

It seems obvious that the only way a consumer can question incorrect information in their consumer credit report, is if they have the right to see their entire consumer credit report.

As it is consumers have too difficult a time disputing fraudulent, incorrect, or inaccurate information that they do know about from their consumer credit report.

I am almost afraid to know how many more fraudulent, incorrect, or inaccurate items are as of yet, unseen in the consumer credit report, but those items need to be disclosed to the consumer so that they can exercise their rights to have that information investigated.

Thanks in advance for your consideration of my comments.

--

Joseph Alex Martin

PA