VOLUME I

Preface

It is with great pleasure that I welcome this special two volume edition of the Digest of United States Practice in International Law covering the years 1991–1999, thus closing a gap for this period during which the Digest was not published. I hope that practitioners and scholars will find these volumes, tracking developments in international law through an eventful decade, to be useful. We await the publication of the next volume, for the calendar year 2004, and look forward as well to presenting editions for all subsequent years.

The Institute is very pleased to work with the Office of the Legal Adviser to make the Digest available for the use of the international legal community.

Introduction

I am pleased to be able to introduce the Digest of United States Practice in International Law covering the period 1991–1999. With the publication of these volumes, the Office of the Legal Adviser completes the effort to document the period when publication of the Digest was temporarily suspended. We hope that practitioners, scholars and the public, as well as governmental officials, will find this multi-year compilation a useful source of information regarding U.S. views and actions in the most important areas of international law. We have tried to be as comprehensive as possible within the limitation of available resources.

The material addressed retroactively in these volumes covers an important historical period involving many issues we believe readers will find highly relevant today. During this period, for instance, the United States became party to important human rights treaties, including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the UN Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, and the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. International terrorist acts such as the bombing of Pan Am 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, posed new challenges, to which the United States responded through negotiation of new international terrorism conventions, efforts in both the UN Security Council and the International Court of Justice, and changes in U.S. domestic laws including the creation of an exception to sovereign immunity for certain acts of state sponsors of terrorism.

Legal issues involving the use of force arose with U.S. participation in the Gulf War and the military intervention in the territory of the Former Yugoslavia, and were addressed in several instances before the International Court of Justice. U.S. participation in the peace process and in peacekeeping in areas as diverse as the Middle East, Bosnia, Kosovo, Somalia, and Haiti gave rise to both international and domestic legal issues. Major efforts were pursued in arms control and nuclear non-proliferation, including the establishment of the Korean Energy Development Organization.

The 1990s were an era of new international institutions and political structures. The United States was actively engaged, for instance, in the Security Council's creation of the international criminal tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda and the UN Mission in Kosovo, and in the negotiation stage of the establishment of the International Criminal Court. In the area of trade, the United States was deeply involved in the establishment of the World Trade Organization and the conclusion of the North American Free Trade Agreement. The breakup of the Soviet Union was only the biggest example of geo-political changes with a wide range of legal implications for the United States and other countries.

In other fields, to list only a few examples, after completion of the 1994 Agreement Relating to the Implementation of Part XI, the President transmitted both the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention and the 1994 Agreement to the Senate for advice and consent. Maritime interdiction of aliens and other aspects of immigration and naturalization generated important legal issues. Cases concerning the right of aliens in the United States to consular notification arose in U.S. courts and the International Court of Justice.

It is difficult adequately to describe the challenge of reaching back in time to identify and collect relevant material as was done to prepare these volumes. Although substantive work was completed by the time I became Legal Adviser, I want to express my thanks and appreciation for the efforts of the co-editors of this series, Sally Cummins and David Stewart. They assure me, however, that it would have been impossible without the extensive assistance they received from their many colleagues in the Office of the Legal Adviser and the support of my immediate predecessors, David Andrews and Will Taft. This is true for every volume of the Digest, but for this 1991–1999 endeavor, that assistance went far beyond the usual role of volunteers. It is safe to say that few lawyers in the Office were not called upon to contribute in some form. Those who made the biggest contribution did so on every level, identifying topics, retrieving documents, drafting, and reviewing drafts in their areas of expertise. Our very deep thanks go to attorneys who drafted part or all of individual chapters: Mary McLeod (Chapters 1 and 2), Denise Manning (Chapter 3), Mary Catherine Malin (Chapter 7), Kathleen Hooke (Chapter 4), James Filippatos (Chapters 6 and 10), Mallory Stewart (Chapter 8), Mary Mitchell (Chapter 11), Steven Pomper (Chapter 17), and Monica Hakimi and Nicole Thornton (Chapter 18). Special recognition is due to Denise Manning who, with help from Elizabeth Amory and Steven Hill, conceived, organized and completed the initial daunting effort to identify the issues to be addressed in these volumes. A series of legal assistants and student interns have also left their mark: Juliana Bentes, Anna Conley, Ryika Hooshangi, Kristina Han, Joe Kelley, and Brett Watkins contributed invaluable assistance by researching and collecting documents as well as significant drafting of Chapters 4, 6, 9, and 16. Support from paralegal Trish Smeltzer has been essential.

The Office thanks also former Deputy Legal Adviser Michael J. Matheson for his generosity in consulting on various topics. And, as always, the volume would never have been completed without the exceptionally able assistance of Joan Sherer, a librarian in the Office of the Legal Adviser. Our collaboration with the International Law Institute continues to be the cornerstone of this effort. We thank its chairman Prof. Don Wallace, Jr. and editor William Mays for their superb support and guidance and summer intern Patrick Dennis for preparing the voluminous original source record for these books.

We are delighted to conclude preparation of the Digest of United States Practice in International Law for calendar years 1991–1999. This two-volume set, together with the 1989-1990 volume published in 2002, completes coverage of the period when publication of the Digest was suspended. Since publication was recommenced, we have also released annual volumes for each of the four years 2000 through 2003, and the volume for 2004 is in the final stages of preparation.

These volumes continue the organization and general approach adopted for Digest 2000. Given the retrospective nature of the 1991–1999 compilation, more extensive editorial background has at times been included than in annual volumes, particularly in treating issues that developed over the course of several years. We have also made an effort in these volumes to signal significant later developments, usually through references to the volumes of the Digest covering subsequent years. We cannot claim to have been comprehensive in this effort, but we hope the additional information will be useful to the reader.

Identifying issues, collecting documents, and addressing the topics for these volumes has been an enormous undertaking. We want to add our thanks to those of the Legal Adviser for the assistance of all those in the Office of the Legal Adviser and from other offices and departments in the U.S. Government who made this cooperative venture possible. Once again, we thank our colleagues at the International Law Institute for their valuable support and guidance. We also want to thank the American Society of International Law for its cooperation in connection with use of materials prepared by State Department lawyers during the 1990s and published in the American Journal of International Law and International Legal Materials. We have provided cross-references to those publications. Our thanks also to Professor Don Wallace, Jr., and the editors of the Public Procurement Law Review for their cooperation in our use of an article by Professor Wallace.

As many of our readers are aware, the Cumulative Digest 1981–1988, published in 1994 and 1995, covered a number of issues that were updated through the publication date. Where that updating was comprehensive, entries in Digest 1991–1999 are briefer than their importance might otherwise warrant, with a reference back to the earlier volumes.

As in our annual volumes, our goal here has been to make the full texts of documents excerpted in this volume available to the reader to the extent possible. That has been more difficult, however, with the older documents. For many documents we have provided a specific internet cite in the text. We realize that internet citations are subject to change, but we have provided the best address available at the time of publication.

Many other types of documents are available from multiple public sources, both in hard copy and from various free or subscription online services. Government publications, including the Federal Register, Congressional Record, U.S. Code, Code of Federal Regulations, and Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, as well as congressional documents and reports and public laws, are available at www.access.gpo.gov. Note that Senate Treaty Documents, containing the President's transmittal of treaties to the Senate for advice and consent with related materials, are available at www.gpoaccess.gov/serialset/cdocuments/index.html. Senate Executive Reports, containing the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations reports of treaties to the Senate for vote on advice and consent and related materials are available at www.gpoaccess.gov/serialset/creports/index.html. In addition, the Library of Congress provides extensive legislative information at http://thomas.loc.gov. The government's "official web portal" is www.firstgov.gov, with links to a wide range of government agencies and other sites; the State Department's home page is www.state.gov. As of December 31, 2004, the United Nations has made its extremely useful Official Document System website available to the public at http://documents.un.org.

Unfortunately, these sources are temporally limited. The extensive materials retrievable from www.access.gpo.gov, for instance, are generally not available for the early 1990s although many of those documents are retrievable from subscription online services. Another valuable resource for State Department material from the 1990s is the Electronic Research Collection ("ERC"), a partnership between the U.S. Department of State and the Federal Depository Library at the Richard J. Daley Library, University of Illinois at Chicago, available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC. We have relied fairly extensively on the Department of State Dispatch, which is no longer published but is available for the 1990s on the ERC site at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

Where documents are not readily available elsewhere, we have placed them on the State Department website, at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. That has been a particular challenge for documents from the 1990s since fewer are available electronically. Given the cost of preparing electronic documents in compliance with statutory requirements for government internet postings, we have not been able to make as many documents available as we would like. We believe, however, that most documents can be located and we hope that our excerpts will prove to be adequate in any event.

Selections of material in this volume were made based on judgments about the significance of the issues, their possible relevance for future situations, and their likely interest to scholars and other academics, government lawyers and private practitioners. We welcome suggestions from readers and users. From time to time we are asked for the official citation to the Digest. We recommend for this volume 1991–1999 Dig. U.S. Pract. Int'l L.

In closing, we wish to note that these are the final volumes for which David Stewart will serve as co-editor, having seen to fruition the resuscitation of the annual Digest in a revised format and organization, integrating electronic availability of full-text source documents. While his participation as editor will be sorely missed, he will, of course, continue to contribute to the annual Digest in the areas of his considerable expertise.

Nationality, Citizenship and Immigration

A. NATIONALITY AND CITIZENSHIP

1. Acquisition of Citizenship

a. Citizenship of foreign-born child of unwed parents, only one of whom is American citizen

On April 22, 1998, in Miller v. Albright, 523 U.S. 420 (1998), the U.S. Supreme Court declined to find § 309 of the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), 8 U.S.C. § 1409, unconstitutional on the ground that it violated the Fifth Amendment by unlawfully discriminating against men. A majority of the Court did not agree on a single basis for affirmance, however. Thus the question of the constitutionality of § 309 was not definitively resolved. Section 309 establishes different conditions under which unwed U.S. citizen men and women may transmit U.S. citizenship to their children born abroad when the other parent is not an American citizen. It provides that unwed U.S. citizen mothers who have met a requirement of physical presence in the United States transmit U.S. citizenship to their children at birth; children of unwed U.S. citizen fathers, however, may acquire citizenship only if they or their fathers take certain steps to create or confirm a legal as well as biological relationship before the child turns 18. The opinion of Justice Stevens, who announced the judgment and who concluded that § 309 was constitutional, and one of the two concurring opinions are excerpted below, with footnotes omitted. Three other separate opinions were also written: Justices O'Connor and Kennedy would have dismissed the case on standing grounds, whereas Justices Ginsburg, Scalia and Breyer would have found § 309 unconstitutional. The Supreme Court again considered § 309's constitutionality several years later in Tuan Anh Nguyen v. INS, 533 U.S. 53 (2001). In that case five of the nine Justices opined that § 309 is constitutional. See Digest 2000 at 1–19; Digest 2001 at 7–8.

JUSTICE STEVENS announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE joined.

Under the terms of the INA, the joint conduct of a citizen and an alien that results in conception is not sufficient to produce an American citizen, regardless of whether the citizen parent is the male or the female partner. If the two parties engage in a second joint act—if they agree to marry one another—citizenship will follow. The provision at issue in this case, however, deals only with cases in which no relevant joint conduct occurs after conception; it determines the ability of each of those parties, acting separately, to confer citizenship on a child born outside of the United States.

If the citizen is the unmarried female, she must first choose to carry the pregnancy to term and reject the alternative of abortion—an alternative that is available by law to many, and in reality to most, women around the world. She must then actually give birth to the child. Section 1409(c) rewards that choice and that labor by conferring citizenship on her child.

If the citizen is the unmarried male, he need not participate in the decision to give birth rather than to choose an abortion; he need not be present at the birth; and for at least 17 years thereafter he need not provide any parental support, either moral or financial, to either the mother or the child, in order to preserve his right to confer citizenship on the child pursuant to § 1409(a). In order retroactively to transmit his citizenship to the child as of the date of the child's birth, all that § 1409(a)(4) requires is that he be willing and able to acknowledge his paternity in writing under oath while the child is still a minor. 8 U.S.C. § 1409(a)(4)(B). In fact, § 1409(a)(4) requires even less of the unmarried father—that provision is alternatively satisfied if, before the child turns 18, its paternity "is established by adjudication of a competent court." § 1409(a)(4)(C). It would appear that the child could obtain such an adjudication absent any affirmative act by the father, and perhaps even over his express objection.

There is thus a vast difference between the burdens imposed on the respective parents of potential citizens born out of wedlock in a foreign land. It seems obvious that the burdens imposed on the female citizen are more severe than those imposed on the male citizen by § 1409(a)(4), the only provision at issue in this case. It is nevertheless argued that the male citizen and his offspring are the victims of irrational discrimination because § 1409(a)(4) is the product of " 'overbroad stereotypes about the relative abilities of men and women.' " Brief for Petitioner 8. We find the argument singularly unpersuasive.

Insofar as the argument rests on the fact that the male citizen parent will "forever forfeit the right to transmit citizenship" if he does not come forward while the child is a minor, whereas there is no limit on the time within which the citizen mother may prove her blood relationship, the argument overlooks the difference between a substantive condition and a procedural limitation. The substantive conduct of the unmarried citizen mother that qualifies her child for citizenship is completed at the moment of birth; the relevant conduct of the unmarried citizen father or his child may occur at any time within 18 years thereafter. There is, however, no procedural hurdle that limits the time or the method by which either parent (or the child) may provide the State Department with evidence that the necessary steps were taken to transmit citizenship to the child.

The substantive requirement embodied in § 1409(a)(4) serves, at least in part, to ensure that a person born out of wedlock who claims citizenship by birth actually shares a blood relationship with an American citizen. As originally enacted in 1952, § 1409(a) required simply that "the paternity of such child [born out of wedlock] is established while such child is under the age of twenty-one years by legitimation." 66 Stat. 238. The section offered no other means of proving a biological relationship. In 1986, at the same time that it modified the INA provisions at issue in Fiallo in favor of unmarried fathers and their out-of-wedlock children, see n. 4, supra, Congress expanded § 1409(a) to allow the two other alternatives now found in subsections (4)(B) and (4)(C). Pub. L. 99-653, § 13, 100 Stat. 3657. The purpose of the amendment was to "simplify and facilitate determinations of acquisition of citizenship by children born out of wedlock to an American citizen father, by eliminating the necessity of determining the father's residence or domicile and establishing satisfaction of the legitimation provisions of the jurisdiction." Hearings, at 150. The 1986 amendment also added § 1409(a)(1), which requires paternity to be established by clear and convincing evidence, in order to deter fraudulent claims; but that standard of proof was viewed as an ancillary measure, not a replacement for proof of paternity by legitimation or a formal alternative. See id., at 150, 155.

There is no doubt that ensuring reliable proof of a biological relationship between the potential citizen and its citizen parent is an important governmental objective. See Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762, 770–771, 52 L. Ed. 2d 31, 97 S. Ct. 1459 (1977); Fiallo, 430 U.S. at 799, n. 8. Nor can it be denied that the male and female parents are differently situated in this respect. The blood relationship to the birth mother is immediately obvious and is typically established by hospital records and birth certificates; the relationship to the unmarried father may often be undisclosed and unrecorded in any contemporary public record. Thus, the requirement that the father make a timely written acknowledgment under oath, or that the child obtain a court adjudication of paternity, produces the rough equivalent of the documentation that is already available to evidence the blood relationship between the mother and the child. If the statute had required the citizen parent, whether male or female, to obtain appropriate formal documentation within 30 days after birth, it would have been "gender-neutral" on its face, even though in practical operation it would disfavor unmarried males because in virtually every case such a requirement would be superfluous for the mother.

Surely the fact that the statute allows 18 years in which to provide evidence that is comparable to what the mother provides immediately after birth cannot be viewed as discriminating against the father or his child.

Nevertheless, petitioner reiterates the suggestion that it is irrational to require a formal act such as a written acknowledgment or a court adjudication because the advent of reliable genetic testing fully addresses the problem of proving paternity, and subsection (a)(1) already requires proof of paternity by clear and convincing evidence. See 96 F.3d at 1474. We respectfully disagree. Nothing in subsection (a)(1) requires the citizen father or his child to obtain a genetic paternity test. It is difficult, moreover, to understand why signing a paternity acknowledgment under oath prior to the child's 18th birthday is more burdensome than obtaining a genetic test, which is relatively expensive, normally requires physical intrusion for both the putative father and child, and often is not available in foreign countries. Congress could fairly conclude that despite recent scientific advances, it still remains preferable to require some formal legal act to establish paternity, coupled with a clear-and-convincing evidence standard to deter fraud. The time limitation, in turn, provides assurance that the formal act is based upon reliable evidence, and also deters fraud. Congress is of course free to revise its collective judgment and permit genetic proof of paternity rather than requiring some formal legal act by the father or a court, but the Constitution does not now require any such change.

Section 1409 also serves two other important purposes that are unrelated to the determination of paternity: the interest in encouraging the development of a healthy relationship between the citizen parent and the child while the child is a minor; and the related interest in fostering ties between the foreign-born child and the United States. When a child is born out of wedlock outside of the United States, the citizen mother, unlike the citizen father, certainly knows of her child's existence and typically will have custody of the child immediately after the birth. Such a child thus has the opportunity to develop ties with its citizen mother at an early age, and may even grow up in the United States if the mother returns. By contrast, due to the normal interval of nine months between conception and birth, the unmarried father may not even know that his child exists, and the child may not know the father's identity. Section 1409(a)(4) requires a relatively easy, formal step by either the citizen father or his child that shows beyond doubt that at least one of the two knows of their blood relationship, thus assuring at least the opportunity for them to develop a personal relationship.

* * * *

Even though the rule applicable to each class of children born abroad is eminently reasonable and justified by important Government policies, petitioner and her amici argue that § 1409 is unconstitutional because it is a "gender-based classification." We shall comment briefly on that argument.

* * * *

The "gender stereotypes" on which § 1409 is supposedly premised are (1) "that the American father is never anything more than the proverbial breadwinner who remains aloof from day-to-day child rearing duties," and (2) "that a mother will be closer to her child born out of wedlock than a father will be to his." Even disregarding the statute's separate, non-stereotypical purpose of ensuring reliable proof of a blood relationship, neither of those propositions fairly reflects the justifications for the classification actually at issue.

Section 1409(a)(4) is not concerned with either the average father or even the average father of a child born out of wedlock. It is concerned with a father (a) whose child was born in a foreign country, and (b) who is unwilling or unable to acknowledge his paternity, and whose child is unable or unwilling to obtain a court paternity adjudication. A congressional assumption that such a father and his child are especially unlikely to develop a relationship, and thus to foster the child's ties with this country, has a solid basis even if we assume that all fathers who have made some effort to become acquainted with their children are as good, if not better, parents than members of the opposite sex.

Nor does the statute assume that all mothers of illegitimate children will necessarily have a closer relationship with their children than will fathers. It does assume that all of them will be present at the event that transmits their citizenship to the child, that hospital records and birth certificates will normally make a further acknowledgment and formal proof of parentage unnecessary, and that their initial custody will at least give them the opportunity to develop a caring relationship with the child. Section 1409(a)(4)—the only provision that we need consider—is therefore supported by the undisputed assumption that fathers are less likely than mothers to have the opportunity to develop relationships. . . . These assumptions are firmly grounded and adequately explain why Congress found it unnecessary to impose requirements on the mother that were entirely appropriate for the father.

* * * *

I agree with the outcome in this case, but for a reason more fundamental than the one relied upon by JUSTICE STEVENS. In my view it makes no difference whether or not § 1409(a) passes "heightened scrutiny" or any other test members of the Court might choose to apply. The complaint must be dismissed because the Court has no power to provide the relief requested: conferral of citizenship on a basis other than that prescribed by Congress.

The Constitution "contemplates two sources of citizenship, and two only: birth and naturalization." United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U.S. 649, 702, 42 L. Ed. 890, 18 S. Ct. 456 (1898). Under the Fourteenth Amendment, "every person born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, becomes at once a citizen of the United States, and needs no naturalization." Ibid. Petitioner, having been born outside the territory of the United States, is an alien as far as the Constitution is concerned, and "can only become a citizen by being naturalized, either by treaty, as in the case of the annexation of foreign territory; or by authority of Congress." 169 U.S. at 702–703; see also Rogers v. Bellei, 401 U.S. 815, 827, 28 L. Ed. 2d 499, 91 S. Ct. 1060 (1971). Here it is the "authority of Congress" that is appealed to—its power under Art. I, § 8, cl. 4, to "establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization."

If there is no congressional enactment granting petitioner citizenship, she remains an alien.

* * * *

By its plain language, § 1409(a) sets forth a precondition to the acquisition of citizenship under § 1401(g) by the illegitimate child of a citizen-father. Petitioner does not come into federal court claiming that she met that precondition, and that the State Department's conclusion to the contrary was factually in error. Rather, she acknowledges that she did not meet the last two requirements of that precondition, §§ 1409(a)(3) and (4). She nonetheless asks for a "declaratory judgment that [she] is a citizen of the United States" and an order to the Secretary of State requiring the State Department to grant her application for citizenship, App. 11–12, because the requirements she did not meet are not also imposed upon illegitimate children of citizen-mothers, and therefore violate the Equal Protection Clause. Even if we were to agree that the difference in treatment between illegitimate children of citizen-fathers and citizen-mothers is unconstitutional, we could not, consistent with the limited judicial power in this area, remedy that constitutional infirmity by declaring petitioner to be a citizen or ordering the State Department to approve her application for citizenship. "Once it has been determined that a person does not qualify for citizenship, . . . the district court has no discretion to ignore the defect and grant citizenship." INS v. Pangilinan, 486 U.S. 875, 884, 100 L. Ed. 2d 882, 108 S. Ct. 2210 (1988) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

Judicial power over immigration and naturalization is extremely limited. "Our cases 'have long recognized the power to expel or exclude aliens as a fundamental sovereign attribute exercised by the Government's political departments largely immune from judicial control.' " Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 792, 52 L. Ed. 2d 50, 97 S. Ct. 1473 (1977) (quoting Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 210, 97 L. Ed. 956, 73 S. Ct. 625 (1953)). See also Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 32, 74 L. Ed. 2d 21, 103 S. Ct. 321 (1982) ("The power to admit or exclude aliens is a sovereign prerogative"); Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 79–80, 48 L. Ed. 2d 478, 96 S. Ct. 1883 (1976) ("In the exercise of its broad power over naturalization and immigration, Congress regularly makes rules that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens"); Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 769–770, 33 L. Ed. 2d 683, 92 S. Ct. 2576 (1972) ("Plenary congressional power to make policies and rules for exclusion of aliens has long been firmly established"); Galvan v. Press, 347 U.S. 522, 531, 98 L. Ed. 911, 74 S. Ct. 737 (1954) ("That the formulation of [policies pertaining to the entry of aliens and their right to remain here] is entrusted exclusively to Congress has become about as firmly imbedded in the legislative and judicial tissues of our body politic as any aspect of our government"). Because only Congress has the power to set the requirements for acquisition of citizenship by persons not born within the territory of the United States, federal courts cannot exercise that power under the guise of their remedial authority. "Neither by application of the doctrine of estoppel, nor by invocation of equitable powers, nor by any other means does a court have the power to confer citizenship in violation of [statutory] limitations." Pangilinan, supra, at 885. "An alien who seeks political rights as a member of this Nation can rightfully obtain them only upon terms and conditions specified by Congress. Courts are without authority to sanction changes or modifications." United States v. Ginsberg, 243 U.S. 472, 474, 61 L. Ed. 853, 37 S. Ct. 422 (1917) (emphasis added).

b. Nonacquisition of citizenship by birth in the Philippines during the territorial period

In INS v. Rabang, 35 F.3d 1449 (9th Cir. 1994), cert. denied sub. nom Sanidad v. INS, 515 U.S. 1130 (1995), excerpted below, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that birth in the Philippines while the Philippines was a territory of the United States did not confer U.S. citizenship. The U.S. Courts of Appeals for the Second and Third Circuits reached the same result in Valmonte v. INS, 136 F.3d 914 (2d Cir. 1998) and Lacap v. INS, 138 F.3d 518 (3rd Cir. 1998), respectively. See also Friend v. Reno, 172 F.2d 638 (9th Cir. 1999).

At the close of the Spanish-American War on December 10, 1898, Spain ceded the Philippine Islands to the United States by treaty. See Treaty of Peace between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Spain, Dec. 10, 1898, U.S.-Spain, art. III, 30 Stat. 1754, 1755 (hereafter "Treaty of Paris"). That treaty provided that "the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress." Treaty of Paris, supra, art. IX, 30 Stat. at 1759.

The United States maintained military rule over the Philippine Islands until 1902. 2 R. Hofstadter, W. Miller & D. Aaron, The American Republic 340 (1959). Congress then enacted the Philippine Government Act, which established the terms of United States' civilian rule over the Philippines. See ch. 1369, 32 Stat. 691 (1902). That enactment provided that certain inhabitants of the Philippine Islands as of April 11, 1899 and "their children born subsequent thereto" were deemed "citizens of the Philippine Islands and as such entitled to the protection of the United States. . . ." § 4, 32 Stat. at 692. It also provided that the Constitution and laws of the United States would not apply to the Philippines. n. 2 § 1, 32 Stat. at 692.

In 1916, Congress adopted the Philippine Autonomy Act to "declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands." Philippine Autonomy Act, ch. 416, 39 Stat. 545 (1916). That act reiterated that "all inhabitants of the Philippine Islands who were Spanish subjects on [April 11, 1899] . . . and their children born subsequent thereto, shall be deemed . . . citizens of the Philippine Islands." § 2, 39 Stat. at 546.

Finally, thirty-five years after the United States acquired the Philippine Islands, Congress adopted the Philippine Independence Act. See Philippine Independence Act, ch. 84, 48 Stat. 456 (1934). That act provided for the adoption of "a constitution for the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands," § 1, 48 Stat. at 456, and for the complete withdrawal of United States sovereignty ten years after the adoption of a Philippine constitution. § 10(a), 48 Stat. at 463 (codified at 22 U.S.C. § 1394(a) (1990)). The act also declared that citizens of the Philippine Islands who were not also citizens of the United States were to be considered "aliens" under the immigration laws of the United States. § 8(a)(1), 48 Stat. at 462.

On July 4, 1946, the United States relinquished control over the Philippine Islands and declared them to be an independent sovereign, thus ending their status as a United States territory. See Proclamation No. 2695, 60 Stat. 1352, 11 Fed. Reg. 7517 (1946), reprinted in 22 U.S.C. § 1394 (1990).

All plaintiffs in this case are at some stage of deportation proceedings brought against them by the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Each complaint seeks declaratory judgment that the plaintiffs are entitled to citizenship under the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The plaintiffs allege that they or their parents were born in the Philippines during the territorial period, that during this time the Philippine Islands were "in the United States," and that plaintiffs were subject to the jurisdiction of the United States at their birth. They therefore claim that they (or their parents) were born "in the United States" and thus constitutionally entitled to citizenship.

The Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

U.S. Const. amend. XIV (emphasis added).

No court has addressed whether persons born in a United States territory are born "in the United States," within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. The courts have, however, uniformly rejected claims that people born in the Philippines during the territorial period retained their "national" status after Philippine independence. See, e.g., Rabang v. Boyd, 353 U.S. 427, 430–31, 1 L. Ed. 2d 956, 77 S. Ct. 985 (1957) (rejecting claim that status as a United States "national" was so related to "citizenship" that U.S. relinquishment of the Philippine Islands could not divest petitioner of his U.S. nationality); Manguerra v. INS, 390 F.2d 358, 360 (9th Cir. 1968) (rejecting argument that United States nationality could not be taken away without consent); Cabebe v. Acheson, 183 F.2d 795, 800 (9th Cir. 1950) (rejecting claim that Congress did not have power to divest petitioner of nationality).

We now hold that birth in the Philippines during the territorial period does not constitute birth "in the United States" under the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and thus does not give rise to United States citizenship.

In the Insular Cases the Supreme Court decided that the territorial scope of the phrase "the United States" as used in the Constitution is limited to the states of the Union. Those cases addressed challenges to the imposition of duties on goods shipped from Puerto Rico to the continental United States. The Court held that Puerto Rico was "not a part of the United States within the revenue clauses of the Constitution." Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244, 287, 45 L. Ed. 1088, 21 S. Ct. 770 (1901). See U.S. Const. art I, § 8 ("all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States") (emphasis added).

In arriving at this conclusion, the Court compared the language of the revenue clause ("all duties . . . shall be uniform throughout the United States") with that of the Thirteenth Amendment (prohibiting slavery "within the United States, or in any place subject to their jurisdiction") and the Fourteenth Amendment (extending citizenship to those born "in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof"). Id. at 251 (emphasis added). The Court emphasized that the language of the Thirteenth Amendment demonstrates that "there may be places within the jurisdiction of the United States that are no part of the Union." Id. In comparison, the Fourteenth Amendment has "a limitation to persons born or naturalized in the United States which is not extended to persons born in any place 'subject to their jurisdiction.' " Id. (emphasis added). Like the revenue clauses, the Citizenship Clause has an express territorial limitation which prevents its extension to every place over which the government exercises its sovereignty. Cf. United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 291 n. 11, 108 L. Ed. 2d 222, 110 S. Ct. 1056 (1990) (Brennan, dissenting) (distinguishing Downes holding regarding the revenue clauses, because the Fourth Amendment "contains no express territorial limitations").

The Downes Court further stated "In dealing with foreign sovereignties, the term 'United States' has a broader meaning than when used in the Constitution, and includes all territories subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal government, wherever located." Downes, 182 U.S. at 263. In other words, as used in the Constitution, the term "United States" does not include all territories subject to the jurisdiction of the United States government. See also Examining Board of Engineers, Architects and Surveyors v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 588 n. 19, 49 L. Ed. 2d 65, 96 S. Ct. 2264 (1976), citing H.R. Rep. No. 249, 56th Cong., 1st Sess., 16 (1900) ("upon reason and authority the term 'United States' as used in the Constitution, has reference only to the States that constitute the Federal Union and does not include the Territories.")

It is thus incorrect to extend citizenship to persons living in United States territories simply because the territories are "subject to the jurisdiction" or "within the dominion" of the United States, because those persons are not born "in the United States" within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment.

2. Oath of Allegiance Requirement for Naturalization

a. Waiver not permissible

The Office of Legal Counsel ("OLC"), Department of Justice, concluded in a memorandum opinion dated February 5, 1997, excerpted below, that the Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") could not waive the statutory requirement of § 337(a) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1448(a), that all applicants for naturalization take an oath of allegiance. OLC's conclusion was based in part on evidence that Congress considered the oath to be indispensable to the naturalization process. The statute was amended in 2000 to provide for a waiver of the oath for the naturalization of aliens having certain disabilities. Pub. L. No. 106–448, § 1, 114 Stat. 1939 (2000). See Digest 2003 at 4–5 regarding implementation of the statutory change.

It is our conclusion that the oath requirement of section 337 cannot be waived. Since the earliest days of our republic, Congress has exercised its power to "establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization," U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4, to require some form of an oath of allegiance as a condition of naturalization. See Act of March 26, 1790, ch. 3, § 1, 1 Stat. 103, 103 (requiring applicants for naturalization to take oath "to support the Constitution of the United States"); see also Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, 7 Immigration Law and Procedure § 96.05[1] (1996) (noting that "U.S. naturalization laws have always required an oath of allegiance as a prerequisite to naturalization" and chronicling statutory evolution of that oath). As "a promise of future conduct," Knauer v. United States, 328 U.S. 654, 671 (1946), the oath of allegiance has been, and remains, an "indispensable legal requirement[]" of naturalization. United States v. Tuteur, 215 F.2d 415, 417 (7th Cir. 1954); See also United States v. Shapiro, 43 F. Supp. 927, 929 (S.D. Cal. 1942) ("The alien makes a contract with the government of the United States. In return for the benefits and high privileges bestowed upon the alien, he makes a solemn agreement expressed in the oath required of all who become citizens."); cf. Luria v. United States, 231 U.S. 9, 22 (1913) ("Citizenship is membership in a political society and implies a duty of allegiance on the part of the member and a duty of protection on the part of the society. These are reciprocal obligations, one being a compensation for the other.").

The current version of the oath of allegiance contains five elements: (1) support the Constitution; (2) renounce all allegiance to any foreign state or sovereign; (3) support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States against all enemies; (4) bear "true faith and allegiance" to the same; and (5) bear arms, perform noncombatant service, or perform work of national importance on behalf of the United States. 8 U.S.C. § 1448(a). In order to attain U.S. citizenship, an applicant must satisfy each of these elements, for the INA demands strict compliance with its statutory conditions.[1] See 8 U.S.C. § 1421(d) (1994) ("A person may only be naturalized as a citizen of the United States in the manner and under the conditions prescribed in this subchapter and not otherwise.") (emphasis added); cf. INS v. Pangilinan, 486 U.S. 875, 884 (1988) (courts' role in naturalization process requires "strict compliance with the terms of [the] authorizing statute"). Moreover, courts have long recognized that naturalization is a privilege, not a right, to be granted only in accordance with the precise conditions established by Congress. See Rogers v. Bellei, 401 U.S. 815, 830 (1971) (" 'No alien has the slightest right to naturalization unless all statutory requirements are complied with.' ") (quoting United States v. Ginsberg, 243 U.S. 472, 475 (1917)).

[An INS] memorandum raises the possibility that Congress might have intended to waive the oath of allegiance requirement when, in 1994, it amended section 312(b) of the INA to permit waiver of the English language and civics requirements for naturalization applicants who are "unable because of physical or developmental disability or mental impairment to comply therewith." 8 U.S.C. § 1423(b)(1) (1994). According to this argument, by waiving the English language and civics requirements for disabled applicants who would otherwise be denied naturalization, Congress must also have intended to waive the oath of allegiance for those disabled applicants who could not satisfy that requirement.

[1] The only category of naturalization applicants that Congress exempted from the oath requirement are children who are applying for derivative citizenship pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1433 (1994) and who, in the opinion of the Attorney General, are "unable to understand [the oath's] meaning." 8 U.S.C. § 1448(a).

We agree with the conclusion reached in your memorandum that this argument is unpersuasive. . . . To begin with, as you have also noted, not all disabled applicants who would benefit from a waiver of the English language and civics requirements would also need a waiver of the oath requirement in order to become U.S. citizens. The fact that Congress chose to waive one statutory requirement for a certain subset of naturalization applicants in no way compels the conclusion that Congress thereby implicitly intended to waive another statutory requirement for a larger subset of applicants. On the contrary, both the language and legislative history of section 312(b) indicate that Congress intended only to waive the English language and civics requirements. See 8 U.S.C. § 1423(b)(1) (waiver applies only to § 1423(a), language and civics requirements); 140 Cong. Rec. 29,220 (1994) (Rep. Mineta's statement that individuals obtaining waiver under section 312(b)(2) would benefit immigrants "who are eager to declare their loyalty to this, their adopted country, by taking the oath of citizenship").

Indeed, it can be argued that Congress's failure to provide an explicit waiver of the oath requirement supports the view that Congress considered the oath of allegiance a critical, indispensable element of the naturalization process. To be sure, Congress recognized that there might be naturalization applicants who, because of serious illness, permanent or developmental disability, advanced age, or other exigent circumstances, would be unable to take the oath of allegiance in a public ceremony as required by section 337(a). In 1990, Congress accommodated the needs of such applicants through the establishment of an alternative, expedited procedure for administration of the oath. See 8 U.S.C. § 1448(c). Notably, however, Congress chose not to excuse them from the oath requirement altogether, thereby reaffirming the centrality of the oath to the naturalization process.

b. No statutory authority for satisfaction of oath of allegiance requirement by guardian or legal proxy

The INS subsequently requested OLC's advice whether section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act, 29 U.S.C. § 794, required some sort of accommodation for persons unable to form the mental intent necessary to take the naturalization oath of allegiance, and, specifically, whether the oath requirement might be fulfilled by a guardian or other legal proxy. In a memorandum opinion dated April 18, 1997, OLC advised that because the oath requirement was "essential" to naturalization, Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act did not require accommodation for persons unable to form the mental intent necessary to take the naturalization oath of allegiance, and that the oath requirement could not be fulfilled by a guardian or other legal proxy.

The full text of the opinion, excerpted below (footnotes omitted) is available at www.usdoj.gov/olc/oathrnd22.htm. As noted above, the statute was amended in 2000. See Digest 2003, at 4–5.

Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act prohibits discrimination against any "otherwise qualified individual with a disability . . . solely by reason of her or his disability" in "any program or activity conducted by any Executive agency." 29 U.S.C. § 794(a). This Office has previously advised that all INS activities and programs constitute "program[s] or activit[ies] conducted by an Executive agency," see Memorandum for Maurice C. Inman, Jr., General Counsel, Immigration and Naturalization Service, from Robert B. Shanks, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, Re: Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 (Feb. 2, 1983). The INS must therefore comply with the requirements of section 504 in the implementation and operation of its naturalization program.

The critical question presented by your memorandum is whether an individual who cannot personally satisfy the oath requirement for naturalization because he or she lacks the ability to form the mental intent sufficient to take an oath can be considered "otherwise qualified" for naturalization; if so, section 504 would require the INS to provide for the naturalization of that individual.

Case law makes clear that, where a program requirement is found to be essential to the program, section 504 does not mandate an accommodation that would alter or eliminate that requirement. . . . The accommodation you have suggested—that a guardian or other legal proxy satisfy the oath requirement of section 337 on behalf of an individual who cannot form the requisite mental intent—would thus be considered "reasonable" under section 504 only if personal satisfaction of the oath requirement is not essential to naturalization.

An analysis of the statutory scheme that Congress has established for naturalization, and the function of the oath of allegiance within that process, convinces us that personal satisfaction of the oath requirement is essential to naturalization. At its core, naturalization concerns the establishment of a relationship between the individual and the state. See generally T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Citizens, Aliens, Membership and the Constitution, 7 Const. Commentary 9 (1990). In defining the prerequisites for this relationship, Congress always has required some form of an oath of allegiance. See, e.g., Act of March 26, 1790, 1 Stat. 103; see also Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, 4 Immigration Law and Procedure § 96.05[1] (1996) ("Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr"). The naturalization oath set forth in the INA simultaneously affirms an individual's intent to become a U.S. citizen and to renounce "all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state or sovereignty," 8 U.S.C. § 1448(a), as well as his or her willingness to assume all the duties of citizenship required by the United States. By including this oath requirement and mandating strict compliance therewith, see 8 U.S.C. § 1421(d) (1994) ("A person may only be naturalized as a citizen of the United States in the manner and under the conditions prescribed in this subchapter and not otherwise."), Congress has made individual volition, as manifested through the oath of allegiance, fundamental to naturalization. See Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr § 91.02[1] (in contrast to citizenship at birth, which is acquired automatically, naturalization involves individual volition).

That Congress considers the oath requirement central to the naturalization process is underscored by the fact that Congress has crafted various statutory accommodations of the oath requirement for persons with disabilities, but has stopped short of exempting such persons from the oath requirement altogether. See 8 U.S.C. § 1448(c) (providing for expedited judicial oath administration ceremony for persons with "developmental disability"); 8 U.S.C. § 1445(e) (1994) (Attorney General may provide for administration of oath of allegiance other than in public ceremony if person has disability that "is of a permanent nature and is sufficiently serious to prevent the person's personal appearance" or "is of a nature which so incapacitates the person as to prevent him from personally appearing").

We therefore find that, under the existing statutory scheme established by Congress, personal satisfaction of the oath requirement by each individual applicant is "essential" to naturalization and that permitting a legal guardian to fulfill that requirement on behalf of an individual whose disability precludes formation of the mental intent necessary to take the oath would not be a reasonable accommodation under section 504.

3. Loss of U.S. Citizenship

a. Expatriating acts

(1) Dual national serving as Prime Minister of a foreign country

In a letter dated July 1, 1993, excerpted below, Edward A. Betancourt, Chief, East Asian and Pacific Division, Office of Citizens Consular Services, responded to an inquiry about various aspects of dual nationality, including the question whether service as Prime Minister of a foreign country would either (1) automatically revoke the naturalization of a foreign-born person not entitled to U.S. citizenship at birth, or (2) make such a person vulnerable to "elective denaturalization."

The full text of the letter is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

At the outset, it should be noted that the various provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act governing loss of U.S. citizenship apply to all U.S. citizens equally, regardless of whether the individual acquired U.S. citizenship at birth or acquired it subsequently by virtue of naturalization in this country. The Supreme Court has stated that there cannot be two classes of U.S. citizens based upon how that citizenship was attained, Schneider v. Rusk, 377 U.S. 163 (1964).

Section 349(a)(4) of the Immigration and Nationality Act pertains to potential loss of nationality as a consequence of acceptance of high political office in foreign governments. That subsection provides that a person who is a national of the United States risks loss of U.S. citizenship if he/she accepts employment with a foreign government and either (1) has the nationality of that foreign state or (2) the employment requires an oath or declaration of allegiance. However, even assuming that the hypothetical actions you propose are encompassed by Section 349(a)(4), the individual's intent toward retaining U.S. citizenship is still relevant. Thus, in addition to committing one of the acts defined in INA 349(a)(4) as potentially expatriating, loss of U.S. citizenship cannot occur unless and until it is determined that the individual acted voluntarily and intended to relinquish his/her citizenship.

The intent to relinquish citizenship was the focus of Kahane v. Shultz, 653 F.Supp. 1486 (E.D.N.Y. 1987). The Kahane court held that a declaration of intent to retain citizenship, even when made simultaneously with the commission of an act made potentially expatriating by statute, is sufficient to preserve the actor's U.S. citizenship. Id. at 1493. Once acquired, citizenship cannot be diluted or canceled at the will of the Federal Government or any governmental unit. Afroyim v. Rusk, 387 U.S. 253, 262 (1967).

It has not been established that the act of serving as Prime Minister of a foreign country is necessarily inconsistent with American citizenship and would automatically deprive the actor of U.S. citizenship. It is worth noting that every citizenship case is judged solely on its merits. However, it is only on a case-by-case basis that the Department could determine whether committing any expatriating act detailed in INA 349(a)(4) would be sufficient to deprive the actor of U.S. citizenship.

(2) Service in Japanese army during World War II; relevance of awareness of citizenship

In a telegram dated July 3, 1991, the Department responded to a request for an advisory opinion from a consular officer at the U.S. Consulate in Fukuoka, Japan in the case of a Japanese-American dual national who served in the medical corps of the Japanese Army during World War II, thereby committing a potentially expatriating act under § 349(a)(3) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1481(a)(3). The dual national claimed that his service in the Japanese Army was not voluntary and was not performed with the intention of relinquishing U.S. nationality. Moreover, he claimed, he was not aware of his claim to U.S. citizenship until he was interviewed at the consulate in connection with a visa application. The Department concurred in the consular officer's opinion that a finding of non-loss of U.S. nationality should be made.

The full text of the Department's telegram is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

4. Awareness of U.S. citizenship status/choice of allegiance

One issue . . . central to the development of this case concerns subject's knowledge of his U.S. citizenship status at the time he entered into foreign military service against the United States in time of war. . . .

It is not unusual in a culture such as Japan in the 1930s and 1940s for an individual to assume that citizenship could not be acquired merely by virtue of jus soli. Japanese citizenship is acquired by jus sanguinis, and until fairly recently only through the father. Dept. does not find it odd that [subject] claims that he was not aware of his possible claim to U.S. citizenship until he visited the American Consulate General in Fukuoka in 1985. Such an assumption on his part is fairly reasonable. [Subject] left the United States in the company of his parents at the age of nine and has lived in Japan ever since. He has never been back to the United States. He states that he has always known that he was born in Hawaii, but was not aware that he acquired U.S. citizenship. . . .

5. Voluntariness

With regard to [subject's] claim of involuntariness the Department cites the statutory presumption of section 349(c) which creates a rebuttable presumption that the potentially expatriating act was performed voluntarily. As evidence of the involuntariness of his actions, the subject alleges that inasmuch as he was conscripted into service, his military service was not voluntary. As Post is aware, the Department does not consider that a person who was conscripted (as opposed to one who enlisted in the military) must be held as a matter of law to have served involuntarily. One can enter the military by means of conscription but nonetheless have been willing, even eager, to serve in the military. On the other hand, one who has been conscripted is in a far better position to assert that such service was involuntary. . . . In [subject's] case, the question of voluntariness is colored by the fact that he was promoted four times leaving service with the rank of sergeant. [Subject] claims that this was not so much the result of working hard or enthusiasm for the work, but a way of avoiding corporal punishment which he describes as a routine practice without just cause.

6. Intent

[Subject] claims that he did not serve in the Japanese military with the intention of relinquishing U.S. nationality. Service against the United States in a time of war suggests that the subject's true allegiance was to Japan, not to the United States. This is further substantiated by the fact that [subject] was promoted four times during his military service. However, at issue is whether [subject] could intend to relinquish something which he claims he did not know he possessed, i.e., U.S. citizenship. . . .

7. Advisory opinion

[Subject] was conscripted and appears to have spent most of his military career in the medical corps. He was promoted four times during his period of service and was discharged with the rank of sergeant. He served in Northern China and French Indochina. Dept. views the effort and conduct involved and generally required to obtain regular promotions as inconsistent with the concept of involuntary service. Dept. cannot concur with Post's conclusion that [subject's] services in the Japanese Army were involuntary or against his will. . . .

. . . [Subject's] account of his experiences as a child returning to Japan with his parents, his conscription, early training, treatment by superior officers, specific services performed during the war, and the experiences of his regiment on the march from Northern China to French Indochina are highly persuasive of his intent, not to relinquish U.S. citizenship, but merely to survive the war. Given [subject's] lack of specific knowledge of his U.S. citizenship status (he was never issued a U.S. passport), his military service while satisfactory from the perspective of his superiors, does not reflect an intention to relinquish U.S. nationality. Dept. does not believe it can sustain the burden of proof that subject committed the potentially expatriating act with the intention of relinquishing U.S. nationality. . . .

b. Renunciation

(1) Renunciation valid when done to serve in foreign legislature

In an unreported decision dated June 27, 1991, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia found that Rabbi Meir Kahane had voluntarily renounced his U.S. citizenship in order to be eligible to run in an Israeli Knesset election in 1988, and that he could not revoke the renunciation based on a claim that his renunciation was coerced by an Israeli law requiring that Knesset members only be citizens of Israel. Kahane v. Baker, Civil Action No. 88–3093-AER, June 27, 1991 opinion by Chief Judge Aubrey E. Robinson, Jr.

See I Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 545–51 for a discussion of Kahane's renunciation and ensuing litigation.

(2) Severe economic coercion and personal duress

A February 9, 1993, letter from Carmen A. DiPlacido, Director of the Department of State's Office of Citizens Consular Services, overturned prior determinations by the U.S. Department of State that six individuals who were members of the Hebrew Israelite Community, a group whose members believe in the return of Jews to the Holy Land, had lost their U.S. citizenship by making formal renunciations of nationality under § 349(a)(5) of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1481(a)(5)). The individuals went to Israel in the 1970s, mistakenly believing they would be granted Israeli citizenship under Israel's Law of Return, which allows Jews anywhere in the world to go to Israel and be eligible for Israeli citizenship. Israel, however, did not grant them Israeli citizenship or work permits. As undocumented aliens living in Israel they were subject to deportation unless they were stateless. On various dates, they all renounced their U.S. citizenship before a consular officer at the U.S. Department of State, thus becoming stateless. They were issued Certificates of Loss of Nationality.

Subsequently, the individuals asked that the loss of nationality determinations be overturned on the grounds they had not clearly understood the consequences of renunciation and had acted under economic, political and social duress —the threat of deportation from Israel and separation from their families living there—when they renounced their citizenship.

Mr. DiPlacido noted in his letter that loss of citizenship cases are difficult to overturn "unless it can be shown that at the time of the act there were seriously mitigating circumstances unknown to the Department or our consular officials which could have altered our decision to approve the renunciation and issue the Certificate of Loss of Nationality." Looking at the facts regarding the individuals in question, he concluded that there was a sufficient basis to conclude that their renunciations were not voluntary. The Department of State accordingly vacated the individuals' Certificates of Loss of Nationality and advised the Embassy in Tel Aviv to treat the six individuals as U.S. citizens. See 70 Interpreter Releases 290–91 (1993).

(3) Renunciation required as prerequisite for Mexican citizenship

In the early 1990s, Mexican officials began to require evidence of formal renunciation of U.S. nationality from U.S.-Mexican nationals before according them benefits available to Mexican nationals. At the time, the Mexican constitution denied Mexican citizenship to persons who possessed the nationality of other countries. A November 16, 1993, telegram from the Department of State, excerpted below, recognized that individuals who decided to renounce their U.S. citizenship to claim the benefits of Mexican citizenship faced a difficult decision, but concluded that the hardships they might otherwise face did not in and of itself invalidate the "voluntariness" of their decisions.

5. . . . The USG cannot administer its laws in a manner which relieves individuals of the consequences of compliance with local law . . . [T]he [Government of Mexico] reserves the right to require formal renunciation as a prerequisite for Mexican citizenship. However disagreeable, this is the [Government of Mexico's] prerogative and it must be respected. The fact that dual nationals may regard themselves as "compelled" by Mexican law to formally renounce American citizenship does not, in and of itself, render their actions involuntary.

A DIFFICULT CHOICE, BUT A CHOICE NONETHELESS

6. A dual national faced with the dilemma of abandoning United States citizenship or suffering alleged hardship as a result of being barred from Mexican nationality admittedly is in a most difficult position. While she may have a choice, albeit a hard choice, she nevertheless is free to choose. She may stand to lose no matter what choice she makes. Her distress does not invalidate her choice however. The fact that renunciation may be motivated by a desire to avoid hardship does not negate intent to renounce, even if the renunciant does not wish the result. Also the fact that a renunciant might feel obliged by her circumstances to take an action she otherwise would not take does not render the action involuntary as a matter of law. See Jolley v. INS, 441 F.2d 1245 (5th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 946 (1971).

RENUNCIANTS SHOULD BE COUNSELLED

7. Persons choosing to renounce U.S. citizenship must be counseled concerning the finality and irrevocability of formal renunciation. In general, posts should not adminsiter formal oaths of renunciation to persons expressing equivocal intent or intent not to voluntarily relinquish citizenship. The choice to renounce, however, ultimately is that of the applicant. Also . . . the execution of the oath of renunciation and the determination of the loss of citizenship are separate. Department will determine whether an oath is effective to grant the prospective renunciant loss of citizenship.

* * * *

CONCLUSION

9. Department realizes that dual nationality hardship cases are among the most difficult of loss cases. Individuals are often faced with hard choices but, to reiterate, if one has a choice to make, one is not under duress. It is important to note that the Department will examine each case separately on its merits. We cannot concede, however, that because an individual wants to remain a dual national, the individual is renouncing involuntarily. The indivdual's choice is to avoid renunciation if he or she wants to remain a U.S. citizen.

c. Denaturalization for participation in Nazi persecution

During the 1990s, the Office of Special Investigations ("OSI") of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice denaturalized and deported naturalized U.S. citizens who had participated or assisted in Nazi persecution. (For a description of OSI and a summary of Nazi persecution denaturalization cases in the 1980s, see I Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 526–41). See, e.g., Hammer v. INS, 195 F.3d 836 (6th Cir. 1999) (individual denaturalized for serving as armed guard at Auschwitz and Sachsenhausen concentration camps and on prisoner rail transports between concentration camps was deportable and was collaterally estopped from relitigating factual issues covered in the denaturalization proceeding), cert denied, 528 U.S. 1191 (2000); United States v. Ciurinskas, 148 F.3d 729 (7th Cir. 1998) (service in the Schutzmannschaft, a Lithuanian military unit that assisted the Nazis in killing thousands of Lithuanian civilians, primarily Jews, was sufficient to constitute assistance in persecution and justify revocation of citizenship); United States v. Stelmokas, 100 F.3d 302 (3d Cir. 1996) (naturalized citizen who voluntarily served as platoon commander in the Schutmannschaft and who misrepresented his World War II employment status, was subject to repatriation); United States v. Koreh, 59 F.3d 431 (3d Cir. 1995) (for purposes of denaturalization, editor of a Hungarian newspaper that published anti-Semitic articles assisted in persecution by fostering a climate of anti-Semitism); Kalejs v. INS, 10 F.3d 441 (7th Cir. 1993) (company commander in a Latvian pro-German force, the Arajs Kommando, was deportable because he participated in persecution and made fraudulent statements on his immigration documents); Kairys v. INS, 981 F.2d 937 (7th Cir. 1992) (prison guard at the Treblinka work camp was deportable whether or not he committed specific atrocities and collateral estoppel barred him from relitigating facts litigated in his denaturalization proceedings); Petkiewytsch v. INS, 945 F.2d 871 (6th Cir. 1991) (individual who served involuntarily as a concentration camp guard and never abused prisoners was not deportable); United States v. Schmidt, 923 F.2d 1253 (7th Cir. 1991) (perimeter guard at the second largest Nazi concentration camp participated in persecution even if he did not personally participate in atrocities and revocation of his naturalization was justified); United States v. Milius, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23172 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 17, 1998) (naturalized citizen who concealed service in the Vilnius Lithuanian Security Policy, or Saugumas, which assisted the Nazis in persecution of the Jews and ethnic Poles, was subject to denaturalization); United States v. Lileikis, 929 F. Supp. 31 (D. Mass. 1996) (naturalized citizen who entered under Displaced Persons Act and had been chief of Saugamas was subject to denaturalization); United States v. Lindert, 907 F. Supp. 1114 (N.D. Ohio 1995) (perimeter guard who entered under Refugee Relief Act and did not make false statements or file false information could not have citizenship revoked); United States v. Hutyrczyk, 803 F. Supp. 1001 (D.N.J. 1992) (perimeter guard at forced labor camp who entered under Displaced Persons Act was subject to denaturalization for assisting in persecution). Their efforts were assisted in some cases by the new availability of documents from archives of the former Soviet Union.

Most of the denaturalization cases involved persons who entered under the Displaced Persons Act of 1948 ("the DPA"), Pub. L. No. 80–774, ch. 647, 62 Stat. 1009 (1948), as amended by Pub. L. No. 81–555 ch. 262, 64 Stat. 219 (1950). The Third Circuit in Koreh, supra, laid out the legal standards applicable in such cases (footnotes omitted):

We have previously noted the "two competing concerns" at issue in denaturalization cases, United States v. Breyer, 41 F.3d 884, 889 (3d Cir. 1994), which have an impact on our review. As acknowledged by the Supreme Court, "the right to acquire American citizenship is a precious one, and . . . once citizenship has been acquired, its loss can have severe and unsettling consequences." Fedorenko v. United States, 449 U.S. 490, 505, 66 L. Ed. 2d 686, 101 S. Ct. 737 (1981). Thus, the government "carries a heavy burden of proof in a proceeding to divest a naturalized citizen of his citizenship." Costello v. United States, 365 U.S. 265, 269, 5 L. Ed. 2d 551, 81 S. Ct. 534 (1961). At the same time, however, courts require "strict compliance with all the congressionally imposed prerequisites to the acquisition of citizenship." Fedorenko, 449 U.S. at 506. These two factors combine to "reflect our consistent recognition of the importance of the issues at stake—for the citizen as well as the Government—in a denaturalization proceeding." Id. at 507.

* * * *

Under Section 340(a) of the Immigration & Nationality Act of 1952, as amended, the government may seek the revocation of an order admitting a person to citizenship and the cancellation of that person's certificate of naturalization if such order and certificate "were illegally procured." 8 U.S.C § 1451(a). In order to legally obtain a naturalization order and certificate, an applicant must have resided in the United States for at least five years after having been "lawfully admitted for permanent residence." See 8 U.S.C. §§ 1427(a)(1), 1429. Lawful admission requires entry pursuant to a valid immigrant visa. See Fedorenko, 449 U.S. at 515; Breyer, 41 F.3d at 889; United States v. Kowalchuk, 773 F.2d 488, 493 (3d Cir. 1985) (in banc), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1012, 89 L. Ed. 2d 303, 106 S. Ct. 1188 (1986).

. . . Koreh entered the United States under a visa issued pursuant to the DPA. At the time of Koreh's application, a DPA visa was available only to persons of concern to the International Refugee Organization (IRO). DPA § 2(b), 62 Stat. at 1009. The IRO

Constitution provided that persons "who can be shown to have assisted the enemy in persecuting civil populations of countries" are not persons "of concern" to the IRO. See Constitution of the International Refugee Organization, opened for signature Dec. 15, 1946, 62 Stat. 3037, 3051–52, T.I.A.S. No. 1846.

In addition, section 13 of the DPA provided, in part:

> No visas shall be issued under the provisions of this Act . . . to any person who is or has been a member of or participant in any movement hostile to the United States or the form of government of the United States, or to any person who advocated or assisted in the persecution of any person because of race, religion, or natural origin.

DPA § 13, 64 Stat. at 227 (emphasis added). . . .

. . . . In Fedorenko, the Supreme Court addressed the meaning of the term "assistance in persecution" with respect to the validity of a visa obtained under the DPA. The Court held that an individual's service as a concentration camp guard constituted "assistance in persecution" even if that service was involuntary. Id. at 512–13 n.34. The Court recognized that "other cases may present more difficult line-drawing problems," and suggested that the proper focus is "on whether particular conduct can be considered assisting in the persecution of civilians." Id. (emphasis in original). It continued:

> Thus, an individual who did no more than cut the hair of female inmates before they were executed cannot be found to have assisted in the persecution of civilians. On the other hand, there can be no question that a guard who was issued a uniform and armed with a rifle and a pistol, who was paid a stipend and was regularly allowed to leave the concentration camp to visit a nearby village, and who admitted to shooting at escaping inmates on orders from the commandant of the camp, fits within the statutory language about persons who assisted in the persecution of civilians.

Id.

We have read Fedorenko as describing a "continuum of conduct to guide the courts in deciding" how to apply the term "assistance in persecution." Breyer, 41 F.3d at 890. Thus, the term is to be applied on a case-by-case basis with reference to the relevant facts presented in each case.

* * * *

The deportation cases involved application of the "Holtzman Amendment," Pub. L. No. 95–549, 92 Stat. 2065 (1978), which amended the INA to make inadmissible and deportable aliens who ordered, incited, assisted or otherwise participated in Nazi persecution before and during World War II. (For a more detailed description of the Holtzman Amendment, see 1 Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 526–27; Digest 1978 at 263–70). In Hammer, supra, the Sixth Circuit explained the legal standards applicable to deportation under the Holtzman Amendment as follows:

---

The Holtzman Amendment provides as follows:

> Any alien who, during the period beginning on March 23, 1933, and ending on May 8, 1945, under the direction of, or in association with—
> (I) the Nazi government of Germany,
>
> (II) any government in any area occupied by the military forces of the Nazi government of Germany,
>
> (III) any government established with the assistance or cooperation of the Nazi government of Germany, or
>
> (IV) any government which was an ally of the Nazi government of Germany,
> ordered, incited, assisted, or otherwise participated in the persecution of any person because of race, religion, national origin, or political opinion is inadmissible.

8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(E).

Hammer argues that the government failed to meet its burden of proving that he "ordered, incited, assisted, or otherwise participated in . . . persecution" because it did not present "specific evidence of persecution by the Petitioner against the prisoners or that, as a guard, he engaged in acts of brutality against them." The government, however, need not present evidence of personal involvement in specific atrocities under the Holtzman Amendment. As the Seventh Circuit has observed:

> Because the statute authorizes deportation of anyone who "assisted" in persecution, personal involvement in atrocities need not be proven. An individual who served as a guard has assisted in persecution for purposes of [the Holtzman Amendment]. . . . Nazi concentration camps were places of persecution; individuals who, armed with guns, held the prisoners captive and prodded them into forced labor with threats of death or capital punishment cannot deny that they aided the Nazis in their program of racial, political and religious oppression.

Kulle v. INS, 825 F.2d 1188, 1192 (7th Cir. 1987) (. . . brackets in original). See also Kairys v. INS, 981 F.2d 937, 942–43 (7th Cir. 1992) (holding that an alien's service as an armed SS guard at a labor camp attached to the Treblinka concentration camp rendered the alien deportable under the Holtzman Amendment for having "assisted" in Nazi persecution "whether or not he committed a specific atrocity by beating a Jewish inmate to death or otherwise mistreating him beyond what is implicit in serving as a guard at such a camp . . ."). As Judge Posner explained in Kairys:

> If the operation of such a camp were treated as an ordinary criminal conspiracy, the armed guards, like the lookouts for a gang of robbers, would be deemed coconspirators, or if not, certainly aiders and abettors of the conspiracy; and no more should be required to satisfy the noncriminal provision of the Holtzman Amendment that makes assisting in persecution a ground for deportation.

Id. at 943.

We find the reasoning in both Kulle and Kairys to be persuasive. The facts presented by the government show that Hammer served as an armed SS guard at Auschwitz and Sachsenhausen, and on prisoner rail transports. As a guard, Hammer had standing orders to shoot anyone who attempted to escape. Although Hammer correctly observes that the government produced no evidence that Hammer actually shot anyone or forced any prisoner into a gas chamber, no court has required such a showing. Over one million people were murdered based solely on their religion or ethnicity at the concentration camps where Hammer stood guard. Hammer's interpretation of the Holtzman Amendment would read the words "assisted, or otherwise participated" out of the statute. We conclude that the requirements of the Holtzman Amendment may be satisfied even in the absence of eyewitness testimony that the alien personally engaged in acts of brutality.

We also note that in Petkiewytsch v. INS, 945 F.2d 871 (6th Cir. 1991), a case involving a civilian forced laborer who had served under duress as a labor education camp guard, this court suggested that the Holtzman Amendment might require something more than "assistance," even though the word "assisted" appears directly in the statute. See id. at 880 (stating that the Holtzman Amendment "appears to require active participation in persecution going beyond 'assistance.' "). Hammer does not place great reliance on Petkiewytsch, and for good reason. The BIA found that he served willingly as an armed SS concentration camp guard. This is materially different than a prisoner serving under duress as a civilian guard at a labor education camp. Hammer, in fact, never claimed in the proceedings below that he served involuntarily as a concentration camp guard. Furthermore, the BIA found that the SS had no legal authority to conscript an ethnic German in Croatia, and even the unauthenticated document relied upon by Hammer refers only to the induction, and not conscription, of ethnic Germans.

Petkiewytsch thus appears to stand for the proposition that some forms of "assistance" to the Nazi regime (such as membership, without more, in an organization which cooperated with the Nazis) may be too attenuated to be considered "under the direction of, or in association with" the Nazi government, and thus insufficient to trigger deportation under the Holtzman Amendment. We do not believe that Petkiewytsch compels the conclusion that "assistance" to the Nazi regime can never be sufficient for deportation under the Holtzman Amendment, because such an interpretation would be squarely at odds with the text of the statute. In any event, even if Hammer did not "assist[]" in persecution, he certainly "otherwise participated" in it. Indeed, in Petkiewytsch, this court took pains to distinguish labor education camps and those required to serve involuntarily as civilian guards at such camps from "extermination camps such as Auschwitz," Petkiewytsch, 945 F.2d at 873–74 (emphasis added), and the SS guards who controlled them.

4. Employment by the United States Government of Persons with More Than One Nationality

a. Employment of noncitizen dual nationals; effective, dominant nationality in cases concerning allied countries

For a number of years, the annual Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations Act has contained a provision prohibiting, with various exceptions, the use of appropriated funds to employ noncitizens whose post of duty is in the continental United States. One exception has been for "nationals of those countries allied with the United States in the current defense effort." In 1997 the Assistant Director of the Office of Attorney Management at the Department of Justice sought an opinion from the Office of Legal Counsel ("OLC") at the Department of Justice on the question whether employment of a noncitizen law student who was a dual national of Canada and Bangladesh as a summer intern would be permissible under this provision, which was then in § 606 of the Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations Act, 1997, Pub. L. No. 104–208, 110 Stat. 3009–314, 354 (1996). Canada was on the State Department's list of countries allied with the United States in the current defense effort, Bangladesh was not. OLC, finding that the language of the statute did not decide the question presented, concluded that the statute was best read by applying the concept of "effective, dominant nationality," a concept that derived from international law and that had been used by the federal courts to resolve disputes under domestic law that involved dual nationals.

The opinion is excerpted below. Most footnotes have been deleted. The full text of the opinion, Memorandum Opinion for the Assistant Director Office of Attorney Personnel Management, U.S. Department of Justice, Re: Eligibility of a Noncitizen Dual National for a Paid Position Within the Department of Justice, may be found at www.usdoj.gov/olc/dual.bd.htm.

We think that the statute is best read, and the policies behind it most satisfyingly accommodated, by applying the concept of "effective, dominant nationality." That concept, which derives from international law,[3] has also been invoked by the federal courts to resolve disputes under domestic law that involve dual nationals. For example, the court in Sadat v. Mertes, 615 F.2d 1176 (7th Cir. 1980), made use of the concept in analyzing whether the "alienage jurisdiction" statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(2), which vests the district courts with jurisdiction over civil actions between citizens of states of the United States and citizens of foreign States gave rise to jurisdiction in a case involving a naturalized citizen who was also an Egyptian national under that country's laws. The court explained the concept as follows:

[3] See Nottebohm (Liechtenstein v. Guatemala), 1955 I.C.J. 4, 22 (Apr. 6) ("International arbitrators . . . have given their preference to the real and effective nationality, that which accorded with the facts, that based on stronger factual ties between the person concerned and one of the States whose nationality is involved. . . . Similarly, the courts of third States, when they have before them an individual whom two other States hold to be their national, seek to resolve the conflict by having recourse to international criteria and their prevailing tendency is to prefer the real and effective nationality."). . . .

> Under international law, a country is responsible for official conduct harming aliens, for example, the expropriation of property without compensation. It is often said, however, that a state is not responsible for conduct which would otherwise be regarded as wrongful if the injured person, although a citizen of a foreign state, is also a national of the state taking the questioned action. . . .

Despite the general rule of nonresponsibility under international law for conduct affecting dual nationals, there are recognized exceptions. One is the concept of effective or dominant nationality. . . . [T]his exception provides that a country (respondent state) will be responsible for wrongful conduct against one of its citizens whose dominant nationality is that of a foreign state, that is,

> (i) his dominant nationality, by reason of residence or other association subject to his control . . . is that of the other state and has taken all reasonably practicable steps to avoid or terminate his status as a national of the respondent state.

Restatement (Second) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 171(c) (1965).

615 F.2d at 1187 (citation omitted).

These tests should be used to determine the dominant, effective nationality of the applicant in question. The primary question to be asked is what nationality is indicated by the applicant's residence or other voluntary associations. A second question is whether the applicant has manifested an intention to be a national of one of the two States, while also seeking to avoid or terminate nationality in the other. Of these two questions, the former will ordinarily be the more important. In Sadat itself, it was the plaintiff's voluntary associations with the United States that led the court to find that his dominant nationality was American: he had not sought to terminate or avoid his Egyptian nationality, and had in fact maintained significant contacts with that country. Consequently, we believe that a dual national can be found to have a dominant, effective nationality of one country, even if he or she takes no affirmative steps to terminate or avoid the nationality of the other—indeed, even if he or she makes a conscious decision to retain the latter nationality.

We believe that the procedure we have outlined serves the various, and sometimes conflicting, goals of section 606. In particular, it will enable the United States to demonstrate its good will toward allied States and its confidence in their nationals, without compromising national security. Moreover, the results of following the procedure should be both fair to individual applicants and satisfactory to federal employers. Because "municipal law determines how citizenship may be acquired," Perkins v. Elg, 307 U.S. 325, 329 (1939), an applicant may be deemed a national of a particular country under its domestic law, even if he or she has no significant voluntary ties whatever to that country. It would be unfair to deny the possibility of federal employment to that applicant merely because of such an incidental nonvoluntary status, if the country in question happened to be nonallied. Equally, it would be unreasonable to treat such an applicant as eligible for federal employment merely because the country happened to be allied, when the applicant's actions and choices demonstrated a conscious commitment to the nationality of another, nonallied State.

b. Employment of U.S. citizen dual national

In 1999 the Director of the Office of Attorney Personnel Management at the Department of Justice sought an opinion from OLC as to whether the statutory provision discussed in 2.a., supra, barred the Department from employing a U.S. citizen with dual nationality. OLC concluded in an opinion excerpted below that § 606 did "not create any burdens on the employability of dual U.S. citizens by the Department of Justice that [did] not exist for sole U.S. citizens" and that it was not necessary to inquire about "effective dominant nationality" for purposes of establishing a dual U.S. citizen's eligibility for employment under that provision. OLC indicated that "second class" U.S. citizenship is disfavored and Congress had not clearly legislated a distinction for purposes of § 606. (Footnotes have been omitted.)

The full text of the opinion, Memorandum Opinion for the Director, Office of Attorney Personnel Management, U.S. Department of Justice, from Beth Nolan, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, Re: Eligibility of a Dual United States Citizen for a Paid Position with the Department of Justice, is available at www.usdoj.gov/olc/dualcitizen.htm.

* * * *

In a 1996 memorandum to your office to your office, we addressed the closely related issue of the eligibility for employment of dual nationals who are not citizens of the United States, but who enjoy, as an incident of one of their nationalities, status in an excepted category ("noncitizen dual nationals"). [See 2.a. supra] . . .

* * * *

At the very least, in light of the 1996 Memorandum, the Department of Justice can hire dual U.S. citizens where their effective dominant nationality is with the United States. To conclude otherwise—that § 606 bars the hiring of all dual U.S. citizens—would produce the anomalous result of placing U.S. citizens in a worse position than noncitizens. That result would be particularly untenable here where neither the language nor the purposes of the statute support such a reading. The only question, then, is whether dual U.S. citizens are in a better position for purposes of this statute than the noncitizen dual nationals who were the focus of the 1996 Memorandum—in other words, whether the inquiry into "effective dominant nationality" is also necessary for purposes of considering the eligibility of dual U.S. citizens for employment.

The 1996 Memorandum read into the statute the concept of effective dominant nationality. It is not entirely clear that we could not have concluded, from the language and structure of § 606, that the second nationality of the applicant is irrelevant if the applicant possesses one nationality that places him or her in an excepted category. The statute does not define ineligibility for employment, except by providing that an eligible person must possess any of six separate characteristics, and the noncitizen dual national in question did possess one of those six characteristics. Nevertheless, we interpreted the statute to incorporate the inquiry into effective dominant nationality, and we do not need to revisit that opinion at this time.

There are strong arguments that the potential employees here, being citizens of the United States, are not subject to the test of effective dominant nationality. Generally, U.S. law evidences hostility towards the notion of inferior classes of American citizenship. Cf. Schneider v. Rusk, 388 U.S. 163, 168–89 (1964) (striking down statute providing for denaturalization of naturalized citizens who returned to their original nation to reside for three or more years, noting that it "creates indeed a second-class citizenship"). Furthermore, although U.S. policy disfavors dual citizenship, it recognizes that in many cases the status of dual U.S. citizenship may be a function of the laws of another country and is not necessarily a status that an individual may control. ("[Dual citizenship exists largely as a result of conflicts in nations' ideas of citizenship. Following the rule that each nation is permitted to determine who its citizens are, American law reluctantly recognizes the existence of dual citizenship in certain cases, even where the party has renounced allegiance to foreign powers.]") In fact, courts have repeatedly emphasized that:

> The United States recognizes that a person may properly be simultaneously a citizen of this country and of another. Neither status in itself or in its necessary implications is deemed inconsistent with the other. ". . . The concept of dual citizenship recognizes that a person may have and > exercise rights of nationality in two countries and be subject to the responsibilities of both. The mere fact that he asserts the rights of one citizenship does not without more mean that he renounces the other. . . . Dual citizenship . . . could not exist if the assertion of rights or the assumption of liabilities of one were deemed inconsistent with maintenance of the other."

Jalbuena v. Dulles, 254 F.2d 379, 381 (3d Cir. 1958) (exercise of routine privilege of Philippine citizenship, applying for Philippine passport and subscribing oath to support Philippine Constitution, cannot deprive dual U.S./Philippine citizen of U.S. citizenship) (quoting Kawakita v. United States, 343 U.S. 717, 723–25 (1952)).

Without deciding whether Congress could place restrictions on the employment opportunities of dual U.S. citizens by virtue of their dual citizenship status, we would look for a much clearer statement before inferring that Congress had intended to create such "second class" citizenship based solely on dual citizenship status. We do not read the language in this appropriations provision to reach that result. We conclude that § 606 does not create any burdens on the employability of dual U.S. citizens by the Department of Justice that do not exist for sole U.S. citizens. No inquiry regarding their "effective dominant nationality" is necessary for purposes of establishing the dual U.S. citizen's eligibility for employment under that provision. Section 606, in a fairly straightforward manner, carves out an exception for U.S. citizens to the general bar on employment. Because dual U.S. citizens are U.S. citizens, they fall into the excepted category.

At the same time, in particular cases, the nature of individual applicants' ties to the U.S. or the strength of their links to their U.S. citizenship may be relevant when considering them for employment with the Department of Justice, particularly when questions of security or loyalty may arise. The manner in which an individual applicant has held or exercised his or her dual citizenship status—or a variation on the "effective dominant nationality" test—may be most appropriately incorporated into the hiring process, for example, as one of the many factors to be considered in decisions to grant or withhold security clearances for employment.

B. PASSPORTS

1. Issuance and Cancellation of Passports Valid Only for Travel to Israel

a. Diplomatic and official passports

Section 129(e) of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act for Fiscal Years 1992 and 1993, Pub. L. No. 102–138, 105 Stat. 647, 662 (1991), and § 503 of the Departments of Commerce, Justice and State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1992, Pub. L. No. 102–140, 105 Stat. 782, 820 (1991), barred the Secretary of State from issuing more than one official or diplomatic passport to a U.S. government official "for the purpose of enabling that official to acquiesce in or comply with the policy of the majority of Arab League nations of rejecting passports of, or denying entrance visas to, persons whose passport or other documents reflect that" the official had visited Israel. The State Department believed that section 129(e) and section 503 unconstitutionally intruded on the President's authority to conduct diplomacy on behalf of the United States and sought the views and guidance of the Office of Legal Counsel at the Department of Justice on this issue, as well as on the issue of the constitutionality of the provisions as applied to non-executive branch officials, such as members of Congress and the federal judiciary, who often carry diplomatic passports, and Congressional staff, who frequently travel on official passports. Memorandum for Timothy E. Flanigan, Acting Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel from Jamison M. Selby, Deputy Legal Adviser, Department of State (January 3, 1992).

The Office of Legal Counsel agreed with the State Department's conclusion that the provisions were unconstitutional. Memorandum Opinion for the Counsel to the President, Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice, Re: Issues Raised by Provisions Directing Issuance of Official or Diplomatic Passports (January 17, 1992), 16 Op. O.L.C. 18 (1992).

Excerpts from the State Department memorandum set forth below explain the Arab boycott passport provisions, the options considered by the Department of State to comply with the legislative provisions, and the Department's conclusion that the provisions were unconstitutional. Footnotes have been omitted.

The full text of the memorandum is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Preliminarily, we note that the Department of State is sympathetic to the goals of this legislation; we strongly object to the policy of some Arab nations of denying admission to persons whose passports reflect travel to Israel. It has been a goal of this administration's diplomacy in the Middle East to persuade those nations to abandon that policy. Thus, there is no conflict between the legislative and executive branches concerning the underlying issue: both agree that a goal of U.S. foreign policy is to bring about the end of the Arab League passport policy. The conflict arises because 1) Congress has attempted to direct the precise means by which the President is to carry out this foreign policy; and 2) the means chosen by Congress would itself interfere with the conduct of diplomacy and perhaps prevent the accomplishment of the desired goal.

The provisions . . . are part of a comprehensive legislative plan that would require the executive branch vigorously to encourage the Arab League nations that maintain the passport and visa policy described in these provisions to reverse that policy, and would also prohibit U.S. Government acquiescence in that policy, "especially with respect to travel by officials of the United States." . . . In addition to the ban on issuing multiple diplomatic or official passports for the purpose of complying with the Arab League passport policy and the requirement that the Secretary promulgate regulations to ensure that U.S. government officials do not comply with that policy, the legislation also directs the Secretary to cease issuing passports designated for travel only to Israel . . .

The effect of these provisions . . . is that the Secretary may still issue multiple passports to enable private travellers to comply with the Arab League passport policy, so long as no passport is stamped "Israel only." The legislation permits no such flexibility with respect to U.S. government officials. Instead, it directs that, without exception, they may not "comply with, or acquiesce in" that policy. (The U.S. policy of issuing two passports to accommodate travel to the Middle East region is not, in our view, acquiescence to the restrictive policy of the Arab States, but rather a challenge to it, because the rules of the boycott forbid the use of second passports to evade the policy. However, the legislative history of the provision in question explicitly states that Congress considers the issuance of second passports as compliance with the Arab League policy. See H.R. Rep. 102–138, Conference Report Accompanying H.R. 1415, at 107.)

BACKGROUND

The Arab League boycott of Israel. The Arab League boycott of Israel is designed to prevent commerce between Arabs and Israel and to prevent firms that do business with Arabs from contributing to the economic development of Israel. . . .

* * * *

The Damascus-based Arab League Central Boycott Office (CBO), which is responsible for monitoring boycott enforcement throughout the Arab League, promulgated a uniform Boycott Law which all Arab League members have adopted with minor variations. The CBO also promulgates "General Principles" or regulations to guide and assist member states' implementation of the uniform law. One of these "general principles" requires member states to prohibit entry into their countries by foreign nationals with passports bearing Israeli visas or with a second passport designed to evade this restriction.

U.S. practice in response to the prohibition.

. . . Over the past few decades, the State Department has responded to accommodate the official and private travel needs of U.S. citizens by issuing second passports to permit them to have one travel document for travel to Israel, leaving a second general passport free of any evidence of travel there. The State Department issues second official or diplomatic passports not only to U.S. Executive branch employees, but also to members of Congress and their staff and members of the federal judiciary, whose travel to the Middle East may include both Israel and Arab League member states that enforce the travel boycott. This practice has been successful in keeping the Arab travel boycott from interfering with the conduct of U.S. diplomacy in the region and from raising bilateral tensions.

Past U.S. practice has been to restrict one of the two passports for travel only to Israel. . . .

Impact of the legislation on the Arab League boycott.

* * * *

Because the legislation permits issuance of a second regular passport for non-official travel, there is likely to be little, if any, impact from the statute's prohibition on the issuance of "Israel-only" passports for such travel. With respect to diplomatic or official passports, however, we believe that the effect of this legislation might well be the opposite of what Congress intends. Arab League states that might have been willing quietly and without publicity to modify their policy as part of an overall diplomatic process may feel compelled to stand up to what they perceive as threatening, coercive U.S. legislation. It is also very likely that U.S. implementation of this legislation would be viewed by the Arab League nations as giving a concession to Israel without exacting anything in return.

A recent State Department survey of the governments of the Arab League countries with which the U.S. currently has relations supports this prognosis. . . .

. . . U.S. officials travelling to the Middle East could be expected to face obstacles to their entry to many Arab League countries if their passports reflect travel to Israel. Even those countries that do not enforce the prohibition, or enforce it haphazardly, could change their stand at any time without notice. Quite apart from the question of entry, difficulties might also arise when an individual bearing evidence of prior or future travel to Israel is stopped at one of the many internal checkpoints in Lebanon and other Arab countries, and asked to produce a passport. At this juncture, evidence of travel to Israel might spark other, more serious, problems than denial of an entry visa. Thus, we believe that the inability to issue more than one official or diplomatic passport would, in some cases, interfere with the ability of United States officials to engage in diplomacy and could upset delicate and complex negotiations. In addition, in some cases, travelling with a diplomatic passport bearing evidence of travel to Israel would place our officials at personal risk.

Other options.

. . . [W]e examined a variety of possibilities for carrying out diplomatic functions without the issuance of more than one official or diplomatic passport and were unable to identify a satisfactory alternative in a significant number of cases that would be affected by this legislation.

* * * *

DISCUSSION

There appears to be very strong support for the proposition that the prohibition on the issuance of multiple diplomatic or official passports is unconstitutional because it impermissibly interferes with the President's authority to conduct diplomatic relations with foreign governments. "The President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations.". . . . This statement by John Marshall . . . summarizes the view—widely accepted from the founding of the Nation until the present—that the Constitution confers on the President a predominant, extensive power with respect to foreign affairs. Further, the President's authority is especially clear when, as is the case here, the challenged legislation would directly interfere with the President's ability to send his diplomats abroad to negotiate with foreign governments. . . .

A. The Constitution Vests In the President the Preeminent Authority to Conduct Diplomatic Relations

The source of the President's foreign affairs power is Article II of the Constitution which vests the executive power of the United States in the President and requires the chief executive to "preserve, protect and defend the Constitution." Article II, Section 1. The Constitution also designates the president as Commander in Chief of the armed forces, gives him the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties and appoint ambassadors and other consular officials, and the power to receive ambassadors from foreign countries. Article II, Sections 2 and 3. There is no dispute among the drafters of the Constitution, other early statements, the courts and scholars that these provisions give the President the preeminent role in conducting the nation's diplomacy.

* * * *

In modern times, Presidents have frequently asserted in signing statements that particular provisions of bills would be treated as non-binding because they impermissibly intruded on their constitutional foreign affairs power. For example, with respect to the very provisions at issue here, President Bush explained in his signing statement that the prohibition could interfere with his ability to conduct diplomacy and that he, therefore, was directing the Secretary of State to ensure that the provision does not interfere with his constitutional prerogatives and responsibilities. President Bush's Statement on Signing the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1992 and 1993, 27 Weekly Comp. Pres. Doc. 1527, 1529. In addition, President Bush previously stated that he would treat as a non-binding sense of the Congress a section of the 1990–1991 Foreign Relations Authorization Act that purported to prohibit use of certain appropriated funds for attendance at any meeting within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe unless the U.S. delegation contained members of a Congressionally controlled group. . . .

* * * *

B. The President's Power to Conduct Diplomacy Encompasses the Authority to Issue Multiple Diplomatic or Official Passports Where Necessary to Carry Out Diplomatic Relations.

The issuance of travel documents to enable U.S. officials to carry out diplomacy with foreign countries is part and parcel of the exclusively executive power to conduct diplomacy on behalf of the United States. . . . Article II's power to appoint ambassadors and other diplomatic officials includes the power to supervise them and to determine when, where, how and by whom the United States will conduct diplomatic relations abroad. . . .

The Executive accordingly has historically taken the position that the Senate cannot use its "advice and consent" function under Article II of the Constitution to restrict the President's exclusive authority in this area. See 7 Op. Of Atty. Gen. At 217 (Congress cannot constitutionally require the president to appoint or not appoint consular officials to a particular place); Meyers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 163–64 (1926) (Congress may not limit President's executive power of appointment by seeking to control removal of appointees from office).

The intent of this legislation is that either the Arab League drops its passport boycott, or the President may not send diplomats who travel to Israel to carry out diplomacy in Arab League nations. Based on prior experience and recent efforts to have the boycott repealed, we believe that at least in some instances the passport boycott will be enforced against U.S. officials. Therefore, the effect of the legislation would be to restrict the President's ability to determine where and by whom he will negotiate. . . .

C. If Congress Cannot Directly Prohibit the Issuance of Multiple Diplomatic Passports, It Cannot Do So Indirectly Through Its Appropriations Power.

* * * *

. . . While section 129 of the authorization act directly prohibits the issuance of multiple diplomatic or official passports for the purpose of complying with the Arab League boycott, section 503, the analogous provision in the appropriations act, prohibits the use of appropriated funds for this purpose. . . .

While Congress has its own constitutional power over appropriations, it appears to us that it may not, in the exercise of this power, circumvent constitutional limitations on congressional power or undercut other constitutional powers vested elsewhere. The Supreme Court most recently reaffirmed this principle in Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, 501 U.S. 252, 114 L.Ed. 2d 236 (1991).

* * * *

CONCLUSION

. . . [I]t appears to us that, to the extent they purport to prohibit the issuance of multiple diplomatic passports for the purpose of complying with the Arab League's passport policy, even when the issuance of such passports is necessary in order for the President to conduct negotiations with foreign governments, sections 129 and 503 are unconstitutional. (We also believe that a court would probably find this issue to be a non-justiciable political question.) . . .

