

NATIONAL FOREST Shaping the Future Together

Have you ever spent time in the beautiful forest in northern Arizona and wondered why it is possible to enjoy this vast public land; or wondered what the future holds for the forest, and how decisions are made about its management? Your opportunity to the have those questions answered is here! The Coconino National Forest is beginning two major planning efforts that will shape future management and enjoyment of this treasured land. Through these efforts you will be able to share your opinions about national forest management including outdoor recreation, wildlife management, fire protection, and others. Both projects need collaboration and involvement from people who value the forest so that ultimately the plans provide for ecological, social, and economic sustainability with public support.

Forest Plan Revision

The Coconino National Forest encompasses 1.8 million acres of spectacularly diverse land in northern Arizona. Management of this land is guided by a forest plan that was developed in the mid-80's. The National Forest Management Act passed by Congress in 1976 requires that each national forest plan is periodically updated. While the Coconino National Forest Plan has been amended several times for specific projects or smaller parts of the forest, it is time to do a strategic revision of the plan.

Much has changed since forest plans were developed under the 1982 planning rule, including our objectives for managing the land. The Forest Service revised its planning rule in 2005 to reflect these changes. The intended effects of the new rule are to: 1) improve the planning process by making plans more adaptable to changes in local economies, social desires and forest health; 2) take into account the best available science; and 3) strengthen collaborative relationships with the public and other entities.

This revision process will include early and on-going opportunities for public input and participation. This approach will produce a forest plan that is dynamic and responsive to local conditions, new information, and public input. The forest supervisor will make the final decision for the revised forest plan.

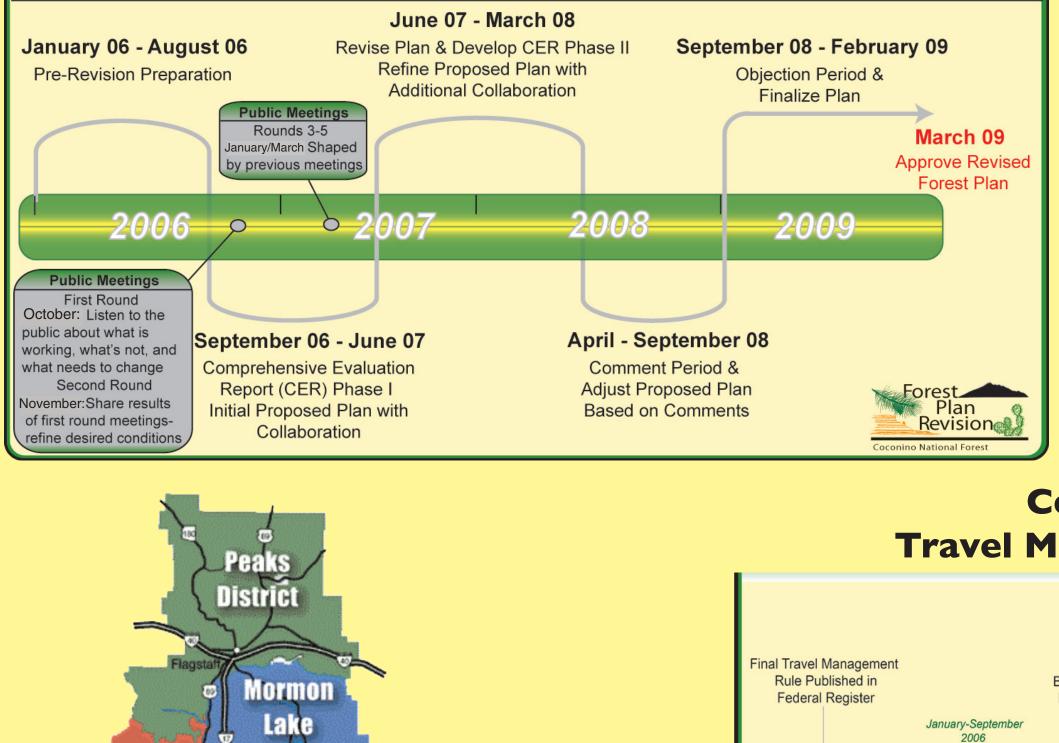

Travel Management Rule

More Americans than ever are using off-highway vehicles (OHV) to enjoy the outdoors. Motorized use of national forests is a valid and valued activity. In the right places it offers an opportunity for people to enjoy our public lands. However, if not managed carefully, motorized recreation can damage both the land and the resources that visitors come to enjoy. In 2005, the Forest Service published a new rule for providing motor vehicle access to national forests and grasslands. It requires each national forest and grassland to designate those roads, trails, and areas open to motorized use. Designated routes and areas will be identified on a motor vehicle use map. The rule itself does not designate roads or areas for motor vehicles but provides a framework for making those decisions at the local level.

The Coconino National Forest is beginning this process that will result in an Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) and a motor vehicle use map. This is a public process and you will be able to participate. If you care which roads, trails, or areas should be open or closed to motor vehicles, we hope you will get involved.

For both projects, see the timeline inside and the list of public meetings on back.
