Ten Career Myths Held by PCVs and RPCVs

Below is an article extracted from the Career Resource Manual. It has been revised to reflect recent updates.

Henry Ford said, “The School of Experience is the best school—but by the time you graduate you are too old to use it.” Too many people, not just Peace Corps Volunteers (PCVs) and returned Peace Corps Volunteers (RPCVs), make mistakes in their career planning, and by the time they correct them they have lost valuable time—maybe years. While it’s almost unavoidable to make some mistakes in your job-search efforts, careful planning will help you achieve your goal—a lifelong, rewarding career. By being aware of the following myths, you will be sure not to waste time because of them.

MYTH 1: To succeed in a career, you should have a good picture now of what you want to do. Few people can predict where they want to be, or what they want to do, ten or even five years from now. Often the best we can do is to develop a reasonable job objective each time we are in the job market and launch the best possible campaign to get that job. Most people change jobs or occupations many times in their lifetime. In fact, it is almost assured that your very next job will not be your last job. Nor the one after that. As the old Chinese proverb says, “A journey of a thousand miles begins with a single step.” You need to determine today the best direction to move, and take that first step. Later, your career goals may be more refined, or radically changed. Therefore, continue defining and refining your career trajectory by building on each job, and make sure that you continue giving opportunity many chances to find you. This way many RPCVs end up in exciting jobs they never knew existed.

MYTH 2: By studying your interests, abilities, and values, you should be able to pinpoint the type of job that is just right for you. Like ready-made shoes, most jobs are only going to roughly fit your interests, abilities, and values. Even those “dream jobs” can have negatives, such as employers who decide on Friday at 4:30 p.m. that you must work on Saturday. Everything you have done in life has probably included an element of compromise. Your goal is to find the career field, the employer, and the job that offers the most pluses and the fewest minuses — for you. Notwithstanding the “rough” fit, assessing your interests, values, and skills and mapping those to possible careers is generally a worthy exercise. To that end, the Office of Domestic Programs, Department of Returned Volunteer Services (RVS) has licensed SIGI3—a highly interactive career and self assessment tool. It will help you examine key motivators and match values, interests, and skills to educational and career pathways. Email RVS at rvs@peacecorps.gov to learn how to access SIGI<sup>3</sup>.

MYTH 3: My career field will probably be related to my past experiences and contacts. Many of us will end up in fields that are unfamiliar to us today. Contacts, chance work assignments, new technology, and likes and dislikes on early jobs may move you far from your original goals. You might, for example, end up managing a state foundation for the arts, helping a famous person write his or her memoirs, or developing new markets overseas for American products. As mentioned above, continue defining and refining in response to these new insights so that opportunity remains in front of you. Occasionally it will come from a direction not predicted.

MYTH 4: Without a firm career goal in mind, it's impossible to launch a job campaign. Ask a hundred Americans if they have a career goal, and 70 will probably fumble before they admit “no.” Although perhaps not “firm,” most of us have some ideas about what we like to do. These preferences should guide your general career objectives, the networks you develop, and the types of job interviews you seek. Employers, however, do expect applicants to verbalize their plans in a clear and convincing manner. You should be able to cite logical career objectives— closely related to the job in question. If, for example, you were exploring jobs in bilingual teaching, international banking, or overseas marketing, you would need to explain for each position how your skills, experiences, and interests are closely related to - and can benefit - the target job. Also be prepared to explain how the target job continues your career trajectory.

MYTH 5: Hard work is the key to finding the best job and advancing in your career. We can hardly call this a myth, but hard work by itself is not the key. The real key to success is working smart, doing the important things well, and not wasting time on insignificant activities. How do you learn to work smart? By using common sense, by learning what your potential employer's needs are, and by educating yourself about successful job-hunting strategies. Books such as the Complete Job Search Handbook, by Howard Figler, or Through the Brick Wall: How to Job-Hunt in a Tight Market, by Kate Wendleton, can help. If you are looking for a federal job, for example, be sure to understand the special hiring status of returned Volunteers. For those of you with remaining noncompetitive eligibility (NCE), see RVS' special December 1, 2006 edition of Hotline to learn how to exercise it. Many federal agency representatives are not familiar with this regulation, which can greatly increase your chances of being hired, so it is up to you to educate them. The special NCE edition of Hotline discusses the details.

MYTH 6: Unemployment is such a critical issue these days. Perhaps I'll never get that job. Even if national unemployment figures were relatively high—at six or seven percent (which currently it is not)—most people do have jobs! And you can be one of them. Keep this in mind: Nobody owes you a job. If you want one, it's up to you to get one. You've already accomplished much as a Peace Corps Volunteer, and those skills and experiences will qualify you for a number of jobs in the private, public, and non-profit sectors. In fact, BusinessWeek.com recently named Peace Corps the 38th-best place to launch a career—out of companies in all industries (see BusinessWeek.com, 9/18/06 “The Best Place to Launch a Career”). In addition, RVS subscribes to six different job listing services on your behalf. Contact us at rvs@peacecorps.gov to learn more about these fee-based job listservs that are free to you.

MYTH 7: Employers react negatively to the Peace Corps experience. Many employers are impressed by Peace Corps experience. On occasion what they do find difficult, however, is the bridge between your Peace Corps Volunteer experiences and their jobs. To overcome this perceived gap, you must break down your Peace Corps experiences into qualifications that are relevant to the employer. This means citing skills such as planning, managing, budgeting, training, reporting, motivating, negotiating, organizing, etc. It is your responsibility to translate your Peace Corps experiences into skills using a lexicon appropriate for the specific prospective employer. The Hotline issues of August 15 and September 1, 2006 address this process of translating your Peace Corps experience.

MYTH 8: You'll never really gain a good understanding about a job unless you actually go work for the organization, so it doesn't make sense to be so selective about prospective employers. Through research, you can get a lot of information about an organization before you ever walk in the door. Look at reports and newspaper articles, talk with customers or those served, go on informational interviews, and see if you know anyone who already has contacts with the organization. The information you glean not only will provide you with a greater awareness of the job and the organization, but it will also make you a much stronger job candidate. If you receive a job offer, you can always ask to revisit the organization and talk with prospective supervisors and colleagues before you make up your mind.

MYTH 9: The best person gets hired for the job, so why interview in places where my qualifications are only average? The best person does not always get the job. The person who best demonstrates knowledge of the organization and its needs, who verbalizes a clear career goal and qualification related to those needs, and who is most liked by the interviewer gets hired. Remember, organizations do not make hiring decisions—people do. That is why it is so important to work at the process of career planning and why if you follow the exercises in the Career Resource Manual (that you received at your COS conference) you should be ahead of most job seekers in the United States. In addition, the Office of Returned Volunteer Services (RVS) hosts quarterly RPCV Career Planning Conferences that include a number of informative panels and interactive workshops to assist you in best preparing and representing yourself for prospective employers. Monitor the RVS events page for event announcements.

MYTH 10: Because I have so little experience, I can't impress employers. Employers know that at one stage in life all of us are young and lack much job experience. No one who has served overseas with the Peace Corps, though, falls into the “no experience” category. However, if you had little prior experience before joining the Peace Corps, your best strategy may be to impress employers with your sincere interest in their organization, a good sense of where you are going, a clear expression of your qualifications, and an understanding of how these things fit together.
