Asian-American experience

- "Paper sons" were the young men brought over from China as "sons" to the older Chinese immigrants in San Francisco. These young men were sometimes the real sons of the older men, but many were not. This system was set up in response to immigration restrictions enforced on the Chinese community in America.
- "Picture brides" and "picture husbands" were Japanese and Korean men and women who married each other without ever seeing each other before the wedding. Usually the bride was in Japan or Korea while the husband was in America. Men would send photographs of themselves home and ask relatives and friends to find a bride. The potential bride would send a photograph of herself for him to see what she looked like. When the bride disembarked from the ship in America both would hold pictures of the other person in order to find their spouse.
- In 1900 there were 2000 Chinese women in the US and 85,000 Chinese men.

There is a large Cambodian community in Lowell, Massachusetts, a former mill town north of Boston.
