Demobilized 22 December 1918 at Camp Kearny, CA, as the 65th and 66th Field Artillery Regiments, and on 21 December 1918 as the 22d Trench Mortar Battery. All elements reconstituted in the Organized Reserves on 15 October 1921 and consolidated as the 308th Cavalry, assigned to the 62d Cavalry Division, and allotted to the Third Corps Area. Organized 10 November 1921 with regimental headquarters at Cumberland, MD. Regiment relocated about October 1922 to western Pennsylvania. Regimental headquarters concurrently organized at Pittsburgh. Reorganized 1 July 1929 as a three-squadron regiment. Concurrently, entire regiment relocated to Pittsburgh, PA. Typically conducted its Inactive Training Period meetings at the 107th Field Artillery’s Hunt Armory at the Post Office Building in Pittsburgh. Members built the 308th Cavalry Club in 1928 on property owned by the Aspinwall Hospital in Aspinwall, PA, and conducted some Inactive Training there. Facilities included equestrian, pistol, and saber training areas. Conducted regular equestrian training with the horses of the 107th Field Artillery. Conducted summer training with the 3d Cavalry Regiment at Fort Myer, VA, and at Fort Belvoir, VA. Trained with the units of the 52d Cavalry Brigade at Mount Gretna, PA, in July 1928. Conducted cavalry Citizens Military Training Camp (CMTC) training at Fort Myer as an alternate form of training. Designated mobilization training station was the York Concentration Area, PA. Location 7 December 1941—Pittsburgh, PA.

Purposes and Scope

The purposes of US Army Order of Battle 1919–1941 are threefold. The first is to fill a void in the published record of US Army units documented by Order of Battle of the United States Land Forces in the World War published by the Center of Military History and Mr. Shelby L. Stanton’s Order of Battle, U.S. Army World War II. The second is to provide Army command historians, unit historians, and other individuals who are trying to research specific unit histories a basic overview of what these units were doing in the interwar period, where the units were located, and who commanded them. The third is to provide a private individual who had a relative who served during this period, and who wishes to know what that service may have consisted of, an account of the major activities in which the relative’s unit was involved. The scope of the work covers units from the size of separate battalions from all arms and services to field armies, as well as the actual order of battle of each as applicable.

Each unit is represented by a unit entry block. The entries contain a host of information that is standardized in its presentation as far as possible. Each entry includes the unit title and type, the headquarters to which the unit was assigned, the geographical area to which the unit was allotted (if National Guard or Organized Reserve), the unit's headquarters location, the unit's physical location (or the unit's headquarters location if dispersed) on 7 December 1941, a unit service narrative, the unit's organization day, the unit's status as of 2001, and a chronological listing of the unit's commanding officers. Depending on the type of unit, additional information may include a listing of subordinate units and their years of assignment; "snapshot" orders of battle for divisions, corps, and armies for selected years; and the subordinate components of nonstandard units such as harbor defense commands. Also included in this work are the headquarters, a unit service narrative, commanders, and a "Major posts, camps, stations, airfields, and National Guard and Organized Reserve training facilities" section for each of the nine corps areas and three overseas departments. Though these were not tactical headquarters in the traditional sense, their importance to this period, and to this project, were such that I felt compelled to add their information.

Unit Title and Type

The unit title, in most cases, is the designation by which the unit was known for most of the 1919–41 period. In some cases, most notably the Air Service/Air Corps units, several unit titles followed by dates are given due to numerous redesignations.

Parentheticals

Titles are often followed by parenthetical information. Typically, the first of these will be the unit type or weapon, such as (Antiaircraft) or (75-mm G). These designations will always be in boldface type. The notation (C) will follow some units. This indicates the unit was designated as a "Colored" unit and manned by African American personnel. The term "Colored" and the designation (C) were the standard usage of the period in mobilization documents and elsewhere and are used here for historical purposes. These designations too will always be in boldface type. Some units held the same designation at different times, but are not the same organization. These titles will be followed by a Roman numeral in parentheses, e.g., (I), (II), etc., to clearly differentiate the separate units. These designations will always be in standard type. The final example of parenthetical information is the major headquarters to which the unit was assigned, for example: (1st Division). This is typically the brigade, division, corps, or army to which the unit was assigned. For National Guard units, these reflect planned mobilization assignments for wartime and do not necessarily reflect actual peacetime command and control relationships. In some cases, again most often Air Service/Air Corps units, the organization was assigned to several different headquarters from 1919 to 1941. In those cases, I have attempted to designate that headquarters to which the unit was assigned for the longest period or, in some instances, the headquarters to which it was assigned in the initial mobilization plans of 1921–23. Admittedly, there are a few instances where these two examples will not apply, but in each of these exceptional cases, the rationale was different and it is not feasible to explain every reason. The headquarters designations will also be in standard type.

Component and Geographic Allotment

National Guard and Organized Reserve units are identified in this section of the unit entry. The state or states of allotment are also identified. In some cases, the unit was allotted for organization to more than one state. In those instances, the states of allotment will be identified with the conjunction "and" as such: Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana National Guard. Typically, the state to which the headquarters was allotted will appear first. In other cases, usually Organized Reserve units, the organization was withdrawn from allotment to one state or geographical area, and reallocated to another. In those instances, the initial state or states of allotment and the follow-on state or states will be differentiated with a slash "/", indicating the first, second, etc., areas of allotment as such: Organized Reserve Missouri and Kansas/South Dakota. In some cases for National Guard or Organized Reserve units, an organization was constituted but never allotted to a given state. In those instances, only the component (i.e., National Guard or Organized Reserve) is listed. Regular Army units that were generally in an inactive status between 1921 and 1939 are shown as Regular Army Inactive (RAI). The vast majority of RAI units were organized with Reserve personnel during this period and thus are differentiated in this manner from Organized Reserve units and active Regular Army units. Many Organized Reserve units were withdrawn from the Reserve and allotted to the Regular Army between 1927 and 1940. These units are all listed herein as Organized Reserve units as that is the component in which they were originally allotted. Active Regular Army units below division level and which headquarters were active for the majority of 1919 to 1941 will have no component listed.

Headquarters Location

The city or post and state or overseas location where the unit's headquarters was physically and permanently located, roughly between January 1919 and 7 December 1941, is listed here. Generally speaking, temporary locations are not included unless the absence from the permanent location was for 6 months or longer. The location and relocation dates for Regular Army and National Guard units are generally accurate, having been determined from unit data cards for the Regular Army and state annual or biennial reports and various other documents for National Guard units. While the majority of the initial organization dates and locations for Organized Reserve (O.R.) units are generally accurate, the relocation dates were somewhat problematic for these units. The primary document used to determine O.R. headquarters locations are 3"x5" index cards located at the Center of Military History at Fort McNair in Washington, DC. These cards were the methodology by which the Army tracked O.R. units in the interwar period. They usually (though not always) contain dates and headquarters location for the relocation of the units, but the relocation dates themselves are often that of the actual document that notified the individual who kept the cards rather than the actual date of the relocation. The date provided on the index card has typically been used as the date of relocation in the absence of the actual date. Those dates, however, while generally accurate, can be as much as a year off. In those instances where the actual relocation date has been located in other kinds of documents, the actual date has been used.

Unit Service Narrative

The service narrative generally provides an overview of the unit's permanent changes of station, assignment and reassignment to major commands, allotment to and withdrawal from component (Regular Army [R.A.], National Guard [N.G.], O.R.), allotment to corps area or overseas department, initial organization date and location, training activities and locations, activation and inactivation, and the location of the unit (or of the unit headquarters if the unit was dispersed) on 7 December 1941. Special events and activities, awards, and deployments are also covered. For R.A. units, support to the Civilian Conservation Corps and training support to O.R. units are covered. For N.G. units, callups for state emergencies of battalion-size or larger, dates of Federal recognition, dates of induction into Federal service, summer training camp locations, and mobilization training stations are covered. For O.R. units, locations for Inactive Training Period meetings, summer training camp locations, mobilization training stations, and Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) feeder units are covered. Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units are covered similarly to O.R. units with the addition of information on Active Associate units and affiliation with ROTC units. Dates provided for unit movements are generally the dates of arrival at the new location by the unit headquarters, unless specifically given as a departure date from the losing duty station. Subordinate elements of the unit may have arrived before or after that date.

Organization Day

The War Department's General Order #24, dated 10 June 1922, established the concept of "Organization Day" (sometimes referred to as "Regimental Day") for US Army units. The Organization Day was not necessarily the date on which the unit was organized. It could also be a special date in its history such as its baptism of fire in combat. In instances where an Organization Day had been adopted, the unit's chosen date for Organization Day, an explanation of the date's significance, and the date of adoption are given, if known.

Status

The unit's status (active, inactive, disbanded, etc.) and designation as of 2001 is given if known.

Events

The numbers represent events of significance in which the unit participated between 1919 and 1941. The details of each event number are located in appendix B.

Commanders

Where known, the unit's commanders and their inclusive dates of command are provided for regiment-size units and above, and selected battalion-size units. The dates of command are for the period 1 January 1919 to 7 December 1941, or the end date of command for the last pre-World War II commander, whichever is later. For infantry, cavalry, field artillery, coast artillery, and engineer regiments, the commanders for the World War I period are also provided if known, because those commander lists were not previously provided in the Center of Military History's Order of Battle of the United States Land Forces in the World War. For some N.G. units, the commanders will have a state abbreviation in parentheses following their name (e.g., (GA) for the state of Georgia) in those instances where the unit was a multistate organization to identify from which state the commander was assigned. If the commander of a N.G. or O.R. unit was an R.A. officer, the name will be followed by the abbreviation (R.A.). If the commander of a N.G. or R.A. unit was an O.R. officer, the name will be followed by the abbreviation (O.R.). If the name is not followed by an abbreviation, the commander is of the component or state to which the unit headquarters was allotted. If a commander is not known for a given period, the entry "Unknown" and the inclusive dates (at least month and year) are provided. In some instances, especially for O.R. units, the inclusive dates for a given commander are not known. In those cases, the entry "ao" (for "as of") followed by a month and year indicates the earliest or latest date known for that commander to be in command of the unit indicated. The example below indicates that Colonel William J. Smith was known to be in command from at least July 1937 to at least April 1940.

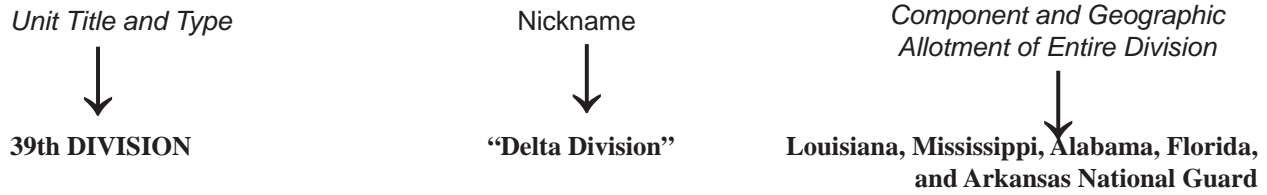

Example: Col. William J. Smith

ao July 1937–ao April 1940

Additionally, a single asterisk (*) beside a commander's name indicates he was an R.A. officer in command of an RAI unit. Two asterisks () indicates a Reserve officer who was in command of an RAI unit. Note that relatively few O.R. brigades and no RAI brigades were assigned a brigadier general as commanding general. These headquarters functioned as such on few occasions, usually at a command post exercise or occasionally during annual training. The brigade was strictly a tactical command during this period and exercised no administrative duties or responsibilities. Those duties were performed at the division and regimental levels. For that reason, O.R. and RAI brigades were generally "commanded" by majors or lieutenant colonels whose duties were primarily limited to planning, conducting, or supervising training in the brigade headquarters during the inactive training period. More often than not, personnel assigned to brigade headquarters simply conducted their inactive training with one of the subordinate regiments. At summer training, the senior regimental commander often served as the brigade commander when the brigade headquarters was intended to function as such. When assignment of Reserve officers to RAI regiments began in 1926, only a single reserve major (later changed to a lieutenant colonel) was authorized as the commander though the regiment could acquire its full quota of captains and lieutenants from the officer's Reserve Corps. In 1927, the command of these regiments was, in many cases, passed to selected Active Duty R.A. colonels and lieutenant colonels who, for the most part, were the professors of Military Science and Tactics at the college or university with which the RAI unit was affiliated. This practice seems to have effectively ended on 1 October 1933, though in some instances it was ended earlier, after which command was exercised by the senior Reserve officer assigned. Most units not affiliated with an educational institution were commanded by Reserve officers, though in a few cases they were commanded by R.A. officers who were assigned as an additional duty. This practice also seems to have ended on 1 October 1933. In many instances, brigades and regiments were commanded by captains and even lieutenants. Those organizations seem to have served more as Reserve pool units for mobilization assignment purposes than actual functional units. This was usually because the assigned personnel were geographically dispersed so as to prevent regular assembly for inactive training periods. Nonetheless, the senior officer assigned acted as the commanding officer during summer training unless a higher ranking officer was temporarily attached to assume command for the camp period.

Example Major Command Unit Entry (divisions, corps, armies)

Major command unit entries generally follow the same pattern as those for smaller unit entries with the exceptions detailed below.

HQ—Not organized, 1921–23 ← Headquarters Location

The 39th Division headquarters arrived at Newport News, VA, aboard the S.S. Matoika on 31 December 1918 after 4 months of overseas service and was demobilized 23 January 1919 at Camp Beauregard, LA. In accordance with the National Defense Act of 1920, the division was allotted to the states of Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, and Arkansas and assigned to the IV Corps in 1921. The division’s designated mobilization training station was Camp McClellan, AL. The division headquarters was not reorganized before the adjutants general of the several states from which the division was drawn petitioned the War Department to change the designation of the division to be formed as the 31st Division as that was the organization in which most of the states’ units served in World War I. The request was approved and the subordinate elements assigned to the 39th Division were withdrawn and assigned to the 31st Division, less the Arkansas elements, effective 1 July 1923.

*Organization/
Order of Battle*

*Indicates state of headquarters allocation; headquarters not organized or inactive.

Nickname

Many divisions adopted nicknames in the World War I period or, in a few cases, the nickname was adopted after the division was constituted or reconstituted in 1921. The nicknames are shown as illustrated.

Component and Geographic Allotment

For corps and armies, only the state to which the headquarters was allotted are listed. For divisions, every state that was allotted a unit in the division's order of battle is listed. The state to which the headquarters was originally allotted and organized will be listed first.

Organization/Order of Battle

Each division, corps, and field army has one or two "snapshot" orders of battle provided to illustrate how the command was organized at the time indicated. The 1939 order of battle provided for the R.A.'s 1st through 9th Divisions represent those divisions' final organization before the change to the "triangular" tables of organization in October 1939. Unit designations in italics indicate an inactive unit or a "not organized" or "not initiated" unit. Unit headquarters locations in italics represent the state of allotment for National Guard Inactive (NGI) units and the corps area of allotment for RAI and Organized Reserve Inactive (ORI) units. Partially active units (i.e., the headquarters was inactive, but some subordinate elements were active) are also shown in italics. For partially active units, the unit headquarters mobilization station/post is also shown in italics.

Division Commanders and Chiefs of Staff

Note that about half of the O.R. divisions actually had at least one general officer assigned as division commander sometime during this period, and none had a general assigned for the entire period. In most cases, one of the R.A. brigade commanders in the corps area was assigned as the commanding general of one of the three O.R. divisions as an additional duty. This practice seems to have been most widely used in the Second, Fourth, Fifth, and Seventh Corps Areas. In some cases, the corps area commander assigned that duty to himself. In two instances, those of the 77th and 95th Divisions, Reserve divisions were actually commanded by a Reserve officer. Generally speaking, the division's chief of staff exercised routine command in the name of the corps area commander or the assigned division commander. Thus, the names of the R.A. chiefs of staff assigned to O.R. divisions have been included in this Order of Battle.

Terminology and Abbreviations

The military and ethnic terminology and abbreviations used in this work are those that were used from 1919 to 1941; therefore, at the beginning of each volume is a Key to Abbreviations. See Appendix A, "Glossary of Terms," for definitions of the terminology used in this Order of Battle.

The National Guard

The N.G. poses several problems in preparing a work such as this because the rules by which the Center of Military History (and the states themselves) trace each unit's lineage do not always mirror those for the R.A. and O.R./US Army Reserve. For example, when a unit in the O.R. was relocated from one community to another, the unit retained its history and designation. In the case of the N.G., however, when a unit designation was relocated to a unit in another community, the history of the unit was retained in the organization located in the first community. Also, if a unit was demobilized (i.e., disbanded) in one community, and then in another community a unit is organized with the same designation, there was, in theory, no relation between the two units other than the fact that they happened to have shared the same designation. For example, the 120th Ammunition Train was organized at Bristow, OK, in May 1923. The unit in Bristow was disbanded in May 1924. A new 120th Ammunition Train was organized at Sperry, OK, in June 1924 and later reorganized as Headquarters Battery, 160th Field Artillery in June 1926. Another new 120th Ammunition Train was organized at Haskell, OK, also in June 1926, and later reorganized as Battery B, 160th Field Artillery in January 1927. In theory, there were three different organizations with the designation “120th Ammunition Train” and as such, each should merit a separate Unit Entry in this Order of Battle. To complicate matters, regimental, brigade, and division headquarters appear not to have been considered state- or community-specific units. For example, the Headquarters, 108th Cavalry at New Orleans, LA, was withdrawn from the state of Louisiana on 15 March 1929 and allotted to the state of Georgia and reorganized at Hinesville, GA. There appears to have been no loss of identity or history in the transfer of that unit designation between states, much less between communities in the same state. It is the same unit with the same lineage. Additionally, the Center of Military History does not consider N.G. units “constituted,” even though the Federal designations of those units were clearly “placed on the rolls of the army” (this is especially pertinent since the vast majority of N.G. units used Federal designations and not state designations during the period) and allotted to the various states in 1920–21 in accordance with the guidelines laid out in the 1920 amendment to the National Defense Act of 1916. The methodology appears to assume that the designation does not exist (at least on the rolls of the Army) until the day the unit is organized and federally recognized, even though letters and memorandums allotting the unit designation to a state, mobilization plans, and numerous other documents clearly refer to the existence of the unit designation before it was actually organized. In light of these pre-existing designations, for the purposes of this Order of Battle, I have chosen to consider the designation of N.G. units to have been constituted in the same manner as R.A. and O.R. units (i.e., when the designation of a unit was placed on the rolls of the Army). Therefore, those units that have a clearly differentiated identity (in other words, separate battalions, regiments, divisions, etc.) are treated as one and the same organization in the Unit Entries. Only in rare instances are two (or more) N.G. units with the same designation treated as separate and distinctly different organizations. The Unit Entries for these units generally makes the purpose for differentiation self-evident.

Chapter 12

Cavalry Divisions

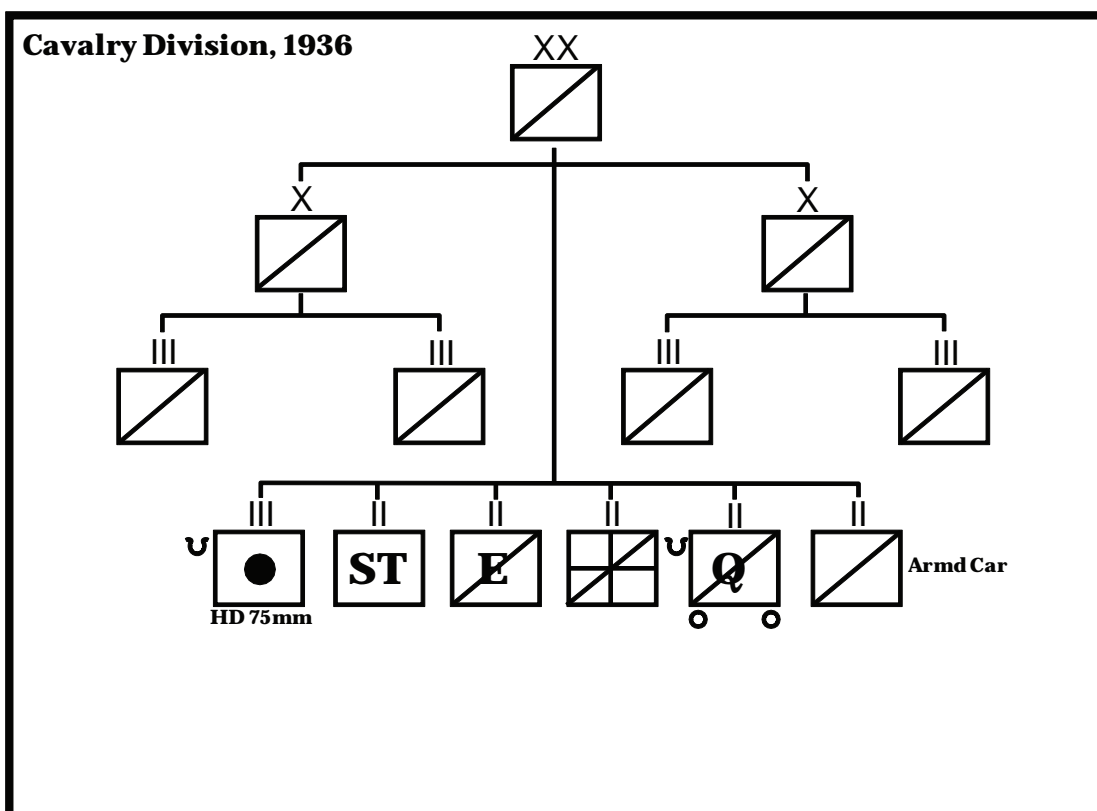

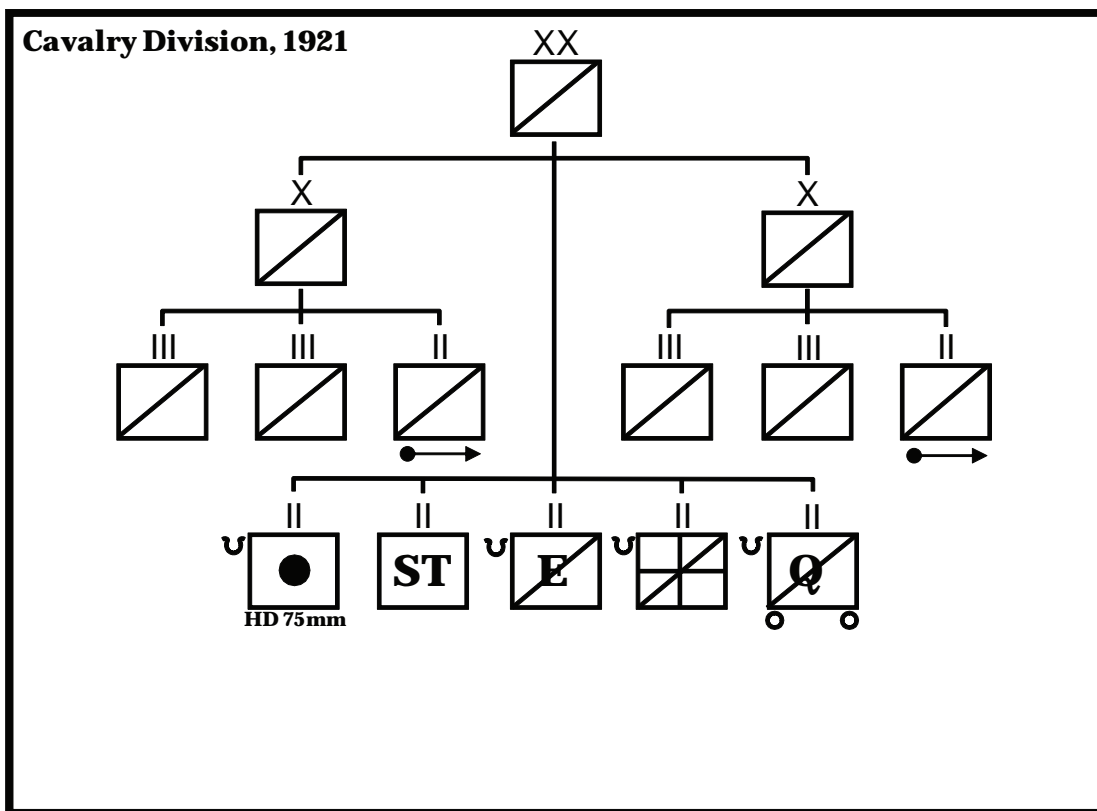

Elements of the 1st Cavalry Division on maneuver near Toyavale, TX, 1938.

