I had a conversation with our OEM account manager last night that I need to pass along to all of you. The general posture MS is going to have toward IBM is follows:

1) MS will be very open to public endorsements, statements about working together, etc. in the retail Aptiva space. This will continue as long as there is a cooperative, partnership kind of relationship. Gates is really mad now about the World Book deal we have and doesn't understand why it wasn't Encarta, given that we want a close relationship in this market with them. Participating in the Direct/Broadcast PC arena is certainly in the cards right now, as they are looking for a "front chair" partner.

2) In the commercial space (server, CDT, mobile) there will be NO public statements of cooperation/endorsements, etc. They will work behind the scenes with us, to enable us to make their software run well on our hardware, etc. but will not go public with that. The reason is we compete on too many fronts and our (IBM Corp) public posture has been less than positive towards MS.
