RPCV Cindy Cain: A Career in Singing

by RPCV John Coyne (Ethiopia, 1962-64)

Editor's Note: Returned Peace Corps Volunteers (RPCVs) who are interested in unusual career paths may be inspired by the following story which originally appeared in the Peace Corps Times (fall 1999). The story is a reminder that careers take many shapes and forms. Whether your interest is in banking, nursing, farming, or singing, opportunities always exist for those with talent and determination.

There's one in every new batch of Peace Corps trainees. Some times it's the guy or gal who wants to take his or her Peace Corps experience and turn it into the next great American novel. Or there is the trainee who dreams of being the first RPCV to be elected president of the United States.

Occasionally, however, there's someone in a training group who stands apart, someone who, if you will, sings her own song. She may or may not be noticed at first. But when everyone breaks into a song on one of those long bus rides, her voice carries clearly over the rough roads and the other voices. It's then that everyone starts to glance around and notice.

That's what happened to Cindy Cain soon after she arrived in Cameroon in 1986 to teach English. Her voice and her determination have carried her a long way from her village in West Africa. And more people have been noticing her ever since.

Over the past seven years or so, Cain has been making her living singing and playing a jazzy kind of blues at places in the greater Washington, D.C., area. She played at the Kennedy's Center's 10th annual open house. In 1998, she released a new CD. And in June 1999, she was one of the featured performers at the Peace Corps' three-day "mega-staging" held in Washington, D.C.

"I've been singing since I was kid," says Cain. "I was in the high school band, then I played in a bluegrass band with one of my professors at Oklahoma State University, where I got my journalism degree. But back then, I never thought of pursuing a career as a singer."

"Most importantly, my Peace Corps experience helped me believe that if I could go teach English in Africa, where I didn't even speak the language, then I could do just about anything, including making it as a singer."

After graduating from OSU, she took a stab at being a reporter for a small-town newspaper. "It wasn't too long before I realized that I didn't have the temperament for daily newspaper life. I grew weary of writing stories about crime, human tragedies, and natural disasters. So I decided that the Peace Corps was the adventure I was missing in my life," she recalls.

Cain put her heart and soul into her job as an English teacher. But she kept singing in her spare time. "It wasn't anything special. You know, Volunteers would be out together, and we'd sing on the way back from the bars to our training site."

As she was nearing the end of her tour, when she was in the capital city of Yaounde, Cain's singing became more than just a part-time hobby.

"We used to go to a place called Le Papillion, which had a house jazz band known as OBEM 4," Cain recalls. One night, Patrick Murphy, another Volunteer, urged me to get up on-stage and sing. So I did. Later, the woman who owned the restaurant asked if I wanted to keep singing with the group. I couldn't resist the offer. The band became OBEM 5, and for the last three months of my tour, I had a secondary job, singing at Le Papillion. It was only then that I thought seriously about singing full time."

After leaving West Africa, with her Peace Corps experience and journalism degree in hand, Cain went to work on Capitol Hill as the press secretary for a congressman from Oklahoma. After work, she would perform at open-mike nights at local clubs. Eventually, she formed her own group, C.C. & the Rhythm Toys, and their first release, "Gettin' a Feel for It," was selected by a Northern Virginia music magazine as one of the best local releases in 1994. The next year, Cain made the move to life as a full-time singer.

"It's incredibly challenging to run a business. I have to operate as booking agent and take care of the administrative and financial details, as well as perform. My Peace Corps experience was perfect groundwork for going into music. I learned how to manage multiple priorities and live within a budget. Most importantly, it helped me believe that if I could go teach English in Africa, where I didn't even speak the language, then I could do just about anything, including making it as a singer," she says.

And making it is what Cain has done. For the past five years, she has made a weekly appearance at Kramer Books, a popular place in D.C. where Mary Chapin Carpenter used to sing in her early days as a musician. Today, Cain keeps a packed schedule of gigs, performs as the lead singer for some of the area's hottest musicians, and has found her strengths as a singer. "I think my strengths are phrasing, timing, pitch, and singing from the heart," Cain says. "She's got a voice that will fill up a room," says Bill Kisluk of Blues Access.

Cain wrote the lyrics for four of the tracks on her first CD, "Love Contest," which was nominated by the Washington Area Music Association in 1988 for five of its prestigious Wammie Awards, including best blues and jazz vocal and best debut recording. Listening to Cain, you can hear touches of Billie Holiday and Sarah Vaughan. The music is cool, energetic, and seductive. And after listening to it once, you want to play it again—and again.

On the CD's sleeve, Cain thanks the people who played a role in helping her make it happen. Toward the end, she pays tribute "To Le Papillion in Yaounde, Cameroon, for my first gig . . . To my Peace Corps buddies, friends, and fans who've come to my gigs over the years."

Cain says serving as a Volunteer gave her the courage to get up on a stage and sing in front of people. "I also learned it's important in life to do things that make me feel good. Singing does that for me. I'm happy to be singing the blues, and by the looks of my bank account, I now have a right to."
