Reinvention: Zen and the Mobile Employer

By: Adrienne Benson Scherger (RPCV Nepal, 1992-1994)

No matter what the school board is saying, there is one group of people for whom evolution is a fact of life. Deciding to follow one's career, or one's spouse, at different points around the globe calls for the flexibility of a yogi and an ability to spin that would make a Washington politico green with envy. Mobile workers and their spouses are a skilled bunch, and not always in the expected ways. Recently, I surveyed the education and work-experience of a small community of Americans (and in some cases their third country spouses) in Tirana, Albania. Just in Tirana, where the surveyed group totaled 13 people, were five Master's degrees, one Law degree, and one registered Nurse Practitioner. Seven others came to Tirana armed with Bachelor's degrees. In the group were writers, teachers, social workers, archiects, Romance language experts, business people, two flight attendants, and several office managers. Although the skills are always divergent, aside from being smart, well-rounded and flexible any group of internationally mobile people share one particular skill in common: The ability to evolve.

Recently I was having a conversation with the wife of a Foreign Service officer. She told me that what she was most proud of in her life as a mobile spouse was her ability to find work that was interesting and relevant to her own career goals. This was a revelation to me, because it clearly defines one of the major issues of being in an internationally mobile family—people interested in finding work internationally, either because they want to stay in their country of service after Peace Corps, or because they are the “non-contracted” spouse of a development worker—more and more are interested in keeping to a career trajectory. Many are not willing to give up on educations and previous experiences when they leap into the wild and wonderful life of international nomadism. In fact, I think many see a distinct challenge in working while living the transitory lifestyle. It takes a special person to find meaningful work in a new locale every few years. However, as special and talented as most mobile workers are, everyone needs help from time to time. To that end, I've compiled a list of best practices for mobile job seekers.

Get Ahead of Yourself

It is certainly helpful if you have an interest in a career that is transportable. If you are just starting a career, and are new to this life, think ahead about types of jobs that can move easily. I watched my mother, a teacher by training and passion; find a job in every post of my father's USAID career. Each time we moved she was literally snapped up within days of alerting the International School that she was ready and willing to work. Obviously not all of us are teachers, but we have a distinct technological advantage these days—the Internet allows us the option of telecommuting, and it allows us to explore job possibilities in our new posts before we get there.

Smarten up, Sister (and Brother)

The Internet provides another boon to the life of savvy mobile workers—online classes. There are a million ways to get a degree or further an education by taking advantage of virtual classrooms. Your dream degree could be a mere mouse-click away. Some international organizations provide some training for spouses. If your other half is employed with a large agency or business, and is knee-deep in language training, see if you're eligible to get down in the muck with them. The more local language you know, the better your options are for finding work at your next post. Plus, there's something about being able to ask for the restroom or order a beer in five different languages that reeks of class. Hey, it's a perk of our lifestyle. Go with it.

If it Isn't Great, Hesitate

This is an important one. I think that some job seekers who want to find work in a particular foreign locale get there and panic. They feel they have to work and so take the first job they hear about. Then later, when the dust has settled, they see that there may have been other opportunities that would have better fit into their personal career trajectory. I was a victim of "job panic" at my first post as a spouse, and am grateful for the lesson it taught me—take things slowly. The job I had was perfect—for someone else—yet I took it and performed it to the best of my ability, all the while regretting the fact that, three months later, someone else discovered and jumped on a job that was perfect for me. Research is key but not difficult. Find people who work in your career area and network with them. This may mean pumping host-country nationals for information, or finding an International Women's group (even if you're a male) whose members have varied professions, and networking there.

It Ain't Always the Dough, Joe (It's the Dojo)

There are plenty of ways that an unpaid (or underpaid) job can help you. Sometimes jobs at the relative salary you made in the States are simply not available. There are two choices when you're faced with this situation. Don't work at all, or take less money. It's no fun to be paid less than you're worth, but it's even less fun to stew about it. Taking a job on the local economy can sometimes be a blessing in disguise. You'll meet a wide variety of people in your field, you'll potentially learn a great deal about the host-country culture and language, and you'll have a very interesting talking point on your resume. This is also a way to ensure, to a degree, that you stay within your career. I know an architect whose wife was assigned to a post where, not surprisingly, the embassy had no use for an eligible family member architect. He found a local company who was interested in an American but who could only pay local rates. The experience was positive for all involved, and he was able to continue in his very specific field even while posted overseas. He left that post empowered to stay focused on what he wanted to do, and with the impetus to find more jobs in his field in future posts.

Focus, Focus, Focus, Till it Hurts

Nothing is more helpful than knowing what you want. If you have a specific long-term goal for your career, it is much easier to match up jobs with it than it is to just willy-nilly take what's available and hope that, in the end, your career is satisfying. In some locales there will be great jobs to choose from, and at others the pickings will be much slimmer. For the people who are concentrating on one particular career goal, let your focus be what gets you through job panic.

One spouse I know followed her husband and his development job throughout Africa. She only took jobs (including volunteer opportunities) that related one way or another to Gender in Development. She didn't work at some posts because she was totally committed to only doing work that she loved and that would further her desire to be an expert in her field. After her husband retired, she found herself a position with the UN doing exactly what she always wanted to do. The jobs she had held while overseas were so focused, that by the time she applied for her dream job, her resume was bursting with appropriate skills and apropos experience. Her technique can be a good one if you are able to think in the long-term.

Your Glass is Never NOT Half Full (Even When it Looks Empty)

Here's where you need to channel your inner Zen-master. Being happy, fulfilled and internationally mobile can be tricky, and calls for an inhuman amount of positive energy and joie de vive. Nobody feels that way all the time. However, the people who would classify themselves as "successful" at navigating this lifestyle would surely also consider themselves lucky to be living it. Finding the good in each location is the key to finding happiness both in your career and in your life. Making sure that you're not succumbing to job-panic and selling yourself short hinges, to a certain extent, on your overall satisfaction. So find the silver linings. A post with little in the way of viable paid work may have a host of interesting volunteer opportunities. A post that seems like a career dead-end may offer up the luxury of exploring a hobby and spending more time on non-career tasks. Having to really pound the pavement (or dust) in search of your perfect job will give you a unique window into host country culture. The smaller sites in developing nations that may seem like the last place you'd like to live may in fact be real career boosters. How many Yale-educated, English-speaking lecturers of forestry can there be in Fredonia? Play your cards right and you could be a consultant to the Ministry of Agriculture while posted there. To quote a fortune cookie: Opportunities are found in the oddest of places. Go out and find them.

Peace Corps' Office of Domestic Programs, Returned Volunteer Services Introduces SIGI<sup>3</sup>

What is SIGI<sup>3</sup>?

SIGI<sup>3</sup> is a highly interactive career assessment tool that is designed to help you make informed and rational decisions about your field of study and career. SIGI<sup>3</sup> can help you assess your work-related values, interests, and skills. SIGI<sup>3</sup> will help you examine key motivators and match work-related values, interests, and skills to educational and career pathways. First you will enter your work-related preferences, and then SIGI<sup>3</sup> will search its built-in library and find those careers that most closely match your preferences. SIGI<sup>3</sup>'s library is so large that it may well find career options that you never even considered or knew existed!

How do I register for access to SIGI<sup>3</sup>?

To access SIGI<sup>3</sup>, e-mail RVS at rvsinfo@peacecorps.gov with your full name, country and dates of Peace Corps service.

**SIGI 3 is licensed to the United States Peace Corps. Use of this license by individuals not officially and directly authorized by Peace Corps' Office of Domestic Programs/Returned Volunteer Services is prohibited*****
