

Conflict of Interest Policy

A Addiction Science & Clinical Practice requires contributors to declare any conflicts of interest that might be construed as potentially influencing their contributions. This policy stems from our obligation to serve our readers by providing effective oversight of the publication's entire contents. Disclosure of a conflict of interest does not necessarily imply that an article's information is questionable or its conclusions biased; rather, disclosure lets readers judge for themselves how much weight to give a contributor's financial relationships when evaluating his or her contribution. Contributors should err on the side of caution when making disclosures; if there are any doubts, contributors should make a disclosure and allow the editorial board and staff to determine its relevance. Omission of a pertinent financial interest could, if later revealed, deal a severe blow to the credibility of the contributor's work.

Like most journals, Addiction Science & Clinical Practice is not able to confirm the accuracy of our contributors' disclosure statements. We rely on our contributors' veracity; of course, Addiction Science & Clinical Practice authors can also expect scrutiny of their statements by readers.

Potential conflicts of interest include, but are not limited to, grant support, employment (recent, present, or anticipated), patents (including pending or applied for), copyrights, and certain institutional or clinical affiliations. Financial compensation arrangements such as consultancies, advisory board positions, stock shares, and travel funding can also be sources of conflict.

Below is a checklist of some of the most common conflicts of interest among our authors. Please read each item and, as appropriate, either check the box certifying no such conflict of interest or, in the space below the item, specify your conflict(s) of interest. Please explain, if appropriate, any measures you have taken to limit the conflicts. This checklist is not intended to be all-encompassing; please use the additional space on page 2 to disclose any conflict not covered by the checklist.

- Do you or any of your co-authors stand to gain financially from sales or licensing of any manual, book, or other publication mentioned or promoted in your article? For example, please disclose if you receive royalties (over $2,500 per year) from any published work cited in this paper.

- Do you or any of your co-authors stand to gain financially (over $10,000 per year) from the promotion or mention of treatment methods or treatment programs in your paper? For example, please disclose if you own, have stock in, or otherwise share in the profits of a treatment program that provides services mentioned in this paper. In addition, please disclose if you receive payment for providing training services for any treatment methods mentioned in this paper.

- Do you or any of your co-authors receive payment or other financial consideration (over $5,000 per year) from any corporation, or organizational affiliate of any corporation, that holds a patent or other financial interest in any pharmaceuticals mentioned or promoted in this article? If so, please disclose the name of the organization and the nature of your financial relationship.

- Have you or any of your co-authors received private or corporate funding for any clinical or research studies cited in this paper? If so, please disclose the source of the funding and certify that this sponsor did not in any way constrain your freedom to report and interpret the study impartially.

- Are any of the data cited in your article based on unpublished administrative data from your clinic or treatment or prevention program? Possible examples of this type of data are: patient success and failure rates, patient and staff population figures, clinical impressions formed over time, and informal study results. Please note that all non-peer-reviewed data should be clearly cited as such within the article.

- Are there any other relevant disclosures that should be brought to the editor's attention?