A January 23, 1992, memorandum from President George H.W. Bush to the Secretary of State stated that the President would treat §§ 129 and 503 as "not imposing any binding legal obligation with respect to the issuance of more than one official or diplomatic passport to U.S. Government officials." It further directed the Secretary to continue issuing U.S. Government officials "with as many official and diplomatic passports as their work requires," notwithstanding

b. Passports designated for travel only to Israel

Sections 129 and 503, discussed in 1.a, supra, further prohibited the Secretary of State from issuing any passport designated for travel only to Israel. On January 29, 1992, the Department of State promulgated its final rule revising the passport regulations at 22 C.F.R. § 51.4 to cancel, effective April 25, 1992, all passports to facilitate the foreign travel of United States citizens and nationals that were designated as valid only for travel to Israel. 57 Fed. Reg. 3282 (Jan. 29, 1992). The Department continued to issue a second passport to travelers who needed to visit both Arab League countries and Israel, but the second passport was not designated only for travel to Israel. See 57 Fed. Reg. 3454 (Jan. 29, 1992).

2. Denial of Passport for Non-Payment of Child Support

Section 370 of the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–193, 110 Stat. 2105 (1996) (42 U.S.C. § 652(k)), required the Secretary of State to deny (or, as appropriate, revoke, restrict or limit) passports of persons certified by the Secretary of Health and Human Services, on the basis of an underlying certification of a state agency, as owing child support arrearages in excess of $5,000. For a discussion of the implementing regulations subsequently issued by the Department, as well as constitutional challenges to the provision, see Digest 2001 at 9–13.

3. Restrictions on Use of U.S. Passport

a. Imposition of Iraq and Kuwait passport restrictions

On February 1, 1991, Secretary of State James A. Baker III signed a notice pursuant to 22 C.F.R. § 51.73 imposing a one-year restriction on use of U.S. passports for travel to, in, or through Iraq, with certain exceptions. 56 Fed. Reg. 5242 (Feb. 8, 1991). The notice provided as follows.

Pursuant to the authority of section 211a of title 22 of the United States Code, Executive Order 11295 (31 FR 10603), and in accordance with § 51.73(a) (2) and (3) of title 22 of the Code of Federal Regulations, all United States passports, with the following exception, are declared invalid for travel to, in, or through Iraq and Kuwait unless specifically validated for such travel. I hereby conclude that it is in the national interest of the United States that these passport restrictions shall not apply to those American citizens now residing in Iraq and Kuwait nor to American professional reporters and journalists on assignment there.

This action is required by the fact that armed hostilities now are taking place in Iraq and Kuwait, and that the safety of any American citizen travelling to those countries no longer can be guaranteed. The American Embassies in Baghdad and Kuwait are closed, thus preventing the United States from providing routine diplomatic protection or consular assistance to Americans who may travel to either country.

In light of these events and circumstances, I have determined that Iraq and Kuwait are areas ". . . where armed hostilities are in progress; or, a country . . . in which there is imminent danger to the public health or physical safety of United States travelers" within the meaning of § 51.73(a) (2) and (3) of title 22 of the Code of Federal Regulations.

The Public Notice shall be effective upon publication in the Federal Register and shall expire at the end of one year unless sooner extended or revoked by Public Notice.

* * * *

Effective March 12, 1991, Secretary Baker revoked the passport restriction imposed on February 1, 1991, with respect to Kuwait because armed hostilities had ceased in Kuwait. The revocation notice noted that certain potential health and safety dangers would continue to exist. 56 Fed. Reg. 10,454

(Mar. 12, 1991). The passport restriction remained in effect with respect to Iraq.

Effective February 27, 1992, Acting Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger extended the restriction on use of U.S. passports for travel to, in, or through Iraq for another year because, although armed hostilities had ended, the Government of Iraq continued to direct hostile acts against United States citizens and nationals. 57 Fed. Reg. 6762 (Feb. 27, 1992).

The restriction was again extended for one year by Acting Secretary of State Clifton R. Wharton, Jr., effective March 1, 1993, on the grounds that Iraq continued to be a country where there was "imminent danger to the public health or physical safety" of U.S. travelers. 58 Fed. Reg. 11,883 (Mar. 1, 1993). Further one-year extensions based on similar grounds were made during the period: 59 Fed. Reg. 10,451 (Mar. 4, 1994); 60 Fed. Reg. 13,002 (Mar. 9, 1995); 61 Fed. Reg. 10,839 (Mar. 15, 1996); 62 Fed. Reg. 13,426 (March 20, 1997); 63 Fed. Reg. 13,715 (Mar. 20, 1998); and 64 Fed. Reg. 14,301 (Mar. 24, 1999).

b. Extension of Lebanon passport restrictions

Effective February 1, 1991, Secretary of State James A. Baker III extended for a year the restriction on use of U.S. passports for travel to, in, or through Lebanon, originally imposed on January 26, 1987. The extension was based on a finding of "imminent danger to the public health and physical safety" of U.S. travelers within the meaning of 22 C.F.R. § 51.73(a)(3) because of the chaotic situation in Lebanon, and West Beirut in particular. 56 Fed. Reg. 4118 (Feb. 1, 1991). The restriction was further extended for one year: 57 Fed. Reg. 5925 (Feb. 18, 1992); and 58 Fed. Reg. 11,286 (Feb. 24, 1993); and for six-month periods: 59 Fed. Reg. 10,195 (Mar. 3, 1994); 59 Fed. Reg. 45,056 (Aug. 31, 1994); 60 Fed. Reg. 12,004 (Mar. 3, 1995); 60 Fed. Reg. 45,206 (Aug. 30, 1995); 61 Fed. Reg. 8096 (Mar. 1, 1996); 61 Fed. Reg. 43,395 (Aug. 22, 1996); and Fed. Reg. 4371 (Jan. 29, 1997).

c. Extension of Libya passport restrictions

Effective November 25, 1991, Acting Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger extended for another year the restriction on the use of U.S. passports for travel to, in, or through Libya, that had originally been imposed on December 11, 1981. The extension was also based on a finding of "imminent danger," due to the unsettled relations between the United States and the Government of Libya and the possibility of hostile acts against U.S. citizens in Libya. 56 Fed. Reg. 59,316 (Nov. 25, 1991). The restriction was further extended for one year periods: 57 Fed. Reg. 55,291 (Nov. 24, 1992); 58 Fed. Reg. 61,137 (Nov. 19, 1993); 59 Fed. Reg. 59,815 (Nov. 18, 1994); 60 Fed. Reg. 58,129 (Nov. 24, 1995); 61 Fed. Reg. 56,993 (Nov. 5, 1996); 62 Fed. Reg. 62,663 (Nov. 24, 1997); 63 Fed. Reg. 64,139 (Nov. 18, 1998); and 64 Fed. Reg. 67,600 (Dec. 2, 1999).

4. Revocation of Passport of Subject of Federal Arrest Warrant

The Department of State revoked the passport of Joseph R. Kelso, who was the subject of a federal warrant of arrest for several felonies, in response to a formal request dated January 20, 1998, by the FBI. As authorized under the Department's regulations, 22 C.F.R. §§ 51.70 (a)(1) and 51.72 (a) (1998), Kelso, who was in the United Kingdom, sought a post-revocation hearing to contest the action on January 29, 1998. The Department failed to schedule the post-revocation hearing within the sixty days required by its regulations. Kelso brought suit seeking a temporary restraining order to vacate the revocation on the grounds that (1) the absence of a pre-revocation hearing violated the Fifth Amendment's due process clause; (2) the regulations empowering the Secretary of State to revoke passports exceeded her delegated authority; and (3) the State Department's regulations compelled the Secretary to return Kelso's passport. The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia rejected the plaintiff's first two arguments based on the Supreme Court holding in Haig v.

Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981) (see Digest 1979 at 293–97; Digest 1980 at 125–32; Digest 1989–90 at 13–17), but ordered the Department (1) to vacate the revocation decision because of its failure to abide by its regulations requiring that it initiate the hearing within sixty days of a request and (2) to restore the status quo ante by returning Kelso's passport to the British authorities who possessed it prior to the revocation decision. Kelso v. United States Dep't of State, 13 F. Supp. 2d 1 (D.D.C. 1998).

The Department of State issued a replacement passport, but then again revoked Kelso's passport under 22 C.F.R. §§ 51.70 and 51.72 (1998) on the grounds that he was the subject of a federal arrest warrant and was deemed a present flight risk. Kelso filed a motion to show cause for contempt that was denied by the district court. The department's regulations, the court reasoned, did not provide any precise sanction for the department's failure to hold the revocation hearing and there was no sanction that prohibited the department from revoking the replacement passport. Moreover, the department's order vacating its first revocation was not a final judgment on the merits that barred the department by principles of res judicata from revoking the replacement passport. Kelso v. Department of State, 13 F. Supp. 2d 12 (D.D.C. 1998).

5. Right to Travel—Cuban Asset Control Regulations

In 1994 the Freedom to Travel Campaign ("FTC"), an organizer of educational trips to Cuba, and other plaintiffs sought a preliminary injunction to prevent enforcement of certain restrictions imposed on travel to Cuba by the Cuban Assets Controls Regulations (31 C.F.R. Part 515 (1994)). The regulations were promulgated shortly after President John F. Kennedy announced the 1962 Cuban trade embargo. As of 1994, they banned nearly all economic transactions with Cuban nationals. A small universe of persons—including journalists, government officials, and certain international organizations—qualified for a general license partially exempting them from these restrictions. All other travelers, including tourists, were required to obtain a specific license that could be issued only upon a showing of "compelling need" to travel to Cuba for such specified reasons as "clearly defined educational . . . activities." 31 C.F.R. § 515.560(b) (1994). Traveling to Cuba without a license was a criminal offense subject to imprisonment, fine, and property forfeiture. 31 C.F.R. § 515.701 (1994). FTC did not qualify for a general license, and had never applied for a specific license. Nonetheless, it had made trips to Cuba in which several hundred people took part, and planned to conduct similar unlicensed trips in the future.

FTC argued that: (1) Congress' delegation of authority to the President under the Trading with the Enemy Act to renew the Cuban embargo solely upon a determination that it is "in the national interest" was too broad, (2) that Regulation 560(b)'s license requirements for "educational" travel were facially vague under both the Fifth Amendment right to travel and the First Amendment, and (3) that the President's statutory authority conflicted with the United States' human rights treaty obligations. The U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California denied FTC's motion for a preliminary injunction and granted the Treasury Department's motion for summary judgment upholding the regulations.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, holding that the "national interest" standard for Congress's delegation of power to the President was not too broad and that the regulations' provisions were not impermissibly vague, affirmed the denial of the preliminary injunction in an opinion excerpted below. Freedom to Travel Campaign v. Newcomb, 82 F.3d 1431 (9th Cir. 1996). Footnotes have been omitted. See also discussion of Cuba sanctions in Chapter 16.A.3.

* * * *

FTC initially argues that the Cuban Asset Control Regulations are an impermissible delegation of Congressional power.

These Regulations, under which the President maintains the Cuban embargo, were promulgated pursuant to TWEA [the Trading with the Enemy Act], 40 Stat. 411 (1917), as amended, 50 U.S.C. App. §§ 1–44 (1988). TWEA itself was a delegation of Congressional power to the President. When the Cuban Asset Control Regulations were originally enacted, TWEA provided that the President could restrict foreign travel and trade both in times of peace and war. 50 U.S.C. § 5(b) (1925). Thus, at that time, the Regulations were a proper exercise of the President's authority under TWEA. See Reagan v. Wald, 468 U.S. 222 . . . (1984).

In 1977, Congress amended TWEA and cut back the President's authority to impose embargoes except in times of war. A new law was enacted to cover the President's emergency powers during times of peace. See International Emergency Economic Powers Act ("IEEPA"), Pub. L. No. 95–223 . . . codified at 50 U.S.C. §§ 1701–1706 (1988). It imposed a higher standard for the creation of peacetime embargoes; they were permitted only if necessary "to deal with any unusual and extraordinary threat, which has its source in whole or substantial part outside the United States, to the national security, foreign policy, or economy of the United States." 50 U.S.C. § 1701(a). The President also had to declare a national emergency. Id.

Congress, however, "grandfathered" in all then-existing economic embargoes. Instead of having to satisfy the more onerous IEEPA standards, the President could simply renew an embargo upon determining "that the exercise of such authority . . . for another year is in the national interest of the United States." Pub. L. No. 95–233, § 101(b)(1977) . . . In each year since the 1977 amendment, Presidents Carter, Reagan, Bush, and Clinton have determined that it was in the "national interest" to continue the Cuban embargo . . .

FTC argues that this "in the national interest" standard is too broad a delegation . . .

Article I, section 1 of the Constitution vests the legislative power of the federal government in Congress. U.S. Const., Art. I, § 1. Over time, the government has reached a "practical understanding that . . . Congress simply cannot do its job absent an ability to delegate power under broad general directives." Mistretta v.

United States, 488 U.S. 361, 372 . . . (1989). Thus, delegations of Congressional authority are proper "so long as Congress 'shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to [exercise the delegated authority] is directed to conform." Id. (citing J.W. Hampton, Jr. & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394 . . . (1928)). This "intelligible principle" must not grant the delegate unrestrained freedom of choice." Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 16 . . . (1965).

Courts have interpreted this mandate liberally and, with two exceptions, have upheld every challenge to allegedly impermissible delegations . . .

Delegation of foreign affairs authority is given even broader deference than in the domestic arena. It is well settled that "Congress—in giving the Executive authority over matters of foreign affairs—must of necessity paint with a brush broader than it customarily wields in domestic areas." Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 17 . . . (1965). The level of deference is so much greater here that a delegation improper domestically may be valid in the foreign arena. Curtiss-Wright, 299 U.S. at 315.

Zemel clearly settles the issue before us. In Zemel, the plaintiffs challenged the delegation provisions of the Passport Act of 1926. This Act gave the Secretary of State the power to grant and issue passports, but set forth no standards to guide the use of his discretion. When the President invalidated all passports to Cuba in 1961, the plaintiff sued. The Court rejected his claim and found the delegation proper. Id. at 18.

. . . The Supreme Court's approval of the strikingly broad delegation in Zemel makes our conclusion crystal clear: the delegation under which the Regulations are promulgated is valid.

* * * *

FTC claims that its freedom to travel is trampled by the Regulations' travel ban. Although the right to travel internationally is a liberty interest recognized by the Fifth Amendment, Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116, 127 . . . (1958) ("Freedom to travel abroad is, indeed, an important aspect of the citizen's 'liberty.' "), it is clearly not accorded the same stature as the freedom to travel among the states. Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280, 306 . . . (1981)

("The Court has made it plain that the freedom to travel outside the United States must be distinguished from the right to travel within the United States.") Restrictions on international travel are usually granted much greater deference. See Califano v. Aznavorian, 439 U.S. 170 . . . (1978) (upholding Social Security Act provisions against freedom to international travel challenge using only rational basis scrutiny). Given the lesser importance of this freedom to travel abroad, the Government need only advance a rational, or at most an important, reason for imposing the ban.

This the Government can do. The purpose of the travel ban is the same now as it has been since the ban was imposed almost 35 years ago—to restrict the flow of hard currency into Cuba. That goal has been found "important," "substantial," and even "vital." See Walsh v. Brady . . . 927 F.2d 1229, 1235 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (finding purpose "important" and "substantial"); Teague v. Regional Comm'r of Customs, 404 F.2d 441, 445 (2d Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 977 . . . (1969) (finding purpose "vital"). Thus, the Government seems to have satisfied its obligation.

FTC, however, would have us evaluate the foreign policy underlying the embargo. It contends that the President's current reason for the embargo—to pressure the Cuban government into making democratic reforms—is not as compelling a policy for an embargo as were previous justifications that relied on national security concerns. FTC thus invites us to invalidate the ban. This is an invitation we must decline.

It is well settled that "matters relating 'to the conduct of foreign relations . . . are so exclusively entrusted to the political branches of the government as to be largely immune from judicial inquiry or interference." Reagan, 486 U.S. at 242 (citing Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 589 . . . (1952)). This immunity manifests itself in a history of judicial deference. In both Sardino v. Federal Reserve Bank, 361 F.2d 106 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 898 . . . (1966) and Reagan, 468 U.S. 222 . . . , courts refused to hear claims that the executive lacked an adequate foreign policy rationale for the Cuban embargo. See Sardino, 361 F. 2d at 112 (refusing to entertain claim that Cuban foreign policy did not support asset freezing); Regan, 468 U.S. at 242 (refusing to hear claim that absence of Cuban Missile Crisis security risk left Cuban embargo without sufficient foreign policy justification).

Even if we were to second guess the President, this is not a case where the Government has set forth no justifications at all. It has detailed numerous reasons for the embargo. We will look no further. The Cuban Asset Control Regulations' travel ban is constitutional.

* * * *

FTC next argues that even if the ban itself is constitutional, the Regulations' licensing exceptions are unconstitutionally vague under the Fifth and First Amendments. This is a particularly novel argument in that FTC challenges the restoration of rights that have been validly taken away . . .

* * * *

FTC concludes by arguing that the Regulations conflict with the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 6 I.L.M. 368 (1967) and are therefore invalid. FTC points to Article 12, section 3, which requires travel restrictions to be "necessary to protect national security." Since the 1977 grandfather clause allows the Cuban ban in the absence of national security threats, FTC argues that a national security requirement must be read into the grandfather clause.

We interpret treaties de novo. United States v. Washington, 969 F. 2d 752, 754 (9th Cir. 1992), cert. denied sub nom. Lummi Indian Tribe v. Washington, 507 U.S. 1051 . . . (1993). While it is true that acts of Congress should not be construed to conflict with international treaty obligations, Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, Inc., 509 U.S. 155 . . . (1993), we fail to see any conflict here.

The "national security" provision of Article 12, section 3 qualifies only sections 1 and 2 of Article 12. 6 I.L.M. at 176 ("The above-mentioned rights shall not be subject to any restrictions except those . . . necessary to protect national security.") (emphasis added). Section 1 states that all persons within a nation shall have the right to move within that nation. Section 2 states that "everyone shall be free to leave any country, including his own."

Because the Regulations do not trigger either section 1 or 2, the section 3 "national security" requirement does not apply. The Regulations do not deal with interstate travel, so section 1 is irrelevant. Nor is Section 2 relevant: it only guarantees the right to leave the United States—it says nothing about the right to travel to specific destination.

Thus, there is no conflict between the grandfather provision and the International Covenant.

C. IMMIGRATION AND VISAS

1. U.S.-Cuba Immigration Issues

a. Joint Communiqué on Migration (1994)

On August 8, 1994, Fidel Castro announced that the Cuban government would no longer forcibly prevent emigration from Cuba by boat. The new policy encouraged thousands of Cubans to escape Cuba and head for the United States in often unseaworthy boats and rafts. A number were lost at sea, although approximately 8,000 reached the United States safely.

On August 19, 1994, President William J. Clinton announced a new U.S. policy, stating at a White House press conference:

> The United States will do everything within its power to ensure that Cuban lives are saved and that the current outflow of refugees is stopped. Today, I have ordered that illegal refugees from Cuba will not be allowed to enter the United States. Refugees rescued at sea will be taken to our naval base at Guantanamo, while we explore the possibility of other safe havens within the region.

Mariel boatlift, see 1 Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 650–661.

The exodus sparked talks in New York between representatives of the United States and of Cuba to normalize migration procedures and take measures to ensure that migration between the two countries would be "safe, legal, and orderly." On September 9, 1994, the representatives reached agreement on the U.S.-Cuba Joint Communiqué on Migration (September 9, 1994), which is excerpted below. The full text of the agreement is available at 5 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 37 at 603 (Sept. 12, 1994), http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

On October 14, 1994, President Clinton announced a series of immediate humanitarian steps relating to Cubans in safe havens in Guantánamo and Panama, which included paroling into the United States all chronically ill persons and their caregivers who could not be adequately cared for in the camps, unaccompanied young children, and migrants over 70; an administrative review of the status of all children in the camps; launching a major effort to persuade other countries to accept some of the Cuban migrants; and improvements in camp conditions, including providing better food, inaugurating mail and telephone service, and improving sanitary conditions. See 5 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 44 at 730 (statement of White House Press Secretary Myers, Oct. 31, 1994), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

U.S.-CUBA JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ ON MIGRATION

Safety of Life at Sea

The United States and the Republic of Cuba recognize their common interest in preventing unsafe departures from Cuba which risk loss of human life. The United States underscored its recent decisions to discourage unsafe voyages. Pursuant to those decisions, migrants rescued at sea attempting to enter the United States will not be permitted to enter the United States, but instead will be taken to safe haven facilities outside the United States. Further, the United States has discontinued its practice of granting parole to all Cuban migrants who reach U.S. territory in irregular ways. The Republic of Cuba will take effective measures in every way it possibly can to prevent unsafe departures using mostly persuasive methods.

Alien Smuggling

The United States and the Republic of Cuba reaffirm their support for the recently adopted United Nations General Assembly resolution on alien smuggling [GA Res. 48/102, adopted Dec. 20, 1993]. They pledged their cooperation to take prompt and effective action to prevent the transport of persons to the United States illegally. The two governments will take effective measures in every way they possibly can to oppose and prevent the use of violence by any persons seeking to reach, or who arrive in, the United States from Cuba by forcible diversions of aircraft and vessels.

Legal Migration

The United States and the Republic of Cuba are committed to directing Cuban migration into safe, legal and orderly channels consistent with strict implementation of the 1984 joint communiqué. Accordingly, the United States will continue to issue, in conformity with United States law, immediate relative and preference immigrant visas to Cuban nationals who apply at the U.S. Interests Section [in Havana] and are eligible to immigrate to the United States. The United States also commits, through other provisions of United States law, to authorize and facilitate additional lawful migration to the United States from Cuba. The United States ensures that total legal migration to the United States from Cuba will be a minimum of 20,000 Cubans each year, not including immediate relatives of United States citizens. As an additional, extraordinary measure, the United States will facilitate in a one-year period the issuance of documentation to permit the migration to the United States of those qualified Cuban nationals in Cuba currently on the immigrant visa waiting list. To that end, both parties will work together to facilitate the procedures necessary to implement this measure. The two governments agree to authorize the necessary personnel to allow their respective interests sections to implement the provisions of the communiqué effectively.

Voluntary Return

The United States and Cuba agreed that the voluntary return of Cuban nationals who arrived in the United States or in safe havens outside the United States on or after August 19, 1994, will continue to be arranged through diplomatic channels.

Excludables

The United States and the Republic of Cuba agreed to continue to discuss the return of Cuban nationals excludable from the United States.

Review of Agreement

The representatives of the United States and the Republic of Cuba agree to meet no later than 45 days from today's announcement to review implementation of this Joint Communiqué. Future meetings will be scheduled by mutual agreement.

b. United States-Cuba—further steps to normalize migration (1995)

On May 2, 1995, the United States and Cuba announced in a Joint Statement on Migration that they had reached agreement on further steps to normalize immigration. These steps built upon the communiqué of September 9, 1994, and sought to address safety and humanitarian concerns, including overcrowding at the safe haven facilities in Guantánamo. The Joint Statement appears in full below, and is also available at 31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 752–53 (May 8, 1995); and 6 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 19 at 397 (May 8, 1995), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

Humanitarian Parole

The United States and the Republic of Cuba recognize the special circumstances of Cuban migrants currently at Guantánamo Bay. Accordingly, the two governments have agreed that the process of humanitarian parole into the United States should continue beyond those eligible for parole under existing criteria. The two governments agree that if the United States carries out such paroles, it may count them towards meeting the minimum number of Cubans it is committed to admit every year pursuant to the September 9, 1994 agreement. Up to 5,000 such paroles may be counted towards meeting the minimum number in any one-year period beginning September 9, 1995, regardless of when the migrants are paroled into the United States.

The United States and the Republic of Cuba reaffirm their common interest in preventing unsafe departures from Cuba. Effective immediately, Cuban migrants intercepted at sea by the United States and attempting to enter the United States will be taken to Cuba. Similarly, migrants found to have entered Guantánamo illegally will also be returned to Cuba. The United States and the Republic of Cuba will cooperate jointly in this effort. All actions taken will be consistent with the parties' international obligations. Migrants taken to Cuba will be informed by United States officials about procedures to apply for legal admission to the United States at the U.S. Interests Section in Havana.

The United States and the Republic of Cuba will ensure that no action is taken against those migrants returned to Cuba as a consequence of their attempt to immigrate illegally. Both parties will work together to facilitate the procedures necessary to implement these measures. The United States and the Republic of Cuba agree to the return to Cuba of Cuban nationals currently at Guantánamo who are ineligible for admission to the United States.

September 9, 1994 Agreement

The United States and the Republic of Cuba agree that the provisions of the September 9, 1994 agreement remain in effect, except as modified by the present Joint Statement. In particular, both sides reaffirm their joint commitment to take steps to prevent unsafe departures from Cuba which risk loss of human life and to oppose acts of violence associated with illegal immigration.

On May 22, 1995, Peter Tarnoff, Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, testified on U.S. policy toward Cuba at hearings on S. 381, the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act, before the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere and Peace Corps Affairs of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. 6 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 22 at 446–53 (May 29, 1995), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

The testimony, excerpted below, discussed the September 1994 and May 1995 migration agreements, and how they met the national interest. Id. at 450–52.

It must be stressed that the legal migration program established by the September 1994 accord represents a significant increase in legal migration levels from Cuba. In the years prior to the accord, the U.S. Interests Section never processed more than about 6,000 people—including immigrants and refugees—for migration to the United States. On October 12, 1994, we announced plans to expand immigrant visa and refugee processing and to use parole authority to meet the 20,000 minimum. The U.S. Interests Section in Havana is on schedule with regard to issuing the required travel documentation. . . .

As part of our enhanced legal migration program for Cubans, the pre-existing in-country refugee program—one of only three the United States conducts in the world—was expanded to process some 7,000 refugees during the period September 1994–September 1995. The previous level of issuance of refugee documents in Havana was about 3,000 per year. The refugee program provides a mechanism for those individual Cubans under pressure by the authorities for attempting to exercise fundamental rights and freedoms, including the right to criticize the government and to come to the United States.

The September accord also called for periodic meetings to review progress toward its implementation; three such sessions have been held thus far. Our ongoing review indicates that the Cuban Government has lived up to its commitment to use persuasive methods to dissuade Cuban citizens from unsafe departures. We have no evidence that violence or coercion have been used to deter such departures or that those attempting to leave the country using irregular means have been persecuted or discriminated against. It is important to note that despite the lack of human rights and political freedom in Cuba, the Castro regime has not taken action against the tens of thousands of Cubans who have applied for legal immigration to the U.S. at the U.S. Interests Section in Havana or against those who have returned voluntarily to Cuba from Guantanamo since September 9, 1994.

Notwithstanding the successful implementation of the September agreement, there remained a potential threat to our borders and thus to our national security posed by a new outflow of Cuban migrants which might have been stimulated by further economic dislocation in Cuba and by the uncertain future for those being held in Guantanamo. To address these critical issues and to prevent additional loss of life at sea during the coming months and to find a responsible humanitarian solution to the problem of the Cuban migrants at our safe haven at Guantanamo, the President directed that we build on the September 1994 agreement to further regularize U.S.-Cuban migration relations. As you know, additional discussions were held with the Cuban Government last month which resulted in a new migration agreement. These discussions were unpublicized for one reason only: To avoid the very real possibility that rumors about the talks might trigger a massive exodus of new rafters seeking to anticipate any new U.S.-Cuban migration agreement. Such a disorganized panic would have presented serious risks of loss of life for Cubans on the high seas, as well as risks for U.S. military personnel who are charged with maintaining order at Guantanamo.

Let me stress that these talks involved only migration issues—there were no side agreements or secret understandings. There are two principal features of the May 2, 1995, migration agreement.

Drawing Down the Guantanamo Safe Haven. The first element of the new migration agreement concerns the Cuban migrants currently in our safe haven at Guantanamo. We will continue to bring into the United States those persons who are eligible for parole under the guidelines announced last October and December. These cover mainly children, the elderly, and the medically ill, with their families. Over 11,000 such persons have already arrived and an additional 5,000 remaining at Guantanamo will likely be eligible for parole on these same grounds. Following completion of processing under these categories, we will continue to parole into the United States on a case-by-case basis all other Cubans in the safe haven, provided they are not ineligible for admission because of criminal record; medical, physical, or mental condition; or commission of acts of violence while in U.S. safe havens—these persons will be returned to Cuba. In admitting these additional migrants we will bear in mind the impact of this "special Guantanamo entrants" program on state and local economies. . . .

These special Guantanamo entrants, who are expected to number about 15,000, will not represent a net increase in overall Cuban migration. Rather, they will be credited against the 20,000 annual Cuban migration figure which the United States agreed to in September 1994, at a rate of 5,000 per year for three years, beginning September 1995, regardless of when the parolees arrive in the United States.

The Government of Cuba has agreed to accept all Cuban nationals in Guantanamo who wish to return home, as well as persons at the safe haven who were previously excluded or deported from the United States or whom the United States deems ineligible for admission.

* * * *

Future Unauthorized Migration. The second element of the May 2 agreement provides that Cuban migrants rescued at sea while attempting to reach the United States will be taken back to Cuba, where U.S. consular officials will meet them at the dock and advise them how to apply to come to the United States through existing legal mechanisms. All such returnees will be permitted to apply for legal migration, including the expanded refugee program.

The Government of Cuba has committed to the United States that no one will suffer reprisals, lose benefits, or be prejudiced in any manner, either because he or she sought to depart irregularly, or because he or she applied for legal migration to the United States. As noted above, the Cuban Government has lived up to a similar commitment made in the context of the September 1994 agreement.

Let me describe how this has worked so far. After being rescued by the U.S. Coast Guard, Cuban rafters heading for the United States will be read a statement explaining that they will be taken back to Cuba where they can apply for legal migration. Trained, Spanish-speaking Immigration and Naturalization Service officers will be available on Coast Guard cutters to evaluate any claims the migrants may make regarding fear of return to Cuba. These are the procedures which were followed in the handling of the initial groups of rafters rescued since May 2. In all these cases the INS officer's determination was that the migrants could safely be returned to Cuba. A similar process will be available for post-May 2 arrivals at Guantanamo.

Cubans who reach the United States through irregular means will be placed in exclusion proceedings and treated as are undocumented migrants from other countries, including being given the opportunity to apply for asylum.

It must also be noted that the arrival of warm weather has signaled the start of the period in which rafting historically reaches a peak. While prior to May 2 the number of interdicted rafters was well below the same period last year, it has been evident that some Cubans intended to persist in this risky venture. The announcement that Cuban migrants henceforth will not be allowed to enter the United States by illegal means should have a deterrent effect on future irregular departures.

* * * *

It is important to understand that our migration accords with the Cubans and the decision to allow Cubans to enter the U.S. from Guantanamo were made in order to help the U.S. better control its borders, to deal with the humanitarian problem posed by prolonged migrant residence on Guantanamo, and to promote legal, orderly migration from Cuba that ensures adequate sponsorship of new arrivals and ends the life-threatening rafter phenomenon. These migration agreements stand alone. They do not signal any change in our policy toward Cuba, which is—let me state one more time—that we seek a peaceful, timely transition to a democratic government in Cuba, one which respects basic freedoms and human rights, one which promotes economic liberalization and individual enterprise, one which provides opportunity and liberty to all its citizens. It would be a mistake to encourage hope on the part of the Cuban Government that there has been or will be a change in U.S. policy toward Cuba as a result of these migration agreements.

2. Grounds for Admission, Inadmissibility, Exclusion, Deportation, Removal of Aliens

a. Nonreviewability of consular officer decisions to deny and revoke visas

In Saavedra Bruno v. Albright, 197 F.3d 1153 (D.C. Cir. 1999), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit reaffirmed the long-standing doctrine of consular nonreviewability—that decisions of consular officers to deny or revoke visas cannot be reviewed by the courts. Excerpts below from the court's opinion provide the somewhat complex facts of the case and the court's conclusion (footnotes deleted).

Saavedra is a Bolivian national. He moved to Washington, D.C. with his family in 1993. At the time, he held an F-1 visa (student) and a B-1/B-2 visa (temporary visitor for business or pleasure) . . .

In May 1995, [a corporation formed by Saavedra sought] to have Saavedra classified as a managerial employee qualified for an L-1 visa. The INS approved the classification [and an extension in 1996]. Saavedra then traveled abroad to seek the renewal of his visa, as is required, presenting himself to the American consul in Panama City on May 16, 1996. . . .

Upon finding Saavedra listed in the State Department's computer "lookout" system, the American consul in Panama City denied his visa application. Saavedra's name had been entered by the U.S. Consul General in Bolivia, who had received classified reports from federal agencies that Saavedra had been involved in narcotics trafficking. Saavedra quickly returned to the United States. . . . At [a] hearing the following week, the immigration officer told him to leave the country and to resolve the matter with the United States Embassy in Bolivia. He therefore departed on June 11, 1996. . . . The Consul General reviewed information [provided by Saavedra's lawyer] along with the classified reports and made a formal determination that Saavedra was ineligible to be admitted to the United States under § 212 of the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(2)(C), because there was reason to believe that he had been an illicit trafficker of controlled substances, or had knowingly assisted and abetted, or conspired and colluded with, others in the illicit trafficking of controlled substances. The Consul General sent a letter to Saavedra at his Florida address revoking his B-1/B-2 visa.

Thereafter, the State Department issued an advisory opinion supporting the Consul General's finding that Saavedra was ineligible for a visa under § 212(a)(2)(C) of the INA. The State Department issued a Certificate of Revocation on August 1, 1996, providing that the revocation of the B-1/B-2 visa would be effective as of Saavedra's next departure from the United States. . . .

In January 1998, Saavedra, his company, and its officer . . . filed suit in the district court seeking review under the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"), 5 U.S.C. § 701 et seq., of the revocation of his B-1/B-2 visa and the refusal to renew his L-1 visa. The complaint also challenged the State Department's failure to act on [a] request for a waiver of inadmissibility under § 212(d)(3) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(3) [which the State Department subsequently denied]. . . .

In view of the political nature of visa determinations and of the lack of any statute expressly authorizing judicial review of consular officers' actions, courts have applied what has become known as the doctrine of consular nonreviewability. The doctrine holds that a consular official's decision to issue or withhold a visa is not subject to judicial review, at least unless Congress says otherwise. For the greater part of this century, our court has therefore refused to review visa decisions of consular officials. . . . Under succeeding incarnations of federal immigration law through to the present, this court and other federal courts have adhered to the view that consular visa determinations are not subject to judicial review. . . . In Castaneda-Gonzalez [v. INS, 183 U.S. App. D.C. 396, 564 F.2d 417, 428 n.25 (D.C. Cir. 1977)] we dealt with the subject tersely, in a footnote, because the law was so settled: a consular officer, we wrote, could refuse to issue a visa to an alien "without fear of reversal since visa decisions are nonreviewable." 564 F.2d at 428 n.25.

. . . [Jurisdiction for] Saavedra must . . . rest on the general federal question statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1331. But this general jurisdictional provision, the government tells us, is subject to preclusion-of-review legislation and the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 ("IIRIRA"), Pub. L. No. 104–208, § 306(a)(2), 110 Stat. 3009, 546, is such legislation. There Congress further restricted judicial review of exclusion orders, now called removal orders, in actions brought by aliens present in the United States. As matters now stand, federal courts have no jurisdiction "to review any final order of removal against an alien who is removable by reason of having committed [certain] criminal offenses"—including trafficking in controlled substances. 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(c) . . . The IIRIRA also amended the immigration law provision giving general jurisdiction to the district courts. The amended provision now reads: the "district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all causes, civil and criminal, brought by the United States that arise under the provisions of this subchapter," 8 U.S.C. § 1329, thus making clear that district court jurisdiction founded on the immigration statute is confined to actions brought by the government. . . . Read in light of the long history of judicial noninterference with the judgments of consular officers regarding visas, one might characterize IIRIRA § 1329 as a restriction on district court jurisdiction to review claims such as those set forth in Saavedra's complaint, a restriction superseding general federal question jurisdiction. Or one might view this recent legislative history as reinforcing the judgment, to which we subscribe, that the immigration laws preclude judicial review of consular visa decisions and that the doctrine of consular nonreviewability remains intact, until Congress provides otherwise. Both views amount to the same thing and lead to the same conclusion—namely, that Saavedra's claims cannot be heard.

Cal. 1996) (summary judgment granted with respect to constitutional and statutory challenges to denial of visas to members of a Cuban musical group with exception of claim that the Secretary of State interfered with the authority of the consular officers in Havana to make visa decisions), later proceeding at 944 F. Supp. 805 (N.D. Cal. 1996).

b. Admission categories

(1) Immigrant visas

(i) Scientists from the former Soviet Union

The Soviet Scientists Immigration Act of 1992, Pub. L. No. 102–509, 106 Stat. 3316, 8 U.S.C. § 1153, relaxed the requirements to qualify for an immigrant visa as an alien possessing "exceptional ability in the sciences" under § 203(b)(2)(A) of the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), 8 U.S.C. § 1153(b)(2)(A), for up to 750 scientists from the former Soviet Union annually for four years. Such scientists were not required to establish that they had an employment offer or that they had advanced degrees, but were required to have expertise in nuclear, chemical, biological, or other high-technology fields or to be working on nuclear, chemical, biological, or other high-technology defense projects. The purpose of the legislation, as stated in Senate bill S. 2201, was to "enhance American competitiveness and to deter the proliferation of expertise in high technology fields associated with military research and development." See H.Rpt. 102–881(I)(1992).

(ii) Special immigrants

The Armed Forces Immigration Adjustment Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102–110, 105 Stat. 555 (scattered sections of 8 U.S.C.), added a new subsection (K) to INA § 101(a)(27) that created a new category of special immigrants consisting of persons who had served on active duty in the U.S. Armed Forces after October 15, 1978, for 12 years (or 6 in the case of an individual on active duty who had reenlisted to incur a total active duty service obligation of at least 12 years) and their spouses and children, if recommended by the executive department under which the individual serves or served.

Section 421(a) of the American Competitiveness and Workforce Improvement Act of 1998, as contained in Div. C, Title IV of the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1999, Pub. L. No. 105–277, 112 Stat. 2681–641 (1998), extended to NATO and NATO civilian components accompanying NATO forces or attached to an allied headquarters the special immigrant benefits given to certain unmarried sons and daughters of current or former international organization officers or employees, surviving spouses of deceased international organization officers or employees, and retired officers of employees of international organizations and their spouses.

(iii) Diversity visa program

Sections 201(a)(3), 201(e), 203(c), 203(e) and 204(a)(1)(G) of the INA, added by the Immigration Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101–649, 104 Stat. 4978 (scattered sections of 8 U.S.C.), established, effective for fiscal year 1995 and thereafter, a permanent annual numerical limitation of 55,000 for diversity immigrants, nationals of countries determined by specified mathematical computations to be underrepresented among immigrants to the United States. On December 29, 1993, the Department of State published regulations for the diversity visa program. The regulations provided that selection would be made at random from those who submitted petitions during application periods established by the Department and who met certain requirements as to education or occupational qualifications. 58 Fed. Reg. 68,791 (Dec. 29, 1993). Temporary diversity visa programs had previously been established by § 314 of Pub. L. No. 99–603, 100 Stat. 3359 (1986), § 3 of Pub. L. No. 100–658, 102 Stat. 3908 (1988) (8 U.S.C. § 1153 note) (see Digest 1989–90 at 40) and § 132 of Pub. L. No. 101–649, 104 Stat. 4978 (1990). Department of State regulations implementing the permanent diversity visa program were published on December 29, 1993, 58 Fed. Reg. 68,791.

(2) Nonimmigrant visas

(i) Business visas

(A) NAFTA business entrants

In December 1992 the Presidents of the United States and of Mexico and the Prime Minister of Canada signed the North American Free Trade Agreement ("NAFTA"). See Chapter 11.B.3. NAFTA, which entered into force on January 1, 1994, provided among other things for the admission of Canadian and Mexican citizens as temporary visitors under § 101(a)(15)(B) of the INA; as treaty traders and investors under INA § 101(a)(15)(E); and as intracompany transferees under INA § 101(a)(15)(L). NAFTA also created a new class of nonimmigrant visas for Canadian and Mexican citizens seeking to engage in professional activities. Mexican, but not Canadian, professionals were subject to an annual limit of 5,500 per year for at least the first ten years of the agreement; they also were required to enter on the basis of a petition filed by a United States employer. Admission could be denied where the temporary entry of a business person might affect adversely the settlement of any labor dispute in progress at the place or intended place of employment, or if temporary entry would affect adversely the employment of any person involved in such dispute. Section 341(a) of the North American Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act, Pub. L. No. 103–182, 107 Stat. 2057 (1993) (19 U.S.C. § 3401) provided the necessary authority for Canadian and Mexican individuals to be classified as treaty traders and investors. Section 341(b) of the Act amended § 214(e) of the INA to provide for the new NAFTA professional category. On December 30, 1993, the INS issued an interim final rule effective January 11, 1994, implementing the business entrant provisions of NAFTA and the implementing legislation. 58 Fed. Reg. 69,205 (Dec. 30, 1993).

(B) Treaty traders and investors

On October 30, 1991, the INS published proposed regulations to codify its existing policy guidelines regarding the classification of nonimmigrant treaty traders and investors under INA § 101(a)(15)(E). 56 Fed. Reg. 42,952 (Aug. 30, 1991). On September 3, 1991, the Department of State proposed regulations to implement the provisions of § 204(c) of the Immigration Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101–649, 104 Stat. 4978, which required the Secretary of State to promulgate a regulatory definition of the term "substantial" after consultation with other appropriate U.S. government agencies. To qualify for treaty trader status, the trade conducted by the individual must be "substantial"; to qualify for treaty investor status, the investment must involve "a substantial amount of capital." 56 Fed. Reg. 43,565 (Sept. 3, 1991). Although the rules were intended to be identical in substance, the different language used by the two agencies led commenters to conclude that the rules were substantively different. One notable example lay in the two agencies' definitions of "substantial" trade. Six years later, the two agencies issued simultaneous and harmonized regulations, in which the INS deferred to the Department of State's definition of "substantial." 62 Fed. Reg. 48,138 (Sept. 12, 1997); 62 Fed. Reg. 48,149 (Sept. 12, 1997).

(ii) Abused spouses and children

Section 40,701(a) of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103–322, 108 Stat. 1796 (as amended at 8 U.S.C. §§ 1101–1154), permitted abused spouses and children to apply on their own behalf for immediate relative status as the spouse or child of a U.S. citizen abuser under § 204 of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1154(a), or for family preference immigration status as the spouse or child of a U.S. permanent resident abuser under § 203(a) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1153, even if the marriage giving rise to the status had terminated.

(iii) Visa Waiver Pilot Program

The visa waiver pilot program, originally limited to eight countries, was authorized by § 313 of the Immigration Control and Reform Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99–603, 100 Stat. 3435, which added § 217 to the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1187. See Digest 1989–90 at 26–27. Section 201 of the Immigration Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101–649, 104 Stat. 4978, removed the eight-country cap and extended the program until September 30, 1994. In an interim rule published at 56 Fed. Reg. 46,716 (Sept. 13, 1991), the Department of State and the Department of Justice, acting jointly, designated Andorra, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Monaco, New Zealand, Norway, San Marino, and Spain as visa waiver pilot program countries effective October 1, 1991. Brunei was designated as a participant in an interim rule published at 58 Fed. Reg. 40,581 (July 29, 1993). Section 211 of Pub. L. No. 103–416, 108 Stat. 4305 (1994) (8 U.S.C. § 1187), further extended the program until September 30, 1996, and created a new probationary status for countries meeting certain criteria. Ireland was added to the program as a country with probationary status effective April 1, 1995. 60 Fed. Reg. 15,872 (Mar. 28, 1995). On July 9, 1996, Argentina was added as a non-probationary participating country, 61 Fed. Reg. 35,628 (July 8, 1996), and Australia was added on July 29, 1996, 61 Fed. Reg. 39,318 (July 29, 1996). Section 635 of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Div. C, Pub. L. No. 104–208, 110 Stat. 3009–702 (1996) continued the pilot program until September 30, 1997, and provided that the Attorney General would designate visa waiver countries "in consultation with" the Secretary of State, instead of jointly, as had previously been the case. On September 30, 1997, the Attorney General added Slovenia as a participating country, 62 Fed. Reg. 51,030 (Sept. 30, 1997). Section 125 of Pub. L. No. 105–119, 111 Stat. 2440 (1997) (8 U.S.C. § 1187), extended the pilot program through September 30, 1998, and § 1 of Pub. L. No. 105–173, 112 Stat. 56 (1998), extended it again through September 30, 2000. The Attorney General subsequently designated and authorized Portugal, Singapore and Uruguay to participate as visa waiver program countries effective August 9, 1999. See 64 Fed. Reg. 42,032 (Aug. 3, 1999).

(iv) Temporary entry and stay of natural persons under the 1994 General Agreement on Trade in Services

Under the General Agreement on Trade in Services ("GATS"), one of the agreements resulting from the Uruguay Round of trade negotiations, see Chapter 11.B.2.a, the United States made specific commitments relating to the entry and stay of services salespersons, who received visas under § 101(a)(15)(B)(ii) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15)(B)(ii); intracorporate transferees, who received visas under § 101(a)(15)(L) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15)(L); and fashion models and specialists, who received visas under § 101(a)(15)(H)(i)(b) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15)(H)(i)(b). The commitments may be found at www.wto.org/English/tratop_e/serv_e/serv_commitment_e.htm.

(v) "S" Visas

Section 130003 of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103–322, 108 Stat. 1796 (Sept. 13, 1994) created a new nonimmigrant visa by adding subsection (S) to INA § 101(a)(15), 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15)(S). The first paragraph of subsection (S) provided for the admission as nonimmigrants of aliens who were determined by the Attorney General to possess critical reliable information concerning a criminal organization or enterprise, who were willing to provide that information to federal and/or state authorities, and whose presence was essential to the success of an authorized criminal investigation or prosecution. The second paragraph covered aliens whom the Secretary of State and the Attorney General jointly determined possessed critical reliable information about a terrorist organization, enterprise or operation; who were willing to provide or have such information provided to federal law enforcement authorities or a federal court; who showed that they were or would be placed in danger as a result of providing such information; and were eligible for a reward under 22 U.S.C. § 2708. Section 130003 also added a new § 214(j)(i) to the INA that limited admissions in the first category to no more than 100 per fiscal year, and admissions in the second category to no more than 25 per fiscal year.

(vi) Irish peace process cultural and training program

Section 2 of the Irish Peace Process Cultural and Training Program Act of 1998, Pub. L. No. 105–319, 112 Stat. 3013 (8 U.S.C. § 1101), provided for the admission under INA § 101(a)(15)(Q), 8 U.S.C. § 1105(a)(Q), of 4,000 Irish nationals from designated counties within the Republic of Ireland in each year of a four year program so that they could contribute to economic regeneration in Ireland and the Irish peace process by developing job skills and conflict resolution abilities. The Department of State implemented the program after publishing regulations at 22 CFR Part 139.

c. The Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996

Following the bombing of the World Trade Center in 1993 and the bombing of the Federal Building in Oklahoma in 1995, Congress enacted the Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–132, 110 Stat. 1214 (1996) ("AEDPA"). In his signing statement, President William J. Clinton remarked that AEDPA, inter alia, would:

> allow U.S. officials to deport terrorists from American soil without being compelled by the terrorists to divulge classified information, and to bar terrorists from entering the United States in the first place.

32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 717, 719 (Apr. 29, 1996).

(1) Designation of "foreign terrorist organization"

As discussed in Chapter 3.B. b.(1), § 302 of AEDPA added a new § 219, 8 U.S.C. § 1189, to the INA authorizing the Secretary of State to designate an organization as a "foreign terrorist organization."

(2) Exclusion of alien terrorists

Section 411 of AEDPA expanded the exclusion of terrorists, INA § 212(a)(3)(B), 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B), that had been added by the Immigration Act of 1990, 101 Pub. L. No. 649, 104 Stat. 4978 (1990) (see Digest 1989–90 at 33–34). The amendment clarified that an alien who is engaged in any terrorist activity is inadmissible (past and likely future activity were already explicitly covered) and made inadmissible any alien who is a representative or a member of a foreign terrorist organization designated by the Secretary of State under the new § 219. A "representative" was defined to include "an officer, official, or spokesman of an organization, and any person who directs, counsels, commands, or induces an organization or its members to engage in terrorist activity."

(3) Alien terrorist removal provisions

Section 401 of AEDPA added a new Title V to the INA (8 U.S.C. §§ 1531–1537) providing special removal procedures for "alien terrorists." An "alien terrorist," as defined in INA § 241(a)(4)(B) (8 U.S.C. § 1231(a)(4)(B)) (renumbered § 237(a)(4)(B), 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(4)(B), by the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, see section d below) was any "alien who has engaged, is engaged, or at any time after admission engages in any terrorist activity as defined in INA § 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)." A special removal court, created by appointment by the Chief Justice of the United States of five U.S. district court judges, was to consider applications by the Attorney General to remove alien terrorists. Provision was made for the protection of classified information from discovery by the alleged terrorist, and for the removal hearing to proceed on the basis of an unclassified summary, if the judge found it sufficient to enable the alien to prepare a defense, after an ex parte review by the judge of the underlying classified information. Appeals from the decisions of the removal court had to be filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The Attorney General was authorized to take and retain in custody any alien with respect to which an application for removal as an alien terrorist had been filed until appeals were resolved, and, if an order of removal was issued, until removal to another country. Permanent resident aliens could request a release hearing. The actions of the Attorney General in deciding to continue the detention of an alien ordered removed whom no country was willing to receive were not to be subject to judicial review, including habeas corpus, except for a claim by the alien that continued detention violated his or her constitutional rights.

(4) Criminal penalty for reentry of alien terrorists

Section 401(c) of AEDPA amended § 276(b) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1326(b), to make it a criminal offense for an alien who had been excluded pursuant to INA § 235(c) (8 U.S.C. § 1225(c)) (removal of aliens on security and related grounds), because of ineligibility under INA § 212(a)(3)(B) (8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B)) (security and related grounds), or who had been removed under INA Title V (see section c(3) supra) to enter or attempt to enter the United States without the permission of the Attorney General.

(5) Denial of other relief for alien terrorists

Section 413 of AEDPA amended § 243(h) of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1253(h)) (renumbered § 241(a)(b)(3), 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(3), by the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, see section d below) to provide that an alien removable as an "alien terrorist" would be considered an alien as to whom there are "reasonable grounds for regarding [the alien] as a danger to the security of the United States," thus making the alien ineligible for withholding of deportation under § 243(h). Section 243(h) implements Article 33 of the United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees that, by operation of the 1967 UN Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, obligates the United States, with certain exceptions, not to return a refugee to a country where the alien's life or freedom would be threatened because of the alien's race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion. Section 413 of AEDPA also amended § 243(h) to give the Attorney General discretion to waive the alien's ineligibility if granting withholding of deportation was necessary to ensure compliance with Article 33. See also Digest 1989–90 at 47–54, and section D.1 below.

Section 413 of AEDPA also made "alien terrorists" ineligible for suspension of deportation and voluntary departure (which are less punitive alternatives to deportation) as well as for adjustment of status to that of a legal permanent resident.

(6) Exclusion of aliens who were not inspected and admitted

Section 414 of AEDPA made aliens in the United States who were not admitted to the United States after inspection (i.e., who were not lawfully admitted) subject to exclusion, rather than deportation, proceedings, thus giving them fewer protections and making it easier to remove them from the United States.

(7) Denial of asylum to alien terrorists

Section 421 of AEDPA provided that the Attorney General could not grant political asylum if the Attorney General determined that the alien was excludable under INA § 212(a)(3)(B) (8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B) (security and related grounds) or deportable under INA § 241(a)(4)(B) (8 U.S.C. § 1231(a)(4)(B)

(security and related grounds) (renumbered INA § 237(a)(4), 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(4), by the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, see section d below) unless the Attorney General determined there were "not reasonable grounds for regarding the alien as a danger to the security of the United States."

(8) Expedited removal procedure

Section 422 of AEDPA amended INA § 235(b)(1) to provide for expedited removal of aliens who had engaged in misrepresentation or lacked documents. It was repealed and superseded by § 302 of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (see section d(1)(iii) below).

(9) Preclusion of judicial review

Section 423 of AEDPA amended INA § 106, 8 U.S.C. § 1105a, to provide that no court would have jurisdiction to review any individual determination, or to entertain any other cause or claim, arising from or relating to the implementation or operation of INA § 235(b)(1) (see section c(8) supra). Judicial review in such cases was limited to habeas proceedings and to determinations of (A) whether the petitioner is an alien, (B) whether the petitioner was ordered specially excluded under INA § 235(b)(1)(A), and (C) whether the petitioner was an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence who was entitled to administrative review of an order of exclusion under INA § 235(b)(1)(A).

(10) Deportation of nonviolent offenders prior to completion of sentence of imprisonment Section 438 of AEDPA amended INA § 242(h) (8 U.S.C. § 1252(h)) (renumbered as INA § 241(a)(4), 8 U.S.C.

§ 1231(a)(4), by the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, see section d below) to authorize the Attorney General to remove an alien who was imprisoned in a federal facility for a nonviolent offense prior to completion of the alien's sentence of imprisonment if the removal of the alien was appropriate and in the best interest of the United States. The Attorney General was similarly authorized to remove a nonviolent offender alien prior to completion of a sentence in a state facility if the chief state official with authority over the alien's incarceration determined that removal was appropriate and in the best interest of the state and submitted a written request.

d. The Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996

The Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 ("IIRIRA") was signed into law by President William J. Clinton as Division C of the Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act, 1997, Pub. L. No. 104–208, 110 Stat. 3009–546, on September 30, 1996. In signing Pub. L. No. 104–208, President Clinton commented that IIRIRA "strengthens the rule of law by cracking down on illegal immigration at the border, in the workplace and in the criminal justice system—without punishing those living in the United States legally." 26 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1935 (Oct. 7, 1996).

IIRIRA sought to deter illegal immigration by improving border control, facilitating legal entry and interior enforcement (§§ 101–110); increasing civil and criminal penalties for offenses related to alien smuggling (§§ 201–220); requiring three types of employment authorization verification pilot programs, and making certain other adjustments to employer sanctions for hiring illegal aliens (§§ 401–421) (for discussion of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, which established employer sanctions, see I Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 638–45); restricting public benefits available to aliens (§§ 501–510); and imposing new requirements on sponsors of alien relatives for immigration (§ 551).

As described below, IIRIRA also changed the procedures for denying aliens entry and for removing aliens, added to and amended the grounds for denying aliens visas and admission to the United States and removing aliens, and placed limitations on judicial review of certain removal decisions.

(1) Reorganization and amendment of removal procedures

(i) Treating persons present in the United States without authorization as not admitted

Section 301(a) of IIRIRA amended the INA to provide that an alien has been "admitted" only if the alien entered lawfully after inspection and authorization by an immigration officer. Aliens present in the United States who had not been admitted or who arrived in the United States (whether or not at a designated port of arrival and including aliens brought to the United States after being interdicted in international or United States waters) were deemed "applicants for admission," and are on a par with aliens who apply for entry at a port of entry or who are stopped at the border. Previously, aliens who managed to enter the United States illegally had been treated as deportable, which placed a higher burden on the Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") to remove them. See section d(1)(iii) below.

(ii) Consolidation of exclusion and deportation proceedings

Section 304 of IIRIRA created a new removal proceeding in INA § 240, 8 U.S.C. § 1229a, to replace the previous separate proceedings for exclusion and deportation. The new removal proceeding imposed on an "applicant for admission" the burden to show that he or she was clearly and beyond doubt entitled to admission and was not inadmissible. Aliens in the United States were given the burden of showing by clear and convincing evidence that they were lawfully present in the United States pursuant to a prior admission. If an alien had been lawfully admitted, INS had the burden to show by clear and convincing evidence that the alien was removable.

(iii) Expedited removal procedure

Section 302 of IIRIRA repealed Section 422 of AEDPA (see section c(8) supra) and substituted a revised expedited removal procedure. Section 302 amended INA § 235(b)(1), 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1), to permit an immigration officer to order an alien excluded from the United States without further hearing or review if the alien was inadmissible under INA § 212(a)(6)(C) (8 U.S.C. § 1182 (a)(6)(C)) (misrepresentation) or § 212(a)(7) (8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(7)) (lack of required documents) so long as the alien did not indicate an intention to apply for asylum or a fear of persecution.

Congress decided to adopt an "expedited removal" system because of its finding that "thousands of aliens arrive in the United States each year without valid documents and attempt to illegally enter the U.S." H.R. Rep. No. 104–469, pt. 1, at 158 (1996). As noted in the conference report for IIRIRA, the purpose of the new removal procedures was:

> [t]o expedite the removal from the United States of aliens who indisputably have no authorization to be admitted . . . while providing an opportunity for such an alien who claims asylum to have the merits of his or her claim promptly assessed by officers with full professional training in adjudicating asylum claims.

H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 104–828, at 209 (1996).

The new procedures applied to aliens arriving in the United States and, if designated by the Attorney General, aliens who had not been admitted or paroled into the United States and who had not shown to the satisfaction of an immigration officer that they had been physically present in the United States continuously for the 2-year period immediately prior to the date of the determination of inadmissibility. The expedited removal procedure was not, however, applied to Cuban nationals.

Section 302 provided that if the alien expressed a desire to apply for asylum or a fear of persecution, the alien was to be interviewed by an asylum officer. If the asylum officer determined that the alien had a credible fear of persecution, the alien was to be detained for further consideration of the asylum application. If the asylum officer concluded that the alien did not have a credible fear of persecution, the alien could request prompt review by an immigration judge.

Other than the provision for review of an asylum officer's negative credible fear determination by an immigration judge, an expedited removal order was subject to administrative appeal only in cases involving permanent resident aliens, aliens admitted as refugees, or aliens granted asylum.

(iv) Expedited removal procedure for aliens inadmissible on security and related grounds

Section 302(c) of IIRIRA amended INA § 235, 8 U.S.C. § 1225, to provide that an immigration officer or an immigration judge who suspected that an arriving alien might be inadmissible under INA § 212(a)(3)(A) (espionage and sabotage or attempted overthrow of the U.S. Government), (B) (terrorist activities) or (C) (foreign policy) (8 U.S.C. §§ 1182(a)(3)(A), (B), (C)) must order the alien removed and report the order of removal to the Attorney General. If the Attorney General was satisfied on the basis of confidential information that the alien was inadmissible under those subsections and concluded that disclosure of the information would be prejudicial to the public interest, safety or security, then the Attorney General could order the alien removed without further inquiry or hearing by an immigration judge.

(v) Detention and removal of aliens ordered removed

Section 305 of IIRIRA amended previous provisions on the detention and removal of aliens ordered removed and placed them in a new INA § 241, 8 U.S.C. § 1231. The new § 241 shortened the period the Attorney General had to remove the alien from six months (under pre-existing law) to 90 days. It mandated the detention of certain criminal aliens during the removal proceedings and the removal period. Moreover, it added a provision (§ 241(a)(6)) giving the Attorney General authority to detain beyond the removal period aliens ordered removed who were inadmissible under INA § 212 (8 U.S.C. § 1182), removable under INA §§ 237(a)(1)(C) (nonimmigrant status violators or violators of conditions of entry), 237(a)(2) (criminal offenses), or 237(a)(4) (security and related grounds) (8 U.S.C. §§ 1227(a)(1)(C), (a)(2), (a)(4)) or who the Attorney General determined were a risk to the community or unlikely to comply with the order of removal.

(2) Grounds of inadmissibility and grounds for deportation

(i) Aliens previously removed and unlawfully present

Section 301(b) of IIRIRA added a new paragraph (9) to INA § 212, 8 U.S.C. § 1182, making inadmissible (subject to certain exceptions and possible waivers) (1) any alien ordered removed upon arrival in the United States who sought admission within 5 years of the date of removal (or within 20 years in the case of a second or subsequent removal, or at any time if the alien was convicted of an aggravated felony); (2) any other alien who was ordered removed under INA § 240, 8 U.S.C. § 1229a, or any other provision of law or who left the United States while an order of removal was outstanding who sought admission within 10 years of the date of departure or removal (or within 20 years in the case of a second or subsequent removal or at any time if the alien was convicted of an aggravated felony); (3) any alien, other than a lawful permanent resident, who was unlawfully present in the United States for a period of more than 180 days but less than one year and voluntarily departed the United States prior to the commencement of removal proceedings who sought admission within 3 years of the date of departure or removal; (4) any alien, other than a lawful permanent resident, who was unlawfully present in the United States for one year or more and sought admission within 10 years of the date of departure or removal, or (5) any alien who was unlawfully present in the United States for an aggregate period of more than 1 year or who had been ordered removed and who entered or attempted to reenter the United States without being admitted. An alien was deemed to have been "unlawfully present" if the alien was present in the United States after the expiration of the period of stay authorized by the Attorney General or without being admitted or paroled.

(ii) Aliens present without admission or parole

Section 301(c) of IIRIRA amended INA § 212(a)(6) to make inadmissible, subject to an exception for certain battered women and children, an alien who (1) was present in the United States without being admitted or paroled, or who arrived in the United States at any time or place other than as designated by the Attorney General or (2) failed or refused to attend or remain in attendance at a proceeding to determine the alien's inadmissibility or deportability and who sought admission to the United States within 5 years of departure or removal.

(iii) Alien guardian required to accompany helpless alien

Section 308(c)(2) of IIRIRA added a new subparagraph (B) under INA § 212(a)(10), 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(10), making inadmissible an alien who was accompanying another alien who was inadmissible and who was certified to be helpless from sickness, mental or physical disability, or infancy and whose protection or guardianship was determined to be required by the helpless alien.

(iv) Aliens involved in or connected to terrorism

Section 342 of IIRIRA added to the grounds of inadmissibility under INA § 212(a)(3)(B), 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B), inciting terrorist activity under circumstances indicating an intention to cause death or serious bodily harm and providing false documentation to terrorists. The exclusion of representatives of terrorist organizations inserted by § 411(1)(C) of AEDPA (see section c(2) supra) was amended by § 355 of IIRIRA to provide for inadmissibility if "the alien knows or should have known" the organization was a terrorist organization.

(v) Aliens who have falsely claimed U.S. citizenship

Section 344 of IIRIRA added a new ground of inadmissibility to INA § 212 (a)(6)(C) (8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(6)(C)), and a new ground of removal to INA § 237(a)(3)(D) (8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(3)(D)), for aliens who "falsely represent, or have falsely represented" themselves to be U.S. citizens for purposes of receiving benefits under the INA or any other federal or state law.

(vi) Student visa abusers

Section 346 of IIRIRA added a new subparagraph (G) to INA § 212(a)(6) (8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(6)), making excludable an alien who violated a term or condition of his or her student visa status (INA § 101(a)(15)(F)(i), 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15)(F)(i)) until the alien had been outside the United States continuously for five years after the violation.

(vii) Unlawful voters

Section 347 of IIRIRA added a new subparagraph (D) to INA § 212(a)(10) (8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(10)(D)(i)), providing for the inadmissibility of any alien who voted in violation of any federal, state, or local law, and added a new paragraph to § 237(a) (8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)), providing for the deportation of any such alien.

(viii) Criminal aliens

Section 321 of IIRIRA broadened the definition of "aggravated felony" provided in INA § 101(a)(43), as amended by § 441(e) of AEDPA, to provide that an alien who committed an aggravated felony at any time after admission was deportable under INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(iii), 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(iii). Section 348 of IIRIRA prohibited the Attorney General from granting a waiver of criminal ineligibilities under INA § 212(h), 8 U.S.C. § 1182(h), to an alien previously admitted to the United States as an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if the alien had been convicted of an aggravated felony since the date of admission or had not lawfully resided continuously in the United States for a period of not less than 7 years immediately prior to removal proceedings.

Section 350 of IIRIRA added a new subparagraph (E) to INA § 237(a)(2), 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2), making deportable any alien who at any time after entry was convicted of a crime of domestic violence, a crime of stalking, or a crime of child abuse, child neglect, or child abandonment. It also added in new subparagraph (E) a provision making deportable any alien who at any time after entry violated a protection order issued for the purpose of preventing violent or threatening acts of domestic violence.

(x) Renunciation of U.S. citizenship to avoid taxation

Section 352 of IIRIRA added a new subparagraph (D) to INA § 212(a)(10), 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(10), providing for the inadmissibility of former citizens who renounced citizenship to avoid taxation.

(xi) High speed flight from immigration checkpoint

Section 108(c) of IIRIRA added conviction of a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 758, relating to high speed flight from an immigration checkpoint, to INA § 237(a)(2)(A), 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A), as a new ground of deportation.

(3) Preclusion of judicial review

Section 306 of IIRIRA repealed INA § 106 (8 U.S.C. § 1105a) (see c(9) supra), and replaced it with INA § 242, 8 U.S.C. § 1252, containing a number of limitations on judicial review of removal orders. Petitions for review of final removal orders generally had to be filed with the court of appeals for the judicial circuit in which the immigration judge completed the proceedings, and judicial review of all questions of law and fact (including interpretation and application of constitutional and statutory provisions) arising from any action taken or proceeding brought to remove an alien was made available only in judicial review of a final order of removal (INA § 242(b), (c), (d), 8 U.S.C. § 1252(b), (c), (d)). With respect to expedited removal orders under INA § 235(b)(1) (8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1)) (see d(1)(iv) supra), except for limited jurisdiction in habeas corpus proceedings, no court was to have jurisdiction to review any individual determination or any other cause or claim relating to the implementation or operation of the removal order, a decision by the Attorney General to invoke the section, the application of the section to individual aliens, or any procedures and policies adopted by the Attorney General to implement the section (INA § 242(a), 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)). Judicial review of expedited removal orders in habeas corpus proceedings was confined to determinations of whether the petitioner was an alien, whether the petitioner was ordered removed under the section and whether the petitioner could prove that the petitioner had been admitted for permanent residence or as a refugee or had been granted asylum (INA § 242(e), 8

U.S.C. § 1252(e)). Only the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia had jurisdiction to review initially whether INA § 235(b) or an implementing regulation was constitutional, or whether a regulation or other written procedure to implement the section was consistent with IIRIRA or otherwise consistent with law, and any suit had to be filed within 60 days of the date the section, regulation or procedure was implemented.

Section 242(a) also provided that no court would have jurisdiction to review any judgment relating to the granting of relief under INA §§ 212(h) (8 U.S.C. § 1182(h)) (waiver of certain criminal ineligibilities), 212(i) (8 U.S.C. § 1182(i)) (waiver of fraud or willful misrepresentation ineligibility), 240A (8 U.S.C. § 1229b) (cancellation of removal), 240B (8 U.S.C. § 1229c) (voluntary departure), or 245 (8 U.S.C. § 1255) (adjustment of status to that of a lawful permanent resident).

Section 242(a) further stated that no court would have jurisdiction to review any final order of removal against an alien who was removable by reason of having committed a crime covered in INA §§ 212(a)(2) (8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(2)) or 237(a)(2)(A)(iii), (B), (C), or (D) (8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(iii), (B), (C), or (D)).

Section 242(f) also placed limits on injunctive relief. It provided that no court other than the U.S. Supreme Court could enjoin or restrain the operation of the IIRIRA provisions relating to removal of aliens, except with respect to the application of such provisions to an individual alien against whom removal proceedings had been initiated. It also stated that no court could enjoin the removal of an alien unless the alien showed by clear and convincing evidence that the entry or execution of the final removal order was precluded as a matter of law.

Finally, § 242(g) stated that except as provided in § 242, no court would have jurisdiction to hear any claim by any alien arising from the decision or action by the Attorney General to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders against any alien under the INA.

(4) Litigation

Following enactment of IIRIRA, litigation ensued on whether the Attorney General was authorized under INA § 241(a)(6) (8 U.S.C. § 1231(a)(6)) to detain aliens who had been ordered removed indefinitely beyond the removal period (see d(1)(v) above). In Zadvydas v. Underdown, 185 F.3d 279 (5th Cir. 1999), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit concluded that an alien's detention did not violate the Due Process Clause of the Constitution, even though three countries had refused to accept him, because eventual deportation was not "impossible," good faith efforts to remove him from the United States continued, and his detention was subject to periodic administrative review. By contrast, in Kim Ho Ma v. Reno, 208 F.3d 815 (9th Cir. 2000), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the holding of a five-judge panel of the Federal District Court for the Western District of Washington that the Constitution prohibited post-removal-period detention unless there were a realistic chance that the alien would be deported and the panel's order that a detained Cambodian should be released because, given the lack of a repatriation agreement between Cambodia and the United States, there was no "realistic chance" that he would be returned. The U.S. Supreme Court ultimately decided, in Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001), that INA § 241(a)(6) contained an implicit "reasonable time" presumption of six months. After six months, if the alien provided good reason to believe that there was no significant likelihood of removal in the reasonably foreseeable future, the government would have to respond with evidence sufficient to rebut that showing. See Digest 2001 at 17–20.

e. Inadmissibility of religious persecutors

As one of the sanctions for religious persecution imposed by the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998, Pub. L. No. 105–292, 112 Stat. 2787, 22 U.S.C. § 6401(note) (1998), § 604 made aliens who had engaged in "particularly serious violations of religious freedom" inadmissible to the United States. In § 3 of the Act, "particularly serious violations of religious freedom" were defined as systematic, ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom, including violations such as torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment for punishment; prolonged detention without charges; causing the disappearance of persons by the abduction or clandestine detention of those persons; or other flagrant denial of the right to life, liberty, or the security of persons. Section 604 added the following new subparagraph to § 212(a)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(2)):

> (G) FOREIGN GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS WHO HAVE ENGAGED IN PARTICULARLY SEVERE VIOLATIONS OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.—Any alien who, while serving as a foreign government official, was responsible for or directly carried out, at any time during the preceding 24-month period, particularly severe violations of religious freedom, as defined in section 3 of the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998, and the spouse and children, if any, are inadmissible.

The House Committee on the Judiciary report on the Act noted that the provision was "in keeping with the United States' tradition of denying admission to criminals, wrongdoers and violators of human rights." H.R. Rep. No. 105–480, pt. 3, at 18 (May 8, 1998).

f. Denial of visas to beneficiaries of uncompensated Cuban expropriations of American property

Section 401 of Title IV of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (LIBERTAD) Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–114, 110 Stat. 785 (1996) (also known as "the Helms-Burton Act" or simply "Helms-Burton"), prohibited visa issuance to, and required exclusion of, any alien whom the Secretary of State determined had confiscated or directed the confiscation of property owned by a United States national, who converted such property for personal gain, who had trafficked in such property, or who was a corporate officer, principal or shareholder with a controlling interest of an entity which had been involved in the confiscation of such property or trafficking in such property. Confiscation was defined to encompass the taking of property without "adequate and effective compensation." The text of § 401 is set forth below.

SEC. 401. EXCLUSION FROM THE UNITED STATES OF ALIENS WHO HAVE CONFISCATED PROPERTY OF UNITED STATES NATIONALS OR WHO TRAFFIC IN SUCH PROPERTY.

(a) GROUNDS FOR EXCLUSION.—The Secretary of State shall deny a visa to, and the Attorney General shall exclude from the United States, any alien who the Secretary of State determines is a person who, after the date of the enactment of this Act—

(1) has confiscated, or has directed or overseen the confiscation of, property a claim to which is owned by a United States national, or converts or has converted for personal gain confiscated property, a claim to which is owned by a United States national;
(2) traffics in confiscated property, a claim to which is owned by a United States national;
(3) is a corporate officer, principal, or shareholder with a controlling interest of an entity which has been involved in the confiscation of property or trafficking in confiscated property, a claim to which is owned by a United States national; or
(4) is a spouse, minor child, or agent of a person excludable under paragraph (1), (2), or (3).

(b) DEFINITIONS.—As used in this section, the following terms have the following meanings:

(1) CONFISCATED; CONFISCATION.—The terms "confiscated" and "confiscation" refer to—
(A) the nationalization, expropriation, or other seizure by the Cuban Government of ownership or control of property—
(i) without the property having been returned or adequate and effective compensation provided; or
(ii) without the claim to the property having been settled pursuant to an international claims settlement agreement or other mutually accepted settlement procedure; and
(B) the repudiation by the Cuban Government of, the default by the Cuban Government on, or the failure of the Cuban Government on, or the failure of the Cuban Government to pay—
(i) a debt of any enterprise which has been nationalized, expropriated, or otherwise taken by the Cuban Government;
(ii) a debt which is a charge on property nationalized, expropriated, or otherwise taken by the Cuban Government; or
(iii) a debt which was incurred by the Cuban Government in satisfaction or settlement of a confiscated property claim.

(2) TRAFFICS.—(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), a person "traffics" in confiscated property if that person knowingly and intentionally—
(i) (I) transfers, distributes, dispenses, brokers, or otherwise disposes of confiscated property,
(II) purchases, receives, obtains control of, or otherwise acquires confiscated property, or
(III) improves (other than for routine maintenance), invests in (by contribution of funds or anything of value, other than for routine maintenance), or begins after the date of the enactment of this Act to manage, lease, possess, use, or hold an interest in confiscated property,
(ii) enters into a commercial arrangement using or otherwise benefiting from confiscated property, or
(iii) causes, directs, participates in, or profits from, trafficking (as described in clause (i) or (ii)) by another person, or otherwise engages in trafficking (as described in clause (i) or (ii)) through another person, without the authorization of any United States national who holds a claim to the property.

(B) The term "traffics" does not include—
(i) the delivery of international telecommunication signals to Cuba;
(ii) the trading or holding of securities publicly traded or held, unless the trading is with or by a person determined by the Secretary of the Treasury to be a specially designated national;
(iii) transactions and uses of property incident to lawful travel to Cuba, to the extent that such transactions and uses of property are necessary to the conduct of such travel; or
(iv) transactions and uses of property by a person who is both a citizen of Cuba and a resident of Cuba, and who is not an official of the Cuban Government or the ruling political party in Cuba.

(c) EXEMPTION.—This section shall not apply where the Secretary of State finds, on a case by case basis, that the entry into the United States of the person who would otherwise be excluded under this section is necessary for medical reasons or for purposes of litigation of an action under Title III.

* * * *

On June 17, 1996, the Department of State published guidelines for the implementation of Title IV of the LIBERTAD Act, 61 Fed. Reg. 30,655 (June 17, 1996). In a June 22, 1999 telegram to all diplomatic and consular posts, excerpted below, the Department set out the guidelines, requested that posts deliver a copy of the guidelines to host governments that had expressed a strong interest in the Act, suggested a number of talking points for presenting them, and provided press guidance for responding to any media inquiries about the guidelines. For an example of payment in connection with confiscated property resolving the question of whether a company's activities constituted "trafficking" within the meaning of Title IV, see http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings/statements/970723f.html.

5. Determinations of Excludability and Ineligibility.
Determinations of ineligibility and excludability under Title IV will be made when facts or circumstances exist that would lead the Department reasonably to conclude that a person has engaged in confiscation or trafficking after March 12, 1996.

6. Prior Notification.
A. An alien who may be the subject of a determination under Title IV will be sent notification by registered mail that his/her name will be entered in the visa lookout system and port of entry exclusion system, and that he/she will be denied a visa upon application or have his/her visa revoked, 45 days after the date of the notification letter. The alien will be informed that divesting from a "trafficking" arrangement would avert the exclusion. The Department may inform the government of the alien's country of nationality in confidence through diplomatic channels of the name of any corporation or other entity related to this action.

B. If no information is received within the 45 day period above that leads the Department reasonably to conclude (I) that the alien or company involved has not engaged in trafficking or is no longer doing so, or (II) that an exception to trafficking under section 401(b)(2)(B) applies, the Department will notify consular officers and the Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") of a determination by entering the alien's name, including the names of the alien's agents, spouse and minor children, if applicable, in the appropriate lookout system, and a visa application from the named alien will be denied or a visa revoked in accordance with the law. Entry of the named alien into the appropriate lookout systems will be the exclusive means by which consular officers and the INS will verify that the alien has been determined to be excludable under section 401 of the Act.

7. Exemptions.
The Department may grant an exemption for diplomatic and consular personnel of foreign governments, and representatives to and officials of international organizations. An alien may request from the Department an exemption for medical reasons or for purposes of litigation of an action under Title III of the Act to the extent permitted under section 401(c) of the Act. The Department will notify Department consular officers and the INS through appropriate channels of the decision to grant an exemption to a person otherwise excludable under Title IV of the Act. The Department may impose appropriate conditions on any exemption granted.

8. Review of Determinations. The Department may review a determination made under Title IV at any time, as appropriate, upon the receipt of information indicating that the determination was in error, that a person has ended all involvement with confiscated U.S. property in Cuba, that an exception applies under section 401(b)(2)(B), or that an exemption should be granted under section 401(c).

* * * *

10. Persons with Business Dealings with Persons Subject to a Determination. It is not sufficient in itself for a determination under section 401(a) that a person has merely had business dealings with a person for whom a determination is made under section 401(a).

* * * *

12. No Right of Action. Nothing in these guidelines will create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable by a party against the United States, its agencies or instrumentalities, its officers or its employees, or any other person.

* * * *

[Talking points]

- The U.S. remains committed to a dialogue with allies as we move forward with the implementation process. We agreed to take the concerns other governments have raised into account when drafting the guidelines, and have done so. We are sharing advance copies of the guidelines in this spirit. We have not sought formal comments on the guidelines prior to publication.
- The purpose of the guidelines is to provide information about what procedures the Department will follow in implementing Title IV, and about what criteria will be used in making determinations of "trafficking" under Title IV.

- The guidelines may be revised at any time, based on input from the public or other governments as well as our implementation experience. Any revisions would be published in the Federal Register to ensure transparency.
- We recognize that the guidelines neither address every possible hypothetical situation nor answer all questions. Many issues will only become clear after we begin examining cases and making determinations.
- After the guidelines are published, the Department of State will rapidly proceed with a careful examination of possible cases involving suspected trafficking. As soon as we have sufficient information to establish that trafficking after March 12, 1996 has occurred, we will make a determination of exclusion. This could happen soon.
- When determinations have been made, individuals affected will be notified by mail 45 days prior to the date on which the exclusion becomes effective. This provides an opportunity for such persons to submit to the Department any information they believe should be considered before the exclusion becomes effective.
- We expect to send advisory letters in the vast majority of cases, but may in some cases inform individuals through notification letters when a determination has been made.
- We reiterate that the State Department does not have a Helms-Burton "black list." We do not plan to release publicly the names of individuals excluded under Title IV.
- We will continue to implement the Act in a manner that minimizes misunderstandings and avoids surprises. We will be open to considering requests to provide advance notification of companies having your country's nationality that are the subject of determination.
- We are looking at all possible cases of trafficking. An inter-agency group will carefully consider all available information before determinations are made.

[Press guidance]

Q. How many companies are likely to be affected by Title IV? Which ones? Is there a list?

A. The State Department has no intention of publishing a list of individuals or companies that have been or might be affected by Title IV. Individuals determined to be "trafficking" will be notified privately by mail. We don't know yet how many companies will be determined to be "trafficking." Each case will be reviewed carefully under the guidelines before action is taken.

Q. Are you ready to make determinations of "trafficking" now? When can we expect action?

A. Now that the guidelines are published and in effect, we intend to proceed rapidly with a careful examination of suspected cases of trafficking. When we have sufficient information to establish that trafficking has occurred, we will make a determination. This could occur relatively quickly.

Q. Isn't this an extra-territorial application of U.S. law?

A. Countries have the sovereign right to control their borders, and to exclude individuals they determine to be undesirable.

Q. Isn't this a secondary boycott?

A. No. The Act is focused on deterring investment in confiscated U.S. property in Cuba, not all investment in Cuba.

Q. Doesn't Helms-Burton violate the WTO and NAFTA?

A. We believe that the Act is consistent with our international obligations. We have taken care to ensure that our implementation is similarly consistent.

* * * *

Q. Is the Administration concerned about harsh criticism from its closest allies of Helms-Burton? Isn't this hurting key U.S. relationships with other countries?

A. We have listened to the concerns our allies have expressed. We are trying to implement Helms-Burton in a way that will maximize pressure on the Cuban government while minimizing frictions with our allies and trading partners. We believe, however, that the U.S. is fully justified in offering a strong response to the Cuban government's shootdown of unarmed U.S. civilian aircraft, and in deterring foreign investors from profiting from expropriated U.S. properties in Cuba.

We reject the notion that the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act represents a lessening of the U.S. commitment to the multilateral system.

The Act is meant to pressure Cuba to change its policies and begin reforms. It also reflects the concerns of U.S. nationals who see foreign companies using confiscated assets in Cuba to which they have claims.

g. Denial of visas to persons involved in unauthorized disclosures of certain confidential business information related to chemical production

As discussed in Chapter 18.D.1., the Chemical Weapons Convention, among other things, addressed concerns of industry to protect sensitive commercial information disclosed to inspectors under the inspection regime established by the convention. Section 103(f) of the "Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998," as contained in Division I, Title I of the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1999, Pub. L. No. 105–277, 112 Stat. 2681 (1998), provided that the Secretary of State must deny a visa to, and the Attorney General must exclude, certain aliens who made unauthorized disclosures of, trafficked in, or were officers, principals or controlling stockholders of entities involved in unauthorized disclosures of, "United States confidential business information" related to the production of chemicals. Section 103(f) was one of a series of measures intended to address the fears of U.S. businesses that the reporting and inspections regime provided under the Convention would lead to misappropriation of their confidential business information. The text of § 103(f), 22 U.S.C. § 6713, is set forth below.

(f) SANCTIONS FOR UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF UNITED STATES CONFIDENTIAL BUSINESS INFORMATION.—The Secretary of State shall deny a visa to, and the Attorney General shall exclude from the United States any alien who, after the date of enactment of this Act—

> (1) is, or previously served as, an officer or employee of the Organization and who has willfully published, divulged, disclosed, or made known in any manner or to any extent not authorized by the Convention any United States confidential business information coming to him in the course of his employment or official duties, or by reason of any examination or investigation of any return, report, or record made to or filed with the Organization, or any officer or employee thereof, such practice or disclosure having resulted in financial losses or damages to a United States person and for which actions or omissions the United States has been found liable of a tort or taking pursuant to this Act;
> (2) traffics in United States confidential business information, a proven claim to which is owned by a United States national;
> (3) is a corporate officer, principal, shareholder with a controlling interest of an entity which has been involved in the unauthorized disclosure of United States confidential business information, a proven claim to which is owned by a United States national; or > (4) is a spouse, minor child, or agent of a person excludable under paragraph (1), (2), or (3).

h. Denial of visas to expropriators or confiscators of real property of U.S. nationals Section 2225 of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998, as contained in Div. G, Title XXII of the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1999, P. L. No. 105–277, 112 Stat. 2681 (1998) (8 U.S.C.

§ 1182d), authorized the Secretary of State to deny visas to aliens who, through abuse of position, convert for personal gain confiscated real property to which a U.S. national owns a claim. The text of section 2225 is set forth below.

SEC. 2225. DENIAL OF VISAS TO CONFISCATORS OF AMERICAN PROPERTY.

(a) DENIAL OF VISAS.—Except as otherwise provided in Section 401 of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (Libertad) Act of 1996 (Public Law 104–114), and subject to subsection (b), the Secretary of State may deny the issuance of a visa to any alien who—
(1) through the abuse of position, including a governmental or political party position, converts or has converted for personal gain real property that has been confiscated or expropriated, a claim to which is owned by a national of the United States, or who is complicit in such a conversion; or
(2) induces any of the actions or omissions described in paragraph (1) by any person.

(b) EXCEPTIONS.—Subsection (A) shall not apply to—
(1) any country established by international mandate through the United Nations; or
(2) any territory recognized by the United States Government to be in dispute.

(c) REPORTING REQUIREMENT.—Not later than 6 months after the date of enactment of this Act, and every 12 months thereafter, the Secretary of State shall submit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate a report, including—
(1) a list of aliens who have been denied a visa under this subsection; and
(2) a list of aliens who could have been denied a visa under subsection (a) but were issued a visa and an explanation as to why each such visa was issued.

On June 2, 1999, the Department of State published guidelines for implementation of § 2225 in the Federal Register. 64 Fed. Reg. 29,731 (June 2, 1999).

A telegram sent on June 22, 1999, to all diplomatic and consular posts (1999 State 116236), excerpted below, transmitted the text of § 2225 and the guidelines, requested that posts bring the legislation and guidelines to the attention of appropriate host governments; provided guidance on the purpose of the statutory language drawn from the report of the Committee of Conference, H.R. Rep. No. 105–432 (1998); and provided several examples of situations where the provision would be applicable.

1. . . . Department believes that [§ 2225] may be a valuable tool to discourage the conversion of expropriated or confiscated real property for personal gain and in appropriate cases to facilitate the resolution of outstanding claims.

