

I strongly believe that a person who receives an adverse action based upon a credit report should receive at least a photo copy of the report used along with the business letter notifying the consumer to said adverse action. As matters now stand, a consumer must go to the reporting agency to request a copy of the report in question. This should not be the responsibility of the consumer.

Respectfully submitted,
Robert M. Pitcher