

ity of the judiciary to adjudicate cases, Judge Souter reflected a reasoned approach and a sound understanding of the Constitution.

In a discussion with the committee chairman about the development of the Bill of Rights, Judge Souter made the following observation:

“ * * * the starting point for anyone who reads the Constitution seriously is that there is a concept of limited governmental power which is not simply to be identified with the enumeration of those specific rights or specifically defined rights that were later embodied in the bill [of Rights].

If there were any further evidence needed for this, of course, we can start with the Ninth Amendment. * * *

“ * * * it was * * * an acknowledgment that the enumeration for rights in the Bill of Rights was not intended to be in some sense exhaustive and in derogation of other rights retained.

I agree with that statement and the approach to the Constitution that it reflects. Our Constitution was not written to prescribe specific remedies for particular problems. It was, rather, intended to prevent a concentration of power by any group or individual so as to preserve the liberties of the people.

In his testimony, Judge Souter acknowledged the responsibility of the Court in fulfilling that purpose. He said, “ * * * courts must accept their own responsibility for making a just society.” Judge Souter repeatedly acknowledged that the rights of Americans are not exhausted by the specific rights listed in the text of the Bill of Rights, but that they also include rights implicit in the text of the Constitution.

He made it clear that what is implicit in the text of the Constitution is not limited to the particular factors present at the time of writing, but includes broader principles.

His interpretation, as he put it, is not that original intent is determinative, but original meaning.

He said, for example, “If you were to confine the equal protection clause only to those subjects which its framers and adopters intended it to apply to, it could not have been applied to school desegregation,” because those who wrote and adopted the 14th amendment lived at a time when segregated schools were the standard.

He went on to say, “What we are looking for, when we look for original meaning, is the principle that was intended to be applied * * *.”

The distinction Judge Souter drew between original intent and original meaning is a useful distinction. It permits the underlying principles to be applied to new needs without limiting the broad rights of our people today to the political or social circumstances of the 18th or 19th centuries.

Judge Souter's understanding, in particular, of the significance and reach of the 14th amendment in the constitutional system reflects an understanding of our Nation's history and of the central role that the tragic fact of racial prejudice has played in our history.

Judge Souter said no social problem is “ * * * more tragic or demanding of the efforts of every American in the Congress and out of the Congress than the removal of societal discrimination in matters of race * * *.” He also said, in response to a question about judicial activism, “The obvious and significant fact of history * * * is the adoption of the 14th amendment.”

As we all know, Judge Souter declined to address specifically the question of abortion and the Court's past rulings on that matter. He acknowledged a core right of privacy but would not be drawn into discussion of how broad or how enforceable against government such a right would be.

For that reason, those who are particularly concerned that the Supreme Court may in the near future dramatically tighten or even reverse the right of a woman to choose to terminate a pregnancy have suggested that Judge Souter's nomination ought to be rejected.

I respect the view that this factor is so central that no other factor should be considered. But, on reflection, I do not share that view.

The hearings focused to a substantial degree on the subject of privacy.

That is understandable at a time when developments in medicine and technology are altering our ability to intervene medically to save and prolong life and to intrude technologically into the most private recesses of individual thought and behavior.

There is little doubt that future cases before the Supreme Court will develop the legal boundaries of privacy, individual autonomy, conscience, and related concepts.

Advances in genetics have already raised questions about the legal ownership rights an individual may have to his or her physical body. Advances in voice transmission have raised questions about the expectation of a privacy in conversations conducted over certain telephone equipment. Medical advances have raised the exceedingly difficult issue of the State's relationship to an individual's death from natural causes.

But while this new and expanding area of law will continue to play a central role in the development of constitutional doctrine and the protection of individual rights, we must remind ourselves that the Supreme Court is not the sole source of legal development in the American system.

The Congress and the executive branch also have their responsibilities in meeting the new challenges that face our society.

I said at the outset that I do not have a feeling that I can predict how Judge Souter would vote on cases that may come before him on the Supreme Court.

I have, therefore, rested my decision on his nomination on the approach that he uses to determine the source of individual liberties, the breadth with which he sees constitutional guarantees, the emphasis he places on the structure of the constitutional system and its purpose, and the criteria he would use to determine if an individual liberty is enforceable against the government.

These factors do not give me an infallible guide as to his future rulings. But they do not give such a guide to anyone else either.