* * * *

6. Note that [the statutory] standard encompasses both expropriation claims of individuals who were U.S. citizens at the time their property was taken, and claims of individuals who were foreign nationals at the time of the taking, but who have since become U.S. citizens. It applies only to the individual found to be subject to the statutes, and not to family members . . . [T]his legislation is not intended to serve the same purpose as Title IV of the Helms-Burton (Libertad) Act and therefore would not (as Cuban officials have claimed) circumvent the May 18, 1998 U.S.-EU Understanding on Expropriated Properties.

Department of State Guidelines for Implementation of Title XXII, Section 2225 of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998.

1. Purpose and authority. These guidelines will be used by the Department of State ("Department") for the purpose of implementing Section 2225 of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998, P.L. 105–277, and other applicable legislation as appropriate.

2. Delegation of Authority. The Secretary of State has delegated authority to the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic and Business Affairs to make determinations under section 2225(a) of the Act, in consultation with the Assistant Secretary of State for the regional bureau or bureaus with jurisdiction over the country where the confiscation or expropriation took place and the country of which the alien who is to be denied a visa is a national, and others as appropriate.

4. Collection of Information.
a. The Department will collect information from available sources on whether property abroad, a claim to which is owned by a U.S. national, has been confiscated or expropriated and converted for personal gain by a person in a position covered by the Act. U.S. Embassies will also collect information and provide information and recommendations to the responsible bureaus in the Department of State concerning activities relevant to Section 2225.
b. As appropriate, the Department will request claimants to provide additional information related to ownership and confiscation or expropriation of the property concerned.
c. The Department will consult as appropriate with other agencies of the U.S. government regarding the identity of persons whose actions may be covered by Sec. 2225(a)(1) or Sec. 2225(a)(2).

5. Determinations under Section 2225. Determinations under Section 2225 will be made when facts or circumstances exist that lead the Department to conclude that a person has committed an act covered by Sec. 2225(a)(1) or Sec. 2225(a)(2).

6. Prior Notification.
a. An alien who is the subject of a determination under Sec. 2225 will be sent notification by registered mail that his/her name will be entered in the appropriate consular visa and immigration lookout systems, and that he/she will be denied a visa upon application and/or have his/her visa revoked, 45 days after the date of the notification letter. The Department may inform the government of the alien's country of nationality in confidence through diplomatic channels of the pending action.

b. If no information is received within the 45 day period above that leads the Department to conclude that the person should not be denied a visa pursuant to Sec. 2225(a), the Department will enter the alien's name, including the names of the alien's agents, if applicable, in the appropriate consular visa and immigration lookout systems. Any then-pending visa application from the named alien will be denied, and any visa previously issued to the alien will be revoked in accordance with law.

7. Review of Determinations: The Department may review a determination made under Section 2225 at any time, as appropriate in its discretion.

8. Exceptions: Section 2225 subsection (a) will not be applied to property in (1) any country established by international mandate through the United Nations; or (2) any territory recognized by the United States Government to be in dispute.

9. Relationship to Section 527 of P.L. 103–236: This section supplements Section 527 of the 1994–1995 Foreign Relations Authorization Act, P.L. 103–326 (April 30, 1994), and is not meant to revise or otherwise detract from the substantive requirements of that section of law.

CONFERENCE REPORT
The Committee of Conference consulted closely with the Department of State in fashioning a provision that is acceptable to both sides. The Committee of Conference intends that this section provides the Secretary of State with the authority to respond to particularly egregious, unlawful confiscations by foreign governments or Taiwan, especially those confiscations not undertaken for a public purpose but rather for the private gain of certain persons of public position. The Committee notes that this provision would cover abuses of governmental or political positions, but there may be rare cases where aliens hold positions of particular social prominence and exercise forms of authority that allow them to take the property of foreign nationals for personal gain.

This section is not intended to apply to the issuance of a visa to aliens involved in a foreign government's or Taiwan's legitimate expropriation of property, consistent with international law. Neither is this section intended to affect in any way the broad variety of private commercial disputes in which United States citizens are involved all over the world. Further, this section does not cover the exercise of ministerial functions or legitimate police powers, such as seizures of property by police and judicial authorities involved in anti-drug programs. While this section supplements the sanctioning authority of Section 527 of the 1994–1995 Foreign Relations Authorization Act (P.L.103–236, April 30, 1994) it is not meant to revise (or otherwise detract) from the substantive requirements of that section of law.

EXAMPLES OF APPLICATION

I. Government A expropriates the residence of claimant X, a U.S. citizen, without compensation. Government A's minister in the Department responsible for expropriations moves into the expropriated or confiscated residence himself/herself. The minister may be subject to visa denial for abusing his/her position as minister and converting the expropriated or confiscated property for his/her own personal gain.

Instead of moving into the property, the minister arranges for the property to be transferred to the deputy minister in the same department. The deputy minister may be subject to visa denial for abusing his/her position and converting the expropriated or confiscated property for personal gain. The minister may be subject to visa denial for being complicit in such conversion.

II. Businessman B is very prominent in town Z in country Q. He has extensive agricultural holdings both in and around town Z. He has strong business and family ties to members of the town council, and in addition, B's family has for many years been considered the leading family in the town; for these reasons, many citizens, including the members of the town council, defer to B in most of his business and personal dealings. B has coveted certain ranch land adjacent to one of his mills, but the land is owned by a U.S. citizen, C. However, C is only in Q six months of the year. While C is out of the country, B hires a number of town residents to be squatters who invade, improve and farm the land. C returns and seeks to persuade the town council to evict the squatters, but to no avail. B may be subject to visa denial for abusing his position as a prominent local person to convert for his own personal gain the property of C.

III. The Government of A has expropriated or confiscated properties belonging to U.S. citizens without compensation. Senior leaders of the government distribute a number of these properties to other members of the civilian and military bureaucracies. General L obtains one of these properties, a residence in the heart of the capital, from the government. General L may be subject to visa denial for abusing his position and converting for personal gain expropriated or confiscated property claimed by a U.S. citizen.

i. Inadmissibility of international child abductors

As a deterrent to international child abduction, § 2226 of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998, as contained in Div. G, Title XXII of the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1999, Pub. L. No. 105–277, 112 Stat. 2681 (1998), amended subparagraph (C) of INA §212(a)(10), 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(10)(C). The subparagraph made inadmissible to the United States aliens who detained, retained, or withheld custody of a child from a person granted custody of the child by a U.S. court order until the surrender of the child to the person granted custody. As amended, it also made inadmissible aliens known by the Secretary of State "to have intentionally assisted" in the abduction or "to be intentionally providing material support or safe haven" to the abductor, and, if designated by the Secretary of State, spouses, children, parents, siblings and agents of the abductor. Subsection (C) was made inapplicable, however, to non-U.S. citizen U.S. government officials acting within the scope of their duties, to foreign government officials designated by the Secretary of State, or while the child is located in a country that is a party to the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, TIAS No. 11670.

j. Denial of visas to Haitians involved in certain killings, the 1991 coup or other violence against the Haitian people

Section 616 of the Departments of Commerce, Justice and State, and Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1999, contained in Title VI of § 101(a) of Division A, Pub. L. No. 105–277, 112 Stat. 2681 (1998), forbade the use of appropriated funds to grant visas to certain Haitians involved in extrajudicial and political killings, the 1991 coup d'etat, or related violence in Haiti. The text of § 616 is set forth below. The provision was extended and amended in subsequent appropriations acts. See Digest 2003 at 23–24.

SEC. 616. (a) None of the funds appropriated or otherwise made available in this Act shall be used to issue visas to any person who—

(1) has been credibly alleged to have ordered, carried out, or materially assisted in the extrajudicial and political killings of Antoine Izmery, Guy Malary, Father Jean-Marie Vincent, Pastor Antoine Leroy, Jacques Fleurival, Mireille Durocher Bertin, Eugene Baillergeau, Michelange Hermann, Max Mayard, Romulus Dumarsais, Claude Yves Marie, Mario Beaubrun, Leslie Grimar, Joseph Chilove, Michel Gonzalez, and Jean-Hubert Feuille;

(2) has been included in the list presented to former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide by former National Security Council Advisor Anthony Lake in December 1995, and acted upon by President Rene Preval;

(3) was sought for an interview by the Federal Bureau of Investigation as part of its inquiry into the March 28, 1995, murder of Mireille Durocher Bertin and Eugene Baillergeau, Jr., and was credibly alleged to have ordered, carried out, or materially assisted in those murders, per a June 28, 1995, letter to the then Minister of Justice of the Government of Haiti, Jean-Joseph Exume;

(4) was a member of the Haitian High Command during the period 1991 through 1994, and has been credibly alleged to have planned, ordered, or participated with members of the Haitian Armed Forces in—
(A) the September 1991 coup against any person who was a duly elected government official of Haiti (or a member of the family of such official), or
(B) the murders of thousands of Haitians during the period 1991 through 1994; or
(5) has been credibly alleged to have been a member of the paramilitary organization known as FRAPH who planned, ordered, or participated in acts of violence against the Haitian people.
(b) EXEMPTION.—Subsection (a) shall not apply if the Secretary of State finds, on a case-by-case basis, that the entry into the United States of a person who would otherwise be excluded under this section is necessary for medical reasons or such person has cooperated fully with the investigation of these political murders. If the Secretary of State exempts any such person, the Secretary shall notify the appropriate congressional committees in writing.
(c) REPORTING REQUIREMENT.—(1) The United States chief of mission in Haiti shall provide the Secretary of State a list of those who have been credibly alleged to have ordered or carried out the extrajudicial and political killings mentioned in paragraph (1) of subsection (a).
(2) The Secretary of State shall submit the list provided under paragraph (1) to the appropriate congressional committees not later than 3 months after the date of enactment of this Act.
(3) The Secretary of State shall submit to the appropriate congressional committees a list of aliens denied visas, and the Attorney General shall submit to the appropriate congressional committees a list of aliens refused entry to the United States as a result of this provision.
(4) The Secretary of State shall submit a report under this subsection not later than 6 months after the date of enactment of this Act and not later than March 1 of each year thereafter as long as the Government of Haiti has not completed the investigation of the extrajudicial and political killings and has not prosecuted those implicated for the killings specified in paragraph (1) of subsection (a).

(d) DEFINITION.—In this section, the term "appropriate congressional committees" means the Committee on International Relations and the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

k. Denial of entry to foreign nationals engaged in establishment or enforcement of forced abortion or sterilization policy

Section 801 of the Admiral James W. Nance and Meg Donovan Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 2000 and 2001, enacted into law by § 1000(a)(7) of Division B of Pub. L. No. 106–113, 113 Stat. 1536 (1999) (8 U.S.C. § 1182e), provided that foreign nationals whom the Secretary of State found, based on credible evidence, to have been directly involved in the establishment or enforcement of forced abortion or sterilization population control policies could not be issued visas or admitted to the United States unless the Secretary of State had substantial grounds for believing that the foreign national had discontinued his or her involvement with, and support of, such policies. The prohibitions did not apply to heads of state, heads of government, or cabinet level ministers. The Secretary was given authority to waive the prohibition upon a determination that it was important to the national interests of the United States to do so and notice to the appropriate congressional committees. The text of § 801 is set forth below.

SEC. 801. DENIAL OF ENTRY INTO UNITED STATES OF FOREIGN NATIONALS ENGAGED IN ESTABLISHMENT OR ENFORCEMENT OF FORCED ABORTION OR STERILIZATION POLICIES

(a) DENIAL OF ENTRY.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of State may not issue any visa to, and the Attorney General may not admit to the United States, any foreign national whom the Secretary finds, based on credible and specific information, to have been directly involved in the establishment or enforcement of population control policies forcing a woman to undergo an abortion against her free choice or forcing a man or woman to undergo sterilization against his or her free choice, unless the Secretary has substantial grounds for believing that the foreign national has discontinued his or her involvement with, and support for, such policies.

(b) EXCEPTIONS.—The prohibitions in subsection (a) shall not apply in the case of a foreign national who is a head of state, head of government, or cabinet level minister.

(c) WAIVER.—The Secretary of State may waive the prohibitions in subsection (a) with respect to a foreign national if the Secretary—

(1) determines that it is important to the national interest of the United States to do so; and

(2) provides written notification to the appropriate congressional committees containing a justification for the waiver.

l. Place of visa processing—Southeast Asian migrant litigation

A flood of migrants from Vietnam and Laos fled their home countries seeking refuge in other countries in Southeast Asia during the 1980s. To deal with this migration crisis, 50 or so countries, including the United States, entered into an international agreement called the Comprehensive Plan of Action ("the CPA"). Under the CPA, local officials screened Vietnamese and Laotian migrants to determine refugee status. "Screened-out" migrants, i.e., those who were determined not to be refugees, were repatriated to their home countries, where they could then apply for immigrant visas to emigrate. Until 1993 the United States Consulate General in Hong Kong processed the visa applications of migrants before, and sometimes after, they were screened out. After other nations to the CPA objected, however, that this practice encouraged migration, the State Department adopted a policy against processing U.S. visa applications from "screened-out" Vietnamese or Laotian migrants in Hong Kong.

In 1994, two Vietnamese migrants, the migrants' sponsors in the United States, and a non-profit legal-rights organization challenged the State Department policy on the grounds that it violated § 202 of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1152(a), which prohibits United States consular officials from discriminating on the basis of nationality in the issuance of immigrant visas; that it was arbitrary and capricious within the meaning of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(a); and that it violated the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The district court granted the State Department's motion for summary judgment, but a divided panel of U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia reversed, holding that the consular venues policy violated 8 U.S.C. § 1152(a)(1) because the State Department had drawn a distinction between Vietnamese and Laotian nationals and nationals of other countries. Legal Assistance for Vietnamese Asylum Seekers ("LAVAS") v. Department of State, 45 F. 3d 469, 473 (D.C. Cir. 1995). Following various procedural motions and decisions, as well as a district court decision enjoining the Department of State's policy in Le v. United States Department of State, 919 F. Supp. 27 (D.D.C. 1996), the Supreme Court granted certiorari, United States Department of State v. Legal Assistance for Vietnamese Asylum Seekers, 518 U.S. 1003 (1996).

Shortly before the Supreme Court was to hear oral argument in LAVAS, the President signed into law the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 ("IIRIRA"), enacted as Division C of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1997, Pub. L. No. 104–208, 110 Stat. 3009 (Sept. 30, 1996). Section 633 of IIRIRA added the following subparagraph to 8 U.S.C. § 1152(a)(1):

> (B) Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to limit the authority of the Secretary of State to determine the procedures for the processing of immigrant visa applications or the locations where such applications will be processed.

After supplemental briefing on the effects of § 633, the Supreme Court vacated the judgment in LAVAS and remanded the case to the court of appeals for further consideration in light of § 633, 519 U.S. 1 (1996). The court of appeals then consolidated LAVAS and Le. 104 F.3d 1349 (D.C. Cir. 1997).

In an opinion excerpted below, the court of appeals held that § 633 applied to the plaintiffs' claims, that the Secretary of State's actions in determining the place of visa processing were not reviewable under the APA, and that the plaintiffs' constitutional claims were without merit.

* * * *

Plaintiffs' statutory claim raises the question of whether the case is governed by the law in effect at the time the Secretary enacted the new consular venue policy or the law as amended by section 633. The Supreme Court set out the principles for determining whether a newly enacted provision is applicable to a pending case in Landgraf v. USI Film Products, 511 U.S. 244, 128 L. Ed. 2d 229, 114 S. Ct. 1483 (1994). . . .

In Landgraf, the Supreme Court observed that changes in procedural rules will often not raise problems of retroactivity. Id. at 275. . . .

Applying the principles of Landgraf to this case, we conclude that application of section 633 would not raise retroactivity concerns. First, plaintiffs are asserting a procedural right. The challenged State Department action merely enacts a change in the procedure by which plaintiffs' visa applications are considered. This policy does not upset any substantive right. As we held in our earlier consideration of this case, plaintiffs do not have a substantive right to any particular process for having their applications considered. See LAVAS, 45 F.3d at 472. The Supreme Court has stated that such procedural claims do not raise retroactivity concerns. Landgraf, 511 U.S. at 275.

Having concluded that section 633 applies, we agree with the State Department that plaintiffs' statutory and APA claims are unreviewable because consular venue determinations are entrusted to the discretion of the State Department. Under the APA, a person "adversely affected or aggrieved by agency action within the meaning of a relevant statute" is entitled to judicial review. 5 U.S.C. § 702. Judicial review is not available, however, if the statute precludes judicial review or the agency action is "committed to agency discretion by law." 5 U.S.C. § 701(a). . . . After reviewing the text of the statute and the nature of the agency action at issue we conclude that the consular venue policy falls within this category of unreviewable agency discretion.

First, the broad language of the statute suggests that the State Department policy is unreviewable. Congress has determined that "every alien applying for an immigrant visa and for alien registration shall make application therefor in such form and manner and at such place as shall be by regulations prescribed." 8 U.S.C. § 1202(a) (emphasis added). This section grants to the Secretary discretion to prescribe the place at which aliens apply for immigrant visas without providing substantive standards against which the Secretary's determination could be measured. Plaintiffs argue that there is a standard against which to measure the Secretary's decision in the prohibition against nationality discrimination contained in 8 U.S.C. § 1152. That argument is untenable after the adoption of section 633. That enactment made clear that the prohibition against nationality discrimination does not apply to decisions of where to process visa applications. These determinations are left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of State.

In addition, the nature of the administrative action counsels against review of plaintiffs' claim. By way of comparison, the Supreme Court has held that the Food and Drug Administration's refusal to take enforcement action is unreviewable because it "involves a complicated balancing of a number of factors which are peculiarly within [the agency's] expertise. Heckler, 470 U.S. at 831. Similarly, in this case the agency is entrusted by a broadly worded statute with balancing complex concerns involving security and diplomacy, State Department resources and the relative demand for visa applications. However, in this case the argument for executive branch discretion is even stronger. By long-standing tradition, courts have been wary of second-guessing executive branch decision involving complicated foreign policy matters. See, e.g, Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 38 U.S. 415, 420, 10 L. Ed. 226 (1839); Garcia v. Lee, 37 U.S. 511, 517–18, 520–21, 9 L. Ed. 1176 (1838); Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. 253, 307–310, 7 L. Ed. 415 (1829). As we noted in another context, "where the President acted under a congressional grant of discretion as broadly worded as any we are likely to see, and where the exercise of that discretion occurs in the area of foreign affairs, we cannot disturb his decision simply because some might find it unwise or because it differs from the policies pursued by previous administrations." DKT Memorial Fund Ltd. v. Agency for Int'l Dev., 281 U.S. App. D.C. 47, 887 F.2d 275, 282 (D.C. Cir. 1989). In light of the lack of guidance provided by the statute and the complicated factors involved in consular venue determinations, we hold that plaintiffs' claims under both the statute and the APA are unreviewable because there is "no law to apply."

We likewise reject plaintiffs' claim that the State Department's consular venue policy violates the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. Plaintiffs concede that the migrants, as aliens, may not assert a Fifth Amendment right in challenging the procedures for granting immigrant visas. See United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 269, 108 L. Ed. 2d 222, 110 S. Ct. 1056 (1990). The equal protection claim must be asserted, if at all, by the citizen sponsors of the migrants. However, the State Department's policy does not depend on the national origin of the sponsor. Under the INA, a United States citizen or a permanent resident alien may sponsor an alien by filing a petition stating that the alien is an immediate relative and is eligible for an immigration preference. 8 U.S.C. § 1154(a). Employment-based immigration preferences are also available when a citizen desiring to employ an alien files a petition. 8 U.S.C. § 1154(a)(1)(D). While we can assume that a sponsor who is asserting a familial relationship to the migrant will more often than not be of Vietnamese or Laotian origins, the State Department does not require this to be the case. We have no reason to think that the nationality of an employer-sponsor at all corresponds to that of the migrant. Moreover, the substantive rights of the citizen sponsor to a particular process cannot be greater than the right of the applicant himself, and we have concluded that the applicants have no substantive right to have their visa applications processed in any particular venue.

m. Deportation of alien for foreign policy reasons

Section 237(a)(4)(C) of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1227) (formerly INA § 241(a)(4)(C), 8 U.S.C. § 1251(a)(4)(C)) provides that an alien "whose presence or activities in the United States the Secretary of State has reasonable ground to believe would have potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States" is deportable.

(1) Head of Haitian paramilitary organization

On March 29, 1995, Secretary of State Warren Christopher sent a letter to Attorney General Janet Reno indicating that he had determined that the continued presence of Emmanuel Mario Constant in the United States would have potentially serious adverse foreign consequences for the United States and requesting that the Attorney General take all steps possible to effect his deportation to Haiti.

According to Secretary Christopher's letter, Constant was a co-founder and the current president of the Revolutionary Front for the Advancement of the Progress of Haiti ("FRAPH"), a paramilitary organization whose members were responsible for numerous human rights violations in Haiti in 1993 and 1994. He was instrumental in sustaining the military regime that overthrew the democratically elected government of Jean-Bertrand Aristide in 1991. Secretary Christopher expressed concern that FRAPH-related activities by Constant in the United States created the false impression that the United States supported and endorsed Constant at a time when elections were pending in Haiti.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") commenced deportation proceedings based on the Secretary of State's determination on April 11, 1995. Constant disputed his deportability and maintained that he was a "political prisoner" being held to prevent him from participating in the presidential elections in Haiti. He sought dismissal of the proceedings, or, in the alternative, voluntary departure. On September 1, 1995, the immigration judge ordered Constant deported to Haiti. In re Emmanuel Constant, No. A 74 002 009 (Immigration Ct. 1995). Constant appealed the ruling to the Board of Immigration Appeals ("the BIA") but withdrew the appeal on December 13, 1995.

In 1998, Constant filed a motion to reopen his deportation order and to apply for asylum based on his claim that he had been advised by Justice Department and INS officials that "intelligence sources" had reason to believe his life would be in danger if he returned to Haiti. Constant remains in the United States.

Secretary Christopher's 1995 letter is excerpted below. The full text of the letter is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

My decision to invoke INA § 241(a)(4)(C) with respect to Mr. Constant is based on the following considerations. Supporting Haiti's fragile democracy is one of our foremost foreign policy priorities, as is seeking respect for human rights in Haiti and throughout the world. A central element of our bilateral policy toward Haiti is helping to build democratic institutions, including a vastly improved criminal justice system through the efforts of the Administration of Justice program jointly administered by the Department of the State, the Department of Justice, and the Agency for International Development. The Administration of Justice project seeks to enable the Haitian courts to bring to justice those responsible for serious crimes and violations of the fundamental human rights of Haitians. One target of this effort is the Revolutionary Front for the Advancement and Progress of Haiti ("FRAPH"). Although FRAPH claims to be a political party, it has never in fact participated in the national political process. It is officially regarded by the Department of State as an illegitimate paramilitary organization whose members were responsible for numerous human rights violations in Haiti in 1993 and 1994. Opposition to FRAPH is a key element of our Haitian foreign policy, and we have said so publicly.

Mr. Constant's presence and activities in the United States seriously undermine these compelling foreign policy objectives. Mr. Constant is one of the co-founders and current President of FRAPH. He was instrumental in sustaining the repression that prevailed in Haiti under the illegal military-led regime until it was displaced last September by the multinational force led by the United States. On February 3, 1995, Mr. Constant sent a letter on behalf of FRAPH to the Special Representative of the Secretary General of the United Nations for Haiti using a Washington, D.C., return address and telephone number. In addition, since his arrival in the United States, FRAPH elements in Haiti have broadcast on Haitian radio tape recordings of Mr. Constant speaking on behalf of FRAPH to the Haitian people.

These activities create the impression in Haiti that the United States is permitting Mr. Constant to use the United States as a basis of operations for FRAPH. They fuel false but widespread perceptions in Haiti that Mr. Constant was deliberately allowed to enter the United States in December and that the United States is secretly supporting him; that the United States endorses both him and his positions; and that we approve of FRAPH. These misperceptions persist notwithstanding that we have consistently denounced FRAPH and made statements distancing the United States from it and Mr. Constant.

My concern about Mr. Constant's presence and activities in the United States is heightened by the fact that elections for a new Haitian Parliament and for over 2,000 local government positions are scheduled for June 4, 1995. The United States has a huge stake in making sure that these elections—the best manifestation of democracy—are held successfully. Because Mr. Constant for many Haitians symbolizes the antithesis of democracy, permitting him to remain at large in the United States could undermine this important foreign policy objective.

In light of these facts and the current perception in Haiti of the United States' tolerance of Mr. Constant, even if Mr. Constant were to cease his FRAPH-related activities in the United States, his mere presence here would seriously undermine U.S. foreign policy interests. To permit Mr. Constant to remain at large in the United States in these circumstances will appear as an affront to the Haitian Government, and will cast doubt upon the seriousness of our resolve to combat human rights violations, thereby undermining our ability to play a leadership role in this area. I have therefore concluded that nothing short of Mr. Constant's removal from the United States can protect our foreign policy interests in Haiti.

The Haitian Government shares our belief that Mr. Constant is in the United States and has requested his extradition so that he may face criminal charges in Haiti. We have returned the request, which was technically deficient, to the Haitian Government, to which we have offered assistance in perfecting the documents. Given the compelling foreign policy interests at stake, it is essential that we seek Mr. Constant's deportation independent of any extradition efforts.

(2) Former Deputy Attorney General of Mexico

On October 2, 1995, Secretary of State Warren Christopher sent a letter to Attorney General Janet Reno indicating that he had determined under INA § 241(a)(4)(C), 8 U.S.C. § 1251(a)(4)(C) (current version at 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(4)(C)) that the continued presence of Mario Ruiz Massieu, former Deputy Attorney General of Mexico, in the United States would have potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States. He requested that the Attorney General "take all reasonable efforts to ensure Mr. Ruiz Massieu's expeditious deportation from the United States [and], in light of the Mexican Government's interest in having Mr. Ruiz Massieu returned to Mexico, [and] that you do everything possible, consistent with the Immigration and Nationality Act, to effect his deportation to Mexico. Excerpts from the Secretary's letter below set forth the bases for his conclusions.

The full text of the letter appears as an appendix to 22 I. & N. Dec. 833 (June 10, 1999). See also 90 AM. J. Int'l L. 442 (1996).

. . . As you are well aware, the United States and Mexico have made tremendous progress in the past five years in strengthening one of our most important and vital bilateral relationships. The range of issues that unite our two nations—from combatting international drug trafficking, to addressing vexing problems of legal and illegal migration, to fortifying trade and investment in one of the world's largest and fastest growing markets—is complex and varied.

One aspect of our relationship that has received the utmost attention from both governments is our ability to cooperate to confront criminality on both sides of the border. We have seen successes on this front, but we continue to seek enhanced cooperation. With easy transit between the United States and Mexico and extensive and ever-increasing ties, this is an area of vital importance to the United States. Our inability to return to Mexico Mr. Ruiz Massieu—a case the Mexican Presidency has told us is of the highest importance—would jeopardize our ability to work with Mexico on law enforcement matters. It might also cast a potentially chilling effect on other issues our two governments are addressing.

Furthermore, the case in question involves charges against the former second ranking law enforcement authority in Mexico and a man connected through his circle of family and friends to the center of power in Mexican politics. Serious allegations against such a high former official are unprecedented in modern Mexico.

The case against Mr. Ruiz Massieu and the arrest and trial for related crimes of Mr. Raul Salinas, brother of the former President, were the dramatic and unequivocal signs of the determination of President Zedillo and his Attorney General to break the so-called "culture of impunity" that long protected corrupt politicians, officials and other powerful elite from being held accountable for their actions and crimes. President Zedillo's anti-corruption drive has resonated throughout Mexico and continues to receive strong support from the Mexican people.

The U.S. Government has consistently urged Mexico to take the steps towards reform in its justice system that President Zedillo is so forcefully pursuing. The ability to prosecute Mr. Ruiz Massieu and other powerful individuals in Mexico for the crimes of which they are accused is key to the success of Zedillo's pledge to transform totally the judicial and law enforcement system and to rid Mexico of corruption and abuse of power. Should the U.S. Government not return Mr. Ruiz Massieu to Mexico, our support of such reforms would be seen as hollow and self-serving and would be a major setback for President Zedillo and our combined efforts to chart a new and effective course of U.S.-Mexican relations.

Our efforts to remove Mr. Ruiz Massieu from the United States should be directed at achieving his direct return to Mexico. When apprehended in New Jersey, Mr. Ruiz Massieu was attempting to depart the United States just days after being called for questioning in Mexico with regard to the crimes with which he was subsequently charged. If our efforts to remove him from the United States result in his ability to depart to a destination other than Mexico, the U.S. Government will almost certainly be viewed by Mexican officials and the Mexican public as not only permitting, but also aiding his successful escape from justice.

* * * *

The U.S. government initiated deportation proceedings against Massieu on December 22, 1995, based on Secretary of State Christopher's determination. This action followed four unsuccessful attempts earlier in 1995 to extradite Massieu to Mexico based on the crimes noted above. All four extradition requests were denied on the ground that evidence was insufficient to establish probable cause.

On January 17, 1996, Massieu filed a complaint in the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey seeking an injunction against the deportation proceeding on three grounds: (1) illegal de facto extradition; (2) selective enforcement and (3) the unconstitutionality of INA § 241(a)(4)(C).

On February 28, 1996, the district court issued an order declaring § 241(a)(4)(C) unconstitutional on three grounds and enjoining the deportation proceedings. Massieu v. Reno, 915 F. Supp. 681 (D.N.J. 1996). First, the district court found the provision void for vagueness because it did not provide adequate notice to aliens of the standards with which they must conform and did not furnish adequate guidelines for law enforcement. Id. at 699–703. Second, the court held that the provision violated procedural due process because the Secretary of State's determination that the alien fell within the statutory standard was unreviewable, thus depriving the alien of a meaningful opportunity to be heard. Id. at 703–07. Finally, the court found that the provision was an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power because it lacked sufficiently intelligible standards to direct the Secretary's exercise of discretion or to enable the court to review the exercise of discretion. Id. at 707–11. The district court did not address the claim of de facto extradition or other arguments.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit reversed but did not reach the merits of the constitutional question. Massieu v. Reno, 91 F.3d 416 (3d Cir. 1996). The Third Circuit remanded to the district court for dismissal, finding that the district court lacked jurisdiction to entertain plaintiff's claims because he had failed to exhaust available administrative remedies.

In a decision dated May 30, 1997, the immigration judge in the deportation proceedings found Massieu not deportable because the INS failed to show by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence that the opinion of the Secretary of State was reasonable. She found that the determination of the Secretary of State alone was insufficient to demonstrate that the presence of Massieu could potentially produce serious adverse foreign policy consequences. Sitting en banc, the Board of Immigration Appeals ("the BIA") reversed the immigration judge. In re Mario Salvador Ruiz-Massieu, 22 I. & N. Dec. 833 (June 10, 1999).

The Board held that the Secretary of State's letter in this case was sufficient evidence to meet the INS's burden of proof:

> We conclude that Congress' decision to require a specific determination by the Secretary of State, based on foreign policy interests, to establish deportability under section 241(a)(4)(C)(i) of the Act, coupled with the division of authority in section 103 of the Act between the Attorney General and the Secretary of State, make it clear that the Secretary of State's reasonable determination in this case should be treated as conclusive evidence of the respondent's deportability. . . . The requirement that the Service demonstrate that the respondent is deportable by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence, . . . is met by the Secretary's facially reasonable and bona fide determination that the respondent's presence here would cause potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States.

The BIA further held that the fact that Massieu had entered the United States voluntarily did not mean that the U.S. Government was required to let Massieu depart voluntarily prior to the initiation of deportation proceedings. Finally, the BIA rejected the argument that the Government's inability to extradite Massieu precluded efforts to deport him:

> Extradition proceedings are separate and apart from any immigration proceeding. . . . The standards of proof are different. As the Service has pointed out, not all of the charges brought in Mexico were cited as a basis for extradition. Also, the existence of criminal charges is not the only possible basis for a determination that the respondent's presence may have adverse foreign policy > consequences. We note that other aliens have been deported after extradition requests were denied by the courts. . . .

> Massieu was subsequently indicted by a federal grand jury in August 1999 for depositing $9 million in U.S. banks, representing profits of narcotics trafficking. On September 15, 1999, he died while living in New Jersey under house arrest.

(3) Top official of HAMAS

After Israel suspended its request for the extradition of Mousa Mohammed Abu Marzook for multiple acts of terrorism in and around Israel, Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright determined that the continued presence of Marzook in the United States would have potentially serious adverse foreign consequences for the United States. In a letter of April 4, 1997, Secretary Albright requested that Attorney General Janet Reno take all reasonable steps to ensure that Marzook, a legal permanent resident of the United States who was already in removal proceedings based on terrorist activities (INA § 212(a)(3)(B)), was not admitted to or permitted to remain in the United States. Marzook was deported to Jordan in 1997.

The fight against international terrorism is one of this nation's highest foreign policy priorities. The United States is taking a leading role in international efforts, both bilateral and multilateral, to combat terrorism. Central to this policy is the effort to identify terrorists and to deny them safe haven.

The promotion of a peaceful resolution of outstanding issues between Israel and the Palestinians is also one of this country's highest foreign policy priorities. As the primary sponsor of this negotiating effort, the United States has devoted significant diplomatic, political and economic support to facilitate progress and protect the negotiations against assaults from the enemies of peace. The President and I have been continuously and intensely involved in this effort.

The vital nature of the twin goals of fighting terrorism in the Middle East and promoting the peace process there is reflected in President Clinton's issuance of an executive order (E.O. 12947) on January 23, 1995, to block assets in the United States of terrorist organizations that threaten to disrupt the Middle East peace process and to prohibit financial transactions with these groups. The President, in issuing the order, found specifically that "grave acts of violence committed by foreign terrorists that disrupt the Middle East peace process constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States." The HAMAS organization was designated in the Executive Order as a terrorist organization that has committed or poses a significant risk of committing acts of violence that have the purpose or effect of disrupting the Middle East peace process. Similarly, Mr. Marzook, who acknowledges that he is a top official of HAMAS, has been declared a "Specially Designated Terrorist" under the authority of the executive order by virtue of his actions on behalf of HAMAS. All assets of both HAMAS and Mr. Marzook in the United States are blocked, and financial transactions with each are prohibited unless authorized by the Department of the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control.

Additionally, during the course of recent extradition proceedings against Mr. Marzook initiated at the request of the Government of Israel, two U.S. courts found probable cause that he was criminally responsible for ten specific grave incidents of terrorism in and around Israel before his arrival in the United States. . . .

Mr. Marzook's entry, presence and activities in the United States would seriously undermine compelling foreign policy objectives in the Middle East and in the fight against terrorism. The credibility of United States policies would be jeopardized if a prominent leader of a designated terrorist organization were allowed to reside in the United States. This in turn would undermine our ability to seek cooperation from others in denying terrorists safehaven. Moreover, this is a particularly crucial moment in the Middle East peace process, when senior United States officials are making a maximum effort to secure cooperation in the fight against HAMAS terrorism and to resume the negotiating process. It would be highly damaging to this effort to admit Mr. Marzook to the United States.

There is also a clear risk that if Mr. Marzook is allowed to remain in the United States he will engage in activities inimical to United States foreign policy interests. . . . In sum, United States foreign policy objectives would be severely undermined if Mr. Marzook used the United States as a base from which to provide assistance to HAMAS, an organization whose goals are currently totally antithetical to U.S. objectives in the Middle East, and the restrictions imposed on him under the executive order cannot be relied on to produce this result.

n. Genetic testing for visa purposes

A State Department telegram sent to all diplomatic and consular posts, March 12, 1999, excerpted below, provided information on when genetic testing was appropriate for purposes of adjudicating visa applications based on family relationships; what percentage of parentage probability was desirable, and what information laboratories needed in order to provide useful results.

The full text of the telegram is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

When is genetic testing appropriate?

2. Genetic testing is expensive, time consuming and logistically complex, and should never become a routine part of the visa adjudication process. Currently, no test can provide parentage with 100 percent certainty. In fact, different labs testing the same samples can report different results depending on the genetic markers tested. Therefore, to the extent possible, consular officers should make determinations of parentage based on evidence such as birth certificates, baptismal certificates, etc. Only when such evidence is unavailable or not credible is genetic testing available.

3. When genetic testing appears warranted, the Conoff [consular officer] should advise the applicant that genetic testing may . . . establish the validity of the relationship; that such testing is entirely voluntary; and that all costs of testing and related expenses must be borne by the petitioner/beneficiary and paid to the laboratory in advance.
4. The approval of a visa petition is prima facie evidence of the relationship between the petitioner and the beneficiary. 9 FAM 42.43 N1 stipulates that only if a consular officer knows or has reason to believe that the beneficiary is not entitled to status shall a consular officer return the petition to the INS-approving office. Such a determination must be based upon evidence that the INS did not have available at the time of adjudication. DNA analysis which excludes the tested individual as the parent suffices to meet this burden of proof.
What percentage of probability is acceptable?
5. . . . American Association of Blood Bank (AABB) standards mandate 99 percent to be the minimum requirement for the probability of paternity, except in rare circumstances. Unfortunately, this statement oversimplifies matters and does not . . . mean that all results below 99 percent exclude paternity (maternity).
6. The type of test performed, the genetic profile of the local population and factors specific to the case at hand will all affect the level of probability that a post should require. Thus, each post should consult with local physicians and labs, consider local fraud profiles, and establish a post-specific desired level of confidence. Post should place this information in a cover letter which should be forwarded to labs with each request for genetic testing. . . .

What does the lab need to know?
Type of Testing Desired
7. RFLP mapping is the most powerful type of genetic testing currently available. RFLP mapping can typically exclude an average of 99.9 percent of falsely claimed parents and will generally provide a probability of paternity (maternity) in excess of 99 percent in cases where the alleged parent is not excluded. RFLP mapping requires relatively large blood samples, however, and cannot be used in countries where collecting and shipping blood samples is not possible. In cases where substitution of a close relative is likely, posts should request the lab to test at least 6 genetic markers if RFLP mapping is used.

8. PCR-based testing is commonly used to evaluate DNA samples collected by scraping the cells lining the inside of the cheeks with a swab (aka Buccal Swab). PCR-based testing is typically 10 to 100 times less powerful than RFLP mapping, but is the only alternative in countries where blood samples cannot be collected or shipped. In cases where substitution of a close relative is likely, posts should request the lab to test at least 15 genetic markers if PCR-based testing is used.

Local Genetic Profile

9. Lab results can be interpreted differently based on the genetic profile of the local population. In countries where there is a high degree of intermarriage among family members and the population is homogeneous, a probability of 99 percent might not be conclusive (an uncle's blood substituted for that of the father might easily result in a 99 percent probability). In such a population, a post might advise labs that a higher than usual degree of probability is desired (for example, 99.5 percent) and provide the lab with a description of the local genetic profile. The lab may then test a wider range of genetic markers to achieve a more refined result.

10. In highly heterogeneous populations where little intra-family mixing occurs, on the other hand, a result of 99 percent or even somewhat less might be conclusive. Again, if the lab is aware of the local conditions, it can tailor its testing to meet a post's needs.

Case-Specific Information

11. It is extremely important that test results be evaluated in light of non-genetic evidence gathered by the consular and medical personnel coordinating the testing. Such information may include clues of premeditated misrepresentation of one or more members of a family. Again, this information may affect the lab's assumptions, analysis of the test results and even the number of genetic markers compared.

12. Posts should feel free to contact the laboratory for clarification if the lab's findings are inconclusive. Labs are able to conduct analysis of additional genetic markers to help resolve such cases. It is also possible for a laboratory to calculate the likelihood the tested individual is an uncle as well as the likelihood that he is a father. Where such concerns exist, officers should ask the lab to calculate which relationship is favored and by how much. A laboratory which states it is unable to comply with this type of a request should not be used for tests when substitutions are a concern. . . .

o. Denial of visas for foreign policy reasons

Section 212(a)(3)(C) of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1227) provides that an alien "whose entry or proposed activities in the United States the Secretary of State has reasonable ground to believe would have potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States" is inadmissible. This general rule is subject to several provisions designed to regulate the denial of visas because of activities that would be protected by the First Amendment. Thus, a visa may be denied under this section based on the alien's "past, current, or expected beliefs, statements, or associations" only if "the Secretary of State personally determines that the alien's admission would compromise a compelling United States foreign policy interest."

Described below are individual cases of visa denials under Section 212(a)(3)(C) of the INA. In order to protect both the confidentiality of the underlying visa records, which are protected from disclosure by Section 222(f) of the INA, and information of national security sensitivity, each case has been summarized in general terms.

(1) Family members of a senior Iraqi government official

In December 1991 the Acting Secretary of State authorized the denial of non-immigrant tourist visas on foreign policy grounds to the family members of a senior Iraqi government official. The determination was based on the visa applicants' close association through marriage/parentage with a senior Iraqi official who was a family member and close adviser to Saddam Hussein. Admitting the family for a discretionary visit would have undercut the United States' vital policy interest in maintaining all possible political and economic pressure on Iraq to comply with all UN Security Council Resolutions. If publicized, the visit would be perceived internationally and domestically as a softening of U.S. resolve in demanding Iraq's compliance with U.S. and UN sanction regimes. The Acting Secretary of State found both that the family members' entry would result in potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States and that it would compromise a compelling United States foreign policy interest.

(2) Deputy leader of the Bosnian Serbs

In December 1992 Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs Arnold Kanter authorized the denial of a non-immigrant visa on foreign policy grounds to a deputy leader of the Bosnian Serbs. The individual claimed to be a member of the presidency of the so-called Serbian Republic of Bosnia, but the U.S. did not recognize the existence of any such republic. The determination was based on the leader's involvement with bombarding Sarajevo and other Bosnian cities, air force sorties in defiance of UN resolutions, ethnic cleansing of non-Serbs, and violent territorial raids on local populations. Granting this deputy leader of the Bosnian Serbs entry into the U.S. could have seriously undermined U.S. foreign policy objectives in combating the activities of the Bosnian Serbs and stabilizing the region.

(3) Iranian government official

In June 1993 Secretary of State Warren Christopher authorized the denial of a visa on foreign policy grounds to an Iranian cleric and government official. Although the Iranian official ostensibly intended to enter the United States for unofficial purposes (including to deliver lectures at an Islamic center), there was reason to believe that the individual might engage in fundraising for organizations dedicated to meeting the Iranian government's objectives. In addition, the individual could have covertly represented Iranian government interests when there were no diplomatic relations between the United States and Iran, thereby enabling Iran to circumvent U.S. diplomatic policy. Thus the Iranian government official's presence in the United States would have had serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States.

(4) Former Iraqi diplomat

In August 1993 Secretary of State Warren Christopher authorized the denial of a visa for foreign policy reasons to a former Iraqi diplomat. The individual applied for a visa in order to visit close family relatives, some of whom were U.S. citizens and others of whom were lawful permanent alien residents. The determination was based on the fact that the former Iraqi diplomat had been a highly visible spokesperson and advocate for the hard-line policies of the Saddam Hussein regime. When the U.S. and Iraq discontinued diplomatic relations in 1990 following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, the former Iraqi diplomat chose not to return to Iraq and eventually obtained permanent residence in another country, but never publicly repudiated any of the policies of the Iraqi government or disassociated himself from Saddam's regime. Allowing the individual to enter the United States would have contradicted U.S. policy and have been particularly harmful to U.S. efforts to encourage other countries to limit their diplomatic dialogue and all other usual diplomatic relations with Iraq by wrongly indicating a softening or shift in U.S. policy toward Iraq. The Secretary determined both that the applicant's entry would have compromised a compelling foreign policy interest and that it would have had potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences.

(5) Members of the Iraqi Trade Ministry

In October 1994 Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs Peter Tarnoff authorized the denial of visas on foreign policy grounds to two of four members of the Iraqi Trade Ministry seeking to attend the United Nations International Symposium on Trade Efficiency ("UNISTE") in Ohio. Iraq was under a trade embargo at the time. Allowing the full delegation to participate could have weakened U.S. credibility on Iraq sanctions issues prior to a November 1994 review of sanctions by the United Nations Security Council and given Iraq evidence that the international embargo against Iraq was on the verge of collapsing. Therefore, two members of the Iraqi Trade Ministry were denied visas because the Under Secretary determined that their entry would have compromised a compelling U.S. foreign policy interest.

(6) Senior FRY and Serbian officials

In March 1998 the Contact Group—a six-nation alliance including the United States, United Kingdom, Russia, France, Germany, and Italy—met to discuss the escalating violence imposed by Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("FRY") and Serbian officials in the Balkans region. Determined to impose measures against those responsible for the atrocities committed against ethnic Albanians, Secretary Albright, in connection with a meeting of the Contact Group, decided that visas should be denied to fifteen senior FRY and Serbian representatives.

For purposes of visa denial, Section 212(a)(3)(C) had never previously been used in the absence of an actual visa application, or for a group of persons not traveling together for the same purpose. However, in this particular case, the United States made the determination to deny visas in advance to senior FRY and Serbian officials to affirm its commitment to stabilizing the region in accordance with the policies of the Contact Group. Allowing entry, or even holding out the possibility that visa applications might be issued to these fifteen senior FRY and Serbian officials would have been at odds with the objectives of the Contact Group and inconsistent with the strong public and diplomatic stance of the United States condemning the kinds of ruthless security operations carried out in Kosovo, including the violence and repressive actions taken by Serbian police against the civilian men, women, and children.

(7) Belarusian officials

In June 1998 the Belarusian government evicted U.S., EU and other ambassadors from their official residences in Minsk. The Belarusian government failed to take any of the necessary steps to comply with the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations ("VCDR") and continued to deny access to diplomatic residences. In response to the government of Belarus' failure to protect U.S. and other foreign missions' inviolability under the VCDR, the United States and the EU member states agreed to restrict the travel of Belarusian officials to their countries. In July 1998, Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott approved a general policy to use foreign policy grounds when necessary to deny visas to Belarusian officials. As a result, all posts were instructed to refer to the State Department for review every application by a Belarusian official at a level of deputy minister or higher regardless of type of visa.

The policy was implemented in the following three cases involving Belarusian officials:

In September 1998 Deputy Secretary Talbott determined that a department head at an advanced Belarusian academic institution and vice chairman of a government committee (comparable to a deputy minister level) was ineligible for admission to the United States; the individual's entry into the country would have had potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States because it would have undercut the policy of the U.S. and EU with respect to Belarus.

In October 1998 Deputy Secretary Talbott found that the entry into the United States of a Belarusian official who was a member of a Commission in the Council of the Republic of Belarus would have potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences thereby rendering him ineligible for admission to the United States. Allowing the individual to travel to the United States could have implied a lack of resolve in the US-EU commitment to reversing the Belarusian government's actions and ensuring its respect for the fundamental principles of diplomacy.

In December 1998, Deputy Secretary Talbott determined that a Belarusian official who was a member of the Office of the President of Belarus was ineligible for admission to the United States. The official applied for a non-immigrant visitor (B-1) visa to attend a ceremony in New York City. The determination was based on the fact that the individual was a senior Belarusian government official subject to our policy visa restrictions. The admittance of the individual would have contradicted American policy toward the Belarusian government, and thus compromised a compelling United States foreign policy interest.

3. Presidential Proclamations: Suspension of Entry

Section 212(f) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, as amended (8 U.S.C. § 1182(f)), authorizes the President to "suspend the entry of all aliens or any class of aliens . . . or impose on the entry of aliens any restrictions he may deem to be appropriate" whenever he finds that their entry would be "detrimental to the interests of the United States."

a. Suspension of entry of certain Haitian nationals

On October 1, 1991, the first democratically elected government in Haiti, headed by President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, was overthrown by a military coup, and President Aristide was forced into exile. Extensive diplomatic efforts and pressure (including economic sanctions) were brought to bear to restore the legal government.

On June 3, 1993, President Clinton issued Proclamation 6569, "Suspension of Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Persons Who Formulate or Implement Policies That are Impeding the Negotiations Seeking the Return to Constitutional Rule in Haiti," directed at the military coup leaders and their families. 58 Fed. Reg. 31,897 (June 7, 1993). Proclamation 6569 is excerpted below.

In light of the political crisis in Haiti resulting from the expulsion from Haiti of President Aristide and the constitutional government, I have determined that it is in the interests of the United States to restrict the entry to the United States of certain Haitian nationals who formulate, implement, or benefit from policies that impede the progress of the negotiations designed to restore constitutional government to Haiti, and the immediate families of such persons.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, WILLIAM J. CLINTON, by the power vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including section 212(f) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, as amended (8 U.S.C. 1182(f)), and section 301 of title 3, United States Code, hereby find that the unrestricted immigrant and nonimmigrant entry into the United States of persons described in section 1 of this proclamation would, except as provided for in sections 2 or 3 of this proclamation, be detrimental to the interests of the United States. I do therefore proclaim that:

Section 1. The entry into the United States as immigrants and nonimmigrants of persons who formulate, implement, or benefit from policies that impede the progress of the negotiations designed to restore constitutional government to Haiti, and the immediate family members of such persons, is hereby suspended.

Sec. 2. Section 1 shall not apply with respect to any person otherwise covered by section 1 where the entry of such person would not be contrary to the interests of the United States.

Sec. 3. Persons covered by sections 1 and 2 shall be identified pursuant to procedures established by the Secretary of State, as authorized in section 6 below.

Sec. 4. Nothing in this proclamation shall be construed to derogate from United States Government obligations under applicable international agreements.

Sec. 5. This proclamation is effective immediately and shall remain in effect until such time as the Secretary of State determines that it is no longer necessary and should be terminated.

Sec. 6. The Secretary of State shall have responsibility to implement this proclamation pursuant to procedures the Secretary may establish.

Although the military leaders in Haiti signed an agreement in July 1993 that had been negotiated under United Nations auspices for a return to democratically elected government, they did not implement it. Widespread human rights violations continued, and U.N. and OAS human rights monitors were expelled. On May 7, 1994, the President issued a broader proclamation, Proclamation 6685, "Suspension of Entry of Aliens Whose Entry is Barred Under United Nations Security Council Resolution 917 or Who Formulate, Implement, or Benefit from Policies that are Impeding the Negotiations Seeking the Return to Constitutional Rule in Haiti." 59 Fed. Reg. 24,337 (May 10, 1994). The proclamation revoked and superseded Proclamation 6569. Consistent with United Nations Security Council Resolution 917, S/RES/917(1994), the new proclamation barred the entry of all officers of the Haitian military, including the police, and their immediate families; the major participants in the coup d'etat of 1991 and in the illegal governments since the coup d'etat, and their immediate families; and persons employed by or acting on behalf of the Haitian military, and their immediate families. In addition, the entry of all other persons who formulated, implemented, or benefited from policies that impeded the progress of the negotiations designed to restore constitutional government to Haiti and their immediate families was prohibited. Proclamation 6685 is excerpted below.

In light of the political crisis in Haiti resulting from the expulsion from Haiti of President Aristide and the constitutional government, United Nations Security Council Resolution 917, and the overriding interest of the United States in the restoration of democracy to Haiti, I have determined that it is in the interests of the United States to restrict the entry to the United States of: (1) all aliens described in paragraph 3 of United Nations Security Council Resolution 917; and (2) all other aliens who formulate, implement, or benefit from policies that impede the progress of the negotiations designed to restore constitutional government to Haiti and their immediate families.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, WILLIAM J. CLINTON, by the powers vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including sections 212(f) and 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, as amended (8 U.S.C. 1182(f) and 1185), and section 301 of title 3, United States Code, hereby find that the unrestricted immigrant and nonimmigrant entry into the United States of aliens described in sections 1 and 2 of this proclamation would, except as provided for in sections 3 and 4 of this proclamation, be detrimental to the interests of the United States. I do therefore proclaim that:

Section 1. The immigrant and nonimmigrant entry into the United States of aliens described in paragraph 3 of United Nations Security Council Resolution 917 is hereby suspended. These aliens are:

(a) all officers of the Haitian military, including the police, and their immediate families;
(b) the major participants in the coup d'etat of 1991 and in the illegal governments since the coup d'etat, and their immediate families; and
(c) those employed by or acting on behalf of the Haitian military, and their immediate families.

Sec. 2. The immigrant and nonimmigrant entry into the United States of aliens who are not covered by section 1, but who nonetheless formulate, implement, or benefit from policies that impede the progress of the negotiations designed to restore constitutional government to Haiti, and their immediate families, is hereby suspended.
Sec. 3. Section 1 shall not apply with respect to any alien otherwise covered by section 1 where the entry of such alien has been approved as prescribed by paragraph 3 of United Nations Security Council Resolution 917.
Sec. 4. Section 2 shall not apply with respect to any alien otherwise covered by section 2 where the entry of such alien would not be contrary to the interests of the United States.

b. Suspension of entry of certain Zairean nationals

In 1991 the long-time dictator of Zaire, President Mobutu Sese Seko, agreed to demands by democracy supporters that the government establish a national conference to draft a new constitution. A national conference was convened and, despite numerous delays and suspensions, announced in June 1992 that a transitional government would be formed in the lead up to proposed elections. In July 1992, President Mobutu and the national conference agreed to establish a High Council of the Republic ("HCR") to oversee the implementation of the conference's decisions. President Mobutu ultimately refused to honor his promise to permit a transition to democracy, however, and suspended the HCR in December 1992. A near-total breakdown of Zaire's modern economic sector followed, along with hyperinflation, severe malnutrition, and severe human rights abuses, especially in the province of Shaba. On June 21, 1993, President Clinton issued Proclamation 6574, "Suspension of Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Persons Who Formulate or Implement Policies That Are Impeding the Transition to Democracy in Zaire or Who Benefit From Such Policies," intended to prevent the entry to the United States of Mobutu and his supporters. 58 Fed. Reg. 34,209 (June 23, 1993). In Proclamation 6574 President Clinton, acting "[i]n light of the political and economic crisis in Zaire," proclaimed, that "[t]he entry into the United States as immigrants and nonimmigrants of persons who formulate, implement, or benefit from policies that impede Zaire's transition to democracy, and the immediate family members of such persons, is hereby suspended," with further provisions similar to those relating to Haitian nationals, supra.

c. Suspension of entry of certain Nigerian nationals

After the military regime in Nigeria refused to release the results of a June 1993 presidential election and suspended the country's framework for a transition to democracy, President Clinton on December 10, 1993, issued Proclamation 6636, "Suspension of Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Persons Who Formulate, Implement, or Benefit From Policies That Are Impeding the Transition to Democracy in Nigeria," aimed at members of the military regime. 58 Fed. Reg. 65,525 (Dec. 14, 1993). In Proclamation 6636 President Clinton, acting "[i]n light of the political crisis in Nigeria," proclaimed that "[t]he entry into the United States as immigrants and nonimmigrants of persons who formulate, implement, or benefit from policies that impede Nigeria's transition to democracy, and the immediate family members of such persons, is hereby suspended," with further provisions similar to those relating to Haitian nationals, supra.

On October 26, 1998, after a new interim regime released political prisoners and moved forward with plans for local elections in November 1998 and national elections in 1999, Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright made a determination pursuant to authority provided in section 6 of Proclamation 6636 that the suspension of entry provided for under that proclamation should lapse and the proclamation should be terminated effective immediately. 63 Fed. Reg. 64,139 (Nov. 18, 1998).

d. Suspension of entry of certain Liberian nationals

On September 30, 1994, in response to evidence of human rights abuses by the various armed factions in Liberia and their failure to cooperate in efforts to reach workable peace agreements, President Clinton issued Proclamation 6730, "Suspension of Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Persons Who Formulate or Implement Policies That Are Impeding the Transition to Democracy in Liberia or Who Benefit From Such Policies." 59 Fed. Reg. 50,683 (Oct. 5, 1994). President Clinton, acting "[i]n light of the long-standing political and humanitarian crisis in Liberia," proclaimed that "[t]he entry into the United States as immigrants and nonimmigrants of persons who formulate or implement policies that impede Liberia's transition to democracy or who benefit from such policies, and the immediate family members of such persons, is hereby suspended," with further provisions similar to those relating to Haitian nationals, supra.

e. Suspension of entry of certain Burmese nationals

Reacting to continuing political repression by the regime in Burma, including detention of duly elected legislators, opposition activities and other persons attempting to promote democratic change, President Clinton on October 3, 1996, issued Proclamation 6925, "Suspension of Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Persons Who Formulate or Implement Policies That Are Impeding the Transition to Democracy in Burma or Who Benefit From Such Policies." 61 Fed. Reg. 52,233 (Oct. 7, 1996), excerpted below.

The current regime in Burma continues to detain significant numbers of duly elected members of parliament, National League for Democracy activists, and other persons attempting to promote democratic change in Burma. The regime has failed to enter into serious dialogue with the democratic opposition and representatives of the country's ethnic minorities, has failed to move toward achieving national reconciliation, and has failed to meet internationally recognized standards of human rights.

In light of this continuing political repression, I have determined that it is in the interests of the United States to restrict the entrance into the United States as immigrants and nonimmigrants of certain Burmese nationals who formulate or implement policies that impede Burma's transition to democracy or who benefit from such policies, and the immediate families of such persons.

Section 1. The entry into the United States as immigrants and nonimmigrants of persons who formulate, implement, or benefit from policies that impede Burma's transition to democracy, and the immediate family members of such persons, is hereby suspended.

Sec. 2. Section 1 shall not apply with respect to any person otherwise covered by section 1 where the Secretary of State determines that the entry of such person would not be contrary to the interests of the United States. Section 1 shall not apply to officials assigned to Burmese missions in the United States or working-level support staff and visitors who support the work of Burmese missions in the United States.

Sec. 3. Persons covered by sections 1 and 2 shall be identified pursuant to procedures established by the Secretary of State, as authorized in section 6 below.

Sec. 7. This proclamation may be repealed, in whole or in part, at such time as the Secretary of State determines that the Burmese regime has released National League for Democracy members currently being held for political offenses and other pro-democracy activists, enters into genuine dialogue with the democratic opposition, or makes significant progress toward improving the human rights situation in the country.

f. Suspension of entry of members or officials of the Sudanese Government or armed forces

On June 26, 1995, an assassination attempt was made on the life of President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt while he was in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. Ethiopia requested the extradition of three suspects who were being sheltered in Sudan, but Sudan refused to extradite them. The UN Security Council adopted Resolution 1044 of January 31, 1996, demanding under Chapter VII of the U.N. charter that the Government of Sudan extradite the suspects and desist from supporting terrorist activities. After Sudan refused to comply, the Security Council adopted Resolution 1054 of April 26, 1996, making the same demands and deciding that all states would significantly reduce the number of the staff at Sudanese diplomatic and consular posts while restricting the movements of those who remained, and take steps to restrict the entry into or transit through their territory of members and officials of the Government of Sudan, as well as members of the Sudanese armed forces. In furtherance of Resolution 1054, President Clinton on November 22, 1996, issued Presidential Proclamation 6958, "Suspension of Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Persons Who Are Members or Officials of the Sudanese Government or Armed Forces." 61 Fed. Reg. 60,007 (Nov. 26, 1996). Acting "in light of the refusal of the Government of Sudan to comply with United Nations Security Council Resolution 1044 . . . and in furtherance of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1054," President Clinton proclaimed that "[t]he entry into the United States as immigrants and nonimmigrants of members of the Government of Sudan, officials of that Government, and members of the Sudanese armed forces, is hereby suspended," with further provisions similar to those relating to Haitian nationals, supra.

g. Suspension of entry of senior officials of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola ("UNITA") and adult members of their immediate families

In November 1994, the Government of Angola signed the Lusaka Peace Accord with the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola ("UNITA") in an effort to end 20 years of civil war. Under the auspices of the United Nations Angola Peacekeeping Mission ("UNAVEM"), and with the help of three observer countries—the United States, Portugal and Russia—the Government of Angola and UNITA began to implement the Lusaka Protocol's provisions for a cease-fire, withdrawal of forces in contact, disarming and quartering of UNITA forces, integration of some UNITA solders into the Angolan armed forces, demobilization of remaining combatants, and creation of a Government of National Reconciliation. When UNITA failed to comply with some of its obligations, the United Nations Security Council adopted Resolutions 1127 of August 28, 1997; 1130 of September 29, 1997; and 1135 of October 29, 1997. In these resolutions, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, demanded that UNITA implement all of its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol, including demilitarization of all its forces and full cooperation in the process of the normalization of state administration throughout Angola. Further, it decided that all States must adopt sanctions against UNITA, including, inter alia, preventing the entry into or transit through their territories of all senior officials of UNITA and of adult members of their immediate families, with certain exceptions. In furtherance of the Security Council Resolutions, President Clinton issued Proclamation 7060, "Suspension of Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Persons Who Are Senior Officials of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola ("UNITA") and Adult Members of Their Immediate Families," on December 12, 1997. 62 Fed. Reg. 65,987 (Dec. 16, 1997).

Acting "[i]n light of the failure of [UNITA] to comply with its obligations under the 'Accordos de Paz,' the Lusaka Protocol, and other components of the peace process in Angola, and in furtherance of United Nations Security Council Resolutions 1127 . . . , 1130 . . . , and 1135," President Clinton proclaimed that "[t]he entry into the United States as immigrants and nonimmigrants of senior officials of UNITA and adult members of their immediate families, is hereby suspended." In addition to provisions similar to those relating to Haitian nationals, supra, the proclamation provided in section 4 that > [i]n identifying persons [otherwise covered but "the entry of such person would not be contrary to the interests of the United States"], the Secretary shall consider whether a person otherwise covered . . . is an official necessary for the full functioning of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, the National Assembly, or the Joint Commission, within the meaning of paragraph 4(a) of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1127 of August 28, 1997.

h. Suspension of entry of certain nationals of Sierra Leone

After a military junta displaced a democratically elected government in Sierra Leone, the United Nations Security Council adopted Resolution 1132 of October 8, 1997. In Resolution 1132, the Security Council demanded that the junta relinquish power and make way for the restoration of the democratically elected government, and decided to impose a number of sanctions, including that all States prevent the entry into or transit through their territories of members of the junta and adult members of their families, with certain exceptions. In furtherance of Resolution 1132, President Clinton issued Proclamation 7062 on January 14, 1998, "Suspension of Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Persons Who Are Members of the Military Junta in Sierra Leone and Members of Their Family." 63 Fed. Reg. 2871 (Jan. 16, 1998). Acting "[i]n light of the refusal of the military junta in de facto control in Sierra Leone to permit the return to power of the democratically elected government of that country, and in furtherance of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1132," President Clinton proclaimed that "[t]he entry into the United States as immigrants and non-immigrants of members of the military junta in Sierra Leone and members of their families, is hereby suspended," with further provisions similar to those relating to Haitian nationals, supra.

i. Suspension of entry of certain nationals of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) and the Republic of Serbia

To sanction atrocities by the regime of President Slobodan Milosevic against civilians in Kosovo, as well as actions taken by the regime to obstruct democracy and suppress freedom of the press and to thwart economic sanctions, President Clinton issued Proclamation 7249 of November 12, 1999, "Suspension of Entry of Persons Responsible for Repression of the Civilian Population in Kosovo or for Policies That Obstruct Democracy in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) ("FRY") or Otherwise Lend Support to the Current Governments of the FRY and of the Republic

* * * *

In light of the actions of President Slobodan Milosevic and other officials of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) ("FRY") and the Republic of Serbia against elements of the civilian population of Kosovo, including actions within the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia; in light of actions being taken by the Milosevic regime to obstruct democracy and to suppress an independent media and freedom of the press in the FRY, Serbia, Montenegro, and Kosovo; and in light of the ongoing efforts of the Milosevic regime and its supporters to thwart the economic sanctions imposed by the United States and other countries against the FRY, I have determined that it is in the interests of the United States to suspend the entry into the United States of certain officials of the FRY Government and the Government of the Republic of Serbia and of other persons who either act in support of such officials' policies or who are closely associated with such officials.

* * * *

Section 1. The immigrant and nonimmigrant entry into the United States of the following persons is hereby suspended:

(a) Slobodan Milosevic and other persons who, as senior FRY or Serbian officials or as members of the FRY and/or Serbian military or paramilitary forces, formulated, implemented, or carried out repressive actions against the civilian population in Kosovo;
(b) Officials of the Government of the FRY or of the Republic of Serbia and FRY nationals who formulate, implement, or carry out policies obstructing or suppressing freedom of speech or of the press in the FRY, Serbia, Montenegro, or Kosovo, or who otherwise are obstructing efforts to establish a peaceful and stable democracy in these areas;

(c) Officials of the Government of the FRY or of the Republic of Serbia and FRY nationals who, individually or as officers or employees of business or financial entities, engage in financial transactions that materially support the Government of the FRY, the Government of the Republic of Serbia, Slobodan Milosevic, or members of the Milosevic regime; and

(d) Any spouse, minor child, close relative, or close personal associate of any person described in subsections (a) through (c) above, if the entry into the United States of such spouse, minor child, close relative, or close personal associate would not be in the interests of the United States in light of the objectives of this proclamation.

* * * *

Immigration measures had previously been imposed by Proclamation 6749 of October 25, 1994 to restrict the entry to the United States of "all aliens described in paragraph 14 of United Nations Security Council Resolution 942 [S/RES/942 (1994)]." 59 Fed. Reg. 54,117 (Oct. 27, 1994). The proclamation listed the affected aliens as:

> (a) members of the authorities, including legislative authorities, in those areas of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina under the control of Bosnian Serb forces; officers of the Bosnian Serb military and paramilitary forces; and those acting on behalf of such authorities or forces;
> (b) persons found, after September 23, 1994, to have provided financial, material, logistical, military, or other tangible support to Bosnian Serb forces in violation of relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions; and
> (c) persons in or resident in those areas of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina under the control of Bosnian Serb forces found to have violated or contributed to the violation of the measures set out in United Nations Security Council Resolution 820 of April 17, 1993, and United Nations Security Council Resolution 942 of September 23, 1994.

D. ASYLUM AND REFUGEE STATUS

1. Maritime Interdiction and Non-refoulement Under Article 33 of the Refugee Convention

a. High seas interdiction of Haitian migrants

In the early 1980s, as thousands of Haitians sought to emigrate to the United States by boat, the U.S. Government initiated a program to interdict illegal Haitian migrants at sea. The program continued into the 1990s, and was challenged in federal court on the grounds that it was a violation of the non-refoulement obligations of the United States under the U.N. Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, Jan. 31, 1967, 19 U.S.T. 6223 (entered into force for the United States Nov. 1, 1968) ("Protocol"). See description of the interdiction program in the U.S. Supreme Court opinion, Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, 509 U.S. 155 (1993), below; see also I Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 631–38; Digest 1989–1990 at 47–54.

The Protocol broadened the coverage of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, done July 28, 1951, 188 U.N.T.S. 150, and incorporated by reference the substantive protections of the 1951 Convention. Article 33 of the 1951 Convention provides in part that "[n]o Contracting State shall expel or return ('refouler') a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion."

In a letter dated December 11, 1991, to Acting Assistant Attorney General Timothy E. Flanigan, Office of Legal Counsel, Department of Justice, the Legal Adviser of the Department of State, Edwin D. Williamson, provided the legal opinion of the Department of State, excerpted below (footnotes omitted), that the non-refoulement obligation of Article 33 did not impose obligations on the United States with respect to refugees outside U.S. territory.

. . . We have previously and publicly taken the position that the [non-refoulement obligation of Article 33] applies only to persons within the territory of a Contracting State. For reasons indicated below, the Department respectfully requests that you reconsider and withdraw the apparently contrary legal conclusion reflected in the opinion of the Office of Legal Counsel of August 11, 1981. . . .

The relevant provisions for interpreting a treaty are accurately reflected in Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, May 23, 1969, 1155 U.N.T.S. 331, U.N. Doc. A/Conf.39/27 (1969) ("Vienna Convention"). . . .

Under Article 31 of the Vienna Convention, the starting point of treaty interpretation is "the ordinary meaning" of the terms of the treaty in their context, and in light of the object and purpose of the treaty. The context includes, among other things, "[a]ny agreement relating to the treaty which was made between all the parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty. Also to be considered is the subsequent practice in applying the treaty if the practice "establishes the agreement of the parties" regarding the treaty's interpretation. Under Article 32, the negotiating history of a treaty may also be consulted, either to confirm the results of an analysis under Article 31 or if the analysis under Article 31 leaves the meaning ambiguous or leads to an absurd or unreasonable result. These principles all lead to the conclusion that Article 33 of the Refugee Convention did not create obligations on States with respect to refugees outside their territory.

The Text and Negotiating History of Article 33

The word "expel" in Paragraph 1 [of Article 33] clearly refers to the treatment of refugees in a State's territory. Paragraph 2 also clearly refers to refugees in a State's territory in excluding certain refugees from the protection of paragraph 1.

Article 33 also uses the word "return." The French term for the word "return" is included in the official English version of the treaty, a drafting device indicating that the word "return" is to be understood as synonymous with the French "refouler." The French was included in the English text for the express purpose of ensuring that the word "return" would be understood as applying only to refugees within a State's territory. During the final negotiating session for the Refugee Convention in July 1951, the Conference of Plenipotentiaries (representing 26 States, including the United States) directly confronted the question of how the word "return" in Article 33 (which was then Article 28) would be interpreted. At the session of July 22, the Swiss representative noted that the French word "refoulement" had some ambiguity, but that it "could not . . . be applied to a refugee who had not yet entered the territory of a country." The Swiss representative also expressed concern that Article 33 would be read to "impl[y] the existence of two categories of refugees: refugees who were liable to be expelled, and those who were liable to be returned." He therefore thought it essential that the drafting States "take a definite position with regard to the meaning to be attached to the word 'return,'" and stated his government's understanding that the word "return," like the word "expel," in fact "applies solely to refugees who had already entered a country, but were not yet resident there."

The Swiss representative made clear that his country's assent would depend on being assured of this reading, one implication of which would be that Article 33 would not require a state "to allow large groups of persons claiming refugee status to cross its frontiers." The representative of France affirmatively agreed with this interpretation and indicated that "[i]t was only the idea of what was generally meant by 'expulsion' that should be retained." The negotiating record for that day reflects no disagreement with this view. U.N. GAOR Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Status of Refugees and Stateless Persons (16th mtg.) at 6, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.2/SR.16 (1951).

The limited meaning of the word "return" in Article 33 was reaffirmed at the second and final reading of the draft Convention, on July 25, 1951. The negotiating record for that day records that the Dutch representative recalled the earlier discussion as follows:

> The Swiss representative had expressed the opinion that the word "expulsion" related to a refugee already admitted into a country, whereas the word "return" ("refoulement") related to a refugee already within the territory but not yet resident there.

The Dutch representative went on to say that this was an important point for his government because of its implications with respect to "large groups of refugees seeking access to its territory." Noting that the representatives of Belgium, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, and Sweden, as well as Switzerland, had supported this interpretation, he asked that it be placed on the record.

The President of the conference ruled that the interpretation should be placed on the record since no objection had been expressed. The British delegate added that the word "return" had been chosen as the nearest equivalent to "refoulement," and that he understood that the word "return" in this context had no broader meaning—i.e., no meaning broader than the French, which had already been clarified as applying only to a refugee within the territory. The President then suggested that the French word be included in brackets whenever the word "return" was used. U.N. GAOR Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Status of Refugees and Stateless Persons (35th mtg.) at 21–22, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.2/SR.35 (1951). The final text of Article 33 was adopted by a vote of 20 for, 0 against, and 3 abstentions. Id. at 25.

In short, the negotiating history reflects a deliberate consideration of the meaning of the word "return," a clear understanding that it referred only to refugees within the State's territory, and a related understanding that Article 33 created no obligations with respect to refugees outside the territory, including no obligation to refugees massing at the border. A number of countries whose support for the Convention was of critical importance would never have agreed to Article 33 but for the explicit rejection of the possibility of reading "return" to apply to refugees outside their territory.

This record is dispositive, whether it is taken under Article 31 of the Vienna Convention to reflect "an agreement relating to the treaty" made between all the parties in connection with its conclusion, to confirm an "ordinary meaning" analysis, or to resolve an ambiguity.

Subsequent Practice

The protracted and unsuccessful international effort to supplement the Refugee Convention with a Convention on Territorial Asylum, a central goal of which was to codify a prohibition against rejection of refugees at the frontier, further evidences an understanding of the limitations of the Refugee Convention and demonstrates the reluctance of the international community to broaden its legal commitments in the area of refugees and immigration.

The effort to draft a territorial asylum convention was preceded by adoption of the non-binding Declaration on Territorial Asylum by the U.N. General Assembly in December 1967. Paragraph 1 of Article 3 of the Declaration carried forward Article 33's usage of the words "expel" and "return" to refer to persons within the territory of a State. Paragraph 1 is broader than Article 33, however, in that it also includes an explicit prohibition against rejection at the frontier:

1. No person [entitled to seek and enjoy asylum from persecution] shall be subjected to measures such as rejection at the frontier or, if he has already entered the territory in which he seeks asylum, expulsion or compulsory return to any State in which he may be subjected to persecution.
2. Exception may be made to the foregoing principle only for overriding reasons of national security or in order to safeguard the population, as in the case of a mass influx of persons.

G.A. Res. 2312, 22 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 81, U.N. Doc. A/6716 (1967).

It was clearly understood that the Declaration's non-binding "prohibition" on rejection at the frontier, even as limited, went beyond the convention's Article 33 obligation. See Weis, The United States Declaration on Territorial Asylum, 7 Can. Y.B. Int'l L. 92, 142 (1969). Thus, one distinguished commentator said that "Article 3(1) of the Declaration on Territorial Asylum, 1967, corresponds to Article 33(1) of the Refugee Convention, but it extends the rule to include the prohibition of rejection at the frontier as well." A. Grahl-Madsen, An International Commentary on Territorial Asylum 33 (2d ed., rev., 1976) (emphasis added).

Work on principles of asylum continued after 1967 with a view toward a binding instrument that would, among other things, extend the precept of non-refoulement to protection against rejection at the frontier. Private sector drafting efforts eventually resulted in a draft convention being submitted to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees and subsequently to the U.N. Economic and Social Council and, finally, the General Assembly ("UNGA"). The UNGA established a Group of Experts that met in 1975 and then called a Conference of Plenipotentiaries to meet in 1977.

The draft text submitted to the Group of Experts included an obligation for States to use their "best endeavours to grant asylum" to refugees (defined somewhat more broadly than in the Refugee Convention). Article 2 also included the following proposed provision:

> No person shall be subjected by a Contracting State to measures such as rejection at the frontier, return, or expulsion, which would compel him to return directly or indirectly to, or remain in a territory with respect to which he has well-founded fear of persecution, prosecution or punishment. . . .

U.N. Group of Experts on the Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum, Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum at 4, U.N. Doc. A/AC.174/CRP.1 (1975). A later draft continued the separate treatment of the concepts of "rejection at the frontier" and "return" or "expulsion". See U.N. GAOR Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Elaboration of a Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum, Report of the Secretary-General at 1, U.N. Doc. A/10177/Corr. 1 (1975).

The Group of Experts had difficulties with this Article, which it recognized as the most important provision in the draft convention. It settled on a proposed re-wording that became Article 3 and read in part as follows:

> No person entitled to the benefits of this convention who is in the territory of a Contracting State shall be subjected by such Contracting State to measures such as return or expulsion which would compel him to return to a territory where his life or freedom would be threatened. Moreover, a Contracting State shall use its best endeavours to ensure that no person is rejected at its frontiers if there are well-founded reasons for believing that such rejection would subject him to persecution, prosecution or punishment. . . .

The proposed revision went on to provide for exceptions similar to those contained in Article 33 of the Refugee Convention. U.N. Group of Experts on the Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum, Report at 16, 34, U.N. Doc. A/AC.174/MISC.3/GE.75–6119 (1975); Elaboration of a Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum, Report of the Secretary General at 1, U.N. Doc. A/10177/Corr. 1 (1975).

Significantly, the initial proposal to reword this provision came from the United States, which took the position that "the principle of non-refoulement . . . should only apply to persons in the territory of a Contracting State" and that "with regard to rejection at the frontier, the principle of non-refoulement should not be expressed in absolute terms but that the words 'use their best endeavours' should be employed." Report at 14, U.N. Doc. A/AC.174/MISC.3/GE, 75–6119. Compare Proposal by the expert of the United states, U.N. Doc. A/AC.174/Informal Working Paper No. 4 (1975) with Report at 14–16, U.N. Doc. A/AC.174.MISC.3/GE.75–6119. See also 1975 Digest of United States Practice in International Law 156–58.

Efforts to conclude the convention were eventually abandoned, as the Conference on Plenipotentiaries on the Draft Convention on Territorial Asylum failed to adopt the Convention. This record clearly demonstrates that States—including the United States—did not regard Article 33 of the Refugee Convention as protecting refugees outside their territory, and that they were unwilling to assume such an obligation as a matter of international law.

The United States Understanding at the Time of Ratification

When President Johnson sent the Protocol to the Senate in 1968, he stated that it would require no changes in domestic law. Special Message to the Senate Transmitting the Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, 2 Pub. Papers 428 (1968). The Report of the Secretary of State, which accompanied the President's message to the Senate, specifically indicated that Article 33 of the Refugee Convention was comparable to section 243(h) of the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), 8 U.S.C. § 1253(h) (1976), and that it could be "implemented within the administrative discretion provided by existing regulations." S. Exec. R., 90th Cong., 2d Sess. VIII (1968). Section 243(h) at that time explicitly applied only to refugees within the United States:

> The Attorney General is authorized to withhold deportation of any alien within the United States to any country in which in his opinion the alien would be subject to persecution on account of race, religion, or political opinion and for such period of time as he deems to be necessary for such reasons.

(emphasis added) In short, it was clearly understood at the time of ratification that Article 33 imposed an obligation only with respect to refugees already within the United States.

Our view is not changed by the fact that the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees ("UNHCR") now advocates recognition of an extraterritorial norm of non-refoulement. UNHCR was established by the U.N. General Assembly even before the Refugee Convention was completed, and has never been charged with a definitive role in the interpretation of the Convention. That role is given to the International Court of Justice by Article 38 of the Convention and by Article IV of the Protocol. Similarly, the consensus-based executive committee ("EXCOM") of UNHCR (comprised of States both party and non-party to the Refugee Convention, and of States party to additional, more expansive conventions) has no authority to interpret legal obligations of States. UNHCR itself has recognized that the EXCOM conclusions have no legal effect, but instead provide guidance for States in developing their policies on refugee issues. Statement of Mr. Arnaout, Director, Division of Refugee Law and Doctrine, UNHCR, in Executive Committee of the High Commissioner's Programme, Summary record of the 431st Meeting at 11–12, U.N. Doc. A/AC.96/SR.431 (1988).

In a memorandum dated December 12, 1991, Acting Assistant Attorney General Flanigan concurred in Mr. Williamson's opinion in a letter excerpted below, footnotes omitted.

We have reviewed your letter opinion dated December 11, 1991, in which you conclude that Article 33 of the 1951 United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees (Refugee Convention) does not impose any domestic legal obligations on the United States with respect to individuals interdicted outside its territory as part of an effort to control mass illegal migration to the United States. . . . For the reasons outlined in your letter and for the additional reasons discussed below, we concur in your conclusions.

* * * *

The word "expel" in Article 33 clearly refers to the treatment to be afforded potential refugees found within a state's territory. Paragraph 1 also uses the term "return," followed by the French term "refouler." . . . [T]he history behind the insertion of "refouler" in the Convention demonstrates that the representatives of the nations that negotiated the Convention intended that the English word "return" not be construed so as to make the treaty applicable to persons outside the territory of a contracting state. . . .

The Supreme Court, in its review of the legislative history of the United States' accession to the Protocol, has also observed that the United States acceded to article 33 based on the view that Article 33 could be implemented through the then-existing section 243(h) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1253(h) (1978 ed.), and that section 243(h) applied only to deportation of refugees already in the United States. See INS v. Stevic, 476 U.S. 407, 415, 417–18 (1984). The legislative history of the Refugee Act of 1980, Pub. L. No. 96–212, 94 Stat. 102, supports this view of Article 33: the House Committee Report states that the Refugee Convention was intended to "insure fair and humane treatment for refugees within the territory of the contracting states." H.R. Rep. No. 608, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 17 (1979) (emphasis added).

Judge Edwards in Haitian Refugee Center v. Gracey, 809 F.2d 794 (D.C. Cir. 1987), concluded unequivocally—and with specific reference to the Haitian interdiction program at issue here—that "Article 33 in and of itself provides no rights to aliens outside a host country's borders." Id. at 840 (Edwards, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part). The other two judges on the Gracey panel decided that the plaintiff lacked standing to challenge the interdiction program and decided the case on that ground, a decision from which Judge Edwards dissented. Neither of the judges in the majority, however, expressed any disagreement with or reservations about Judge Edwards' analysis of the underlying merits issues, including his discussion of Article 33 and his conclusion that it provides no rights to aliens outside a state's borders.

We note, moreover, as an independent ground for our conclusion, that the Protocol by which the United States adhered to the Convention is not self-executing for domestic law purposes. Accordingly, the Protocol itself does not create rights or duties that can be enforced by a court.

Under the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution, treaties made pursuant to the Constitution's procedures are part of the "supreme Law of the Land. . . ." U.S. Const., art. VI, cl. 2. Some treaties, however, merely impose obligations under international law that the United States, as a contracting party, must perform particular acts, without themselves creating any obligations under domestic law. In such cases the international obligations must be "executed" through domestic legislation before the obligation becomes effectively the law of the land. Thus, in Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253, 314 (1829), Chief Justice Marshall recognized that not all treaties are self-executing:

> [A treaty] is, consequently, to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the legislature, whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court. . . .

Whether a treaty is self-executing is controlled by the intent of the United States as a contracting party. See British Caledonian Airways v. Bond, 665 F.2d 1153, 1160 (D.C. Cir. 1981); United States v. Postal, 589 F.2d 862, 876 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 832 (1979); Diggs v. Richardson, 555 F.2d 848, 851 (D.C. Cir. 1976). "The parties' intent may be apparent from the language of the treaty, or, if the language is ambiguous, it may be divined from the circumstances surrounding the treaty's promulgation." Postal, 589 F.2d at 876.

The language of the Protocol by which the United States adhered to the Refugee Convention demonstrates that the United States did not intend that the Convention, as adhered to, would be self-executing. In particular, Article III of the Protocol provides that the signatories are to communicate to the United Nations the "laws and regulations which they may adopt to ensure the application of the present Protocol." 19 U.S.T. at 6226. Cf. Postal, 589 F.2d at 876–77 (treaties that "expressly provide for legislative execution" are "uniformly declared executory" and therefore require further legislative action to bring the treaty into effect). Moreover, such a provision would have been unnecessary if the Refugee Convention were self-executing. Cf. Protocol, art. VI(b), 19 U.S.T. 6227 (any signatory with federal form of government obligated to bring the articles of Refugee Convention to the notice of the constituent states if those articles come within the states' exclusive legislative jurisdictions). Thus, the Protocol by its own terms plainly contemplates the need for implementing legislation by its signatories.

Furthermore, the understanding of the President and the Senate in adopting the Protocol was that the United States' obligations under the Refugee Convention, pursuant to the Protocol, would not be self-executing. Specifically, the President and Senate clearly believed that pre-existing domestic law governing refugees—which applied only to persons already in the United States—would suffice to implement the Refugee Convention and the Protocol. See also Stevic, 467 U.S. at 417–18. We also note that the Second Circuit, the only circuit court to address the question directly, has concluded that the Protocol is not self-executing. Bertrand v. Sava, 684 F.2d 204, 218–19 (2d Cir. 1982).

Because the Protocol is not self-executing, its provisions cannot be enforced by a private right of action in a United States court. It is well-established that individuals may directly seek enforcement of a treaty's provisions only when "the treaty . . . expressly or impliedly provides a private right of action." Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic, 726 F.2d 774, 808 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Bork, J., concurring); cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1003 (1985). See also Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 598–99 (1884); Frolova v. Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, 761 F.2d 70, 373 (7th Cir. 1985) ("if not implemented by appropriate legislation [treaties] do not provide the basis for a private lawsuit unless they are intended to be self-executing"); Mannington Mills, Inc. v. Congoleum Corp., 595 F.2d 1287, 1298 (3d Cir. 1979); Linder v. Calero Portocarrero, 747 F. Supp. 1452, 1462–63 (S.C. Fla. 1990); Haitian Refugee Cent. v. Gracey, 600 F. Supp. 1396, 1405–06 (D.D.C. 1985), aff'd on other grounds, 809 F.2d 794 (D.C. Cir. 1987).

