INTRODUCTION

In the 1950s the United States was experiencing a postwar upsurge in religious activity and interest. Religious leaders, such as Norman Vincent Peale, Fulton J. Sheen, and Billy Graham, attracted large followings. Church membership rose from only 43% of the U.S. population in 1920 to a peak of 69% by 1960. It fell back to 63% by 1970. A 1954 survey showed that 9 out of 10 Americans believed in the divinity of Christ. During the Cold War years religion was seen by many as playing an important role in the struggle against Communism.¹

When Dwight D. Eisenhower entered the political arena in 1952 he had never belonged to any organized church. One reason he gave for this was the fact that he was subject to constant relocation during his military career. However, he believed himself to be a “deeply religious” man. After his election as President he was baptized and joined the National Presbyterian Church. The Eisenhowers frequently attended this church during the eight years of his administration.

After being sworn in as President on January 20, 1953, Dwight D. Eisenhower began his first Inaugural Address with a prayer he had composed. During his administration, the phrase “under God” was added to the Pledge of Allegiance and Congress adopted "In God We Trust" as our national motto. As president Eisenhower spoke many times about the importance of religious faith as an “essential foundation stone” for democracy, and he supported such programs as the American Legion’s “Back to God” campaign. He expressed the belief that man was a spiritual being and that God was “the author of individual rights.” Cabinet meetings were begun with a moment of silent prayer, and he had frequent meetings with religious leaders, such as Rev. Edward Elson, Francis Cardinal Spellman, and Billy Graham. Some historians have referred to Eisenhower’s use of religious ideas, concepts, and symbols as the promotion of a civil religion.

The religious background of Dwight D. Eisenhower’s family was rooted in the Brethren in Christ Church (River Brethren), a Mennonite offshoot whose members had migrated to Kansas from Pennsylvania and Virginia. Bible reading and prayer were a frequent practice in Eisenhower’s boyhood home. Dwight Eisenhower’s parents, David and Ida, became involved in the “Bible Student” or Russellite movement (forerunner of the Jehovah’s Witnesses) in the late 1890s and early 1900s while continuing to maintain some affiliation with the Brethren in Christ community. There is no evidence that Dwight Eisenhower ever participated in this movement. Our files contain records, which show that Dwight and his brothers attended Sunday School at a local Brethren in Christ church.

This guide contains a survey of historical materials in the Eisenhower Library that relate to Dwight D. Eisenhower and religion. It describes materials in forty-three manuscript collections and includes listings of oral history interviews, vertical file folders, and still photographs. A bibliography of books and articles is also attached. Although we have tried to be fairly comprehensive in our survey, there are undoubtedly additional references to this subject, which have escaped our notice. Researchers who thoroughly search the finding aids and files of our manuscript collections will undoubtedly locate relevant materials not on this list. There is a moderate quantity of materials relating to his family background, boyhood, and early developmental years in Abilene. This consists primarily of oral history interviews and secondary books and articles. The bulk of the manuscript materials relate to the 1940s through the 1960s and involve a variety of documentation, including correspondence, speeches, messages, statements, acts of Congress, proclamations, clippings, and memoranda. The bibliography lists a variety of books and articles, which provide background and analysis on the role of religion in Dwight D. Eisenhower's life and presidency.