Like the infantry division, in 1919 the Superior Board analyzed the organization of the 1917 cavalry division proposed for employment with the American Expeditionary Force (AEF) in World War I. Only one of these divisions was formed during the war, the 15th Cavalry (Cav.) Division (Div.), and it served along the Mexican border from November 1917 to May 1918 until it was demobilized. A very large division, the 15th consisted of 3 brigades of 3 regiments each, and topped out at over 18,000 officers and men. Considered too large and unwieldy for cavalry operations, the Superior Board rejected the idea of retaining that organization and instead recommended a “square” division consisting of two brigades of two regiments each, plus various division support units. Ultimately, the Army adopted a modified form of this division.

As approved in 1921, the new cavalry division was substantially different from the 15th Cav. Div. The size of the new division was set at 7,463 officers and men, a reduction of over 10,000 troops from the 1917 model. Additionally, the division was to include a battalion-size special troops unit, which included a signal troop, ordnance company, veterinary troop, and the division headquarters (HQ) troop (a tank company would be added in 1927). The table of organization (T/O) also included a field artillery battalion, a division air service, an engineer battalion (mounted), two machine gun squadrons, and a quartermaster train.

Postwar Plans for Cavalry Divisions

The postwar War Plans Division (WPD) mobilization plans called for 12 cavalry divisions. Two of those divisions were allotted the Regular Army (R.A.), four in the National Guard (N.G.), and six in the Organized Reserve (O.R.). For mobilization purposes, each field army was assigned two cavalry divisions.

Cavalry Division organization, 1921 and 1936.

Regular Army

Organization

The postwar R.A. cavalry divisions initially consisted of the 1st and 2d Cav. Divs. Due to budget limitations, only the 1st Cav. Div. was fully activated. It was organized in August 1921 at Fort Bliss, TX, where the bulk of the division's were located. One brigade, the 1st Cav. Brigade (Brig.), was deployed in posts along the Mexican border from Camp Harry J. Jones, AZ, to Fort Clark, TX. The brigade was relocated to posts entirely within Texas in 1923. Originally, this brigade consisted of one white cavalry regiment and one black regiment, the 10th Cav. However, under existing War Department policies of the time, units of the two races were not to be brigaded. Thus in 1923, the 10th Cav. was relieved from assignment to the 1st Cav. Div. and the 1st Cav. Regiment (Regt.) was assigned in its stead. The only other change to the division's subordinate regiments in the interwar period was the assignment of the 12th Cav. in early 1933 when the 1st Cav. was relieved and transferred to Fort Knox to form the basis for the 7th Cav. Brig. (Mecz).

The 2d Cav. Div. was not organized in 1921; however, all of its cavalry regiments were already active, as were a number of its other subordinate elements. The mobilization HQ for the division was Fort Riley, KS, where a number of the division's active units were located. Virtually all of the division's inactive elements, less the division HQ itself, were organized with Reserve personnel as Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units in the Seventh Corps Area in 1926 and 1927. Additionally, War Department instructions issued in August 1927 changed a number of regimental assignments and detailed further mobilization requirements for various installation activities in the Seventh Corps Area to provide the division with personnel on mobilization. Though it participated in command post exercises (CPXs) in the 1920s and 1930s as an RAI unit, the division HQ would not be activated until 1941.

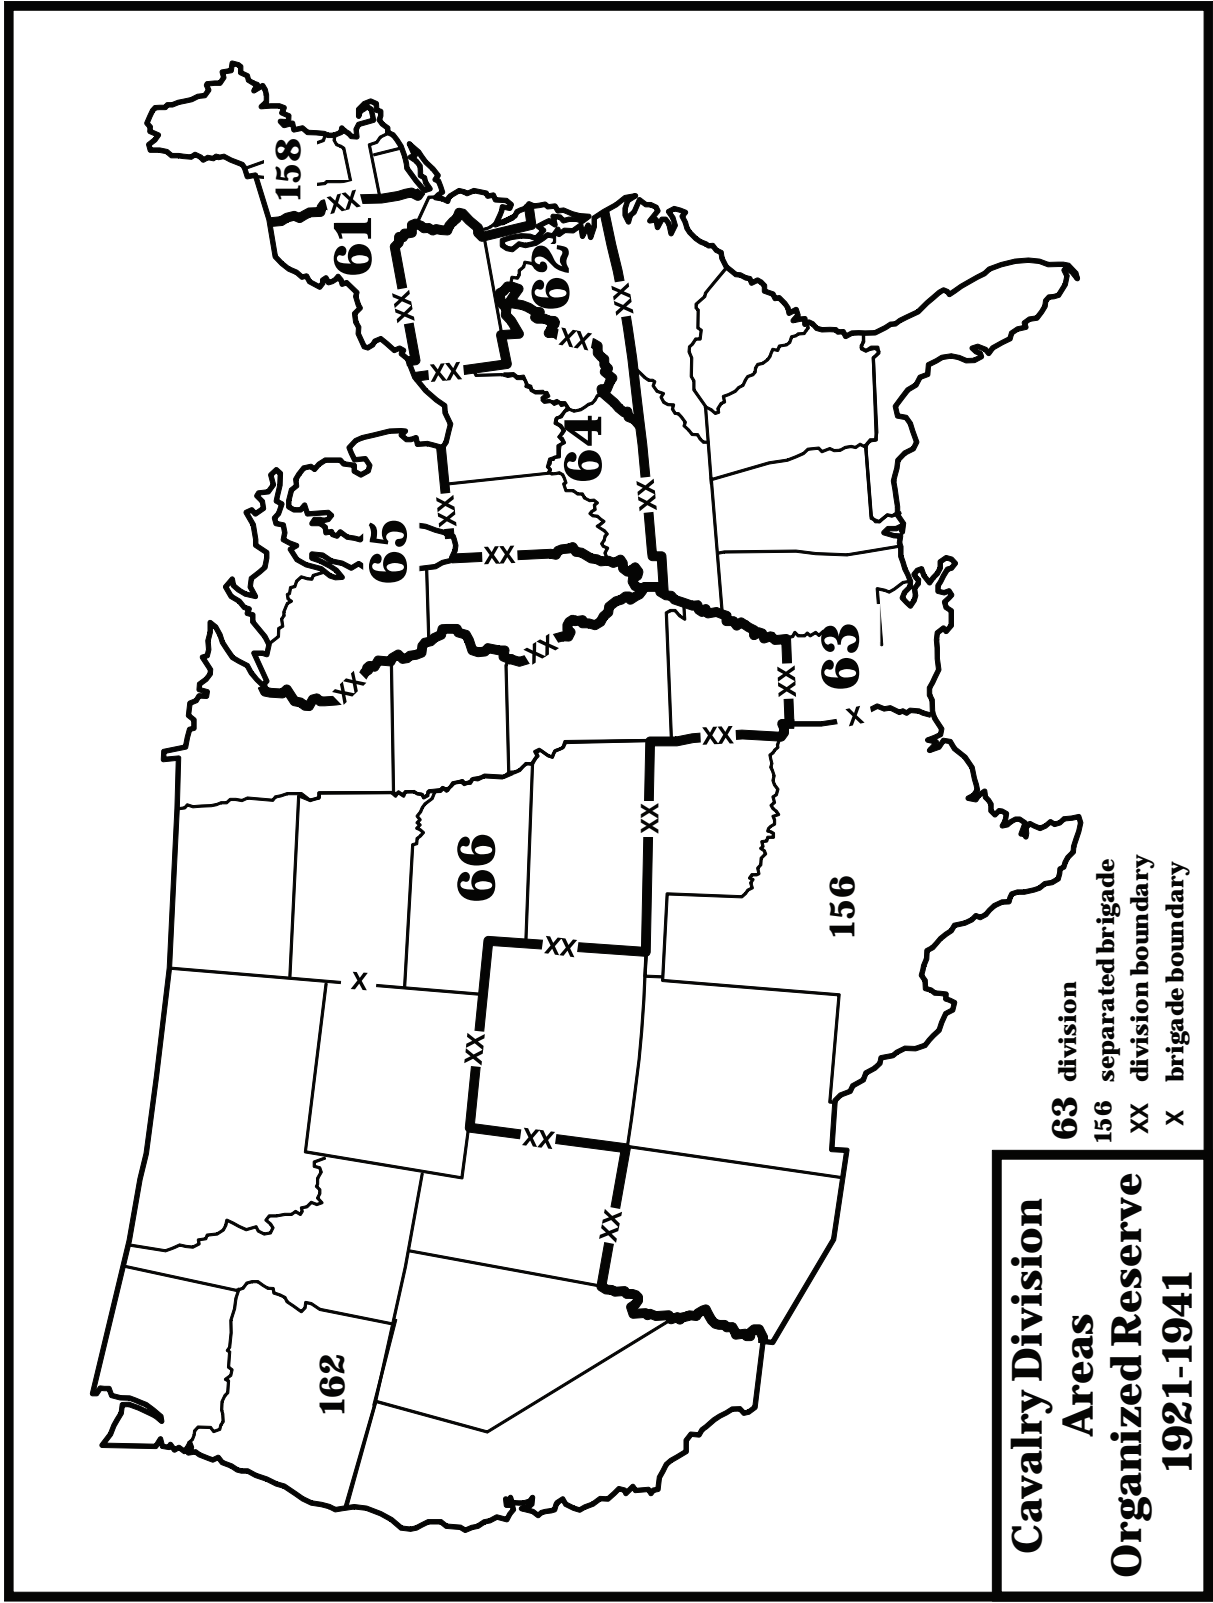

Also in August 1927, the Army constituted the 3d Cav. Div. Like the 2d Cav. Div., this division's subordinate regiments were also already active in the R.A. Most of the other subordinate units were soon organized as RAI organizations in the Fourth, Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Corps Areas (though predominantly in the Seventh). The division was disbanded in 1940.

Training

Given that the 1st Cav. Div. was concentrated in west Texas, it was able to assemble for training easier than most of the other stateside divisions. The first division-level maneuver was conducted in the fall of 1923 near Marfa, TX. The next, however, was not conducted until 4 years later at roughly the same location. The division was able to conduct additional maneuvers on the average of about one every 2 or 3 years from that point on. It also participated in a number of corps area and army CPXs, as well as the large Third Army Maneuvers in the late 1930s and early 1940s.

In the spring of 1929, the division was deployed along the Mexican border in Arizona and New Mexico in response to fighting along the border during the Escobar-Topete Revolution. The division, along with a brigade from the 2d Div., was sent there to protect public and private property and to prevent any of the fighting from spilling over onto US soil. Though not a training event per se, the deployment gave the division staff and subordinate units an opportunity to conduct a short-notice deployment and division-level operations under almost wartime conditions.

Like the 2d Div. for the infantry branch, the 1st Cav. Div. performed the role as the test-bed organization to develop the new cavalry division tables of organization in 1938. Those tests once again validated the square organization of the cavalry division and led to the adoption of only a few changes. These included a special weapons troop and three squadrons of three troops each for the cavalry regiment, but no major changes to the division structure. The strength of the cavalry division, however, was increased to 10,680 officers and men.

National Guard

Organization

The postwar mobilization plans called for four N.G. cavalry divisions, numbered 21 through 24. By the spring of 1921, most of the division subordinate units had been allotted to states and efforts to organize the divisions were soon underway. Under the rules of organization, division HQ could not be federally recognized until at least 75 percent of subordinate units had themselves been federally recognized. That requirement, coupled with a 2-year suspension of the Federal recognition of new units due to shortfalls in the Army's budget, prevented the Federal recognition of the 22d Cav. Div. HQ in Wisconsin until 1925. That status lasted just over 5 years. In 1929, due to further budget cuts, the Secretary of War directed that division-level cavalry HQ would no longer be funded until further notice. As a result, Federal recognition of the 22d Cav. Div. was withdrawn and its HQ was inactivated in June 1930. No other N.G. cavalry division HQ had been organized during this period.

By 1927, the Militia Bureau (soon to be renamed the National Guard Bureau) had determined that the geographically scattered nature of the N.G. cavalry divisions prevented them from being effectively trained. Most infantry divisions belonged to two or three states. Components of the 23d Cav. Div., however, belonged to 11 different states. Even the most concentrated division, the 21st, was composed of units from six different states. The Militia Bureau decided to limit Federal recognition to any new higher-level cavalry HQ to the brigade level (and later to the elimination of the one existing cavalry division HQ). The bureau also devised a plan where each corps area would have one cavalry brigade HQ within its jurisdiction to command and control the existing cavalry units. Therefore, a ninth brigade HQ, the 59th, was constituted and allotted to the state of Massachusetts in the First Corps Area. Massachusetts never organized the HQ, so it was reallocated to New Jersey in 1937 and quickly organized.

In 1935, the War Department reauthorized the formation of Guard cavalry division HQ. The following January, the HQ of the 24th Cav. Div., the most geographically dispersed of all N.G. divisions, was federally recognized at Topeka, KS. Though this division was the most geographically separated, it was also the division that had suffered the least from the various reorganizations, unit changes, and state allotments to its subordinate units. It was essentially the same organization as originally allotted in 1921, less the T/O changes that all the divisions experienced. Due to the failure of the various states involved in the remaining three divisions to agree on the final allotment of units and staff positions, the next division HQ was not federally recognized until 1939. By July 1940, all three of the remaining cavalry divisions were federally recognized, but their existence was short-lived. On 1 November, all four were disbanded when the WPD determined that large numbers of horse cavalry were not needed for future conflicts.

Training

Until 1936, the training of N.G. cavalry divisions was focused on brigade level and lower. Though the staff of the 22d Cav. Div. conducted its training at Camp Douglas, WI, from 1925 to 1929, the remainder of the division was not assembled there for the training and those subordinate units that were at Camp Douglas conducted their own camps separate from the division HQ.

Not until 1936 was a N.G. cavalry division able to assemble its staff at a camp for training with subordinate units. During that summer, the new 24th Cav. Div. assembled its entire HQ at Camp Guernsey, WY, for training with the 115th Cav. Each year thereafter until 1940, the HQ assembled at the camp of one its subordinate regiments or brigades for the purposes of training its staff and HQ personnel on division-level wartime tasks.

In September 1936, several states that composed the 23d Cav. Div. sent officers from subordinate units to Camp Bullis, TX, to participate in the Third Army CPX being held there. Brigadier (Brig.) General (Gen.) Louis S. Davidson, the commander of the Texas 56th Cav. Brig. acted as the division commander, and the remaining officers provisionally formed the division staff and HQ for the CPX.

In March 1940, the division commanders and staffs of the 22d, 23d, and 24th Cav. Divs. each traveled to Fort Bliss, TX, for 4 days of training with the division commander and staff of the 1st Cav. Div. The training was designed to prepare these commands for their respective field army maneuvers coming up that summer. Though none of the divisions were able to fully assemble all of their subordinate units for the training, each was able to assemble enough to make a viable cavalry force for their respective maneuvers. The 1940 maneuvers were the last hurrah for the N.G. cavalry divisions. They were all disbanded by October 1940.

Organized Reserve

Organization

In developing the structure for the postwar Army, the WPD planned for six divisions of O.R. cavalry. These consisted of the 61st through 66th Cav. Divs. These divisions were assigned to the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Armies for mobilization. Like N.G. divisions, most of the O.R. units were scattered across numerous states. The one exception was the 61st Cav. Div., which was located wholly within New York with the exception of one regiment in New Jersey. Once the allotment was complete and a local board of officers determined the location of the division HQ as well as the division's subordinate elements, organization of the divisions began. A small R.A. staff was assigned to each division HQ. These staffs advertised the organization of their respective divisions in local papers, radio spots, and other means. The staff, which had been provided a list of names and addresses of former and current Officer Reserve Corps (ORC) and National Army officers, also began contacting and recruiting these men for the new divisions until they were organized.

As with the infantry divisions, a corps area commander typically functioned as the commanding general for O.R. cavalry divisions. These duties were generally administrative in nature, but even then, the vast majority of the divisions' training and administration was supervised by each division's R.A. chief of staff. In many cases, the chief of staff also functioned as the acting division commander for CPXs and other training exercises, though at times one of the O.R. brigadier generals assigned to the 61st and 65th Cav. Divs. would function as such.

In general, O.R. cavalry divisions and regiments were provided for in the same manner as infantry organizations. However, the 156th, 158th, and 162d Cav. Brigs., each located in different corps areas than their parent divisions, possessed a small R.A. staff at the brigade level, which infantry divisional brigades did not have. The cavalry staffs were typically organized as follows:

Division Staff:

Chief of Staff	colonel
Adjutant General/G1	lieutenant colonel
Assistant Chief of Staff, General Staff G3	lieutenant colonel
Assistant Chief of Staff, General Staff G3	major
Assistant Chief of Staff, G4	lieutenant colonel

Executive officer*	lieutenant colonel

*Redesignated "unit instructor" in 1926.

Note: Ranks shown are highest authorized. Actual assigned personnel frequently held ranks lower, and sometimes higher, than those shown.

Unlike their R.A. and N.G. counterparts, the organization of Reserve division HQ and all the division's subordinate units was generally achieved by the end of 1922. Of course, for Reserve divisions all this really meant was that the unit was organized by the initial assignment of personnel. Most divisional subordinate organizations achieved somewhere near full strength in authorized officers by the mid-1920s and by then were considered functional units. Organizationally, the Reserve divisions went through the same interwar reorganizations as those in the other two components. Other than that, the composition of Reserve division subordinate units was constant from 1921 to 1941.

Training

The training of O.R. divisions posed a much greater challenge than those of the R.A. or N.G. due to the lack of equipment, horses, enlisted personnel, and funding. In any given year, for example, the War Department had only enough funds to send about 25 percent of O.R. personnel to summer camps. Still, the Reserve division staffs made the effort to conduct some level of adequate training for staffs and subordinate units at the camps and during the Inactive Training Period.

Like their infantry division counterparts, Reserve cavalry division staffs began to attend camps as a unit after 1924. In most cases, however, Reserve division staffs were only able to assemble at a summer camp about once every 4 or 5 years. When one did, the HQ most often participated in CPXs for training. During those years that the HQ did not go to camp as a unit, individual staff officers were trained in one of several ways for annual training. The most preferred was assignment to a R.A. or N.G. division staff during that unit's own summer training period. Another method was for staff officers to be ordered to duty during other times of the year to work on a R.A. division staff while in garrison, a corps area staff, or at times even the Reserve division's own Active Duty staff.

Organization (T/O)

The first significant modification to the cavalry division T/O after 1921 was the consolidation of the ambulance company and the veterinary troops into a medical squadron in 1925. A new T/O issued in 1928 dictated further major changes. This T/O eliminated the machine gun squadron in each brigade and returned one machine gun troop to each regiment. It also added an armored car squadron and a division air service consisting of a HQ and an observation squadron. The mounted engineer battalion was motorized and redesignated as an engineer squadron. The field artillery battalion was expanded to form a regiment, and a tank company was added to the special troops. Additionally, the strength of the new division was increased to 9,595 officers and men. An additional change came in 1936 when the quartermaster train was largely motorized and redesignated as a quartermaster squadron.

The final prewar revision to the cavalry division was defined in a new division T/O issued in November 1940. A summary of the changes consisted of the addition of a weapons troop to the brigade, the reorganization and redesignation of the armored car squadron as a reconnaissance squadron, the elimination of the tank company and the addition of a divisional antitank troop, the elimination of the special troops HQ, and the reorganization of the field artillery regiment to consist of two horse-drawn 75-mm pack howitzer battalions and one truck-drawn 105-mm howitzer battalion. The reorganized division now consisted of 11,676 officers and men.

1st CAVALRY DIVISION

HQ—Fort Bliss, TX, 1921–41

The 1st Cav. Div. was constituted in the R.A. on 20 August 1921 and activated at Fort Bliss, TX, on 13 September 1921. The division was allotted to the Eighth Corps Area and assigned to the Third Army. The division was formed around the remnants of the World War I-era 15th Cav. Div., which had been formed initially to protect the border with Mexico and was to deploy to France as the AEF cavalry force, but was disbanded in 1918 because not enough shipping was available to transport it to Europe. Unlike most other stateside divisions, the 1st Cav. Div. had an actual peacetime military mission to patrol the turbulent Mexican border and prevent incursions similar to Pancho Villa's raid on Columbus, NM, in 1916. The division's units manned posts that stretched along the Rio Grande River from Fort Bliss at El Paso to Fort Brown at Brownsville. In the early 1920s, the division garrisoned a series of platoon- and troop-size border camps from which regular patrols were dispatched to intercept bandits crossing the river to raid for cattle. By 1925, however, most of these camps were dismantled and the patrols were then conducted from the main garrisons, but less frequently as World War II approached. When not engaged in actual patrols, the 1st Cav. Div. engaged in periodic brigade- and division-level maneuvers. The first division maneuver was conducted in the early fall of 1923 near Marfa, TX. That exercise was the largest gathering of cavalry in the United States since the Civil War. Due to budget constraints, the division did not deploy its entire strength to the field again until 1927 when Marfa was again the site selected for the maneuvers. The 1929 exercise was slated for April, but was postponed due to the troubles caused by the Escobar-Topete Revolution. To ensure that US borders were secure, the entire division was deployed to border patrol camps with the bulk of the division joining the 10th Cav., 25th Inf., and elements of the 2d Div. manning posts in Arizona and New Mexico. During a fire fight between rebels and Mexican Army troops, which occurred across the border from Naco, AZ, Maj. Gen. George Van Horn Moseley, the division commander, crossed the border under fire and warned the Mexican commander to cease small-arms fire across the border into the United States or be prepared for retaliation from the 1st Cav. Div. The warning was heeded and the US troops remained disinterested and undisturbed bystanders during the remainder of the fight. The revolution was short-lived, and all units were back at home stations by the end of May. The maneuvers scheduled for April were conducted in October near Fillmore Pass, NM. Maneuvers were held near the Hueco Mountains in 1931 and 1932, but the depression and the management of Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC) camps prevented the possibility of division exercises in 1933 and for the next 2 years. The 1st Cav. Div. was given responsibility for the construction and operation of the Arizona–New Mexico CCC District. Though not a military program, the CCC camps were conducted in a loose military manner and gave hundreds of thousands of young men a taste of army life while performing work in the nation's forests. At its height, the 1st Cav. Div. was responsible for 62,500 of these young men. The next division maneuvers were held in April 1936, once again near Marfa, and again in May 1938, near Balmorhea, TX. The Balmorhea exercise was closely followed by the August 1938 Third Army Maneuver. For the Third Army Maneuver, the 1st Cav. Div. did not operate as a full division due to the lack of funds needed to concentrate it. Instead, the elements at Fort Bliss were opposed by the New Mexico N.G.'s 111th Cav. near the Ora Grande Mountains in New Mexico, while the 1st Cav. Brig. supported the VIII Corps' attacks against the 36th Div. at Camp Bullis, TX. The 1939 division maneuvers were conducted at Balmorhea against the 9th Inf. Regt. from Fort Sam Houston. For the August 1940 Third Army Maneuvers, the 1st Cav. Div. traveled to the Kisatchie National Forest in Louisiana. In that exercise, the division was the "eyes and ears" of the VIII Corps and operated against the newly formed 23d Cav. Div. After returning to home stations, the 1st Cav. Div. was relieved of the border posts by the Texas N.G.'s 56th Cav. Brig. and assembled at Fort Bliss in February 1941 for further training. After conducting a series of exercises, the division was sent again to Louisiana to participate in the 1941 Louisiana Maneuvers in August and September. The last exercise pitted the Second and Third Armies against one another. In the culminating battles, the 1st Cav. Div. successfully conducted a night crossing of the Sabine River and captured the Second Army fuel depot at Zwolle, LA, thereby preventing the refueling of Maj. Gen. George S. Patton's tanks and ensuring victory for the Third Army. After the maneuver, the division returned to its home station at Fort Bliss. Location 7 December 1941—Fort Bliss, TX.