A one-page opinion of this Office, and one sentence in another Office of Legal Counsel opinion, might be read to suggest that refugees interdicted on the high seas enjoy certain rights under the Protocol adopting the Refugee Convention. See Memorandum for the Attorney General from Assistant Attorney General Olson, 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 242, 248 (1981) ("Individuals who claim that they will be persecuted . . . must be given an opportunity to substantiate their claims [under Article 33]."); Memorandum for the Associate Attorney General from Larry L. Simms, Deputy Assistant Attorney General (Aug. 5, 1991) ("Those who claim to be refugees must be given a chance to substantiate their claims [under Article 33]."). Among other things, these memoranda did not address whether the Protocol adopting the Refugee Convention is self-executing. To the extent that these memoranda could be read to suggest that Article 33, as adopted by the Protocol, imposes a judicially enforceable obligation on the United States with respect to individuals interdicted beyond its territorial boundaries, those memoranda are incorrect.

On May 24, 1992, President George H.W. Bush signed Executive Order No. 12807 on the interdiction of illegal aliens, 57 Fed. Reg. 23,133 (June 1, 1992). Executive Order No. 12807 revoked Executive Order No. 12324 issued by President Reagan in 1981, which had provided that "no person [interdicted by the United States on the high seas] who is a refugee will be returned without his consent." Executive Order No. 12807 stated that:

> [t]he international legal obligations of the United States under the United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees (U.S. T.I.A.S. 6577; 19 U.S.T. 6223) to apply Article 33 of the United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees do not extend to persons located outside the territory of the United States. . . .

In addition to ordering the Secretary of State to "undertake to enter into, on behalf of the United States, cooperative arrangements with appropriate foreign governments for the purpose of preventing illegal migration to the United States by sea," the President ordered instructions to be issued to the Coast Guard "in order to enforce the suspension of the entry of undocumented aliens by sea and the interdiction of any defined vessel carrying such aliens."

The executive order required that the instructions provide for the Coast Guard:

> (1) To stop and board defined vessels, when there is reason to believe that such vessels are engaged in the irregular transportation of persons or violations of United States law or the law of a country with which the United States has an arrangement authorizing such action.
> (2) To make inquiries of those on board, examine documents and take such actions as are necessary to carry out this order.
> (3) To return the vessel and its passengers to the country from which it came, or to another country, when there is reason to believe that an offense is being committed against the United States immigration laws, or appropriate laws of a foreign country with which we have an arrangement to assist; provided, however, that the Attorney General, in his unreviewable discretion, may decide that a person who is a refugee will not be returned without his consent.

It authorized these actions "to be undertaken only beyond the territorial sea of the United States."

When the issue ultimately reached the Supreme Court, in Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, 509 U.S. 155 (1993), the United States argued that the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA") precluded review of the interdiction program, that collateral estoppel barred the suit in light of an earlier ruling upholding the program, that § 243(h) of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1253(h)) (later redesignated as INA § 241(b)(3) by the IIRIRA, see section C.2.b supra), the implementing legislation for Article 33, did not have extraterritorial application (consistent with the proper interpretation of Article 33); and that prudential considerations barred an injunction against the interdiction program. The Supreme Court ruled in favor of the government, holding "that neither § 243(h) nor Article 33 of the United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees applies to action taken by the Coast Guard on the high seas."

The text of the United States brief is available at 1992 U.S. Briefs 344. The Supreme Court's decision is excerpted below; all footnotes have been omitted.

The President has directed the Coast Guard to intercept vessels illegally transporting passengers from Haiti to the United States and to return those passengers to Haiti without first determining whether they may qualify as refugees. The question presented in this case is whether such forced repatriation, "authorized to be undertaken only beyond the territorial sea of the United States," violates § 243(h)(1) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 (INA or Act). We hold that neither § 243(h) nor Article 33 of the United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees applies to action taken by the Coast Guard on the high seas.

On September 23, 1981, the United States and the Republic of Haiti entered into an agreement authorizing the United States Coast Guard to intercept vessels engaged in the illegal transportation of undocumented aliens to our shores. While the parties agreed to prosecute "illegal traffickers," the Haitian Government also guaranteed that its repatriated citizens would not be punished for their illegal departure. The agreement also established that the United States Government would not return any passengers "whom the United States authorities determined to qualify for refugee status."

On September 29, 1981, President Reagan issued a proclamation in which he characterized "the continuing illegal migration by sea of large numbers of undocumented aliens into the southeastern United States" as "a serious national problem detrimental to the interests of the United States." Presidential Proclamation No. 4865, 3 CFR 50–51 (1981–1983 Comp.). He therefore suspended the entry of undocumented aliens from the high seas and ordered the Coast Guard to intercept vessels carrying such aliens and to return them to their point of origin. His Executive Order expressly "provided, however, that no person who is a refugee will be returned without his consent." Exec. Order No. 12324, 3 CFR § 2(c)(3), p. 181 (1981–1983 Comp.).

In the ensuing decade, the Coast Guard interdicted approximately 25,000 Haitian migrants. After interviews conducted on board Coast Guard cutters, aliens who were identified as economic migrants were "screened out" and promptly repatriated. Those who made a credible showing of political refugee status were "screened in" and transported to the United States to file formal applications for asylum. App. 231.

On September 30, 1991, a group of military leaders displaced the government of Jean Bertrand Aristide, the first democratically elected president in Haitian history. . . . Following the coup the Coast Guard suspended repatriations for a period of several weeks, and the United States imposed economic sanctions on Haiti.

On November 18, 1991, the Coast Guard announced that it would resume the program of interdiction and forced repatriation. . . . .

. . . . During the six months after October 1991, the Coast Guard interdicted over 34,000 Haitians. Because so many interdicted Haitians could not be safely processed on Coast Guard cutters, the Department of Defense established temporary facilities at the United States Naval Base in Guantanamo, Cuba, to accommodate them during the screening process. Those temporary facilities, however, had a capacity of only about 12,500 persons. In the first three weeks of May 1992, the Coast Guard intercepted 127 vessels (many of which were considered unseaworthy, overcrowded, and unsafe); those vessels carried 10,497 undocumented aliens. On May 22, 1992, the United States Navy determined that no additional migrants could safely be accommodated at Guantanamo. App. 231–233.

With both the facilities at Guantanamo and available Coast Guard cutters saturated, and with the number of Haitian emigrants in unseaworthy craft increasing (many had drowned as they attempted the trip to Florida), the Government could no longer both protect our borders and offer the Haitians even a modified screening process. It had to choose between allowing Haitians into the United States for the screening process or repatriating them without giving them any opportunity to establish their qualifications as refugees. . . .

On May 23, 1992, President Bush adopted the second choice. After assuming office, President Clinton decided not to modify that order; it remains in effect today. . . .

Both parties argue that the plain language of § 243(h)(1) is dispositive. It reads as follows:

> "The Attorney General shall not deport or return any alien (other than an alien described in section 1251(a)(4)(D) of this title) to a country if the Attorney General determines that such alien's life or freedom would be threatened in such country on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion." 8 U.S.C. § 1253(h)(1) (1988 ed., Supp. IV).

* * * *

Other provisions of the Act expressly confer certain responsibilities on the Secretary of State, the President, and, indeed, on certain other officers as well. The 1981 and 1992 Executive Orders expressly relied on statutory provisions that confer authority on the President to suspend the entry of "any class of aliens" or to "impose on the entry of aliens any restrictions he may deem to be appropriate." We cannot say that the interdiction program created by the President, which the Coast Guard was ordered to enforce, usurped authority that Congress had delegated to, or implicated responsibilities that it had imposed on, the Attorney General alone.

The reference to the Attorney General in the statutory text is significant not only because that term cannot reasonably be construed to describe either the President or the Coast Guard, but also because it suggests that it applies only to the Attorney General's normal responsibilities under the INA. The most relevant of those responsibilities for our purposes are her conduct of the deportation and exclusion hearings in which requests for asylum or for withholding of deportation under § 243(h) are ordinarily advanced.

Since there is no provision in the statute for the conduct of such proceedings outside the United States, and since Part V and other provisions of the INA obviously contemplate that such proceedings would be held in the country, we cannot reasonably construe § 243(h) to limit the Attorney General's actions in geographic areas where she has not been authorized to conduct such proceedings. Part V of the INA contains no reference to a possible extraterritorial application.

Even if Part V of the Act were not limited to strictly domestic procedures, the presumption that Acts of Congress do not ordinarily apply outside our borders would support an interpretation of § 243(h) as applying only within United States territory. See, e.g., EEOC v. Arabian American Oil Co., 499 U.S. 244, 248, 113 L. Ed. 2d 274, 111 S. Ct. 1227 (1991) (citing Foley Bros., Inc. v. Filardo, 336 U.S. 281, 285, 93 L. Ed. 680, 69 S. Ct. 575 (1949)); Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 585–589, 119 L. Ed. 2d 351, 112 S. Ct. 2130, and n. 4 (1992) (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment); see also Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428, 440, 102 L. Ed. 2d 818, 109 S. Ct. 683 (1989) ("When it desires to do so, Congress knows how to place the high seas within the jurisdictional reach of a statute"). The Court of Appeals held that the presumption against extraterritoriality had "no relevance in the present context" because there was no risk that § 243(h), which can be enforced only in United States courts against the United States Attorney General, would conflict with the laws of other nations. 969 F.2d at 1358. We have recently held, however, that the presumption has a foundation broader than the desire to avoid conflict with the laws of other nations. Smith v. United States, 507 U.S. 197, 206–207, n. 5, 122 L. Ed. 2d 548, 113 S. Ct. 1178 (1993).

Respondents' expansive interpretation of the word "return" raises another problem: It would make the word "deport" redundant. If "return" referred solely to the destination to which the alien is to be removed, it alone would have been sufficient to encompass aliens involved in both deportation and exclusion proceedings. And if Congress had meant to refer to all aliens who might be sent back to potential oppressors, regardless of their location, the word "deport" would have been unnecessary. By using both words, the statute implies an exclusively territorial application, in the context of both kinds of domestic immigration proceedings. The use of both words reflects the traditional division between the two kinds of aliens and the two kinds of hearings. We can reasonably conclude that Congress used the two words "deport" and "return" only to make § 243(h)'s protection available in both deportation and exclusion proceedings. Indeed, the history of the 1980 amendment confirms that conclusion.

. . . [I]n sum, all available evidence about the meaning of § 243(h)—the Government official at whom it is directed, its location in the Act, its failure to suggest any extraterritorial application, the 1980 amendment that gave it a dual reference to "deport or return," and the relevance of that dual structure to immigration law in general—leads unerringly to the conclusion that it applies in only one context: the domestic procedures by which the Attorney General determines whether deportable and excludable aliens may remain in the United States.

Although the protection afforded by § 243(h) did not apply in exclusion proceedings before 1980, other provisions of the Act did authorize relief for aliens at the border seeking protection as refugees in the United States. See INS v. Stevic, 467 U.S. at 415–416. When the United States acceded to the Protocol in 1968, therefore, the INA already offered some protection to both classes of refugees. It offered no such protection to any alien who was beyond the territorial waters of the United States, though, and we would not expect the Government to assume a burden as to those aliens without some acknowledgment of its dramatically broadened scope. Both Congress and the Executive Branch gave extensive consideration to the Protocol before ratifying it in 1968; in all of their published consideration of it there appears no mention of the possibility that the United States was assuming any extra-territorial obligations. Nevertheless, because the history of the 1980 Act does disclose a general intent to conform our law to Article 33 of the Convention, it might be argued that the extraterritorial obligations imposed by Article 33 were so clear that Congress, in acceding to the Protocol, and then in amending the statute to harmonize the two, meant to give the latter a correspondingly extraterritorial effect. Or, just as the statute might have imposed an extraterritorial obligation that the Convention does not (the argument we have just rejected), the Convention might have established an extraterritorial obligation which the statute does not; under the Supremacy Clause, that broader treaty obligation might then provide the controlling rule of law. With those possibilities in mind we shall consider both the text and negotiating history of the Convention itself.

Like the text and the history of § 243(h), the text and negotiating history of Article 33 of the United Nations Convention are both completely silent with respect to the Article's possible application to actions taken by a country outside its own borders. Respondents argue that the Protocol's broad remedial goals require that a nation be prevented from repatriating refugees to their potential oppressors whether or not the refugees are within that nation's borders. In spite of the moral weight of that argument, both the text and negotiating history of Article 33 affirmatively indicate that it was not intended to have extraterritorial effect.

Article 33.1 [of the Refugee Convention] uses the words "expel or return ('refouler')" as an obvious parallel to the words "deport or return" in § 243(h)(1). There is no dispute that "expel" has the same meaning as "deport"; it refers to the deportation or expulsion of an alien who is already present in the host country. The dual reference identified and explained in our opinion in Leng May Ma v. Barber suggests that the term "return ('refouler')" refers to the exclusion of aliens who are merely " 'on the threshold of initial entry.' " 357 U.S. at 187 (quoting Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 212, 97 L. Ed. 956, 73 S. Ct. 625 (1953)).

This suggestion—that "return" has a legal meaning narrower than its common meaning—is reinforced by the parenthetical reference to "refouler," a French word that is not an exact synonym for the English word "return." Indeed, neither of two respected

English-French dictionaries mentions "refouler" as one of many possible French translations of "return." Conversely, the English translations of "refouler" do not include the word "return." They do, however, include words like "repulse," "repel," "drive back," and even "expel." To the extent that they are relevant, these translations imply that "return" means a defensive act of resistance or exclusion at a border rather than an act of transporting someone to a particular destination. In the context of the Convention, to "return" means to "repulse" rather than to "reinstate."

The text of Article 33 thus fits with Judge Edwards' understanding that "'expulsion' would refer to a 'refugee already admitted into a country' and that 'return' would refer to a 'refugee already within the territory but not yet resident there.' Thus, the Protocol was not intended to govern parties' conduct outside of their national borders." Haitian Refugee Center v. Gracey, 257 U.S. App. D.C. at 413, 809 F.2d at 840 (footnotes omitted). From the time of the Convention, commentators have consistently agreed with this view.

The drafters of the Convention and the parties to the Protocol—like the drafters of § 243(h)—may not have contemplated that any nation would gather fleeing refugees and return them to the one country they had desperately sought to escape; such actions may even violate the spirit of Article 33; but a treaty cannot impose uncontemplated extraterritorial obligations on those who ratify it through no more than its general humanitarian intent. Because the text of Article 33 cannot reasonably be read to say anything at all about a nation's actions toward aliens outside its own territory, it does not prohibit such actions.

B. The Negotiating History of the Convention

In early drafts of the Convention, what finally emerged as Article 33 was numbered 28. At a negotiating conference of plenipotentiaries held in Geneva, Switzerland, on July 11, 1951, the Swiss delegate explained his understanding that the words "expel" and "return" covered only refugees who had entered the host country. . . .

No one expressed disagreement with the position of the Swiss delegate on that day or at the session two weeks later when Article 28 was again discussed. . . .

. . . . At one time there was a "general consensus," and in July 1951 several delegates [to the negotiation of the Convention] understood the right of non-refoulement to apply only to aliens physically present in the host country. There is no record of any later disagreement with that position. Moreover, the term "refouler" was included in the English version of the text to avoid the expressed concern about an inappropriately broad reading of the English word "return."

Therefore, even if we believed that Executive Order No. 12807 violated the intent of some signatory states to protect all aliens, wherever they might be found, from being transported to potential oppressors, we must acknowledge that other signatory states carefully—and successfully—sought to avoid just that implication. The negotiating history, which suggests that the Convention's limited reach resulted from a deliberate bargain, is not dispositive, but it solidly supports our reluctance to interpret Article 33 to impose obligations on the contracting parties that are broader than the text commands. We do not read that text to apply to aliens interdicted on the high seas.

It is perfectly clear that 8 U.S.C. § 1182(f) . . . grants the President ample power to establish a naval blockade that would simply deny illegal Haitian migrants the ability to disembark on our shores. Whether the President's chosen method of preventing the "attempted mass migration" of thousands of Haitians—to use the Dutch delegate's phrase—poses a greater risk of harm to Haitians who might otherwise face a long and dangerous return voyage is irrelevant to the scope of his authority to take action that neither the Convention nor the statute clearly prohibits. As we have already noted, Acts of Congress normally do not have extraterritorial application unless such an intent is clearly manifested. That presumption has special force when we are construing treaty and statutory provisions that may involve foreign and military affairs for which the President has unique responsibility. Cf. United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 81 L. Ed. 255, 57 S. Ct. 216 (1936). We therefore find ourselves in agreement with the conclusion expressed in Judge Edwards' concurring opinion in Gracey, 257 U.S. App. D.C. at 414, 809 F.2d at 841:

> "This case presents a painfully common situation in which desperate people, convinced that they can no longer remain in their homeland, take desperate measures to escape. Although the human crisis is compelling, there is no solution to be found in a judicial remedy."

* * * *

On September 24, 1999, President William J. Clinton, pursuant to sections 212(f) and 215(a)(1) of the INA (as amended at 8 U.S.C. §§ 1182(f), 1185(a)(1)) and in light of Presidential Proclamation 4865 of September 29, 1981 on High Seas Interdiction of Illegal Aliens, 46 Fed. Reg. 48,107 (Oct. 1, 1981), delegated to the Attorney General the authority to (1) maintain custody at any location the Attorney General deemed appropriate and conduct any screening the Attorney General deemed appropriate in the Attorney General's unreviewable discretion of any undocumented person the Attorney General had reason to believe was seeking to enter the United States and who was encountered in a vessel on the high seas through December 31, 2000, and (2) undertake any other appropriate actions with respect to such aliens permitted by law. 64 Fed. Reg. 55,809 (Oct. 15, 1999).

b. Interdiction of undocumented aliens in the territorial sea

In late 1993 the Office of the Associate Attorney General for the Department of Justice ("DOJ") and the General Counsel's Office of the Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") requested an opinion from the Office of Legal Counsel at DOJ ("OLC") on the question, inter alia, whether an undocumented alien who had been interdicted within United States territorial waters was entitled to an exclusion hearing.

OLC concluded that undocumented aliens within the territorial sea of the United States were not entitled to a hearing under the exclusion provisions of the INA and could be turned back from the United States by the Coast Guard if the President so ordered. Memorandum for the Attorney General from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, re: Immigration Consequences of Undocumented Aliens' Arrival in United States Territorial Waters, 17 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 77 (1993). The opinion is excerpted below. Most footnotes have been deleted.

* * * *

The background to these requests is as follows. Historically, the United States adhered to the rule that the territorial sea extends three nautical miles out. In 1988, however, President Reagan, by proclamation, extended the United States's territorial sea to a distance of twelve nautical miles. See Proclamation No. 5928 (Dec. 27, 1988), 54 Fed. Reg. 777 (1988), reprinted at 103 Stat. 2981, 3 C.F.R. 547 (1989) (the Proclamation). . . . Although the Proclamation by its terms purported not to extend or otherwise alter existing Federal law or any jurisdiction, rights, legal interests, or obligations derived therefrom, questions arose concerning the possible or alleged effects of the Proclamation on domestic law or law enforcement. . . .

* * * *

. . . The question presented here is whether undocumented aliens seeking to enter the United States but interdicted within its territorial waters—that is, within twelve nautical miles from the United States' baselines—must be accorded an exclusion proceeding under the INA.

Section 235(b) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b), "provide[s] the jurisdictional basis for an exclusion hearing before an immigration judge." Matter of Waldei, Interim Dec. # 2981, 19 I. & N. Dec. 189, 191 (Board of Immigration Appeals 1984). That section reads in part as follows (emphasis added):

> Every alien (other than an alien crewman) and except as otherwise provided in subsection (c) of this section and in section 1323(d) of this title, who may not appear to the examining immigration officer at the port of arrival to be clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to land shall be detained for further inquiry to be conducted by a special inquiry officer.

Section 236(a), 8 U.S.C. § 1226(a), provides for exclusion hearings before a "special inquiry officer" (i.e., an immigration judge, see 8 U.S.C. § 1101(b)(4)). Section 236(a) states:

> A special inquiry officer shall conduct proceedings under this section, administer oaths, present and receive evidence, and interrogate, examine, and cross-examine the alien or witnesses. He shall have authority in any case to determine whether an arriving alien who has been detained for further inquiry under section 1225 of this title shall be allowed to enter or shall be excluded and deported.

As the plain language of the INA makes clear, it is a predicate for conducting exclusion proceedings that the alien seeking admission be examined "at the port of arrival" by an immigration officer. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b). . . . An alien interdicted at sea—even if within the territorial waters of the United States—is not at any "port." Consequently, there is no jurisdiction to conduct an exclusion proceeding in such a case.

. . . [T]he overall statutory scheme regulating the exclusion of an alien is activated by the alien's arrival at a port of the United States. That event triggers significant legal effects, including the transporter's duty to provide a manifest, the immigration officers' powers to inspect and detain, and the alien's right, if detained, to an exclusion proceeding. Nothing in the statute contemplates that the same effects are to follow if the alien is interdicted at sea before reaching port—even if interdiction occurs within United States territorial waters. For purposes of exclusion under the INA, the ports of the United States—not the limits of its territorial waters—are functionally its borders. Accordingly, we conclude that aliens interdicted within United States territorial waters do not have a right to exclusion proceedings under INA section 236.

Asylum and Withholding Provisions of the INA

" '[O]ur immigration laws have long made a distinction between those aliens who have come to our shores seeking admission . . . and those who are within the United States after an entry, irrespective of its legality. In the latter instance the Court has recognized additional rights and privileges not extended to those in the former category who are merely "on the threshold of initial entry." ' " Sale, slip op. 18 (quoting Leng May Ma v. Barber, 357 U.S. 185, 187 (1958) (quoting Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 212 (1953))). . . . "Entry" is here a term of art. See Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. at 28–29; Matter of Patel, Interim Dec. # 3157. slip op. 4 (Board of Immigration Appeals, August 9, 199l). "Physically coming into the United States does not necessarily accomplish an entry, else all inspections would effectively have to be made on foreign soil. Presence after inspection and admission, however, does amount to entry. So does penetrating the functional border by intentionally evading inspection before being apprehended." 1 Charles Gordon and Stanley Mailman, Immigration Law and Procedure, supra, § 1.03[2][b]. Aliens who have made an "entry" are entitled to deportation proceedings; those who are seeking admission but who have not entered are accorded, at most, an exclusion proceeding—"a process in which the alien usually has less protection under the statute and little, if any, under the Constitution." Id.

Before 1980, aliens who were excludable but not deportable did not have the right to apply for either asylum or withholding of deportation or return. By the enactment of the Refugee Act of 1980, Pub. L. No. 96–212, 94 Stat. 107 (1980), Congress extended those benefits to both types of aliens. Section 201(b) of the Refugee Act, as amended, now codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1158(a), prescribed that the Attorney General was to establish procedures for asylum applications. The Refugee Act's asylum provision states in part:

> The Attorney General shall establish a procedure for an alien physically present in the United States or at a land border or port of entry, irrespective of such alien's status, to apply for asylum . . .

8 U.S.C. § 1158(a) (emphasis added). In Haitian Refugee Center, Inc. v. Baker, 953 F.2d 1498, 1510 (11th Cir. 1995), the court construed the language of the asylum provision and held:

> [T]he plaintiffs in this case—who have been interdicted on the high seas—cannot assert a claim based on the INA or the Refugee Act. . . . The plain language of the statute is unambiguous and limits the application of the provision to aliens within the United States or at United States' borders or ports of entry. . . . The plaintiffs in this case have been interdicted on the high seas and have not yet reached "a land border" or a "port of entry."

Precisely the same can be said of aliens who have been interdicted within territorial waters: they have not yet reached a land border or a port of entry.

Furthermore, aliens interdicted within the territorial waters are also not "physically present in the United States," 8 U.S.C. § 1158(a), in the sense of that expression evidently intended by Congress. The statute's distinction between aliens "physically present in the United States" and aliens "at a land border or port of entry" is evidently designed to refer to the difference between deportable and excludable aliens: as pointed out above, the former are understood to be "already physically in the United States," while the latter are deemed to be "outside the United States seeking admission." Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. at 25. Aliens interdicted within the territorial waters are undoubtedly not entitled to deportation proceedings. They are therefore not "physically present in the United States" within the meaning of the Refugee Act's asylum provision.

The Refugee Act also amended the INA to allow aliens in exclusion proceedings to seek "withholding" under INA section 243(h), 8 U.S.C. § 1253(h). See Sale, slip op. 19 ("The 1980 amendment erased the long-maintained distinction between deportable and excludable aliens for purposes of section 243(h). By adding the word 'return' and removing the words 'within the United States' from § 243(h), Congress extended the statute's protection to both types of aliens . . ."). In Sale, the Supreme Court held that this amendment did not limit the President's power to order the Coast Guard to repatriate undocumented aliens interdicted on the high seas. Id., 18–21. In our view, the amendment also does not limit the President's power to order the Coast Guard to turn back undocumented aliens interdicted within United States territorial waters.

> The Attorney General shall not deport or return any alien . . . to a country if the Attorney General determines that such alien's life or freedom would be threatened in such country on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.

Section 243(h) by its terms applies only to the actions of the Attorney General. . . . If the President orders the Coast Guard to interdict and turn back aliens within the territorial waters, nothing in section 243(h) precludes that agency from obeying his instructions, any more than the section precluded the agency from obeying a similar Presidential order with regard to aliens on the high seas. Cf. Sale, slip op. 15–16.

This analysis of the scope of section 243(h) is consistent with Congress's understanding of the scope of Article 33 of the United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, July 28, 1951, 19 U.S.T. 6259, T.I.A.S. No. 6577, 189 U.N.T.S. 150 (United Nations Convention).

Furthermore, Article 33 does not convey any entitlements that could be relevant here but that are not provided by section 243(h) itself. See Stevic, 467 U.S. at 426–28 n.22; Haitian Refugee Center, Inc. v. Gracey, 809 F.2d at 794 (Edwards, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Thus, Article 33 does not serve as an independent basis for requiring procedural protections not conferred by the statute. In addition, the State Department has advised us of its view that the United States's international law obligations under the Protocol do not require it to provide exclusion hearings to aliens who have merely arrived in its territorial waters.[23] That conclusion concerning the territorial scope of the signatories' obligations under Article 33 is re-enforced by the negotiating history of the article and the interpretations of commentators.

Accordingly, we conclude that the INA's sections relating to asylum and withholding do not require that an exclusion hearing be provided for aliens interdicted within territorial waters.

The Geographical Limits of the "United States"

Our reading of the INA is consistent with the statute's definition of the "United States," 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(38):

> "The term 'United States', except as otherwise specifically herein provided, when used in a geographical sense, means the continental United States, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands of the United States."

That definition makes no reference to the United States's territorial waters and on its face is consistent with the view, supported by [23] The State Department takes the position that "the non-refoulement obligation of the Protocol [which is reflected in the "withholding of return" language of INA § 243(h)] applies only with respect to aliens who have 'entered' the United States in the immigration law sense. That is, the international treaty obligation only applies with respect to an alien who is physically present on the land mass of the United States and who has passed a port of entry . . . [T]he non-refoulement obligation of the Refugee Protocol does not apply at sea at all and therefore has no bearing on the questions presented to you by INS." State Dep't Submission 2.

other sections of the INA, that an undocumented alien is entitled to an exclusion hearing only if he or she has actually arrived at a port of entry.[25]

Effect Of Presidential Proclamation No. 5928

As discussed above, Presidential Proclamation No. 5928 of December 27, 1988, announced that the territorial sea of the United States would extend to twelve nautical miles from the baselines of the United States. The President further stated:

Nothing in this Proclamation:

> (a) extends or otherwise alters existing Federal or State law or any jurisdiction, rights, legal interests, or obligations derived therefrom. . . .

54 Fed. Reg. 777.

Despite this expressed intent not to alter domestic law, the INS suggests that the Proclamation did operate to extend the scope of the INA. More precisely, the INS appears to argue that the Proclamation operated to enlarge the INA's definition of the "United States," 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(38). See INS/OGC Memorandum 1–3.

[25] In numerous other statutes, Congress has specifically included a reference to the territorial waters when defining the "United States." For example, the Longshore and Harbor Workers Compensation Act defines the term "United States" "when used in a geographical sense [to include] the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, including the territorial waters thereof." 33 U.S.C. § 902 (9). The Congressional Research Service has identified a large number of statutes referring explicitly to the territorial sea. See Memorandum to Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, from American Law Division, re: Effect of Territorial Sea Extension on Selected Domestic Law, CRS-12 (March 16, 1989), reprinted in Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Oceanography and Great Lakes of the House Comm. on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, 101st Cong., 1st Sess. 49, 60 (1989).

When the Proclamation was proposed, this Office considered various issues relating to its legality. As to the possible effect of the Proclamation on domestic law, we opined:

> By its terms, the Proclamation will make clear that it is not intended to affect domestic law. Congress may, however, have enacted statutes that are intended to be linked to the extent of the United States' territorial sea under international law. The issue, therefore, in determining the effect of the proclamation on domestic law is whether Congress intended for the jurisdiction of any existing statute to include an expanded territorial sea. Thus, the question is one of legislative intent.

Memorandum to Abraham D. Sofaer, Legal Advisor, Department of State, from Douglas W. Kmiec, Acting Ass't Att'y Gen., Office of Legal Counsel, re: Legal Issues Raised by the Proposed Presidential Proclamation to Extend the Territorial Sea, 12 Op. O.L.C. 301, 323 (1988).

Our 1988 opinion invites the question whether Congress intended the INA, or particular sections of the INA, to track any changes in the bounds of the United States's territorial sea. We have therefore considered whether Congress intended the INA's definition of the "United States" at 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(38) to track, and conform to, changes in international law determining the extent of the United State's territorial sea. We believe that Congress had no such intent. . . .

We shall, however, assume arguendo that Congress intended the INA's definition of the "United States" to track changes in the extent of the United States's territorial sea recognized by international law. Cf. Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping, 488 U.S. at 441 (suggesting by negative implication that if injury had occurred in territorial waters, it would have taken place within "United States" as defined in Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976). It still does not follow that exclusion proceedings must be provided for undocumented aliens interdicted within the twelve mile bounds that now comprise the territorial waters. An implicit enlargement of the INA's definition of the "United States" to include the new territorial waters has no bearing on the scope of the statute's exclusion provisions, INA sections 225–226. As discussed above, these sections do not refer to the "United States" in any relevant way; rather, they refer to "the ports of the United States," and condition exclusion proceedings on arrival at such ports. In short, by enlarging the territorial waters, the Proclamation may also have extended the geographical scope of the "United States" under the INA; but it does not follow that aliens for whom exclusion proceedings need not previously have been provided have become entitled to them.

Furthermore, the Proclamation should have no impact on the procedural entitlements of undocumented aliens under the INA because the statute's only significant reference to the territorial waters occurs in a provision establishing the Government's power to deter illegal immigration rather than in any of the provisions establishing an alien's procedural rights in seeking to enter the United States. A computer search shows that the terms "territorial waters" or "territorial sea" are mentioned in only one section of title 8 (which includes the INA). That provision is section 287(a)(3) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1357(a)(3), which authorizes the INS to conduct warrantless searches of vessels "within the territorial waters of the United States. . . ." The absence of any other use in the INA of the terms "territorial waters" or "territorial sea"—and particularly their absence in the detailed provisions governing the treatment of aliens seeking to enter the United States—strongly suggests that an alien's arrival or presence in the territorial waters is simply not a relevant consideration for establishing or expanding the rights of aliens seeking entry. Had Congress wanted to make mere entry into the territorial waters sufficient to guarantee the entrant an exclusion hearing, it could easily have written such language into an appropriate section of the INA, as it did elsewhere in the Act . . .

Accordingly, we conclude that Presidential Proclamation No. 5928 does not have the effect of requiring exclusion hearings to be provided to undocumented aliens interdicted within the territorial sea.

c. Interdiction in internal waters

INS subsequently sought OLC's opinion as to whether aliens who were interdicted in U.S. internal waters but who had not landed or been taken ashore on United States dry land were entitled to exclusion proceedings or other proceedings under the INA. Answering in the negative, OLC noted that the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 ("IIRIRA") substantially amended the INA, ch. 477, 66 Stat. 163 (1952) (as amended at 8 U.S.C. §§ 1101–1503) (for a discussion of IIRIRA, see section C.2.d. supra). Section 304(a)(3) of IIRIRA (INA §§ 239,240, 8 U.S.C. § 1229, 1229a) replaced deportation and exclusion proceedings with "removal proceedings" available to "aliens treated as applicants for admission" as well as aliens who had been admitted to the United States. As defined under section 302(a) of the Reform Act (section 235 of the INA), the term "aliens treated as applicants for admission" included: "[a]n alien present in the United States who has not been admitted or who arrives in the United States (whether or not at a designated port of arrival and including an alien who is brought to the United States after having been interdicted in international or United States waters)." Accordingly, OLC concluded: "Congress provided that the unlanded alien interdicted in United States waters must first be 'brought to' the United States—i.e., taken ashore to U.S. dry land—before he can be said to have 'arrived' there and before he acquires the right to be treated as an applicant for admission." Memorandum for David A. Martin, General Counsel, Immigration and Naturalization Service, from Richard L. Shiffrin, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, re: Rights of Aliens Found in U.S. Internal Waters (Nov. 21, 1996).

Your inquiry raises questions concerning undocumented aliens (i.e., those lacking a visa or other authorization for lawful entry into the United States) interdicted in the "internal waters" of the United States, which you define by reference to certain treaty and statutory definitions.[2] The internal waters thus defined could include, for example, such locations as the straits between the Florida Keys, portions of the Chesapeake Bay, or even the upper reaches of the Potomac River. For purposes of this analysis, we assume that the aliens in question are aboard a vessel in transit from another country to the United States but have not landed or disembarked on U.S. soil at the time of interdiction.

I.

Your initial question asks whether an undocumented alien interdicted in U.S. inland waters has effected an "entry" within the meaning of the INA and is thus entitled to deportation proceedings. In this regard, we note that the amendments to the INA enacted by the Reform Act have supplanted the significance of the technical term "entry" as a legal threshold for such procedural entitlements. . . .

* * * *

. . . Thus, the question whether an alien's presence on the internal waters constitutes an "entry" mandating "deportation" procedures no longer reflects the governing terminology and procedures. The relevant question now is whether such an alien qualifies as an "applicant for admission" under section 235(a)(1) of the INA, which provides as follows (emphasis added):

[2] The Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone, Apr. 29, 1958, Part I, § II, art. 5(1), 15 UST 1606, 1609, provides, "[w]aters on the landward side of the baseline of the territorial sea form part of the internal waters of the State." The related classification of "Inland Waters" is defined for purposes of domestic law under 33 U.S.C. § 2003(o) as "the navigable waters of the United States shoreward of the navigational demarcation lines dividing the high seas from harbors, rivers, and other inland waters of the United States and the waters of the Great Lakes on the United States side of the International Boundary."

> (1) Aliens Treated as Applicants for Admission.—An alien present in the United States who has not been admitted or who arrives in the United States (whether or not at a designated port of arrival and including an alien who is brought to the United States after having been interdicted in international or United States waters) shall be deemed for purposes of this Act an applicant for admission.

Thus, aliens who are "present in" or have "arrive[d] in" the United States are to be deemed "applicants for admission" and must be accorded the inspection, screening, and attendant procedures that will result in either admission, asylum, or removal. That raises the question whether an alien interdicted on a vessel in the internal waters of the United States, before he has disembarked on U.S. land, shall be deemed "present in the United States" or to have "arrived in the United States." We conclude that the wording of section 235 yields a negative answer to that question.

The underscored portion of section 235 contemplates the situation where an alien is "brought to the United States after having been interdicted in . . . United States waters." Id. (emphasis added). If an unlanded alien interdicted in United States waters—which would include the inland waters—still must be "brought to" the United States, it plainly follows that Congress did not regard such an alien as already present or arrived in the United States.[3] Rather, Congress provided that the unlanded alien interdicted in United States waters must first be "brought to" the [3] This interpretation is consistent with the fact that the INA's current definition of "United States," 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(38), does not include waters or airspace subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. Moreover, as emphasized in one recent court of appeals opinion, "Nor can it be said that the current definition implicitly includes territorial waters." Yang v. Maugans, 68 F.3d at 1548. The court in Yang, noting that the definition of United States prior to the 1952 enactment of the INA did include "waters . . . subject to [U.S.] jurisdiction," ascribed considerable significance to the absence of "waters" from the current definition in concluding that the "physical presence" requirement of the former "entry" test is satisfied "only when an alien reaches dry land." Id. at 1548–49.

United States—i.e., taken ashore to U.S. dry land—before he can be said to have "arrived" there and before he acquires the right to be treated as an applicant for admission.

Given our conclusion that unlanded aliens interdicted on internal waters do not constitute "applicants for admission," and therefore need not be inspected or screened pursuant to section 235(b), it necessarily follows that such aliens are not entitled to removal proceedings (i.e., the amended INA's substitute for deportation proceedings) under section 240. Only those interdicted aliens who qualify as applicants for admission must be referred to removal proceedings if the examining officer determines that they are not "clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted." Reform Act § 302(a), INA § 235(b)(2)(A).[4] Those aliens who do not land on U.S. soil, in contrast, do not constitute applicants for admission and therefore need not be inspected or screened by an immigration officer.

Our conclusion on this issue is fortified by court decisions interpreting the analogous concept of "physical presence in the United States" in deciding whether aliens had effected an "entry" under the pre-Reform Act provisions of the INA. . . . [T]hose decisions hold that an arriving alien's mere presence on U.S. waters does not establish the requisite physical presence in the United States unless and until the alien has "landed" on U.S. soil. Yang v. Maugans, 68 F.3d at 1546–49; Zhang v. Slattery, 55 F.3d 732,

[4] We note that section 235(a)(3) of the amended INA provides, "All aliens (including alien crewmen) who are applicants for admission or otherwise seeking admission or readmission to or transit through the United States shall be inspected by immigration officers." (emphasis added) We do not believe unlanded aliens interdicted on U.S. internal waters constitute aliens "otherwise seeking admission" who must be inspected by immigration officers under this section. Unless that term is limited to those persons who appear before immigration officers in the United States (or at its border) seeking dmission, it would extend overinclusively to persons who may be hundreds or thousands of miles from the United States, but nonetheless "seek admission" to it. Requiring immigration officers to inspect all such persons would make no sense. Cf. Xiao v. Reno, 837 F. Supp. 1506, 1562 (N.D. Cal. 1993), aff'd sub nom. Wang v. Reno, 81 F.3d 808 (9th Cir. 1996).

754 (2d Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 116 S.Ct. 1271 (1996) ("an alien attempting to enter the United States by sea has not satisfied the physical presence element . . . until he has landed"); Chen Zhou Chai v. Carroll, 48 F.3d 1331, 1343 (4th Cir. 1995) (Chen never entered the United States because he was apprehended "before he reached the shore").

II.

The second question is whether an unlanded alien's apprehension within the internal waters constitutes an "arrest" for purposes of section 287(a)(2) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1357(a)(2), and would therefore require the institution of exclusion proceedings —i.e., what are now removal proceedings under amended section 240. In particular, INS takes the view that such apprehension constitutes an arrest "at least when it involves the boarding of the vessel by United States officers, the forced diversion of the vessel at the command of United States officers, or the physical custody of an individual (for example after being pulled from the water)." INS Mem. at 4.

Absent any purpose to hold the alien in question for processing under the INA, prosecution, or for other legal proceedings, we do not view the apprehension of an unlanded alien under the circumstances you describe as an "arrest" and do not conclude that it would require the institution of removal proceedings under the INA.

Our 1994 Arrest Opinion concluded that "INS interdictions of aliens within the territorial waters do not involve taking aliens into custody and holding them for further legal proceedings, and are thus not 'arrests' as that term is naturally understood." Arrest Op. at 3 (emphasis added). The mere fact that such an interdiction of unlanded aliens takes place in the internal waters of the United States—e.g., on the straits of the Florida Keys—does not alter or undermine our conclusion on that point. Because such an alien has not landed in the United States, he is not "present," nor has he "arrived," in the United States within the meaning of section 235 of the INA. We therefore do not consider his pre-landing, non-prosecutorial apprehension an "arrest" any more than if the apprehension occurred on non-internal territorial waters of the United States. Only if the interdicted alien is taken into custody and held for the purpose of further immigration proceedings or prosecution—as opposed to being held until the vessel is escorted or diverted out of United States waters—would an "arrest" result.[5]

d. Asylum applications by migrants interdicted at sea

A number of Cubans and Haitians who were interdicted at sea while attempting to reach the United States in 1994 were transported to temporary safe haven at the United States military base at Guantánamo Bay. The Cubans and Haitians were given the option of voluntary repatriation. They were not, however, allowed to apply for admission to the United States as refugees. Nor were they permitted to apply for asylum in the United States. Cuban advocacy groups brought an action in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida seeking, inter alia, access to Cuban detainees to provide legal advice concerning asylum in the United States and an end to further repatriations of Cubans. Haitian advocate groups filed a separate lawsuit seeking access to all Haitian migrants at Guantánamo Bay, a grant of parole to all unaccompanied Haitian minors and the names of all Haitian migrants in safe haven. In a series of orders, the district court granted virtually all of the relief sought by the plaintiffs.

On December 19, 1994, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit consolidated the two cases and stayed

[5] Of course, if the alien were taken ashore for some reason—i.e., if he were "brought to the United States" within the meaning of section 235(a)(1)—he would be deemed an "applicant for admission" and would have to be inspected and screened pursuant to section 235(b), which in some cases may lead in turn to asylum or removal proceedings.

the relief granted by the district court. In an opinion dated January 18, 1995, the Eleventh Circuit held that Guantánamo, a leased military base over which Cuba retained sovereignty, was outside the United States and not the "functional equivalent" of a land border or "port of entry." Cuban Am. Bar Ass'n v. Christopher, 43 F.3d 1412 (11th Cir. 1995). Pursuant to Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, 509 U.S. 155 (1993), the migrants in safe haven at Guantánamo therefore had no rights pursuant to Article 33 of the Refugee Protocol or 8 U.S.C. §1253(h). Nor did they have protectable liberty or property interests for purposes of the Fifth Amendment, because providing safe haven was a gratuitous humanitarian act that did not create even a putative liberty interest in securing asylum processing. The opinion is excerpted below; most of the footnotes have been omitted.

1. Statutory and Constitutional Rights of Migrants in Safe Haven

The Cuban migrants and the Haitian migrants are asserting statutory rights under the Immigration and Naturalization Act, 8 U.S.C. §§ 1101–1503 ("INA") and the Refugee Convention. The individual Cuban plaintiffs in safe haven also assert rights under the Cuban Refugee Adjustment Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1255, and the Cuban Democracy Act, 22 U.S.C. §§ 6001–6010. The individual Haitian unaccompanied minor plaintiffs assert rights against discriminatory parole decisions under 8 U.S.C. § 1182. Additionally, the individual Cuban plaintiffs advance claims to Fifth Amendment rights of due process, and the individual Haitian migrants are asserting Fifth Amendment rights to due process and equal protection of the laws.

a. Status of Guantanamo Bay

The district court in this case relied upon Haitian Ctrs. Council, Inc. v. Sale, 823 F. Supp. 1028 (E.D.N.Y. 1993), vacated by Stipulated Order Approving Class Action Settlement Agreement (Feb. 22, 1994) [hereinafter HCC], in entering its order granting the Cuban migrants meetings with lawyers upon request and barring repatriation of migrants without prior legal consultation. In the HCC case, the New York district court found that lawyers had a First Amendment right to free speech and association for engaging in legal consultation at Guantanamo Bay because it was a naval base over which the United States has "complete control and jurisdiction" and "where the government exercises complete control over all means of delivering communication." Id. at 1040. The district court here erred in concluding that Guantanamo Bay was a "United States territory." October 31 Order at 9. We disagree that "control and jurisdiction" is equivalent to sovereignty. See Agreement for the Lease to the United States of Lands in Cuba for Coaling and Naval Stations, Feb. 26, 1903, U.S.-Cuba, T.S. No. 418 (distinguishing between sovereignty of the Republic of Cuba over the leased land and the "control and jurisdiction" granted the United States), reprinted in 6 Bevans 1113–15; cf. United States v. Spelar, 338 U.S. 217, 221–22, 70 S. Ct. 10, 12, 94 L. Ed. 3 (1949) (construing the Federal Tort Claims Act not to apply to an American military air base in Newfoundland because the lease between Newfoundland and the United States "effected no transfer of sovereignty with respect to the military bases concerned").

The Cuban Legal Organizations and HRC attempt to circumvent precedent in this circuit by arguing that Haitian Refugee Ctr., Inc. v. Baker, 953 F.2d 1498 (11th Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 1122, 117 L. Ed. 2d 477, 112 S. Ct. 1245 (1992) [hereinafter "HRC II"], in contrast with the instant case, dealt solely with Haitians who were interdicted on the high seas and returned to Haiti by United States Coast Guard cutters. However, we also addressed the claims of Haitians who were interdicted on the high seas and then transported to Guantanamo Bay. See HRC II, 953 F.2d at 1514; id. at 1516–17 (Hatchett, J., dissenting). Based upon our holding in HRC II, 953 F.2d at 1510, we again reject the argument that our leased military bases abroad which continue under the sovereignty of foreign nations, hostile or friendly, are "functionally equivalent" to being land borders or ports of entry of the United States or otherwise within the United States.[11] Therefore, any statutory or constitutional claim made by the individual Cuban plaintiffs and the individual Haitian migrants must be based upon an extraterritorial application of that statute or constitutional provision.

b. Extraterritorial Application of Legislation and the Constitution

If the migrants have been provided rights by statute, we need not reach the constitutional questions urged upon us. However, because the Cuban Legal Organizations and HRC struggle to re-assert statutory claims foreclosed by HRC II and Sale v. Haitian Ctrs. Council, Inc., 509 U.S. 155, 113 S. Ct. 2549, 125 L. Ed. 2d 128 (1993), and fail to assert new meritorious statutory claims, we reach the constitutional issues as well.

We decided in HRC II, 953 F.2d at 1510, and the Supreme Court agreed in Sale, 113 S. Ct. at 2557–58, 2563, that the very same statutes and treaties regarding repatriation, Article 33 of the Refugee Convention, n.13 and the INA, specifically, 8 U.S.C. § 1253(h) n.14 and 8 U.S.C. § 1158(a) do not apply extraterritorially. In HRC II, we unequivocally held that the interdicted Haitians could not claim any rights under sections 1253(h) or 1158(a). We further concluded that:

> the interdicted Haitians [on Coast Guard cutters and at Guantanamo Bay] have none of the substantive rights—under . . . the 1967 United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, the Immigration and Naturalization Service Guidelines, the Refugee Act of 1980, the Immigration and Nationality Act, or international law—that they claim for themselves or that the HRC claims for them.

[11] Panama regained sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone and the area where the United States maintains military installations by the Panama Canal Treaty of 1977. Panama Canal Treaty, Sept. 7, 1977, U.S.-Pan., art. III, § 1, art. IV, § 2, 33 U.S.T. 39; Panama Canal Treaty, Implementation of Article IV, Sept. 7, 1977, U.S.-Pan., art. I, annex A, 33 U.S.T. 307.

HRC II, 953 F.2d at 1513 n.8 (emphasis added). These laws, which govern repatriation of refugees, bind the government only when the refugees are at or within the borders of the United States. See id. at 1509–10. Therefore, the claims asserted by the migrants under the INA and under Article 33 continue to be untenable.

The individual Cuban plaintiffs attempt to utilize the Cuban Refugee Adjustment Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1255, and the Cuban Democracy Act, 22 U.S.C. §§ 6001–6010, to assert the right of the Cuban migrants to seek parole and asylum in the United States. While these acts acknowledge the political climate in Cuba, provide for economic sanctions for dealing with Cuba, and allow for certain rights for Cubans who reach the United States, they do not address the rights of Cuban migrants to enter or to seek entry to the United States initially, nor do they confer directly any rights upon the Cuban migrants outside the United States. Hence, neither of these acts can be relied upon by the individual Cuban plaintiffs to assert a right against repatriation or to seek parole or asylum in the United States from safe haven.

Right to Counsel

The individual Cuban plaintiffs and the individual Haitian migrants claim a due process right to obtain and communicate with legal counsel of their choice regarding asylum application or parole in order to protect an interest against being wrongly repatriated from safe haven. In order for the migrants to have a right to counsel, they must first have a protectable liberty or property interest. See Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 569–572, 92 S. Ct. 2701, 2705–06, 33 L. Ed. 2d 548 (1972). The Executive Branch has made the policy decision not to offer preliminary refugee determination interviews, or "screening" to the Cuban or Haitian migrants. In previous Haitian migrant cases, migrants who had been held to have a liberty interest to which due process could attach were "screened-in" by the government. . . .

. . . The migrants in this case have not been "screened in" or otherwise processed for asylum. By bringing the migrants to safe haven, the government has not created any protectable liberty or property interest against being wrongly repatriated and the migrants may not rest a claim of right of counsel and information on the due process clause.

Unaccompanied Minor Haitians' Right to Parole

The individual unaccompanied minor Haitian migrants are asserting statutory and constitutional equal protection claims to be paroled into the United States on the same basis that unaccompanied minor Cubans have been or may be paroled into the United States. The unaccompanied minor Haitian migrants claim that the Attorney General has abused her discretion under the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1182, by paroling in Cuban unaccompanied minors but not Haitian unaccompanied minors. While this claim is not dependent upon the extraterritorial application of the statute, it fails nonetheless. We agree with our en banc court's statement in Jean v. Nelson, 727 F.2d 957, 981–82 (11th Cir. 1984) (en banc) [hereinafter "Jean I"], aff'd on other grounds, 472 U.S. 846, 105 S. Ct. 2992, 86 L. Ed. 2d 664 (1985) [hereinafter "Jean II"], that "there is little question that the Executive has the power to draw distinctions among aliens based on nationality." Jean I, 727 F.2d at 978 n.30; see generally, Exec. Order No. 12,711, 55 Fed. Reg. 13,897 (1990), reprinted in 8 U.S.C. § 1157. This authority extends both to the President of the United States and to the Attorney General. n.19 Jean I, 727 F.2d at 978. Aliens may be excluded or denied parole on grounds that might be "suspect in the context of domestic legislation," because "there are apparently no limitations on the power of the federal government to determine what classes of aliens will be permitted to enter the United States or what procedures will be used to determine their admissibility." Id. at 965 n.5. Here, the Attorney General has exercised her discretion on the legitimate basis of the very different political climates in Haiti, under the newly restored democratic President Jean-Bertrand Aristide on the one hand, and in Cuba, under the regime of Fidel Castro on the other. See Garcia-Mir v. Smith, 766 F.2d 1478, 1492 (11th Cir. 1985) (per curiam) (holding Attorney General need only assert a " 'facially legitimate and bona fide' " reason for a parole decision (quoting Jean I, 727 F.2d at 977)), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1022, 106 S. Ct. 1213, 89 L. Ed. 2d 325 (1986). Thus, we hold that the statutory claims made by the unaccompanied minor Haitian migrants are without merit and cannot justify an injunction directing the government to parole them into the United States. Because we conclude that the statute alleged does not protect the unaccompanied Haitian minors, we address their constitutional equal protection claim.

In Jean I, we held that unadmitted and excludable aliens "cannot claim equal protection rights under the Fifth Amendment, even with regard to challenging the Executive's exercise of its parole discretion." 727 F.2d at 970 (emphasis added). The plaintiffs in Jean I could not "challenge the decisions of executive officials with regard to their applications for admission, asylum, or parole, on the basis of the rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution," id. at 984, because they had "no constitutional rights with regard to their applications," id. at 968; accord Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 32, 103 S. Ct. 321, 329, 74 L. Ed. 2d 21 (1982) ("The power to admit or exclude aliens is a sovereign prerogative."); cf. Perez-Perez v. Hanberry, 781 F.2d 1477, 1479 (11th Cir. 1986) ("The world is not entitled to enter the United States as a matter of right."). The individual unaccompanied Haitian migrants here, who are outside the borders of the United States, can have no greater rights than aliens in Jean I who were physically present in the United States. See Landon, 459 U.S. at 32, 103 S. Ct. at 329 ("However, once an alien gains admission to our country and begins to develop the ties that go with permanent residence his constitutional status changes accordingly.").

In HRCII, we concluded that the interdicted Haitians on Coast Guard cutters and at Guantanamo Bay did not possess any of the statutory rights they claimed under the INA and the Refugee Convention, or the constitutional rights they claimed under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, and the First Amendment. HRC II, 953 F.2d at 1503, 1511 n.6 (agreeing with the district court that the Haitian migrants had no "correlative First Amendment rights of their own"). Our decision that the Cuban and Haitian migrants have no First Amendment or Fifth Amendment rights which they can assert is supported by the Supreme Court's decisions declining to apply extraterritorially either the Fourth Amendment, United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 274–75, 110 S. Ct. 1056, 1066, 108 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1990) (rejecting Fourth Amendment limits to search and seizure of property owned by a non-resident alien conducted in Mexico by United States agents), or the Fifth Amendment, Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 784, 70 S. Ct. 936, 947, 94 L. Ed. 1255 (1950) (rejecting claim that aliens outside the sovereign territory of the United States are entitled to Fifth Amendment rights). Cf. Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 77 S. Ct. 1222, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1148 (1957) (plurality opinion) (holding the right to a jury trial applies to an American citizen abroad being tried by a United States military court (narrowest holding)). Clearly, aliens who are outside the United States cannot claim rights to enter or be paroled into the United States based on the Constitution.

Therefore, any right to equal protection of the laws, due process, or rights under the INA or the Refugee Convention now asserted by the Haitian and Cuban migrants are not cognizable. Thus, neither group of migrants could have a "substantial likelihood of success on the merits" which is a necessary predicate to the grant of injunctive relief. The district court erred in granting relief to the individual Cuban and Haitian migrants.

2. Eligibility for Asylum

a. Persecution "on account of" race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion

In INS v. Elias-Zacarias, 502 U.S. 478, 483 (1992), the U.S. Supreme Court held that an individual's statement that he had resisted forced conscription by a guerrilla group was not sufficient to establish that he had a "well-founded fear" of persecution based on "political opinion" and qualify him for asylum. The individual had to show that his fear of persecution was based on his political opinion, not that of the guerrillas, and a desire not to take sides between the government and the guerrillas did not constitute a "political opinion." The decision is excerpted below (footnotes omitted).

* * * *

Respondent Elias-Zacarias, a native of Guatemala, was apprehended in July 1987 for entering the United States without inspection. In deportation proceedings brought by petitioner Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), Elias-Zacarias conceded his deportability but requested asylum and withholding of deportation.

* * * *

Section 208(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 8 U. S. C. § 1158(a), authorizes the Attorney General, in his discretion, to grant asylum to an alien who is a "refugee" as defined in the Act, i.e., an alien who is unable or unwilling to return to his home country "because of persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion." § 101(a)(42)(A), 8 U. S. C. § 1101(a)(42)(A). See INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421, 423, 428, n. 5, 94 L. Ed. 2d 434, 107 S. Ct. 1207 (1987). The BIA's determination that Elias-Zacarias was not eligible for asylum must be upheld if "supported by reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence on the record considered as a whole." 8 U. S. C. § 1105a(a)(4). It can be reversed only if the evidence presented by Elias-Zacarias was such that a reasonable factfinder would have to conclude that the requisite fear of persecution existed. NLRB v. Columbian Enameling & Stamping Co., 306 U.S. 292, 300, 83 L. Ed. 660, 59 S. Ct. 501 (1939).

The Court of Appeals found reversal warranted. In its view, a guerrilla organization's attempt to conscript a person into its military forces necessarily constitutes "persecution on account of . . . political opinion," because "the person resisting forced recruitment is expressing a political opinion hostile to the persecutor and because the persecutors' motive in carrying out the kidnapping is political." 921 F.2d at 850. The first half of this seems to us untrue, and the second half irrelevant.

Even a person who supports a guerrilla movement might resist recruitment for a variety of reasons—fear of combat, a desire to remain with one's family and friends, a desire to earn a better living in civilian life, to mention only a few. The record in the present case not only failed to show a political motive on Elias-Zacarias' part; it showed the opposite. He testified that he refused to join the guerrillas because he was afraid that the government would retaliate against him and his family if he did so. Nor is there any indication (assuming, arguendo, it would suffice) that the guerrillas erroneously believed that Elias-Zacarias' refusal was politically based.

As for the Court of Appeals' conclusion that the guerrillas' "motive in carrying out the kidnapping is political": It apparently meant by this that the guerrillas seek to fill their ranks in order to carry on their war against the government and pursue their political goals. See 921 F.2d at 850 (citing Arteaga v. INS, 836 F.2d 1227, 1232, n. 8 (CA9 1988)); 921 F.2d at 852. But that does not render the forced recruitment "persecution on account of . . . political opinion." In construing statutes, "we must, of course, start with the assumption that the legislative purpose is expressed by the ordinary meaning of the words used." Richards v. United States, 369 U.S. 1, 9, 7 L. Ed. 2d 492, 82 S. Ct. 585 (1962); see Cardoza-Fonseca, supra, at 431; INS v. Phinpathya, 464 U.S. 183, 189, 78 L. Ed. 2d 401, 104 S. Ct. 584 (1984). The ordinary meaning of the phrase "persecution on account of . . . political opinion" in § 101(a)(42) is persecution on account of the victim's political opinion, not the persecutor's. If a Nazi regime persecutes Jews, it is not, within the ordinary meaning of language, engaging in persecution on account of political opinion; and if a fundamentalist Moslem regime persecutes democrats, it is not engaging in persecution on account of religion. Thus, the mere existence of a generalized "political" motive underlying the guerrillas' forced recruitment is inadequate to establish (and, indeed, goes far to refute) the proposition that Elias-Zacarias fears persecution on account of political opinion, as § 101(a)(42) requires.

Elias-Zacarias appears to argue that not taking sides with any political faction is itself the affirmative expression of a political opinion. That seems to us not ordinarily so, since we do not agree with the dissent that only a "narrow, grudging construction of the concept of 'political opinion,'" post, at 487, would distinguish it from such quite different concepts as indifference, indecisiveness, and risk averseness. But we need not decide whether the evidence compels the conclusion that Elias-Zacarias held a political opinion. Even if it does, Elias-Zacarias still has to establish that the record also compels the conclusion that he has a "well-founded fear" that the guerrillas will persecute him because of that political opinion, rather than because of his refusal to fight with them. He has not done so with the degree of clarity necessary to permit reversal of a BIA finding to the contrary; indeed, he has not done so at all.

Elias-Zacarias objects that he cannot be expected to provide direct proof of his persecutors' motives. We do not require that. But since the statute makes motive critical, he must provide some evidence of it, direct or circumstantial. And if he seeks to obtain judicial reversal of the BIA's determination, he must show that the evidence he presented was so compelling that no reasonable factfinder could fail to find the requisite fear of persecution. That he has not done.

b. "Persecution" does not require subjective intent to harm

In Pitcherskaia v. INS, 118 F.3d 641 (9th Cir. 1997), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed the Board of Immigration Appeals ("BIA") denial of asylum to a woman who requested asylum based on her fear of persecution on account of her political opinions and support of lesbian and gay rights in Russia. The BIA found that involuntary psychiatric treatment imposed on her by Russian militia and psychiatric institutions were not persecution, because they were intended to "cure" her and not to punish her. The court of appeals disagreed, as excerpted below (footnotes omitted), holding that subjective intent to punish was not a requirement for actions to constitute "persecution."

* * * *

I. Alla Pitcherskaia is a 35 year old native and citizen of Russia. She entered the United States as a visitor for pleasure on March 22, 1992, with authorization to remain for six months. On June 2, 1992, she applied for asylum on the basis that she feared persecution on account of her own and her father's anti-Communist political opinions. After a complete interview, the Immigration and Naturalization Service Asylum Office found that she was credible and that she had suffered past persecution. However, it found that she failed to establish a well-founded fear of future persecution and denied her application. She was placed in deportation proceedings for overstaying her visa.

Pitcherskaia renewed her request for asylum and withholding of deportation, under sections 208(a) and 243(h) of the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA" or "Act"), 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158(a) and 1243(h). In this application, she claimed an additional basis for granting her petition—that she was persecuted and feared future persecution on account of her political opinions in support of lesbian and gay civil rights in Russia, and on account of her membership in a particular social group: Russian lesbians. . . .

Pitcherskaia's father was an artist and political dissident. As a result of his antigovernment activities, he was arrested and imprisoned numerous times during Pitcherskaia's childhood until 1972 when he died in prison. Pitcherskaia testified that, because of her father's anticommunist activities, she has been under the control and surveillance of the police for her entire life.

* * * *

In 1985 or 1986, Pitcherskaia's ex-girlfriend was forcibly sent to a psychiatric institution for over four months, during which time she was subjected to electric shock treatment and other so-called "therapies" in an effort to change her sexual orientation. Pitcherskaia testified that while she was visiting this woman at the psychiatric institution, she was grabbed by the militia, forcibly taken to a doctor's office and questioned about her sexual orientation. She was permitted to leave only after she provided a false address outside the jurisdiction of the clinic. Although she denied being a lesbian, the clinic registered her as a "suspected lesbian" and told her she must undergo treatment at her local clinic every six months. When she failed to show up for these outpatient sessions, she received a "Demand for Appearance." She testified that if she failed to comply, the militia would threaten her with forced institutionalization and forcibly take her from her home to the sessions.

Pitcherskaia testified that she attended eight of these "therapy" sessions. During these sessions, Pitcherskaia continued to deny that she was a lesbian. However, she was officially diagnosed with "slow-going schizophrenia," a catchall phrase often used in Russia to "diagnose" homosexuals. The psychiatrist prescribed sedative drugs, which Pitcherskaia never took. On one occasion, the psychiatrist tried to hypnotize her.

On two separate occasions, in 1990 and 1991, Pitcherskaia was arrested while in the homes of gay friends and taken to prison overnight. She received several "Demands for Appearance" when the militia sought to interrogate her about her sexual orientation and political activities. In 1991, she was interrogated about her activities with a gay and lesbian political organization—the "Union of Coming Out"—that had been denied legal recognition by the government.

Since her arrival in the United States, Pitcherskaia has received two more "Demands for Appearance" from the militia that were delivered at her mother's residence. Since she did not respond to the two recent Demands, Pitcherskaia fears that the militia will carry out their previous threats and forcibly institutionalize her if she returns to Russia.

* * * *

[II.] B. The Definition of Persecution is Objective

The majority of the Board required that Pitcherskaia prove that the Russian authorities intended to harm or punish her. While acknowledging that forced institutionalization, electroshock treatments, and drug injections could constitute persecution, see e.g., Sagermark v. INS, 767 F.2d 645, 650 (9th Cir. 1985) (suggesting that involuntary and unjust confinement to a mental institution may constitute persecution), the BIA majority concluded that because here the "involuntary treatment and confinement [were] intended to treat or cure the supposed illness, not to punish," Pitcherskaia had not been persecuted nor did she have a well-founded fear of persecution. For the following reasons we conclude that in requiring Pitcherskaia to prove intent to harm or punish as an element of persecution, the BIA majority erred.

Although many asylum cases "involve[] actors who had a subjective intent to punish their victims . . . this subjective 'punitive' or 'malignant' intent is not required for harm to constitute persecution." In re Fauziya Kasinga, Int. Dec. 3278 at 12 (BIA June 13, 1996) (en banc) (designated as precedent by the BIA). Neither the Supreme Court nor this court has construed the Act as imposing a requirement that the alien prove that her persecutor was motivated by a desire to punish or inflict harm.

We have defined "persecution" as "the infliction of suffering or harm upon those who differ . . . in a way regarded as offensive." Sangha v. INS, 103 F.3d 1482, 1487 (9th Cir. 1997) (citing Sagermark, 767 F.2d at 649). This definition of persecution is objective, in that it turns not on the subjective intent of the persecutor but rather on what a reasonable person would deem "offensive." That the persecutor inflicts the suffering or harm in an attempt to elicit information, as in Nasseri v. Moschorak, 34 F.3d 723, 724–25 (9th Cir. 1994), for his own sadistic pleasure, as in Lopez-Galarza, supra, to "cure" his victim, or to "save his soul" is irrelevant. Persecution by any other name remains persecution.

Motive of the alleged persecutor is a relevant and proper consideration only insofar as the alien must establish that the persecution is inflicted on him or her "on account of" a characteristic or perceived characteristic of the alien. See Elias-Zacarias, 502 U.S. 478 at 481, 117 L. Ed. 2d 38, 112 S. Ct. 812. The BIA majority misconstrues this motive requirement. Elias-Zacarias does not require an alien to provide evidence that his persecutor's motive was to inflict harm and suffering in an effort to punish. It is the characteristic of the victim (membership in a group, religious or political belief, racial characteristic, etc.), not that of the persecutor, which is the relevant factor. Id. at 482 (the ordinary meaning of persecution on account of political opinion "is persecution on account of the victim's political opinion, not the persecutor's").

The Board has defined "persecution" as "the infliction of harm or suffering by a government, or persons a government is unwilling or unable to control, to overcome a characteristic of the victim." Kasinga, at 12. This "'seeking to overcome' formulation has its antecedents in concepts of persecution that predate the Refugee Act of 1980." Id. The BIA majority, however invokes two prior BIA rulings, Matter of Mogharrabi, 19 I. & N. Dec. 439, 446 (BIA 1987) and Matter of Acosta, 19 I. & N. Dec. 211, 226 (BIA 1985), both of which speak in terms of an "intent to punish." To establish a well-founded fear of persecution, these cases require that an applicant for asylum establish that: "(1) the alien possesses a belief or characteristic a persecutor seeks to overcome in others by means of punishment of some sort; (2) the persecutor is already aware, or could . . . become aware, that the alien possesses this belief or characteristic; (3) the persecutor has the capability of punishing the alien; and (4) the persecutor has the inclination to punish the alien." Mogharrabi, 19 I. & N. Dec. at 446 (quoting Acosta, 19 I. & N. Dec. at 226) (emphasis added). This test confuses punishment and persecution. The two concepts are not coterminous.

Although we have held that unreasonably severe punishment can constitute "persecution," see Rodriguez-Roman v. INS, 98 F.2d 416, 430 (9th Cir. 1996), "punishment" is neither a mandatory nor a sufficient aspect of persecution. See e.g., Fisher, 79 F.3d at 963 (punishment for violation of enforcement of offensive regulations does not constitute persecution within the meaning of the INA). Webster defines to punish as "(1) To afflict with pain, loss, or suffering for a crime or fault; to chasten. (2) To inflict a penalty for (an offense) upon the offender." Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary 685 (Second Edition 1956). To persecute, in contrast, is defined as "(1) To pursue in a manner to injure; . . . to cause to suffer because of belief, esp. religious belief. (2) To afflict, harass, or annoy. . . ." Id. at 628. Hence, punishment implies that the perpetrator believes the victim has committed a crime or some wrong; whereas persecution simply requires that the perpetrator cause the victim suffering or harm. To the extent that Acosta and Mogharrabi require an alien to prove the persecutor harbored a subjective intent to punish, we reject their holdings.

* * * *

The fact that a persecutor believes the harm he is inflicting is "good for" his victim does not make it any less painful to the victim, or, indeed, remove the conduct from the statutory definition of persecution. The BIA majority's requirement that an alien prove that her persecutor's subjective intent was punitive is unwarranted. Human rights laws cannot be sidestepped by simply couching actions that torture mentally or physically in benevolent terms such as "curing" or "treating" the victims.

c. Political opinion—China "one child" policy

In cases brought before 1997, the Board of Immigration Appeals and federal courts consistently held that sanctions imposed under China's "one child" family planning policy were not persecution "on account of political opinion" and were not a basis for a grant of political asylum. See, e.g., Chen v. INS, 95 F.3d 801 (9th Cir. 1996); Jia-Ging Dong v. Slattery, 84 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 1996); Xin-Chang Zhang v. Slattery, 55 F.3d 732 (2d Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1176 (1996); Chen Zhou Chai v. Carrol, 48 F.3d 1331 (4th Cir. 1995); Matter of Chang, 20 I&N Dec. 38 (BIA 1989).

In reaction to these decisions, Congress in 1997 amended the definition of "refugee" contained in § 101(a)(42) of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(42)) as follows:

> . . . a person who has been forced to abort a pregnancy or to undergo involuntary sterilization, or who has been persecuted for failure or refusal to undergo such a procedure or for other resistance to a coercive population > control program, shall be deemed to have been persecuted on account of political opinion, and a person who has a well founded fear that he or she will be forced to undergo such a procedure or subject to persecution for such failure, refusal, or resistance shall be deemed to have a well founded fear of persecution on account of political opinion.

Section 601(a)(1) of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (IIRIRA), contained in Division C of the Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act, 1997, Pub. L. No. 104–208, 110 Stat. 3009–546 (1996).

Following enactment of § 601(a)(1), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed a BIA holding that a Chinese student from Shanghai who claimed he would be subject to forced sterilization, imprisonment, professional restrictions, fines, and educational and housing costs upon his return to China with a third child born in the United States had not established that a reasonable person in his circumstances would fear persecution. Yong Hao Chen v. INS, 195 F.3d 198 (4th Cir. 1999). In rejecting his claim, the court of appeals highlighted the lack of negative consequences when the applicant's second child was born in China, a State Department report that couples returning to Shanghai from university study abroad had been excused from any penalties, and the fact that the monetary penalties the applicant might face did not meet the "deliberate imposition of substantial economic disadvantage" standard necessary for economic deprivation to constitute persecution. The Fourth Circuit decision is excerpted below.

Chen and Wei Kai Li's second child (Chen's third) was born in the United States in July 1993. The couple testified that there would be severe repercussions for them if they returned to China with another child. They speculated that they would be forced to undergo sterilization, imprisoned, professionally restricted, and severely fined. They also expressed generalized fears about what their American-born son's status would be if they were forced to return, claiming that his access to educational opportunities and housing would be limited. The couple pointed to the fact that they had already sent money back to China to pay fines associated with their older child, although Chen's testimony suggested that these were merely fees for the cost of the child's housing and education. Chen also submitted a 1995 report by Human Rights in China, which describes severe repercussions for some families in violation of China's "one child" policy, including beatings and forced surgeries.

The INS, in arguing that Chen has no objective basis for his fears of persecution, submitted a 1995 State Department report on conditions in China. The report indicates that although forced abortions and sterilizations still occur, these practices have been on the decline since the mid-1980's, and they are increasingly limited to rural areas. Instead, according to the report, the "one child" policy "relies on education, propaganda and economic incentives as well as more coercive measures, including psychological pressure and economic penalties." Furthermore, the report cites interviews with family planning officials from Shanghai—Chen and Wei Kai Li's home city—in which the officials explained that couples returning from university study abroad with an additional child have been "excused" from paying any penalty or have paid only fees commensurate with the cost of housing and educating the child.

. . . . Chen maintains that [the 1997 "refugee"] amendment entitles him to refugee status because he has a well-founded fear that he will be forced to undergo an involuntary sterilization procedure or that he will be subject to persecution for his refusals to undergo such a procedure.

In amending the Immigration and Nationality Act, Congress included three additional classes of individuals in the definition of "refugee": 1) persons who had been forced to undergo an involuntary sterilization or abortion; 2) persons who had been persecuted for refusing to undergo such a procedure or for other resistance to a coercive population control program; and 3) persons who have a well-founded fear of being subjected to a coercive population control program. See 8 U.S.C.A. § 1101(a)(42). By including applicants with a "well founded fear" of persecution as a distinct category, Congress directed that an individual in fear of a population control program would be able to qualify for refugee status even in the absence of a showing of past persecution.

For applicants seeking refuge from China's "one child" policy, the statute thus requires the Board, and ultimately the courts, to make judgments about the state of enforcement of a policy with contours that have been only partially disclosed, in a vast and diverse society on another continent. Tellingly, the State Department report on China, offered by the INS here, records conflicting insights from informants, breaks down its analysis by province and region, and offers only tentative conclusions. The asylum applicant who has suffered no past persecution will often be at great remove from what we would ordinarily consider "concrete" evidence. Yet that applicant may nonetheless have an objectively well-founded fear of future persecution under the "one child" policy.

It does not appear that any other court has yet been asked to evaluate a claim of a well-founded fear of a coercive population control program under the amended statute. However, courts have considered the quantum of evidence necessary to establish a well-founded fear of persecution on account of political opinion. In Cardoza-Fonseca, the Supreme Court rejected the INS's contention that the applicant must prove a "clear probability of persecution" if returned to his home country. 480 U.S. at 430. Rather, the Court explained, "one can certainly have a well-founded fear of an event happening when there is less than a 50% chance of the occurrence taking place. Id. at 431. We have never quantified precisely what is necessary to demonstrate a well-founded fear of persecution, cf. Montecino v. INS, 915 F.2d 518, 520 (9th Cir. 1990) (showing of 10% chance would be sufficient), but we have recognized that an individual can demonstrate such a fear by

Asylum petitioners who have not suffered past persecution have been able to establish a well-founded fear of future persecution when they have offered some evidence that they would be individually targeted, because of their particular status or role in their home country, for persecution on one of the statutorily defined grounds. . . . The "well founded fear" standard, however, does not require an asylum petitioner to show that he will be individually targeted, or "singled out," for persecution. See C.F.R. § 208.13(b)(2) (INS "shall not require the applicant to provide evidence that he or she would be singled out individually for persecution if . . . there is a pattern or practice . . . of persecution of a group of persons similarly situated" and the applicant establishes inclusion in such group). Thus, asylum petitioners have also been able to demonstrate a well-founded fear by showing that they belong to a broader class of individuals that has been subjected to systematic persecution. . . . The key for the applicant is to show the thorough or systematic nature of the persecution he fears.

Individual targeting and systematic persecution do not necessarily constitute distinct theories. Rather, an applicant will typically demonstrate some combination of the two to establish a well-founded fear of persecution. . . . Conversely, a stronger showing of individual targeting will be necessary where the underlying basis for the applicant's fear is membership in a diffuse class against whom actual persecution is haphazard and rare.

Congress's amended definition of "refugee" instructs the INS to consider, as the underlying basis for the asylum claim at issue here, membership in an extraordinarily large and diffuse class of individuals—persons subject to the coercive enforcement of China's "one child" population control policy. The Chinese government and its local agents, according to the State Department, impose these measures in a far from systematic way, and with decreasing frequency. As a result, an applicant must proffer some additional evidence that his fears of this policy are objectively reasonable. Unless the individual can offer persuasive evidence that, contrary to the State Department report, coerced abortions and sterilizations continue to systematically occur, he must come forward with some additional evidence of the risk posed by a return to China. For example, he must show that he has been individually targeted for coercive enforcement of the "one child" program or that he belongs to some subgroup, such as those residing in a particular province or region, against whom coercive enforcement of the "one child" program remains systematic.

In this case, viewing the administrative record as a whole, we must conclude that substantial evidence supports the Board's decision. Chen offered no evidence that seriously contested the findings of the State Department regarding the current enforcement status of the "one child" policy. Although the Human Rights in China report offered by Chen details horrific practices that continue to take place, the report does not contradict the State Department's conclusion that the practice of forced sterilization is uncommon and increasingly limited to rural areas. The Human Rights in China report does not present a picture of systematic persecution under the "one child" policy.

d. Membership in a particular social group—female genital mutilation

(1) In re Kasinga

The Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA) held in Matter of Kasinga, 21 I&N Dec. 357 (BIA 1996), excerpted below, that the practice of female genital mutilation ("FGM"), which results in permanent disfiguration and poses a risk of serious, potentially life-threatening complications, can constitute "persecution" for the purposes of eligibility for asylum. The BIA granted asylum to a woman from a tribe in Togo that practices FGM who had not yet been subjected to female genital mutilation, based on conclusions that she was a "member of a particular social group"—women of her tribe who had not had FGM and who oppose the practice—and had a well-founded fear of persecution based on membership in that social group.

According to the applicant's testimony, the FGM practiced by her tribe, the Tchamba-Kunsuntu, is of an extreme type involving cutting the genitalia with knives, extensive bleeding, and a 40-day recovery period . . . The background materials confirm that the FGM practiced in some African countries, such as Togo, is of an extreme nature causing permanent damage, and not just a minor form of genital ritual . . .

The record material establishes that FGM in its extreme forms is a practice in which portions of the female genitalia are cut away. In some cases, the vagina is sutured partially closed. This practice clearly inflicts harm or suffering upon the girl or woman who undergoes it.

FGM is extremely painful and at least temporarily incapacitating. It permanently disfigures the female genitalia. FGM exposes the girl or woman to the risk of serious, potentially life-threatening complications. These include, among others, bleeding, infection, urine retention, stress, shock, psychological trauma, and damage to the urethra and anus. It can result in permanent loss of genital sensation and can aversely affect sexual and erotic functions . . .

The FGM Alert, compiled and distributed by the INS Resource Information Center, notes that "few African countries have officially condemned female genital mutilation and still fewer have enacted legislation against the practice." FGM Alert, supra, at 6. Further, according to the FGM Alert, even in those few African countries where legislative efforts have been made, they are usually ineffective to protect women against FGM. The FGM Alert notes that "it remains practically true that [African] women have little legal recourse and may face threats to their freedom, threats or acts of physical violence, or social ostracization for refusing to undergo this harmful traditional practice or for attempting to protect their female children." . . .

. . . We agree with the parties that this level of harm can constitute "persecution" within the meaning of section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(42)(A) (1994).

While a number of descriptions of persecution have been formulated in our past decisions, we have recognized that persecution can consist of the infliction of harm or suffering by a government, or persons a government is unwilling or unable to control, to overcome a characteristic of a victim. See Matter of Acosta, 19 I&N Dec. 211, 222–23 (BIA 1985), modified on other grounds, Matter of Mogharrabi, 19 I &N Dec. 439 (BIA 1987). The "seeking to overcome" formulation has its antecedents in concepts of persecution that predate the Refugee Act of 1980, Pub. L. No. 96–212, 94 Stat. 102. See, e.g., Matter of Diaz, 10 I&N Dec. 199, 204 (BIA 1963).

As observed by the INS, many of our past cases involved actors who had a subjective intent to punish their victims. However, this subjective "punitive" or "malignant" intent is not required for harm to constitute persecution. See Matter of Kulle, 19 I&N Dec. 318 (BIA 1985); Matter of Acosta, supra.

* * * *

To be a basis for a grant of asylum, persecution must relate to one of five categories described in section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Act. The parties agree that the relevant category in this case is "particular social group.". . . .

In the context of this case, we find the particular social group to be the following: young women of the Tchamba-Kunsuntu Tribe who have not had FGM, as practiced by that tribe, and who oppose the practice . . .

The defined social group meets the test we set forth in Matter of Acosta, supra, at 233. See also Matter of H—, Interim Decision 327 (BIA 1996) (finding that identifiable shared ties of kinship warrant characterization as a social group). It also is consistent with the law of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, where this case arose. Fatin v. INS, 12 F.3d 1233, 1241 (3d Cir. 1993) (stating that Iranian women who refuse to conform to the Iranian Government's gender-specific laws and social norms may well satisfy the Acosta definition).

In accordance with Acosta, the particular social group is defined by common characteristics that members of the group either cannot change, or should not be required to change because such characteristics are fundamental to their individual identities. The characteristics of being a "young woman" and a "member of the Tchanba-Kunsuntu Tribe" cannot be changed. The characteristic of having intact genitalia is one that is so fundamental to the individual identity of a young woman that she should not be required to change it.

To be eligible for asylum, the applicant must establish that her well-founded fear of persecution is "on account of" one of the five grounds specified in the Act, here, her membership in a "particular social group." . . .

Both parties have advanced, and the background materials support, the proposition that there is no legitimate reason for FGM . . . [T]he practice has been condemned by such groups as the United Nations, the International Federation of Gynecology and Obstetrics, the Council on Scientific Affairs, the World Health Organization, the International Medical Association, and the American Medical Association.

Record materials state that FGM "has been used to control woman's sexuality," FGM Alert, supra, at 4. It also is characterized as a form of "sexual oppression" that is "based on the manipulation of women's sexuality in order to assure male dominance and exploitation." Toubia, supra, at 42 (quoting Raqiya Haji Dualeh Abdalla, Somali Women's Democratic Organization). During oral argument before us, the INS General Counsel agreed with the later characterization . . . He also stated that the practice is a "severe bodily invasion" that should be regarded as meeting the asylum standard even if done with "subjectively benign intent" . . .

We agree with the parties that, as described and documented in this record, FGM is practiced, at least in some significant part, to overcome sexual characteristics of young women of the tribe who have not been, and do not wish to be, subjected to FGM. We therefore find that the persecution the applicant fears in Togo is "on account of" her status as a member of the defined social group.

(2) Abankwah v. INS

In Abankwah v. INS, 185 F.3d 18 (2d Cir. 1999), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed a decision of the BIA that a Ghanaian woman's fear of FGM was not sufficiently grounded in reality to satisfy the objective element of the test for well-founded fear of persecution. The woman had testified that she had engaged in premarital sex, and was in line to become the "Queen Mother" of a tribe that practiced FGM upon designated Queen Mothers who were not virgins. The court of appeals found her testimony credible and "particularly" compelling in light of a 1997 State Department report stating that, although Ghana criminalized FGM in 1994, the number of prosecutions had been insignificant, and between 15 and 20 percent of all women and girls in Ghana had been subjected to FGM. The decision is excerpted below, without footnotes.

. . . Abankwah entered the United States illegally on March 29, 1997. She sought asylum on the ground that if she returns to Ghana, her tribe will inflict female genital mutilation ("FGM") on her as a punishment for having engaged in premarital sex. Abankwah also sought withholding of deportation under Section 243(h)(1) of the Act. 8 U.S.C. § 1253(h)(1) (1994). The Board of Immigration Appeals ("BIA") concluded that Abankwah failed to demonstrate an objectively reasonable fear that her tribe will subject her to FGM, and, consequently, to establish her eligibility for asylum.

For the reasons set forth below, we reverse the denial of asylum and the denial of the application for withholding of deportation and remand for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Background

. . . Abankwah is a twenty-nine year old native of Ghana and a member of the Nkumssa tribe, which is located in the central region of Ghana. The Nkumssa tribe condemns women who engage in premarital sex and punishes them through FGM. The type of FGM practiced in Ghana "involves the amputation of the whole of the clitoris and all or part of the labia minora."

Abankwah testified that her mother had held the position of Queen Mother within the Nkumssa tribe. . . . , that her mother died in July 1996, and that, as the eldest daughter, she was to become the next Queen Mother. . . .

Nkumssa tradition requires that the girl or woman next in line for the Queen Mother position must remain a virgin until she is "enstooled." . . . [I]f the woman is believed not to be a virgin, she will be forced to undergo FGM.

. . . While she was at school, Abankwah fell in love with a man from her tribe and commenced a sexual relationship with him. When Abankwah learned that she would be the next Queen Mother, she knew that her lack of virginity would be discovered and that FGM would be the consequence.

In an effort to avoid this result, Abankwah fled to the capital city of Accra to live with the family of a friend [and then] fled to the United States.

C. Abankwah Has Established a Well Founded Fear of FGM

* * * *

The practice of FGM has been internationally recognized as a violation of women's and female children's rights. See, e.g., Report of the Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, General Recommendation No. 14, U.N. GAOR, 45th Sess., Supp. No. 38, at 80, p. 438, U.N. Doc. A/45/38; The Beijing Declaration and The Platform for Action, Fourth World Conference on Women, Beijing, China, 4–15 September 1995, U.N. Doc. DPI/1776/Wom (1996) pp. 112–113.

The practice of FGM has also been criminalized under federal law. See 18 U.S.C. § 116 (Supp. II 1996). In September 1996, as part of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Congress determined that whoever "knowingly circumcises, excises, or infibulates the whole or any part of the labia majora or labia minora or clitoris of another person who has not attained 18 years" shall be fined or imprisoned. The statute went into effect in April, 1997. It exempts certain medical procedures "necessary" to the health of a person when performed by a medical practitioner, but specifically notes that no account may be taken of a cultural belief that the practice is necessary. The congressional findings note the "physical and psychological health effects that harm the women involved." Pub.L. 104–208, § 645(a), 110 Stat. 3009–546 (1996). That FGM involves the infliction of grave harm constituting persecution under Section 101 (a)(42)(A) of the Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1101 (a)(42)(A) (1994), is not disputed here. See Kasinga, 1996 WL 379826.

1. Abankwah's Fear of FGM is Subjectively Real

The record as it stands establishes that Abankwah genuinely fears persecution if she returns to Ghana. Thus, there are no credibility issues before us. . . .

