I. Scope

The Library attempts completeness in acquiring library materials of research value to adults on education in the United States. This includes high school graduates, undergraduate and graduate students, scholars and researchers, and people interested in continuing education and life-long learning. Collecting is comprehensive for publications of the United States Government, U.S. educational associations at the national level, international organizations, and substantial monographs and serials deposited or registered under the U.S. copyright law. Publications on education in foreign countries are acquired selectively, with emphasis on those having scholarly content and those relating to the country as a whole.

The Library also collects test preparation guides beginning with advanced placement level studies through college admission (SAT, ACT) and post graduate education (GMAT, GRE, LSAT, MCAT, etc.). The Library does not routinely collect K-12 achievement test materials or guides. The Library also does not routinely collect customized training for adults, employee training modules, or PowerPoint presentations. College catalogs are out of scope for the collection.

Dissertations and Theses are addressed in a separate Collections Policy Statement. Other Collections Policy Statements should also be consulted, including: Developing Countries, Government Publications, International Organizations, Law, and Societies and Associations. All materials relating to education of the legal professions and to the education of the general public in the field of law come under the Law Collections Policy Statement.

In recognition of the importance of education in developing countries, the content and the political and social importance of the materials should be taken into consideration in making selections for the Library's collections. Major changes in foreign education systems are a consideration for wider coverage of the material to compare the old systems with the new systems.

II. Research Strengths

The Library's long-standing ability to acquire education materials published throughout the world contributes to a solid and historically distinct collection of over 254,000 titles. The education collections are particularly distinguished by the comprehensiveness of their scope, and by the diversity of languages and cultures represented. The collections are extraordinarily strong in the theory and practice of U.S. education, the history of U.S. education, school administration and organization, materials about education and state (government policy), both secondary and higher education, illiteracy, professional education, and in resources about American educational institutions.

In addition, the collections about the educational systems of other countries are significant. The Library's complete collection of ERIC microfiche is supplemented by an extensive collection of education periodicals. The collections are strong in education materials from professional societies and associations. A number of monographic series in the field of education, such as Advances in Teacher Education, augment the collections, as does electronic subscription databases such as Education Fulltext and Education Journals via ProQuest.

Other noteworthy research materials include manuscript items on women's education in the early 19th century such as the Margaret Bayard Smith Papers in the Manuscripts Division, McGuffey Readers which fused moral instruction with the teaching of language skills in the Rare Book Division, and a Pictorial Americana collection of American colleges and universities in the Prints and Photographs Division. Many items in the General and Special collections that are not found within the L classification contain political, social, religious and psychological information that directly support research in the educational classes.

III. Collecting Policy

The Library of Congress attempts to acquire all substantial U.S. periodicals, yearbooks, and directories of national scope, and publications of educational societies and congresses at the national or international level. Other general publications are acquired selectively, based on their research value.

The Library acquires university and college alumni directories, United States and foreign. Also, the Library collects Washington, DC metropolitan area high school directories; however, the Library does not collect syllabi, campus newspapers, educational psychological tests, teacher training outlines, local or high school directories, or individual class textbooks. The Library does collect high school textbooks selectively.

The Copyright Best Edition statement provides guidance for selecting materials for the education collections.

IV. Acquisition Sources – Current and Future

The Library of Congress currently acquires education materials through various methods. These include Cataloging in Publication, Copyright, Exchange, Gift, Federal Transfer, and Purchase.

Future acquisition sources may include building web archives from web sites of the U.S. Department of Education, major education associations, think tanks, and consortia. Blogs and wikis are also probable sources of future content. These acquisition sources may become more prominent if the projected trend from print to electronic publication of education material becomes a reality.