Status: Active at Fort Hood, TX, as the 1st Cav. Div. Though the division retains the traditional title of "cavalry," it is an armored division.

2d CAVALRY DIVISION

HQ—Not organized, 1921–41; Fort Riley, KS, 1941

The 2d Cav. Div. was constituted in the R.A. on 20 August 1921, allotted to the Seventh Corps Area, and assigned to the Second Army. Though not activated until 1 April 1941, many of the units of the division were active from 1921 to 1940, and many others were active in the O.R. as RAI units. The active elements of the division in the 1920s and 1930s consisted mainly of the cavalry regiments; Troop A, 9th Engrs.; the various artillery units assigned during the period; and elements of the quartermaster train (later the 17th Q.M. Sq.). The division's designated mobilization station was Fort Riley, KS, where many of the units were concentrated in the 1920s and 1930s, and where they conducted their annual summer training. On 15 August 1927, under special instructions from the War Department, the division was reorganized to consist of the 2d, 4th, 12th, and 14th Cav. Regts., the 4th F.A. Bn., and the 16th Obsn. Sq. Other active elements assigned were the 14th Ord. Co., and the 5th, 6th, and 7th Pack Trains. The division Headquarters and Headquarters Troop (HHT), 3d and 4th Cav. Brig. HHTs, 2d Signal Troop, and 8th Pack Train were to be formed from unit and post support personnel at Fort Riley. The quartermaster (Q.M.) train HQ, 27th and 28th Wagon Cos., and the 2d Med. Sq. were to be formed from post support personnel at Fort Leavenworth. The rest of the units were to be activated from existing units at Fort Riley and RAI units in the O.R. After RAI units were authorized to be manned by Reserve personnel in 1926, units of the 2d Cav. Div. began to be organized in the Seventh Corps Area with most being concentrated in the Kansas City area. The 3d and 4th MG Sqs. (which were to be formed from cadre from the 2d MG Troop at Fort Riley), division special troops, and later, the inactive elements of the 2d Armd Car Sq. were all organized with reservists in Kansas City. These units conducted their summer training at Fort Riley, and therefore had a relatively close association with the division units located there. Thus, in the event of mobilization, the 2d Cav. Div. was most likely to be the first inactive division to be able to completely mobilize. Like many of the inactive R.A. divisions, the 2d Cav. Div. HQ was organized provisionally from time to time for CPXs, particularly those involving the exercises of the I Cav. Corps. As part of the general buildup of the US Army prior to World War II, the War Department directed the activation of the division at Fort Riley in the fall of 1940, where the majority of the division's active units were already concentrated. The first major element activated was the 3d Cav. Brig. on 15 October 1940, followed by the 4th Cav. Brig. (Colored) on 21 February 1941, and the division HQ on 1 April 1941. After conducting a series of premaneuver exercises, the division was sent to Louisiana to participate in the 1941 Louisiana Maneuvers in August and September. The last exercise of the maneuver pitted the Second Army against the Third Army. The major cavalry battle of the maneuver pitted the 2d Cav. Div. against the 1st Cav. Div. in the vicinity of East Texas and near Zwolle, LA. The division returned to Fort Riley in October 1941. Location 7 December 1941—Fort Riley, KS.

HQ—Not organized, 1927–40

The 3d Cav. Div. was constituted in the R.A. on 15 August 1927; allotted to the Fourth, Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Corps Areas; and assigned to the Second Army. The division was reassigned to the General Headquarters Reserve (GHQR) as a result of the US Army reorganization of 1933. The 3d Cav. Div.'s designated mobilization station was Fort Des Moines, IA, where many of the division's units were organized with Reserve officers as RAI units and where most of them conducted their annual summer training camps. The 3d Cav. Div. consisted largely of RAI units though many of the units of the division were active during the period 1921–40. Unlike the 2d Cav. Div., the division's active units were not concentrated in one or two areas, but were spread from coast to coast. The active elements of the division in the 1920s and 1930s consisted only of the cavalry regiments; the remainder of the units were to be activated from RAI units in the O.R. Like the 2d Cav. Div., however, RAI units of the 3d Cav. Div. were predominantly located in the Seventh Corps Area with most being initially concentrated in the Kansas City area. These units conducted their summer training at Fort Riley and were under the peacetime control of the HQ, 66th Cav. Div. for administrative and training purposes. In 1933, several of the division's RAI units were transferred to the Third Corps Area, but by the late 1930s, most of the division's RAI units were relocated to Des Moines, IA.

Status: Disbanded 10 October 1940.

21st CAVALRY DIVISION

New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey,
Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and Virginia National Guard

HQ—Not organized, 1921–40; Manhattan, NY, 1940

The 21st Cav. Div. was constituted in 1921; originally allotted to the states of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Virginia; and assigned to the First Army. From 1922 to 1938, the division's subordinate units generally held separate summer camps at locations within their respective states: the 51st Cav. Brig. at Pine Camp, NY, for New York units; the 102d Cav. at Sea Girt, NJ; the 52d Cav. Brig. at Mount Gretna, PA, 1921–35 and Indiantown Gap, 1936–40. The 52d held its first full brigade camp in 1923, during which the Pennsylvania Cavalrymen held a brigade review for Gen. John J. Pershing. The 51st held its first full brigade camp in June 1928 when the 121st Cav. participated for the first time. Staggered camps were the rule of thumb for both brigades. This meant that one regiment would be followed immediately by the second so that the horses of both regiments could be pooled to mount an entire regiment. In that period of tight budgets, N.G. cavalry troops were authorized only half the number of horses (32) than that of men (about 65) per troop. The brigade HQ would arrive for the last week of the first regiment, and remain for the first week of the second regiment. This allowed the brigade commander and his staff to work with both regiments to discern strengths and weaknesses of his units. In March 1925, plans were developed to assemble the entire 21st Cav. Div. at Sea Girt for maneuvers. The plan never came to fruition, however, due to a lack of money and the idea was not pursued again until the late 1930s. Although the division HQ was not officially formed until 1940, the combined staffs of the 51st and 52d Brigs. formed the division HQ in a provisional status for First Army CPXs on several occasions. The staffs participated in the CPXs at Camp Dix in 1931 and 1934, at Fort Devens in 1936, and in the I Cav. Corps CPX at Fort Knox, KY, in 1934. Although the 21st Cav. Div. did not participate in the First Army maneuvers in 1935, 1939, and 1940, several of its subordinate units did. The 101st Cav. participated in the 1939 maneuver and the 21st Rcn. Sq. participated in the 1940 maneuver, but as the “eyes and ears” of the 22d Cav. Div. The primary reason that the division did not play a part in those major maneuvers was that it did not have a staff organized, nor a commander appointed, until the summer of 1940. This state of affairs was due, in part, to the failure of the representative states' adjutants general to agree on the division's final allotments. The division was reorganized in the fall of 1938 when the 52d Cav. Brig. was relieved from assignment and New Jersey's 59th Cav. Brig. assigned in its stead. Also, that fall the Secretary of War authorized the various states to begin final negotiations for the formation of the HQ of the remaining N.G. cavalry divisions (less the 24th, already organized). Final allotments were made in January 1939 and the division HQ, less several staff positions were allotted to the state of New York. The Secretary of War authorized the formation of the 21st Cav. Div. on 30 April 1940 and the division HQ was organized and federally recognized on 5 July 1940, making it the last N.G. cavalry division to be formed. On that date, Maj. Gen. Nathaniel H. Egleston (formerly the C.G., 51st Cav. Brig.) was appointed division commander. However, only 3 months later the division was directed to be broken up. The 21st Cav. Div. was inactivated on 1 October 1940.

Status: Disbanded effective 1 November 1940.

22d CAVALRY DIVISION

Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Kentucky, Louisiana, and West Virginia National Guard

HQ—Not organized, 1921–25; Milwaukee, WI, 1925–30; Inactive, 1930–40; Harrisburg, PA, 1940

The 22d Cav. Div. was constituted in 1921; originally allotted to the states of Wisconsin, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Kentucky, Louisiana, and West Virginia; and assigned to the Second Army. By 1927, it had been reallocated to the states of the Fifth and Sixth Corps Areas only. The HQ was allotted to the Wisconsin N.G., which began appointing officers to the division staff in 1922, but it was not until 25 March 1925 that the division HQ was federally recognized. Col. Frank Caldwell, a R.A. officer, was offered command, but declined, not wanting to accept a dual commission in the Wisconsin N.G. Concurrently, Lt. Col. Robert M. Beck was also offered command of the 53d Cav. Brig., but declined for the same reason. A division commander was never appointed and the division was headed instead by Col. James T. Hale, the division chief of staff. In 1929, due to budget constraints, the Secretary of War directed that only brigade-level HQ would be funded in cavalry divisions until further notice. As a result, the first HQ of the 22d Cav. Div. was disbanded on 30 June 1930. During most of the period of the division's existence, training was conducted at regimental level and below. This was particularly true of the armory training period which ran roughly from August to May, and was conducted at troop level. The armory training consisted of the weekend drills typical of N.G. units of the time. Interspersed were periods of Active Duty at the call of the state. Regiments, or elements thereof, were called out from time-to-time by state governors for emergencies or to establish martial law in an unruly area. The best training for units of the 22d Cav. Div. was provided by the annual 2-week summer camps. The 53d Cav. Brig. and 105th Cav. conducted their camps at Camp Williams, WI, while the 106th Cav. was split between Camp Grayling, MI (1st Sq.) and Camp Grant, IL (HQ and 2d Sq.). The units of the 53d Brig. trained together for the first time in 1936 when it was assembled at Camp Williams for the Second Army Maneuvers that summer. Prior to 1935, the 54th Cav. Brig. HQ and the 107th Cav. trained at Camp Perry, OH, while the 123d Cav. trained at Fort Knox, KY. During the summer of 1935, the 107th Cav. came to train at Fort Knox followed immediately by the 123d Cav. The brigade HQ overlapped the camps of the two subordinate regiments. This system was similar to that practiced by the brigades of the 21st Cav. Div. By 1937, however, the regiments of the 54th Brig. were training concurrently at Fort Knox as the brigade made progress toward higher levels of collective training. The 22d Cav. Div. was reorganized in February 1939 when the HQ was withdrawn from Wisconsin and allotted to Pennsylvania. Concurrently, the 53d Brig. was assigned to the 23d Cav. Div. and Pennsylvania's 52d Cav. Brig. was assigned to the 22d Div. This brigade, along with the newly activated 166th F.A., 22d Sig. Tp., and 122d Q.M. Sq. (all from the Pennsylvania N.G.) took to the field at Indiantown Gap for 1 week in November 1939 as part of an increase in training periods directed by the War Department. These units made up over half of the division, and while the training was conducted primarily at troop- and squadron-level, the training gave many brigade officers (soon to be assigned to the new division staff) an opportunity to conduct something akin to division-level planning. On 3 January 1940, the HQ, 22d Cav. Div. was once again federally recognized, this time at Harrisburg, PA. Two months later, the new commander, Maj. Gen. Edward J. Stackpole Jr., assembled his new staff at Fort Bliss, TX, to train with the staff of the 1st Cav. Div. from 10 to 12 March 1940. This training was designed to prepare the staff for the upcoming First Army Maneuvers near Canton, NY, in August 1940. The training was apparently worth the effort as the 22d Div. was later able to perform well above the expectations for a brand new division. During the First Army Maneuvers, the division was short one brigade because funds were not available to move the 54th Cav. Brig. to New York. The 21st Rcn. Sq. (21st Cav. Div.) was attached to the division for the maneuver to replace the missing 22d Sq. of Ohio. The final exercise of the maneuver pitted the Blue First Army (II and III Corps) against the invading Black I Corps. The 22d Div. was placed on the right flank of the First Army facing the 26th "Yankee" Div. In a typical cavalry "end-run" on the final night and day of the exercise, the cavalry units of the 22d Div. moved in behind the Yankee Div. cutting the lines of communication of the 51st Inf. Brig. Although the performance of the 22d Cav. Div. was quite impressive, the results were not convincing enough to save the division from the planners at GHQ. On 23 September 1940, the 22d Cav. Div. was inactivated.

Status: Disbanded effective 1 November 1940.

23d CAVALRY DIVISION“Dixie Cavalry”*Texas, Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, North Carolina, Illinois,
New Mexico, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Massachusetts National Guard*HQ—Not organized, 1921–39; New Orleans, LA, 1939–40

The 23d Cav. Div. was constituted in 1921; originally allotted to the states of Texas, Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, North Carolina, New Mexico, and Massachusetts; and assigned to the Third Army. By 1927, it had been reallocated to the states of the Fourth and Eighth Corps Areas only. Although formal activation of the division did not occur until 1939, many of the units that made up the division began organizing or were already in existence when it was constituted. The first of the units to be assigned to the division was the 56th Cav. Brig., which was originally raised by the Texas N.G. for service along the Mexican border in World War I. In 1921, the brigade commander, Brig. Gen. Jacob F. Wolters, was designated by the War Department to be the division commander of the 23d Cav. Div. on mobilization, a designation he retained until his retirement in 1934. The 56th Brig. consisted of the 111th and 112th Cav. Regts. and the 56th MG Sq. Through the 1920s, divisional units continued to be activated, beginning with the HQ Troop, 23d Cav. Div., which was organized and federally recognized at Birmingham, AL, on 12 April 1921. Additionally, the 55th MG Sq., the 109th Cav., the 110th Cav., and HQ Troop, 55th Cav. Brig. were organized. These last units constituted the bulk of the 55th Cav. Brig., although the brigade HQ itself was not organized until 1936 due to budget constraints. In the early years, training of division units centered primarily on armory drills and, of course, the annual summer camp. Armory drill periods gave the units the opportunity to train at the squad-, platoon-, and rarely, troop-level. Troop-, squadron-, and regimental-level training was generally reserved for summer camp. By 1932, however, both the 55th and 56th Cav. Brigs. were conducting brigade-level exercises each summer. The bulk of the division's units, being located in the Fourth Corps Area, trained each summer at Fort Oglethorpe, GA, with the 6th Cav. Regt., while the 56th Cav. Brig. and the 141st F.A. trained at Camp Wolters, TX, and Camp Beauregard, LA, respectively. Since the 23d Cav. Div.'s brigades were able to concentrate their subordinate units for summer camp, they were consistently rated among the best, if not the best, N.G. cavalry units by R.A. evaluators. Commanders and staff officers of the major units in the division had several opportunities to work together before the division's activation. The first of these was in September 1936, when officers of the division participated in the Third Army CPX at Camp Bullis, TX. The provisional 23d Div. staff was made up of officers primarily from the 55th and 56th Cav. Brigs. During the CPX, the R.A. officers working with the 23d Div. gave the provisional staff high praise for their performance. The next opportunity came in August 1938 when the entire 23d Cav. Div. participated in the Third Army Maneuvers. Due to cost constraints, however, the Third Army could not be assembled in one location so the 23d did not train as a division. The bulk of the division participated in the Fourth Corps Area portion of the exercise in Mississippi's DeSoto National Forest under control of the 55th Cav. Brig. The 56th Cav. Brig. participated in the Eighth Corps Area exercise at Camp Bullis, near San Antonio, TX. The Third Army commander was so satisfied with the performance of the 23d Div. units, he recommended that the N.G. horse divisions should be retained in the army structure and mobilized as such in time of war. On 18 October 1939, at long last the division HQ was organized and federally recognized at New Orleans and the 23d Cav. Div. formally came into existence with Maj. Gen. James F. Edmonds appointed as the first, and ultimately the only, commander. Gen. Edmonds and his staff almost immediately began preparations for the 23d Cav. Div. to take part in the 1940 Louisiana Maneuvers. In January 1940, Gen. Edmonds assembled the division staff at Roberts Field in Birmingham, AL, for the additional training directed by the War Department for all N.G. units that winter. During that training, the division staff, the division HQ Tp., and HHT, 55th Cav. Brig. participated in a CPX. Two months later, Edmonds and the division staff traveled to Fort Bliss, TX, to train with the staff of the 1st Cav. Div. from 17 to 20 March 1940. This training was specifically designed to prepare the staff for that summer's maneuvers. During the Louisiana Maneuvers, the 23d Cav. Div. was assigned the mission to provide reconnaissance for the IV Corps and, during the exercise, it operated against the VIII Corps and the Regulars of the 1st Cav. Div. in the Kisatchie National Forest. Subsequent reports stated that the 23d did a credible job despite facing the more experienced R.A. troops and the difficulties caused by the rental horses provided to the N.G. units. The efforts of the 23d Cav. Div. during the exercise were good, but not good enough to save it from the Army's troop basis planners. Its performance notwithstanding, the 23d Cav. Div. was inactivated 6 October 1940.

Kansas, Iowa, South Dakota, Idaho,
Minnesota, Wyoming, Washington, and Colorado National Guard

HQ—Not organized, 1921–36; Topeka, KS, 1936–40

The 24th Cav. Div. was constituted in 1921; originally allotted to the states of Kansas, Iowa, South Dakota, Idaho, Minnesota, Wyoming, Washington, and Colorado; and assigned to the Third Army. It was reassigned to the Fourth Army as a result of the army reorganization of 1932. Organizationally, the 24th Cav. Div. was unique in that it was the only N.G. cavalry division to maintain the same brigades and regiments from beginning to end. It was the least affected by reorganizations and as a partial result, organized its HQ a full 3 years before the other division. As constituted, the 24th Div. consisted of the 57th and 58th Cav. Brigs. The 57th included Iowa's 113th Cav. and Kansas' 114th Cav. The 57th MG Sq., while constituted, assigned to the brigade, and allotted to the state of South Dakota, was never organized. The 58th consisted of Wyoming's 115th Cav., Idaho's 116th Cav., and the 58th MG Sq. of Washington and Wyoming. In addition to the combat units, the support units were constituted as inactive units and assigned to the division in 1921. These included the 24th Sig. Tp., 128th Ord. Co. (Maint), 168th F.A. Bn. (Horse), 128th Engr. Bn. (Mtd), and 24th Div. Q.M. Train. The 124th Med. Sq. was constituted and assigned in 1924. In July 1926, the 168th F.A. Bn. was organized from the 1st Bn., 158th F.A., which was formerly assigned to the 45th Div. One other unique fact about the 24th Cav. Div. was the organization in 1939 of a division aviation section. This section consisted of the 120th Obsn. Sq., 120th Photo Section, and a Medical Department Detachment, all from Colorado and formerly assigned to the 45th Div. All of the armory drill periods were designed to prepare the troops for the annual 2-week summer camp. Unfortunately, the camps for the units of the division were spread out all over the western United States, which made it difficult to assemble units larger than a regiment. For example, the division HQ troop trained at Camp Murray, WA; the 57th Brig. and the 113th Cav. at Camp Dodge, IA; the 114th Cav. at Fort Riley, KS; the 115th Cav. at Pole Mountain, WY; the 58th Brig. and 116th Cav. at Boise Barracks, ID; and the 168th F.A. trained at Fort Logan, CO. On 28 January 1936, the HQ of the 24th Cav. Div. was federally recognized at Topeka, KS, under the command of Maj. Gen. William K. Herndon. Realizing the difficulties he faced in training his division, Gen. Herndon immediately set out to assemble the entire organization at Fort Riley, KS, for the 1936 summer camp. Unfortunately, the funds for the movement of all the troops, horses, and equipment were not available, and the plan was shelved. Instead, Gen. Herndon developed a plan to assemble the division staff (the members of which came from the several states that comprised the division) for training. His idea included the provision that the staff would hold their camp with a different regiment each year, at least until funds came available to bring the division together. Enough funds were available to support this plan, which was implemented beginning the summer of 1936. The division staff assembled for training that summer at Camp Guernsey, WY, with the 115th Cav. For the 1937, 1938, and 1939 camps, the entire division HQ trained at Camp Dodge, IA; Camp Guernsey; and Boise Barracks, ID, respectively. In 1940, Herndon and the division staff traveled to Fort Bliss, TX, to train with the staff of the 1st Cav. Div. 24–27 March. This training was specifically designed to prepare the staff for that summer's maneuvers. Although these efforts were a step in the right direction, the closest the 24th Div. ever came to operating as a full division was during the Fourth Army Maneuvers in July and August 1940. For the Ninth Corps Area Maneuver, Gen. Herndon was able to concentrate the division HQ, the HQ troop, the 58th Cav. Brig. complete, and the 24th Rcn. Sq. at Centralia, WA. In this exercise, the division (-) was the cavalry force for the provisional Blue Corps, consisting of the 3d Div., the 40th Div., and miscellaneous coast artillery and support units. While the bulk of the division was training in Washington, a large portion of it was finishing its participation in the Seventh Corps Area Maneuver near Camp Ripley, MN, in July and early August. In that exercise, the 57th Cav. Brig., reinforced by the 24th Sig. Tp. and the 4th Cav. Regt. (Horse and Mecz), constituted the reconnaissance and screening force for the provisional Red VII Corps. The 168th F.A. and the 120th Obsn. Sq. were not part of the Fourth Army Maneuvers. Being located in the Eighth Corps Area, they participated in the Third Army's Louisiana Maneuvers that August. The results of the large-scale maneuvers of 1935–40, coupled with events in Poland and France, convinced army planners that the day of employing large bodies of horse cavalry were numbered. As a result, like the other three N.G. cavalry divisions, the 24th was inactivated in October 1940.

Status: Disbanded effective 1 November 1940.