2. Abankwah Has Established an Objectively Reasonable Fear of FGM

The inquiry here is whether the record compels the conclusion that Abankwah's fear is objectively reasonable. The BIA found that Abankwah failed to present sufficient evidence to support her claim that she will be punished by FGM for having engaged in premarital sex. The BIA discounted the declaration of Kwabena Otumfuor as "not based on personal knowledge," "incomplete," and because it did not establish that the declarant "is an expert in the traditions of the applicant's tribe." With respect to the affidavit and testimony of Victoria Otumfuor ("Otumfuor"), the BIA noted that Otumfuor testified that she did not know "a great deal" about the Nkumssa tribe, that she could not testify with certainty that the Nkumssa tribe practiced FGM as punishment, and that in her own tribe a person who had engaged in premarital sex would be expelled from the village. Finally, the BIA discredited the documentary evidence submitted by Abankwah since the studies did not list Abankwah's tribe as among those that still practice FGM in Ghana. Further, the BIA noted that none of the documents specifically states that FGM is imposed as punishment for lack of virginity.

The BIA was too exacting both in the quantity and quality of evidence that it required. As an initial matter, INS regulations do not require that credible testimony—that which is consistent and specific—be corroborated by objective evidence. See 8 C.F.R. § 208.13(a) (1999); 8 C.F.R. § 208.16(b) (1999) ("The testimony of the applicant, if credible, may be sufficient to sustain the burden of proof without corroboration."). "In the absence of documentary proof, the applicant's testimony will be enough if it is credible, persuasive, and refers to specific facts that give rise to an inference that the applicant has been or has good reason to fear that he or she will be singled out for persecution." Melendez, 926 F.2d at 215 (internal quotations and citation omitted).

Without discounting the importance of objective proof in asylum cases, it must be acknowledged that a genuine refugee does not flee her native country armed with affidavits, expert witnesses, and extensive documentation. See, e.g., Canas-Segovia v. INS, 902 F.2d 717, 727 n.20 (9th Cir. 1990) (the "requirement of evidence should not be too strictly applied in view of the difficulty of proof inherent in the special situation in which an applicant for refugee status finds himself"), vacated on other grounds, 502 U.S. 1086 (1992). In this case, Abankwah has presented, through her affidavit and her own plausible, detailed, and internally consistent testimony, combined with evidence of the pervasiveness of FGM in Ghana and the testimony and affidavit of Victoria Otumfuor, strong evidence to demonstrate that her fear of FGM is objectively reasonable.

Abankwah's fear of FGM is thus sufficiently "grounded in reality" to satisfy the objective element of the test for well-founded fear of persecution. Melendez, 926 F.2d at 215. Given the customs of the Nkumssa tribe, a reasonable person who knew that she had disobeyed a tribal taboo and knew that discovery by the tribe of her disobedience was imminent would share Abankwah's fears.

e. Gender guidelines

On May 26, 1995, the Office of International Affairs, Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS"), issued guidance entitled "Considerations for Asylum Officers Adjudicating Asylum Claims from Women," intended to provide the INS Asylum Officer Corps with guidance and background on adjudicating asylum cases of women based wholly or in part on their gender. The guidance is excerpted below. Most footnotes have been deleted.

The full text of the guidance is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Despite the increased attention given to this type of claim during the past decade, gender-based asylum adjudications are still relatively new developments in refugee protection. This "Considerations" memorandum is a natural and multi-faceted outgrowth of a set of gender guidelines issued by the UNHCR in 1991, the 1993 Canadian gender guidelines, a proposed set of guidelines submitted by the Women Refugees Project (WRP) of the Harvard Immigration and Refugee Program, Cambridge and Somerville Legal Services, in 1994, and recent (and still developing) U.S. caselaw. . . . Additionally, this memorandum seeks to enhance the ability of U.S. Asylum Officers to more sensitively deal with substantive and procedural aspects of gender-related claims irrespective of country of origin.

* * * *

II Procedural Considerations for U.S. Asylum Officers

(a) Purpose and Overview

Asylum Officers should bear in mind the context of these human rights and cross-cultural considerations when dealing with women claimants:

- The laws and customs of some countries contain gender-discriminatory provisions. Breaching social mores (e.g., marrying outside of an arranged marriage, wearing lipstick or failing to comply with other cultural or religious norms) may result in harm, abuse or harsh treatment that is distinguishable from the treatment given the general population, frequently without meaningful recourse to state protection. As a result, the civil, political, social and economic rights of women are often diminished in these countries.
- Although women applicants frequently present asylum claims for reasons similar to male applicants, they may also have had experiences that are particular to their gender. A woman may present a claim that may be analyzed and approved under one or more grounds. For example, rape (including mass rape in, for example, Bosnia), sexual abuse and domestic violence, infanticide and genital mutilation are forms of mistreatment primarily directed at girls and women and they may serve as evidence of past persecution on account of one or more of the five grounds.
- Some societies require that women live under the protection of male family members. The death or absence of a spouse or other male family members may make a woman even more vulnerable to abuse.
- Women who have been raped or otherwise sexually abused may be seriously stigmatized and ostracized in their societies. They may also be subject to additional violence, abuse or discrimination because they are viewed as having brought shame and dishonor on themselves, their families, and their communities.

III. Legal Analysis of Claims

Women make up a large percentage of the world's refugees. In order to qualify as a refugee under our laws, female applicants must—like any applicant—show that they cannot return home and cannot avail themselves of the protection of their country because of "persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion." INA section 101(a)(42). Often, of course, the asylum claim of a female applicant will have nothing to do with her gender. In other cases, though, the applicant's gender may bear on the claim in significant ways to which the adjudicator should be attentive. For example, the applicant may assert a particular kind of harm, like rape, that either is unique to women or befalls women more commonly than men. Or an applicant may assert that she has suffered persecution on account of her gender or because of her membership in a social group constituted by women. She might also assert that her alleged persecutors seek to harm her on account of a political or religious belief concerning gender. Such claims must be analyzed within the terms of United States law, but gender-related claims can raise issues of particular complexity, and it is important that United States asylum adjudicators understand those complexities and give proper consideration to gender-based claims.

* * * *

Persecution: How Serious is the Harm?

* * * *

The forms of harm that women suffer around the world, and that therefore will arise in asylum claims, are varied. Forms of harm that have arisen in asylum claims and that are unique to or more commonly befall women have included sexual abuse, rape, infanticide, genital mutilation, forced marriage, slavery, domestic violence, and forced abortion. The form of harm or punishment may be selected because of the gender of the victim, but the analysis of the claim should not vary based on the gender of the victim. . . .

A. Rape and Other Forms of Sexual Violence as Persecution

Serious physical harm consistently has been held to constitute persecution. Rape and other forms of severe sexual violence clearly can fall within this rule. See Lazo-Majano v. INS, 813 F.2d 1432, 1434 (9th Cir. 1987) (Salvadoran woman raped and brutalized by army sergeant who denounced her as subversive had been "persecuted" within the terms of the Act). In Matter of—Krome (BIA May 25, 1993), which the board recently voted to designate as a precedent, it was determined that the gang rape and beating of a Haitian woman in retaliation for her political activities was "grievous harm" amounting to persecution. Severe sexual abuse does not differ analytically from beatings, torture, or other forms of physical violence that are commonly held to amount to persecution. The appearance of sexual violence in a claim should not lead adjudicators to conclude automatically that the claim is an instance of purely personal harm. As in all cases, the determination that sexual abuse may be serious enough to amount to persecution does not by itself make out a claim to asylum. The applicant must still demonstrate that the fear of persecution is well-founded and that the persecution was threatened or inflicted on account of a protected ground.

B. Violation of Fundamental Beliefs as Persecution

The Third Circuit has considered whether an Iranian woman faced with having to wear the traditional Islamic veil and to comply with other harsh rules imposed on women in Iran risked "persecution" as the Board has defined it. Fatin v. INS, 12 F.3d 1233 (3d Cir. 1993). The record included evidence about the possibility of physical harm. The applicant had asserted in her brief that the routine penalty for women who break the moral code in Iran is "74 lashes, a year's imprisonment, and in many cases brutal rapes and death." Id. at 1241. These, the court states, would constitute persecution. The court went on to assume that "the concept of persecution is broad enough to include governmental measures that compel an individual to engage in conduct that is not physically painful or harmful but is abhorrent to that individual's deepest beliefs." Id. at 1242. Having to renounce religious beliefs or to desecrate an object of religious importance might, for example, be persecution if the victim held strong religious beliefs. . . .

The court did not specify how "profoundly abhorrent" to one's belief forced behavior must be to constitute persecution. It did note that "the concept of persecution does not encompass all treatment that our society regards as unfair, unjust, or even unlawful or unconstitutional." Id. at 1240. The degree of abhorrence an applicant claims to feel at such forced behavior must be objectively reasonable—that is, it would have to be a degree of abhorrence that a reasonable person in the circumstances of the applicant could share. Id. at 1242 n.11.

Nexus: the "On Account of" Requirement

* * * *

A. Actual or Imputed Political Opinion

Asylum claims may often raise assertions of fear on account of a political opinion having to do with gender-related issues. The Third Circuit in Fatin had "little doubt that feminism qualifies as a political opinion within the meaning of the relevant statutes." 12 F.2d at 1242. The political opinion of the appellant in that case did not, however, provide a basis for refugee status. Though she had shown that she generally possessed political beliefs about the role of women in society that collided with those prevailing in Iran, she had not shown that she would risk severe enough punishment simply for holding such views. Nor had she shown that she actually possessed the narrower political opinion that Iran's gender-specific laws and repressive social norms must be disobeyed on grounds of conscience, although the court had indicated that the penalties for disobedience were harsh enough to amount to persecution. Id. at 1242–43. However, the case does make clear that an applicant who could demonstrate a well-founded fear of persecution of account of her (or his) beliefs about the role and status of women in society could be eligible for refugee status on account of political opinion.

Some tribunals have held or suggested that an applicant can establish eligibility for refugee status by demonstrating that he or she is at risk on account of a political opinion that the persecutor believes the applicant to have, whether or not the applicant actually possesses that political opinion. This is the doctrine of "imputed political opinion." See, e.g., Ravindran v. INS, 976 F.2d 754 (1st Cir. 1992); Canas-Segovia v. INS, 970 F.2d 599 (9th Cir. 1992); Matter of R-, Interim Decision #3195 (BIA 1992); Opinion of the General Counsel, "Continuing Viability of the Doctrine of Imputed Political Opinion" part I, pp. 1–6 (INS, January 19, 1993). Thus, in addition to the question whether views on issues that relate to gender can constitute a "political opinion" under the INA, asylum claims sometimes raise the question whether a woman has been persecuted because of a political opinion (regardless of its substance) that has been imputed to her.

In Campos-Guardado v. INS, 809 F.2d 285, 289 (5th Cir. 1987), for example, the Fifth Circuit considered the claim of a woman whose family members had been politically active in El Salvador. Armed attackers came to her home, bound the applicant and other female family members and forced them to watch while the attackers murdered male family members. The attackers then raped the applicant and the other female family members while one attacker chanted political slogans. In what might appear to be an extreme assessment of the evidence, the court affirmed the Board's determination that the attackers were motivated by a political opinion they imputed to the victim. Reasonable minds could differ over this record. The court might reasonably have concluded that the chanting of political slogans during the rape indicated not merely that the attackers were politically motivated, but more specifically that they believed the petitioner to have contrary political views and that they punished her because of it. In any case, Campos-Guardado illustrates the need for an adjudicator to carefully ascertain all the facts surrounding an allegation of persecution in order to assess whether there are indicia that the act was committed or threatened on account of a protected characteristic.

B. Membership in a Particular Social Group

(2) Social Group Defined by Gender

An increasing number of asylum applicants claim that gender, alone or along with other characteristics, can define a "particular social group." The Second Circuit has stated that gender alone cannot. "Possession of broadly-based characteristics such as youth and gender will not by itself endow individuals with membership in a particular group." Gomez v. INS, 47 F.2d 660, 664 (2nd Cir. 1991). The Third Circuit has taken a different view. In Fatin, the court emphasized that an Iranian applicant who feared persecution because she is a woman would be a member of a particular social group under the INA. Ms. Fatin was not eligible for asylum, however, because she had not shown that persecutors would seek to harm her "based solely on her gender." 12 F.3d at 1240 (emphasis added).[13]

Thus, while some courts have concluded as a legal matter that gender can define a particular social group, no court has concluded

[13] The Eighth Circuit has adopted a similar approach. "Safaie asserts that Iranian women, by virtue of their innate characteristic (their sex) and the harsh restrictions placed upon them, are a particular social group. We believe this category is overbroad, because no fact finder could reasonably conclude that all Iranian women had a well-founded fear based solely on their gender." Safaie v. INS, 25 F.3d 636, 640 (8th Circ. 1994). Although this language on its face would suggest that gender could never define a particular social group, the court does not make so broad a statement. Though its language is imprecise, the Safaie court cites the portion of Fatin in which the Third Circuit concluded that, while gender can define a social group under the INA, the record before it contained no evidence from which a reasonable fact finder could conclude that persecutors in Iran seek to harm people simply because they are women.

as a factual matter that an applicant has demonstrated that the government (or a persecutor the government could not or would not control) would seek to harm her solely on account of her gender. The courts have then considered whether gender might be one characteristic that combines with others to define the particular social group.

In Fatin, for example, the applicant's primary argument was not that she risked harm simply for being female. Rather, she argued that she risked harm as a member of a "very visible and specific subgroup: Iranian women who refuse to conform to the government's gender-specific laws and social norms." 12 F.3d at 1241, quoting petitioner's brief (emphasis supplied by the court). This group, the court noted, is not made up of all Iranian women who hold feminist views, nor even of all those who object to the rules that govern women in that country. It is limited to the smaller group of women who so strongly object that they refuse to conform, despite the risk of serious punishment. If a person would choose to suffer severe consequences rather than to comply with rules contrary to her beliefs, the court reasoned, then those beliefs might well be so fundamental to her identity or conscience that she ought not have to change them. The subgroup that the applicant asserted therefore could be seen as a particular social group. Moreover, the record indicated that the punishment facing the members of that group is severe enough to constitute persecution. The applicant was not a refugee, though, because she had not shown that she was a member of such a group. She had testified only that she would try to avoid as much as she could the strictures that she objected to. Id.

Thus the Fatin court found that women in Iran could constitute a "particular social group" and recognized the applicant's membership, but found that the members were not at risk of persecution. The court also seemed to recognize the narrower subgroup of Iranian women who find their country's gender-specific laws offensive and do not wish to comply with them, but similarly found no evidence that people in this narrower group faced harm serious enough to constitute persecution. Last, the court recognized the narrowest subgroup of Iranian women whose opposition to Iran's gender-specific laws is so profound that they would disobey at serious peril; it held that the possible consequences of disobedience were extreme enough to be persecution, but found that petitioner was not in the particular social group. In each scenario the court regarded gender, either alone or as part of a combination, as a characteristic that could define a particular social group within the meaning of the INA. Accord Safaie, 25 F.3d at 640, citing Fatin (although "a group of women who refuses to conform [with moral code in Iran] and whose opposition is so profound that they would choose to suffer the severe consequences of noncompliance, may well satisfy the definition," the applicant had failed to show that she fell within that group).

(3) Social Group Defined by Family Membership

Asylum seekers often claim to have suffered harm or to face the risk of harm because of a family relationship. In Gebremichael v. INS, 10 F.3d 28, 36 (1st Cir. 1993), the court concluded: "There can, in fact, be no plainer example of a social group based on common, identifiable and immutable characteristics than that of a nuclear family.". . . . Gebremichael concerned an Ethiopian applicant who had been imprisoned and tortured by Dergue government officials seeking information about the applicant's brother. The court found that > the link between family membership and persecution is manifest: as the record makes clear and the INS itself concedes, the Ethiopian security forces applied to petitioner the "time-honored theory of cherchez la famille ('look for the family')," the terrorization of one family member to extract information about the location of another family member or to force the family member to come forward. As a result, we are compelled to conclude that no reasonable fact finder could fail to find that petitioner was singled out for mistreatment because of his relationship to his brother. Thus, this is a clear case of "[past] persecution of account of . . . membership in a particular social group."

10 F.3d at 36. See also Ravindran v. INS, 976 F.2d 754, 761 n.5 (1st Cir. 1992), quoting Sanchez-Trujillo, 801 F.2d at 1576 ("a prototypical example of a 'particular social group' would consist of the immediate family members of a certain family, the family being the focus of fundamental affiliational concerns and common interests for most people"). Without mentioning Sanchez-Trujillo, however, or exploring the question in depth, the Ninth Circuit later held that the concept of persecution on account of membership in a particular social group does not extend to the persecution of a family. Estrada-Posadas v. INS, 924 F.2d 916, 919 (9th Cir. 1991).

. . . Adjudicators should also note that the applicant's gender need not play any role in whether family membership can define a particular social group in the context of a particular case; Gebremichael, for example, was male. But claims based on family membership are frequently asserted by female applicants, particularly in countries where men tend to be more active politically than women. . . .

Public versus Private Acts

(1) Is the Persecutor the Government or Someone the Government is Unable or Unwilling to Control?

* * * *

In the usual case, the government will be the alleged persecutor. The question may arise, however, whether an act committed or threatened by a government official was nevertheless a purely private one. The Ninth Circuit considered whether a woman who was "singled out to be bullied, beaten, injured, raped and enslaved" was persecuted by an agent of the government for political or for personal reasons in Lazo-Majano v. INS, 913 F.2d 1432, 1434 (9th Cir. 1987). There the persecutor, a member of the Salvadoran military, threatened to accuse the applicant of subversion. He then did so, to a friend in the police force. Based on evidence of severe treatment of subversives by Salvadoran authorities, the court determined that the applicant was a refugee on account of the political opinion that could be imputed to her because of the public accusation, even without evidence that she actually held subversive political views. In Lazo-Majano, therefore, an act that might have been regarded as personal violence not covered by the INA was held to have become persecution on account of a protected characteristic because of the conduct of the persecutor. Cf. Matter of Pierre, 15 I & N Dec. 461 (BIA 1975) (husband's status as a legislator in Haiti did not by itself make abuse of his wife persecution on account of political opinion even though the Haitian government would not restrain the husband).

The Sixth Circuit considered the distinction between public and private acts in a claim based on sexual harassment in Klawitter v. INS, 570 F.2d 149 (6th Cir. 1992). There the applicant claimed that she feared the unwanted sexual advances of a colonel in the Polish secret police. The court agreed with the position of the Board that "[h]owever distasteful his apparent treatment of the respondent may have been, such harm or threats arising from a personal dispute of this nature, even one taking place with an individual in a high governmental position, is not a ground for asylum." . . . Although petitioner's testimony recounts an unfortunate situation, harm or threats of harm based solely on sexual attraction do not constitute persecution under the Act. 970 F.2d at 152.[15]

These cases involve public officials who commit what is commonly seen as a private act. In such situations adjudicators must determine whether a reasonable basis exists for regarding the act as a "public" one that can be attributed to the government or an agent the government is unable or unwilling to control. . . .

As mentioned above, the persecutor might also be a person or group outside the government that the government is unable or unwilling to control. If the applicant asserts a threat of harm

[15] This does not mean that sexual harassment could never amount to persecution no matter the seriousness; nor does it mean that a government official could never engage in sexually abusive conduct as a means of punishing someone on account of a protected ground. Klawitter instead reiterates the requirement that an asylum seeker must show that harm is threatened or inflicted on account of a protected characteristic within the meaning of Elias-Zacarias, and that the agent of harm must be the government or someone the government is unable or unwilling to control. . . .

from a non-government source, the applicant must show that the government is unwilling or unable to protect its citizens. See Matter of Villalta, Int. Dec. 3126 (BIA 1990); Rodriguez-Rivera v. INS, 848 F.2d 998, 1005 (9th Cir. 1988). It will be important in this regard, although not conclusive, to determine whether the applicant has actually sought help from government authorities. Id. Evidence that such an effort would be futile would also be relevant.

(2) Is State Protection Possible Elsewhere in the Country?

The principle that international protection becomes appropriate where national protection is unavailable also means that, to be eligible for international protection, an applicant must generally demonstrate that the danger of persecution exists nationwide. . . . If there is evidence that the applicant can avoid the threat by relocating to a different part of the country or that a government would offer protection from otherwise private acts of harm elsewhere in the country than the locality where those acts take place, then normally the applicant will not qualify for asylum. See Beltran-Zavala v. INS, 912 F.2d 1027, 1030 (9th Cir. 1990).

This principle becomes crucial where the applicant alleges private actions—such as domestic violence—that the state will not protect against. In such situations the officer must explore the extent to which the government can or does offer protection or redress, and the extent to which the risk of harm extends nationwide. According to the UNHCR Handbook, "a person will not be excluded from refugee status merely because he could have sought refuge in another part of the same country, if under all the circumstances it would not have been reasonable to expect him to do so." UNCHR Handbook ¶ 91.

f. Children's asylum guidelines

On December 10, 1998, Jeff Weiss, Acting Director of the Office of International Affairs, Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS"), issued "Guidelines for Children's Asylum Claims," excerpted below, to provide the INS Asylum Office Corps with background and guidance on adjudicating children's asylum claims.

The full text of the guidelines is available at www.uscis.gov/graphics/lawsregs/handbook/10a_ChldrnGdlns.pdf.

* * * *

During the last 10 years, the topic of child asylum seekers has received increasing attention from the international community. Human rights violations against children can take a number of forms, such as abusive child labor practices, trafficking in children, rape, and forced prostitution. In violation of current international standards that establish age 15 as the minimum age for participation in armed conflicts, children under age 15 in some countries are forcibly recruited by regular or irregular armies to participate directly in military conflicts. Children who have had such experiences are referred to as "child soldiers" throughout this text. The protection needs of these and other children have commanded much international and domestic attention.

* * * *

Because of the unique vulnerability and circumstances of children, the Immigration and Naturalization Service considers it appropriate to issue guidance relating to our youngest asylum seekers. These "Guidelines for Children's Asylum Claims" provide Asylum Officers with child-sensitive interview procedures and analysis regarding the most common issues that may arise in these cases. This guidance is similar in approach to the "Considerations for Asylum Officers Adjudicating Asylum Claims from Women" (the "Gender Guidelines") memorandum issued on May 26, 1995. Like the Gender Guidelines, these guidelines are intended to enhance the ability of INS Asylum Officers to address more responsively the substantive and procedural aspects of claims, irrespective of the child's country of origin. . . .

* * * *

* * * *

(b) Children as Refugees

. . . In order to be granted asylum in the United States, the child applicant must establish that he or she meets the definition of refugee contained at Section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), as interpreted by Board and Federal court precedent. Regardless of how sympathetic the child's claim may be, he or she cannot be granted asylum unless this standard is met. Consequently, the "best interests of the child" principle, while useful to the interview process, does not replace or change the refugee definition in determining substantive eligibility.

In discussing the treatment of unaccompanied minors, the UNHCR Handbook notes that, "[t]he same definition of a refugee applies to all individuals, regardless of their age." Sensitivity to the age of the child, however, may affect the analysis of his or her refugee status:

> Although the same definition of a refugee applies to all individuals regardless of their age, in the examination of the factual elements of the claim of an unaccompanied child, particular regard should be given to circumstances such as the child's stage of development, his/her possibly limited knowledge of conditions in the country of origin, and their significance to the legal concept of refugee status, as well as his/her special vulnerability.

* * * *

(c) Persecution

* * * *

The harm a child fears or has suffered . . . may be relatively less than that of an adult and still qualify as persecution. Given the "variations in the psychological make-up of individuals and in the circumstances of each case, interpretations of what amounts to persecution are bound to vary." UNHCR Handbook . . . at ¶ 52. The types of harm that may befall children are varied. In addition to the many forms of persecution an adult may suffer, children may be particularly vulnerable to sexual assault, forced labor, forced prostitution, infanticide, and other forms of human rights violations such as the deprivation of food and medical treatment. Cultural practices, such as FGM, may under certain circumstances constitute persecution. Matter of Kasinga, Int. Dec. 3278 (BIA 1996).

. . . A well-founded fear of persecution involves both subjective and objective elements. . . . For child asylum seekers, however, the balance between subjective fear and objective circumstances may be more difficult for an adjudicator to assess. Although there are no bright line tests, the UNHCR Handbook suggests that children under the age of 16 may lack the maturity to form a well-founded fear of persecution, thus requiring the adjudicator to give more weight to objective factors. UNHCR Handbook . . . at ¶ 125, 217. "Minors under 16 years of age . . . may have fear and a will of their own, but these may not have the same significance as in the case of an adult." . . . There is, of course, no hard and fast rule; "a minor's mental maturity must normally be determined in the light of his [or her] personal, family and cultural background." . . .

(d) Nexus: the "On Account of" Requirement

(1) General Factors to Be Considered

* * * *

. . . the nexus requirement may be particularly difficult to determine because a child may express fear or have experienced harm without understanding the persecutor's intent. A child's incomplete understanding of the situation does not necessarily mean that a nexus between the harm and a protected ground does not exist. . . .

Similarly, the inherent vulnerability of children often places them at the mercy of adults who may inflict harm without viewing it as such, sometimes to such a degree of severity that it may constitute persecution. In that context, it is important to remember that the Board of Immigration Appeals has held that a punitive or malignant intent is not required for a harm to constitute persecution on the basis of a protected ground. A persecutor may believe that he or she is helping the applicant by attempting to overcome the protected characteristic. . . .

(2) Issues of Particular Relevance to Children

When the child claims asylum on the basis of political opinion, the age and maturity of the child must also be taken into account. Just as a younger child may have difficulty forming a well-founded fear of persecution, the ability to form a political opinion for which one may be persecuted may be more difficult for a young child to establish. Because the level of children's political activity varies widely among countries, however, Asylum Officers should not assume that age alone prevents a child from holding political opinions for which he or she may be persecuted. See Civil v. INS, 140 F.3d 52 (1st Cir. 1998).

It may also be possible for a child's claim to be based on imputed political opinion. See, e.g., Matter of S-P-, Int. Dec. 3287. The adjudicator should carefully review the family history of the child and should explore as much as possible the child's understanding of his or her family's activities to determine whether the child may face persecution based on the imputed political beliefs of family members or some other group with which the child is identified.

(e) Membership in a Particular Social Group

(3) Social Groups Defined in Whole or in Part by Age

Domestic law with respect to age-based claims is scarce. The Second Circuit has noted that "[p]ossession of broadly-based characteristics such as youth and gender will not by itself endow individuals with membership in a particular group." Gomez v. INS, 947 F.2d 660 (2d Cir. 1991). With respect to gender, Federal courts have taken different legal approaches regarding the possible breadth of a gender-based claim, but have yet to find as a factual matter that an applicant has established that a persecutor sought to harm the individual on the basis of gender alone. See, Gender Guidelines and cases cited therein. More often, while acknowledging the possibility of a broadly defined social group based on gender, courts have looked to narrowly defined subgroups in which gender is one of several factors used to determine the parameters of the particular social group. . . .

By analogy, an age-based claim grounded solely in the applicant's status as a child or a child from a particular country is unlikely to be sufficiently discrete to establish persecution on account of that status. The Board and Federal courts have rejected claims based primarily or exclusively on age. For example, in Matter of Sanchez and Escobar, 19 I&N Dec. 276 (BIA) 1985, the Board rejected as overly broad claims that young Salvadoran men, ages 18 to 30, who were urban, working class males of military age constituted a particular social group. The Board noted:

> Historically, it has been the young who have primarily been involved in both the internal and external armed conflicts of a country. Although it may be an element of the proof, a purely statistical showing is not by itself sufficient proof of the existence of a persecuted group. It is not enough to simply identify the common characteristics of a statistical grouping of a portion of the population at risk. In the context of the asylum and withholding provisions related to "membership in a particular social group" under the Act, there must be a showing that the claimed persecution is on account of the group's identifying characteristics.
> Id. at 285–86.

On appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed, reiterating that the term "particular social group" does not "encompass every broadly defined segment of a population, even if a certain demographic division does have some statistical relevance." Sanchez-Trujillo, 801 F.2d at 1576. See also Civil 140 F.3d at 56 (rejecting "Haitian youth who possess pro-Aristide political views" as overly broad); Ravindran v. INS, 976 F.2d 754, 761 n.5 (1st Cir. 1991) (rejecting argument that Tamil males between the ages of 15 and 45 were targeted for persecution on the basis of age and gender); Matter of Vigil, 19 I&N Dec. 572 (BIA 1988).

3. Eligibility for Withholding of Deportation—"Serious Nonpolitical Crime"

Section 243(h) of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1253(h)) (added by the Refugee Act of 1980 and later redesignated as INA § 241(b)(3), 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(3) and amended by the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, see section C.2.b supra) prohibited the Attorney General from removing an alien to a country if the Attorney General decided that the alien's life or freedom would be threatened in that country because of the alien's race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion. This remedy of "withholding of deportation" implemented the U.S. obligation of non-refoulement under the United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, Jan. 31, 1967, 19 U.S.T. 6223 (entered into force for the United States Nov. 1, 1968). See section D(1) supra for a discussion of non-refoulement. Under § 243(h), an alien was not eligible for withholding of deportation if the Attorney General decided, inter alia, that there were "serious reasons to believe that the alien committed a serious nonpolitical crime outside the United States before the alien arrived in the United States."

In INS v. Aguirre-Aguirre, 526 U.S. 415 (1999), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the Board of Immigration Appeals' interpretation that to be a "political crime," a crime must be one in which the political aspect of the crime outweighed its common-law character, that crimes grossly out of proportion to the political objective or involving acts of an atrocious nature could not be "political crimes," and that the severity of the persecution that the alien was likely to face upon return was not relevant to whether the crime was "political." Excerpts from the opinion follow (footnotes omitted.)

. . . In 1994, respondent was charged with deportability by the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) for illegal entry into the United States. Respondent conceded deportability but applied for asylum and withholding. At a hearing before an Immigration Judge respondent testified, through an interpreter, that he had been politically active in Guatemala from 1989 to 1992 with a student group called Estudeante Syndicado (ES) and with the National Central Union political party. App. 19–20, 36–37. He testified about threats due to his political activity. The threats, he believed, were from different quarters, including the Guatemalan Government, right-wing government support groups, and left-wing guerillas. App. to Pet. for Cert. 23a.

Respondent described activities he and other ES members engaged in to protest various government policies and actions, including the high cost of bus fares and the government's failure to investigate the disappearance or murder of students and others. App. 20–21; App. to Pet. for Cert. 22a–23a. For purposes of our review, we assume that the amount of bus fares is an important political and social issue in Guatemala. We are advised that bus fare represents a significant portion of many Guatemalans' annual living expense, and a rise in fares may impose substantial economic hardship. See Brief for Massachusetts Law Reform Institute et al. as Amicus Curiae 18–19. In addition, government involvement with fare increases, and other aspects of the transportation system, has been a focus of political discontent in that country. Id., at 16–21.

According to the official hearing record, respondent testified that he and his fellow members would "strike" by "burning buses, breaking windows or just attacking the police, police cars." App. 20. Respondent estimated that he participated in setting about 10 buses on fire, after dousing them with gasoline. Id., at. 46. Before setting fire to the buses, he and his group would order passengers to leave the bus. Passengers who refused were stoned, hit with sticks, or bound with ropes. Id., at 46–47. In addition, respondent testified that he and his group "would break the windows of . . . stores," "take the people out of the stores that were there," and "throw everything on the floor." Id., at 48.

The Immigration Judge granted respondent's applications for withholding of deportation and for asylum, finding a likelihood of persecution for his political opinions and activities if he was returned to Guatemala. App. to Pet. for Cert. 31a–32a. The INS appealed to the BIA. . . . With respect to withholding, the BIA did not decide whether respondent had established the requisite risk of persecution because it determined that, in any event, he had committed a serious nonpolitical crime within the meaning of § 1253(h)(2)(C).

In addressing the definition of a serious nonpolitical crime, the BIA applied the interpretation it first set forth in Matter of McMullen, 19 I. & N. Dec. at 97–98: "In evaluating the political nature of a crime, we consider it important that the political aspect of the offense outweigh its common-law character. This would not be the case if the crime is grossly out of proportion to the political objective or if it involves acts of an atrocious nature." In the instant case, the BIA found, "the criminal nature of the respondent's acts outweigh their political nature." App. to Pet. for Cert. 18a. The BIA acknowledged respondent's dissatisfaction with the Guatemalan government's "seeming inaction in the investigation of student deaths and in its raising of student bus fares." Ibid. It said, however: "The ire of the ES manifested itself disproportionately in the destruction of property and assaults on civilians. Although the ES had a political agenda, those goals were outweighed by their criminal strategy of strikes. . . ." Ibid. The BIA further concluded respondent should not be granted discretionary asylum relief in light of "the nature of his acts against innocent Guatemalans." Id., at 17a.

A divided panel of the Court of Appeals granted respondent's petition for review and remanded to the BIA. 121 F.3d 521 (CA9 1997). According to the majority, the BIA's analysis of the serious nonpolitical crime exception was legally deficient in three respects. First, the BIA should have "considered the persecution that Aguirre might suffer if returned to Guatemala" and "balanced his admitted offenses against the danger to him of death." 121 F.3d at 524. Second, it should have "considered whether the acts committed were grossly out of proportion to their alleged objective" and were "of an atrocious nature," especially with reference to Ninth Circuit precedent in this area. Ibid. (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). Third, the BIA "should have considered the political necessity and success of Aguirre's methods." 121 F.3d at 523–524.

As an initial matter, the Court of Appeals expressed no disagreement with the Attorney General or the BIA that the phrase "serious nonpolitical crime" in § 1253(h)(2)(C) should be applied by weighing "the political nature" of an act against its "common-law" or "criminal" character. See Matter of McMullen, supra, at 97–98; App. to Pet. for Cert. 18a; Deportation Proceedings for Doherty, 13 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 1, 23 (1989) (an act " 'should be considered a serious nonpolitical crime if the act is disproportionate to the objective' ") (quoting McMullen v. INS, supra, at 595), rev'd on other grounds, Doherty v. INS, 908 F.2d 1108 (CA2 1990), rev'd, 502 U.S. 314, 116 L. Ed. 2d 823, 112 S. Ct. 719 (1992). Nor does respondent take issue with this basic inquiry.

The Court of Appeals did conclude, however, that the BIA must supplement this weighing test by examining additional factors. In the course of its analysis, the Court of Appeals failed to accord the required level of deference to the interpretation of the serious nonpolitical crime exception adopted by the Attorney General and BIA. Because the Court of Appeals confronted questions implicating "an agency's construction of the statute which it administers," the court should have applied the principles of deference described in Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 842, 81 L. Ed. 2d 694, 104 S. Ct. 2778 (1984). Thus, the court should have asked whether "the statute is silent or ambiguous with respect to the specific issue" before it; if so, "the question for the court [was] whether the agency's answer is based on a permissible construction of the statute." Id., at 843. See also INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. at 448–449.

The Court of Appeals' error is clearest with respect to its holding that the BIA was required to balance respondent's criminal acts against the risk of persecution he would face if returned to Guatemala. In Matter of Rodriguez-Coto, 19 I. & N. Dec. 208, 209–210 (1985), the BIA "rejected any interpretation of the phrase . . . 'serious nonpolitical crime' in [§ 1253(h)(2)(C)] which would vary with the nature of evidence of persecution." The text and structure of § 1253(h) are consistent with this conclusion. Indeed, its words suggest that the BIA's reading of the statute, not the interpretation adopted by the Court of Appeals, is the more appropriate one. As a matter of plain language, it is not obvious that an already-completed crime is somehow rendered less serious by considering the further circumstance that the alien may be subject to persecution if returned to his home country. See ibid. ("We find that the modifier . . . 'serious' . . . relates only to the nature of the crime itself").

It is important, too, as Rodriguez-Coto points out, 19 I. & N. Dec. at 209–210, that for aliens to be eligible for withholding at all, the statute requires a finding that their "life or freedom would be threatened in [the country to which deportation is sought] on account of their race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion," i.e., that the alien is at risk of persecution in that country. 8 U.S.C. § 1253(h)(1). By its terms, the statute thus requires independent consideration of the risk of persecution facing the alien before granting withholding. It is reasonable to decide, as the BIA has done, that this factor can be considered on its own and not also as a factor in determining whether the crime itself is a serious, nonpolitical crime. Though the BIA in the instant case declined to make findings respecting the risk of persecution facing respondent, App. to Pet. for Cert. 18a, this was because it determined respondent was barred from withholding under the serious nonpolitical crime exception. Ibid. The BIA, in effect, found respondent ineligible for withholding even on the assumption he could establish a threat of persecution. This approach is consistent with the language and purposes of the statute.

In reaching the contrary conclusion and ruling that the risk of persecution should be balanced against the alien's criminal acts, the Court of Appeals relied on a passage from the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Handbook on Procedures and Criteria for Determining Refugee Status (Geneva, 1979) (U. N. Handbook). . . . The U. N. Handbook may be a useful interpretative aid, but it is not binding on the Attorney General, the BIA, or United States courts. "Indeed, the Handbook itself disclaims such force, explaining that 'the determination of refugee status under the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol . . . is incumbent upon the Contracting State in whose territory the refugee finds himself.'" INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. at 439, n. 22 (quoting U. N. Handbook, at 1, P(ii)). See also 480 U.S. at 439, n. 22 ("We do not suggest, of course, that the explanation in the U. N. Handbook has the force of law or in any way binds the INS . . ."). For the reasons given, supra, at 9–10, we think the BIA's determination that § 1253(h)(2)(C) requires no additional balancing of the risk of persecution rests on a fair and permissible reading of the statute. See also T. v. Secretary of State for the Home Dept., 2 All E. R. 865, 882 (H. L. 1996) (Lord Mustill) ("The crime either is or is not political when committed, and its character cannot depend on the consequences which the offender may afterwards suffer if he is returned").

* * * *

Also relying on the U. N. Handbook, the Court of Appeals held that the BIA "should have considered whether the acts committed were 'grossly out of proportion to the alleged objective.' . . . The political nature of the offenses would be 'more difficult to accept' if they involved 'acts of an atrocious nature.'" 121 F.3d at 524 (quoting U. N. Handbook, P152, at 36). . . .

* * * *

. . . Our decision takes into account that the BIA's test identifies a general standard (whether the political aspect of an offense outweighs its common-law character) and then provides two more specific inquiries that may be used in applying the rule: whether there is a gross disproportion between means and ends, and whether atrocious acts are involved. Under this approach, atrocious acts provide a clear indication that an alien's offense is a serious nonpolitical crime. In the BIA's judgment, where an alien has sought to advance his agenda by atrocious means, the political aspect of his offense may not fairly be said to predominate over its criminal character. Commission of the acts, therefore, will result in a denial of withholding. The criminal element of an offense may outweigh its political aspect even if none of the acts are deemed atrocious, however. For this reason, the BIA need not give express consideration to the atrociousness of the alien's acts in every case before determining that an alien has committed a serious nonpolitical crime.

The BIA's approach is consistent with the statute, which does not equate every serious nonpolitical crime with atrocious acts. Cf. 8 U.S.C. § 1253(h)(2)(B) (establishing an exception to withholding for a dangerous alien who has been convicted of a "particularly serious crime," defined to include an "aggravated felony"). Nor is there any reason to find this equivalence under the statute. In common usage, the word "atrocious" suggests a deed more culpable and aggravated than a serious one. See Webster's Third New International Dictionary 139 (1971) (defining "atrocious" as, "marked by or given to extreme wickedness . . . [or] extreme brutality or cruelty"; "outrageous: violating the bounds of common decency"; "marked by extreme violence: savagely fierce: murderous"; "utterly revolting: abominable"). As a practical matter, if atrocious acts were deemed a necessary element of all serious nonpolitical crimes, the Attorney General would have severe restrictions upon her power to deport aliens who had engaged in serious, though not atrocious, forms of criminal activity. These restrictions cannot be discerned in the text of § 1253(h), and the Attorney General and BIA are not bound to impose the restrictions on themselves.

In the instant case, the BIA determined that "the criminal nature of the respondent's acts outweigh their political nature" because his group's political dissatisfaction "manifested itself disproportionately in the destruction of property and assaults on civilians" and its political goals "were outweighed by [the group's] criminal strategy of strikes." App. to Pet. for Cert. 18a. The BIA concluded respondent had committed serious nonpolitical crimes by applying the general standard established in its prior decision, so it had no need to consider whether his acts might also have been atrocious. The Court of Appeals erred in holding otherwise.

* * * *

It is true the Attorney General has suggested that a crime will not be deemed political unless there is a "'close and direct causal link between the crime committed and its alleged political purpose and object.'" Deportation Proceedings for Doherty, 13 Op. Off. Legal Counsel, at 23 (quoting McMullen v. INS, 788 F.2d 591 (CA9 1986)). The BIA's analysis, which was quite brief in all events, did not explore this causal link beyond noting the general disproportion between respondent's acts and his political objectives. Whatever independent relevance a causal link inquiry might have in another case, in this case the BIA determined respondent's acts were not political based on the lack of proportion with his objectives. It was not required to do more. Even in a case with a clear causal connection, a lack of proportion between means and ends may still render a crime nonpolitical. . . .

4. Non-refoulement under Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture

The United States became a party to the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ("the Torture Convention"), 1465 U.N.T.S. 113 (1984), on November 21, 1994. See Digest 1989–90 at 176–90, for a discussion of U.S. ratification of the Convention. Article 3(1) of the Convention provides that: "No State Party shall expel, return, ("refouler") or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he or she would be in danger of being subjected to torture." Article 3(2) states that "[f]or the purposes of considering whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant, or mass violations of human rights."

In 1998 the Board of Immigration Appeals of the U.S. Department of Justice ruled in Matter of H-M-V-, 22 I&N Dec. 256 (BIA 1998), that the Torture Convention Article 3 protections could not be invoked in regular asylum proceedings because the Convention was not self-executing and therefore not binding on Immigration Judges in the absence of implementing legislation. Congress subsequently enacted § 2242 of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998, as contained in Division G of Title XXII of the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1999, Pub. L. No. 105–277, 112 Stat. 2681–822 (1998). Section 2242 made it the policy of the U.S. "not to expel, extradite, or otherwise effect the involuntary return of any person to a country in which there are substantial grounds for believing that the person would be in danger of being subjected to torture, regardless of whether the person is physically present in the United States," and required that INS issue implementing regulations within 120 days. On February 19, 1999, the INS published interim regulations in 64 Fed. Reg. 8478, discussed in Chapter 6.F.1.b.

5. Temporary Protected Status, Deferred Enforced Departure and Related Statutory Relief

a. Temporary protected status

Section 244A of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1254a, as amended, added by § 302(a) of Title III of Pub. L. No. 101–649, 104 Stat. 4978 (1990) (see Digest 1989–90 at 39–40) and redesignated as § 244 by § 308 of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 ("IIRIRA"), Division C of the Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act, 1997, Pub. L. No. 104–208, 110 Stat. 3009–546 (1996), authorized the Attorney General to grant temporary protected status in the United States to eligible nationals of designated foreign states. It authorized the Attorney General, after consultation with appropriate agencies, to designate a state (or any part thereof) after finding that (1) there was an ongoing armed conflict within the state (or part thereof) that would pose a serious threat to the safety of nationals returned there; (2) the state had requested designation after an environmental disaster resulting in a substantial, but temporary, disruption of living conditions that rendered the state temporarily unable to handle the return of its nationals; or (3) there were other extraordinary and temporary conditions in the state that prevented nationals from returning in safety, unless permitting the aliens to remain temporarily would be contrary to the national interests of the United States. Section 304(b)(1) of the Miscellaneous and Technical Immigration and Naturalization Amendments of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102–232, 105 Stat. 1733 (1992) extended eligibility for temporary protected status to a person with no nationality if he or she last habitually resided in a designated state.

The Attorney General exercised the authority to grant temporary protected status on a number of occasions from 1991 through 1999.

(1) Armed conflict and civil strife

(i) Lebanon

Attorney General Dick Thornburgh designated Lebanon under § 244A effective March 17, 1991 through March 22, 1992, based on his findings that (a) there was an ongoing armed conflict in Lebanon and requiring the return of nationals of Lebanon would pose a serious threat to their personal safety, and (b) there were extraordinary and temporary conditions in Lebanon that prevented Lebanese nationals from returning in safety and permitting Lebanese nationals to remain temporarily in the United States was not contrary to the national interest of the United States. 56 Fed. Reg. 12,746 (Mar. 27, 1991), excerpted below.

* * * *

By the authority vested in me under section 244A of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as amended, and as Attorney General, I find that (a) There is an ongoing armed conflict within Lebanon and, due to such conflict, requiring the return of aliens who are nationals of Lebanon to that state would pose a serious threat to their personal safety and (b) there exist extraordinary and temporary conditions in Lebanon that prevent aliens who are nationals of Lebanon from returning to Lebanon in safety and permitting nationals of Lebanon to remain temporarily in the United States is not contrary to the national interest of the United States. Accordingly, it is ordered as follows:

(1) Lebanon is designated under section 244A(b) of the Act and nationals of Lebanon may apply for Temporary Protected Status.
(2) I estimate that there are no more than 27,000 Lebanese nationals, who are currently in nonimmigrant or unlawful status, eligible for Temporary Protected Status.
(3) Except as specifically provided in this notice, applications for Temporary Protected Status submitted by nationals of Lebanon must be filed pursuant to the provisions of 8 CFR part 240.
(4) Any alien who is a national of Lebanon and has been continuously physically present and has continuously resided in the United States since March 27, 1991, may apply for Temporary Protected Status within the 12-month period of designation from March 27, 1991, to March 27, 1992.

The designation was extended, 57 Fed. Reg. 2931 (Jan. 24, 1992), and was terminated in 1993, 58 Fed. Reg. 7582 (Feb. 8, 1993), as excerpted below.

* * * *

By the authority vested in me as Attorney General under section 244A of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and pursuant to sections 244A(b)(3)(A) and (C) of the Act, I find, after consultation with the appropriate agencies of the United States Government, that the extraordinary and temporary conditions found to exist in Lebanon on March 21, 1991, and on January 20, 1992, are not presently in existence. The United States embassy in Beirut reports that the security situation for Lebanese citizens is steadily improving. The Lebanese government's amnesty law specifically protects Lebanese citizens from prosecution for virtually all actions taken during the war years, and the majority of Lebanese go about their daily activity without hindrance. While the few persons who might still encounter difficulties in Lebanon due to their affiliations could apply for asylum, we believe that Temporary Protected Status is no longer appropriate for Lebanese citizens in general.

(ii) Liberia

Attorney General Thornburgh designated Liberia under § 244A effective March 27, 1991, 56 Fed. Reg. 12,746 (Mar. 27, 1991) based on his findings that (a) there was an ongoing armed conflict in Liberia and requiring the return of nationals of Liberia would pose a serious threat to their personal safety, and (b) there were extraordinary and temporary conditions in Liberia that prevented Liberian nationals from returning in safety and permitting Liberian nationals to remain temporarily in the United States was not contrary to the national interest of the United States. The designation was extended and renewed until July 1998, when Attorney General Janet Reno terminated the designation. With the recurrence of armed conflict in Liberia, Attorney General Reno redesignated Liberia in September 1998, a designation that was terminated in September 1999. 57 Fed. Reg. 2932 (Jan. 24, 1992)

(extension); 58 Fed. Reg. 7898 (Feb. 10, 1993) (extension); 59 Fed. Reg. 9997 (Mar. 2, 1994) (extension); 60 Fed. Reg. 16,163 (Mar. 29, 1995) (extension); 61 Fed. Reg. 8076 (Mar. 1, 1996) (extension); 62 Fed. Reg. 16,608 (Apr. 7, 1997) (extension and redesignation); 63 Fed. Reg. 15,437 (Mar. 31, 1998) (termination of designation); 63 Fed. Reg. 51,958 (Sept. 29, 1998) (redesignation); 64 Fed. Reg. 41,463 (July 30, 1999) (termination of designation). The Federal Register notice of final termination is excerpted below.

On September 29, 1998, the Attorney General published a notice re-designating Liberia for TPS for a period of one year, based upon conditions in Liberia at that time. 63 FR 51958 (Sept. 29, 1998). That TPS designation is scheduled to expire on September 28, 1999.

Based upon a more recent review of conditions within Liberia by the Departments of Justice and State, the Attorney General finds that conditions no longer support a TPS designation. A Department of State memorandum concerning Liberia states that "[t]he divisive civil war in Liberia which began in 1990 ended with the Abuja Peace Accords in 1996. Since 1997, the country in general has not experienced ongoing armed conflict. In September 1998, violence erupted suddenly in Monrovia.* * * Since then, however, no further general conflict has occurred." The memorandum also states that "Although conditions in Liberia remain difficult, the overall situation is not sufficiently adverse to prevent most Liberian nationals in the U.S. from returning to Liberia in safety." It concludes, "The Department of State finds that sufficient grounds to recommend a further extension of TPS for Liberia do not exist. We therefore recommend that TPS for Liberia be terminated on its current expiration date of September 28, 1999."

Based on these findings, the Attorney General has decided to terminate the designation of Liberia for TPS.

(iii) Other countries

Somalia was designated as to its nationals based on "extraordinary and temporary conditions in Somalia" on September 16, 1991. 56 Fed. Reg. 46,804 (Sept. 16, 1991). The designation was extended annually through the 1990s. 57 Fed. Reg. 32,232 (July 21, 1992); 58 Fed. Reg. 48,898 (Sept. 20, 1993); 59 Fed. Reg. 43,359 (Aug. 23, 1994); 60 Fed. Reg. 39,005 (July 31, 1995); 61 Fed. Reg. 39,472 (July 29, 1996); 62 Fed. Reg. 41,421 (Aug. 1, 1997); 63 Fed. Reg. 51,602 (Sept. 28, 1998); 64 Fed. Reg. 49,511 (Sept. 13, 1999).

Bosnia-Herzegovina was designated on August 10, 1992, as to its nationals and "stateless nationals who last habitually resided in Bosnia-Hercegovina," based on armed conflict. 57 Fed. Reg. 35,604 (Aug. 10, 1992). The designation was extended yearly through the 1990s. 58 Fed. Reg. 40,676 (July 29, 1993); 59 Fed. Reg. 36,219 (July 15, 1994); 60 Fed. Reg. 39,004 (July 31, 1995); 61 Fed. Reg. 39,471 (July 29, 1996); 62 Fed. Reg. 41,420 (Aug. 1, 1997); 63 Fed. Reg. 45,092 (Aug. 24, 1998); 64 Fed. Reg. 43,720 (Aug. 11, 1999).

Rwanda (June 7, 1994), Burundi (November 4, 1997), Sierra Leone (November 4, 1997), and Sudan (November 4, 1997) were also designated as to nationals and stateless aliens last habitually residing in those countries based on armed conflict.

— For Rwanda, see 59 Fed. Reg. 29,440 (June 7, 1994). The designation was extended several times until Attorney General Reno terminated it in June 1997. 60 Fed. Reg. 27,790 (May 25, 1995) (extension); 61 Fed. Reg. 29,428 (June 10, 1996) (extension); 61 Fed. Reg. 58,425 (Nov. 14, 1996) (extension); 62 Fed. Reg. 33,442 (June 19, 1997) (termination).

— For Burundi, see 62 Fed. Reg. 59,735 (Nov. 4, 1997); extended 63 Fed. Reg. 59,334 (Nov. 3, 1998); extended and redesignated in November 1999, 64 Fed. Reg. 61,123 (Nov. 9, 1999).

— For Sierra Leone, see 62 Fed. Reg. 59,736; extended 63 Fed. Reg. 59,336 (Nov. 3, 1998); extended and redesignated in November 1999, 64 Fed. Reg. 61,125 (Nov. 9, 1999).

— For Sudan, see 62 Fed. Reg. 59,737 (Nov. 4, 1997); extended 63 Fed. Reg. 59,337 (Nov. 3, 1998), extended and redesignated in November 1999, 64 Fed. Reg. 61,128 (Nov. 9, 1999).

Guinea-Bissau was designated as to its nationals and stateless aliens habitually resident therein based on civil strife in the country, effective March 11, 1999. 64 Fed. Reg. 12,181 (Mar. 11, 1999).

(2) Natural disasters

Starting in July 1995, the 10-square-kilometer island nation of Montserrat was endangered by an active volcano. The volcano's eruptions forced the evacuation of more than half the island, closed the airport, stopped most seaport activity and destroyed three-fourths of the infrastructure of the island. On August 26, 1997, Attorney General Janet Reno designated Montserrat under § 244 based on her findings that (a) there had been an environmental disaster in Montserrat resulting in a substantial, but temporary, disruption of living conditions, (b) the government of Montserrat officially had requested designation, and (c) there were extraordinary and temporary conditions in Montserrat that prevented nationals of Montserrat (and stateless aliens who last habitually lived in Montserrat) from returning to Montserrat in safety. 62 Fed. Reg. 45,685 (Aug. 28, 1997). Eligibility for temporary protected status was granted to nationals of Montserrat (and aliens having no nationality who last habitually resided in Montserrat) who had been "continuously physically present" in the United States since August 28, 1997 and who had "continuously resided in the United States" since August 22, 1997. Effective August 28, 1998, Attorney General Reno extended the designation for a year, 63 Fed. Reg. 45,864 (Aug. 27, 1998), and effective August 28, 1999, she extended the designation through August 27, 2000. 64 Fed. Reg. 48,190 (Sept. 2, 1999).

After Hurricane Mitch swept through Central America, causing severe flooding and associated damage, Attorney General Janet Reno designated Honduras and Nicaragua under § 244 effective January 5, 1999 until July 5, 2000. She found that, due to the environmental disaster and substantial disruption of living conditions caused by Hurricane Mitch, each country was unable, temporarily, to handle adequately the return of its nationals. 64 Fed. Reg. 524, 526 (Jan. 5, 1999).

(3) Province of Kosovo in the Republic of Serbia in the State of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia-Montenegro)

Marking the first time that the Attorney General had designated a portion of a country under § 244, Attorney General Reno designated the Province of Kosovo effective June 9, 1998, 63 Fed. Reg. 31,527 (June 9, 1998), as excerpted below.

Background

Based on a thorough review by the Departments of State and Justice of all available evidence, the Attorney General finds that there is an on-going armed conflict in the Province of Kosovo in the Republic of Serbia in the state of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia-Montenegro) (hereafter "Kosovo Province") and that, due to such conflict, requiring the return of nationals of Serbia-Montenegro to Kosovo Province would pose a serious threat to their personal safety.

Kosovar Albanians constitute approximately 90 percent of the 2 million people in the Province of Kosovo in Serbia-Montenegro, a country governed by a Serb-majority government. Tensions have been particularly high since the government's 1989 revocation of Kosovo's political autonomy. In March 1998, the Serb government crackdown left approximately 90 Kosovar Albanians dead, including non-combatants and children. Although the fighting has subsided, protests continue and the Serb government has shown limited cooperation with the international community's calls for dialogue concerning the killings.

An extension and redesignation went into effect on June 8, 1999, 64 Fed. Reg. 30,542 (June 8, 1999), excerpted below.

* * * *

Due to the recent events in Kosovo Province and surrounding areas of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Attorney General and the Department of State have reexamined conditions in Kosovo Province. A recent Department of State report on conditions in that region found that, "[g]iven the state of open war in Kosovo, the ongoing NATO air strikes in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (including Kosovo), and no indication of peaceful resolution, a resident of Kosovo now in the United States could not possibly return to Kosovo without incurring an extremely serious threat to his or her personal safety." Based on these and other findings, the Attorney General has determined that conditions in Kosovo Province have worsened since the initial designation and, as a result, has decided to extend and redesignate Kosovo Province under the TPS program. This will extend availability of TPS to include eligible nationals of Kosovo Province (and aliens having no nationality who last habitually resided in Kosovo Province) who arrived in the United States after the date of initial designation.

b. Related statutory relief

(1) The Chinese Student Protection Act of 1992

On October 9, 1992, President George H. W. Bush signed into law the Chinese Student Protection Act of 1992, Pub. L. No. 102–404, 106 Stat. 1969 (1992). The Act enabled many of the Chinese nationals who had been granted deferred enforced departure following the brutal suppression by armed forces of the government of the People's Republic of China ("PRC") in June 1989 of Chinese student dissidents who participated in the Tiananmen Square demonstrations (see Digest 1989–90 at 54–57) to regularize their status and remain in the United States permanently.

The Act permitted Chinese nationals who had resided continuously in the United States since April 11, 1990, (other than for brief, casual and innocent absences) and who were not physically present in the People's Republic of China for longer than 90 days after that date and before the date of enactment to apply for lawful permanent residence without being subject to a number of the usual restrictions on adjustment of status, such as certain grounds of inadmissibility.

(2) The Nicaraguan Adjustment and Central American Relief Act of 1997

The Nicaraguan Adjustment and Central American Relief Act of 1997, enacted into law on November 19, 1997, as title II (§§ 201–204) of the District of Columbia Appropriations Act of 1998, Pub. L. No. 105–100, 111 Stat. 2160 (1997), provided aliens of certain nationalities with the opportunity to apply for relief from removal. Section 202 allowed nationals of Nicaragua and Cuba who had been physically present in the United States continuously since December 1, 1995, as well as their spouses, children and unmarried sons and daughters, to apply for adjustment of status to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence provided they did so by April 1, 2000. Certain usual restrictions on adjustment of status, such as the availability of visa numbers and the application of certain grounds of inadmissibility, did not apply to such adjustments.

Section 203 of the Act exempted specified groups of aliens from the stricter "continuous presence" rules for the remedies of "suspension of deportation" and "cancellation of removal" that had been established by § 309(c)(5) of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, (see C.2.b. supra). The exempted groups included aliens who were not apprehended at the time of entry after December 19, 1990, and who were: (1) Salvadorans who entered the United States on or before September 19, 1990, and who, on or before October 31, 1991, either registered for benefits under the settlement agreement in American Baptist Churches v. Thornburgh, 760 F. Supp. 796 (N.D. Cal. 1991) (for a discussion of the settlement agreement, see Digest 1989–90 at 40–42) or applied for Temporary Protected Status under § 244A of the INA (for a discussion of § 244A see section D.5.b. supra; Digest 1989–90 at 39–40); (2) Guatemalans who entered the United States on or before October 1, 1990, and registered for benefits under the American Baptist Churches settlement on or before December 31, 1991; (3) Salvadorans and Guatemalans who applied for asylum on or before April 1, 1990; (4) the spouses or children of aliens in the preceding three categories at the time the alien's application for relief was approved; (5) the adult, unmarried sons or daughters of such aliens if they entered the United States on or before October 1, 1990; and (6) nationals of the Soviet Union (or any of its successor republics), Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania, Poland, Czechoslovakia (or its successor republics), Romania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Albania, East Germany, or Yugoslavia (or its successor republics) who entered the United States on or before December 31, 1990, and applied for asylum on or before December 31, 1991.

(3) The Haitian Refugee Immigration Fairness Act of 1998

The Haitian Refugee Immigration Fairness Act of 1998 ("HRIFA"), Title IX (§§ 901–904) of Division A of the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1999, Pub. L. No. 105–277, 112 Stat. 2681–538 (1998), allowed certain Haitians to apply for adjustment of status to that of lawful permanent resident provided they did so before April 1, 2000. Eligible Haitians were those present in the United States on December 31, 1995, and who were continuously present in the United States from that date through the date their adjustment petition was filed and who: (1) filed for asylum on or before December 31, 1995; (2) were paroled into the U.S. on or before December 31, 1995, after being identified as having a credible fear of persecution or for emergency reasons or reasons deemed strictly in the public interest; or (3) were children who (a) arrived in the U.S. without parents and had remained without parents while in the U.S., (b) became orphaned subsequent to arrival in the U.S., or (c) were abandoned by parents or guardians prior to April 1, 1998, and remained abandoned. With respect to such Haitians, HRIFA lifted a number of the restrictions usually applicable to adjustment of status. HRIFA applicants were not, for example, required to have been inspected and admitted or paroled into the United States; were not subject to the bars to adjustment contained in section 245(c) of the Immigration and Naturalization Act ("INA"), 8 U.S.C. § 1255(c); were not subject to the immigrant visa preference quotas; did not need to demonstrate they were not inadmissible under certain provisions of section 212(a) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a); and were not barred from filing applications for adjustment of status while in exclusion or removal proceedings.

Consular and Judicial Assistance and Related Issues

A. CONSULAR NOTIFICATION, ACCESS AND ASSISTANCE

1. Consular Notification and Access

In the early 1990s U.S. compliance with consular information and notification requirements under Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations ("the VCCR"), April 24, 1963, 21 U.S.T. 77 (entered into force for the United States December 24, 1969), particularly in death penalty cases, became a frequent subject of bilateral discussions and an increasingly litigated issue in criminal cases in the U.S. and before international commissions and courts. Foreign nationals in the United States facing or convicted of criminal charges—and sometimes their consular authorities on their behalf— began seeking to suppress evidence or to overturn convictions based on alleged failures of officials in the United States to inform detainees of their right to consular notification and/or to notify their consulates without delay as required by Article 36.

Article 36 of the VCCR provides:

> COMMUNICATION AND CONTACT WITH NATIONALS OF THE SENDING STATE
> 1. With a view to facilitating the exercise of consular functions relating to nationals of the sending State:

> (a) consular officers shall be free to communicate with nationals of the sending State and to have access to them. Nationals of the sending State shall have the same freedom with respect to communication with and access to consular officers of the sending State;
> (b) if he so requests, the competent authorities of the receiving State shall, without delay, inform the consular post of the sending State if, within its consular district, a national of that State is arrested or committed to prison or to custody pending trial or is detained in any other manner. Any communication addressed to the consular post by the person arrested, in prison, custody or detention shall also be forwarded by the said authorities without delay. The said authorities shall inform the person concerned without delay of his rights under this subparagraph.
> (c) consular officers shall have the right to visit a national of the sending State who is in prison, custody or detention, to converse and correspond with him and to arrange for his legal representation. They shall also have the right to visit any national of the sending State who is in prison, custody or detention in their district in pursuance of a judgment. Nevertheless, consular officers shall refrain from taking action on behalf of a national who is in prison, custody or detention if he expressly opposes such action.

a. U.S. court consideration of alleged violations of consular notification

With a few exceptions, in cases decided between 1991 and 1999, U.S. courts rejected attempts to obtain suppression of confessions, new trials, or new sentencing hearings based on alleged failures to inform a foreign national without delay that he could have his consular officer notified of his detention, as required by Article 36(1)(b) of the VCCR. Courts found the claims unavailing on a number of grounds, including that the defendant failed to raise the claim at trial (the procedural default doctrine), that the VCCR did not create individual rights, that any individual rights created by the VCCR were not "fundamental," that the defendant failed to show prejudice and/or that the claim was barred by the Eleventh Amendment of the U.S. Constitution (which prohibits suits against a state by citizens of another state or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state).

For example, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit on April 10, 1996, refused to overturn the conviction of a Canadian citizen, Stanley Faulder, who was twice convicted and sentenced to death in Texas for the murder of an elderly widow. The State of Texas admitted that it had not complied with the consular notification requirements of Article 36, paragraph 1(b) of the VCCR. The Fifth Circuit held: "[w]hile we in no way approve of Texas' failure to advise Faulder, the evidence that would have been obtained by the Canadian authorities is merely the same as or cumulative of evidence defense counsel had or could have obtained," and Faulder therefore was not prejudiced. Faulder v. Johnson, 81 F.3d 515, 520 (5th Cir. 1996). For discussion of diplomatic communications between the United States and Canada and U.S. Department of State actions in the Faulder case, see 1.c.(2)(i) below.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit on June 19, 1997, affirmed a decision of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia to deny a petition for federal habeas corpus relief in a case involving a Mexican national defendant where Article 36, paragraph 1(b) of the VCCR allegedly had been violated. Murphy v. Netherland, 116 F.3d 97 (4th Cir. 1997). The defendant pled guilty and was sentenced to death in Virginia state court for murder-for-hire and conspiracy to commit capital murder. Defendant's federal habeas corpus petition claimed that the failure to inform him of his right to contact the Mexican consulate made his conviction and sentence constitutionally invalid. The district court rejected the petition because his VCCR claim had not been raised in state court. On appeal, in addition to finding no justification for the defendant's failure to raise the VCCR claim in state court, the court of appeals held defendant could not make the "substantial showing of the denial of a constitutional right" required under the federal habeas corpus statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2253, to appeal the denial of his petition. The court of appeals reasoned that, even assuming the VCCR created individual rights as opposed to setting out the rights and obligations of States Parties, it did not create constitutional rights. Although states of the United States had an obligation under the Supremacy Clause to comply with the provisions of the VCCR, the Supremacy Clause did not convert violations of treaty provisions into violations of constitutional rights. Finally, the court of appeals found that Murphy had failed to establish prejudice from the alleged VCCR violation because he could not explain how contacting the Mexican consulate would have changed either his guilty plea or his sentence. United States and Mexican diplomatic exchanges in the Murphy case are discussed in 1.c.(2)(iv) below.

In United Mexican States v. Woods, 126 F.3d 1220 (9th Cir. 1997), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit dismissed an action brought by Mexico, the Legal Advisor of the Secretary of Foreign Relations of Mexico, and the Consul General of Mexico in the State of Arizona, to enjoin execution of a Mexican national, Ramon Martinez Villareal. Mexico and its officials alleged that Arizona officials had failed to notify Martinez Villareal of his consular notification rights in violation of the VCCR and the U.S.-Mexico bilateral consular convention, had denied Mexico a meaningful opportunity to assist him under the two treaties, and had failed to ensure that he had competent counsel. They further contended that he was retarded and his execution would violate the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Dec. 19, 1966, 999 U.N.T.S. 171, as well as customary international law. The Ninth Circuit held that the Arizona officials were immune from suit under the Eleventh Amendment. Martinez Villareal's petition to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights is discussed in section 1.d.(1)(ii) below.

In Breard v. Greene, 523 U.S. 371 (1998), the U.S. Supreme Court by a 5–4 majority declined to review the conviction of Angel Francisco Breard, a Paraguayan national, for murder, or to stay his execution based on noncompliance with the consular notification provisions of the VCCR and a provisional measures order from the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") indicating that the United States "should take all measures at its disposal to ensure that Angel Francisco Breard is not executed pending the final decision" of the ICJ in a suit filed by Paraguay against the United States. The Supreme Court concluded that the VCCR claim was procedurally barred and resolved a number of other issues against review. For further discussion of the domestic court and ICJ litigation in the Breard case, see section 1.d.(2)(i) below.

A 1999 decision by a panel of the Ninth Circuit holding that Article 36, paragraph 1(b), created individual rights that could be enforced in U.S. courts by foreign national defendants and that incriminating statements made before a defendant was informed of those rights should be suppressed if the defendant could show prejudice from the failure to inform was reversed in 2000 by the Ninth Circuit sitting en banc. United States v. Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F.3d 882, 885–888 (9th Cir. 2000). See discussion in Digest 2000 at 23–46.

In United States v. Hongla-Yamche, 55 F. Supp. 2d 74 (D. Mass. 1999), a lawful permanent resident who was a national of Cameroon was charged with violation of the Endangered Species Act when customs agents discovered and seized ivory figurines in his luggage during a secondary inspection. He argued that the evidence against him was obtained in violation of Article 36, paragraph 1(b), of the VCCR because he had not been informed of his consular notification rights, and asked that either the complaint be dismissed or the evidence be suppressed. While the district court agreed with defendant's assertion that Article 36, paragraph 1(b), granted individual rights, it found that the defendant was not "detained" within the meaning of that paragraph. The secondary inspection did not cross the line into custodial interrogation, the questioning was straightforward and not coercive, no events caused heightened suspicion, and the duration of examination was only approximately an hour.

In Federal Republic of Germany v. United States, 526 U.S. 111 (1999), the U.S. Supreme Court by a 5–4 majority declined to exercise its original jurisdiction over a suit by the Federal Republic of Germany seeking to enforce a provisional measures order of the ICJ indicating that the United States "should take all measures at its disposal to ensure that" a German national, Walter LaGrand, "is not executed pending the final decision" of the ICJ in a case brought by Germany against the United States based on an alleged failure to inform Walter LaGrand of his consular notification rights. The Court stated:

> With regard to the action against the United States, which relies on the ex parte order of the International Court of Justice, there are imposing threshold barriers. First, it appears that the United States has not waived its sovereign immunity. Second, it is doubtful that Art. III, § 2. cl. 2 provides an anchor for an action to prevent execution of a German citizen who is not an ambassador or consul. With respect to the action against the State of Arizona, as in Breard v. Greene, 523 U.S. 371 . . . (1998), a foreign government's ability here to assert a claim against a State is without evident support in the Vienna Convention and in probable contravention of Eleventh Amendment principles. This action was filed within only two hours of a scheduled execution that was ordered on January 15, 1999, based upon a sentence imposed by Arizona in 1984, about which the Federal Republic of Germany learned in 1992. Given the tardiness of the pleas and the jurisdictional barriers they implicate, we decline to exercise our original jurisdiction.

In State v. Reyes, 1999 WL 743598 (Del. Super. Ct. Aug. 17, 1999), the Superior Court of Delaware suppressed the statement of a Guatemalan defendant who had shot and killed another man, but claimed he acted in self defense. The State conceded the defendant had not been notified of his consular notification rights before he made incriminating statements. The court made a specific finding of prejudice in fact and concluded that suppression of the statement was an appropriate remedy, but noted that it was not holding that a violation of the VCCR is "prejudice per se."

—Waldron v. INS, 17 F.3d 511 (2d Cir. 1994) (INS failure to follow its own regulations concerning mandatory consular notification did not justify remand in deportation case because Article 36 rights were not fundamental rights derived from the constitution or federal statutes and the Nigerian national did not claim or demonstrate that the failure to notify prejudiced him in his preparation of a defense to the deportation charges);

—Villafuerte v. Stewart, 142 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 1998) (Article 36 claim procedurally defaulted in state court was not "a new rule of constitutional law made retroactive to cases on collateral review by the Supreme Court, that was previously unavailable" and therefore was not cognizable as a federal habeas claim under 28 U.S.C. § 2244);

—United States v. Maldonado-Vences, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 32637 (4th Cir. Dec. 31, 1998) (failure of arresting authorities to comply with Article 36 did not constitute "plain error" justifying reversal of Mexican national's conviction for illegal re-entry into the United States, because voluntary guilty plea waived prior nonjurisdictional defects, there was no denial of constitutional rights, and the Mexican national failed to show prejudice);

Dec. 31, 1998) (district court properly denied motion to suppress use of heroin as evidence on ground arresting officers did not comply with Article 36 because national of Dominican Republic failed to show how failure could have affected the outcome of his case);

—United States v. Ademaj, 170 F.3d 58 (1st Cir. 1999) (failure to give consular information to an Albanian national did not constitute "plain error" where issue was not raised before trial court and defendant provided no evidence that the Albanian Consul could have assisted in his defense or that any material due process right was infringed by the failure to notify the Consul);
—United States v. Doe, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 21400 (4th Cir. Sept. 7, 1999) (defendant did not meet burden of showing she was prejudiced by the Government's failure to notify her of her rights under Article 36);

Esparza-Ponce*, 193 F.3d 1133 (9th Cir. 1999) (motion to suppress incriminating post-arrest statements based on alleged Article 36 violations was properly denied where Mexican national failed to demonstrate or even allege that he would have contacted the Mexican consul if he had been informed of his right to do so, that the consul would have done anything to help him, and, if the consul had, that it would have been something that his attorney had not already done);
—United States v. Ediale, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 28477 (4th Cir. Nov. 2, 1999) (judgment denying motion to suppress was affirmed where defendant failed to demonstrate how assistance from consul would have affected the outcome of his trial); —United States v. Juarez-Yepez, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 30604 (9th Cir. Nov. 22, 1999) (post arrest statement would not be suppressed on basis of alleged Article 36 violation in absence of showing of prejudice);

Cal. 1999), aff'd 230 F.3d 1368 (9th Cir. 2000) (foreign national defendant who was advised of Miranda rights and waived them could not establish prejudice based on INS agents' failure to advise of right to consular notification before interrogation);

Supp. 2d 236 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (assuming but not deciding that Egyptian defendant in 1993 World Trade Center bombing case had standing to bring an Article 36 VCCR claim, suppression of post-arrest statements would not be an appropriate remedy where no constitutional violation and defendant could not demonstrate prejudice because Egyptian officials turned him over to U.S. authorities in Egypt and therefore knew of his detention);

—United States v. Torres-Del Muro, 58 F. Supp. 2d 931 (C.D. Ill. 1999) (exclusion of incriminating statements not available remedy for Article 36 violation because it was not a constitutional violation); —United States v. Miranda, 65 F. Supp. 2d 1002 (D. Minn. 1999) (two-day delay between arrest and advice of Convention rights violated Article 36, paragraph 1(b), but defendant was not prejudiced because he failed to contact the consulate when advised of his rights and did not demonstrate how contact with the consulate might have prevented him from making the statements he sought to exclude);

—United States v. Rodrigues, 68 F. Supp. 2d 178 (E.D.N.Y. 1999) (suppression of incriminating post-arrest statements did not constitute showing of prejudice because defendant was fully informed of his constitutional right to remain silent and to have an attorney and waived those rights and there was no evidence that Guyanese consulate in New York regularly provided any assistance at all to its citizens who were arrested, and the VCCR did not prohibit questioning of a foreign national awaiting consular contact; suppression of statements was not an appropriate remedy for violation of Article 36, paragraph 1(b) because it was not a constitutional violation, and all VCCR parties remedied breach through traditional diplomatic and not judicial channels);

—United States v. Carrillo, 70 F. Supp. 2d 854 (N.D. Ill. 1999) (even if Mexican nationals had standing to raise alleged violations of Article 36 of the VCCR and showed prejudice, neither dismissal of their indictments for drug-related offense nor suppression of cocaine seized from their vehicle were available remedies);

—United States v. Briscoe, 69 F. Supp. 2d 738 (D.V.I. 1999) (Jamaican defendant had standing to raise Article 36 violation, but did not meet burden of establishing prejudice—producing evidence that (1) he did not know of his right, (2) he would have availed himself of the right and (3) there was a likelihood that the contact with the consul would have resulted in assistance to him—when he said he would have asked consular officers whether he should make a statement but where no showing of how the consular officer's assistance would have added or varied from the assistance of an attorney, which he had voluntarily waived);

—United States v. Martinez-Villalva, 80 F. Supp. 2d 1152 (D. Colo. 1999) (district court would not suppress incriminating statement defendant made about his illegal reentry to the United States to Immigration and Naturalization Service because INS was independently aware of his previous deportation order and defendant therefore could not establish prejudice);

—State v. Loza, 1997 Ohio App. LEXIS 4574 (Ohio Ct. App. Oct 13, 1997) (defendant sentenced to death for multiple murders was not entitled to post-conviction relief for alleged violation of Article 36, paragraph 1(b) because the rights violated were not of constitutional dimension);

—Cardona v. State, 973 S.W.2d 412 (Tex. App. 1998) (trial court's refusal to suppress statement because Mexican defendant was not informed of his right of access to his consulate was not reversible error when consulate was notified within hours of his arrest and probable impact of statement on jury was negligible);

—Kasi v. Commonwealth, 508 S.E.2d 57 (Va. 1998) (Article 36 does not create any legally enforceable individual rights, but, in any event, VCCR did not require defendant, who was seized in Pakistan and brought back to the United States, to be informed of his consular notification rights when he was arrested in Pakistan and turned over to Pakistani authorities, and once defendant returned to the United States, the prosecutor informed the defense of his right to contact the Pakistani consulate); —Melendez v. State, 4 S.W.3d 437 (Tex. App. 1999) (alleged failure to comply with Article 36, paragraph 1(b) did not invalidate juvenile court's transfer of defendant to criminal court because it was not settled that an individual had standing to raise violations of Article 36, consular assistance under Article 36 is subject to the practices and procedures of the receiving State, and although defendant was born in El Salvador, there was no evidence in the record that he was not a U.S. citizen);

—Flores v. State, 994 P.2d 782 (Okla. Crim. App. 1999) (Mexican national was not prejudiced by failure to inform him of Article 36 rights when he voluntarily waived his Miranda rights, signed a search warrant for his apartment, and presented no evidence that he would have been granted greater protection or would have acted differently had he been so informed).

b. Department of State guidance on consular notification and access for federal, state, and local law enforcement and other officials

In January 1998 the Department of State released a new 72-page document, Publication 10518, Consular Notification and Access: Instructions for Federal, State, and Local Law Enforcement and Other Officials Regarding Foreign Nationals in the United States and the Rights of Consular Officials to Assist Them. Prepared by the Office of the Legal Adviser in booklet format, the manual contained "instructions and guidance relating to the arrest and detention of foreign nationals, deaths of foreign nationals, the appointment of guardians for minors or incompetent adults who are foreign nationals, and related issues pertaining to the provision of consular services to foreign nationals in the United States." The foreword pointed out that cooperation of federal, state and local law enforcement agencies in ensuring treatment of foreign nationals in accordance with the instructions not only would permit the United States to comply with its consular legal obligations domestically, but also would help ensure that the United States could insist upon "rigorous compliance by foreign governments with respect to United States citizens abroad."

Part One of the booklet, Basic Instructions, summarized consular notification and access requirements pertaining to foreign nationals under the VCCR and bilateral consular agreements. Part Two provided more detailed instructions; Part Three covered frequently asked questions; Part Four supplied translations of suggested statements in 13 languages; Part Five provided relevant legal overview and provisions; and Part Six listed phone and fax numbers for foreign embassies and consulates in the United States.

Parts One and Two are excerpted below. The full text of the publication is available at www.state.gov/www/global/legal_affairs/ca_notification/introduction.html.

Part One

* * * *

1. When foreign nationals are arrested or detained, they must be advised of the right to have their consular officials notified.
2. In some cases, the nearest consular officials must be notified of the arrest or detention of a foreign national, regardless of the national's wishes.
3. Consular officials are entitled to access to their nationals in detention, and are entitled to provide consular assistance.
4. When a government official becomes aware of the death of a foreign national, consular officials must be notified.
5. When a guardianship or trusteeship is being considered with respect to a foreign national who is a minor or incompetent, consular officials must be notified.
6. When a foreign ship or aircraft wrecks or crashes, consular officials must be notified.

These are mutual obligations that also pertain to American citizens abroad. In general, you should treat a foreign national as you would want an American citizen to be treated in a similar situation in a foreign country. This means prompt, courteous notification to the foreign national of the possibility of consular assistance, and prompt, courteous notification to the foreign national's nearest consular officials so that they can provide whatever consular services they deem appropriate.

* * * *

The instructions in this booklet are based on international legal obligations designed to ensure that governments can assist their nationals who travel abroad. While these obligations are in part matters of "customary international law," most of them are set forth in the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations ("VCCR"), and some are contained in bilateral agreements, conventions, or treaties (i.e., agreements between the United States and just one other country). The agreements discussed herein have the status of treaties for purposes of international law and Article VI, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States ("all treaties made . . . shall be the supreme law of the land"). They are binding on federal, state, and local government officials to the extent that they pertain to matters within such officials' competence.

These instructions focus primarily on providing consular notification and access with respect to foreign nationals arrested or detained in the United States, so that their governments can assist them. The obligations of consular notification and access apply to United States citizens in foreign countries just as they apply to foreign nationals in the United States. When U.S. citizens are arrested or detained abroad, the United States Department of State seeks to ensure that they are treated in a manner consistent with these instructions, and that U.S. consular officers can similarly assist them. It is therefore particularly important that federal, state, and local government officials in the United States comply with these obligations with respect to foreign nationals here.

These instructions also discuss obligations relating to deaths of foreign nationals, to the appointment of guardians for foreign nationals who may be minors or incompetent adults, and to foreign aircraft or ship wrecks. Like the obligations of consular notification and access, these are mutual obligations that also apply abroad.

Arrests and Detentions of Foreign Nationals

Whenever a foreign national is arrested or detained in the United States, there are legal requirements to ensure that the foreign national's government can offer him/her appropriate consular assistance. In all cases, the foreign national must be told of the right of consular notification and access. In most cases, the foreign national then has the option to decide whether to have consular representatives notified of the arrest or detention. In other cases, however, the foreign national's consular officials must be notified of an arrest and/or detention regardless of the foreign national's wishes. Whenever a foreign national is taken into custody, the detaining official should determine whether consular notification is at the option of the foreign national or whether it is mandatory. A list of all embassies and consulates in the United States, with their telephone and facsimile numbers, is included in this booklet to facilitate the provision of notification by detaining officials to consular officials when required.

Notification at the Foreign National's Option

In all cases, the foreign national must be told of the right of consular notification and access. The foreign national then has the option to decide whether he/she wants consular representatives notified of the arrest or detention, unless the foreign national is from a "mandatory notification" country. The mandatory notification countries are listed on page 5 and in Part Five of this booklet.

If the detained foreign national is a national of a country not on the mandatory notification list, the requirement is that the foreign national be informed without delay of the option to have his/her government's consular representatives notified of the detention. If the detainee requests notification, a responsible detaining official must ensure that notification is given to the nearest consulate or embassy of the detainee's country without delay.

Mandatory Notification

In some cases, "mandatory notification" must be made to the nearest consulate or embassy "without delay," "immediately," or within the time specified in a bilateral agreement between the United States and a foreign national's country, regardless of whether the foreign national requests such notification. Mandatory notification requirements arise from different bilateral agreements whose terms are not identical. The exact text of the relevant provisions on mandatory notification in our bilateral agreements is reproduced in Part Five of this booklet.

Foreign nationals subject to mandatory notification requirements should otherwise be treated like foreign nationals not subject to the mandatory notification requirement. Thus, for example, the foreign national should be informed that notification has been made and advised that he/she may also specifically request consular assistance from his or her consular officials.

Privacy concerns or the possibility that a foreign national may have a legitimate fear of persecution or other mistreatment by his/her government may exist in some mandatory notification cases. The notification requirement should still be honored, but it is possible to take precautions regarding the disclosure of information. For example, it may not be necessary to provide information about why a foreign national is in detention. Moreover, under no circumstances should any information indicating that a foreign national may have applied for asylum in the United States or elsewhere be disclosed to that person's government. The Department of State can provide more specific guidance in particular cases.

Consular Access to Detained Foreign Nationals

Detained foreign nationals are entitled to communicate with their consular officers. Any communication by a foreign national to his/her consular representative must be forwarded by the appropriate local officials to the consular post without delay.

Foreign consular officers must be given access to their nationals and permitted to communicate with them. Such officers have the right to visit their nationals, to converse and correspond with them, and to arrange for their legal representation. They must refrain from acting on behalf of a foreign national, however, if the national opposes their involvement. In addition, consular officers may not act as attorneys for their nationals.

The rights of consular access and communication generally must be exercised subject to local laws and regulations. For example, consular officers may be required to visit during established visiting hours. Federal, state, and local rules of this nature may not, however, be so restrictive as to defeat the purpose of consular access and communication. Such rules "must enable full effect to be given to the purposes" for which the right of consular assistance has been established.

The above requirements are set out in Article 36 of the VCCR. Additional requirements may apply to particular countries because of bilateral agreements.

c. Bilateral exchanges on consular notification and access

(1) United States-Mexico Memorandum of Understanding on Consular Protection of United States and Mexican Nationals

On May 7, 1996, in the context of the U.S.-Mexico Binational Commission, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Secretary of Foreign Relations Angel Gurria of the United Mexican States concluded the Memorandum of Understanding on Consular Protection of United States and Mexican Nationals ("MOU"). A non-binding statement of principles and goals, the MOU reemphasized the importance of compliance with Article 36, paragraph 1(b) of the VCCR by both countries. In response to Mexico's particular concerns involving the detention of minors, pregnant women and "people at risk" (understood to be people with extremely serious mental or physical problems, or who were charged with crimes that could result in the death penalty), reflected in paragraph 2 of the MOU, the Department of State subsequently wrote to the governors of the fifty states of the United States asking that they encourage law enforcement authorities to consider policies of notifying Mexican consular officials of such cases even when notification would not be required by the VCCR.