Those who argue that Judge Souter should be opposed because they are certain they know how he will vote have no objective basis for that certainty.

But there is one certainty over which there can be no dispute: No matter what the pressing controversy of the moment is, Judge Souter or any other nominee will occupy a seat on the Supreme Court for many years after the hot controversies of today are settled law.

I believe that if Judge Souter brings to those future controversies the breadth of experience, understanding, and the careful judgment which his testimony before the Judiciary Committee reflected, then his decisions in those cases will continue to reflect the fundamental American constitutional tradition.

For those reasons, I shall vote to confirm his nomination.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of David H. Souter, of New Hampshire, to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 90, nays 9, as follows:

THE INTERNATIONAL FUND FOR IRELAND

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the International Fund for Ireland has now been in operation for 4 years. In that time, it has grown from a hopeful idea in the Anglo-Irish Agreement on Northern Ireland in 1985, through a troubled initial phase, to what it has become today, a worthwhile participant in the search for a peaceful settlement of the violence and divisions that have plagued the people of Northern Ireland for over 20 years.

The United States has a substantial interest in promoting this search for peace. After a difficult start, the Fund has turned out to be an effective means for us to help achieve the goal that all of us share for the future of Northern Ireland. Annual appropriations from the United States have played a major role in the Fund's success. An appropriation of $20 million for fiscal year 1991 has strong support in Congress, and I hope that it will be enacted.

From the beginning, the mandate of the Fund was clear—to encourage economic development in the areas most affected by the violence in Northern Ireland. In article 10 of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, the Governments of Ireland and Great Britain pledged to Cooperate to promote the economic and social development of those areas of both parts of Ireland which have suffered most severely from the consequence of the instability of recent years, and shall consider the possibility of securing international support for this work.

The International Fund for Ireland was subsequently created to carry out this purpose. In the initial phase of its operations, the Fund established seven key programs:

First, two investment companies operating according to strict commercial criteria;

Second, a business enterprise program to stimulate job creation;

Third, an urban development program to revitalize town centers, including 24 towns in Northern Ireland, and 12 in the South;

Fourth, a tourism program to develop one of the region's principal industries;

Fifth, an agriculture and fisheries program to stimulate new enterprises;

Sixth, a science and technology program to emphasize practical research likely to lead to early economic benefits;

Seventh, a wider horizons program to encourage new skills through practical work experience, training, and education overseas.

At the outset, however, the Fund had difficulty in developing and implementing its mission. Projects were funded that were difficult to justify on the basis of the priority intended to be given to areas most affected by the violence. These areas include over a third of the population of Northern Ireland, and are concentrated in West and North Belfast, Derry, and along the border with Ireland. As a result of its missteps, the Fund was legitimately and increasingly criticized, and there were growing doubts in Congress about the desirability of U.S. support.

To its credit, the Fund responded to these concerns. A new series of initiatives was developed with special emphasis on disadvantaged areas, and the Fund has received high marks in the past year for its work in implementing these initiatives.

At a meeting of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference on September 14, the conferees noted with particular satisfaction the growing evidence of the Fund's success in promoting economic regeneration to the direct benefit of the entire community, particularly in the most disadvantaged areas.

There is tangible evidence of this success. In all, 1,300 projects have been supported by the Fund; 8,000 jobs have been created; and substantial assistance has been made available to disadvantaged areas, with special emphasis on economic development projects in North Belfast, West Belfast, and Derry.

For the vast majority of the people on both sides of the conflict in Northern Ireland, the Fund has become a symbol of hope for a better future. It is helping to reduce the violence, mistrust, and discrimination that have plagued Northern Ireland for too long. In my view, the Fund deserves credit for resolving its early difficulties. It is coming into its own today, and it deserves continued support from the United States.

Mr. President, a four-part series of articles by Niall Kiely in the Irish Times last August provides an excellent analysis of the Fund. I believe that the articles will be of interest to all of us in Congress, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the RECORD, along with a subsequent editorial in the Irish Times.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Irish Times, Aug. 20, 1990]

FUND'S U.S. BACKERS DISAPPOINTED BY DUBLIN

(By Niall Kiely)

Beset by radical critics drawn from the ranks of Sinn Fein supporters in the United States, the International Fund for Ireland could have done without this year's unpublicised differences between the Irish Government and its most important supporters, the Friends of Ireland (FoI) group in the American Congress and Senate.