61st CAVALRY DIVISION“The Foragers”*Organized Reserve New York and New Jersey

HQ—New York City, NY, 1921–41

The 61st Cav. Div. was constituted 15 October 1921, allotted to the Second Corps Area, and assigned to the Fourth Army. The division HQ was initiated in December 1921 by Maj. Frederick S. Snyder at the Federal Building in Rochester, NY. The HQ was relocated to the Army Building in New York City in January 1922 and finally to 39 Whitehall Street in New York City in April 1922. To maintain communications with the officers of the division, Col. William F.H. Godson, the division chief of staff, established a newsletter titled the “Forager” after the division’s nickname. In accordance with early mobilization plans, the Syracuse Concentration Area was designated as the division’s mobilization station. The division tables of organization remained unchanged from its formation until 1 July 1929 when the machine gun squadrons were deleted. The 151st MG Sq. was reorganized and redesignated as the 461st Armd Car Sq. The personnel of the 152d MG Sq. were reassigned to one of the cavalry regiments in New York City. Other changes to the division organization were the addition of the 461st Tank Co. (Light), and the expansion of the 461st F.A. Bn. into a regiment (and concurrently redesignated the 861st). Additionally, when the field armies were activated and army areas reallocated in 1933, the division was relieved from the Fourth Army and assigned to the First Army. The 61st Cav. Div. boasted its share of interesting personalities, some of whom gained fame later on in World War II. For example, Maj. Terry de la Mesa Allen, later to become the first commanding general of the 2d Cav. Div., and also commanded the famed “Big Red One” in World War II, was the executive officer of the 303d Cav. in New York City. The first commanding officer of the 301st Cav. Regt. was Col. William J. Donovan. Col. Donovan won the Medal of Honor in World War I and was the US District Attorney in Syracuse, NY. However, Col. Donovan would become even more famous for organizing and heading the Office of Strategic Services (OSS) during World War II, the forerunner of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). The Inactive Training Period for the 61st Cav. Div. usually ran September to May. The 151st Cav. Brig. and other “upstate” units conducted their training events on Tuesday evenings and were the first in the division to begin a regular schedule of marksmanship training. In fact, the 151st MG Sq. competed regularly in rifle matches against the 26th Inf. at Plattsburg Barracks, though they rarely bested the Regulars. The division HQ, 152d Cav. Brig., and other New York City units had their inactive meetings on the first and third Mondays of each month at the Army-Navy Club in Manhattan. Riding classes were conducted on Thursday evenings at the 101st Cav. Armory and correspondence courses were done on the officer’s own time. The division held consolidated summer training camps for the first 2 years (1922–23) at Camp Dix, NJ. After that, the division support units generally went to other camps designed for their respective arm or service. For example, the 401st Engrs. usually trained with the 1st Engr. Regt. at Fort Du Pont, DE, the 461st F.A. Bn. trained with the 2d Bn., 7th F.A. at Madison Barracks, and the 361st Med. Sq. trained with the 1st Med. Regt. at Carlisle Barracks, PA. From 1924 to 1934, the cavalry units trained at Fort Ethan Allen, VT. The training plan was normally developed by the division’s R.A. instructors and executed with the assistance of the 1st Sq., 3d Cav. and the 7th F.A., both stationed at Fort Ethan Allen. In 1935, however, the 152d Cav. Brig. was sent to train at Fort Myer, VA, with the 62d Cav. Div. and the 3d Cav. The event was so successful that the whole division traveled down to train with the 62d Div. in 1937 and 1939. For the intervening years of 1936 and 1938, the division went to Jericho, VT, near Fort Ethan Allen to train. The division staff also had the opportunity to function as a staff during several Second Corps Area and First Army CPXs held in 1929, 1931, 1934, and 1936. Due to the lack of equipment and enlisted personnel, units of the 61st Cav. Div. did not participate as organized units in the First Army maneuvers of 1935, 1939, and 1940. However, hundreds of individual officers and many enlisted men from the 61st participated as umpires or by being assigned to R.A. or N.G. cavalry units to bring them up to authorized war strength. The 1940 maneuver in upstate New York was the division’s last major training event, for although the 61st was not officially disbanded until January 1942, it had almost ceased to exist by then. Most of the assigned personnel had already been called to Active Duty, leaving only a shell of the former organizations. Location 7 December 1941—Manhattan, NY.

Organized Reserve Maryland, Virginia,
Pennsylvania, and District of Columbia

HQ—Hagerstown, MD, 1921–24; Towson, MD, 1924–40; Baltimore, MD, 1940–41

The 62d Cav. Div. was constituted on 15 October 1921, allotted to the Third Corps Area, and assigned to the Fourth Army. The division HQ was initiated on 7 September 1921 at 27 West Washington Street in Hagerstown, MD, by Lt. Col. William R. Taylor. The division was officially activated shortly thereafter and began to flourish rapidly. From an original strength of 70 officers and no enlisted men on 31 December 1921, by 31 July 1925, the 62d Cav. Div. boasted 355 officers and 43 enlisted men and all authorized units had been activated. The division HQ was relocated to York and Allegheny Avenues in Towson, MD, on 30 June 1924. It was moved one final time on 27 September 1940 to the Hurst Building in Baltimore, MD, where it remained until its inactivation in 1942. The division tables of organization remained unchanged from its formation until 1 July 1929, when the MG Sqs. were eliminated and absorbed into other units. Other changes to the division organization were the addition of the 462d Armd. Car Sq., 462d Tank Co. (L), and the expansion of the 462d F.A. Bn. into a regiment (and concurrently redesignated the 862d). Additionally, when the field armies were activated and army areas reallocated in 1933, the division was relieved from the Fourth Army and assigned to the First Army. The 62d Cav. Div. had a number of interesting personalities assigned to or associated with it during the years between the wars. For example, the first postwar commander of the 306th Cav. was Col. John B.P. Clayton Hill, a Congressman from the state of Maryland. In February 1938, Col. Bruce C. Clark assumed the duties of the division chief of staff, a job he held until 1940. Additionally, Cols. Jonathan Wainwright and George S. Patton were frequent guests to divisional social events and various training events during the period they were regimental commanders of the 3d Cav. at Fort Myer, VA, in the late 1930s. The Inactive Training Period for the 62d Div. usually ran September to May. Most of the units held their training meetings at the armory of the N.G. unit in the city where they were located. The 306th Cav., being located close to the 3d Cav. at Fort Myer, made frequent use of that regiment's mounts and the 307th Cav. established a relationship with the cavalry ROTC unit at the Virginia Military Institute from which many of the officers of the regiment were commissioned. The 308th Cav. had a similar relationship with Valley Forge Military Academy. The division generally held its summer training camps at Fort Myer and was always supported with men and horses from the 3d Cav. For most of the period between the wars, the cavalry regiments of the division alternated each summer between participating in the regular training camp at Fort Myer and conducting the training of the cavalry elements of the Citizen's Military Training Camp (CMTC) at Fort Belvoir. For at least two camps (1926 and 1928), the 305th and 308th Regts. attended summer training with the regiments of the 52d Cav. Brig. at Mount Gretna, PA. The division support units generally went to other camps designed for their respective arm or service. For example, the 402d Engr. Sq. usually trained with the 13th Engr. Regt. at Fort Humphreys, VA, and a few years with the 1st Engrs. at Fort DuPont, DE. The 462d F.A. Bn. trained with the 6th F.A. at Fort Hoyle, MD, and the 362d Med.Sq. trained with the 1st Med. Regt. at Carlisle Barracks, PA. Beginning in 1930 the level of training of the division began to accelerate and become more varied as the division staff became more experienced in their duties and in spite of the problems brought on by the depression. In July of that year, the division, brigade, and regimental staffs participated in the Third Corps Area CPX at Fort Meade, MD. As the depression began to deepen, however, the R.A. groaned under the weight of maintaining readiness with inadequate funding while still operating the camps of the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC). In 1934, the War Department directed the Regulars to hand over the camps to the stewardship of Reserve Officers. The 62d Cav. Div. responded with a flood of volunteers. By November 1935, 87 officers of the division were on Active Duty working with the CCC. In 1937, the 152d Cav. Brig. was sent to train at Fort Myer with the 62d Cav. Div. and the 3d Cav. The event was so successful that the entire 61st Cav. Div. came to Fort Myer to train with the 62d in 1937 and 1939. The focus of the 1939 camp was to prepare the officers of those two divisions for the First Army maneuver scheduled for the following summer. During those maneuvers, the officers of the 62d were assigned duties with the units of the 22d Cav. Div. as well as the 3d Cav. The 1940 maneuver in upstate New York was the division's last major training event, for although the 62d was not officially disbanded until January 1942, it had almost ceased to exist by then due to the call to Active Duty of most of its officers. Location 7 December 1941—Towson, MD.

Organized Reserve Texas, Oklahoma, Colorado,
Arizona, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana,
Tennessee and North Carolina

HQ—New Orleans, LA, 1922–23; Fort Oglethorpe, GA, 1923–27; Chattanooga, TN, 1927–41

The 63d Cav. Div. was constituted on 15 October 1921, allotted to the Fourth and Eighth Corps Areas, and assigned to the Fifth Army. The division HQ was initiated on 7 July 1922 at Poland and Dauphin Streets in New Orleans, LA, by Col. James H. Hornbeck. The division HQ was moved to Fort Oglethorpe, GA, on 10 October 1923 because that post provided a more central location from which to control the division's scattered units. Originally, Camp Beauregard had been designated as the mobilization station for the division HQ, but it was changed to Fort Oglethorpe when the HQ moved there. The division HQ was relocated once again on 8 July 1927 when it was moved to the Pound Building in Chattanooga, TN, where it remained until the beginning of World War II. Except for the 156th Cav. Brig., which was to mobilize at Fort Clark, TX, and the 403d Engr. Sq. and division quartermaster train, which were to form at Camp Beauregard, LA, the division's remaining units were to mobilize at Fort Oglethorpe. The division tables of organization remained unchanged from its formation until 1 July 1929, when the MG Sqs. were eliminated and absorbed into other units. Other changes to the division at that time were the addition of the 463d Armd. Car Sq., 463d Tank Co. (L), and the expansion of the 463d F.A. Bn. into a regiment (and concurrently redesignated the 863d). Additionally, when the field armies were activated and army areas reallocated in 1933, the division was relieved from the Fifth Army and assigned to the Third Army. The division's Inactive Training Period usually ran September to May. Many of the units held their training meetings at N.G. armories or trained with ROTC units in the city where the majority of their officers were located. Units in the Chattanooga and Atlanta areas were fortunate in that they participated in a marksmanship training program at the Catoosa Training Area and Range, near the Chickamauga National Battlefield. Division units held their summer training camps at a wide variety of posts throughout the south and were able to establish consistent training partnerships with the R.A. units at those locations. The 6th Cav. at Fort Oglethorpe provided support to the units of the 155th Cav. Brig. in terms of horses, equipment, and training expertise. The 156th Cav. Brig. and 311th Cav. trained with the 1st Cav. Brig. and the 5th Cav., respectively, at Fort Clark, TX, while the 312th Cav. and 156th MG Sq. trained at Fort Bliss and were supported with men and horses from the 7th Cav. and the 2d MG Sq. As an alternate form of training, the cavalry regiments of the 155th Cav. Brig. occasionally conducted the training of the cavalry elements of the Citizen's Military Training Camp (CMTC) at Fort Oglethorpe. In July 1935, virtually the entire division, save the 156th Cav. Brig., trained the various branches of the CMTC at Fort Oglethorpe. Under the guiding eyes of the men of the 6th Cav. and the Regulars assigned to the division, the CMTC provided one of the few opportunities the 63d Cav. Div. had to operate its various echelons of HQ simultaneously. The 1930s saw the level of training in the division accelerate and become more varied as experience levels increased in the staff officers of the HQ, as well as in the officers of the units. For example, in May 1936, the brigade and regimental staffs of the 156th Brig. participated in the Third Army CPX at Camp Bliss, TX. The training objective of the CPX was to begin the process of preparing staffs of the R.A., N.G., and O.R. units for the army-level maneuvers scheduled for the summer of 1938. In the same vein, the division and brigade staffs participated in a 2-week, division-level CPX held at the Chickamauga Battlefield in May 1937. Due to the lack of horses, equipment, and enlisted men, the 63d Cav. Div. did not participate in the 1938 Third Army maneuver as an organized division. Instead, the members of the division reinforced R.A. or N.G. units to bring them up to wartime strength in officers or by acting as umpires. In general, the eastern elements of the division reinforced the 55th Cav. Brig., 127th Engr. Sq., and the 141st F.A. of the 23d Cav. Div., all of which participated in the Fourth Corps Area portion of the maneuvers held in the DeSoto National Forest in Mississippi. Concurrently, the 156th Cav. Brig. reinforced the Texas N.G.'s 56th Cav. Brig. and the 1st Cav. Brig. of the 1st Cav. Div., which participated in the maneuver at Camp Bullis, TX, as part of the Eighth Corps Area concentration. In all, over 300 officers from the division participated in the Third Army maneuver that year. The next major event in the life of the division was the 1940 Third Army maneuver held near the Kisatchie National Forest in central Louisiana in August 1940. Once again, the officers of the 63d reinforced the 1st and 23d Cav. Divs., but also provided a substantial number of officers to the 31st Div. as well. The 1940 maneuver in central Louisiana was the division's last major training event. Shortly thereafter, most of the division's assigned personnel were called to Active Duty during the build-up of the US Army in 1940–41. Location 7 December 1941—Chattanooga, TN.

Status: Disbanded 30 January 1942.

64th CAVALRY DIVISION

“Arrowhead”

Organized Reserve Kentucky, Indiana,
Ohio, West Virginia, New Hampshire,
Vermont, Connecticut, and Massachusetts

HQ—Lexington, KY, 1921–22; Louisville, KY, 1922–41

The 64th Cav. Div. was constituted 15 October 1921, allotted to the First and Fifth Corps Areas, and assigned to the Fifth Army. The division HQ was initiated 22 October 1921 at the Post Office Building in Lexington, KY, by Lt. Col. Richard W. Walker. The division HQ was moved to Louisville, KY, on 14 March 1922 to provide a more central location for the command and control of the cavalry units in the Fifth Corps Area. On official activation, the division began to flourish rapidly. By the end of 1922, the division was 62 percent complete. By 1926, the 64th Cav. Div. boasted 336 officers and 47 enlisted men and all authorized units had been activated. The tables of organization in the division remained unchanged until 1 July 1929 when the MG Sqs. were eliminated and absorbed into other units. Other changes to the division organization were the addition of the 464th Armd. Car Sq., 464th Tank Co. (L), and the expansion of the 464th F.A. Bn. into a regiment (and concurrently redesignated the 864th). Additionally, when the field armies were activated and Army areas reallocated in 1933, it was relieved from the Fifth Army and assigned to the Second Army. The Inactive Training Period for the “Arrowhead” Division usually ran September to May and many of the units held their training meetings at N.G. armories or trained with ROTC units near where the majority of their officers were located. The 313th Cav., for example, frequently conducted training at the Culver Military Academy in Culver, IN. The academy was the source for many of the regiment’s officers, even though it only had a junior ROTC unit. The 316th Cav. often trained with the cavalry ROTC unit at Norwich University in Vermont. As a result of their relationship, many of the cadets from that school accepted commissions in all the units of the 158th Brig., and especially in the 316th. Elements of the 315th Cav. trained with the horses and equipment at the armory of the 2d Sq., 110th Cav. in Providence, RI. The division’s units held their summer training camps at a wide variety of posts throughout the eastern United States. The units were able to establish training partnerships with the R.A. units at those locations. In the case of the 157th Cav. Brig. and its subordinate regiments, the 6th Cav. at Fort Oglethorpe provided support in terms of horses, equipment, and training expertise for their summer training, while the 157th MG Sq. trained with the 53d and 54th MG Sqs. of the Kentucky N.G. each summer at Fort Knox. The 158th Cav. Brig. trained each year with the 1st Sq., 3d Cav. at Fort Ethan Allen, VT. As an additional form of training, the cavalry regiments of the 157th Cav. Brig. occasionally conducted the training of the cavalry elements of the CMTC at Fort Oglethorpe. The 157th alternated the responsibilities of CMTC training each year with the regiments of the 155th Brig. of the 63d Div. The 158th Brig. conducted cavalry CMTC training at Fort Ethan Allen. The division’s support units established training affiliations with R.A. units as well and generally went to other camps designed for their respective arm or service. For example, the 404th Engr. Sq. usually trained with the 13th Engrs. from Fort Humphreys, VA, the 464th F.A. Bn. trained with the units of 3d F.A. at Fort Knox, and the 464th Armd. Car Sq. trained with the 1st Cav. Regt. (Mecz) at Fort Knox. Additionally, the 364th Med. Sq. trained at the Fort Ben Harrison post hospital, and the division quartermaster train (later the 464th Q.M. Sq.) attended summer training at the Jeffersonville Q.M. Depot in Jeffersonville, IN. Throughout the 1930s, the 64th Cav. Div. participated in the various army and corps area CPXs at Fort Knox. The training objective of these CPXs was to prepare the staffs of R.A., N.G., and O.R. units for the 1937 Second Army maneuver. Due to the lack of horses, equipment, and enlisted men, the 64th Cav. Div. did not participate in the Second Army maneuver as an organized division. Instead, the members of the division (minus the 158th Brig.) reinforced R.A. or N.G. units to bring them up to wartime strength in officers or by acting as umpires. In general, elements of the division reinforced the 7th and 54th Cav. Brigs., which participated in the Fifth Corps Area portion of the maneuvers held at Fort Knox. In all, over 200 officers from the division participated. The next major event for the division was the Second Army maneuver held in central Wisconsin in August 1940. This time, the officers of the 64th reinforced the 1st Sq., 14th Cav., but also provided a substantial number of officers to the 38th Div. as well. The 1940 maneuver in Wisconsin was the division’s last major training event, for although the 64th was not officially disbanded until January 1942, it had almost ceased to exist by then. Most of the assigned personnel had already been called to Active Duty, leaving only a shell of the former organizations. Location 7 December 1941—Louisville, KY.

Status: Disbanded 30 January 1942.

65th CAVALRY DIVISION

“Chevaliers”

Organized Reserve Illinois,
Wisconsin, and Michigan

HQ—Chicago, IL, 1922–41

The 65th Cav. Div. was constituted on 15 October 1921, allotted to the Sixth Corps Area, and assigned to the Sixth Army. The division HQ was initiated on 11 February 1922 at 405 West Van Buren Street in Chicago, IL, by Maj. William C. Christy. The HQ was relocated on 12 June 1930 to the Burnham Building, 160 North La Salle Street in Chicago. The tables of organization in the division remained unchanged until 1 July 1929 when the MG Sqs. were eliminated and their personnel absorbed into other units. Other changes to the division organization were the addition of the 465th Armd. Car Sq., 465th Tank Co. (L), and the expansion of the 465th F.A. Bn. into a regiment (and concurrently redesignated the 865th). Additionally, when the field armies were activated and army areas reallocated in 1933, the division was relieved from the Sixth Army and assigned to the Fourth Army. The Inactive Training Period for the “Chevaliers” usually ran September to May and many of the units held their training meetings at N.G. armories in the city where they were located. The 317th and 318th Regts., for example, frequently conducted training with the horses and equipment from the “Black Horse Troop” of the 106th Cav. in Chicago. The 319th Cav. often trained with the Michigan elements of the 106th Cav. in Detroit, as did the 160th MG Sq. The 320th Cav. trained with troops of the 105th Cav., Wisconsin N.G. The division’s units held their summer training camps primarily at Camp Custer, MI; Fort Des Moines, IA; and Fort Sheridan in Chicago. In the case of most of the division’s units, the 1st Sq., 14th Cav. at Fort Sheridan usually provided support in terms of horses, equipment, and training expertise for their summer training, whether it was at Fort Sheridan or Camp Custer. For more than a few summers, the 159th Brig. was sent to Fort Des Moines to conduct training with the 14th Cav. (-). During those years, the cavalry regiments of the 159th Cav. Brig. also conducted the training of the cavalry elements of the CMTC at Fort Des Moines. The 159th alternated the responsibilities of CMTC training each year with the regiments of the 66th Div. The division’s support units established training affiliations with R.A. units as well and generally went to other camps designed for their respective arm or service. For example, the 405th Engr. Sq. usually trained at Fort Sheridan and Camp Custer; the 465th F.A. Bn. trained with the units of the 1st Bn., 14th F.A., and later the 3d F.A., both at Fort Sheridan; and the 465th Armd. Car Sq. trained with the 14th Cav. at Fort Sheridan. Additionally, the 365th Med. Sq. trained at the medical officers training camp at Fort Snelling, MN. During the 1930s, the level of training accelerated and became more varied as experience levels increased in the staff officers of the HQ, as well as those in subordinate units. Throughout the 1930s, the units and staffs of the 65th Cav. Div. participated in various army and corps area CPXs. The training objective of these CPXs was to prepare the staffs of the R.A., N.G., and O.R. units for the 1937 Second Army maneuver. The first of these major exercises was the Sixth Corps Area CPX held at Camp Custer in May 1932. Three years later, the 318th Cav. participated in a staff exercise with the 33d Div. at Camp Grant. The exercise was planned and supervised by Col. George C. Marshall, the senior instructor to the Illinois N.G. at the time. This was followed by a 65th Cav. Div. CPX during April 1936 in Chicago and finally by the Second Army maneuver in August 1937. Due to the lack of horses, equipment, and enlisted men, the 65th Cav. Div. did not participate in the 1937 Second Army maneuver as an organized division. Instead, the members of the division reinforced R.A. or N.G. units to bring them up to wartime strength in officers or by acting as umpires. In general, elements of the division reinforced the 14th Cav. and the 53d Cav. Brig., which participated in the Sixth Corps Area portion of the maneuvers held at Camp Custer. In all, over 200 officers from the division participated. The next event in the life of the division was the Second Army maneuver held in central Wisconsin in August 1940. This time, the officers of the 65th Div. reinforced the 1st Sq., 14th Cav., but also provided a substantial number of officers to the 33d Div. as well. The 1940 Second Army maneuver was the division’s last major training event. Over the next year, most of the division’s assigned personnel were called to Active Duty during the buildup of the US Army in 1940–41. Location 7 December 1941—Chicago, IL.

Organized Reserve Nebraska, Kansas,
Iowa, Missouri, Utah, California,
South Dakota, and North Dakota

HQ—Omaha, NE, 1922–30; Fort Omaha, NE, 1930–33; Kansas City, MO, 1933–41

The 66th Cav. Div. was constituted on 15 October 1921, allotted to the Seventh and Ninth Corps Areas, and assigned to the Sixth Army. The division HQ was initiated in January 1922 and established in the Army Building in Omaha, NE, by Col. William L. Luhn. The HQ was moved several times during the period 1922–41, the first time to 22d and Hickory Streets in Omaha in March 1924, then to Fort Omaha about July 1930. The final move was made in August 1933 to 3614 Main Street in Kansas City, MO, ostensibly because of the heavy concentration of division officers in that city. The 66th Cav. Div. suffered from having its units spread out over a wide geographical area. Similar to the N.G.'s 24th Cav. Div., the division's organizations were located across the states of the old west. The bulk of the division was located east of the Rocky Mountains with only the units of the 162d Cav. Brig. being west of the Continental Divide. The tables of organization in the division remained unchanged until 1 July 1929 when the MG Sqs. were deleted. Other changes to the division organization were the addition of the 466th Tank Co. (L), and the expansion of the 466th F.A. Bn. into a regiment (and concurrently redesignated the 866th). Additionally, when the field armies were activated and army areas reallocated in 1933, the division was relieved from the Sixth Army and assigned to the Fourth Army. The 66th Cav. Div. boasted its share of interesting personalities. One example was Col. Julian Gaujot, who earned the Medal of Honor in 1911 near Agua Prieta, Mexico. The most famous alumnus of the 66th Cav. Div., however, was 2d Lt. Ronald Reagan, the 39th President of the United States. Commissioned in the cavalry in 1936, he was assigned to Troop B, 322d Cav. in Des Moines. When he moved to California to pursue his acting career in the late 1930s, he was reassigned to HQ Troop, 323d Cav. The division's Inactive Training Period ran roughly September to June. The Kansas City units had their training meetings each Tuesday evening for 2 hours at the Ambassador Hotel or at Fort Leavenworth. Classes were usually taught by the R.A. unit instructors, or frequently by instructors from the Command and General Staff School. Riding classes were conducted at Fort Leavenworth using horses from the 10th Cav. The Des Moines units also conducted their training events on Tuesday evenings and were able to use the mounts from the 14th Cav. as well as the Fort Des Moines riding hall to perform their equestrian instruction. The officers of the 162d Brig., not being in close proximity to Regular or N.G. cavalry units had to own their horses or pay out of their pockets to rent horses. The division, less the 162d Cav. Brig., held consolidated summer training camps for the first 2 years (1922–23) at Fort Des Moines. After that, the division support units generally went to other camps designed for their respective arm or service. For example, the 406th Engrs. usually trained with the 9th Engrs. at Fort Riley, the 466th F.A. Bn. trained with the 14th F.A. at Fort Riley, and the 366th Med. Sq. trained at the medical officers training camp at Fort Snelling. The 161st Cav. Brig. units (less the 322d Cav.) usually trained at Fort Riley, but occasionally trained at Fort Des Moines. The 322d trained at Fort Des Moines, but also went to Fort Riley for several summers. The 323d Cav. went to Del Monte, CA, near the Presidio of Monterey to train with the 11th Cav. Fort D.A. Russell, WY, was the summer training site of the 324th Cav. until the 13th Cav. was transferred to Fort Riley in 1926, after which the regiment traveled to Fort Meade, SD, to train with the 4th Cav. In addition to the summer training camps, the units of the 66th Cav. Div. also conducted the training at the CMTC. The 321st Cav. usually supervised the cavalry camps at Forts Riley and Leavenworth, and the 322d at Fort Des Moines. The 323d and 324th ran the camps at Del Monte and Fort Meade, respectively. Because of the lack of assigned enlisted personnel, horses, and equipment, the 66th Cav. Div. did not participate as an organized unit in the Fourth Army maneuvers of 1937 and 1940. However, hundreds of officers and many enlisted men from the 66th participated as umpires or by being assigned to R.A. or N.G. cavalry units to bring them up to authorized war strength. The 1940 maneuvers at Camp Ripley, MN, and Fort Lewis, WA, were the division's last major training events. For these maneuvers, the division provided over 250 officers to fill out units of the 24th Cav. Div., and the R.A.'s 2d, 4th, 11th, and 14th Cav. Regts. Many were also employed as umpires. Location 7 December 1941—Kansas City, MO.