The substantive provisions of the MOU appear below. The full text is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United Mexican States, Considering their firm commitment to respect the human rights of all individuals within their respective territories;
Considering their firm will to strengthen and enhance their relationships in all areas, within the spirit of good neighbors and mutual respect;
Considering the need to continue to foster and strengthen the effective relationships and communications among consular officials and local authorities of both countries, within the spirit of the Consular Convention between the two Governments and the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations;
Considering that the Working Group on Migration and Consular Affairs of the Binational Commission has proven to be an effective forum to discuss and exchange information on the migratory phenomenon between the two countries, as well as to agree on measures that serve the interest of both nations;
Considering the will of both Governments to strengthen the Border Liaison Mechanisms and the Consultation Mechanisms on Immigration and Naturalization Service Activities and Consular Protection, which have been recently established for, among other purposes, sharing information concerning migratory practices and procedures by authorities on both sides of the border, and resolving problems at the local level, including issues related to the protection of human rights;
Considering the interest of both Governments in preventing situations that negatively affect the physical safety, dignity and human rights of their nationals within the territory of the other country, and the importance of having adequate institutional mechanisms to effectively address those situations when they might occur,

Adopt the following principles and goals:

1. To include within the mandate of the Working Group on Migration and Consular Affairs of the Binational Commission, the discussion and evaluation of issues, problems and trends related to the consular protection and human rights of nationals of both countries and the understandings expressed in this memorandum as regular matters on its agenda, in order to make recommendations to the respective Governments, if mutually agreed upon.
2. To provide any individual detained by migration authorities with notice of his/her legal rights and options, including the right to contact his/her consular representatives, and to facilitate communication between consular representatives and their nationals. Both Governments will endeavor, consistent with the relevant laws of each country, to ensure that specific notification to consular representatives is given in cases involving the detention of minors, pregnant women and people at risk.
3. To endeavor to provide settings conducive to full and free exchange between the consular representatives and detained individuals in order to allow, consistent with the relevant laws of each country, consular officials to interview their respective nationals when they are detained, arrested, incarcerated or held in custody in accordance with Article VI, paragraph 2, section (c) of the Consular Convention between the United States of America and the United Mexican States of August 12, 1942, and in accordance with Article 36, first paragraph, of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 1963.
4. To allow and to facilitate, consistent with the relevant laws of each country, consular officials to be present at all times at the trials or judicial procedures concerning their respective nationals, including those legal procedures relating to minors.
5. To bring to the attention of the Working Group on Migration and Consular Affairs significant reports concerning consular protection and respect for human rights of nationals of both countries discussed at the Border Liaison Mechanisms and the Consultation Mechanisms on Immigration and Naturalization Service Activities and Consular Protection.

6. To promote bi-cultural sensitivity and understanding related to human rights protection through the Border Liaison Mechanisms and the Consultation Mechanisms on Immigration and Naturalization Service Activities and Consular Protection, and to encourage the participation of local authorities in these entities.
7. To encourage cooperation at the highest levels to facilitate investigation of violent and serious incidents involving consular protection of their respective nationals.

(2) Diplomatic communications and State Department responses in consular notification cases involving the death penalty

The following summarizes a number of cases that arose between 1991 and 1999. Information about the cases was submitted to the ICJ in the Avena case (see Digest 2003 at 43–103) in the Declaration of Ambassador Maura A. Harty regarding U.S. compliance with Article 36(1)(b) of the VCCR (Annex 1 to the U.S. Counter Memorial), filed November 3, 2003.

(i) Joseph Stanley Faulder

As noted in section 1.a, supra, Joseph Stanley Faulder, a Canadian national, was twice convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Texas for a murder committed in 1975. His first conviction and sentence were vacated in 1980, and his second trial was held in 1981. The Canadian Government brought Faulder's case to the attention of the Department of State in 1992. At the Department's request, Texas investigated the consular notification issue and provided a report that was shared with the Canadian Embassy in September 1992. The Canadian Embassy also asked whether the Department would consider supporting Faulder in litigation on its behalf. The United States concluded that it could not represent to a court that a breach of Article 36, paragraph 1(b) required that the defendant be granted remedies in the U.S. criminal justice system.

After years of appeals and several stays of execution, Faulder's date of execution ultimately was set for December 10, 1998. He filed a clemency petition with then Governor George W. Bush of Texas based, in part, on the alleged failure of Texas officials to inform him of his right to have a Canadian official notified of his detention under Article 36(1)(b) of the VCCR.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs of Canada, Lloyd Axworthy, in a letter of November 2, 1998, requested Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to recommend clemency for Faulder. In her reply of November 27, Secretary of State Albright apologized for the failure of consular notification in Faulder's case. While she did not feel the Department of State had an adequate basis to recommend clemency, she indicated that the Department "was concerned that the failure of notification, coupled with the fact that Faulder's name was not included on lists of Canadian prisoners given to the Canadian Consulate General in Dallas, meant that he did not have an opportunity to receive consular assistance, particularly in connection with his second trial." Accordingly, she indicated that she was writing to the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles asking that it give serious consideration to the failure of consular notification in Faulder's case, and to Governor Bush to advise him of the Department's submission to the Board and to encourage him to give serious consideration to the Government of Canada's request for a thirty-day extension.

Secretary Albright's November 27, 1998, letter to Victor Rodriguez, Chairman of the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles, with attachments, is excerpted below. She wrote to Governor Bush on the same day.

On June 16, 1999, the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles voted 18–0 to deny Faulder's request for reprieve or commutation of sentence. He was executed on June 17, 1999.

Secretary Albright's letters to Governor Bush and to Mr. Rodriguez, with attached Observations of the United States Department of State Concerning Consular Notification Issues in the case of Joseph Stanley Faulder, as well as correspondence from Canadian Minister of Foreign Affairs Lloyd Axworthy to Secretary Albright and to the same Texas officials, are available in Memorial of Mexico (Mexico v. United States of America), 2003 I.C.J. (Annex 29) (1 June 20, 2003), at A420–A439.

I am deeply troubled by the failure of consular notification in this case. Texas has conceded that the VCCR's requirement of consular notification was violated. Further, safeguards that the Canadian Government had in place to protect against violations of consular notification requirements failed when Texas omitted Mr. Faulder's name from the lists of prisoners. It is clear that, but for these failures, Canadian consular officials would have visited Mr. Faulder in prison and offered him assistance before his second trial and direct appeals had been completed, when such assistance would have been most critical. Moreover, we are not confident that the purposes of the VCCR were served in Mr. Faulder's case through other mechanisms. We are particularly troubled by the facts that Mr. Faulder's legal counsel has been found by the courts to have been deficient in his handling of the sentencing phase of trial, that no mitigation evidence was presented to the jury in the sentencing phase, and that Mr. Faulder's family was not aware of his situation. These are all areas in which Canadian consular officials might well have taken some action. While the VCCR violation in this case does not create any legal right to relief, we believe that this is a case in which consular notification issues may provide sufficient grounds for according discretionary clemency relief.

We do not have access to all relevant information and cannot take a position on whether Mr. Faulder in fact warrants clemency. We believe, however, that the absence of consular notification and assistance in this case should be a significant relevant factor in your deliberations. I am enclosing for the Board's consideration the observations of the Department of State with respect to the consular issues raised in this case. . . .

We have not previously made such a submission. For example, this case is quite unlike the recently highly publicized case of Angel Breard. We have decided to make a submission here because the breakdown of consular assistance mechanisms in this case had implications for Mr. Faulder's ability to enlist the assistance of his government and his family in ensuring that he had competent counsel and presented relevant information in his defense, particularly in the sentencing phase. Failure to examine these issues carefully would be inconsistent with the United States' policy of supporting respect for the consular notification and access requirements of the VCCR both here and abroad.

As Secretary of State, ensuring the protection of American citizens abroad is one of my most important responsibilities. The treaty violated in this case governs the United States' consular relations with over 140 countries and provides the basic framework under which United States consular officers under my direction assist American citizens imprisoned abroad. Last year, the Department of State was providing assistance to over 2,500 such Americans, including well over 300 from Texas. We assist by attempting to ensure that they understand the foreign country's legal system and their legal options, by helping them obtain qualified legal representation, by taking other steps to improve the prisoner's situation and, in some cases, to influence the outcome of the proceedings. Our ability to provide such assistance is heavily dependent, however, on the extent to which foreign governments honor their consular notification obligations so that we can have access to detained Americans in time to assist them.

Ensuring worldwide respect for the consular notification requirements of the VCCR and for international law generally is a major responsibility and concern for me. We must be prepared to accord other countries the same scrupulous observance of consular notification requirements that we expect them to accord the United States and its citizens abroad. We cannot have a double standard. State as well as federal executive officials must be committed to compliance with consular notification requirements and must look seriously at allegations of failures of compliance.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF STATE CONCERNING THE CONSULAR NOTIFICATION ISSUES IN THE CASE OF JOSEPH STANLEY FAULDER

* * * *

Faulder's defense attorney for both trials was Vernard Solomon, a court appointed attorney. In 1992, in the context of the first state proceeding on an application for a writ of habeas corpus by Faulder, a Texas state court rejected Faulder's ineffective assistance of counsel claim. . . .

In the subsequent federal habeas proceeding, the federal district court found that Faulder's attorney was deficient, but that the deficiency was not prejudicial. The Fifth Circuit affirmed this finding. . . .

A failure to advise a detainee of the right to request consular assistance may be largely irrelevant in any number of situations. For example, the detainee may already be aware of this right; the appropriate consular officials may learn of the detention independently; the detainee's government may have been unable or disinclined to provide significant consular services in any event; the kind of assistance that consular services is designed to permit may have independently been available to the defendant; [footnote omitted] or the foreign national may have been resident in the home country so long that he or she is for all practical purposes on the same footing in the criminal justice system as a national. Moreover, there is no legal requirement that the collection of evidence by prosecutors be held in abeyance until consular notification is given or until consular assistance is provided.

* * * *

In this case, there is no evidence that Faulder knew that he could request consular assistance. . . . His time in the United States prior to his arrest, his uncertain ties to the United States, and his apparent lack of involvement with the American justice system prior to his 1977 arrest, suggest someone not fully integrated into American society. His family was in Canada and apparently entirely unaware of his detention. . . . Solomon had no prior experience in death penalty cases and did not understand the law relevant to mitigation evidence. In addition, Solomon failed to develop or introduce mitigation evidence notwithstanding that such evidence would have been available. Full development of the possible mitigation evidence in question required access to people (family, friends, doctors, etc.) and records available in Canada. The federal courts have held that Faulder's court appointed lawyer was deficient in the sentencing phase, and have denied Faulder's ineffective assistance of counsel claim only because they concluded—at a stage when the burden of proof was on Faulder (and some evidence no longer available)—that Faulder had failed to show that, had the mitigation evidence been introduced, a different sentence was reasonably likely.

At the same time, the Canadian Consulate General was actively and aggressively seeking to provide consular services to Canadian prisoners in Texas during the critical period of Faulder's second trial and direct appeal. The Consulate General's own "safety mechanism" for protecting against a failure of notification—requesting lists of Canadian prisoners from Texas authorities—failed, however, because Texas did not include Faulder on lists given to Canada. This meant that Canada was unable to offer Faulder assistance directly. Had he been on the Texas lists, a Canadian consular official would have contacted him and offered assistance. Because Canada began requesting and obtaining lists by the late 1970s but the second trial did not occur until 1981, such an offer very likely would have occurred prior to the second trial.

It also appears that, even if Faulder had declined an offer of assistance from the Canadian Consulate General when first made, Canadian representatives nevertheless would have attended Faulder's trial and continued to remain available to him so that he could have obtained consular assistance at any time if he had changed his mind.

Canada has offered significant evidence of its involvement in criminal cases involving Canadians abroad, explaining how its consular assistance has made a difference. . . .

A number of reasons have been offered for concluding that the failure of notification was not significant in Faulder's case. . . .

The fact that some Canadian law enforcement officials knew of Faulder's detention: Texas authorities corresponded with Canadian law enforcement entities in Canada for information about Faulder that would support his conviction. . . .

As the Department of State has officially stated, however, informing law enforcement officials from a foreign national's country of the foreign national's detention is not a substitute for informing the appropriate consular officials. Page 20 of Consular Notification and Access [see section 1.b, supra] includes the following question and answer on this issue:

> Q. If the alien's government is aware of the case and helping with our investigation, should we still go through the process of notification?
> A. Yes. It is important to distinguish between a government's consular officials and other officials, such as law enforcement officials, who have different functions and responsibilities. Even if law enforcement officials of the alien's country are aware of the detention and are helping to investigate the crime in which the alien was allegedly involved, it is still important to ensure that consular notification procedures are followed.

There are a number of reasons for this. The VCCR explicitly requires that the notification must be to a consular post. The functions of consular and law enforcement officials are very different; law enforcement officials may have an interest in not disclosing information to anyone in order to protect an investigation, and are unlikely to have been trained to notify consular officials of their country (with whom they may have no established working relations) of a detention. Accordingly, if an American detained abroad were not advised of the right to request assistance from a U.S.

consular official, the United States would not agree that the fact that a federal law enforcement agency such as the Drug Enforcement Administration knew of the detention excused the failure.

The fact that Mr. Faulder advised his attorney not to contact his family. The courts have noted that, while Faulder's family was not involved in his defense, he had instructed his attorney not to contact them. It appears, however, that this instruction was an instruction not to ask them to attend his trial for the purpose of eliciting sympathy. It was not an instruction not to seek to have them testify in mitigation, since Solomon apparently did not understand that such testimony was an option. [citations omitted]

The Department of State would not conclude that, because Faulder told his attorney not to contact his family for purposes of having them attend trial, he would have given the same instruction to a Canadian consular officer. The fact that Faulder told his attorney not to contact his family is not in our view dispositive of whether his family would have been involved by a consular officer.

First, because the Canadian Consulate General had established a practice of requesting lists of Canadian prisoners in Texas and offering its assistance to all those on the lists, it is fair to assume that Faulder would have had at least one face-to-face meeting with a Canadian consular representative before his second trial if his name had been on the lists. . . .

The experience of the Department of State is that, once direct contact is established between a prisoner and a consular officer, there is a significant potential for a relationship of trust to develop over time. Prisoners who decline consular assistance at the outset of their detention frequently change their mind as the period of detention lengthens. In addition, prisoners tend to develop a qualitatively different relationship with consular officials than with their own attorneys. The consular officer is a fellow countryman, while the attorney invariably is not; a prisoner may feel an affinity with a consular official from his own country lacking in his relationship with his attorney. A consular official cannot substitute as legal counsel, but can take on a role as advocate (e.g., for improved detention conditions) and even confidant in addition to monitoring whether the foreign national is receiving a fair trial and has legal representation.

American prisoners abroad who instruct consular officers not to notify their families of their detention frequently change their minds as the period of detention becomes longer, as they perceive their situation to be more dire, or if they understand that their families can provide important assistance. If a relationship of trust had developed between Faulder and a Canadian consular officer, it is possible that the officer over a period of five years—the period of Faulder's detention before his second trial—would have ultimately persuaded Faulder to permit the officer to contact his family. A consular officer normally seeks to involve the detainee's family in part because the family can provide financial and moral support to the prisoner. . . . It would be entirely possible, therefore, that Faulder's family would have been informed and involved by the time of Faulder's second trial.

The fact that mitigation evidence was not obtained by Faulder's attorney. The Department similarly would not infer from the fact that Faulder's attorney did not develop mitigation evidence that such evidence could not have been developed if Faulder had had consular assistance. As in the case of family involvement, a consular officer may affect the way in which a defendant is represented. Whether and to what extent this occurs will vary in individual cases and in light of different countries' consular practices. There is precedent, however, for consular officers to assist in obtaining legal counsel and sometimes even in obtaining evidence. Over the five-year period prior to Faulder's second trial, such efforts could have been undertaken by Canadian consular officials.

(ii) Carlos Santana

Carlos Santana was convicted in Texas state court of a brutal murder during the course of an armed robbery and sentenced to death. See Santana v. State, 714 S.W.2d 1 (Tex. Crim. App. 1986). After his execution was set for March 23, 1993, the Ambassador of the Dominican Republic, Jose del Carmen Ariza, wrote a letter dated March 15, 1993, to Secretary of State Warren Christopher. The Ambassador alleged that Santana was a national of the Dominican Republic and that he had not been notified of his rights under Article 36 of the VCCR, and sought the assistance of the Department of State in obtaining a stay of his execution and a commutation of his sentence of death. An individual complaint was also filed with the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights on behalf of Santana, Case 11.130, Inter-Am. C.H.R., OEA/ser. L/V/II.95(1993). Santana was executed on March 23, 1993.

A May 10, 1993, letter from James H. Thessin, Acting Legal Adviser of the Department of State, excerpted below, responded formally to the Ambassador's letter, describing the actions taken by the Department in response to it. The full text of Mr. Thessin's letter is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

In response to your letter, we asked Texas Governor Anne Richards to provide for an investigation of the consular notification issue. . . .

On March 23, 1993, Governor Richard's office and the Texas Attorney General's office in a series of telephone calls provided us with detailed information about the consular notification issue. Based on that information, we concluded that Texas authorities had no reason to think Mr. Santana was a Dominican citizen, in part because he at times had affirmatively represented that he was a citizen of the United States. . . .

The record as we know it would not in our view support a conclusion that there was any failure to comply with the consular notification provisions of the Vienna Convention. We have, however, reminded the Texas officials with whom we have communicated of the seriousness with which we regard these provisions, and of the importance of complying with them.

* * * *

The Dominican ambassador did not respond to this letter. Nor did the Dominican Republic otherwise advise the Department of any disagreement with the Department's assessment that Santana had represented to law enforcement officials that he was a U.S. citizen.

(iii) Irineo Tristan Montoya

In 1985 Irineo Tristan Montoya, a Mexican national, was convicted of murder and sentenced to death by the State of Texas. During 1996 and 1997, the Government of Mexico filed four diplomatic protests with the U.S. Department of State. In the notes, Mexico alleged that Tristan Montoya had not been informed of his right to contact Mexican consular officials in violation of Article 36 of the VCCR and the Consular Convention Between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, Aug. 12, 1942, U.S.-Mex., 57 Stat. 800, 125 U.N.T.S. 301 (entered into force July 1, 1943), and that his confession had been obtained in violation of the two Conventions, as well as the Fifth, Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution. In the last of the four notes, dated June 17, 1997, Mexico asked the U.S. federal government to intervene "before the appropriate judicial body, in order to suspend the execution of Tristan Montoya" and further requested "that the possible violation of the [VCCR and bilateral consular convention], and the consequences on equity and fairness of the process followed against the Mexican national be determined with strict observance of the law, repairing the harm, if justified, through a new trial." (The diplomatic notes discussed in this section are set forth in Memorial of Mexico (Mexico v. United States of America), 2003 I.C.J.(Annex 16) 1 (June 20, 2003), at A236–A255.)*

* At the initial public sitting for oral presentations, December 15, 2003, President Shi, presiding, announced that the Court had decided that "copies of the pleadings and documents annexed will be made accessible to the public on the opening of the oral proceedings on the merits. Further, in accordance with the Court's practice, these pleadings without their annexes will from today be put on the Court's Internet site [www.icj-cij.org]."

In response to Mexico's notes, the Department of State communicated orally with Texas and the Embassy of Mexico to ascertain the relevant facts and, after confirming a breach of Article 36, asked that the breach be considered as a factor in Tristan Montoya's clemency petition.

The State of Texas executed Tristan Montoya on June 18, 1997. Mexico protested the execution in a diplomatic note dated June 19, 1997. In a note dated July 9, 1997, excerpted below, the U.S. Department of State responded formally to Mexico's diplomatic notes, recapping the actions it had taken. The response also apologized for the apparent failure to notify Tristan Montoya of his right to consular notification as required by Article 36(1)(b) of the VCCR.

The full text of the U.S. July 9 note is also available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

With respect to the case of Mr. Tristan Montoya, the Department of State has taken the matters raised in the Embassy's notes with the utmost seriousness, and made extensive inquiries into the circumstances of Mr. Tristan Montoya's case. The Department sought information from a number of sources, and made a formal request on June 12, 1997, to the Governor of the State of Texas to provide information about Mr. Tristan Montoya's case. . . .

The Office of the Governor was unable to find any information that Mr. Tristan Montoya was informed before his conviction of his right to consular notification under Article 36(1)(b) of the Vienna Convention. The Department of State extends, on behalf of the United States, its most profound apology for the apparent failure of the competent authorities to inform Mr. Tristan Montoya that he could have a Mexican consular officer notified of his detention.

As the Governor of Texas considered the clemency petition then before him, the Department believed it appropriate to request that he take into account the U.S. obligation to provide consular notification and the fact that Mr. Tristan Montoya apparently was not informed that he could have a consular officer notified of his detention. The Department so advised the Governor's office on June 17. The Department was assured that the Governor would consider this factor carefully, and this assurance was formalized in the enclosed June 18 letter from the Governor's office. The Department formally acknowledged this assurance later that day in a letter that is also enclosed for the Embassy's information. Nonetheless, the Governor declined to grant the petition for clemency, and Irineo Tristan Montoya was executed by lethal injection later that evening.

With respect to the specific requests . . . concerning communications with judicial and civil authorities in the United States, the Department notes that as a general matter the Government of Mexico may make appropriate direct communications in any specific legal proceeding in which one of its nationals is a party. The Department has previously issued circular diplomatic notes (see, e.g., the circular diplomatic note of August 17, 1978, to all Chiefs of Mission at Washington, D.C.) clarifying that when foreign governments wish to make their views known to courts in the United States, they should do so directly under relevant court rules, which normally permit filing briefs as amici curiae. . . . In the occasional instance when U.S. courts have expressed reluctance to receive such views, the Department has encouraged them to do so (see, e.g., Westinghouse Uranium Antitrust Litigation (1980)). The Department remains willing to assist in this way.

The Department further notes that, in the case of Mr. Tristan Montoya, information provided to the Department suggests that Mexican consular officials provided affidavits and statements to be attached to petitions submitted on behalf of Mr. Tristan Montoya to the Texas Board of Pardons and the to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, and that the views of Mexican federal and state officials were communicated directly to the Governor of Texas. . . .

Mexico's response, dated August 5, 1997, expressed appreciation for the United States apology, but noted Mexico's concern about the increasing number of Mexicans on death row in the United States (then 36) and the fact that Mexico had allegedly received consular notification in none of them. The lack of notification "cause[d] the Government of Mexico to be unable to support their defense, to assist the defending attorneys, to assure that the arrested individuals understand the seriousness of the charges and the rights that assist them in their defense and to help to obtain mitigating evidence which might be found in Mexico. Thus, [Mexico] considers that the due process of law is sensibly affected."

(iv) Mario Benjamin Murphy

On June 25, 1997, the Embassy of Mexico sent a note to the U.S. Department of State about the pending execution of another Mexican national, Mario Benjamin Murphy. Murphy was sentenced to death after being convicted of a murder for hire and conspiracy to commit capital murder. In the note, Mexico claimed that Murphy had not been informed of his right to consular notification in violation of Article 36 of the VCCR and Article VI of the U.S.-Mexico Consular Convention, stated its belief that notification "may have resulted in a different sentence than the one imposed on him," and expressed the opinion that because "international treaties approved by the U.S. congress are a Supreme Law of the United States, the trial conducted against Mario B. Murphy may even have contained violations of constitutional provisions concerning the due process of law." Mexico asked that the Department of State "swiftly" convey Mexico's views to the U.S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. (The diplomatic notes discussed in this section are set forth in Memorial of Mexico (Mexico v. United States of America), 2003 I.C.J.(Annex 17) 1 (June 20, 2003), at A256–A271.)

A subsequent diplomatic note, dated September 8, 1997, reiterated Mexico's views and requested that they be conveyed to the Governor of Virginia "since, in any case, the Governor is the depositary of the last resort which, at a specific moment—if the judicial authorities do not allow for a stay of execution—may free Mario B. Murphy from being executed by commuting his sentence."

In a third diplomatic note, dated September 10, 1997, from Jesus Silva-Herzog, Ambassador of Mexico to the United States, to Jeffrey Davidow, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Ambassador Silva-Herzog referred to a conversation of September 9 concerning Mexico's September 8 note, and expressed his concern that "the State Department still does not consider the denial of Article 36 rights as affecting the outcome of this or other cases." He attached an analysis by Murphy's attorneys of "how, factually and legally, our Consul's early participation could significantly have assisted Murphy," but added that the VCCR "gives foreign nationals Article 36 rights in every instance and the very denial of these rights should be protected irrespective of whether in any case their exercise would 'have affected the outcome' of any given matter." He asked that the Department of State join Mexico in asking the Governor of Virginia to commute Murphy's sentence.

Subsequently, the Department of State advised the Embassy of Mexico by diplomatic note that it was assessing the information it had received concerning the case of Murphy, including a report from the Commonwealth of Virginia, and observed that Mexico appeared to have presented its views to the appropriate officials, including by filing a clemency petition with the Governor of Virginia, George Allen.

On September 17, the Governor of Virginia, George Allen, issued a press release explaining why he had decided not to grant clemency to Murphy. He specifically considered the alleged violation of Article 36 of the VCCR in a section of the press release set forth below (italics in the original). Murphy was executed that day.

The full text of Governor Allen's press release is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. See section 1.a, supra, for a discussion of U.S. court litigation over the consular notification issue in Murphy's case.

* * * *

I am mindful of the deep interest of the government of Mexico in this case. I certainly respect their concerns about the Vienna Convention issue, as to whether Murphy was allowed to contact the Mexican consulate, but there are some pertinent facts to be considered in analyzing this issue.

First, Murphy had lived in the United States since he was three years old, which was 16 years prior to the murder of James Radcliff. It can fairly be said that he was raised in the United States, and at the time of his arrest was as fluent in English as any U.S. citizen who had grown up in the United States. Given his surname, English fluency and long-time residence in Virginia Beach, there was absolutely no reason for the Virginia Beach authorities to suspect upon his arrest that Murphy was a citizen of Mexico.

Second, neither Murphy nor his attorney ever requested to talk to any officials from the Mexican government until several years after his conviction. When he requested such a contact, it was allowed. There is absolutely no evidence that Murphy or his attorneys were ever prevented from contacting the Mexican authorities when he expressed a desire to do so.

Moreover, the central issue is whether this apparent violation of the treaty caused a violation of Murphy's fundamental right to due process of law and a fair trial. Both the U.S. District Court and the U.S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals considered this question and both concluded that it did not. They both found that Murphy was not prejudiced by any purported violation of the treaty. The U.S. Supreme Court chose not to disturb those rulings.

To overturn a valid sentence of a confessed murderer based on such a procedural issue—especially when the courts have said that no prejudice against Murphy resulted—would be an abdication of the oath that I took as Governor to the people of Virginia to uphold the laws and constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

I respect the position of the Mexican government. But just as citizens of the United States must respect and obey the laws of any country they visit, we expect that visitors from other nations to Virginia will obey our laws, and suffer the same consequences that criminals in Virginia suffer when they break our laws. Regardless of a person's nationality, one must be responsible and accountable for one's actions.

We cannot tolerate a double standard of justice: one standard for citizens of Virginia, and a lesser standard for someone who freely chooses to live permanently in Virginia, but who retains citizenship in another country and who belatedly invokes that citizenship in an effort to evade the justice imposed in a fair trail for a crime committed in Virginia against a Virginia citizen.

* * * *

In a September 23, 1997, diplomatic note to the Embassy of Mexico, the Department of State reviewed the exchanges it had with Governor Allen's office concerning Murphy's clemency petition and apologized for the apparent failure of the authorities to inform Murphy that he could have a Mexican consular officer notified of his detention.

A September 25, 1997 diplomatic note from the Embassy of Mexico rejected the apology as "insufficient, since [Mexico] expects the Department of State to conduct specific actions to guarantee the compliance of Article 36" of the VCCR.

The full text of the September 23 U.S. note, excerpted below, is also available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

[T]he Office of the Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia was unable to find any evidence that Mr. Murphy was informed before his conviction of his right to consular notification under Article 36(1)(b) of the Vienna Convention. The Department extends, on behalf of the United States, its most profound apology for the apparent failure of the competent authorities to inform Mr. Murphy that he could have a Mexican consular officer notified of his detention.

The report of the Governor's office in this case assured the Department that, as he considered the clemency petitions pending before him, the Governor would take into account the U.S. obligation to provide consular notification and the fact that Mr. Murphy apparently was not informed that he could have a consular official notified of his detention. The Department believed this consideration was appropriate in the circumstances, and the Legal Adviser so informed the Governor's office on September 16. . . . The Legal Adviser also conferred with legal counsel to the Governor on September 17, and emphasized the importance of the consular notification obligation. Later that day, Governor George F. Allen released a public statement announcing his decision not to grant the petitions for clemency. . . .

d. Alleged violations of Article 36 in death penalty cases brought before international commissions and courts

(1) Individual complaints to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights

(i) Cesar Fierro

A complaint was filed on behalf of Cesar Fierro in the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights on July 21, 1994. Case 11.331, Inter-Am. C.H.R., OEA/ser. L/V/II.118 (1994). Fierro was convicted of the murder of a taxi driver in El Paso, Texas, and sentenced to death. His execution was scheduled for August 10, 1994. The complaint alleged that Fierro's conviction was based on a coerced confession elicited from him as a result of Mexican police threats to torture his mother and step-father, and argued that, had Fierro been informed of his right to contact the Mexican consul, the consul could have taken steps to secure the release from police custody of Fierro's parents and thus eliminated the circumstances that coerced Fierro's statement. U.S. responses dated October 21, 1994, and September 19, 1996, suggested that the petition should be dismissed because Fierro had not exhausted domestic remedies in accordance with Articles 37 and 41 of the Commission's Regulations. The case lay in abeyance until 2002 when the Commission decided to consider the merits prior to ruling on admissibility. In March 2003, the Commission concluded both that Fierro's claims were admissible and that the United States had violated Articles XVIII and XXVI of the American Declaration on the Rights of Man by failing to inform him of his right to consular notification under Article 36 of the VCCR. The Commission issued its final report on December 29, 2003. Rept. No. 99/03, Case 11.331 (Merits).

(ii) Ramón Martinez Villareal

On May 16, 1997, the Center for Justice and International Law filed a petition against the United States of America with the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights on behalf of Ramón Martinez Villareal, a Mexican national sentenced to death on May 20, 1983, for committing two murders. Case No. 11.753. The petition alleged that the United States violated Martinez Villareal's rights under Articles I, XVIII, and XXVI of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man because his attorney failed to provide him with effective representation; because he was mentally ill and therefore incompetent to stand trial or be sentenced to death; and because he was not informed of his right to consular notification under Article 36 of the VCCR.

In a response dated December 18, 1997, the United States attached a response by the State of Arizona, excerpted below, rejecting the Article 36 claim on the ground that the Mexican Government was aware of Martinez Villareal's case from the news media and other sources and could have helped him had it chosen to do so. See also the discussion of United Mexican States v. Woods in section A.1.a., supra. For post-1999 developments in the Commission, including the Commission's ultimate conclusion that Martinez Villareal's conviction and sentence were inherently flawed because of lack of consular notification at the time of arrest, Report No. 52/02, see Digest 2002 at 48–52.

Because no issue of treaty compliance was raised until 1997, little information is available about what steps may have been taken to inform representatives of Mexico about the case. However, it is plain that the Mexican government was in a position to know about the case, from the news media and other sources, and that Defendant was in fact visited by someone from the Mexican consulate on the first day of the trial. Mexico maintains consulates in Nogales (where Defendant was held in jail and tried) and in Tucson. When current counsel for Defendant was investigating what pretrial publicity there might have been, he was unable to find any repository that had kept copies of the Nogales newspapers for that time period. However, he did locate one story published in the Arizona Daily Star (Tucson), dated January 8 1983 (i.e., more than three months before the April 1983 trial), reflecting that Defendant, a Mexican national, would be tried for the murders and that the prospective jurors were aware of the case. Under such circumstances, it must be assumed that the Mexican consular staffs in both Tucson and Nogales also were aware of the case, even if there had not been formal notification.

However, Mexican governmental awareness of the case is more than an assumption. Tom McGrew (son of one of the victims) has sworn in an affidavit that he personally contacted a Mexican consular official in Nogales about the case and was told that "the Mexican Government was concerned with the proceedings and would monitor those proceedings." Moreover, examination of the records of the Santa Cruz County jail has disclosed that Defendant received a visit from someone from the Mexican consulate on the evening of April 19, [1983], the first day of the trial. [footnote omitted] Thus, it is clear that the government of Mexico was aware of Defendant and his case, so that it could have assisted him had it wished to do so.

(2) Claims in the International Court of Justice

(i) The Breard Case

Angel Francisco Breard, a Paraguayan national, was convicted of attempted rape and capital murder in Virginia. On August 20, 1996, he filed a motion for federal habeas corpus relief under 28 U.S.C. § 2254 in which he argued for the first time that his conviction and sentence should be overturned because the arresting authorities failed to inform him that, as a foreign national, he had the right to contact the Paraguayan Consulate under Article 36(1)(b) of the VCCR. The District Court rejected the petition on the grounds that he had failed to show cause or prejudice for failing to raise the claim in state court, Breard v. Netherland, 949 F. Supp. 1255, 1266 (E.D. Va. 1996), and the Fourth Circuit affirmed, Breard v. Pruett, 134 F.3d 615, 620 (4th Cir. 1998).

In September 1996 the Republic of Paraguay, the Ambassador of Paraguay to the United States and the Consul General of Paraguay to the United States ("Paraguay") brought suit in federal district court against certain Virginia officials, alleging that the failure to inform Breard of his rights under Article 36(1)(b) violated their separate rights under the VCCR. The Consul General in addition asserted a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The district court concluded that it had no subject-matter jurisdiction because Paraguay's claim was not a "continuing violation of federal law" and therefore was barred by the Eleventh Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Republic of Paraguay v. Allen, 949 F. Supp. 1269, 1272–73 (E.D. Va. 1996). The Fourth Circuit affirmed, Republic of Paraguay v. Allen, 134 F.3d 622 (4th Cir. 1998).

On April 3, 1998, Paraguay filed Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Para. v. U.S.), 1998 I.C.J. 248, against the United States in the International Court of Justice ("ICJ"), seeking to void the conviction and death sentence imposed by Virginia on Breard, on the grounds that the United States had failed, as required by Article 36(1)(b) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, to inform him that he had the right to have a Paraguayan consular post notified of his arrest and detention. Paraguay also requested an indication of provisional measures to stop Breard's execution, scheduled for April 14, 1998.

In a hearing convened before the ICJ on April 7 regarding Paraguay's request for the indication of provisional measures, the United States acknowledged that there had been a breach of the U.S. obligation under Article 36(b)(1) to inform Breard that he could ask that a Paraguayan consular post be notified of his arrest and detention. The United States explained that, consistent with state practice in such cases, the United States had thoroughly investigated the case, had expressed its regret to Paraguay for the breach, and was taking measures to avoid any recurrence. The United States further noted that its investigation of the case provided no basis for believing that consular assistance would have altered the outcome because Breard had a good command of English, had lived in the United States for many years, was represented by two competent defense attorneys, and decided to testify to his guilt against the advice of his attorneys and family. As for the specific relief requested, the United States challenged the jurisdiction of the ICJ over the case on the grounds that it did not involve a dispute over the "interpretation or application" of the VCCR. It further questioned the ICJ's jurisdiction to invalidate Breard's conviction or postpone his execution as neither the VCCR's language, its history nor state practice supported Paraguay's claim that invalidation of a subsequent conviction and sentence of an alien was an available remedy for failure of consular notification. With respect to Paraguay's request for provisional measures, the United States further contended that suspension by the ICJ of the execution would amount to a decision for Paraguay on the merits and would constitute a major and unprecedented intrusion by the Court into domestic criminal processes. The oral presentations, excerpted below, were made principally by Catherine Brown, Assistant Legal Adviser for Consular Affairs, John Crook, Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs, and Michael Matheson, Deputy Legal Adviser.

All oral and written pleadings as well as the ICJ's orders in Breard are available at www.icj-cij.org/icjwww/idocket/ipaus/ipausframe.htm.

Ms. Brown:

* * * *

2.2. My task is to explain to the Court the factual background of this dispute. I will review how the United States has responded to the concerns expressed by the Government of Paraguay, including the results of our investigation into the facts of Mr. Breard's case. First, however, I will address the nature of the consular function and the practice of States with regard to consular notification, in so far as those facts are relevant to the issues of this case.

I. The Consular Function

2.3. The principal function of consular officers is to provide services and assistance to their country's nationals abroad. The Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, to which both the United States and Paraguay are parties, enumerates a wide range of general consular functions in Article 5. Article 36 addresses the specific issue of consular officers communicating with their nationals abroad.

* * * *

2.6. Article 36, paragraph 1 (b), concludes with the "consular notification" obligation that is at issue in this case: it provides that "the said authorities shall inform the person concerned without delay of his rights under this paragraph". Virginia authorities apparently did not so advise Mr. Breard, at the time of his arrest, or at any time prior to his conviction and sentence, that he could communicate with a consular official. But that does not mean that he was impeded or dissuaded from obtaining consular assistance. He, or his family, or his attorneys, might at any time have enlisted the assistance of a consul, as is frequently the case. The option of calling one's embassy or consul for help is widely known, and many governments advise their own nationals to call their embassy or consul in an emergency abroad.

2.7. Article 36, paragraph 1 (c), provides that consular officials may visit their nationals in detention, converse and correspond with them, and arrange for their legal representation. Again, there was no deliberate effort to interfere with this right, and since becoming aware of Mr. Breard's detention Paraguayan consular officials have been able to visit and communicate with him. With respect to legal representation, arrangements were made by the State of Virginia for two clearly competent lawyers to represent Mr. Breard. Thus a consul proved unnecessary to perform this function.

2.8. Finally, Article 36, paragraph 1 (c), concludes that a consular officer shall refrain from taking action on behalf of a national who is in prison if he expressly opposes such action. This provision is of particular interest here because Mr. Breard did not accept—indeed he adamantly resisted and even rejected—the advice not only of his attorneys, but also of his mother, a Paraguayan national.

2.9. Several additional points are noteworthy. First, neither Article 5 nor Article 36 imposes any obligations on consular officers themselves. A consular officer may or may not choose to undertake any particular function on behalf of his countrymen. Consequently, the practice of States—and even of individual consuls—in assisting their nationals varies widely. Some countries are very active, while others are passive or even quite frankly uninterested or unable to provide any significant consular assistance. A country may have just one or two consular officials in a capital city, and none at a more remote location. A country's consular officials may make frequent prison visits or visit only selectively, if at all. Each country decides for itself what it will do. This in turn creates expectations among its nationals as to whether seeking consular assistance would be worthwhile.

2.10. Second, nothing in these Articles elevates the rights of foreign nationals above those of citizens of the host country. A foreign national is expected to obey the host country's laws, and is subject to its criminal justice system. Consular officers assist their nationals within this context. Consistent with this, Article 5 (i) of the Vienna Convention limits the rights of consular officers to represent or to arrange representation of their nationals before the tribunals of the receiving State. They may do so only "subject to the practices and procedures obtaining in the receiving State".

The United States does not permit foreign consular officials to act as attorneys in the United States, nor may its own consular officers abroad act as attorneys for American citizens. We believe that this is the general practice of states.

2.11. Third, the Vienna Convention does not make consular assistance an essential element of the host country's criminal justice system. This is inevitable, given that consular officers have no obligations to act in any particular way vis-à-vis a host country's criminal justice system. A consul may do nothing at all, leaving the justice system to run its course. Or, the consul may visit the detainee; may ensure that the detainee's family is aware of the detention; may assist the detainee in securing counsel, if necessary; and may follow developments so that any questions about the fairness of the proceedings can, if appropriate, be discussed with host country officials. But the consular officer is not responsible for the defense because he cannot act as an attorney.

II. State Practice With Respect to Consular Notification

2.12. Two additional aspects of state practice are relevant: how faithfully do governments provide notification and what remedies, if any, are provided by governments for failures to notify? Because it is important that the United States respond appropriately to allegations of violations of consular notification, the Department of State recently made inquiries to all of our Embassies and, through them, directly to governments on these matters. While our information remains incomplete, we believe that it fairly reflects the range of state practice.

2.13. Practice with respect to notification: Compliance with respect to the obligation to notify the detainee of the right to see a consul in fact varies widely. At one end of the spectrum, some countries seem to comply unfailingly. At the other end, a small number seem not to comply at all. Rates of compliance seem partly to be a function of such factors as whether a country is large or small, whether it has a unitary or federal organization, the sophistication of its internal communication systems, and the way in which the country has chosen to implement the obligation.

Countries have chosen to implement the obligation in different ways, including by providing only oral guidance, by issuing internal directives, and by enacting implementing legislation. Some apparently provide no guidance at all.

2.14. If a detainee requests consular notification or communication, actual notification to a consul may take some time. It may be provided by telephone, but sometimes a letter or a diplomatic note is sent. As a result there may be a significant delay before notification is received and, consequently, critical events in a criminal proceeding may have already occurred before a consul is aware of the detention. And, as noted previously, the consul may then respond in a variety of ways. For these reasons, and because of the wide variation in compliance with the consular notification requirement, it is quite likely that few, if any, states would have agreed to Article 36 if they had understood that a failure to comply with consular notification would require undoing the results of their criminal justice systems.

2.15. Practice with respect to remedies: Let me turn now to what our inquiries revealed about state practice with respect to remedies. Typically when a consular officer learns of a failure of notification, a diplomatic communication is sent protesting the failure. While such correspondence sometimes goes unanswered, more often it is investigated either by the foreign ministry or the involved law enforcement officials. If it is learned that notification in fact was not given, it is common practice for the host government to apologize and to undertake to ensure improved future compliance. We are not aware of any practice of attempting to ascertain whether the failure of notification prejudiced the foreign national in criminal proceedings. This lack of practice is consistent with the fact and common international understanding that consular assistance is not essential to the criminal proceeding against a foreign national.

2.16. Notwithstanding this practice, Paraguay asks that the entire judicial process of the State of Virginia—Mr. Breard's trial, his sentence, and all of the subsequent appeals, which I will review momentarily—be set aside and that he be restored to the position he was in at the time of his arrest because of the failure of notification. Roughly 165 States are parties to the Vienna Convention. Paraguay has not identified one that provides such a status quo ante remedy of vacating a criminal conviction for a failure of consular notification. Neither has Paraguay identified any country that has an established judicial remedy whereby a foreign government can seek to undo a conviction in its domestic courts based on a failure of notification.

* * * *

2.18. It is not difficult to imagine why such remedies do not exist. As noted, consular assistance, unlike legal assistance, is not regarded as a predicate to a criminal proceeding. Moreover, if a failure to advise a detainee of the right of consular notification automatically required undoing a criminal procedure, the result would be absurd. In particular, it would be inconsistent with the wide variation that exists in the level of consular services provided by different countries. But it would be equally problematic to have a rule that a failure of consular notification required a return to the status quo ante only if notification would have led to a different outcome. It would be unworkable for a court to attempt to determine reliably what a consular officer would have done and whether it would have made a difference. Doing so would require access to normally inviolable consular archives and testimony from consular officials notwithstanding their usual privileges and immunities. In this case, for example, one might wish to examine Paraguay's consular instructions and practices as of the time when Mr. Breard was arrested and inquire into the resources then available to Paraguay's consular officers. Surely governments did not intend that such questions become a matter of inquiry in the courts.

III. The United States Response To The Failure of Notification

2.19. Against this background, I would now like to advise the court of the steps taken by the United States relating to this case in an effort to be responsive to Paraguay's concerns.

2.20. The United States received official notice of Mr. Breard's case in April 1996 through a diplomatic note from Paraguay's

Embassy in Washington. Significantly, the note did not allege a breach of the Article 36 consular notification obligation. It did not request consultations to discuss the case. It did not ask for any United States government intervention other than to facilitate efforts to obtain information from Virginia, which the Department of State did. The Department later learned, from Mr. Breard's attorneys, that those attorneys were attempting to challenge Mr. Breard's conviction based on an apparent failure of consular notification and litigation brought by Mr. Breard.

2.21. In September 1996, Paraguay filed suit against Virginia in a federal trial court. The suit sought to restore the status quo ante for Mr. Breard on the theory that only such action could vindicate Paraguay's governmental rights in consular notification.

The Department of State discussed the case with representatives of Paraguay in October 1996 and later received a request from the Paraguayan Ambassador for assistance in obtaining a new trial for Mr. Breard. That request failed to provide any evidence that consular law or practice would require such a result. Nevertheless, United States officials met with counsel for Paraguay about the matter and gave the issues raised by the suit careful consideration. Ultimately, the United States concluded that Paraguay's remedy for the consular notification failure lay in diplomatic communications with the Department of State. The United States so advised both the court in which Paraguay's case was pending and Paraguay's Ambassador. The United States did not object to Mr. Breard's own efforts to raise the consular notification issues in the courts, but neither did it support them.

2.22. On 3 June 1997, the Department received another letter from the Ambassador. . . . In it the Ambassador advised that Paraguay thought that the dispute should be resolved in the domestic courts of the United States, and not by this Court, but that Paraguay nevertheless would agree with the United States to come to this Court. This proposal was conditioned: the domestic United States proceedings should be stayed and the United States should waive any jurisdictional objections it might have to the jurisdiction of this Court and the United States should agree to require Virginia to accept this Court's decision. Like Paraguay's previous correspondence, this letter again failed to offer any serious explanation of why the remedy Paraguay was seeking was appropriate.

2.23. The Department of State nevertheless then decided to undertake an investigation into the case. In our investigation, we received the full co-operation of Virginia and we reviewed all facts relevant to the consular notification issue. This included the critical portions of the transcript, including Mr. Breard's testimony and an affidavit from his defense lawyers concerning their efforts on his behalf.

2.24. Through this process, we learned the following relevant facts:

(1) Mr. Breard unquestionably committed the offences for which he was tried. He was arrested while attempting a rape. . . .

(2) Mr. Breard had almost immediate and thereafter continuing contact with his family. . . . Contacting family members is normally one of the first and most important things that a consular officer does when a national is detained, but here consular assistance to accomplish this proved unnecessary;

(3) Mr. Breard first came to the United States in 1986 and thus had been resident in the United States for about six years at the time of his arrest. He had been married briefly to an American. This made it difficult to accept Paraguay's contention that Mr. Breard did not understand American culture;

(4) Mr. Breard had a good command of English. His lawyers had no difficulty communicating with him in English. He testified at his trial in English and the transcript of his testimony attests to his command of the language. Mr. Breard told the judge that he had no problems with English and was comfortable speaking it. Moreover, the state would have provided an interpreter had one been needed. Thus, Paraguay's implication that Mr. Breard was tried unfairly in a language he did not understand is demonstrably false. While a consular officer might help interpret for a detained foreign national, such assistance was not needed by Mr. Breard;

(5) Mr. Breard was represented by two criminal defence lawyers experienced in death penalty litigation. They spent at least 400 hours—the equivalent of 50 days—on his case. United States courts subsequently concluded that their legal representation met the requirements of the United States Constitution for the effective assistance of counsel. These attorneys worked closely with Mr. Breard, his mother, a female cousin, and his religious counsellor from jail, who was of Bolivian origin, to prepare his defense. They communicated with Mr. Breard's personal friends to find witnesses who could testify on his behalf. They communicated with persons in Paraguay to find evidence that would assist in his defense. They arranged for the court to appoint three experts to examine Mr. Breard's mental competence, and they obtained his medical records from Paraguay and from Argentina, so as to explore fully the possibility of an insanity defense and to develop mitigation evidence. Paraguay's assertion that it could have paid for witnesses from Paraguay appears irrelevant, because both his mother and cousin came from Paraguay to assist and there is no indication that there were other witnesses who were not used because of financial constraints;

(6) Mr. Breard decided to plead "not guilty" and to testify in both the penalty and sentencing phases of his trial contrary to the advice of his legal counsel and his mother—a strategy that was clearly unwise. This is the principal tactical decision Paraguay asserts it could have changed, but it is clear that Mr. Breard was advised against it by his own lawyers and his mother, yet rejected their advice. He was fully apprised of the risks of his strategy in the context of the American legal system. Access to a consular officer, who would have been less familiar with that system than his own lawyers, would not have made Mr. Breard's tactical decisions more informed;

(7) There is no credible evidence that Mr. Breard's decision to plead "not guilty" and testify was founded on a cultural misunderstanding. . . . Significantly, as noted, his mother was also Paraguayan and yet she as a Paraguayan understood the error of his judgment well enough to advise him not to do what he did. And again, finally, his lawyers unequivocally explained to him that his strategy would not work. He signed a statement confirming that he was rejecting their advice and was not afraid of the outcome even if it resulted in a sentence of death;

(8) Although Mr. Breard's legal counsel apparently thought that Breard had the opportunity to plead guilty in exchange for a life sentence, at best only very general preliminary discussions were held on this matter and they were never seriously pursued. . . .

(9) Objective evidence indicates that the jury and the judge could easily have decided on the death penalty even if Mr. Breard had not testified. . . .

(10) Finally, Mr. Breard had the full protection of the criminal justice system. In addition to competent court appointed counsel, he had full judicial review. His conviction and sentence were reviewed and sustained by the Virginia trial court and the Virginia Supreme Court, and subsequently by a federal district court and a federal appeals court. The consular notification issue was being raised only after these procedures had been completed, in yet two more entirely separate legal proceedings.

2.25. In July 1997, the Department reported the results of its investigation in a letter to the Ambassador. . . . Because it found no evidence of consular notification or access, the Department expressed deep regret that such notification apparently was not provided to Mr. Breard. The Department advised, however, that there was no basis for concluding that consular assistance would have altered the outcome. It further stated that it saw no appropriate role for this Court.

2.26. Significantly, the Government of Paraguay has never responded to that letter, either to contest its factual assumptions or to address the Department's conclusion that consular notification would not have made a difference. Even so, the United States has continued to have periodic communications and discussions about the case with Paraguay. These discussions included assurances given as recently as February of this year by senior Paraguayan government officials that they recognized that this case was unprecedented and unlikely to succeed. On 30 March, however, Paraguay unexpectedly advised the United States that it would file this suit unless the United States engaged in consultations and stayed Mr. Breard's execution. Still prepared to address in diplomatic channels any issues relating to consular notification, the United States agreed to engage in such consultations. The United States did so even though it was unable to stay the execution—which is in the hands of the United States Supreme Court and the Governor of Virginia—and even though it continues to believe that this Court is not an appropriate forum to address Paraguay's concerns.

2.27. In addition to these specific measures relating to Mr. Breard's case, the United States has also intensified its long-standing efforts to ensure that all federal, state, and local law enforcement officials in the United States are aware of and comply with the consular notification and access requirements of Article 36. Guidance on these requirements has been issued regularly by the Department of State for many years. Recently, however, the Department has issued a new and comprehensive guidance on this subject, along with a pocket-sized reference card for law enforcement officers to carry on the street. These materials have been personally provided by the Secretary of State to the United States Attorney-General and to the Governor of every state of the United States including, of course, Virginia. They have also been provided by the Department's Legal Adviser, Mr. Andrews, to every state Attorney-General, and they are being disseminated throughout the United States. In addition, the Departments of State and Justice have begun conducting briefings on these issues for state and federal prosecutors, and law enforcement officials, focusing particularly on areas with high concentrations of foreign nationals. Through these and other efforts, the United States is both acting to correct the circumstances that led to the failure of consular notification in Mr. Breard's case and acting in a manner consistent with state practice. . . .

Mr. Crook:

* * * *

I. The Significance of Provisional Measures

* * * *

3.4. The basic factors guiding the Court's decision whether or not to use its exceptional power to indicate provisional measures are laid down in the Statute of the Court. Article 41 envisions that the Court will carry out two separate, although inter-related, examinations. . . .

3.5. . . . First, the Court's decision whether to indicate provisional measures is to be guided by an assessment of the overall context or circumstances of the case before it. Second, any measures to be indicated are of a nature "which ought to be taken to preserve the respective rights of either party". . . .

II. Provisional measures are not warranted in these circumstances

* * * *

No Jurisdiction.

* * * *

3.10. Article I of the Optional Disputes Settlement Protocol to the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations gives the Court jurisdiction over disputes arising out of the "interpretation or application" of the Convention. However, there is no dispute here about either the interpretation or the application of the Convention. The Parties do not disagree on what it means to "inform" a foreign national of his rights under Article 36, paragraph 1 (b), of the Convention. Nor do they dispute that Mr. Breard was not so informed.

3.11. Instead, Paraguay's claim in this case, in essence, is that under the Vienna Convention the Court can void Mr. Breard's criminal conviction and sentence, and require that he be given a new trial. As I will show, the Vienna Convention does not provide for such an extraordinary form of relief. Paraguay may object to the appropriateness of a criminal conviction and sentence under United States law and practice, but this is not a dispute about the interpretation or application of the Vienna Convention.

3.12. Paraguay tries to meet this difficulty by invoking the doctrine of restitutio in integrum. [citation omitted] Paraguay cannot, however, create a right that does not otherwise exist under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations—the Court's sole basis for jurisdiction in this case—simply by invoking a general principle of the law on reparation. Paraguay has failed to make a prima facie showing that the Court has jurisdiction to grant the exceptional relief it seeks here. . . .

* * * *

The Merits of Paraguay's Claim.

3.14. Obviously, the Court cannot consider the merits at this stage in a case that is 96 hours old. Nevertheless, in addition to assessing whether it has jurisdiction to proceed, the Court must weigh the totality of circumstances bearing on Paraguay's request for preliminary measures. In so doing, the Court must consider the doubtful nature of the core legal proposition that Paraguay is advancing—that the Convention requires the invalidation of every conviction and sentence of any person who has not received consular notification required by the Convention.

* * * *

A. Plain Meaning of the Text

3.16. What are the legal difficulties? To begin with, Paraguay's claim conflicts with the plain meaning of the text. Absolutely nothing in the language of Article 36, paragraph 1, of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (or in any other Article of the Convention) offers support for Paraguay's claim that failure of consular notification requires invalidation of any subsequent conviction and sentence of an alien.

* * * *

3.21. Mr. President, there are very few situations in which States actually have agreed by treaty that the failure to observe specific standards can be the basis for appeal to an international tribunal for possible reversal of a conviction or sentence. I have in mind here, for example, regional instruments and institutions such as the European Convention on Human Rights and the Strasbourg Court. Where States have elected to create such mechanisms, they have done so expressly and with great precision. They have not created such additional remedies by indirection or implication, as Paraguay asks the Court do here. . . .

B. Negotiating History

3.22. Likewise, there is no support for Paraguay's claim there. We know of nothing in the history—and Paraguay has pointed to nothing—even hinting that the parties intended failure to comply with Article 36, paragraph 1, to invalidate subsequent criminal proceedings.

3.23. The Vienna Convention was negotiated on the basis of draft articles prepared by the International Law Commission. The relevant ILC proposals do not contain the obligation to inform an arrested person that their consul could be notified. That was added at the Conference. We have found nothing in the debates of the conference supporting Paraguay's claim, but there are a number of indications to the contrary.

3.24. Article 36 was negotiated with great difficulty at the Vienna Conference. The final version was only agreed upon two days before the Conference ended. Some delegations supported the ILC's initial draft of Article 36, which would have required that receiving States automatically notify sending States' consuls if a national was arrested. A large number of other States strongly opposed this requirement. They argued, among other things, that it would impose an excessive administrative burden on the receiving State and that the national might not want his government authorities to know about his arrest. (Luke T. Lee, Consular Law and Practice (1990), pp. 138–139.)

3.25. Ultimately, a compromise had to be reached. The compromise involved a series of amendments to the ILC draft. I will not try to trace all of these for you, but I will mention one because it helps to show that States at the Conference clearly did not intend that failure of consular notification would invalidate subsequent legal proceedings. The negotiations began with the ILC draft providing for consular notification in the case of arrest. That was widely criticized as unreasonably burdensome and impractical. Accordingly, various narrowing amendments were offered by groups of countries.

3.26. One, offered by Egypt and accepted by the Conference, changed the initial language to state that the obligation to inform the sending State only arises if the national so requests. The delegate of Egypt explained his amendment as follows:

> "The purpose of the amendment is to lessen the burden on the authorities of receiving States, especially those which had large numbers of resident aliens or which received many tourists and visitors. The language proposed in the joint amendment would ensure that the authorities of the receiving State would not be blamed if, owing to the pressure of work or other circumstances, there was a failure to report the arrest of a national of the sending State." (Twentieth Plenary Meeting on 20 April, 1963, United Nations Conference on Consular Relations, Official Records, p. 82, at para 62. Emphasis added.)

The explanation of this amendment (which was adopted by the Conference) clearly suggests that the Conference saw the normal processes of diplomatic adjustment as the means to address failure of a notification requirement. The Conference did not foresee that defects of consular notification would result in the invalidation of subsequent criminal proceedings. Had the parties thought so, the many States that already expressed fears about the burden of the notification requirement would surely have voted down the text that is before you today.

3.27. Other statements during the Conference reinforce that the Parties did not intend the Convention to alter the operation of domestic criminal proceedings. The delegate from the USSR stated that "the matters dealt with in Article 36 were connected with the criminal law and procedure of the receiving State, which were outside the scope for the codification of consular law" (ibid., p. 40, para. 3). The delegate from Belarus expressed similar views, noting that "the Conference was drafting a consular convention, not an international penal code, and it had no right to attempt to dictate the penal codes of sovereign States" (ibid., p. 40, para. 8). Such statements directly conflict with Paraguay's claim today. Thus, the negotiating history does not support Paraguay's broad view of the consequences of non-compliance with Article 36, and a variety of statements made during the debate support a contrary view.

C. State Practice

3.28. Likewise, there is no support in state practice for Paraguay's position. As Ms Brown explained, after the Breard case initially came to the attention of the United States federal authorities, the United States Department of State surveyed the practice of the States parties to the Vienna Convention. That survey found no State—none—that adopted the position Paraguay urges on the Court here. Paraguay has referred to no such State practice here.

3.29. The few national court cases that we know have considered the matter have not reached the result urged by Paraguay.

* * * *

D. No Injury to Mr. Breard

3.30. Finally, as Ms. Brown has explained, the notion that Mr. Breard suffered injury because of any failure of consular notification is speculative and unpersuasive. Paraguay's Application asks this Court to indicate provisional measures largely on the basis of some bold assumptions about what Paraguay's consul might have done. In doing so, the Application presents an inflated and unrealistic description of a consul's functions in criminal matters. A consul is not a defense attorney. Consular protection does not immunize a national from local criminal jurisdiction. What a consul can do is help arrested persons arrange means for their own defense. A consul can notify an arrested person's family, or help to ensure that the defendant has local defense attorneys. A consul does not typically retain lawyers to defend her nationals; the United States does not do so, and Paraguay has not established that it normally does so either.

3.31. But, as we have shown, Mr. Breard was able to accomplish all these things quite effectively without the assistance of Paraguay's consul. He spoke English and had lived in the United States since 1986. After his arrest, he was in regular contact with his family. He was defended by able attorneys throughout his trial and the many subsequent legal proceedings. A consul could not have done more to enhance the effectiveness of Mr. Breard's legal defense.

E. Conclusion

3.32. For all of these reasons—the lack of any textual basis in the Convention, the lack of support in the negotiating history and State practice, and the absence of injury to Mr. Breard—Paraguay's basic claim in these proceedings lacks legal foundation. Because there is no basis for the remedy Paraguay seeks in the Convention, the Court lacks jurisdiction. The weakness of Paraguay's legal claim is also a compelling reason for declining to indicate provisional measures.

* * * *

Mr. Matheson:

4.2. Article 41 of the Statute of the Court provides in part that the Court "shall have the power to indicate, if it considers that circumstances so require, any provisional measures which ought to be taken . . .". This language clearly indicates that the Court may or may not choose to exercise this power in a particular case, depending on whether it believes the circumstances require it and whether it believes the particular measures proposed ought to be taken. [citation omitted]

4.3. It follows from this that the Court should only grant provisional measures where it is satisfied that this would not only be fair and beneficial to the parties to the immediate dispute, but also would be consistent with the proper role of the Court, the interests of the Parties to the convention in question, and the good of the general international community.

4.4. In the present case, Paraguay has asked the Court to suspend decisions of the criminal courts of a State. To our knowledge, this is the first occasion on which the Court has been asked to do so. In its request for provisional measures, Paraguay has asked the Court, in a matter of a few days, to scrutinize and suspend for an indefinite period the considered decisions of the trial and appellate courts of Virginia and the United States—decisions that have been taken after extensive judicial proceedings over a period of years.

4.5. This would be a very serious step, and one which could threaten serious disruption of the criminal justice systems of the parties to the Vienna Convention, and of the work of this Court as well.

4.6. There are currently over 160 parties to the Vienna Convention, of which over 50 have adhered to the Optional Protocol on Compulsory Settlement of Disputes. The Parties to the Protocol include a number of populous States, such as France, Germany, India, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States, where very large numbers of foreign nationals have immigrated or travelled for various reasons. It is inevitable that a significant number of crimes will occur in any population group of such a size, and in fact this has occurred. It is also to be expected that in a number of these cases, law enforcement authorities may commit, or be alleged to have committed, errors in the process of consular notification called for under the Vienna Convention.

4.7. The question is not whether such errors should be remedied. Rather, it is whether this should be left to the diplomatic process and to the domestic criminal authorities of the State in question, or whether this Court should assume the role of a supreme court of criminal appeals to deal with such cases by staying, reviewing and reversing domestic court decisions. Once the Court opens itself to this process, it can be expected that a great many defendants will press the States of their nationality to take recourse to it. This would include not only those who received no consular notification at all, but also those who may wish to claim that the notification received was deficient, incomplete, or tardy. It would include not only those who were genuinely prejudiced by the failure of consular notification, but also those who suffered little or no prejudice because they were nonetheless accorded full assistance of competent counsel and all the requirements of due process.

4.8. In principle, if such a remedy were available for violations of the Vienna Convention, why would it not also be available for alleged violations of other conventions when committed against foreign nationals in detention for criminal offenses, such as bilateral treaties with provisions for consular protection, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, or other agreements with provisions concerning rights to be accorded to aliens or to any person accused of criminal offences? If States may ask this Court to stay executions and nullify convictions on the basis of violations of the Vienna Convention, would they not feel able to do so under these other agreements as well?

4.9. It is difficult to believe that the parties to these conventions really intended that this Court serve as a supreme court of criminal appeals in this manner. It is difficult to believe that they intended to subject their domestic criminal proceedings, which typically include both trial proceedings and one or more levels of appellate review, to yet another stage of review by an international tribunal. As Mr. Crook demonstrated, we know this was not the case with respect to the Vienna Convention. We also know that such a role was not contemplated by the framers of the United Nations Charter and the Statute of the Court.

4.10. Yet this is precisely the message that the Court would give in granting the provisional measures sought by Paraguay in the present case. Delay of the execution of Mr. Breard until the Court's final disposition of the case, as Paraguay requests, would in practice mean the suspension of domestic criminal proceedings for years, whatever the final outcome. Many other defendants in many States could be expected to demand the same treatment, whether the alleged violations were serious or minor, and whether or not those violations led to any significant failures of due process in their conviction.

4.11. In other words, the indefinite stay of execution requested by Paraguay would not be a minor measure that simply preserves the status quo. It would be a major and unprecedented intrusion by the Court into the domestic criminal process that could have far-reaching and serious effects on the administration of justice in many States, and on the role and functioning of the Court.

4.12. All States have compelling interests in the orderly administration and finality of their criminal justice systems, particularly with respect to heinous crimes of the type committed by Mr. Breard. All States have compelling interests in avoiding external judicial intervention that would interfere with the execution of a sentence that has been affirmed following an orderly judicial process meeting all relevant human rights standards.

4.13. We submit that the Court should not take a step having such potentially far-reaching consequences on the basis of a few days of hurried consideration of a suit filed at the very last moment. Before taking any action to intrude into the criminal process of a State, the Court should require Paraguay to show that it does indeed have a basis for its claim in accordance with the normal, orderly process of full proceedings under Part III of the Rules of Court. In this connection, the Court should go through the process called for by Article 63 of the Statute of the Court, which calls for notification of all States parties to the Vienna Convention so as to afford them the possibility of intervention or other submission of views to protect their own vital interests in the interpretation and application of the Convention.

4.14. Given these compelling reasons for refraining from the provisional measures sought, has Paraguay identified any basis for justifying such an extraordinary remedy? We maintain that this is not the case, since Paraguay has shown nothing to indicate that consular notification would have changed the result of the Breard case.

On April 9, 1998, the ICJ issued an order of provisional measures stating that the United States "should take all measures at its disposal to ensure that Angel Francisco Breard is not executed pending the final decision in these proceedings, and should inform the Court of all the measures which it has taken in implementation of this Order." That day, the Legal Adviser to the Department of State, David A. Andrews, wrote to the Governor of Virginia, James S. Gilmore, bringing the ICJ order to his attention and requesting that the Governor give consideration to the ICJ's indication of provisional measures.

Both Breard and Paraguay petitioned the Supreme Court for writs of certiorari. Paraguay also filed a motion for leave to file an original action in the Supreme Court, and Breard also filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. In its brief in opposition, filed April 16, 1998, the United States argued that neither Paraguay nor its official representatives had a cause of action that would afford a judicial remedy of vacatur of a criminal conviction of a Paraguayan national; that Breard could not seek in his habeas corpus petition to invalidate his conviction and sentence because of a past violation of the Vienna Convention; and that the petitioners had not shown that a judicial stay of execution was warranted. Brief for Amicus Curiae United States, Breard v. Greene, (Nos. 97–8214 and 97–1390).

On April 13 Secretary of State Madeleine Albright wrote to the Governor of Virginia, James S. Gilmore, requesting that he stay the execution of Breard.

I am writing to seek a stay of the execution of Angel Francisco Breard, who is sentenced to be executed by the Commonwealth of Virginia tomorrow, April 14.

The United States has throughout vigorously defended Virginia's right to go forward with the sentence imposed on Mr. Breard by Virginia's courts. Counsel for the U.S. Government argued strongly before the International Court that the Court should not issue the relief sought by Paraguay. We maintain, for the reasons we presented to the Court at its hearing last week, that consular notification would not have changed the outcome and that the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations does not require that Mr. Breard's conviction and sentence be vacated.

The International Court, however, was not prepared to decide the issues we raised in its urgent proceedings last week. Using non-binding language, the court said that the United States should "take all measures at its disposal to ensure that Angel Francisco Breard is not executed pending the final decision in these proceedings." The Court concurrently set an expedited briefing schedule in the case, apparently intending to hold its final hearing this fall.

In light of the Court's request, the unique and difficult foreign policy issues, and other problems created by the Court's provisional measures, I therefore request that you exercise your powers as Governor and stay Mr. Breard's execution. It is only with great reluctance that I make this request, especially given the aggravated character of the crime for which Mr. Breard has been convicted and sentenced and our view of the merits of Paraguay's legal claims. As Secretary of State, however, I have a responsibility to bear in mind the safety of Americans overseas.

I am particularly concerned about the possible negative consequences for the many U.S. citizens who live and travel abroad. The execution of Mr. Breard in the present circumstances could lead some countries to contend incorrectly that the U.S. does not take seriously its obligations under the Convention. The immediate execution of Mr. Breard in the face of the Court's April 9 action could be seen as a denial by the United States of the significance of international law and the Court's processes in its international relations and thereby limit our ability to ensure that Americans are protected when living or traveling abroad.

On April 14, 1998, the Supreme Court denied the petitions and motions in Breard v. Greene, 523 U.S. 371 (1998) and issued a per curiam opinion, with three Justices dissenting and one issuing a separate statement. The Court's opinion is excerpted below.

It is clear that Breard procedurally defaulted his claim, if any, under the Vienna Convention by failing to raise that claim in the state courts. Nevertheless, in their petitions for certiorari, both Breard and Paraguay contend that Breard's Vienna Convention claim may be heard in federal court because the Convention is the "supreme law of the land" and thus trumps the procedural default doctrine. . . . This argument is plainly incorrect for two reasons.

First, while we should give respectful consideration to the interpretation of an international treaty rendered by an international court with jurisdiction to interpret such, it has been recognized in international law that, absent a clear and express statement to the contrary, the procedural rules of the forum State govern the implementation of the treaty in that State. [citations omitted] This proposition is embodied in the Vienna Convention itself, which provides that the rights expressed in the Convention "shall be exercised in conformity with the laws and regulations of the receiving State," provided that "said laws and regulations must enable full effect to be given to the purposes for which the rights accorded under this Article are intended." Article 36(2), [1970] 21 U.S. T., at 101. It is the rule in this country that assertions of error in criminal proceedings must first be raised in state court in order to form the basis for relief in habeas. [citation omitted] Claims not so raised are considered defaulted. [citation omitted] By not asserting his Vienna Convention claim in state court, Breard failed to exercise his rights under the Vienna Convention in conformity with the laws of the United States and the Commonwealth of Virginia. Having failed to do so, he cannot raise a claim of violation of those rights now on federal habeas review.

Second, although treaties are recognized by our Constitution as the supreme law of the land, that status is no less true of provisions of the Constitution itself, to which rules of procedural default apply. We have held "that an Act of Congress . . . is on a full parity with a treaty, and that when a statute which is subsequent in time is inconsistent with a treaty, the statute to the extent of conflict renders the treaty null." Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 . . . (1957) (plurality opinion); see also Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190 . . . (1888) (holding that if a treaty and a federal statute conflict, "the one last in date will control the other"). The Vienna Convention—which arguably confers on an individual the right to consular assistance following arrest—has continuously been in effect since 1969. But in 1996, before Breard filed his habeas petition raising claims under the Vienna Convention, Congress enacted the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDPA), which provides that a habeas petitioner alleging that he is held in violation of "treaties of the United States" will, as a general rule, not be afforded an evidentiary hearing if he "has failed to develop the factual basis of [the] claim in State court proceedings." 28 U.S.C. A §§ 2254(a), (e)(2) (Supp. 1998). Breard's ability to obtain relief based on violations of the Vienna Convention is subject to this subsequently-enacted rule, just as any claim arising under the United States Constitution would be. This rule prevents Breard from establishing that the violation of his Vienna Convention rights prejudiced him. Without a hearing, Breard cannot establish how the Consul would have advised him, how the advice of his attorneys differed from the advice the Consul could have provided, and what factors he considered in electing to reject the plea bargain that the State offered him. That limitation, Breard also argues, is not justified because his Vienna Convention claims were so novel that he could not have discovered them any earlier. Assuming that were true, such novel claims would be barred on habeas review under Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288 . . . (1989).

Even were Breard's Vienna Convention claim properly raised and proven, it is extremely doubtful that the violation should result in the overturning of a final judgment of conviction without some showing that the violation had an effect on the trial. [citation omitted] In this case no such showing could even arguably be made. Breard decided not to plead guilty and to testify at his own trial contrary to the advice of his attorneys, who were likely far better able to explain the United States legal system to him than any consular official would have been. Breard's asserted prejudice—that had the Vienna Convention been followed, he would have accepted the State's offer to forgo the death penalty in return for a plea of guilty—is far more speculative than the claims of prejudice courts routinely reject in those cases where an inmate alleges that his plea of guilty was infected by attorney error. [citation omitted]

As for Paraguay's suits (both the original action and the case coming to us on petition for certiorari), neither the text nor the history of the Vienna Convention clearly provides a foreign nation a private right of action in United States' courts to set aside a criminal conviction and sentence for violation of consular notification provisions. The Eleventh Amendment provides a separate reason why Paraguay's suit might not succeed.

That Amendment's "fundamental principle" that "the States, in the absence of consent, are immune from suits brought against them . . . by a foreign State" was enunciated in Principality of Monaco v. Mississippi, 292 U.S. 313 . . . (1934). Though Paraguay claims that its suit is within an exemption dealing with continuing consequences of past violations of federal rights, see Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267 . . . (1977), we do not agree. The failure to notify the Paraguayan Consul occurred long ago and has no continuing effect. The causal link present in Milliken is absent in this case.

Insofar as the Consul General seeks to base his claims on § 1983, his suit is not cognizable. Section 1983 provides a cause of action to any "person within the jurisdiction" of the United States for the deprivation "of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws." As an initial matter, it is clear that Paraguay is not authorized to bring suit under § 1983. Paraguay is not a "person" as that term is used in § 1983. [citations omitted] Nor is Paraguay "within the jurisdiction" of the United States. And since the Consul General is acting only in his official capacity, he has no greater ability to proceed under § 1983 than does the country he represents. Any rights that the Consul General might have by virtue of the Vienna Convention exist for the benefit of Paraguay, not for him as an individual.

It is unfortunate that this matter comes before us while proceedings are pending before the ICJ that might have been brought to that court earlier. Nonetheless, this Court must decide questions presented to it on the basis of law. The Executive Branch, on the other hand, in exercising its authority over foreign relations may, and in this case did, utilize diplomatic discussion with Paraguay. Last night the Secretary of State sent a letter to the Governor of Virginia requesting that he stay Breard's execution. If the Governor wishes to wait for the decision of the ICJ, that is his prerogative. But nothing in our existing case law allows us to make that choice for him.

* * * *

Late on April 14 Governor Gilmore decided not to stay the execution and Breard was executed. The Governor issued a press statement, excerpted below.

The full text of the press release is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The concerns expressed by the Secretary of State are due great respect and I have given them serious consideration. However, it is but one of the various concerns that I must take into consideration in reaching my decision.

As Governor of Virginia my first duty is to ensure that those who reside within our borders—both American citizens and foreign nationals—may conduct their lives free from the fear of crime. Our criminal justice system is designed to provide the greatest degree of safety for law abiding citizens and foreign visitors alike while ensuring substantial procedural safeguards to those accused of crime. Indeed, in this case Mr. Breard received all of the procedural safeguards that any American citizen would receive.

I am concerned that to delay Mr. Breard's execution so that the International Court of Justice may review this matter would have the practical effect of transferring responsibility from the courts of the Commonwealth and the United States to the International Court. Should the International Court resolve this matter in Paraguay's favor, it would be difficult, having delayed the execution so that the International Court could consider the case, to then carry out the jury's sentence despite the rulings [of] the International Court.

The U.S. Department of Justice, together with Virginia's Attorney General, make a compelling case that the International Court of Justice has no authority to interfere with our criminal justice system. Indeed, the safety of those residing in the Commonwealth of Virginia is not the responsibility of the International Court of Justice. It is my responsibility and the responsibility of law enforcement and judicial officials throughout the Commonwealth. I cannot cede such responsibility to the International Court of Justice.

Breard having committed a heinous and depraved murder, his guilt being unquestioned, and the legal issues being resolved against him, and the U.S. Supreme Court having denied the petitions of Breard and Paraguay, I find no reason to interfere with his sentence. Accordingly, I decline to do so.

In accordance with the schedule established for the merits phase of its case in the ICJ, Paraguay filed its Memorial on October 9. On November 2, 1998, however, it informed the Court that it wished to discontinue the proceedings with prejudice. On November 3, the United States informed the Court that it did not oppose Paraguay's request. The same day, the U.S. Embassy in Asuncion, Paraguay, released a statement, excerpted below, which again apologized for the violation of the VCCR in Breard's case on behalf of the United States of America. The ICJ issued an order on November 10, 1998, placing the discontinuance on record and ordering that the case be removed from its list of pending cases.

On Tuesday, April 14, a Paraguayan national was executed by the State of Virginia after exhausting his legal appeals to the courts of the United States.

Mr. Breard had not been told that Paraguay's consular officials could be notified of his arrest, and that he could seek their assistance. Such notification was required by the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations and should have been made by competent United States authorities. That failure to notify Mr. Breard was unquestionably a violation of an obligation owed to the Government of Paraguay.

The Government of the United States fully recognizes the violation of the Vienna Convention in this case, and conveys its apologies to the Government and people of Paraguay.

Recognizing that United States compliance with the requirements of the Vienna Convention must improve, the Government of the United States has undertaken efforts to better educate officials throughout the United States of the consular notification requirements. . . . Consular notification is no less important to Paraguayan and other foreign nationals in the United States than to U.S. nationals outside the United States. We fully appreciate that the United States must see to it that foreign nationals in the United States receive the same treatment that we expect for our citizens overseas. We cannot have a double standard.

(ii) The LaGrand Case

On March 2, 1999, Germany filed a case in the International Court of Justice claiming that the United States failed to inform two German brothers of their right to have German consular authorities notified following their 1982 arrest for murder in violation of Article 36, paragraph 1(b) of the VCCR. See Digest 2000 at 43–93 and Digest 2001 at 21–24 for a discussion of the case.

(3) Advisory opinion of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights

On December 9, 1997, Mexico requested an advisory opinion from the Inter-American Court of Human Rights concerning the minimum judicial guarantees and due process rights accorded to foreign nationals who were not informed of their right to consular access and were subsequently sentenced to death. Mexico's request was made under Article 64(1) of the American Convention on Human Rights, 1144 U.N.T.S. 123 (opened for signature Nov. 22, 1969, entered into force July 18, 1978, reprinted in 9 ILM 673 (1970) and OAS Treaty Series No. 36, OEA/ser. A/16 (English) (1977)), which authorizes members of the Organization of American States to consult the Court concerning the interpretation of the American Convention "or of other treaties concerning the protection of human rights in the American states." Consistent with Article 61(1) of the Rules of the Court, the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights and a number of governments, including the United States (which is not a State Party to the Convention), submitted written observations on the request.

In its written submission dated June 1, 1998 (corrected on June 10), the United States argued that it was procedurally inappropriate for the Inter-American Court of Human Rights to consider Mexico's request in the context of an advisory opinion because the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations was not a human rights treaty under Article 64(1) of the American Convention; because considerations of comity should preclude any review of the Vienna Convention while proceedings were pending before the International Court of Justice (in Breard, supra); and because the petition was actually a contentious case directed against the United States in the guise of a request for an advisory opinion. On the substance of the request, the United States argued that the Vienna Convention does not create a right to consular assistance because the obligation of the receiving State to notify a detained foreign national under the Vienna Convention of the right to seek consular assistance does not give rise to an obligation for the sending state's consular authorities to provide consular assistance. Also, the United States contended, compliance with the Vienna Convention is not required for the observance of human rights in criminal cases because the international human rights instruments invoked by Mexico, and presumably the relevant municipal laws of all OAS member states, provide foreign detainees with specific fair trial rights and procedural protections. These rights must be applied in all cases, regardless of the nationality of the foreign national. Although special measures may be appropriate in some cases to ensure the effective enjoyment of human rights, the need for such measures was case specific. The United States also explained why Mexico's proposed remedies for failures to observe Article 36 were inappropriate.

II. Jurisdiction

Article 64 of the American Convention permits the Court to consider requests for advisory opinions on the interpretation of the Convention itself and "of other treaties concerning the protection of human rights in the American states.". . . .

In the present case, the issue turns on an interpretation of the obligations of States parties to the VCCR, which manifestly is not a human rights treaty. Nor is the VCCR a treaty "concerning" or "dealing with" the protection of human rights so as to confer jurisdiction upon this Court. Indeed, to paraphrase the Court's own words, the VCCR is one of those "multilateral treaties of the traditional type concluded to accomplish the reciprocal exchange of rights for the mutual benefit of the contracting States," and readily distinguished in character from "modern human rights treaties." See para. 29, OC-2/82 of September 24, 1982, "Effect of Reservations on the entry into Force of the American Convention on Human Rights," Series A. No. 2, 22 ILM 37 (1983). . . . Nor does the fact that one provision in the VCCR may authorize beneficial assistance to certain individuals in certain circumstances transform the VCCR into a human rights instrument containing "binding unilateral commitments not to violate the human rights of individuals within their jurisdiction." Id. at para. 33. Treaties concerning investment, trade, and other aspects of bilateral reciprocal relations such as ownership of land and rights of inheritance, for example, confer not only benefits but also rights on individuals, but such treaties are not considered human rights treaties within the jurisdiction of the Court.

There are other compelling reasons why the Court should, in this instance, act both judiciously and with caution. The VCCR is not in any sense a regional treaty; nor does it belong to the Inter-American system. Rather, it was adopted under the auspices of the United Nations to establish a uniform global regime for the conduct of consular relations between States. The prospect of differing interpretations of State obligations on a regional basis is inconsistent with that objective. Second, there is already pending before the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") a contentious proceeding involving the same issue that Mexico has raised in this proceeding. Indeed, that case was brought against the United States by the Republic of Paraguay, a State that has indicated an intent to participate in this proceeding. Thus, this case will necessarily involve many of the same legal and factual issues that are now before the ICJ. Prudence, if not considerations of comity, should lead this Court to defer its consideration of the pending request until after the ICJ has rendered its decision interpreting the obligations of States party to the VCCR.

Still another reason the Court should decline to exercise jurisdiction in the present proceeding is that Mexico has in fact presented a contentious case in the guise of a request for an advisory opinion. The Court has on several occasions expressed its concern over this possibility. [citations omitted]

That the subject matter of the current proceeding involves a contentious case is evident from the fact that the disputes presented by Mexico's application cannot be resolved without reference to specific facts. . . . As this is a request under Article 64(1), the Court must limit itself to the question of interpretation in general terms, without considering the particular laws and practices of a particular country. See Advisory Opinion, OC-14/94, of December 9, 1994, "International Responsibility for the Promulgation and Enforcement of Laws in Violation of the Convention (Arts. 1 and 2 of the American Convention on Human Rights)," Series A No. 14.

While Mexico alludes to a number of cases in the United States involving the death penalty and consular notification issues, the judicial record in none of the cases is before this Court. Indeed, the submission of Mexico does not even specifically identify the majority of cases on which it bases its request for an advisory opinion, and many of them apparently remain in litigation in U.S. courts. . . . [A] decision by this Court, even of an advisory nature, would necessarily involve a judicial characterization of those cases, and of the rights of the individuals and governments concerned. Moreover, such a decision could seriously compromise the integrity of the judicial systems in which these cases are pending.

III. Summary of Why Mexico's Submission Must In Any Event Be Rejected On the Merits

. . . [T]here is no support, either in the VCCR or in relevant human rights instruments, for Mexico's efforts to transform the VCCR's consular notification obligations into a necessary and universal prerequisite for the observance of human rights, or into an obligation that, if not observed, invalidates the results of a state's criminal justice system.

First, and contrary to the suggestion in Mexico's submission, the VCCR does not create a right to consular assistance. . . .

Second, the VCCR's consular notification obligation is not a prerequisite for the observance of human rights in criminal case. It does not constitute a human right enforceable in national courts in order to invalidate criminal proceedings that otherwise satisfy relevant human rights norms as reflected in national law. . . .

IV. The Vienna Convention on Consular Relations

* * * *

A. The obligations and practice of State parties under Article 36

* * * *

Article 36 provides that both notification obligations must be carried out "without delay." No more specific definition of "without delay" is to be found in the VCCR's text or in its negotiating record, and there is no basis for Mexico's suggestion that the notification must occur precisely at the time of the arrest. Rather, a defendant should be informed about consular notification following his detention or arrest, within a limited, reasonable period of time that allows authorities to determine whether the defendant is a foreign national and to complete the necessary formalities.

As a practical matter, notification at the time of arrest may not be possible. An arrest may occur in exigent circumstances, or may involve little or no communication between the arresting official and the detainee. Typically it is only when a detainee arrives at a detention facility, at the earliest, that detaining officials have a reasonable opportunity to ascertain the detainee's nationality and to advise the detainee of the possibility of notification to his consul. In some cases, the fact that a detainee is a foreign national is not known—and even cannot be known—until long after the arrest. In the United States, for example, detained foreign nationals may lie about or conceal their nationality to avoid deportation and there often is no obvious distinction between an American citizen and a foreign national.

When States have wished to agree to specify a precise time by which the consular notification procedure must be completed, they have done so by concluding agreements separate from the VCCR. For example, the United States and other States have negotiated bilateral consular agreements that provide enhanced consular protections, beyond those contained in the VCCR. In some of these enhanced agreements, the States parties have allowed each other up to four days to provide consular notification following a detention or arrest. [citation omitted] The existence of such agreements is inconsistent with Mexico's suggestion that consular notification under the VCCR must occur at the time of arrest or before a foreign national provides a statement to the authorities.

That Mexico's suggestion is untenable is also evident from the fact that Article 36 does not specify the manner in which notification to consular officials must be provided. Indeed, some countries provide notification by diplomatic note, a formal and frequently lengthy process. Notification may also occur by mail, phone, or facsimile, or even in person. Depending on the means chosen, there may be a significant delay before notification is received by consular authorities. Moreover, even in countries where notification is normally provided by telephone, completing notification depends upon the particular consular facility being open. Persons arrested in the evening or at night, on weekends or on holidays, often cannot have their detention notified to a consular official until the next business day for the consular facility, which may mean a delay of several days. During this time, even under the best of circumstances, criminal proceedings take the same course for both aliens and nationals. As a result, statements, pleas, or other events significant to a criminal proceeding may well occur either before the detainee is notified of the right to consular notification; before consular notification, if requested, is made; or before the accused speaks to a consular official. Thus, nothing in the VCCR or in state practice under the VCCR supports Mexico's suggestion that procedures in criminal cases must be brought to a halt until notification occurs.

