

Statewide Inventory of Prevention Services Providers

Texas Department of Family and Protective Services

March 2004

FORWARD

Throughout Texas, numerous agencies and organizations offer services to families and children who are at risk of abuse and neglect, delinquency, and academic failure. Besides providing services that prevent these things from happening in the first place, many agencies and organization offer treatment or intervention services to families and individuals who have already engaged in the behaviors and conditions to be prevented. On some level, treatment or intervention services are designed to prevent the recurrence of these behaviors and eliminate the conditions that lead to child maltreatment, delinquent conduct, and school failure.

While prevention and intervention services are available across the state, the specific counties in which these services are available are often unknown. Even when service areas are clearly identified, the population for which services are available is not. For example, child abuse prevention services may only be available in some locations to high-risk families. In other areas, all families--regardless of risk level--may have access to child abuse prevention services.

In an effort to determine where prevention services are available and to whom those services are intended, the Prevention and Early Intervention (PEI) Division of the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services conducted a statewide survey of social service organizations and agencies during state fiscal year (FY) 2003. Questionnaires were mailed to more than 5,000 social services providers across the state. Despite a low response rate (about 6%), results of the survey enabled PEI to create its first inventory of prevention services.

Prior to launching our survey of prevention services providers, the Board of the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services adopted new terms for prevention and intervention. The definitions for those terms are provided on the next two pages. Note that we have not used the new terms to identify the kinds of services provided by the organizations and agencies listed in this document. Our plan is to incorporate the new terms in subsequent inventories. For now, we simply want to introduce you, our partners in prevention, to the new prevention terminology.

Albeit incomplete, we hope that you find this document useful. If you would like to have your organization or agency included in a future inventory, please complete the appropriate form in the back of this book and send to the address listed on the form. If your agency or organization is listed in this inventory and you wish to provide updated information, please complete and submit the Update form that is also located in the back of this book.

Contract Management Division

NEWLY ADOPTED TERMS AND DEFINITIONS FOR PREVENTION SERVICES

The Board of the Texas Department of Protective and Regulatory Services (PRS) adopted changes to the definitions of prevention during its March 28, 2003 meeting. The changes align the PRS prevention definitions with those of other agencies and organizations.

The PRS Board approved replacing primary, secondary, tertiary, and intervention terms and definitions with universal, selective, indicated and treatment, respectively. Generally speaking, a service or program is now defined according to the individual, group or population targeted to receive the service. As such, the exact same service can be defined as a universal prevention service, a selective prevention service, an indicated prevention service or a treatment service, depending on the group or population receiving the service. To better understand this concept, consider the following terms, definitions and examples.

Prevention programs and services that are available to the population-at-large are defined as universal. These programs and services do not target specific individuals, families or communities. Instead, the universal programs or services are intended for anyone and everyone. The PRS child abuse prevention campaign—"It's Up To You"-- is a good example of a universal prevention service since the campaign is designed for the general population, not a specific group or subpopulation of at-risk families.

Selective prevention services and programs target individuals and families who are at risk of engaging in the condition to be prevented simply because they are members of a particular population or sub-population. Youth residing in neighborhoods with high rates of juvenile crime are ideal candidates for selective delinquency prevention services. Here, the fact that these youth live in a community where juvenile crime is high elevates their risk of engaging in delinquent behavior. Note that selective prevention programs and services are not designed for individuals who have already engaged in the condition to be prevented or who are engaged in behaviors that lead to, or are associated with, the condition to be prevented. In other words, a youth who has already committed a crime would not be targeted for selective delinquency prevention services, nor would a youth who, for example, is skipping school during the day. While cutting class does not necessarily constitute criminal behavior, it can become a behavior that significantly increases the risk of delinquent conduct.

Indicated prevention services and programs target individuals and families who are engaged in the activities and behaviors that lead to the condition to be prevented. In the delinquency example above, a youth who is skipping school and left unsupervised would be targeted for indicated delinquency prevention services, even if s/he had not yet committed a delinquent act. A dropout prevention program might also provide indicated prevention services to the student who is cutting classes but has not yet quit school altogether. The Services To At Risk Youth (STAR) program is another example of an indicated prevention program. Many youth and families receive STAR services because of family conflict. Family conflict is associated with, and identified as a risk factor for, child maltreatment, delinquent conduct, running away, and academic failure. Note that indicated prevention services and programs are not intended for families and individuals who have already engaged in the condition to be prevented. Families with open CPS cases would not be targeted to receive indicated child abuse prevention services. Students who have dropped out of school would not be eligible for indicated dropout prevention services and youth who have engaged in criminal behavior would not receive indicated delinquency prevention services.

