Other TSLAC operations such as Human Resources and the Executive Offices have relocated to the second floor.

“Visitors and patrons will be very pleased with the new environment we have created in our public service areas,” said Peggy D. Rudd, Texas State Library and Archives Commission director and librarian, when commenting about the nearly completed ground, first and second floors of the Lorenzo de Zavala Building, located in the Capitol Complex in Austin.

Construction continues on the third and fourth floors, which are now closed to the public. This will complete the $15.5 million renovation of the building that originally opened its doors in 1961.

With public services now operating in new and modern locations, TSLAC will still enforce security procedures when entering these areas. Patrons and visitors must secure personal and bulky items in a guarded and individually keyed security locker located on the first floor while visiting the Texas State Archives.
