Innovative approaches are needed to assist these communities to build their capacity and to develop and implement a community action plan. REHDAI communities are paired with nine CEEDS who provide the REHDAI participants with one year of funding and three years of technical assistance. This is consistent with other "Legacy" communities that are funded by CEEDS. However, the REHDAI communities also participate in a separate series of training efforts designed to build their capacity and they receive additional technical assistance from the CDC REHDAI Program Coordinator. This evaluation will help CDC better understand contributions of the REHDAI both to the participating communities and as a component of the overarching REACH Program model. The hospitals need to have sufficient numbers of births (a minimum of 3000 per year) so that a contemporary sample of late preterm births (8-10% of births) is obtained. The hospitals should serve populations that ideally reflect the racial, ethnic and socioeconomic diversity of the metropolitan area. Confined participation to only urban teaching centers is not acceptable. Target medical centers should include academic as well as private institutions. Additionally, the participating hospitals must have obstetric and pediatric staff and neonatal support services that allow for the care of late preterm infants. A staff person completes the mPINC survey on behalf of his or her institution in their capacity as the person most knowledgeable about the relevant practices. The 2007 survey established a baseline measure of breastfeeding-related maternity care practices at intrapartum care facilities across the United States and Territories and the extent to which practices vary by state. Data from the 2009 survey provide the first information about changes and trends in practices since 2007. The current RFP is intended to continue the work of the previous surveys conducted in 2007 and 2009 to assess and monitor breastfeeding-related hospital practices across the United States. A delay by the government during the intervention package development contract resulted in removing the administrator's guide from the deliverables. DCPD is currently funding a field test of the intervention through a SIP with the Cancer Prevention and Control Research Network Center at the University of Texas Houston. SIP 03-07 will identify necessary core components of the intervention as well as provide efficacy data for the intervention. The decision was made to not include the development of the guide in the current pilot test of the intervention because of time constraints on the project and the complexity of the pilot group discussion guide, transcript qualitative coding scheme, and qualitative data analysis.