Cavalry Brigades

Halftracks of the 7th Cavalry Brigade (Mechanized) in the field at Fort Knox, KY, during the 1936 Second Army maneuvers.

Cavalry brigades provided command and control for assigned or attached cavalry units and other elements attached for operations. Their mission was to plan, coordinate, and conduct operations to provide reconnaissance and security for the ground force to which they were assigned or attached. Cavalry brigades could also be used both defensively and offensively. When employed in the former mode (defense), they were usually to be deployed in an economy of force or delay role. In the latter (offense), cavalry brigades were employed in reconnaissance missions, raids, or pursuit and exploitation of routed enemy formations.

Organization

In 1921 cavalry brigades were organized to consist of a headquarters (HQ), HQ company, and two cavalry regiments and a machine gun squadron. The major change to the cavalry brigade occurred in 1928 and 1929 when the machine gun squadrons were eliminated and a machine gun troop added to each of the cavalry regiments.

The vast majority of cavalry brigades in the interwar period were divisional brigades, but there were two separate brigades. The organization of the one separate National Guard (N.G.) brigade mirrored that of the divisional brigades. The other separate brigade, the 7th Cavalry (Cav.) Brigade (Brig.) (Mechanized [Mecz]), was a completely different animal. The creation of the 7th Brig. was a result of the tests of the experimental Mechanized Force in 1928 and 1931 and General (Gen.) Douglas MacArthur's 1931 directive to begin mechanizing and motorizing the US Army "as far as is practicable." This brigade was initially organized in 1932 at Fort Knox from the remnants of the defunct Mechanized Force. Over the next several years, it was slowly built up to the point where it consisted of two mechanized cavalry regiments and various support elements by 1936. Over that period and on to 1940, when it was reorganized and redesignated as the 1st Armored (Armd.) Division (Div.), the brigade was one of the most active organizations in the Army, traveling as far west as Fort Riley, KS, and as far north as New York State to participate in various Army training and publicity activities.

Until 1940, the 1st and 2d Cav. Brig. were the only R.A. cavalry brigades in active service. However, the brigades of the 2d and 3d Cav. Divs. were all active as RAI units at various times in the 1920s and 1930s. Though active as Reserve organizations, these brigades did not function as command and control HQ. They were typically used only as mobilization assignment units and rarely functioned as units in the inactive training period or during summer training. During 1940 and 1941, the 3d and 4th Cav. Brigs. were both activated as “Colored” organizations in the all-black 2d Cav. Div.

There were eight N.G. brigades constituted in 1921, assigned two each to the four Guard cavalry divisions. Between 1921 and 1927, the National Guard Bureau, various state Adjutants General, and War Department made several adjustments to the allotment and assignments of the 16 N.G. cavalry regiments. In the latter year, the 59th Cav. Brig. was constituted and allotted to the First Corps Area to provide each corps area with a cavalry brigade HQ. Over the next 2 years, four new Guard cavalry regiments were created, which in turn required several changes to regimental assignments to the nine brigades. In 1938, during the efforts to organize the remaining three inactive N.G. cavalry divisions (the 24th Div. was organized in 1936) the 56th Cav. Brig. was relieved from the 23d Cav. Div. and became a separate brigade in the mobilization plan. As such, it was the only one of the nine N.G. cavalry brigades federalized for Active Duty in World War II. The other eight were disbanded along with the four divisions in the fall of 1940.

Twelve brigades were constituted in the Organized Reserve (O.R.) in 1921, all of which were divisional brigades. Unlike the Guard brigades, the divisional assignments of the Reserve brigades remained constant through the interwar period. All of the divisional brigades functioned as units and a few functioned, at times, as actual HQ in the inactive training period. Those brigades were generally commanded by a Reserve senior colonel or brigadier general. Three of the brigades, the 156th, 158th, 162d Brigs., each located in different corps areas than their parent divisions, possessed a small Regular Army (R.A.) staff at the brigade level that infantry divisional brigades did not have. These staffs generally performed the same functions as the cavalry division staffs. This system was eliminated for the 158th Cav. Brig. by 1934 and thereafter the brigade was attached to the 94th Div. (and at times to the 76th Div.) for the purposes of administration, logistics, and training. The staffs were typically organized as follows:

Geographically Separated Cavalry Brigade:

Chief of Staff	colonel
Adjutant General/S1	major
Assistant Chief of Staff, S3	lieutenant colonel
Enlisted clerk/driver	sergeant

Training

Both active R.A. cavalry brigades were concentrated along the Mexican border between 1919 and 1941. The 2d Brig. was assembled entirely at Fort Bliss, TX, while the 1st Brig. was distributed in posts on or near the Rio Grande River between Marfa and Fort Brown. This disposition, while not ideal for training purposes, was necessary to satisfy the 1st Cav. Div.’s real world mission of policing the troublesome Mexican border. The division was able to assemble both brigades at one location for training only a few times before 1940. However, both brigades deployed to the field for a brigade- or division-level maneuver most years after 1926. The 1st Cav. Brig. usually trained with the 2d Div. at locations in south Texas and the 2d Cav. Brig. usually trained with the balance of the 1st Cav. Div. at locations in west Texas.

The Regular Army Inactive (RAI) cavalry brigades of the 2d Cav. Div. frequently attended summer camps in the 1920s and 1930s. In both cases, however, the brigades were largely pool organizations and rarely functioned as organized units in the Inactive Training period. At summer training, the personnel of these brigades were typically integrated into the training of subordinate regiments. The same was true for the brigades of the 3d Cav. Div. There is no evidence that the 6th Brig. was ever ordered to camp as a unit, though it is likely that its members attended camp as individuals attached to other units.

N.G. cavalry brigade headquarters and headquarters companies (HHC) typically performed their drills during the Inactive Training period at their home armories 1 night a week or on the weekend, depending on the planned training. The HQ and staff usually focused on staff skills while the various sections of the HQ troop focused on support tasks. Occasionally N.G. brigade HQ participated in division or higher level CPXs as part of their inactive training. All cavalry brigades were assigned to multistate divisions and generally attended camp within their home state. Six of the nine brigades were themselves multistate organizations and thus, their camps were generally split between the two or three states of their subordinate regiments. Several multistate brigades were able to assemble the subordinate units from other states at a brigade camp in a few instances in the interwar years. Except for the army-level maneuvers in the late 1930s and early 1940s, however, combined camps for multistate brigades were rare.

Though most O.R. brigades functioned as units, their Inactive Training assemblies tended to be conducted with one of their subordinate regiments or with another HQ. Only occasionally did these brigades hold training periods that were conducted solely with the brigade's assigned personnel. Most of these brigades functioned as actual command and control HQ during summer training camps where they participated in a division or corps area CPX. Usually, if a senior officer was not already assigned to command the brigade, the senior regimental commander temporarily filled in as commander for the camp. More often, the brigade's personnel would attend the summer training attached to one of the brigade's subordinate regiments. For a number of brigades in the 1930s, the HQ was placed in charge to control the conduct of its two subordinate regiments as they took turns training the candidates of the CMTC.

Chapter 14

Cavalry Regiments

National Archives

A troop of the 13th Cavalry on a long distance march returns to Fort Riley, KS, in 1927.

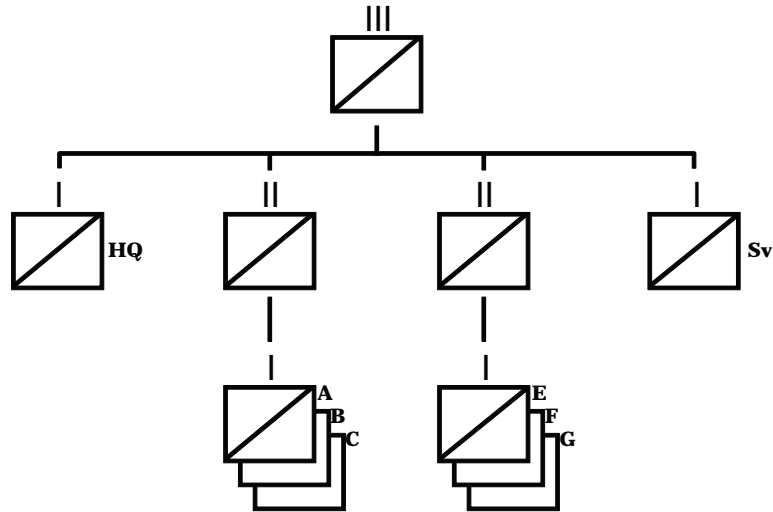

The mission of cavalry regiments was to plan and conduct operations to provide reconnaissance and security for the ground force to which they were assigned or attached. Cavalry regiments could also be used both defensively and offensively. When employed in the former mode (defense), they were usually to be deployed in an economy of force or delay role. In the latter mode (offense), cavalry regiments were employed in reconnaissance missions, raids, or in pursuit and exploitation of routed enemy formations.

Organization

As with the infantry, the regiment was considered the base cavalry unit for combat, training, and administrative operations in the interwar period. The cavalry regiment as reorganized in 1921 consisted of a headquarters (HQ), HQ troop, and two rifle squadrons of two troops each.

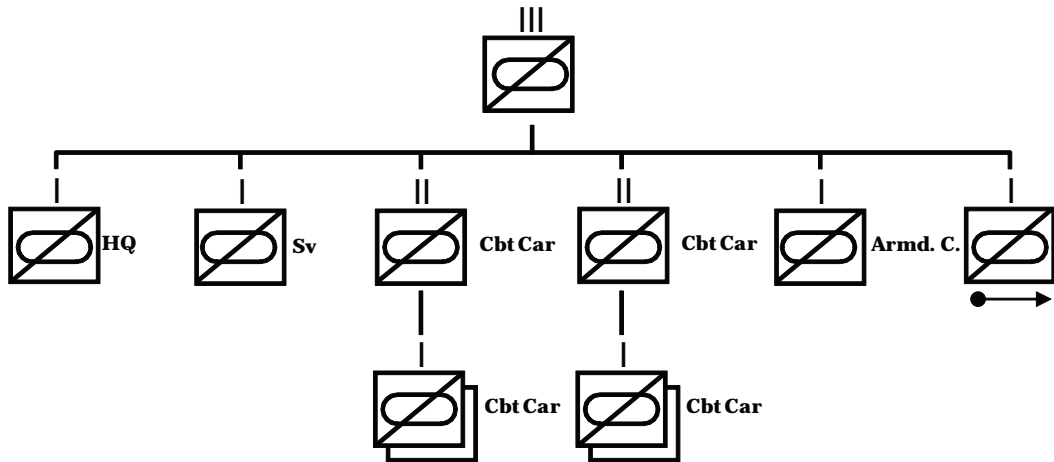

All 17 of the Regular Army (R.A.) cavalry regiments remained active until 1921 when the 15th, 16th, and 17th were inactivated as part of the postwar drawdown of the Army. Shortly thereafter, a new regiment, the 26th Cavalry (Cav.), was constituted in the R.A. and organized in the Philippines as a Philippine Scout Regiment. Initially, 8 of the 15 active regiments were brigaded together in the 1st and 2d Cav. Divisions (Divs.). Four more were made divisional regiments upon the constitution of the 3d Cav. Div. in 1927. Two regiments, the 9th and 10th Cav., remained "Colored" organizations and were brigaded together initially in the 5th Cav. Brigade (Brig.) in 1933 and later in the 4th Cav. Brig. in 1940.

Other than a number of divisional assignment shifts, the number and basic organization of cavalry regiments remained relatively constant until late 1932 when the 1st Cav. Regiment (Regt.) was ordered to turn in its horses, travel by motor convoy to Fort Knox, KY, and reorganize itself into a mechanized cavalry regiment under the recently organized 7th Cav. Brig. (Mecz). This new regiment consisted of two squadrons consisting of two troops each, a HQ troop, service troop, armored car troop, and a machine gun troop. The two squadrons were mounted in "combat cars," which was essentially cavalry-speak for "light tank." The cavalry combat cars were not appreciably different from the new light tanks being manufactured for the infantry. The remainder of the squadron was mounted in some type of motorized or mechanized vehicle. The 1st Cav. was joined in the mechanized brigade in 1936 by the 13th Cav. and together would later form the basis for the new 1st Armored (Armd.) Div. in 1940.

Horse regiments changed relatively little until 1939 when the Army adopted a new table of organization for the separate "corps reconnaissance regiment." This regiment was a hybrid organization that attempted to combine horses with portee trucks and other mechanized elements to enhance the capability of the horse on the modern battlefield. Four R.A. and seven National Guard (N.G.) regiments would adopt this organization during 1939 and 1940. The "horse and mechanized" concept was an unsuccessful arrangement, however, and was abandoned shortly after the beginning of the war.

Three of the inactive R.A. regiments were organized as Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units in the interwar period. These regiments were functional organizations and were among the most active Reserve units in the Army. Initially assigned as separate regiments under the General Headquarters Reserve (GHQR) in the War Plans Division's various mobilization plans, they were reassigned to the I Cavalry Corps in 1927. Two of the three (the 15th and 17th) were reorganized and redesignated as horse and mechanized corps reconnaissance regiments in 1940; however, none of the three were activated for service until after the attack on Pearl Harbor.

Based on the new mobilization plans for the postwar era, 16 cavalry regiments were allotted to the N.G. to create the four Guard cavalry divisions contemplated. An additional separate regiment, the 117th Cav. was allotted to the states of Colorado and New Mexico. Of the others, several regiments were organized almost immediately when allotted in 1921 and the remainder were slowly built between then and 1927 when the 106th Cav. was finally federally recognized. These were not the only cavalry organizations in the N.G., however. Besides several machine gun squadrons, there were numerous separate cavalry squadrons and troops (which retained state designations) scattered around the country that had no real role to play in the Army's mobilization structure. For the most part, these units had historical significance to the state's military history and were authorized for Federal recognition by special allotment. Most of these units would be integrated into four new regiments allotted to the N.G. in 1928 and 1929. The number and organization of the N.G. cavalry regiments changed drastically in the fall of 1940 when the Guard cavalry divisions were eliminated from the force structure. At that point, of the existing 19 regiments, 7 were reorganized into horse and mechanized regiments, 6 were converted to field artillery regiments, and 4 were converted to coast artillery regiments or separate coast artillery battalions. Only two, the Texas National Guard's 112th and 124th Cav. Regts. remained traditional horse-mounted organizations, and both were federalized as part of the 56th Cav. Brig. for service in World War II.

Twenty-four cavalry regiments were constituted in 1921 and all were organized in the Organized Reserve (O.R.) by the following year. All of these regiments were brigaded together in six cavalry divisions and there were no nondivisional regiments in the Reserve. All of these were also functional and active units, but as with most Reserve organizations, the more concentrated the regiment, the more active and cohesive they were. The divisional and brigade assignments remained constant for these units throughout the interwar period, though the geographical location of the commands shifted, in some cases significantly, during this period. The most notable movements of the geographical location of these regiments were those of the three separated brigades, the 156th, 158th, and 162d Cav. Brigs. The movement of these units was due to a number of reasons, but primarily from the shifting densities of cavalry officers produced by Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) programs and the availability of field grade officers to command the organizations.

Training

R.A. cavalry regiments maintained a training cycle similar to that of the infantry regiments (see Chapter 9, Infantry Regiments, for a general description). Given the lack of funding, cavalry regiments, like most Army units, were able to go to the field, at best, for 2 to 3 weeks a year. Most of that time was usually spent in brigade, division, or corps area maneuvers in the summer or fall.

As with the infantry, N.G. cavalry regiments followed an annual training pattern that generally resembled their R.A. counterparts. One of the limiting aspects of training Guard units in this period, however, was the number of horses authorized to be maintained by each troop. A cavalry troop in this period was authorized about 65 officers and men, but only 32 horses. Thus, it became difficult or impossible to mount the entire unit for training, unless horses could be borrowed or rented. A solution was to put the troop through training by platoon. For example, one platoon would conduct skills training that required no horses while the other platoon rode the horses.

Like their infantry counterparts, Guard cavalry regiments were often called up for state emergencies, which contributed to their level of readiness. One of the most notable events was the mobilization of the 56th Cav. Brig. in 1931. The entire brigade was mobilized in September to establish martial law in the great east Texas oil field. Elements of the brigade's 112th and 124th Cav. Regts. remained on Active Duty there for 15 months in an effort to keep the area from devolving into violence over oil production quotas. Most other N.G. cavalry regiments experienced multiple calls to active service to support state authorities in the interwar period.

Summer training camps were generally conducted at the regimental level and in two cases at the brigade level. On the other hand, several regiments were multistate organizations and rarely had the opportunity to train as a complete unit. Most regiments, however, were located within a single state and throughout the 1920s and 1930s, the level of training in virtually all regiments progressed to higher levels as each unit gained in experience and cohesiveness. By the late 1920s, the regiments of the 56th Cav. Brig. were participating in a brigade-level exercise during the second week of each summer's camp. These regiments were also conducting coordinated air-ground reconnaissance efforts with the 111th Observation (Obsn.) Squadron (Sq.). The regiments of Pennsylvania's 52d Brig. were also known to participate in brigade-level exercises occasionally at Indiantown Gap. The best training for all of these regiments, of course, was the various army-level maneuvers in the late 1930s. During these maneuvers, the cavalry regiments were employed in more realistic roles with actual divisions and corps for which they conducted a variety of cavalry missions.

The training of O.R. cavalry regiments was difficult, especially given the added cavalry requirement of maintaining equestrian skills. Most Reserve regiments were able to address these requirements through a variety of means. Many O.R. regiments coordinated with nearby R.A. and N.G. cavalry and field artillery units to borrow their horses for equestrian training. Since unit horses needed to be exercised on a regular basis, these arrangements often made for a welcome and symbiotic relationship between the components. Other regiments coordinated with cavalry ROTC units, which were authorized to maintain horses. Since many of the cadets from these programs would end up with commissions in the same O.R. regiment, these arrangements also made for excellent affiliations between the units. In one case, that of the 319th Cav. located in Detroit, the officers and R.A. instructors in the regiment concluded an agreement with a nearby horse farm to provide free stabling for the units' horses. Of course, the unit's horses were not Government issue, but were owned by the officers or had been donated to, or purchased by, the unit for training purposes.

Reserve cavalry regiments conducted nonequestrian training meetings in places such as post office buildings, Federal buildings, chamber of commerce buildings, schools, ROTC buildings, R.A. installations, and N.G. armories, among others. Other than the equestrian events, the opportunity for O.R. units to conduct meaningful skills training during the inactive training period was far more limited than for R.A. and N.G. units. Therefore, most training for Reserve cavalry regiments from September to May was largely indoor events such as lectures, demonstrations, and troop schools.

Generally, summer training camps were conducted in ways similar to those of Reserve infantry regiments (see Chapter 9, Infantry Regiments, for a general description). One thing that made some cavalry camps distinctly different was the propensity to conduct the camps as brigade groups rather than at the regimental level. Given the comparatively small size of cavalry regiments combined with the fact that only about a quarter of a regiment's assigned officers were provided the opportunity to attend a camp each year, it made sense to train the brigade's officers in a single group. In this way, the two regiments would often form the leadership for a half-strength provisional regiment for the training.

Chapter 15

Cavalry Squadrons

Troops of the 10th Cavalry under review by General of the Armies John J. Pershing at Fort Myer, VA, February 1932.

The mission of cavalry squadrons was to plan and conduct operations to provide reconnaissance and security for the ground force to which they were assigned or attached. Cavalry squadrons could also be used both defensively and offensively. When employed in the former mode (defense), they were usually to be deployed in an economy of force or delay role. In the latter mode (offense), cavalry squadrons were employed in reconnaissance missions, raids, or in pursuit and exploitation of routed enemy formations.

Organization

A total of 29 cavalry squadrons were constituted or reconstituted in the three components of the Army in the interwar period. Of these, 12 were allotted to the Regular Army (R.A.), three were allotted to the National Guard (N.G.), and 14 were allotted to the Organized Reserve (O.R.). The organization of these squadrons was not appreciably different from that for regimental squadrons.

The two of the three N.G. squadrons, the 1st Squadrons of Rhode Island and Connecticut, were special allotments from the War Department and held no role in the early mobilization plans. Both were eventually integrated into the 110th and 122d Cavalry (Cav.) Regiments (Regts.), respectively. The third squadron, the 117th of Colorado, was originally intended to be part of the 111th Cav. with New Mexico. It was later withdrawn to form an additional regiment. That plan never came to fruition, and it was later redesignated as a separate squadron. The 117th was eventually converted to field artillery in 1933.

The 14 O.R. squadrons were all originally allotted to the Fourth and Eighth Corps Areas. In 1927, the seven squadrons allotted to the Eighth Corps Area were withdrawn and allotted to the Seventh Corps Area. All 14 were demobilized in 1928 and replaced in the mobilization plans by 12 “Colored” Regular Army Inactive (RAI) cavalry squadrons, all of which were allotted to the Eighth Corps Area. Though these units were not to be organized until M-Day, at least six were inexplicably organized with Reserve personnel for about 8 months in 1935, then inactivated in November of that year. None of these squadrons were activated for service in World War II.

Training

There is no evidence that any of the six organized RAI squadrons ever held training meetings or attended a camp in their brief existence. The three N.G. squadrons carried on drills in a fashion similar to any Guard unit of their day. Each attended summer camps at their respective state training areas, but none participated in any major maneuvers of the period. Given the geographical dispersion of their personnel, it is unlikely that any of the Reserve squadrons ever functioned as a unit during the inactive training period, or held unit meetings. However, the Reserve squadrons of the Fourth Corps Area attended camps at Fort Oglethorpe, GA, for a number of summers and those of the Eighth Corps went to camps held at Fort Bliss, TX.

Chapter 16

Machine Gun Squadrons

A machine gun troop from the 1st Cavalry Division in the field in west Texas.

The mission of machine gun squadrons was to provide heavy machine gun support to cavalry organizations in offensive and defensive operations.

