miss. Oct. 28, 1997).

579. Operation Push Litig., discussion at 674 F. Supp. 1245, 1265 (N.D. Miss. 1987) (unresponsiveness found based upon failure to appoint deputy registrar/white officials hinder black registration); Marengo County Litig., discussion at 731 F.2d 1546, 1572 (11th Cir. 1984) (failure to appoint minority registrars weighs in favor of finding lack of responsiveness); Citizen Action Litig., discussion at Civ. No. N 84-431, 1984 U.S. Dist. Lexis 24869 at *12-13 (D. Conn. Sept. 27, 1984) (responsiveness lacking based on jurisdiction's failure to use available resources to increase voter registration, the absence of door to door canvassing, the scarcity of outreach, the decision to ban volunteer registrars, and the registrar's failure to provide bilingual ballots available at no cost from the state); Terrell Litig., discussion at 565 F. Supp. 338, 343 (N. D. Tex. 1983) (refusal to open second more accessible polling station supports finding of lack of responsiveness); see also Sisseton Independent School District Litig., discussion at 804 F.2d 469, 477 (8th Cir. 1986) (remanding for more findings on failure to hire Native American teachers or appoint a Native American deputy registrar). But cf. Suffolk County Litig., discussion at 268 F. Supp. 2d 243, 266 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) (failure to respond to plaintiff's letters regarding redistricting made factor 8 "neutral at best").

580. SENATE REPORT at 28-30.

581. See Marengo County Litig. (AL), 731 F.2d 1546, 1571 (11th Cir. 1984).

582. See Master Lawsuit List. The lawsuits that held otherwise were: Southern Christian Leadership Litig. (AL), 56 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 1995) (tenuous policy but Section 2 no violation where racial bloc voting not established and no viable alternative to challenged plan presented); Wamser Litig. (MO), 883 F.2d 617 (8th Cir. 1989) (lower court found policy tenuous, but plaintiff involved lacked standing to bring challenge);

583. See Master Lawsuit List.

584. Armour Litig., 775 F. Supp. 1044 (N.D. Ohio 1991); Monroe County Litig., 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990); Wamser Litig. (MO), 883 F.2d 617 (8th Cir. 1989); Smith-Crittenden County Litig., 687 F. Supp. 1310 (E.D. Ark. 1988); Baldwin Board of Education Litig., 686 F. Supp. 1459 (M.D. Ala. 1988); City of Jackson Litig., 683 F. Supp. 1515 (W.D. Tenn. 1988); Marengo County Litig., 623 F. Supp. 33 (S.D. Ala. 1985); City of Greenwood Litig., 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss. 1984); El Paso Independent School District Litig., 591 F. Supp. 802 (W.D. Tex. 1984); Lubbock Litig. (TX), 727 F.2d 364 (5th Cir. 1984); McCarty Litig. (TX), 749 F.2d 1134 (5th Cir. 1984); Major Litig., 574 F. Supp. 325 (E.D. La. 1983).

585. See, e.g., Armour Litig., 775 F. Supp. 1044 (N.D. Ohio 1991) (where state legislature gave no justification for reapportionment plan in two state house districts, court found that there is "simply no defensible basis" for the current boundaries because they are in clear violation of the state constitutional requirement "that the integrity of political subdivisions be respected whenever possible."); Monroe County Litig., 740 F. Supp. 417 (N.D. Miss. 1990) (policy tenuous where county gave no justification for districting plan, the population was 30% African American, no district was majority African American, and "[t]here is no state or county policy requiring majority white voting age populations in all supervisory and justice court judge districts."); Baldwin County Bd. of Education, 686 F. Supp. 1459 (M.D. Ala. 1988) (where board of education gave no justification for at-large election system, the policy was tenuous because the board had a "pattern or practice" of shifting between at-large and single-member voting systems, which was motivated by a desire to prevent African-American candidates from winning school board seats); Wamser, 679 F. Supp. 1513 (E.D. Mo. 1987) (finding tenuous City Election Board's lack of a justification for not reviewing ballots uncounted by ballot machine on the ground that some justification was necessary), finding of a violation later overruled on other grounds, 883 F.2d 617 (8th Cir. 1989) (overturned and dismissed for lack of standing); City of Greenwood Litig., 599 F. Supp. 397 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (where city gave no justification for at-large election system, the court found the policy was tenuous where no state policy favored at-large elections, and there was a tendency in Mississippi cities with a population of 10,000 or more to elect their city councils by multiple districts.); Marengo County Litig., discussion at 731 F.2d 1546 (11th Cir. 1984) (where county gave no justification for at-large commissioner and school board elections, the policy was tenuous because no strong state policy for or against at-large elections, this system was in fact adopted in 1955, leading appellate court to infer that the goal of the plan was to prevent an increase in African-American political participation); El Paso Ind. Sch. Dist., 591 F. Supp. 802 (W.D. Tex. 1984) (finding tenuous no justification given for at-large system where the combination of a 1977 referendum and subsequent legislative approving single-member districts rendered suspect the continuation of the at-large election system; and finding only real reasons for system could be intent to discriminate); Major v. Treen, 574 F. Supp. 325 (D. La. 1983) (finding policy tenuous where the reapportionment plan was passed without the input of African-American groups after Governor's veto threat).

586. Smith-Crittenden County Litig., 687 F. Supp. 1310 (E.D. Ark. 1988); City of Jackson, TN Litig., 683 F. Supp. 1515 (W.D. Tenn. 1988); Lubbock Litig. (TX), 727 F.2d 364 (5th Cir. 1984); McCarty Litig. (TX), 749 F.2d 1134 (5th Cir. 1984).

587. Rural W. Tenn. African-American Affairs Council v. McWherter, 836 F. Supp. 453 (W.D. Tenn. 1993) (finding justification of respect for traditional political boundaries not tenuous); Frank v. Forest Co., 194 F. Supp. 2d 867 (E.D. Wis. 2002) (finding policy of respecting traditional political boundaries nontenuous); Chattanooga Board of Comm'rs, 722 F. Supp. 380 (E.D. Tenn. 1989) (considering at-large policy was necessary to keep the commission form of government); Buchanan v. City of Jackson, 683 F. Supp. 1515 (W.D. Tenn. 1988) (finding at-large policy was a "logical feature" of commission form of government);

588. See, e.g., Rural West II Litig., 209 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 2000) (rejecting as tenuous state's claim that it sought to maintain political boundaries and thus not fracture City of Jackson where challenged districting plan fractured cities in other parts of the state).

589. Liberty County Commissioners Litig. (FL), 221 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2000); NAACP v. Niagara Falls, 913 F. Supp. 722 (W.D.N.Y. 1994); Reed v. Town of Babylon, 914 F. Supp. 843 (E.D.N.Y. 1996); City of Austin Litig., discussion at CIV. No. A-84-CA-189, 1985 WL 19986 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 12, 1985).

590. Shirt v. Hazeltine, 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1048 (D.S.D. 2004) (finding that the policy was not supported by the idea that the people were happy with their districts because the only input the legislature had sought from the people was far away from the Indian Reservation, and the legislature did not make the plans accessible to the public); Political Civil Voters Organization v. Terrell, 565 F. Supp. 338, 341 (N.D. Tex. 1983).

591. Vecinos Debarrio Uno v. City of Holyoke, 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997); Red Clay School Dist. Litig., 116 F.3d 685 (3rd Cir. 1997); City of Rome Litig. (GA), 127 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997); Hall v. Holder, 757 F. Supp. 1560 (M.D. Ga. 1991) (finding a single-member commission may be more responsive in a small county); Williams v. City of Dallas, 734 F. Supp. 1317 (W.D. Tex. 1990); Collins v. City of Norfolk, 679 F. Supp. 557 (E.D. Va. 1988); Perez v. Pasadena Indep. Sch. Dist., 958 F. Supp. 1196 (S.D. Tex. 1997).

592. Blaine County Litig. (MT), 363 F.3d 897 (9th Cir. 2004); Town of Hempstead Litig., 956 F. Supp. 326 (E.D.N.Y. 1997) (discounting the responsiveness argument after finding Senate Factor 8 (a significant lack of responsiveness) met); McMillan v. Escambia County, 748 F.2d 1037 (5th Cir. 1984) (affirming district court finding that the responsiveness explanation was inconsistent with the current operation of the Commission); McNeil v. City of Springfield, 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1033 (C.D. Ill. 1987) ("The claim of responsiveness of the officials to the electorate is tenuous in a community where racially polarized voting exists. The responsiveness of the elected official is, of course, to the white majority that elected him and not to the black minority which is without the ability to elect candidates of their choice to seats of power."); see also N.A.A.C.P. v. City of Columbia, 850 F. Supp. 404, 425 (D.S.C. 1993) ("Mixed systems provide neighborhood, and therefore often minority, representatives, but nevertheless avoid the factionalism and "turfism" often associated with all single-member districts. Mixed systems provide the advantage of a city-wide perspective, but nevertheless avoid the problems often associated with at-large systems of lack of diversity on the council and neglect of neighborhoods…The overwhelming weight of the evidence offered in this case suggests that Columbia's mixed system functions exactly as designed, in terms of attention to neighborhood concerns, but without resulting in factionalism or turfism.")

593. See, e.g., Cousin v. Sundquist, 145 F.3d 818 (6th Cir. 1998); Prejean Litig. (LA), 227 F.3d 504, 516 (5th Cir. 2000); France v. Pataki, 71 F. Supp. 2d 317 (S.D.N.Y. 1999); Davis v. Chiles Litig. (FL), 139 F.3d 1414, 1421 (11th Cir. 1998); Southern Christian Leadership Conference Litig. (AL), 56 F.3d 1281, 1295 (11th Cir. 1995) (en banc); Nipper Litig. (FL), 39 F.3d 1494, 1534 (11th Cir. 1994) (en banc); LULAC v. Clements Litig. (TX), 999 F.2d 831, 857-58 (5th Cir. 1993); Magnolia Bar Ass'n, 793 F. Supp. 1386 (S.D. Miss. 1992).

594. See, e.g., Prejean v. Foster Litig., 83 Fed. Appx. 5, 11 (5th Cir. 2003) (finding that drawing district lines to protect incumbent judges who happened to be white was not tenuous and did not violate Section 2 or the Constitution, as politics not race was the primary motivation); Fund for Accurate & Informed Representation, 796 F. Supp. 662, 672 (N.D.N.Y. 1992) ("plaintiffs failed to demonstrate any linkage between the alleged fragmentation of minority communities in Monroe, Nassau, Erie or Westchester Counties, and an alleged intent to preserve the incumbency of 'certain white incumbents,' " so not only could no intentional discrimination be shown, but also: "Plaintiffs have not convinced us that the state legislature's decision to heighten the minority population in certain Assembly districts is a pretext for an unworthy goal. Moreover, under some circumstances, the use of a lower population threshold for minority districts may lead to ineffective minority control districts. This choice is a matter of judgment, and we cannot say on this record that the legislature exercised its judgment unlawfully.").

595. See, e.g., Emison Litig., 782 F. Supp. 427 (D. Minn. 1992) (finding tenuous policy of pairing incumbents where doing so unnecessarily limited African-American voting strength) overturned on other grounds by 507 U.S. 25 (1993); Gingles Litig., 590 F. Supp. 345 (E.D.N.C. 1984) (protecting incumbents was "obviously" not enough to justify racial vote dilution).

596. See, e.g, Black Political Taskforce, 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004) (finding that "race [was] used as a tool to achieve incumbency protection" in the drawing of Massachusetts state legislative district lines after the 2000 census); Ketchum v. Byrne, 740 F.2d 1398, 1408 ("We think there is little point for present purposes in distinguishing discrimination based on an ultimate objective of keeping certain incumbent whites in office from discrimination borne of pure racial animus."); Buskey v. Oliver Litig., 565 F. Supp. 1473 (M.D. Ala. 1983) (drawing district to ensure defeat of political rival is tenuous where jurisdiction knew effect would be to dilute black voting power). But see Escambia County, 638 F.2d 1239, 1245 (5th Cir.) ("the desire to retain one's incumbency unaccompanied by other evidence ought not to be equated with an intent to discriminate against blacks qua blacks").

597. Westwego Litig., discussion at CIV. A. NO. 84-5599, 1989 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7298, 1989 WL 73332 (E.D. La. June 28, 1989); Armstrong v. Allain, 893 F. Supp. 1320 (S.D. Miss. 1994) (60% requirement for school bond referenda was justified by the fact that school districts had a number of alternative sources of revenue for capital expenditures.); Clark v. Calhoun County, 813 F. Supp. 1189 (N.D. Miss. 1993) (policy of keeping districts with equal road mileage nontenuous); Aldasoro v. Kennerson Litig., 922 F. Supp. 339 (S.D. Cal. 1995) (noting the reasons for keeping an at-large system were El Centro was too small for single districts and finding the at-large system allowed minorities to elect); Houston v. Lafayette County, 841 F. Supp. 751 (N.D. Miss. 1993) (equal road mileage); Brown v. Chattanooga Board of Comm'rs, 722 F. Supp. 380 (E.D. Tenn. 1989) (necessary to keep the commission form of government); Buchanan v. City of Jackson, 683 F. Supp. 1515 (W.D. Tenn. 1988) (logical feature of commission form of government); Mississippi State Chapter, Operation Push v. Allain, 674 F. Supp. 1245 (N.D. Miss. 1987) ("The clerks are responsible for registering all voters and must have some discretion in selecting those agents and employees who will assist the circuit clerks in accomplishing their objective. n15 The court concludes that some measure of discretion and flexibility is needed for the registration process to work smoothly and efficiently."); Smith-Crittendon County Litig., 687 F. Supp. 1310 (E.D. Ark. 1988) (finding a state policy supporting multi-member districts is neither tenuous nor particularly strong); NAACP v. Fordice, 252 F.3d 361 (5th Cir. 2001) (finding requested reorganization would cost the state millions of dollars and finding cost efficiency reasons not tenuous); Clarke v. Cincinnati, 40 F.3d 807, 814 (6th Cir. 1994) ("Moreover, given the difficulties experienced in the administration of PR, we cannot say that the policy underlying 9X is "tenuous.""); City of Philadelphia Litig., 28 F.3d 306 (3d Cir. 1994) (accepting a voter purge law as not tenuous because the policy was deemed to prevent voter fraud).

598. Mississippi State Chapter, Operation Push v. Allain, 674 F. Supp. 1245, 1266 (N.D. Miss. 1987).

599. Hall v. Holder, 757 F. Supp. 1560 (M.D. Ga. 1991) (finding use of single person commissioner historically fostered responsiveness); Dallas County Commission Litig., 636 F. Supp. 704 (S.D. Ala. 1986) (considering a long-standing state-wide policy in favor of at-large elections without regard to race, dating back to the first Alabama school board in 1854); McCord v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 617 F. Supp. 1093 (S.D. Fla. 1985) (noting the at-large system had been in place since 1911 and there was no evidence of invidious intent); Houston v. Haley, 663 F. Supp. 346 (N.D. Miss. 1987) ("Oxford held aldermen elections through single-member districts for as long as anyone could remember, except after the 1970 census when because of state statute and growth in population the city was required to hold at-large elections for a brief period."); Milwaukee Branch of N.A.A.C.P. v. Thompson, 935 F. Supp. 1419 (E.D. Wis. 1996) (The state of Wisconsin had history of using at-large elections for judges dating back to its 1848 constitution.).

600. 116 F. 3d 1194 (7th Cir. 1997).

601. Kirksey v. Allain Litig., 658 F. Supp. 1183 (S.D. Miss. 1987).

602. Terrazas v. Clements, 581 F. Supp. 1329 (N.D. Tex. 1984). (Even though incumbency was a factor in the reapportionment, the other factors were present as well such as the need to comply with one person one vote and the Section 5 of Voting Rights Act, and plaintiff failed to show that the policy behind it was tenuous.); Sanchez v. Colorado, 97 F.3d 1303, 1325 (10th Cir. 1996) (criticizing but not finding clearly erroneous the district courts finding that the underlying policy was VRA compliance, noting "[t]he record casts doubt on the court's finding the Commission from beginning to end observed the tenets of § 2.").

603. Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1048 (D.S.D. 2004).

604. As explained by the Court, proportionality is distinct from proportional representation. The latter links the proportion of minority officeholders to the minority group's share of the relevant population. See De Grandy Litig., discussion at 512 U.S. 997, 1014 n.11 (1994).

605. Id. at 1020-21.

606. Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004); Rodriguez Litig., 308 F. Supp. 2d 346 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); Perry Litig., 298 F. Supp. 2d 451 (E.D. Tex. 2004); Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004); Old Person Litig., 312 F.3d 1036 (9th Cir. 2002); Campuzano Litig., 200 F. Supp. 2d 905 (N.D. Ill. 2002); Rural West II Litig., 209 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 2000); Liberty County Commissioners Litig., 221 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2000); City of Chicago-Bonilla Litig., 141 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 1998); County of Thurston Litig., 129 F.3d 1015 (8th Cir. 1997); African American Voting Rights LDF Litig., 994 F. Supp. 1105 (E.D. Mo. 1997); City of Holyoke Litig., 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997); Rural West I Litig., 877 F. Supp. 1096 (W.D. Tenn. 1995); St. Louis Board of Education Litig., 90 F.3d 1357 (8th Cir. 1996); Little Rock Litig., 56 F.3d 904 (8th Cir. 1995); City of Columbia Litig., 33 F.3d 52 (4th Cir. 1994); Austin Litig., 857 F. Supp. 560 (E.D. Mich. 1994).

See also Rural West I Litig., discussion at 877 F. Supp. 1096, 1109-11 (W.D. Tenn. 1995) (addressing proportionality but not ultimately making a definitive finding on it); City of Chicago Litig. (IL), discussion at 141 F.3d 699, 705 (7th Cir. 1998) (finding proportionality absent and remanding for additional findings to determine whether the deviation from proportionality can be justified by reference to other appropriate districting factors because "[d]eviations from proportionality, especially small ones, can be justified by reference to other factors, such as the compactness of districts and the desirability of preserving continuity and recognizing topographical, cultural, and economic factors that may make one ward mapping preserve communities of political interest better than another.").

607. Rodriguez Litig., 308 F. Supp. 2d 346 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); Perry Litig., 298 F. Supp. 2d 451 (E.D. Tex. 2004); Campuzano Litig., 200 F. Supp. 2d 905 (N.D. Ill. 2002); Liberty County Commissioners Litig., 221 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2000); African American Voting Rights LDF Litig., 994 F. Supp. 1105 (E.D. Mo. 1997); City of Holyoke Litig., 960 F. Supp. 515 (D. Mass. 1997); St. Louis Board of Education 90 F.3d 1357 (8th Cir. 1996); Little Rock Litig., 56 F.3d 904 (8th Cir. 1995); City of Columbia, 33 F.3d 52 (4th Cir. 1994); Austin, 857 F. Supp. 560 (E.D. Mich. 1994).

608. Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004); Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004); Rural West II Litig.,, 209 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 2000); Old Person Litig., 312 F.3d 1036 (9th Cir. 2002); County of Thurston Litig., 129 F.3d 1015 (8th Cir. 1997).

609. Bone Shirt Litig., 336 F. Supp. 2d 976 (D.S.D. 2004); Black Political Task Force Litig., 300 F. Supp. 2d 291 (D. Mass. 2004); Rural West II Litig. (TN), 209 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 2000); County of Thurston Litig. (NE), 129 F.3d 1015 (8th Cir. 1997).

610. Old Person Litig. (MT), discussion at 312 F.3d 1036, 1050 (9th Cir. 2002). In ultimately affirming the judgment of the district court finding a lack of vote dilution, though, the 9th Circuit panel made clear that its decision to affirm the ultimate conclusions of the lower court had more to do with the standard of review than the weight which the panel would have accorded to some pieces of evidence. See id.

611. African American Voting Rights Legal Defense Fund, Inc v. Villa, 54 F.3d 1345 (8th Cir. 1995) ("We also hold that the district court properly granted summary judgment where the record before it demonstrated that sustained and substantial proportionality existed between the percentage of blacks in the citywide voting age population and the number of safe black wards.").

612. De Grandy, 512 U.S. at 1023

613. Black Political Task Force Litig., discussion at 300 F. Supp. 2d 291, 312 (D. Mass. 2004).

614. Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 494-95 & n. 134 (E.D. Tex. 2004) ("Plaintiffs' own experts and argument reminded this court that because of the lower turnout of Latino voters, a low majority of the Hispanic citizen voting age population does not produce an effective Latino opportunity district.")..

615. The Court explained that it examined allegations of dilution in the geographic terms stated by plaintiffs themselves who had specifically alleged dilution only in particular regions of the state rather than the plan as a whole. As such the Court "had no occasion to decide which frame of reference should have been used" had the matter not already been agreed upon by the parties in the district court. See De Grandy, 512 U.S. at 1022.

616. Rural West I Litig., discussion at 877 F. Supp. 1096, 1109-10 (W.D. Tenn. 1995); Rural West II Litig. (TN), discussion at 209 F.3d 835, 843-44 (6th Cir. 2000); Austin Litig., discussion at 857 F. Supp. 560, 569 (E.D. Mich. 1994); Bone Shirt Litig., discussion at 336 F. Supp. 2d 976, 1048-49 (D.S.D. 2004).

617. Rural West I Litig., discussion at 877 F. Supp. 1096, 1109 (W.D. Tenn. 1995).

618. Rural West II Litig. (TN), discussion at 209 F.3d 835, 843 (6th Cir. 2000).

619. Austin Litig., discussion at 857 F. Supp. 560, 569 (E.D. Mich. 1994).

620. Perry Litig., discussion at 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 494 ("Because the Supreme Court has not yet provided precise guidance on the proper standard for assessing proportionality, however, we also examine proportionality on a statewide basis.")

621. Old Person Litig. (MT), discussion at 230 F.3d 1113, 1129-30 (9th Cir. 2000).

622. Blytheville School District Litig., discussion at 71 F.3d 1382, n.6 (8th Cir. 1995) ("De Grandy resolved a claim involving 'proportionality,' which 'links the number of majority-minority voting districts to minority members' share of the relevant population.' Here, because we address a claim involving a single at-large district, the analyses between proportionality and proportional representation are essentially the same."); City of St. Louis, 896 F. Supp. 929, 943 (E.D. Mo. 1995) ("In Johnson v. De Grandy, the Supreme Court indicated that even if a plaintiff succeeds in establishing the Gingles preconditions, a defendant may be able to defeat a § 2 claim by showing that the minority group in question has achieved, or will achieve, substantially proportional representation under the challenged districting plan.")

623. Liberty County Commissioners Litig., discussion at 957 F. Supp. 1522, 1570 (N.D. Fla. 1997) ("Proportionality, while not dispositive of a section 2 claim, is a relevant factor which should be examined under the totality of the circumstances. The proportionality inquiry is very straight forward in this case. Blacks have not achieved proportional representation on the Liberty County School Board. Not only is there no black currently serving on the school board, no black has ever served on the school board. The opposite is true with the Liberty County Commission. Since 1990, Earl Jennings, a black, has served as one of the five county commissioners. As stated earlier, blacks make up 17.63 percent of the total population and 25.03 of the voting age population of Liberty County. Thus, with blacks comprising twenty percent of the county commission's membership, blacks have clearly achieved proportional representation on the county commission. Such proportional representation does not automatically preclude a finding of section 2 liability, although it is obviously some evidence that blacks have equal access to the political process in Liberty County.") (internal citations omitted).

624. Liberty County Commissioners, discussion at 221 F.3d 1218, 1225 (11th Cir. 2000) (en banc) (quoting 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b)).

Published by Princeton University Press, 41 William Street, Princeton, New Jersey 08540
In the United Kingdom: Princeton University Press, Chichester, West Sussex

---

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Quiet revolution in the South : the impact of the Voting Rights Act, 1965--1990 / Chandler Davidson and Bernard Grofman, editors.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN: 0-691-03247-5 — ISBN 0-691-02108-2 (pbk.)
1. Afro-Americans—Suffrage—Southern States. 2. Voter registration—Southern States. 3. Afro-American politicians—Southern States. 4. Elections—Southern States. 5. Southern States—Politics and government—1951– I. Davidson, Chandler. II. Grofman, Bernard.
JK1929.A2Q54 1994
324.6'2'08996073075—dc20 93-38961

This book has been composed in Times

Princeton University Press books are printed on acid-free paper and meet the guidelines for permanence and durability of the Committee on Production Guidelines for Book Longevity of the Council on Library Resources

Printed in the United States of America

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 (Pbk.)

IN MEMORY OF

JUSTICE THURGOOD MARSHALL

"AND WE MUST TAKE THE CURRENT WHEN IT SERVES, OR LOSE OUR VENTURES"

CONTENTS

FIGURES

EDITORS' INTRODUCTION

CHANDLER DAVIDSON AND BERNARD GROFMAN

PRESIDENT LYNDON B. JOHNSON signed the Voting Rights Act on 6 August 1965. Enacted to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment, the statute consists of both permanent features that apply to the United States as a whole and temporary features—special provisions—that largely apply to specific jurisdictions.[1] The initial duration of its nonpermanent parts was five years. However, Congress extended them in 1970, 1975, and 1982, in each case with some important amendments to the act. Initial passage and each subsequent extension occurred with substantial bipartisan support.

Extensions were necessary because many white officials continued to resist the full incorporation of blacks and certain language minorities into the polity. As direct disfranchising strategies were frustrated by the act, officials relied on more subtle mechanisms of vote restriction aimed primarily at preventing minority voters from electing the candidates of their choice. Widely employed throughout the South, these mechanisms included the submergence of minority voting strength in at-large or multimember districts and the gerrymandering of district lines. The story told in the chapters of this book is largely the story of the "quiet revolution" in voting rights that has occurred since 1965.[2]

Because the most frequent and the most severe discrimination against minorities in the United States has occurred against blacks in the South, the special provisions of the act have been targeted particularly toward that region. From 1965 to the present, seven of the eleven states of the former Confederacy, including all five Deep South states, have been continuously covered entirely or in large part by the act's special provisions: Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Virginia, and forty of the hundred counties of North Carolina. Since 1975 Texas, an eighth former Confederate state with the largest black population of any southern state and the second largest Mexican-American population in the nation, has also been covered by the act's special provisions.[3]

Most of these states at one time or another employed a statewide literacy test, exclusive white primary elections, a poll tax, and a majority runoff requirement. These states were also more likely than others to employ at-large municipal election systems.[4] The use of such systems was much more widespread in these states than in the rest of the nation when the Voting Rights Act was passed, which Wolfinger and Field at the time attributed to the fact that in the South, "most municipal institutions seem to be corollaries of the region's traditional preoccupation with excluding Negroes from political power."[5]

We have chosen to focus on the eight southern states covered by the act's special provisions because the Voting Rights Act has had its greatest impact in the South and because, almost without exception, it is in these states that the key conceptual underpinnings of vote dilution have come to be defined through litigation challenging election practices.

The Basic Research Goals

In anticipation of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the act in 1990, with funding from the National Science Foundation's Law and Social Science Program, we commissioned comprehensive studies of several facets of southern black political participation. These studies included research on gains in black registration, systematic state-by-state investigations of the relationship between the act and the electoral success of racial minorities for municipal office in each of the eight states,[6] and a study of black representation in southern legislatures and congressional delegations.[7] Each state chapter was to be written by students of that state's electoral history, including at least one lawyer and one political scientist, sociologist, or historian. Many of the authors, as it turned out, had had direct experience with voting rights litigation as attorneys or as expert witnesses.[8]

The central aims of the project reflected the two major purposes of the act. We wanted to determine what effect it had in enfranchising blacks in the South. We also wanted to know its impact on black representation by preventing the dilution of minority votes. Regarding dilution, we were particularly interested in whether the act enabled blacks (and Mexican Americans in Texas) to win local office.

More specifically, the task we set for the authors of the state chapters had five components. First, we asked them to cover the main voting rights developments in their state from Reconstruction to modern times in a relatively brief compass but to give special attention to the post–World War II period. Without this prelude, the significance of the events from the 1960s on would be difficult to appreciate.

The second component stems from the fact that the Voting Rights Act is complex and open to different readings; there has consequently been a considerable development over the past two decades of case law devoted to its interpretation. Voting rights litigation in the states discussed in this book has been voluminous. We asked the authors of the eight chapters to review the major constitutional and statutory cases in their state related to the act and also to discuss section 5 enforcement issues in the state.

Third, we wished to address a long-standing controversy over the precise effects of at-large election systems on local minority representation. Unfortunately, no research design that could definitively resolve the issue had been used by any of the numerous scholars in the debate. To attack the problem, we required the authors to generate a comprehensive longitudinal data base for cities in their state that would enable them to distinguish—in large part, at least—the consequences of multimember-district elections from the impact of other factors.

The fourth task concerned the direct effect of the Voting Rights Act on the election of minority candidates to local office. If, as we anticipated, our data revealed that the abolition of at-large election structures increased minority candidates' chances of winning, we wanted to find out whether the act caused the adoption of district systems. To investigate the role of law—including the activities of voting rights organizations and attorneys—in promoting change, we required our authors to make an inventory of all litigation challenging at-large city council elections in the state over the previous twenty-five years. Our data include information on both the organizations and the individual attorneys involved in instigating such litigation.[9]

The fifth component allowed us to address a debate over how easy it is for minority candidates to win office in majority-white districts at the local level. The conventional view has been that minority success in these districts is difficult, especially when the white voters make up a substantial majority.[10] But recent claims to the contrary have raised a controversy on this point.[11] The authors of the state chapters have compiled evidence on the relationship between minority population in districts in a multidistrict system and the likelihood of minority electoral success, with an eye to determining what minority population proportion is sufficient to provide minority voters with a realistic opportunity to elect their candidates of choice at the local level.[12] The result is the most comprehensive data base extant with which to explore this question.

Previous Research on the Voting Rights Act

A survey of research on the Voting Rights Act reveals that while a number of useful studies of one aspect or another have been reported, no attempt has been made to understand the broad contours of its effects. And even the limited efforts to gauge its impact have often suffered from shortcomings in conceptualization, method, or both. We are struck, for example, by the dearth of hard evidence on the extent to which the remarkable gains in black officeholding in the South, and in Mexican-American officeholding in Texas and other southwestern states, could be attributed directly to the Voting Rights Act.[13] Most of the best scholarship has addressed legal or constitutional issues and has appeared in law-related journals, or it has been written from a nonquantitative or a journalistic vantage point.[14]

With some important recent exceptions,[15] most empirical work on the act's effects on minority representation has been either anecdotal or of a relatively low level of methodological sophistication. While there is a very important body of research that has examined minority officeholding under different election methods, those articles do not systematically investigate when and how changes in election type came about.[16] Also, remarkably, even the most basic facts about the implementation of the act, such as the number and results of post-1982 section 2 cases brought under it, have never been compiled, perhaps because many of these cases did not result in published opinions or were settled out of court before trial.[17]

It is true that many informative statistics have been made available in the various reports on the act's enforcement, published by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, and in the reports of groups such as the Southern Regional Council and the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. But much data that are publicly available, such as those contained in a list of Justice Department preclearance objections, have never been systematically examined to see what the consequences of Justice Department intervention have been.[18] Moreover, there has been too little thought given, even when statistics are published, to the overarching question of how the act's several mechanisms have directly or indirectly influenced minority registration and voting, on the one hand, and minority officeholding, on the other.

Our book is an attempt to remedy this situation. It gathers data systematically on southern voter registration and officeholding, keeping firmly in mind the questions of whether the Voting Rights Act has been responsible for the remarkable upsurge in black participation and electoral success, and, if so, how. We believe that the findings of our project constitute the best answer so far to the question of the Voting Rights Act's effect on minority representation in the South at the local level.[19]

The act's effect on black enfranchisement is treated by Alt in chapter 12. Alt's work is an advance over that of scholars who considered black registration separately from that of whites. He recognizes that the two are bound together in a dynamic system in which whites' behavior depends on blacks' potential to form a majority of the electorate in a jurisdiction. Following in the footsteps of Key, Alt explores the hypothesis that white efforts to reduce black electoral participation have traditionally depended upon the size of the black population. He provides a careful longitudinal investigation of the changing black-white registration ratio, which is the single most accessible measure of potential black voter mobilization in comparison with that of whites, and provides a comparison of that ratio with what would be expected if whites and blacks registered at equal rates relative to their pool of eligible voters. Alt's multivariate modeling allows him to assess the relative short- and long-run effects of several factors on changes in black and white registration, including the use of literacy tests, poll taxes, and the sending of federal registrars to various southern counties as authorized by the Voting Rights Act.

A different analytical framework allows us to examine systematically, using a quasi-experimental design, the impact of election type on changes in local minority officeholding. This framework is applied in the eight individual state chapters. In addition, chapter 11 presents data on the relation between black population concentration and black officeholding in the legislatures and congressional delegations of all eleven states of the former Confederacy, including the three states not covered by section 5 of the act.

The Controversy over Barriers to Minority Representation

A major purpose of the chapters on representation is to resolve an issue that since the 1970s has been sharply debated in academic journals and courtrooms. The refusal of the controversy to subside is undoubtedly tied to its continuing practical importance. The question goes to the heart of the meaning of racial and ethnic representation in a democratic polity and how that representation is best achieved under the constraints imposed by considerations of fairness, constitutional norms, and statutory mandates. Chapter 1, which provides a brief introduction to voting rights case law, illuminates the importance of this question, and chapter 10 discusses the question in detail. But a brief description of it now is useful as well.

Most American local and state election schemes are basically of three kinds: at-large, single-member district, and mixed systems—the latter combining features of the first two. In an at-large system, all the contested seats on a governmental body, such as a city council, county commission, or school board, are filled by voters in the jurisdiction at large. If there are eight seats to be filled, all voters have eight votes and theoretically have a chance to influence who gets elected to all eight seats. In a single-member-district system, by contrast, the city is divided into geographical districts, and voters in each district, like voters in congressional elections, are limited to a vote for a single candidate running to represent their district. In a mixed system, some of the seats are voted on at large, and some by district.

In the nation and in the South, single-member districts or wards were widely used in the late nineteenth century. The Progressive movement (1896–1920) introduced the at-large election as a substitute for voting by ward, ostensibly to foster "good government," a notoriously vague idea.[20] In the North the imposition of such election procedures made it much less likely that European ethnics—many of them impoverished immigrants recently arrived from Ireland and from southern and eastern Europe—would be elected from the heavily ethnic wards. In the South, at-large elections were often seen as a way to make it harder for blacks, and sometimes poor whites as well, to win office. From the Progressive Era to the 1970s, the proportion of at-large elections in the nation's local election systems increased. They became especially common in the South.[21]

Students of local government structure have long known that at-large elections, whatever their benefits might be, disadvantage ethnic minorities, especially when there is strong resistance by the majority to minority officeholding.[22] In particular, scholars of southern politics have pointed to dramatic instances where district election structures in majority-white jurisdictions were changed to at-large ones in anticipation of minority officeholding.[23] In the 1970s social scientists conducted research that corroborated this commonsense idea. About the same time, expert witnesses for minority plaintiffs challenging at-large elections were citing this research in arguing that at-large elections, when whites were in the majority and voted overwhelmingly against minority candidates, prevented the election of those candidates even when they had strong and cohesive support in their own communities. District elections, by contrast, often enabled minority candidates to win.

An article written in 1981 reviewed fourteen studies of the effects of at-large elections on minority representation between 1969 and 1981 and found that eleven supported the conventional view that at-large and other multimember-district elections, ceteris paribus, reduced the representation of black officeholders.[24] An unpublished study that same year found that eighteen of twenty-three published and unpublished studies also supported the conventional view.[25] The occasional study that did not find at-large elections to disadvantage minority candidates could usually be accounted for by small sample size or flawed methods, such as inclusion in the data base of cities with very small minority populations.[26] A text on political participation summed up the scholarly consensus in 1991 by observing that while some authors had denied the impact of at-large elections on minority officeholding, "there is persuasive evidence that the electoral structure has a significant, perhaps even dominant, impact on the extent of [minority officeholding]."[27]

Until 1981, the only approach to the question had been to examine samples of at-large, mixed, and single-member-district cities at a single point to see whether there were fewer minority officials on council, proportionally, in cities using one election type instead of another. The results were typically presented in a contingency table or a regression equation. This cross-sectional method, however, has serious shortcomings even when used correctly, which it sometimes was not.

One problem is that several other factors besides the election system can affect minority officeholding. Some factors can be measured without difficulty and with their effects controlled in a cross-sectional design. Among these are the size of the city's minority population and the socioeconomic differences between blacks and whites. Another factor, whose effects are more difficult to control, is minority residential segregation; it has typically not been measured in cross-sectional studies because segregation data are difficult to obtain for sizable samples of cities.[28] Other variables are also difficult to gauge. One is the existence of racially gerrymandered district boundaries in ward-based or mixed-system cities, which can lead to an underestimation of the differences in minority representation between at-large and district cities.

To resolve these and other problems of the cross-sectional research design, Davidson and Korbel conducted a longitudinal study of jurisdictions before and after a change from an at-large to a district or mixed system to determine what kind of election rules provided the most equitable minority representation. The advantage of this approach—especially when effects are measured immediately before and after the change in election rules—is that very little change takes place in the cities aside from the change in election structure. Thus the effects of other factors that could influence minority officeholding are held constant.

Davidson and Korbel examined the forty-one cases of political jurisdictions, including cities, they could identify as having changed from at-large plans in Texas during the 1970s. The proportion of minority officeholders in the forty-one units increased from 10 to 29 percent after the change occurred: from 6 to 17 percent for blacks and from 5 to 12 percent for Mexican Americans.[29] As a result, both minority groups were represented in rough proportion to their percentage in the population in the forty-one units as a whole; before the change, they had been underrepresented, roughly speaking, by a factor of three. The findings in this longitudinal research, combined with those of corroborating studies using the cross-sectional method, seemed to vindicate the conventional view, at least so far as blacks were concerned.[30] (Some authors, however, while admitting that at-large elections disadvantaged Mexican Americans, questioned whether single-member-district remedies generally benefited them.)[31]

The controversy was revived in 1987 by Thernstrom, who claimed that whites had become increasingly accepting of minority candidates. And as it is the tendency of whites to bloc vote against minority candidates that gives at-large elections their force in diminishing minority officeholders, the implication of Thernstrom's claim was that at-large elections were not terribly different in their effects on minority officeholding from district elections. Consequently, most minority voters no longer needed the protections of the Voting Rights Act.[32] Although Thernstrom presented only the sketchiest of anecdotal evidence for her hypothesis, the spectacular success in 1989 of a few minority officeholders in predominantly white jurisdictions shortly after her book appeared gave some credence to her view. The mayoral victories of David Dinkins, John Daniels, and Norman Rice in New York City, New Haven, and Seattle, respectively, and Douglas Wilder's election as governor of Virginia were especially noteworthy.

More systematically gathered evidence also appeared to underscore Thernstrom's point. Welch, in the most comprehensive cross-sectional study that uses data from the 1980s rather than the 1970s, looked at the effect of election type on minority representation in 1988 in predominantly white cities of 50,000 or larger with at least 5 percent black or 5 percent Hispanic population. She found that the gap in black officeholding between at-large and mixed or district cities had narrowed sharply, in comparison to findings from earlier research, including her own. To be sure, in the nation as a whole blacks were still somewhat less well represented in at-large than in single-member-district cities, and the gap was greater in the South than in the non-South. But black representation in at-large cities generally had risen significantly, she concluded.[33]

However, Welch noted that her study, like earlier ones addressing this issue, used the cross-sectional design after the time when many cities—particularly in the South—had abandoned the at-large election system, and she acknowledged that this fact presents a problem of interpretation.[34] The problem is that some of the previously at-large cities are now in the sample of district or mixed cities that are compared to the remaining at-large ones. If the cities that changed election forms were more resistant than average to black candidates when they were using at-large systems, then more recent findings of small differences between at-large and districted systems in cross-sectional data may be biased by what is called a selection effect.

There is at least prima facie evidence to suggest that such a bias is operative. The cities that have abandoned at-large elections through litigation or threat of it have typically been cities that are vulnerable to legal challenge for having systematically defeated black or Hispanic candidates. In consequence, the disappearance from the at-large category of many such cities could lead to mistaken conclusions about the impact of at-large elections on minority representation, if the analysis depends entirely on cross-sectional data. For this reason a longitudinal, or "before-and-after," design is clearly preferable, even though research on this issue has, almost without exception, continued to use cross-sectional data.

Previous longitudinal research has exibited shortcomings as well. Grofman has criticized Davidson and Korbel for failing to incorporate into their longitudinal design a control group consisting of a sample of cities that did not change their at-large structure during the period when other cities were changing theirs.[35] This precluded knowing whether minority representation had also increased in unchanged cities, which one would have expected if white voters' attitudes were changing in cities generally with the passage of time.[36]

In 1983 Heilig and Mundt presented longitudinal data based on a sample of 209 southern cities of at least 10,000 persons containing a black population of at least 15 percent.[37] They compared cities that retained their election structure in the 1970s (whether at-large, mixed, or district plans) with those which changed during the decade from at-large to either mixed or district plans. The cities that changed election structures had sharp increases in black officeholding, a finding that corroborated the findings by Davidson and Korbel. There was virtually no change in black representation in cities that maintained an at-large system during the same period, and relatively small gains in the cities that retained mixed or district plans.

While Heilig and Mundt's study represents an advance over Korbel and Davidson's, given its use of a control group of unchanged cities, it, too, has methodological problems. First, the cities' black equity scores (ratios) for the two time periods were not exactly comparable. Those for the earlier period were either means of the cities' scores over the entire decade of the 1970s or, alternatively, "for the years in the decade before the change to districts." Those for the latter were apparently based on a score at a single point in 1980 or 1981.[38] Second, like Davidson and Korbel, the authors failed to control for the effects of the city's black population percentage, a factor known to influence black officeholding. But perhaps the most serious problem with their design was pointed out by Engstrom and McDonald, who observed that the cities were not placed randomly in experimental and control groups. "This leaves open the possibility that another factor or factors may be responsible for both the change in the electoral system and the increase in the number of blacks elected to the councils," such as black political mobilization.[39]

To examine the impact of at-large elections by utilizing a design that would overcome some of the flaws in both the previous longitudinal and cross-sectional studies, we decided to conduct new research in each of the eight southern "section 5 states," focusing on city election system changes (and in three states, county changes as well) during the period when the Voting Rights Act may well have had its greatest effect on minority officeholding.[40] Our findings are based on data for two different times[41] in all cities above a certain population size[42] with a black population (or in Texas, black plus Hispanic population) of at least 10 percent.[43] Our analysis controls for the effects of minority population size by classifying cities as those with a minority population of 10–29.9 percent, 30–49.9 percent, and 50 or larger percent. The data base identifies the number of elected officials who were black (and in Texas and North Carolina, Hispanic and Native American, respectively) at each time and identifies the election system in use at each time.[44] Election type is classified as either at large, single-member district, or mixed.[45] In all of the state chapters the population thresholds of the analyzed cities are far below the 25,000 or 50,000 thresholds used in most of the earlier studies. Our response rate for cities above the requisite size and population minimum in each state is very near 100 percent.[46] Thus, our data base of over one thousand cities is considerably larger than that in virtually all earlier studies,[47] even though the cities are located in only eight states.[48]

In addition to measuring the impact of election systems on minority representation, we wanted to determine if the Voting Rights Act influenced changes in the cities' election structure. Therefore, for every lawsuit filed challenging at-large rules in a city (and, in three states, counties too), the data set includes the case citation, the name of the attorney bringing the lawsuit, the name of the sponsoring organization, if any, and information about the disposition of the case, including the final outcome.[49]

Moreover, for each instance where there was a change in election method over the period in question, information was collected about the factors that led to the shift. For most states, where the shift was not voluntary, the proximate legal cause is classified according to whether a section 5 preclearance denial by the Justice Department was involved, or alternatively, a Fourteenth Amendment or section 2 challenge. Many of the state chapters also distinguish cases where the threat of litigation influenced the decision, and a few also specify whether the change was brought about by referendum.

The Tables

There are several kinds of tables in this book, all of which appear at the end of the chapters' text. Chapters 1, 10, 11, and 12 contain tables whose formats are unique to each of the four chapters, and they are numbered sequentially, beginning with 1, as they are mentioned in the text. In contrast, the 8 state chapters (2 through 9) contain four types of tables: those whose format is virtually identical in all eight; those whose format is similar in all eight; those whose format is a variation of tables of the first two types; and those which are unique to a state chapter and are not a variation on any of the "standard" tables. Let us briefly describe and illustrate these four types in the eight state chapters.

First, there are five tables whose format is virtually identical from one state chapter to the next. They are numbered 1 through 5 in each chapter, and they contain data on city election structures and minority equity of representation.[50] They can be found in the table section of any of the eight state chapters, and the reader will find it easy to compare, say, Alabama's table 5 with Georgia's or South Carolina's table 5.

Second, there are tables whose format is similar in all eight chapters, but not quite so much so as in the first five tables, and so their data are only roughly comparable. These are numbered 6 through 10. Thus, tables 1–10 can be thought of as "standard" tables, although 1–5 are more similar to their analogues in other states than 6–10 are. A glance at table 6 for Texas and Georgia will illustrate this. The Texas table presents a more complicated data configuration than the Georgia table, although the tables both address similar questions about city election structures in their state. Again, table 10 in both the Texas and Alabama chapters gives the percentage of minority officeholders, but the Texas table focuses on the statewide officeholding population, while the Alabama table presents data only on legislative officeholding.

Third, there are tables that are variations of standard tables in the state chapters, and as such they are designated with an A. For example, three state projects collected data for county office and presented them in a format similar to that for cities in their states' tables 1–5. Tables 1A–5A in the three chapters present the county data. To take another example of a variation on a standard table, Alabama table 5A presents data on changed city election structures for a time period different from that in Alabama table 5, in order to illustrate the way in which the selection effect can bias data in cross-sectional studies. Or, to mention yet another example, the Louisiana project composed a set of variations to Lousiana tables 1–5 using voting-age population, rather than total population, for the percentage base, to see if their test results would be different. These variations, too, are designated as tables 1A–5A in the Louisiana chapter.

Fourth, there were a few tables in the state chapters that were not variations on standard tables. They were given numbers above 10. For example, Lousiana table 11 presents black registration rates for Louisiana parishes in 1964. No equivalent data were gathered by other state projects. While we believe the four kinds of tables in the state chapters will be easy for the reader to distinguish once the tabular data are examined, we nonetheless urge him or her to pay attention to the table titles, which give full and accurate descriptions of each table's contents—especially when analogous tables in two or more state chapters are being compared.

A word should be said about one table composed for each of the eight state chapters that is not included in this book. Designated as table Z, it is a listing of all lawsuits filed between 1965 and 1989 under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Fifteenth Amendment, or the Voting Rights Act by private plaintiffs or the Justice Department that challenged at-large elections in municipalities in these states, as well as the disposition of the case, the ensuing changes in election structures, if any, and the names of plaintiffs' attorneys and their organizational affiliations. Some of these tables (or variations on these tables) also contain information on challenges to county election systems as well. Because of the length of these tables, and the fact that table 8 in each state chapter makes use of much of the information in it for analytic purposes, we have chosen not to include table Z. Nonetheless, it is archived along with the other data bases of this project, and can be obtained through the International Consortium for Political and Social Research at the University of Michigan.

The most important data on minority election success in the eight states provide the basis for tables 1–5 and their variations. Table 1 reports minority officeholding percentages in 1989 or 1990 for cities classified according to election type and minority population percentage. Table 2 reports minority officeholding percentages in terms of before-and-after comparisons (most commonly in 1974 and 1989) for cities that elected council at large at the beginning point of the study. The changes in minority representation in the cities that retained at-large systems over the entire period constitute a type of control for effects independent of change in election type. Table 3 refers only to cities with mixed election plans and reports the minority officeholding percentages in both the at-large and district components. Table 4 makes use of the data in table 1 to report two measures of minority representational equity in 1989 or 1990 for cities with each of the three election plans.[51] Both measures—one involving an arithmetic difference, the other a ratio—gauge proportionality of minority representation by comparing the percentage of minority officeholders on the governing body with the percentage of the total minority population in the jurisdiction. (A variation of table 4 in chapter 4—table 4.4A—substitutes minority voting-age population for minority total population in the state of Louisiana, thus providing a comparison between results using these two population measures.)

Table 5 makes use of the data in table 4 to report the ratio measure of minority representational equity for cities of the various types at both the beginning and the end of the period under study. It shows how equity has changed over time in cities that changed election plan and in those that did not.[52]

Among other things, these five tables allow us to develop a clear picture of the growth since the early 1970s in the number of black (and, in Texas, Hispanic) council members in cities with varying minority population proportions and election structures. The size of our data base allows us to establish with more confidence than would otherwise be possible the effect of the act on minority electoral success at the local level within individual southern states. Moreover, because our data permitted comparisons between changes in minority representation in the cities that retained at-large systems and those which did not, we can make some cautious inferences—as we do in chapter 10 for blacks—about how much of the growth in the number of minority officials is the result of change in election systems as distinct from change in other respects, including the willingness of whites to vote for minority candidates.

Tables 6 and 7 examine the racial characteristics of districts in relation to the race of the officeholder elected from those districts, in cities with single-member-district or mixed plans. They tell us how likely blacks are to be elected from districts with various percentages of whites and, in particular, how likely blacks are to be elected from majority-white districts. These two tables, then, are equivalent—for cities in the eight states—to various tables in chapter 11, which present similar information for legislative and congressional districts in all eleven southern states.

Table 8 contains a complete list, by city, of the reasons why cities changed to district or mixed plans during the period under analysis and enables us to estimate the extent to which the Voting Rights Act or Fourteenth Amendment litigation was directly responsible for abolition of at-large systems.[53] Thus, by examining table 8 in conjunction with table 5, we can model a three-step process in which voting rights litigation is either brought or threatened, which may lead to a change in election system, which in turn may lead to a change in minority electoral equity.

Table 9 focuses on disfranchisement. It contains a sobering list of each of the major disfranchising mechanisms used at some time between the end of the Civil War and the present era. Table 10 contains figures on black and white (and in Texas, Mexican-American and Anglo) registration at the time the Voting Rights Act was passed and in the late 1980s or early 1990s; it also contains figures on black and white officeholding in the 1960s and recent years. These data are presented as a percentage of total registrants and total officeholders (or, in some chapters, officeholders in each of the two statehouses), respectively, to provide a depiction of the changes in racial composition of these aggregates in the years since 1965.

Third- and Fourth-Generation Voting Research

As straightforward as our research goals were, they required a massive effort to gather and analyze several kinds of data and to situate them within a historical setting that gives them meaning. We nonetheless anticipate that some readers of this volume will charge us with not having addressed the question of whether the act has made a difference to ordinary southern blacks and Latinos. These readers will want to know: Has the federal guarantee of minority persons' right to vote and to elect candidates of their choice measurably changed their daily lives for the better?

We call first-generation research questions those having to do with minority enfranchisement, and second-generation those dealing with vote dilution and minority candidate electoral success. Third-generation issues concern the extent to which minority elected officials become an integral part of the political process: operating inside the system without being discriminated against, forming multiethnic coalitions, and working out resolutions to problems with fellow officials—in short, finding acceptance as active, influential players in the mainstream political game. Fourth-generation issues examine that game's output so far as minority citizens at the grass roots are concerned. Of concern here are the substantive policies that minority officeholders are able to get enacted and the impact these policies have on the life chances of their minority constituents. In these terms, it is clearly first- and second-generation questions that our project set out to answer definitively. By contrast, we asked the authors of the state chapters to ignore third- and fourth-generation problems. There were several reasons for this decision.

First and most obvious, the impact of the Voting Rights Act on minority registration and voting and the election of minority officials is a large and important topic in itself, requiring careful and time-consuming investigation. The act's impact has been the subject of much controversy. In particular, as we have already said, some scholars and political commentators claim that increased willingness of whites to vote for black candidates had by the 1980s largely obviated the need to make further changes in election methods. Only a comprehensive longitudinal data set on minority representation in southern jurisdictions, of the kind we have developed, permits this controversy to be adequately addressed.

Second, we are putting first things first. Before one can sensibly talk about policy consequences of the minority vote and minority officeholding, it is important to ascertain the pattern and causes of minority registration and electoral success. While it is widely assumed that the act has been responsible for increases in minority officeholding, there has been almost no systematic effort to test this assumption. The work reported in this book is the most extensive effort so far. We believe that it will, in itself, contribute to our understanding of law as an instrument of social change. In addition, we anticipate that it will facilitate an informed discussion of the act's implications for the theory of democratic representation. Until certain key factual issues are settled, however, we submit that such normative inquiry lacks guidance. In particular, we doubt the usefulness of an abstract debate over the merits of color-blind redistricting that ignores the issue of the prevalence of racially polarized voting and its effects in various types of election system.[54]

Third, relative to what is needed to study the policy consequences of black elected officials, our resources were prohibitively small. There have been a few serious efforts to answer third- and fourth-generation questions in selected southern jurisdictions, but this kind of research, even when focused on a small sample, requires a labor-intensive case-study approach carried out over a considerable period of time.[55] An attempt to provide a systematic answer to these questions based on an adequate, carefully selected sample of cities across the South would be a major undertaking—one, we believe, that would require at least the resources and time that went into our own project. In the absence of such an enterprise, comments on third-generation questions would necessarily be speculative. For this reason we encouraged our authors to forgo them.[56]

There is yet another reason why we decided not to pursue this line of inquiry here. Where the rights of long-excluded minority groups to vote and to elect candidates of their choice against concerted white opposition are concerned, we firmly believe that these two rights are not contingent on the groups' ability to demonstrate that their exercise results in measurable political incorporation or in policy benefits to the minority communities, even though common sense tells us that over time such results will come to pass. These voting rights can be justified—quite aside from their link to better police protection, job opportunities, and the like, in minority communities—solely on the basis of their power to confer full citizenship on the members of the group.[57]

Karst, the constitutional scholar, quotes Judge Learned Hand to make this point about the right to vote. "Of course I know how illusory would be the belief that my vote determined anything; but nevertheless when I go to the polls I have a satisfaction in the sense that we are all engaged in a common venture." Karst adds, "Voting is the preeminent symbol of participation in the society as a respected member, and equality in the voting process is a crucial affirmation of the equal worth of citizens."[58] What is true of voting is also true of electing candidates of choice. Where the ability to elect such candidates is systematically denied, a group long frozen out of the political process is denied the full measure of citizenship that has long remained beyond its grasp.

Tom McCain was one of the first blacks elected to office since Reconstruction in Edgefield County, South Carolina—home of racist firebrand Benjamin "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman and of long-time opponent of desegregation J. Strom Thurmond. Speaking in 1981, McCain said, "There's an inherent value in officeholding that goes far beyond picking up the garbage. A race of people who are excluded from public office will always be second class."[59]

We believe that the questions about whether black officeholding leads directly to political incorporation, whether it has immediate policy consequences, and if so in either case, under what circumstances, are important ones for social scientists to address.[60] However, to pursue them in this book, within the context of the history of black voting rights in the South, could easily muddy Karst's and McCain's distinction between, on the one hand, the justification of those rights on the basis of their conferring full citizenship and, on the other, justification on the basis of their enabling those who exercise them to achieve preferred policy goals. This confusion would be unfortunate.

All of these reasons, then, have militated against our attempting to answer third- and fourth-generation questions in this book.[61] Rather, the key issue we have tried to resolve is whether, during the first quarter century of its existence, the Voting Rights Act has made it possible for southern blacks (and in Texas, Mexican Americans) to vote without hindrance and to elect candidates of their choice.

The data sets that provide the basis for our authors' conclusions about the effects of the act on minority representation will be made publicly available through the computerized data archives of the Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research at the University of Michigan within six months of this book's publication. Thus, if there are disagreements with the conclusions reached by the authors, they can be debated with respect to a common comprehensive data base. Even more important, we see the comprehensive data base that has been generated by our authors as one of the project's lasting legacies, one that will be of use for some time to come, we hope, to students of voting rights and broader issues of race and politics in the South.[62]

Chapter Organization

Chapter 1 describes the legal context in which the recent battle for minority participation was fought. It attempts to show how the act evolved synergistically with the constitutional voting rights protections that were elucidated in a remarkable series of federal court decisions beginning in 1960 and continuing into the 1980s. Chapters 2 through 9 contain individual accounts of the impact of the act, particularly on local election systems, in the eight southern states covered entirely or in substantial part by the section 5 preclearance provision.

The data on voting rights litigation and minority officeholding in the eight state chapters are summarized and commented upon in chapter 10. Changes in city election structure are gauged. Then the effect of these changes on minority officeholding is measured. Further, the ability of blacks to win office from districts of varying black population proportions is examined. Taken together, this information allows inferences about the direct link between enforcement of the act and minority officeholding. Chapter 10 also contains a discussion of the issues that led us to adopt the longitudinal design that served as the unifying framework for the individual state chapters.

Chapter 11 examines the relationship between the black population proportion in state legislative and congressional districts in the eleven southern states and the ability of blacks to win election there. It provides an overview of minority legislative and congressional representation in the South (including states not covered under section 5) and links changes in minority representation to voting rights litigation and preclearance decisions. Chapter 12 answers the first-generation question of how the act affected the black-white registration rates in the eleven-state South. Chapter 13 summarizes and interprets the larger significance of the book's major findings.

PART ONE

The View from the States

CHAPTER ONE

The Recent Evolution of Voting Rights Law Affecting Racial and Language Minorities

CHANDLER DAVIDSON

THE VOTING RIGHTS of American ethnic minority groups are guaranteed primarily by two documents: the United States Constitution—especially the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments—and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Some of the same principles are contained in both, but there are important differences between the two, including differences in coverage, legal standing of parties, methods of enforcement, and standards of proving discrimination.

This volume examines the effects of the Voting Rights Act. Yet the act, as it has evolved, is interwoven with constitutional voting rights law that grew out of a series of judicial decisions enunciating the rights of racial and language minorities as these groups were making an extraordinary push for inclusion in the American polity. An understanding of the act therefore requires an appreciation of the synergystic relation between the mandates of the act and those of the Constitution regarding the rights of minority voters. There has yet to appear a standard legal history of the modern development of minority voting rights, from the abolition of the white primary by the Supreme Court in 1944[1] to the Court's latest full-dress interpretation of the Voting Rights Act's prohibition of minority vote dilution in 1986.[2] In the absence of such a history, I will sketch the merest outline of one as a road map for reading the chapters that follow.

After the Civil War, southern states were required by the Military Reconstruction Acts of 1867 to adopt new constitutions granting universal male suffrage regardless of race as a precondition for readmission to the Union. The Fifteenth Amendment, ratified in 1870, seemed to guarantee blacks the franchise by prohibiting vote discrimination on the basis of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."[3] Nonetheless, by the turn of the century white conservative officials had effectively nullified the black vote as a political force in the eleven states of the former Confederacy. The elimination of black suffrage was made possible by northern indifference to the plight of southern blacks after the Hayes-Tilden Compromise in 1877, southern intimidation of potential black voters, corruption and fraud at the ballot box, Supreme Court decisions striking down various provisions of the Enforcement Act of 1870 and the Force Act of 1871, and subsequent court decisions permitting southern states to rewrite their constitutions to exclude blacks by devices such as literacy and good character tests and the poll tax. The Fifteenth Amendment, ignored by racist southern officials and racist courts, was a dead letter. As a weapon to protect black voting rights, another Civil War amendment, the Fourteenth, with its potentially powerful equal protection clause, suffered the same fate.

Southern blacks continued to fight for the franchise that had been promised them. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, founded in 1910, became the main organization through which the laws preventing black voting were attacked. The first significant breakthrough came in 1944, when the Supreme Court unanimously held that the Texas Democratic party's exclusive white primary elections violated the Fifteenth Amendment. It was not until passage of the Voting Rights Act, however, that the last major barriers to voting were breached.

Minority Vote Dilution

The original purpose of the act was primarily to destroy the remaining barriers to the full exercise of the black franchise. But the act would soon be used to confront a quite different problem: electoral devices that operated to restrict the impact of black votes. Their establishment was in many instances the result of white southern politicians' recognition after World War II that, since black enfranchisement was probably inevitable and the white primary no longer existed as a force to prohibit black voters from participating in the all-important nominating elections, new means would have to be found to limit black voters' effectiveness. The fear of black voting—and in Texas, of Mexican-American voting as well—led southern officials, years before the Voting Rights Act was passed, to enact laws to prevent minority candidates from gaining office when barriers to voting fell. Whites had used such laws in the nineteenth century both during and after Reconstruction to dilute or curtail the power blacks had obtained at the ballot box.[4]

The distinction between disfranchisement and dilution can be made as follows. Disfranchisement prohibits or discourages a group from voting—for example, through making it difficult to register, intimidating would-be voters from entering the polling booth, declaring ballots invalid for specious reasons, stuffing the ballot box, or inaccurately tallying votes. Dilution, on the other hand, can operate even when all voters have full access to the polling place and are assured that their votes will be fairly tallied.

Vote dilution is a process whereby election laws or practices, either singly or in concert, combine with systematic bloc voting among an identifiable group to diminish the voting strength of at least one other group. The idea is that one group, voting cohesively for its preferred candidates, is systematically outvoted by a larger group that is also cohesive. If both groups are cohesive or, in other words, vote as opposing blocs, then racially polarized voting exists. Dilution can occur as a result of polarization between Democrats and Republicans, between rural voters and urban ones, or between any other identifiable factions in the electorate.[5]

Ethnic or racial vote dilution takes place when a majority of voters, by bloc voting for its candidates in a series of elections, systematically prevents an ethnic minority from electing most or all of its preferred candidates—candidates who will probably be members of the minority group—in an election system to which there is a feasible alternative. Vote dilution not only can deprive minority voters of the important symbolic achievement of being represented by preferred members of their own group, it can deprive them of a committed advocate in councils of government. In doing this, it may also deprive them of the substantial benefits that government bestows—from streetlights to storm sewers, municipal employment to fire protection, fair law enforcement to efficient public transportation.

Several election rules or practices may have a dilutionary impact when used in a setting of racially polarized voting. One of the most familiar is the gerrymander, by which district lines are drawn either to diminish the proportion of minority voters in districts or, alternatively, to pack far more minority voters in a district than is necessary for their candidates to win, thus reducing the number of districts with a substantial minority population or voter preponderance. Another is the at-large election plan (a type of multimember district), which has instead of several single-member districts or "wards"—some of which might contain a majority of minority voters—only one district, all of whose members are chosen by an electorate in which the ethnic minority may also be an arithmetic minority. If voting is polarized, then the majority in an at-large system will be able to elect all its candidates, and the minority will not be able to elect any. Even if the degree of polarization is less than absolute, the ability of minority voters to elect their candidates can be severely diminished.

Yet a third election practice that sometimes dilutes minority votes is the majority-runoff requirement. A runoff is a two-stage election procedure whose second stage comes into effect only if no candidate wins a majority of the votes. In the first election, the white majority may split among several candidates, with the result that a candidate favored by the minority would obtain a plurality. Under a plurality-win arrangement (which is a very common one in U.S. cities), the minority candidate in this situation would win. Under a majority-win rule, however, a runoff is required if no majority is obtained in the first election. If in the runoff the white majority coalesces behind the white candidate who was runner-up in the first contest, the white bloc vote can often defeat the front-running minority candidate, even if the minority bloc is strongly behind that person. This arrangement has sometimes been adopted by white officials soon after minority voters enter the electorate in large numbers, or after a minority candidate has won or come close to winning under the plurality-win rule.[6]

A fourth dilution measure, of which there are two common types, is the anti-single-shot device. The first type operates in elections where all candidates run against each other and the top vote getters fill the available seats. The device restricts the ability of voters to single-shoot (sometimes called "bullet vote"), that is, to withhold votes for some candidates in order to help their favored one. Blacks, for example, have often decided as a group before an election that the white bloc vote will defeat their preferred candidate if blacks vote not only for their candidate but for as many others as they have votes to cast. So they decide on the candidate they will vote for while witholding votes for the other candidates, who are, in effect, her competitors. This strategy has often led to the election of a black in a polarized setting, although it requires black voters to forgo having a say in the election of other officials. The single-shot strategy is frustrated by the full-slate rule, requiring voters to cast all their available votes or to have their ballots invalidated. Another device is the numbered place system, whereby every candidate is required to declare for "place" 1, 2, 3, and so forth, on the ballot rather than run against all other candidates in a single contest. As voters can cast only one vote per place, this system prevents them from withholding votes from their favored candidate's competitors. It is sometimes resorted to when more straightforward prohibitions against single-shot voting are not feasible.[7] In a racially polarized setting, both anti-single-shot devices prevent a successful single-shot strategy to elect a minority candidate.

As Kousser has shown, southern white officials have long known the dilutionary effects of these arcane laws when used in a racially polarized setting.[8] While it is true that ordinary voters show little interest in the intricacies of voting laws, the politicos of even the smallest towns make it their business to understand how voting rules advantage some groups over others. This knowledge, after all, can powerfully influence who wins and who loses; and election results can affect how and to whom city contracts are let, on whose property the county airport will get built, how high the tax rate will be, who gets on the city payroll, in whose neighborhood the waste treatment plant will be located, or how aggressively environmental regulations will be enforced.[9] This practical political knowledge of election rules was used by southern whites against blacks from the end of the Civil War until disfranchisement, when the black vote was no longer a serious factor.[10]

But when it threatened to become one again, efforts were mounted throughout the former Confederacy to establish laws that would dilute minority voting strength. The chapters that follow provide detailed accounts of these efforts from the 1940s onward. The methods were the same ones that had been used during Reconstruction. Rosenberg provides a useful laundry list of the tactics—some disfranchising, some diluting—that whites have employed in recent decades when confronted by the prospects of black officeholding:

> When blacks attempted to run as candidates, discriminatory administration of neutral laws resulted in the following: abolition of the office; extension of the term of the white incumbent; substitution of appointment for election; increase in filing fees; raising of requirements for independent candidates; increase in property qualifications; withholding information on how to qualify; withholding or delaying required certification of nominating petitions. And finally, of course, there are the time-honored practices of gerrymandering, county consolidation, switching to at-large elections, and the like, which all can act to continue to deprive blacks of any political representation.[11]

The Alabama legislature in 1951, for example, enacted a full-slate law preventing single-shot voting, a law that applied to every election in the state.[12] The city of Tuskegee, with its large black population, was specifically mentioned by one white legislator who said the law was necessary because "there are some who fear that the colored voters might be able to elect one of their own race" to Tuskegee's city council.[13] But when the full-slate law proved insufficient to this end, the legislature went a step further by redrawing the city's boundaries to exclude virtually all of the city's black voters but none of its white ones. In Gomillion v. Lightfoot (1960) the Supreme Court held that the law violated the Fifteenth Amendment.[14] Justice Felix Frankfurter, who wrote the opinion, saw the boundary manipulation as vote denial rather than vote dilution,[15] but the decision called attention to the way in which drawing boundaries could affect the political strength of blacks; and Frankfurter cited one of the Court's earlier opinions, Lane v. Wilson (1939)[16] in holding that "the [Fifteenth] Amendment nullifies sophisticated as well as simple-minded modes of discrimination."[17] The quoted passage continues: "It hits onerous procedural requirements which effectively handicap exercise of the franchise by the colored race although the abstract right to vote may remain unrestricted as to race."

When the Voting Rights Act was passed, Alabama blacks began to vote in significant numbers. But the white registration rate also shot upward. Indeed, the net gain in white registration between 1964 and 1967 outstripped that of blacks, thanks to the efforts of Governor George Wallace and his followers. The fear of black officeholding in the state was no doubt partially responsible for this upsurge. Shortly after the Selma-to-Montgomery march the spring preceding passage of the act, a state senator pushed through a bill to require at-large commission elections in Barbour County, which till then had had districts. The reason he gave was to restrict the impact of "the block vote."[18] The first minority vote dilution suit, Smith v. Paris,[19] was filed in Alabama in 1966, challenging another switch in Barbour County elections—this one pertaining to the county's Democratic Executive Committee.

