about us

The agriculture industry's concerns are more significant and complex today than ever before, including microbial threats to food safety, invasive pests and diseases that damage crops, and the growing social needs of our workforce. The Foundation addresses these challenges through research, education and philanthropic outreach in the community. We are committed to being the leading non-profit organization in making viable solutions possible for our industry.

FOUNDATION

community

The Foundation is responsive to the needs of the farmworker community, providing funding for the Redlands Christian Migrant Association for family and education services. Through the George F. Sorn Scholarship, we also help children of farmworkers pursue higher education. In addition, after the devastating hurricanes of 2004 we partnered with other organizations to build stronger housing. We also support the Produce for Better Health Foundation, which promotes fruit and vegetable consumption.

Research is critical to the future of agriculture. The Foundation plays a leading role in making available hundreds of thousands of dollars in funding for major initiatives related to food safety, methyl bromide alternatives and pest management. Several citrus greening research projects are under way to find ways to fight the disease.

The Foundation makes possible numerous educational opportunities each year. The Agricultural Labor Relations Forum informs employers and workers about compliance with agricultural labor laws and sound labor relations practices. An annual environmental and pest management regulatory tour provides on-site education for federal and state officials. Additional seminars keep Florida's agricultural producers informed on a variety of issues.

education

we need your help

For generations, Florida agriculture has grown stronger thanks to the dedicated, hard-working people who produce crops in the fields or breakthroughs in the laboratories. It's that combination of science and sweat equity that has kept Florida producers competitive in a tough global marketplace. And the Florida Specialty Crop Foundation is dedicated to fostering further achievements in generations to come. We can do that with your help.
