

HOUSE REPUBLICANS USED TO LOVE “ROVE-ING” INVESTIGATIONS

House Republicans took 140 hours of testimony to investigate whether the Clinton White House misused its holiday card database.

Rep. Dan Burton wrote a letter to President Clinton saying: “I would like to inquire what the standard practice is for the White House to respond to mail directed to ‘Socks,’ your cat.”

House Republicans spent $17 million on politically-motivated investigations from 1995-1998.

House Republicans compelled 15 of 20 standing House Committees to conduct politically-motivated investigations from 1995-1998.

House Republicans conducted over 50 politically-motivated investigations from 1995-1998.

House Republicans on the Government Reform Committee received over 1.2 million pages of documents from the Clinton Administration between January 1997-2001.

House Republican investigations led the Clinton White House to spend over $12 million to reconstruct internal White House e-mails for Committee review, including e-mails between the Vice President and his staff.

House Republicans have written 0 letters, taken 0 hours of testimony, and held 0 zero hearings about a leak by White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove of an undercover CIA agent’s identity.