In 1947 the first southern black running against whites was elected to public office since the turn of the century. He won a seat on the Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Board of Aldermen under a ward system. Soon afterward a new district plan was adopted to restrict black officeholding to one ward out of eight.[20] After a black was elected in Wilson, a town in eastern North Carolina, in 1953 and 1955, the legislature changed the election plan from district to at large, resulting once more in an all-white council.[21]

These stratagems were harbingers of more widespread resistance to black officeholding in North Carolina, a state that has long prided itself on its relative moderation in racial matters. In 1966, shortly after the Voting Rights Act was passed, the general assembly in special session authorized almost half the state's counties' governing bodies to adopt at-large elections. Departing from past practice, the state would also require at-large elections in every school district in North Carolina.[22] In South Carolina between 1965 and 1973, eleven of nineteen counties that elected at least some members of their governing board from districts had switched to at-large systems.[23]

In Georgia, the legislature responded to a federal court order in 1962 requiring

reapportionment by presenting a plan that maintained single-member districts in most areas of the state but that created multimember districts in counties with more than one state senator, which included Fulton County, with its heavily black areas. During debate on the bill, a senator had warned his colleagues of the danger that a black might be elected in Fulton County under a single-member-district scheme. The plan was narrowly averted only hours from election day by a court order holding that the scheme violated the state constitution's prohibition of multimember elections in senate races; thus Georgia's first black senator since Reconstruction was subsequently elected.[24]

When the Supreme Court struck down the Georgia county-unit system, a malapportionment mechanism that diluted the votes of blacks, among others, the legislature passed majority-vote and numbered-place requirements in all state and federal elections. The bill, introduced in 1963, thus changed the plurality requirement in as many as 100 of the state's 159 counties. The law's sponsor spoke openly of its purpose "to thwart election control by Negroes and other minorities." In 1968, shortly after passage of the Voting Rights Act, the legislature extended the majority-vote requirement to many municipalities.[25] In Louisiana several police juries—the county governing bodies in the state—switched from district to at-large elections in the late 1960s and early 1970s.[26]

Soon after Brown v. Board of Education the Texas legislature began passing laws with increasing frequency that enabled school districts and cities to adopt the place voting system. One purpose, according to a student of place voting, was to prevent the election of minority officeholders by preventing single-shot voting.[27] In 1966, as a result of court-mandated reapportionment, the legislature gerrymandered district lines to dilute minority votes. It also imposed a minority-runoff requirement for school board elections in Houston, site of the state's largest school district, after two blacks and a white liberal had won election under the plurality rule. In the same period conservative Democrats set in motion an effort to shift elections for state office to off years. When the effort succeeded in the early 1970s, voter turnout, which had gradually been rising since the abolition of the state's white primary in 1944, decreased in state elections by about one-third.[28] In Mississippi in 1962, as black voter registration drives were beginning, the legislature passed a law requiring a large number of municipalities to elect aldermen on an at-large basis.[29] In Virginia, the legislature blatantly diluted the black vote in its 1964 reapportionment plan by creating a two-member senate district in Richmond and by joining the city of Richmond, 42 percent black, with Henrico County to form an eight-person multimember house of delegates district that was only 29 percent black.[30]

In short, there was widespread hostility among southern whites to black officeholding before passage of the Voting Rights Act—a hostility that found ready expression in legislation designed to curtail minority political strength even as the civil rights movement was expanding it. Once the act was passed, efforts to undercut blacks' newly gained voting strength continued, not only by creating at-large or multimember districts in many kinds of jurisdictions but by gerrymandering existing single-member districts to restrict the possibility of black (and Mexican-American) officeholding.[31] These efforts continued into the 1980s, and if they have begun to diminish, it is at least partly because the evolution of voting rights law has made them more difficult and more costly to white officials in southern jurisdictions.[32]

Vote Dilution and the Constitution

The Supreme Court's involvement in the question of vote dilution followed on the heels of Gomillion, the case that originated in Tuskegee, Alabama, where blacks were gerrymandered out of the city's municipal boundaries. The Court held in a case originating in Tennessee, Baker v. Carr (1962),[33] that legislative apportionment was justiciable. In Reynolds v. Sims (1964),[34] decided the year before the Voting Rights Act was passed, it held that because Alabama legislative districts contained unequal numbers of voters, the state's apportionment diluted the votes of inhabitants of the heavily populated districts and thus violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court required the legislature to reapportion itself on the basis of population equality.

In Reynolds, Alabama plaintiffs had sued to rectify the dilution of white suburban votes by a rural-dominated legislature at a time when few blacks could vote in that state.[35] Race was not explicitly at issue. Nor was it in Fortson v. Dorsey,[36] a Georgia dilution case that the Supreme Court decided in 1965. Rejecting a claim by Georgia voters that a combination of single-member and multimember legislative districts diluted the votes of residents of the multimember districts, the Court nonetheless said that while multimember districts were not inherently unconstitutional, they might be if they operated "designedly or otherwise . . . to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial or political elements of the voting population."[37] The Court was silent as to how that might happen.

Black plaintiffs then filed class actions trying to convince the courts that multimember districts, including at-large election systems, did in fact violate their constitutional rights.[38] These cases typically invoked the Fifteenth Amendment and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (claiming that plaintiffs' right to equal political participation was denied), and they sought as a remedy the creation of single-member-district plans. But not until 1973 did the Court hold that unconstitutional minority vote dilution had been proven. In White v. Regester,[39] an action filed in Texas by Mexican-American and black voters who challenged multimember legislative districts in Bexar County and Dallas County, respectively, after the 1970s round of redistricting, the Court unanimously found for the plaintiffs. However, its reasoning as to why the districts were unconstitutional was vague. The Court cited a number of factors: the long history of state-sanctioned discrimination against blacks in Texas and the history of discrimination against Mexican Americans as well; the small number of blacks and Mexican Americans elected to office in Dallas and Bexar Counties, respectively; and the existence of a powerful white-dominated slating group in Dallas that ignored blacks' interests and engaged in racial campaign tactics to defeat candidates of blacks' choice. The Court also cited cultural and language barriers that had depressed Mexican-American registration and Bexar County legislators' lack of responsiveness to Mexican-American interests. It pointed to the existence of the majority-vote and numbered-place rules as enhancing the opportunity for racial discrimination in the counties' multimember settings. There was no indication, however, that the Court considered any of the items on this laundry list to be determinative. It simply approved the trial court's conclusion based on its examination of the "totality of the circumstances." Taken together, the high court said, they revealed that blacks and Mexican Americans "had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice."[40]

The vagueness of the opinion bothered voting rights lawyers, especially inasmuch as the justices did not even try to explain why the record in White differed from an earlier case with similar facts, in which the Court had found for the defendants.[41] A subsequent circuit court opinion, Zimmer v. McKeithen,[42] systematized the facts to be considered in a dilution case and, drawing on White, listed eight criteria as relevant. Four of these it called "primary" and four others "enhancing." But, like White, it did not specify determinative factors: "The fact of dilution is established," the Court said, "upon proof of the existence of an aggregate of these factors."[43]

The heavy burden of proof plaintiffs in these cases were required to shoulder is indicated by the list of "Zimmer criteria."

> Where a minority can demonstrate a lack of access to the process of slating candidates, the unresponsiveness of legislators to their particularized interests, a tenuous state policy underlying their preference for multimember or at-large districting, or that the existence of past discrimination in general precludes the effective participation in the election system, a strong case is made. Such proof is enhanced by a showing of the existence of large districts, majority vote requirements, anti-single shot voting provisions, and the lack of provision for at-large candidates running from particular geographical subdistricts.[44]

In spite of this burden, minority plaintiffs in the years following White filed a number of constitutional challenges to at-large election schemes throughout the eight states covered by section 5—at least forty from 1973 through 1980. City councils, county commissioners' courts, and school boards—often in large cities—were the main targets of these suits, which were litigated primarily by attorneys with the Legal Services Corporation, the American Civil Liberties Union, the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project, and various private attorneys who began to specialize in voting rights cases. In some instances the U.S. Department of Justice also filed suit or was involved as intervenor or amicus curiae.[45] a list of relevant factors without specifying any as determinative, plaintiffs' lawyers tried to cover all the bases. They hired experts to investigate the racial history of the jurisdiction's major institutions, the history of its electoral system, and the socioeconomic situation of minorities compared to that of the majority in recent decades. The experts conducted detailed demographic studies of the ethnic groups to establish whether single-member districts would in fact remedy the vote dilution that existed under the challenged at-large system. Experts closely examined many kinds of statistics on local government hiring of minorities over time, government responsiveness to minority concerns, and government appointments to boards and commissions. They scrutinized newspapers and other documents for signs of racial appeals to white voters in elections involving minority candidates. They developed and applied methodological and statistical techniques for measuring such things as racial polarization and residential segregation—techniques that were sometimes refined after courtroom cross-examination by defense lawyers and criticism by opposing experts. Lawyers submitted interrogatories to officials requesting numerous records. They deposed potential witnesses. "Visuals" presenting many kinds of social science data were constructed. By the time these cases went to trial, the evidence, marshaled and systematized by lawyers and expert witnesses for both sides, often resembled huge, historically framed ethnographies of the jurisdiction's race relations and politics, sometimes spanning many decades.

The task of the plaintiffs was formidable. Because White and Zimmer presented

The burdensome nature of these cases at the trial court level alone should be obvious from this description. The data-gathering process sometimes had to be extended when cases were appealed and then remanded to the trial courts for further fact-finding. In the intervening period, statistics might become dated as the factual situation evolved or new statistical sources became available. In the case that was ultimately styled City of Mobile v. Bolden,[46] black plaintiffs' lawyers filed suit in 1975 challenging the city's at-large election system; the case worked its way to the Supreme Court, which announced its decision in 1980 and remanded the case to the district court for further factual findings. The case was reheard in 1981 after extensive new evidence by four expert witnesses for the plaintiffs and the Justice Department and was finally decided in 1982. The first elections under the new district plan were held in 1985, ten years after the case was originally filed. Plaintiffs' lawyers logged 5,525 hours and spent $96,000 in out-of-pocket fees, which were exclusive of expenses incurred by Justice Department lawyers after the department intervened and the costs of expert witnesses and paralegals.[47] While Bolden was not typical, many other Fourteenth Amendment cases also involved massive data collection efforts and bounced back and forth between district and appeals courts for years.

The Origins of the Voting Rights Act of 1965

In 1940 approximately 3 percent of the black voting-age population in the South was registered to vote, which was about the same proportion it had been forty years earlier.[48] After World War II that figure began to rise, and by 1964 it stood at 43.3 percent. However, in many areas, particularly where the racial caste system was strongest, white resistance to black voting was adamant. Blacks who attempted to register risked economic reprisals, violent repression, and sometimes death. In spite of courageous efforts by civil rights groups and local black leaders to increase registration and in spite of the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960, and 1964, with their relatively weak voting provisions, little progress was made enforcing the Fifteenth Amendment in the areas of greatest resistance—five southern states with large black populations: Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina. In 1964 average black registration in the five was 22.5 percent; in Mississippi it was 6.7.[49]

Lyndon Johnson's decision in late 1964 to press forward with a voting rights statute reflected a combination of factors: the inability of previous civil rights laws to crack white resistance to black voting,[50] a changing climate of public opinion outside the Deep South, the heroism exhibited by many civil rights activists, Johnson's concern with his place in history as well as his genuine desire to guarantee black voting rights, and calculations of Democratic advantage at a point when white southern support for the Democratic national ticket was eroding. Barry Goldwater's 1964 sweep of the Deep South, a bastion of Democratic strength since Reconstruction, had underscored the erosion.

About the same time Johnson reached his decision, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, a civil rights group led by the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., chose Selma, Alabama, to be the battleground for a do-or-die push for black voting rights. Another civil rights group, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and the Department of Justice had been working unsuccessfully for some time to register black voters in Selma and surrounding Dallas County. The drive, launched on 2 January 1965, provoked violence against the demonstrators and eventually led to the deaths of one black and two white protesters. The national outrage over the brutality of Alabama lawmen and of white terrorists galvanized Congress to enact Johnson's bill by a very large margin, even in the face of bitter resistance from most southern white congressmen.[51]

Provisions of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, as Amended

Until the 1980s the key components of the original act were the temporary provisions contained in sections 4 through 9, which were renewed and amended in 1970, 1975, and 1982, the last time for a period of twenty-five years.[52] They will come up again for congressional consideration in 2007. As with its original passage in 1965, extensions and amendments of the act in all three years reflected a strong bipartisan consensus, although there were initial attempts by presidents Nixon and Reagan in 1970 and 1982, respectively, to sabotage extension of various important provisions of the act.[53]

In 1965 the most imposing barrier to the black franchise was the literacy test in the seven southern states of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia. Even when fairly employed, this test often kept a disproportionate number of blacks from registering, since the South's unequal school system had provided blacks with an inferior education. But it was not always fairly administered, and then the effects were even more discriminatory than they otherwise would have been. Section 4 of the act contained a triggering formula that originally abolished literacy tests for a five-year period in any state or subdivision that used a test or similar device as a voting requirement on 1 November 1964 and had a voter registration rate on that date (or a voter turnout in the 1964 presidential election) of less than 50 percent of the voting-age residents. Between 1965 and 1975 six southern states and much of a seventh were the primary areas covered by this formula: Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Virginia, and forty counties in North Carolina.

A major expansion of section 4 coverage occurred in 1975, when an additional language-minority trigger formula was added. A jurisdiction would be covered according to this formula if more than 5 percent of the voting-age citizens belonged to a single language minority group (defined as Asian Americans, American Indians, Alaskan natives, and persons of Spanish heritage), if, furthermore, fewer than 50 percent of voting-age citizens had voted in the 1972 presidential election, and if that election had been conducted only in English. Jurisdictions thus covered were required to provide election materials, including ballots, in the appropriate language in addition to English.[54] This new formula brought under the umbrella of section 4 the state of Texas—also a part of the old Confederacy, with its large black and Mexican-American populations—as well as the entire states of Alaska and Arizona and a number of counties in other states.

Section 5, which pertains only to the jurisdictions covered as a result of section 4's triggering formula, froze in place all voting statutes, pending federal approval of proposed changes. Jurisdictions were required to submit to the Attorney General (who normally had sixty days to object) or to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia all proposed changes having to do with voting that were in force before coverage. In the areas originally covered, the freeze date was 1 November 1964. In others, it was a later date, depending on when coverage first occurred. The proposed changes would be "precleared" for approval, each jurisdiction separately, after federal scrutiny of the particular facts if and only if the changes did not have the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, or (after 1975) language-minority status. Section 5 preclearance requirements have, at one time or another, covered all or part of twenty-two states, although the focus has consistently been on the South. Today, section 5 covers nine states entirely and counties in seven additional ones.[55]

Sections 6 and 7 gave the Attorney General authority to appoint federal officials as voting examiners, or "registrars," who could be sent into jurisdictions covered by section 4 to ensure that legally qualified persons were free to register in federal, state, and local elections. Section 8 provided for the Attorney General to assign, when needed, federal observers to oversee the actual voting process in covered jurisdictions. Section 9 spelled out the procedures for challenging lists of eligible voters drawn up by federal registrars.

Other sections of the original act instructed the Attorney General to challenge the constitutionality of the poll tax as a voting requirement in the four states that still retained it for state elections (it had just been outlawed at the federal level by the Twenty-fourth Amendment, ratified in 1964); prohibited, under threat of penalty, interfering with the voting rights of qualified voters or engaging in voting fraud; and spelled out in detail the meaning of vote or voting for purposes of the act.[56] In South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966)[57] the Supreme Court found constitutional all those sections of the act challenged by the state of South Carolina, including most of section 4 and all of section 5.

Vote Dilution Issues under Section 5 of the Act

Initially the key provisions of the Voting Rights Act were those dealing with voter registration. For almost four years after passage, the Justice Department did not apply the section 5 preclearance mechanism to proposed changes in voting laws that threatened to dilute minority votes. The situation changed dramatically as a result of Allen v. State Board of Elections,[58] a 1969 Supreme Court decision based on suits filed in Virginia and Mississippi. The facts in Mississippi were particularly egregious. The 1966 legislature, without public debate, passed a package of election laws that would diminish black voting strength. Among them was a bill requiring at-large election of all county boards of supervisors and boards of education. A senator explained that the change from wards to countywide elections would protect "a white board and preserve our way of doing business."[59] Lawyers for black voters argued that these bills should have been cleared with the Justice Department under section 5; Mississippi disagreed. After reviewing the Voting Rights Act's legislative history, the Supreme Court held that preclearance was required, reasoning that the act "gives a broad interpretation to the right to vote, recognizing that voting includes 'all action necessary to make a vote effective.'"[60]

Preclearance decisions are not subject to judicial review. Thus section 5, as interpreted by Allen in 1969, gave the Justice Department unprecedented authority to monitor election procedure in covered areas for evidence not only of disfranchisement but of vote dilution and to force compliance. Whereas the department had not objected to a single instance of vote dilution before 1969, it began to object that year and continued to do so thereafter with increasing frequency,[61] signaling to the multitude of covered jurisdictions that attempts to make dilutionary changes in their election laws would encounter difficulties.

Allen was a tremendously important decision for two reasons. By interpreting section 5 as requiring preclearance of election changes that could affect black representation as well as black voting, it gave the Justice Department's review powers a much broader scope than they otherwise would have had. But equally as important, in this decision the Court expanded the notion of vote dilution beyond that developed in the reapportionment cases—where an individual's vote was diluted by virtue of unequally populated districts—to include the dilution of a group's vote by any number of devices, including submersion in an at-large election system. The expanded idea of dilution in Allen was implicit in White v. Regester in 1973, although the Court was still struggling to articulate it.[62] Indeed, the idea would not be spelled out precisely by the Court until Thornburg v. Gingles,[63] decided more than a decade later. But minority vote dilution as a group-based phenomenon was clearly the target of the Fourteenth Amendment voting rights cases growing out of White and Zimmer; and so in an important sense the Voting Rights Act from 1969 on has influenced the development of the constitutional case law on this subject. As the Fourteenth Amendment was the primary weapon by which minority plaintiffs could attack at-large elections and other multimember districting schemes that diminished their voting strength until section 2 was amended in 1982, the synergistic relation between the U.S. Constitution and the act is obvious.

The reach of section 5 in protecting against dilution was limited in four respects, however. First, its coverage was restricted to a minority of the states and to a small number of jurisdictions within several of these. In 1981, for example, all or parts of twenty-two states were covered by the preclearance provisions, but only nine (seven in the South) were entirely covered, and in the remaining thirteen states, ten had fewer than six covered counties. Second, dilutionary laws on the books at the time jurisdictions were first covered by section 5 could not be challenged unless officials proposed changes. In many instances, dilutionary laws already in place simply remained unchanged. Third, when officials decided to pass a dilutionary law, they sometimes failed to submit it to the Justice Department or the Washington, D.C., court for preclearance, despite the section 5 requirement to do so. Once enacted, the changes might escape detection indefinitely. This was especially a problem in the early years of the act. Fourth, under the standard enunciated by the Supreme Court in Beer v. United States (1974),[64] only those proposed electoral changes in covered jurisdictions that were "retrogressive" or, in other words, would actually diminish minority voting strength from what it had been, were prohibited under section 5. Thus if the election law to be supplanted by the proposed change already diluted minority voting strength and the proposed change would not dilute it more, the change was permissible.[65]

In short, while section 5 was enforced by the Justice Department with growing effectiveness from the early 1970s on, especially with respect to state legislative redistricting, and while it undoubtedly prevented numerous dilutionary devices from being implemented, it was an instrument with serious limitations. These limitations led plaintiffs and their lawyers to continue to press suits in the federal courts, claiming that election structures violated the constitutional right of the minority group to an equal opportunity to elect candidates of its choice.

Bolden and the Amendment of Section 2

City of Mobile v. Bolden was a major turning point in the evolution of voting rights law, both constitutional and statutory. The Supreme Court in 1980 handed down the decision, sending shock waves through the voting rights community. A plurality of the badly divided Court held that the Fifteenth Amendment prohibited only formal barriers to registration and voting—not vote dilution. And it held that a Fourteenth Amendment violation required a showing of racially invidious purpose in creating or maintaining a dilutionary system such as at-large elections. The decision indicated, in the words of two voting rights lawyers, that "the justices confronted the lingering problem of adjudicating at-large vote dilution cases caused by the lack of clearly enunciated standards, but no five justices could agree on a solution."[66]

The intent requirement seemed to be the straw that would break the camel's back in voting rights cases, where the load borne by the plaintiffs' camel was already heavy. It was not simply one more burden equal in importance to the eight other Zimmer factors. Often the at-large system, like that in Mobile, had been established at the turn of the century as part of a Progressive Era reform package described by its advocates as a "good government" measure but often intended to get socialists, blacks, and white ethnic or working-class representatives off city council.[67] The likelihood was remote that plaintiffs in these cities could uncover "smoking guns" indicating reformers' racial intent more than half a century after the fact. In some cities there were not even extant public records or newspaper accounts that described the events leading to the adoption of such reforms. While this was not true for Mobile, the complexity of that city's racial politics in the early twentieth century was such that, when forced to present evidence of racially discriminatory purpose after the case was remanded to the district court, plaintiffs' lawyers and the Justice Department, intervenor in the case, felt compelled to hire three historians to comb the record—which stretched back to the early nineteenth century—for months. The results of this research led to the discovery of evidence of discriminatory intent in the Bolden case and an ultimate victory for the plaintiffs. But the hundreds of hours of historical research that might go into the discovery of incriminating racial motives would very likely have been prohibitive in most cases.

Faced with the new Bolden requirements, the voting rights bar mobilized the national civil rights lobby to press for a statutory response to the Court's decision. As fate would have it, the Voting Rights Act was coming up for renewal in 1982, and civil rights strategists decided to try to convince Congress to amend section 2—a permanent feature of the act covering the entire nation—to restore the White-Zimmer factors as the criteria for proving minority vote dilution. While this tactic appeared in 1981 to be a long shot, given the recent election of Ronald Reagan as president and his appointment of a quite conservative attorney general and assistant attorney general for civil rights—William French Smith and William Bradford Reynolds, respectively—it ultimately succeeded. In 1982 the Voting Rights Act was extended and the amendments to section 2 that the voting rights bar sought were made, thanks partly to clarifying compromise language introduced by Republican senator Robert Dole of Kansas. The amendment passed both houses of Congress by veto-proof majorities, despite strong initial opposition of the White House and the continued spirited opposition of such Republican stalwarts as senators John East of North Carolina and Orrin Hatch of Utah. President Reagan signed the amended bill into law.[68]

As amended, section 2 explicitly prohibited any voting procedure that so much as resulted in members of the protected classes having "less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." The law went on to say that "the extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State or political subdivision is one circumstance which may be considered: Provided, That nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population."[69] Shortly thereafter, ironically, the Supreme Court in Rogers v. Lodge[70] softened its intent standard to the extent that plaintiffs' burden of proof was essentially what it had been in White and Zimmer. By the end of 1982, therefore, amended section 2 enabled either the Justice Department or private plaintiffs to sue jurisdictions anywhere in the nation without having to prove intent.

Vote Dilution and Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act

Yet another irony in the train of events set in motion by the plurality ruling in Bolden became manifest when the Court gave its interpretation of amended section 2 in Thornburg v. Gingles (1986). In a decision written by Justice William Brennan, the Court adopted criteria for claims of at-large dilutionary effects similar to those proposed in a law review article by James Blacksher and Larry Menefee, plaintiffs' lawyers in Bolden whose criticism of White focused on its lack of judicial manageability.[71] Thenceforth, the Court held, claims of dilutionary effects under section 2 must meet a three-pronged test. First, the minority group must be "sufficiently large and geographically compact" to constitute a majority in at least one single-member district. Second, the group must be "politically cohesive," or in other words, tend to vote as a bloc. Third, the majority must also vote "sufficiently as a bloc to enable it . . . usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate."[72] This test, which was significantly different from the White standards, streamlined the evidentiary requirements for minority plaintiffs.

With the exception of one feature—the Court's introduction of a population size and geographic compactness standard for minority groups that was not explicitly contained in the statute—the new test for dilution was immediately welcomed by most voting rights lawyers as a major advance.[73] Many dilution cases were filed in the 1980s, some of which were settled out of court in a manner favorable to plaintiffs, as the chapters to come make clear. Many at-large jurisdictions in the South (and to a lesser extent in the Southwest), having seen the handwriting on the wall, decided to adopt at least some single-member districts before someone filed a section 2 case in their locale, just to be on the safe side. As a city attorney in Texas whose municipality had shifted to single-member districts put it, "Because of recent changes in the law, [our city] felt a voluntary move to single-member districts to be more efficient from an economic and political standpoint."[74]

Conclusion

The Voting Rights Act of 1965, one of the most important civil rights statutes in American history, is part of a struggle for the minority franchise reaching back across centuries. Since its enactment, it has evolved beyond its original primary purpose of securing the black franchise (see table 1.1). Congress and the federal courts have gradually developed a theory of voting rights—one that extends to certain language minorities as well as to blacks—that includes protection against vote dilution. Constitutional protection is found in the language of the Fourteenth Amendment, so long as minority plaintiffs can show under the preponderance of the evidence an intent to diminish their voting strength through racial gerrymanders, at-large election systems, and the like. Vote dilution is also subject to protection under the Voting Rights Act, both in sections 2 and 5. Under both sections intent to discriminate need not be proved.[75] The achievement of these protections is a long and complicated story, not easily captured in statistics, although the authors of the essays in this volume present a good many of them. In fact, as the chapters that follow demonstrate, there is not one single story but at least eight: one for each southern state covered by section 5. To speak even more accurately, there are thousands of stories, each detailing the amazing efforts by determined men and women in communities throughout the former Confederacy to make good on this nation's promise of an inclusive democracy. While the research reported here only hints at these rich and varied local histories, it makes clear, through its integrated design and, chapter by chapter, its reiteration of common themes, how important the Voting Rights Act of 1965 has been its first twenty-five years.

Table 1.1
Major Legal Developments Involving Vote Dilution, 1960–1990

Year	Development	Significance
1960	Gomillion v. Lightfoot	Disfranchisement through racial gerrymandering is unconstitutional.
1962	Baker v. Carr	Legislative reapportionment is held justiciable.
1964	Reynolds v. Sims	Alabama legislature must reapportion itself under "one-person, one-vote" principle.
1965	Voting Rights Act is passed	Jurisdictions covered by section 5 must preclear voting changes.
1965	Fortson v. Dorsey	Multimember districts might possibly be unconstitutional in some cases.
1966	South Carolina v. Katzenbach	Voting Rights Act is constitutional.
1969	Allen v. State Board of Elections	Laws potentially causing minority vote dilution are subject to section 5 preclearance.
1970	Voting Rights Act is extended, amended	Section 5 remains in force.
1973	White v. Regester	Invoking "the totality of the circumstances," Court invalidates a legislative plan that diluted minority voting strength.
1973	Zimmer v. McKeithen	White standards are codified into eight factors.
1975	Voting Rights Act is extended, amended	Section 5 is expanded to cover language minorities and hence some other states (including Texas).
1976	Beer v. United States	Retrogression standard applies to section 5.
1980	City of Mobile v. Bolden	Evidence of discriminatory intent is required in Fourteenth Amendment and section 2 dilution cases.
1982	Voting Rights Act is extended, section 2 amended	Congress adopts a "results" standard for section 2 cases.
1982	Rogers v. Lodge	Bolden standards are softened in Fourteenth Amendment dilution cases.
1986	Thornburg v. Gingles	Three-prong dilution test in section 2 cases is established; polarized voting is the linchpin.

CHAPTER TWO

Alabama

PEYTON McCRARY, JEROME A. GRAY, EDWARD STILL, AND HUEY L. PERRY

When Colonel Al Lingo's state troopers charged onto the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Alabama, on Sunday, 7 March 1965, their violent assault on unarmed civil rights demonstrators unwittingly dealt the cause of white supremacy a mortal blow. Television cameras recorded the entire scene as troopers attacked with nightsticks and tear gas, to the cheers of white onlookers, and Sheriff Jim Clark's mounted posse chased the panic-stricken demonstrators back across the bridge.[1] That footage on the evening news, followed by a mass march from Selma to Montgomery and the deaths of two civil rights workers at the hands of Klansmen and their sympathizers, prompted Congress to demand federal intervention in the black struggle for voting rights. President Lyndon B. Johnson personally addressed the Congress, urging passage of the administration's voting rights bill and stirring a nationwide television audience with an eloquent defense of political equality for southern blacks.[2]

Alabama was at the heart of the resistance to minority voting rights. Only 19 percent of the black voting-age population was registered in 1964, the lowest proportion in the South except for Mississippi. By contrast, 69 percent of the white voting-age population was registered. Discriminatory application of a literacy test—a requirement that two registered voters "vouch" for each new applicant—and a cumulative poll tax were the most effective tactics used to inhibit black political participation.[3]

The recently enacted Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibited use in federal elections of different qualifications for blacks and whites, or disqualification of applicants for minor errors, and made a sixth-grade education prima facie proof of literacy.[4] The Alabama Supreme Court, charged by state law with responsibility for the literacy test, then developed a new set of short-answer quizzes; these were struck down, in turn, by the federal courts.[5]

The Voting Rights Act, passed by Congress a few months after the Selma-to-Montgomery march, was a watershed in the history of Alabama politics. By suspending literacy tests and the voucher system, this powerful new statute moved the state far along the road to universal suffrage.[6] The threat that federal examiners might intervene in the registration process throughout the state, as they did in a few counties that had registered virtually no blacks, helped persuade white officials to give up their discriminatory manipulation of registration laws.[7] The federal courts also struck down state court injunctions that would have prevented registrars in several black-belt counties from complying with the act.[8] Elimination of the state poll tax by federal court action also made it easier to add new voters to the rolls.[9] By October 1967, 248,432 blacks (52 percent of the black population) had registered in Alabama, more than doubling the black registration rate in only three years.[10] The fact that most blacks could now vote, in turn, brought a dramatic reduction in the use of traditional white supremacist rhetoric in most areas of the South. Because of the extraordinary strength of the George Wallace movement, however, Alabama was among the slowest to put away old habits. As late as the 1970 gubernatorial runoff against the moderate incumbent, Albert Brewer, Wallace's charge that his opponent was the candidate of "the bloc vote (Negroes and their white friends)" helped him come from behind and eke out a narrow victory over the governor.[11]

The effort of Wallace and his supporters to mobilize white voters after 1965 had, in fact, facilitated a great expansion in white registration in Alabama, now that the literacy test and the poll tax were gone. In absolute numbers the new white voters actually outstripped new black voters: 276,622 whites registered between 1964 and 1967, bringing the proportion registered to 90 percent.[12] In all except a few localities, blacks remained a political minority; outside of black-majority jurisdictions, no blacks were elected to public office.[13]

When the Voting Rights Act was adopted, most Alabama jurisdictions already used citywide or countywide elections designed, together with a "numbered-place" requirement, to dilute black voting strength. The state could thus prevent black officeholding without having to change its election laws (and thus be subject to the preclearance provision of section 5). Politicians in Alabama, as in the rest of the South, had long understood that at-large elections enable a white majority—if it chooses to vote as a cohesive bloc—to prevent minority representation altogether.[14] Black officeholding in Alabama was achieved, by and large, only as a result of successful voting rights litigation challenging the use of at-large elections.

The First Vote-Dilution Lawsuit

Barbour County, which George Wallace called home, was among those still electing county commissioners by single-member district in 1965. Shortly after the Selma-to-Montgomery march, Senator James S. Clark of Barbour County pushed through the legislature a bill that required at-large elections for the county commission.[15] The local paper quoted him as saying that one of the reasons for switching to countywide elections was "to lesson [sic] the impact of any block vote."[16] Clark, a Wallace floor leader in the legislature, used the term block vote as a code word for the black vote, as was customary in the 1960s.[17]

Barbour County's change from district to at-large elections for the county commission escaped federal detection until 1978.[18] When party officials attempted the same change in 1966 for the Barbour County Democratic Executive Committee, however, it sparked the very first minority vote-dilution lawsuit, Smith v. Paris.[19] Veteran civil rights lawyer Fred Gray, who had been a close associate of Martin Luther King, Jr., from the Montgomery bus boycott of 1955 to the Selma demonstrations in 1965, filed the case as a cooperating attorney of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund. On behalf of the county's black citizens, Gray alleged that the elimination of ward elections by the executive committee was intentional discrimination designed to dilute the black vote, and thus violated the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments.[20]

For many years voters in each of sixteen districts had chosen their own representatives in the party primary, with only five members elected on an at-large basis. Between the passage of the Voting Rights Act and 21 February 1966, however, the number of blacks on the registration rolls increased from 723 to 3,100, approximately one-third of the total county electorate. In four districts blacks were now a majority of the registered voters.[21] After six blacks filed as candidates for the county executive committee, the incumbents adopted a resolution requiring all members to run countywide, rather than just within their districts.[22]

The plaintiffs were fortunate that their lawsuit was before Judge Frank Johnson, the legendary federal district judge in Montgomery who had heard most of the important civil rights cases in Alabama for more than a decade. The "clear effect of the resolution" adopted by the county executive committee, declared Johnson, was that "predominantly Negro beats now have their representatives determined for them by the predominantly white majority of voters in the county as a whole."[23] In that first election the black candidates received a majority of the votes cast in their districts but lost countywide. The defendants conceded that at-large elections had a discriminatory impact, disputing only the claim that the executive committee acted with a racial motive.[24]

As to motive, Judge Johnson's experience with racial attitudes in Barbour County went back to 1959, when he had ordered George Wallace, then a circuit judge in Barbour County, to allow the staff of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights to examine voter registration records. Preston Clayton, Wallace's personal attorney in the earlier dispute, was now attorney for the County Democratic Executive Committee.[25] The court, however, saw the elimination of ward elections as just another in a history of efforts by Alabama whites to keep blacks from power. "If this court ignores the long history of racial discrimination in Alabama," declared Johnson, "it will prove that justice is both blind and deaf."[26] Johnson outlawed future use of the at-large scheme because "its passage was racially motivated" and thus violated the Fifteenth Amendment.[27] The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld Johnson's finding of unconstitutionality, and ordered new elections to be held on a single-member-district basis in 1968.[28]

Amazingly, the Barbour County Democratic Executive Committee defied both courts. At a meeting on 17 February 1968, the committee voted to elect new members in the May primary on an at-large basis, without requiring candidates to reside in a particular district.[29] "The majority of people in Barbour County," Senator Clark explained, wanted "to keep the Democratic Committee on an at-large basis and 'free from federal intervention.'"[30]

This time the United States government sued the Barbour County Democratic Executive Committee, charging that the resolution "was adopted with the purpose and effect of diminishing the effectiveness of the Negroes' vote."[31] This appears to be the first vote-dilution case filed by the Department of Justice, and the first in which it challenged the adoption of at-large elections as a violation of section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.[32] Seeing this case as "a sequel to Smith v. Paris," the court found the 1968 resolution "purposeful discrimination against Negroes in violation of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments."[33] When a new election was held on a single-member-district basis, four blacks were elected to the Barbour County Democratic Executive Committee.[34]

The history of racial discrimination mattered a great deal in Judge Johnson's court. His willingness to make judicial findings of invidious intent seems to have been based, in part, on his personal knowledge of that history. This tendency to focus on the question of motivation was more pronounced among federal judges in Alabama than elsewhere, for reasons that appear rooted in the individual biographies of the judges themselves. Vote-dilution lawsuits in the state for the next two decades, in any event, often turned on historical evidence of discriminatory intent. This historical evidence is worth a closer look.

The History of Discrimination in Alabama Politics

The Reconstruction Period

In 1867, two years after the end of the Civil War, the United States government sought to "reconstruct" the southern states by requiring the election of new constitutional conventions. Blacks were able to register freely, but many whites who had supported the Confederacy were disqualified under the terms of the Fourteenth Amendment. The convention elected under the new suffrage requirements was overwhelmingly Republican; it left voter registration open to blacks and continued, for a time, the restrictions on former Confederates.[35]

The state government elected under the new constitution, like the convention that had preceded it, was dominated by white Republicans, a majority of whom were residents of Alabama before the Civil War. These "scalawags," as native white Republicans were called by hostile white Democrats, represented predominantly white counties, especially in the northern half of the state. Northern whites who had moved to Alabama after the war ("carpetbaggers," in the Democratic lexicon), tended to represent black-majority constituencies, especially in the plantation counties of the south.[36] Except in counties or city wards where their race was in the majority, however, black officeholders were rare.[37]

The Democrats often used violence and intimidation as political weapons. During a special legislative election in 1869, for example, Mobile Democrats wheeled a piece of field artillery from a firehouse and trained it on a crowd of perhaps a thousand blacks waiting to cast their ballots. The crowd scattered without waiting to vote; the Democrat won the election.[38] The Ku Klux Klan was active in rural areas of the state between 1868 and 1872, beating and killing Republican leaders, burning their houses, lynching several blacks, and sending armed bands of as many as 160 white horsemen to break up Republican political rallies and intimidate voters.[39]

In the 1874 elections the Democrats again used violence and intimidation to secure permanent control of Alabama state government. In Mobile white horsemen shot down black voters on their way to the polls, killing one, wounding four, and intimidating countless others. Another major election riot in black-majority Barbour County left three dead and over forty wounded.[40] Systematic use of political violence, intimidation, and economic coercion played a pivotal role in the Democrats' "redemption" of Alabama from Republican rule.[41]

Minimizing the Effectiveness of Black Voting

The likelihood of federal intervention prevented the Democrats from simply disfranchising blacks and made it necessary to find alternative methods of assuring white supremacy.[42] The first legislature controlled by the Democrats enacted a statute designed, among other things, to punish election fraud. Under the new law, changing the preferences marked on a voter's ballot, bribing a voter, deterring a voter from casting his ballot, or failing to open the polling place at all—practices in which white election officials or party representatives routinely indulged—were illegal, but were only misdemeanors. The statute made it a felony, however, to vote more than once for any office during an election.[43] Democrats charged that blacks—but not whites—were often guilty of voting "early and often." "It is an established fact that a white man cannot easily vote more than once at one election," said one legislator during debate over the bill, because whites "do not all look alike."[44]

The prohibition on multiple voting was clearly intended as a device to limit primarily black election fraud, and perhaps to intimidate honest black voters as well. "Governor Houston has approved the new election law for the State," reported the Montgomery Advertiser: "Good-bye to negro repeating and packing of negroes around the Courthouse on election day."[45]

Democrats in Montgomery and Selma persuaded the legislature to remove predominantly black sections from each city's boundaries, so that whites would have a safe majority.[46] Mobile Democrats pushed successfully for the adoption of at-large elections for the county school board, replacing a "limited vote" procedure enacted in 1871 to allow minority representation. The new system of countywide elections eliminated black, as well as white Republican, membership on the school board.[47]

With the exception of a few predominantly white counties, most county commissions were already elected at large in Alabama.[48] Thus only in the black belt was white domination of local governing bodies in jeopardy. In 1876 the Democratic legislature eliminated elections altogether for county commissions in eight black-majority counties, authorizing the governor to appoint county commissioners. In several counties the legislative delegation was still Republican, and these bills were passed over their opposition.[49] The legislature also set unusually high security bonds for elected officials in certain black-belt counties, and Democrats tried to assure through community pressure that no whites would help Republicans raise the money for these bonds. The governor could then appoint a Democrat to the vacant office. The legislature also abolished the criminal court in black-majority Dallas County, solely because the judge was a black Republican, and created a new court to perform the same functions.[50]

Thereafter county commissioners and election officials in these counties were Democrats committed to the principle of white supremacy. Often they refused to open the polling places at all, or kept them open for only a few hours, in overwhelmingly black precincts. They used wholesale election fraud to win congressional, legislative, and gubernatorial races, regularly casting black votes intended for Republican or Populist candidates on behalf of their own conservative Democratic ticket, and justifying these tactics as a necessary evil to prevent a return to the "horrors" of Reconstruction.[51]

Widespread outcry against the conservatives' use of black votes in 1892 to defeat the Populist gubernatorial candidate, who was, after all, a white man, led the Alabama legislature to adopt an alternative approach: a restrictive voter registration and election law. Drafted by A. D. Sayre, a powerful committee chairman from black-majority Montgomery County, the bill authorized the governor to appoint all registration boards, provided that voters could register only in the month of May, and required the voter to produce his registration certificate in order to vote. Ostensibly a "reform" bill because it provided an official secret ballot for the first time instead of relying on the traditional "party ballot," it actually created a de facto literacy test. The complex form of the ballot, in which candidates were arranged alphabetically without party labels, was designed to confuse those who could not read well; illiterate or semiliterate voters could be assisted only by an election official and could remain in the voting booth only five minutes.[52] The complexities of casting the new official ballot were widely recognized as providing a "legal and honest way of preventing Negro control in the black counties."[53]

The Sayre Law cut black voter participation dramatically, to be sure: Kousser estimates that turnout among blacks dropped from 64 percent in 1892 to 42 percent in 1894. White participation also declined from 80 to 67 percent in the same period, however, and the decline was greatest among whites who had supported the Populist party in 1892. Thus the secret ballot "reform" broke the back of Alabama Populism and prepared the way for the wholesale disfranchisement of blacks and poor whites in 1901.[54]

Disfranchisement

By the late 1890s southern white conservatives no longer feared federal intervention to enforce the voting rights extended to blacks by the Reconstruction amendments. Northern whites were often disenchanted with the principle of Negro suffrage, and the theme of sectional reconciliation was dominant in the literature of the period. The Spanish-American War and U.S. intervention in the Philippines led a growing number of Americans to speak of the "white man's burden" to rule colored peoples throughout the world. The Supreme Court, reflecting (or perhaps even leading) this drift to the right, accepted the idea that state-sanctioned racial segregation was not unconstitutional.[55]

When the conservative wing of the Alabama Democratic party took firm control of state politics in 1900, it called an election for delegates to a constitutional convention to eliminate the black vote. Against the opposition of the few surviving Populist and Republican delegates, the convention enacted a cumulative poll tax, a literacy test, a long residency requirement, and required gainful employment for the past year.[56] Another provision disfranchised persons convicted of a variety of specific crimes, usually misdemeanors perceived by delegates as more often committed by blacks than whites.[57] These disfranchising devices were effective. In 1900 there were over 180,000 blacks eligible to vote in Alabama; by 1 January 1903, there were fewer than 3,000. Many whites, especially poorer whites, also lost their right to vote: over 230,000 whites qualified in 1900, but only 191,000 were registered at the beginning of 1903. As a result of disfranchisement, voter turnout in the presidential election of 1904 was only 24 percent of adult males. This figure represented an estimated 19 percent reduction among whites, when compared with the 1900 election, but an extraordinary 96 percent reduction in black voter turnout.[58]

"But if the Negroes did learn to read, or acquire sufficient property, and remember to pay the poll tax and to keep the record on file," notes Woodward, "they could even then be tripped by the final hurdle devised for them—the white primary."[59] As in other states, Alabama laws regulating primary elections allowed party officials to determine the rules for voting, thus providing the legal fiction that it was the party, not the state legislature, that limited participation to whites.

The possibility that litigation might persuade the federal courts to strike down the disfranchising devices enacted in 1901 was still a concern, even after the Supreme Court refused to take action in Giles v. Harris.[60] With the white primary as an insurance policy against such legal threats, however, white supremacy seemed to be safe at last. Then black-majority counties that had relied on gubernatorial appointment of county commissioners to maintain white supremacy felt safe in returning to popular elections, and many other counties switched to district elections.[61] The state legislature also adopted a new municipal code requiring larger cities to use ward elections for city council seats.[62]

The return to a ward system caused a brief controversy in Mobile, where close to two hundred blacks remained on the voter registration rolls, many in the overwhelmingly black seventh ward.[63] In 1908 opponents of Mayor Pat Lyons accused his "machine" of using the black vote to elect its aldermanic candidate in what was supposed to be a white primary. The mayor's supporters did, in fact, seem unusually tolerant, for their day, of black voting rights. In the next session the business-oriented Mobile legislative delegation, avoiding open reference to the race issue and employing the "good government" arguments common to advocates of at-large elections elsewhere, began the drive that culminated in the adoption of a commission form of government in 1911. Adopted at least in part to prevent Lyons from capitalizing on his strength in the overwhelmingly black seventh ward, the commission system eliminated the election of council members by single-member districts and thus added a new layer of insurance against black electoral influence.[64]

The Restoration of Black Voting Rights

For decades the multilayered system of discriminatory election laws enacted between 1893 and 1911 denied Alabama's black citizens any voice in the election of state or local officials. In 1944, however, the Supreme Court struck down the white primary in Smith v. Allwright.[65] Thereafter, the federal courts offered an arena where blacks might sometimes find vindication of their political rights.

Immediately blacks in Mobile, Birmingham, and the college town of Tuskegee began to register in larger numbers and tried unsuccessfully to vote in the Democratic primary. The governor and legislature pushed through a state constitutional amendment, drafted by Representative E. C. Boswell, that gave local registrars greater discretion to disqualify prospective voters. Black citizens in Birmingham, represented by local black attorney Arthur Shores with the assistance of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, and in Mobile, represented by Chicago attorney George Leighton of the American Civil Liberties Union, successfully challenged the "Boswell Amendment" in federal court.[66]

Subsequently, however, the legislature adopted and voters ratified a new constitutional amendment prescribing a uniform registration application to be drawn up by the Alabama Supreme Court. Designed to accomplish the same goal of minimizing black voter registration by requiring applicants to fill out a complex, legalistic form and read portions of the Constitution, the new amendment was adopted in a deliberately quiet campaign and was not challenged in court for a decade.[67]

In addition to its continuing effort to prevent blacks from registering and voting, the Alabama legislature developed new tactics to minimize the effectiveness of black voting strength. The most flamboyant approach was conceived by state senator Sam Engelhardt of Macon County to deal with the rapidly growing black electorate of Tuskegee, the county seat and home of famed Tuskegee Institute.[68] Engelhardt persuaded the legislature to redraw Tuskegee's municipal boundaries in such a way that virtually all blacks found themselves residents of the rural portions of Macon County.[69]

Because the discriminatory purpose of his "Tuskegee gerrymander" was so obvious, it was immediately challenged in court in Gomillion v. Lightfoot.[70] On behalf of the local black political organization, the Tuskegee Civic Association, Montgomery attorney Fred Gray, with the assistance of the NAACP Legal Defense

Fund, challenged the act in federal court. The plaintiffs lost in the trial court because Judge Johnson felt obliged to follow the strong precedents against entering what Justice Felix Frankfurter had called the "political thicket" of redistricting.[71] On appeal, however, the plaintiffs won a unanimous victory before the Supreme Court. Although "cloaked in the garb of the realignment of political subdivisions," the gerrymander had the "inevitable effect" of depriving black citizens of the right to vote in municipal elections, according to Justice Frankfurter's opinion, which found that Engelhardt's legislation was "solely concerned with" the achievement of this racially discriminatory goal.[72]

The Perfection of Vote-Dilution Measures

Far less obvious in its racial purpose, and perhaps for that reason not challenged in court, was an "anti-single-shot" law Engelhardt persuaded the legislature to apply to all Alabama municipalities in 1951. Under the municipal election code, some cities used a simple at-large system that made it possible for a politically cohesive minority group to elect one representative if several council seats were to be filled in the same election. In order to accomplish this goal, the minority group must concentrate its votes on one of the candidates, and not cast the full number permitted. This practice, which increases the mathematical weight of the vote for the preferred candidate, is called single-shot, or "bullet," voting.[73] Engelhardt's law made single-shot voting impossible by disqualifying any ballot not including a full slate of preferences. As one black-belt legislator explained, the bill was necessary because "there are some who fear that the colored voters might be able to elect one of their own race to the [Tuskegee] city council by 'single shot' voting."[74] This is the first modern example of an Alabama statute designed explicitly to dilute minority voting strength.

Engelhardt's full-slate law remained in effect until 1961, when the Alabama legislature replaced it with another statewide law accomplishing the same purpose by requiring the use of numbered places for all elections.[75] Single-shot voting is impossible if each candidate is required to qualify for a separate place or post (i.e., place no. 1, place no. 2, and so forth). Because every seat on the governing body is filled through a head-to-head contest in which only one vote can be cast, there is no way to increase the mathematical weight of one's ballot by denying votes to other candidates.[76]

Democratic party leader Frank Mizell of Montgomery explained both the dangers of single-shot voting and the advantages of the place requirement to the State Democratic Executive Committee. "If you have a group of people who want to vote as a bloc, whether they be negroes or otherwise," he said, "it would be easy under the single shot voting for all of them to come in, to put a scallowag [sic] or put a negro in there." Mizell reminded his colleagues of "increasing Federal pressure" from the Department of Justice, which sought to "register negroes en masse, regardless of their criminal records." In light of changing circumstances, concluded Mizell, "it has occurred to a great many people, including the legislature of Alabama, that there should be numbered places."[77]

By the time the Voting Rights Act was adopted, Alabama had perfected a system of local and state laws that, for most jurisdictions, required at-large elections, numbered places, and a majority vote, making it virtually impossible for blacks to elect candidates of their choice without substantial white crossover voting. In a handful of counties or municipalities with substantial black majorities, unrestricted voter registration would inevitably give black voters effective majorities at the ballot box. Otherwise, only a change to district elections could provide black voters with an opportunity to elect representatives of their choice. With a few rare exceptions, such changes occurred over the next quarter century only as a result of successful voting rights litigation or objections by the Department of Justice.

Implementation of the Voting Rights Act

Section 5 Review by the Department of Justice

In the first few years after passage of the act, the Department of Justice concentrated on attacking barriers to registration, to participation in elections, and to filing of candidacies.[78] Not until 1969 did the Supreme Court make clear that section 5 required all proposed voting changes, including measures that could dilute minority voting strength, to be precleared by the Department of Justice before implementation.[79] Thereafter the Voting Section of the department, guided by evolving federal case law, scrutinized the adoption of potentially dilutive electoral procedures.[80]

The Attorney General first objected to a dilutive device in Alabama on 9 July 1971. The Jefferson County legislative delegation had imposed a numbered-place requirement on the election of Birmingham city council members shortly after the council appointed black attorney Arthur Shores to a vacant seat. Until then, Birmingham's at-large system was among the few in the state exempted from the 1961 numbered-place requirement; thus it would have been possible for Shores to win election in 1971 without substantial white crossover voting. Sponsored by Representative Bob Gafford, long an ardent segregationist and Wallace supporter, the bill's purpose was, according to the Birmingham News, "to minimize chances of election of Negroes to the council by forcing them to run head-to-head with white candidates for specific places."[81]

Most municipalities already used at-large elections and numbered places before 1965 and thus had no need to enact new laws that would require preclearance. Three small cities did adopt district elections in order to secure approval of annexation plans to which the department had objected.[82] Phenix City found itself confronting a Justice Department objection when the local legislative delegation tried to shorten the terms of unpopular city commissioners by imposing staggered terms. Knowing that it was under section 5 scrutiny, the city switched to a mayor-council form of government; it included two at-large seats but, at the request of the black community, three single-member districts.[83] One black council member was elected from the 62 percent black district.[84]

Approximately one-third of Alabama's county commissions were elected by single-member districts in 1965; sixteen sought to adopt at-large elections during the next two decades.[85] The Department of Justice objected to eleven of these changes and precleared the remainder because the black population was either too small or too geographically dispersed to constitute a black-majority district. Justice also objected to the adoption of at-large elections for three county school boards.[86]

Section 5 review was sometimes the cause of changes to district elections in Alabama. In most jurisdictions, however, the principal means of securing equitable election plans was through litigation. A number of federal court decisions in the early 1970s signaled that black plaintiffs in such cases would receive a fair hearing.

The Influence of Sims v. Amos and White v. Regester

In 1972 a three-judge panel decided in Sims v. Amos to outlaw further use of multimember districts in the apportionment of seats in the Alabama legislature, at least in part as a remedy for racial vote dilution.[87] Newspaper coverage of public reaction to the decision displayed widespread agreement among attorneys, legislators, local officials, and political observers that elimination of multimember districts would substantially increase black representation.[88] Implementation of the court's districting plan in 1974 increased the number of black legislators from two to fifteen.[89]

Three weeks after the court struck down multimember districts as racially discriminatory in Sims v. Amos, the Selma city council discovered that it had to change its method of elections. Because the city's population had passed the 20,000 mark by 1970, the state's municipal election code required Selma to choose between going to ward elections or cutting the number of council seats from ten to five. The black community petitioned for acceptance of single-member districts, and city council members agreed. Mayor Joe Smitherman seems to have played a role in persuading the council to choose ward elections, despite their recognition that such a change would "lead to the election of the council's first black members."[90]

Two communities apparently switched on their own initiative to district elections; the change even seems to have been motivated, in part, by a desire to provide minority representation. In 1972 the college town of Auburn adopted a mixed plan, with two members elected by each of four wards, plus a council president elected citywide.[91] More surprising was the switch to single-member districts in the state's capital city. Under the leadership of Mayor James Robinson, Montgomery adopted the mayor-council form of government with nine single-member districts. According to a recent study, "Montgomery adopted districts as the price to be paid for black assent to, and Justice Department approval of, a referendum to change from a commission to a strong-mayor system."[92] The county's two white state senators successfully fought to eliminate all at-large seats on the grounds that "having at-large councilmen would discriminate against blacks since the city has a greater percentage of whites," warning opponents that the federal courts might strike down the new law if at-large seats were included.[93]

Two weeks earlier, on 18 June 1973, the Supreme Court had for the first time found the use of at-large elections, together with numbered-place and majority-vote requirements, unconstitutional on the grounds of racial vote dilution in a Texas redistricting case, White v. Regester.[94] In the same year the Fifth Circuit set forth specific guidelines by which trial courts should decide such vote-dilution lawsuits in a Louisiana case, Zimmer v. McKeithen.[95] Alabama politicians now had fair warning that the at-large numbered-place system was open to legal challenge.

The Creation of an Alabama Voting Rights Bar

Thereafter, a new generation of voting rights lawyers challenged the use of at-large elections in community after community; when successful, as they usually were, these lawsuits transformed the racial politics of Alabama beyond recognition. Most of the work was done by young Alabama whites, educated at the University of Alabama Law School but affiliated with public-interest legal organizations, such as the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund and the American Civil Liberties Union.[96] The Voting Section of the Department of Justice brought numerous cases; most of its attorneys handling Alabama cases were young whites from outside the South.[97] The so-called voting rights bar proved to be far more successful than its opponents were, at least in part because plaintiffs' attorneys and lawyers from the Justice Department were specialists who knew more about case law in this complex field than did those who represented state and local defendants.

The ability of private attorneys to bring successful voting rights litigation, which as a rule involved heavy expenses and a lengthy appeals process, was dependent on their ability to recover reasonable fees and expenses. In Sims v. Amos, the court had awarded the plaintiffs' attorneys fees under the established theory that lawyers representing class-action members in public-interest litigation acted as "private attorneys general" in seeking enforcement of federal law.[98] This prospect was thrown into doubt in 1975 by a Supreme Court decision in an unrelated case.[99] Congress revised the Voting Rights Act in 1975 to clarify its intention that private attorneys successfully representing the claims of minority voters receive expenses and reasonable fees for their time.[100]

White attorneys took great pains to consult closely with local black plaintiffs, most of whom were members of the Alabama Democratic Conference (ADC), the leading statewide black political organization. In 1972 loyalist party chairman Robert Vance, who had persuaded the State Democratic Executive Committee to remove the white supremacy symbol of a rooster from its campaign literature only six years earlier, persuaded fellow whites on the committee to bring blacks into the Alabama Democratic Party; ADC president Joe Reed of Montgomery became the party's vice-chairman for minority affairs.[101] By the 1980s Jerome Gray, ADC field director, worked closely with plaintiffs' attorneys in virtually all Alabama voting rights litigation, and ADC members provided most of the financial support.[102]

Initially the going was uncertain. In the fall of 1973, black plaintiffs in Pickens County challenged the use of at-large elections for the county commission, school board, and Democratic executive committee. The court required the school board and party committee plans, which were adopted after 1965, to be submitted for preclearance; the Department of Justice objected to the use of at-large and numbered-place requirements for both.[103] The county had long elected its commissioners by districts in the Democratic primary, however, using at-large elections only in the general election. The court required reapportionment of the district lines to comply with one-person, one-vote standards for the all-important primary, but let the at-large system stand for the general election. This decision was upheld on appeal.[104]

Fairfield, a small city in Jefferson County, was 48 percent black. Its city council was elected at large, with two seats to be filled by residents of each of six wards, and a council president to be elected without regard to residence. In 1968 blacks elected six council members; in 1972, however, whites won all thirteen seats. A suit was subsequently filed by blacks. Although Judge Sam Pointer did not conclude that the at-large system was intentionally discriminatory, he found that voting was racially polarized to a substantial degree, and ruled for the plaintiffs. The appeals court declared that finding at-large elections discriminatory in effect due to polarized voting was not sufficient to outlaw their use.[105] Judge Pointer then decided in favor of the city, and was upheld on appeal.[106]

Judge Frank Johnson in 1974 found in favor of the plaintiffs in a challenge to at-large council elections in Dothan, but stayed proceedings for a year because a black had been elected citywide.[107] On the basis of similar evidence, on the other hand, he outlawed the use of at-large elections for the Montgomery County commission.[108] Judging from these early cases, the standards of proof in dilution cases were still in flux.[109]

Challenging At-Large Elections in Mobile

The Alabama case that played the most important role in shaping national voting rights law was Bolden v. City of Mobile.[110] In 1975 black plaintiffs led by octagenarian Wiley L. Bolden, a voting rights activist since the days of the white primary, filed their challenge to the at-large election of three city commissioners, a system that had resulted in the total exclusion of blacks from office. Shortly thereafter a white state senator introduced a mayor-council bill that would require election to seven district seats and two at-large posts. The senator later testified that district elections provided the only way black voters could secure representation in Mobile city government; he included the at-large seats in the hope of winning the support of "certain established members of the community."[111] Nevertheless, the conservative daily newspaper opposed any use of ward elections, explaining that the plan would have the effect of "assuring representation from the black community."[112] The bill did not pass.

Judge Virgil Pittman cited the defeat of this plan as evidence that the at-large system was being maintained with a racially discriminatory purpose. He also found that the city government was unresponsive to the black community in the delivery of municipal services, that city police continued to be guilty of brutality against blacks in law enforcement, that city agencies were desegregated only by court order, that few blacks were appointed to boards or committees, and that socioeconomic disparities between blacks and whites continued to inhibit black political participation.[113]

The most compelling aspect of the plaintiffs' case, however, was expert testimony that racially polarized voting made it unlikely that black candidates could ever win office in citywide elections. In addition, observed the judge, "practically all active candidates for public office testified it is highly unlikely that anytime in the foreseeable future, under the at-large system, that a black can be elected against a white."[114]

Under the prevailing Zimmer standard, the court had little alternative but to find for the plaintiffs. The question of remedy was more troublesome; because commissioners under the existing plan performed specific administrative functions of a citywide nature, Judge Pittman found it necessary to order replacement of the commission system by a mayor-council form of government patterned after that established in Montgomery.[115]

Some lower federal courts were beginning to require proof of racial purpose, however, not just discriminatory impact, before striking down dilutive election structures. The appeals court ruled in 1978 that proof of discriminatory intent was required, but held that Judge Pittman's findings "compel the inference that the system has been maintained with the purpose of diluting the black vote."[116] In 1980, however, the U.S. Supreme Court overruled the lower courts in City of Mobile v. Bolden and surprised knowledgeable observers by setting forth an "intent standard" for judging vote-dilution lawsuits. In a plurality opinion by Justice Potter Stewart, the Court held that plaintiffs must prove at-large elections were adopted or maintained with a racially discriminatory purpose. Arguing that plaintiffs had not presented such "intent" evidence in the first trial, a majority of the justices agreed to remand the case to the lower courts.[117] When the case was tried a second time, expert testimony concerning the historical evidence discussed earlier in this chapter demonstrated to the court that racial concerns played a significant role in the adoption of at-large elections in 1911.[118]

The intent standard set forth by Justice Stewart in the Mobile case, however, had aroused a furor in national civil rights circles. In hearings before subcommittees in both House and Senate, voting rights lawyers, black political leaders, and an increasingly broad spectrum of white public officials urged Congress to revise the Voting Rights Act in such a way as to eliminate the need for this sort of detailed historical inquiry. A revision of section 2, known as the Bolden Amendment, made clear that Congress intended that the courts outlaw election practices that were discriminatory in effect, without requiring proof of invidious racial purpose.[119]

Litigation by the Department of Justice

The Department of Justice sometimes had to go to court to defend its objections to voting changes covered by section 5.[120] In such cases the act places the burden of proof on the jurisdiction. One such case involved Hale County, Alabama, which had switched from district to at-large elections for its county commission pursuant to a 1965 statute adopted the day after it was assigned federal registrars under the act. The county, contrary to the law, did not submit the change for a decade. Although it was a black-majority county, half of its registered voters and a majority of those turning out to vote were white, due to the low participation rate of its poverty-stricken black citizens. Regression analysis by a Department of Justice expert demonstrated, furthermore, that voting was highly polarized along racial lines. The court found Hale County's at-large election system racially discriminatory in purpose and effect.[121] Other counties recognized that they could not sustain the burden of proof in a section 5 challenge and agreed to return to district elections.[122]

The department's two most difficult Alabama cases were Fourteenth Amendment challenges to the at-large election of commissioners in the black-belt counties of Marengo and Dallas. Both were filed in 1978 and tried before Judge W. Brevard Hand of Mobile, who had almost always found for defendants in civil rights cases. Judge Hand concluded in both cases that there was no evidence of discriminatory intent; although he found evidence that voting was racially polarized to a significant degree, he ruled that blacks were close enough to a majority of the electorate that they could win if they worked harder to turn out the vote.[123]

The appeals court, however, refused to attribute the exclusion of blacks to the failure of blacks to work hard enough. In both cases it viewed the lower level of registration and turnout among blacks as a lingering effect of past discrimination in education and employment, and thus a factor favoring the plaintiffs. More importantly, the overwhelming evidence of racially polarized voting in both cases, which made it clear that blacks could not expect to win countywide elections, led the appeals court to rule in favor of the plaintiffs. By 1988 effective remedies were put into place, and black citizens in Marengo and Dallas counties were able to elect representatives of their choice.[124]

The Winning Coalition

More victories were won by the private voting-rights bar, working in close coalition with the Alabama Democratic Conference. ADC members were the plaintiffs in Burton v. Hobbie, a legal challenge to the legislative redistricting plan enacted by the state after the 1980 census.[125] The Department of Justice objected to the initial plan on 6 May 1982, and to a new legislative plan on 2 August 1982, on the grounds that both reduced black voting strength by comparison with the previous system imposed by Sims v. Amos.[126] Chairman Joe Reed of the ADC was the principal drafter for the districting arrangements proposed by the plaintiffs, adopted by the legislature, precleared by the Department of Justice, and approved by the court for use in new elections in the fall of 1983.[127]

In Harris v. Graddick, black plaintiffs successfully challenged the underrepresentation of blacks among poll officials in the state.[128] ADC members gathered the lists of county poll officials and identified their race in exhibits used at trial, as well as testifying about conditions in their counties. Not only was the quantitative evidence of white domination of the administration of Alabama elections dramatic, but the case revealed ongoing evidence of racial animosity like that found two decades earlier.[129] After the plaintiffs won a preliminary injunction, the state agreed to appoint substantial numbers of black poll officials and to establish a program of training and certification for all those who worked at the polls; staff members of historically black Alabama State University were actively involved in the training program and in a voter outreach project targeting young black adults. The state also agreed to gather and maintain precinct-level voter registration data by race, and to provide the court with detailed records of its efforts to implement the numerous changes.[130]

In a case tried under the Constitution such as Underwood v. Hunter, initiated in the late 1970s but not decided by the Supreme Court until 1985, evidence of a racially discriminatory purpose is essential. A challenge to the section of the 1901 state constitution disfranchising individuals convicted of various enumerated "petty crimes," Underwood turned on historical evidence that the framers of this provision explicitly intended that it eliminate black voters in significant numbers. The state's defense was that in addition to disfranchising blacks, the provision was also intended to prevent many poor whites from voting. The trial court agreed with this reasoning but was reversed on appeal; in a unanimous Supreme Court opinion, Justice William Rehnquist ruled that the state could not discount the compelling evidence of racial intent in the record merely by showing that the convention was also motivated by distaste for the poor. In light of this evidence of discriminatory purpose, moreover, only a modest additional showing of disparate impact was necessary for the plaintiffs to prevail.[131]

The 1982 revision of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act makes it unnecessary for plaintiffs to prove discriminatory intent in order to win a dilution case. Nevertheless, black plaintiffs in Alabama managed to turn the intent standard into a weapon to advance minority voting rights on a wholesale basis. In Dillard v. Crenshaw County, black citizens challenged the at-large election of commissioners in nine counties in one consolidated lawsuit.[132] The linchpin of their case was evidence of discriminatory purpose in the adoption of the statewide anti-single-shot and numbered-place requirements in 1951 and 1961 discussed above. In addition, the plaintiffs' expert historian testified that a third of the state's counties shifted from district to at-large elections between 1947 and 1971, after blacks began to register and vote in large numbers. On the basis of this historical evidence, Judge Myron Thompson ruled that "the plaintiffs have shown a substantial likelihood of prevailing," and enjoined further use of at-large elections in those counties.[133]

All of the defendants adopted single-member district plans for their county commissions. Then the plaintiffs added all the municipalities and school boards where at-large elections still resulted in the dilution of black votes (in the end some 180 jurisdictions). Most agreed to settle on election plans acceptable to local ADC leaders. Many of the changes to district elections documented in the next section of this chapter emanate from Dillard and its progeny. In a few jurisdictions, settlement talks between ADC leaders and local officials led to the adoption of cumulative or limited voting plans rather than single-member districts. These remedies succeeded in providing a substantial degree of black representation throughout Alabama.[134]

Changes from At-Large to District Elections in Alabama

At the time the Voting Rights Act was adopted, as we have noted, the handful of black elected officials in the state were restricted entirely to communities in which blacks constituted a majority of the registered voters. Nor did the removal of legal barriers to registration and voting lead immediately to black representation in white-majority jurisdictions. In 1970 only two white-majority cities, Auburn and Birmingham, had elected a black at large.[135] By 1989, however, black officeholding in Alabama approached the level of proportional representation. To what factors must we attribute this extraordinary change?

The existing social science literature provides two alternative hypotheses. Some accounts argue that racial attitudes have changed so markedly in the South during the last two decades that whites are generally willing to vote for qualified minority candidates; thus the increase in black officeholding in Alabama cities between 1970 and 1989 might result from a decline in the degree of racially polarized voting.[136] Most empirical studies, however, indicate a strong correlation between the use of single-member districts and the election of racial and ethnic minority officials. This evidence suggests that the increase in black representation results largely from the abolition of at-large elections.[137] In order to test these conflicting hypotheses, we compare the method of electing municipal governing bodies with the degree of representation for blacks in Alabama city government over the last two decades.[138]

Our principal concern is to identify the racial effect of changing from citywide to district elections. We measure the degree of black representation by an equity ratio (the percentage of elected officials who are black divided by the proportion of the jurisdiction's population that is black).[139] Between 1970 and 1989, 37 of the 48 cities with 6,000 or more inhabitants having a population at least 10 percent black switched to single-member districts, and another 5 to mixed plans (see table 2.2).[140] As a result, the degree of black representation in white-majority cities using single-member districts increased from zero in 1970 to slightly better than proportional representation in 1989 (see table 2.5). For mixed plans, the small number of cases renders any conclusion suspect; the equity ratios are significantly lower than under single-member district plans, primarily because no blacks were elected to any at-large seats in those cities (see table 2.3).[141]

To control for the possibility that declining racial prejudice alone explains the dramatic increase in black representation, we sought to identify a control group of cities retaining at-large elections. The success of minority plaintiffs and the Department of Justice in eliminating at-large elections, however, complicates the analysis. By 1989 the use of at-large elections, once ubiquitous, had all but disappeared in Alabama.

Only 6 of the 48 cities in our sample retained at-large elections (see table 2.1). This is a small and arguably unrepresentative sample. Three of the 6 were black-majority cities where at-large elections should benefit rather than disadvantage blacks; predictably, blacks were more than proportionally represented in 1989 (see table 2.4). Only 3 of the 42 white-majority cities in our sample elected their councils at large. The fact that blacks had proportional representation in these 3 cities, as well as in the 36 using single-member districts (see table 2.4), should not be taken as proof that at-large elections are no longer racially discriminatory. Indeed, the fact that blacks were adequately represented in these cities helps explain why their at-large systems went unchallenged in the 1980s.[142]

Had our survey been conducted a mere two years earlier, in January 1987, our control group would have included 31 cities still using at-large elections. As the data presented in table 2.5A demonstrate, the 27 white-majority cities in this control group had only minimal black representation. In contrast, blacks in the 11 cities electing council members by single-member districts had proportional representation.[143]

Between 1970 and 1989, 42 of the 48 Alabama cities of 6,000 or larger switched from at-large to district or mixed plans. Litigation was the principal cause of these changes, accounting for 26 of the new district systems and 1 of the shifts to a mixed plan (see table 2.8). Four of the changes came in response to objections by the Department of Justice.[144] Thus, in 31 of the 42 changes, some degree of coercion was involved. Voluntary decisions by city leaders accounted for only 11 of the shifts to district elections.[145] In many of those instances, furthermore, jurisdictions were well aware of the possibility of lawsuits or objections by the Department of Justice.[146]

Our findings provide little support to the view that a significant increase in minority representation occurred in Alabama merely because white voting behavior had changed. (Indeed, in districted cities, we found only two instances out of 148 white-majority districts in which blacks were elected. See table 2.6.) Instead, we provide new evidence to reinforce the conclusion of most empirical studies that district elections played a major role in increasing black officeholding.

