CHAIRMAN SPEAKS

PROBLEMS OF PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY

LIBRARY.

"A really successful fraud can scarcely be accomplished in our complex financial worlds without the help of accountants and lawyers," Chairman Ray Garrett, Jr., told a meeting of the American Bar Association, National Institute, in Montreal yesterday. "This may be active and intentional connivance or it may be more passive and subtle, but it is frequently essential." In this area, Mr. Garrett recalled a quotation from Westbrook Pegler:

"it takes a corporation lawyer with a heart for the game to organize a great stock swindle or income tax dodge and drill the financiers in all the precise details of their play."

I wish to encourage some better understanding of what we at the Commission see as the problem of law enforcement as it applies to professional persons acting in their professional capacity and what we are trying to do about it, Mr. Garrett said. While noting that the fear of liability can provide an effective stimulant to right behavior, the Chairman pointed out that it can also over-terrorize to the point of psychological ineffectiveness. The SEC does have a responsibility, Mr. Garrett averred, to use its resources to achieve the objectives of the laws we administer. These resources include law enforcement through civil litigation--normally the suit for injunction--and criminal references, as well as rulemaking, exhortation through releases, guidelines and speeches, and recommending legislation. Mr. Garrett noted that the Commission's response in the area of its concern has been to use all of the weapons Congress has given it save only, to date, rulemaking and the recommending of legislation. When is it better to establish a point through litigation, or to propose and adopt a rule? In response to this rhetorical question, Mr. Garrett observed that some aspects of professional responsibility may be too complex for rule-making, at least for rule-making too soon. "It is the essential genius of the Common Law that the court decide only the case before it, and not propose to decide all of the other possible cases that may be more or less similar . . . ," he said.

In closing, Mr. Garrett said that, in case there is really any doubt, we are fully aware of the high standards that govern the conduct of most accountants and lawyers most of the time. Without them our system would be impossible. Accountants and lawyers are in the front line of law enforcement, helping to achieve the goals of honesty in our business life and full and fair disclosure to investors in countless cases that never do, and never could come to our attention. Our whole system of government regulation and supervision relies heavily on the continued exercise of such professional responsibility in your daily work. We have no desire to change this system. We want only to preserve and improve it.