. . . [W]hile Article 36(1)(c) establishes that consular officials must be permitted to visit their nationals in detention, to converse and correspond with them, and to arrange for their legal representation, detained persons are not required to accept such assistance, and a consular officer must refrain from taking any action on behalf of a detainee that the detainee opposes. A detainee may in fact reject consular assistance for a variety of reasons, including to protect his privacy or because of a general distrust of his own government, or because he considers it unnecessary (e.g., in the case of a long-term, assimilated resident).

More importantly, the VCCR does not obligate consular officials to provide any measure of substantive consular assistance in any case, whatever the nature of the charges or the potential penalty. . . . Governments need not assist their nationals, and some do not do so consistently, or at all. Given this practice, to suggest that there is an obligation for the receiving State to hold its criminal justice process in abeyance pending the provision of such services is untenable. . . .

. . . Indeed, Mexico's portrayal of consular assistance as a universal prerequisite to the protection of human rights proceeds from a largely imaginary and inaccurate view of the consular function.

. . . Providing a high level of consular assistance requires a commitment of human and financial resources that is beyond the capacity of many States. . . . Even countries with significant resources may limit their consular services if providing such services is not a priority for that country. Others may vary their focus on consular assistance in light of the host country involved.

Ultimately, each State decides for itself what it can and will do in aid of its nationals. Thus neither the text nor the negotiating history nor state practice supports the existence of a "right to consular assistance." On no basis, therefore, could this Court find that consular assistance is a human right, in any context. . . .

It is also relevant to note that there are significant legal limits on the prerogatives of consular authorities. Article 5(i) of the VCCR limits the rights of consular officers to represent or to arrange representation of their nationals before the authorities of the receiving State. They may do so only "subject to the practices and procedures obtaining in the receiving State." The United States does not permit foreign consular officials to act as attorneys in the United States (nor may its own consular officers abroad act as attorneys for American citizens). We believe that this is the general practice of States. Moreover, a consular official could seriously interfere with a foreign national's legal defense if the official were to undertake to provide legal advice with respect to a criminal proceeding notwithstanding the official's lack of competence to do so, or to second-guess the views of the detainees' lawyers.

Finally, Article 36 makes no distinction among different kinds of detentions. It applies regardless of the types of charges a detainee might face. . . . This is consistent with the fact that consular notification has not been understood to be an essential component of a national criminal justice proceeding against a foreign national. . . .

B. VCCR remedies and enforcement

The VCCR does not provide for a remedy in national courts for the failure of a host State to fulfill its consular notification obligation. Nor does the VCCR's Optional Protocol Concerning the Compulsory Settlement of Disputes specify such a remedy. The VCCR does not require the domestic courts of State parties to take any actions in criminal proceedings, either to give effect to its provisions or to remedy their alleged violation. Instead, the practice of States concerned about consular notification has been to follow a process of diplomatic communication and negotiation initiated by an aggrieved State.

. . . In this connection, the United States believes that the sending State has some responsibility to call to the receiving State's attention situations in which the sending State is dissatisfied with Article 36 compliance. U.S. consular officers, for example, are under standing formal instructions to raise issues of compliance with the receiving State. Conversely, when the United States hears little or nothing from a sending State about consular notification issues in the United States, it may fairly assume that the sending State is satisfied with the level of compliance, and in any event has no way of knowing if additional measures are required to improve compliance. . . .

When a consular officer learns of and is concerned about a failure of notification, a diplomatic communication may be sent to the host government protesting the failure. While such correspondence sometimes goes unanswered, more often it is investigated either by the foreign ministry or the relevant law enforcement officials of the host government. If it is learned that notification in fact was not given, it is common practice for the host government to apologize and to undertake to ensure improved future compliance. To the best of our knowledge, no State has demanded a remedy outside of the diplomatic process until consular notification recently became a subject of dispute between the United States and certain other States concerned about death sentences imposed by U.S. courts in certain cases involving their nationals. . . .

VI. Consular Notification is Not a Prerequisite For the Exercise and Protection of Human Rights.

* * * *

Indeed, to find a "human right" in the treaty obligation to notify a detained foreign national of the further right to have a consular official notified of the detention would create profoundly illogical results. It would imply that a foreign national's human rights are violated regardless of his need for consular notification (e.g., he may already be aware of the option); regardless of his need for consular assistance (e.g., he may be a long-term resident who is, for all practical purposes, like a national of the host country); and regardless of what assistance might actually have been provided (e.g., his country of nationality might have provided no services at all). And, because the general requirements of consular notification and access pertain only if there are consular relations between governments (and the specific provisions of Article 36 pertain only between State parties to the VCCR), the Mexican proposal would imply that some individuals have greater human rights than others.

* * * *

A. The purpose of the VCCR is not to establish or protect individual human rights.

It is evident from a reading of the VCCR's many related provisions that the essence of the VCCR is not the elaboration or even the protection of individual human rights. Rather its intent and effect are to establish legal rules governing relations between States, not to create rules that operate between States and individuals. . . . [T]he VCCR's text creates a body of international law rules regulating the activities of State parties as they engage in consular functions—issues such as the establishment of consular relations, the appointment of consular staff, and various exemptions from host state regulation. . . .

[T]he VCCR's very terms emphasize that it articulates the rights of States and that it was not concluded, in the first instance, to protect the rights of individuals. Consistent with this, it should not be viewed as a source of individual human rights. In two phrases, indisputably, Article 36 expresses ideas in the vocabulary of "rights." But it is important to bear in mind that Article 36 does so, not because of any notion that a human right to notification existed or should be established, but because it reflects a compromise between those countries that advocated notification to consular officials of all detentions (sometimes known as "mandatory notification") and those who argued that notification should be made only when specifically requested by the detainee. Had mandatory notification been adopted, there would have been no reference in Article 36 to the right of the individual at all, and notification to consular officials would have occurred regardless of the individual's wishes. Opponents of mandatory notification argued primarily that it would place an unmanageable burden on host countries, given the inherent difficulties of compliance. Others were concerned that the privacy interests of the detainees would be ignored—i.e., they were interested in preserving the individual's "right to privacy." Opponents of requiring notification only upon specific request were concerned that the detainee would not know that he could request notification. Ultimately, it was agreed that the detainee would be advised of the possibility of consular notification, and that notification to consular officials would be required if requested. Strictly speaking, therefore, the provision is a compromise between the State's right to consular notification and the individual's right to privacy vis-à-vis the State. This compromise was incorporated into the VCCR as a requirement to inform the individual of a "right" to have consular officials notified . . .

B. Consular notification is not a prerequisite to protecting the human rights of individuals subject to criminal proceedings.

Consular notification may in particular circumstances assist in the vindication of human rights, but it is not a necessary precondition for their observance; indeed, human rights must be observed in the absence or the presence of consular notification, access, or assistance. Certainly the obligation of States to provide individuals with consular notification does not rise to the level of the human rights recognized in the provisions of the American Declaration, the OAS Charter, or the ICCPR.

In relevant part, Article 14 of the ICCPR guarantees individuals accused of crimes equality before the courts; a fair trial before a competent tribunal; and adequate time and facilities for the preparation of a defense. The American Declaration states (in Articles II and XXVI) that individuals accused of crimes are to be presumed innocent, afforded impartial judicial hearings, and treated equally before the law, without distinction as to race, nationality, sex, and other factors. Article 3(l) of the OAS Charter, which Mexico invokes, does not enumerate specific rights, but rather makes reference in more general terms to "the fundamental rights of the individual." This Court has interpreted this as referring to the rights set forth in the American Declaration. (See Advisory Opinion OC 10/89 of July 14, 1989.) . . .

Nothing in these international instruments suggests that there exists a human right to consular notification or that such notification is a necessary prerequisite to the exercise of the rights that these instruments enshrine. And nothing in these texts indicates that consular notification—or even consular assistance—is relevant to the fair trial protections which they explicitly enumerate. . .

* * * *

C. Other means assure the effective protection of human rights in the United States.

The U.S. criminal justice system gives full effect to the important fair trial protections and procedural guarantees invoked by Mexico. These procedures and guarantees are not dependent upon consular notification, access, or assistance. . . . The U.S. Constitution—which governs both federal and state criminal proceedings—establishes a wide range of rights and legal protections for individuals charged with criminal offenses, as do other federal and state laws and regulations. These protections ensure that all persons, including foreign nationals unfamiliar with English or the U.S. judicial system, will have adequate interpreters and competent legal counsel who can advise them. Failure to honor these protections and guarantees can be corrected through appeals or other judicial remedies.

Among the most important U.S. constitutional protections are the following [citations omitted]:

1. Criminal defendants are guaranteed the right to be tried before a fair and impartial tribunal under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.
2. The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments also guarantee that persons shall not be subject to discrimination by federal and state authorities based on their race, gender, ethnicity or national origin.
3. Under the Fifth Amendment, authorities must inform detained persons of the privilege against self-incrimination (the "right to remain silent"). This privilege prevents authorities from incriminating a defendant with his own statements unless the individual has "knowingly and intelligently" waived this constitutional privilege. Waiver of this privilege would not be considered "knowing" if the defendant did not comprehend his rights, whether because of language difficulties, or for other reasons.

4. Under the Sixth Amendment, defendants are entitled to (1) be informed promptly, and in detail, of all charges made against them; (2) a public trial by jury in all criminal prosecutions; (3) effective legal representation—supplied at public expense if they cannot afford an attorney; and (4) adequate time and opportunity to prepare a defense and consult with counsel.
5. Of particular importance to some foreign nationals is the fact that U.S. courts have interpreted the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to embrace the right to be assisted by an interpreter if a defendant does not understand English language proceedings.
6. While Mexico suggests that consular assistance is needed to ensure that evidence on the defendant's behalf is discovered, in fact U.S. courts have interpreted the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments as providing a constitutional right to the assistance of investigators and experts where a particularized need for such assistance can be demonstrated.
7. The ex post facto clause of the U.S. Constitution, Article I, Section 9, bars retroactive increases in the penalties available in criminal cases. The operation of this clause forbids the government from imposing a penalty (including the death penalty) on an offender for a crime that was not subject to such punishment at the time it was committed.
8. The death penalty may be carried out only under laws in effect at the time the crime was committed, subject to the extensive due process and equal protection requirements of the U.S. Constitution, and after exhaustive appeals. U.S. law provides special protections for those accused of capital offenses. For example, in addition to the usual requirements enumerated above:
   — Automatic review of the conviction as well as the sentence is mandatory in nearly every state whose laws provide for capital punishment. Such review serves to safeguard against the possibility that capital punishment might be imposed capriciously, arbitrarily, or disproportionately. Typically, review is undertaken regardless of the defendant's wishes and is conducted by the state's highest appellate court.

— In those few states not providing for automatic review, the defendant may elect to appeal the sentence, the conviction, or both.

— The U.S. Supreme Court has determined that when a sentencing jury is empowered to impose either capital punishment or a sentence of life imprisonment, the jury must be informed whether, in the latter case, the defendant would be ineligible for parole. This is because ineligibility for parole may cause a jury to recommend a life sentence instead of death.

— A state may not prohibit acts of executive clemency, including amnesty, pardon, and commutation of sentence. Such measures may provide relief from convictions that have been affirmed when no further recourse to the judicial process is available, including in cases where new evidence suggests the possibility of innocence.

— Persons who were under sixteen years of age at the time of the crime may not receive capital punishment in the United States.

— Both Federal and State law provide significant protection against the trial, conviction and punishment of individuals with significant mental infirmities or disabilities. U.S. law prohibits the execution of the insane. In many states, a defendant cannot be held responsible if he or she reacted to an "irresistible impulse" or is incapable of acting responsibly by reason of mental or emotional disability. Moreover, no one who is not mentally competent can be forced to stand trial in the United States. Similarly, an individual cannot be executed unless he or she is both aware of the punishment and of the reason why it is to be imposed. The legal standard for competence, together with the bar on the prosecution of the insane and the other > defenses mentioned above, limit significantly the prosecution of persons with mental disabilities.

Foreign nationals in the U.S. criminal justice system enjoy all of these rights under international law and U.S. law. The United States and the several states of the United States are obligated to honor these rights, regardless of the status of consular notification, and regardless of whether defendants have received substantive consular assistance. If fair trial and due process protections have been violated, the affected individuals are entitled to judicial remedies, no matter their nationality, and no matter the status of consular notification. The failure to provide consular notification does not, however, violate these rights and protections, and cannot itself cause or constitute a violation of them. These rights must be provided in any event.

In its submission to the Court, Mexico expresses concern that the fair trial rights and due process protections of Mexican nationals in U.S. criminal proceedings will not be vindicated in the absence of consular notification. Mexico merely makes the point that consular assistance—if and when it is provided—may enhance the operation of the rights and protections traditionally recognized under international law. This could be true in a particular case, but it does not compel or even justify the legal conclusion that consular notification must be accorded the status of a human right that may be enforced through domestic legal systems to set aside otherwise valid convictions and sentences.

It is unnecessary, and it would be unwise, to create a universal presumption that failure to provide consular notification must invalidate subsequent criminal convictions. Such a presumption would be diametrically at odds with the VCCR and the practice of States, which do not link consular notification to the criminal process, and would ignore the large variety of real-world circumstances that may exist in a particular case. Moreover, whether or not consular notification has occurred, if there exists a question about the fundamental fairness of a judicial proceeding, or (in the United States) about compliance with one of the specific rights just described, the resulting inquiry properly focuses on whether such rights explicitly guaranteed by international instruments (and, in turn, by municipal law) have been violated. For example: Was the defendant's right to prepare an adequate defense given effect? And did the defendant receive the assistance of competent, effective counsel?

These are important questions. They can be answered only upon a proper judicial inquiry into the facts of each case in which a human rights violation has been alleged. Mexico confuses and distorts the inquiry by asking this Court to deem the failure to provide consular notification to be a violation of fair trial rights and due process protections per se—that is, in every present and future case, without regard to the particular facts and circumstances. . . .

E. Consular notification has no special role in cases involving application of the death penalty.

Mexico has stressed its concern regarding cases involving potential application of the death penalty. It has suggested that special protections should be extended to criminal defendants who may be sentenced to death. . . .

Mexico asks the Court to enshrine a new human right to consular notification, without which the death penalty cannot lawfully be prescribed. Mexico has not argued and cannot demonstrate, however, that the numerous and rigorous protections already provided to defendants in capital cases in the United States are insufficient under international law. . . . Moreover, it is difficult to see how standards for the protection of human rights can properly be set at a much higher level in death penalty cases than in other equally or more serious cases that may lead to penalties other than death, such as life or other lengthy imprisonment; or indeed than in any other criminal matter. If the right to consular notification is essential to the protections of human rights, then it properly attaches, at a minimum, in any legal proceeding which threatens a significant deprivation of a defendant's liberty.

F. Mexico's argument has serious implications for the criminal justice systems of VCCR parties.

. . . If the Court were to follow Mexico's suggestion, it would call into question the basic fairness and sufficiency of any criminal proceeding potentially resulting in significant imprisonment, in which consular notification regrettably did not occur—even if the defendant was served by competent counsel, investigators, and translators. There is no basis in international law, logic, or morality for such a judgment and for the resulting disruption and dishonor to the many States parties to the VCCR.

VII. The Failure to Provide Consular Notification Is Not Discriminatory and Does Not Violate the Right to Equality Before the Law.

In its request, the Government of Mexico makes reference to the rights to non-discrimination and equality before the law. One must ask, therefore, in what respect and under what circumstances the failure to provide consular notification bears on either of these rights.

* * * *

We do not understand the Government of Mexico to be raising the question of discrimination or equality as between persons of differing nationalities, however. Rather, it appears that the question of possible discrimination or inequality is raised as between citizens of the State which is responsible for the detention and citizens of other States. In this context, it is not the presence or absence of consular notification which is relevant (since consular notification is never given to nationals of the detaining State). Rather, the question is whether there is discrimination or unequal treatment with respect to the enjoyment of recognized due process and other relevant rights.

Foreign nationals are entitled to the same access to courts, and the same treatment before the courts, as are citizens of a host country. The U.S. Constitution enshrines this principle in its Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment, as do the constitutions of the constituent states of the United States. . . .

Mexico's submission appears to suggest, however, that foreign nationals merit special protections of their human rights, above and beyond those applicable to citizens of a host State. Mexico has invited the Court to declare the existence of a special form of human rights protection that benefits only a narrow class of persons detained in a foreign country—foreign nationals of States that have consular relations with the host State.

While it is recognized that special measures in some cases may be appropriate to ensure the adequate and effective enjoyment of human rights, this analysis is highly case- and fact-specific. . . . Accordingly, this Court should reject any conclusion that the right to non-discrimination or equality before the law is violated per se on the basis of nationality. Ultimately, the suggestion that foreign nationals merit special rights is itself contrary to the principles of non-discrimination and equality.

VIII. Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, the United States submits that the Court should decline Mexico's invitation to rule that the individual rights and protections applicable in criminal proceedings and expressed in the American Declaration, the OAS Charter and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights encompass a human right to consular notification; that notification must be given at the time of arrest or before a statement is made by the detainee; and that any particular remedy is required when the death penalty is imposed in cases involving failures of notification.

Instead, the Court should conclude that:

1. Compliance with the consular notification requirements of Article 36 is important and all States party to the VCCR should endeavor to improve their compliance.
2. Consular notification is not a human right, as such, but rather a duty of States that have entered into consular relations with other States that is intended to benefit individuals as well as States.

3. Consular notification does not imply a right to or require any particular level of consular assistance.
4. Where consular relations exist between States, consular notification nevertheless may result in consular assistance that could assist a foreign national who is subject to criminal proceedings in the receiving State.
5. The essence of the individual rights and protections applicable in criminal proceedings is as expressed in the American Declaration, the OAS Charter, and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.
6. All persons are entitled to fair criminal proceedings, regardless of the penalty that may be imposed, and foreign nationals must be accorded fair criminal proceedings regardless of whether they receive consular notification.
7. The failure of a host State to inform a foreign national that consular authorities may be notified of his detention may properly result in diplomatic measures that seek to address such a failure and improve future compliance; in any event, the appropriate remedy for a failure of notification can only be evaluated on a case-by-case basis in light of the actual practice of States and the consular relations between the States concerned.

The Inter-American Court issued its advisory opinion on October 1, 1999. The Right to Information on Consular Assistance in the Framework of the Guarantees of the Due Process of Law, Advisory Opinion OC-16/99 of October 1, 1999, Inter-Am. Ct. H.R. (Ser A) No. 16 (1999).

141. . . .

unanimously

That it is competent to render the present Advisory Opinion.

IT IS OF THE OPINION

Unanimously,

1. That Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations confers rights upon detained foreign nationals, among them the right to information on consular assistance, and that said rights carry with them correlative obligations for the host State.

Unanimously,

2. That Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations concerns the protection of the rights of a national of the sending State and is part of the body of international human rights law.

Unanimously,

3. That the expression "without delay" in Article 36(1)(b) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations means that the State must comply with its duty to inform the detainee of the rights that article confers upon him, at the time of his arrest or at least before he makes his first statement before the authorities.

Unanimously,

4. That the enforceability of the rights that Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations confers upon the individual is not subject to the protests of the sending State.

Unanimously,

5. That articles 2, 6, 14 and 50 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights concern the protection of human rights in the American States.

Unanimously,

6. That the individual's right to information established in Article 36(1)(b) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations allows the right to the due process of law recognized in Article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights to have practical effects in concrete cases; Article 14 establishes minimum guarantees that can be amplified in the light of other international instruments such as the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, which expand the scope of the protection afforded to the accused.

By six votes to one,
7. That failure to observe a detained foreign national's right to information, recognized in Article 36(1)(b) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, is prejudicial to the due process of law and, in such circumstances, imposition of the death penalty is a violation of the right not to be deprived of life "arbitrarily", as stipulated in the relevant provisions of the human rights treaties (e.g. American Convention on Human Rights, Article 4; International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Article 6), with the juridical consequences that a violation of this nature carries, in other words, those pertaining to the State's international responsibility and the duty to make reparation.
Judge Jackman dissenting.
Unanimously,
8. That the international provisions that concern the protection of human rights in the American States, including the right recognized in Article 36(1)(b) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, must be respected by the American States Party to the respective conventions, regardless of whether theirs is a federal or unitary structure.

The United States subsequently made clear that it disagreed with and would not accept the Court's decision. See, e.g., Counter-Memorial of the United States filed in the International Court of Justice in Avena and Other Mexican Nationals (Mexico v. the United States of America) at 6.84, excerpted in Digest 2003 at 43–103 and available at www.icj-cij.org/icjwww/idocket/imus/imusframe.htm.

2. Consular Assistance

a. Department of State travel advisory system

On May 22, 1992, Acting Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger approved a new travel advisory system for the Department of State designed to expand the type of information distributed to U.S. citizens traveling and residing abroad, to make it more understandable, and to reinforce the "no double standard" policy that the government should not disseminate threat information to U.S. government employees without similarly advising U.S. citizens subject to the same threat. For discussion of the previous policies on travel advisories, see 1 Cumulative Digest 1981–1988, at 624–26.

Excerpts from a telegram dated July 22, 1992, sent to all diplomatic and consular posts announcing the new system, which would use two categories of travel advisories, follow below.

The full text of the telegram is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

2. As you know, the Bureau of Consular Affairs has long provided information to the American traveling public in the form of travel advisories. This is an extremely important discretionary activity undertaken as part of the Department's consular responsibilities for assisting U.S. citizens overseas. . . .

3. Essentially the new system will pare the three general categories of travel advisories—warnings, cautions, and notices—down to two: Travel Warnings and Consular Information Sheets. Warnings will be issued only when we recommend avoidance of travel to a certain country when a situation is so dangerous or unstable that a U.S. citizen is likely to be adversely affected by travel to that country and the U.S. Government's ability to assist that citizen is severely constrained as in the case of an embassy drawdown or closure. Cautions and notices will be consolidated into the new Consular Information Sheets. The information sheets will provide factual information on every country.

4. Consular Information Sheets will include such information as the location of the U.S. embassy or consulate in the subject country, unusual immigration practices, health conditions, minor political disturbances, unusual currency and entry regulations, crime and security information (including terrorist incidents), drug penalties and areas of instability. Countries for which deferral of travel is recommended will have Travel Warnings as well as Consular Information Sheets.

5. If an unstable situation in a country does not warrant a warning, we would appropriately and factually include a description of the unstable area in an information sheet. Thus, it provides the public with the same degree of information but with greater consistency to enable them to make an informed decision about travel plans to a country or portion thereof. On limited occasions and to avoid a double standard we will restate in the information sheet any embassy security advice given to official employees.

6. I expect this system to be implemented in a manner consistent with the Department's "no double standard" policy, under which we do not disseminate important security information to only selective potential travelers when the information is relevant to a broader group. All Department personnel involved in implementing the system should be aware that this policy has a statutory basis, in that we are prohibited by law from notifying a civil aviation threat to only selective potential travelers, unless the threat applies only to them. This mandate reflects strong concern that the Government should not protect U.S. Government employees without similarly protecting U.S. citizens subject to the same threat. The "no double standard" rule accordingly is now applied by the Department to all threat notifications, not just to those involving civil aviation. The Department will adhere strictly to this policy in implementing the new travel advisory system. Thus, if an embassy is giving important security advice to its employees, this information will be quoted in the information sheets unless it clearly is relevant only to Government employees.

* * * *

A third category of travel advisory, "public announcements," was added subsequently, as described in the following excerpt from a May 29, 1998, telegram from the Department of State to all diplomatic and consular posts concerning the travel advisory program. The full text of the telegram is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

PUBLIC ANNOUNCEMENTS (PA)
4. Events of a transitory nature concerning safety, security, and sometimes health . . . affect a country, only part of a country, or several countries in a region such that inclusion in the more general CIS [Consular Information Sheet] or TW [Travel Warning] would be inappropriate. PA's do not address matters such as hotel room shortages; this type of information is available through travel agencies and other private sector sources. They are not used to warn about endemic or epidemic diseases or health conditions unless they are so grave that local authorities have taken measures directly affecting the traveling public (e.g., quarantine of an area). In general, PA's are used to disseminate information quickly about terrorist threats and other relatively short-term and/or transnational conditions posing significant risks to the security of U.S. citizen travelers unless they are so grave that local authorities have taken measures directly affecting the traveling public (e.g., quarantine of an area). In extraordinary circumstances, a PA concerning a worldwide threat may be issued. PA's are frequently used to share with the broader U.S. public information to be released by a particular post through its warden network. This ensures that all citizens have access to relevant information and helps avoid a "double standard" problem. Consular PA's should be crafted to provide comprehensive information about a potentially dangerous situation. . . . Public Announcements have expiration dates. If the situation meriting the PA in a specific country is likely to extend beyond the expiration date of the PA, the CIS for the country should be revised to include information on the circumstances that triggered the PA. All posts are notified . . . whenever a PA is issued or rescinded.

b. Provision of information on certain violent crimes abroad to victims and victims' families

Section 307 of the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1998, Pub. L. No. 105–107, 111 Stat. 2248, enacted November 20, 1997, set forth below, required the Secretary of State to take appropriate actions to make information (including classified information) that the U.S. Government possessed concerning the killing, abduction, torture, or other serious mistreatment of U.S. citizens abroad available to the victims of such crimes, or, when appropriate, to U.S. citizen family members of such victims.

* * * *

SEC. 307. PROVISION OF INFORMATION ON CERTAIN VIOLENT CRIMES ABROAD TO VICTIMS AND VICTIMS' FAMILIES.

* * * *

(b) RESPONSIBILITY.—The Secretary of State shall take appropriate actions to ensure that the United States Government takes all appropriate actions to—
(1) identify promptly information (including classified information) in the possession of the departments and agencies of the United States Government regarding the killing, abduction, torture, or other serious mistreatment of United States citizens abroad; and
(2) subject to subsection (c), promptly make such information available to—
(A) the victims of such crimes; or
(B) when appropriate, the family members of the victims of such crimes if such family members are United States citizens.
(c) LIMITATIONS.—The Secretary shall work with the heads of appropriate departments and agencies of the United States Government in order to ensure that information relevant to a crime covered by subsection (b) is promptly reviewed and, to the maximum extent practicable, without jeopardizing sensitive sources and methods or other vital national security interests, or without jeopardizing an on-going criminal investigation or proceeding, made available under that subsection unless such disclosure is specifically prohibited by law.

The Conference Report, H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 105–350, at 22 (1997), clarified that the "term 'information' [is intended] to be construed to mean information that is not available to the victims or families unless provided to them by the United States Government."

c. Deaths and estates of United States citizens overseas

(i) Consular officer functions

Section 234(b) of the Admiral James W. Nance and Meg Donovan Foreign Relations Authorizations Act, Fiscal Years 2000 and 2001, H.R. 3427, 106th Cong. (1999), which was enacted into law by § 1000(a)(7) of the Consolidated FY2000 Appropriations Act, Pub. L. No. 106–113, 113 Stat. 1501A-426, (codified as 22 U.S.C. § 2715c (2004)), replaced and modernized the existing statutory provisions relating to the traditional consular function of protection, conservation and disposition of the estates of Americans who die overseas in certain circumstances. The report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 2000–2001, S. Rep. No. 106–43, at 13–14 (1999), excerpted below, explained the new provisions.

This section would repeal 22 U.S.C. 4195 and replace it with new provisions in the State Department Basic Authorities Act to provide a revised statutory basis for the traditional consular function of protection and conservation, and ultimately disposition, of the estates of Americans who die overseas in those cases where a legal representative is not appointed by the heirs or other beneficiaries within a reasonable time. This section also provides a number of specific authorities not found in the original law which have been proposed by the Department of State based on its experience with the current law.

Subsection (b) amends the State Department Basic Authorities Act to provide for reports of death and notification of next-of-kin in certain cases of American citizens dying overseas. The new section 43A of the Act would specifically authorize reports of presumptive death to be issued in the absence of a report by a local authority pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Secretary.

The new section 43B would deal with the overseas conservation and disposition of estates of Americans who die abroad. It authorizes a consular officer to act as the provisional conservator of the U.S. citizen decedent's estate and take possession of the personal effects within his or her jurisdiction. Until 1996, 22 U.S.C. 4195 provided for consular officers to transfer unclaimed estates to the General Accounting Office and for that Office to conserve the property by various means, including sale of personal property and deposit of the net proceeds in the Treasury in trust for potential claimants. However, in the absence of valid claims after a period of years, such proceeds would be turned over to the U.S. State of last known domicile or, if not known, placed in miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury.

In 1996, P.L. 104–316 substituted the Department of State or Secretary of State for the General Accounting Office, but made no procedural changes. Experience since that time, given the increasing number of Americans who establish permanent residence overseas and acquire interests in real property, and the related number of them who die intestate without clear ties to any particular U.S. State, has led the Department of State to propose expanded, more flexible authority to deal with both real and personal property, particularly where legal representatives or claimants cannot be located within a reasonable time. . . . Section 43B also provides authority to conserve and settle estates, including passage of title to the State Department for disposition of unclaimed property in accordance with the rules for domestic surplus United States Government property. Under the proposed procedures, after an initial waiting period of one year, followed by a further period of five full fiscal years, subsequent claims would be paid as refunds from the Treasury, which would have received the net proceeds of disposition as miscellaneous receipts. Title to any real property in an estate which is unclaimed by the end of an identified waiting period, shall pass to the Secretary who would retain the property if useful to the Department or dispose of the estate in the same manner as surplus U.S. Government-owned property. Such property would be considered foreign excess property under title IV of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949.

(ii) Disposition of unidentified remains of victims of aviation disasters

In a February 17, 1998, response to a letter from James Hall, Chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board, excerpted below, Katherine Peterson, the Managing Director of Overseas Citizens Services for the Department of State's Bureau of Consular Affairs, described the Department's experience with respect to the disposition of unidentified remains of victims of aviation disasters abroad.

. . . The question arose in connection with the crash of KAL Flight 801 in Guam. I understand that the Government of Korea has proposed that all of the unidentified remains be sent to Korea for interment. In as much as some of those remains are American citizens, we have some serious reservations about that course of action. We would endorse, however, the concept of the cremation of the unidentified remains, including remains of possible U.S. citizen victims, and distribution of the ashes to family members of unidentified victims including both Americans and Koreans, and perhaps the interment of some ashes in a memorial at the site of the crash in Guam, provided the families receive prior consultation.

A review of the State Department's collective experience regarding disposition of remains of victims of foreign aviation disasters over the past twenty years reflects that, traditionally, unidentified remains have been buried locally in the place where the disaster occurred. In circumstances where culture, health regulations, or the condition of the remains dictate that cremation take place, ashes have been interred locally. Whether burial or cremation takes place, a collective memorial service for the victims has been conducted in the country where the tragedy occurred. In the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, for example, unidentified remains were buried in Lockerbie, Scotland, where a memorial service occurred. More recently, in the 1997 crash of a Garuda flight in Indonesia, unidentified remains, including the possible remains of a U.S. citizen, were interred in a single burial site in Indonesia following a memorial service.

I understand that the concept under consideration for resolution of the disposition of the unidentified remains from the KAL 801 disaster is that the remains be cremated, and ashes shared among the families of the Koreans and U.S. citizen victims. This proposal is similar to a practice offered by the Department of Defense POW/MIA Office regarding disposition of co-mingled ashes of POW/MIA military and U.S. civilian victims of the war in South East Asia. . . .

We believe it is essential that the families of the U.S. citizen victims of KAL 801 should be consulted carefully before any agreement is reached with the Government of Korea regarding the disposition of unidentified remains. Shipment of unidentified remains or ashes abroad in a domestic commercial aviation disaster would constitute a meaningful precedent, and therefore should be approached with particular concern for the U.S. citizen victims and their families and for the sensibilities of the local authorities where the disaster occurred.

d. Performance of consular functions by civil service employees rather than foreign service officers

Section 127 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1994 and 1995, Pub. L. No. 103–236, as amended by section (1)(mm)(2) of Pub. L. No. 103–415, 22 U.S.C. § 4221 (2004), authorized the Secretary of State to designate U.S. citizen employees abroad, other than consular officers, to perform notarial and passport services. Section 2222 of the Omnibus Appropriations Act, 1999, Pub. L. No. 105–277, 122 Stat. 2681 (1998), further authorized the Secretary to designate U.S. citizen employees of the Department of State with appropriate training to issue consular reports of birth abroad (22 U.S.C. § 2705); to authenticate foreign documents for use in U.S. criminal cases (including taking testimony on oral or written interrogatories pursuant to the commission of a U.S. court) (22 U.S.C. § 4191 and 18 U.S.C. §§ 3492–3496); to administer oaths for patent purposes (35 U.S.C. § 115); and to make determinations of nationality under the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, as amended, 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(9).

B. CHILDREN

1. International Child Abduction

a. Interpretation and application of the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction by U.S. courts

(1) Wrongful removal

Article 3 of the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, October 25, 1980, T.I.A.S. No. 11670 ("the Hague Abduction Convention" or "Hague Convention") provides:

The removal or the retention of a child is to be considered wrongful where—> a) it is in breach of rights of custody attributed to a person, an institution or any other body, either jointly or alone, under the law of the State in which the child was habitually resident immediately before the removal or retention; and > b) at the time of removal or retention those rights were actually exercised, either jointly or alone, or would have been so exercised but for the removal or retention.

> The rights of custody mentioned in sub-paragraph a) above, may arise in particular by operation of law or by reason of a judicial or administrative decision, or by reason of an agreement having legal effect under the law of that State.

(i) Habitual residence of the child

In Friedrich v. Friedrich ("Friedrich I"), 983 F.2d 1396 (6th Cir. 1993), excerpted below, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit elucidated how a child's "habitual residence" was to be determined under Article 3 of the Hague Abduction Convention.

* * * *

In December 1989, Emanuel Friedrich married Jeana Friedrich in the Federal Republic of Germany. Mrs. Friedrich, a citizen of the United States, was a member of the United States Army stationed in Bad Aibling, Germany. Mr. Friedrich, a citizen of Germany, was employed on the military base as a bartender and club manager.

On December 29, 1989, the Friedrichs' only child, Thomas David Friedrich, was born in Bad Aibling. During 1990 and early 1991, Thomas lived with both of his parents in Bad Aibling off the military base. The Friedrichs' marriage was a rocky one from the start. . . .

On the evening of July 27, 1991, the Friedrichs had a heated argument at their apartment. During the argument, Mr. Friedrich ordered Mrs. Friedrich to leave the apartment with Thomas and put most of their belongings in the hallway, including some of Thomas's toys. Mrs. Friedrich, however, did not leave the apartment until the next morning when she obtained assistance from friends in the United States Army. Together, they took Thomas and removed her possessions to on-base visiting quarters, where she lived with Thomas for the next four nights, until August 1, 1991. Mr. Friedrich did not interfere with the removal of Mrs. Friedrich's possessions or with the removal of his child. He explained that he was intimidated by the soldiers and wanted to avoid a scene in front of Thomas.

. . . In the late evening of August 1, 1991, without Mr. Friedrich's permission, consent or knowledge, Mrs. Friedrich left Bad Aibling en route to the United States with Thomas.

Mr. Friedrich discovered that Thomas had been removed to the United States on August 3, 1991, and filed a claim in Germany seeking to obtain parental custody soon afterward. On August 22, 1991, a Municipal Court-Family Court in Rosenheim, Germany granted Mr. Friedrich parental custody of Thomas. Mrs. Friedrich did not receive notice of that judicial proceeding. Friedrich filed this action on September 23, 1991, alleging that Mrs. Friedrich had wrongfully removed Thomas from Germany in violation of the Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. On January 10, 1992, the district court denied Mr. Friedrich's claim.

* * * *

The Convention does not define "habitual residence." Little case law exists on the Convention in general; no United States cases provide guidance on the construction of "habitual residence." The British courts have provided the most complete analysis. In In Re Bates, No. CA 122.89, High Court of Justice, Family Div'n Ct. Royal Court of Justice, United Kingdom (1989), the High Court of Justice concluded that there is no real distinction between ordinary residence and habitual residence. Id. At 10. The court also added a word of caution:

> "It is greatly to be hoped that the courts will resist the temptation to develop detailed and restrictive rules as to habitual residence, which might make it as technical a term of art as common law domicile. The facts and circumstances of each case should continue to be assessed without resort to presumptions or pre-suppositions."

Id. (quoting Dicey & Morris, The Conflicts of Laws 166 (11th ed.)). We agree that habitual residence must not be confused with domicile. To determine the habitual residence, the court must focus on the child, not the parents, and examine past experience, not future intentions.

Thomas was born in Germany to a German father and an American mother and lived exclusively in Germany except for a few short vacations before Mrs. Friedrich removed him to the United States. Mrs. Friedrich argues that despite the fact that Thomas's ordinary residence was always in Germany, Thomas was actually a habitual resident of the United States because: 1) he had United States citizenship; 2) his permanent address for the purpose of the United States documentation was listed as Ironton, Ohio; and 3) Mrs. Friedrich intended to return to the United States with Thomas when she was discharged from the military. Although these ties may be strong enough to establish legal residence in the United States, they do not establish habitual residence.

A person can have only one habitual residence. On its face, habitual residence pertains to customary residence prior to the removal. The court must look back in time, not forward. All of the factors listed by Mrs. Friedrich pertain to the future. Moreover, they reflect the intentions of Mrs. Friedrich; it is the habitual residence of the child that must be determined. Mrs. Friedrich undoubtedly established ties between Thomas and the United States and may well have intended for Thomas to move to the United States at some time in the future. But before Mrs. Friedrich removed Thomas to the United States without the knowledge or consent of Mr. Friedrich, Thomas had resided exclusively in Germany. Any future plans that Mrs. Friedrich had for Thomas to reside in the United States are irrelevant to our inquiry.

The district court appears to agree that before the argument of July 27, 1991, Thomas was a habitual resident of Germany. The district court, however, found that Thomas's habitual residence was "altered" from Germany to the United States when Mr. Friedrich forced Mrs. Friedrich and Thomas to leave the family apartment.

Habitual residence cannot be so easily altered. Even if we accept the district court's finding that Mr. Friedrich forced Mrs. Friedrich to leave the family apartment, no evidence supports a finding that Mr. Friedrich forced Mrs. Friedrich to remove Thomas from Germany; Mr. Friedrich was not even aware of the removal until after the fact. Thomas's temporary three-day stay on a United States military base did not transfer his habitual residence to the United States, even if it was precipitated by Mr. Friedrich's angry actions in a marital dispute. As a threshold matter, a United States military base is not sovereign territory of the United States. The military base in Bad Aibling is on land which belongs to Germany and which the United States Armed Services occupy only at the pleasure of the German government. See Dare v. Secretary of Air Force, 608 F. Supp. 1077, 1080 (D. Del. 1985).

More fundamentally, Thomas's habitual residence in Germany is not predicated on the care or protection provided by his German father nor does it shift to the United States when his American mother assumes the role of primary caretaker. Thomas's habitual residence can be "altered" only by a change in geography and the passage of time, not by changes in parental affection and responsibility. The change in geography must occur before the questionable removal; here, the removal precipitated the change in geography. If we were to determine that by removing Thomas from his habitual residence without Mr. Friedrich's knowledge or consent Mrs. Friedrich "altered" Thomas's habitual residence, we would render the Convention meaningless. It would be an open invitation for all parents who abduct their children to characterize their wrongful removals as alterations of habitual residence.

(ii) "Right of custody"

In Croll v. Croll, 66 F. Supp. 2d 554 (S.D.N.Y. 1999), a U.S. district court held that a ne exeat clause requiring a non-custodial father's consent to remove the child from the country conferred a "right of custody" on the father within the meaning of Article 3 of the Hague Abduction Convention. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed and remanded in Croll v. Croll, 229 F.3d 133 (2d Cir. 2000) ("A foundational assumption in the Convention is that the remedy of return will deliver the child to a custodial parent who (by definition) will receive and care for the child. It does not contemplate return of a child to a parent whose sole right—to visit or veto—imposes no duty to give care."), cert. denied, 534 U.S. 949 (2001). See also Loos v. Manuel, 651 A.2d 1077 (N.J. Super. Ct. Ch. Div. 1994) (German foster parents did not have "rights of custody"); Meredith v. Meredith, 759 F. Supp. 1432 (D. Ariz. 1991) (mother with no rights of custody could not petition for return of daughter to England); Morton v. Morton, 982 F. Supp. 675 (D. Neb. 1997) (court gave "full faith and credit" to holding by Utah state court that father's visitation rights coupled with requirement that parents give 90 days notice of intent to move constituted a "right of custody"); Bromley v. Bromley, 30 F. Supp. 2d 857 (E.D. Pa. 1998) (where mother had sole custody, court had no jurisdiction to enforce father's visitation rights); David S. v. Zamira S., 574 N.Y.S.2d 429 (N.Y. Fam. Ct. 1991) (relying in part on respondent's contemptuous conduct in removing children in violation of order prohibiting removal of the children from Ontario in deciding that petitioner had a right of custody within the meaning of the Convention); Viragh v. Foldes, 612 N.E.2d 241 (Mass. 1993) (Convention does not provide remedy of return for denial of rights of visitation); Janakakis-Kostun v. Janakakis, 6 S.W.3d 843 (Ky. Ct. App. 1999) (temporary order granting custody to respondent and prohibiting removal of child from Greece gave petitioner a right of custody within the meaning of the Convention).

(iii) "Exercise" of custody rights

In the second round of litigation in Friedrich v. Friedrich ("Friedrich II"), 78 F.3d 1060 (6th Cir. 1996), excerpted below with footnotes omitted, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit set forth the legal standard for determining when a parent is "exercising" custody rights to a child at the moment of removal. See also Pesin v. Rodriguez, 77 F. Supp. 2d 1277 (S.D. Fla. 1999) (although father stayed in separate quarters during vacation and later did not live with children, he "exercised" his custody rights by eating dinner with, visiting, and telephoning children).

Mrs. Friedrich also argues that, even if Mr. Friedrich had custody rights under German law, he was not exercising those custody rights as contemplated by the Hague Convention. She argues that, since custody rights include the care for the person and property of the child, Mr. Friedrich was not exercising custody rights because he was not paying for or taking care of the child during the brief period of separation in Germany.

The Hague Convention does not define "exercise." As judges in a common law country, we can easily imagine doing so ourselves. One might look to the law of the foreign country to determine if custody rights existed de jure, and then develop a test under the general principles of the Hague Convention to determine what activities—financial support, visitation—constitute sufficient exercise of de jure rights. The question in our immediate case would then be: "was Mr. Friedrich's single visit with Thomas and plans for future visits with Thomas sufficient exercise of custodial rights for us to justify calling the removal of Thomas wrongful?" One might even approach a distinction between the exercise of "custody" rights and the exercise of "access" or "visitation" rights. If Mr. Friedrich, who has de jure custody, was not exercising sufficient de facto custody, Thomas's removal would not be wrongful.

We think it unwise to attempt any such project. Enforcement of the Convention should not to be made dependent on the creation of a common law definition of "exercise." The only acceptable solution, in the absence of a ruling from a court in the country of habitual residence, is to liberally find "exercise" whenever a parent with de jure custody rights keeps, or seeks to keep, any sort of regular contact with his or her child.

We see three reasons for this broad definition of "exercise." First, American courts are not well suited to determine the consequences of parental behavior under the law of a foreign country. It is fairly easy for the courts of one country to determine whether a person has custody rights under the law of another country. It is also quite possible for a court to determine if an order by a foreign court awards someone "custody" rights, as opposed to rights of "access." Far more difficult is the task of deciding, prior to a ruling by a court in the abducted-from country, if a parent's custody rights should be ignored because he or she was not acting sufficiently like a custodial parent. A foreign court, if at all possible, should refrain from making such policy-oriented decisions concerning the application of German law to a child whose habitual residence is, or was, Germany.

Second, an American decision about the adequacy of one parent's exercise of custody rights is dangerously close to forbidden territory: the merits of the custody dispute. The German court in this case is perfectly capable of taking into account Mr. Friedrich's behavior during the August 1991 separation, and the German court presumably will tailor its custody order accordingly. A decision by an American court to deny return to Germany because Mr. Friedrich did not show sufficient attention or concern for Thomas's welfare would preclude the German court from addressing these issues—and the German court may well resolve them differently.

Third, the confusing dynamics of quarrels and informal separations make it difficult to assess adequately the acts and motivations of a parent. An occasional visit may be all that is available to someone left, by the vagaries of marital discord, temporarily without the child. Often the child may be avoided, not out of a desire to relinquish custody, but out of anger, pride, embarrassment, or fear, vis a vis the other parent. Reading too much into a parent's behavior during these difficult times could be inaccurate and unfair. Although there may be situations when a long period of unexplainable neglect of the child could constitute non-exercise of otherwise valid custody rights under the Convention, as a general rule, any attempt to maintain a somewhat regular relationship with the child should constitute "exercise." This rule leaves the full resolution of custody issues, as the Convention and common sense indicate, to the courts of the country of habitual residence.

We are well aware that our approach requires a parent, in the event of a separation or custody dispute, to seek permission from the other parent or from the courts before taking a child out of the country of its habitual residence. Any other approach allows a parent to pick a "home court" for the custody dispute ex parte, defeating a primary purpose of the Convention. We believe that, where the reason for removal is legitimate, it will not usually be difficult to obtain approval from either the other parent or a foreign court. Furthermore, as the case for removal of the child in the custody of one parent becomes more compelling, approval (at least the approval of a foreign court) should become easier to secure.

Mrs. Friedrich argues that our approach cannot adequately cope with emergency situations that require the child and parent to leave the country. . . . [I]f an emergency forces a parent to take a child to a foreign country, any such emergency cannot excuse the parent from returning the child to the jurisdiction once return of the child becomes safe. Nor can an emergency justify a parent's refusal to submit the child to the authority of the foreign court for resolution of custody matters, including the question of the appropriate temporary residence of the child. See Viragh v. Foldes, 415 Mass. 96, 612 N.E.2d 241 (Mass. 1993) (child removed to America by one parent without notification to other parent may remain in America in light of decision by Hungarian court in parallel proceeding that best interests of the child require exercise of sole custody by parent in America).

We therefore hold that, if a person has valid custody rights to a child under the law of the country of the child's habitual residence, that person cannot fail to "exercise" those custody rights under the Hague Convention short of acts that constitute clear and unequivocal abandonment of the child. Once it determines that the parent exercised custody rights in any manner, the court should stop—completely avoiding the question whether the parent exercised the custody rights well or badly. These matters go to the merits of the custody dispute and are, therefore, beyond the subject matter jurisdiction of the federal courts. 42 U.S.C. § 11601(b)(4).

(2) Defenses to return

The Hague Abduction Convention provides five exceptions to the mandatory return of a child who has been wrongfully removed or retained. Where the exceptions apply, the judicial or administrative authority is not bound to return the child, but may do so nonetheless. Article 12 provides that, if the petition for return is filed more than one year from the date of the wrongful removal or retention, the child shall be returned "unless it is demonstrated that the child is now settled in its new environment." Article 13 provides three other exceptions:

> . . . [T]he judicial or administrative authority of the requested State is not bound to order the return of the child if the person, institution or other body which opposes its return establishes that—> a) the person, institution or other body having the care of the person of the child was not actually exercising the custody rights at the time of removal or retention, or had consented to or subsequently acquiesced in the removal or retention; or
> b) there is a grave risk that his or her return would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation.
>
> The judicial or administrative authority may also refuse to order the return of the child if it finds that the child > objects to being returned and has attained an age and degree of maturity at which it is appropriate to take account of its views.

Finally, Article 20 provides that:

> The return of the child under the provisions of Article 12 may be refused if this would not be permitted by the fundamental principles of the requested State relating to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

(i) Child well-settled in new environment

A U.S. district court explained the "well-settled" exception in In re Robinson, 983 F. Supp. 1339 (D. Colo. 1997), excerpted below, a case in which the petition was filed more than one year after the removal. See also Lops v. Lops, 140 F.3d 927 (11th Cir. 1998) (in a case where children were abducted to the United States from Germany by their father and his mother, who concealed their whereabouts, children were not "well settled" in their new environment); Wojcik v. Wojcik, 959 F. Supp. 413 (E.D. Mich. 1997) (children were settled in their new environment where they were attending school or day care consistently, they had friends and relatives in the area, and they attended church regularly with their mother); In re Coffield, 644 N.E.2d 662 (Ohio Ct. App. 1994) (child not settled in new environment when, because of father's attempt to conceal whereabouts, child was not enrolled in school or other activities and had not made friends in the community at large).

* * * *

When are the children "settled"? Unfortunately, that term is not defined in the Convention or ICARA. Perez-Vera [the official reporter of the session at which the Convention was adopted] provides no real assistance other than to make clear that the issue is not a custody determination in the traditional sense.[5] The State Department's legal analysis gives a hint of substance by providing that the burden to resist an Order of Return because the child is allegedly settled in the new environment should require "nothing less than substantial evidence of the child's significant connections to the new country. . . ." Public Notice 957, 51 Fed. Reg. at 10,509.

Nor is "settled" a legal term of art in my experience. It is not used in the Uniform Dissolution of Marriage Act (Colo. Rev. Stat. §§ 14–10–101 to 133 (1997)). . . .

* * * *

Of course, the Convention and its purposes ultimately provide the context for meaning in this case. Without more, its object is the prompt return of wrongfully removed children. However, there are exceptions and the one relevant to the decision here is premised on the passage of time, namely at least one year. Although there is nothing magical about one year,[7] its basic purpose is designed to serve the best interests of the child which remain "of paramount importance in matters relating to their custody. . . ." Convention, Preamble, 51 Fed. Reg. at 10,498. It would seem that, just as it is harmful to wrongfully remove the children from their habitual residence, it may also be harmful to remove them again if they have become connected to or "settled" in the new environment. However, it is not the mere passage of time which determines the issue or the Convention would have so provided (fn. omitted).

[5] Perez-Vera notes that the Convention avoided the potential pitfall of having subjective value judgments made on the "best interests of the child." Perez-Vera Report at 431. The Convention purposes are served when a return is ordered or when it is determined that the child is settled in the new environment. After that determination has been made then there may be "an examination of the merits of the custody rights . . . which is outside the scope of the Convention." Id. at 458.

[7] Perez-Vera discusses the importance of the role of a specific time limit and how, although the one year may be arbitrary, it serves as an important watershed separating the required return of the child from allowing consideration of its best interests after it has been settled in a new environment. Perez-Vera Report at 458–59.

Rather, there must also be evidence that the children are in fact settled in or connected to the new environment so that, at least inferentially, return would be disruptive with likely harmful effects. The Department of State says there must be "substantial evidence of the child's significant connections." Public Notice 957, 51 Fed. Reg. at 10,509 (fn. omitted). To simply provide some sort of rule, such as a presumption or otherwise, based solely on the passage of time would invite the person who wrongfully removed the child to hide out or avoid service of process.

(ii) Defense to return—acquiescence

In Friedrich II, supra, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit also rejected the abducting mother's arguments that the court should decline to return her son to Germany under Article 13(a) of the Hague Abduction Convention because his father allegedly acquiesced to his removal to the United States. See also Currier v. Currier, 845 F. Supp. 916 (D.N.H. 1994) (private custody agreement not approved by German court and rescinded before removal of children did not constitute acquiescence); Wanninger v. Wanninger, 850 F. Supp. 78 (D. Mass. 1994) (finding no acquiescence where, inter alia, petition was filed within three months of wrongful removal and within a few days of learning that petitioner's marriage was irreconcilable); Freier v. Freier, 969 F. Supp. 436 (E.D. Mich. 1996) (finding no acquiescence or consent where, inter alia, petition was filed within days of wrongful removal); Zarate v. Perez, 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19047 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 23, 1996) (finding no acquiescence or consent where, inter alia, petitioner sought assistance through Central Authority of Mexico to obtain return of child "shortly" after wrongful retention); Pesin v. Rodriguez, 77 F. Supp. 2d 1277 (S.D. Fla. 1999), appeal dismissed, 244 F.3d 1250 (11th Cir. 2001) (timely filing of petition after 6 months of serious and concerted efforts at reconciliation was not evidence of acquiescence); David S. v. Zamira S., 574 N.Y.S.2d 429 (N.Y. Fam. Ct. 1991) (finding no acquiescence where petition was filed two months after wrongful removal, though judicial proceedings did not commence for another 12 months).

Mrs. Friedrich also claims that the district court erred in ordering Thomas's return because Mrs. Friedrich proved by a preponderance of the evidence that Mr. Friedrich (i) consented to, and (ii) subsequently acquiesced in, the removal of Thomas to America.

Mrs. Friedrich bases her claim of consent to removal on statements that she claims Mr. Friedrich made to her during their separation. Mr. Friedrich flatly denies that he made these statements. The district court was faced with a choice as to whom it found more believable in a factual dispute. There is nothing in the record to suggest that the court's decision to believe Mr. Friedrich, and hold that he "did not exhibit an intention or a willingness to terminate his parental rights," was clearly erroneous. In fact, Mr. Friedrich's testimony is strongly supported by the circumstances of the removal of Thomas—most notably the fact that Mrs. Friedrich did not inform Mr. Friedrich that she was departing. [citation omitted] The deliberately secretive nature of her actions is extremely strong evidence that Mr. Friedrich would not have consented to the removal of Thomas. For these reasons, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in finding that Mrs. Friedrich took Thomas to America without Mr. Friedrich's consent.

Mrs. Friedrich bases her claim of subsequent acquiescence on a statement made by Mr. Friedrich to one of her commanding officers, Captain Michael Farley, at a cocktail party on the military base after Mrs. Friedrich had left with Thomas. Captain Farley, who cannot date the conversation exactly, testified that:

> During the conversation, Mr. Friedrich indicated that he was not seeking custody of the child, because he didn't have the means to take care of the child.

[citation omitted] Mr. Friedrich denies that he made this statement. The district court made no specific finding regarding this fact.

We believe that the statement to Captain Farley, even if it was made, is insufficient evidence of subsequent acquiescence. Subsequent acquiescence requires more than an isolated statement to a third-party. Each of the words and actions of a parent during the separation are not to be scrutinized for a possible waiver of custody rights. See Wanninger, 850 F. Supp. at 81–82 (refusing to construe father's personal letters to wife and priest as sufficient evidence of acquiescence where father consistently attempted to keep in contact with child). Although we must decide the matter without guidance from previous appellate court decisions, we believe that acquiescence under the convention requires either: an act or statement with the requisite formality, such as testimony in a judicial proceeding; a convincing written renunciation of rights; or a consistent attitude of acquiescence over a significant period of time.

By August 22, 1991, twenty-one days after the abduction, Mr. Friedrich had secured a German court order awarding him custody of Thomas. He has resolutely sought custody of his son since that time. It is by these acts, not his casual statements to third parties, that we will determine whether or not he acquiesced to the retention of his son in America. Since Mrs. Friedrich has not introduced evidence of a formal renunciation or a consistent attitude of acquiescence over a significant period of time, the judgment of the district court on this matter was not erroneous.

(iii) Grave risk of physical or psychological harm

In Friedrich II, supra, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit also rejected the abducting mother's arguments that the court should decline to return her son to Germany under Article 13(b) of the Hague Abduction Convention because return would create a grave risk of physical or psychological harm.

See also Rydder v. Rydder, 49 F.3d 369 (8th Cir. 1995) (citation of authorities that recognized separation of child from primary caregiver could cause psychological harm was not adequate to justify not returning child on basis of Article 13(b));

—Nunez-Escudero v. Tice-Menley, 58 F.3d 374 (8th Cir. 1995) (mother's testimony concerning mistreatment, primarily of herself, was not sufficient to invoke Article 13(b), and, return to Mexico "does not specify the logistics of the return", remanded);

—Blondin v. Dubois, 189 F.3d 240 (2d Cir. 1999) (court of appeals agreed with district court that children should not be returned to their home country in their father's custody where father had routinely beaten mother, hit child, twisted electrical cord around child's neck and threatened to "kill everyone," but remanded to district court to consider availability of temporary arrangements that would comply with Hague Convention's mandate to deliver abducted children to their country of habitual residence while protecting them from "grave risk" of harm) (see Digest 2000 at 105–15 for discussion of later developments in the case);

—Krishna v. Krishna, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4706 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 11, 1997) (refusing return that would put child back into psychologically damaging environment of prior abuse, but also finding that removal was not "wrongful" where father acquiesced in child's leaving country);

—Steffen F. v. Severina P., 966 F. Supp. 922 (D. Ariz. 1997) (separating child from mother to whom he was closely attached and bonded would pose "grave risk" of psychological harm);

—Freier v. Freier, 969 F. Supp. 436 (E.D. Mich. 1996) (mother's evidence that child's return would pose "grave risk" because Israel was a war zone was insufficient, and conflict was not ongoing in all of Israel and in particular not in city where child would live);

—In re Walsh, 31 F. Supp. 2d 200 (D. Mass. 1998) (intemperate and unkind spanks and slaps and constant exposure to violence and physical conflict in home were not sufficient to deny return under Article 13(b), but father was required to provide undertakings rebehavior and support), rev'd, Walsh v. Walsh, 221 F. 3d 204 (1st Cir. 2000) (holding that section 13(b) exception must be applied because district court underestimated risk to children from father's violence and overestimated efficacy of undertakings);

—Rodriguez v. Rodriguez, 33 F. Supp. 2d 456 (D. Md. 1999) (son's testimony about beatings by father was sufficient to warrant denial of return under Article 13(b)); —Tahan v. Duquette, 613 A.2d 486 (N.J. Super. Ct. 1992) (proposed testimony concerning nature of child's life in United States relevant to subsequent custody decision, not to determination of "grave risk" in country of habitual residence); —In re Coffield, 644 N.E.2d 662 (Ohio Ct. App. 1994) (psychological testing and evidence concerning mother's prior lifestyle similarly irrelevant to "grave risk" exception);

—Turner v. Frowein, 1998 Conn. Super. LEXIS 3781 (Conn. Super. Ct., June 25, 1998) (return denied under Article 13(b) based on overwhelming evidence that father abused son), rev'd and remanded, 752 A.2d 955 (Conn. 2000) (district court instructed to explore modalities of returning child that would not put him at "grave risk");

App. 1999) (uncorroborated expert testimony of husband's "violent temperament" and alleged abuse found unconvincing and insufficient to demonstrate "grave risk" of harm, and no evidence Greek courts could not protect child's interests), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 811 (2000) (see Digest 2000 at 93–105 for brief of U.S. in Supreme Court opposing grant of certiorari).

Mrs. Friedrich alleges that she proved by clear and convincing evidence in the proceedings below that the return of Thomas to Germany would cause him grave psychological harm. Mrs. Friedrich testified that Thomas has grown attached to family and friends in Ohio. She also hired an expert psychologist who testified that returning Thomas to Germany would be traumatic and difficult for the child, who was currently happy and healthy in America with his mother. . . .

If we are to take the international obligations of American courts with any degree of seriousness, the exception to the Hague Convention for grave harm to the child requires far more than the evidence that Mrs. Friedrich provides. Mrs. Friedrich alleges nothing more than adjustment problems that would attend the relocation of most children. There is no allegation that Mr. Friedrich has ever abused Thomas. The district court found that the home that Mr. Friedrich has prepared for Thomas in Germany appears adequate to the needs of any young child. The father does not work long hours, and the child's German grandmother is ready to care for the child when the father cannot. There is nothing in the record to indicate that life in Germany would result in any permanent harm or unhappiness.

Furthermore, even if the home of Mr. Friedrich were a grim place to raise a child in comparison to the pretty, peaceful streets of Ironton, Ohio, that fact would be irrelevant to a federal court's obligation under the Convention. We are not to debate the relevant virtues of Batman and Max und Moritz, Wheaties and Milchreis. The exception for grave harm to the child is not license for a court in the abducted-to country to speculate on where the child would be happiest. That decision is a custody matter, and reserved to the court in the country of habitual residence.

Mrs. Friedrich advocates a wide interpretation of the grave risk of harm exception that would reward her for violating the Convention. A removing parent must not be allowed to abduct a child and then—when brought to court—complain that the child has grown used to the surroundings to which they were abducted. Under the logic of the Convention, it is the abduction that causes the pangs of subsequent return. The disruption of the usual sense of attachment that arises during most long stays in a single place with a single parent should not be a "grave" risk of harm for the purposes of the Convention.

In thinking about these problems, we acknowledge that courts in the abducted-from country are as ready and able as we are to protect children. If return to a country, or to the custody of a parent in that country, is dangerous, we can expect that country's courts to respond accordingly. . . . And if Germany really is a poor place for young Thomas to grow up, as Mrs. Friedrich contends, we can expect the German courts to recognize that and award her custody in America. When we trust the court system in the abducted-from country, the vast majority of claims of harm —those that do not rise to the level of gravity required by the Convention—evaporate.

The international precedent available supports our restrictive reading of the grave harm exception. In Thomson v. Thomson, 119 D.L.R. 4th 253 (Can. 1994), the Supreme Court of Canada held that the exception applies only to harm "that also amounts to an intolerable situation." Id. at 286. The Court of Appeal of the United Kingdom has held that the harm required is "something greater than would normally be expected on taking a child away from one parent and passing him to another." In re A., 1 F.L.R. 365, 372 (Eng. C.A. 1988). And other circuit courts in America have followed this reasoning in cases decided since Friedrich I. See Nunez-Escudero, 58 F.3d at 377 (citing Thomson, 119 D.L.R. 4th at 286, and In re A., 1 F.L.R. at 372); Rydder, 49 F.3d at 373 (affirming district court order for return of child over abducting parent's objection that return would cause grave harm). Finally, we are instructed by the following observation by the United States Department of State concerning the grave risk of harm exception.

> This provision was not intended to be used by defendants as a vehicle to litigate (or relitigate) the child's best interests. Only evidence directly establishing the existence of a grave risk that would expose the child to physical or emotional harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation is material to the court's determination. The person opposing the child's return must show that the risk to the child is grave, not merely serious.
> A review of deliberations on the Convention reveals that "intolerable situation" was not intended to encompass > return to a home where money is in short supply, or where educational or other opportunities are more limited than in the requested State. An example of an "intolerable situation" is one in which a custodial parent sexually abuses the child. If the other parent removes or retains the child to safeguard it against further victimization, and the abusive parent then petitions for the child's return under the Convention, the court may deny the petition. Such action would protect the child from being returned to an "intolerable situation" and subjected to a grave risk of psychological harm.

Public Notice 957, 51 FR 10494, 10510 (March 26, 1986) (emphasis added).

For all of these reasons, we hold that the district court did not err by holding that "the record in the instant case does not demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that Thomas will be exposed to a grave risk of harm." Although it is not necessary to resolve the present appeal, we believe that a grave risk of harm for the purposes of the Convention can exist in only two situations. First, there is a grave risk of harm when return of the child puts the child in imminent danger prior to the resolution of the custody dispute—e.g., returning the child to a zone of war, famine, or disease. Second, there is a grave risk of harm in cases of serious abuse or neglect, or extraordinary emotional dependence, when the court in the country of habitual residence, for whatever reason, may be incapable or unwilling to give the child adequate protection. Psychological evidence of the sort Mrs. Friedrich introduced in the proceeding below is only relevant if it helps prove the existence of one of these two situations.

(iv) Return not permitted by fundamental principles of United States concerning human rights and fundamental freedoms

The district court in Freier v. Freier, 969 F. Supp. 436 (E.D. Mich. 1996) concluded that an Israeli court's restraining order precluding the mother and child from leaving Israel pending resolution of the custody dispute did not mean that the child's return to Israel would violate the "fundamental principles" of the United States.

(3) Applicability to diplomats

On October 1, 1982, Ronald Parson, a U.S. citizen and a Foreign Service Officer employed by the Department of State, married a German national. They subsequently had two daughters. While Parson was assigned to the U.S. Embassy in London, accompanied by his family, Mrs. Parson filed for divorce. On July 25, 1997, she filed a petition before the United Kingdom's High Court of Justice, Family Division, seeking an order preventing Parson from bringing the children to the United States and permitting her to take them to Germany. In the Matter of the Children Act 1989 and In the Matter of the Supreme Court Act 1981, No. CP-1316–1997 (High Court of Justice, Family Division). A British solicitor and barrister successfully argued on behalf of Parsons and the United States that the British court lacked jurisdiction over Mrs. Parson and her children due to their diplomatic immunity, and the U.K. High Court for Justice, Family Division, in an order dated August 7, 1997, dismissed Mrs. Parson's petition for lack of jurisdiction.

On August 7, 1997, the Embassy informed Parson that the Department of State had curtailed his tour of duty in London effective immediately, and that he was reassigned to Washington, D.C. The Department of State provided travel orders for the entire family to return to the United States, and Mrs. Parson returned with her husband and daughters at U.S. government expense on August 8, 1997. She and the children moved to one residence in Falls Church, Virginia, while Parson lived elsewhere in Falls Church. On August 11, Mrs. Parson filed a petition for the return of the children to the United Kingdom under the Hague Abduction Convention. In September 1997, she also filed a petition in the Juvenile and Domestic Relations Court of Arlington Country, Virginia, in which she sought to have the children returned to the United Kingdom under the International Child Abduction Remedies Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 11601–11610 (1989), which implements the Hague Convention in the United States, and the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act, 9 U.L.A. 115 (1988). She contended that Parson wrongfully removed the children when he brought them to the United States following the curtailment of his diplomatic assignment to London, where she claimed the children were habitually resident. Parson filed a custody case seeking custody of his daughters in the same Virginia court.

On November 7, 1997, Mrs. Parson also filed an appeal of the High Court of Justice decision in the United Kingdom's High Court of Justice, Family Division seeking a declaration pursuant to Section 8 of the U.K. Child Abduction and Custody Act 1984 that the removal of the children from the United Kingdom by the father was a wrongful removal within the meaning of Article 3 of the Hague Convention. An order was granted ex parte with leave for the father to apply; subsequently, an order was issued to determine the preliminary issue of jurisdiction.

On November 13, 1997, the United States filed a statement of interest in the Arlington County case pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 517 to inform the court of its interpretation of the Hague Convention.

The full text of the statement of interest, excerpted below with footnotes deleted, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

. . . Mrs. Parson's request is fundamentally at odds with the fact that she, Mr. Parson, and the Parson children were cloaked with diplomatic immunity while in the United Kingdom. The United States submits that, because the Hague Convention did not vest jurisdiction over this custody dispute with the courts of the United Kingdom, the Hague Convention equally provides no basis for treating the departure of the Parson children from the United Kingdom as a "wrongful removal." A contrary ruling would be directly at odds with settled principles of diplomatic law, and would significantly impair the United States' ability to conduct its foreign relations. The United States takes no position with respect to the ultimate issue of custody.

THE HAGUE CONVENTION

. . . The Hague Convention seeks to prevent forum-shopping for the resolution of custody disputes by establishing a rule of jurisdiction—i.e., that custody jurisdiction generally lies with the country of the child's place of habitual residence prior to any wrongful removal of the child by a parent. H.R. Rep. No. 100–525 (1988), reprinted in 1988 U.S.C.C.A.N. 386, 386–87 ("The international abductor is denied legal advantage from the abduction to or retention in the country where the child is located. . . .") (quoting President Ronald Reagan's Letter of Transmittal to U.S. Senate of 10/30/85); Rydder, 49 F. 3d at 372. The fundamental premise of the rule, however, is that the place of habitual residence prior to any wrongful removal therefrom was a place with jurisdiction over any custody issues. See Hague Convention.

* * * *

I. THE UNITED STATES' INTERPRETATION OF THE HAGUE CONVENTION IS ENTITLED TO SUBSTANTIAL DEFERENCE

The United States' interpretation of the Hague Convention's applicability to this case in light of the Hague Convention is entitled to substantial deference. See Sumitomo Shoji Am., Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 178, 184–85 (1982) ("Although not conclusive, the meaning attributed to treaty provisions by the Government agencies charged with their negotiation and enforcement is entitled to great weight."); Tabion v. Mufti, 73 F. 3d 535, 538 (4th Cir. 1996) (according "substantial deference" to United States Statement of Interest, filed on Department of State's behalf, in interpreting provision of Vienna Convention).

II. THE VIENNA CONVENTION'S GRANT OF DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY TO MR. PARSON AND THE CHILDREN PREVENTS THE HAGUE CONVENTION FROM VESTING JURISDICTION OVER THE CUSTODY OF THE CHILDREN IN THE BRITISH COURTS

The United Kingdom was not a jurisdiction that could have resolved the Parsons' custody dispute. Accordingly, Mr. Parson's return to the United States with his family upon the curtailment of his diplomatic assignment to the United Kingdom was wholly outside the scope of the Hague Convention. The Hague Convention does not operate to vest jurisdiction over child custody issues in a court that could not otherwise exercise jurisdiction. Rather, it is a choice-of-forum convention that operates in the context of competing possible jurisdictions and provides that, when a child is wrongfully removed from a jurisdiction of habitual residence to a second jurisdiction, the child custody issues should be decided by the jurisdiction of habitual residence. In the case of a diplomat's child, however, even leaving aside the substantial question of whether a "receiving state" could be a diplomatic child's "habitual residence," the Vienna Convention's grant of diplomatic immunity prevents the exercise of jurisdiction by the courts of the receiving state. Absent express waiver by the "sending state" (here, the United States) or applicability of certain enumerated exceptions not relevant here, the Vienna Convention prevents jurisdiction over any matter involving a diplomat or members of his/her household from vesting in the receiving state's courts (here, the British courts). Vienna Convention arts. 31–32, 37. The United States did not waive the diplomatic immunity conferred on Mr. Parson and his household while they were in the United Kingdom. Thus, as the British High Court of Justice found, Mr. Parson and the children were diplomatically immune from British courts' jurisdiction while they were in that country.

The Vienna Convention prevented the British courts from exercising jurisdiction over the custody of the children based on the children' presence in the United Kingdom. Because the Hague Convention does not create jurisdiction where it would not otherwise exist, there is no basis under the Hague Convention for regarding the United Kingdom as a place that, but for the removal of the Parson children, could have exercised jurisdiction over their custody.

III. MR. PARSON'S RETURN TO THE UNITED STATES WITH HIS FAMILY UPON THE CURTAILMENT OF HIS ASSIGNMENT TO THE UNITED KINGDOM WAS NOT A "WRONGFUL REMOVAL" UNDER THE HAGUE CONVENTION

Because the United Kingdom had no jurisdiction over the Parson family and because the Parsons left the United Kingdom in conjunction with the termination of Mr. Parson's diplomatic assignment, there is no basis for a finding that the children's departure from that country constituted a "wrongful removal" under the Hague Convention. Clearly, this is not a situation to which the Hague Convention was intended to apply. As noted above, the Convention is designed to undo a wrongful act by one parent and restore jurisdiction, where there has been a wrongful removal, to the habitual residence of children so that jurisdiction's courts may decide issues of custody and visitation. As discussed above, because the British courts lacked jurisdiction over Mr. Parson and the children by virtue of their diplomatic immunity, there was no legal basis on which the custody of the children could have been determined if they had remained in the United Kingdom. Moreover, to find a "wrongful removal" in this case would create a direct conflict with long-standing diplomatic practices, and the Vienna Convention. The Court should not permit this result. It is legally incorrect and would not serve the policy objective of the Hague Convention, which is to deter parents from crossing international boundaries in search of a sympathetic court. There was no court of jurisdiction in the United Kingdom, and the Parsons returned home because of Department of State travel orders. Given these circumstances, the Court should not find that Rebecca and Christina Parson were wrongfully removed from the United Kingdom or that they should therefore be returned.

Finally, the Court should not consider the Parsons' children "habitually resident" of the United Kingdom for the purposes of the Hague Convention. They are not British nationals. They resided in that country only temporarily during their father's diplomatic assignment and were, at all times, immune from that country's jurisdiction.

IV. A FINDING THAT MR. PARSON VIOLATED THE HAGUE CONVENTION WOULD IMPAIR THE UNITED STATES' ABILITY TO CONDUCT ITS FOREIGN RELATIONS

The United States' ability to conduct its foreign relations would be significantly compromised if the Hague Convention were found to apply in instances such as this, where children depart from a foreign country because the Department of State curtails a parent's diplomatic assignment or the assignment otherwise ends. To staff overseas U.S. missions the Department of State and other U.S. foreign affairs agencies assign and reassign employees according to applicable laws and regulations, reflecting relevant personnel policies and agency needs . . . Applying the Hague Convention's terms in circumstances such as these would impair the ability of the Department of State, as well as other U.S. foreign affairs agencies, to assign employees with families to overseas posts by enabling officers' spouses to attempt to control such relocations by invoking the Hague Convention.

In addition, application of the Hague Convention to situations such as this would subject U.S. Foreign Service Officers and other foreign affairs personnel to accusations of international child abduction if they take their children from a foreign post when leaving that post on reassignment in compliance with official U.S. Government travel orders. This result would undermine the privileges and immunities that the United States is entitled to have protect its diplomatic personnel, and ultimately would make it difficult for the Department of State to recruit, assign, and retain employees with families for service overseas . . . The United States submits that this result was not intended by the Hague Convention's drafters.

The High Court of Justice ruled on the immunity issue on January 22, 1998, holding that there was no immunity under the Diplomatic Immunity Act based on the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, but that there was state immunity based on the State Immunity Act. Both sides appealed to the U.K. Supreme Court of Judicature in the Court of Appeal (Civil Division). Meanwhile, in a hearing held on February 11, 1998, before the Arlington County Juvenile and Domestic Relations Court, Mrs. Parson's attorney agreed to drop the Hague Abduction Convention claim if the Supreme Court of Judicature ruled that the United Kingdom did not have jurisdiction. The U.K. Supreme Court of Judicature dismissed the appeals on the grounds that a declaration would serve no purpose as all the concerned parties were in the United States, where legal proceedings were being pursued. In the Matter of RE: P (Minors), FC3 98/5515 CMS2: FC3 98/5520 CMS2: FAFMI 98/0189 (March 11, 1998). In an unpublished decision of March 19, 1998, the Arlington County Juvenile and Domestic Relations Court found that the March 11 decision had determined that England had no jurisdiction and ruled that Mrs. Parson was barred from pursuing her Hague Convention claim.

b. International Parental Kidnapping Crime Act of 1993

In 1993 the International Parental Kidnapping Crime Act of 1993 ("the IPKCA"), Pub. L. No. 103–173, 107 Stat. 1998 (codified as amended at 18 U.S.C. § 1204), was enacted as federal law, as set forth below. For treatment of parental kidnapping under extradition treaties, see Chapter 3.A.1.c.

* * * *

(a) Whoever removes a child from the United States, or attempts to do so, or retains a child (who has been in the United States) outside the United States with intent to obstruct the lawful exercise of parental rights shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both.

* * * *

(c) It shall be an affirmative defense under this section that—

(1) the defendant acted within the provisions of a valid court order granting the defendant legal custody or visitation rights and that order was obtained pursuant to the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act or the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act and was in effect at the time of the offense;

(2) the defendant was fleeing an incidence or pattern of domestic violence; or

(3) the defendant had physical custody of the child pursuant to a court order granting legal custody or visitation rights and failed to return the child as a result of circumstances beyond the defendant's control, and the defendant notified or made reasonable attempts to notify the other parent or lawful custodian of the child of such circumstances within 24 hours after the visitation period had expired and returned the child as soon as possible.

(d) This section does not detract from The Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Parental Child Abduction, done at The Hague on October 25, 1980.

The House Committee on the Judiciary described the purpose of the IPKCA in H.R. Rep. No. 103–390 (Nov. 20, 1993), excerpted below with footnotes omitted.

* * * *

In the international cases which are the subject of this bill, the lack of a federal offense—and the federal criminal justice system consequences that would flow from such an offense—handicaps the pursuit of an effective remedy by the custodial, or "left-behind," parent. This is primarily because violations of state parental kidnapping statutes—even though they may be felony offenses—do not in international practice provide an adequate basis for effective pursuit and extradition.

* * * *

There is . . . little effective legal process with which to enforce the criminal sanctions of state law in international child abduction cases.

There is an international civil mechanism relating to these cases, the Hague Convention on International Parental Child Abduction, for which Congress passed implementing legislation in 1988. As a result of this convention, the signatories will recognize the custody decrees of other signatories, thereby facilitating the return of abducted children. However, most countries are not signatories to the Convention, thus leaving individual countries to take whatever legal unilateral action they can to obtain the return of abducted children.

Creating a federal felony offense responds to these problems in four ways.

> First, making international parental kidnapping a federal crime provides a direct basis for the United States to request extradition of the kidnapping parent from those countries with which we have extradition treaties.
>
> Second, the federal criminal penalty will deter at least some abductions by ensuring that the kidnapping offender will be pursued by the United States government. At present, most abducting parents have little to fear with regard to effective pursuit.
>
> Third, the offense will provide the basis for Federal warrants, which will in turn enhance the force of U.S. diplomatic representations seeking the assistance of foreign governments in returning abducted children.
>
> Fourth, enacting such a felony offense will make clear to other nations the gravity with which the United States views these cases.
>
> In his signing statement, 29 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2493 (Dec. 6, 1993), President William J. Clinton explained the relationship of the IPKCA to the Hague Abduction Convention as follows.

---

H.R. 3378 recognizes that the international community has created a mechanism to promote the resolution of international parental kidnapping by civil means. This mechanism is the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. H.R. 3378 reflects the Congress' awareness that the Hague Convention has resulted in the return of many children and the Congress' desire to ensure that the creation of a Federal child abduction felony offense does not and should not interfere with the Convention's continued successful operation.

This Act expresses the sense of the Congress that proceedings under the Hague Convention, where available, should be the "option of first choice" for the left-behind parent. H.R. 3378 should be read and used in a manner consistent with the Congress' strong expressed preference for resolving these difficult cases, if at all possible, through civil remedies.

In United States v. Amer, 110 F.3d 873 (2d Cir. 1997), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit refused to permit a defendant father who abducted his children to Egypt to present defenses available under the Hague Convention that were not found in the IPKCA. The court of appeals also found that the prosecution would not "detract from" the Hague Convention because Egypt was not a State party, and the Hague Convention therefore did not apply to the abduction.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit refused to dismiss the indictment of a father who removed his children from Colorado in violation of their maternal grandmother's visitation rights under state law, because such rights were "parental rights" within the meaning of IPKCA. United States v. Alahmad, 28 F. Supp. 2d 1273 (D. Colo. 1998), aff'd 211 F.3d 538 (10th Circ. 2000), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 1080 (2001).

2. Intercountry Adoption Convention

On June 11, 1998, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Convention on Protection of Children and Co-operation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption, adopted and opened for signature at the conclusion of the seventeenth session of the Hague Conference on Private International Law on May 29, 1993, 32 I.L.M. 1134. Excerpts from the letter of the President transmitting the Convention to the Senate for advice and consent and the Report of the Department of State to the President attached to that letter, contained in S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–51 (1998), are found in Digest 2000 at 142–45.

C. PRISONER ISSUES

1. Inter-American Convention on Serving Sentences Abroad

On September 30, 1996, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification the Inter-American Convention on Serving Criminal Sentences Abroad, drawn up by the Committee on Juridical and Political Affairs within the Permanent Council of the Organization of American States ("OAS"), composed of representatives of the member states. S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–35 (1996).

Excerpts below from the Report of the Department of State to the President, attached to the President's letter transmitting the Convention to the Senate for advice and consent, contained in S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–35, explained the purpose of, and need for, the Convention. See Digest 2001 at 51–55 for a discussion of U.S. ratification and implementation of the Convention.

The purpose of the Convention is to facilitate the transfer of foreign prisoners to their home countries by establishing procedures that can be initiated by prisoners who prefer to serve their sentences there. The means employed to achieve this purpose are basically similar to those embodied in bilateral prisoner transfer treaties that are now in force between the United States and eight other countries, and in the multilateral Council of Europe Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons. The major advantages of concluding a multilateral convention with the OAS Member States are the establishment of uniform procedures and the saving of resources that would be required to negotiate and bring into force bilateral treaties with a large number of countries in the hemisphere.

Although the United States is already a party to the multilateral Council of Europe Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons, which entered into force for the United States, following Senate advice and consent to ratification, on July 1, 1985, only two other OAS Member States have become parties to that Convention. Ratification of the Inter-American Convention on Serving Criminal Sentences Abroad would help fill a void by providing a mechanism for the reciprocal transfer of persons incarcerated in prisons in OAS Member States, to permit those individuals to serve their sentences in their home countries. A multilateral prisoner transfer convention for the Americas would also reduce, if not eliminate, the need for the United States to negotiate additional bilateral prisoner transfer treaties with countries in the hemisphere.

2. United States-Hong Kong Prisoner Exchange Treaty

By a letter dated May 5, 1997, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification the Agreement Between the Government of the United States and the Government of Hong Kong for the Transfer of Sentenced Persons, signed at Hong Kong on April 15, 1997. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–7.

Excerpts below from the Report of the Department of State to the President attached to that letter, contained in S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–7, explained the purpose of, and need for, the Convention given Hong Kong's scheduled reversion to the sovereignty of the People's Republic of China.

The purpose of the Agreement is to facilitate, after Hong Kong reverts to the sovereignty of the People's Republic of China on July 1, 1997, the transfer of persons sentenced in the United States and in Hong Kong to their home territory to serve their sentences. The Agreement achieves this purpose by establishing procedures that can be initiated by sentenced persons who prefer to serve their sentences in their home territory. The means employed to achieve this purpose are similar in all important respects to those embodied in existing bilateral prisoner transfer treaties in force between the United States and eight other countries, and in the multilateral Council of Europe Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons.

The United States and Hong Kong have been exchanging prisoners under the terms of the Council of Europe Convention, to which the United States and the United Kingdom are parties and which has been extended by the latter to Hong Kong and other specific territories under U.K. sovereignty. The People's Republic of China is not a party to the Council of Europe Convention and has not agreed that the Convention should continue to apply to Hong Kong after reversion to Chinese sovereignty on July 1, 1997. Nonetheless, the Chinese government, acting through the Sino-U.K. Joint Liaison Group, authorized the Hong Kong government to negotiate a bilateral agreement on transfer of sentenced persons with the United States to apply after reversion.

D. JUDICIAL ASSISTANCE

Assistance to Foreign and International Tribunals

28 U.S.C. § 1782, set forth below, gives U.S. district courts discretionary authority to issue orders to give testimony or to produce documentary evidence for use in proceedings in foreign or international tribunals:

> (a) The district court of the district in which a person resides or is found may order him to give his testimony > or statement or to produce a document or other thing for use in a proceeding in a foreign or international tribunal, including criminal investigations conducted before formal accusation. The order may be made pursuant to a letter rogatory issued, or request made, by a foreign or international tribunal or upon the application of any interested person and may direct that the testimony or statement be given, or the document or other thing be produced, before a person appointed by the court. By virtue of his appointment, the person appointed has power to administer any necessary oath and take the testimony or statement. The order may prescribe the practice and procedure, which may be in whole or part the practice and procedure of the foreign country or the international tribunal, for taking the testimony or statement or producing the document or other thing. To the extent that the order does not prescribe otherwise, the testimony or statement shall be taken, and the document or other thing produced, in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

> A person may not be compelled to give his testimony or statement or to produce a document or other thing in violation of any legally applicable privilege.
> (b) This chapter [28 USCS §§ 1781 et seq.] does not preclude a person within the United States from voluntarily giving his testimony or statement, or producing a document or other thing, for use in a proceeding in a foreign or international tribunal before any person and in any manner acceptable to him.

When it amended § 1782 in 1964, Congress substantially broadened the power of federal courts to assist foreign litigants in obtaining oral and documentary evidence in the United States, in the hope that the initiative would lead foreign governments similarly to liberalize their judicial assistance procedures. S. Rep. No. 88–1580 (1964).

a. Pendency of adjudicative proceeding

In 1991 the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit examined the question whether an adjudicative proceeding must be pending to satisfy the requirements of 18 U.S.C. § 1782 in General Universal Trading Corp. v. Morgan Guaranty Trust Co. (In re Int'l Judicial Assistance (Letter Rogatory) for the Federative Republic of Brazil), 936 F. 2d 702 (2d Cir. 1991). The court of appeals held that a proceeding need not actually be pending, but rather that a proceeding must be "imminent—very likely to occur and very soon to occur." This standard was similar to the "very likely to occur" standard previously enunciated by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, in In re Request for Assistance from Ministry of Legal Affairs of Trinidad and Tobago, 848 F.2d 1151 (11th Cir. 1988), but contrasted with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia's standard in In re Letter of Request from the Crown Prosecution Service of the United Kingdom, 870 F.2d 686 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (requiring that a proceeding be "in reasonable contemplation") (for a description of the case, see Cumulative Digest 1981–1988).