Conclusion

As long as at-large elections were in place, white majorities voting as a bloc were able to prevent black citizens enfranchised by the Voting Rights Act from winning local office. Most changes from at-large to district elections in Alabama resulted either from litigation or, to a lesser degree, objections by the Department of Justice. Although lawsuits won by the department played a key role in eliminating at-large elections in various black-belt counties, most of the changes were due to litigation by private attorneys. These changes substantially increased minority representation on local governing bodies, both rural and urban. Indeed, black representation in our sample has now reached the level of proportional representation in Alabama.

The act has played a critical role in this achievement. Its first great success, the enfranchisement of the black population, brought less immediate change in black representation to Alabama than to some other southern states, because state election laws already in place effectively diluted black voting strength. The evolution of case law in the voting area, however, ultimately provided civil rights lawyers with the weapons necessary to eliminate those barriers to minority representation. In most of the successful lawsuits in Alabama, historical evidence of discriminatory intent played a key role in the outcome. The story we have chronicled is controversial, we recognize, among those who believe that federal intervention with state and local control of elections in the South, either by administrative action or as a result of court decisions, is no longer warranted. In the best of worlds, effective minority representation would not depend on such intrusive legal action. Our findings make clear, however, that at least in Alabama, effective minority representation could have been achieved in no other way.

TABLE 2.1
Black Representation on Council in 1989 by Election Plan, Alabama Cities of 6,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council, 1989
SMD plan
10–29.9	23	19	20
30–49.9	13	37	38
50–100	1	74	80
Mixed plan
10–29.9	1	16	11
30–49.9	2	38	30
50–100	2	52	51
At-large plan
10–29.9	3	20	20
30–49.9	0	—	—
50–100	3	68	74

TABLE 2.2
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1970 and 1989, Alabama Cities of 6,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council
			Before Change (1970)	After Change (1989)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	23	19	0	20
30–49.9	13	37	0	38
50–100	1	74	0	80
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	16	11	11
30–49.9	2	38	0	30
50–100	2	52	0	51
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	3	20	0	20
30–49.9	0	—	—	—
50–100	3	68	46	74

TABLE 2.3
Black Representation in 1989 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, Alabama Cities of 6,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

% Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black Councilpersons in District Components, 1989	Mean % Black Councilpersons in At-Large Components, 1989
10–29.9	1	13	0
30–49.9	2	42	0
50–100	2	59	0

TABLE 2.4
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Black on Council in 1989 with Percentage Black in City Population in 1980, Alabama Cities of 6,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Difference Measure (% on Council − % in Population)	Ratio Measure (% on Council ÷ % in Population)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	23	1	1.10
30–49.9	13	1	1.03
50–100	1	6	1.08
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	−5	0.69
30–49.9	2	−8	0.78
50–100	2	−1	0.98
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	3	0	1.00
30–49.9	0	—	—
50–100	3	18	1.09

TABLE 2.5
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1970 and 1989, Alabama Cities of 6,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Black Representational Equity on Council
		1970	1989
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	23	0.00	1.10
30–49.9	13	0.00	1.03
50–100	1	0.00	1.08
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	0.11	0.69
30–49.9	2	0.00	0.78
50–100	2	0.00	0.98
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	3	0.00	1.00
30–49.9	0	—	—
50–100	3	0.46	1.09

TABLE 2.5A
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1970 and 1986, Alabama Cities of 6,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Black Representational Equity on Council
		1970	1986
	Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	4	0.00	1.00
30–49.9	7	0.00	1.00
50–100	0	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	2	0.35	1.06
30–49.9	2	0.00	0.79
50–100	2	0.00	0.87
	Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	21	0.00	0.32
30–49.9	6	0.00	0.26
50–100	4	0.49	1.09

TABLE 2.6
Black Representation in Council Single-Member Districts in 1989, Alabama Cities of 6,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

% Black Population of District	N[a]	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
0–29.9	139	8	0
30–49.9	9	41	22
50–59.9	0	—	—
60–64.9	2	61	100
65–69.9	17	67	100
70–100	38	82	100

[a]Racial composition of single-member districts was not available for the following cities (each of which had five districts): Athens, Brewton, Lanett, Prichard, and Russellville.

TABLE 2.7
Black Council Representation in Single-Member Districts in 1989 by Racial Composition of District, Alabama Cities of 6,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Racial Composition of District	N	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
Black majority[a]	57	74	100
White majority	148	10	1

[a]There were no districts in the 50–59.9 percent black range.

TABLE 2.8
Cause of Change from At-Large to Mixed or District Plan between 1970 and 1989, Alabama Cities of 6,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Reason for Change
		Changed to Single-Member Districts
Alabaster	No	Objection of Department of Justice to annexations in 1977; objection withdrawn in 1983 upon submission of a single-member-district plan.
Alex City	No	Objection by Department of Justice to annexations in 1986; withdrawn upon submission of a single-member-district plan in 1987.
Andalusia	No	Voluntary change to single-member districts in 1988, at the request of the black community.
Athens	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Atmore	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Attalla	No	Ordinance, 1988; supported by local black leaders; in 1984 Attalla had switched from at-large elections to a mixed plan, also voluntarily.
Bay Minette	No	Objection by Department of Justice to annexations in 1986; withdrawn upon submission of single-member-district plan in 1987.

(continued)

TABLE 2.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Reason for Change
Brewton	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Decatur	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Demopolis	Yes	United States v. City of Demopolis; consent decree implemented in 1986.
Enterprise	Yes	McClain v. City of Enterprise; consent decree implemented in 1986.
Eufaula	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Florence	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Gadsden	Yes	Adams v. City of Gadsden; consent decree implemented in 1986.
Greenville	No	Legislation upon request of local chapter of Alabama Democratic Conference.
Guntersville	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Huntsville	Yes	Grayson v. Madison County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Jackson	Yes	Elliott v. City of Jackson; consent decree implemented in 1985 (3 districts; 2 members per district).
Jasper	No	Legislation adopted following unsuccessful challenge to at-large elections (Chapman v. Nicholson).
Lanett	Yes	Reese v. Yeargan; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Leeds	Yes	Objection by Department of Justice to annexations in 1985; subsequently sued in Dillard v. Crenshaw; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Mobile	Yes	Bolden v. City of Mobile; plaintiffs won at trial; court-ordered legislation implemented in 1985.
Montgomery	No	Legislation adopted in 1973 as a result of voluntary action initiated by Mayor James Robinson and the county's legislative delegation; change approved in referendum and implemented in 1975.

TABLE 2.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Reason for Change
Northport	No	Voluntary change at request of black community; implemented in 1988.
Opelika	Yes	Lee County Branch of NAACP v. City of Opelika; consent decree implemented in 1986.
Opp	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Pell City	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Prichard	No	Legislation adopted voluntarily at the behest of black-majority city government.
Prattville	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Russellville	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Sheffield	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Sylacauga	No	Voluntary change adopted at the request of black community.
Talladega	Yes	Taylor v. City of Talladega; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Tarrant City	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
Troy	Yes	Henderson v. City of Troy; consent decree implemented in 1986.
Tuscaloosa	Yes	Mallisham v. City of Tuscaloosa; consent decree implemented in 1985.
Tuscumbia	Yes	Dillard v. Crenshaw County; consent decree implemented in 1988.
		Changed to Mixed Plan
Anniston	No	Legislation prompted by threat of litigation by Department of Justice.

(continued)

TABLE 2.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Reason for Change
Auburn	No	Legislation; voluntary change in 1972; liberal sentiment in a university town.
Bessemer	Yes	Tolbert v. City of Bessemer; consent decree implemented in 1986.
Phenix City	No	Objection by Department of Justice to adoption of staggered terms, combined with local dissatisfaction with existing city commissioners; under pressure from black leaders, and aware of federal scrutiny, legislative delegation adopted a mixed plan, which was precleared in 1977.
Selma	No	1970 census showed Selma's population was over 20,000; state municipal code required Selma to use districts or cut the size of its council; aware of federal court rulings concerning at-large elections, and pressed by black leaders, council agreed to a mixed plan with 5 double-member districts and an at-large council president; in 1980s council was reduced to 1 member per ward and ward lines were redrawn pursuant to court order in a one-person, one-vote lawsuit brought by whites; in 1988 legislation adopted with consent of city government created 8 single-member districts, with the council president continuing to be elected at large.
SUMMARY	Yes 27 (64%) No 15 (36%)

TABLE 2.9
Major Disfranchising Devices in Alabama

Device	Date Established	Date Abolished
Restricting voter assistance	1893	1988[a]
Literacy test, voucher system	1901	1965[b]
Poll tax	1901	1966[c]
Long residency requirement	1901	1972[d]
Petty crimes provision	1901	1985[e]
White primary	1902	1944[f]
Registrar discretion in judging applicant's interpretation of state or federal constitutions	1946	1949[g]
Court-prepared educational test	1951	1964[h]

[a] Harris v. Siegelman, 695 F. Supp. 517 (M.D. Ala. 1988).
[b] Voting Rights Act.
[c] United States v. Alabama, 252 F. Supp. 95 (M.D. Ala. 1966).
[d] Unconstitutional in light of Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330 (1972).
[e] Ruled unconstitutional in Underwood v. Hunter, 730 F.2d 614 (11th Cir. 1984), aff'd, 471 U.S. 222 (1985).
[f] Unconstitutional in light of Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944).
[g] Davis v. Schnell, 81 F. Supp. 872 (S.D. Ala. 1949), aff'd, 336 U.S. 933 (1949).
[h] United States v. Hines, 9 Race Rel. L. Rep. 1332 (N.D. Ala. 1964) [Sumter County]; United States v. Cartwright, 230 F. Supp. 873 (M.D. Ala. 1964) [Elmore County]; and United States v. Parker, 236 F. Supp. 511 (M.D. 1964) [Montgomery County].

TABLE 2.10
Black and White Registered Voters and Officeholders in Alabama, Selected Years[a]

	Black		White
	N	%	N	%
Registered Voters
1964[b]	92,737	9	935,695	91
1966[c]	246,396	17	1,192,072	83
1992[d]	373,205	22	1,335,837	78
Officeholders[e]
State house
1964	0	0	105	100
1966	0	0	105	100
1992	18	17	87	83
State senate
1964	0	0	35	100
1966	0	0	35	100
1992	5	14	30	86

[a]Mean black Alabama population, 1960–90 = 26.8%.
[b]U.S. Commission on Civil Rights 1968.
[c]Southern Regional Council (Voter Education Project), "Voter Registration in the South, 1966."
[d]Data submitted by the state of Alabama in connection with its legislative and congressional redistricting plans, 1992.
[e]U.S. Commission on Civil Rights 1968; Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies 1990.

CHAPTER THREE

Georgia

LAUGHLIN McDONALD,
MICHAEL B. BINFORD, AND KEN JOHNSON

THE IMPACT of the Voting Rights Act in altering the political environment in Georgia has been substantial. Dramatic changes have come in the registration of eligible black voters, and, with more equitable forms of voting, in the election of black candidates to office. The degree of change is all the more impressive given the background of intentional discrimination against black political participation in this state.

On the eve of passage of the act, fewer than a third of age-eligible blacks in Georgia were registered to vote.[1] The disparities were even greater in the state's twenty-three counties with black voting-age majorities, where an average of 89 percent of whites, but only 16 percent of blacks, were registered. Despite the fact that blacks were 34 percent of the voting-age population, there were only three black elected officials in the entire state, and they had been elected only in the preceding three years.[2] This exclusion from the normal political processes was not fortuitous; it was the result of two centuries of deliberate and systematic discrimination by the state against its minority population.

THE HISTORY OF DISCRIMINATION: THE EARLY YEARS

Blacks first got the right to vote in Georgia in 1867 as a result of federal military reconstruction.[3] The state held a constitutional convention the following year—roundly denounced by white Democrats as a "nigger–New England" convention—and formally guaranteed blacks citizenship, equal protection of the law, and the right to vote.[4] Because of the intense opposition of whites, the convention did not expressly guarantee the right of blacks to hold office.

At the ensuing elections, which were accompanied by an extremely high level of racial violence, twenty-five blacks were elected to the house and three to the senate. They were promptly expelled from office. Four mulattoes were also elected to the house and were originally targeted for expulsion, but they were granted the status of "honorary white men" and allowed to keep their seats.[5] Because of the expulsions, as well as continuing violence and white terrorism across the state, Georgia was again placed under federal military reconstruction. The expelled blacks were returned to the general assembly, certain Democrats were disqualified under the Fourteenth Amendment, and control of the lower chamber returned to the Republicans.

The change in political fortune of blacks was short-lived. With the election of James Smith as governor in 1872, full control of the executive and legislative branches passed to white Democrats. This shift signaled that blacks were no longer a viable element in state politics and paved the way for the complete restoration of white supremacy. The state was assisted in its efforts by the U.S. Supreme Court, which weakened civil rights enforcement in a series of decisions, including United States v. Cruikshank[6] and United States v. Reese,[7] holding that the right to vote was a state-created, not a federal, right.

The "redeemed" legislature moved quickly to roll back Reconstruction and nullify the effects of black suffrage. It reimplemented proof of payment of the poll tax as a condition for voting;[8] abolished ward voting for the city of Atlanta, which had allowed the election of blacks to office; eliminated local elections altogether in majority-black McIntosh County; and abolished district elections for county school boards in favor of a system of appointments by white grand jury "elites."[9]

In 1873, the general assembly increased the residency requirements for voters in order to take advantage of the supposed itinerant habits of blacks and disfranchise them.[10] Local officials also closed their registration books except during planting time, when many blacks would find it difficult, if not impossible, to register.[11] Aside from these "legal" methods of limiting the black vote, the state resorted to such time-honored stratagems as intimidation, violence, vote buying, ballot-box stealing, and the use of "tissue ballots" that facilitated stuffing ballot boxes and altering the results of elections.[12]

The state adopted a new constitution in 1877. Robert Toombs, the acknowledged leader of the constitutional convention, consigned blacks to a status that was less than human when he boasted: "Give us a convention, and I will fix it so that the people shall rule and the Negro shall never be heard from."[13] The convention incorporated the new statutory residency requirements and added bribery and larceny to the list of disfranchising offenses that blacks were thought more likely to commit than whites.[14] But the main work of disfranchisement was the adoption of a cumulative poll tax, requiring proof of payment of past as well as current poll taxes as a condition for voting.[15] The tax could accumulate indefinitely and was described by one observer as "the most effective bar to Negro suffrage ever devised."[16]

The poll tax finally was abolished in Georgia in 1945.[17] Leaders of the general assembly assured their colleagues that repeal would increase white voter participation and would not affect the state's white primary.[18]

In an additional effort to consolidate power in the hands of ruling white Democrats, the legislature passed a law in 1890 giving party officials the duty of conducting primary elections.[19] This allowed parties to enact rules excluding blacks, which the Democratic party eventually did, thereby adopting into its formal rules

what its general practice had been.[20] Since victory in the Democratic primary was tantamount to election, exclusion from the primary effectively eliminated blacks from meaningful participation in Georgia politics. Further exclusionary efforts included a law passed in 1894 that required registration by race on separate lists.[21] Given the climate of the times, this law merely facilitated fraud and discrimination against blacks.[22]

While the state moved relentlessly toward white hegemony, the Populist revolt of the early 1890s, led by Georgia firebrand Tom Watson, provided a countervailing tendency. The Populists, composed of agrarian masses and an emerging blue-collar proletariat, urged a united front of black and white farmers to oppose the oppressive forces of capitalist finance and industrialism. Its platform called for racial cooperation and justice, and repudiated race hatred and lynch laws. The Populist movement failed in Georgia by the middle of the decade—with Watson himself turning to virulent racism and anti-Semitism—in large measure because of the demagogic and destructive use of the race issue by other white state and local politicians at the time.[23]

As effective as the prior disfranchising measures were, the centerpiece of Georgia's efforts to deny the vote to blacks, the Disenfranchisement Act of 1908, came later.[24] Governor Hoke Smith's naming of the act in his message to the legislature left no doubt as to its goal.[25] This law provided for registration by any male who was sane, had no criminal record, had paid all taxes since 1877, had met the existing residency requirements, and had satisfied one of the following additional requirements: (1) had served honorably in wars of the United States or in the forces of the Confederate states; (2) had descended from persons who had such service records; (3) was of "good character" and could understand the duties of citizenship; (4) could read and write in English any paragraph of the state and federal constitutions or could understand and give a reasonable interpretation of any paragraph of such constitutions; or, (5) owned at least forty acres of land or property assessed for taxation at the value of at least five hundred dollars.[26]

Few blacks could meet any of these requirements as they were administered. They had not fought in wars in significant numbers, nor had their ancestors. The good character, literacy, and understanding tests, aside from the fact that they were designed to exclude uneducated blacks, were administered by white Democrats who made sure that blacks did in fact fail. Qualification through property ownership, given the disadvantaged economic position of blacks in the South, was for them a virtual impossibility. In South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966)[27] the 1908 Georgia scheme was described as "specifically designed to prevent Negroes from voting." Five years after passage of the act, disfranchisement was intensified by a system of permanent registration requiring all voters to submit to examination by a board of registrars.[28] Since the boards were composed of whites who were hostile to black voting, many blacks were denied registration or were discouraged from even attempting it.[29]

A contemporary publication noted that Georgia had "closed the door of political hope in the faces of one million of its citizens."[30] A commentator writing more than twenty years later reported that following passage of the Disenfranchisement Act, there was "almost absolute exclusion of the Negro voice in state and federal elections."[31]

Abolition of the White Primary

The white primary was successfully challenged in Georgia in 1945 in King v. Chapman,[32] after the Supreme Court's decision in Smith v. Allwright[33] invalidated the white primary system in Texas. Eugene Talmadge, a candidate for governor the following year and a confirmed white supremacist, responded by orchestrating a series of challenges to blacks around the state for allegedly being improperly registered and thus ineligible to vote in the primaries.[34] These challenges were a stopgap measure and, despite their in terrorem effect, did not keep a significant number of blacks from the polls. The challenges collapsed under their own administrative weight, and most of the challenged blacks actually voted.[35]

The legislature made a final attempt to salvage the white primary in 1947. It enacted a white primary bill repealing all statutes linking the primary to the state in an attempt to remove the primary from state control and thus from federal judicial oversight. The bill was vetoed by Governor M. E. Thompson, who questioned the legality of the bill and said it was an invitation to fraud.[36]

After the White Primary: Black Mobilization and New Restrictions on Registration

The demise of the white primary set in motion two opposing forces in the state: mobilization in the black community and efforts by the white leadership to make the registration process more restrictive. In 1940, before the end of the white primary, estimates placed the black registration in Georgia at 20,000.[37] After its abolition in 1945, black voter-registration organizations sprang up across the state, including the All-Citizens Registration Committee of Atlanta (ACRC), which has claimed the distinction of being "the oldest continuous political education and registration organization of its kind in the South."[38] It was through the efforts of ACRC and other groups that 125,000 blacks, 18.8 percent of the eligible population, were registered by late 1947.[39] The political leadership of the state was not slow in responding to these political stirrings in the black community.

By the time Eugene Talmadge's son Herman became governor in 1948, the decision in King v. Chapman had made the outright exclusion of blacks from the primary no longer possible. Accordingly, the state turned its attention once again to making the registration process more difficult. In 1949, it passed a reregistration and purge law.[40] Voters who failed to vote in at least one election in a two-year period were automatically purged, unless they requested a renewal of their registration.

The most innovative feature of the new law was a requirement that all who sought reregistration on the basis of good character and understanding of the duties of citizenship—that is, those who could not qualify under the literacy provisions—were required to take a test and successfully answer ten of thirty questions. The law proved to be as burdensome to whites as to blacks, and as a result, the Talmadge administration secured passage of a bill allowing those registered under the preexisting statutes to remain on the voter rolls.[41]

The traditional leadership of the state felt a new urgency to shore up the state's registration laws and protect white supremacy when Congress enacted the Civil Rights Act of 1957, the first civil rights act since Reconstruction.[42] The act prohibited discrimination in voting and authorized the Attorney General to bring suit for injunctive relief. That same year, the Georgia General Assembly adopted a resolution calling for the repeal of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments to the Constitution because they "were malignant acts of arbitrary power" and "are null and void and of no effect."[43]

In 1958, the state enacted a new registration act,[44] which incorporated the provisions of the old one but added an even more stringent test for the registration of those who could not read or write. They were required under the "good character and understanding" qualification to correctly answer twenty of thirty questions propounded by the registrar. The questions were difficult for even the best educated person to answer. They were an insurmountable barrier to illiterate blacks, particularly since the tests were administered by unsympathetic whites.[45]

Among the thirty questions were: What is a republican form of government? How does the Constitution of the United States provide that it may be amended? What does the Constitution of the United States provide regarding the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus? How does the constitution of Georgia provide that a county site may be changed? How may a new state be admitted to the Union? One question, with no irony apparently intended, was: What does the Constitution of the United States provide regarding the right of citizens to vote? The thirty questions were rewritten and reduced to twenty in 1964, with fifteen correct answers considered a passing score.[46] Robert Flanagan, for many years the field director of the Georgia National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), says that there was actually only one correct answer to each question, and that was "white folks ain't going to let black folks vote."[47]

The difficulty blacks had in registering under restrictive statutes that gave total discretion to hostile local officials, and the failure of existing civil rights laws to remedy the problem, were exemplified by Terrell County. Although it was 64 percent black, only 48 blacks—compared to 2,810 whites—were registered to vote in 1958.[48] The reasons for the disparities were simple. Registration was segregated; whites were given white application forms, and blacks were given green application forms. The white forms were processed, and the green forms were not. The literacy test was administered in a racially discriminatory manner, and blacks were held to a higher standard of literacy than were whites.

The Department of Justice brought one of its first suits under the Civil Rights Act of 1957 against Terrell County in 1959, seeking an injunction against discriminatory local registration practices.[49] The case was bitterly contested, and although the department eventually won an injunction, only five blacks were added to the county voter rolls by 1960.

Despite the federal court order, opposition to black registration remained unabated in Terrell County, appropriately dubbed by civil rights activists "Terrible Terrell." In 1963, Sheriff Zeke Mathews locked up two Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) workers engaged in voter registration on trumped-up charges of vagrancy. The federal court again stepped in and enjoined local officials from interfering with black registration efforts.[50]

Similar strong-arm tactics were used in nearby Sumter County, in which 44 percent of the population was black but only 8.2 percent of the black voting-age population was registered. Voting was segregated, and the Jaycees, an all-white organization, ran county elections. In 1963, four civil rights workers, John Perdew, Don Harris, and Ralph Allen of SNCC, and Zev Aeloney of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), were arrested because of their voter-registration and civil-rights activities and were charged with insurrection, at that time a capital offense in Georgia. A federal court eventually ruled the insurrection statute unconstitutional, ordered the four defendants admitted to bail, and enjoined their prosecutions.[51]

Clearly, if the problems of discrimination in voting were to be effectively redressed in places like Terrell and Sumter counties, some method other than the time-consuming, expensive, case-by-case litigation method of enforcing civil rights would have to be devised.

The County Unit System and the Statewide Majority-Vote Rule

Georgia's unique and complex county unit system was adopted in statutory form in 1917.[52] Described by Key as the "Rule of the Rustics," it applied to primary elections for United States senator and statewide offices.[53] This unique system institutionalized malapportionment and also served to minimize black political power.

Unit votes were assigned on the basis of the apportionment (in fact, malapportionment) of the Georgia House of Representatives. The candidate who received the highest number of popular votes in a county received all the county's unit votes. A majority of county unit votes nominated a senator and the governor, while a plurality of county unit votes nominated others. The system allowed for control by the rural counties and insured the containment of the voting power of blacks and other elements concentrated in the urban areas of the state, both of which were regarded with suspicion by the Democratic party.[54] The federal district court for the District of Columbia found that one of the purposes of the county unit system in Georgia was "to destroy black voting strength."[55]

The county unit system was a highly inequitable way of apportioning electoral power, and in 1963, in an opinion by Justice William O. Douglas, the Supreme Court, agreeing with the decision of the lower court, held that the county unit system violated the concept of "one person, one vote," which was the first use of the phrase.[56] The response of the state's white leaders to the overthrow of the county unit system was swift and predictable. Representative Denmark Groover, a former floor leader for segregationist governor Marvin Griffin, introduced a bill in the general assembly in 1963 requiring a majority vote for election to all county, state and federal offices.[57] The majority-vote law was enacted, with the support of the administration of Governor Carl Sanders, the following year.[58]

Prior to 1963, county officials—unlike statewide officeholders, who were selected under the county unit system—were nominated in primary elections conducted by the political parties. There was no statewide majority-vote requirement, and local party committees were free to determine whether a majority or a plurality vote would decide winners in their county's elections. The use of the plurality vote was widespread. Party officials estimated that as many as 100 of Georgia's 159 counties used a plurality vote, and that "it had been a 'toss up' between the two systems."[59]

Representative Groover was reported in several newspapers as saying the purpose of the majority-vote legislation was to "again provide protection which . . . was removed with the death of the county unit system" and to "thwart election control by Negroes and other minorities."[60] According to Groover, without a majority-vote requirement, "special interests and bloc groups" could control elections "by entering several candidates to split the field."[61] Speaking a week later, he warned that the federal government had been trying "to increase the registration of Negro voters" in Georgia and that his bill "would prevent the election by plurality vote of a candidate supported only by a local courthouse ring or by a bloc vote group."[62]

The general assembly also enacted a numbered-post provision to accompany the majority-vote rule requiring that candidates run for specific seats. The Supreme Court later ruled in a case from Burke County that the numbered-post law further enhanced minority vote dilution because it prevented a cohesive political group from concentrating on a single candidate.[63]

The majority-vote requirement was extended to municipalities in 1968,[64] but exempted from coverage were those whose charters expressly provided for plurality vote. More than fifty cities and towns that had plurality-vote provisions in their charters eventually adopted a majority-vote requirement, and often under overtly racial local circumstances—for example, after the near win, by a plurality vote, of a black to municipal office; after the resignation of a long-term white incumbent; after a black entered a contest with several white candidates who would likely split the white vote; or after an increase in black voter registration.[65]

The majority-vote requirement, currently under attack in Brooks v. Harris[66] and United States v. Georgia,[67] has survived two prior federal court challenges. The first was dismissed in 1971 as too speculative and not ripe for adjudication.[68] The second, an action to enforce section 5 brought by the Department of Justice, was also dismissed when it was discovered that the Attorney General had in fact precleared the majority-vote rule.[69] The evidence of purposeful discrimination discussed above, however, as well as evidence of the impact of the majority-vote requirement on the outcome of elections and its depressant effect on black candidacies, was not presented in either case. In the current litigation, the state has argued that Groover "did not have any power at all" in the general assembly, and that the majority-vote requirement was part of an election law reform bill pushed by the Sanders administration for nonracial reasons.[70]

The effect of abolition of the majority-vote requirement is to some extent speculative, for it is not possible to predict accurately, among other things, the extent to which whites would choose consensus candidates prior to the primary and impose the functional equivalent of a majority-vote requirement or would simply bolt the Democratic party in the event blacks were nominated in the primary and vote for white Republicans in the general election.[71] It seems likely, though, that abolition of the majority-vote requirement would result in an increase in the number of blacks nominated in the primaries, and thus elected in general elections, and would increase black political participation, including the number of black candidacies in majority-white jurisdictions.

Reapportionment: The Opening Round

A three-judge court in 1962 invalidated the apportionment of the Georgia General Assembly because it underrepresented the most populous counties.[72] The allocation system under the old arrangement insured that the smallest counties, containing less than one-fourth of the state's total population, comprised constitutional majorities in both houses. The court indicated that at least one house elected by the people had to be apportioned according to population. The general assembly went into a special session and reapportioned the senate into single-member districts on the basis of population, but it was very careful to devise procedures that would preclude blacks from being elected from the majority-black areas of Fulton County. Heeding the warning of house floor leader Frank Twitty that "district elections almost inevitably would lead to the election of a Negro in one of Fulton County's seven districts," the general assembly included a provision in the legislation requiring candidates in counties with more than one senatorial district to be elected at large on a countywide basis.[73]

The disfranchising provision was thrown into doubt, however, when legislative counsel advised the general assembly that at-large voting would violate the state constitution, which required senators to be elected from single-member districts. Twitty, vowing that he would "not . . . vote for anything that would automatically put a member of a minority race in the Senate," helped push through an amendment to the state constitution allowing at-large voting for senators in multidistrict counties.[74] The drawback of this tactic from its sponsor's point of view was that the constitutional amendment could not be presented to the voters for approval until the November general election—one month after the scheduled 16 October primary.

The stratagem to exclude blacks from the senate unraveled further when a would-be candidate challenged the at-large voting requirement for Fulton County in federal and state court. The federal court abstained, but Judge Durwood T. Pye of the Fulton County Superior Court issued an order less than seven hours before the polls were to open on election day holding that the at-large provision was in violation of the state constitution.[75] The elections were held on a district basis, and Leroy Johnson, a black attorney, defeated three white opponents for the majority-black District 38 seat. He went on to win the general election against a black Republican opponent and became the first black to serve in the general assembly since Reconstruction.[76] Horace Ward, another black attorney and presently a federal district court judge in Atlanta, won a second seat in the senate from a majority-black district in 1964.

The significance of the dispute over district as opposed to countywide voting in Fulton County, which Twitty and his colleagues thoroughly understood, is apparent from the district and countywide totals for Johnson's election. He got a majority of 70 percent of the votes in District 38, but only a plurality of 47 percent countywide.[77] Had countywide voting been in effect, Johnson would have been forced into a runoff, and given the prevailing pattern of racial bloc voting, he would doubtlessly have been defeated by his white opponent.

When the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, it described the voting practices of various southern states as "an invidious and pervasive evil which has been perpetuated . . . through unremitting and ingenious defiance of the Constitution."[78] Given its remarkable and relentless history of discrimination, that characterization was particularly accurate for Georgia.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965: A Watershed Event

The Voting Rights Act abolished Georgia's literacy test for voting, including its "good character and understanding" questions and a 1964 law requiring poll officials to be "judicious, intelligent and upright,"[79] and required the state under section 5 of the act to prove, before its new voting practices could be implemented, that they were not discriminatory.[80] This combination of abolition of barriers to registration and federal supervision of new voting procedures has had a profound impact on the state. Voter registration has increased dramatically, and black officeholding, while still disproportionately low, has steadily advanced.

The Increase in Black Voter Registration

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights estimated that the number of blacks registered to vote in Georgia in 1964 was 270,000, or 27.4 percent of the eligible black citizens.[81] Figures from the Georgia secretary of state's office show that by 1980, 464,783 black registered voters were reported—69.7 percent of the black voting-age population. As of 1988, 644,500 registered blacks were on the voter lists. Data for black and white registration have shown consistently that since 1988 about 10 percentage points more eligible white voters register than black ones.

Some of the black increase can be traced to the early efforts of federal examiners appointed under the Voting Rights Act, who in 1967 registered 1,465 blacks in Terrell County, 475 in Lee County, and 1,448 in Screven County.[82] However, the main work of voter registration has been done by civil rights organizations such as the Voter Education Project (VEP), the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), NAACP, SNCC, CORE, and literally hundreds of local black clubs and civic leagues from around the state.[83]

Although Georgia's literacy test was abolished by the act, and the state was prevented by section 5 from enacting new, equally discriminatory practices to take its place, the state's cumbersome registration process remains in place. Faithful to its white redeemer roots, Georgia's procedures are now needlessly complex. They place the burden of registration on the voter and vest enormous discretion in local officials. Registration, for example, may be conducted only at fixed sites designated by local registrars and must be advertised in advance.[84]

After passage of the Voting Rights Act, fraud and intimidation as methods of blunting black voter registration gradually faded away. They were replaced with what the director of VEP has described as "an adversarial relationship."[85] Local officials simply refused to designate additional registration sites in the black community or canceled previously authorized neighborhood registration drives.

Some of these restrictive practices have been challenged in state and federal court, but with mixed results. Blacks were successful in securing an injunction in 1980 under section 5 against the implementation of a new policy prohibiting neighborhood registration drives in DeKalb County, where only 24 percent of the black eligible voters were registered, as compared with 81 percent of eligible whites.[86] Blacks failed in their state court efforts to have additional registration sites designated in the black areas of Muscogee County, where 60 percent of whites, but only 48 percent of blacks, were registered. In a show of remarkable legal obfuscation and indifference to the depressed levels of minority registration, the state supreme court held that the plaintiff should have filed an action for mandamus, rather than declaratory judgment, and that the discretion of the local registrar in designating, or refusing to designate, registration sites was judicially unreviewable.[87]

In another case, VEP v. Cleland,[88] a federal court dismissed a statewide challenge to Georgia's registration system when the state agreed in the stipulation of dismissal that it would "encourage" registrars to appoint black deputy registrars and establish additional registration sites. While VEP v. Cleland did not succeed in restructuring the state's system of voter registration, VEP's director said it precipitated a change in the relationship between state officials and voter registration groups. "Since 1984 there has been more cooperation. I think Max Cleland [secretary of state] was hurt by the suit and realized the adversarial relationship was self-defeating. It's not ideal now, but at least we talk. It's definitely better."[89] As evidence of the thaw in relations, state and local officials entered into consent decrees in two subsequent cases facilitating access to voter registration by minority and poor citizens. In Project VOTE! v. Ledbetter,[90] the state consented to allowing registration at food-stamp distribution centers, and in Spalding County VEP v. Cowart,[91] the defendants agreed to establishing registration sites in the black community in Spalding County.

One improvement in the registration process would be a simplified system using mail-in registration and motor vehicle files. This change—inexpensive and easy to administer—would undoubtedly increase registration for all voters and reduce existing racial disparities.[92]

Changes in City and County Electoral Structures

To assess the impact of the Voting Rights Act in Georgia on local electoral systems (principally at-large elections), we surveyed in 1989–90 all cities in the state of 10,000 or more people that had 10 percent or more black population in 1980. Thirty-four cities met these criteria. We asked whether the cities had made changes in their method of elections in response to the act, and whether the changes were associated with increased minority officeholding.

Because of the historical significance of county government in Georgia, we also surveyed counties regarding the electoral changes they had made. A substantial number of counties in Georgia had changed their method of elections since 1965 from at-large to district voting. In order to include these jurisdictions in our study and make our analysis more comprehensive, we surveyed all counties in the state with 10 percent or more black population; 129 counties fit this standard, including a number of very small rural counties. By including city and county governments in our analysis, we feel confident that our conclusions are not limited to city environments but apply to both major types of local government affecting the lives of Georgians.

The survey was done by mail questionnaires, with a follow-up mailing and, when necessary, follow-up telephone calls. We were able to obtain the appropriate information for virtually all cities and counties. Local registrars and voting officials cooperated fully in the project.

We had originally wanted to learn, for each jurisdiction, the method of electing the governing body at three points—1964, 1980, and 1990. Preliminary discussions with election officials and civil rights workers, however, led us to select 1980 and 1990 as years for which accurate data on election methods and black officeholding could be obtained. Moreover, because many changes in Georgia election structure occurred between these two years, we believed we would have a good sample of jurisdictions for a before-and-after study of the results of those changes. We therefore tried to determine the election method—whether at large, district, or mixed—in the two years. If it had changed, we discovered when the change had occurred. We collected the racial and gender makeup of the council or commission in both pre- and post-change formats, although we do not report gender data here. We also sought information about whether the change was a result of litigation or threat of litigation, or was simply voluntary.

A Summary of Findings

We discovered a striking pattern of changes over time in electoral structures from at-large to district voting in the surveyed jurisdictions, for both cities and counties. The changes were particularly marked after 1982, the year in which section 2 of the Voting Rights Act was amended to make voting practices unlawful if they resulted in discrimination, whether intentional or not.[93] The switch from at-large to single-member-district or mixed plans invariably led to an increase in the number of black elected officials. In contrast, there was not a consistent increase in black officeholding in the jurisdictions that retained their at-large systems, nor was the black increase as great when it occurred. These changes correspond with the general findings in the social science literature regarding form of election and minority representation.[94]

Our findings are also consistent with the conclusions expressed by knowledgeable local observers of politics in some jurisdictions that have switched from at-large to district elections. According to one of the leaders in the drive for single-member districts in Baldwin County, "We've tried many, many times to get blacks elected [at large] and we've never been able to do it, even when most everybody turns out to vote. We finally made the decision that the only thing we could do was sue."[95] One of the two blacks elected to the Mitchell County Commission following a successful legal challenge to at-large voting in 1984 underscored the importance of district elections. "District voting, as we had alleged all the time, resulted in people being elected who really represent the community."[96]

The massive shift to district voting usually was caused by litigation or threat of it. Seventy-seven law suits were filed against the surveyed jurisdictions alone, challenging at-large elections under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments, the preclearance provisions of section 5, and amended section 2. While the Justice Department played a key role in the enforcement of section 5, virtually all of the litigation challenging election structures was brought by civil rights organizations on behalf of the minority community.

Increased Minority Officeholding

The changes brought to Georgia's electoral systems by the Voting Rights Act have been broad and systematic, and are only now beginning to reveal themselves in increased electoral representation of blacks. That these changes have come from the passage and implementation of the act, and the parallel development of vote-dilution jurisprudence in constitutional litigation, is undeniable. Virtually every change was from a more dilutive to a more representative form of government. At-large elections were once the dominant form of election in both cities and counties in Georgia; now, single-member-district and mixed plans predominate.

Cities that changed to multimember plans also experienced increased black officeholding. These cities, and three additional cities with multimember plans in place before 1980, show how adopting minority-controlled districts increases black representation. With usually two to three members representing each district, these plans, by allowing voters of different districts to use the same polling place, permit small cities to have relatively large governing councils even when they have only a few voting precincts.

Of the 34 cities of 10,000 or more we surveyed, 29 reported previously having had an at-large system, but only 6 still maintained that method. We found evidence of legal action in 17 cities. (Twenty-three suits were also brought in cities with fewer than 10,000.) Table 3.8 shows that in many of the unsued cities making changes in their method of elections, litigation was threatened or was implicit in demands of the minority community for the abolition of at-large voting. In 1990, 9 of the surveyed cities reported pure single-member districts, and 12 had mixed plans. Over one-half of the changes occurred in the seven years following the amendment of section 2.

Of the 129 counties surveyed in our study, 115 had at-large systems prior to passage of the Voting Rights Act. Only 12 counties made changes to mixed or single-member-district plans between 1965 and 1980. By 1990, only 30 at-large systems remained. Over one-half of the changes have occurred since 1984. Fifty-seven of the counties—more than one-half of those making changes—faced direct legal challenges to their systems of electing commissioners. The other counties making changes often did so under the threat, direct or implied, of litigation.

Of the 30 counties retaining at-large voting, 9 used a sole commissioner form of government. The sole commissioner system, unused outside of Georgia, combines all county legislative and executive authority in a single official.[97] In majority-white counties where voting is racially polarized, the sole commissioner system, coupled with the state's majority-vote requirement, effectively denies blacks the equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice to the legislative and executive branches of county government. Several of the single commissioner counties have sizable black populations; when an entire county is represented by one white male commissioner, the result there is substantial underrepresentation of minorities. Sole commissioner systems have come under increasing attack under section 2, and as a result, several jurisdictions have abandoned this form of government in favor of boards of commissioners elected from districts.[98]

Generally speaking, there is a moderate-to-strong correlation in both the cities and the counties between the proportion of the population that is black and the percentage of the governing body that is black. The Pearson product-moment correlations are .79 in the cities and .53 in the counties. Both of these correlations are substantially stronger than the relationship under the at-large form of election.

Our data from the thirty-four cities are presented in tables 3.1–3.7, and the county-level data are reported in the corresponding tables 3.1A–3.5A. Tables 3.1 and 3.1A show the expected connection between the proportion of the population that is black and the percentage of black officeholders. These two tables also show the continuing underrepresentation of blacks in majority-white jurisdictions under all plans. In only one instance, involving multimember district plans with low percentages of black residents, did the mean percentage of black officials meet or exceed the mean population figures. This anomaly was based on one case.

Tables 3.2 and 3.2A show the dramatic increase in representation in the last ten years in majority-white cities and counties that abandoned at-large plans, in contrast to those that did not. The 6 cities and 30 counties that retained at-large systems show only minimal increases in the level of black representation. Of the counties retaining at-large systems, only the 7 with majority-black populations showed a substantial increase, and this increase (7.8 percentage points) still leaves blacks woefully underrepresented. The remarkable lack of change in black representation in cities and counties that maintained at-large systems is quite significant. Without electoral changes and the potential empowerment of the black electorate that they provide, very little forward movement in the electoral fortunes of Georgia blacks would have occurred.

The source of black success in mixed plans is exhibited in tables 3.3 and 3.3A. In majority-white jurisdictions, the district arrangements reported there (and in table 3.6) were much more conducive to black electoral success than the at-large components. In short, most local black officials in these Georgia cities and counties were elected from single-member districts, either in pure district systems or in the district component of mixed plans. Tables 3.3, 3.3A, and 3.6 point to the conditions that encourage election of blacks in these districts: a sizable black population.

Tables 3.4 and 3.4A show two measures of black representational equity in 1990—the percentage of blacks on a government body compared to their percentage of the jurisdiction's population, expressed as a difference and as a ratio. Blacks were much more equitably represented on governing bodies in district systems than in at-large ones, by either measure.

Table 3.5 reports the degree of change in black representational equity between 1980 and 1990, using the ratio measure. Only cities that changed electoral systems after 1980 are included. The results are clear and consistent: changing from at-large to some variety of district plan markedly increased black representation on city councils. Unchanged cities had minuscule changes in black representation, however. Table 3.5A reports similar data from Georgia counties. Again, the evidence is clear. Changing the method of electing the county commission substantially increased black representation, particularly in majority-white counties. Counties that did not alter their election systems continued to show very low levels of black representation, even in majority-black counties. The results envisioned by those who see the Voting Rights Act as a weapon to attack vote dilution were occurring in Georgia in the 1980s.

The connection between a majority-black constituency and black electoral success in cities is obvious in tables 3.6 and 3.7. Multimember systems are included because there is evidence that these plans were introduced to provide at least some level of minority representation. Excluding multimember systems does not substantially affect the results of tables 3.6 or 3.7. While blacks occasionally won in majority-white districts, it was rare. Even in cities 50–59.9 percent black, only a little over one-half of the council members were black. As black majorities increased, so did black electoral success. Racially polarized voting may very well have accounted for the results in these tables.

To summarize, the empirical evidence reflects the strong impact of the Voting Rights Act on black electoral success in Georgia. Through the introduction of single-member-district and mixed plans, which the act facilitated, blacks have been able to sharply increase their representation. Even so, measures of equity show that in 1990 blacks were still underrepresented in all types of systems, and at all levels of black population.

Litigation and the Role of the Civil Rights Community

Georgia has had an extraordinary amount of voting rights litigation at the local level. Between 1974 and 1990 there were lawsuits challenging at-large systems in forty Georgia cities and fifty-seven counties, respectively. A few jurisdictions were sued more than once. Augusta, for example, was sued in separate actions by the U.S. Attorney General and private plaintiffs. In addition, cities and counties were often joined as defendants in the same suit. Bleckley County and Cochran, the county seat, for example, were both defendants in Hall v. Holder.

A review of the litigation makes at least two things clear. First, most changes in voting that occurred were forced upon the cities and counties by the preclearance process and by litigation (see table 3.8 for cities).[99] There is no basis for concluding that jurisdictions voluntarily abandoned past discriminatory practices. Second, most of the litigation was brought by the civil rights community itself. Of the 86 cases filed against a city or county, at least 68 were brought by the legal staffs of civil rights organizations: 54 by the American Civil Liberties Union; 5 by Georgia Legal Services; 4 by the Voter Education Project; 3 by the Southern Poverty Law Center; 2 by the Legal Defense Fund; 1 by the NAACP; and 1 by the Center for Constitutional Rights. In five cases, two or more of the organizations shared representation of the plaintiffs, and each organization is separately credited in the numbers listed immediately above. Three cases were brought by the Department of Justice.

Shift by Counties from District to At-Large Elections

The continuing effort by Georgia whites to exclude blacks from effective participation is particularly apparent in the shift by a number of counties from district to at-large voting soon after the passage of the Voting Rights Act. An intentional shift to a more dilutive form of elections in the face of the act cannot be interpreted as anything other than a continuing resistance to black political participation.

Although the vast majority of the state's counties elected their county government at large at the time of the act's passage, some did use single-member districts. Thirteen of those with significant black populations, which almost certainly would have had one or more majority-black districts as a result of increasing black registration, abolished district voting in favor of at-large elections after the passage of the act. The counties, with black populations ranging from 28 to 61 percent, were: Miller, Dooly, Calhoun, Clay, Early, Henry, Walton, Meriwether, Morgan, Newton, Twiggs, McDuffie, and Wilkes. Two additional counties, Bacon (13 percent black) and Crisp (40 percent black), switched from district to at-large voting in 1963 and 1964 respectively, but with implementation of the changes to take place after 1 November 1964, which later became the effective date for preclearance under section 5.

Since passage of the act, such changes in voting are presumed by law to be discriminatory.[100] Presumptions aside, in view of the 1962 senate reapportionment battle described earlier, there can be little doubt that local officials and their representatives in the general assembly were aware that at-large voting would make it more difficult for blacks to win elective office in these counties. Although the act required that at-large changes be submitted for preclearance, most of them were not.

All the above fifteen counties eventually returned to district elections, but only because they were forced to do so by lawsuits, threats of such, and/or Department of Justice denial of preclearance to their at-large systems.[101] After these counties returned to district elections 17 percent of the county commissioners elected were black.

One county with district elections before passage of the act that did not change to at-large voting was Seminole County. Its districts, which were grossly malapportioned, already discriminated against minority voters. The county's plan had been enacted in 1933,[102] and the most populous district, with the majority of the county's black voters, was over ten times larger than the smallest one. After local blacks filed a one-person, one-vote lawsuit, the court in 1980 ordered a new, properly apportioned plan into effect.[103] To no one's surprise, a black commissioner was elected after the new system was implemented.

Rogers v. Lodge and the Acceleration of Change

One of the most important modern voting cases in Georgia is Rogers v. Lodge,[104] a successful challenge to at-large elections in Burke County. Pitts v. Busbee,[105] a similar challenge to at-large elections in Fulton County, and Paige v. Gray,[106] the first successful challenge to at-large elections for a Georgia city (Albany), were earlier cases that set important precedents, but it was not until Rogers that much of the confusion over appropriate standards in vote-dilution cases was resolved and the change to district voting began to escalate throughout the state.

The first decision of the U.S. Supreme Court invalidating at-large elections on the grounds that they diluted minority voting strength was White v. Regester, a case from Texas.[107] In reaching its decision, the Court looked at a broad range of factors affecting minority participation, such as the history of discrimination, a depressed minority socioeconomic status, the small number of minorities elected to office, and so forth. The White analysis, which examined the effect of a challenged practice to determine its lawfulness, was applied in subsequent voting cases, including Pitts v. Busbee and Paige v. Gray.

In 1980, a sharply divided court in City of Mobile v. Bolden[108] held that minority plaintiffs must prove that a challenged voting practice was adopted or was being maintained with a racially discriminatory intent, and essentially repudiated White. Bolden was a highly controversial and much criticized decision.[109] In response to it, Congress amended section 2 in 1982 to provide that, whatever the standard of the Constitution, voting practices were in violation of the statute if their "result" was to discriminate on the basis of race or color.[110]

Two days after Congress amended section 2, the Supreme Court decided Rogers v. Lodge and essentially reversed its earlier decision in City of Mobile. While the Court continued to require proof of racial purpose, it said that such purpose could be inferred from circumstantial evidence: "discriminatory intent need not be proved by direct evidence. 'Necessarily, an invidious discriminatory purpose may often be inferred from the totality of the relevant facts.'"[111]

The decision in Rogers and the amendment of section 2 represented the renewal of a strong judicial and congressional commitment to equal voting rights. They also accelerated the pace of litigation and the adoption of district elections in Georgia.

The facts in Rogers were egregious, but Burke County was fundamentally no different from other counties in the state that had a significant black population and used at-large elections. All of them had a common history of discrimination; minorities were a depressed socioeconomic group; there were few, if any, elected black officials; voting was racially polarized; housing, churches, civic, and social organizations were largely segregated as a matter of practice. Rogers was a clear signal, as the subsequent litigation bore out, that every at-large system in the state was vulnerable to challenge under the Voting Rights Act.

Another factor contributing to change was that jurisdictions which lost in court were required to pay the costs and attorneys' fees of the prevailing plaintiffs. In Rogers, Burke County not only had to pay its own lawyers, but it had to pay the plaintiffs' attorneys $294,584.41.[112] Poor odds and the costs of losing were strong disincentives for jurisdictions to fight to keep their at-large systems. According to a survey of probate judges conducted by the Atlanta Constitution, "the threat of costly lawsuits is prompting more and more local officials to adopt district elections."[113]

The Supreme Court first construed amended section 2 in 1986 in Thornburg v. Gingles,[114] a case involving multimember legislative districts in North Carolina. The court simplified proof of vote dilution by focusing on whether voting was racially polarized and whether majority-black single-member districts could be created. As a result of the amendment of section 2 and the decisions in Rogers and Gingles, many jurisdictions in Georgia and throughout the South have bowed to the inevitable and have adopted less dilutive forms of elections. Linda Meggers, the director of the state's reapportionment office, described the change to district voting as "the most revolutionary change in Georgia since the Civil War. You're having a whole new distribution of power."[115]

Polarized Voting

Elections in Georgia in which voters have a choice between viable black and white candidates are, with occasional exceptions, polarized on the basis of race. This is true whether the definition of polarized voting is the one adopted by the Supreme Court of "black voters and white voters vot[ing] differently,"[116] or a more stringent definition, such as a majority of each race voting differently.

The fact that voting behavior may also be correlated with other factors, such as voters' socioeconomic characteristics or place of residence, or candidates' expenditures, is legally irrelevant to a section 2 racial bloc voting analysis. Not only are many of these factors themselves strongly related to race, but the Supreme Court held in Gingles that "all that matters under §2 and under a functional theory of vote dilution is voter behavior, not its explanation."[117] Thus, where black and white voters are actually voting differently, it is immaterial that nonracial factors may play a role in explaining voter behavior.

Reported decisions have explicitly or implicitly found polarized voting in a number of Georgia jurisdictions, including Bleckley County, where "the evidence conclusively established a pattern of racially polarized voting";[118] Burke County, where the evidence of bloc voting "was clear and overwhelming";[119] Carrollton, where voting was "racially polarized";[120] Colquitt County, where there was evidence of "racial bloc voting";[121] Albany, where the at-large system amounted to "the winner take all";[122] Fulton County, where "the government ha[d] never become equally open to participation by black and white members of the community";[123] Putnam County, where elections were characterized by "racially polarized white voting";[124] and Wilkes County, where "racial bloc voting exist[ed] in the county."[125]

A 1989 analysis by the ACLU confirmed the continuing existence of polarized voting in the state. The analysis was conducted as part of a challenge to the at-large, circuitwide election of superior court judges. The state, which contended that statutes affecting the election of judges were not subject to the Voting Rights Act, was ordered by a three-judge court to comply with section 5 and to submit for preclearance statutes enacted since 1 November 1964 affecting the election of forty-eight judgeships.[126]

The ACLU analyzed all known judicial, legislative, and at-large county office elections since 1980, in the counties affected by the litigation (principally those with substantial concentrations of black population) in which there was a "serious" black candidate, defined as a black who received at least half of the black vote in a primary or general election. Fifty-one elections from twenty counties were examined. Regression analysis showed that, on average, 86 percent of whites voted for the white opponent(s) of the black candidate.[127] Given such a pattern of voting, it is apparent why black candidates with strong black support have found it difficult to win majority-white districts. Conversely, it is equally clear why serious black candidates have enjoyed success primarily in those districts where members of their own race were in the majority.

The three most notable exceptions to the pattern of blacks losing in majority-white districts involved Andrew Young, elected to the then majority-white Fifth Congressional District in 1972; Robert Benham, elected to the court of appeals in 1984 and the state supreme court in 1990, becoming the first black ever to win statewide office in Georgia; and Clarence Cooper, elected as a member of the court of appeals in 1990.

In his 1972 contest, Young got 25.3 percent of the white vote. In 1981, however, after serving in Congress for three terms and as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations under President Carter, and after raising more money than in any of his previous campaigns, he got only 8.9 percent of the white vote in his successful runoff election against a white for mayor of majority-black Atlanta.[128] In 1990 Andrew Young ran for governor of Georgia, receiving 28.8 percent of the primary vote. In the required runoff election, he increased his share to 38.1 percent, far short of the majority he needed. Ecological regression analysis of the county returns showed strong evidence of racially polarized voting in both Young efforts that year. The slope of his regression lines mirrored that of Jesse Jackson's 1988 presidential primary bid in Georgia, indicating that in all these races, the black candidate received less than 26 percent of the white vote.[129]

Judicial elections are unique in that they are subject to considerable control by the bar and the political leadership of the state. Candidates are essentially preselected through appointment by the governor to vacant positions upon the recommendation of a judicial nominating committee dominated by the bar. The chosen candidate then runs in the ensuing election with all the advantages of incumbency. Judicial elections are low-key, low-interest contests in which the voters tend to defer to the choices that have previously been made.[130] Benham, following this pattern of preselection, was appointed by the governor to the court of appeals in 1984. He ran for the position in August of that year, and was elected with 58.5 percent of the vote. His election was unusual in that he faced three white opponents, whereas most court appointments have very little opposition.

Benham received special political treatment. According to state representative Tyrone Brooks, "the governor felt they could sell Benham in the white community, with the support of the bar and the Democratic leadership, because nobody knew he was black. The plan was to get out the vote in the black community in the traditional way, but to ignore race in the white community. Benham's picture could appear only on brochures distributed in the black community and there could be no endorsements of Benham by Maynard Jackson, Julian Bond, Jesse Jackson, or anybody in the civil rights community."[131] Ironically, but not surprisingly, the result of this consciously racial campaign was that Benham's election revealed very little racial polarization. Benham's election to the state supreme court in 1990 resulted from much the same strategy, and he was again successful.

In 1990, Clarence Cooper became the second black to win statewide judicial office by following Benham's strategy. He was appointed to the court of appeals and then ran for election to a full term. Ecological regression analysis showed strong similarities in racial voting patterns between the Benham and Cooper contests; white support for black candidates was decidedly greater than in either Andrew Young's 1990 or Jesse Jackson's 1988 statewide contest.

Legislative Reapportionment

The increased use of single-member districts in the general assembly, implemented as a result of litigation and section 5 review, has also resulted in a corresponding increase in the number of black legislators. Following decisions of the Supreme Court holding that the one-person, one-vote principle required a state to apportion both houses of its legislature on the basis of population, the district court in Toombs v. Fortson[132] ordered further reapportionment in Georgia. This litigation created a series of interim plans and special elections, and culminated in the adoption of single-member and multimember districts for the house.[133]

One of the first blacks elected was Julian Bond, former communications director of SNCC. After his election in 1965 but before he took office, he issued a SNCC-endorsed statement strongly critical of the Vietnam War and of continued racial discrimination in the United States. "We are in sympathy with and support the men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft," the statement said, "which would compel them to contribute their lives to United States aggression in Viet Nam in the name of 'freedom' we find so false in this country."[134]

The statement was triggered by the death of Samuel Younge, Jr., a Tuskegee Institute student and navy veteran, who had been killed while trying to use the segregated bathroom of a local service station. According to Bond, "the irony of Younge losing the life he had offered his country over a segregated toilet" prompted the release of the antiwar statement by SNCC.[135]

Before the house convened, seventy-five members petitioned to have Bond excluded on the grounds that he could not validly take the oath of office to support the constitutions of the United States and Georgia. When he appeared for the swearing-in ceremony, Bond felt that "the hostility from white legislators was nearly absolute."[136]

In an action reminiscent of that of the general assembly of 1868, the house in 1966 passed, 184 to 12, a resolution that "Bond shall not be allowed to take the oath of office . . . and . . . shall not be seated as a member of the House of Representatives."[137] Undaunted, Bond ran in the special election to fill his vacant seat and was reelected by an overwhelming majority. He refused to recant his statement and was denied the oath of office a second time.

The U.S. Supreme Court held that he had been improperly excluded and his freedom of expression had been violated. The court found it unnecessary to reach the issue of whether Bond's exclusion had also been because of race. He was seated and served several terms in both the house and later the Georgia senate.

After the 1970 census, the state enacted a new legislative apportionment plan. Under the preclearance process, the Attorney General objected to the original plan because various discriminatory features—including multimember districts, numbered posts, a majority-vote requirement, and changes in the structure of potential black-majority single-member districts for the house—enhanced the possibility of discrimination against minority voters.[138] He also objected to the senate plan because of the potentially discriminatory way in which districts had been drawn in Fulton and Richmond counties.

Once again, the state was compelled by section 5 to construct a more racially fair reapportionment plan. The new plan corrected the objection to senate redistricting, increased the number of single-member house districts from 105 to 128, and reduced the number of multimember house districts from 49 to 32. The Attorney General approved the senate changes but rejected the house reapportionment plan again. He concluded that the house plan did not remove the objectionable combination of multimember districts, numbered posts, and the majority-vote requirement. The state resolved to take no further steps to rectify the matter. The Attorney General brought suit, and the state eventually lost. It was required to reapportion in conformity with section 5.[139] The general assembly adopted a new plan in 1974 and used fewer multimember districts. It provided for 180 house members elected from 154 districts. As a result of the 1974 changes, the number of blacks in the house increased from fourteen to twenty.

It is difficult to overstate the impact on minority officeholding of single-member-district elections for the general assembly. Of the six black state senators and twenty-two representatives, only one—Michael Thurmond, whose district included the university town of Athens—was elected from a majority-white (57 percent) district.[140] The remaining black members were elected from districts 56 percent to 99 percent black.

Congressional Reapportionment

Georgia's 1971 and 1981 congressional reapportionments were the products of intentional discrimination and are dramatic examples of the extraordinary lengths to which the legislature was prepared to go to exclude blacks from the congressional delegation. They also show how effective the preclearance provisions of section 5 have been in blocking certain forms of vote dilution and facilitating minority officeholding.

The congressional reapportionment enacted in 1931 was invalidated in Wes- berry v. Sanders (1964)[141] because of severe malapportionment of the Fifth District, comprising Fulton, DeKalb, and Rockdale counties. This district was the largest in the state and contained 823,680 people, while the smallest district, the Ninth, had only 272,154 people—fewer than one-third as many as the Fifth. After Wesberry, the general assembly enacted a new plan with acceptable population deviations.[142] The apportionment process following the 1970 census was the first reapportionment subject to section 5 review.

The original 1971 plan discriminated in three distinct ways. First, it divided the concentration of black population in the metropolitan Atlanta area into the Fourth and Fifth districts to insure that the Fifth would be majority-white. Second, it excluded the residences of black persons from the Fifth District who were known to be potential candidates: Andrew Young, who had run in the previous Fifth District election in 1970; and Maynard Jackson, the vice-mayor of Atlanta. The homes of both men were located about one block from the new district line. The 1970 contest between Young and a white opponent, Fletcher Thompson, had been particularly divisive, and, according to a federal judge, was characterized by "racist campaign tactics."[143] Third, to maximize the chances of white control, the residences of whites who were recognized as potential candidates were included in the district bounds.[144] Although there is no candidate residency requirement in congressional elections, nonresidence would have been an obvious political obstacle.

The plan was submitted for preclearance, and the Attorney General objected to it. He said that he was unable to conclude "that these new boundaries will not have a discriminatory racial effect on voting by minimizing or diluting black voting strength in the Atlanta area."[145] Under the duress of section 5, the general assembly enacted a new plan in 1972, increasing the black percentage in the Fifth District from 38 to 44 percent and including the residences of Young and Jackson. The plan was precleared. Young, an adroit politician and campaigner, ran in the ensuing 1972 election and, with crossover support from progressive white in-town Atlanta neighborhoods, became the first black elected to Congress from Georgia since Reconstruction.[146]

When the state reapportioned its congressional districts after the 1980 census, it tried once again to minimize black voting strength in the metropolitan Atlanta area. The 1980 figures revealed that the state's ten congressional districts, while having become severely malapportioned since they were drawn in 1972, were still majority white, with the exception of the Fifth. This district contained a slight (50.33 percent) black population majority.

The new plan drawn in 1981 maintained white majorities in nine of the ten districts and increased the black population in the Fifth to 57.28 percent. Although majority-black in total and voting-age populations, the district actually contained a 54 percent white majority among registered voters. The state submitted the plan for preclearance and argued that the Fifth District's configuration could not be discriminatory because it increased the black percentage over the 1972 plan. The Attorney General did not agree, and denied section 5 approval.[147]

The state then filed a declaratory judgment action in the district court for the District of Columbia, arguing that under the retrogression standard of section 5, it was entitled to have its congressional reapportionment plan precleared. The Supreme Court had previously held in Beer v. United States[148] that the purpose of section 5 was to maintain the status quo in voting, and that a plan that was ameliorative instead of retrogressive could not violate the effect standard of the statute. The evidence at trial showed that the 1981 plan, while not technically retrogressive, was the product of intentional discrimination. The court denied preclearance, and the Supreme Court affirmed on appeal.[149]

Given the rich history of chronic vote discrimination against blacks, it is not surprising that the 1981 congressional redistricting process was influenced by race, despite the vigorous denials by white officials. What is surprising was the extent of that influence. Senator Julian Bond had introduced legislation that would have created a Fifth District that was 69 percent black. Several senators opposed the so-called Bond Amendment because it would, they said, cause "white flight," divide the congressional districts into "black and white," and "bring out resegregation in a fine county like Fulton and a fine city like Atlanta."[150] Nonetheless, the final plan adopted by the senate contained the Bond Amendment.

The leadership of the house rejected the Bond plan for the Fifth District. Joe Mack Wilson, chairman of the House Reapportionment Committee and the person who dominated the process in the lower chamber, frankly explained to his colleagues that "I don't want to draw nigger districts."[151] Wilson freely used the term "nigger," and he regularly characterized legislation of benefit to blacks as "nigger legislation." The District of Columbia court, in an extraordinary but factually based finding, concluded that "Representative Joe Mack Wilson is a racist."[152] The speaker of the house, Tom Murphy, while not as antagonistic in his language, was equally opposed to the Bond plan for the same reasons. "I was concerned," he said later, "that . . . we were gerrymandering a district to create a black district where a black would certainly be elected."[153] On the basis of these overt racial statements, as well as on the absence of a legitimate nonracial reason for adopting the plan, the conscious minimizing of black voting strength, and the history of discrimination in Georgia, the court concluded that the state's submission had a discriminatory purpose and violated section 5.

Forced yet again by the Voting Rights Act to construct a racially fair plan, the general assembly in a special session enacted an apportionment plan for the Fifth District with a black population exceeding 65 percent. The plan was approved by the court. In 1986, black civil rights activist John Lewis was elected in this district, defeating Julian Bond, a former SNCC colleague and the principal architect of the redistricting plan.

Conclusion

Against formidable odds, and checked at every turn, blacks in Georgia have made impressive advances in political participation. The number of black elected officials grew from 3 in 1964 to 495 in 1990.[154] During the same period, black registration increased from 270,000 to 608,000.

The Voting Rights Act was a decisive event in Georgia's political history and continues to be the major weapon in the civil rights armamentarium in the battle to bring about a more equitable role for blacks in the political system. Section 5 has successfully blocked the introduction of many new attempts at vote dilution. Section 2, since its amendment in 1982, has proved a potent force in challenging existing discriminatory practices.

The increase in black officeholding can in large measure be traced directly to the gradual demise of at-large elections and the implementation of single-member districts containing effective black voting majorities. These changes were neither self-executing nor voluntary, but were coerced through a combination of congressional legislation, favorable judicial decisions, the enforcement of the preclearance requirement, and litigation efforts of the civil rights and minority communities.

Significant racial disparities remain, however. Blacks are 25 percent of Georgia's voting-age population, but constitute only 7.6 percent of the elected officials in the state. Not only is black registration depressed, but black voter turnout is lower than white voter turnout. According to Bureau of the Census surveys taken after the 1988 presidential election, 53.2 percent of age-eligible whites in Georgia, but only 42.4 percent of age-eligible blacks, reported voting in the election.[155]

Bloc voting, evidence of a continuing racial schism, remains a political fact of life in the state, as does the use of election practices that enhance discrimination, such as at-large voting and the majority-vote and numbered-post requirements. The state's system of voter registration is needlessly rigid and cumbersome and is in need of overhaul. The fight for equal voting rights in Georgia, therefore, is far from over. Much remains to be done. But the Voting Rights Act, in conjunction with alert and active civil rights and minority communities, should continue to serve well the citizens of the state, both black and white.

TABLE 3.1
Black Representation on Council in 1990 by Election Plan, Georgia Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council, 1990
SMD plan
10–29.9	3	23.5	15.0
30–49.9	6	44.1	33.3
50–100	0	—	—
Mixed plan
10–29.9	0	—	—
30–49.9	9	40.9	32.2
50–100	3	57.8	45.8
MMD plan[a]
10–29.9	1	27.4	30.0
30–49.9	6	43.0	31.9
50–100	0	—	—
At-large plan
10–29.9	5	21.7	10.0
30–49.9	1	41.0	16.7
50–100	0	—	—

[a]These are multimember-district plans in which all councilpersons are elected from districts, but typically two or three members are elected per district.

TABLE 3.1A
Black Representation on Commission in 1990 by Election Plan, Georgia Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in County Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in County Population, 1980	Mean % Black on Commission 1990
SMD plan
10–29.9	7	24.0	11.4
30–49.9	25	37.6	24.6
50–100	5	35.7	36.0
Mixed plan
10–29.9	26	22.5	15.0
30–49.9	28	36.4	22.8
50–100	8	55.4	38.1
At-large plan
10–29.9	18	17.2	2.2
30–49.9	5	40.8	10.0
50–100	7	61.4	27.6

TABLE 3.2
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1980 and 1990, Georgia Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N[a]	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council
			Before Change (1980)	After Change (1990)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	1	28.2	0.0	25.0
30–49.9	3	44.4	13.3	30.0
50–100	0	—	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	0	—	—	—
30–49.9	3	38.7	6.7	32.1
50–100	2	53.4	22.5	35.4
From at-large to MMD plan
10–29.9	0	—	—	—
30–49.9	4	42.3	23.3	31.7
50–100	0	—	—	—
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	5	21.7	8.5	10.2
30–49.9	1	41.0	20.0	16.7
50–100	0	—	—	—

[a]The number of cities in table 3.2 is smaller than in table 3.1 because the change to an at-large plan in some cities occurred before 1980.

TABLE 3.2A
Changes in Black Representation on Commission between 1980 and 1990, Georgia Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Change by % Black in County Population, 1980	N[a]	Mean % Black in County Population, 1980	Mean % Black on County Commission
			Before Change (1980)	After Change (1990)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	5	22.8	2.9	12.0
30–49.9	21	37.9	16.2	25.5
50–100	4	55.8	0.0	35.0
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	14	22.0	0.0	16.6
30–49.9	19	34.4	19.2	23.8
50–100	4	54.5	30.0	33.3
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	18	17.2	0.0	2.2
30–49.9	5	40.8	8.3	10.0
50–100	7	61.4	19.8	27.6

[a]The number of counties in this table is smaller than in table 3.1A because the change to an at-large plan in some counties occurred before 1980.

TABLE 3.3
Black Representation in 1990 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, Georgia Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

% Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black Councilpersons in District Components, 1990	Mean % Black Councilpersons in At-Large Components, 1990
10–29.9	0	—	—
30–49.9	9	41.5	12.0
50–100	3	44.6	38.9

TABLE 3.3A
Black Representation in 1990 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, Georgia Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

% Black in County Population, 1980	N[a]	Mean % Black Commissioners in District Components	Mean % Black Commissioners in At-Large Components
10–29.9	5	18.0	0.0
30–49.9	2	43.8	8.3
50–100	2	50.0	33.3

[a]Missing data reduced the number of mixed county plans for analysis.