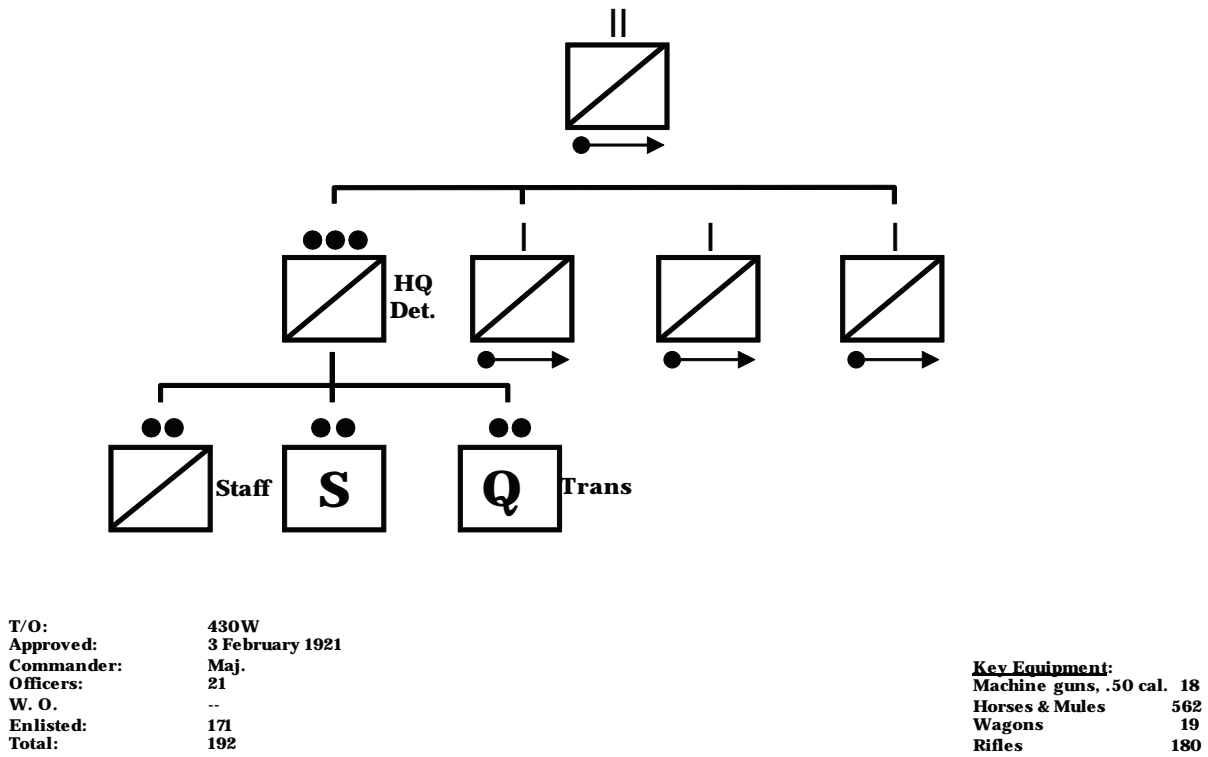

Organization

In the interwar period, 26 machine gun squadrons were constituted in the three components of the Army. Of these, 6 were allotted to the Regular Army (R.A.), 8 were allotted to the National Guard (N.G.), and 12 were allotted to the Organized Reserve (O.R.). The organization was a result of an analysis of the World War I cavalry division and its subordinate units. Unlike the infantry, which eliminated the machine gun battalion and incorporated those weapons into the regimental structure, the cavalry went in the opposite direction. The branch eliminated the machine gun troop in the regiment and combined those troops into a brigade machine gun squadron due to the belief that those weapons would slow the movement of the regiments they were to support.

The machine gun squadron consisted of a headquarters (HQ), HQ troop, and three line troops. Each troop consisted of 5 officers and 110 enlisted men manning or protecting six .50-caliber heavy machine guns. Each squadron boasted 18 heavy machine guns, which provided a powerful punch on the battlefield. This table of organization remained in effect until the elimination of these squadrons in 1928.

Two of the six R.A. machine gun squadrons, the 1st Cavalry (Cav.) Division's (Div.) 1st and 2d Squadrons (Sqs.), were organized in 1921. Those of the 2d and 3d Cav. Divs. were organized only briefly as Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units in 1927 before being demobilized the following year. Six of the eight N.G. machine gun squadrons were fully organized in the early 1920s. Of the other two, one was partially organized and the other remained totally inactive. All 12 of the Reserve squadrons were organized during 1921 and 1922.

After about 7 years of experimentation with the machine guns squadron as a separate organization, the Cavalry branch determined that it was tactically unnecessary and undesirable to maintain the machine gun troops as separate units. Thus, in 1928, the squadrons were eliminated and the machine troop was returned to each cavalry regiment. The squadron HQ for R.A. squadrons was demobilized and the subordinate troops returned to their original regiments. In the N.G., most of the squadrons were either integrated into new or existing cavalry regiments as those units' recently authorized third squadrons or were demobilized. All of the O.R. squadrons were demobilized and the personnel used to form the third squadrons or machine gun troops of existing cavalry regiments or one of the new armored car squadrons authorized for the cavalry division. One, the 151st Machine Gun (MG) Squadron (Sq.), was initially demobilized, then reconstituted a short time later and consolidated with the new armored car squadron for the 61st Cav. Div.

Training

The 1st and 2d MG Sqs. generally participated in the events of their respective brigades. Since the standard procedure for machine gun squadrons was to attach troops to the regiments of the brigade, and rarely functioned as a cohesive, pure unit, most of the other training events for these units were conducted at the troop- and platoon-level. Much of that, not surprisingly was range firing and crew drills. RAI machine gun squadrons were active for such a short period that it is unlikely that they functioned as units.

N.G. machine gun squadrons conducted the usual training activities in the inactive training period. Much of the machine gun-related training was focused on weapons functions and assembly, crew drills, and lectures and demonstrations on theoretical machine gun employment. Due to the lack of local availability of machine gun-capable ranges, machine gun units were generally required to conduct their annual firing exercises at the summer training camps, though they might have the chance to participate in maneuver training during the second week of camp.

Most O.R. machine gun squadrons were functional organizations, though a few, mainly in the west, were too geographically dispersed to enable them to effectively assemble as units. Few of these squadrons had an opportunity to work with their primary weapon except at summer training camps. In a few instances, organizations were able to work with weapons loaned by nearby R.A. or N.G. units. Most, however, spent their inactive training periods conducting theoretical employment of the units in various tactical scenarios or conducting general skills training or troop schools. Most of the practical work with machine gun, as well as tactical training, was performed at the summer training camps.

1st Machine Gun Squadron (1st Cavalry Division)

HQ—Camp Harry J. Jones, AZ, 1921–22; Fort Clark, TX, 1923–28

Constituted in the R.A. on 20 August 1921. Organized on 1 September 1921 at Camp Harry J. Jones in Douglas, AZ, from D Troop, 1st Cav. (redesignated as HQ Detachment), and the machine gun troops from the 1st, 5th, and 12th Cav. Regts. Assigned to the 1st Cav. Div. on 13 September 1921. Transferred to Fort Clark, TX, by making an overland march from 26 December 1922 to 23 January 1923. Participated in 1st Cav. Brigade (Brig.) maneuvers near Fort Clark, TX, in January 1926. Participated in the making of Lansky's Famous Players movie "Rough Riders" near San Antonio, TX, 17 August–20 September 1926. Headquarters and headquarters troop (HHT) demobilized on 1 February 1928. Concurrently, Troops A, B, and C reorganized and redesignated as MG Troop (Tp.), 1st, 12th, and 5th Cav. Regts, respectively.

Armored Car and Reconnaissance Squadrons

Vehicles from the 1st Armored Car Squadron at Fort Bliss, TX, about 1934.

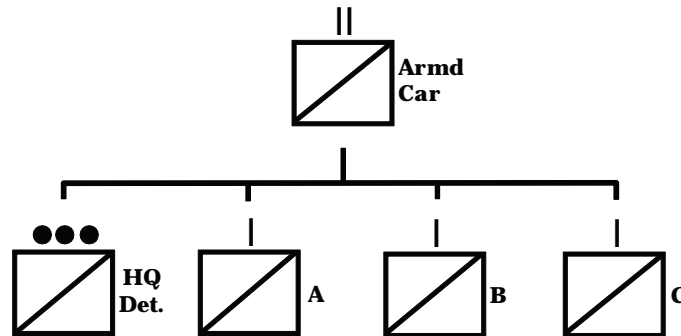

The mission of armored car squadrons was to provide rapid, motorized reconnaissance support to cavalry organizations in offensive and defensive operations.

Organization

The armored car squadron was the cavalry's initial effort to adopt motorization in its attempts to modernize the branch for future conflict. The squadron consisted of a headquarters (HQ), a HQ troop, and three line troops each equipped with 12 armored cars. One of these organizations was authorized for each cavalry division in 1928 for an initial total of 13 in the force structure. An additional squadron for the I Cavalry Corps was constituted in 1933 and another, the 7th Reconnaissance (Rcn.) and Support (Spt.) Squadron (Sq.) was constituted as a component of the 7th Cavalry (Cav.) Brigade (Brig.) (Mechanized [Mech]) in 1940. The designation of the armored car organization was changed to "reconnaissance squadron" in 1939.

In the Regular Army (R.A.), both the 1st and 2d Sqs. were limited to one active troop, of which only the former had a lengthy stint as an active unit. Troop A, 2d Sq. was active for only about 4 years. The remaining units of both squadrons, as well as the 3d Armored (Armd.) Car Sq., were organized as Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units. None of the four Guard squadrons were active until 1939, when the 21st, 22d, and 24th Rcn. Sqs. were organized, followed by the 23d a few months later in 1940. These squadrons were either disbanded or integrated into the new corps reconnaissance regiments created after the disbandment of the four Guard cavalry divisions in the fall of 1940. All six of the O.R. squadrons were organized in 1928 and remained active until the beginning of World War II.

Training

The active troops of the 1st and 2d Sqs. participated in some of the most well-publicized Army maneuvers of the interwar period, and along with the Mechanized Force and 7th Cav. Brig. (Mecz), significantly contributed to the development of the motorized and mechanized tactical doctrine and training of the Army's armored and mechanized forces that were to follow in World War II. All four of the National Guard (N.G.) reconnaissance squadrons certainly spent most of their short periods of existence in organizing and equipping themselves. Each, however, participated in one of the major field army maneuvers in 1940 before being converted to other types of units. The Reserve squadrons conducted mostly theoretical classes on the employment of armored car units or attended nonmission specific training with other organizations. In most cases, the units attended camp with the motorized elements of R.A. cavalry regiments or other types of mechanized or armored units, such as the 1st Tank Company (Co.) at Miller Field, NY. Several of the squadrons had the opportunity to attend training at least once with units of the 7th Cav. Brig. at Fort Knox, KY.

Chapter 18

Field Artillery Major Commands

There were two types of major artillery commands in the interwar army. These were the 6 army and 18 corps artillery headquarters. As their names imply, these headquarters provided command and control of artillery assigned or attached to them for various missions and operations at the army and corps level.

The army artillery consisted only of the army artillery headquarters and an army ammunition train. All other artillery and other support organizations that served as army artillery assets would be typically attached from the General Headquarters Reserve (GHQR). These assets were to be attached to the army artillery in the numbers and type needed for specific operations and transferred to other armies as the operational situation required. The intent was to achieve maximum use and effect from available artillery assets. An army that was assuming a defensive posture, for example, would require less artillery than one that was planning for an offensive. In such a situation, the General Headquarters (GHQ) would order the transfer of artillery and other assets from the defending army to the army that was soon to launch an offensive. As only divisional and corps artillery brigades had assigned ammunition trains, the army ammunition trains provided the resupply of ammunition to the attached GHQR artillery brigades and other assets attached to the army.

The corps artillery consisted of a corps artillery headquarters and a corps artillery brigade. The mission of the corps artillery was to coordinate the operations of the corps and divisional artillery brigades, as well as any GHQR artillery assets attached from the army artillery or directly from the GHQR.

Chapter 19

Field Artillery Brigades

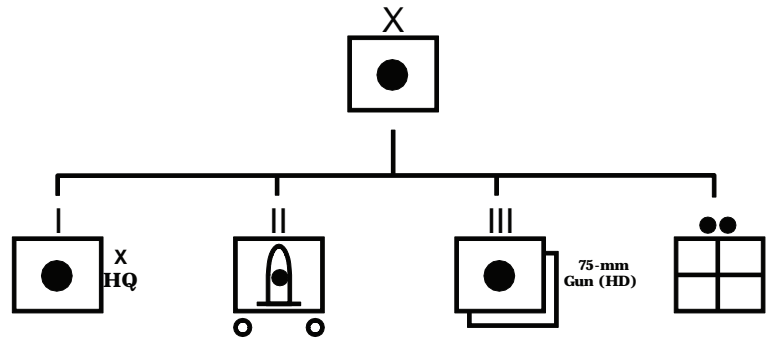

The 1st Artillery Brigade on occupation duty in Germany, 1919.

Field Artillery (F.A.) brigades provided command and control for assigned or attached field artillery regiments and other elements attached for operations. Their mission was to plan, coordinate, and conduct indirect and direct fire support for the ground gaining arms. The divisional brigades provided the direct support to the infantry and cavalry, while the corps and General Headquarters Reserve (GHQR) brigades provided counterbattery and deep interdiction fires.

Organization

Field Artillery brigades in this period consisted of several distinct types. There were divisional, corps, light, portee, and medium and heavy (M&H) brigades. Each type of brigade was designed to consist of at least a headquarters (HQ), HQ battery (Btry), and two or more field artillery regiments. In 1921, the divisional brigades were reorganized to consist of only two light 75-mm howitzer (H) horse-drawn regiments. The division's 155-mm H equipped medium artillery regiment was moved to the corps artillery brigade giving that unit four regiments: three 155-mm H regiments and one 155-mm gun (G) regiment. These brigades retained these respective structures until 1929 when the 155-mm H regiment was returned to the divisional brigades on the Army's adoption of a newer, more mobile, truck-drawn 155-mm H artillery piece. The corps brigades were correspondingly reduced by one 155-mm H regiment. The light, portee, and M&H brigades were assigned to the GHQR. The first two types of GHQR brigades consisted of a HQ, HQ Btry, and three 75-mm truck-drawn or portee transport battalions. The M&H brigades did not appear to have a standardized table of organization (T/O), but typically consisted of two 155-mm H, two 240-mm H, and one 6-inch G regiments, and two attached ordnance companies (heavy maintenance). All of the M&H regiments were truck-drawn. The GHQR brigades were controlled by the General Headquarters (GHQ) and attached to, or withdrawn from, the army artillery based on current and future operational requirements.

Field artillery brigade, organizations, 1921.

Field artillery brigade, corps artillery, 1930.

For most of the period between 1921 and 1939, there were only five active Regular Army (R.A.) artillery brigades—four with active divisions and one corps artillery brigade. The 11th F.A. Brigade (Brig.) in Hawaii had the distinction of being the only fully active and three-regiment divisional brigade after 1921. War Department planners apparently felt that with the Hawaiian Division's mission being to hold fixed locations on Oahu, the mobility of its medium artillery regiment was not an issue and the division was authorized to retain it. The other three active divisional brigades not only lost their medium regiment, but were also eventually forced to inactivate parts of their existing regiments as well. The one active corps artillery brigade, the 13th at Fort Bragg, also inactivated bits and pieces of its active regiments. By 1930, however, the Army was able to begin reorganizing its artillery organizations and through efficiencies, was able to reactivate the 4th and 6th F.A. Brig. HQs in 1935 and 1934, respectively. In October 1939, all of the divisional brigade headquarters and headquarters batteries (HHBs) were disbanded in accordance with the triangular division T/O.

Each of the inactive R.A. divisional brigades were organized as Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units at various times during 1926 or later. Like almost all brigade and higher RAI commands, these units did not function as actual HQ and only a few were functional units. Most of the brigade HQ were essentially pool units or were used for mobilization assignments. Only a few of the corps artillery brigades and none of the GHQR brigades were organized as RAI units after 1926, although a significant increase in the number of RAI field artillery brigades in these categories were constituted in 1933.

There were 18 divisional and 6 corps brigades constituted or reconstituted in the National Guard (N.G.) in 1920–21. All of the divisional brigades were organized in the interwar period, but none of the corps brigades. In 1923, all six of the corps brigades were designated as Deferred National Guard (DNG) units, placed on the deferred list, and transferred to the Organized Reserve (O.R.). All but one were demobilized between 1927 and 1933. Six more N.G. corps brigades were constituted and organized during 1940–41 as part of the mobilization for World War II.

Not including the six DNG brigades, there were 62 field artillery brigades constituted in the O.R. in the 1920s. Of these, 27 were divisional brigades, 17 were corps brigades, 5 were light brigades, 6 were portee brigades, and 7 were M&H brigades. All of the divisional and corps brigades and most of the others were organized at some point in the interwar period. Many of the corps brigades were demobilized in 1933 and replaced in the Army's mobilization plans by RAI brigades. Some GHQR brigades were never organized and many were demobilized or inactivated by 1933, but not replaced in the mobilization plans.

Most of the Reserve divisional brigades (and a few of the others) were functional units. A number of divisional and corps brigades occasionally functioned as command and control HQ during the inactive training period. On the other hand, few of the GHQR brigades were functional units. Most were pool units used for mobilization assignments. The most active brigades were generally commanded by a Reserve senior colonel or brigadier general, though most possessed lieutenant colonels or majors as acting commanders, but who exercised no control over the brigade's subordinate regiments.

Training

The training of R.A. field artillery brigades was conducted in a variety of venues in the interwar period and as with all units in this period, the venues were dictated by budgetary constraints and other available resources. Though the desire of the three stateside infantry division commanders was to assemble their divisions and brigades at least once a year for collective maneuver training, this was not possible given the lack of training dollars. This was particularly true for the 1st and 3d F.A. Brigs., which were spread up and down the east and west coasts, respectively. The 2d F.A. Brig. was luckier as it was largely concentrated at Fort Sam Houston, TX, throughout most of this period.

N.G. field artillery brigade headquarters and headquarters batteries (HHB) typically performed their drills during the inactive training period at their home armories one night a week or on the weekend depending on the planned training. The HQ and staff usually focused on staff skills while the various HQ battery sections focused on support tasks. Occasionally, N.G. brigade HQ participated in division or higher-level command post exercises (CPXs) as part of their inactive training. Brigades assigned to single state divisions generally attended summer training at the same time as the rest of the division. For maneuver training at summer camp, multistate brigades usually attended camp with their parent division, while brigade regiments from other states trained with units of their own state. Several multistate divisions were able to assemble subordinate brigades from other states at a division camp in a few instances in the interwar years. Except for the army-level maneuvers in the late 1930s and early 1940s, however, combined camps for multistate divisions were uncommon. In many states, N.G. brigades rotated maneuver and live-fire training on a biennial basis. For example, for maneuver training one year, the Texas N.G.'s 61st F.A. Brig. would attend camp at Camp Hulen with the rest of the 36th Division (Div.). The following year, the brigade would go to Camp Bullis, TX, near San Antonio to conduct live-fire training. For many Guard brigades, maneuver and live-fire training were conducted at the same installation but rotated every other year.

Though most O.R. divisional brigade HHB functioned as units, their inactive training assemblies tended to be conducted with one of their subordinate regiments or with another HQ. Only occasionally did these brigades hold training periods that were conducted solely with the brigade's assigned personnel. Most of the brigades functioned as actual command and control HQ during summer training camps only if they participated in a division or corps area CPX. Usually, if a senior officer was not already assigned to command the brigade, the senior regimental commander temporarily filled in as commander for the camp. More often the brigade's personnel would attend the summer training attached to one of the brigade's subordinate regiments. In some cases, the brigade HHB personnel would be attached directly to R.A. or N.G. field artillery brigades for the summer training period or during major maneuvers.

In the case of the other types of O.R. field artillery brigades, few functioned as units and fewer were ever ordered to camp as units. Most often, the personnel of those brigades were ordered to camp as individuals attached to subordinate regiments or other brigades.

Soldiers of B Battery, 2d Field Artillery prepare a 75-mm pack howitzer for an experimental airlift exercise from France Field to Rio Hato, CZ, 20 March 1931.

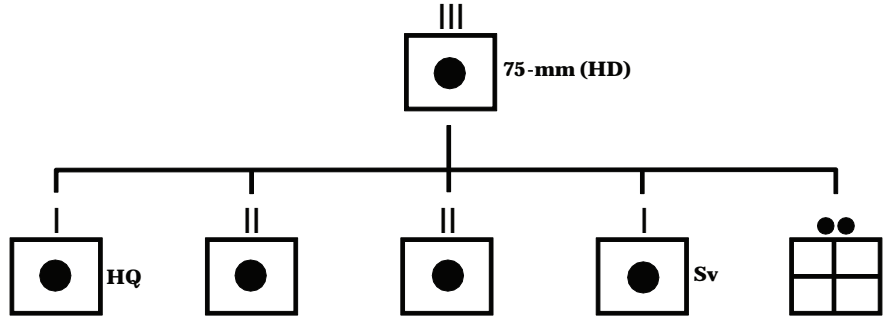

Field Artillery (F.A.) regiments provided indirect and direct fire support for the ground gaining arms.

Organization

As with the infantry, the field artillery regiment was considered the base artillery organization for combat, training, and administrative operations in the interwar period. For the most part, the organization and types of regiments in the postwar Army were a direct adoption of the types of units that served in World War I. The Hero Board, headed by its namesake, Brigadier General Andrew Hero Jr., found during its analysis of wartime field artillery units in 1919 that the practical utility of field artillery organizational structure was sound, but still recommended a number of changes. Though there were changes to the various artillery brigades and a few other artillery organizations, the various types of regiments were left largely intact.

There were several distinct types of field artillery regiments in this period. The organization of these units was based on the type of weapon with which they were equipped and the echelon of command to which they were assigned. At the division-level were two 75-mm G horse-drawn regiments consisting of 2 battalions and 24 guns each (12 weapons per battalion). Three truck-drawn versions of this regiment were integral to the General Headquarters Reserve (GHQR) light field artillery brigade and another three were found in the GHQR portee brigade as well. The 155-mm H regiment was part of both the corps artillery brigade (three regiments each) and in the GHQR medium and heavy (M&H) artillery brigade (two regiments each). Both regiments consisted of 3 battalions of 8 weapons in each battalion (24 total). The 155-mm G regiment was located only in the corps artillery brigade and was organized the same as the 155-mm H regiment and equipped with 24 guns versus the howitzer. The 240-mm H regiment was a part of the

M&H brigade only and was organized with 3 battalions and 24 howitzers. The 6-inch G regiment was also a component of the M&H brigade and organized similarly to the 240-mm H regiment. The final type of regiment was the 75-mm pack howitzer regiment. Like other 75-mm regiments, these units also consisted of 2 battalions and 24 guns (12 weapons per battalion).

By 1921, only the regiments integral to the infantry and cavalry divisions were horse drawn, though the guns of the 75-mm pack regiments, which were generally intended for jungle or mountain terrain, were broken into component parts and carried by mules. The guns of portee regiments were carried on the bed of a portee truck or trailer. The remaining weapons were intended to be truck- or tractor-drawn, though few field artillery units were ever equipped with the latter as a prime mover.

During the interwar period, there were 87 authorized Regular Army (R.A.) field artillery regiments. Of these regiments, 27 were on the rolls as of January 1920. Between that date and October 1933, another 60 regiments would be constituted or reconstituted and added to the rolls of the Army. Of these regiments, only 12 managed to maintain an Active Duty regimental headquarters (HQ) for the entire period. Another 15 regiments were partially active with at least 1 battalion on Active Duty for all or part of that time. Nine of those regiments, less their active elements, were organized for varying lengths of time as Regular Army Inactive (RAI) regiments. Fifty-seven additional regiments were organized at some point as RAI units. Only three of the R.A. regiments remained totally inactive during the interwar period. Most of these regiments were reorganized and redesignated as divisional or nondivisional field artillery battalions during 1940–41 and activated for service in World War II. A minority remained organized as regiments and a few of those were activated as such during the same period.

Most of the RAI regiments were functional units during their period of organization as Reserve units. Generally, these regiments were organized in larger cities or affiliated with a Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) program. They also tended to have a Reserve field grade officer at the rank of major or higher in command. Typically, those that were commanded by captains or lieutenants were pool units for mobilization assignment purposes and rarely met for unit activities except for summer training camps.

