

Environmental Health

Dedicated to the advancement of the environmental health professional

Volume 71, No. 1 July/August 2008

About the Cover:

This issue of the Journal features four special reports: case studies on the influence environmental health has had in four counties across the country in the planning and design of built environments. Recent studies have shown that the way in which a community is built affects physical activity, obesity, and other health issues. As our cover and the special reports point out, teamwork among the various departments and entities—e.g., environmental health, public health, city planning, and developers—is crucial to the goal of making communities healthier via their planning, design, and amenities.