TABLE 3.4
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Black on Council in 1990 with Percentage Black in City Population in 1980, Georgia Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Difference Measure (% on Council − % in Population)	Ratio Measure (% on Council ÷ % in Population)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	3	−2.40	0.90
30–49.9	6	−9.91	0.74
50–100	0	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	0	—	—
30–49.9	14	−10.45	0.75
50–100	3	−11.87	0.78
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	5	−12.15	0.37
30–49.9	1	−24.30	0.40
50–100	0	—	—

TABLE 3.4A
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Black on Commission in 1990 with Percentage Black in County Population in 1980, Georgia Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in County Population, 1980	N	Difference Measure (% on Commission − % in Population)	Ratio Measure (% on Commission ÷ % in Population)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	7	−12.54	0.52
30–49.9	25	−11.43	0.66
50–100	5	−19.70	0.65
From At-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	26	−13.34	0.68
30–49.9	28	−13.49	0.64
50–100	8	−18.67	0.69
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	18	−76.00	0.10
30–49.9	5	−30.40	0.25
50–100	7	−33.69	0.42

TABLE 3.5
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1980 and 1990, Georgia Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N[a]	Black Representational Equity on Council
		1980	1990
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	1	0.00	0.89
30–49.9	3	0.30	0.68
50–100	0	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	0	—	—
30–49.9	3	0.17	0.83
50–100	2	0.42	0.66
From at-large to MMD plan
10–29.9	0	—	—
30–49.9	4	0.55	0.75
50–100	0	—	—
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	5	0.39	0.47
30–49.9	1	0.49	0.40
50–100	0	—	—

[a] The number of cities in this table is smaller than in tables 3.1 and 3.4 because some changes in form occurred before 1980.

TABLE 3.5A
Changes in Black Representation on County Commission between 1980 and 1990, Georgia Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Black in County Population, 1980	N[a]	Minority Representational Equity on Commission
		1980	1990
	Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	5	0.13	0.53
30–49.9	21	0.43	0.67
50–100	4	0.00	0.63
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	14	0.00	0.75
30–49.9	19	0.56	0.69
50–100	4	0.55	0.61
	Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	18	0.00	0.10
30–49.9	5	0.20	0.25
50–100	7	0.32	0.42

[a]These data exclude counties that changed plans prior to 1980 or that maintained single-member-district or mixed plans throughout this period. Thus the *N*s may be smaller than in tables 3.1A and 3.4A.

TABLE 3.6
Black Representation in Council Single- and Multimember Districts in 1990, Georgia Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

% Black Population of District	N[a]	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1990
0–29.9	65	13.2	0.0
30–49.9	8	38.7	25.0
50–59.9	13	54.6	53.8
60–64.9	8	62.3	75.0
65–69.9	4	65.7	100.0
70–100	35	85.3	94.3

[a]Of the 162 single- or multimember district cities in Georgia, we were able to obtain data on 133 districts. We received data from 26 of the 27 cities.

TABLE 3.7
Black Council Representation in Single- and Multimember Districts in 1990, by Racial Composition of District, Georgia Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Racial Composition of District	N	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1990
Black majority	60	74.3	83.3
White majority	73	16.0	2.7

TABLE 3.8
Cause of Change from At-Large to Mixed, Single-Member-, or Multimember-District Plan between 1974 and 1990, Georgia Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change
	Changed to Single-Member Districts
Albany	Yes	Paige v. Gray, 1977
Milledgeville	Yes	NAACP v. City of Milledgeville, 1983
Newnan	Yes	Rush v. Norman, 1984
Waycross	Yes	Ware County VEP v. Parks, 1985
	Changed to Mixed Plan
Americus	Yes	Wilkerson v. Ferguson, 1981
Atlanta	No	Legislative change
Augusta	Yes	United States v. City of Augusta, 1988
Bainbridge	No	Legislative change
Carrollton	Yes	Carrollton Branch NAACP v. Stallings, 1985
Columbus	No	City/county consolidation
Cordele	Yes	Dent v. Culpepper, 1988
Covington	Yes	Newton County Voters League v. City of Covington, 1977

(continued)

TABLE 3.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change
Decatur	Yes	Thrower v. City of Decatur, Georgia, 1984
Douglas	Yes	NAACP Branch of Coffee County v. Moore, 1978
Dublin	Yes	Sheffield v. Cochran, 1975
Griffin	Yes	Reid v. Martin, 1986
Macon[a]	No	Legislative change after dismissal of lawsuit, Walton v. Thompson, 1975
Moultrie	Yes	Cross v. Baxter, 1984
Savannah	No	Legislative change
Statesboro	Yes	Love v. Deal, 1983
Thomasville	No	Threat of litigation
Valdosta	Yes	United States v. Lowndes County, 1984
Vidalia	No	Legislative change
SUMMARY	Yes 16 (70%) No 7 (30%)

Sources: Legal research and interviews with civil rights attorneys.

[a]Macon was sued under section 2, but the lawsuit was unsuccessful. The subsequent change to a new system was legislative.

TABLE 3.9
Major Disfranchising Devices in Georgia

Device	Date Established	Date Abolished
Poll tax	1868; repealed in 1870; reenacted in 1871; made cumulative in 1877	1945[a]
Payment of taxes	1868	1931[b]
Durational residency requirements	1868; lengthened in 1873	1972[c]
Grand jury appointment of school boards	1872	Gradually by local referendums in individual counties, statewide in 1992[d]
White primary	By party rules, late nineteenth century	1945[e]
Disfranchising offenses	1877	Still in use[f]
Registration by race	1894	Still required
Literacy, good character and understanding tests	1908	1965[g]
Grandfather clause	1908	1915[h]
Property ownership alternative	1908	1945[i]
County unit system	By party rules, late nineteenth century; by statute, 1917	1963[j]
Thirty questions test	1949, revised 1958	1965[g]
Majority vote and numbered posts requirements	Late nineteenth century, local option; replaced by statute county- and statewide in 1964; operative for municipalities in 1968	Still in use

[a]Georgia Laws 1945, 129.
[b]Georgia Laws, 1931, 102.
[c]Abbott v. Carter, 356 F. Supp. 280 (N.D. Ga. 1972).
[d]Georgia Laws 1991, 2032 (approved by referendum on 3 November 1992).
[e]King v. Chapman, 62 F. Supp. 639 (M.D. Ga. 1945).
[f]Upheld in Kronlund v. Honstein, 327 F. Supp. 71 (N.D. Ga. 1971).
[g]Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. §1973b.
[h]Georgia Laws 1908, 29 (providing expiration data).
[i]Georgia Laws 1945, 15.
[j]Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368 (1963).

TABLE 3.10
Black and White Registered Voters and Officeholders in Georgia, Selected Years[a]

	Black		White
	N	%	N	%
Registered voters
1964[b]	270,000	16.2	1,399,778	83.8
1966[c]	289,545	17.4	1,378,005	82.6
1990[d]	607,782	21.9	2,143,121	77.3
Officeholders[e]
State house
1964	0	0.0	100	100.0
1966	9	5.0	171	95.0
1990	27	15.0	153	85.0
State senate
1964	2	3.6	54	96.4
1966	2	3.6	54	96.4
1990	8	14.3	48	85.7

[a] Mean black Georgia population, 1960–90 = 27.0%.
[b] Estimate reported by U.S. Commission on Civil Rights
[c] Southern Regional Council 1966.
[d] Secretary of state.
[e] All data on officeholding were provided by the clerks of the house and senate.

FOUR

Louisiana

RICHARD L. ENGSTROM,
STANLEY A. HALPIN, JR.,
JEAN A. HILL, AND
VICTORIA M. CARIDAS-BUTTERWORTH

> Historically, Louisiana's political environment has been hostile to the aspirations of blacks for equal political participation. Any alteration in this basic environment has been largely the result of "outside interference" in the form of federal intervention.
>
> —Jewel L. Prestage and Carolyn Sue Williams[1]

EFFORTS TO RESTRICT black participation in the governmental process have been a permanent feature of Louisiana's political environment. Prior to the Civil War the state's constitutions prohibited blacks, whether free or slave, from voting. Today, while allowed to vote, blacks must constantly challenge electoral schemes that dilute their new voting strength. Discriminatory election laws, in short, continue to be a serious problem in Louisiana. The fact that the nature of the discrimination has changed from disfranchisement to vote dilution, however, does reflect progress toward a more open electoral process.

This progress has been the consequence of one of the most significant manifestations of "outside interference" in Louisiana's political process—the federal Voting Rights Act. As a result primarily of that act, blacks now register to vote in Louisiana at a rate approaching, but still not equal to, that for whites. Among blacks of voting age, 66.9 percent were registered to vote at the beginning of 1990, compared to 72.6 percent of the whites, resulting in a registered electorate that was 26.2 percent black.[2] This new black voting strength has been the principal reason there were over five hundred black elected officials in Louisiana by 1990—about 11 percent of all elected officials.[3] There were twenty-four black members (22.9 percent) of the state's house of representatives and eight members (20.5 percent) of the senate in 1992. Blacks now serve on the governing boards of parishes (counties), municipalities, and education authorities throughout Louisiana. In the state's largest city, New Orleans, both the mayor and a majority of the city council are black. Although the registration and representation figures for Louisiana continue to be low when compared with the percentage of blacks in the state's population—30.8 percent in 1990—and although blacks still have to fight efforts to dilute their votes, the situation today is a major improvement over that in 1965, when the Voting Rights Act was adopted.

Vote Denial

On 8 March 1965, only a few months before President Lyndon Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act, the Supreme Court unanimously concluded that Louisiana was guilty of unconstitutionally depriving its black residents of their right to vote. In Louisiana v. United States the state was enjoined from continuing to require potential voters to pass its constitutional "interpretation" test.[4] This test required applicants for registration to "understand and give a reasonable interpretation" of a passage from either the three-volume state constitution or the federal Constitution.[5] It was the latest in a series of unlawful devices that the state had employed to disfranchise its black residents.

Their disfranchisement was initially straightforward. The state's first three constitutions—those of 1812, 1845, and 1852, as well as the secessionist constitution of 1861—simply restricted the franchise to white males who could satisfy other registration requirements.[6] The constitution of 1864, written by delegates from the federally occupied southern part of the state, did not lift this racial ban. Blacks were registered to vote, however, under the federal Military Reconstruction acts, and a report by the state board of registration in 1867 revealed that 65.2 percent of the state's registrants were black at that time. About 90 percent of the black males of voting age were reportedly registered in 1867, compared to less than half of the white males.[7]

The state prohibition on blacks voting was removed by the state constitution adopted in 1868, under which Louisiana was readmitted to the Union. This constitution was written by an elected convention in which half of the delegates were black. In 1870 the state legislature, also about half black at this time, required voters to register under the new requirements.[8]

Blacks were a significant political force in Louisiana during this period of black enfranchisement. They developed political organizations of their own, and participated actively in Republican party politics. Blacks were not only elected in large numbers to the state legislature, three were also elected to the statewide offices of lieutenant governor, superintendent of education, and state treasurer. One lieutenant governor, Pinckney Benton Stewart Pinchback, served briefly as governor. At the local level blacks served as mayors, sheriffs, assessors, tax collectors, coroners, and in a variety of other elective positions.[9]

Black enfranchisement and its consequence, an integrated elected elite, did not sit well with Louisiana's whites. New means were developed to minimize black participation. These methods could not be direct, as the old ones had been, because of the Fifteenth Amendment to the federal constitution, adopted in 1870. The new methods had to be "facially neutral," but they were effective nonetheless.

The Grandfather Clause

In 1896 blacks still constituted 44.8 percent of Louisiana's registered voters. Four years later they composed only 4.0 percent.[10] Their virtual elimination from the electorate was accomplished initially through the discriminatory application of a new registration law adopted in 1896 that required voters to register between 1 January 1897 and 1 January 1898. Black registration was reduced during this period by about 90 percent, leaving only 9.5 percent of the adult black males with the franchise.[11] This was followed by the adoption of new registration requirements in the constitution of 1898. According to its presiding officer, this constitution was written by a convention that had been called for one primary purpose—"the purification of the electorate."[12] As part of the scheme to accomplish this, it invented the now infamous "grandfather" clause.

The constitution of 1898 established an educational or property ownership requirement for voters. Applicants for registration were required to read and write, and to demonstrate this ability by completing without assistance a complicated application form (which demanded, for example, that the applicant express his age in years, months, and days), or alternatively, to own property with an assessed valuation of at least three hundred dollars and to have paid all taxes due on that property. Anyone registered to vote on or before 1 January 1867, however, as well as the son or grandson of any such person, was exempted from these new requirements, as were immigrants who had come to the United States after that date. Only 111 blacks qualified to vote under this exemption in 1898, compared to 37,877 whites.[13]

The intended effect of the new registration provisions was of course the disfranchisement of blacks. According to the convention's president, if the delegates had been free of federal constraints, they would have again provided explicitly for "the exclusion from the suffrage of every man with a trace of African blood in his veins."[14] The federal constraints, however, required only a slightly more complicated procedure. The convention's president undoubtedly spoke for the delegates when he commented on the new scheme:

> What care I whether it be more or less ridiculous? Doesn't it meet the case? Doesn't it let the white man vote, and doesn't it stop the negro from voting, and isn't that what we come here for?[15]

The purpose was achieved. By 1900, after a reregistration of voters based on the new requirements, blacks constituted about 4.0 percent of those registered, despite still comprising half of the state's population. Registration figures showed that while 29,189 whites had been exempted from the new requirements by the grandfather clause in 1900, not a single black person was any longer enfranchised as a result of that clause.[16]

The White Primary

Although Louisiana invented the grandfather clause, it was the Oklahoma version that was struck down in 1915 by the Supreme Court in Guinn and Beal v. United States.[17] The opinion, ironically, was written by the only person from Louisiana ever to sit on the Court, Chief Justice Edward D. White. Unable to rely any longer on that provision as a means to keep whites in and blacks out of the electorate, Louisiana in 1921 adopted new barriers to black participation. A new state constitution adopted that year contained two devices widely regarded as disfranchising mechanisms—the "interpretation" test and the white primary.[18] This layered approach was designed to minimize black participation. The interpretation requirement would be used to keep blacks from becoming registered, while any who did so would be precluded from voting in the only elections of any consequence in one-party Louisiana, the Democratic primaries.

The white primary so effectively prevented meaningful participation by blacks that the interpretation test was rarely needed prior to the 1950s. The state constitution did not explicitly preclude blacks from voting in primaries, but rather authorized political parties to require registered voters to possess "other and additional qualifications" as prerequisites to participating in the selection of party nominees.[19] The state's Democratic party decided that being white was an additional qualification. The white primary not surprisingly had a chilling effect on black interest in attempting to surmount the registration hurdle.[20] From 1921 to 1944, when the Supreme Court declared that whites-only primaries were unconstitutional, blacks never made up more than 1 percent of the state's registered voters.[21]

The "Interpretation" Test

Following the invalidation of the white primary, black registration increased in Louisiana. It did so, however, very unevenly, with substantial gains in some parishes and next to none in others. By 1964 just over 30 percent of voting-age blacks across the state were registered to vote, and they constituted 13.7 percent of all registered voters. Registration rates for the individual parishes that year, however, ranged from only 1.7 percent in Tensas to 93.8 percent in Evangeline. The distribution of parish-based registration rates for 1964, in deciles, is reported in table 4.11. Fewer than 20 percent of voting-age blacks were registered in twenty of Louisiana's sixty-four parishes, while over 70 percent were registered in eight.[22]

Much of the variation in registration rates can be accounted for by two variables, the location of the parishes and the potential black electorate within them.[23] This is highlighted by the two extremes, Tensas and Evangeline. Tensas, a northern parish, had a potentially large black electorate (60.7 percent of the voting-age population was black in 1960). In contrast, Evangeline, a French-Catholic parish in the southern part of the state, had a black voting-age population the same year of only 19.7 percent.

Black registration rates tended to vary inversely with the relative presence of blacks in the parish populations. This relationship was not unique to Louisiana,[24] but simply reflected the fact that in Louisiana, as in the South generally, "the greater the potential for meaningful black impact on politics in the immediate geographic area the more rigid were the barriers to such impacts."[25] The other relationship between the location of parishes and registration rates was a more uniquely Louisiana phenomenon. The southern part of the state, unlike the rest of the American South, is largely French Catholic. The white population in this area (known as Acadiana), while segregationist, was generally less hostile to blacks voting, a trait attributed to the influence of the Catholic clergy there. Blacks therefore faced fewer barriers to registration in most of the Acadiana parishes. As described by Wright, "Catholicism in southern Louisiana fashioned a different political perimeter for blacks living there. The record clearly indicates that black political participation was not enthusiastically sought or even welcomed. However, the evidence is just as clear that black participation was nonetheless tolerated."[26]

The demise of the white primary brought the interpretation test to the fore, and the different registration rates across the parishes undoubtedly reflected the different manner in which the "test" was applied by parish registrars.[27] Evidence demonstrating the racially selective application of the interpretation requirement was marshaled for twenty-one parishes in United States v. Louisiana, initiated by the federal government under the Civil Rights Act of 1960. Only one of the twenty-one parishes, Plaquemines, controlled by the archsegregationist Leander Perez,[28] was located in south Louisiana. In these selected parishes only 8.6 percent of voting-age blacks were registered at the end of 1962, compared to 66.1 percent of the whites.[29] The Supreme Court concluded that evidence of the application of the interpretation requirement in these parishes showed that it had been employed "not [as] a test but a trap."[30]

The test required applicants for registration to provide "a reasonable interpretation" of a section of either the federal or state constitution.[31] Enormous discretion was provided in its application. Parish registrars decided which applicants would be confronted with it, what constitutional passage they would have to interpret, and whether their interpretation was "reasonable." Needless to say, the discretion was abused; the test was a trap for black applicants. The evidence revealed a pattern of "regular, consistent, predictable, unequal application" so as to disfranchise black but not white residents in these parishes.[32]

In parishes in which substantial numbers of blacks had registered, the discriminatory application of the interpretation test was preceded by a purge of the black registrants.[33] This two-step approach to black disfranchisement was advocated in a pamphlet, Key to Victory, published by the Association of Citizens Councils of Louisiana and distributed to parish registrars by the state.[34] Louisiana law allowed any two registered voters to file affidavits challenging the registration of another person. This law was used by local white citizens councils to challenge the registration status of numerous blacks, along with a token number of whites. For example, in October 1956 the Citizens Council of Jackson Parish successfully challenged the registration of 953 of the 1,122 blacks registered to vote in that parish, along with 13 of the 5,450 whites. A federal district court found that "the challenges were based on alleged errors, omissions, and handwriting differences on the original application cards of the voters. These alleged deficiencies were not deficiencies under the standards applied by the registrar at the time these voters registered and the application cards of approximately 75 percent of the white voters who were not challenged contained similar deficiencies."[35]

Following the purges, registrars became more rigorous in their review of applicants' qualifications, or at least those of the black applicants. For example, in Jackson Parish during the period beginning just after the purge in October 1956 and ending in September 1962, the registrar rejected the applications of about 64 percent of the blacks but only 2 percent of the whites.[36]

The interpretation test, as noted above, was invalidated by the Supreme Court in 1965, just prior to the adoption of the Voting Rights Act. It was found to be discriminatory in purpose and effect and, therefore, a violation of both the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments. The Court concluded that it was a trap "sufficient to stop even the most brilliant [black] man on his way to the voting both."[37] Indeed, its purpose was so clear that many blacks were deterred from even attempting to register, knowing that the registrar would find any answers from a black applicant unsatisfactory.[38]

Despite the invalidation through litigation of several barriers to black disfranchisement, black participation in Louisiana's electoral process was still restricted as late as 1965. Litigation victories had been important, but they had not provided blacks with anything approaching equal access to the voting booth. It would take a more forceful form of "outside interference" for that to happen. The successful antidote to disfranchisement in Louisiana, as elsewhere, was the expanded federal protection authorized by the Voting Rights Act.

The Voting Rights Act

The act suspended the use of discriminatory tests and devices as a prerequisite for voting, authorized federal officials to register voters in selected areas (at the discretion of the Attorney General), and required "preclearance" for any changes in the election and registration laws in those states and local political subdivisions covered by section 5.[39] All of these provisions affected Louisiana. The impact was rapid and dramatic.

Louisiana was one of the seven states initially covered entirely or in large part by section 5. It was therefore precluded once again from simply substituting a new discriminatory trap for its invalidated literacy test. Black and white applicants for registration were to be treated equally beginning in 1965. To assist in the attainment of that goal, federal registrars were sent into nine of the parishes with the worst history of discrimination. By the fall of 1967 over 24,000 blacks had been added directly to the registration rolls in these parishes by the federal officials.[40] Their presence undoubtedly had a catalytic effect, as there were simultaneously "phenomenal increases" in black registration in parishes near those to which federal registrars had been sent.[41] By October 1967 overall black registration is reported to have increased by 84.2 percent. Blacks at that time constituted about 20 percent of the state's registered electorate, with just over half of voting-age blacks registered.[42]

Louisiana continued to be covered as the preclearance provision of the act was extended in 1970, 1975, and again in 1982. These extensions preserved the gains in black registration. Indeed, black registration continued to improve, with over 60 percent of voting-age blacks registered by the early 1970s, and close to 70 percent by the end of that decade.[43] As noted above, in 1990 about two-thirds were registered, comprising over a fourth of the state's registrants.

One consequence of the act therefore has been the virtual elimination of vote denial as an issue in Louisiana politics.[44] While racial disparities in registration rates remain, they are attributable largely to the socioeconomic disparities that continue to distinguish the black and white residents of the state, rather than to formal legal barriers or to the discriminatory behavior of local registrars. But while disfranchisement is now a thing of the past, the issue of "voting rights" is still very much alive in Louisiana. Efforts to combat discrimination in the electoral process have had to continue as blacks in Louisiana quickly learned that election systems could be arranged in ways that reduced their right to vote to a right to cast "meaningless ballots."[45]

Equal access to the voting booth is a necessary but not a sufficient condition for a fair electoral process. Louisiana unfortunately was not immune to efforts to minimize systematically, or dilute, the impact that black voters could have on election outcomes. This "second-generation" type of electoral discrimination had to be confronted as well.[46] Fortunately, the Voting Rights Act proved to be almost as powerful an antidote for this type as it had been for disfranchisement.

Vote Dilution

As the black vote in Louisiana grew, so did the number of black elected officials. There were over 100 in the state by 1972, over 200 by 1975, over 300 by 1978, and over 400 by 1984. The number in January 1990 stood at 527. Only two states, Alabama and Mississippi, had more.[47] This has been "the most striking payoff" from the registration gains reported above, as these officials were heavily dependent on black voters for their electoral support.[48] Indeed, almost all of them were elected from units (districts, cities, and so forth) in which blacks constituted a majority, as Louisiana's white voters have not been very receptive to black candidates.[49]

The payoff was not automatic, however. Resistance to integrating the elected elite continued. The state and various local governments adopted schemes that would impede the ability of blacks to use their new voting strength to elect black officials. Given the marked racial divisions in candidate preferences among Louisiana voters when they were presented with a choice between or among black and white candidates, the election of blacks has almost always depended on how electoral competition has been structured. Attempts to structure it to the disadvantage of blacks have been common.[50]

The major mechanisms for diluting the black vote have been elections held at large in majority-white political jurisdictions, the use of majority-white multimember geographic districts that submerge black voters, and the discriminatory delineation, or gerrymandering, of election district boundaries.[51] Both the preclearance requirements contained in section 5 and the general prohibition on dilutive electoral arrangements contained in section 2, as amended in 1982,[52] have served as important protections against these and other dilutive schemes in Louisiana. Had these protections not been available, there can be little doubt that the growth in the number of black elected officials in the state would have been severely attenuated.

Section 5

The preclearance requirement contained in section 5 precludes the state of Louisiana, as well as its local governments, from implementing any changes in laws relating to elections until those changes have been approved by either the Attorney General or the United States District Court in the District of Columbia. In this process, the state or local unit making the change has the responsibility of demonstrating that no discriminatory intent lies behind the alteration and that no discriminatory effect will result from it. The burden of proof, in short, rests with the governmental jurisdiction proposing the change.

The impact that this provision has had on Louisiana cannot be quantified for the simple reason that its major consequence has undoubtedly been its deterrent effect. There is no way to identify the number of times discriminatory changes would have been adopted had this requirement not been in effect, but the number must be large. Despite this deterrent effect, the Attorney General still found it necessary between 1965 and the middle of 1989 to issue sixty-six objection letters nullifying approximately two hundred of the changes that had been submitted for review. Eleven letters concerned changes proposed by the state government, and fifty-five, changes by local governments.[53] These objections have played a critical role in protecting the black vote from efforts to minimize its impact on Louisiana elections.

Among the most important objections under section 5 have been those preventing the state from implementing racially discriminatory districting plans for the state legislature. Objections were issued to the state's redistricting proposals following both the 1970 and 1980 censuses.

Both the house and senate plans adopted by the legislature in 1971 contained a mixture of single- and multimember districts that disadvantaged black voters. Multimember districts can be used to submerge black voters in large majority-white districts,[54] and the Attorney General identified a number of instances of these in Louisiana's proposed schemes. Concentrations of blacks sufficient to have formed majorities in single-member districts had simply been swallowed by larger majority-white multimember districts. The Attorney General noted that other black concentrations had been dissected by the proposed district boundaries, resulting in black voters being dispersed among majority-white districts. In one instance, a majority-black parish was joined with two majority-white parishes with which it was not even contiguous in order to form a majority-white state senate district. There were also instances of blacks being overconcentrated in a systematic fashion. For example, the only black person serving in the legislature at the time the plans were adopted, Dorothy Mae Taylor from New Orleans, was given a new nineteen-sided house district in which 33,364 of the 36,598 residents (91.3 percent) were black. Many of the black voters in this district could have helped to constitute a second black-majority district.[55]

The dilutive consequences of the legislature's schemes were so blatant that a federal district judge stated in 1971 that if the Attorney General had not objected to their implementation, he would have found them to be unconstitutional for, among other reason, "employing gerrymandering in its grossest form."[56] In response to Fourteenth Amendment–based "equal protection" challenges to these legislative acts, the judge ordered forthcoming legislative elections to be held under an alternative districting arrangement adopted by him.[57] This decision brought about a change in Louisiana's legislative election system that would be of profound importance to the state's blacks: the court-ordered arrangement relied exclusively on single-member districts.

Single-member districting unquestionably facilitated the election of blacks to the legislature.[58] By the end of the decade the voters in ten of these judicially imposed house districts and in two of the senate districts had elected black people as their representatives.[59] Since their imposition by the court, single-member districts have become a state constitutional requirement.[60]

The 1980 census necessitated another thorough revision of legislative districts. The state's plan for new senate districts, which contained five districts having a black population majority, was approved by the Attorney General's office, but the plan for the lower house once again failed to meet preclearance standards. The house plan was found to be unnecessarily retrogressive, even given the state's own districting criteria, as the number of black-majority districts was reduced from seventeen to fourteen. The state subsequently revised that plan, creating four more black-majority districts, and this second effort was granted preclearance.

The denial of preclearance to the legislature's redistricting products highlights the importance of section 5 in Louisiana. By 1990 there were fifteen state house districts and five senate districts in which blacks constituted a majority of the registered voters, and the voters in each of those districts (and only those districts) had chosen to be represented by a black legislator. It is extremely unlikely that there would have been twenty blacks serving in the legislature in 1990 had it not been for these section 5 objections and the federal court–ordered single-member districts.

The vast majority of the black elected officials in Louisiana serve in local legislative bodies. The fact that Louisiana ranked third in the nation in 1990 in the size of its black elected elite was due primarily to the 116 blacks elected to parish governing bodies, the 128 elected to local school boards, and the 173 elected to municipal councils.[61] As was the case with the state legislature, these numbers would also have been substantially lower had Louisiana not been subject to the preclearance requirement.

Probably the most important section 5 objections in Louisiana were the very first two, issued together on 27 June 1969. The state in 1968 had adopted statutes that authorized the election at large of the general governing boards (called police juries) and the school boards of parishes. These units had previously been required by state law to be elected through districts. The dilutive consequences of switching to at-large elections were obvious. Given the residential segregation of blacks, fairly drawn districting schemes would certainly have resulted in many majority-minority districts from which blacks would be elected. At-large elections, like the multimember state legislative districts, would have submerged this black voting strength within the overall white majority and often precluded the election of blacks.[62] These legislative acts were the first changes submitted for preclearance from Louisiana, and the Attorney General objected to both because of their dilutive nature. These objections, along with six others to subsequent attempts by specific police juries to switch to at-large elections in the early 1970s,[63] combined with the nearly forty objections the Attorney General had made to the redistricting schemes adopted by police juries and school boards following the 1970 and 1980 censuses, have been a critical factor in the successful conversion of black votes into black representation at the parish level.

Changes in Municipal Election Structures

Prohibiting these parish bodies from switching to at-large elections set an important precedent for cities as well. Indeed, municipal changes went in the opposite direction: from at-large elections to district or mixed plans (the latter containing both district and at-large seats). A survey in December 1989 of the state's eighty-seven municipalities having populations of 2,500 or more and in which blacks constituted at least 10 percent of the voting-age residents in 1980 revealed that one-half of the fifty-four cities that had at-large council plans in 1974 had adopted district or mixed plans by 1989 (table 4.12).[64] Whereas over 60 percent of the cities surveyed had an at-large plan in 1974, this arrangement was the least frequent of the three basic election types by 1989.

Many of these changes were stimulated by actual or expected legal challenges to the at-large system under either the Voting Rights Act or the Fourteenth Amendment. Local informants in nine of the twenty-seven cities switching from at-large systems stated that the change had been ordered by a court; in another four, change resulted from the voluntary settlement of a legal challenge; and in three others, it came from the threat of litigation (see table 4.8A). No information on the cause of change could be ascertained in the remaining eleven.

The shift to districts contributed to the increase in the number of black elected officials. Table 4.1A shows comparisons between the mean percentage of council seats held by blacks and the mean percentage of the voting-age population that was black in the surveyed municipalities, grouped by types of electoral systems and the percentage black. Two measures of how proportionately blacks were represented in 1989 are shown in tables 4.4 and 4.4A.[65]

Blacks were close to being, or were more than, proportionally represented in almost every category in 1989, according to table 4.4A. The only exceptions were the two categories (containing twenty-four cities in all) in which blacks were a minority of the voting-age population and elections were held at large. In 33.3 percent of these twenty-four at-large cities, blacks were completely absent from the council. This was true in only 3.3 percent of the cities using mixed systems and in none of the districted cities. The close correspondence between the black percentage of the voting-age population and number of black-held seats in the mixed systems was, in addition, due entirely to the districted portions of those systems. As disclosed in table 4.3A, blacks tended to be severely underrepresented in the at-large seats within these cities, but close to proportionately represented in the districted components, which contained some majority-black districts. These results demonstrate the critical importance of districts to black officeholding. While black representation in at-large systems overall was no longer as low as it had been, more equitable levels were achieved in municipalities that adopted districts. (See tables 4.2A and 4.5A for comparisons between 1974 and 1989.)[66] These results were not unique to Louisiana,[67] and were consistent with the well-established generalization that the less municipalities rely on at-large elections, the more proportionately blacks are likely to be represented within them.[68]

Although the Attorney General often objected to the districting plans proposed by police juries and school boards, only rarely did he object to the redistricting of municipal councils in Louisiana. As reported above, there was a close correspondence between black voting-age population percentages and black seat percentages in districted cities; in these municipalities, the percentage of majority-black districts was roughly proportional to the percentage of the voting-age population that was black. As with state legislative districts, there was a pronounced relationship between the racial composition of council districts and the race of the person elected to represent the district. Voters in majority-black districts almost invariably elected a black to represent them, while voters in majority-white districts elected whites (tables 4.6A and 4.7A).[69] As a consequence of the creation of the black-majority districts in these plans, the Attorney General rarely objected to them. Following the 1970 census he twice objected to efforts at revising the council districts in New Orleans, and he also objected to a redistricting in the city of Many. Only a single objection—to New Iberia's proposed districts—followed the next round of municipal redistricting based on the 1980 census.

New Orleans's second effort at redistricting in the 1970s became the subject of an important Supreme Court decision concerning section 5 preclearance criteria. The city council did not accept the Attorney General's decision and sought preclearance from the federal judiciary. The Supreme Court in Beer v. United States (1976),[70] its first review of a districting proposal under section 5, ruled in favor of the council. This decision affected far more than New Orleans, however, as the standard adopted in Beer seriously restricted the grounds upon which the Attorney General could deny preclearance generally.

At issue in Beer was the redrawing of the city's five single-member council districts and the continued use of at-large elections for two seats. This "five plus two" arrangement had been adopted in 1954 as part of a new city charter. The five districts had always been constructed by combining the seventeen wards of the city, which tended to follow a north-south pattern. By 1970 the city's blacks constituted 45 percent of the population and about 35 percent of the registered voters, and they tended to reside in an east-west pattern. The north-south districting configuration therefore dispersed the city's black vote across districts.

Despite the city's growing black electoral strength, no black had ever been elected to council, and the 1970s redistricting was controlled by whites. Not surprisingly, the council continued with a basically north-south districting scheme (although ward boundaries were now violated in order to comply with the one-person, one-vote rule). The result was two districts with black population majorities, but one was only 50.6 percent black. The other was 64.1 percent black and had a 52.6 percent black majority in voter registration. The black percentages among registered voters in the other four districts were 43.2, 36.8, 23.3, and 22.6.[71] After the Attorney General objected because of the dispersion of black electoral strength, the council sought permission from the federal district court in Washington, D.C., to use the plan.

A unanimous three-judge panel found, as had the Department of Justice, that the plan had a discriminatory effect, and refused to allow it to be implemented. The court concluded that the number of seats that blacks could expect to win under this plan, given the racially polarized voting patterns in the city, was considerably fewer than the number of seats that both the citywide black population and black registration percentages suggested as their "theoretical entitlement." The arrangement therefore was found to be an unjustified dilution of the black voting strength. The court also concluded, in response to an issued raised by the New Orleans blacks who had intervened in the case, that the two at-large seats, by themselves, diluted the city's black vote.[72]

The council appealed this decision to the Supreme Court, arguing that the at-large seats adopted in 1954 were not part of any voting change and therefore not covered by section 5, and that the district court had incorrectly adopted a rule that required districting plans to maximize black electoral opportunities. The Court agreed that the at-large seats were not part of the change and therefore should not be considered.[73] More important, however, was the Court's approach to the proposed division of the city into five districts.

In its review of the districting arrangement, a five-member majority adopted a new interpretation of section 5's purpose. The Court concluded that it was not a protection against dilutive changes per se, but only against retrogressive changes: it was the intent of Congress to ensure that "no voting procedure changes would be made that would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise."[74] If a redistricting plan was not retrogressive—that is, not worse for blacks than the plan it was to replace—it should not be denied preclearance (unless the plan was clearly unconstitutional).[75] As for New Orleans's five proposed districts, the Court found that they were not retrogressive but ameliorative. The districting plan being replaced, at the time it was adopted in 1961, had contained only one district with a black population majority and none with a black voter registration majority. The city's new proposal included two districts with a population majority and one with a registration majority. It was therefore an "improvement" over the old arrangement and, the Court concluded, entitled to be precleared.

The Beer decision was, from the black perspective, an unfortunate step backward. The retrogression test established a relative vote dilution standard under section 5 rather than an absolute standard. In the words of one scholar, this approach to preclearance had the perverse consequence of "rewarding those jurisdictions with a history of the worst dilution of black electoral strength."[76] In addition, the Court's application of the retrogression criterion in Beer was itself problematic. The Court compared the racial composition of the districts in the city's proposed plan with those of the previous plan at the time that plan had been adopted (1961) rather than at the time it was revised (1973). The more appropriate comparison would have been with the districts as they stood at the time of revision. If the point of comparison is the time of initial adoption, then even plans that are in fact retrogressive could receive section 5 approval, given the usual ten-year period that elapses between redistricting efforts. In the New Orleans situation the comparison of the voter registration figures for the new districts with those for the old districts as of 1961, prior to the adoption of the Voting Rights Act, is particularly difficult to understand. Only about 17 percent of New Orleans's registered voters were black in 1961, compared to about 35 percent in 1973. It is hard to imagine how any set of districts proposed in 1973 would not be ameliorative if the comparison was to the 1961 figures.

The impact of Beer's retrogression test was to restrict, at least for a while, the range of dilutive redistricting proposals that could be prevented from being implemented by the preclearance requirement.[77] This retrogression standard became less important, however, following the extension and amendment of the Voting Rights Act in 1982. Section 2 was revised to provide a "results" test for dilution, and the Attorney General held that changes creating arrangements that would violate the new results test would be denied preclearance under section 5. Nonretrogressive yet dilutive changes therefore could be objected to once again.[78]

The Beer decision highlighted two limitations of the preclearance requirement as a protection against dilution. First, section 5 applies only to changes in election procedures; it does not reach dilutive structures, such as at-large elections, that were in place prior to 1 November 1964. Second, until the 1982 amendment to section 2, changes could be dilutive and still precleared, provided they were not deemed to be retrogressive (or so blatant as to have been motivated by racial considerations). In Louisiana, however, blacks confronted with dilutive arrangements that were in place prior to 1965 or that have been granted preclearance by the Attorney General have had considerable success in overturning these schemes. The medium for these challenges has been the other provision of the Voting Rights Act mentioned above—the more general results test contained in section 2. Indeed, much of the effort at combating dilution in Louisiana since 1982 has relied on this provision.

Section 2

Section 2 was a relatively unimportant provision, at least in impact, before 1982. The Supreme Court had even held in City of Mobile v. Bolden (1980) that it was merely a restatement in statutory form of the Fifteenth Amendment prohibition on race-based disfranchisement and therefore was not a protection against dilution of the franchise.[79] The Court in Bolden also held that the Fourteenth Amendment, while a protection against dilution, prohibited only those schemes that had been adopted or retained for the purpose of diluting minority votes. Proof of the discriminatory effects of an electoral arrangement would not be sufficient for the plaintiffs to prevail on a Fourteenth Amendment claim; victory would require a demonstration of discriminatory motives as well.[80]

Bolden elevated seriously the burden of proof that black plaintiffs in Louisiana would have to meet in their constitutionally based challenges to dilutive schemes. Prior to Bolden the prevailing precedents, at least in cases involving claims of dilution by submergence in at-large or multimember districts, were Whitcomb v. Chavis (1971)[81] and White v. Regester (1973).[82] These cases had required not proof of discriminatory motives but demonstration by the plaintiffs that as a consequence of an electoral scheme, minority residents "had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political process and to elect legislators of their choice."[83] Federal district courts in Louisiana had been instructed by an en banc decision of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, Zimmer v. McKeithen (1973), to examine a variety of evidentiary considerations when determining whether this "opportunity" was in fact equal.[84]

The Zimmer decision blocked a shift from district to at-large elections for the East Carroll Parish police jury and school board that had been ordered by a federal district court in response to a complaint that the districts violated the one-person, one-vote standard. Blacks alleged that the initial malapportionment case had been a "sweetheart" white-on-white lawsuit, and challenged the constitutionality of the at-large remedy on dilution grounds. The Fifth Circuit agreed that the system would be dilutive in the East Carroll context. In reaching this conclusion, the court cited specifically the "protracted history" of discrimination against blacks in the parish, the persistent "debilitating effects" of previous disfranchisement schemes on black electoral participation, the "firmly entrenched state policy" in favor of district elections prior to the growth in the black electorate, and the fact that the at-large system in question required a majority vote for election to specific seats or places (thereby precluding "single-shot" voting). Under Zimmer, courts were instructed to examine "the confluence of factors" such as these to determine whether impermissible dilution was or would be present.[85]

There were a number of successful challenges to dilutive systems in Louisiana under the Zimmer standard. After the Bolden decision, however, constitutionally based litigation came to a virtual standstill. This halt to Fourteenth Amendment cases was not unique to Louisiana but a common phenomenon throughout the South, as many voting rights attorneys viewed litigation under Bolden's intent requirement to be relatively useless.[86] Direct evidence of discriminatory motives would rarely be available, and judges were not expected to infer a racial intent readily from circumstantial evidence.[87]

Voting rights advocates proposed an amendment to section 2 as a way to minimize the impact of the Bolden ruling. The amendment was to provide a general statutory protection against dilutive schemes that would serve as an alternative to the now weakened constitutional protection. In a major lobbying victory, civil rights forces persuaded Congress in 1982 to prohibit electoral schemes that resulted in vote dilution, regardless of the purpose behind their use.[88] This revision gave new life to the fight against dilution, particularly in Louisiana.[89]

One of its first applications was in a successful challenge to the division of the state's eight congressional districts after the 1980 census. The New Orleans black community was split into two districts. Both of these districts, which extended into white suburban areas outside the city, had white population and voter registration majorities. New Orleans had a population of 557,482, which was only 0.06 percentage points over the ideal population size for a congressional district. Blacks constituted 55.3 percent of the city's residents in 1980. Therefore, a congressional district centered on the city could have been a racially competitive district in which black voters would have had an opportunity to elect a black to Congress.

The state chose instead to divide the city's black vote, placing about 43 percent of the black residents in the new First District and 57 percent in the new Second

District, each of which had a white incumbent. This division left blacks as only 29.5 percent of the population (and 21.4 percent of the registered voters) in the First, and 44.5 percent of the population (38.7 percent of the registered voters) in the Second. The division was accomplished geographically by a contorted boundary line that left the shape of the Second resembling a duck (fig. 4.1), prompting the scheme to be labeled derisively as a "gerryduck."[90]

The design of the districts was initially decided upon at an unofficial meeting attended by several legislators and other interested parties, but to which no blacks were invited. Although the group was conscious of the need to obtain section 5 preclearance and therefore avoided a configuration that was racially retrogressive, the dominant consideration was the impact the configuration of the districts would have on incumbents, all of whom were white. The "cracking" of the black vote could therefore charitably be viewed simply as a by-product of an incumbent protection plan. The plan was later formally adopted over the objections of all of the black state legislators. It was then granted preclearance by the Attorney General, despite an internal staff recommendation from Justice Department lawyers that an objection should be issued, because the state had failed to demonstrate the absence of a discriminatory purpose behind the division. (Blacks alleged, during the subsequent section 2 litigation, that this preclearance decision had been motivated by partisan politics. The plan was largely the result of the intervention of Louisiana's Republican governor, David Treen, in the interest of the Republican congressman from the New Orleans area, Robert Livingston. The decision to preclear the plan, despite the staff recommendation, was made by Republican political appointees in the Justice Department in response, blacks claimed, to Treen's lobbying for section 5 approval of the plan.)[91]

Only the 1982 congressional elections were held under this controversial districting arrangement, however. The following year a three-judge federal court in New Orleans ruled unanimously, in Major v. Treen (1983), that the plan was a violation of the new section 2.[92] Black plaintiffs characterized the arrangement as an "outrageous racial gerrymander," for which there were no legitimate nonracial explanations. They maintained that it was a conscious effort to accommodate the political ambitions of white incumbents at the expense of black voters. The state attempted to justify the arrangement by arguing that it reflected an effort to continue to locate two congressional districts in New Orleans and that its racial impact was therefore benign, not dilutive, in that New Orleans's blacks could influence the election of two members of Congress rather than one.[93] The court was not persuaded that the arrangement was benign, however, and held instead that the dissection of the city had been performed in a "racially selective manner" that would result in the dilution of the black vote. Neither the decision to continue to base two districts in New Orleans nor a desire to protect the electoral future of incumbents could justify this discriminatory result.[94] According to the court, "If [the] sundering of the black populace of New Orleans were allowed to stand, the effective independent impact of black voters would be unfairly and illegally minimized."[95]

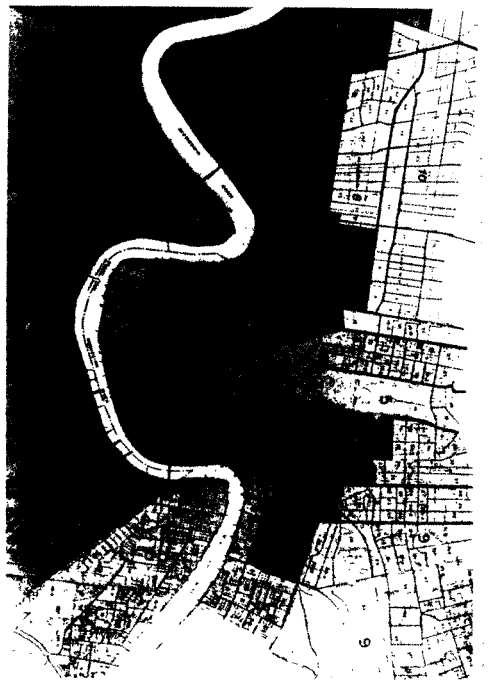

Figure 4.1. New Orleans "Gerryduck" Congressional District

The crack in the black vote was repaired when the legislature, in a special session in late 1983, adopted a new congressional districting scheme for the New Orleans metropolitan area. This arrangement contained a district, the Second, that was located entirely within the city, and had both a black population and black voter registration majority (58.6 percent and 53.9 percent, respectively). This was not a "safe" black district, as many critics of the court's intervention complained, but it did provide potential black candidates with their first opportunity since Reconstruction to compete seriously for a congressional seat in Louisiana. A black state court judge, Israel Augustine, attempted to unseat the incumbent in the district, Democratic congresswoman Lindy Boggs, in the 1984 open primary. Although Augustine was the preferred choice of the black voters in that election, winning an estimated 64 percent of their votes, he won only a paltry 7 percent of the white vote and therefore lost to Boggs by a substantial margin.[96] Boggs, the most liberal member of Louisiana's congressional delegation, enjoyed considerable support from New Orleans blacks and did not face serious opposition again. In 1990, however, she announced her retirement from Congress, and the voters in the Second District chose a black, William Jefferson, to be her successor.

Section 2 has also been invoked in Louisiana to invalidate election systems that dilute through submergence. These efforts had been facilitated greatly by the Supreme Court's first decision involving the amended section, Thornburg v. Gingles (1986), in which multimember state legislative districts in North Carolina were found to have a dilutive effect.[97] They were facilitated further in Louisiana by the first post-Gingles decision of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, which involved a Louisiana municipality. That decision, Citizens for a Better Gretna v. City of Gretna, handed down in 1987, contained important pronouncements concerning the plaintiff's burden of proof on the critical evidentiary issue of whether voting in the jurisdiction in question was "racially polarized."[98]

Blacks constituted about 30 percent of Gretna's population but no black had ever been elected to the city's at-large five-member council. Blacks had attempted to win seats on three occasions, but each attempt had failed because, as plaintiffs demonstrated, these candidates received only minimal support from the city's white voters. Additional evidence of black support for and white opposition to black candidates in Gretna was marshaled through an analysis of voting within Gretna in statewide elections involving black candidates. Plaintiffs claimed this pattern of voting precluded Gretna's blacks from electing candidates of their choice in the at-large context. The city attempted to rebut this evidence by arguing that some of the white candidates elected to the council had been supported by a majority of the black voters, and therefore blacks were electing candidates of their choice. The city argued that plaintiffs' focus on the fortunes of the black councilmanic candidates was misplaced and that the analysis of "exogenous" (i.e., noncouncilmanic) elections was irrelevant in a dispute involving a city's election system.

The Fifth Circuit, in upholding a district court judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, rejected the city's suggestion that as long as blacks supported some winning white candidates, their inability to elect a black was legally inconsequential. The court noted that the at-large elections in Gretna were five-seat contests in which each voter had five votes. Given that no more than one candidate in any councilmanic election had been black, it was "virtually unavoidable" that some white candidates would receive substantial black support. The fact that some of these white candidates were successful did not negate the existence of the veto white voters exercised over black candidates.[99] The plaintiffs' focus on the racial divisions in the vote for black candidates was found to be proper. The court concluded that elections involving "a viable minority candidate" provided the best context for determining whether the candidate preferences of whites and blacks diverged.[100] In addition, exogenous elections involving black candidates, because they provide information about "local voting patterns," were found to be relevant to the section 2 inquiry.[101]

The Gretna decision was an important precedent. Prior to the Supreme Court's decision in Gingles, defendants in vote-dilution cases typically argued that plaintiffs, in order to demonstrate that voting was "racially polarized," had to show that race was itself the cause of the voting divisions.[102] This argument was rejected in Gingles when the Supreme Court held that plaintiffs need show only the existence of the divisions, not the reasons for them.[103] Following Gingles the standard defense strategy was to argue, in effect, that as long as blacks were often on the winning side in white-on-white elections, they had no valid claim of dilution. The fact that blacks could not elect blacks was somehow cleansed of any discriminatory consequences by this ability to elect candidates of their "choice" in the white-on-white context. This argument was especially pernicious in light of the chilling effects that dilutive arrangements often have on black candidacies. Campaigns can be expensive in both time and money, and the probability of success is one factor that candidates, black or white, consider when deciding whether to run.

The Fifth Circuit's focus on black-on-white contests in Gretna, including those for other offices in which voters in the jurisdiction at issue participate, has virtually eliminated this argument as an efficacious defense in Louisiana.[104] Indeed, just such a defense was rejected the following year when a federal district court, based on evidence from numerous exogenous elections, found that voting in Louisiana's major suburban parish, Jefferson, was racially polarized. The finding was critical to the court's conclusion in East Jefferson Coalition for Leadership and Development v. Parish of Jefferson (1988) that the three-tiered election system (four single-member districts, two half at-large districts, and one parishwide district) employed to select the parish council had a dilutive result and therefore violated section 2.[105]

Section 2 and the Election of Judges

The section 2 case that may have the most profound impact in Louisiana, however, involves not the election of legislators but rather of judges. In Clark v. Edwards (1988), the systems through which judges are elected to serve on the state's basic trial courts—called judicial district courts—and on its intermediate courts of appeals, were challenged under section 2 by black plaintiffs.[106]

The systems at issue were at-large (jurisdictionwide) elections to specific places or divisions on the respective court, with winners determined by a majority-vote rule, with the top two vote recipients entering a runoff if no candidate received a majority in the first election. Blacks have been especially underrepresented in the state's judiciary. At the time of the trial in Clark, only 5 of the state's 178 district court judges and only 1 of the 48 court of appeals judges were black. Blacks had made numerous efforts to be elected to the bench, but their candidacies were consistently rebuffed by the state's white voters.[107] Relying heavily on the Supreme Court's Gingles decision, a federal district court in Louisiana found that black voters were being submerged in a number of the judicial jurisdictions, resulting in a dilution of their vote under section 2.[108]

The state attempted to remedy the dilution identified in Clark by proposing a constitutional amendment authorizing the election of judges through "subdistricts" within the geographical jurisdiction of each court. Only voters residing within a subdistrict would be able to vote for judges apportioned to that subdistrict, but candidates living elsewhere within the overall jurisdiction could run in any of the subdistricts. The state also adopted a districting scheme, contingent on approval of the amendment, through which forty trial judges and twelve appellate judges would have been elected by voters in majority-black districts. White incumbents who would be adversely affected by this new arrangement were provided with the option of assuming a new "senior" status, through which they could remain on the bench (retaining their salaries) without standing for reelection. When this arrangement was presented to the voters for their approval in October 1989, however, the proposed amendment was rejected in a racially divided response. An estimated 66.4 percent of blacks voting on the amendment voted in favor of it, but only 17.2 percent of the whites supported it.[109] Had the amendment passed, the number of black judges in Louisiana would have increased dramatically after the 1990 elections.

The subdistricting remedy was subsequently adopted by the federal court for ten trial court jurisdictions and one appellate court district. A total of nineteen trial court judges and one appellate court judge were to be elected from within black-majority subdistricts in these new arrangements.[110] While the Clark case was on appeal before the Fifth Circuit, the plaintiffs and the state settled the suit. Under the settlement, even more trial court judges and more appellate court judges would be elected from black-majority subdistricts than would have been in the federal court's remedial order.

The system for electing state supreme court judges was also challenged There are seven members of this court, five of whom are elected from single-member districts, the other two from a two-member district (with staggered terms) made up of the City of New Orleans and three surrounding parishes, Jefferson, St. Bernard, and Plaquemine. No black was ever elected to the supreme court under this arrangement. The plaintiffs in this case, Chisom v. Edwards, later Chisom v. Roemer,[111] asserted a standard claim of dilution by submergence, relying on the Gingles precedent. The four-parish two-member district was majority white in both population and voter registration. Given the racially polarized nature of voting within the four-parish area and the majority-vote requirement for election to the supreme court, blacks did not have a realistic opportunity of electing a black candidate of their choice within this district. If it were divided into two single-member districts, however, a district centered on New Orleans in which blacks would have a population and a registration majority could have been created. Plaintiffs argued that a New Orleans–based district would provide blacks with their first real opportunity to elect a candidate of their choice to the supreme court.[112]

The Chisom case was also settled in 1992, again while it was on appeal before the Fifth Circuit. Unlike the Clark case, the state had won the Chisom case in the federal district court. Although it was undisputed that no black candidate for any type of judgeship had been supported over a white candidate by white voters in any of the four parishes in the district, the federal judge concluded that there was an emerging crossover vote in the district, and therefore the black vote was not illegally submerged.[113] The case was settled, however, when the legislature created a new, temporary "supreme court" judgeship that would be filled in a 1992 election in which only New Orleans voters would participate.

The state constitution specifies that the state supreme court shall consist of seven justices, and therefore the new eighth member was to be elected, technically, to the state court of appeals and then assigned to serve on the supreme court. The eight-member court would then hear cases in rotating seven-member panels, with cases assigned to panels randomly. This is to be a temporary arrangement; the legislature is required to adopt, in 1998, a new districting plan containing a single-member district with a black voting-age majority that includes Orleans Parish in its entirety. This new districting arrangement will be in place starting with an election in 2000. If a vacancy should occur in one of the two seats in the existing First District prior to the year 2000, Orleans Parish voters only will vote in a special election to fill the seat.[114] This is the result of a compromise obviously intended to add a black justice to the court without abbreviating the term of one of the two white incumbents in the First District. A new black justice assumed the new seat on 1 January 1993, as only black candidates filed to run in the 1992 election for that position.

The Chisom case also served as the medium for an important Supreme Court decision in 1991 concerning section 2's application to judicial election systems. Following the trial court decisions in Clark and Chisom, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals held, in an en banc decision involving Texas judgeships, that section 2 did not provide a protection against dilution in the judicial election context. The majority in that case concluded that the language in subsection b concerning minority voters' opportunities "to elect representatives of their choice" was intended to exclude judges because judges, unlike other elected officials, were not "representatives."[115] The Supreme Court, in reviewing this issue in the Chisom context, held otherwise. Congress, the Court concluded, did not intend any exemption of judicial elections from this protection against vote dilution. The word representatives simply referred to "the winners of representative, popular elections," which included successful candidates in judicial elections.[116] Judicial election systems that dilute minority votes, therefore, are invalid under the Voting Rights Act.

Section 2 has become an important supplement to the preclearance requirement contained in section 5. Since its revision in 1982, section 2 has provided blacks in Louisiana with a means through which to challenge election systems not subject to the preclearance rule and, also, arrangements such as the 1981 congressional redistricting that are not retrogressive but are still viewed by blacks as discriminatory. The two sections together have proven overall to be very effective protections against dilution. The number of black elected officials in Louisiana today would be much smaller had it not been for these provisions.

Conclusion

Efforts to integrate the elected elite have been resisted by whites throughout Louisiana's history. This resistance was initially operationalized through schemes that disfranchised black voters. The first of these schemes explicitly established racial qualifications for voting; the later ones were "facially neutral" but discriminatory in application. This denial of the franchise on the basis of race was not successfully attacked in Louisiana until the adoption of the Voting Rights Act. Although there had been federal court decisions in favor of the plaintiffs in some voting rights cases prior to that act, it was the special provisions of the act that ultimately opened the franchise to Louisiana's black residents.

The consequent growth in the black vote did not end electoral discrimination in Louisiana, however. As the black vote expanded, a second-generation type of electoral discrimination became prevalent, the dilution of the black vote. Although the Fourteenth Amendment provides a constitutional protection against dilution, it requires plaintiffs to assume the difficult burden of proving racially discriminatory motives behind the use of these arrangements. In Louisiana as elsewhere blacks have had to rely heavily on the statutory protections of the Voting Rights Act to combat dilutive schemes. Both the preclearance provision of section 5 and the more general results tests contained in amended section 2 have provided critical protections against such schemes.

In 1990 Louisiana had the third largest number of black elected officials among the fifty states. This remarkable progress toward integrating the elected elite is the direct result of the Voting Rights Act. Both the enfranchisement of blacks and the subsequent protection against the virtual nullification of their votes were made possible by the act. This extraordinary form of "outside interference" in Louisiana was necessary to begin to open the electoral process to blacks. More remains to be done before blacks have a truly equal opportunity to participate politically, however, and any further progression toward that ultimate goal will undoubtedly be very dependent on the act's protections as well.

TABLE 4.1
Black Representation on Council in 1989 by Election Plan, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980[a]

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council, 1989
SMD plan
10–29.9	9	24.1	25.2
30–49.9	16	42.2	34.9
50–100	6	56.6	50.0
Mixed plan
10–29.9	13	22.7	20.4
30–49.9	13	36.9	25.9
50–100	4	52.8	47.2
At-large plan
10–29.9	16	17.5	10.0
30–49.9	7	39.7	20.0
50–100	6	63.8	53.3

[a]This table contains data on three cities not included in table 4.1A because this table employs a threshold of 10 percent black total population rather than voting-age population.

TABLE 4.1A
Black Representation on Council in 1989 by Election Plan, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Voting-Age Population (VAP) in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City VAP, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City VAP, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council, 1989
SMD plan
10–29.9	12	21.9	28.6
30–49.9	14	38.6	34.5
50–100	4	55.0	55.0
Mixed plan
10–29.9	19	22.3	21.0
30–49.9	11	39.4	35.6
50–100	0	—	—
At-large plan
10–29.9	16	18.4	11.2
30–49.9	8	41.9	27.5
50–100	3	71.7	66.7

TABLE 4.2
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1974 and 1989, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980[a]

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council
			Before Change (1974)	After Change (1989)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	3	25.4	0.0	26.7
30–49.9	9	43.0	1.6	38.4
50–100	2	61.6	0.0	50.0
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	7	23.5	3.2	19.4
30–49.9	6	36.4	0.0	24.2
50–100	1	51.1	0.0	25.0
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	16	17.5	0.0	10.0
30–49.9	7	39.7	0.0	20.0
50–100	6	63.8	26.7	53.3

[a]This table contains data on three cities not included in table 4.2A because this table employs a threshold of 10 percent black population rather than voting-age population.

TABLE 4.2A
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1974 and 1989, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Voting-Age Population (VAP) in 1980

Type of Change by % Black in City VAP, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City VAP, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council
			Before Change (1974)	After Change (1989)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	5	22.9	2.9	32.6
30–49.9	7	38.3	0.0	37.6
50–100	1	64.9	0.0	60.0
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	10	23.2	2.2	20.1
30–49.9	4	38.3	0.0	26.9
50–100	0	—	—	—
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	16	18.4	0.0	11.2
30–49.9	8	41.9	2.5	27.5
50–100	3	71.7	40.0	66.7

TABLE 4.3
Black Representation in 1989 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

% Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black Councilpersons in District Components, 1989	Mean % Black Councilpersons in At-Large Components, 1989
10–29.9	13	30.5	0.0
30–49.9	13	30.7	6.9
50–100	4	50.8	37.5

TABLE 4.3A
Black Representation in 1989 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Voting-Age Population (VAP) in 1980

% Black in City VAP, 1980	N	Mean % Black Councilpersons in District Components, 1989	Mean % Black Councilpersons in At-Large Components, 1989
10–29.9	19	29.2	2.1
30–49.9	11	40.3	18.2
50–100	0	—	—

TABLE 4.4
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Black on Council in 1989, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980[a]

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Difference Measure (% on Council − % in City)	Ratio Measure (% on Council ÷ % in City)
SMD plan
10–29.9	9	1.1	1.04
30–49.9	16	−7.2	0.84
50–100	6	−6.6	0.88
Mixed plan
10–29.9	13	−2.4	0.93
30–49.9	13	−11.0	0.70
50–100	4	−5.6	0.89
At-large plan
10–29.9	16	−7.1	0.60
30–49.9	7	−19.7	0.52
50–100	6	−10.4	0.80

[a]This table contains data on three cities not included in table 4.4A because this table employs a threshold of 10 percent black total population rather than voting-age population.

TABLE 4.4A
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Black on City Council in 1989, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Voting-Age Population (VAP) in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City VAP, 1980	N	Difference Measure (% on Council − % in City VAP)	Ratio Measure (% on Council ÷ % in City VAP)
SMD plan
10–29.9	12	6.7	1.31
30–49.9	14	−4.1	0.89
50–100	4	0.0	1.00
Mixed plan
10–29.9	19	−1.3	1.00
30–49.9	11	−3.8	0.90
50–100	0	—	—
At-large plan
10–29.9	16	−7.1	0.62
30–49.9	8	−14.4	0.66
50–100	3	−5.0	0.93

TABLE 4.5
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1974 and 1989, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980* (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Black Representational Equity on Council
		1974	1989
	Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	3	0.00	1.04
30–49.9	9	0.04	0.90
50–100	2	0.00	0.80
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	7	0.11	0.85
30–49.9	6	0.00	0.65
50–100	1	0.00	0.49
	Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	16	0.00	0.60
30–49.9	7	0.00	0.52
50–100	6	0.33	0.80

*This table contains data on three cities not included in table 4.5A because this table employs a threshold of 10 percent black total population rather than voting-age population.

TABLE 4.5A
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1974 and 1989, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Voting-Age Population (VAP) in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Black in City VAP, 1980	N	Black Representational Equity on Council
		1974	1989
	Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	5	0.12	1.40
30–49.9	7	0.00	0.99
50–100	1	0.00	0.92
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	10	0.08	0.90
30–49.9	4	0.00	0.70
50–100	0	—	—
	Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	16	0.00	0.62
30–49.9	8	0.06	0.66
50–100	3	0.56	0.93

TABLE 4.6A
Black Representation in Council Single-Member Districts in 1989, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Voting-Age Population (VAP) in 1980

% Black VAP of District	N	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
0–29.9	59	10.8	1.7
30–49.9	14	38.3	14.3
50–59.9	7	57.9	85.7
60–64.9	1	62.5	100.0
65–69.9	3	67.8	100.0
70–100	30	86.0	100.0

TABLE 4.7A
Black Council Representation in Single-Member Districts in 1989 by Racial Composition of District, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Voting-Age Population (VAP) in 1980

Racial Composition of District	N	Mean % Black VAP in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
Black majority	41	79.3	97.6
White majority	73	16.1	4.1

TABLE 4.8A
Cause of Change from At-Large to Mixed or District Plan between 1974 and 1989, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Voting-Age Population in 1980

City[a]	Did lawsuit Accompany Change?	Year of Change	Results		Reason for Change[b]
			District Seats (Number)	At-Large Seats (Number)
		Changed to Single-Member Districts
Amite	Yes	1984	5	0	Settlement
Breaux Bridge	No	1976	5	0	Threat of lawsuit
Hammond	Yes	1977	5	0	Court-ordered
Homer	Yes	1975	5	0	Settlement
Lake Charles	Yes	1974	4	0	Court-ordered
Lafayette	Yes	1975	5	0	Court-ordered
Marksville	No	1978	5	0	—
Minden	Yes	1978	5	0	Court-ordered
Monroe	Yes	1980	5	0	Court-ordered
Shreveport	Yes	1978	7	0	Court-ordered
Springhill	Yes	1974	5	0	Settlement
Tallulah	Yes	1979	5	0	Court-ordered
Winnfield	Yes	1982	5	0	Settlement
		Changed to Mixed Plan
Bogalusa	No	1978	5	2	—
Bossier City	No	1977	5	2	—
Broussard	No	1986	4	1	—
Bunkie	No	1984	4	1	Threat of lawsuit
Covington	No	1978	5	2	—
Crowley	No	1974	8	1	Threat of lawsuit
Donaldsonville	No	1975	3	1	—
Gretna	Yes	1987	4	1	Court-ordered
Kenner	No	1974	5	2	—
Leesville	No	1978	4	2	—
Natchitoches	No	1975	4	1	—
Ponchatoula	No	1980	4	1	—
Thibodeaux	No	1975	3	2	—
Ville Platte	Yes	1975	5	1	Court-ordered
SUMMARY	Yes 13 (48%)
	No 14 (52%)

[a]Voting age population by race was not provided in the 1980 census for Farmerville, a city which switched, under threat of a lawsuit, from at-large elections to a single-member-district system; therefore it is not included in this table.

[b]Some cities would not or could not supply reasons for the change.

TABLE 4.9
Major Disfranchising Devices in Louisiana

Device	Date Established	Date Abolished
Explicit racial exclusion	1812	1868[a]
Grandfather clause (educational and property requirements)	1898	1915[b]
White primaries	1921	1944[c]
Interpretation test	1921	1965[d]

[a]Congressional Reconstruction.
[b]Guinn and Beal v. United States, 238 U.S. 347 (1915).
[c]Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944).
[d]Louisiana v. United States, 380 U.S. 145 (1965).

TABLE 4.10
Nonwhite and White Registered Voters and Officeholders in Louisiana, Selected Years[a]

	Nonwhite		White
	N	%	N	%
Registered voters
1964	164,601	13.7	1,037,184	86.3
1967	303,148	20.2	1,200,517	79.8
1988	571,453	26.4	1,589,942	73.6
Officeholders
1964	—	—	—	—
1969	64	1.0[b]	—	—
1988	524	11.1	4,196	88.9

Sources: Registration figures for 1964 and 1967 are based on United States Commission on Civil Rights 1968, 242–43. Registration figures for 1988 are based on the end-of-year report for that year by the Louisiana Department of Elections and Registration. Figures for the number of elected officials are taken from the Joint Center for Political Studies 1970 and 1989.
[a]Mean black Louisiana population, 1960–90 = 30.5%.
[b]Rough estimate.

TABLE 4.11
Black Voter Registration Rates for Louisiana Parishes, 1964

Registration as % of Black VAP[a]	Parishes
	N	%
0–10	13	20.3
10–20	7	10.9
20–30	8	12.5
30–40	8	12.5
40–50	5	7.8
50–60	7	10.9
60–70	8	12.5
70–80	4	6.2
80–90	3	4.7
90–100	1	1.6
TOTAL	64	99.9

Source: United States Commission on Civil Rights 1968, 240–43.
[a]Registration figures are for 3 October 1964.

TABLE 4.12
Municipal Election Systems, 1974 and 1989, Louisiana Cities of 2,500 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Voting-Age Population in 1980

Type of Election System	1974		1989
	N	%	N	%
Districts	17	19.5	30	34.5
Mixed	16	18.4	30	34.5
At-large	54	62.1	27	31.0
TOTAL	87	100.0	87	100.0

CHAPTER FIVE

Mississippi

FRANK R. PARKER, DAVID C. COLBY, AND MINION K. C. MORRISON

"I OPPOSE the bringing of the negro back into politics, which . . . allowing the wards to select their Aldermen, will surely do," argued Mississippi state senator J. L. Hebron in 1906, during a debate on whether to change Greenville's electoral structure from at-large to district elections.[1] In 1962, the Mississippi legislature required all code charter cities with mayor–board of aldermen governments to switch from district to at-large aldermanic elections to prevent the election of black aldermen. "This is needed to maintain our southern way of life," a supporter of this legislation argued.[2] In Mississippi, exclusion of black representatives was at least one reason for the widespread adoption of at-large municipal voting. In this chapter we analyze the impact of the Voting Rights Act and litigation under it on changes from at-large to district city council elections, as well as on the election of black city council members in Mississippi. We do not discuss the impact of the act on other governmental structures, such as congressional, state legislative, and county redistricting, which has been discussed elsewhere.[3]

Intense social and political mobilization by blacks seeking the right to vote in the most "redeemed" of the former Confederate states significantly contributed to the passage of the Voting Rights Act.[4] The history of Mississippi race relations and black disfranchisement is therefore important for understanding the changes in black municipal political participation. The state came into the Union in 1817 and, unlike some other southern states, had essentially a one-crop cotton economy. Most slaves were occupied with hoeing and picking cotton "from sunup to sundown." This regimen was sustained by harsh regulations that amounted to a police-state apparatus. Notwithstanding factionalism among themselves, whites were in sufficient agreement on African-American inferiority to produce greater resistance to change in race relations than in any other state in the South.[5]

Despite the harshness of the slave system before the Civil War, the Reconstruction Act of 1867 enabled blacks to achieve some quick successes in political participation from 1867 to 1870. For example, they sent sixteen delegates to the hundred-member constitutional convention in 1868. From 1870 to 1875, they enjoyed their greatest participation in politics until the present period. Blacks teamed up with their white allies to control the legislature. In 1870, 30 of 107 representatives in the lower house and 5 of 30 senators were black.[6] In the 1870s, other blacks occupied national, state and local offices: there were 2 U.S. senators, a U.S. representative, a lieutenant governor, 5 secretaries of state, a superintendent of education, and 2 speakers of the state house of representatives. Blacks also controlled some county governments, notably in the Delta region. Nevertheless, in a state that was 54 percent black in 1870, black representation in government was never proportional to the black population.[7]

This period of participation ended in 1875, when blacks were disfranchised by fraud and intimidation, or co-opted into arrangements controlled by whites.[8] This de facto disfranchisement received the sanction of law in 1890 when a new constitution was written by an almost all-white convention. The convention adopted a cumulative poll tax of two dollars per year and a literacy requirement for voter registration (see table 5.9). The poll tax created an economic hardship for blacks and poor whites alike. The literacy provision—requiring an applicant to read, understand, or interpret any section of the state constitution (later changed to read, write, and interpret) to the satisfaction of the circuit clerk, a local white official—gave circuit clerks wide discretion to allow illiterate whites to vote and to prevent even literate blacks from doing so. Previously, blacks had made up a majority of the registered voters; by 1896 only 9 percent of adult blacks were registered to vote.[9]

These constitutional measures were reinforced by the adoption of party primaries to nominate candidates for office and the "white primary" rule that excluded blacks from these crucial elections. They were barred from participating in the Democratic primaries beginning in 1907.[10] In response both to the U.S. Supreme Court's decisions, in 1944 and 1954, respectively, that white primaries and racially segregated schools were unconstitutional and to growing black mobilization, Mississippi erected further barriers to black enfranchisement.[11] The legislature conditioned participation in party primaries upon adherence to "party principles," and the political parties adopted principles supporting racial segregation, in effect excluding anyone who did not support segregation. In addition, the legislature adopted statutes and constitutional amendments that strengthened the literacy test and added a "good moral character" test that required the names of persons applying for voter registration to be published in the local newspaper. Some blacks whose names were published were then evicted from their homes and fired from their jobs.

