Social media is a rapidly growing use of current technologies both in the United States and around the world. Join your colleagues for a look at recent developments in the management and re-use of public sector information in the United Kingdom. Efforts there expand the employment of social media as a tool to encourage digital engagement.

Biography

Carol Tullo is the Director of Information Policy Services at the National Archives in the United Kingdom. She is responsible for the Office of Public Sector Information (OPSI), Archives Sector Development services, and information management and collection research.

Tullo is also Queen's Printer for Scotland, Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office (HMSO), Queen's Printer of Acts of Parliament and Government Printer for Northern Ireland. Prior to joining the Cabinet Office in 1997, Tullo practiced law at the Bar in London and had a successful career in law and professional publishing. She is responsible for providing strong, coherent leadership in information management and policy both across government and in the wider public sector. Tullo is a visiting professor in Information Science at City University, London and an executive committee member of the International Government Printing and Publishing Association.
