

From - Thu Jul 25 22:09:07 1996
X-Mozilla-Status: 0001
Message-ID: <31F852E4.25A1@netscape.com>
Date: Thu, 25 Jul 1996 22:08:52 -0700
From: John Freeborg <johnf@netscape.com>
Reply-To: johnf@netscape.com
Organization: Netscape Communications Corp.
X-Mailer: Mozilla 3.0b5aGold (Win95; I)
MIME-Version: 1.0
To: Julie Herendeen <julieh@netscape.com>, linear
Subject: Win 95 Scripting License - Ugh
Content-Type: text/plain; charset=us-ascii
Content-Transfer-Encoding: 7bit

CONFIDENTIAL

I leaned into Ed Mitchell today on the scripting license. They've had it since last Thursday. I bitched about how 5 days is plenty of time to sign the darn thing and to get some action on it. He claims to have given it to Karl (Carl?) Stork - the director that would sign it last Thursday. Ed was out of town Monday and Tuesday of this week. I've called him every day to see what the status is.

I have flat out asked him for a commitment that we get this signed this week, but Ed says he "can't commit" since he doesn't control the process. They are well aware that we have a beta that we must have this for and it is panic time.

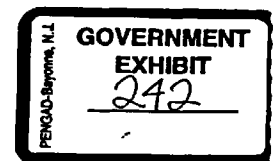

Earlier today he cautioned that due to the competitive nature Karl Stork may need to pass it to Brad Silverberg for sign-off in the Internet division. However, he left me a voicemail later that said he brought the matter to Karl's attention again and it sounded like that may not happen now.

Any other ideas to prod them along? I don't have any other contacts there other than Dan Walker, our premium support technical account manager (TAM).

- John

HIGHLY CONFIDENTIAL

NOV 1996

NSC000176