The systematic exclusion of blacks from electoral participation came under increasing attack in Mississippi as early as the 1940s. At that time, groups composed mainly of black professionals, such as clergy, schoolteachers, and doctors, along with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), began to take independent action to secure voting rights and greater respect in general for blacks.[12] Their efforts culminated in the 1960s in a civil rights campaign for voter registration, school desegregation, and a wide range of other rights commonly denied blacks. The collective activation of their groups' resources resulted in broad mobilization for the acquisition of social and political goods.[13] In its organized form this activation occurred under the sponsorship of the NAACP, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Congress of Racial Equality, the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, the Council of Federated Organizations, and numerous local leaders. These forces worked with federal officials and civil rights lawyers to challenge Mississippi's racist laws and to seek new legislation to strengthen black rights. The Voting Rights Act is the crowning achievement of the civil rights agitation and litigation campaign.

Passage of the act in 1965 dramatically changed Mississippi politics. The most obvious change was the enfranchisement of blacks. But as Chief Justice Earl Warren stated in Allen v. State Board of Elections, a case interpreting the scope of the act, "the Voting Rights Act was aimed at the subtle, as well as the obvious, state regulations which have the effect of denying citizens their right to vote because of their race. . . . The right to vote can be affected by a dilution of voting power as well as by an absolute prohibition on casting a ballot."[14] The Voting Rights Act invalidated Mississippi's literacy test as well as other voter registration tests, and led to the abolition of the the poll tax in state elections; consequently, black registration increased sharply.[15] However, other obstacles to registration, such as the requirement of dual registration for state and municipal elections, and a prohibition against registrars enrolling voters outside their offices, remained in effect in Mississippi until the 1980s. Barriers that diluted black voting power were more resistant to change. After passage of the act, the goal of white segregationists was mainly to dilute black voting power, not only through legislation but through deceit, intimidation, and violence.[16]

The Impact of Litigation on At-Large Municipal Elections

Twenty-two of the twenty-six largest incorporated cities in Mississippi had at-large city council elections in 1965. Today most cities have changed to district-based election systems. This change is the product of a new, post-1965 voting rights movement that has relied primarily on litigation under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments and the Voting Rights Act to mount court challenges to at-large election systems that dilute minority voting strength. To the extent that this new movement protests denials and abridgments of black citizens' right to vote, it reflects a historical continuity with the goals of the civil rights struggles of the 1960s. The success of the later movement resulted not only from black initiatives but from congressional legislation and Supreme Court decisions that made the litigation possible. The 1965 passage of the act, which broadly prohibited racial discrimination in voting, and the 1982 amendment to section 2, which eliminated the necessity of proving discriminatory intent in challenges to voting systems and adopted a more liberal "results" test, were key to the movement's success.

To study the impact of the act on municipal election structures and black officeholding, we have conducted research on litigation challenging at-large city council elections, including the collection of information on all lawsuits against Mississippi cities with at-large elections. Since many of these cases were unreported or were settled out of court, we surveyed legal organizations and attorneys filing voting rights cases in the state to obtain information on their lawsuits. For each case, we obtained the name of the city involved, the case name,-the case particulars (date filed, date resolved), the attorneys for the plaintiffs, how the case was resolved, the legal basis for the case, and the type of election system challenged.

Between 1965 and 1989, seventy-one Mississippi cities of 1,000 or more with at least 10 percent black population switched from systems under which all the city council members were elected at large to either district elections or to mixed plans in which some council members were elected by district and others at large (see tables 5.8 and 5.11). Fifty-nine of the seventy-one cities went to district elections as a result of court injunctions in contested litigation, settlement of pending litigation, or threat of litigation; four (including three that were also targets of litigation) switched as a result of Justice Department section 5 objections to the adoption of at-large voting or to municipal annexations; and eleven switched voluntarily.

The Section 5 Preclearance Requirement

Section 5 requires covered states, including Mississippi, to submit all proposed new voting laws either to the U.S. Attorney General or to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia for preclearance before they can be implemented. The state has the burden of proving that the change is not racially discriminatory in purpose or effect. If the Attorney General objects or the court denies approval, the change cannot be implemented. In Allen v. State Board of Elections, the Supreme Court interpreted the section 5 preclearance requirement to cover not only changes affecting registration and voting, but also any changes that might dilute minority voting strength, including adoption of at-large elections.

The first municipal at-large election challenge in Mississippi was Perkins v. Matthews,[17] filed by the Jackson office of the Lawyers' Constitutional Defense Committee (LCDC), a national coalition of groups that opened offices in the South to assist the civil rights movement. In this case, black voters challenged Canton's switch in 1969 to at-large elections without section 5 preclearance. The city contended that although it had conducted the 1965 city elections under a district system, the 1969 change to at-large voting was not covered by section 5 because it was authorized by a state statute adopted in 1962, before section 5 went into effect. A three-judge district court agreed with the city's position and went on to rule that the change was not discriminatory, since black voters had an overwhelming majority in only one district. If one black alderman were elected, the district court reasoned, it "would, in practical effect, amount to nothing" because "the one Negro member of the board [of aldermen] would always be outvoted by the four white members."

On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the district court's ruling.[18] The decision was significant for Voting Rights Act enforcement throughout the South because it reaffirmed the Court's ruling in Allen that all voting law changes adopted after 1965 must be precleared under section 5, and it expressly applied section 5 to changes in at-large municipal elections (as well as municipal annexations and polling place changes). The Court ruled that section 5 covers any change in actual voting practices since the effective date of the Voting Rights Act. Thus, because Canton conducted district elections in 1965, the 1969 switch to at-large voting was a covered change. Further, the Court held that the question of whether Canton's changes were racially discriminatory was an issue specifically reserved by section 5 to the Attorney General or the district court for the District of Columbia to decide.

However important the Supreme Court's Perkins decision was to the issue of what changes are covered by section 5, it had little impact upon at-large voting structures in Mississippi. Most of the state's cities had adopted at-large voting before 1965, and their systems therefore were not subject to federal preclearance. As table 5.11 shows, only three cities were blocked by section 5 objections from adopting at-large elections after 1965, although undoubtedly the Perkins decision and these objections deterred some cities from switching to at-large voting. As a result, most at-large challenges in Mississippi have been based on the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments or, after 1982, on section 2.

Fourteenth Amendment Challenges

The first, and most important, Mississippi lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of at-large municipal elections was filed in 1973. Stewart v. Waller[19] is important not only because it was one of the first such lawsuits in the South, but also because it was the first multijurisdictional one, ultimately requiring thirty-one municipalities to abolish at-large voting. In 1962, as the state's first black voter registration drives of the decade were getting underway, the Mississippi legislature passed one of its first political "massive resistance" statutes, requiring all code charter municipalities (cities organized under the state's municipal code but not those municipalities incorporated under private charters from the legislature) with a mayor–board of aldermen form of government to elect all board members on an at-large basis. Previously, code charter municipalities over 10,000 in population were required to elect six aldermen by district and one at large, while those under 10,000 had the option of either electing five aldermen at large or four by district and one at large. To challenge the constitutionality of this statute, the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law—a national civil rights group with an office in Jackson—and the Washington law firm of Covington and Burling filed Stewart on behalf of eight black voters in four cities.

In 1975, a three-judge district court held that the statute violated the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments because it was adopted with "an intent to thwart the election of minority candidates to the office of alderman." The court's ruling was based on direct evidence of discriminatory motivation, the absence of an adequate nonracial explanation for the change, Mississippi's long history of official racial discrimination, and the foreseeable and actual impact of the law in defeating black candidates' efforts to win at-large municipal elections. The district court's 1975 injunction required thirty municipalities to revert to the district voting systems they had used prior to the enactment of the statute. In 1977 an additional city, West Point, which had been severed from the principal case, was also enjoined from holding at-large elections. The district court, however, rejected the plaintiffs' request to expand its injunction to cover all at-large municipal elections in Mississippi, holding that the constitutionality of at-large elections in municipalities that did not rely on the 1962 statute would have to be litigated on a case-by-case basis.

Stewart was atypical because there was direct evidence of discriminatory intent supplied by newspaper reports of the state senate floor debate on the statute. Most of the Mississippi lawsuits of the 1970s were litigated under what became known as the White-Zimmer standard, which did not require proof of discriminatory intent. In White v. Regester[20] the Supreme Court held that at-large voting violated the Fourteenth Amendment if minority voter plaintiffs could prove on the basis of a number of evidentiary factors that "the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question—that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice." This decision was first implemented by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in the Louisiana case of Zimmer v. McKeithen,[21] hence the White-Zimmer standard. Racially polarized voting, which was an element of the district court's decision in White v. Regester but which was not cited in the Supreme Court's decision, subsequently was added as an element of proof in the subsequent White-Zimmer line of cases.

Although this standard required a complex multifactor analysis, it nevertheless established a favorable legal standard for black plaintiffs to litigate at-large election challenges because it did not depend on proof of discriminatory intent. Between 1976 and 1980, twelve lawsuits were filed against eleven cities in Mississippi, challenging at-large city council elections for violating the Fourteenth Amendment. Seven of the twelve cases were settled with agreements to eliminate at-large elections and to institute district voting systems.

The Impact of City of Mobile v. Bolden

The first wave of legal attacks on at-large voting came to a screeching halt in 1980 with the Supreme Court's decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden.[22] Plaintiffs in Fourteenth Amendment challenges were now required to prove that the at-large system had been adopted or maintained for a discriminatory purpose, a difficult burden of proof. Even worse for voting rights plaintiffs, the court rejected as not probative of discriminatory intent the evidentiary factors (e.g., past history of discrimination, absence of minority officeholders, discriminatory election rules) on which the White-Zimmer line of cases was based.

The damaging impact of the Mobile decision on at-large election challenges throughout the South has been widely noted.[23] In Mississippi, district courts employing the Mobile intent standard for the first time rejected constitutional challenges to at-large voting in two of the four cities against which cases were pending—Jackson (Kirksey v. City of Jackson)[24] and Greenwood (Jordan v. City of Greenwood).[25] In a third case pending against the city of Hattiesburg, the Justice Department on its own motion dismissed its lawsuit challenging at-large city council elections after the Mobile decision, sending the district court a signal that the intent standard could not be met in that case and undermining the viability of a companion case filed by black voters.

The district courts ruled against black voter plaintiffs in the Jackson and Greenwood cases even though at-large voting had resulted in the total exclusion of black representation on the city councils of both cities and even though there was strong but circumstantial evidence that discriminatory intent had been a factor in the adoption and retention of at-large elections. In the Jackson case, both the district court and the court of appeals rejected as failing to prove discriminatory intent strong circumstantial evidence that at-large voting had been adopted and retained for racial reasons. Most damaging to the plaintiffs in this case, the courts refused to accept as relevant evidence an analysis of a 1977 referendum showing that 72 percent of the whites voted to retain at-large elections, while 98 percent of the blacks voted to change to district elections. The courts also excluded from consideration an opinion survey in which 61 percent of the white respondents who voted against the change gave at least one racial reason for their vote, and 44 percent gave two or more racial reasons, including unsolicited comments such as "I don't want a 'Nigra' representing me" and "blacks are human but whites are more efficient."[26] On appeal, the Fifth Circuit upheld the district court's decision to exclude this evidence for the reason that white voters' motives in retaining at-large elections were protected under the First Amendment from judicial inquiry. This ruling made it impossible to satisfy the Mobile requirement of proving discriminatory intent in cases in which at-large elections were adopted or retained by popular referendum because it excluded the voters' motivations from judicial consideration.

Section 2 Litigation

Responding to the outcry against the Mobile decision from civil rights groups and legal scholars, Congress amended section 2 in 1982 to prohibit voting practices that result in discrimination, regardless of the motivation behind them.[27] Congress's stated purpose was to restore the White-Zimmer legal standard, under which proof of discriminatory intent was not required. Then in Thornburg v. Gingles[28] the Supreme Court simplified the new section 2 standard even further by adopting a three-part legal test of discriminatory results based on proof that (1) a single-member district could be created in which minorities have a majority; (2) minority voters bloc vote for certain candidates; and (3) minority-preferred candidates usually are defeated by white bloc voting. The new section 2 standard, then, as interpreted by the Supreme Court in the Gingles decision, emphasizes proof of racially polarized voting that results in the systematic defeat of minority-backed candidates.

If the Justice Department's refusal to pursue its Hattiesburg case under the Fourteenth Amendment indicated that the case would be lost under the intent test, Congress's enactment of the section 2 amendment made the case winnable. In the first court ruling under the new section 2 standard in Mississippi—and one of the first in the South—the district court in Boykins v. City of Hattiesburg[29] ruled that Hattiesburg's at-large city council elections violated the section 2 standard. The court cited evidence of a history of official discrimination against black voters in Mississippi, statistical proof of racially polarized voting that resulted in the defeat of all black candidates, and election rules—including a majority-vote requirement, a prohibition on single-shot voting, a numbered-post system, and the absence of a district residency requirement—that disadvantaged black candidates. The district court also relied on data showing severe socioeconomic disparities between whites and blacks that hindered black political effectiveness, evidence of racial campaigning, and proof that white officials had been unresponsive to the needs of the black community.

All the Mississippi cases that had been lost under the Mobile intent standard were won or settled under the new section 2 results standard. The district court's earlier adverse decision against the black voter plaintiffs in the Greenwood case was vacated on appeal by the Fifth Circuit and remanded for reconsideration. The district court then reversed its prior ruling for the city and held that at-large voting violated section 2. The lawsuit against the Jackson City Council that was lost under the Mobile standard was refiled as a section 2 case, and in 1985—responding to newspaper advertisements that if the city's voters did not adopt a district voting system, the federal court would do it for them—Jackson's voters by referendum eliminated at-large voting and adopted ward elections.

The 1982 amendment has had great impact in eliminating at-large city council elections in Mississippi. Altogether, section 2 lawsuits were filed against forty-three cities. Four of these cities litigated, three unsuccessfully, and thirty-two settled the lawsuits. The remaining seven were still pending at the time of our survey. In addition, twenty-three other cities abandoned at-large voting voluntarily or under threat of litigation.[30] Indeed, it is likely that the successes in the section 2 cases may have persuaded cities that converted to district systems to change without the direct threat of litigation.

The Election of Black Council Members

Having reviewed the history of voting rights litigation in Mississippi, we now turn to a systematic analysis of black officeholding in the state's cities. In this analysis, we examine the relationship between council election systems and the election of black council members.

In the spring of 1989, to gather data for this study, we conducted a telephone survey of all Mississippi cities with 1980 populations of at least 1,000 (N = 148). Of the 145 cities that responded to the survey, our analysis considers only those with a black population of 10 percent or more (N = 133). The data include information on the type of electoral structure, the number of city council members, the racial composition of the city council, and the race of the mayor. For those cities with district elections, we have collected information about the date of change to this system and the racial composition of the council in 1980. We have supplemented our survey with information from sources such as the U.S. Bureau of the Census and the Joint Center for Political Studies' annually published National Roster of Black Elected Officials.

Table 5.1, showing black officeholding in 1989, confirms the findings of several previous studies: in cities with a black population of less than 50 percent, black council members were most likely to be elected in pure single-member-district systems and least likely to be elected in at-large ones; cities with mixed plans fell in between. In those Mississippi cities with any seats elected at large, blacks were less likely to be elected to council than in pure single-member-district cities.

Why do the mixed plans occupy the middle status? To answer this question, we compared the results of elections for single-member-district seats with at-large seats in the 43 cities with mixed plans (see table 5.3). We found that black officials in mixed systems were elected overwhelmingly from district seats. Indeed, in cities with a black population of less than 50 percent, no blacks were elected to the at-large seats under mixed plans, showing that at-large seats in mixed plans continued to dilute black voting strength, just as they did in pure at-large systems.

From the survey data and section 5 records obtained from the Justice Department, we were able to calculate the black percentage of the population in each single-member district in 40 cities (see table 5.6). In districts with a black population of less than 65 percent, blacks were dramatically underrepresented. In districts with a higher black percentage, blacks were elected in about the same proportion as their percentage of the city's population. Thus, even in single-member districts, blacks in Mississippi needed a supermajority to win elections.

A Longitudinal Measure of the Impact of Election Structures on Black Representation

In our cross-sectional analysis of cities discussed so far, we have shown a positive relationship between district elections and the presence of blacks on city councils—a fact noted in other such studies as well.[31] Although there have been only a few before-and-after studies of this relationship, they reached the same conclusion.[32] Nevertheless, one of these longitudinal studies lacked a control group of unchanged at-large cities. The other did not randomly assign cities to the experimental and control groups. On the other hand, as Davidson and Grofman argue in chapter 10 of this volume, cross-sectional studies also have serious methodological problems.[33] Our research remedies this by adopting the research design similar to that used in the other state chapters in this book: it compares the racial makeup of city councils before and after cities shifted from at-large to mixed or single-member-district plans in the period between 1974 and 1989; it then compares the racial makeup of councils in 1974 and 1989 in the control group of cities that retained their at-large system throughout the period.

By 1974, nine years had elapsed since passage of the Voting Rights Act, allowing time for the act's effect on black registration and mobilization to be felt. Nevertheless, Mississippi was still resistant to equal black participation in many ways.[34] In the 130 cities with at-large elections in 1974, there were very few black council members, and they were elected in cities that were virtually all black (see table 5.2).

In cities that later switched electoral structures, a dramatic change occurred in the black percentage on council (see table 5.2). In cities less than 50 percent black that switched to pure single-member districts or mixed plans, the proportion of black council members increased noticeably; in cities that did not switch, the increase was minimal. In cities less than 50 percent black, district voting led in every category to significant increases in numbers of black elected officials.

Since the black population ratio varies among city election types, a comparison of standardized measures of black "equity of representation" provides a clearer analysis of the impact of these changes than does the comparison in table 5.2. Table 5.4 presents two measures of representational equity in 1989—a ratio and a difference measure—for cities with different types of elections. Our findings can be summarized as follows: When the effects of the size of black population are controlled, blacks in majority-white cities were best represented in 1989 in pure district cities, less well represented in mixed ones, and least well represented in at-large ones.

Finally, we compare the three types of cities' equity ratios for 1974 and 1989 (see table 5.5). For all types of cities, these improve over time. Nevertheless, the improvement in black representation in majority-white cities changing to district or mixed plans was much greater than in cities that retained at-large elections.

Conclusion

Black electoral power was dramatically diluted in Mississippi cities following passage of the Voting Rights Act, largely due to the use of at-large elections. As our data show, the abolition of this system in many cities has brought about fairer representation for blacks. Majority-white cities that switched from at-large to single-member districts had the fairest representation, followed by cities with mixed electoral systems.

Most at-large systems in Mississippi cities have been eliminated through litigation under the Voting Rights Act and, prior to 1980, the Fourteenth Amendment. Moreover, section 5 was successfully used to block changes from ward to at-large elections.

Of the fifty-five lawsuits that were filed challenging at-large elections in Mississippi cities, only seven of them—Stewart v. Waller and the individual cases against Greenwood, Hattiesburg, Houston, Jackson (the first case filed in the state), West Point, and Woodville—actually went to trial on the merits of at-large challenges (exclusive of remedy hearings on a redistricting plan). The degree of resistance in these cases, however, should not be minimized. The state strenuously defended the 1962 statute at issue in Stewart even when it became patently obvious that the law was racially motivated. After that decision, resistance was strongest in the state's most populous cities, which had large black concentrations and the financial resources to pay their attorneys for years of resistance. The cities that most strongly resisted eliminating their at-large systems included Jackson, which bitterly contested the lawsuits against it through two separate trials and two appeals to the Fifth Circuit—litigation lasting from 1977 to 1985. Greenwood, Greenville, and Hattiesburg all fought to retain at-large elections from 1977 to 1984. After section 2 was amended and the demise of their at-large election systems seemed inevitable, all four cities in effect gave up. The Jackson City Council supported the 1985 referendum that created ward voting. The Greenwood council, although it did not settle, in the end did not contest the evidence that demonstrated a section 2 violation. Greenville agreed to a mixed four–two voting plan in 1984. Hattiesburg decided not to appeal the district court decision striking down at-large elections under section 2.

In resisting other applications of the Voting Rights Act, Mississippi created ingenious devices, engaged in persistent resistance, and, during the Reagan presidency, had the implicit support of a federal administration that was hostile to the act.[35] Mississippi racially gerrymandered its congressional and state legislative districts, and numerous counties gerrymandered their county election district lines after the 1970, 1980, and 1990 censuses. Between 1965 and 1980, fourteen of the state's eighty-two counties attempted to switch to at-large elections for county supervisor positions, twenty-two counties switched to at-large elections for school boards, and from 1966 to 1975 the legislature increased the number of multimember districts for the election of state senators and representatives.[36] Additionally, some cities annexed white residential areas to dilute black electoral strength.

Mississippi resisted in other ways. Under pressure from U.S. Senator Thad Cochran and Congressman Trent Lott, the Justice Department in 1981 violated its own procedures for preclearance when it withdrew an objection to a municipal annexation.[37] In a 1980 amicus curiae brief in City of Rome v. United States,[38] a Georgia case, Mississippi argued that section 5 was unconstitutional twelve years after the Supreme Court had sustained its constitutionality.

Approximately 125 years have passed since Mississippi blacks registered to select delegates to the constitutional convention during Reconstruction. Between that time and passage of the Voting Rights Act, Mississippi thwarted black voter registration with literacy tests, white primaries, and poll taxes as well as with violence and intimidation. After passage of the act, the state has used barriers to candidacy, relocation of polling places, denial of the ballot, racial gerrymandering, at-large elections, and annexations to deny or dilute black voting. Yet in spite of this massive and unceasing resistance, the act has advanced Mississippi toward the ideal expressed in the Fifteenth Amendment that "the right of citizens . . . to vote shall not be denied or abridged . . . on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

TABLE 5.1
Black Representation on Council in 1989 by Election Plan, Mississippi Cities of 1,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council, 1989
SMD plan
10–29.9	5	24	20
30–49.9	14	42	36
50–100	12	57	41
Mixed plan
10–29.9	18	20	12
30–49.9	13	40	30
50–100	12	63	37
At-large plan
10–29.9	20	22	9
30–49.9	15	35	9
50–100	24	71	49

TABLE 5.2
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1974 and 1989, Mississippi Cities of 1,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N[a]	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council
			Before Change (1974)	After Change (1989)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	5	24	0	20
30–49.9	14	42	0	36
50–100	11	58	0	43
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	16	20	0	11
30–49.9	13	40	0	30
50–100	12	63	5	37
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	20	22	0	9
30–49.9	15	35	0	9
50–100	24	71	23	49

[a]Two cities with mixed plans and one with a single-member-district plan listed in table 5.1 are excluded from this table because they had adopted their plans before 1974.

TABLE 5.3
Black Representation in 1989 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, Mississippi Cities of 1,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

% Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black Councilpersons in District Components, 1989	Mean % Black Councilpersons in At-Large Components, 1989
10–29.9	18	15	0
30–49.9	13	37	0
50–100	12	46	25

TABLE 5.4
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Black on Council in 1989 with Percentage Black in City Population in 1980, Mississippi Cities of 1,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N[a]	Difference Measure (% on Council − % in Population)	Ratio Measure (% on Council ÷ % in Population)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	5	−4	0.84
30–49.9	14	−6	0.85
50–100	11	−15	0.74
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	16	−8	0.58
30–49.9	13	−11	0.74
50–100	12	−26	0.59
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	20	−13	0.41
30–49.9	15	−26	0.26
50–100	24	−21	0.70

[a]Two cities with mixed plans and one with a single-member-district plan listed in table 5.1 are excluded from this table because they had adopted their plans before 1974.

TABLE 5.5
Changes in Black Representation on Council between 1974 and 1989, Mississippi Cities of 1,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N[a]	Black Representational Equity on Council
		1974	1989
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	5	0.00	0.84
30–49.9	14	0.00	0.85
50–100	11	0.00	0.74
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	16	0.00	0.58
30–49.9	13	0.00	0.74
50–100	12	0.07	0.59
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	20	0.00	0.41
30–49.9	15	0.00	0.26
50–100	24	0.32	0.70

[a]Two cities with mixed plans and one with a single-member-district plan listed in table 5.1 are excluded from this table because they had adopted their plans before 1974.

TABLE 5.6
Black Representation in Council Single-Member Districts in 1989, Mississippi Cities of 1,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

% Black Population of District	N[a]	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
0–29.9	84	10	0
30–49.9	26	39	0
50–59.9	11	56	27
60–64.9	6	62	33
65–69.9	15	67	53
70–100	53	89	94

[a]Of the 347 single-member districts in Mississippi cities of 1,000 or more population with 10 percent or more black population, we were able to obtain usable data on 195.

TABLE 5.7
Black Council Representation in Single-Member Districts in 1989, by Racial Composition of District, Mississippi Cities of 1,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Racial Composition of District	N	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
Black majority	85	79	74
White majority	110	17	0

TABLE 5.8
Cause of Change from At-Large to Mixed or District Plan between 1974 and 1989, Mississippi Cities of 1,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Reason for Change
Changed to Single-Member Districts
Aberdeen	Yes	Consent decree
Belzoni	Yes	Settlement
Biloxi	No	Voluntary
Carthage	No	Voluntary
Charleston	Yes	Consent decree
Clarksdale	Yes	Consent decree
Columbia	Yes	Court order
Columbus	Yes	Consent decree
Gloster	Yes	Settlement
Greenwood	Yes	Court order
Grenada	Yes	Consent decree
Gulfport	No	Voluntary
Hattiesburg	Yes	Court order
Hazelhurst	Yes	Consent decree
Indianola	Yes	Settlement
Jackson	Yes	Settlement
Laurel	Yes	Consent decree
Leland	Yes	Settlement
Lumberton	No	Voluntary
Macon	Yes	Court order
Meridian	Yes	Settlement
Monticello	No	Voluntary
Newton	Yes	Settlement
Okolona	No	Threat of litigation
Picayune	Yes	Consent decree
Port Gibson	Yes	Settlement
Tutwiler	No	Voluntary
Vicksburg	No	Section 5 negotiation
West Point	Yes	Court order
Yazoo City	Yes	Consent decree
Changed to Mixed Plan
Bay St. Louis	No	Voluntary
Brandon	No	Voluntary
Brookhaven	Yes	Court order
Canton	Yes	Settlement
Centreville	Yes	Settlement

(continued)

TABLE 5.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Reason for Change
Cleveland	Yes	Court order
Coffeeville	Yes	Consent decree
Collins	No	Voluntary
Crenshaw	Yes	Settlement
Crystal Springs	Yes	Settlement
Drew	Yes	Consent decree
Ellisville	Yes	Court order
Forest	Yes	Court order
Hollandale	Yes	Consent decree
Holly Springs	Yes	Court order
Houston	Yes	Court order
Itta Bena	Yes	Settlement
Kosciusko	Yes	Court order
Lexington	Yes	Court order
Louisville	No	Threat of litigation
Magee	Yes	Court order
Magnolia	Yes	Court order
Marks	Yes	Settlement
Mendenhall	No	Threat of litigation
Moss Point	Yes	Court order
New Albany	Yes	Court order
Oxford	Yes	Court order
Pass Christian	Yes	Court order
Pearl	Yes	Court order
Philadelphia	Yes	Court order
Pontotoc	Yes	Court order
Ridgeland	Yes	Court order
Ripley	No	Voluntary
Rolling Fork	Yes	Settlement
Sardis	Yes	Court order
Starkville	Yes	Court order
Tupelo	Yes	Court order
Tylertown	Yes	Court order
Water Valley	Yes	Court order
Wesson	Yes	Court order
Wiggins	No	Voluntary
SUMMARY	Yes 56 (79%)
	No 15 (21%)

TABLE 5.9
Major Disfranchising Devices in Mississippi

Device	Date Established	Date Abolished
Literacy test: Must be able to read or understand or interpret any section of the state constitution (1890); amended to read and write any section and give a reasonable interpretation (1955)	1890	1965[a]
Poll tax	1890	1964 for federal elections;[b] 1966 for state elections[c]
Durational residence requirement: 2 years in state, 1 year in precinct (1890); amended to 1 year in state, 6 months in precinct (1972)	1890	1972[d]
Disfranchising crimes list	1890	Still in effect
Dual registration requirement (voters must register with both county registrar and municipal clerk)	1892	1984, 1987[e]
White primary	1907	ca. 1947[f]
Party principles loyalty oath	1947	1987[g]
Citizenship understanding test	1955	1965[h]
Prohibition on satellite registration	1955	1987[e]
Good moral character test	1960	1965[h]
Newspaper publication of names of applicants for registration; procedure for challenging moral character	1962	1965[h]

Sources: U.S. Commission on Civil Rights 1965; U.S. Commission on Civil Rights 1968; Parker 1990.

[a] Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C., Section 1973 et seq.

[b] Twenty-fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

[c] United States v. Mississippi, 11 Race Relations Law Reporter 837 (S.D. Miss. 1966) (three-judge court).

[d] Graham v. Waller, 343 F. Supp. 1 (S.D. Miss. 1972) (three-judge court) (limited to thirty days in state, county, and precinct).

[e] Mississippi State Chapter, Operation PUSH v. Allain, 674 F. Supp. 1245 (N.D. Miss. 1987), aff'd, 932 F.2d 400 (5th Cir. 1991).

[f] Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944).

[g] Mississippi legislature.

[h] Mississippi legislature, passed in July 1965 in hopes of evading coverage of the Voting Rights Act.

TABLE 5.10
Black and White Registered Voters and Officeholders in Mississippi, Selected Years[a]

	Black		White
	N	%	N	%
Registered voters[b]
1964	28,500	5.1	525,000	94.9
1968	181,233	23.6	589,066	76.4
1988	—[c]	32.5	—[c]	67.0
Officeholders
1965	6	0.1	5,272	99.9
1968	29	0.5	5,249	99.5
1989	646	12.2	4,632	87.8

Sources: U.S. Commission on Civil Rights 1968; voter registration statistics of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council; Joint Center for Political Studies 1989.

[a] Mean black Mississippi population, 1960–90 = 37.4%.

[b] Voter registration statistics for 1964 and 1968 are estimates, and voter registration statistics for 1988 are based on census survey results and probably exaggerate the total number of registered voters, on which these percentage calculations are based, and the number of black registered voters.

[c] Black and white registration combined was 945,712 in 1988.

TABLE 5.11
Reasons for Changes from At-Large to Mixed and Single-Member-District Plans in Mississippi Cities of 1,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Reason	N[a]
Injunction, contested litigation	29
Settlement of litigation	27
Threat of litigation	3
Voluntary, no litigation	11
Section 5 objection to switch to at-large voting	3
Section 5 objection to municipal annexation	1
TOTAL	74

[a] Three cities—Grenada, Kosciusko, and Lexington—that were required to revert to ward elections by litigation are listed twice. These cities later attempted to switch to at-large elections and were blocked by section 5 objections.

CHAPTER SIX

North Carolina

WILLIAM R. KEECH AND
MICHAEL P. SISTROM

> It has been the vogue to be progressive. Willingness to accept new ideas, sense of community responsibility toward the Negro, feeling of common purpose, and relative prosperity have given North Carolina a more sophisticated politics than exists in most southern states.
>
> —V. O. Key, Jr.[1]

KEY RECOGNIZED North Carolinians' self-conscious and self-perpetuated image of themselves as a "progressive plutocracy." For black Tar Heels, however, the long struggle for voting rights and racial equality has been a paradox. For example, North Carolinians have been taught to remember Governor Charles Brantley Aycock as the "education governor," bringing progressive reform in public education at the turn of the century.[2] Blacks might also recall that Aycock came to power as an advocate of black disfranchisement

Similarly, in 1954 Greensboro, North Carolina, became the first city in the South to announce that it would comply with the Supreme Court's school desegregation edict. However, the Pearsall Plan, the state law passed in response to Brown v. Board of Education, provided that local school districts or individual schools within them could close down rather than desegregate. In 1971, after loss of federal funds and under court order, Greensboro finally integrated its public schools, making it one of the last in the region to do so.[3]

Among southern states, North Carolina has often been perceived as different, usually in a way that reflected favorably on it as more progressive or less blatantly racist than other southern states. The Voting Rights Act itself recognized that North Carolina was different by originally including fewer than half its hundred counties under coverage of the special provisions. Before the act was passed in 1965, an estimated 46.8 percent of the state's black voting-age population was registered, the most of any of the seven states originally covered.[4]

Clearly North Carolina's performance has been "better" in some respects, but there are limits to its racial progressivism. One observer contends that North Carolina, as "one of the few Southern states that has been moderate in race relations has been most effective in belittling the voting strength of a sizable black population."[5] Perhaps projecting the progressive image was a less blatant and therefore more effective way to maintain a system of white supremacy.

The groundbreaking 1984 lawsuit, Gingles v. Edmisten,[6] was a response to the facts that rates of black officeholding still lagged, state election law and local government were slow to reform, and racially polarized campaigns and voting still characterized North Carolina elections. Yet by now, a quarter century after the passage of the Voting Rights Act, the barriers of tradition have been substantially broken. The purpose of this chapter is to examine the effects of the act on black registration and officeholding in North Carolina. In general, we will show that there has been substantial progress, much of which resulted from the act. After a look at North Carolina politics, we will consider changes in voter activity and officeholding by race.

Demographic and Historical Context

North Carolina's black population is 22 percent of the total. Much of it is concentrated in the historical black belt in the eastern section of the state. There is also substantial black population in the cities of the Piedmont. These cities—Raleigh, Durham, Greensboro, Winston-Salem, and Charlotte—are the largest in what is still one of the least urban of American states.

North Carolina's Native American population, 1.1 percent of the total, is the largest east of the Mississippi, and is the second largest minority population in the state. It is concentrated in three counties—Robeson, Hoke, and Swain—in two of which it is a plurality. The Voting Rights Act in 1975 placed those counties under the new language-minority provisions.

Blacks played an important role on the political stage throughout the postbellum period. The state's Reconstruction constitution of 1868 established universal manhood suffrage, thus eliminating racial and property qualifications for voting. In the registration rolls created by the ruling Republicans in 1868, 36 percent of the new voters were former slaves.[7] The freedmen continued to register and cast ballots, with their turnout reaching 83 percent of registered blacks in the 1880 elections, surpassing the white rate.[8]

The restoration of county government under the new constitution and the existence of strong alternatives to the dominant Democratic party (Republicans and later the Republican/Populist Fusion movement) gave North Carolina blacks access to a variety of elected and appointed positions until the turn of the century. As a rule, "the darker the district"—whether city or county ward, legislative or congressional seat—the more frequent was its black representation. Four blacks represented the Second Congressional District, the "Black Second," between 1868 and 1901, serving a total of seven terms.[9] George White, the last of these, was the last black member of Congress until 1929, and the last from the South until 1973.[10]

These representatives were able to secure a measure of federal patronage for their black constituents, especially jobs as postmasters, recorders of deeds, tax collectors, and even collector of customs for the Port of Wilmington.[11]

Between 1876 and 1900, fifty-nine blacks sat in the state house and eighteen were elected to the state senate, all from districts drawn from sixteen majority-black counties. They were almost without influence in the white-dominated legislature, and were truly active only on "race issues" such as black education, election laws, and convict labor, but they did hold some important committee assignments.[12] Local black communities also captured county and municipal posts. Numerous blacks were elected as magistrates, and a handful became sheriffs and county commissioners. A scattering of black aldermen were also on the boards of several eastern and Piedmont cities, including Raleigh, Wilmington, Tarboro, and New Bern.[13] Still, white allies were unenthusiastic about black officeholding, and blacks never exercised political power commensurate with their numbers.

White Democrats, motivated by the specter of "Negro domination" and the desire for one-party hegemony, sought to eliminate this limited black political strength from the time Democrats regained control of state government in 1870 until the culmination of their efforts in the disfranchising constitutional amendments of 1900. They experimented with a number of intermediate steps both to deny the ballot to the blacks and poor whites who made up the Republican and Populist constituencies and to dilute black voting strength. In 1877 the general assembly replaced the popular vote with legislative control of county government. Other bills redrew ward lines in cities with heavy black populations, either to limit black influence to one district or to disperse it through several. This maneuvering, along with violent terror, gave the white Democratic minority control over the eastern black belt.[14]

One of the most effective early disfranchisement measures was the centralization of control over elections and the establishment of intricate procedures for voter registration. A new and highly partisan state board of elections supervised the appointment of local registrars and judges of elections. The key features of the statutes were the wide discretion granted to the local clerks, the specificity of the information required of the registrant, the limited time periods the books were open, and the provisions allowing challenges of a voter's qualifications to be made on the day of the election, thus making it more difficult for the challenged would-be voters to clear their record in time to vote.[15] Even where impartially administered, such laws significantly diminished turnout from their inception in the late nineteenth century to the 1960s.

The registration scheme, however, like the other election chicanery, was by no means foolproof. Since the techniques relied on discriminatory administration, a change in the control of state government might reverse the direction of discrimination in voter registration. Federal regulation of voter registration and elections, a feature of the narrowly defeated "Force Bill" of 1890, might eliminate the advantage entirely. In fact, Democrats lost control of the legislature in 1894 to a "Fusion" ticket of Populists and Republicans, which replaced the Democratic registration schemes with what Kousser has called "probably the fairest and most democratic election law in the post-Reconstruction South."[16]

With this law, the Fusion ticket prevailed again in the 1896 legislative elections, when Republican Daniel Russell won a four-year term as governor. But the Democrats regained the legislature in 1898 and reformulated the election law again. This time, however, Democratic leaders sought the permanent and constitutional elimination of blacks from the electorate. In the face of opposition from blacks and some white dissenters, the 1900 election returned a victory for Democratic gubernatorial candidate Charles Aycock and for a package of disfranchisement amendments that differed only in minor ways from those used in the rest of the South. The central provision was a requirement that "persons offering to vote shall be at the time a legally registered voter." In order to be registered, potential voters had to "be able to read and write any section of the constitution in the English language" and to have paid a poll tax.

Lawmakers faced a problem: one-fifth of the white population was illiterate and one-half of the adult black population was literate. A fair application of the test would have disfranchised over 50,000 whites and left almost 60,000 blacks on the rolls.[17] A grandfather clause excused voters from the literacy test if they had been entitled to vote in any state in 1867, or were a lineal descendent of such a person. (In order to be eligible for this possibility, voters had to be registered as such by 1908.)[18] North Carolina has never had a system of white primaries, and the poll tax was repealed as a requirement for voting in 1920. Thus the main institutional feature of black disfranchisement in North Carolina was the literacy test as a part of the registration requirement and the discretion granted to local registrars—precisely what was suspended by the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

The suffrage restriction mechanisms secured white supremacy and Democratic solidarity. The Fusion movement had collapsed, the Republican party turned lily-white, and black efforts to challenge the amendments in court failed. By 1910 almost no blacks voted, and white turnout had dropped substantially.[19] Apathy spread throughout the electorate as blacks all but disappeared from the public life of the state.

Black plaintiffs challenged the legality of the literacy requirement in court, but without success. In 1936, two black schoolteachers who had been prevented from voting sued their county registrar and the state for a judgment outlawing the literacy test. The state supreme court, limiting its inquiry to whether the test was correctly applied in the teachers' case, ruled that they were clearly literate and qualified to vote, a fact the defendants had admitted. The literacy test itself, however, was not struck down as a voting prerequisite. In a curious non sequitur, the court endorsed the test, saying that "this constitutional amendment providing for an educational test . . . brought light out of the darkness as to education for all people of the state. Religious, educational, and material uplift went forward by leaps and bounds."[20] through the 1950s. In 1959, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed a decision by the state supreme court upholding the use of the literacy requirement.[21] In 1961, the state supreme court qualified its earlier rulings, striking down the practice of requiring registrants to write a chosen section of the North Carolina constitution from dictation, but it upheld the requirement that all applicants of uncertain ability be required to show a capacity to read and write a section of the state constitution.[22] The ruling seemed to have little effect in easing restrictions, as evidenced by 750 complaints filed by blacks in 1962 with the North Carolina Advisory Committee to the Civil Rights Commission, documenting discriminatory application of the literacy test.[23]

The courts continued to protect North Carolina's registration procedures

Meanwhile, the black electorate struggled to grow. In 1940 only 5 percent of the eligible black electorate was registered, but by 1956 the fraction had risen to one-fifth, by 1960 to one-third, and by 1965 to over 45 percent.[24] The proportions registered were lower in the heavily black counties in the east than in the whiter western counties. In 1960, in the twenty-three majority-black counties, fewer than 20 percent of eligible blacks were registered.[25]

In contrast, pockets of black voting and even black officeholding developed in some Piedmont cities. For example, in Winston-Salem a militant black labor union local began building a black electorate in the mid-1940s, and by 1947 a black was voted onto that city's board of aldermen, becoming the first black public official elected in North Carolina in this century. In Durham an upper-middle-class black community had begun a political organization in the 1930s. This group, which was associated with the city's black insurance and banking industry, increased the local black electorate until it became an important force in local elections, and by 1953 a black insurance executive had been elected to the city council. The tradition of black politics continued in these cities until, by 1960, 62 percent of Durham's eligible black population was registered, as was 54 percent of Winston-Salem's, 34 percent of Greensboro's, and 27 percent of Raleigh's.[26]

After blacks were elected to public office in several cities in the 1940s and 1950s, concerned whites borrowed from the earlier strategies of the 1870s and 1880s to dilute black voting strength by changing district lines or electoral systems. In Winston-Salem, the prospective election of a black led to a demand for citywide elections, but this was denied by the city council. After the election of a black to the board of aldermen in 1947, however, a new single-member-district plan was implemented. This arrangement split a previous two-member district and localized black influence in a single "safe" ward.[27] When a black won election in 1953 and 1955 in Wilson, a small city in eastern North Carolina, the legislature changed the city's electoral system from district to at large, and Wilson's city council became all-white again.[28]

The state legislature mounted a more concentrated effort to dilute black votes in the 1950s as the threat of the black vote loomed larger and the national legal campaign against disfranchisement gained momentum. While passing anti-integration legislation for the public schools, the general assembly also passed a law that would prohibit "bullet voting" in fourteen mostly eastern counties. The law invalidated votes cast for only one candidate in a multimember district, and was obviously aimed at black strategies of voting for a single black, thereby denying any of their votes to a competitor who might defeat him. (This act was declared unconstitutional by the federal courts in 1972.)[29] Lawmakers also turned aside a bill that would have made school board positions elective instead of appointive.

The Effect of the Voting Rights Act on Voter Registration

Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act prohibited all practices that denied or abridged the right to vote on grounds of race or color. Section 4 identified "covered jurisdictions" for special treatment if they used a literacy test and had had a black registration rate on 1 November 1964 or a black turnout rate in the 1964 presidential election of less than 50 percent. Six southern states were entirely covered on these grounds, and some forty of North Carolina's one hundred counties were covered by this presumption of discriminatory use of a test. Wake County, which includes Raleigh, the state capital, successfully sued for exemption, while Gaston County was denied exemption in an important case defining a limit on the possibilities of becoming exempt.[30] In the latter case, the Supreme Court held that the Gaston County black schools were so poor that no literacy test could avoid discriminating on the grounds of race.[31]

Literacy tests were automatically suspended in all covered counties. The act also provided that federal registrars or observers could under certain conditions be sent into covered jurisdictions by the Attorney General. Although the state's black leadership urged oversight from Washington, no North Carolina county was ever designated for federal examiners.[32]

Therefore, when we assess the direct consequences of the act on voter registration in North Carolina, we are assessing suspension of the literacy test in the covered counties. (The test continued to be used in some noncovered counties as late as 1970, the year that an amendment to the Voting Rights Act suspended literacy tests nationwide; the state board of elections did not instruct these counties to discontinue such use until December 1970.)[33] The political atmosphere may well have changed after passage of the act, and this may have affected behavior in both covered and uncovered jurisdictions. We do not have direct knowledge that literacy tests were suspended in the covered jurisdictions, although this is implied by the fact that no examiners were sent.

Thompson has carefully documented changes in voter registration in both covered and uncovered counties. He found that the percentage of eligible blacks registered to vote in the covered counties increased from 32.4 percent in 1964, before passage, to 54.0 percent in 1976—a change of over 20 percentage points. In the same period, white registration increased by only 3.1 points, to just over 80 percent. There was less than 1 percentage point net change in both white and black registration in forty matched counties that were not covered by the act.[34] There have been even more spectacular gains since 1965 in individual covered counties.

In thirty, black voter registration rates have doubled, while in seven, they have more than tripled; in three, blacks have become a majority of the registered electorate.[35]

Thompson's figures provide powerful support for the claim that coverage made a difference, even without external enforcement by federal examiners. They suggest also that section 4 standards (less than 50 percent black registration or total voter turnout) were reasonable ways to identify discriminatory use of the literacy test. A measure of what the act did not do for voter registration can be found in the continuing difference as of 1976 between black and white registration rates in both covered counties (54 and 81 percent, respectively) and uncovered ones (65 and 89 percent, respectively), and also in the difference between black registration rates in the covered and uncovered counties (54 and 65 percent, respectively).[36]

In the state as a whole, there has been a unique pattern of change since 1965. There has not been the dramatic statewide increase in black registration found in some states, such as Mississippi, where black registration was previously much lower than in North Carolina. Instead, there has been a convergence of black and white rates that reflects slow and steady growth of black registration and a slight decline in that of whites. The fraction of the electorate that was black grew from 18 to almost 27 percent in covered counties between 1966 and 1988, while the fraction grew from 12 to 15 in the uncovered counties in the same period. As of 1990 the statewide proportion of eligible blacks registered (63 percent) approached that for whites (69 percent), while 47 percent of the Native American population was registered.

The Effect of Section 5 on Election Laws

Section 5 demands that proposed electoral changes in covered jurisdictions be precleared—submitted for approval to the U.S. Attorney General or to the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia. Such changes include "any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting." According to Thernstrom, preclearance had originally a very limited aim, "guarding against renewed disfranchisement, the use of the back door once the front door was blocked,"[37] although, according to the Civil Rights Commission, "Congress intended to include a very broad range of subjects under section 5."[38]

There has been a variety of efforts in covered states to dilute the impact of the newly enfranchised black electorate by, for example, redrawing district lines or shifting from single-member districts to at-large elections. Some of the most flagrant of these efforts were in Mississippi.[39] In Allen v. State Board of Elections (1969),[40] the Supreme Court held that section 5 preclearance applied to such changes. Speaking for the Court, Chief Justice Warren said that the Voting Rights Act "was aimed at the subtle, as well as the obvious, state regulations which would have the effect of denying citizens their right to vote because of race."[41]

In response to the act's unprecedented challenge to prevailing practice, North Carolina quickly employed some of the strategies used by Deep South states to dilute the emerging black vote. The general assembly relinquished its central powers and authorized some localities to alter their election procedures. In a 1966 special session, the legislature authorized forty-nine boards of county commissioners that had had some form of election or residency requirements by districts to adopt an at-large election system. Twelve counties took immediate steps: six converted to at-large elections, and six changed the boundaries of their wards. The state also shifted from past practice and required at-large election of all school boards.

The North Carolina government's extensive revisions of election law took place under the purview of the Voting Rights Act and the preclearance requirements of section 5, but very few changes were submitted for review and none was objected to before 1971. Of the 88 changes in election law proposed between 1965 and 1971, only 12 were submitted, and all 12 were approved. In 1971 the Justice Department interceded in 6 cases to block the continued application of the literacy test, and it ruled on a few at-large election schemes, annexations, and the procedure for voting for multimember house and senate seats. According to Suitts's 1981 tabulation, there were 193 legislative acts passed by the general assembly between 1965 and 1979 affecting local electoral schemes in the forty covered counties. Of these, only about 20 percent were submitted for review under section 5.[42] Subsequently the number of such acts has risen, and, according to Justice Department data that do not entirely agree with Suitts's figures, a total of 4,416 changes were submitted from North Carolina between 1970 and 1987. According to the same data, 107 objections were interposed in the same period.[43] (Some apparent discrepancies between the tabulations may be due to the fact that Suitts's unit of analysis was individual laws, each of which may have included multiple changes in voting procedures.)

Although Suitts acknowledged some margin of error in his figures, he argued that "the overwhelming majority of legislative changes has not been submitted for review and does not comply with the law. . . . A benign explanation for these nonsubmissions has not been readily apparent."[44] He contended that North Carolina's failure to submit changes could not be attributed to ignorance of the act's requirements. The fact that some submissions have been made for each of the covered counties indicates that officials have made selective judgments about what needed to be submitted for review.

While North Carolina lawmakers were not eager to change the racial complexion of state politics, they may not have been as conspiratorial as Suitts implied. Given a Justice Department that did not vigorously act on its own interpretations, it was up to states and localities to initiate the process of preclearance. North Carolina had to wait along with the rest of the South for the language of the Voting Rights Act to be interpreted in the series of precedent-setting lawsuits of the late 1960s and 1970s—particularly Allen—over what kinds of legislative changes required preclearance. The increase in submissions in the 1980s suggests that Gingles helped to further clarify what issues were subject to preclearance. North Carolina has the added confusion of having only forty of its one hundred counties covered by the federal mandate. Decisions regarding election law and the Voting Rights Act have thus rested with forty different elections boards and county attorneys, who have little or no supervision from the legislature or the state board of elections.

The Election of Blacks to Public Office

The remainder of this chapter assesses the consequences of the Voting Rights Act on the election of blacks to public office. This is, of course, only one of the consequences that might be investigated. There are many kinds of public policy results to be expected from the effective enfranchisement of the black population.[45] The election of blacks is by far the most easily measured—the main reason it is the focus of our attention. In effect, we are investigating in this section the effect of the Voting Rights Act on descriptive representation (based on race) rather than on substantive representation (based on interests and preferences). As Swain documents and explains, the relationship between descriptive and substantive representation of African Americans is far from simple. Fortunately, the election of blacks to public office is not the only way to assure that black interests are considered in public life.[46]

As the unique experience of the urban Piedmont showed and the subsequent history of the state in the wake of the Voting Rights Act continues to illustrate, white voters have not uniformly refused to vote for black candidates. Furthermore, a black electorate has often supported and at times provided the margin of victory for sympathetic white candidates.

As of 1990 there were 453 black elected officials in North Carolina serving in a variety of state, county, and municipal posts.[47] At each level of government the act's effect on black voting strength, districting arrangements, minority officeholding, and the relationship between minority candidates and white voters is different.

Statewide Executive and Congressional Office

Before the 1992 election, no blacks had been elected to statewide executive office or to Congress, though a few had run. Reginald Hawkins ran for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination in 1968 and 1972. He came in third both times, with 18.5 and 8 percent of the votes cast in the first primary, respectively. In 1976, Howard Lee, a black former mayor of majority-white Chapel Hill, narrowly led in the first primary for the Democratic nomination for lieutenant governor. But Jimmy Green (a white who had received 27.35 percent to Lee's 27.71) defeated Lee in the runoff by 56 to 44 percent. In 1977 Lee was appointed head of the state Department of Environment, Health and Natural Resources, a post he held for over four years. In February 1990 he was appointed to fill a vacancy in the state senate, and was elected to that post later in that year.

Lee's experience, along with that of some blacks running for congressional offices discussed below, contributed to a belief that runoffs reduced the chances for blacks to win nomination and election to public offices that they might otherwise win. In response to pressures from the black community, the state law was changed in 1989 to provide that a runoff be held only if the leading candidate in the first primary received less than 40 percent of the vote.

In 1990, Harvey Gantt, a black former mayor of majority-white Charlotte, sought the Democratic nomination for the United States Senate, and won the first primary with 37.51 percent, which was short of the new threshhold. Even though a second primary was called, forcing a two-person race between a white and a black, Gantt was able to win the nomination with almost 57 percent, showing that in a Democratic primary, a runoff provision does not necessarily disadvantage a black candidate in a majority-white electorate. In a race that commanded international attention, Gantt received 47 percent of the general election vote against three-term incumbent Jesse Helms, even though Gantt had led in some polls taken before the final week of the campaign. As the figures below indicate, Gantt's losing margin was similar to that of the three white candidates who had lost to Helms in earlier senate races, even though Helms introduced racial appeals in the campaign. (The main example was a television advertisement suggesting that white workers would lose jobs if the congressional civil rights bill supported by Gantt were to pass.)

1972	Helms	54%	Galifianakis	46%
1978	Helms	55%	Ingram	45%
1984	Helms	52%	Hunt	48%
1990	Helms	53%	Gantt	47%

Black candidates ran strong races to be the Democratic nominee for Congress in the Second District—38 percent black in 1980—but none won. In 1972, Howard Lee ran unsuccessfully against incumbent L. H. Fountain, who was first elected in 1952. In 1982, the year in which Fountain retired, H. M. "Mickey" Michaux ran first with 44 percent in the first primary to 33 percent for I. T. "Tim" Valentine. Valentine subsequently won the second primary with 54 percent and then won the general election; he has held the seat since that time. This election inspired much of the effort to create the threshold change for avoiding a second primary.[48] Valentine was challenged in the Democratic primary in 1984 by Kenneth Spaulding, a black, who lost with 48 percent.

Statewide Judicial Office

More than a dozen blacks have been elected to statewide judicial office. In the state judicial system, overhauled in the mid-1960s, there are three tiers that involve statewide election: the supreme court, the court of appeals, and the superior court.

Elections to all three are partisan. Vacancies are filled by gubernatorial appointments, which last until the next general election, at which time the seat is filled for the remainder of the original term.[49]

The supreme court has seven judges elected to eight-year terms. One of these judges, Henry Frye, is black. Justice Frye was appointed to fill a vacancy in 1983, elected in 1984, and reelected to a full term in 1988 The court of appeals has twelve judges elected for eight-year terms. Of these twelve seats, one has been occupied by black judges since 1978, and another since 1982. Blacks first came to these seats by appointment, but they have won five different statewide elections for the two seats. The only black to lose was a Republican appointee who lost to a black Democrat in the general election.

One seat on the court of appeals has been occupied continuously since 1982 by Judge Clifton E. Johnson, who was first appointed and then elected in that year, and reelected in 1990. The other seat has had four black occupants since 1978, when Judge Richard Erwin was appointed and subsequently elected. He resigned in 1980, and was replaced in 1981 by Judge Charles L. Becton, who was elected in 1984 and resigned in 1990. He was replaced by Judge Allison Duncan, a Republican, who was defeated for reelection by Judge James A. Wynn, Jr., another black, in that same year. Other than Judge Duncan, all were Democrats.

The trial level of the statewide judicial system is called the superior court. These judges are nominated in partisan primaries in electoral districts, but they are elected in statewide partisan elections for eight-year terms. The question whether to elect trial court judges from districts or statewide has been a serious and persistent one in North Carolina since Reconstruction. In 1868 the Republican-dominated constitutional convention first created a system of popularly elected superior court judges. The convention mandated that the elections be held in districts in order to ensure that Republican strength, which was concentrated in pockets across the state, would be protected. In 1875, after regaining control of the legislature, the Democrats amended the state constitution to shift to statewide election of superior court judges. This change was intended to increase Democratic power across the state, dilute the Republican strongholds, and prevent the election of black judges. Statewide election of superior court judges remained in place until it was amended by a 1987 lawsuit inspired by the Voting Rights Act.

The number of superior court judges is set by the general assembly. Before 1987, there were sixty-four "regular" judges, supplemented by from two to eight "special" judgeships. The special judgeships were created by the general assembly and the judges were appointed by the governor for four-year terms. Between 1900 and 1986, two blacks had served as "regular" superior court judges. One was Clifton Johnson, mentioned above, who was elected in 1978 and subsequently elevated to the court of appeals in 1982. The other was Terry Sherrill, who resigned in 1990 after he was convicted for cocaine possession. The special judgeships had been an important vehicle for the appointment of blacks in the 1960s and 1970s, but few became regular judges.[50] to several lawsuits filed under the Voting Rights Act. The first suit, Haith v. Martin,[51] decided in 1985, determined that the state had failed to submit for preclearance several acts regarding judicial election passed in the 1960s and 1970s. After subsequent submission, the Department of Justice rejected features involving numbered seats and staggered terms, both of which can sometimes operate to dilute black votes through frustrating the black strategy of single-shot voting.

The system of selecting superior court judges was changed in 1987 in response

The state changed the law in response to the numbered seat issue, but was challenging the decision on staggered terms when another suit was filed under amended section 2. Alexander v. Martin[52] challenged the use of staggered terms, large multijudge districts for primaries, and statewide general elections. The remedies under section 2 could be much broader than simply rejection of the proposed changes, as provided by the preclearance features of section 5, and the state responded to the suit by changing the law before a judgment was issued.

The new law was introduced by a black representative from Durham, and after it passed in 1987,[53] the relevant litigation was dropped. The legislation created nine new judgeships and eliminated the special judges. It subdivided six former single-county, multijudge districts into multiple districts providing for several safe black seats, and it eliminated staggered terms in these counties.[54] The law also split ten multicounty, multijudge districts into twenty single-judge districts, of which two had majorities of black or other minority groups.[55] Subsequently, eleven black judges and one Native American were elected to superior court. Two of the black judges were elected from seats that were not created especially to elect blacks.[56]

The experience with judgeships shows that it is possible for blacks to be elected statewide in North Carolina, a state with a black population of 22 percent. All of the elections have come after passage of the Voting Rights Act. Most of them have been a direct result of litigation under the 1982 amendments to the act, and have been based on nominations from districts designed to generate black nominees. Still, several elections, especially those to the supreme court and the court of appeals, demonstrate the possibility that blacks can win open statewide election under more normal circumstances. The general rule seems to have been for black judges to run for reelection as incumbents after initially gaining the office by appointment. Since judicial elections did not in the past involve much campaigning, they were not very visible. This fact as well surely helped blacks to win these statewide elections. However, this advantage for blacks may not last because partisan competition and open campaigning for judicial office have increased steadily in recent years.[57]

The General Assembly

Black representation in the state legislature increased substantially after 1968, when the first black in this century was elected to the house (see table 6.10). The number rose by 1990 to 5 blacks among 50 senators, and to 13 blacks among 120 house members. The largest jump was from 3 to 11 black members of the house after the 1982 election. There was also one Native American, representing Robeson County. The post-1982 changes followed the 1982 filing of Gingles v. Edmisten,[58] which was to become on the national level one of the most important cases implementing the Voting Rights Act, but change in North Carolina came before the decision was handed down.

The suit challenged the 1981 redistricting of general assembly seats and the provision of the North Carolina constitution that counties not be divided in creating election districts. The suit contended that the constitutional provision had been in use since 1967, without having been precleared as required by section 5. After the suit was filed, the state did submit the questioned practices, and both the constitutional provision and the 1981 districting plan were denied preclearance.

The general assembly responded to the objections by enacting a new redistricting plan that contained five majority-black house districts and one majority-black senate district. As indicated, the result was an increase of eight black house members, although no additional blacks were elected to the senate until 1984. The Gingles decision, which was handed down by the district court in 1984 (after the 1982 amendents to the Voting Rights Act became law), rejected the redistricting plan that had been adopted after the suit was brought. In a special session in 1984, the legislature adopted single-member districts in lieu of several former multimember districts, and postponed the primary elections until the new districts could be drawn. The increases that followed the Gingles decision were modest in the house (from eleven to thirteen by 1985), but more dramatic in the senate (from one to four by 1989).

The relationship between the act, the Gingles case, and increases in the number of blacks in the legislature is complicated While the biggest changes came before the suit was resolved, it would be difficult and unreasonable to deny that they came in response to the filing of the suit. The mere existence of the act was not enough to bring very substantial changes in the election of blacks to the legislature. Private litigation under the act was necessary to get officials to request preclearance as required by section 5. Yet, the initiation of litigation was able to produce substantial changes even before a decision was issued. The court itself acknowledged the claim that the election of additional blacks in 1982 was a special case: "In some elections the pendancy of this very litigation worked a one-time advantage for black candidates in the form of unusual organized political support by white leaders concerned to forestall single-member districting."[59] Clearly the threat of litigation under the act is capable of generating changes even before a verdict. North Carolina legislators were doubtless mindful of the Gingles experience as they carried out the 1991 redistricting process.

Blacks have achieved an important presence in the general assembly in terms of policy impact and leadership positions.[60] Shortly after Harvey Gantt lost the 1990 election, which, had he won, would have made him the first black U.S. senator from the South since Reconstruction, Daniel T. Blue achieved a different historic first. A five-term (ten-year) member of the house, Blue was chosen speaker of that body. This choice of the Democratic house caucus made him the first black state house speaker in modern southern history.[61] remain to be seen. The results of the 1990 census have already begun another round of high-stakes redistricting for seats in Congress and in the state house and senate, perhaps the most significant redistricting since passage of the act. While largely beyond the scope of this essay, a more recently recognized and unanticipated effect of the shift to single-member legislative districts in southern states like North Carolina has been to narrow the reach of the black electorate by excluding blacks from larger multimember districts. This in turn has made some Democratic incumbents more vulnerable to Republican challengers. Some formerly heterogeneous multimember districts like Wake County (from which Representative Blue had been elected prior to the 1984 shift) have, in essence, been split into black Democratic, white Democratic, white Republican, and rural and urban districts.

The more long-term effects of the Voting Rights Act on the general assembly

County Commissions

We consider next the relationship between districting arrangements and the election of black and Native American officials in county governments. We begin with counties and follow with cities because counties are more comprehensive administrative units. Every citizen lives in one of these jurisdictions, while not every citizen is included in cities. While we concentrate on county commissions, blacks served in several other county-level offices as of 1990. In addition to the forty-four black county commissioners (roughly 5 percent of the total membership on county boards), there were sixty-four black members of county boards of education and four black sheriffs. Native American officeholding at the county level was limited to three members of Robeson County's seven-member commission and two members of the county board of education, all of whom were elected at large.

The series of tables comparing districting arrangements, minority population, and minority officeholding of counties are designated with an A, while those tables without an A refer to cities.[62] Table 6.1A shows that in 1989, nine out of ten counties had at-large systems for election of county commissioners. Among these counties, there was a positive relationship between the size of the black population in the county and the percentage of commissioners who were black, though at most a quarter of the commissioners were black, even in the eight majority-black counties. The fraction of officials who were minority was consistently less than the minority fraction of the population.

Only four counties had pure district systems. Curiously, none of them was one of the eight counties in which minorities were a majority of the population. The fact that blacks were so underrepresented in majority-black counties retaining at-large schemes would seem to indicate a situation ripe for change in districting arrangements. In the handful of counties with district elections, there was a much more nearly proportionate relationship between the black percentage in the electorate and on the county commission than in the at-large counties in the same population categories. The four counties with mixed systems fell in between.

Table 6.2A, containing longitudinal data, shows that there were small increases in black elected officials between 1973 and 1989 even in majority-white counties with unchanged electoral systems. This indicates that there were other changes besides electoral arrangements during the sixteen years covered by the table. We should keep in mind that the effects of these nonelectoral changes were also likely to to felt, to some degree, in the counties where the electoral arrangements were changed. Thus, not all changes in black officeholding in these locales can be attributed to the creation of districts. On the other hand, to the extent that the electoral changes were the result of preclearance objections or lawsuits, the counties in which these took place may have been especially resistant to black officeholding.

Still, there is clear evidence that electoral arrangements made a difference. In the three counties that changed from at-large to single-member status between 1973 and 1989, and in the four that changed from at-large to mixed systems, all of the black elected officials were elected after the change. Table 6.3A allows an assessment of the consequences of the electoral arrangements on minority officeholding in counties with mixed plans. In the four counties with both district and at-large components, most of the black commissioners were elected from the districts rather than from the entire county.

Two measures of representational equity are reported in tables 6.4A and 6.5A. One measures the difference between the minority percentage in the county population and on the commission, while the other measures the ratio of the same percentages. Blacks and Native Americans were consistently underrepresented on county commissions regardless of districting arrangements and time. Nevertheless, the equity measures confirm the observations of tables 6.1A and 6.2A that in majority-white counties single-member districts were the most proportionately representative system, followed by mixed systems. At-large plans were the least proportional. Comparing the equity ratios across time, as table 6.5A does, one can also see that while the ratios in the unchanged counties increased slightly, much more substantial increases occurred after the adoption of some form of district election.

Tables 6.6A and 6.7A allow a more detailed analysis of the influence of district elections in North Carolina counties. The tables compare percentages of minority populations with those of minority elected officials in each of the fifteen wards composing the four counties with single-member district plans. Within these few districts it appears that minorities needed a substantial majority (over 60 percent) before they could be assured of electing their own or of controlling county boards with people of their own ethnic group. (None of the three Native American counties employed district elections.)

City Councils

We now consider the relationship between districting arrangements and the election of black and Native American officials in North Carolina cities. The picture in many ways parallels that presented above for counties. There were 260 black city council members (around 10 percent of the total), 18 black mayors, and 19 black members of city school boards governing North Carolina cities, towns, and villages.

As table 6.1 shows, over 90 percent of city councils were elected at large, and in them the fraction of minority elected officials was minuscule, even in majority-black municipalities. As with counties, there was a very small number of cities with mixed or single-member district arrangements. These were the cities in which the percentage of minority council members approximated the minority percentage of the population.

Over time there have been dramatic increases in the fraction of black elected officials in most of the groups of cities with changed arrangements, regardless of the system adopted. As table 6.2 shows, in the great majority of cities there was no change in electoral arrangements, and in such cities there was much less of an increase in the proportions of minority officials than there was in the changed cities. Even in the 144 majority-black cities, the jump in black officeholding between 1973 and 1989 was many times higher in the changed as compared with the static at-large plans.

There was an important difference between city and county patterns that is not shown in the tables. For both counties and cities, some at-large jurisdictions had district residence or nomination requirements. Counties with these arrangements, like pure at-large systems, elected very few blacks. In the cities, however, this system did almost as well as single-member districts in producing minority officials. We speculate that this is because minority residential concentration was greater in cities than in counties. When a district is largely black, a candidate who must be a resident or nominated by residents is likely to be black. Under such circumstances, district residence or nomination with at-large election can approach the success possible in single-member districts in securing the election of blacks. We suspect that these conditions of black residential concentration in districts are more likely to exist in cities than in more sparsely populated counties.

In cities with mixed plans (table 6.3), districts produced substantially larger numbers of blacks than did the at-large system. This is not surprising, though it is an even more dramatic pattern than that found in the mixed systems in the counties. Of the fifteen black council members from the fourteen cities with mixed plans, only one was elected at large. Here too, we suspect that the districting arrangements paralleled segregated residential patterns in the cities more than in the counties. That is, we expect more black-dominated districts in cities than in counties, and therefore even more blacks are likely to be elected from districts under these circumstances. A comparison between counties and cities of the numbers of districts in each population category (tables 6.6A and 6.6) bears out this expectation.

In single-member districts in the counties, 27 percent of the districts had majorities composed of minority groups, while roughly 42 percent of such districts in the cities are dominated by minorities. Ironically, residential segregation of the races is important for allowing single-member districts to facilitate the election of blacks. In the absence of such segregation, single-member districts are far less effective in doing so. These points are illustrated by a Granville County case discussed below.

The equity scores for the changed cities (tables 6.4 and 6.5) were substantially higher than they were in the counties, but differences in scores among the three types of electoral systems were similar to those in the counties. In no case were minorities better represented than whites, but mean equity ratios in majority-white cities ranged between 0.82 and 0.98 for blacks and Native Americans combined in single-member district and mixed systems. In none of the at-large cities did the ratio rise above 0.14.