The National Guard (N.G.) had 107 field artillery regiments on the rolls of the Army at some point between 1921 and 1940. Of these, 63 were active units between 1921 and 1939. There were three partially active regiments during this period, two of which were later subsumed into other regiments. There were another 28 regiments that were allotted to various states of the N.G., which were never organized. These were corps and GHQR regiments that were placed on the deferred list in 1923 and, with a few exceptions, were demobilized in 1927. Between 1939 and 1941, another 13 regiments were organized in the N.G. These were largely organized from existing Guard units that were not required by the Army's mobilization plans. The new units were formed mostly from cavalry regiments formerly belonging to the four disbanded Guard cavalry divisions. The others were former infantry regiments.

Over 220 regiments were constituted or reconstituted and allotted to the Organized Reserve (O.R.) between 1921 and 1929. The majority of these regiments were organized, but many were later inactivated with the organization of the many RAI regiments that were constituted or reconstituted and organized with Reserve personnel in the 1920s and 1930s. About 37 of the O.R. regiments were later demobilized as excess to Army needs. The majority of those organized, especially the divisional regiments, were functional units. Like most O.R. units, those regiments that were originally spread over large geographic areas in the early 1920s tended to coalesce into larger population centers, either at the battalion- or regimental-level by the late 1920s. A number of regiments, mostly GHQR and a few corps artillery regiments, remained pool units for officers who were geographically separated from larger cities and could not participate in unit training activities.

Training

The annual training cycle for R.A. field artillery regiments was similar to that for other combat arms units (see Chapter 9, Infantry Regiments, for a general description). For artillery units, the tight budgets meant that service firing with live rounds was conducted only occasionally and rarely more than twice a year. Even when live firing was conducted, rounds were used sparingly. Maneuver training was conducted, generally, in conjunction with the artillery unit's parent brigade or division, though it was not unusual for batteries to take to the field to conduct firing position occupation and battery displacement drills.

N.G. artillery units typically followed a 2-year cycle. One year the regiment, frequently as part of its parent brigade, would conduct live-firing exercises. The next year the unit would attend maneuver training. As for the R.A., when live firing, Guard artillery regiments were provided a minimal amount of ammunition for training and attempted to maximize the training value for every round. The inactive training period was conducted in a similar fashion to other Guard units (see chapter 9 for a general description).

Many O.R. field artillery regiments conducted their inactive training periods performing a lot of theoretical exercises concerning the employment of artillery. Those units lucky enough to be near an R.A. or N.G. artillery unit could often use those units' equipment, if it was available, for more basic hands-on skills. During summer camps, the training was often very elementary. Junior officers were often employed as gun crews to learn the fundamental skills of the branch. More senior officers were employed as battery commanders or instructors. If the camp was a Regular Army Training Center (R.A.T.C.)-type camp, the Reserve officers would have the opportunity to shadow an R.A. counterpart in the field. If the regimental or battalion commander felt that the Reserve unit had progressed well enough, the commander could turn over control of the unit to the Reserve officers for a few days. Live firing tended to be a more intense level of training due to the lower skill level of the Reservists and the increased possibility of a serious incident. Nevertheless, the Reserve units did get to conduct live firing about every 2 to 3 years. Given that the average Reservist attended camp only once every 3 to 4 years, however, it might be as long as 3 to 8 years between live firing events for a Reserve field artillery officer.

Chapter 21

Field Artillery Battalions

The 82d Field Artillery Battalion on parade at Fort Bliss, TX.

Field Artillery battalions provided indirect and direct fire support for the ground gaining arms.

Organization

As with the field artillery regiments, the separate battalions were armed with several distinct types of weapons in this period. These consisted of 75-mm Gun (G), 75-mm Howitzer (H), 2.95-in Vickers-Maxim (VM), 155-mm H, 155 G, and 240-mm H weapons. The prime mover for each type of weapon depended on the mission and echelon of command to which they were assigned. With the exception of the 83d Field Artillery (F.A.) Battalion (Bn.), which was tractor drawn until 1927, the 75-mm G battalions were horse drawn. The two 75-mm H battalions were designated as pack units, though the 2d F.A. Bn. was actually organized as a portee unit during its brief existence. The other pack unit, the 4th F.A. Bn., was the only battalion armed with the 2.95-in VM, a British-made mountain gun, though the 24th F.A. Regiment (Regt.) in the Philippines was also equipped with the same weapon. The remaining battalions were truck-drawn organizations. In general, those battalions assigned to support divisions were horse drawn, pack, or portee units; and those assigned to corps and General Headquarters Reserve (GHQR) field artillery brigades were truck drawn.

There were 30 separate field artillery battalions in the Regular Army (R.A.) in the interwar period. Only six of those served on Active Duty and most had only a brief existence. All but one of the active service battalions were organized from preexisting regiments and all of them had disappeared by April 1930 after being reabsorbed by a reorganized regiment. The other 24 R.A. battalions were Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units and only 1 of those was organized with reservists.

There were only four separate field artillery battalions authorized in the National Guard (N.G.) (the 141st and 167th Bns. were the same organization) during this period. Those battalions were assigned to the four Guard cavalry divisions. They were active as separate battalions. The two active units (the 141st and 168th F.A. Bns.) were absorbed by new regiments between 1932 and 1939. The remaining two battalions were reorganized and redesignated as regiments in a "not organized" status in 1939.

A total of 19 field artillery battalions were constituted and allotted to the Organized Reserve (O.R.) between 1921 and 1923. Of these, six were horse-drawn 75-mm G battalions assigned to the O.R. cavalry divisions. All six of these battalions were functional units and were later expanded and redesignated as field artillery regiments in 1929. The remaining 13 battalions were a mixture of 75-mm G, 155-mm G, 155-mm H, and 240-mm H units. Only five of these were known to have been initiated. Since these organizations were assigned to the Zone of the Interior, it appears that most of these battalions were to be assigned to various training centers as training support units. Two were assigned to Fort Sill, OK, for mobilization purposes, and Fort Bragg, a major artillery training post, was designated as the mobilization station for several others. All 13 were demobilized in 1928 and replaced by RAI units in the mobilization plans. It is unlikely that any of the five initiated Zone of the Interior battalions were functional units.

Training

Training opportunities and activities for field artillery battalions were generally the same as that for field artillery regiments of the same component (i.e., R.A., N.G., or O.R.).

Observation Battalions (Sound and Flash)

Soldiers conduct training on a sound detection system, circa 1925.

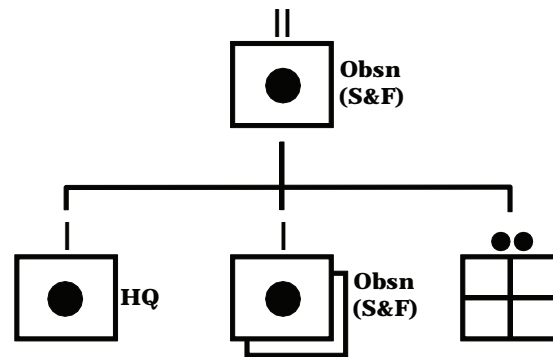

Field Artillery observation battalions provided the detection and spotting capabilities for General Headquarters Reserve (GHQR) and corps field artillery brigades to perform counterbattery fires against enemy artillery positions.

Organization

Field Artillery observation battalions consisted of a headquarters (HQ) battery (btry) and two line batteries composed of two sound and flash detection platoons. The batteries were generally deployed on or near the front lines in a series of sound and flash teams. The teams attempted to determine the location of enemy artillery by individual observation (flash) and sound detection with sensitive microphones. The intent was to have two or more teams detect an enemy gun position and pinpoint the location through the triangularization process. The enemy location could then be sent to an artillery fire direction center, which would plot the position and provide firing data to a supporting battery.

There were 38 sound and flash battalions constituted during the interwar period—10 in the Regular Army (R.A.), 3 in the National Guard (N.G.), and the remainder in the Organized Reserve (O.R.). Only the Observation battalion organization.

1st Observation (Obsn.) Battalion (Bn.) was in active service before 1940, but all of the remaining R.A. battalions were active as Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units.

There were only three battalions authorized in the N.G. during this period. None of the three were ever organized and all were placed on the deferred list in 1923 as Deferred National Guard (DNG) units. All three were withdrawn in 1927 and presumably demobilized.

Not including the 3 DNG battalions, 22 sound and flash battalions were constituted and allotted to the O.R. With the exception of two of the deferred battalions, all of these battalions were initiated at some point during the period. Many were later demobilized due to the constitution of the RAI battalions in 1933.

Training

The majority of the RAI and O.R. battalions appear to have been pool units and, therefore, held no meetings during the Inactive Training Period. Training opportunities for the personnel of these units was rather limited given the small number of units and until 1934, only one sound and flash battery was active in the R.A. Consequently, these organizations were sent to summer camp as units on an infrequent basis. The personnel were more often sent as individuals and formed into provisional units at the camp. Generally, the units and personnel trained with the 1st Obsn. Bn. at Fort Bragg and with the sound and flash section of the Field Artillery School at Fort Sill. These two installations were also the designated mobilization training station for the majority of the sound and flash battalions. Additionally, the units had the opportunity to send personnel to attend the sound and flash course periodically conducted for the Army at the University of Pennsylvania in the 1930s and early 1940s.

Chapter 23

Ammunition Trains

Headquarters, Second Ammunition Train.

Ammunition trains provided the ammunition haul and delivery capability for General Headquarters Reserve (GHQR), corps, and division field artillery brigades and GHQR and army coast artillery brigades.

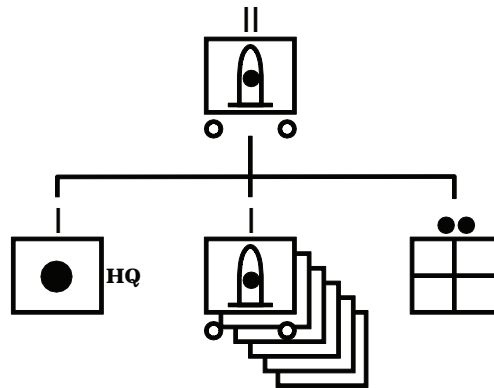

Organization

There were three types of ammunition train in the postwar period. The army-level trains consisted of a headquarters battery and six motorized ammunition resupply batteries. The corps train was composed of essentially the same organization as that of the army train, less one ammunition resupply battery. This table of organization (T/O) was also used for those trains assigned or attached to GHQR brigades. The division ammunition train was significantly different from the other two trains. It consisted of a headquarters battery, one horse-drawn ammunition transportation battery, and one motorized ammunition resupply battery. The divisional train underwent a major reorganization in 1931 when it expanded to consist of a headquarters battery, one horse-drawn ammunition resupply battery, and two motorized ammunition resupply batteries, one motorized transportation section, and one horse-drawn transportation section. Concurrently, the train's personnel strength tripled in size.

There was a total of 109 ammunition trains constituted during the interwar period—22 in the Regular Army (R.A.), 27 in the National Guard (N.G.), and 60 in the Organized Reserve (O.R.). Of these, 13 were army trains, 33 were corps trains, 6 were allocated to the GHQR, and 57 were assigned to infantry divisions. All of the R.A. trains except one were active or organized as Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units. Most of the active trains were inactivated in 1930 and only the 2d Ammunition (Ammo.) Train (Tn.) survived on Active Duty into the late 1930s as a Field Artillery School support and training unit. Most of the inactivated trains were reorganized as RAI units.

Only 11 of the 27 N.G. trains were active at some point in the interwar period—10 divisional trains and one army-level train. Most of the active trains were reorganized at some point into other organizations, mostly field artillery units. Only three trains survived into the late 1930s and all three were converted into other organizations during the major reorganizations of the N.G. during 1939–40.

Ammunition train, division artillery brigade organization.

The vast majority of the O.R. ammunition trains were initiated during the interwar period. Most of those that were not, were Deferred National Guard (DNG) units. A number of the GHQR trains were demobilized in 1923 when the War Plans Division (WPD) determined that they would not be needed. Additional trains were demobilized in 1933 due to the constitution of new RAI ammunition trains needed for the nine lower numbered corps and the four field armies in accordance with the four-army plan.

The requirement to have separate ammunition trains for hauling and delivering ammunition became less acute in the 1930s as the Army motorized its artillery units. The combat trains, ordnance companies, and quartermaster truck regiments integral to the field forces made the ammunition train superfluous to the needs of those forces. The ammunition train was eliminated from the triangular division in 1939 and eliminated from all Guard divisions and corps artillery brigades in 1940. Trains survived in the O.R. divisions until 1942 when those divisions were also reorganized as triangular divisions.

Training

There is not much information available on the training and activities of ammunition trains. While they were in service, the Active Duty R.A. trains supported the training of divisional field artillery units during field training and live-fire exercises. Of course, the 2d Ammo. Tn. lived on a while longer in the 1930s supporting the training at the Field Artillery School. RAI trains were almost all pool units and only attended summer training as units. Only the 6th Ammo. Tn. appears to have held unit training during the Inactive Training Period. N.G. trains held normal drills during the Inactive Training Period and attended summer training with their respective brigades. The majority of the O.R. division ammunition trains were likely functional units, though not much evidence has been found either way. The remaining trains were mostly pool units and only one corps train was determined to have held activities as a unit during the Inactive Training Period.

Chapter 24

Coast Artillery Major Commands

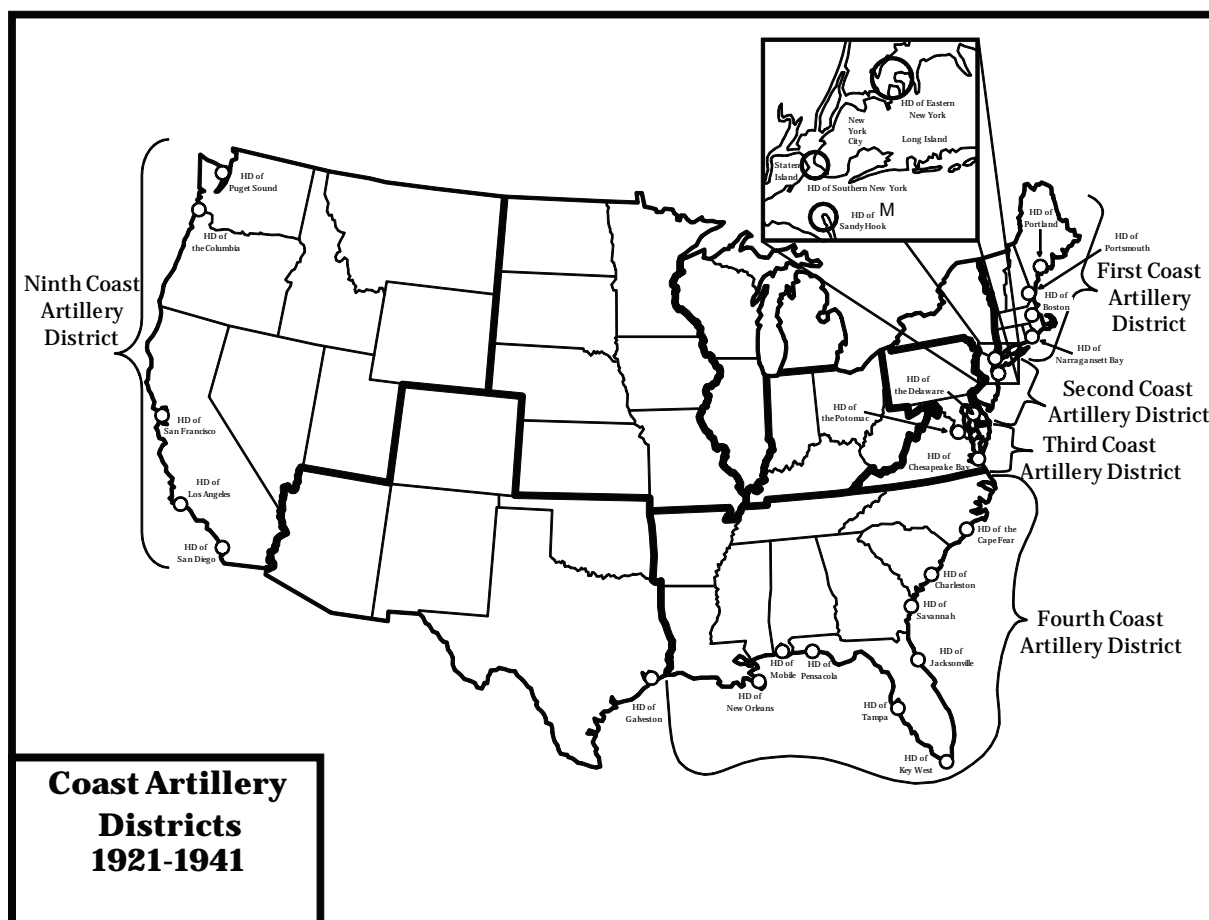

George H. Ruhlen collection, Ival Lawhon, St. Joseph, MO.

Troops of the 59th Coast Artillery conduct life firing at Battery Hearn, Corregidor, PI, 1938.

There were five types of major coast artillery (C.A.) commands during the interwar years. These commands consisted of C.A. districts, harbor defenses, coast defense commands, coastal frontiers, and sectors. These headquarters (HQ) provided command and control of C.A. organizations assigned or attached to the various coast defenses located along the bays and harbors of the continental United States or in one of the overseas departments.

The five numbered C.A. districts (First, Second, Third, Fourth, and Ninth) were organized in August 1920 from five previously existing geographically named districts. The new districts were numbered and geographically reorganized to align with the corresponding corps areas to which they were subordinated. The new commands did not necessarily mirror the older command's areas of responsibility. Additionally, there were two overseas districts: one in the Hawaiian Department and one in the Panama Canal Department. The Coast Defenses of Manila and Subic Bays essentially functioned as a district for the Philippine Department, and though it never attained that status, it was typically commanded by a brigadier general in peacetime. C.A. districts provided command and control of the various fixed C.A. commands within the department or corps area. They also exercised command and control over attached mobile forces, C.A. and otherwise, for training exercises and wartime defense of harbors and shores. The districts were charged with the coastal defense of harbors, shores, and operationally significant maritime areas within their respective areas of responsibility. The districts' responsibilities included anti-aircraft defense as well as planning and coordination requirements with aerial defense commands and naval districts. In peacetime, each C.A. district consisted of two or more fixed defense commands designated as "coast defenses" (later redesignated as "harbor defenses"). For operations, additional mobile assets could be attached to the districts from a department, field army, or General Headquarters Reserve (GHQR).

The stateside C.A. districts also had several peacetime requirements concerning the Reserve Components. Each district was responsible for coordinating and assisting the annual training of National Guard (N.G.) harbor defense regiments and battalions assigned to one of the harbor defense commands in the corps area.

Map, Coast Artillery Districts, 1921–41.

The districts also oversaw preparation of those units' mobilization plans and typically provided the annual inspection teams that verified the readiness of the Guard unit in accordance with Federal requirements. Moreover, the districts assisted the coordination between the Guard unit and its harbor defense command on issues such as integration of the units into the harbor defenses and logistical support on mobilization.

The districts performed essentially the same functions for Organized Reserve (O.R.) C.A. units as those for the N.G.; however, their responsibilities for the former were even greater. In addition, the districts managed the Reserve C.A. units in generally the same manner as the Regular Army (R.A.) staffs did for the Reserve divisions. The district's staff managed the administration of the Reserve personnel assigned to the units, issued general orders and special orders in regard to the units, and determined which units would attend camp in a given year and when and where those camps would be conducted.

As of January 1919, there were 27 R.A. coast defense commands in the continental United States, two in the Canal Zone, and one each in the Philippine and Hawaiian Departments. By 1921, the stateside commands had been significantly reduced in manpower. Many had only a skeletal force to man the batteries and none were maintained at war strength. One coast defense command was placed in caretaker status each year from 1921 to 1924. During the latter year, to maximize use of available manpower and scarce budget dollars, five coast defense commands were placed in caretaker status. Between 1924 and 1930, seven of those commands had all remaining weapons removed and were totally inactivated, though they were retained in mobilization plans for possible reactivation.

During the same period, the remaining commands suffered cuts as well, but each of them maintained at best two or more active batteries of troops to service key positions determined to be necessary for immediate defense. The remaining battery positions at those commands were also placed in caretaker status. In January 1930, as a further economic measure, 13 more commands were placed in caretaker status and their troops redistributed among the remaining active coast defenses.

In June 1935, the War Department revised the status of various coast defense commands based on classes of readiness. The revised system consisted of the following:

Harbor Defense Classifications June 1935

- Class I (Full Training) Harbor defense training will consist of all phases and types of C.A. exercises to include firing of harbor defense guns, submarine mine training, and anti-aircraft training.
- Class II (Limited Training) Harbor defense training will consist of all phases and types of C.A. exercises except as they are limited by maintenance duties. At harbor defenses having a submarine mine project, special emphasis will be placed on submarine mine training.

Harbor Defense Manning Chart, T/O: 302W.

Class III (Maintenance) Harbor defense training will primarily consist of maintenance of harbor defense armament and accessories. Firing of harbor defense guns will be conducted only on special authorization from the War Department.

These classifications remained in use until the beginning of World War II.

The various fixed defense commands designated as coast defenses were redesignated as harbor defenses in 1925 to provide a title that more accurately reflected the actual mission of the units. The entire coastline of the United States was impossible to defend everywhere, so the system of coast defense comprised both harbor defenses and mobile defenses. In short, the harbor defenses were primarily of a fixed nature and included dispositions and operations for the defense of a limited portion of the seacoast, ordinarily defined as important harbors. The mission of harbor defenses was to deny an enemy the possession, use, or destruction of harbors and facilities. The mission of mobile defenses (i.e., infantry, artillery, and engineer units) in the scheme of coast defense was to prevent the enemy from landing and securing a lodgment on the shore adjacent to, and usually out of the range of, the fixed harbor defenses.

In peacetime, harbor defense commands provided the direct command and control for the harbor defense batteries within the command and ensured the readiness of the defenses for war. The commands also provided the structure around which assigned Regular Army Inactive (RAI), N.G., and O.R. units could assemble and mobilize. The commands also provided various types of training for these Reserve Component units. Perhaps more so than for most units in the Army, the Reserve Component training provided by the harbor defense commands was extremely relevant as it often took place on the very guns the units would be expected to man in wartime.

Organizationally, these harbor defense commands consisted of a number of separately numbered R.A., N.G., and O.R. C.A. companies until 1924. The number of companies varied with the command, as the manning requirements were not the same for any two commands. In 1924, most of the companies in all three components were redesignated as batteries and integrated into several different types of C.A. units, most of which were fixed harbor defense regiments and separate battalions. The remaining companies were demobilized.

In wartime, the harbor defense commands were responsible for the integration of all harbor defense activities including fixed defenses, mobile defenses, anti-aircraft defenses, and mine planting. Many of the commands were large enough to require temporary subordinate commands called groups and groupments. These levels of command were wartime groupings of various battalions, batteries, positions, and minefields within the harbor defense command. The group or groupment provided command and control for a sector of the harbor defenses. Typically, the commanders and staffs of mobilized Guard or Reserve regiments were to form these temporary commands until such time that they were no longer needed.

Harbor Defenses Overseas Garrisons.

Compared to the stateside commands, the overseas harbor defense commands were maintained at much higher levels of readiness. Though not all elements remained active in all units, some regiments were maintained at or near peace strength, and others would have a minimum of at least one full peace-strength battalion.