Treatment services and programs target families and individuals who are, or who have already engaged in, the condition to be prevented. These services and programs are designed to prevent the recurrence of the condition. For example, families with closed CPS cases may participate in an agency program that provides services to prevent subsequent abuse or neglect. In this sense, the program provides treatment services. If the same agency or organization serves families who have not engaged in child maltreatment, but who are living in isolation or experiencing crisis, the services provided would be defined as indicated, rather than treatment.

Given these new terms and definitions, it is easy to see how the same service might be categorized as universal, selective, indicated, or treatment. Consider again the child abuse prevention kit that PRS distributes annually. While the kit is intended for and made available to the general public it is classified as a universal child abuse prevention service. If however, the kit were provided only to teen parents--a population with an elevated risk of child maltreatment--distribution of the kit would be a selective child abuse prevention service. Distributing the kit to parents who are in crisis and socially isolated would make the process an indicated child abuse prevention service. If distribution of the kit targeted only families with substantiated incidents of child abuse, the distribution would fit the definition of a treatment service.

HOW TO USE THE INVENTORY

The 2004 Statewide Inventory of Prevention Services lists agencies and organizations that deliver child abuse prevention services, delinquency prevention services, and dropout or academic failure prevention services. For each agency or organization, contact information is listed. The Inventory is divided into the following three sections:

- Child Abuse Prevention
- Delinquency Prevention
- Academic Success.

An internal tab is used to group sections. Counties are listed alphabetically within each section. Providers listed under each county indicate the agencies and organizations that serve residents of that county. The county where an agency or organization is physically located may be different from the counties in which services are provided. For example, an agency's mailing address may be in Harris County but it is listed under Montgomery, Walker, and Harris counties. The agency is listed under all three counties because families in each of those counties receive its services. The final page of each section lists agencies and organizations that indicated their services were available throughout Texas. The title given those pages is "Intrastate Services".

The 2004 Statewide Inventory of Prevention Services is by no means a complete list of Texas prevention service providers. The information included in this document is limited to the data collected from survey questionnaires. Contact information may no longer be accurate and some agencies and organizations may no longer exist or provide prevention services.

The inventory does not identify the specific kinds of services (i.e., universal, selective, indicated, or treatment) provided by an organization or agency. The reader may choose to contact the provider to gather additional information about services and programs.

Statewide Inventory of Prevention Service Providers "Add Our Program" Request Form

We would like to keep the Provider list as accurate as possible. If you are NOT currently listed in this book and are a provider of prevention services in one of the areas listed below, please complete this form and submit to the address or fax number listed below.

Please name your prevention/treatment program(s) in the appropriate program area (Child Abuse Prevention, Delinquency, or Academic Success). For your most recently completed program year, indicate the counties served, the number of families served, and number of youth/children served (ages 0 – 17 yrs). Finally, mark an "X" for the target population(s) served by each of your prevention/treatment programs.

General Population – Prevention/Treatment program targets and is available to a population-at-large, rather than a population exhibiting risk factors associated with the condition to be prevented. A good example of a service targeting the general population is a public awareness or prevention campaign.

Low Risk Population – Members of this "target group" are subgroups of people who are at greater risk by virtue of membership to a particular population (teen parents, children of substance abusers). Members, however, do not yet exhibit the condition to be prevented nor engage in factors directly associated with or leading to that condition.

High Risk Population – Members of this "target group" are subgroups of people who exhibit behaviors or risk factors directly associated with the condition to be prevented but have not yet actually engaged in the condition. For example, if dropping out of school is the condition to be prevented, students who are truant would be included in the target (high risk) population.

Engaged in Behavior – Members of this "target group" are individuals who have or are engaged in the condition to be prevented in the first place and who now are receiving treatment services. Treatment services are aimed at preventing a condition from recurring. If delinquency is the condition to be prevented, youth with adjudicated cases are members of the target group.