Tables 6.6 and 6.7 allow a more detailed analysis of the influence of district election in North Carolina cities. In contrast to the counties analyzed above, it was possible to elect blacks in city single-member districts where blacks were only a minority of the electorate. Not surprisingly, even larger proportions of council members were black in black-majority districts.

The fact that most North Carolina Native Americans lived in a cluster of towns retaining at-large plans makes it difficult to discuss multiethnic voting within district systems. We can, however, take a closer look at the towns in Robeson County, where the Native American population was concentrated. (All but the county seat of Lumberton operated without district elections.) The voter registration rates for blacks and Native Americans in these towns were both very high. Assuming that Native Americans, blacks, and whites have comparable opportunities to vote, Native Americans were more seriously underrepresented than blacks on the local boards.

The Role of Litigation

As indicated in tables 6.8 and 6.8A, most of the changes from at-large to single-member district or mixed systems in North Carolina counties and cities involved litigation or the threat thereof under section 2 as amended in 1982. Of the forty-nine (fifty-four) changes in county and city electoral systems that took place between 1973 and 1989 (1965 and 1991), twenty-nine (thirty-two) were induced by lawsuits and two (two) by threatened suits. Very few resulted from section 5 preclearance objections. Out of the thirty-four changes induced between 1965 and 1991 by real or threatened legal action, twenty-one occurred in covered jurisdictions, while five counties and eight cities not originally covered under section 5 were successfully sued under amended section 2.

There were very few suits on the county or city level before Gingles, and only five suits were filed while that case was pending in district court. Soon after Gingles was decided, however, the plaintiffs in a suit against Halifax County won a favorable decision.[63] In response to these decisions, at least thirty lawsuits were filed in the state pursuant to the Voting Rights Act, and at least five more controversies were resolved before filing by the threat of litigation. The use of at-large elections was challenged for at least twelve cities or towns, twenty counties, and seven boards of education. The majority of these suits were sponsored by the NAACP or the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund. North Carolina's voting rights case law has been constructed largely by a group of committed black and white attorneys: Leslie Winner, Romallus Murphy, Ronald Penny, Angus Thompson, and a few others.

The results of the litigation have been basically favorable to the plaintiffs, resulting about half the time in a negotiated agreement regarding the use of some districts and some at-large seats before the case was even brought to trial. In only two lawsuits were plaintiffs offered no relief.[64] Of the county and city government controversies that have been resolved by the courts, thirteen resulted in pure district systems and nineteen in mixed ones. Four resulted in either limited voting or a combination of districts and limited voting, and two resulted in the elimination of the residency requirement that had been used in conjunction with at-large elections. In several jurisdictions, such as Guilford, Wilson, Halifax, and Pasquotank counties, and in Elizabeth City, High Point, and Lexington, litigation was associated with the creation of majority-black districts from which blacks were elected.[65]

A limit on the possibility of using the Voting Rights Act to secure the representation of blacks has been defined in Granville County.[66] This county was 43 percent black, but a maximum of two of seven districts could be drawn with a black majority. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit overturned a district court decision that had mandated a limited voting system. Specifically, the district judge had provided for election of four and three seats at a time for staggered terms, but with each voter allowed only two votes per election. This was seen as a way to allow blacks to control more seats in a county where their substantial numbers were too dispersed to elect commissioners in proportion to their numerical strength. The argument was rejected by the higher court.[67]

Granville County had not contested the fact that the original at-large system was discriminatory, and the plaintiffs had agreed that the county's new plan for seven single-member districts was drawn as well as could be expected, but they still pushed for a limited voting scheme as an alternative. The appellate court rejected the district judge's decision to dismiss the county's plan as an overtly political ruling that substituted the judge's wisdom for the county's preference.

The influence of the Voting Rights Act has also been felt on the remaining twenty-five county commissions and city councils that appear to have shifted from at-large systems "voluntarily," that is, without the impetus of a lawsuit or threatened litigation. We suspect that the fear of possible litigation, especially in the post-Gingles environment, was enough to convince moderate white politicians who may have been wavering to undertake reform. Tables 6.8A and 6.8 reveal that all five of the counties and nine of the fifteen cities which shifted on their own (i.e., without a lawsuit filed) to single-member or mixed plans were subject to the direct scrutiny of the Justice Department under section 5. In retrospect, the fact that plaintiffs have tended to seek relief under section 2 does not diminish the perceived power of section 5 with its specific coverage. The minority population of the counties and cities that changed voluntarily is also, on average, about 9 percentage points higher than the minority population in the counties and cities undergoing legal action. While not a startling difference, the political incentives of a larger black population may have made the extra push of a lawsuit unnecessary.

A comparison of tables 6.8A and 6.8 also reveals that litigation inspired by the act appears to have been much more instrumental in altering county systems than municipal bodies. About three-fourths of the changes in county government were the result of lawsuits, while fewer than half of the new city systems had their genesis in court. While the voluntary counties were not geographically clustered, many of the cities that implemented changes on their own were large (over 25,000) and were located in the Piedmont region of the state (for example, Winston-Salem, Tarboro, Wilson, Raleigh, Cary, Charlotte, Greensboro, and Fayetteville). These facts bear out a general pattern in which the racial politics of the urban Piedmont has been relatively more progressive than in the rest of North Carolina.

The Granville case may be an important indicator for the future of litigation under the Voting Rights Act concerning methods of election in North Carolina. Specifically, the appellate ruling established the precedent for balancing plaintiffs' desires with the ability of local governments to comply within the bounds of reason and fairness. More generally, the case suggests that after the first wave of suits following Gingles, which aimed at some of the most obvious county and city targets, future legal battles will more likely occur in locales where there are not simple remedies for an underrepresentation of blacks in elective office. On the other hand, the evidence from tables 6.5 and 6.5A, in particular, on majority-black jurisdictions with at-large systems suggests that there are still many locales awaiting basic reform.

Conclusion

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 has had a substantial impact in North Carolina. It capped the sixty-five-year struggle of black Tar Heels to rebuild the political community destroyed by disfranchisement and opened up an entirely new realm of possibilities. Most immediately, the act facilitated substantial increases in black voter registration in the covered counties. On the other hand, the preclearance provisions were largely ignored by the state and the Justice Department until the 1970s. It took litigation to change this. The most notable cases targeted the judicial system and the state legislature, and the response was substantial.

The possibility of minority voters suing to demand preclearance obviously made a difference in the behavior of white officials. State resistance was not substantial in the case of the judicial system, and the state's resolution of the problem led to the withdrawal of the lawsuit. For the legislative changes, the state did not give up its resistance until Gingles was resolved. The 1982 amendments to section 2 have surely made a difference in North Carolina by calling attention to the possibility of the use of the act to block some changes and to secure others. The changes in the judicial election system show that substantial "voluntary" compliance may occur when litigation becomes a real option.

Recently, political and legal energies have been focused on North Carolina counties and cities, for it is in these jurisdictions that the act has opened up both the greatest opportunities and challenges for black electoral equality. Litigation inspired by the act has led to the adoption of districting arrangements that, in turn, have led to much more nearly proportional representation for blacks. For a variety of reasons, however, an overwhelming number of cities and counties have retained at-large elections, and blacks and Native Americans continue to be underrepresented on local boards, even when they are a majority of the population.

The North Carolina experience, however, raises questions about the common presumption that blacks cannot be elected in majority-white districts. On the statewide level, Harvey Gantt came as close to winning a U.S. Senate seat as had three previous white opponents of Senator Helms. Although nine of the judges elected statewide are products of a nominating system that is designed to assure the choice of a black, the fact remains that there are fourteen black judges elected statewide, and five of these are not products of such engineering. In 1991 five black members of the state house of representatives (including Representative Michaux) and the one Native American member were elected from majority-white multimember districts. The remaining eight black house members came from majority-black single-member districts. In the state senate Howard Lee and one other black senator served majority-white multimember districts. The other three black senators were elected from majority-black single-member districts.

There have also been important local examples of blacks being elected in majority-white districts. Howard Lee's election as mayor of Chapel Hill in 1969 (then about 13 percent black) was the first modern election of a black to such a position in a predominantly white community in the South. Harvey Gantt in 1983 was elected mayor of Charlotte, the state's largest city, which was then about 31 percent black. At this writing, the sheriff and the register of deeds of Wake County, the site of the state capital, are black, as is the district attorney for Orange and Chatham counties. However, as our discussion of local elections makes clear, blacks, whatever the election system, are still not elected to county boards and city councils to a degree that approaches their fraction of the population. This is particularly true in at-large jurisdictions.

North Carolina's progressive image has surely exaggerated the nature of the reality, as many of the observations in this essay make clear. It is true that the victories of Justice Frye, Speaker Blue, Representative Michaux, Senator Lee, Mayor Gantt, Sheriff Baker, and numerous other minority candidates prove that North Carolina whites are not consistently unwilling to support blacks for public office. But it cannot be ignored that in voting rights as in school desegregation, the state has also resisted movements toward racial equality and fairness. Many of the changes regarding voting rights issues would not have been made without the reality or the threat of litigation.

The Voting Rights Act has clearly reshaped North Carolina politics, both in increasing black participation and in securing procedural arrangements that facilitate the possibility of electing blacks to public office. North Carolina's experience a quarter century after passage of the act suggests both the importance of the federal mandate and the uniqueness of the state within the region. It is also clear that there are many perplexing issues regarding voting rights and political equality still to be faced.

TABLE 6.1
Minority Representation on Council in 1989 by Election Plan, North Carolina Cities with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Minority in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Minority in City Population, 1980			Mean % Minority on City Council, 1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
SMD plan
10–29.9	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
30–49.9	9	39.8	0.2	39.9	39.3	0.0	39.3
50–100	4	47.2	8.8	56.0	44.0	2.8[a]	46.8
Mixed plan
10–29.9	5	22.0	0.2	22.2	18.2	0.0	18.2
30–49.9	8	32.7	0.4	33.1	31.8	0.0	31.8
50–100	1	76.4	0.1	76.3	40.0	0.0	40.0
At-large plan[b]
10–29.9	346	18.8	0.4	19.2	2.7	0.0	2.7
30–49.9	216[c]	38.2	1.0	39.2	5.3	0.0	5.3
50–100	140	56.5	9.0	65.5	8.5	0.7[d]	9.2

Note: In tables 6.1–6.7A, the "Black + Indian" percentages are not the summed row values of blacks and Indians. Rather, these percentages are derived from the raw data.

[a] Lumberton had one Native American on its nine-member board in addition to three blacks

[b] The at-large cells include nineteen cities that were "other" systems, i.e., systems that had a residence requirement and/or nomination requirement.

[c] Durham had six members elected at large and six elected at large to wards. There were seven blacks on the board.

[d] Pembroke's board was 100 percent Native American. It was the only city other than Lumberton with Native Americans on the city governing body.

TABLE 6.1A
Minority Representation on Commissioners Court in 1989 by Election Plan, North Carolina Counties of 10 Percent or More Black and Indian Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Minority in County Population, 1980	N	Mean % Minority in County Population, 1980			Mean % Minority on County Commission, 1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
SMD plan
10–29.9	1	25.0	0.4	25.4	14.3	0.0	14.3
30–49.9	3	37.5	0.1	37.6	30.5	0.0	30.5
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
Mixed plan
10–29.9	1	26.5	0.3	26.8	14.3	0.0	14.3
30–49.9	3	38.6	0.8	39.4	12.2	0.0	12.2
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
At-large plan[a]
10–29.9	29	17.9	11.5	29.4	5.8	0.0	5.8
30–49.9	26	37.8	0.6	38.4	5.2	0.0	5.2
50–100	8	50.8	6.6	57.4	25.0	5.4[b]	30.4

[a] The at-large category includes thirty-four counties with "other" types of at-large systems, i.e., those combining at-large election with district residency and/or nomination requirements. Twelve of these had a 10–29.9 percent minority population, and about 6 percent of their board membership was minority. Sixteen had a 30–49.9 percent minority population, and just over 3 percent of their commissioners were minority. Six of these counties were majority black, and their boards were 20 percent minority.

[b] Robeson County had three Native Americans on its seven-member county commission, in addition to four whites. The population of the county was 35 percent Native American and 25 percent black. The commissioners were nominated by district but elected at large. Robeson was the only county with Native Americans on its governing body.

TABLE 6.2
Changes in Minority Representation on Council between 1973 and 1989, North Carolina Cities with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980[a]

Type of Change by % Minority in City Population, 1980	N[b]	Mean % Minority in City Population, 1980			Mean % Minority on City Council
					Before Change (1973)			After Change (1989)
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	0	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
30–49.9	6	40.7	0.2	40.9	5.2	0.0	5.2	36.0	0.0	36.0
50–100	3	54.9	0.0	54.9	5.6	0.0	5.6	47.6	0.0	47.6
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	5	22.0	0.3	22.2	8.3	0.0	8.3	18.2	0.0	18.2[c]
30–49.9	7	33.2	0.5	33.7	11.2	0.0	11.2	32.3	0.0	32.3
50–100	1	76.3	0.1	76.4	0.0	0.0	0.0	40.0	0.0	40.0
Unchanged Systems
At-large
10–29.9	346	18.8	0.4	19.2	0.8	0.0	0.8	2.7	0.0	2.7
30–49.9	216	38.2	1.0	39.2	1.2	0.0	1.2	5.3	0.0	5.3
50–100	140	56.5	9.0	65.5	1.9	0.0	1.9	8.5	0.7	9.2

[a]The cells in this table submerge in the general at-large categories the cities in the "other" category of at-large election and district residency and/or nomination requirements. Four cities shifted from simple at-large to "other" at large, and two with majority-black populations went from having 0 to 60 percent minority membership on their city boards. Four cities shifted from "other" to single-member districts. Two had a 30–49.9 percent minority population and one was majority-black. In all three, the percentage of minority officials on city boards rose from between 0 and 0.35 percent to almost 43 percent. Three cities shifted from "other" to mixed systems. In the two cities 30–49.9 percent minority, the percentage of minority officials rose from 8.35 to 41.7 percent. Fifteen cities retained their "other" systems through 1989 and so remained "unchanged," but the percentage of minority officials rose. Twelve of these cities had a 10–29.9 percent minority population, and the percentage of minority officials increased from 5.4 to 13.1 percent. Two cities had a 30–49.9 percent minority population, and their percentage of minority officials jumped from 8.4 to 37.5 percent. In the one majority-black city that retained its "other" system, the percentage of minority officials stayed at 20 percent.

[b]Five cities are excluded from this table because shifts from at-large systems occurred before 1973. The five are composed of one mixed system and four single-member districts. The cities are Tarboro, Winston-Salem, Raleigh, Plymouth, and Lumberton.

[c]This picture is somewhat distorted by lumping the "other" at-large and the simple at-large categories together. The two pure at-large cities in this cell went from 0 to 16.7 percent minority officials when they changed from at-large to mixed. The one "other" at-large city lost minority representation (16.7 to 0 percent) when it shifted from "other" at-large to mixed.

TABLE 6.2A
Changes in Minority Representation on Commissioners Court between 1973 and 1989, North Carolina Cities with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980[a]

Type of Change by % Minority in County Population, 1980	N[b]	Mean % Minority in County Population, 1980			Mean % Minority on County Commission
					Before Change (1973)			After Change (1989)
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	1	25.0	0.4	25.4	0.0	0.0	0.0	14.3	0.0	14.3
30–49.9	2	34.9	0.1	34.8	0.0	0.0	0.0	35.8	0.0	35.8
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	26.5	0.3	26.8	0.0	0.0	0.0	14.3	0.0	14.3
30–49.9	3	38.6	0.1	38.7	0.0	0.0	0.0	12.2	0.0	12.2
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	29	18.5	1.6	20.1	1.8	0.0	1.8	3.4	0.0	3.4
30–49.9	25	38.8	0.9	39.7	3.2	0.0	3.2	4.7	0.0	4.7
50–100	8	50.8	6.6	57.4	5.0	0.0	5.0	25.0	5.4	30.4

[a]The categories in this table submerge the 32 counties with "other" at-large systems (those with district residency and/or nomination requirements) into the overall at-large category. Four counties (all less than 30 percent minority) shifted from simple at-large to "other" at-large systems but still had no minority representation on their boards. Three counties (all 30–49.9 percent minority) shifted from "other" at-large to mixed systems. The percentage of minority commissioners rose from 0 to 12.2 percent. Twenty-five counties retained their "other" at-large systems. The change in those 25 counties in minority officeholding over time very nearly paralleled that for the unchanged at-large counties without residence or nomination requirements.

[b]Washington and Cherokee counties were excluded because of the 1973 cutoff date. Washington adopted a SMD system before 1973. Cherokee had a SMD system until 1978 and then shifted to an at-large system.

TABLE 6.3
Minority Representation in 1989 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, North Carolina Cities with 10 Percent or More Black and Indian Population in 1980

% Minority in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Minority Councilpersons in District Components, 1989			Mean % Minority Councilpersons in At-Large Components, 1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
10–29.9	5	31.0	0.0	31.0	0.0	0.0	0.0
30–49.9	8	35.9	0.0	35.9	3.1	0.0	3.1
50–100	1	50.0	0.0	50.0	0.0	0.0	0.0

TABLE 6.3A
Minority Representation in 1989 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, North Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Black and Indian Population in 1980

% Minority in County Population, 1980	N	Mean % Minority Commissioners in District Components, 1989			Mean % Minority Commissioners in At-Large Components, 1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
10–29.9	1	25.0	0.0	25.0	0.0	0.0	0.0
30–49.9	3	30.5	0.0	30.5	16.7	0.0	16.7
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—

TABLE 6.4
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Minority on Council in 1989 with Percentage Minority in City Population in 1980, North Carolina Cities with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980[a]

Type of Plan by % Minority in City Population, 1980	N	Difference Measure (% on Council − % in Population)			Ratio Measure (% on Council ÷ % in Population)
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
30–49.9	9	−0.5	−0.1	−0.6	0.98	0.00	0.98
50–100	4	−3.1	−6.0	−9.2	0.93	0.32	0.84
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	5	−3.7	−0.2	−4.0	0.83	0.00	0.82
30–49.9	8	−1.0	−0.4	−1.5	0.97	0.00	0.96
50–100	1	−36.3	−0.1	−36.4	0.52	0.00	0.52
Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	346	−16.1	−0.4	−16.6	0.14	0.00	0.14
30–49.9	216	−32.9	−1.0	−33.9	0.14	0.00	0.13
50–100	140	−48.1	−8.2	−56.3	0.15	0.07	0.14

[a]This table includes five cities not included in tables 6.2 and 6.5, cities that changed prior to 1973.

TABLE 6.4A
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Minority on County Commission in 1989 with Percentage Minority in County Population in 1980, North Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980*

Type of Plan by % Minority in County Population, 1980	N	Difference Measure (% on Commission − % in Population)			Ratio Measure (% on Commission ÷ % in Population)
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	1	−10.7	−0.4	−11.1	0.57	0.00	0.56
30–49.9	3	−7.0	−0.1	−7.1	0.81	0.00	0.81
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	−12.2	−0.3	−12.5	0.54	0.00	0.53
30–49.9	3	−26.4	−0.8	−27.2	0.32	0.00	0.31
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	29	−12.1	−11.5	−23.6	0.32	0.00	0.20
30–49.9	26	−32.6	−0.6	−33.2	0.14	0.00	0.13
50–100	8	−25.8	−1.2	−27.0	0.49	0.83	0.53

*This table includes two counties not included in tables 6.2A and 6.5A, counties that changed prior to 1973.

Camden, a county with a mix of at-large and multimember districts, is treated as having a mixed plan in this table. Mitchell County shifted to at-large elections after 1989.

TABLE 6.5
Changes in Minority Representation on Council between 1973 and 1989, North Carolina Cities with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Minority in City Population, 1980	N	Minority Representational Equity on Council
		1973			1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
30–49.9	6	0.12	0.00	0.12	0.89	0.00	0.89
50–100	3	0.10	0.00	0.10	0.87	0.00	0.87
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	5	0.38	0.00	0.38	0.83	0.00	0.82
30–49.9	7	0.34	0.00	0.33	0.97	0.00	0.96
50–100	1	0.00	0.00	0.00	0.52	0.00	0.52
Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	346	0.04	0.00	0.04	0.14	0.00	0.14
30–49.9	216	0.03	0.00	0.03	0.14	0.00	0.13
50–100	140	0.03	0.00	0.03	0.15	0.07	0.14

TABLE 6.5A
Changes in Minority Representation on Commission between 1973 and 1989, North Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)[a]

Type of Change by % Minority in County Population, 1980	N	Minority Representational Equity on Commission
		1973			1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	1	0.00	0.00	0.00	0.57	0.00	0.56
30–49.9	2	0.00	0.00	0.00	1.03	0.00	1.03
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	0.00	0.00	0.00	0.54	0.00	0.53
30–49.9	3	0.00	0.00	0.00	0.32	0.00	0.31
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	29	0.10	0.00	0.09	0.18	0.00	0.17
30–49.9	25	0.08	0.00	0.08	0.12	0.00	0.12
50–100	8	0.10	0.00	0.09	0.49	0.83	0.53

[a]Mitchell County changed from at-large elections before 1965.

TABLE 6.6
Minority Representation in Council Single-Member Districts in 1989, North Carolina Cities with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980

% Ethnic Population of District	N[a]	Mean % Minority Population in Districts, 1980			Mean % Minority Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Black
0–29.9	30	15.2	1.6	16.8	3.2	0.0	3.2
30–49.9	15	37.3	3.8[b]	41.1	29.4	5.9	35.3
50–59.9	7	55.8	0.2	56.0	100.0	0.0	100.0
60–64.9	2	63.6	0.0	63.6	33.3	0.0	33.3
65–69.9	3	67.8	0.2	68.0	100.0	0.0	100.0
70–100	20	86.3	0.4	86.7	100.0	0.0	100.0
Indian
0–29.9	76	45.1	0.1	45.2	51.1	0.0	51.1
30–49.9	1	34.4	46.6	81.0	0.0	100.0	100.0
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
Black + Indian
0–29.9	29	15.0	1.3	16.3	0.0	0.0	0.0
30–49.9	14	35.6	1.5	37.1	31.3	0.0	31.3
50–59.9	8	55.1	0.3	55.4	100.0	0.0	100.0
60–64.9	2	63.6	0.0	63.6	33.3	0.0	33.3
65–69.9	3	67.8	0.2	68.0	100.0	0.0	100.0
70–100	21	83.8	2.6	86.4	96.6	3.4	100.0

[a]The number of seats does not match the number of districts because some districts elect multiple members. There are 77 districts and 90 seats.

[b]The Indian population percentage in this cell is inflated by one district in the town of Lexington that was 44.6 percent Indian. Excluding this district, the Indian population percentage for the 30–49.9 percent black population range was 1.2 percent.

TABLE 6.6A
Minority Representation in Commission Single-Member Districts in 1989, North Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980

% Ethnic Population of District	N	Mean % Minority Population in Districts, 1980			Mean % Minority Commissioners in Districts, 1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Black
0–29.9	7	12.0	0.2	12.2	0.0	0.0	0.0
30–49.9	4	36.6	0.3	36.9	0.0	0.0	0.0
50–100	4	63.4	0.1	63.5	100.0	0.0	100.0
Indian
0–29.9	15	37.3	0.2	37.5	33.3	0.0	33.3
30–49.9	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
50–100	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
Black + Indian
0–29.9	7	12.0	0.2	12.2	0.0	0.0	0.0
30–49.9	4	36.6	0.3	36.9	0.0	0.0	0.0
50–100	4	63.4	0.1	63.5	100.0	0.0	100.0

TABLE 6.7
Minority Council Representation in Single-Member Districts in 1989, by Ethnic Composition of District, North Carolina Cities with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980

Ethnic Composition of District	N	Mean % Minority Population in Districts, 1980			Mean % Minority Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Black Majority	32	76.5	0.3	76.8	95.2	0.0	95.2
Indian Majority	0[a]	—	—	—	—	—	—
White Majority	43	21.7	1.3	23.0	10.9	0.0	10.9
Black Plurality	1	49.8	0.9	50.7	100.0	0.0	100.0
Indian Plurality	1	34.5	46.6	81.0	0.0	100.0	100.0
White Plurality	0	—	—	—	—	—	—

[a] Native Americans were a plurality of the population in three North Carolina cities and a majority in thirteen, but all sixteen had at-large systems and so are excluded.

TABLE 6.7A
Minority Commission Representation in Single-Member Districts in 1989 by Ethnic Composition of District, North Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980

Ethnic Composition of District[a]	N	Mean % Minority Population in Districts, 1980			Mean % Minority Commissioners in Districts, 1989
		Black	Indian	Black + Indian	Black	Indian	Black + Indian
Black majority	4	63.4	0.1	63.5	100.0	0.0	100.0
Indian majority	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
White majority	11	22.5	0.2	22.7	0.0	0.0	0.0

[a] There were no pluralities in counties.

TABLE 6.8
Cause of Change from At-Large to Mixed or District Plan between 1973 and 1989, North Carolina Cities with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980

City	Year of Change	Covered by Section 5?[a]	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Reason for Change
Changed to Single-Member Districts
Princeville	1977	Yes	No	Ordinance
New Bern	1985	Yes	No	Ordinance
Rocky Mount	1985	Yes	Yes	Settled
Wilson	1986	Yes	No	Ordinance
Elizabeth City	1986	Yes	Yes	Settled[b]
Dunn	1987	Yes	Yes	Consent decree
Freemont	1987	Yes	No	Ordinance, lawsuit threat
Goldsboro	1987	Yes	No	Ordinance
Clinton	1989	No	Yes	Consent decree
Changed to Mixed Plan
Raleigh	1973	No	No	Referendum
Cary	1975	No	No	Ordinance
Charlotte	1977	No	No	Referendum
Greensboro	1983	No	No	Ordinance[c]
Statesville	1985	No	Yes	Consent decree
Fayetteville	1986	No	No	Ordinance
Greenville	1986	Yes	No	Ordinance
Henderson	1986	Yes	No	Ordinance
High Point	1986	Yes	Yes	Consent decree
Lexington	1986	No	Yes	Settled
Enfield	1987	Yes	No	Ordinance, lawsuit threat
Mooresville	1987	No	No	Ordinance
Thomasville	1987	No	Yes	Settled
Albemarle	1988	No	Yes	Settled
Edenton	1989	Yes	No	Ordinance
Benson	1989	No	Yes	Settled
Siler City	1989	No	Yes	Plan adopted after suit filed
Smithfield	1989	No	Yes	Plan adopted after suit filed

SUMMARY (Were changes accompanied by lawsuits?)
Yes 12 (44%)
No 15 (56%)

[a] This column in tables 6.8 and 6.8A is unique to this chapter on North Carolina. It indicates whether the county or city in question is covered by section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. Only 40 of North Carolina's 100 counties—and the towns and cities within—were in 1989 included in the preclearance provisions of section 5.

[b] The laswuit was settled after two injunctions had been granted and after the city's alternative plan had been rejected by the Justice Department.

[c] The city council passed an ordinance to create the plan after it had been defeated in five referendums since 1968. Under the at-large scheme, however, blacks had been elected to the city council and school board in roughly proportionate numbers since the 1950s.

TABLE 6.8A
Cause of Change from At-Large to Mixed or District Plan between 1973 and 1989, North Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Indian Population in 1980

County	Year of Change	Covered by Section 5?[a]	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Reason for Change
Changed to Single-Member Districts
Guilford	1983	Yes	Yes	Settled
Wilson	1985	Yes	Yes	Summary judgment
Vance	1987	Yes	Yes	Settled
Craven	1987	Yes	No	Ordinance
Nash	1988	Yes	Yes	Preliminary injunction, then settled
Pitt	1988	Yes	Yes	Consent decree
Duplin	1989	No	Yes	Consent judgment
Anson	1989	Yes	No	Ordinance
Granville	1989	Yes	Yes	Court-ordered remedy
Harnett	1989	Yes	Yes	Settled
Sampson	1989	No	Yes	Settled
Changed to Mixed Plan
Mecklenburg	1984	Yes	No	Referendum[b]
Halifax	1984	Yes	Yes	Preliminary injunction, then settled
Camden	1986	Yes	No	Ordinance[c]
Pasquotank	1986	Yes	Yes	Settled
Chowan	1987	Yes	No	Ordinance
Bladen	1988	Yes	Yes	Consent judgment
Lenoir	1988	Yes	Yes	Consent decree
Pamlico	1988	No	Yes	Consent decree
Wayne	1988	Yes	Yes	Settled
Caswell	1989	Yes	Yes	Settled
Forsyth	1989	No	Yes	Settled

SUMMARY (Were changes accompanied by lawsuits?)
Yes 17 (77%)
No 5 (23%)

[a] This column in tables 6.8 and 6.8A is unique to this chapter on North Carolina. It indicates whether the county or city in question is covered by section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. Only 40 of North Carolina's 100 counties—and the towns and cities within—were in 1989 included in the preclearance provisions of section 5.

[b] Voters rejected the referendum for a switch from a five-commissioner at-large system to one with three commissioners elected at large and four elected at large to represent districts. They approved the shift to a mixed system with three at-large and four district seats.

[c] The county commission enacted the mixed plan in 1977. The Justice Department did not approve it until 1986.

TABLE 6.9
Major Disfranchising Devices in North Carolina

Device	Date Established	Date Abolished
Literacy test	1900[a]	1965, 1970[b]
Grandfather clause	1900[a]	1908[c]
Poll tax	1900[a]	1920[d]

[a] Constitutional amendment.
[b] Voting Rights Act of 1965 and amendments of 1970.
[c] Automatic expiration in constitutional amendment.
[d] Repealed.

TABLE 6.10
Black and White Registered Voters and Officeholders in North Carolina, Selected Years[a]

	Black		White
	N	%	N	%
Registered voters
1962[b]	—	10.0	—	89.6
1966	281,134	14.2	1,653,796	85.1
1990	635,045	19.0	2,677,162	80.0
Officeholders
State house
1962	0	0.0	120	100.0
1966	0[c]	0.0	120	100.0
1990	13[d]	10.8	120	89.2
State senate
1962	0	0.0	50	100.0
1966	0[e]	0.0	50	100.0
1990	4[f]	8.0	46	92.0

Sources: North Carolina Advisory Committee 1962; North Carolina State Board of Elections (for 1966 and 1990 registration data); U.S. Census of the Population for North Carolina, 1960, 1970, and 1990.

[a] Mean black population in state 1960–90 = 22.8%.
[b] The most recent pre-Voting Rights Act registration figures are those for 1962. These data—and those for 1966—are for blacks and whites only, and do not sum to 100 percent.
[c] The first black representative was elected in 1968.
[d] A Native American was elected in 1990.
[e] The first black senator was elected in 1974.
[f] An additional black senator was elected in 1990.

CHAPTER SEVEN

South Carolina

ORVILLE VERNON BURTON,
TERENCE R. FINNEGAN,
PEYTON McCRARY, AND
JAMES W. LOEWEN

SOUTH CAROLINA, first in nullification and first in secession, was also the first state to challenge the constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act [1] It was fitting that the state should have taken a central role in this challenge. After all, it had served as the leading advocate for the rights of slaveholders in the debates over the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. Under the leadership of John C. Calhoun, South Carolina had attempted to "nullify" a federal tariff law in 1832 in order to establish a constitutional precedent for voiding future antislavery legislation. It was the first state to secede from the Union, and a few months later, South Carolinians fired the first shot of the Civil War at Fort Sumter. During the seven decades following Reconstruction, the state legislature devised election laws that effectively disfranchised African Americans; and when the Supreme Court outlawed the white primary, South Carolina led the way in devising substitutes to keep blacks out of the Democratic primary. In 1948 Governor J. Strom Thurmond became the standard bearer of the "Dixiecrat" revolt against the civil rights plank of the Democratic party. A few years later, the South Carolina attorney general's office vociferously defended the principles of public school segregation before the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education, and the state's congressional delegation resolutely opposed every civil rights bill proposed in Congress from 1957 to 1965.

Despite this history, South Carolina attorneys, in challenging the Voting Rights Act, maintained that it subjected the state to unnecessary intrusive supervision without proof of intentional discrimination. In denying their challenge and affirming the constitutionality of the act in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, Chief Justice Earl Warren stated, "Congress felt itself confronted by an insidious and pervasive evil." He noted the long history of racial discrimination in the voter registration process in South Carolina, directly quoting some of the more outrageous remarks of Benjamin R. "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman at the 1895 disfranchising convention as evidence of the discriminatory purpose of the literacy test suspended by the act. Warren stated that "the constitutional propriety of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 must be judged with reference to the historical experience which it reflects."[2] History had finally caught up with South Carolina.

Voting Rights and Racial Politics from 1865 to 1965

"The central fact in the history of black Carolina," concludes Newby, "has been the racism of white Carolina."[3] The degree to which African Americans have held public office in South Carolina since the Civil War was largely determined by the state's election laws and the manner in which they were implemented. White officials made their intentions clear from the beginning. The South Carolina constitutional convention of 1865, with the approval of President Andrew Johnson, restricted voting and officeholding to white males. "This is a white man's government," explained Governor Benjamin Perry, "and intended for white men only."[4] In an attempt to buttress white supremacy, southern state legislatures enacted "black codes" that severely restricted the rights of freedpersons. The South Carolina black code required agricultural workers to sign away most of their rights as citizens in annual labor contracts with landowners or risk prosecution for vagrancy.[5] The enactment of black codes throughout the South played a key role in persuading Congress to enfranchise African Americans and temporarily restrict the suffrage of some Confederates.

Enfranchised by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments, South Carolina's black majority elected Republican candidates to the bulk of the seats in a new constitutional convention, which then granted the right to vote to every adult male, "without distinction of race, color, or former condition."[6] Subsequently, blacks controlled a majority of seats in the lower house (and from 1874 to 1876 in both the senate and the house), and they won elections as lieutenant governor, secretary of state, and state treasurer. Equally important, they were elected to a significant number of local offices, such as sheriff, county commissioner, magistrate, school commissioner, and alderman.[7] Reconstruction in South Carolina lasted as long as in any other state, and the black Republicans there achieved as great a degree of political power as did African Americans anywhere.

Disfranchisement

Some whites bitterly opposed black equality and endorsed systematic political violence to overcome Republican control. Whether through secretive activity by the Ku Klux Klan or open mob violence, Democrats often resorted to political assassination and murder, although physical beatings, arson, and threats of death were more common. Seven state legislators were murdered between 1868 and 1876.[8] Violence was so severe in nine upcountry counties that the federal government intervened in 1871 and declared martial law, making hundreds of arrests; a few dozen indictments led to guilty pleas and prison sentences. In the black-controlled town of Hamburg, Democrats under former Confederate general Matthew Calbraith Butler's leadership brought a cannon and several hundred armed horsemen to do battle with the African-American militia, killing six (four by firing squad) and pillaging the homes and shops of the town's black population and their white allies.[9] In the wake of the Hamburg massacre, Butler and another former Confederate general, Martin Witherspoon Gary, orchestrated a violent "redemption" of state government from Republican control. Gary had announced as early as 1874 that political contests in South Carolina were "a question of race and not of politics."[10] While Civil War hero General Wade Hampton ostensibly advocated moderation, Gary favored all-out guerilla warfare and organized Democrats into three hundred "rifle clubs" throughout the state. Armed bands of horsemen attired in symbolically defiant red shirts intimidated and attacked potential black voters.[11]

Although violent clashes between whites and blacks occurred in Charleston and in low-country plantation counties, the scale of battle in 1876 was nowhere as great as in Edgefield County, home of Gary and Butler. Over seven hundred armed and mounted Democrats in red shirts seized control of the county courthouse and, despite the presence of federal troops, prevented African Americans from voting. "Gary's doctrine of voting early and often changed the republican majority of 2,300 in Edgefield to a democratic majority of 3,900," recalled Gary protégé and future governor Benjamin Tillman, a participant in the Edgefield violence, "thus giving Hampton a claim to the office of governor." Hampton's victory resulted from the casting of 2,252 more votes than there were eligible voters.[12]

Although Hampton owed his election to the political violence of the "Edgefield plan," in his campaign speeches he pledged to treat blacks fairly in the new order. For Hampton and the "moderates," blacks who "knew their place" had a place in the system, and he did appoint some to local offices. Later, however, as a U.S. senator, Hampton justified fraud, intimidation, and violence to deny South Carolina blacks the franchise, claiming "the very civilization, the property, the life of the State itself, were involved."[13] Black-majority counties elected some African-American legislators, but the overwhelmingly white legislature determined to combat these successes. It adopted a law intended to eliminate federal scrutiny of state affairs by requiring separate ballot boxes for state and federal elections.[14] In addition, the legislature abolished a large number of precincts in heavily Republican counties, requiring voters to travel long distances in order to vote.[15]

After the end of Reconstruction, the Democrats manipulated election laws to institutionalize their control of state politics (see table 7.9). In 1882 a new law required all citizens to reregister or face permanent disfranchisement; registrars had great discretion in applying the law so that they could avoid striking white voters from the rolls. A companion statute, the Eight Box Law, intended as a de facto literacy test, required voters to place ballots for various offices in separate boxes, which election officials periodically shuffled. These discriminatory tactics effectively cut the African-American electorate in half.[16]

Even so, black voters remained numerous enough to be troublesome to white supremacists. Consequently, the legislature adopted a congressional redistricting plan that packed blacks into a malapportioned district where they made up 82 percent of the population, thereby diluting their voting strength in the rest of the state. The "black district," as it was called, ran from the city of Columbia to the coast, divided six counties, incorporated most black neighborhoods of Charleston, and, according to the New York Times, resembled a boa constrictor. Although this district generally elected a black Republican to the U.S. House of Representatives until 1896, the gerrymander assured Democrats safe contests for the remaining seats.[17]

The second stage of disfranchisement, designed to eliminate the African-American vote altogether, took place in the 1890s after former "red shirt" Ben Tillman gained control of the Democratic party. Brown has described Tillman as the "best known and most vitriolic Negrophobe in America" and the undisputed leader of black disfranchisement.[18] Tillman's biographer, Simkins, maintained that between Reconstruction and World War I, "Ben Tillman fostered the modern reaction against the Negro. This stance was one of his most significant influences on American life."[19] Tillman's movement to purge the black vote in South Carolina was as openly racist and its postdisfranchisement regime as rigidly committed to white supremacy as any in Dixie. In the U.S. Senate, Tillman declared defiantly: "We have done our level best. We have scratched our heads to find out how we could eliminate every last one of them. We stuffed ballot boxes. We shot them. We are not ashamed of it."[20] Openly avowing their intention to disfranchise blacks through the rewriting of the state constitution, the Tillman forces secured passage of a new registration law designed to eliminate as many African-American voters as possible before the referendum on calling a constitutional convention (see table 7.9). Governor John Gary Evans, Tillman's successor and General Gary's nephew, ordered election officials not to issue registration forms to blacks.[21] "The whites," Tillman announced, "have absolute control of the government, and we intend at any hazard to retain it."[22]

In 1895, now U.S. Senator Tillman chaired the convention's committee on the rights of suffrage. At his urging the convention established as prerequisites for registration the payment of a poll tax at least six months before the election and proof of payment of all other taxes. In addition, a prospective voter had to satisfy a literacy test or demonstrate an understanding of any constitutional provision read to him by the registrar. The discretion of the registrar was unlimited. The convention also adopted a "petty crimes" provision that disfranchised all those convicted of certain crimes that whites believed blacks frequently committed. Conservative historian David Duncan Wallace referred to this provision as "the black squint of the law."[23]

In 1896 the South Carolina legislature authorized statewide party primaries.[24] Henceforth the State Democratic Executive Committee prohibited all African Americans from voting in the primary, which was, in the one-party system after disfranchisement, the only election that mattered. The state poll tax requirement never applied to these primary elections, presumably because party rules already excluded African Americans.[25]

These changes affected both black and white political participation. As of October 1896, only 5,500 blacks were registered to vote in South Carolina, a mere

10 percent of all registered voters.[26] Kousser estimates that 45 percent of white adult males and 11 percent of black adult males voted in the 1896 presidential election.[27] This low turnout was the norm between 1920 and 1946. On average, only 27 percent of the state's adults voted in the Democratic primaries for governor and U.S. senator.[28]

Controlling election laws and voter registration was crucial to maintaining white supremacy. Congressman James F. Byrnes, who eventually became a U.S. senator, Supreme Court justice, U.S. secretary of state, and governor of South Carolina, cautioned in 1920: "It is certain that if there was a fair registration they [African Americans] would have a slight majority in our state. We cannot idly brush the facts aside. Unfortunate though it may be, our consideration of every question must include the consideration of this race question."[29] A year later, historian Francis Butler Simkins confirmed the intent of his native state's legislation. "Reviewing the South Carolina law in respect to the Negro since 1876, it is apparent that its frank purpose is to perpetuate the division of society into two distinct castes—the white, or dominant ruling class, and the Negro, or subject class."[30]

Democratic party officials unabashedly did their part for the cause of white supremacy. "There are dam [sic] few negroes registered in any way," observed a local executive committee spokesman to a journalist in 1940. "If a coon wants to vote in the primary, we make him recite the Constitution backward, as well as forward, make him close his eyes and dot his i's and cross his t's. We have to comply with the law, you see."[31] The effect of disfranchising legislation was profound: only fifteen hundred African Americans in South Carolina were registered to vote in 1940.[32]

When the Supreme Court overturned the white primary in 1944,[33] Governor Olin D. Johnston called a special session of the legislature to repeal all laws relating to primary elections in the hope that this would remove the element of "state action" and make the white primary invulnerable to legal challenge. "After these statutes are repealed," Johnston told the legislature, "we will have done everything in our power to guarantee white supremacy in our primaries."[34] Voters then approved a constitutional amendment erasing all mention of primaries from the state constitution, and the Democratic party adopted rules excluding African Americans from its "private" primary elections.[35]

When the NAACP challenged the private primary in federal court, Judge J. Waties Waring of Charleston ruled that because the Democratic primary was the vehicle through which all public officials were chosen, it remained a state action. Because the governor and legislature acted "solely for the purpose of preventing the Negro from gaining a right to vote," the judge ruled the change violated the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments.[36] The Democratic party then adopted new rules, not explicitly barring African Americans but requiring voters to swear to uphold segregation and for the first time extending the literacy test required for general elections to the primary.[37] Judge Waring struck down the required oath and prohibited the party from barring black participation.[38]

In 1950 the general assembly adopted a new election law restoring state regulation of primary elections.[39] The proposal to extend the literacy test to party primaries occasioned great debate. Some up-country legislators feared the measure would disfranchise their poor white constituents. In the end, however, the appeal to racial solidarity was successful, and Governor J. Strom Thurmond signed the bill into law.[40]

Among the electoral devices restored to the primary election laws were statewide full-slate and majority-vote requirements, which would dilute the votes of blacks now eligible to participate in the Democratic primary.[41] Although these features of the statute were reenacted without comment, contemporary accounts attributed the same purpose to the statute as a whole. "Conservative lawmakers admit that the bill is designed to control Negro voting in primaries," reported a Charleston newspaper in 1950.[42]

At the same time, Governor Thurmond was pushing to remove the state poll tax requirement from the state constitution, apparently with the intention of weakening congressional support for a federal anti–poll tax bill. Ogden noted that "many South Carolinians recognized that their tax had little significance since it did not apply to primary elections nor to women, was non-cumulative and amounted to only $1.00 per year."[43]

These machinations in election law, such as the repeal of the poll tax, mark a departure from the hard-line posturing of other states. In 1950 James F. Byrnes ran for governor and continued South Carolina's shift toward a "calculated moderation." Byrnes's experience on the Supreme Court and in national politics provided him a sophisticated and subtle approach in resisting racial integration. In order to forestall desegregation, for example, he used a significant portion of a new sales tax for the education of black children, and white leaders throughout the state began equalizing the facilities of white and black schools in a desperate attempt to salvage segregation. Byrnes urged the creation of a committee to find ways to maintain segregation and staffed it with some of the state's most prominent lawyers. Chaired by state senator L. Marion Gressette, this special school committee coordinated efforts to maintain the racial status quo.[44] This technique of bending a little to prevent larger changes, aptly termed "firm flexibility" by Sproat,[45] gave the state another decade of segregation. Byrnes's approach also ostensibly brought South Carolina back to the constitutional high ground. Just as it had argued for states' rights instead of slavery in both nullification and Civil War, so South Carolina appealed to constitutional precepts in opposing civil rights and voting rights in the modern period.

African-American Activism

During these many years of oppression, blacks regularly sought to reassert their right to vote. When women secured the ballot in 1920, a group of black women tried to exercise this newfound right, but were forcibly ejected from the registration office in Columbia.[46] In 1939 an African-American labor group in Greenville joined with the local NAACP and the Negro Youth Council in a voter registration drive, only to be quashed by police intimidation. To raise money to challenge the white primary and to increase voter registration, blacks founded the South Carolina Negro Citizens Committee in 1942. Led by black journalist John McCray in 1944, they formed a statewide protest organization, the Progressive Democratic party, with chapters in every South Carolina county. This group unsuccessfully challenged the seating of South Carolina's all-white delegation at the 1944 Democratic national convention, and sponsored Osceola McKaine, an African American, as a candidate for the U.S. Senate against Democrat Olin Johnston.[47] Between 1940 and 1946 the Progressive Democrats and the NAACP mounted a registration drive that increased the number of black voters on the rolls from 1,500 to 50,000.[48] Despite Klan marches and cross burnings, 35,000 black voters went to the polls in the 1948 primary. In the primary race that year for the U.S. Senate seat between William Jennings Bryan Dorn and Burnet Maybank, Dorn denounced Judge Waring because of his decision outlawing the white primary. The black vote went solidly to Maybank, sending a clear signal to the state's Democratic politicians that black voters would seek to punish blatant appeals to white supremacy.[49]

During the next decade journalist McCray, NAACP leader Reverend I. DeQuincey Newman, activist Modjeska Simkins, and other African Americans encouraged sustained activism as a means of effecting racial change. Esau Jenkins, a black businessman from Charleston, with help from NAACP activist and native Charlestonian Septima Clark, Highlander Folk School founder Myles Horton (who was white), beautician Bernice Robinson, and Guy and Candie Carawan (whites who moved to Johns Island), began citizenship schools in the late 1940s and early 1950s to help African Americans obtain the right to vote and overcome the "yoke of [white] domination."[50] The Southern Christian Leadership Conference established citizenship schools in low-country Georgia in the early 1960s under Clark's direction, where African Americans from South Carolina and other states of the Deep South learned about their legal rights and about strategies for civil disobedience. These schools became one of "the most effective organizing tools of the [civil rights] movement." Citizenship schools taught democratic rights and encouraged thousands to take part in demonstrations.[51]

African Americans believed that education was a key to freedom; consequently, separate and unequal education was the foremost target of the civil rights movement in South Carolina. In the early 1940s the NAACP brought court cases to equalize teachers' salaries. Black South Carolinians' most dramatic and influential success against institutionalized white racism involved the Briggs v. Elliot case against Clarendon County. This case led to the Brown decision, which eventually outlawed segregated schools.[52]

Other important developments in South Carolina included James McCain's work with the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). Under the leadership of McCain, CORE launched a sustained effort to register African Americans during the late 1950s. A former head of the black teachers' association in South Carolina, McCain established throughout the state seven CORE groups, which later proved instrumental in the South Carolina sit-in movement during the 1960s.[53] In 1958, McCain's troops actually gained control of the Democratic organization in a black-majority precinct in Sumter and supported, without success, an African-American candidate for city council. Despite the urging of CORE's national leadership that he enlist as many whites as possible, McCain found that for white Carolinians, joining an interracial civil rights organization or even supporting a black voter registration drive was unthinkable at the height of "massive resistance" to school desegregation. Rivalry with the NAACP was also a problem, but the two organizations eventually worked out a tacit division of the state.[54]

Black voter registration did not increase dramatically for more than a decade; in 1960 it was still only 58,000, 16 percent of the black voting-age population.[55] By 1962 around 91,000 blacks (23 percent of the black voting-age population) were on the rolls.[56] As in the rest of the South, black registration in South Carolina was still low in counties with a high percentage of African Americans in their population.[57] These old plantation counties, mostly in the low country but including some Piedmont counties, provided most of the members of the White Citizens' Councils formed in the state in the 1950s to rally opposition to school desegregation.[58]

White Reaction to the Civil Rights Movement

Many whites in South Carolina agreed with Governor James F. Byrnes's 1954 declaration that if the state could not "find a legal way of preventing the mixing of the races in the schools, it will mark the beginning of the end of civilization in the South as we have known it."[59] South Carolina whites bitterly opposed federal court decisions that ruled segregated schools unconstitutional, and the NAACP, which organized most African-American plaintiffs in desegregation lawsuits, became the focus of white resistance. NAACP members and their relatives were fired as teachers, and in some cases black leaders fled the state to avoid terrorist activity and legal prosecution.[60] In 1956 the general assembly adopted laws making NAACP members ineligible for state employment, requiring investigation of NAACP activity at traditionally black South Carolina State College, and revising the state's barratry laws so that they could be used against NAACP lawyers who "stirred up" civil rights litigation.[61] CORE organizer Frank Robinson was forced out of his real estate and home-building business when local banks cut off his credit because of his voter registration activities. Students engaging in demonstrations went to jail throughout the state in the early 1960s.[62]

In 1964 South Carolina whites revolted openly against the national Democratic ticket; the Democratic party's commitment to civil rights so alienated Senator Strom Thurmond that he permanently switched to the Republican party. Conservative whites voted as a bloc for Republican presidential nominee Barry Goldwater, enabling him to win 59 percent of the state's vote. Despite overwhelming support from those African Americans able to cast ballots, incumbent Lyndon B. Johnson garnered only 41 percent.[63] More important than all other issues, according to

Fowler, was "the race question, and, more specifically, the fact that Goldwater voted against the Civil Rights Act of 1964 while Johnson was chiefly responsible for its passage."[64] An intensive case study of Ridgeway, South Carolina, found that "a large number of nominal Democrats consistently vote Republican. Virtually all of them cite the Civil Rights issue as their reason."[65]

On the eve of passage of the Voting Rights Act, South Carolina remained thoroughly in the grip of white supremacy. Although 37 percent of the 1964 black voting-age population was registered, this represented only 17 percent of the state's voters on the rolls.[66] South Carolina elected no black officials in the twentieth century before the Voting Rights Act.[67] Whites kept black registration down and sometimes did not count all the votes cast by blacks who did register. Charged with telling a black voter during the 1964 presidential election "to place his ballot in the wrong box," precinct manager Wade H. Ratcliffe explained, "I knew this was wrong but we have always done these things."[68] Immediately following the enactment of the Voting Rights Act, African-American leaders formally complained about white officials' deliberate slowdown of the voter registration process for blacks in Allendale, Barnwell, Charleston, Dorchester, Jasper, and Orangeburg counties, and federal observers were sent to Clarendon and Dorchester.[69]

Despite heroic voter registration drives mounted by CORE, the Voter Education Project,[70] the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and the NAACP—all involved in "combined efforts" in July and August 1965—these organizations faced great difficulty in overcoming the effects of long years of racial discrimination.[71] Education in particular failed the black community of South Carolina. In his 1911 inaugural gubernatorial address, demagogue Cole Blease stated, "I am opposed to white people's taxes being used to educate Negroes."[72] An analysis of educational expenditures from 1896 to 1960 demonstrates how inequitably the state funded black education.[73] In 1940, for example, South Carolina spent only 30 percent as much to educate a black child as a white child, a lower percentage than any southern state except Mississippi. By 1952, per-pupil expenditures for black children were only 60 percent of the amount spent to educate white children, still behind all southern states except Mississippi. In 1960, half a decade after Brown, South Carolina still spent on average 50 percent more per white than per black pupil, a greater disparity than had existed in 1896.[74] Students graduating from high school in 1940 were only in their forties in 1964; those who finished in 1952 were just turning thirty; and those who graduated in 1960 were barely old enough to vote. Thus, given the well-known correlation between educational attainment and voter turnout, the effects of educational disparities lingered for decades as a deterrent to African-American political participation.

Despite the insistence of some Carolinians upon white supremacy, during the 1960s the state continued its move toward "calculated moderation," parting company with the forces of hard-core resistance. Black voter registration drives aroused sporadic violence from angry whites and occasional stalling devices from local officials, although not the massive opposition found in Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, or Georgia.[75]

At this time, federal intervention could have proven quite useful. Since adoption of the 1957 Civil Rights Act, the Justice Department had been empowered to bring lawsuits challenging racial discrimination in the registration process. However, because it concentrated its meager resources on even more recalcitrant states, the department's Civil Rights Division as late as 1965 had not filed a single lawsuit challenging South Carolina officials with racial discrimination.[76] Thus, during the debate that year over the Voting Rights Act's section 5 provisions, South Carolina attorney general Daniel R. McLeod and U.S. Representative William Jennings Bryan Dorn pointed to Justice Department inaction to buttress the charge that their state was being labeled guilty without trial. The act's extraordinary intrusion into matters reserved to the states, they argued, was unjustified without proof of intentional discrimination by state or local registration officials. McLeod and Dorn attributed the low level of black voter registration in South Carolina to apathy, not official discrimination.[77]

After the act's passage, the state echoed these protestations of innocence in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, but, speaking for an eight-to-one majority, Justice Warren made clear, even while conceding that evidence of recent voting discrimination was more "fragmentary" for South Carolina than for states in the Deep South, that Congress had assembled ample proof that white officials in the covered southern states enforced the literacy test and other devices in a purposefully discriminatory manner against black citizens. The formula for determining the jurisdiction of the act was "rational in both practice and theory," declared Warren, because long-standing use of tests and devices was a direct cause of low black voter registration.[78]

The Continuing Struggle over Voting Rights

With passage of the Voting Rights Act in August 1965, black voter registration soared.[79] By 1967 it had climbed to 51 percent of the age-eligible population. By and large, South Carolina's white officials grudgingly conceded that as in the rest of the South, the Voting Rights Act made it impossible to prevent African-American citizens from registering and casting their ballots.[80] Yet barriers to registration and voting have continued until recently, especially in some rural areas. State law specified that voter registration always occur in a public place, often the courthouse, a potentially intimidating place to many black southerners, for whom it symbolizes the locus of white power. As recently as 1987, according to the director of the Voter Education Project, "in rural areas, some precincts are in all-white areas, and blacks just don't cross the railroad tracks." Local voting registration boards had the discretion to appoint deputies and set office hours. Often offices were not open when black laborers might be available to register.[81]

Registration procedures in Fairfield County exemplify the complications that African Americans encountered as late as the 1980s. The local NAACP, the Progressive Citizens Organization, and Fairfield United Action had been successful in increasing black registration from about 20 percent of potential voters prior to the Voting Rights Act to a majority of them in the mid-1980s. But the county's board of registration continued to resist black registration efforts. The governor, who appoints each county's board upon recommendation from the senate (that is, the county senator), in 1986 appointed two white members and one black member (a domestic worker employed by the Fairfield senator).[82] The board refused requests to allow door-to-door registration drives. It also refused to accept one black deputy registrar's voter applications because the deputy registrar used a computer code instead of the full name for precincts; the following week the board rejected the same deputy's applications because the computer code was not supplied. In 1983, only five deputy registrars were appointed for all the African-American communities in the county. The board refused fourteen applications because a check was not on the registration form next to an item that had no box to check. Only an appeal to the South Carolina Elections Commission forced the acceptance of these new applications.[83] South Carolina now has a postcard registration procedure, which has significantly diminished registration restrictions in South Carolina.[84]

In 1965 it seemed to some observers that black registration increases augured significant change in South Carolina in the near future. The act's ban on the literacy test had "the potential for a political upheaval," warned one reporter, who projected the election of at least twenty-two blacks to the general assembly under the existing districting plan.[85] Two developments, among others, helped avert black officeholding. First, even as black registration increased, so did white registration: from 76 to 82 percent in 1967. Thus, in spite of sharp black registration gains, African Americans that year still comprised a mere 21 percent of total registrants in a state that was 30 percent black.[86]

Another strategy for minimizing the effectiveness of the growing black vote was to enact election laws designed to "dilute" minority voting strength, such as at-large elections, full-slate requirements, or runoff provisions. South Carolina already had a full-slate law (prohibiting the casting of a "single-shot" vote) and a majority vote requirement for most elections. These procedures enhanced the racially discriminatory effects of at-large elections and multimember legislative districts, which were the cornerstone of southern efforts to minimize the impact of increased black voting strength after 1965.[87] When the Voting Rights Act was passed, however, nineteen South Carolina counties elected at least some members of their county governing body by single-member districts, according to a survey by the U.S. Bureau of the Census. By 1973, the bureau's survey indicated that eleven counties had switched entirely to at-large elections.[88]

Many of these changes were challenged in federal court during the next two decades, and their purposes often became a matter of public record. This was not true of the switch to at-large elections for the Charleston County Council in 1969. Available evidence suggests, however, the possibility of an underlying racial purpose. J. Mitchell Graham, who had formerly chaired the county council, explained to a reporter not long after passage of the Voting Rights Act that the existing election plan gave Charlestonians "the guarantee of representation from their own districts."[89] In 1967, however, with blacks running for office throughout the state, the county council asked the local legislative delegation to draft a statute requiring countywide election of council members.[90] The person who chaired the council and pushed successfully for the adoption of at-large elections was Micah Jenkins, who ten years earlier had been among the most visible leaders of the Citizens Council movement in South Carolina.[91] Because a constitutional amendment was a prerequisite for other features of Jenkins's proposed reform of county government, the legislature did not adopt the change until 1969.[92]

The Nexus between Legislative Redistricting and Home Rule

All politics, it is said, is local. Thus when the Voting Rights Act was passed, African Americans hoped it would enable them to wield significant influence at the community level through the election of black candidates. These hopes did not materialize. Political power in South Carolina was not directly responsive to local electorates. A system of legislative county government, established by the Tillman forces during the struggle for disfranchisement in the 1890s, had eliminated county and township elections because conservative whites disliked elected local governments with their "identification with black political power, as well as with high taxes."[93] Since that time, the general assembly provided that the governor appoint county officials upon recommendation of a county's state senator and representatives. This law effectively eliminated the opportunity of African Americans to elect local officials of their choice, even where they were an overwhelming majority of the population.[94]

The power of legislative delegations over county government remained largely intact from 1895 until 1965, even in those few counties where some form of elected councils had been established through local legislation.[95] The general assembly was the center of governmental power in South Carolina, and the senate was clearly the dominant house. Each of the forty-six counties had one senator, elected countywide, and one or more representatives, also elected at large. In no other state was legislative dominance over local government so strong. Key put it succinctly: "County legislative delegations constitute the real governing bodies of their respective counties."[96]

The local legislative delegation often appointed the county governing body as well as local school boards, public service districts, and park boards. Sometimes the legislators themselves served as members of the county council. The delegation supervised the selection of employees and appointments to boards and committees. Most importantly, the delegation set tax levels and submitted the county budget, which was adopted by the entire legislature as the county's "supply bill."[97] Each county's senator, because he could veto any local legislation, usually became its "first-ranking politician."[98]

In December 1965 this system suddenly faced the risk that rural counties would lose their resident senator when the federal court in O'Shields v. McNair[99] gave the legislature four months to redistrict the state senate according to the one-person, one-vote principle articulated by the U.S. Supreme Court.[100] Senator Edgar A. Brown of Barnwell County, a thirty-six-year veteran known as the dean of the senate and described as "the most powerful man in South Carolina's government,"[101] characterized reapportionment as the "political crisis of my time." The court's decision, he declared, "invites a return to the kind of government that Wade Hampton had to stamp out in 1876."[102] Warning of a resurgence of the evils of "Black Reconstruction" was a time-honored tactic of southern white Democrats concerned about black voting strength.[103]

Brown and other veteran legislators, however, devised a redistricting plan that minimized the chances of the election of African-American legislators.[104] Its essence was to use as many at-large multimember districts as possible. In order to satisfy the one-person, one-vote rule, the all-white general assembly reapportioned the state senate by shifting from a plan in which all senators were elected from single-member districts (i.e., one per county) to a system relying primarily on multimember senatorial districts. Reapportionment did not require use of multimember districts, however, even in rural areas and certainly not in urban counties.[105] In O'Shields the court in 1966 approved an interim reapportionment plan that replaced many of the existing single-member districts with multimember districts.[106] A year later the legislature adopted a permanent plan that included only five single-member districts, dividing the state into fifteen multimember senatorial districts, all of which had a white majority.[107] Only one African American was ever elected to the senate under either of these plans.[108] With that exception, the senate maintained its all-white membership and its at-large elections until 1984, when it became the last southern state legislative body to acquire either single-member districts or African-American members.

Multicounty senatorial districts created a major difficulty for many rural counties because under the redistricting plan adopted in response to O'Shields, those counties would no longer be represented by a senator residing within county borders. Having an "outsider" exercise the extraordinary control over local government traditionally accorded the local senator was unacceptable to many Carolinians.[109] The movement to secure local autonomy for South Carolina counties and cities, which culminated in the adoption of a statewide Home Rule Act in 1975, grew directly from resentment over the effects of court-ordered redistricting.[110]

As if increased black voter registration and court-ordered redistricting were not enough for South Carolina whites, a new element entered the picture in 1969. In Allen v. Board of Elections, a consolidated case involving various Mississippi and Virginia voting changes, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that under section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, potentially dilutive procedures such as at-large elections, numbered posts, residency districts, majority-vote requirements, and districting plans were not legally enforceable until submitted for preclearance, either by a three-judge panel in the District of Columbia or by the Department of Justice.[111] Section

5 provided a powerful weapon for enforcing minority voting rights if the jurisdiction had altered its electoral procedures since 1 November 1964 in a manner that had the potential for diluting minority voting strength. The Justice Department then created a special section to review such electoral procedures.[112]

When the South Carolina legislature redistricted after the 1970 census, plaintiffs challenged the plan for each house in court, and each plan underwent section 5 review by the Justice Department.[113] On 6 March 1972, in the first of a series of controversial decisions, the Attorney General objected to the use of multimember districts, numbered posts, majority-vote requirements, and some of the specific district lines in the senate plan, which had no black-majority seats.[114] The general assembly then drew a new plan, which a three-judge court in South Carolina ruled constitutional; the Attorney General, deferring to the court, did not object to its implementation.[115]

A three-judge court also rejected the claim of African-American plaintiffs that the house plan was racially discriminatory; on the other hand, however, it struck down the state's full-slate law on the grounds that to require a person to vote for every office on the ballot was an unreasonable restriction on the right of suffrage.[116] The South Carolina legislature immediately replaced the full-slate law with a numbered-place rule, which required each candidate to qualify for a particular seat (that is, place no. 1, place no. 2, and so forth).[117] Every seat would then be decided through a head-to-head contest in which only one vote could be cast, making single-shot voting impossible.[118] The Department of Justice, in turn, objected to this change under section 5.[119] The house plan was implemented in the 1972 house elections, but without the full-slate requirement. In 1973 the U.S. Supreme Court summarily reversed the decision of the three-judge court that had upheld the constitutionality of the house plan.[120] Forced to redistrict once again, the general assembly nevertheless rejected the complaints of African-American legislators against multimember districts, numbered seats, and the majority-vote requirement. The Department of Justice cited these dilutive devices as evidence of racial discrimination when it objected to the plan under section 5.[121] The legislature finally acquiesced and adopted a single-member district plan, under which the number of African-American representatives increased from four to thirteen in the 1974 elections.[122]

The presence of these new members made a significant difference in the debate over the Home Rule Act in 1975. This omnibus legislation transferred much of the authority for local legislative or administrative decision making away from the county delegation in the general assembly to a popularly elected county council. The Home Rule Bill, as originally passed by the house at the urging of the black caucus, would have required all counties to elect their governing bodies by single-member districts. At one point, racial tensions in the debate threatened to get out of hand when a black Democrat and a white Republican from Columbia "exchanged heated remarks on the single-member provision . . . punctuated by mild profanity."[123] White legislators accepted single-member districts in part because of general awareness that the changes resulting from the Home Rule Act had to undergo Department of Justice scrutiny.[124]

The all-white senate, however, adamantly refused to require district elections, even at the risk of passing no bill at all. Ultimately, a compromise provision required all county councils to be elected from single-member districts, with two exceptions: (1) the voters could approve the use of at-large plans in a referendum; or (2) counties that failed to hold a referendum would be assigned one of five specific forms of government by default. Under the second option, a county was assigned the form most closely approximating its current system, which usually included at-large elections.[125] More than half the counties (twenty-five of forty-six) held referendums; citizens of twenty opted in the referendums for single-member district elections.[126] The Home Rule Act accounted for more than 40 percent (fifteen of thirty-five) of the changes from at-large to district election plans that have occurred in South Carolina county councils between 1974 and 1989 (see table 7.8A).

In South Carolina, the civil rights movement, the Voting Rights Act, one-person, one-vote senate reapportionment, and the rise of the Republican party were intertwined. At the same time that the state's traditional white leadership was faced with increased black and white voting, it was also losing control of day-to-day oversight of county offices. With a political culture constructed on constituent service, loss of control at the local level was a critical challenge. Court-ordered redistricting, which suddenly rendered the traditional system of legislative county government unacceptable to political leaders throughout South Carolina, provided the major stimulus for the home rule movement after 1965. The state legislature and many county governmental bodies shifted to at-large election methods.

In the early 1970s African-American plaintiffs filed and lost a challenge to the process that left the South Carolina senate all white. Plaintiffs, however, won their challenge to the electoral system that resulted in a nearly all-white house of representatives. Consequently, African Americans were a significant force in the new general assembly when the Home Rule Act came up for final passage in 1975. On the county level, however, it was not until the mid-1970s that voting rights lawyers filed the first racial vote-dilution challenges to at-large county governments; almost all the suits were wholly unsuccessful.

The Nexus between Section 5 Enforcement and Litigation

In the 1970s South Carolina had few active voting rights lawyers. Black attorney Matthew Perry, retained by the NAACP, handled much of the civil rights litigation in South Carolina until he was named to the U.S. Court of Military Appeals in 1976.[127] In legislative redistricting cases Perry was cocounsel with Armand Derfner of Washington, D.C., with the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. Derfner, who had litigated voting rights cases in Mississippi in the 1960s with the Lawyers' Constitutional Defense Committee, moved to Charleston in 1974 and opened a private practice. He was involved in many of the key South Carolina cases, often in cooperation with Laughlin McDonald, a white native of Fairfield County who has directed the Southern Regional Office of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) in Atlanta for over two decades. Other attorneys, both white and black, like John Roy Harper II, an African-American native of Greenwood who grew up in Camden, occasionally brought voting rights cases in the 1970s, but the ACLU was virtually the only source of funds available in South Carolina in the 1970s to cover the heavy expenses of vote-dilution lawsuits.[128]

The experience of private attorneys convinced them that the federal bench in South Carolina was generally unsympathetic to African-American plaintiffs in civil rights cases.[129] In Lee County, for example, where a change from district to at-large elections in 1968 had been precleared by the Department of Justice, Derfner and McDonald thought the facts in the case might nevertheless sustain a constitutional challenge. In 1966, following increased black voter registration in this 60 percent black county, an African-American candidate ran for the board of commissioners and lost by only a few votes. Before the next election Lee County switched to a county council elected at large. Although the plaintiffs provided undisputed evidence of racially polarized voting, racial disparities in socio-economic status and education, and the virtual exclusion of African Americans from the ranks of poll workers and election officials, Judge Robert F. Chapman in 1976 decided in favor of the county.[130]

The same fate awaited a 1977 challenge to the at-large election of city council members in Columbia filed on behalf of members of the local NAACP by McDonald, black attorneys I. S. Leevy Johnson and John Roy Harper II, and white Columbia attorney Herbert Buhl and tried once again before Judge Chapman.[131] Both Chapman and the three-judge appeals court ruled against the plaintiffs, finding that racially polarized voting was significant but did not "approach totality" because an estimated 25 percent of the vote in predominantly white areas went to an African-American candidate in the most recent election.[132] The courts also rejected the NAACP's claim that the city had been unresponsive to the needs of the African-American community, and dismissed the significance of earlier discrimination such as the literacy test, poll tax, and full-slate requirement on the grounds that, having been struck down by the federal courts or outlawed by the Voting Rights Act, these devices were no longer a barrier to African-American participation. The courts also ruled that the city had adopted at-large elections in 1910 with no discriminatory purpose.[133] Following this ruling, however, the city held a referendum in which voters approved a change to a mixed election system, with four council members elected from single-member districts and two at large, in addition to the mayor. Although devised by a biracial committee and supported by the mayor, the change to district elections occurred only because of overwhelming support in African-American precincts.[134]

Faced with the prospects of trying cases before unsympathetic judges, the voting-rights bar in South Carolina came to appreciate the virtues of the pre-clearance requirements of section 5, which put the burden of proof on the jurisdiction proposing election law changes, not on minority citizens. Justice Department objections under section 5 caused about one-fourth of the changes in county election method from 1974 to 1989 (nine of thirty-two; see table 7.8A); section 2 litigation prompted about 29 percent of changes (ten of thirty-two); and one county voluntarily changed its method of election after pressure from the NAACP.[135]

The Attorney General objected to the adoption of at-large elections for nine county councils and four school boards during the 1970s.[136] Often litigation was necessary to enforce these objections. With the exception of Charleston County, which successfully challenged the timeliness of the objection in court, all thirteen governments ultimately adopted single-member districts.[137]

Some cities as well as counties switched to district elections as a result of Department of Justice scrutiny. Most cities and towns in South Carolina already used at-large elections, and the Home Rule Act did not require a change. Municipal annexations had to be precleared, however. In 1974, for example, the Attorney General objected to seven annexations of predominantly white areas by the city of Charleston.[138] Polarized voting patterns had characterized recent city elections, and the votes of whites in the annexed areas had a substantial impact on the outcome of the close mayoral election in 1971, swinging the victory to the incumbent mayor.[139] In order to secure preclearance of the annexations, Charleston agreed to adopt a ward election system.[140] As of 1990, the city had six African-American council members out of twelve. Section 5 objections to annexations of white subdivisions led to single-member districts in other cities as well.[141]

Attorneys for plaintiffs were sometimes able to use requirements of section 5 to good advantage in forcing political jurisdictions to change from at-large to district elections. Dorchester County, for example, came under section 5 scrutiny following a previous challenge for faulty redistricting on the basis of the one-person, one-vote rule. In 1973 Derfner and McDonald successfully challenged the districts used in Dorchester county council elections on one-person, one-vote grounds.[142] Rather than redress the malapportionment through redistricting, the county adopted at-large elections. The Department of Justice refused preclearance, noting that racial bloc voting had prevented all African-American candidates from being elected to the council in a county that was 35 percent black.[143] Dorchester then devised a seven-district plan, with two black-majority districts, which the department approved.[144]

Private voting rights attorneys and the Department of Justice have cooperated in attacking South Carolina's at-large voting system. Still, because the department had precleared some changes before the Home Rule Act, some voting rights attorneys believe that in the early years of the Voting Rights Act, "while concentrating on cleaning up barriers to black voter participation, the Justice Department failed to enforce preclearance requirements which allowed many South Carolina counties to establish at-large election methods without objection."[145] Wherever the department failed to file an objection, private attorneys had to bring costly and time-consuming lawsuits. Key cases in South Carolina involved Sumter and Edgefield counties.