The eight N.G. coast defense commands organized in the early 1920s were, in effect, regimental HQ for the fixed defense C.A. companies allotted to the commands' respective states. These command HQ and companies were allotted based on mobilization requirements to support fixed defenses in the harbor defense command where the units were intended to serve in wartime. The companies were provided mobilization assignments to the various named batteries in the harbor defenses. It was not clear as to the role of the command HQ however; most likely, the HQ would have been integrated into the HQ for the harbor defense or perhaps formed the command and control element for a fort, group, or groupment. By 1924, all of these commands were reorganized and redesignated as numbered C.A. regiments or battalions.

In 1936, 12 new wartime command HQ were constituted in the R.A. These were three coastal frontiers and nine sectors. The coastal frontiers were intended to supersede the five C.A. districts on activation. The North Atlantic Coastal Frontier would assume command and control for all assigned assets of the First, Second, and Third C.A. Districts. The South Atlantic Frontier would assume command and control for all assigned assets of the Fourth C.A. District, plus the Harbor Defenses of Galveston in Texas. The Pacific Frontier would assume command and control for all assigned assets of the Ninth C.A. District. Each of these frontiers was further divided into three sectors. The sectors would command and control two or more harbor defense commands. As World War II approached in 1941, however, War Department planners determined that the five C.A. districts should convert from peacetime administrative and coordination HQ to wartime frontier command HQ responsible for the integration of coast defense assets for the purposes of frontier defense. This change was instituted right after Pearl Harbor and the districts were redesignated as "Frontier Defense Sectors" in December 1941.

Coast Artillery Brigades

The 41st Coast Artillery (Railway), Hawaiian Separate Coast Artillery Brigade passes in review at Schofield Barracks, TH, 1935.

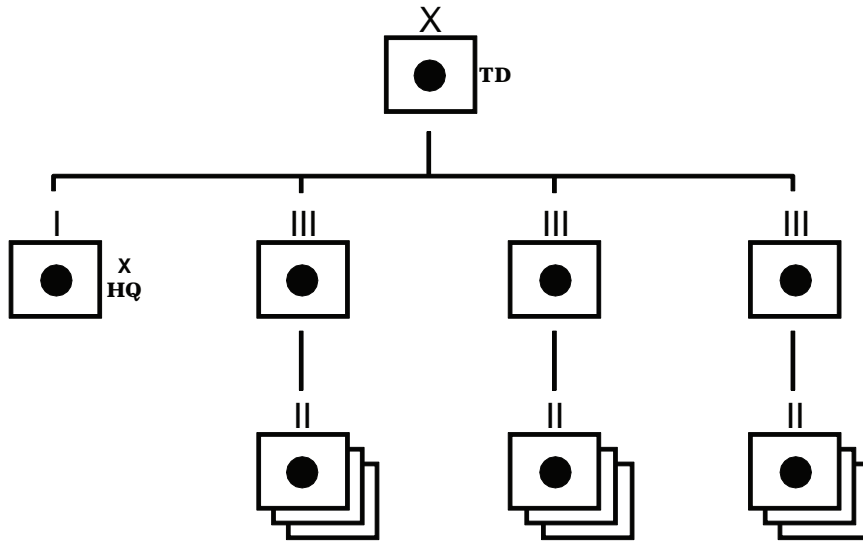

Coast artillery (C.A.) brigades provided command and control for assigned or attached C.A. regiments, battalions, and other elements attached for operations. The brigades' primary mission was to plan, coordinate, and conduct indirect and direct fire and antiaircraft artillery support in defense of mobile units, harbor defenses, airfields, and other key installations.

Organization

There were three distinct types of C.A. brigade tables of organization (T/Os) in the interwar period. These were the antiaircraft artillery brigade, railway artillery brigade, and tractor-drawn artillery brigade. Each type of brigade consisted of a HQ, a HQ battery, and three C.A. regiments. Each type of brigade had different missions. The antiaircraft brigade provided antiaircraft defense for the Army's mobile units in the theater of operations. These brigades could also be used for fixed installations such as harbor defenses, airfield, important industrial facilities, key government centers, and communications facilities, either in the Zone of the Interior or the theater of operations. The railway brigades were intended to be devoted to harbor and coast defense, but could be employed as heavy artillery in a theater of operations. The tractor-drawn brigades were to be used as mobile batteries for harbor and coast defense as well, but could also be used in the medium or heavy artillery mode.

Additionally, there was also three other brigades in existence during the interwar period that were not organized in accordance with a standard T/O, but were formed to meet the defensive needs of a specific geographical area. These were the Hawaiian Separate (Sep.) C.A. Brigade (Brig.), the Panama Sep. C.A.

Coast artillery brigade organization.

Coast artillery brigade organization.

Brig., and the New York C.A. Brig. All three were organized primarily for harbor defense missions, though the latter two included antiaircraft artillery and railway units, and all three controlled mobile C.A. units (tractor drawn) in addition to fixed-gun harbor defense regiments.

There were 15 brigades in the Regular Army (R.A.), of which 2 were railway brigades, 3 were tractor-drawn brigades, and 10 were antiaircraft artillery brigades. The remaining two were the nonstandard Hawaiian and Panama Sep. C.A. Brig. Only the Hawaiian Sep. C.A. Brig. and the 30th C.A. Brig. (RY) were in active service for more than 2 years before World War II. Several of the antiaircraft brigades were activated during the 1940–41 buildup. Each of the inactive RA brigades were organized as Regular Army Inactive (RAI) units at various times after 1929. Like almost all brigade and higher RAI commands, these units did not function as actual HQ and only a few were functional units. Most were pool units.

There were only two National Guard (N.G.) brigades. One was the already mentioned New York C.A. Brig., which was reorganized and redesignated as the 102d C.A. Brig. (AA) in 1940. An additional Guard brigade, 101st C.A. Brig. (AA) was also created in 1940 by the reorganization and redesignation of Minnesota’s 92d Infantry (Inf.) Brig. as part of the mobilization for World War II.

There were 14 C.A. brigades constituted in the Organized Reserve (O.R.) between 1921 and 1928, and one brigade, the 239th, was transferred to the O.R. from the R.A. in 1927. All but one of these brigades were initiated at some point during the interwar years. Of these commands, 14 were antiaircraft artillery brigades. The remaining unit, again the 239th, was a tractor-drawn brigade. Six of the brigades were demobilized in 1933 and replaced in the Army’s mobilization plans by RAI brigades. As with the RAI brigades, most of the O.R. commands were pool units, though at least one was functional.

Training

The training of the few active R.A. C.A. brigades was generally conducted in the coast defense areas where they would actually perform their wartime missions. The one stateside brigade, the 30th, was often called on to support the summer training of O.R. brigades and regiments at Fort Eustis. Since few, if any, of the RAI brigades were functional, they apparently held no training activities as units during the Inactive Training Period. Additionally, only four appear to have attended a summer training camp as a unit.

The New York C.A. Brig. typically performed its drills during the Inactive Training Period at its home armory in New York City. The HQ and staff usually focused on staff skills while the various HQ battery sections concentrated on support tasks. Occasionally the brigade HQ participated in command post exercises (CPXs) as part of their inactive training. The brigade typically attended summer training at Fort Ontario or Camp Smith, NY.

Since they were generally pool units, the personnel of most O.R. C.A. brigade headquarters and headquarters batteries (HHB) attended Inactive Training Period training activities with one of the brigade's subordinate regiments or with another local unit. Additionally, there is no evidence that any of these brigades functioned as command and control HQ during summer training camps either. Most likely, the brigades' personnel attended summer training activities with one of their subordinate regiments.

Coast Artillery Regiments and Battalions

A gun crew from the 61st C. A. practices its gunnery skills on the shores of Lake Michigan, Fort Sheridan, IL, 1925.

Coast artillery (C.A.) regiments and battalions provided indirect and direct fire and antiaircraft artillery support in defense of mobile units, harbor defenses, airfields, and other key installations.

Organization

For the most part, the organization and types of C.A. regiments and battalions in the post-war Army were an adoption of the types of units that served in World War I. The advent of the aircraft as a weapon of war prompted the Army to add antiaircraft units to its structure and these units were formed from largely inert and not needed fixed C.A. units as a stopgap measure during the war. The 1920 National Defense Act formally assigned the antiaircraft mission to the C.A. Five distinct types of C.A. regiments and battalions were retained for the post-war Army. These units were organized based on their mission and type of weapon with which they were equipped. They included harbor defense, railway, tractor drawn, antiaircraft, and trench mortar regiments and battalions. The table on the next page illustrates the allotment of those types of units to the various components through 1940.

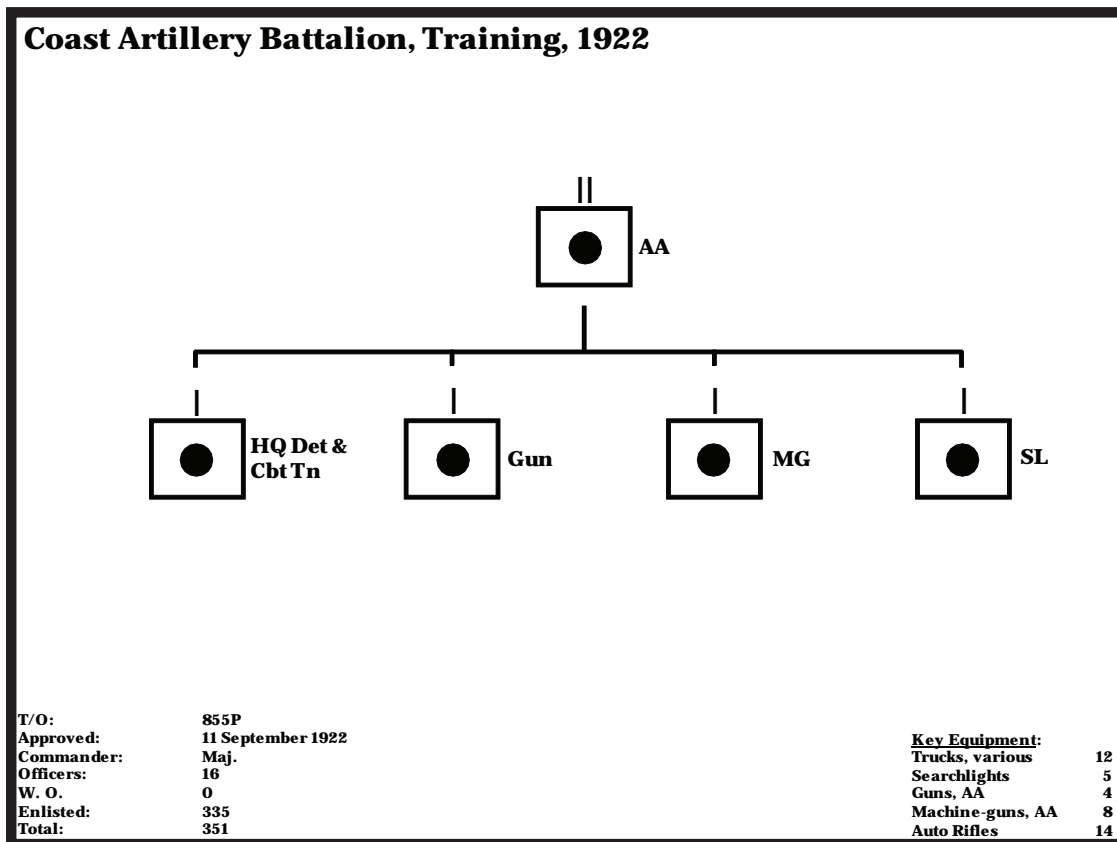

Fixed harbor defense units were the traditional mainstay of the C.A. Prior to 1923, each harbor defense was allotted a number of Regular Army (R.A.), National Guard (N.G.), and Organized Reserve (O.R.) C.A. companies to man its fixed defenses. That year, in coordination with War Department plans, the N.G. and O.R. began to reorganize existing harbor defense commands and separate C.A. batteries into regiments and battalions. The R.A. batteries were similarly reorganized in June and July of the following year. These regiments and battalions were organized into one of four type units (Type A, B, C, or D) each with varying numbers of batteries. Because these units were tailored organizationally to more properly fit the harbor defense command to which they were assigned for wartime, there was no standard number of batteries. During the interwar period, most of the active R.A. units were woefully undermanned. Some regiments only had one battery on Active Duty for the majority of the period. Others had two or three. With the exception of the defenses in the three overseas departments, none was fully active. As World War II neared, however, the R.A. regiments began to reactivate many of their battalions and batteries that had been dormant. These units were bolstered in 1940 and 1941 by those of the N.G., which had been, for the most part, fully organized but at peace strength. By the time of Pearl Harbor, there were 23 R.A. and 11 N.G. fixed harbor defense regiments on Active Duty.

Railway regiments and battalions were assigned to a specific harbor defense command; but due to their mobility, they could be used in the broader coast defense missions or easily transferred to support and supplement other harbor defenses as the need arose. As in World War I, the units could also be deployed to a theater of operations to be employed in harbor/coast defense roles overseas or as heavy artillery in support of mobile forces. These organizations could be equipped with varying types and sizes of weapons including 6-, 8-, 10-, 12-, 14- or 16-inch guns or 8-, 10-, or 12-inch mortars. Only two of these units were active, or at least partially active, in the interwar period, and none of the remaining three were activated as railway organizations for World War II service. Nor were any of the O.R. railway units activated for World War II service, at least as railway units, as the War Plans Division (WPD) apparently determined that such organizations would not be needed.

The largest category of C.A. units in terms of the number of organizations was the antiaircraft regiments and battalions. These units were intended to provide antiaircraft defense for mobile units, harbor defenses, key industrial facilities, command and communications centers, and similarly important fixed locations. The units were typically brigaded three or four regiments to a brigade, especially those slated for operations with field armies. As the airplane took on added importance in the world's military forces, the US Army expanded its antiaircraft defense structure and in 1928 constituted a large number of O.R. antiaircraft regiments. In 1933, a large number of those regiments were demobilized and replaced in the Army's force structure by Regular Army Inactive (RAI) regiments, or were withdrawn from the O.R. and reallocated as RAI antiaircraft units. The number of N.G. antiaircraft regiments also increased during 1939–40 when several excess infantry and cavalry regiments were converted to C.A. antiaircraft regiments. By the time of Pearl Harbor, 29 R.A. (some of which were former O.R. units) and 23 N.G. antiaircraft regiments were on Active Duty. Only a handful of the O.R. regiments were later activated for service during the war.

The tractor-drawn C.A. unit was organized similarly to a standard field artillery regiment. It was equipped with the 155-mm G.P.F. (Grande Puissance Filloux) gun, a French-made artillery piece that won great favor with American gun crews in World War I. The United States manufactured a large number of these guns during and after the war, and they became the mainstay of tractor-drawn C.A. organizations from 1918 until well into World War II. The rugged reliability, mobility, and range of these guns made them particularly well suited for use in coast defense work. The accuracy of these guns was enhanced when they were installed on what became known as a "Panama Mount." The mount was a leveled, circular concrete base with a centered pintle post and a steel circular rail that allowed the rapid traverse of the gun left and right. The mount enabled the gun crew to rapidly engage several ships or to target fast moving destroyers or mine sweepers. The added benefit of the 155-mm G.P.F. tractor-drawn unit was that it could be deployed to defend harbors overseas or used as heavy artillery in the combat zone, just as they were in World War I. At the time of Pearl Harbor, there were a total of eight of these regiments on Active Duty—four R.A. and four N.G. None of the O.R. regiments were activated for World War II service.

The remaining category of C.A. units was the trench mortar regiment and there was only one of its kind constituted in the Army's force structure. This unit was equipped with heavy, but mobile, 12-inch trench mortars that had great range and destructive power. The regiment was intended to be used in coast defense work or for the reduction of heavy field fortifications in the combat zone. Given its mobility and that it would most likely be used in the latter role more than the former, it was transferred to the field artillery in 1928.

Training

The annual training cycle for R.A. C.A. regiments was similar to that for other combat arms units (see Chapter 9, Infantry Regiments, for a general description). As with field artillery units, the tight budgets meant that service firing with live rounds was conducted only occasionally and rarely more than twice a year. In the case of railway and fixed defense units, the larger the caliber, the rarer the opportunities for live firing. For the few 16-inch pieces in either category, firing was conducted on only a handful of occasions for the entire interwar period. For the 155-mm G.P.F. units, maneuver and live-fire training was conducted, generally, in conjunction with the occasional exercises conducted by the harbor defense command to which they were assigned. Antiaircraft units, on the other hand, conducted relatively frequent maneuver training with ground mobile forces and during various air corps exercises conducted in many locations across the United States. Like their sister organizations, however, AA units only engaged in live fire exercises on an infrequent basis.

The information regarding most RAI units seems to indicate that all or most of those that were organized (three were not) were functional units. These units usually conducted their summer training with similarly organized and equipped active units.

During the Inactive Training Period, N.G. regiments and battalions participated in the general drill program followed by most Guard units. For summer training, harbor defense units typically trained on the guns of the harbor defense command to which they were assigned for wartime mobilization. Some tractor-drawn regiments, because they were not tied to fixed harbor defenses, trained at a variety of locations, but, in general, trained at locations where they could conduct realistic live-fire exercises. These units conducted live-fire training almost every year during summer camp. The same was true for Guard antiaircraft units. For some of the antiaircraft units, however, finding a location for live firing was a problem. The firing of antiaircraft (AA) weapons was usually conducted over water so that the rounds could fall harmlessly to earth. Therefore, AA units in the interior United States, such as Missouri's 203d C.A., often had to travel out of state to conduct their training. In addition, all of these types of units engaged the services of the various N.G. observation squadrons to provide spotter and tow-target aircraft to improve the realism of their training exercises.

Most of the O.R. C.A. regiments were functional units and many were some of the most active and well-trained Reserve organizations in the Army, especially those that were fixed harbor defense units. These units conducted their Inactive Training Periods performing exercises, demonstrations, and lectures covering theoretical employment and operations of the various kinds of C.A. guns and organizations. Those outfits lucky enough to be situated near a harbor defense installation or a R.A. or N.G. C.A. unit could often use those units' equipment, if it was available, for more basic hands-on skills. For fixed defense organizations, the summer training was usually conducted on the very guns these units were expected to man in wartime. As with the field artillery, junior officers and enlisted reservists were often employed as gun crews, in the fire control center, or ammunition handling to learn the fundamental skills of the branch. More senior officers were employed as battery commanders or instructors. For mobile units (tractor drawn and AA), if the camp was at a Regular Army Training Camp (R.A.T.C.) or during a maneuver, the Reserve officers would often have the opportunity to shadow a R.A. counterpart in the field. C.A. mobile units were able to conduct some live firing most years when they were ordered to camp. Railway units usually trained with harbor defense units and only rarely trained on actual railway guns. Only once, apparently, did any Reserve units have the opportunity to live fire with a railway artillery piece during the interwar period.

Army Mine Planters and Cable Ships

US National Park Service, Gulf Islands National Seashore

U.S.A.M.P. Royal T. Frank conducting mine planting operations near Fort Pickens, FL.

Before World War I, the Army possessed a fleet of mine planters, mine yawls, and distribution box boats to support its large number of coast defense commands. These boats had the wartime mission of installing and maintaining underwater mine fields and antisubmarine nets at the various harbor defenses in the continental United States and the 3 overseas departments. When war came in 1917, the number of planters was inadequate to meet the needs of these commands so the Army placed orders for at least 24 new mine planters and junior mine planters during the war. However, the new classes of boats, consisting of 8 primary and 16 junior planters were completed too late to participate in the war. In the early 1920s 5 of the 8 new primary planters were transferred to the US Coast Guard or to the US Lighthouse Service. The remaining 3, along with the 6 other older mine planters formed the backbone of the Army's mine planting service in the interwar period. Six of these boats were located at various commands in the United States. Two were located on the west coast, and the other four, one of which was a cable ship that generally performed duties as a mine planter, were stationed at defense commands on the east coast. Three of the primary planters were assigned to the Philippine (2) and Panama Canal (1) Departments. Hawaii possessed no primary planter, but did have 2, later 3, Harbor Boat Service vessels that were used to support the training of coast artillery batteries and planting sections from time to time. Occasionally, the primary planters from San Francisco or Puget Sound would travel to Hawaii to also support those activities.

Organization and Training

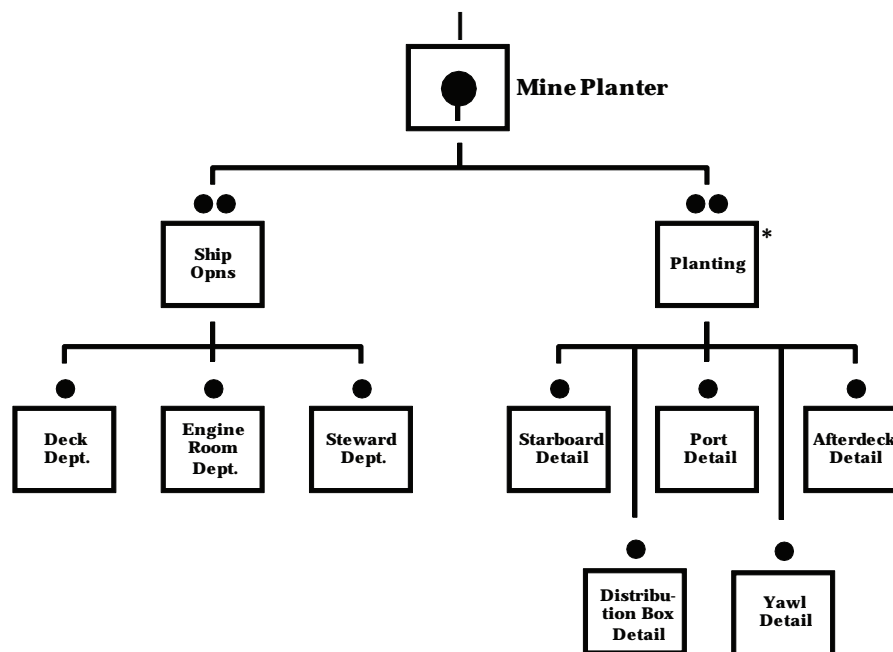

Though primary planters were typically assigned to a specific command, they frequently steamed to other harbor defense locations to service those commands. With over 20 active harbor defense commands to service, the primary planters were kept busy in terms of training of harbor defense planting sections, maintenance of mining equipment, and minor repairs to mine cable systems located within the harbors.

Until 1918, the Army mine planters actually served under a dual allegiance of sorts. The boats themselves were the property of the Quartermaster Corps. With the exception of the boat's commander, the personnel assigned to each boat's Operations Section (i.e., the permanent crew), including the boat's master, were civilian crews hired by the Quartermaster Corps. The Operations Section, which included the boat's commander, was responsible only for the operation of the boat. The boat's commander was a coast artillery officer from the harbor defense command to which the boat was permanently assigned. In April 1918, this changed when Congress established the Army Mine Planter Service and all crews were militarized. At that point both the Operations and Planting Sections were composed of Army personnel.

Though the Operations Section was the boat's permanent crew, mine planters did not maintain a permanent Planting Section. During training exercises or mining operations, the harbor defense command for which the boat was operating at the time provided the coast artillery personnel who composed the Planting Section. These crews were the men who actually did the work of preparing and planting each of the large antishipping mines that composed the harbor's mine field defenses and tended the antisubmarine nets.

In addition to the primary mine planters, by 1919 the Army also possessed over 30 junior mine planters. A number of these vessels, however, were sold to private businesses or transferred to other government agencies during 1920-23 and several more between 1929 and 1932. These boats were only infrequently employed in mine planting operations during peacetime. Most of the junior mine planters were used in various other capacities but mostly as freight and passenger craft supporting the Army's Harbor Boat Service, or occasionally as artillery tugs to tow target sleds on those relatively rare occasions when harbor defense crews fired the big guns during training. Even when employed in the latter capacity, these boats were far more frequently used as freight and passenger craft during this period than as vessels to support harbor defense duties. In 1941, all of these boats still in service were reconditioned and reequipped as junior mine planters and served as such during World War II.