Litigation in Sumter County

Litigation regarding the use of at-large elections was complex and produced important struggles on both sides. The Sumter County Council case involved legislative redistricting, fear of black influence after the Voting Rights Act, objections by the Department of Justice, and private litigation. In 1967 Sumter County adopted an elective form of government to replace its appointive system.[146] Sumter was among those counties which chose not to hold a referendum under the 1975 Home Rule Act. The act, therefore, assigned to Sumter the council-administrator form of government, with council members to be elected at large. On 3 December 1976, however, the Attorney General objected to the at-large feature of the plan. Both the Department of Justice and local African-American plaintiffs, represented by white attorney Herbert Buhl of Columbia and black attorney Donald Sampson of Greenville, challenged the unprecleared use of at-large elections for county council in 1978; the court agreed that under the terms of section 5, the county's at-large system was legally unenforceable.[147] In November 1978, the county held a referendum to determine the preference of the electorate, and, in a racially polarized vote, a majority supported the at-large option over a district plan.[148] The county asked that the previous objection be withdrawn in light of the referendum results, but the Department of Justice declined.[149] The county then persuaded a three-judge court in South Carolina that its request for reconsideration was actually a new submission and that, because the department had failed to object within the required sixty days, it had, in fact, precleared the change.[150]

The Department of Justice chose not to appeal this ruling. Sampson, joined by attorney Armand Derfner, took the case to the U.S. Supreme Court and won a reversal.[151] Sumter County then filed a lawsuit seeking preclearance by a three-judge panel in the District of Columbia. After a full trial on the merits, the court refused to preclear the switch to at-large elections, ruling that the county had not met its burden of proof that the original change in 1967 was racially discriminatory in neither purpose nor effect. The court found that the decision to eliminate the legislative appointment of county government was motivated in part by a concern "that a black senate district would be created and the person elected from that district might control appointments to the Sumter County governing body."[152]

Expert testimony in the trial clarified the racial motivation behind the shift from appointive to at-large elected officials in 1967. Sumter was a bastion of racial conservatism, and its resident senator, Henry Richardson, had actively supported the county's White Citizens Council in the 1950s.[153] When the senate redistricting committee broached a plan that would have put Sumter County into a black-majority senatorial district with Clarendon and Williamsburg counties, Richardson and his colleagues threatened a filibuster. The incumbent senator from Williamsburg predicted bluntly that the proposed three-county district might actually elect a black senator.[154] The more likely prospect, at least for the near future, was the election of a white who, in order to attract the support of black voters, might agree to appoint African-American members to the county governing body. The influential Richardson pushed through the legislature a statute creating an elected county council, with all members elected at large, and then managed to force black-majority Williamsburg into another district. Under the state's full-slate law, such a council was more likely to remain all white than it would be under the traditional appointive system.[155] In 1984, after eight years of litigation, Sumter County adopted a plan with seven single-member districts. The council held its first election since 1976; African Americans won three seats.

Litigation in Edgefield County

An even more complex lawsuit, McCain v. Lybrand arose in Edgefield County, home of U.S. senator J. Strom Thurmond, who had bitterly opposed the original Voting Rights Act in 1965 and who fought not only the extensions of section 5 in 1970, 1975, and 1982, but the 1982 amendment to section 2.[156] Ten years of lawsuits and proceedings, with an ultimate objection by the Department of Justice in 1984, finally ended the use of at-large elections for the Edgefield county council. In 1969 black activist Tom McCain began efforts to open local governing bodies to African Americans. In 1974, on behalf of African-American plaintiffs led by McCain, attorneys Derfner and McDonald filed a lawsuit challenging the county council's at-large elections. After a trial on the merits in 1975, Judge Robert Chapman took five years to rule.[157] In following the Supreme Court guidelines set forth in White v. Regester,[158] Chapman decided that the plaintiffs' expert had presented statistical evidence of "bloc voting by the whites on a scale that this Court has never before observed."[159] When, in 1980, the judge ruled in favor of the plaintiffs, Derfner almost cried. "I have never been more surprised in my life as a lawyer," he said.[160]

Chapman vacated his own opinion, however, when the Supreme Court abruptly enunciated a new "intent standard" in City of Mobile v. Bolden, which meant that plaintiffs would have to prove that at-large elections were adopted or maintained with a racially discriminatory purpose.[161] Because of Edgefield's long history of racial discrimination, which continued up to the time of trial, Derfner and McDonald pressed their constitutional claim and began amassing "smoking gun" evidence concerning the change from appointed to elected county council in 1966.[162] At the same time, they amended their complaint to challenge the county's failure to submit the 1966 change to at-large elections for section 5 preclearance. In 1981 a weary McDonald wrote to interested parties of "this seemingly interminable lawsuit."[163] The three-judge district court in South Carolina, however, ruled that the Department of Justice had already precleared this change when it failed to object to a 1971 modification of the at-large system.[164] On behalf of the plaintiffs, McDonald, Derfner, and Buhl appealed to the Supreme Court, which finally in 1984 unanimously reversed the South Carolina panel.[165] The department then objected to the change to at-large elections, and Judge William W. Wilkins, Jr., former assistant to Thurmond, ordered implementation of a single-member-district plan, under which African Americans won three of five seats on the Edgefield county council.[166]

Immediately following this case, black parents sued the Edgefield school board to change from at-large to single-member districts. Because of the tremendous costs incurred by the county during McCain v. Lybrand, some prominent Edgefield citizens wanted to change to single-member districts. Instead, school board members insisted on retaining at-large districts. In Jackson v. Edgefield County, South Carolina, School District, the school board, like the county council, spared no expense in the defense of discrimination.[167]

Plaintiffs presented evidence at trial of the school board's racially discriminatory behavior for years after the adoption in 1968 of at-large elections to reinforce the inference that the change was racially motivated and that at-large elections were maintained with discriminatory intent. When Congressman Butler Derrick, a native Edgefieldian, testified as a witness for the school board, he conceded that Edgefield County voting was racially polarized. Again Edgefield African-American plaintiffs prevailed; again the cost to the county's citizens was extraordinary. This time the school board did not appeal.[168]

The Edgefield and Sumter cases were important precedents for other counties, cities, and school districts. They encouraged other municipalities to settle out of court. In the city of Sumter, for instance, which was 39 percent black but had only had one African American on council in more than one hundred years, the Justice Department objected to the annexation of a white suburb, and the local NAACP approached the city council about changing to district elections.[169] Mayor W. A. "Bubba" McElveen, having observed Sumter County spend eight years and more than half a million dollars in an unsuccessful attempt to preserve at-large elections, introduced single-member districts in the city. As a result, blacks won three of six single-member-district seats.[170] Following Jackson v. Edgefield County, South Carolina, School District, Edgefield County African Americans filed lawsuits to change the method of election from at-large to single-member districts in the cities of Edgefield, Johnston, and Trenton. These cities immediately negotiated settlements.

"When Sumter and Edgefield fell, the rest came tumbling down," said longtime NAACP activist Adell Adams. The Columbia State, arguably the most influential newspaper in South Carolina, agreed. Coming on the heels of the 1982 revision of section 2, which made it possible for minority plaintiffs to win vote-dilution lawsuits without proof of discriminatory intent, the lengthy and costly court losses by Sumter and Edgefield counties "marked the beginning of the end of at-large governments in South Carolina."[171] McCain v. Lybrand clarified section 5 preclearance in the state, and gave the section 5 unit of the Justice Department firmer precedents with which to insist on changes in other jurisdictions.

After the McCain Supreme Court decision affecting Edgefield, adjacent Saluda County settled out of court. Several other counties and cities adopted single-member districts under similar litigation or threat thereof. In 1987 Laurens County, facing objections from the NAACP, the ACLU, and the Justice Department to its at-large system, approved a single-member-district plan, and two African Americans were elected to its council. Abbeville County had never elected a black county council member until the NAACP and ACLU sued the county and the city. When the county went to district elections in 1989, two African Americans were elected. In Barnwell County the NAACP and ACLU again sued, and the county, under its first district elections, elected three black council members. In 1988 Columbia attorney John Roy Harper II and NAACP attorney Willie Abrams sued Richland County. The county settled before trial; eleven districts were drawn, and four African Americans won election out of the first six districts phased in that year (see table 7.8A).[172]

Role of the NAACP in Litigation

In voting rights litigation, local NAACP members and officers were generally the plaintiffs in suits brought by Buhl, Derfner, Harper, McDonald, and other attorneys in the 1970s and early 1980s. At its annual meeting in 1980, the South Carolina State Conference of Branches resolved to dismantle all at-large systems of elections that diluted African-American voting strength. In 1981 the national NAACP's general counsel, Thomas Atkins, visited the state and brought Margarett Ford, an assistant general counsel. Ford was assigned to South Carolina and worked primarily on the South Carolina House and Senate redistricting as well as on congressional issues. In 1985, Dennis Hayes, NAACP staff attorney responsible for the voting rights docket, joined Ford in South Carolina to work on reapportionment and redistricting. Hayes encouraged local NAACP branches to broaden their grass-roots activism and local participation. His proddings to file section 2 lawsuits in South Carolina fell on the receptive ears of Adell Adams, chair of the Political Action Committee of the state NAACP; John Roy Harper II, general counsel of the South Carolina NAACP; Dr. William E. Gibson, president of the South Carolina State Conference of Branches; and Nelson Rivers, who was hired as executive secretary of the state conference at about the same time Hayes began work in the state. With a statewide network of local branches, the NAACP, beginning in November 1986, made its primary focus local at-large election systems that diluted the votes of South Carolina's African Americans. Rivers, who characterized the at-large system as a dinosaur and "a thing of the past," told NAACP branch presidents that "where there is an NAACP branch president and at-large voting system in the same city or town, one of the two must go."[173] Thus in the late 1980s the South Carolina NAACP, with the full backing of the national office in Baltimore, initiated a number of successful voting rights lawsuits.

Beyond litigation, the NAACP branches have been successful in political negotiations to convince counties, cities, towns, and school boards to voluntarily dismantle at-large systems. For example, the city of Spartanburg, which is 41 percent black, had one African-American city council member, a successful and popular high school football coach. Black citizens wanted more representation, and the local branch of the NAACP in 1987 convinced Hayes, along with Greenville black attorney Michael Talley, to bring suit against the city council. The Justice Department subsequently intervened (having objected to the annexation of a predominantly white area in Spartanburg as early as 16 July 1985). The case in Spartanburg was settled, and African Americans were elected in three of the six single-member districts.[174] Following the successful settlement of the suit against the city, the local NAACP approached the county council with its maps and plans; the county council, in light of the city's decision to settle its lawsuit, agreed to adopt a district plan. A referendum passed in March 1990, and a district plan was implemented that year.

Although litigation was not involved in the Spartanburg County Council change, threat of litigation was clear to all involved. In response to the question, "Do you know the reason the county changed to a district method of electing county officials?" a city official answered, "The NAACP forced the district method."[175] The ACLU, often working with the NAACP, continued its attack in other jurisdictions as well. Cases were often settled; believing that chances of successfully defending citywide or countywide voting were small, local governments adopted district election plans (see table 7.8A). As a result, black representation increased dramatically (see tables 7.5 and 7.5A).

Racial Bloc Voting

Proof of racial bloc voting was a crucial element to the success of lawsuits. In 1965 a Columbia newspaper concluded that "bloc voting in the Piedmont State exists, among Negroes and whites." As evidence, the paper pointed to the 1964 Democratic primary for the South Carolina House of Representatives. "In several local elections of recent vintage," it continued, "with Negro and white candidates in the field, both races have voted with color-consciousness, as blocs."[176] Even in recent years, courts have found that racially polarized voting characterized South Carolina jurisdictions.[177] Defendants in other lawsuits agreed to go to district plans after courts ruled that plaintiffs had established a prima facie case of racial bloc voting.[178] In a recent statewide redistricting lawsuit, the court relied on extensive expert testimony demonstrating ongoing evidence of racially polarized voting.[179] The Department of Justice has also referred to evidence of bloc voting in thirty-eight separate section 5 objections between 1974 and 1992.[180]

A recently published statewide study reinforces judicial findings for particular jurisdictions in South Carolina. Loewen examined precinct-level data from 130 contests held from 1972 to 1984 between black and white candidates. Over two-thirds were elections for local office in both rural and urban jurisdictions from every section of South Carolina. An average of 90 percent of white voters cast their ballots as a bloc for white candidates; African Americans were almost as cohesive, voting for candidates of their own race 85 percent of the time.[181] With such racially polarized electoral behavior, at-large elections in majority-white jurisdictions inhibit African-American representation to a substantial degree. State officials conceded in 1987 that "there are few methods other than at-large election methods to dissuade blacks from voting or seeking council seats."[182] And the research director of the Atlanta-based Voter Education Project observed that "the at-large election system is the most effective tool to deny blacks equal representation. Until the fundamental question of at-large systems is addressed, we're going to have places like South Carolina and North Carolina where blacks are largely underrepresented."[183]

The Impact of Single-Member Districts

A simple method of measuring the impact of election methods on minority representation is to compare the percentage of black officeholders in at-large systems with the percentage elected under district plans.[184] A better method is to compare the proportionality of black officeholders in the two types of system, using an "equity measure," such as the ratio of blacks on council to blacks in the city population. As in the other state chapters in this volume, we have used such measures of black representation to examine the impact of changes in election structure on black officeholding.

County governing bodies are the primary focus of our analysis of South Carolina for several reasons (although data on cities are presented in several tables). Relatively few cities had changed to single-member districts by 1989, and the paucity of cases made it difficult to draw firm conclusions. Moreover, in recent years county councils (along with the state legislature) have been the central battleground in the conflict over election methods. At the time of our survey, voting rights lawsuits and objections by the Department of Justice had affected South Carolina counties to a greater degree than cities. Black electoral efforts, as well as black electoral success, had come mainly on the county level. Finally, we focus on county government because of its significance in South Carolina, especially in rural counties. As recently as 1980, 49.1 percent of all the state's African Americans still lived in rural areas. County governments maintain roads and operate schools. As Blough puts it, counties "have been the most important kind of local government during much of the history of this rural state . . . [and] in recent years counties have undergone the most radical transformation of all local governments."[185]

The indisputable finding of our survey is that African Americans in white-majority counties are more fully represented under single-member-district plans than under at-large systems (see table 7.1A).[186] Counties with mixed plans also elected a higher percentage of African Americans than those with at-large systems, but no blacks were elected to the at-large seats within mixed plans in 1989 (see table 7.3A). Only in black-majority counties did method of election make little difference. Where African Americans were no longer in the minority, at-large elections did not prevent them from winning. The equity measures presented in table 7.4A reveal the same pattern, but demonstrate that even in counties using district elections, African Americans were not elected in numbers corresponding to their percentage of the population.

A before-and-after comparison, as displayed in table 7.2A, demonstrates that changes from at-large to single-member district systems substantially increased minority representation on South Carolina county councils between 1974 and 1989. Whatever their racial composition, counties using at-large elections in 1974 had only a small share of African-American council members. The equity ratio employed in table 7.5A measures the same trend more effectively. In counties between 10 and 29.9 percent black that changed from at-large to districts, the proportionality of black representation increased from a score of 0.15 to 0.82 between 1974 and 1989. In counties between 30 and 49.9 percent black, it increased from 0.08 to 0.72. Although single-shot voting (i.e., voting for only one person when more than one could be elected—a method that sometimes enables blacks to win at-large seats) was possible in at-large systems in South Carolina, counties that retained at-large elections witnessed only a minimal increase in black representation between 1974 and 1989, except where blacks were a majority.[187]

The discriminatory effects of at-large elections are consistent with the evidence presented earlier that voting behavior in South Carolina remains highly polarized along racial lines. The district-by-district results presented in table 7.6A further strengthen this conclusion. In districts less than 30 percent black, only 2 percent of the council members elected in 1989 were African Americans; in those between 30 and 49.9 percent black, only 10.2 percent were. Districts between 50 and 59.9 percent black were, in effect, swing districts; blacks made up, on average, 54.3 percent of the population but comprised only 36.4 percent of the council members elected. In districts 60 percent and above, by contrast, a minimum of 82.2 percent of the council seats were filled by African Americans.

Only a few cities had adopted single-member districts by the time of our survey.[188] For purposes of comparison with other states, we display election results in tables 7.1 through 7.6 for cities of at least 10,000 with a black population of at least 10 percent. (South Carolina has no cities in this category with an African-American majority.) The small number of cities involved minimizes the statistical significance of the findings. We have, however, included every city in each category.

City election results are similar to our findings concerning county councils. The most obvious finding is that single-member-district plans in cities afforded African Americans the best opportuntity to elect candidates of their choice (see table 7.1). Although minority representation in mixed plans was also significantly higher than minority representation in at-large plans, black candidates won only in the district portions of these plans; none won at-large seats in cities with mixed plans (see table 7.3).

The effectiveness of single-member districts in terms of minority representation in cities can be seen clearly from table 7.4. By 1989 the nine white-majority cities that used single-member-distict plans had gone beyond representational parity. The dramatically divergent record of the seven white-majority cities that still used at-large elections demonstrates the detrimental effects of this dilutive device on minority officeholding.

The pattern of change over time in cities is also analogous to the pattern found in county councils. The change from at-large to single-member disticts in white-majority cities greatly increased minority officeholding between 1974 and 1989. While black representation in the nine cities that changed to single-member districts increased tremendously in 1989 over 1974, in the seven cities that retained at-large systems black representation increased only modestly (see tables 7.2 and 7.5).

Table 7.6, showing city data, reinforces our conclusion in Table 7.6A, showing county data, that voting patterns in South Carolina remain divided by race. White-majority districts elected not a single African American to city office. In black-majority districts, on the other hand, African Americans held three-quarters of the seats in districts between 50 and 59.9 percent black and all seats in districts 60 percent black or greater.[189]

Conclusion

Although the struggle for fair elections continues in South Carolina, the Voting Rights Act brought enormous change to the state's politics. The increase in African-American voter registration and turnout almost immediately eliminated the white supremacist rhetoric that had been a hallmark of the state's political leaders. Increased African American representation has come more slowly. Even today, black representation on county councils, city governing boards, and school boards is in general far from proportional. The number of African Americans in state elected offices remains woefully small (see table 7.10). Still, the equity ratio for all county councils at least 10 percent black more than tripled between 1974 and 1989, from 0.21 to 0.71; for the cities we surveyed it increased from 0.07 to 0.85. Most of this increase resulted from the change from at-large to single-member-district plans.

Lawsuits by private plaintiffs, along with Department of Justice objections and litigation, have played a significant role in the shift of South Carolina counties to single-member districts since 1974. Often litigation, or the threat of litigation, prompted a county to submit a change to the Department of Justice, leading then to an objection. Voluntary changes, especially those adopted pursuant to the Home Rule Act in 1976, indicate a growing willingness on the part of some whites in some counties to accommodate minority representation, as well as a growing preference for district elections among whites for nonracial reasons. Not all were as resistant as Edgefield or Sumter.

Nowhere in the state were the changes wrought by the Voting Rights Act more dramatic than in Edgefield County, home of "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman and Senator J. Strom Thurmond. On 1 January 1985, three African Americans were sworn in as county council members, giving them majority control. The ceremony took place in the same courthouse seized at gunpoint by the "Redeemers" of 1876 to prevent African Americans from voting and to control the ballot count.[190] Even when whites later recaptured the majority on the county council in 1986, African Americans retained political influence. In 1984, when African Americans won majority control of the county council, the lame-duck white incumbents responded by signing an unprecedented two-year contract with the incumbent white administrator, in an attempt to tie the hands of the incoming black majority.[191] In 1985 the newly inaugurated county council replaced the incumbent anyway with Dr. Thomas McCain, the black educator who had led the court battles responsible for the victory.[192] When the 1986 elections swung the margin back to a three-two white majority, however, the new council did not replace Dr. McCain, and he remains as Edgefield County administrator today. In the words of local white businessman and publisher of the Edgefield Citizen-News, Bettis C. Rainsford, "I think he's done a helluva job and everybody else does, too."[193] The white-majority council's and white Edgefieldians' acceptance of McCain as county administrator proves that single-member districts can make a difference, even in the home county of "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman.

TABLE 7.1
Black Representation on City Councils in 1989 by Election Plan, South Carolina Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council, 1989
SMD plan
10–29.9	2	18.65	25.00
30–49.9	7	41.73	45.24
50–100	0	—	—
Mixed plan
10–29.9	1	29.47	25.00
30–49.9	4	40.43	33.33
50–100	0	—	—
At-large plan
10–29.9	5	15.56	3.33
30–49.9	2	37.08	15.48
50–100	0	—	—

TABLE 7.1A
Black Representation on County Council in 1989 by Election Plan, South Carolina Counties of 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980[a]

Type of Plan by % Black in County Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in County Population, 1980	Mean % Black on County Council, 1989
SMD plan
10–29.9	9	23.79	14.93
30–49.9	14	40.35	27.45
50–100	9	58.00	41.82
Mixed plan
10–29.9	2	23.45	19.05
30–49.9	2	34.11	14.29
50–100	0	—	—
At-large plan
10–29.9	2	22.24	8.33
30–49.9	2	32.77	7.14
50–100	3	56.79	42.86

[a]Colleton had a multimember district plan, but is included in the single-member-district category. Colleton had two large districts that elected three members from each district. Beaufort had one multimember district, three single-member districts, and three at-large seats and is included in the mixed category.

TABLE 7.2
Changes in Black Representation on City Councils between 1974 and 1989, South Carolina Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black in City Population, 1980	Mean % Black on City Council
			Before Change (1974)	After Change (1989)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	2	18.65	0.00	25.00
30–49.9	7	41.73	2.14	45.23
50–100	0	—	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	29.47	0.00	25.00
30–49.9	4	40.43	4.17	33.33
50–100	0		—	—
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	5	15.56	0.00	3.33
30–49.9	2	37.08	8.34	15.48
50–100	0	—	—	—

TABLE 7.2A
Changes in Black Representation on County Councils between 1974 and 1989, South Carolina Counties of 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Change by % Black in County Population, 1980	N[a]	Mean % Black in County Population, 1980	Mean % Black on County Council
			Before Change (1974)	After Change (1989)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	4	25.06	3.85	20.59
30–49.9	11	40.01	3.39	28.75
50–100	7	56.74	11.43	37.21
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	22.13	0.00	16.67
30–49.9	1	35.31	0.00	0.00
50–100	0	—	—	—
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	2	22.24	0.00	8.33
30–49.9	2	32.77	7.14	7.14
50–100	3	56.79	15.38	42.86

[a]Ns differ from those in table 7.1A because some counties did not have at-large plans in 1974.

TABLE 7.3
Black Representation in 1989 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, South Carolina Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

% Black in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black Councilpersons in District Components, 1989	Mean % Black Councilpersons in At-large Components, 1989
10–29.9	1	33.00	0.00
30–49.9	4	53.33	0.00
50–100	0	—	—

TABLE 7.3A
Black Representation in 1989 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, South Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980[a]

% Black in County Population, 1980	N	Mean % Black Councilpersons in District Components	Mean % Black Councilpersons in At-large Components
10–29.9	2	21.05	0.00
30–49.9	2	28.57	0.00
50–100	0	—	—

[a]Beaufort had three at-large representatives, three single-member districts, and one multimember district from which three representatives were selected. Aiken, Horry, and Saluda county chairpersons were elected at large. These three counties listed their method of election as single-member district. However, because one member was elected at large, the counties were categorized as mixed. Saluda County had no black representatives from the four districts. The black population was dispersed throughout the county so that a district could not be created to give black candidates a majority district.

TABLE 7.4
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Black on City Council in 1989 with Percentage Black in City Population in 1980, South Carolina Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Difference Measure (% on Council − % in Population)	Ratio Measure (% on Council ÷ % in Population)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	2	6.35	1.34
30–49.9	7	3.51	1.13
50–100	0	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	−4.47	0.85
30–49.9	4	−7.1	0.82
50–100	0	—	—
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	5	−12.23	0.23
30–49.9	2	−21.6	0.42
50–100	0	—	—

TABLE 7.4A
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Black on County Council in 1989 with Percentage Black in County Population in 1980, South Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980[a]

Type of Plan by % Black in County Population, 1980	N	Difference Measure (% on Council − % in Population)	Ratio Measure (% on Council ÷ % in Population)
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	4	−4.47	0.82
30–49.9	11	−11.26	0.72
50–100	7	−19.53	0.66
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	−5.46	0.75
30–49.9	1	−35.31	0.00
50–100	0	—	—
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	2	−13.91	0.37
30–49.9	2	−25.63	0.22
50–100	3	−13.93	0.75

[a]These data are calculated directly from 1989 figures in table 7.2A.

TABLE 7.5
Changes in Black Representation on City Councils between 1974 and 1989, South Carolina Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Black in City Population, 1980	N	Black Representational Equity on Council
		1974	1989
		Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	2	0.00	1.34
30–49.9	7	0.05	1.13
50–100	0	—	—
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	0.00	0.85
30–49.9	4	0.09	0.82
50–100	0	—	—
		Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	5	0.00	0.23
30–49.9	2	0.21	0.42
50–100	0	—	—

TABLE 7.5A
Changes in Black Representation on County Councils between 1974 and 1989, South Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980[a] (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Black in County Population, 1980	N	Minority Representational Equity on Council
		1974	1989
	Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	4	0.15	0.82
30–49.9	11	0.08	0.72
50–100	7	0.20	0.66
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	1	0.00	0.75
30–49.9	1	0.00	0.00
50–100	0	—	—
	Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	2	0.00	0.37
30–49.9	2	0.22	0.22
50–100	3	0.27	0.75

[a]These data are calculated from the data in table 7.2A.

TABLE 7.6
Black Council Representation in City Council Single-Member Districts in 1989, South Carolina Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980[a]

% Black Population of District	N	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
0–29.9	35	9.38	0.00
30–49.9	4	33.75	0.00
50–59.9	4	57.20	75.00
60–64.9	4	63.58	100.00
65–69.9	9	66.13	100.00
70–100	15	77.30	100.00

[a]Complete information was obtained on districts in twelve of fourteen cities.

TABLE 7.6A
Black Representation in County Council Single-Member Districts in 1989, South Carolina Counties of 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980[a]

% Black Population of District	N	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
0–29.9	99	15.16	2.00
30–49.9	49	39.82	10.20
50–59.9	22	54.31	36.40
60–64.9	17	62.38	88.20
65–69.9	17	67.20	82.40
70–100	11	75.89	90.90

[a]Complete information was obtained for districts in 30 of 36 counties.

TABLE 7.7
Black City Council Representation in Single-Member Districts in 1989 by Racial Composition of District, South Carolina Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Racial Composition of District	N	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
Black majority	32	70.35	96.88
White majority	39	11.88	00.00

TABLE 7.7A
Black County Council Representation in Single-Member Districts in 1989 by Racial Composition of District, South Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

Racial Composition of District	N	Mean % Black Population in Districts, 1980	Mean % Black Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
Black majority	67	63.17	70.15
White majority	148	23.33	4.73

TABLE 7.8
Cause of Change from At-Large to Mixed or District Plan between 1974 and 1989, South Carolina Cities 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change[a]
	Changed to Single-Member Districts
Charleston	No	Change necessary to secure Justice Department preclearance of annexations; redistricting, 1983
Easley	No	—
Greenwood	No	Change to districts, 1988. Voluntary; consulted with NAACP
Greer	No	Voluntary change at the request of local NAACP in 1987; two black-majority districts out of six; phased in, so that the second black district did not elect until 1989
Laurens	Yes	Glover v. Laurens
Orangeburg	Yes	Owens v. City of Orangeburg
Rock Hill	No	Annexation objection and negotiations with NAACP.
Spartanburg	Yes	NAACP and United States v. Spartanburg
Sumter	No	Change necessary to secure Department of Justice preclearance of annexations, 1986. Negotiations with NAACP

(continued)

TABLE 7.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change[a]
	Changed to Mixed Plan
Aiken	No	—
Anderson	No	Voluntary change, Home Rule Act, 1976; redistricting, 1985
Columbia	No	Voluntary change by referendum to mixed plan in 1982 following successful defense of at-large elections in Washington v. Finlay
Florence	Yes	Jones v. Tedder, C.A. No. 76-831 (D.S.C.), consent decree, 1977; one councilmember elected at large, three from single-member districts, plus mayor; redistricting 1984
Greenville	No	Voluntary change, Home Rule Act, 1977; redistricting, 1983
SUMMARY	Yes	4 (28.6%)
	No	10 (71.4%)

Source: Legal research and interviews with civil rights attorneys; Municipal Association of South Carolina.

[a]Cities of Easley and Aiken could not provide information on reasons for change.

TABLE 7.8A
Cause of Change from At-Large to Mixed or District Plan between 1974 and 1989, South Carolina Counties with 10 Percent or More Black Population in 1980

County	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change
		Changed to Single-Member Districts
Abbeville	Yes	Litigation by NAACP and ACLU: Robinson v. Savitz, Consent Decree (D.S.C.), 1989
Allendale	Yes	Litigation by NAACP: Allendale County NAACP v. Henry Laffitte (D.S.C.), 1976
Anderson	No	Home Rule Act[b]
Bamberg	No	Department of Justice objection, 20 September 1974
Barnwell	Yes	Litigation by NAACP and ACLU: Houston v. Barnwell County (D.S.C.), 1988
Berkeley	No	Home Rule Act
Calhoun	No	Home Rule Act
Cherokee	No	Home Rule Act; referendum
Chester	Yes	Department of Justice objection, 28 October 1977; King v. Roddey, consolidated with United States v. Chester County, (D.S.C.), 1979
Chesterfield	No	Home Rule Act
Colleton	Yes	Department of Justice objections, 6 February 1978, 19 December 1979; Colleton County Council v. United States (D.D.C.), 1982
Darlington	Yes	United States v. Darlington County (D.S.C.), 1986
Dorchester	Yes	Department of Justice objection, 22 April 1974; DeLee v. Branton (D.S.C.), 1974
Edgefield	Yes	McCain v. Lybrand (D.S.C.), 1974–84; Department of Justice objections, 8 February 1979, 11 June 1984
Fairfield	Yes	Litigation by ACLU: Walker v. Fairfield County Council (D.S.C.), 1988; Council asked the ACLU to bring suit. Majority-black county

(continued)

TABLE 7.8A (Continued)

County	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change
		had already elected three of five black council members when elections were at large
Florence	No	Home Rule Act
Georgetown	Yes	Consent Decree; Watkins v. Scoville (D.S.C.), 1982–84
Greenville	No	Home Rule Act
Greenwood	No	Voluntary, but NAACP worked behind scenes
Laurens	Yes	Litigation by ACLU; Beasley v. Laurens County, United States v. Laurens County (D.S.C.), 1988 Consent Decree
Lee	No	Home Rule Act
Marion	No	Home Rule Act
Marlboro	No	Home Rule Act
Newberry	No	Home Rule Act
Orangeburg	No	Home Rule Act
Richland	Yes	NAACP v. Richland County (D.S.C.), 1988
Sumter	Yes	Department of Justice objection, 3 December 1976, Blanding v. Dubose, joined with United States v. Sumter County (D.S.C.), 1978; Sumter County v. United States (D.D.C.), 1982
Union	Yes	Lytle v. Commissioners of Election of Union County (D.S.C.), 1974; Home Rule Act
York	No	Department of Justice objection, 12 November 1974; Home Rule Act; referendum
		Changed to Mixed Plan
Aiken	No	Department of Justice objection, 25 August 1972; Home Rule Act
Horry	Yes	Department of Justice objection, 12 November 1976; Horry County v. United States (D.D.C), 1978

(continued)

TABLE 7.8A (Continued)

County	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change
Saluda	Yes	Litigation by ACLU: Lewis v. Saluda County (D.S.C.), 1983–85, Consent Decree
SUMMARY	Yes	16 (50%)
	No	16 (50%)

[a] Beaufort is not included in this table because it changed before 1974. Spartanburg is not included because it changed after 1989.

[b] In 1975 the Home Rule Act (explained in text) required every county to select a form of government. Twenty-four of the forty-six counties held referendums. If a county did not schedule a referendum, the Home Rule Act assigned, of five government systems, that nearest to the county's 1975 form of government.

TABLE 7.9
Major Disfranchising Devices in South Carolina

Device	Date Established	Date Abolished
White primary	Selected places 1876; statewide, 1896	1947[a] 1947[a]
Separate ballots and boxes for state and federal elections	1878	1895[b]
Reregistration of all voters	1882	One-time measure
Eight Box Law	1882	1895[b]
Appointment of all legislature by local officials	1894	1975[c]
Poll tax	1895	1951[d]
Denial of right to vote for commission of certain crimes	1895	1982[e]
Reregistration of all voters	1896	One-time measure
Literacy test	1895	1965[f]
Understanding clause	1896	1965[f]
Short registration hours and time	1896	1967, 1968, 1986[g]
Lengthy residency requirement	1896	1972[h]
Party loyalty oath	1944	1947, 1948[i]
Local private party clubs	1944	1947, 1948[i]

[a] Elmore v. Rice, 72 F. Supp. 516 (E.D.S.C. 1947), aff'd sub nom. Rice v. Elmore, 165 F.2d 387 (4th Cir. 1947), cert. denied, 333 U.S. 875 (1948).

[b] State constitution (1895). Rendered superfluous by disfranchising features in state constitution.

[c] State legislature (1975).

[d] Amendment to state constitution (1951).

[e] State Legislature (1981); influenced by Allen v. Ellisor, 477 F. Supp 321 (D.S. C. 1979), rev'd and remanded, 664 F.2d 391 (4th cir. 1981).

[f] Voting Rights Act (1965).

[g] Act 443 State Legislature (1967); creation of South Carolina Election Commission (1968); postcard registration (1986).

[h] Unconstitutional in light of Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330 (1972).

[i] Elmore v. Rice (1947); Brown v. Baskin, 78 F. Supp. 933 (E.D.S.C. 1948), aff'd, 174 F.2d 391 (4th Cir. 1949).

TABLE 7.10
Black and White Registered Voters and Officeholders in South Carolina, Selected Years[a]

	Black		White
	N	%	N	%
Registered voters
1964	144,000	17	703,000	83
1966	191,000	21	718,000	79
1990	354,000	26	1,000,000	74
Officeholders
State house
1964	0	0	124	100
1966	0	0	124	100
1990	16	13	108	87
State senate
1964	0	0	46	100
1966	0	0	46	100
1990	5	11	41	89

Sources: South Carolina Election Commission 1990 and 1991; Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies 1990 and 1991; U.S. Commission on Civil Rights 1968, 219, 252–53.

[a]Mean black South Carolina population, 1960–90 = 31.4%.

CHAPTER EIGHT

Texas

ROBERT BRISCHETTO, DAVID R. RICHARDS, CHANDLER DAVIDSON, AND BERNARD GROFMAN

TEXAS is not one of the seven states originally covered by the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act,[1] but it has been a major battleground on which the struggle over minority voting rights has occurred. While the African-American population in Texas is proportionally smaller than that in any of the other seven states, in absolute numbers it is larger. In fact, Texas blacks and Hispanics[2] together—6.3 million strong in 1990—slightly outnumbered the black population of the entire Deep South region composed of Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Georgia, and South Carolina.

The proportion of Texas blacks and Hispanics combined is as great as the black proportion in Mississippi, which has the largest black ratio of any state. In 1990 blacks and Hispanics made up 11.9 and 25.6 percent of the state's population, respectively, for a total of almost 37 percent. Over 96 percent of the remaining inhabitants were Anglos, that is, white non-Hispanics.[3]

A review of the history of minority voting rights in Texas provides a short course in the evolution of the federal government's role in protecting the franchise. At the turn of the century the state established by statute and practice formidable barriers to voting.[4] Today, almost entirely as a result of federal litigation, only vestiges remain to remind us of the lengthy struggle by the state's two largest minority groups for access to the ballot. But voting rights encompass more than the right to cast a ballot and have it fairly counted. They include the right of previously excluded minority groups to have an equal chance to elect their candidates to office. The attack on the infringement of this right is of more recent vintage, and it is far from completion. The present chapter tells the story of minority efforts both to vote without hindrance and to overcome barriers to fair representation.

AFRICAN AMERICANS

The emancipation of slaves in Texas began with the arrival of federal troops in Galveston on 19 June 1865, although some slaveholders refused to free blacks until the fall.[5] An all-white constitutional convention met the following year. The new constitution it produced did not extend the suffrage even to literate blacks; and the first legislature thereafter prohibited "intermarriage, voting, officeholding, and jury service by freedmen."[6] Only with congressional passage of the Reconstruction acts in 1867 were the state's African Americans enfranchised.[7] Thus was established a century-long pattern following emancipation in which Texas officialdom denied the political rights of blacks, whose only recourse was to the federal government.

Congressional Reconstruction, as a precondition for Texas's reentry into the Union, required the enfranchisement of blacks and the convening of a new constitutional convention, which was held in 1868–69. It was dominated by Radical Republicans as a result of widespread refusal by white voters to participate, in protest of federal military rule.[8] Although two-thirds of the votes polled on the convention question were cast by African Americans, who were voting in their first election in Texas, only ten of the ninety-three delegates were black. All but one of the black delegates were from heavily black counties.[9]

Edmund J. Davis, a Republican, became Texas's Reconstruction governor in 1870, and over the next three years black participation in state and local politics was greater than at any time until quite recently.[10] Several black political organizations quickly flourished, and two black senators and twelve representatives were elected to the Twelfth Legislature, the first to be convened under the new constitution. They, too, were mostly elected from heavily black counties.[11] Radical Republicans dominated the legislature for a brief period, and among the most important policies they enacted were ones creating a state police and militia, both of which blacks could join. These organizations helped deal with the violence—much of it racial—that was rampant in the state during that era. Many whites resented them for actions they took against the Ku Klux Klan and for guarding the polls during elections.[12]

The heavy influx of white settlers in the early 1870s enabled the Democrats to recapture both houses of the legislature in the elections of 1872, and the number of black lawmakers was reduced to seven. Governor Davis was defeated by a vote of two to one in 1873. A former Texas governor called the Democrats' victory "the restoration of white supremacy and Democratic rule."[13] Reconstruction in Texas was over.

Another constitutional convention was held in 1875, this one, as in 1866, controlled by white Democrats. The six black delegates, however, were among a bloc that prevented establishment of a poll tax as a voting requirement. But they were unable to derail a bill mandating segregated schools. The gerrymandering of predominantly black counties diminished black and Republican candidates' opportunities for judicial and legislative seats.[14] An Austin newspaper, speaking of the black-belt counties, said "districts were 'Gerrymandered,' the purpose being, in these elections, and properly enough, to disfranchise the blacks by indirection."[15]

From the end of Reconstruction to the turn of the century, the political situation of Texas blacks declined, slowly at first and then, in the 1890s, with increasing momentum. The result, as in the other southern states, was disfranchisement.[16] In the 1870s, associations of whites had sprung up in the black-belt counties, the purpose of which was to prevent the election of blacks to office. When this failed, "local whites, as in other parts of the South, resorted to extra-legal devices such as fraud, intimidation, intrigue, and murder."[17] Pitre gives a chilling and detailed account of this terror in the Texas black belt following Reconstruction—a terror that differed little, according to Smallwood, from that in the Deep South states during the same period.[18]

White conservative opposition to black political participation increased with the growth of third parties, in which blacks played a significant though not a leading role. The most famous of these was the Populist party, which developed rapidly as an expression of agrarian discontent and peaked in 1896. As a result of the intimidation and violence that white Democrats directed at the Populists—basically a biracial coalition of impoverished farmers—the extremely high voting rates in gubernatorial races of the 1880s and 1890s dropped sharply from over 80 percent of adult males, black and white combined, to about 50 percent in 1902.[19]

In 1901 the legislature voted to submit a constitutional amendment to the electorate requiring payment of a poll tax as a voting requirement. Ratified the following year, it went into effect in 1904, by which point the turnout rate of adult males had dropped still further to 37 percent.[20] The legislature in 1903 and 1905 enacted laws that codified the poll tax, encouraged use of the exclusive white primary by the major parties, and established an annual four-month registration period that ended nine months before the general election. The effect of these developments, along with the discouragement of black participation by the "lily white" faction of the Republicans, was to depress black voter participation from 100,000 in the 1890s to about 5,000 by 1906.[21] Exclusion of African Americans from the two major parties was virtually complete, and inasmuch as nomination in the Democratic primary was tantamount to election, black disfranchisement was a fait accompli.

The banning of Texas blacks from the political system a generation after emancipation was a terrible blow to them, for they had not only enjoyed the freedom to vote but had elected several of their number to state and local office. Between 1871 and 1895 at least forty-one served in the legislature—thirty-seven in the house and four in the senate.[22] Many more were elected to city and county office during this period, largely from counties that were majority black or contained a significant black minority.[23]

Mexican Americans

Mexican Americans also were gradually disfranchised in Texas in the late-nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, although never to the extent as were blacks. From one perspective, they did not represent as great a threat to local Anglo domination as did blacks at the time because, except in a few counties between the Mexican border and the Nueces River, they made up only a small percentage of the population. In 1887, when blacks comprised 20 percent of the state's population, Tejanos made up 4 percent.[24] Only in the late 1940s did Tejanos numerically surpass blacks, as the black ratio continued to decline. By 1960 "Spanish-heritage" people—to use the census term—constituted 15 percent of the Texas population, while blacks comprised 12 percent.[25] The 15 percent figure, however—the highest up to that point in the twentieth century—overstates the size of the potential Hispanic electorate; throughout the century, many Tejanos were not citizens and could not vote.[26]

Even so, from the state's earliest days Mexicans in South Texas counties were a matter of political concern to the Anglos, some of whom tried during the 1845 Texas constitutional convention to exclude them as voters. While these efforts failed, Tejanos were nonetheless subsequently denied the vote in certain districts. Even where they had voting rights, "protests and threats from Anglo-Americans were constant reminders of a fragile franchise."[27] Their ability to influence election results was greatest in the urban areas along the border, where they were concentrated. In the rural areas they were powerless. Here, it was only as Anglo patrones (bosses), typically large landholders whose relation to the peones was almost feudal, began to organize the Mexican vote around the time of the Civil War did their vote become relatively secure. But under these circumstances, it was a manipulated vote.

The possibilities for political access that an urban setting offered were demonstrated in San Antonio, which had a large Mexican population when Texas became part of the United States.[28] In the decade between 1837 and 1847, fifty-seven of the city's eighty-eight aldermen were Spanish-surnamed. As the Mexican proportion of the population dropped, however—which it did throughout the century—so did the number of Mexican officials. In the decade between 1875 and 1884, for example, only two of the sixty-nine aldermen had Spanish surnames.[29]

The rise of boss rule along the Rio Grande in the latter half of the nineteenth century led to sharp and sometimes bitter disputes in the early twentieth century between "reformers" and the machines.[30] The conflict was typical of Progressive Era battles over control of the electoral structure in that the challengers, some of whom organized into Good Government Leagues, used the rhetoric of "good government" and "honest elections" to justify their politics of self-interest. Often the reformers were small Anglo farmers newly arrived in the fertile Rio Grande Valley and resentful of the large landholders—also usually Anglos—and their control of the Mexican-American vote. A particularly bitter conflict of this kind in Dimmit County led the reformers to create a White Man's Primary in 1914. The local newspaper announced that the organization "absolutely eliminates the Mexican vote as a factor in nominating county candidates, though we graciously grant the Mexican the privilege of voting for them afterwards."[31] The conflicts between South Texas reformers and machine bosses, therefore, offered Tejanos a choice between disfranchisement and a manipulated vote.

Some of the machines continued into the post–World War II era. Duval County, whose stuffed ballot boxes were crucial for Lyndon B. Johnson's razor-thin senatorial victory in 1948, remained under the control of the notorious Parr machine until 1975.[32] Key found in the late 1940s that several South Texas counties exhibited the tell-tale signs of machine control in their voting returns: many victories of landslide proportions and voters' "remarkable fickleness in attachment to particular candidates." When LBJ defeated former governor Coke Stevenson in the 1948 senatorial election thanks to the lopsided Duval County vote, the loser complained about the landslides there and in surrounding counties. Boss George Parr pointed out that Stevenson had solicited his support in four previous elections and won by similar margins. "And I never heard a complaint from him then about the bloc vote in Duval County," Parr remarked.[33]

The disfranchisement of Tejanos through exclusive primaries was not unique to Dimmit County. Democrats in Gonzales County had barred both blacks and Tejanos from their primaries in 1902.[34] "White men's primaries" at the local level were frequently mentioned in the literature on Tejano politics. M. C. González, for example, a founder of the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) in 1929, listed among the conditions facing Mexican Americans in Texas during the 1920s "the establishment of 'white man's' primaries to prevent blacks and Mexican Americans from exercising their right of suffrage."[35] Kibbe, writing in the 1940s, mentions the existence of a local white primary, called the White Man's Union, in four South Texas counties.[36] De Leon mentions a White Man's party in Duval County existing in 1892.[37] Shelton quotes the constitution of the White Man's Union Assocation in Wharton County as excluding "any Mexican, who is not a full Spanish blood."[38]

Restrictive registration rules, too, were directed at Mexicans. Laws making it difficult for Mexican citizens to vote in Texas were opposed at the time of passage by Jim Wells, a conservative Democrat who was one of the most powerful South Texas bosses.[39] (A county was later named for him.) In 1918 the legislature passed a bill prohibiting interpreters at the polls. This law was clearly aimed at voters who had difficulty with English—a lack of proficiency that was undoubtedly encouraged by discrimination in the schools, including the widespread segregation of Tejanos.[40] Thus, like blacks, Texas Mexicans were not only victims of an oppressive social and economic system that in many respects resembled a classic caste society; by law and custom they were deprived of the means to change their situation through effective political participation.

The Battle to Abolish the White Primary

Soon after turn-of-the-century disfranchising laws were passed, Texas blacks, supported by the newly formed National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), began to challenge the system of political discrimination. They focused their first major efforts on the white primary. In varying numbers, blacks actually had continued to vote in some Texas nonpartisan municipal elections after 1905. Through litigation, blacks in Waco successfully challenged a nonpartisan white primary in 1918. This and some notable manifestations of black voter influence in San Antonio were apparently behind the legislature's 1923 law providing that "in no event shall a negro be eligible to participate in a Democratic primary election held in the State of Texas."[41] While county Democratic parties across the state had already pretty thoroughly prohibited black participation by that time, the new law gave explicit state sanction to the practice.

Dr. Lawrence A. Nixon, a black El Paso physician, was quick to challenge this law, and the Supreme Court in Nixon v. Herndon (1927)[42] concluded that it violated the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause, holding that "color cannot be made the basis of a statutory classification affecting the right set up in this case."[43] To circumvent the ruling, the legislature soon enacted a replacement statute designed to shift the burden of disfranchisement from the state to political parties. The new law authorized "every political party in the State through its State Executive Committee . . . to prescribe the qualifications of its own members."[44] The State Democratic Executive Committee (SDEC) took this cue and adopted a resolution limiting participation to "white Democrats . . . and none other."[45] Dr. Nixon, with NAACP counsel, sued again, and the Supreme Court in Nixon v. Condon (1932)[46] also invalidated that scheme as simply an extension of the earlier unconstitutional exclusion. The Court reasoned that the SDEC did not have the authority to act for the party; consequently, it was simply acting for the state and, in so doing, violated once again the equal protection clause. But the party's state convention, said the Court, had such authority. Within a month after the opinion, to no one's surprise, the convention adopted a resolution prohibiting African Americans from participation in the Democratic primary.

Richard Randolph Grovey, a black Houstonian, attacked the new rule in yet another suit. At issue was whether the party was a private, voluntary organization or an instrument of the state. Plaintiffs argued that the primary was conducted under state authority and thus was protected by the Fifteenth Amendment. The unanimous Court, in Grovey v. Townsend (1935)[47] held otherwise, invoking an earlier Texas supreme court decision which declared that political parties were voluntary associations, not creatures of the state.[48]

The single most important organization concerned with African American voting rights in Texas or elsewhere at this time was the NAACP. Urbanization and the growth of a black middle class in Texas cities provided the basis for a black leadership class that was somewhat freer to participate in civil rights activities than was possible in small towns. Beginning in the late 1930s, a new generation of leaders, typified by Dallas businessman A. Maceo Smith, revived existing local chapters, created new ones, and developed a dynamic statewide conference. Working with such figures in the national office as Walter White and Thurgood Marshall, the new black Texas leadership—including Juanita Craft in Dallas; and Lulu White, Carter Wesley, and Hobart Taylor, Sr., in Houston—coordinated and funded a number of major legal efforts.[49]

Largely as a result of this group's work, in collaboration with Thurgood Marshall, general counsel of the newly formed NAACP Legal Defense Fund, the Supreme Court again addressed the constitutionality of the white primary in 1944. The Court's membership was changing. In an earlier case involving New Orleans voting fraud, United States v. Classic (1941),[50] it had held that "where the state law has made the primary election an integral part of the procedure" of choice, "or where in fact the primary effectively controls the choice, the right of the qualified elector to vote and have his ballot counted at the primary, is part of the right" protected by article 1 of the Constitution.[51] This led Dr. Lonnie Smith, a Houston dentist, to challenge the Texas white primary using the same logic as the Court espoused in Classic. Capping twenty years of litigation on the issue, the Court, in Smith v. Allwright (1944),[52] overrode its prior reasoning in Grovey that the Texas Democratic primary was distinct from the state electoral apparatus. On the contrary, the Court now said, because state law regulated the Democratic primary, which selected nominees to be included on the general election ballot, the primary was an agency of the state. The exclusion of blacks from the party's nominating process thus violated the Fifteenth Amendment, which forbids denial of the franchise on the basis of race.

The Smith decision was announced in April, and significant numbers of Texas blacks voted in the July 1944 Democratic primary. In 1946 their turnout in the primary was estimated at 75,000–100,000, in about the numbers at which they had voted during the high point of black participation in the 1890s.[53] Yet the raw figures are deceiving. Whereas a turnout of 100,000 in 1896 represented perhaps as much as 90 percent of the black potential (male) electorate of the day, in 1946 it constituted only about 20 percent of the (male and female) black electorate.

Litigation over racially exclusive primaries concluded with Terry v. Adams (1953).[54] The Supreme Court there condemned the "Jaybird primary" that had arisen in Fort Bend County in the nineteenth century to exclude African Americans from meaningful electoral participation. Strictly speaking, this device was not a primary but an exclusively white pre-primary conducted by the local Jaybird party to determine the preferred candidate of white voters, thereby avoiding the risk of dividing their vote in the Democrat primary. Defendants, who described their whites-only group in court as a "good government" measure,[55] argued that the Jaybirds, unlike the Democratic party, were not part of the state's official election machinery and, hence, were constitutional. The Court held otherwise.

Barriers to Registration

Texas, unlike most other southern states, never had a literacy test. However, the poll tax in Texas operated as a limitation upon the right to vote in federal elections until 1964 and in state elections until 1966. Statewide constitutional referendums to abolish the tax had failed, although evidence indicated that it still had an impact on turnout in the 1960s, especially among low-income voters. Simmons reported in the early 1950s that the tax, "although a small sum ($1.75), costs the [South Texas Mexican] laborer most of a day's wage."[56] The same was true of many blacks in rural East Texas, and of poor whites generally.

The Twenty-fourth Amendment, prohibiting the tax as a voting requirement in federal elections, was ratified by the required thirty-eight states in 1964. Texas was one of five at that time which still maintained the tax.[57] The Voting Rights Act of 1965 instructed the U.S. Attorney General "forthwith" to challenge in court the enforcement of any poll tax used as a voting requirement. He quickly brought suit against Texas, and a federal court in United States v. State of Texas (1966)[58] found that the state's poll tax was unconstitutional, having originally been imposed for the purpose of disfranchising black voters. The legislature, dominated by the conservative Democratic wing led by Governor John Connally, promptly replaced the tax with an almost equally onerous annual voter registration system. The new law, which, like the recently invalidated one, required the voter to register in a four-month period ending 31 January in order to vote in November elections, was ruled unconstitutional by a federal court in Beare v. Smith (1971).[59] The court concluded that "it is beyond doubt that the present Texas voter registration procedures tend to disenfranchise multitudes of Texas citizens otherwise qualified to vote."[60]

Texas did not surrender gracefully. In 1975 the legislature enacted a new voter registration statute that would effectively have purged the state's entire election rolls and required reregistration of the state's voters. As Congress the same year had extended coverage of section 5 of the Voting Rights Act to Texas, the new voter registration system became the first Texas statute challenged under it.

The state, in Briscoe v. Levi (1976),[61] failed in its attempt to block extension. At about the same time, a federal court enjoined the implementation of the proposed statutory purge of the voter rolls in Flowers v. Wiley (1975).[62] Since then Texas has had a registration statute that permits enrollment up to thirty days before any election. The system seems to have operated without objection for a number of years.

An impediment that disproportionately burdened minority candidates for office was removed by elimination of the excessive candidate filing fees required by Texas law. The Supreme Court in Bullock v. Carter (1972)[63] concluded that "the very size of the fees imposed under the Texas system gives it a patently exclusionary character . . . [and] there is the obvious likelihood that this limitation would fall more heavily on the less affluent segment of the community."[64] That segment was disproportionately made up of minority persons.

No story of minority registration efforts in Texas would be complete without mention of the prolonged struggle of students at Prairie View A. & M. to register to vote. Prairie View is a predominantly black university located in rural Waller County near Houston, the only Texas county in 1970 with a majority-black population. Texas by statute attempted to prevent students from registering to vote in the communities where they attended college, a limitation declared unconstitutional in Whatley v. Clark (1973).[65] Nonetheless, the local tax assessor steadfastly frustrated attempts of Prairie View students to register in Waller County.[66] The extension of section 5 to Texas finally enabled a successful attack upon this exclusion of African American voters in Symm v. United States (1979).[67] Immediately thereafter a successful attack was made on the apportionment of the Waller County commissioners court for its failure to include students in determining county population. The resulting reapportionment produced the county's first black county commissioner.[68]

Minority Groups in the Voting Rights Movement

Most of the voting rights litigation in Texas until the 1970s focused on the unconstitutional barriers to participation faced by blacks rather than Mexican Americans, for various reasons: the degree of black exclusion was more extreme; blacks had historically been a larger group in the state; and, perhaps for the first two reasons, blacks were more inclined toward litigation. It was only in the 1960s that Tejanos began to come into their own as a statewide political force, although they had been emerging as an important part of the Texas liberal coalition at least since the 1950s.[69]

The decade of the 1960s witnessed the rise of the Chicano movement, a surge of militant activity among the younger generation of Mexican Americans that quickly spread throughout the Southwest. In Texas, the decade began with the involvement of old-line Tejano organizations in the 1960 presidential campaign. The Viva Kennedy clubs played an important role in carrying Texas by a narrow margin for the Democratic ticket, and gave impetus to a broad-based coalition formed in 1962, the Political Association of Spanish-Speaking Organizations (PASO). In 1963 the teamsters union, PASO, and a number of independent militants joined in a historic uprising in which the city council of a small South Texas town, Crystal City, was entirely filled by an all-Tejano slate. This victory, while short-lived, received nationwide coverage in the news media and presaged a new day for Mexican Americans in Texas politics. A farmworkers movement, along the lines of the one led by Cesar Chavez in California, was also partly inspired by PASO, and confrontations between strikers and the Texas Rangers, long considered by growers and the local Anglo establishments of South Texas as their personal police force, fanned a wave of militance that surged across Texas college campuses, leading to such Chicano groups as the Mexican American Youth Organization (MAYO) that established La Raza Unida party. High school students in South and West Texas towns in the late 1960s boycotted classes in support of fair treatment and greater prominence for the teaching of Mexican culture.

These developments had their roots in self-help groups that Mexican-American veterans founded soon after World War I, such as Sons of Texas, Sons of America, and Knights of America, all of which were united into LULAC in 1929. This organization would play a significant role in politicizing Tejanos locally and fighting discrimination through legal means. Recent scholarship, moreover, has revised the notion that these early organizations, as well as the G.I. Forum, founded by World War II veterans, were primarily concerned with assimilation into Anglo culture and politically ineffective.[70] Considering the racist Texas milieu of the period, the accomplishments of LULAC, the G.I. Forum, and leaders of those groups, such as Professor George I. Sanchez and Dr. Hector Garcia, were in the long term quite effective.

Grass-roots organizations, for example, played a significant role in the 1948 election of Gustavo Garcia to the San Antonio school board, a watershed event in Texas electoral politics. LULAC was active in the 1957 election in El Paso of Raymond Telles, a moderate reformer and the first Hispanic mayor of a major southwestern city in the twentieth century.[71] Such groups were involved in Henry B. Gonzalez's election to the San Antonio city council in 1953 and to the Texas senate in 1956, where he immediately became an eloquent opponent of discrimination against not only Tejanos, but blacks and poor whites.[72]

Yet not until the Mexican-American statewide political mobilization during the 1960s did voting rights litigation begin to shift its focus of concern toward Mexican Americans.[73] This was due largely to the establishment of two organizations. Modeled on the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF) was created in 1968 with financial support from the Ford Foundation, and the lawsuits brought by its attorneys focused increasingly on the special electoral problems confronting Tejano voters. The Southwest Voter Registration Education Project (SVREP) was founded by San Antonio activist Willie Velásquez in 1974. One of its primary purposes was to register Tejanos, and it appears to have made great strides on that score. When the project began its work in 1976, 488,000 Mexican Americans were registered in Texas. Ten years later, approximately 1 million were, even though their registration rates remained much lower than those of blacks or Anglos.[74] But in addition to its registration drives, SVREP's legal staff also became involved in voting litigation. Between 1974 and 1984 SVREP and MALDEF filed eighty-eight suits in widely scattered Texas jurisdictions.[75]

One of the first successful voting cases brought by MALDEF was Garza v. Smith (1970).[76] This action challenged Texas election laws that enabled voting officials to assist physically handicapped voters but did not permit assistance to voters who were not proficient in English. The argument in Garza foreshadowed the broadening of section 5 coverage to Texas five years later. In its 1975 extension of the act, Congress concluded that "where State and local officials conduct elections only in English, language minority citizens are excluded from participating in the electoral process."[77] Congress therefore brought under section 5 coverage some of those states and counties that had historically failed to provide multilingual election materials.[78]

Various private attorneys and legal aid lawyers, including liberal Anglos, were also active in voting rights litigation during this period. Litigation by attorneys with the federal Legal Services Corporation was partly responsible for efforts by conservative Republicans during the Reagan and Bush administrations to abolish the organization, or, failing that, to at least prohibit it from filing voting suits.

Minority Vote Dilution

The elimination of barriers to registration and voting in Texas often did not result in the election of minority candidates, even in jurisdictions with significant numbers of minority voters. Several structural roadblocks remained, the most noteworthy of which were multimember districts (including at-large elections), racial gerrymandering, and malapportionment. Such barriers diluted minority voting strength when bloc voting among Anglos combined with certain election rules to prevent a cohesive bloc of minority voters from electing candidates of their choice. Largely for this reason it was not until 1966 that the first African Americans in this century became nominees of the Democratic party for any elective public office in Texas above the level of voting precinct official, even though black candidates had run for office at least as far back as 1920.[79]

Mexican Americans, too, faced numerous barriers to political office, although by 1967 there were ten Tejano state legislators—nine in the house and one in the senate—compared to only three blacks.[80] While Mexican-American voters as early as the 1940s were described as tending to prefer candidates of their own ethnicity "on the rare occasions when they appear on the ballot," the same electoral mechanisms that prevented blacks from winning office operated against their candidates, too. "Anglo American politicians have always recognized this tendency," wrote Simmons in 1952, "and have tried to cope with it, when no other means were available, by putting up a second Mexican candidate of their own choosing in order to split the Mexican vote."[81]

Simmons also pointed to the well-known phenomenon of a nonpartisan slating group operating through at-large elections. He quoted a county commissioner: "Candidates are usually nominated on a ticket which is made up by a private group that invites the candidate to run." While any candidate was free to oppose the ticket, "independent candidates seldom have a chance."[82] Several lawsuits in the 1970s and 1980s pointed to the existence of the standard electoral mechanisms of minority vote dilution operating against Tejano candidates: at-large elections, gerrymandered districts, the numbered-place system, and others.[83]

The first successful challenge to legislative malapportionment in Texas, at least in modern times, occurred after the 1960 census, when population disparities in legislative districts were huge. The boundaries had not changed significantly since 1921.[84] A state constitutional prohibition on the number of legislative seats per county had contributed to overrepresentation of the shrinking rural population at the expense of the rapidly expanding urban one, which contained great numbers of minority voters. The largest senatorial district, for example, contained 1,243,158 persons, while the smallest one had 147,454. A majority of the senators could be elected by as few as 30 percent of Texas voters.[85] Kilgarlin v. Martin (1966)[86] was a broad-based attack on the 1960 Texas legislative redistricting plans. In preliminary rulings, the senate and house apportionment was found to violate the one-person, one-vote principle recently established by the Supreme Court in Reynolds v. Sims (1964).[87] Texas constitutional provisions limiting the number of senators and legislators who could be elected from any given county were invalidated, and apportionment of the Texas senate was required on the basis of population equality.

The legislature responded with a new apportionment plan that, among other changes, increased the number of legislators in Harris County (Houston) from twelve to nineteen and in Dallas County from nine to fourteen. In the case of Harris

County, for the first time state representatives were to be elected in three county multimember subdistricts rather than countywide. Senate districts—which had been and remained single-member districts—were also carved into subdistricts of Dallas and Harris counties to meet one-person, one-vote criteria. In spite of clear instances of racial gerrymandering against blacks in the Harris County state representative districts under the new apportionment scheme,[88] the initial result of these changes in 1966 was the election of the first three black Texas legislators to serve since 1895.

Barbara Jordan, who had twice failed to win election to the state house of representatives when she ran at large in Harris County, was elected from one of the new Houston senate districts (one, significantly, that contained a black and Mexican-American majority), becoming the first black Texas senator to hold office since 1883. Curtis Graves won a house seat from a multimember Harris County subdistrict. In addition to these two victories resulting from boundary changes, Joe Lockridge, also black, was elected at large to the state house from Dallas County after being slated by the Dallas Committee for Responsible Government (DCRG), a powerful white-dominated slating group that would soon receive federal court scrutiny.[89]

A major breakthrough in minority legislative representation came after the 1970 census. Blacks and Tejanos—aided by a group of minority and Anglo lawyers and political scientists—jointly attacked the system of multimember countywide legislative districts in Dallas and Bexar counties, arguing that, in conjunction with other discriminatory actions, the arrangement diluted minority votes in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Graves v. Barnes (1972)[90] the three-judge federal court agreed, mandating single-member legislative districts for both counties. This decision was unanimously affirmed by the Supreme Court in White v. Regester (1973),[91] the first case in which it sustained claims of at-large vote dilution.

The Court had earlier asserted in Whitcomb v. Chavis (1971) that multimember district systems "may be subject to challenge where the circumstances of a particular case may 'operate to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial or political elements of the voting population.' "[92] However, until White the Supreme Court had never been persuaded that such circumstances existed. In fact, in Whitcomb the Court had rejected a trial court finding that an at-large legislative districting scheme in Indiana operated unconstitutionally to cancel out minority voting strength. Similarly, the Supreme Court had upheld a Texas trial court conclusion in Kilgarlin v. Hill (1967)[93] that the state's at-large legislative districts did not unconstitutionally deprive African Americans of their voting rights. Against this discouraging backdrop, the plaintiffs' victory in White took on special significance.

The Graves decision had both immediate and long-term consequences. The immediate result was a significant increase in the number of blacks and Mexican Americans from Dallas and San Antonio, respectively, elected to the Texas legislature in November 1972. In the second round of Graves v. Barnes (1974),[94] the state's remaining multimember legislative districts were also found to dilute minority voting strength. Single-member legislative districts were created in the Texas counties of Tarrant (Fort Worth), El Paso, Travis (Austin), Nueces (Corpus Christi), Jefferson (Beaumont), McLennan (Waco), Lubbock, and Galveston. In most instances, this resulted in the election of the first minorities to the legislature from those counties.

An upsurge in voting litigation across Texas followed White. Applying the principles established in that case, minority plaintiffs made a number of Fourteenth Amendment attacks on at-large elections to city councils and school boards. Using one-person, one-vote arguments under Avery v. Midland County (1968)[95] and White minority vote-dilution principles, black and Tejano voters also attacked county government apportionment schemes throughout Texas, the 254 counties of which have long been governed by a commissioners court consisting of four commissioners elected from single-member districts and a county judge elected at large. The first city to change its at-large council elections as a result of vote-dilution litigation was Nacogdoches in deep East Texas; after black plaintiffs won at trial, the city in 1975 settled a lawsuit while the case was on appeal, and subsequent elections produced the city's first black council member. The first successful legal attack on at-large elections to a Texas city school board occurred in Waco. The trial court ordered the creation of single-member districts for both the city council and school board, and this arrangement was sustained in Calderon v. McGee (1978).[96]

After the extension of section 5 to Texas in 1975 as a result of the state's large Spanish-language population, attacks based on Fourteenth Amendment arguments developed in White and section 5 objections by the Justice Department produced some form of single-member-district elections in most major Texas cities, including Houston, San Antonio, and Dallas. These changes led to noteworthy increases in the number of elected minority officials, as will be shown below. Vote-dilution litigation, however, has affected not simply the large urban centers but cities as small as Jefferson, with a 1980 population of fewer than 3,000, where plaintiffs won at trial and a single-member-district plan was imposed.[97]

Similar breakthroughs occurred in county reapportionment litigation. For example, a federal court ruling in Weaver v. Nacogdoches County (1974)[98] produced a new reapportionment plan and the election of the first black Texas county commissioner in this century. Another East Texas reapportionment case resulted in the first federal court finding of a racial gerrymander in the drawing of district lines. In Robinson v. Commissioners Court, Anderson County (1974)[99] the court held that "the most crucial and precise instrument of the Commissioner's denial of the black minority's equal access to political participation, however, remains the gerrymander of precinct lines so as to fragment what could otherwise be a cohesive voting community. . . . This dismemberment of the black community . . . had the predictable effect of debilitating the organization and decreasing the participation of black voters in county government."[100]

The extension of section 5 to Texas was a major advance in securing minority voting rights. Justice Department intervention in Texas after 1975 either prevented many potentially dilutionary measures or required them to be counterbalanced with additional election changes that restored or enhanced minority voting strength. Thus, when the city of Houston annexed territory, some of which included virtually all-white suburbs, and thus diminished the proportion of blacks and Mexican Americans in the city, the Justice Department entered an objection, based in part on evidence of racially polarized voting in Houston council elections presented by plaintiffs in Greater Houston Civic Council v. Mann,[101] an unsuccessful constitutional challenge to the city's electoral structure tried in 1975. The city's options were to contest the objection in federal court in Washington, D.C., deannex the territory, or change the council's at-large election system to include at least some single-member districts. The city took the latter course, following a citywide referendum, and adopted a mixed plan of nine single-member districts and five at-large posts, in addition to the mayor's at-large office.[102] Justice Department intervention under section 5 was also instrumental in San Antonio's change from an at-large to a pure single-member-district plan in 1977.

Between the time Texas was brought under section 5 coverage in 1975 and December 1990, the Justice Department interposed 131 objections to voting procedures in the state. Many of these objections were to multiple infractions of voting law within a single jurisdiction.[103] The infractions embraced the spectrum of illegal procedures: racial gerrymandering, discriminatory purges of registered voters, imposition of numbered posts and the majority runoff requirement, annexations that diluted minority votes, a faulty bilingual oral assistance program, reduction in the number of elected officials, transfer of duties from one official to another, and unfair changes in election dates. One can only speculate about the number of discriminatory changes that would have occurred but for the deterrent effect of section 5.

Reviewing the results in the forty-one instances in Texas where they could identify a change from at-large to mixed or district plans in the 1970s, Davidson and Korbel found the percentage of black and Mexican-American officeholders had increased from 11 to 29 percent of the total in those jurisdictions (6 to 17 percent for blacks, 5 to 12 percent for Mexican Americans). Put differently, before the change, minority officeholders were underrepresented by a factor of three; afterward, they were almost proportionally represented. City councils, school boards, junior college boards, and multimember legislative districts were included in the study; increases in minority representation occurred in every type of unit.[104] This was the only before-and-after study published in the 1970s or 1980s that examined the impact of at-large elections on Mexican Americans, and its findings contrasted sharply with most of the research on this issue that utilized cross-sectional data. The reason, we believe, is that cross-sectional studies seldom control for residential dispersion of Mexican Americans, which is greater than it is for blacks.[105] Our own data, reported below, corroborate Davidson and Korbel's findings.[106]

One of the most far-reaching results of Texas voting litigation is contained in the 1982 congressional amendments of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, passed to overcome the effects of City of Mobile v. Bolden (1980),[107] in which a plurality of the Supreme Court held that at-large elections were not unconstitutional unless the they had been "conceived or operated" intentially to discriminate. In amending section 2 to allow a showing of discriminatory result as sufficient proof of dilution, Congress explicitly incorporated into the statute the vote-dilution principles first established in 1972 by the federal trial court in Graves v. Barnes and then adopted in the language of White v. Regester.[108]

The impact of amended section 2 was clearly seen in Campos v. City of Baytown (1988).[109] The appeals court affirmed a trial court finding that the at-large election system for Baytown's city council violated section 2. Despite the presence of sizable black and Mexican-American communities in the city at the time of trial, no minority member had ever been elected to the Baytown council. Yet the plaintiffs would have been hard put to show that the at-large system, which dated from 1947, was adopted to frustrate minority candidates. Under amended section 2, however, plaintiffs used voting statistics to prove the dilutionary effect of the at-large system.

The pace of section 2 voting rights litigation in Texas remained lively at the end of the 1980s. In 1989 courts first heard attacks on the at-large election of trial and appellate judges in Texas. In both cases the trial courts concluded that at-large electoral systems violated section 2, and required single-member districts as a remedy. In Rangel v. Mattox (1989),[110] the trial court found that the at-large electoral system of the Thirteenth Court of Appeals, situated in South Texas, discriminated against the Tejano voters of the Lower Rio Grande Valley. The court sanctioned a plan consisting of six single-member districts. In LULAC v. Mattox (1989),[111] the trial court concluded that at-large election of district judges in the state's urban counties similarly violated minority voting rights of blacks and Mexican Americans under section 2.

On appeal of the LULAC decision, the Fifth Circuit, sitting en banc, held that section 2 did not apply to judicial elections. This decision effectively blocked any immediate change in Texas judicial elections. The Supreme Court reversed in Houston Lawyers Association v. Attorney General of Texas (1991),[112] holding that judicial elections were indeed covered by section 2. As a result, the issues presented in Rangel and LULAC are now back before the Fifth Circuit. These cases would seem to portend significant changes in the method of selecting the Texas judiciary.

The extent and diversity of voting rights actions and Justice Department intervention in Texas is suggested by a list compiled by Korbel in connection with lawsuits challenging the method of electing judges. The list contains Justice Department objections or privately brought actions concerning vote dilution between 1972 and 1989 in a mere twenty-county area of South Texas. (The state contains 254 counties.) Targeted were voting procedures for school boards, city councils, county commissioners courts, the state legislature, and justice of the peace courts.

There were fourteen objection letters from the Justice Department in seven of the counties, and at least fourteen vote dilution cases won by plaintiffs or settled out of court in a manner favorable to plaintiffs.[113]

The Impact of Voting Rights Litigation in Texas Cities

We now systematically examine changes in voting structures in Texas cities. As part of a collaborative effort in several states, we measured the extent of change between 1974—the year before section 5 was extended to the state—and 1989 in all Texas municipalities of 10,000 or more persons that had a combined black and Hispanic population of at least 10 percent according to the 1980 census.[114] The purposes were, first, to learn how rapidly black and Tejano officeholding had progressed; second, to determine the extent to which such progress was linked to the existence of single-member-district and mixed plans (the latter composed of both district and at-large seats); and, third, in the event that there was a linkage, to find out whether the creation of districts was the result of litigation under the Fourteenth Amendment (as in Graves and its progeny), litigation or Justice Department objections under the Voting Rights Act, or voluntary action by city governments.

Methods

Our research design followed in broad detail the above-mentioned longitudinal study by Davidson and Korbel.[115] However, as Grofman pointed out soon after the research was reported, the design lacked a control group.[116] The design for the present study therefore includes not only cities that abandoned at-large elections for district or mixed plans but those comparable Texas municipalities which did not change their at-large council structure between 1974 and 1989.[117] During this period the number of African-American and Hispanic elected municipal officials in all Texas cities increased from 59 to 138 and from 251 to 463, respectively.[118]

Minority Representation in Texas Cities

Table 8.1 is a cross-sectional view of minority representation on city councils in 1989 by type of election plan and percentage of minority population within each type.[119] Because most studies examining the relation between election plans and minority representation have used a cross-sectional design, table 8.1 provides a point of comparison with them. It shows that in cities that were majority Anglo, combined minority representation in 1989 was greater in district than in at-large systems, when the effects of minority population size were controlled for. However, at-large cities had better minority representation than districted ones in cities where blacks and Hispanics were a majority, although this seemed to be at least partly the result of the at-large cities having, on average, a larger minority population percentage than either mixed or district plans. (In other words, if the effects of minority population were controlled in the 50–100 percent category, as they are, in effect, in table 8.5, the at-large advantage in these cities would diminish.) But this latter finding should not be allowed to obscure the most important pattern in table 8.1: the advantage to minorities in district-based majority-Anglo cities—for it is in these cities where the at-large system is said to be particularly dilutive of minority votes.

As explained in the Editors' Introduction, cross-sectional studies typically do not control for a number of factors besides minority population that can affect minority representation. In addition, cross-sectional data collected from a sample of cities after many of them have changed their method of election may reflect a "selection bias" because the remaining at-large cities may not be typical of at-large cities in general—a possibility that is examined in chapter 10.

Table 8.2, utilizing a before-and-after design with a control group, measures minority percentages on all city councils at two points fifteen years apart: in changed cities before and after the shift from at-large elections occurred; and in unchanged cities at the same two points, 1974 and 1989.[120] Among majority-Anglo cities, those changing from at-large to single-member districts between 1974 and 1989 witnessed sharply increased minority (black plus Hispanic) percentages on council following the change. Large changes also occurred in the cities that adopted mixed plans. These positive changes occurred for both blacks and Tejanos separately, generally speaking. Among unchanged at-large cities, on the other hand, there was an actual decrease in minority representation in one population category, and only a modest rise in the other.

So far we have controlled only roughly for the effects of a city's minority population on minority representation, by categorizing the data according to three sets of minority population ranges. To refine this control, we employ the concept of representational equity, or proportionality, which is simply a comparison of cities' percentage of minority council members with their percentage of minority inhabitants. There are two standard measures of proportionality—differences and ratios—the strengths and limitations of which Grofman has discussed elsewhere.[121]

Table 8.4, presenting 1989 cross-sectional data, shows some of the same patterns in tables 8.1 and 8.2. Whether using the difference measure or the ratio measure of equity, we find in majority-Anglo cities that single-member-district and mixed cities were generally more representative than at-large ones, and usually they were strikingly so—at least where blacks were concerned. Tejanos did not follow this pattern so clearly. They were less well represented than blacks in every type of system, except in some minority-Anglo cities (where the majority of the population was overwhelmingly Hispanic, not black). Nonetheless, it was generally true that in majority-Anglo cities, Tejanos were more equitably represented in cities that had adopted at least some districts than in those that had not.

Table 8.5, comparing equity ratios in 1974 with those in 1989, gives an even clearer picture than does table 8.2 of the effects of the shift from at-large elections in those cities of less than 50 percent minority population. It essentially corroborates the findings in tables 8.1, 8.2, and 8.4. The experimental cities underwent sharp increases in combined minority representational equity during the fifteen years, while the control cities made generally unremarkable gains when they made any gains at all.[122] The impact of the new election systems is best seen by focusing on equity ratios in the majority-Anglo cities that changed to pure single-member districts, and comparing them to ratios in the cities that remained at-large.

	1974		1989
	Blacks	Hispanics	Blacks	Hispanics
		Changed to Districts
10–29.9%	0.38	0.18	1.32	0.35
30–49.9%	0.13	0.15	1.12	0.95
		Remained at large
10–29.9%	0.62	0.37	0.80	0.21
30–49.9%	0.58	0.24	0.75	0.50

Within each population category, mean minority equity scores in the control cities were better in the early year—1974—than in cities that later changed to districts, a fact that was true for both ethnic minorities. This was at a time, obviously, when all the cities in the table elected council at large. By 1989, the situation was completely reversed: the mean equity scores in all categories of the cities that switched to districts were greater than those, in the comparable population categories, in the cities that had kept their at-large systems. Again, this was true for both blacks and Mexican Americans. This consistent reversal was the result, in most cases, of hefty increases in minority equity scores as cities switched to district elections. Part of the reversal, on the other hand, was due to the fact that in the twenty-six cities of less than 30 percent minority population that kept at-large systems—representing one-fourth of the total number of cities analyzed—there was an actual drop in the mean equity score of Mexican Americans (0.37 to 0.21) and only a modest rise for blacks (0.62 to 0.80) over the fifteen-year period. This is an important finding, we believe, in light of the claim by some critics of the Voting Rights Act that Anglo Texas voters were much more likely to vote for minority candidates in at-large settings by the end of the 1980s than they were even a decade or two earlier.

In 1989 both Tejanos and blacks in the majority-Anglo unchanged cities were still underrepresented, although Tejanos were more so. Had the changed cities not adopted new election structures—so the data for the cities in the control group suggest—their minority voters would still be far less well represented than they were in 1989, and perhaps, in some cases, even less well represented than in 1974. In summary, table 8.5 presents strong evidence for a causal link between election systems and proportionality of minority representation in majority-Anglo cities.[123] This link exists for both Tejanos and African Americans.

The findings in table 8.5 contrast to those of a recent cross-sectional study of American cities of at least 50,000 population with minority populations of less than 50 percent, which found a relatively small difference in 1988 black representational equity scores between at-large and districted cities.[124] This may well be the result, in part, of the studies' different population thresholds, assuming that racially polarized voting is greater in smaller cities.

There may be another reason for the different results as well. Table 8.5 shows clearly that the cities that changed election systems had, on average, significantly lower minority equity scores in 1974 than those which remained at-large. This suggests that any cross-sectional study today of Texas cities which attempts to measure the impact of election structures on minority representation may be subject to a bias resulting from the selection effect: Our sample of cities that in 1989 were districted contained a disproportionate number that in 1974 were among the "worst cases" of at-large cities, in terms of minority representation. Assuming that the worst cases were most liable to vote-dilution litigation and thus were most likely to change to districts, a cross-sectional study in 1989 would contain a sample of at-large cities from which the worst ones in 1974 were removed ("selected"), in which case the comparison of at-large and district cities would understate the difference in minority representation between at-large and districted cities, in contrast to what it would have been had the changes to district systems not occurred.

Yet another important fact emerges from table 8.5. Despite the frequently heard assertion that the evolving nature of voting rights law now requires at-large cities to adopt district systems, the Texas case shows otherwise. There are 83 cities in the table with a minority population between 10 and 50 percent, yet 38 (46 percent) still maintained at-large systems in 1989, in spite of two decades of aggressive legal challenges to such structures across the state and seven years of section 2 litigation—some of it in these very cities. Nor is it true that these at-large cities failed to change because minorities were proportionally represented on council. As the table shows, minority populations in the majority-Anglo unchanged cities were only about half as well represented as one would expect if ethnicity were not a factor. In 22 of the 38 unchanged cities, moreover, no blacks sat on council in 1989; in 30 of these cities, no Tejanos did; and in 19 cities—exactly half—neither a black nor a Tejano was a council member. The number of cities among the 38 that had neither blacks nor Tejanos on council actually increased slightly between 1974 and 1989: from 21 to 22.

The dynamics of change in the minority-Anglo cities are difficult to fathom, given only the data in table 8.5. Contrary to the facts in majority-Anglo cities, when predominantly minority cities (which in our sample are all predominantly Hispanic ones) switch to districts, there is either little increase in representational equity or an actual decrease. In fact, minority equity of representation increased more sharply in the unchanged cities where, at 0.97, it was greater by 1989 than in either other type of changed cities (0.80 and 0.72, respectively).

What could account for this? The minority-Anglo unchanged cities had an average minority population of close to 80 percent. If voting were racially polarized, as in the case of many at-large majority-Anglo cities, then the Mexican-American population could easily have determined the makeup of city council. Why they were less equitably represented in changed cities—particularly pure district ones—is unclear. One possible answer is that because changes from at-large plans in minority-Anglo cities are less likely to be the result of litigation or Justice Department objections, the drawing of district boundaries may not be as closely supervised, and this might work to the disadvantage of minority voters. On the other hand, inasmuch as there was significant minority representation on these cities' councils even before the changes occurred, one would expect the boundaries not to be patently disadvantageous to minority voters.

Whatever the explanation of this anomaly in majority-minority cities, the focus of our inquiry must be kept on the Anglo-majority cities, because they are the ones that present the classic conditions for minority vote dilution. Our findings in table 8.5 demonstrate clearly that when such cities shifted to districts, minority representation increased sharply, in contrast with cities that retained at-large elections.

The Effects of Mixed Plans on Minority Representation

A significant proportion of cities shifting from at-large plans chose mixed systems. Past research indicates that they typically fall between single-member-district systems and at-large ones in the equity of black representation. The data on blacks in table 8.5 conform to that pattern. The most plausible reason is that a mixed system is made up of both the least and most representative election methods. It is useful to examine the results of these two methods separately in order to see how mixed systems work.

Table 8.3 compares minority representation in the at-large and district components of mixed cities in 1989. It shows that most of the black representation can be attributed to the district rather than to the at-large component of the majority-Anglo plans. For Hispanics, the pattern was less clear, primarily because they were sharply underrepresented in both components. It is noteworthy, in light of these findings on blacks, that a federal court in Williams v. City of Dallas (1990) held that the at-large seats in the Dallas city council's mixed system diluted the voting strength of blacks.[125]

The Link between Minority Population Percentage and Minority Representation in Single-Member Districts

Table 8.6 shows 1989 minority representation in single-member districts in cities with mixed or pure single-member-district plans. There were 57 cities with at least some districts, but we were unable to obtain 1980 population data for districts in

12. The data base consists of the 257 districts in the 45 cities for which we did obtain complete information. The rule of thumb often mentioned is that a district must have a population of about 65 percent of a particular minority group in order to provide that group with a realistic opportunity to elect a minority candidate.[126] Table 8.6 indicates that for blacks in Texas, majority-black districts somewhat below that level were usually sufficient. However, about 5 percent of the nonblack population in majority-black districts was Hispanic, and the presence of Hispanics in such districts, as we shall see, can provide an advantage to black candidates.

In contrast to blacks, Hispanic candidates at no level were assured of victory, although their chances increased sharply when districts became majority-Hispanic. Yet even here, Hispanic districts often had significant numbers of blacks in the population. For minorities in general—where African Americans and Hispanics are treated as one group—the finding is much the same as for Hispanics. At the 70 percent level and above, 91.7 percent of officials were minority members.

Tables 8.6 and 8.7 shed light on another question: How well were blacks and Hispanics represented in majority-Anglo districts? If race did not play a significant role in whites' voting behavior, we would expect the answer to be, very well. The most useful data in table 8.6 for addressing this issue is the third set, which allows us to determine how likely it was that either blacks or Hispanics were elected from districts that were less than 50 percent black and Hispanic combined. The answer is, relatively few. Only 2.5 percent of the council members in the 147 districts less than 30 percent black and Hispanic belonged to the two ethnic minorities. The figure increased to 16.7 percent in the 29 districts 30–49.9 percent black and Hispanic. But it is obvious that the overwhelming majority of black and Hispanic council members were elected from districts in which Anglos were a relatively small minority. Data in table 8.7 corroborate this. In the 176 districts that were majority-Anglo, only 4.5 percent of the council members from those districts were black or Hispanic. Anglos did not fare much better in the 32 majority-black and 31 majority-Hispanic districts: they comprised 6.2 and 12.9 percent of the council members, respectively. These findings are consistent with the assumption that racially polarized voting was strong in most Texas cities during this period.

Minority Representation in Multiethnic Districts

Blacks and Tejanos often reside in contiguous or overlapping neighborhoods. Census data indicate that in 1980 both groups' residences were still highly segregated from those of Anglos in most of the larger Texas cities.[127] Many districts contained large numbers of both ethnic groups, although not a majority of either. In this circumstance, did minority candidates have a reasonable chance of winning office? The answer is provided by table 8.7, which contains data on the 257 districts analyzed in table 8.3 above. By examining minority council representation in districts with different ethnic compositions, we are able to see the benefits accruing to minority candidates in situations where minority coalitions are possible.

As might be predicted on the basis of table 8.3, table 8.7 shows that minority candidates had a very good chance in districts with a sizable African-American or Tejano majority and a very poor chance in districts with a sizable Anglo majority. The average black-majority district was 66.5 percent black, and the average percentage of minority officeholders was 93.8 percent. The average Hispanic-majority district was 66.4 percent Hispanic, and the average percentage of minority officeholders was 87.1 percent. The average Anglo-majority district was 82.3 percent Anglo, and the average percentage of minority officeholders was 4.5 percent. The table also shows that minority-plurality districts elected a significant number of minority candidates, as did Anglo-plurality districts in which blacks and Hispanics combined made up a slight majority. This is consistent with the interpretation that the minority groups help each other's candidates in these circumstances.

The Causes of Structural Changes in Texas Cities

In a fifteen-year period, fifty-two cities in our sample changed to some form of district plan; this represents structural change of a magnitude not witnessed in Texas since the widespread adoption of at-large plans in connection with the commission form of government during the Progressive Era.[128] The foregoing evidence, moreover, points to a causal link between the adoption of district systems and greatly increased minority representation on city councils.

To determine the causes of the structural changes, we sent questionnaires to all city attorneys in municipalities in our sample that had shifted from at-large to district or mixed systems between 1974 and 1989. Follow-up questionnaires were sent to nonrespondents after three weeks, and then telephone calls were made to those cities still not responding. The reasons officials gave for the changes were tabulated, and then compared with a data set obtained from voting rights lawyers throughout the state, consisting of lawsuits challenging at-large elections in Texas municipalities going back to the late 1960s. The information from these two sources was then combined and presented in table 8.8.

The table shows that twenty-nine (56 percent) of the fifty-two cities of 10,000 people or more that adopted single-member-district or mixed plans did so after a lawsuit was filed. (An additional city changed solely as the result of a section 5 objection.) In some cases, the suit alleged unconstitutional vote dilution; in others, it alleged violation of sections 2 or 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

There is not always a direct relation between the filing of a lawsuit (several of which were settled out of court) and a change in election structure. In some instances, city councils had already begun to discuss changing the election structure when the suit was filed. On the other hand, it is clear that in numerous cities, suits were necessary to compel councils to create districts in which minority candidates could have a fair opportunity to win.

Even where no suit was filed, it is obvious from the replies of various city attorneys that some of the changes had resulted from petitions by minority citizens for a change or from threats of a suit that the city could well have lost while incurring considerable costs. As one attorney put it who described his city's 1984 change as voluntary: "There was some perception among council members that districts were the wave of the future and would best be determined locally rather than by a lawsuit." Another attorney who described his city's change as voluntary said, "Because of recent changes in the law, [our city] felt a voluntary move to single member districts to be more efficient from an economic and political standpoint." Referring to changes that occurred shortly after the congressional amendment to section 2, these remarks demonstrate that the Voting Rights Act was very much on the minds of city council members in deciding to make the change. Earlier research on the causes of election law shifts in Texas corroborates this fact.[129]

Other city attorneys who described the process in their municipality as voluntary pointed out that there is no sharp distinction between voluntary and legally forced change. In reality, most cities changed because minority leaders or city officials were at least aware of the evolution in voting rights law, the effects of which they had heard about as other jurisdictions underwent legal challenges to their at-large elections. (One of the best-attended sessions of the annual meeting of the Texas Municipal League in the late 1970s was a workshop for city attorneys on voting rights litigation.) While some cities that changed voluntarily may have done so simply because they believed it was the right thing to do, legal developments in neighboring jurisdictions made the decision much easier.

Conclusion

A historical examination of minority voting rights in Texas from 1865 to the present reveals a continuing struggle by blacks and Mexican Americans to realize their voting rights in full measure. The very touchstone of democratic citizenship, these rights confer not only the ability to cast a vote without hindrance in every type of public election, but to have a reasonable chance to elect a candidate of one's choice. At the very least, this means an equal opportunity for a cohesive group of minority voters to elect their candidates when cohesive Anglo opposition systematically prevents them from doing so.

The struggle has been difficult and expensive, and at times has cost the lives of those who have taken part. White Texas officialdom, until the mid-1970s dominated by the conservative wing of the Democratic party, generally opposed the minority communities' quest for equal access to the ballot. The battles won by minority plaintiffs and their Anglo allies—most of whom belonged to the liberal wing of the Democrats—have taken place almost exclusively in federal courtrooms as a result of constitutional challenges, the extension of section 5 coverage to Texas in 1975, and the amendment of section 2 in 1982, which has eased burdens on plaintiffs in proving vote dilution.

Black Texans were actively involved as plaintiffs, lawyers, and fund-raisers in the series of white primary cases from the early 1920s until Terry v. Adams in 1953, which opened party activity once again to many southern blacks. Soon after the Voting Rights Act was signed, lawsuits began to challenge malapportioned districts and multimember election structures. The battle between racial liberals and conservatives over restrictive registration laws was fought until 1971, when, in Beare v. Smith, the liberals prevailed, even though rearguard efforts by white registrars in various counties to exclude blacks continued into the 1990s.[130]

Invoking the Fourteenth Amendment, MALDEF began its attack, in Garza v. Smith (1970), on the failure of registrars to allow assistance to voters not proficient in English. Also in the early 1970s minority plaintiffs and lawyers belonging to the three major ethnic groups, aided by academic experts, launched a series of constitutional challenges against dilutionary structures in municipalities, school districts, community college districts, the legislature, and Congress. These efforts played an important role in increasing the number of black and Tejano officeholders in these bodies. White v. Regester (1973), a Texas legislative redistricting case, was the first minority vote-dilution challenge in the United States to win in the Supreme Court.

In 1975, ten years after passage of the Voting Rights Act, its special provisions, including those in section 5, were extended to Texas. Bilingual ballots in Tejano areas became the norm. The Justice Department began to object to changes in election structures, and Texas jurisdictions were soon the target of the largest number of objections in any covered state. In just five years, between 1975 and 1980, the Attorney General objected to eighty-six proposed changes in Texas, significantly more than the fifty-three changes objected to in Mississippi in the fifteen-year period between 1965 and 1980.[131]

In the 110 Texas cities of 10,000 or more persons with a 1980 combined minority population of at least 10 percent, 52, including the state's 4 most populous, changed from at-large to single-member-district or mixed plans between 1974 and 1989. Of those, more than half—29—changed after a lawsuit was filed. Nineteen of the 29 suits were resolved after 1982, when section 2 was amended. This suggests that a decisive majority of the lawsuits that accompanied change were tried under the Voting Rights Act. In 3 of the 52 cities that changed—2 in which a lawsuit was filed, 1 in which it was not—section 5 objections also entered into the process, resulting in change. Finally, of the 22 changed cities in which neither a lawsuit nor an objection was instrumental in the switch, most of them adopted single-member districts after 1982, and city attorneys in some of them acknowledged frankly that the change came about as a result of amended section 2. Their cities decided to adopt districts before a lawsuit would have forced the issue. For this reason it seems probable that the great majority of the 52 cities adopted some form of districting plan as a direct or indirect result of the act.[132] And as we have demonstrated, the creation of districts has been responsible for much of the increase in minority officeholding.

This survey has shown how the evolution in constitutional and statutory law from the 1940s to the 1990s has developed in response to the growing demand for equal participation of previously unrepresented blacks and Mexican Americans. In the course of this evolution, powerful tools have been fashioned that make manipulation of the election system by racial conservatives more difficult. While this achievement alone is not sufficient to enable racial and language minorities to achieve full integration into American society, it certainly represents necessary and important progress toward that goal.

TABLE 8.1
Minority Representation on Council in 1989 by Election Plan, Texas Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Hispanic Population in 1980[a]

Type of Plan by % Minority in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Minority in City Population, 1980			Mean % Minority on City Council, 1989
		Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic
SMD plan
10–29.9	12	14.9	8.9	23.9	19.6	3.8	23.4
30–49.9	10	22.2	14.5	36.6	25.5	10.8	36.2
50–100	4	3.4	66.5	69.9	2.5	53.3	55.8
Mixed plan
10–29.9	15	10.0	12.4	22.3	9.9	9.8	19.7
30–49.9	14	17.8	22.1	39.9	18.5	10.4	28.9
50–100	2	3.3	58.3	61.6	0.0	35.4	35.4
At-large plan
10–29.9	26	8.5	9.8	18.4	6.8	2.1	8.8
30–49.9	12	17.7	20.6	38.3	13.3	10.4	23.6
50–100	15	0.9	76.4	77.3	1.7	71.3	73.0

[a]One city is omitted from this table because it elected council from multimember districts.
Note: In tables 8.1–8.7, the "Black + Hispanic" percentages are not the summed row values of blacks and Hispanics. Rather, these percentages are derived from the raw data.

TABLE 8.2
Changes in Minority Representation on Council between 1974 and 1989, Texas Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Hispanic Population in 1980

Type of Change by % Minority in City Population, 1980	N[a]	Mean % Minority in City Population, 1980			Mean % Minority on City Council
					Before Change (1974)			After Change (1989)
		Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic
Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	9	14.6	10.6	25.1	5.6	1.9	7.4	19.3	3.7	23.0
30–49.9	9	23.9	12.5	36.4	3.2	1.9	5.1	26.7	11.9	38.6
50–100	4	3.4	66.5	69.9	3.1	47.5	50.6	2.5	53.3	55.8
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	14	10.3	12.7	23.0	2.6	1.8	4.4	9.5	10.5	20.0
30–49.9	13	17.5	23.2	40.6	7.6	3.8	11.4	19.0	11.1	30.2
50–100	1	5.1	46.6	51.8	16.7	50.0	66.7	0.0	37.5	37.5
Unchanged Systems
At-large plan
10–29.9	26	8.5	9.9	18.4	5.3	3.7	8.9	6.8	2.1	8.8
30–49.9	12	17.7	20.6	38.3	10.2	4.9	15.1	13.3	10.4	23.6
50–100	14	0.9	77.0	77.9	0.0	65.4	65.4	1.8	73.6	75.4

[a]The number of cities in table 8.2 (102) is smaller than that in table 8.1 (110) because in five cases the changes from an at-large plan occurred before 1974 or the change was not from an at-large but from a mixed plan; and in three cases data on minority council members for the year 1974 were not available.

TABLE 8.3
Minority Representation in 1989 in Mixed Plans by District and At-Large Components, Texas Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Hispanic Population in 1980

% Minority in City Population, 1980	N	Mean % Minority, Councilpersons in District Components, 1989			Mean % Minority, Councilpersons in at-Large Components, 1989
		Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic
10–29.9	16	13.8	9.3	23.0	2.1	9.4	11.5
30–49.9	13	24.8	12.3	37.1	9.5	7.9	17.4
50–100	2	0.0	63.3	63.3	0.0	0.0	0.0

TABLE 8.4
Two Equity Measures Comparing Percentage Minority on Council in 1989 with Percentage Minority in City Population in 1980, Texas Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Hispanic Population in 1980

Type of Plan by % Minority in City Population, 1980	N[a]	Difference Measure (% on council − % in Population			Ratio Measure (% on Council ÷ % in Population
		Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic
Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	9	4.7	−6.9	−2.2	1.32	0.35	0.92
30–49.9	9	2.8	−0.5	2.3	1.12	0.95	1.06
50–100	4	−0.9	−13.2	−14.1	0.74	0.80	0.80
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	14	−0.8	−2.2	−3.0	0.92	0.83	0.87
30–49.9	13	1.6	−12.0	−10.4	1.08	0.48	0.74
50–100	1	−5.1	−9.1	−14.3	0.00	0.80	0.72
Unchanged Systems
At-large Plan
10–29.9	26	−1.8	−7.8	−9.6	0.80	0.21	0.48
30–49.9	12	−4.4	−10.3	−14.7	0.75	0.50	0.62
50–100	14	0.9	−3.4	−2.5	1.96	0.96	0.97

[a]The cities in this table are the same ones as in table 8.2.

TABLE 8.5
Changes in Minority Representation on City Council between 1974 and 1989, Texas Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Hispanic Population in 1980 (Ratio Equity Measure)

Type of Change by % Minority in City Population, 1980	N[a]	Mean Minority Representational Equity on Council
		1974			1989
		Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic
Changed Systems
From at-large to SMD plan
10–29.9	9	0.38	0.18	0.29	1.32	0.35	0.92
30–49.9	9	0.13	0.15	0.14	1.12	0.95	1.06
50–100	4	0.91	0.71	0.72	0.74	0.80	0.80
From at-large to mixed plan
10–29.9	14	0.25	0.14	0.19	0.92	0.83	0.87
30–49.9	13	0.43	0.16	0.28	1.08	0.48	0.74
50–100	1	3.27	1.07	1.29	0.00	0.80	0.72
Unchanged Systems
At-large Plan
10–29.9	26	0.62	0.37	0.48	0.80	0.21	0.48
30–49.9	12	0.58	0.24	0.39	0.75	0.50	0.62
50–100	14	0.00	0.84	0.84	1.96	0.96	0.97

[a]The cities in this table are the same ones as in table 8.2.

TABLE 8.6
Minority Representation in Council Single-Member Districts in 1989,[a] Texas Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Hispanic Population in 1980

		Mean % Minority Population in Districts, 1980			Mean % Minority Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
% Ethnic Population	N	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic
Black
0–29.9	212	6.4	20.6	27.0	3.3	16.0	19.3
30–49.9	13	37.1	22.8	59.8	53.8	7.7	61.5
50–59.9	3	55.5	2.4	58.0	100.0	0.0	100.0
60–64.9	13	62.4	4.2	66.6	84.6	0.0	84.6
65–69.9	7	67.2	4.8	72.0	100.0	0.0	100.0
70–100	9	75.7	5.1	80.8	100.0	0.0	100.0
Hispanic
0–29.9	200	17.2	8.6	25.7	18.0	2.0	20.0
30–49.9	26	13.0	39.5	52.5	19.2	26.9	46.1
50–59.9	10	9.5	54.3	63.9	10.0	80.0	90.0
60–64.9	6	9.4	63.2	72.6	16.7	66.7	83.4
65–69.9	6	5.8	67.3	73.1	16.7	66.7	83.4
70–100	9	2.6	81.3	83.9	0.0	88.9	88.9
Black + Hispanic
0–29.9	147	5.3	8.2	13.5	0.6	1.9	2.5
30–49.9	29	12.4	26.8	39.2	6.7	10.0	16.7
50–59.9	13	26.9	28.9	55.8	53.3	26.7	80.0
60–64.9	16	34.1	29.3	63.4	58.8	29.4	88.2
65–69.9	16	37.1	30.0	67.1	43.8	43.8	87.6
70–100	36	37.5	41.6	79.1	55.6	36.1	91.7

[a]Data were available for 45 of the 57 cities with districts.

TABLE 8.7
Minority Council Representation in Single-Member Districts in 1989 by Ethnic Composition of District, Texas Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Hispanic Population in 1980

		Mean % Minority Population in Districts, 1980			Mean % Minority Councilpersons in Districts, 1989
Ethnic Composition of District	N	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic	Black	Hispanic	Black + Hispanic
Black majority	32	66.5	4.4	71.0	93.8	0.0	93.8
Hispanic majority	31	6.8	66.4	73.2	9.7	77.4	87.1
Anglo majority	176	6.5	11.3	17.7	1.1	3.4	4.5
Black + Hispanic majority (no single group a majority) with:
Black plurality	2	46.0	21.0	67.0	100.0	0.0	100.0
Hispanic plurality	8	22.1	44.9	67.0	50.0	50.0	100.0
Anglo plurality	8	28.7	27.5	56.2	37.5	12.5	50.0

TABLE 8.8
Cause of Change from At-Large to Mixed or District Plan between 1974 and 1989, Texas Cities of 10,000 or More Population with 10 Percent or More Combined Black and Hispanic Population in 1980

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change[a]
		Changed to Single-Member Districts
Beeville	No	City secretary said 1974 change was the result of pressure brought by Hispanic leaders. School district system had recently been overturned through voting rights litigation.
Cleburne	No	City Attorney said change was the result of black leaders' activities.
Corsicana	No	There were no activities or threats by minority leaders, but city attorney said city was mindful of changes elsewhere.
El Paso	No	Threat of a lawsuit from an Anglo civic club that felt its interests were slighted; also some Hispanic involvement.
Ennis	No	Not due to activities of minority leaders, but charter commission was made up of people "from all ethnic groups."
Fort Worth	No	Voting rights attorney George Korbel said change was made "under threat"; city attorney said it was voluntary, but was seen "as necessary and would have been required in the future."
Henderson	No	City attorney said minorities requested change but made no threat.
Jacksonville	No	City attorney refused interview.
Laredo	No	Voting rights attorney Korbel said threat was necessary; city attorney denied it.
Levelland	Yes	Esparza and Herrera v. City of Levelland; settled, 1986.
Longview	No	No threat of suit or minority activity.
Lubbock	Yes	Jones v. City of Lubbock; plaintiffs won at trial, 1981.

(continued)

TABLE 8.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change
Lufkin	Yes	David v. Garrison; plaintiffs won at trial; 5th Cir. reversed; parties settled, 1978.
Marshall	Yes	Wilson v. City of Marshall; settled before trial.
Palestine	Yes	Robinson v. Rodgers; settled in 1976.
Plainview	No	City attorney imputed change to "recent changes in the law," referring to amended section 2.
Port Lavaca	Yes	Rodriguez v. City of Port Lavaca; settled in 1984.
San Angelo	No	Voting rights attorney Korbel said change occurred "under threat"; city attorney said it was voluntary, resulting from a petition from minorities and others.
San Antonio	Yes	Martinez v. Becker; after suit was filed, section 5 objection to annexation triggered establishment of new plan. City attorney nonetheless described the change as "voluntary." New plan adopted in 1977.
Sweetwater	No	City attorney said change was voluntary.
Terrell	Yes	PCVO v. City of Terrell; plaintiffs won at trial.
Texarkana	No	City acceded in minority leaders' request.
Tyler	Yes	Square v. Halbert; settled in 1976.
Waco	Yes	Calderon v. Waco I.S.D. and City of Waco; plaintiffs won. Sustained by 5th Cir. in 1978.
		Changed to Mixed Plan
Alvin	Yes	Binkerhoff v. City of Alvin; settled in 1985.
Baytown	Yes	Campos v. City of Baytown; plaintiffs won at trial, and city in 1989 adopted an interim plan while case was on remand from 5th Cir. (In 1992 a permanent single-member district plan was adopted.)

(continued)

TABLE 8.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change
Beaumont	Yes	Moore v. City of Beaumont; city adopted plan in 1984 after suit was filed. City attorney said process began before suit was filed.
Big Spring	Yes	LULAC v. City of Big Spring; settled in 1983.
Brenham	No	City attorney said change was not connected to racial issues.
Brownfield	Yes	Davila v. City of Brownfield; settled in 1986.
Corpus Christi	Yes	Alonzo v. Jones; plaintiffs won at trial, new plan adopted in 1983.
Dallas	Yes	Lipscomb v. Wise; plaintiffs won at trial in 1975. (Mixed system was later challenged and replaced with a single-member-district plan in 1991.)
Denison	No	City attorney said there were no threats, but plan was adopted because it was "the wave of the future."
Denton	No	City attorney refused interview.
El Campo	No	City attorney said there were no threats, no racial activists.
Grand Prairie	No	Blacks filed petition; leadership was provided by white "populist" mayor.
Hereford	Yes	Aguero v. City of Hereford; settled in 1985.
Houston	Yes	Greater Houston Civic Council v. Mann; city won at trial, but changed system in 1979 following section 5 objection to subsequent annexations. Objection was based in part on data collected by plaintiffs at trial.
La Porte	No	Section 5 objection to intended charter revision led to change in 1979.
Lamesa	Yes	Sorola v. City of Lamesa; settled in 1984.
McKinney	No	Request was made by black leaders.
Midland	Yes	LULAC v. City of Midland; settled in 1985.

(continued)

TABLE 8.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change
Nacogdoches	Yes	Weaver v. Muckleroy; plaintiffs won at trial. Case settled in 1975 while on appeal.
New Braunfels	Yes	Torres v. City of New Braunfels; settled in 1984.
Odessa	No	Black council member requested change, according to city attorney.
Port Arthur	Yes	City of Port Arthur v. United States; original plaintiffs lost constitutional case (Mosley v. Sadler). City then tried to annex white residential areas. Private plaintiffs and the Department of Justice filed suit under section 5 and ultimately won, in a case that was decided by the Supreme Court in 1982. City attorney refused interview.
Snyder	Yes	Peña v. City of Snyder; settled in 1987.
Taylor	Yes	Thompson v. City of Taylor, settled in 1985. Earlier plaintiffs, who had filed suit in the 1970s, nonsuited in the wake of Bolden v. City of Mobile, for lack of evidence of discriminatory intent.
Temple	No	Voting rights attorney Korbel said change made "under threat"; city attorney said it was voluntary. City changed twice: once in 1977, again in 1989.
Texas City	Yes	United States v. City Commission of Texas City; the Department of Justice filed a constitutional and section 2 suit in 1977. Shortly before trial in 1978 the city, by referendum, adopted a charter amendment creating a mixed plan; the case was dismissed without prejudice as moot.
Victoria	Yes	Mata v. City of Victoria; settled. But city attorney's office, almost a decade after the suit was filed, said the change was "completely voluntary."

(continued)

TABLE 8.8 (Continued)

City	Did Lawsuit Accompany Change?	Lawsuit/Reason for Change
Wichita Falls	Yes	Vasquez v. City of Wichita Falls; settled before trial in 1985.
SUMMARY	Yes 29 (56%) No[b] 23 (44%)

Sources: Plaintiffs' attorneys' records; telephone interviews with city attorney's or secretary's office in cities; interviews with George Korbel, voting rights attorney with Texas Rural Legal Aid, and Gerald Hebert, Department of Justice.

[a]There are minor discrepancies between the classification of a few cities' election plans in this table—derived from a telephone survey of the cities in 1989—and that derived from records of plaintiffs' attorneys who tried the cases between 1974 and 1989. In some instances, the attorneys classified a city as single-member district, and the city classified it as mixed, or vice versa. Two cities in table 8.1 are absent from this table because they changed from mixed to single-member-district plans rather than from at-large plans.

[b]One of these twenty-three cases involved a change resulting from a section 5 objection.

TABLE 8.9
Major Disfranchising Devices in Texas

Device	Date Established	Date Abolished
White primaries (major parties)
Locally, on a county-by-county basis (Democrats)	At least as early as 1888[a]	Unknown
Virtually statewide, regulated by state party (Democrats)	1904[b]	1923[c]
Statewide, mandated by state law	1923[c]	1927[d]
Statewide, mandated by State Democratic Executive Committee (Democrats)	1927[e]	1932[f]
Statewide, mandated by Democratic state convention (Democrats)	1932[e]	1944[g]
Local so-called nonpartisan white men's parties and preprimary groups	Beginning in 1874[h]	1953[i]
Poll tax
State elections	1902[j]	1964[k]
Federal elections	1902[j]	1966[l]
Early and short registration period	1903[m]	1971[n]

[a]Barr 1971, 195–96.
[b]Ibid., 201.
[c]Barr 1982, 134.
[d]Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U.S. 536.
[e]Key 1949, 622.
[f]Nixon v. Condon, 286 U.S. 73.
[g]Smith v. Allwright 321 U.S. 649.
[h]Rice 1971, 113.
[i]Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461.
[j]Barr 1971, 205.
[k]Twenty-fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.
[l]United States v. State of Texas, 252 F. Supp 234 (1966).
[m]Barr 1971, 206.
[n]Beare v. Smith, 321 F. Supp. 100 (S.D. Tex. 1971), aff'd sub nom. Beare v. Briscoe, 498 F.2d 244 (5th Cir. 1974).

TABLE 8.10
Ethnic Registered Voters and Officeholders in Texas, Selected Years[a]

	Black		Hispanic		Anglo
	N	%	N	%	N	%
Registered voters
1964	375,000	12.4	—	—	—	—
1968	540,000	13.2	—	—	—	—
1988[b]	832,610	11.0	1,169,736	15.5	5,549,520	73.5[c]
Officeholders
1965	<7	<0.1	—	—	—	—
1971	45	<1.0	—[d]	—	—	—
1989	312	1.2	1,693	6.3	25,036	92.5

Sources. The 1964 and 1968 registration data were supplied by the Voter Education Project (1976) of the Southern Regional Council; 1988 registration data were from U.S. Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census 1989, 39. The 1965 officeholder data are found in U.S. Commission on Civil Rights 1968, 221; 1971 officeholder data are reported in Joint Center for Political Studies 1971, 113–17; 1988 officeholder data are from Joint Center for Political Studies 1989, 11, and the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials 1989, vi.

[a] Mean black and Hispanic populations 1960–90: 12.3% and 19.9%, respectively.

[b] Registration figures for 1988 are based on postelection surveys of self-reported registration. Respondents tend to overreport their degree of participation; some evidence points to disproportionate overreporting by minority respondents

[c] Includes a small number—less than 1 percent of total registrants—of Asians and other nonblack, non-Hispanic minorities.

[d] An early attempt at a systematic count of Tejano elected officeholders was made in 1973 by George Korbel, a voting rights lawyer, and revealed a total of 565.

CHAPTER NINE

Virginia

THOMAS R. MORRIS AND NEIL BRADLEY

VIRGINIA has always clung to an image of moderation in race relations, even though it was one of the original six states deemed by Congress to warrant being covered entirely under the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act. In 1960, five years before passage of the act and just as the state's "massive resistance" to school desegregation had been struck down by the courts, blacks made up 20.6 percent of the state's population. Public schools in Prince Edward County had been closed in 1959 and would not reopen until 1964. Only about 23 percent of voting-age blacks were registered to vote.[1] The political organization that had become synonymous with the name of Senator Harry F. Byrd, Sr., reigned supreme in Virginia, easily defeating antiorganization candidates supported by black voters in the Democratic primary and Republican challengers in the 1961 elections.

Key wryly observed in 1949 that Mississippi was a "hotbed of democracy" in contrast with Virginia. Only once between 1925 and 1945 did the winning candidate in the Democratic primary receive more than 8.6 percent of the vote of the adult population.[2] Virginia had the distinction during this period of turning out the smallest proportion of its potential vote for governor of any of the southern states. Suffrage restrictions effectively minimized voting by blacks and poor whites. These restrictions were crucial to the successful operation of the Byrd organization and its predecessor, the Martin organization, headed by U.S. Senator Thomas Staples Martin from the late nineteenth century until his death in 1919. The increasing black voting strength made possible by the removal of suffrage restrictions in the 1960s paralleled the demise of the Byrd organization.

NINETEENTH- AND EARLY TWENTIETH-CENTURY SUFFRAGE RESTRICTIONS

After the fall of the Confederacy, Virginia avoided a period of radical Reconstruction such as most other southern states experienced. The Virginia constitutional convention of 1867–68 originally proposed a document known as the Underwood Constitution, which incorporated universal adult male suffrage for blacks as well as whites. Seventy-two radicals (twenty-five of whom were black) had overwhelmed the thirty-three conservatives, and the convention majority delivered its harshest blows by supporting the "disfranchisement" and "test-oath" clauses.[3] Those clauses would have denied the ballot and public office to the vast majority of white Virginians who had held civil or military office under the Confederacy. Shocked by the provisions of the proposed Underwood Constitution, conservatives from both the Whig and Democratic parties came together to form the Conservative party of Virginia. A united assault by white voters against the Underwood Constitution was avoided when moderates from the Republican and Conservative parties joined together to support "universal suffrage and universal amnesty": the enfranchisement of blacks without the disfranchisement of former Confederates.[4] White Conservatives and moderate Republicans accepted a liberal state constitution, which included black suffrage, in exchange for being allowed separate votes on the two disqualifying clauses when the constitution was put before the voters for approval in 1869.

In the 1869 elections, the disfranchisement and test-oath clauses, aimed at secessionist whites, were soundly defeated at the same time the new constitution was overwhelmingly adopted. The gubernatorial candidate supported by most conservative whites, Gilbert Walker, was also elected by a majority of over eighteen thousand votes.[5] Faced with the prospects of dividing the vote of those opposing the biracial Republican ticket, the Conservative party candidates for statewide office resigned in favor of the nominees of the conservative Republicans who ran on the "True Republican" ticket. Some blacks voted for Walker, the True Republican nominee, but most supported the losing Republican candidate.[6] Meanwhile, the Conservative party (destined to become the Democratic party in 1883) won solid majorities in both houses of the legislature and five of the nine seats in Congress.

In the election of delegates to the 1867–68 convention, 95,145 blacks but only 76,084 whites voted; 88 percent of registered blacks voted, whereas only 63 percent of registered whites did. Two years later, in 1869, whites outvoted blacks 125,114 to 97,205 in the referendum on the Underwood Constitution and the statewide and legislative elections.[7] The increased voting by whites ensured that, despite the dominant role played by radicals and blacks in drafting the new constitution, the Conservative party presided over its application and shaped state policies during the 1870s. Reconstruction ended for Virginia in early 1870, and, from the perspective of Virginia traditionalists, the state had been "redeemed" in 1869 from the prospect of rule by blacks and their radical Republican allies, who had controlled the Underwood Convention.[8]

In 1870 the state legislature enacted a statute requiring separate registration books for blacks and whites. This law made chicanery easier by limiting through technical delays the number of blacks who could vote in the allotted time or allowing local registrars to "lose" the black voter list. Gerrymandering to break up black pockets of voters took place during reapportionment in 1874–76, 1883, and 1891, first by the Conservatives and then by the Democrats.[9] In 1876, the Conservatives amended the state constitution to make payment of the poll tax a prerequisite for voting, and conviction for petty larceny grounds for disfranchisement. According to the Richmond State and Petersburg Index and Appeal, these amendments constituted "almost . . . a political revolution" in reducing the black vote in 1877.[10] Black voting had already begun to decline and was further diminished in importance by the amendments.

A brief period of control by the Readjuster party, which gained broad support from blacks and sought to ease (or "readjust") the burden of prewar debt, led to the repeal of the poll tax in 1882, but the exclusion of blacks from public office continued unabated. Twenty-seven blacks had been elected in 1869 among the 180 members of the new general assembly, but that number fell to 17 two years later and plummeted to 2 in 1885.[11] By 1891 no blacks sat in the state legislature, and only 3 Republicans remained. Moreover, Virginia's first and only black congressman, John Mercer Langston (1890–91), was defeated in the 1890 congressional elections along with all other Republican candidates. (Langston had been elected in 1888 but did not take his seat until 1890 because of an election contest.)

During the early stages of the Democratic organization under Senator Thomas Martin (1893–1919), black citizens were virtually eliminated from electoral participation in Virginia. The two-step disfranchisement included election "reform" and a new constitution. The Democrats passed a secret-ballot law in 1894 known as the Walton Act. It provided for a publicly printed ballot to be marked secretly in booths. Neither party names nor symbols were permitted on the ballots. Provision was made for special election judges (i.e., Democrats) to assist illiterates, but the practical effect was to end voting by most blacks in Virginia. One scholar has estimated that the percentage of blacks voting for the candidate opposing the Democratic nominee dropped from 46 percent in 1893 to 2 percent in 1897.[12]

In 1902 Virginia ranked seventh among the states in the percentage of blacks in its total population (35.7 percent); moreover, blacks constituted a majority of the population in thirty-five of the state's one hundred counties.[13] The Virginia constitutional convention of 1901–02 took the second step in disfranchisement in its provisions for a framework of poll taxes, an "understanding clause," and literacy tests designed explicitly for the purpose of disfranchising black voters. The overall effect of the new requirements, which affected poor whites as well as blacks, was to decrease dramatically the total vote in the state; the presidential vote declined almost 50 percent from 264,240 votes in 1900 to 135,865 in 1904. The restricted electorate once again aided the Democratic organization in tightening its grip on state politics.

Even though voter turnout for all races and regions in Virginia was shockingly low, black voter participation was even more dismal. Of the estimated 147,000 blacks of voting age at the time the 1902 constitution was adopted, only 21,000 were on the registration lists once Virginia's registrars began applying the understanding clause. After the poll tax became a voting requirement in 1905, it was estimated that fewer than one-half of that 21,000 met both poll tax and registration requirements. In Richmond the number of blacks qualified to vote shrank from 6,427 in 1900 to 228 in 1907.[14]

Black Participation under the Martin and Byrd Organizations

With the work of the disfranchising convention completed, the way was cleared for the Martin organization to acquiesce in the demands of the antiorganization reformers for a direct primary in Virginia. Without the dramatic reduction in the black vote, it is doubtful that the organization would have agreed to the primary system.[15] Discriminatory application of registration procedures by local registrars against black citizens also was used to exclude Republicans and other white voters who refused to support organization candidates, thus serving the additional purpose of reducing the competitiveness of the Republican party to which most blacks gave their support. Nomination in the Democratic primary became tantamount to election in Virginia.

Until 1912 blacks were legally eligible to vote in the Democratic primary, although the black vote in the first primary of 1905 was "minuscule and inconsequential."[16] In 1912 the legislature passed a statewide primary law introduced by Richard Byrd, the father of Harry Byrd and speaker of the house of delegates at the time. Known as the Byrd Law, it gave the party wide discretion to regulate its affairs. The Virginia Democratic party promptly affirmed a policy of limiting participation in its primary to qualified white voters.[17]

Little action was taken from 1912 through 1925 to challenge Virginia's white primary policy. But when the U.S. Supreme Court in 1927 struck down a 1923 Texas law prohibiting black participation in Democratic primary elections, blacks attempted to vote in a 1928 primary in Richmond. After election judges denied them the opportunity to participate, one black plaintiff challenged the constitutionality of the Byrd Law. It had been drafted with foresight to avoid charges of discriminatory state action by permitting parties to make their own regulations, but the law fell as a result of one of its progressive elements—public financing of the primary election. A 1930 federal appeals court decision invalidated Virginia's publicly financed white primary, and the state did not appeal. This legal development gave Virginia the distinction of being the only southern state at the time with no racial restrictions on primary participation.[18]

But while invalidated by the federal courts, the white primary statute remained on the books, even though unenforced. As late as 1947 party leaders counseled against updating the party rules rather than creating, according to Key, "an opportunity for intolerant elements to sound off, unnecessarily and undesirably opening the whole race issue, which is little discussed in Virginia politics."[19] Key in 1949 observed an Upper South attitude among Virginia whites toward blacks, which resulted in a proportionally larger black vote in primaries and general elections.[20] Blacks were permitted to vote in primaries and serve as delegates in conventions. The Byrd organization was not troubled by this black participation because blacks made up such a small percentage of the registered voters and other suffrage restrictions were still in force. In addition to being registered, voters also had to be current in the payment of the poll tax six months before an election. Moreover, citizens who had been lax in payment of the tax had to pay for the two preceding years as well, for a total of $4.50, to be eligible to vote.

Blacks rarely sought office prior to 1945, but black voting increased markedly in Virginia cities following World War II, especially where there were black candidates seeking local offices. Oliver Hill, a black attorney in Richmond respected by both races, came within 191 votes in 1947 of being nominated to the state legislature in the Democratic primary. The legislative seat he ran for encompassed the entire city of Richmond. The following year he garnered an estimated 3,000 white votes and won the ninth of nine at-large seats on Richmond City Council.[21] Two years later, in 1950, Hill was narrowly defeated for reelection when blacks opted to support a seven-person biracial ticket rather than cast single-shot ballots for Hill, as they had done in 1948.

Hill's success encouraged other black candidates in the early fifties. The coming of white massive resistance to the U.S. Supreme Court's 1954 school desegregation decision, however, was a sharp setback to black aspirations. In his book on massive resistance, Robbins Gates summarized black participation at the time in this manner:

> In states of the Upper South [including Virginia], Negroes can be conceded political "participation" without a commensurate concession of political "power." Participation without power makes for hat-in-hand politics. Negroes are to be found in both Virginia parties, and in both factions of the dominant party, but in no party or faction do they have any real political power "as Negroes." No party or faction thereof in the state is in a position to yield to any Negro demands that fail to conform to basic tenets of white supremacy.[22]

Between the 1870s and 1960s, therefore, various suffrage restrictions effectively limited black voting to a level that was not threatening to white supremacists and virtually eliminated black officeholding.

Political Change Comes to Virginia

Prior to 1964 the black vote in Harry Byrd's Virginia had not been significant, much less decisive. The end of the Byrd era was foreshadowed when the state Democratic convention repudiated Byrd's position of "golden silence" on the 1964 presidential election and endorsed the candidacy of Lyndon Johnson. Increasingly sophisticated voter registration drives inspired by the successes of the civil rights movement, abolition of the poll tax, and near unanimous black support for the initiatives of the new Johnson administration resulted in blacks providing the winning margin of 76,704 votes for the Democratic ticket in Virginia. Estimates of the number of blacks voting varied from 100,000 to "at least 160,000."[23] Whatever the figure, it was evident that with blacks casting well over 90 percent of their vote for the Democratic ticket, Johnson could not have won in Virginia without them.

The Voting Rights Act, passed the next year, ended Virginia's literacy test for voting. The adoption of the Twenty-fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in 1964 eliminated the poll tax for federal elections, and the Supreme Court's decision in Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections[24] invalidated the poll tax for state elections as well.

The importance of the tax for the Byrd organization was highlighted by the call of a special session of the state legislature in the fall of 1963 to design an alternative way of limiting the electorate, once it became clear that the tax would soon be invalidated. To replace it, legislation was enacted requiring voters to file a "certificate of residence" six months prior to each federal election to prove continuing residence in the state. In May 1964 a federal district court invalidated the legislation, clearing the way for Virginia citizens to vote, for the first time in sixty years, without paying the poll tax.[25] An estimated 55,000 blacks registered as part of an increase of 224,305 new voters from April to October 1964.[26] The number of votes cast by Virginians in 1964 topped 1 million for the first time in history, an increase of 270,000 over the 1960 presidential election. Voter turnout in the state moved from 33.3 percent in 1960 to 41.2 percent of the adult population in 1964; while representing a significant increase, the 1964 figure was still 20 percentage points below the national average.[27]

The 1965 gubernatorial election proved to be a transition to a new political era in state politics. Lieutenant Governor Mills E. Godwin, Jr., who had supported massive resistance as a member of the state senate, acknowledged the changes taking place by endorsing the Democratic presidential ticket in 1964, the year President Lyndon B. Johnson was challenged by Barry Goldwater. He benefited the following year when he received the gubernatorial nomination without opposition and enjoyed labor and black support in the general election. In part because the poll tax still applied to state elections in 1965, far fewer blacks voted than in 1964. The Democratic majorities in black precincts were less than for the Johnson ticket, but once again the victorious Democratic nominee would not have been elected without black voters.[28]

In 1966 a solid black vote was essential to William Spong's upset victory by 611 votes over the aging incumbent senator, A. Willis Robertson, in the Democratic primary. Spong won an easy victory in the general election on the basis of urban and black votes. In the other Senate race that year, blacks overwhelmingly supported the Republican candidate against Harry Byrd, Jr., who had been appointed to his father's seat. The black vote reduced Byrd's support, but not enough to deny him a majority of the popular votes.[29] The decade of the 1960s ended with the 1969 election of the first Republican governor of the century. A divisive Democratic runoff primary enabled the moderate Republican candidate, Linwood Holton, to win this first gubernatorial election after the removal of the poll tax in state elections. Holton's triumph demonstrated that Republicans could run well in urban Virginia in races for state offices, just as their presidential nominees had done for years. Moreover, Holton's 37.2 percent share of the black vote was a key factor in his victory.

The Voting Rights Act was one of a number of interrelated factors shaping the changes in Virginia's electorate during the sixties. The act's elimination of the literacy test, the removal of the poll tax at the federal and state level, the increasing urbanization of the state, and the more competitive status of Republicans were all important components of the changes taking place. The potency of the black vote in general elections from 1964 to 1966 subsided, however, as the registration of white voters, too, increased dramatically. From 1965 to 1973 the black vote steadily declined as a percentage of the total vote in general elections. Voting in selected black precincts during that period remained relatively constant in general elections even as overall participation within the electorate increased.

The erosion of black influence was dramatically demonstrated in populist Democrat Henry Howell's narrow loss to Mills Godwin in the 1973 race for governor. Given the near unanimous black support for Howell, he would have won the election if the black participation rate had approached that of whites. Sabato quoted black leaders as conceding a loss of "intensity" following the initial surge of black registration in the 1960s and interpreted the low participation level as an indication that "many blacks are disillusioned with the political process or question the fruits of participation in the system."[30]

In the Democratic primary, in contrast to general elections, black influence was increasing even as their participation rates in general elections declined. Blacks, labor, and liberals became disproportionately represented in the Democratic primary as conservative voters dropped out of it, shifting their focus to the general election in November. Blacks overwhelmingly supported nominees of the Democratic party who were shut out of the governorship and both U.S. Senate seats during the 1970s. Only in 1977, when a moderate, Marshall Coleman, was elected as the state's first Republican attorney general, did a Republican candidate for statewide office even approach Linwood Holton's 37.2 percent of the black vote in 1969. Coleman received 32.7 percent of that vote against a conservative Democrat who had supported massive resistance legislation in the late 1950s. In the 1980s, only two Republican candidates for statewide offices received any significant black vote. John Warner garnered 21.2 percent when he was reelected to the U.S. Senate in a landslide in 1984. Maurice Dawkins, the black nominee in the 1988 race for a U.S. Senate seat, received 16.3 percent of the black vote, losing badly to former governor Charles Robb.[31]

The major surge in black registration and voting took place in the mid-1960s. But even though increased participation in state elections thereafter was primarily attributable to new white registrants, black registration went forward. From 1960 to 1984 the proportion of blacks among registered voters in Virginia increased from 10 to 17 percent, figures consistent with those for the rest of the southern electorate.[32] The long-term significance of this newly enfranchised minority in statewide elections was evident in the resurgence of the Virginia Democratic party in the 1980s as it swept all three statewide offices in three consecutive elections (1981, 1985, and 1989). The vital role of black support was underscored by the fact that none of the successful gubernatorial nominees of the Democratic party received a majority of the white vote in the three general elections.[33] Moreover, in all three, the turnout rate of blacks exceeded that of whites. This record of support by black voters undoubtedly contributed to the nomination by convention of state senator L. Douglas Wilder without opposition for lieutenant governor in 1985 and for governor in 1989. Virginia Democrats, who abandoned the runoff primary following the divisive gubernatorial primary of 1969, turned to state conventions for the purposes of nominating statewide candidates in the 1980s.

As the nation's first elected black governor, Wilder is a poignant reminder of the progress being made in overcoming racial barriers. Race undoubtedly continues to be an issue in Virginia politics, but Wilder's victory, although by the closest margin in a Virginia gubernatorial election in this century, means race is not always the determining factor in the outcome of elections. His winning margin came largely from Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads, the fastest growing regions of the state with the largest nonnative populations. So dramatic was the population shift within Virginia that he was able to win by carrying only twenty-two of forty-one cities and twenty-two of ninety-five counties. Wilder received 41 percent of the white vote and benefited from a turnout rate among black registered voters that was 8 percentage points higher than the figure for white voters; four years earlier the black rate had been only about one point higher.[34]

Rarely has a minority candidate been as well positioned to win statewide office as was Wilder in 1989. A majority-black state senate district had assured him electoral security and legislative seniority. As the state's leading black politician for twenty years, and as a candidate who had never lost an election, he had earned a reputation as a seasoned insider within the majority Democratic party. He had moderated his views over the years to espouse fiscal conservativism and hard-line positions on crime, including support for the death penalty. Like his white predecessors, he had used his four years as lieutenant governor to expand his contacts around the state. Wilder pursued a "deracial" political strategy designed to avoid racial polarization and emphasize the nonthreatening nature of his campaign. He ran "not as a black politician, but as a politician who happened to be black."[35] He was nominated without opposition by a fully unified party, was well financed, and ran as the successor to two popular Democratic administrations. Moreover, his prochoice position on the dominant issue of the campaign—abortion rights—gave him an advantage without which it is difficult to imagine him winning. His victory underscores the capability of a black candidate to win the votes of a large number of whites. "Wilder's campaign," in the cautionary evaluation of one observer, "offers a formula, albeit not an easily followed one, for doing that."[36]

Virginia Resists the Voting Rights Act

On key 1965 congressional votes, only Mississippi opposed President Johnson's positions and a larger federal role through Great Society programs more often than Virginia did.[37] All of the Virginia congressional delegation voted against the Voting Rights Act except for Representative W. Pat Jennings, a liberal Democrat from the southwestern district containing many straight-ticket, anti-Byrd Democrats.

Support for the act and its extensions was limited to a handful of the state's twelve-member congressional delegation. Only Senator Spong, who was defeated for reelection in 1972, and Republican representative William Whitehurst, whose district included a black population of 22 percent, voted for the 1970 extension. However, even Whitehurst voted against extending the act in 1975, leaving only two Democrats elected from northern Virginia in 1974 to cast affirmative votes. In 1982 the only Virginia votes supporting final passage of that year's extension and amendments were two Republicans: Senator Warner and Congressman Frank Wolf of northern Virginia. Overall, the minimal level of support by the delegation for the act's initial passage and its three extensions can best be explained by the predominance of two groups least likely to provide support: Old South Democrats and Republicans.[38] By 1968 Republicans had won half of the state's ten house seats, and at the time of the 1982 vote for extension controlled nine of ten House seats and one Senate seat.

In 1973 the Virginia General Assembly passed a resolution directing the state attorney general to take action necessary to bail out Virginia from coverage of the special provisions of the act, including section 5. Accordingly, Attorney General Andrew Miller filed suit that same year in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, making Virginia the first southern state to seek exemption from the act. The state maintained that it met the statutory requirement at that time—a ten-year absence of any discriminatory device for voting—since its literacy test had been fairly administered in the years immediately before it was suspended by the act. Miller estimated that as many as 90,000 blacks might have registered between 1962 and 1964. He pointed to the growth of black registration prior to 1965 and the failure of the Civil Rights Commission and the Department of Justice to "find substantial discrimination." In fact, no federal observers or examiners had ever been assigned to Virginia under the provisions of the act.[39]

However, estimates of the number of blacks registering to vote in Virginia during the 1960s varied widely. The Civil Rights Commission estimated that almost 100,000 more blacks were registered in 1967 than in 1965, when the act was passed. The commission also found a gap of over 22 percentage points between white and black registration rates prior to passage of the act.[40] The federal district court hearing Virginia's bail-out arguments acknowledged in a footnote the dispute over registration statistics as well as the state's concession that the black registration rate was "significantly lower" than the white rate. The court commended the state for "its good faith efforts in voter registration in the sixties," but estimated that the black registration rate was about 10 percent below that of whites from 1963 to 1965.[41] Virginia was denied exemption from the act on the ground that the state's record of segregated, inferior education for blacks contributed to low literacy rates, which affected the ability of persons to satisfy literacy requirements prior to 1965.

Vote Dilution in State Legislative Redistricting

The state's 1964 reapportionment of the legislature was challenged in federal court for,[42] among other reasons, diluting the black vote by establishing a two-member senate district in Richmond and by combining Richmond with Henrico County into an eight-person at-large district for the purpose of electing members to the house of delegates. While blacks made up 42 percent of the Richmond population, they constituted only 29 percent of the combined Richmond-Henrico house district. In a decision handed down on 9 April 1965, less than four months before the signing of the Voting Rights Act, a federal district court dismissed the complaint on the grounds the state had traditionally used multimember districts in other areas of Virginia.[43]

William Ferguson Reid of Henrico County narrowly lost his campaign for a seat from that Richmond-Henrico district in 1965, but in 1967 he became the first black to serve in the Virginia legislature since 1891. Reid, a physician, placed fourth overall in 1967, winning handily against three opponents in the Richmond-Henrico district, along with the other seven Democratic candidates. Turnout in Richmond, where Dr. Reid led the ticket, exceeded the 1965 turnout for the gubernatorial election by some eight thousand votes.[44] In 1969 attorney Douglas Wilder was elected state senator from Richmond in a special election in which he won slightly less than 50 percent of the vote against two white candidates. There was no runoff requirement. The citywide election took place in a jurisdiction that had a black population majority but a substantial white registration edge. Even though the bulk of his support came from black voters, Wilder acknowledged on election night that he received some white votes and benefited from the decision of some whites not to vote. He said he "look[ed] forward to the time when all men can run as candidates on their qualifications, and not as a 'Negro' candidate or a 'white' candidate."[45]

The decision of the state senate in 1971, under pressure from the Justice Department, to elect all senators from single-member districts signaled the end of Richmond's multimember senate district. Most of the city's black population was put in Wilder's district, giving him a politically safe constituency that was 71 percent black. Wilder ran without opposition and served until he resigned following his election as lieutenant governor in 1985. Delegate Reid was not so fortunate in the changes affecting his district. The new house districts created in 1971 separated Richmond and Henrico County, leaving Reid, a county resident, to run in a single-member floater district composed of the two jurisdictions and containing a black population of 29 percent. In 1971 he won reelection against an independent, but he was unseated two years later by a white Richmond city council member running as an independent in a three-way race involving a Republican candidate and heightened public attention to the busing issue. In 1977 two blacks were elected to the house of delegates from Richmond as part of the victorious Democratic ticket, when two incumbents relinquished their seats to seek statewide offices.

Following the 1970 census count, the Department of Justice objected under section 5 to Virginia's redistricting plans for both houses of the legislature. The objections for the senate plans found that a multimember district diluted the black vote in Norfolk. In 1971 the senate responded to the objections by creating single-member districts, including a heavily black district there. Meanwhile, Henry Howell, the white liberal state senator from Norfolk, complained that he had been placed in a "Goldwater" district as a result. Invoking the one-person, one-vote principle, he challenged the legislature's decision to include all shipboard naval personnel in his district despite the fact they were residentially scattered throughout the Norfolk area.[46] The federal district court agreed with Howell and restored a multimember senate district for Norfolk, subsequently upheld in Mahan v. Howell.[47] This litigation headed off the probable candidacy of Delegate William Robinson, Sr., of Norfolk, a black college professor first elected in 1969, for the abolished single-member senate seat.

On the house side, the Department of Justice objected to the retention of multimember districts in areas with heavy concentrations of black voters—Hampton, Newport News, Norfolk, Portsmouth, and Richmond. The house of delegates received an unexpected reprieve, however, when the U.S. Supreme Court declined to invalidate multimember districts on Fourteenth Amendment grounds in an Indiana case, Whitcomb v. Chavis.[48] The Department of Justice withdrew its objections, and multimember districts were retained.