In 1996 Congress added the phrase "including criminal investigations conducted before formal accusation" to the first sentence of 28 U.S.C. § 1782 to make clear that assistance could be provided for foreign government officials with respect to criminal investigations prior to the initiation of judicial proceedings. Section 1342(b), Div. A, Title XIII, Subtitle E of Pub. L. No. 104–106, 110 Stat. 186 (1996).

b. Discoverability under the laws of the foreign jurisdiction

In cases decided between 1991 and 1999, the U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals split on the issue whether discovery sought pursuant to § 1782 must be information that would be discoverable under the laws of the foreign jurisdiction in which the proceeding was pending. The First Circuit construed § 1782(a) to contain a foreign-discoverability requirement.

See In re Application of Asta Medica, S. A., 981 F.2d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 1992). Earlier the Eleventh Circuit had reached the same conclusion in In re Request for Assistance from Ministry of Legal Affairs, 848 F.2d 1151, 1156 (11th Cir. 1988). The Fourth and Fifth Circuits held that no such requirement existed if the § 1782(a) applicant was a foreign sovereign. See United States v. Morris (In re Letter of Request from the Amtsgericht Ingolstadt), 82 F.3d 590, 592 (4th Cir. 1996); In re Letter Rogatory from First Court of First Instance in Civil Matters, 42 F.3d 308, 310–311 (5th Cir. 1995). The Second and Third Circuits rejected a foreign-discoverability requirement. See In re Application of Gianoli Aldunate, 3 F.3d 54, 59–60 (2d Cir. 1993); In re Bayer AG, 146 F.3d 188, 193–194 (3d Cir. 1998).

The U.S. Supreme Court resolved the split in the circuits in 2004, holding that § 1782 did not impose a "foreign-discoverability" requirement. Intel Corp. v. Advanced Micro Devices, Inc., 124 S. Ct. 2466 (2004); see also Digest 2002 at 875–77, Digest 2003 at 873–76.

International Criminal Law

A. EXTRADITION AND MUTUAL LEGAL ASSISTANCE AND RELATED ISSUES

1. Extradition

a. Extradition practice of the United States

On May 3, 1999, Jamison S. Borek, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, and Mary Lee Warren, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, testified before the House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources on extradition matters. International Law: The Importance of Extradition: Hearing Before the Subcomm. On Criminal Justice, Drug Policy, and Human Resources of the House Comm. On Government Reform, 106th Cong. (1999). Excerpts from their testimony follow.

Ms. Borek:

* * * *

Extradition is an essential tool in [the effort to fight international crime], providing the most effective means of obtaining the return of international fugitives. In recent years, our extradition requests have resulted in the return to the United States of some of the world's most notorious criminals, such as those responsible for the 1993 World Trade Center bombings in New York City. As you are aware, extradition is the process by which a person charged with or convicted of a crime under the law of one state is arrested in another state and returned for trial or punishment. Although States have no general obligation in international law to extradite persons, the practice has become widespread and is nearly universal. Because of the many unique national legal systems around the world, however, there is no single set of rules that govern the process of international extradition and the conditions upon which extradition may be granted vary widely. Under U.S. law, fugitives can only be extradited from the United States pursuant to authorization granted by statute or treaty.

The general rules of extradition for the United States are found in Title 18, United States Code, beginning at section 3181. Virtually all extraditions from the United States take place pursuant to bilateral extradition treaties or conventions. There are, however, some other possible bases. For instance, extraditions are possible to the war crimes tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda pursuant to statutory authority granted by Congress combined with executive agreements between the United States and each of the tribunals. In addition, there is currently a limited exception for extradition without a treaty—a 1996 amendment to Section 3181 of the U.S. Criminal Code permits extradition from the United States, even in the absence of a treaty, of foreign nationals who have committed violent crimes against U.S. nationals outside of the United States. At this point, the United States has approximately 110 extradition treaty relationships with countries throughout the world. Under these treaties, the extradition process can be initiated either through a formal request for extradition or a provisional arrest request, which initially requires less supporting documentation. The provisional arrest or "PA" request is made in cases of urgency, such as where the fugitive is likely to flee. Once a fugitive is apprehended pursuant to a provisional arrest request, the Requesting State will have a set number of days to file a formal request for extradition. For example, the U.S.-Canada and the U.S.-Mexico extradition treaties provide that a formal request must be made within 60 days following the provisional arrest of a fugitive.

Extradition requests by the United States are made by the Department of State, at the initiation of the Department of Justice, after formal charges are brought by federal, state and local prosecutors. Extradition may be sought for felonies ranging from terrorism and narcotic offenses to common crimes such as murder, arson and fraud. The government of the country receiving an extradition request will typically conduct a preliminary review to determine whether the request appears to fall within the scope of the applicable extradition treaty. If it determines that additional information is required, the government will inform the Requesting State of that fact through diplomatic channels. If provided by the Requesting State, such additional information can then be used in proceedings in the Requested State that may lead to extradition.

A government's decision to extradite is typically subject to some form of judicial review under its national laws. Thus, in the United States, following initial review by the executive branch to determine whether an extradition request meets the facial requirements of the relevant treaty, the extradition request is presented to a U.S. court for a decision as to extraditability. At this stage, a magistrate or district judge needs to: confirm the identity of the fugitive; determine whether "probable cause" exists to believe that the fugitive committed the offense charged; and ascertain that no valid defense to extradition under the applicable treaty has been asserted. If these conditions are fulfilled, the judge or magistrate will issue a certificate of extraditability, which is subject to challenge through a petition for a writ of habeas corpus and subsequent appeal. Under U.S. law, the final decision on whether a fugitive will be extradited is made by the Secretary of State.

Not all legal systems are the same as ours, and judicial and executive branch authorities may play a greater or smaller role in extradition. Moreover, the extent of the judicial proceeding and the evidentiary requirements differ among legal systems. Although an extradition hearing is not supposed to be a full-fledged trial on the merits, the evidentiary requirements vary from legal system to legal system and do not necessarily mirror the requirements for our own "probable cause" standard. We have been engaged in a constant process of seeking to enter into new extradition relationships, as well as to update and improve existing ones.

Our goal is to negotiate and to bring into force as many treaty relationships as possible that have no restrictions on the extradition of nationals. There are many success stories in international extradition and many fugitives have been returned to face justice for their crimes. The process, however, is not simple and sometimes results in delays or denials of extradition. Apart from the nationals issue I just discussed, many countries are concerned about the penalties that may be imposed in the Requesting State, such as the death penalty or even life sentences. For example, many countries—including Australia, Belgium, Hungary, Switzerland, and Thailand—may decide not to extradite fugitives unless they receive assurances that the death penalty will not be imposed in the Requesting State. Further, other considerations may factor into an extradition decision, such as a state's obligations to abide by the Torture Convention or other relevant international instruments.

In some countries, the judicial process is lengthy and subject to multiple reviews that can delay extradition for years. Confusion can result from differing legal systems, different standards of proof, different rules of admissibility, and so forth. Despite these difficulties, we are working hard with countries around the world to enhance our international extradition program, and to improve the possibility that fugitives may be returned for trial and punishment to countries with jurisdiction over their crimes. . . .

Ms. Warren:

* * * *

Progress on General Extradition Issues.

One of the Justice Department's primary initiatives in recent years has been the improvement and expansion of our extradition relationships worldwide, with a particular emphasis on persuading other countries to authorize the extradition of their nationals. We have spent enormous time and energy at every level, and particularly through the repeated and vigorous efforts of Attorney General Reno, in advocating the benefits of extradition to our international counterparts and colleagues, based on the logic of extradition in calling fugitives to account for their crimes in the country whose laws they violated, the efficiency and effectiveness of extradition in ensuring that the prosecution of accused criminals takes place in the national jurisdiction where the evidence and witnesses are located, and the equity of extradition in recognizing the rights and sensitivities of the victims, the victims' families, the witnesses, and the society most directly and adversely affected by the criminal conduct at issue. We have, of course, also supported deportation as an alternative to extradition in appropriate cases because it too results in the return of the fugitive to the country of the crime. We have been less enthusiastic about the alternative of having fugitives prosecuted in their country of nationality, an option interjected by a number of countries to dispel the need to extradite citizens. We are generally dissatisfied with domestic prosecution because the costs involved in transferring proceedings to another country can be extraordinary, because evidence gathered pursuant to one criminal justice process may not be legally transferrable to or admissible or given the same weight and effect in another, and because the potential hardship to victims and witnesses who may be required to travel long distances to participate in foreign court systems in foreign languages in order to achieve justice seems unjustified and inequitable.

Fortunately, we believe that real progress is being made in terms of a growing acceptance of modern extradition mechanisms and, in a somewhat surprising number of venues, with longstanding and previously impenetrable bars to the extradition of nationals. The European Union Convention specifically recognizes the need to reform domestic laws to allow nationals to be extradited. Israel, a nation particularly sensitive to the situation of its citizens, has now passed a law allowing those citizens to be surrendered for trial in the country of their alleged offenses. Portugal and Italy have departed from tradition by legally recognizing the need to extradite nationals for particularly significant international criminality.

It is in Latin America, however, that we have found the most marked change of attitude on extraditing fugitives, regardless of nationality. Chile, Guatemala, and Uruguay have broken with tradition by creating no barriers to extradition based on nationality. Our bilateral treaty with Bolivia now mandates the extradition of citizens for serious offenses. The Senate has approved a new treaty with Argentina and we have signed a treaty with Paraguay with affirmative provisions on surrendering nationals. After decades of disappointment, we are now developing a productive extradition relationship with the Dominican Republic under a recent law there that recognizes the government's authority to extradite Dominicans.

Since 1996, the Government of Mexico has found that in exceptional cases, the extradition of Mexican nationals may be justified (a topic discussed more fully below). Colombia has gone so far as to amend its constitution on this issue, and El Salvador has proposed a similar constitutional change. Even in those countries in Latin America where the historic bar to extraditing nationals has not been dropped and our bilateral treaties are in most ways seriously outdated, we have been able to secure the surrender of significant U.S. or third-country national narcotics traffickers, either through the invocation of the 1988 U.N. Drug Convention or through the application by the other country of its domestic laws.

U.S.-Mexico Extradition and Fugitive Relationship.

It is our understanding that this Subcommittee has a particular interest in the extradition process in Mexico, which is similar to those in many other civil law jurisdictions and not particularly complicated until the appeal or amparo process begins. . . .

* * * *

Thus far in 1999, two fugitives have been extradited by Mexico, one a U.S. citizen and the other a Mexican national who had escaped from a U.S. federal correctional facility following conviction and sentencing on substantial narcotics related charges. As many observers and critics of the extradition relationship have noted, no major Mexican narcotics trafficker has yet been extradited by Mexico to the United States. This fact is clearly a disappointment to the Department of Justice, as we know it is to the members of this Subcommittee. We believe it is important to note, however, that the executive branch of the Government of Mexico, through the SRE, issued 19 orders of extradition in 1998, including five orders against Mexican citizens facing significant drug trafficking charges in the United States. . . .

* * * *

An extremely effective working relationship [exists] between Mexican immigration authorities and the FBI and the U.S. Marshals Service personnel posted at our Embassy in Mexico City. In 1998, this relationship led to the identification, location, and expulsion of over 30 U.S. citizens who are fugitives from U.S. justice, but whose removal from Mexico was based on their illegal immigration status in that country rather than on the existence of U.S. criminal charges. This proactive program resulted in three times as many fugitive deportations from Mexico in 1998 as in any other year in which we have tracked such actions.

* * * *

b. Ratification of new extradition treaties

During the period 1991–1999, the United States entered into 32 bilateral extradition treaties. These included a number modernizing pre-existing treaties, others replacing existing treaty relationships between the United States and former British territories that had been based on application of U.S.-U.K. extradition treaties, and a few with countries with whom the United States had not previously had a treaty relationship. Excerpts below from testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee ("SFRC") and questions and answers submitted to the SFRC on these extradition treaties, which were transmitted for advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, highlight key developments in the treaties during the period. A list of U.S. bilateral treaties is available at 18 U.S.C. § 3181, note.

(1) Dual criminality and temporary surrender

On April 8, 1992, Alan J. Kreczko, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, testified before the SFRC in support of four extradition treaties: Extradition Treaty with The Bahamas, Mar. 9, 1990, U.S.-Bah., S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–17 (1991); Protocol Amending the 1974 Extradition Treaty with Australia, Sept. 4, 1990, U.S.-Austl., S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–23 (1992); Supplementary Extradition Treaty with the Federal Republic of Germany, Oct. 21, 1986, U.S.-F.R.G., S. Treaty Doc. No. 100–6 (1987); and Second Supplementary Extradition Treaty with Spain, Feb. 9, 1988, U.S.-Spain, S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–24 (1992).

Mr. Kreczko's prepared statement highlighted key advantages of the new treaties, including replacement of list treaties with dual criminality and provision for temporary surrender, as set forth below. The Senate granted advice and consent to ratification on May 13, 1992. 138 CONG. REC. S6592 (daily ed. May 13, 1992).

The full text of Mr. Kreczko's testimony is available at S. Hrg. Doc. No. 102–674 (1992). See also 86 Am. J. Int'l. L. 547 (1992).

Each of the new treaties replaces a traditional list of offenses with a modern dual criminality formula which provides for extradition based on the underlying criminal conduct rather than the designation of a particular offense. This dual criminality formula permits extradition for any crime that is punishable in both countries by imprisonment for more than one year. Such a provision obviates the need to renegotiate or supplement the treaty, as new offenses, such as computer-related crimes or money laundering, become punishable under the laws of both states. The treaty with The Bahamas, for example, would now make conspiracy, attempt, mail or wire fraud, extortion, and firearm offenses extraditable offenses between our two countries. The Supplementary Treaty with Germany would incorporate U.S. racketeering and continuing criminal enterprise offenses, as well as criminal association offenses under German law. . . .

Another new feature which has been introduced in each of these treaties is a provision that permits the requested state to surrender temporarily a person while he is still serving a sentence in that state in order to expedite a prosecution in [the] requesting state for offenses other than those for which the sentence was imposed. At the end of the prosecution in the requesting state, the person would be returned to the requested state to serve the remainder of the sentence. At the present time, under each of the treaties being amended or replaced, the only option of the requested state in this situation has been to postpone extradition until the sentence has been served in its territory or to forego the service of that sentence in favor of extradition. This modification serves the interest of justice in both states by permitting early trial in the requesting state while the evidence and witness recollections are fresh, while preserving the interests of the requested state in having its full sentence served. . . .

(2) Extradition in death penalty cases; extradition of nationals

On July 17, 1996, and September 15, 1998, Jamison S. Borek, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, and Mark M. Richard, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, appeared before the SFRC in support of pending law enforcement treaties. S. Hrg. Doc. No. 105–730 (1998).

Treaties before the SFRC in 1996 included seven bilateral extradition treaties: a treaty and a supplementary treaty to promote the repression of terrorism with Belgium (Apr. 27, 1987, U.S.-Belg., S. Treaty Doc. Nos. 104–7,8 (1995)), and treaties with Bolivia (June 27, 1995, U.S.-Bol., S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–22 (1995)); Hungary (Dec. 1, 1994, U.S.-Hung., S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–5 (1995)); Malaysia (with related exchange of notes) (Aug. 3, 1995, U.S.-Malay., S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–26 (1995)); the Philippines (Nov. 13, 1994, U.S.-Phil., S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–16 (1995)); and Switzerland (Nov. 14, 1990, U.S.-Switz., S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–9 (1995)). The treaties received advice and consent from the Senate on August 2, 1996, 142 CONG. REC. S9661 (daily ed. Aug. 2, 1996).

In 1998 sixteen comprehensive extradition treaties were pending before the SFRC: Antigua and Barbuda, Dominica, Grenada, and St.Lucia (final signature Oct. 31, 1996, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–24 (1996)), Argentina (June 10, 1997, U.S.-Arg., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–18 (1996)), Austria (Jan. 8, 1998, U.S.-Aus., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–50 (1996)), Barbados (Feb. 28, 1996, U.S.-Barb., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–20 (1996)), Cyprus (June 17, 1996, U.S.-Cyprus, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–16 (1996)), France (Apr. 23, 1996, U.S.-Fr., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–13 (1996)), India (June 25, 1997, U.S.-India., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–30 (1996)), Luxembourg (Oct. 1, 1996, U.S.-Lux., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–10 (1996)), Poland (July 10, 1996, U.S.-Pol., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–14 (1996)), St. Kitts and Nevis (final signature Feb. 4, 1998, U.S.-St. Kitts & Nevis, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–37 (1996)), St. Vincent and the Grenadines (Jan. 8, 1998, U.S.-St. Vincent, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–44 (1996)), Trinidad and Tobago (Mar. 4, 1996, U.S.-Trin. & Tobago, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–21 (1996)), and Zimbabwe (July 25, 1997, U.S.-Zimb., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–33 (1996)), as well as two supplementary treaties with Spain (Mar. 12, 1996, U.S.-Spain, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–15 (1996)), and Mexico (Nov. 13, 1997, U.S.-Mex., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–46 (1996)). Ten of the comprehensive treaties replaced existing treaty relationships between the United States and former British territories that had been based on the 1931 or 1972 U.S.-U.K. extradition treaties, five of them updated existing treaties, and one, with Zimbabwe, created a new treaty relationship. The eighteen treaties received advice and consent to ratification on October 21, 1998, 144 CONG. REC. S12974–79 (daily ed. Oct. 21, 1998).

In her 1998 testimony, which addressed a number of new mutual legal assistance treaties ("MLATs") and a prisoner transfer treaty as well as the extradition treaties, Ms. Borek described the International Crime Control Strategy announced by President William J. Clinton in May, 1998, as follows:

> . . . The growth in transborder criminal activity, especially violent crime, terrorism, drug trafficking, and the laundering of proceeds of organized crime, has confirmed the need for increased international law enforcement cooperation. Extradition treaties and MLATs are essential tools in that effort.

The negotiation of new extradition and mutual legal assistance treaties are one important part of the President's comprehensive International Crime Control Strategy, which was announced last May. That Strategy recognizes the increasing threat of international crimes such as terrorism, organized crime and arms and drug trafficking. One important measure to better address this threat is to enhance the ability of U.S. Law enforcement officials to cooperate effectively with their overseas counterparts in investigating and prosecuting international crime cases. One of the Strategy's eight goals is to deny safe haven to international criminals and the negotiation of new extradition and mutual legal assistance treaties is one of the objectives necessary to reaching that goal. Replacing outdated extradition treaties with modem ones and negotiating extradition treaties with new treaty partners is necessary to create a seamless web for the prompt location, arrest and extradition of international fugitives. The Strategy also underscores that mutual legal assistance treaties are vitally needed to provide rapid, mutual access to witnesses, records and other evidence in a form admissible in criminal prosecutions. The instruments before you today will be important tools in achieving this goal.

Testimony on the pending treaties and written questions and answers submitted to the SFRC addressed, among other things, the importance of agreement to extradite nationals of the requested country and issues concerning availability of the death penalty, as excerpted below. See also 91 Am. J. Int'l L. 93, 98 (1997); 92 Am. J. Int'l L. 44 (1998).

These treaties . . . address two of the most difficult issues in our extradition treaty negotiations: extradition of nationals of the Requested State and extraditions where the fugitives may be subject to the death penalty in the Requesting State. As a matter of longstanding policy, the U.S. Government extradites U.S. nationals. Most civil law countries, however, are prohibited by their constitutions or domestic law from extraditing their nationals. The U.S. Government has made it a high priority to convince states to agree to extradite their nationals, notwithstanding laws or traditions to the contrary. This is, however, a very sensitive and deep-seated issue.

The treaty with the Philippines is the clearest and best expression of our efforts. Paragraph 6 of that treaty provides that "Extradition shall not be refused on the ground that the person sought is a citizen of the Requested State." In the case of our extradition relations with the Philippines, this provision is especially useful since a relatively large percent of fugitives wanted by the United States in that country are of Philippine nationality.

Our treaty with Bolivia similarly provides that the Requested State is obligated to extradite its nationals to the Requesting State to stand trial for certain specified serious offenses including murder, kidnapping, rape, sexual offenses involving children, armed robbery, certain fraud offenses, organized criminal activity, drug and terrorism related offenses, and other offenses punishable in both states for a maximum penalty of at least ten years. This treaty represents a watershed in our efforts to convince civil law countries in the western hemisphere to oblige themselves to extradite their nationals to the United States. We are already using this treaty as precedent in our efforts with other civil law nations in Latin America and elsewhere. In practical terms, this treaty should help the United States to bring to justice narcotics traffickers of Bolivian nationality who reside or may be found in Bolivia.

The treaties with Belgium, Hungary, Malaysia, and Switzerland permit, but do not require, a Requested State to extradite its nationals. In each of these treaties, should a Requested State refuse extradition on that basis, it is obliged upon request of the Requesting State to submit the case to its competent authorities for prosecution.

Although the U.S. delegations pursued this point very strenuously, the domestic laws of Belgium, Hungary, and Switzerland prohibit the extradition of nationals, while the law in Malaysia expressly gives the Malaysian executive the discretion to refuse extradition of nationals. Based on representations made by the Malaysian negotiators, it is the expectation of the U.S. Government that the Malaysian Government will not ordinarily exercise such discretion, but would extradite its nationals in most cases. We are continuing our efforts to convince these and all other countries to remove such restrictions on the extradition of nationals.

The second typically difficult issue in modern extradition treaties involves extraditions in cases in which the fugitive may be subject to the death penalty in the Requesting State. To understand this issue, it is important to keep in mind that a large number of countries in the world that have prohibited capital punishment domestically also, as a matter of law or policy, prohibit the extradition of persons to face the death penalty. To deal with this situation, the majority of recent U.S. extradition treaties have contained provisions under which a Requested State may request an assurance from the Requesting State that the fugitive will not face the death penalty. Provisions of this sort appear in the extradition treaties with Belgium, Bolivia, Hungary, the Philippines, and Switzerland. A relevant article also appears in the Malaysia treaty, which provides that the parties shall consult about and agree to the submission of a request which involves a capital offense in the Requesting State that is not subject to the death penalty in the Requested State. This somewhat different approach reflects the accommodation of Malaysian Government concerns that the role of their judiciary precludes their being able to give such assurances in any case.

Mr. Richard (1998):

The extradition treaty with Argentina highlights a development in the field of international extradition. There is almost universal agreement among nations on the value of international extradition, but there is less agreement on whether nations should extradite their own nationals to other nations. Most countries with a common law tradition, like the United States, do extradite their citizens, on request, to the country where the crime was committed, provided there is a treaty in force and there is evidence to support the charges. Many countries with a civil law tradition, however, have historically refused or been reluctant to extradite their nationals. These nations typically deny extradition and offer instead to prosecute the national within their own legal system for crimes committed abroad, a process referred to as "domestic prosecution."

Our experience has been that such "domestic prosecutions" are appealing in theory but woefully ineffective and inefficient in practice. Evidence collected in one country often cannot be transferred from the country where the offense occurred to the country of the offender's nationality because rules of evidence differ, or other technical, legal, or procedural differences interfere. Witnesses and victims themselves are often unable or unwilling to travel long distances to participate in judicial proceedings whose language and procedures they do not understand. Moreover, as the Attorney General has often stated, it is more appropriate to have the defendant tried where the victims are located and where the major harm was committed.

As a matter of fundamental law enforcement policy, the Administration believes that persons should be brought before the courts in those countries which have suffered the major criminal harm and which are best positioned to ensure fair and effective prosecution. The Administration further believes that criminals should never escape justice based simply on their citizenship or nationality.

We are especially pleased to see the growing number of countries like Argentina that are willing to re-examine past policies prohibiting or discouraging extradition of nationals. For instance, Italy, faced with the serious threat to society posed by international organized crime organizations, was one of the first countries to reverse its position, and began in the 1980s to extradite its citizens to the U.S. Bolivia and Uruguay have also broken with civil law tradition and dismantled barriers to extradition of nationals, and other states, such as Poland, are also re-evaluating their laws. For these reasons, the treaty with Argentina is an especially timely development, and will be an important precedent that we will encourage other Latin American nations to follow.

The extradition treaties reflect our law enforcement relations and priorities with our treaty partners. We have tried to emphasize negotiations of the extradition treaties that will be of paramount practical value to U.S. law enforcement.

(3) Other issues

During the 1991–1999 period, extradition treaties with Jordan (Mar. 28, 1995, U.S.-Jordan, S. Treaty Doc. 104–3 (1995)), Hong Kong (Dec. 20, 1996, U.S.-H.K., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–3 (1997)), and the Republic of Korea (June 9, 1998, U.S.-Korea, S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–2 (1999)), also entered into force following individual hearings before the SFRC and advice and consent to ratification. Issues raised in the context of specific treaties are discussed below.

(i) U.S.-Jordan extradition treaty

On May 3, 1995, the Senate gave advice and consent to ratification of a new extradition treaty between the United States and Jordan, transmitted by the President on April 24, 1995. S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–3 (1995); 141 CONG. REC. S6126 (daily ed. May 3, 1995). The report of the SFRC to the full Senate recommending advice and consent included State Department answers to questions posed by committee members on, among other things, the extradition of U.S. nationals to Jordan, as excerpted below. S. Exec. Rept. No. 104–2 (1995). See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 79, 80 (1996). The U.S.-Jordan extradition treaty entered into force on November 21, 1995. Subsequently, questions were raised in Jordan as to whether it had properly completed its domestic procedures for ratification. The United States continues to consider the treaty as in force.

Question. Under what circumstances or for what reasons may the United States legally, under the treaty, refuse extradition to Jordan of a U.S. citizen?
Answer. The treaty provides a number of grounds under which the United States may deny extradition of U.S. citizens and of non-U.S. citizens. For example, the United States can deny extradition if the offense for which extradition is sought does not comply with the treaty's dual criminality provisions (Article 2); if the crimes charged are political or military offenses, or if the charges are politically motivated (Article 4); if the fugitive has been convicted or acquitted of the charges in the United States (Article 5); if assurances regarding the death penalty are requested by the United States but not granted by Jordan (Article 7); if Jordan does not submit the documentation required to support a request for extradition (Article 8); if the fugitive is not removed from the Requested State once extradition has been granted (Article 12); or if the fugitive is extradited to another state (Article 14). In addition, extradition may be delayed until a United States prosecution or punishment of the fugitive sought by Jordan is completed. Moreover, the treaty does not in any way alter existing U.S. law which requires, as a prerequisite for extradition, that a U.S. court must find, based on the information submitted by the country requesting extradition, that there is probable cause to believe that the crime charged was committed and that the person whose extradition is sought committed that crime.

Question. Could the United States refuse extradition in the case of a U.S. citizen who is charged with a crime for which the penalty in Jordan is significantly more severe than the penalty in the United States?
Answer. The United States could refuse extradition in circumstances where a particular crime was punishable by the death penalty in Jordan but not in the United States. Article 7 of the Treaty provides that when the offense for which extradition is sought is punishable by death under the laws in the Requesting State and is not punishable by death under the laws in the Requested State, the Requested State may refuse extradition unless the Requesting State provides such assurances as the Requested State considers sufficient that the death penalty, if imposed, shall not be carried out.

In other cases, in keeping with modern U.S. extradition treaty practice, a crime will be extraditable if it is punishable under the laws in both Contracting States by deprivation of liberty for a period of more than one year or by a more severe penalty, regardless of whether the punishment might be more severe in one or the other Contracting State. Because the United States frequently imposes more severe penalties for crimes than our treaty partners, we do not negotiate provisions that would allow one party to refuse extradition based on the severity of the penalty, with the exception of the special death penalty provision noted above. We note that under United States law, the Secretary of State has the ultimate discretion to refuse extradition to another government under any extradition treaty.

(ii) U.S.-Hong Kong extradition treaty

Jamison S. Borek, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, and Mark M. Richard, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on June 3, 1997 to provide testimony in support of a bilateral extradition treaty with Hong Kong. Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Hong Kong for the Surrender of Fugitive Offenders, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–3 (1997). The treaty received advice and consent from the Senate on October 23, 1997, 143 CONG. REC. S11165 (daily ed. Oct. 23, 1997), and was ratified by the President on January 21, 1998. See also Chapter 4.A.4. for discussion of Hong Kong's status and the role of the United Kingdom and the People's Republic of China in the treaty.

The full text of the testimony, excerpted below, and related documents, is available in S.Exec. Rept. 105–2 (1997).

Ms. Borek:

* * * *

Hong Kong is one of our most valuable allies in this fight against international crime, and law enforcement is an important and vital element of our bilateral relationship. The ability to pursue fugitives who flee to Hong Kong and extradite them to the United States for trial is an essential part of that relationship. Since 1991 alone, Hong Kong has extradited over 60 fugitives to the United States and we have sent seven to Hong Kong under the 1972 treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom and the 1985 Supplementary Treaty, both made applicable to the Crown Colony of Hong Kong. This treaty, however, will cease to be effective for Hong Kong as of July 1, 1997, when Hong Kong reverts to the sovereignty of the People's Republic of China. Because of the importance of our law enforcement relationship with Hong Kong, we have anticipated this change and have negotiated the new treaty that you have before you. To complete the picture, we have also negotiated new treaties in the areas of mutual legal assistance and prisoner transfer which have recently been submitted to you as well for advice and consent.

This new treaty, the Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Hong Kong for the Surrender of Fugitive Offenders ("the Treaty") will, when ratified, provide the basis under U.S. law for extraditions from the United States and for requesting extraditions from Hong Kong. The Treaty is entered into with the sovereign assent and authorization of both the United Kingdom and the People's Republic of China ("PRC"). The Treaty itself expressly provides that Hong Kong enters into it with the authorization of "the sovereign government which is responsible for its foreign affairs." At present, that is the United Kingdom. However, the PRC has also specifically authorized the negotiation and conclusion of the Treaty, as well as its continuation in force after the reversion on July 1, 1997.

To date Hong Kong has followed this same process to negotiate and sign agreements for surrender of fugitive offenders with six countries in addition to the United States: the Netherlands, Canada, Australia, Malaysia, Philippines, and Indonesia. With your permission, I would also provide the committee with a diplomatic note for the record from the Government of the United Kingdom explaining in some detail the process established for authorizing and approving these new agreements and the role of the Joint Liaison Group.

After July 1, Hong Kong will continue to operate autonomously in the field of law enforcement. The status of Hong Kong after reversion is spelled out in two important documents. First, the 1984 Sino-British Joint Declaration on the Question of Hong Kong, which is an international agreement registered with the United Nations, provides for the transition of sovereignty from the United Kingdom to China. In so doing it embodies the concept of "one country, two systems" for Hong Kong, under which Hong Kong will retain a high degree of autonomy in all matters except foreign affairs and defense. In addition, the 1990 Basic Law promulgated by the People's Republic of China provides the fundamental governing framework for implementing the principles of the Joint Declaration in the future Hong Kong Special Administrative Region.

Together these instruments explicitly provide for the continuation of the capitalist system and way of life unchanged in the HKSAR for 50 years; for continuity of the legal system and laws; for an independent judiciary and for independent prosecution. They also provide for the continued applicability of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights to the HKSAR and provide other specific protections for individual rights and basic freedoms. The Basic Law expressly prohibits interference by the PRC in affairs administered by the HKSAR.

In sum, they provide that law enforcement and criminal justice, including police force, prosecution, trial and imprisonment will be a matter administered independently by the HKSAR by Hong Kong courts under Hong Kong law.

* * * *

. . . Certain . . . provisions have been included that are of particular value given the special circumstances of Hong Kong, including protections for fugitives after Hong Kong's reversion.

Article 16, for instance, provides the customary protections referred to as the "rule of specialty." This provides that an extradited fugitive cannot be tried or punished nor transferred outside the jurisdiction of the requesting Party for crimes committed prior to surrender unless the sending Party consents or the person has had an opportunity to leave the jurisdiction and has chosen not to do so or has left and voluntarily returned. In the Treaty, the specialty provision has been specifically adapted to take account of the precise situation of Hong Kong, and thus prohibits the surrender or transfer of a fugitive anywhere beyond the jurisdiction of the Special Administrative Region of Hong Kong.

Furthermore, under Article 20, these protections are made expressly applicable to persons who have been surrendered between the parties prior to its entry into force. That is, the Treaty expressly extends these protections to persons who have already been extradited under the existing treaty. We believe that the specialty protection of the current treaty would continue to apply to such persons even in the absence of the new treaty. These provisions, however, make clear that anyone we extradite to Hong Kong is fully protected from being tried for other crimes or surrendered outside of Hong Kong to other parts of the PRC or anywhere else for the same or prior crimes without the express consent of the United States.

Among the other crimes that will become extraditable for the first time are intellectual property offenses, computer crimes, bail jumping, gambling, money laundering related to any extraditable crime, and weapons offenses. The agreement envisions that as a general rule, extradition will not be denied on the basis of nationality. This principle, found in Article 3, is consistent with long-standing U.S. policy favoring the extradition of nationals. However, the agreement contains narrow exceptions that take into account Hong Kong's unique status under the Chinese "one country, two systems" approach to reversion. Under Article 3 of the agreement, the executive authorities of both the United States and Hong Kong have the right to refuse the surrender of nationals(in the case of Hong Kong, this means Chinese nationals) if the requested surrender relates to the defense, foreign affairs, or essential public interest of the requested Party. Article 3 also permits the executive authority in Hong Kong to refuse the surrender of a Chinese national who does not have what is called the "right of abode" in Hong Kong or has not "entered Hong Kong for the purpose of settlement," if the P.R.C. has jurisdiction over the offense and has commenced or completed proceedings for the prosecution of that person. (The term "right of abode" refers to legal residents of Hong Kong, and the language concerning entry "for the purpose of settlement" is a term of art referring to an ongoing family reunification policy in Hong Kong). Article 3 also provides that in the event that the surrender of a national is refused, the case may be submitted to the competent authorities of the requested Party for possible domestic prosecution.

* * * *

In providing advice and consent to the extradition treaty with Hong Kong, the Senate included provisions specifically tailored to the political situation in Hong Kong, set forth below. 143 CONG. REC. S11165 (daily ed. Oct. 23, 1997).

---

(a) UNDERSTANDINGS. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following two understandings, which shall be included in the instrument of ratification, and shall be binding on the President:

(1) THIRD PARTY TRANSFERS. The United States understands that Article 16(2) permits the transfer of persons surrendered to Hong Kong under this Agreement beyond the jurisdiction of Hong Kong when the United States so consents, but that the United States will not apply Article 16(2) of the Agreement to permit the transfer of persons surrendered to the Government of Hong Kong to any other jurisdiction in the People's Republic of China, unless the person being surrendered consents to the transfer.

(2) HONG KONG COURTS' POWER OF FINAL ADJUDICATION. The United States understands that Hong Kong's courts have the power of final adjudication over all matters within Hong Kong's autonomy as guaranteed in the 1984 Sino-British Joint Declaration on the Question of Hong Kong, signed on December 19, 1984, and ratified on May 27, 1985. The United States expects that any exceptions to the jurisdiction of the Hong Kong courts for acts of state shall be construed narrowly. The United States understands that the exemption for acts of state does not diminish the responsibilities of the Hong Kong authorities with respect to extradition or the rights of an individual to a fair trial in Hong Kong courts. Any attempt by the Government of Hong Kong or the Government of the People's Republic of China to curtail the jurisdiction and power of final adjudication of the Hong Kong courts may be considered grounds for withdrawal from the Agreement.

(b) DECLARATIONS. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following two declarations, which shall be binding on the President:

(1) REPORT ON THE HONG KONG JUDICIAL SYSTEM. One year after entry into force, the Secretary of State, in coordination with the Attorney General, shall prepare and submit a report to the Committee on Foreign Relations that addresses the following issues during the period after entry into force of the Agreement: (i) an assessment of the independence of the Hong Kong judicial system from the Government of the People's Republic of China, including a summary of any instances in which the Government of the People's Republic of China has infringed upon the independence of the Hong Kong judiciary; (ii) an assessment of the due process accorded all persons under the jurisdiction of the Government of Hong Kong; (iii) an assessment of the due process accorded persons extradited to Hong Kong by the United States; (iv) an accounting of the citizenship and number of persons extradited to Hong Kong from the United States, and the citizenship and number of persons extradited to the United States from Hong Kong; (v) an accounting of the destination of third party transfer of persons who were originally extradited from the United States, and the citizenship of those persons; (vi) a summary of the types of crimes for which persons have been extradited between the United States and Hong Kong;

c. Treaty interpretation: extradition for parental child abduction

As noted above, older U.S. extradition treaties, generally those signed before 1980, were most typically "list" treaties. Such treaties did not include "parental child abduction" or "parental kidnapping" or a similar phrase or concept among the list of extraditable offenses. At the time the treaties were negotiated, parental child abduction was not a criminal offense in most countries, including in the United States. By the mid-nineties, however, every state in the United States and the District of Columbia had criminalized the act of parental abduction. In 1993, the International Parental Kidnapping Crime Act of 1993, Pub. L. No. 103–173, 107 Stat. 1998 (codified as amended at 18 U.S.C. § 1204) was enacted at the federal level; see Chapter 2.B.1.b.

Normally, the interpretation of "list" treaties would have evolved to reflect the evolution of new aspects of crimes that are identified in the list treaties. In this instance, however, the U.S. view that extradition list treaties did not include parental child abduction had been widely disseminated. In 1976 a notice in the Federal Register stated that "extradition is an instrument of criminal law enforcement, and it is believed that it might be frequently misused if applied to domestic relations problems such as custody disputes." See 41 Fed. Reg. 51,897 (Nov. 24, 1976). See also Digest 1978 at 391; I Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 700–01.

This issue did not arise with extradition treaties that, as discussed above, replaced the list of extraditable crimes with a "dual criminality" provision, thus providing for extradition to and from any country which also criminalizes parental child abduction.

To remedy the situation, the State and Justice Departments brought the issue to the attention of Congress in 1997. As a result, the Extradition Treaties Interpretation Act of 1998, Pub. L. No. 105–323, 112 Stat. 3029 (codified as amended at 22 U.S.C. § 2708), was enacted, clarifying that "kidnapping" in extradition list treaties may include parental kidnapping, thus reflecting the major changes that had occurred in this area of criminal law in the previous 20 years. The change in the U.S. practice of interpreting extradition list treaties was also announced in the Federal Register on January 25, 1999. 64 Fed. Reg. 3735 (Jan. 25, 1999), excerpted below.

This change in the interpretation of "kidnapping" for purposes of extradition treaties is entirely unrelated to and would have no effect whatsoever on the use of civil means for the return of children, in particular under the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Parental Child Abduction. It addresses only countries with which we have "list" extradition treaties and would have no effect with respect to countries with which the United States has no extradition relationship or countries where we have a dual criminality treaty.

The adoption of this expanded interpretation with respect to each specific treaty, however, will depend of course on the views of the other country in question, as the interpretation of terms in a bilateral treaty must depend on a shared understanding between the two parties. The United States recognizes that not all countries have criminalized parental kidnapping, and many continue to treaty custody of children as a civil or family law matter that is not an appropriate subject for criminal action. We also recognize that this is an evolving area of criminal law and that some countries which do not currently criminalize this conduct may decide to do so in future years. For this reason, we will consult with our list treaty partners and will adopt the expanded interpretation only where there is a shared understanding to this effect between the parties.

d. Roles of judiciary and Secretary of State in U.S. extradition practice

(1) Rule of non-inquiry

On March 20, 1997, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit reversed a grant of habeas corpus by the U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts in a case challenging an extradition to Hong Kong. United States v. Lui Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997), as corrected April 9, 1997, stay of mandate denied, 520 U.S. 1206 (1997). Lui, formerly Director of Exports of the British American Tobacco Co. (Hong Kong) Ltd., was charged in Hong Kong with conspiring to receive and receiving over $3 million in bribes and $1.5 million in unsecured loans during a five-year period. The payments were allegedly in exchange for a virtual monopoly on the export of certain brands of cigarettes to the People's Republic of China ("PRC") and to Taiwan. Hong Kong requested Lui's extradition from the United States on February 13, 1996, under the U.S.-U.K. extradition treaty, applicable at that time to Hong Kong as a crown colony of the U.K. (The 1931 U.S.-U.K. treaty was made applicable to Hong Kong, among other British territories, by an exchange of diplomatic notes on October 21, 1976. Extradition Treaty with the United Kingdom, 28 U.S.T. 227. The U.S.-U.K. treaty and the Supplementary Treaty, S. Treaty Doc. No. 99–8 (1985), were applicable to Hong Kong by their terms.)

Lui was found extraditable by a U.S. magistrate on August 29, 1996. In re Extradition of Lui Kin-Hong, 939 F. Supp. 934 (D. Mass. 1996). The U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts granted Lui's petition for writ of habeas corpus on January 7, 1997, based on the effects of the scheduled reversion of Hong Kong to the PRC on July 1, 1997. Lui Kin-Hong v. United States, 957 F. Supp. 1280 (D. Mass. 1997). As subsequently summarized by the court of appeals, the district court reasoned that:

> because the Crown Colony could not try Lui and punish him before the reversion date, the extradition treaty between the United States and the UK, which is applicable to Hong Kong, prohibited extradition . . . Because no extradition treaty between the United States and the new government of Hong Kong has been confirmed by the United States Senate, . . . the magistrate judge lacked jurisdiction to certify extraditability . . .

In reversing this order, the First Circuit concluded that Lui's concerns as to treatment after extradition were for the Secretary of State to consider rather than the courts, relying, inter alia, on the "rule of non-inquiry." Lui-Kin Hong, 110 F.3d at 110. The Supreme Court denied Lui's petition for a stay of mandate on May 12, 1997. 520 U.S. 1206 (1997). Lui was extradited to Hong Kong in May 1997 where he was tried, convicted, and sentenced under Hong Kong law. Excerpts below from the First Circuit opinion describe the extradition process in the United States and provide the court's views of the relevance of the reversion of Hong Kong and the rule of non-inquiry and its applicability to this case. International citations have been omitted.

Lui does not claim that he faces prosecution in Hong Kong on account of his race, religion, nationality, or political opinion. He does not claim to be charged with a political offense. The treaties give the courts a greater role when such considerations are present. Here, Lui's posture is that of one charged with an ordinary crime. His claim is that to surrender him now to Hong Kong is, in effect, to send him to trial and punishment in the People's Republic of China. The Senate, in approving the treaties, could not have intended such a result, he argues, and so the court should interpret the treaties as being inapplicable to his case. Absent a treaty permitting extradition, he argues, he may not be extradited.

While Lui's argument is not frivolous, neither is it persuasive. The Senate was well aware of the reversion when it approved a supplementary treaty with the United Kingdom in 1986. The Senate could easily have sought language to address the reversion of Hong Kong if it were concerned, but did not do so. The President has recently executed a new treaty with the incoming government of Hong Kong, containing the same guarantees that Lui points to in the earlier treaties, and that treaty has been submitted to the Senate. [Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Hong Kong for the Surrender of Fugitive Offenders, signed Dec. 20, 1996] In addition, governments of our treaty partners often change, sometimes by ballot, sometimes by revolution or other means, and the possibility or even certainty of such change does not itself excuse compliance with the terms of the agreement embodied in the treaties between the countries. Treaties contain reciprocal benefits and obligations. The United States benefits from the treaties at issue and, under their terms, may seek extradition to the date of reversion of those it wants for criminal offenses.

Fundamental principles in our American democracy limit the role of courts in certain matters, out of deference to the powers allocated by the Constitution to the President and to the Senate, particularly in the conduct of foreign relations. Those separation of powers principles, well rehearsed in extradition law, preclude us from rewriting the treaties which the President and the Senate have approved. The plain language of the treaties does not support Lui. Under the treaties as written, the courts may not, on the basis of the reversion, avoid certifying to the Secretary of State that Lui may be extradited. The decision whether to surrender Lui, in light of his arguments, is for the Secretary of State to make.

This is not to say American courts acting under the writ of habeas corpus, itself guaranteed in the Constitution, have no independent role. There is the ultimate safeguard that extradition proceedings before United States courts comport with the Due Process Clause of the Constitution. On the facts of this case, there is nothing presenting a serious constitutional issue of denial of due process. Some future case may, on facts amounting to a violation of constitutional guarantees, warrant judicial intervention. This case does not.

A. United States Extradition Procedure

In the United States, the procedures for extradition are governed by statute. See 18 U.S.C. ch. 209. The statute establishes a two-step procedure which divides responsibility for extradition between a judicial officer (fn. omitted) and the Secretary of State. The judicial officer's duties are set out in 18 U.S.C. § 3184. In brief, the judicial officer, upon complaint, issues an arrest warrant for an individual sought for extradition, provided that there is an extradition treaty between the United States and the relevant foreign government and that the crime charged is covered by the treaty. See id. If a warrant issues, the judicial officer then conducts a hearing to determine if "he deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty." Id. If the judicial officer makes such a determination, he "shall certify" to the Secretary of State that a warrant for the surrender of the relator "may issue." Id. (emphases added). The judicial officer is also directed to provide the Secretary of State with a copy of the testimony and evidence from the extradition hearing. Id.

It is then within the Secretary of State's sole discretion to determine whether or not the relator should actually be extradited. See 18 U.S.C. § 3186 ("The Secretary of State may order the person committed under section[] 3184 . . . of this title to be delivered to any authorized agent of such foreign government. . . .") . . . The Secretary has the authority to review the judicial officer's findings of fact and conclusions of law de novo,[8] and to reverse the judicial officer's certification of extraditability if she believes that it was made erroneously. (fn. and citations omitted) The Secretary may also decline to surrender the relator on any number of discretionary grounds, including but not limited to, humanitarian and foreign policy considerations. Additionally, the Secretary may attach conditions to the surrender of the relator.[10] The State Department alone, and not the judiciary, has the power to attach conditions to an order of extradition.

Thus, under 18 U.S.C. § 3184, the judicial officer's inquiry is limited to a narrow set of issues concerning the existence of a treaty, the offense charged, and the quantum of evidence offered. The larger assessment of extradition and its consequences is committed to the Secretary of State. This bifurcated procedure reflects the fact that extradition proceedings contain legal issues peculiarly suited for judicial resolution, such as questions of the standard of proof, competence of evidence, and treaty construction, yet simultaneously implicate questions of foreign policy, which are better answered by the executive branch. Both institutional competence rationales and our constitutional structure, which places primary responsibility for foreign affairs in the executive branch., see, e.g., United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319–22, 81 L. Ed. 255, 57 S. Ct. 216 (1936), support this division of labor.

In implementing this system of split responsibilities for extradition, courts have developed principles which ensure, among other things, that the judicial inquiry does not unnecessarily impinge upon executive prerogative and expertise. For example, the executive branch's construction of a treaty, although not binding upon the courts, is entitled to great weight. Another principle is that extradition treaties, unlike criminal statutes, are to be construed liberally in favor of enforcement because they are "in the interest of justice and friendly international relationships." These principles of construction require courts to: > interpret extradition treaties to produce reciprocity between, and expanded rights on behalf of, the signatories: "[Treaties] should be liberally construed so as to effect the apparent intention of the parties to secure equality and reciprocity between them. For that reason, if a treaty fairly admits of two constructions, one restricting the rights which may be claimed under it, and the other enlarging it, the more liberal construction is to be preferred."

[10] The United States has, for example, imposed conditions as to the type of trial the relator would receive (e.g., in civil, rather than martial law, court) and as to security arrangements for the relator. 4 Abbell & Ristau, supra, § 13–3–8(4), at 273 n.1.

Another principle that guides courts in matters concerning extradition is the rule of non-inquiry. More than just a principle of treaty construction, the rule of non-inquiry tightly limits the appropriate scope of judicial analysis in an extradition proceeding. Under the rule of non-inquiry, courts refrain from "investigating the fairness of a requesting nation's justice system," id. at 1329, and from inquiring "into the procedures or treatment which await a surrendered fugitive in the requesting country." Arnbjornsdottir-Mendler v. United States, 721 F.2d 679, 683 (9th Cir. 1983). The rule of non-inquiry, like extradition procedures generally, is shaped by concerns about institutional competence and by notions of separation of powers. See United States v. Smyth, 61 F.3d 711, 714 (9th Cir. 1995) (fn. omitted). It is not that questions about what awaits the relator in the requesting country are irrelevant to extradition; it is that there is another branch of government, which has both final say and greater discretion in these proceedings, to whom these questions are more properly addressed (fn. omitted).

The principles of reciprocity and liberal construction also counsel against construing the Treaties so as to prohibit Lui's extradition. Hong Kong, through the United Kingdom, has entered bilateral treaties with the United States. The United States has sought extradition of criminals from Hong Kong in the past, and may wish to continue to do so up until July 1, 1997. If the executive chooses to modify or abrogate the terms of the Treaties that it negotiated, it has ample discretion to do so. However, if this court were to read a cut-off date vis-a-vis extraditions to Hong Kong into the Treaties, it would risk depriving both parties of the benefit of their bargain.

None of these principles, including non-inquiry, may be regarded as an absolute. We, like the Second Circuit, "can imagine situations where the relator, upon extradition, would be subject to procedures or punishment so antipathetic to a federal court's sense of decency as to require reexamination of the principles" discussed above. . . . This is not such a case. Lui is wanted for economic, not political, activities whose criminality is fully recognized in the United States. His extradition is sought by the current Hong Kong regime, a colony of Great Britain, which, as Lui himself points out, is one of this country's most trusted treaty partners. Moreover, Lui has been a fugitive from Hong Kong since 1994. He has been subject to extradition since entering the United States in December 1995. Now that only a few months remain before the reversion of Hong Kong is partly attributable to strategic choices made by Lui himself. There is nothing here which shocks the conscience of this court.

(2) Constitutional challenges to extradition statute

During the 1990s several suits were filed challenging the constitutionality of the statutory scheme for extradition from the United States set forth at 18 U.S.C. § 3181 et seq. The challenges focused on language in section 3184, described by the First Circuit in Lui Kin-Hong, supra.

The cases discussed below alleged that the provision, enacted in 1848, violated separation of powers by providing for review of a judicial decision by the executive branch. Ultimately none was successful.

(i) LoBue v. Christopher; DeSilva v. DiLeonardi

In 1995 the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia found the extradition statute unconstitutional for violation of separation of powers. LoBue v. Christopher, 893 F. Supp. 65 (D.D.C. 1995). Plaintiffs in LoBue, Anthony and Albert DeSilva, Anthony LoBue and Thomas Kulekowskis, had been found extraditable to Canada by a U.S. magistrate judge in the Northern District of Illinois on charges of kidnapping Anthony DeSilva's paraplegic wife from Canada to the United States. In re Extradition of Kulekowskis, 881 F.Supp. 1126 (N.D. Ill. 1995). The four individuals then brought an action in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia against the Secretary of State, the Department of State, and the United States challenging the constitutionality of the federal extradition statute and seeking declaratory relief and an injunction barring the United States from carrying out their extradition. The district court granted the relief sought, concluding that, "while is it quite clear that the Constitution forbids the Executive branch from reviewing the legal decisions of the federal Judiciary, this is precisely the effect of the statute."

On September 15, 1995, in an unpublished order, the district court also certified a class of all persons "who presently or in the future will be under the threat of extradition" pursuant to the existing extradition statute, extended its declaratory judgment to all potential extraditees, and enjoined the Secretary of State from extraditing any fugitives from the United States to foreign countries. The injunction was stayed by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on September 29, 1995. See Lo Duca v. United States, 1996 U.S. App. LEXIS 28746, n.1. (2d Cir. Aug. 29, 1996).

On August 30, 1996, the court of appeals vacated the district court decision and remanded for dismissal of the case. LoBue v. Christopher, 82 F.3d 1081 (D.C. Cir. 1996). It did so on grounds that the district court lacked jurisdiction because plaintiffs "are in the constructive custody of the U.S. Marshal for the Northern District of Illinois [and] they can challenge the statute through a petition for habeas corpus there. (In fact, they have filed a habeas petition.)" The D.C. Circuit did not address the constitutional issues. Id. at 1082.

The U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois initially granted writs of habeas corpus for which the plaintiffs in LoBue had applied. Kulekowskis v. DiLeonardi, 941 F. Supp. 741 (N.D. Ill. 1996). The district court concluded that the requirement under the U.S.-Canada extradition treaty for "dual criminality" i.e., that the conduct be criminal in both the United States and Canada, was not met in the case because of DeSilva's status as guardian of his wife, whom the four were charged with kidnapping. Id. at 744. Because the court found the absence of dual criminality dispositive, it did not address petitioners' other claims, including a challenge to the constitutionality of the statute.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit reversed. As to the dual criminality requirement, the court of appeals disagreed with the district court's analysis of U.S. guardianship law, concluding that "[a] guardian who moves an adult ward across state or national boundaries, against her will, . . . may be convicted of kidnapping." The court of appeals also addressed the constitutional claim, concluding that § 3184 did not violate the doctrine of separation of powers because, like a search warrant or an order approving deportation, "it authorizes, but does not compel, the executive branch of government to act in a certain way." Desilva v. DiLeonardi, 125 F.3d 1110 (1997), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 810 (1998). The Seventh Circuit analysis of the constitutional issue is set forth below.

The magistrate judge certified the charges under § 3184 and left to the Secretary of State the ultimate decision whether to honor Canada's request. Petitioners submit that § 3184 violates Article III of the Constitution and the doctrine of separation of powers "by requiring federal courts to give advisory opinions that are subject to plenary review and revision by the Executive branch." . . .

An argument that certification for extradition is an advisory opinion does not have much force, as magistrate judges do not serve under Article III of the Constitution and therefore are free to issue advisory opinions if a statute requires that step. The current proceeding—the quest for writs of habeas corpus—is anything but advisory. If the writ issues, it must be obeyed. But even the proceeding before the magistrate judge was an Article III case or controversy. A certificate of extradition is no different from a search warrant or an order approving a deportation: it authorizes, but does not compel, the executive branch of government to act in a certain way. The police may change their mind about the need for a search; the Board of Immigration Appeals may grant the alien's request for reopening. The Constitution itself allows the President to block enforcement of a criminal judgment by issuing a pardon. Judgments give victorious litigants rights but not duties; only the losers are placed under obligations, and a judgment may be called "advisory" only when it does not bind the unsuccessful litigant. A victor in civil litigation may forego collecting the award of damages; no one thinks that this makes the judgment advisory. The police need not search, the Attorney General need not deport, the victorious plaintiff need not collect—and the Secretary of State need not extradite. A federal court had the constitutional authority to certify the petitioners for extradition. Accord, Lo Duca v. United States, 93 F.3d 1100 (2d Cir. 1996) (reaching the same conclusion by a different route).

* * * *

In 1998 the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois rejected additional claims brought by the same petitioners, including a claim that the Constitution prohibited magistrate judges from making extradition decisions and that the role of the U.S. Attorney as an advocate of extradition violated the Emoluments Clause of the Constitution because it made him a de facto officer of a foreign nation. LoBue v. DiLeonardi, 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3317 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 8, 1999). The Seventh Circuit affirmed. DeSilva v. DiLeonardi, 181 F.3d 865 (7th Cir. 1999).

(ii) Lo Duca v. United States

In 1996 the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit also affirmed a district court decision denying a challenge to the constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 3184. Lo Duca v. United States, 1996 U.S. App. LEXIS 28746 (2d Cir. Aug. 29, 1996), correcting 93 F.3d 1100 (2d Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1007 (1996). In 1993 LoDuca was convicted in Italy for various narcotics-related offenses and sentenced to nineteen years in prison after being tried in absentia. He was arrested in the United States and found extraditable by a magistrate judge in the Eastern District of New York in 1994 pursuant to a request by Italy under the U.S.-Italy extradition treaty. LoDuca sought a writ of habeas corpus from the district court, arguing that insufficient documents had been presented and that the offense for which he was being extradited did not meet the dual-criminality requirement of the treaty. The district court denied the writ.

On appeal Lo Duca for the first time argued that 18 U.S.C. § 3184 was unconstitutional. While acknowledging the general rule that a federal appellate court does not consider issues not addressed below, the court nevertheless exercised its discretion to consider the issue because it found that "the constitutional issues advanced by Lo Duca are sufficiently important that they should be assessed on their merits."

Excerpts below set forth the Second Circuit's analysis of the constitutional challenge and its conclusion that the statute did not violate separation of powers because judicial officers acting pursuant to section 3184 did not exercise the "judicial power" of the United States under Article III of the Constitution and because the judicial officers' actions pursuant to the extradition statute did not constitute unconstitutional authorization to engage in extrajudicial activities. Internal citations have been omitted.

* * * *

The federal extradition statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3184, was first enacted nearly 150 years ago to provide a legal framework for extradition proceedings involving fugitives found in the United States. Prior to 1848, extradition was largely a matter committed to the discretion of the Executive Branch. The primary function of section 3184 is to "interpose the judiciary between the executive and the individual."[2] . . .

The extradition hearing conducted pursuant to section 3184 "is not . . . in the nature of a final trial by which the prisoner could be convicted or acquitted of the crime charged against him . . ." Instead, it is "essentially a preliminary examination to determine whether a case is made out which will justify the holding of the accused and his surrender to the demanding nation." As the Supreme Court has stated, "The function of the committing magistrate is to determine whether there is competent evidence to justify holding the accused to await trial, and not to determine whether the evidence is sufficient to justify a conviction." The judicial officer who conducts an extradition hearing "thus performs an assignment in line with his or her accustomed task of determining if there is probable cause to hold a defendant to answer for the commission of an offense."

If the extradition officer issues a certificate of extraditability, the Secretary of State "may" order the fugitive to be delivered to the extraditing nation. 18 U.S.C. § 3184. The Secretary of State, however, is under no legal duty to do so. . . .

Lo Duca presents two alternative contentions, consideration of which depends upon our resolution of an initial question: do judicial officers acting pursuant to section 3184 exercise the "judicial power" of the United States under Article III of the Constitution? If an extradition officer does exercise Article III power, then Lo Duca contends that the statutory scheme is unconstitutional since it subjects Article III judgments to revision by the Executive Branch. On the other hand, if an extradition officer does not exercise Article III power, then Lo Duca contends that Congress has unconstitutionally authorized federal judges and magistrate judges to engage in extrajudicial activities.

[2] In the absence of section 3184, the Executive Branch would retain plenary authority to extradite. See Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698, 714, 37 L.Ed. 905, 3 S.Ct. 1016 (1893) ("The surrender, pursuant to treaty stipulations, of persons residing or found in this country, and charged with crime in another, may be made by the executive authority of the President alone, when no provision has been made by treaty or by statute for an examination of the case by a judge or magistrate.").

This is not the first time that our Circuit has considered the question of whether extradition officers exercise Article III power. In Austin, we recently held that the function performed by an extradition officer is not an exercise of the judicial power of the United States. Austin, 5 F.3d [598] at 603. [2d Cir. 1993]. This holding accords with the decisions of the First, Eleventh, and District of Columbia Circuits.

* * * *

. . . The fact that decisions of extradition officers are non-appealable strongly indicates that such officers do not exercise Article III power.

This conclusion is bolstered by the fact that, although direct judicial review of an extradition proceeding is not available, there is the possibility for what has been called "executive revision," pursuant to the discretionary authority of the Executive Branch to refuse extradition. . . .

* * * *

In United States v. Ferreira, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 40, 14 L. Ed. 42 (1852) (Little Brown & Co. 1870), the Supreme Court considered a . . . statute authorizing federal district judges in Florida to adjust certain claims made by the Spanish inhabitants of that state against the United States. Id. at 45. Those determinations were subject to approval by the Secretary of the Treasury. Id. The Supreme Court held that "such a tribunal is not a judicial one. . . . The authority conferred on the respective judges was nothing more than that of a commissioner. . . ." Id. at 47. As the Supreme Court elaborated:

> The powers conferred by these acts of Congress upon the judge . . . are, it is true, judicial in their nature. For judgment and discretion must be exercised by both of them. But it is nothing more than the power ordinarily given by law to a commissioner appointed to adjust claims to lands or money > under a treaty. . . . [It] is not judicial . . . , in the sense in which judicial power is granted by the constitution to the courts of the United States.

Id. at 48. Thus, the Supreme Court found it unexceptional that the judges, as commissioners, acted in an "adjudicatory" capacity.[5]

. . . Ferreira relied on the fact that the decisions of the district judges were subject to executive revision. The Supreme Court found it "too evident for argument" that the statute did not confer Article III power since > neither the evidence, nor [the judge's] award, are to be filed in the court in which he presides, nor recorded there; but he is required to transmit, both the decision and the evidence upon which he decided, to the Secretary of the Treasury; and the claim is to be paid if the Secretary thinks it just and equitable, but not otherwise.

Id. at 46–47. Thus, the fact of executive revision led the Supreme Court in Ferreira to hold that those judges, acting as commissioners, did not exercise Article III power. Similarly, in this case, it is dispositive U.S. Const. art. III, § 1 ("The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."). The use of the word "judges" in section 3184 is more consistent with a statute appointing commissioners "by official, instead of personal descriptions." Hayburn's Case, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) at 410 n.1. that, since the decisions of extradition officers are subject to revision by the Secretary of State, those officers do not exercise judicial power within the meaning of Article III. See Doherty, 786 F.2d at 499 n.10 ("The . . . function of issuing the certificate [of extraditability is] nonjudicial because . . . the Secretary of State is not bound to extradite even if the certificate is granted.").

[5] The Constitution itself provides numerous situations where some form of adjudication is required outside the context of Article III. For example, the executive decision to grant a Presidential pardon may be based on a review of the law and facts that would normally be reserved to the province of courts. Similarly, the executive decision to veto legislation may be based on an opinion that such legislation is unconstitutional. See Bator et al., Hart & Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System, supra, at 471 ("The concept of 'the judicial power' cannot be defined so as . . . to create a monopoly for the judges in the adjudicatory task of finding facts and determining the meaning and applicability of provisions of law.") . . .

Lastly, we point out that, as a matter of statutory language, section 3184 closely tracks the holdings of Metzger, Hayburn's Case, and Ferreira by granting jurisdiction over extradition complaints not to "courts" but to individual enumerated "justices," "judges," and "magistrates," including judges of state courts of general jurisdiction. See 18 U.S.C. § 3184. Thus, by its terms, "§ 3184 vests individual judges with jurisdiction over extradition requests." Mackin, 668 F.2d at 130 n.11. This distinction between "courts" and "judges" in the context of extradition proceedings has been long recognized. We note that, traditionally, it is "courts" and not "judges" that exercise Article III power. See U.S. Const. Art. III, Sect. 1 ("The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.") The use of the word "judges" in section 3184 is more consistent with a statute appointing commissioners "by official, instead of personal descriptions." Hayburn's Case, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) at 410 n.1.

* * * *

Having examined the text of the statute, its structural correlation with Article III, and the relevant historical precedents, we conclude that our holding in Austin was correct—extradition officers do not exercise judicial power under Article III of the Constitution. Austin, 5 F.3d at 603. We therefore turn to Lo Duca's following arguments, which contend that section 3184 is unconstitutional precisely because it does not confer Article III power.

* * * *

In cases reaching as far back as Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 2 L. Ed. 60 (1803), the Supreme Court has held that Congress may not expand the jurisdiction of federal courts beyond the limits established by Article III. Lo Duca relies on these cases to contend that the Constitution prevents Congress from vesting federal courts with jurisdiction over non-Article III extradition complaints.

Without questioning these cases, the Government responds that federal courts are not the subject of section 3184. Rather, "§ 3184 vests individual judges with jurisdiction over extradition requests." This distinction between "courts" and "judges" is dispositive. . . . Only individual justices, judges, and magistrate judges are authorized to act under the statute. Since they function, as in Hayburn's Case and in Ferreira, as commissioners, they are not bound by the limits of Article III.

Lo Duca next argues that, insofar as section 3184 requires judges to act in an extrajudicial capacity, the statute runs afoul of Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 102 L. Ed. 2d 714, 109 S. Ct. 647 (1989). In Mistretta, the Supreme Court was concerned with the possibility that Congress might compromise the independence of Article III judges by requiring them to participate in extrajudicial activities. This concern, however, does not apply with equal force to those who are not Article III judges. Thus, Lo Duca's claim founders at the outset since his extradition proceedings were conducted solely by federal magistrate judges. Then-Magistrate Judge Ross issued the warrant under which Lo Duca was arrested. Magistrate Judge Gold conducted the subsequent extradition hearing and granted the certificate of extraditability. . . . Since federal magistrate judges are not Article III judges, the Constitution does not accord them the same protections against Congressional expansion of their duties. . . .

In any event, even if Lo Duca's extradition proceedings had been conducted by a federal judge, there would be no violation of Mistretta. On the contrary, Mistretta expressly states that federal judges may participate in extrajudicial activities as long as two requirements are met. First, the judge must be acting "in an individual, not judicial, capacity." Mistretta, 488 U.S. at 404. Second, "a particular extrajudicial assignment [must not] undermine[] the integrity of the Judicial Branch." Id. n9 We have already held that judges acting pursuant to section 3184 do so as commissioners in an individual capacity. . . .

Mistretta was also concerned with the possibility that certain extrajudicial activities might undermine the integrity of the Judicial Branch by weakening public confidence. We believe that, in this particular context, history sufficiently allays this concern. For nearly 150 years, federal judges have adjudicated extradition complaints under section 3184 with no indication of any adverse consequences. Of course, this is hardly surprising since an extradition proceeding is "an essentially neutral endeavor and one in which judicial participation is peculiarly appropriate." We conclude that the extrajudicial duties authorized by section 3184 do not undermine the integrity of the Judicial Branch, and Mistretta does not prohibit federal judges from hearing extradition complaints.

(iii) Other cases

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit also upheld the constitutionality of the extradition statute in a case involving an extradition to the United Kingdom, adopting the Seventh Circuit's reasoning in DeSilva. United States v. Artt, 158 F.3d 462 (9th Cir. 1998). That opinion, however, was withdrawn when the Ninth Circuit granted the U.S. petition for rehearing on other issues. 183 F.3d 944 (9th Cir. 1999). In 2000 the appeals were dismissed as moot, and the case was remanded to the district court with direction to withdraw its opinion and order for extradition and dismiss the case as moot when the United Kingdom withdrew its request for extradition. 249 F.3d 831 (9th Cir. 2000).

In United States v. Lui Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997), the First Circuit commented on the question of the constitutionality of section 3184 in a footnote, as follows:

> Although at first glance this procedure might appear to be of questionable constitutionality because it subjects judicial decisions to executive review, rendering them non-final, cf. Hayburn's Case, 2 U.S. (2Dall.) 409, 1 L.Ed. 436 (1792), it has been held that the judicial officer in an extradition proceeding "is not exercising 'any part > of the judicial power of the United States,' " and instead is acting in "a non-institutional capacity." United States v. Howard, 996 F.2d 1320, 1325 (1st Cir. 1993) (quoting In re Kaine, 55 U.S. (14 How.) 103, 120, 14 L.Ed. 345 (1852)).

(3) Application of supplementary treaty with United Kingdom: In re Extradition of Smyth

In 1994 the District Court for the Northern District of California denied certification of extradition of James Joseph Smyth to the United Kingdom. In re Extradition of Smyth, 863 F. Supp. 1137 (N.D. Cal. 1994). Smyth had been convicted of the attempted murder of a prison officer in Belfast, Northern Ireland in 1978 and sentenced to 20 years. He escaped from prison in 1983 and fled to the United States. The United Kingdom sought Smyth's extradition to serve the remainder of his sentence under the terms of the 1972 U.S.-U.K. Extradition Treaty, June 8, 1972, U.S.-U.K., 28 U.S.T. 227, and the 1985 Supplementary Extradition Treaty, June 25, 1985, U.S.-U.K., S. Treaty Doc. No. 99–8 (1985).

The case presented the first instance in which a defendant raised a defense under Article 3(a) of the Supplementary Treaty to challenge his extradition to Northern Ireland. On July 27, 1995, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court's decision. 61 F.3d 711 (9th Cir. 1995), as amended by 73 F.3d 887 (9th Cir. 1995). As to the history of Article 3, the Ninth Circuit explained:

> [b]eginning in 1979, a series of United States court decisions denied extradition of [Irish Republican Army ("IRA")] members because the underlying offenses constituted "political acts." See In re McMullin, No. 3–78–1899 M.G. (N.D. Cal. 1979), reprinted in 132 CONG. REC. 16,585 (1986); In re Mackin, No. 86 Cr. Misl., appeal denied, 668 F.2d 122 (2d Circ. 1981); In re Doherty, 599 F. Supp. 270 (S.D.N.Y. 1984). These decisions angered the British Government, which viewed them as condoning violent terrorist conduct.

In denying extradition in the referenced cases, U.S. courts had relied on the then standard political-offense exception to extradition in article V of the 1972 Treaty. Article 1 of the 1985 Supplementary Treaty, as ratified, provided a number of exceptions to this limitation on extradition, listing violent offenses that "shall not be considered of a political character."*

The Senate gave advice and consent to the supplementary treaty in July 1986, with certain proposed amendments, which the Government of the United Kingdom found acceptable. See 1 Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 771–782. The amendments included a new Article 3, creating a defense to extradition for those crimes to which the political offense exception was made expressly inapplicable. Section 3(a) provided:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of this Supplementary Treaty, extradition shall not occur if the person sought establishes to the satisfaction of the competent judicial authority by a preponderance of the evidence that the request for extradition has in fact been made with a view to try or punish him on account of his race, religion, nationality or political opinions, or that he would, if surrendered, be prejudiced at his trial or punished, detained or restricted in his personal liberty by reason of his race, religion, nationality or political opinions.

* Offenses listed in Article 1 were:

"(a) an offense for which both Contracting parties have the obligation pursuant to a multilateral international agreement to extradite the person sought or to submit his case to their competent authorities for decision as to prosecution;
(b) murder, voluntary manslaughter, and assault causing grievous bodily harm;
(c) kidnapping, abduction, or serious unlawful detention, including taking a hostage;
(d) an offense involving the use of a bomb, grenade, rocket, firearm, letter or parcel bomb, or any incendiary device if this use endangers any person; and
(e) an attempt to commit any of the foregoing offenses or participation as an accomplice of a person who commits or attempts to commit such an offense."

Section 3(b) limited applicability of 3(a) to "offenses listed in Article 1" and provided for appeal of decisions made under 3(a).

After reviewing the record from the district court decision denying certification of Smyth's extradition under article 3(a), the Ninth Circuit reversed "because we hold that the record does not establish by a preponderance of the evidence that this extradition will lead to detention and punishment on account of Smyth's race, religion, nationality, or political opinions rather than on account of his conviction for attempted murder." 61 F.3d at 713. Excerpts from the Ninth Circuit decision commenting on the unique role of the courts under article 3 and the appropriate standard of decision are provided below. Following unsuccessful efforts to obtain a stay of his extradition, Smyth was extradited in August 1996 and returned to prison.

* * * *

If this were a traditional extradition, we likely would not concern ourselves with the operation of the justice system in Northern Ireland. The long-standing "rule of noninquiry" has traditionally circumscribed the breadth of a court's inquiry into such matters. Under that doctrine, "an extraditing court will generally not inquire into the procedures or treatment which await a surrendered fugitive in the requesting country." Arnbjornsdottir-Mendler v. United States, 721 F.2d 679, 683 (9th Cir. 1983). Undergirding this principle is the notion that courts are ill-equipped as institutions and ill-advised as a matter of separation of powers and foreign relations policy to make inquiries into and pronouncements about the workings of foreign countries' justice systems. See Michael P. Scharf, Foreign Courts on Trial: Why U.S. Courts Should Avoid Applying the Inquiry Provision of the Supplementary U.S.-U.K. Extradition Treaty, 25 Stan. J. Int'l L. 257, 269 (1988). ("The State Department is in a superior position to consider the consequences of a nonextradition decision upon foreign relations than the courts and it has diplomatic tools, not available to the judiciary, which it can use to insure that the requesting state provides a fair trial.").

* * * *

The Senate Report described the Supplementary Treaty as "one of the most divisive and contentious issues the Committee [on Foreign Relations] has faced this Congress. The Committee has worked long and hard to develop a compromise that can win broad, bipartisan support." S. Exec. Rep. No. 17, 99th Cong., 2d Sess., 6 (1986). The Report further characterized the compromise as "an effort to balance anti-terrorism concerns and the right of due process for individuals." Id. at 3. As such, Article 3(a) is not a mere reformulation of the political offense exception; the provision invites an altogether new inquiry in the extradition context. Rather than focusing on the motivations of the accused (which the political offense exception encourages), the Article 3(a) defense to extradition focuses on the treatment the accused will likely receive at the hands of the requesting country's criminal justice system.

Even after the language of what is now Article 3(a) had been penned, the discussion of its proper interpretation continued. The most contested issue centered on how broad an inquiry into the operation of Northern Ireland's system of justice was to be authorized by the treaty's language. A colloquy inserted by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee into the Executive Report accompanying the Supplementary Treaty explained the Committee majority's view and that of the amendment's principal sponsor, Committee chairman Senator Lugar: that the inquiry should not be limited to the procedures utilized at trial.[3]

[3] The excerpted colloquy transpired as follows:

* * * *

Senator BIDEN. Let me make sure as part of this colloquy that I understand the nature of the rule of inquiry into the justice system in Northern Ireland that we are establishing here. My understanding is this: That notwithstanding that probable cause has been established in an American court; notwithstanding that the accused is the person sought; notwithstanding that it is in an extraditable offense under the terms of this treaty we are about to vote on; and notwithstanding that otherwise it is an offense for which extradition would lie; and notwithstanding that it is an offense under this treaty for which the political offense doctrine would not otherwise apply; notwithstanding all of that, the

This is the first case in which a person challenging extradition to Northern Ireland has raised a defense under Article 3(a) of the Supplementary Treaty. Because of the lack of precedent, the district court held several preliminary hearings to decide the scope of the evidence that would be discoverable and admissible to support the Article 3(a) defense. . . .

Legal problems became thornier when the court proceeded to address specific discovery requests. Smyth sought discovery of several government documents that the U.K. refused to produce. Three such documents involved U.K. government-sponsored investigations into possible misconduct by police and security forces in Northern Ireland in the 1980s. . . . The U.K. objected to producing these documents on the grounds that they were irrelevant and protected by several privileges including the state secret privilege, deliberative process privilege and investigatory files privilege.

Smyth then filed a motion to dismiss the petition for extradition. He argued that because the government was the moving party and was depriving him of materials necessary to his defense, dismissal was appropriate. . . . The court determined that because Smyth had made a "strong showing of necessity for disclosure" of the requested reports, both privileged and non-privileged, and because the U.K. had failed to produce documents for which it could not claim a valid privilege, the former warranted a remedy and the latter, a sanction. [In Re Extradition of Smyth, 826 F.Supp. 316, 322–23 (N.D.Cal. 1993)]. Rather than dismissing the petition defendant will have an opportunity in Federal court to introduce evidence that he or she would personally, because of their race, religion, nationality or political opinion, not be able to get a fair trial because of the court system or any other aspect of the judicial system in a requesting country, or that the person's extradition has been requested with a view to try or punish them on account of their race, their religion, nationality or political opinion.

The CHAIRMAN [Senator LUGAR]. My answer is yes.

S. Exec. Rep. No. 17 at 4–5 (emphasis added).

for extradition . . . the court granted the following rebuttable presumptions in favor of Smyth:

> (1) Catholic Irish nationals accused or found guilty of offenses against members of the security forces or prison officials are subjected systematically to retaliatory harm, physical intimidation and death in Northern Ireland.
> (2) Members of the security forces in Northern Ireland either participate directly or tacitly endorse these actions.

Unrebutted, the presumptions effectively establish that Smyth would suffer retaliatory harm at the hands of security forces in Northern Ireland upon his return. It is significant for purposes of our review, however, that the presumptions do not directly address that prong of Article 3(a) requiring the person sought for extradition to establish that the retaliation or detention would be on account of "race, religion, nationality or political opinions."

* * * *

[Following a five-week evidentiary hearing beginning in September 1993], [t]he district court made extensive findings of fact regarding the background of political violence in Northern Ireland and the government efforts to combat it, the history of problems with the security forces, the conditions in the Maze Prison, and the background of Smyth, all in an effort to predict what would occur on Smyth's return to Northern Ireland. In its final order, the district court denied the request for certification of extradition on three independent grounds:

First, the U.K. did not rebut the presumption that Smyth would face retaliatory punishment and harm upon his return to Northern Ireland. Second, even if the presumption had not been awarded, Smyth established that he would be punished upon return to prison in Northern Ireland. Third, and again without the benefit of the presumption, Smyth established that he would be punished, detained and restricted in his personal liberty upon release into the general population at the conclusion of his prison term in Northern Ireland.

Here, we conclude the district court erred in at least two respects. In the first place, resort to the withholding of deportation regulation that presumes a present danger of persecution from past experience of persecution cannot validate the district court's presumption of a risk of persecution two to five years in the future. Second, the district court erred in relying extensively upon evidence of the general discriminatory effects of the Diplock system upon Catholics and suspected Republican sympathizers. That evidence does not relate to the treatment Smyth is likely to receive as a consequence of extradition, as required under Article 3(a).

Article 3(a) fashioned a compromise between two extreme positions. On the one extreme was the provision of the old treaty that barred any extradition if the underlying crime was a political act, even an act of violent terrorism. At the other extreme was the view espoused by the Reagan administration that the political nature of a crime, and necessarily any punishment or retaliatory treatment that might flow from it, should be irrelevant to the extradition inquiry. The Supplementary Treaty struck a balance between these extremes: it abolished the political act doctrine for some crimes but permitted judicial inquiry into the probable consequences of a given extradition, including imprisonment and other restrictions on liberty that would flow from religious or political discrimination. Article 3(a) thus must be read within both the context of the controversy that gave rise to it and the overall purpose of extradition treaties generally, which is to facilitate criminal prosecution and punishment. See Restatement, vol. 1, pt. IV, ch. 7, subchapter B, ("Extradition"), intro. note, 556–57. "Extradition is the process by which a person charged with or convicted of a crime under the law of one state is arrested in another state and returned for trial or punishment."

The presumptions the district court imposed did not address whether the presumed punishment or restriction on liberty that the security forces would inflict would be on account of Smyth's religion, nationality, or political opinions. Article 3(a), however, clearly contains such a requirement. It does not authorize denial of extradition on account of the punishment, official or unofficial, that will be imposed for the underlying criminal act of attempted murder. It was to avoid such a result that the Supplementary Treaty abrogated the political act doctrine for enumerated crimes and that Article 3(a) was adopted. In concluding that the unrebutted presumptions constituted an independent ground for denying extradition, the district court permitted Smyth to avoid bearing his burden of showing discriminatory motivation and therefore failed to satisfy the requirements of Article 3(a).

* * * *

We conclude that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding that Smyth would face mistreatment in prison on account of his political or religious beliefs. In predicting Smyth's probable treatment in prison, the district court did not distinguish between the relative importance of Smyth's crime and his escape on the one hand, and his political and religious views on the other. The evidence does not support a finding that Smyth would be punished upon his return to prison by reason of his "race, religion, nationality, or political opinions" as required by the Supplementary Treaty. The last ground for the district court's ruling is therefore also infirm.

2. Irregular Rendition

a. Transborder abduction from Mexico

(1) U.S. v. Alvarez-Machain

On June 15, 1992, in a case of first impression, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed and remanded a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit holding that U.S. courts lacked jurisdiction to prosecute a person whom the district court determined had been brought to the United States in violation of the extradition treaty between the United States and Mexico. United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655 (1992). Dr. Humberto Alvarez-Machain, a citizen and resident of Mexico, was indicted in the United States for participating in the kidnap and murder of U.S.

Drug Enforcement Administration ("DEA") agent Enrique Camarena-Salazar and a Mexican pilot working with him. The case was described as follows in the Supreme Court's opinion (footnotes omitted):

> On April 2, 1990, respondent was forcibly kidnapped from his medical office in Guadalajara, Mexico, to be flown by private plane to El Paso Texas, where he was arrested by DEA officials. The District Court concluded that DEA agents were responsible for respondent's abduction, although they were not personally involved in it. United States v. Caro-Quintero, 745 F. Supp. 599, 602–604, 609 (CD Cal. 1990).
> . . . The District Court rejected [Alvarez-Machain's] outrageous governmental conduct claim, but held that it lacked jurisdiction to try respondent because his abduction violated the [U.S.-Mexico] Extradition Treaty. . . .
>
> The Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal of the indictment and the repatriation of respondent [ordered by the district court], relying on its decision in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341 (CA9 1991), cert. pending, No. 91–670. 946 F.2d 1466 (1991). In Verdugo, the Court of Appeals held that the forcible abduction of a Mexican national with the authorization or participation of the United States violated the Extradition Treaty between the United States and Mexico.
> Although the Treaty does not expressly prohibit such abductions, the Court of Appeals held that the "purpose" of the Treaty was violated by a forcible abduction . . . which, along with a formal protest by the offended nation, would give a defendant the right to invoke the Treaty violation to defeat jurisdiction of the District Court to try him. . . .

On remand, Alvarez-Machain was acquitted and returned to Mexico. For a discussion of subsequent litigation by Dr. Alvarez-Machain against certain U.S. government officials and Mexican citizens, see Digest 2001 at 326–34, Digest 2003 at 380–83.

Excerpts from the Court's analysis in reversing the Ninth Circuit are set forth below (most footnotes and internal citations omitted). See also United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, in (2) below.

. . . In the absence of an extradition treaty, nations are under no obligation to surrender those in their country to foreign authorities for prosecution. The Treaty thus provides a mechanism which would not otherwise exist, requiring, under certain circumstances, the United States and Mexico to extradite individuals to the other country, and establishing the procedures to be followed when the Treaty is invoked.

The history of negotiation and practice under the Treaty also fails to show that abductions outside of the Treaty constitute a violation of the Treaty. As the Solicitor General notes, the Mexican Government was made aware, as early as 1906, of the Ker doctrine, and the United States' position that it applied to forcible abductions made outside of the terms of the United States-Mexico Extradition Treaty. Nonetheless, the current version of the Treaty, signed in 1978, does not attempt to establish a rule that would in any way curtail the effect of Ker. Moreover, although language which would grant individuals exactly the right sought by respondent had been considered and drafted as early as 1935 by a prominent group of legal scholars sponsored by the faculty of Harvard Law School, no such clause appears in the current Treaty.[13]

[13] In Article 16 of the Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, the Advisory Committee of the Research in International Law proposed:

> "In exercising jurisdiction under this Convention, no State shall prosecute or punish any person who has been brought within its territory or a place subject to its authority by recourse to measures in violation of international law or international convention without first obtaining the consent of the State or States whose rights have been violated by such measures." Harvard Research in International Law, 29 Am. J. Int'l L. 442 (Supp. 1935)

Thus, the language of the Treaty, in the context of its history, does not support the proposition that the Treaty prohibits abductions outside of its terms. The remaining question, therefore, is whether the Treaty should be interpreted so as to include an implied term prohibiting prosecution where the defendant's presence is obtained by means other than those established by the Treaty. Respondent contends that the Treaty must be interpreted against the backdrop of customary international law, and that international abductions are "so clearly prohibited in international law" that there was no reason to include such a clause in the Treaty itself. The international censure of international abductions is further evidenced, according to respondent, by the United Nations Charter and the Charter of the Organization of American States. Respondent does not argue that these sources of international law provide an independent basis for the right respondent asserts not to be tried in the United States, but rather that they should inform the interpretation of the Treaty terms.

The Court of Appeals deemed it essential, in order for the individual defendant to assert a right under the Treaty, that the affected foreign government had registered a protest. Respondent agrees that the right exercised by the individual is derivative of the nation's right under the Treaty, since nations are authorized, notwithstanding the terms of an extradition treaty, to voluntarily render an individual to the other country on terms completely outside of those provided in the treaty. The formal protest, therefore, ensures that the "offended" nation actually objects to the abduction and has not in some way voluntarily rendered the individual for prosecution. Thus the Extradition Treaty only prohibits gaining the defendant's presence by means other than those set forth in the Treaty when the nation from which the defendant was abducted objects.

This argument seems to us inconsistent with the remainder of respondent's argument. The Extradition Treaty has the force of law, and if, as respondent asserts, it is self-executing, it would appear that a court must enforce it on behalf of an individual regardless of the offensiveness of the practice of one nation to the other nation. In Rauscher, the Court noted that Great Britain had taken the position in other cases that the Webster-Ashburton Treaty included the doctrine of specialty, but no importance was attached to whether or not Great Britain had protested the prosecution of Rauscher for the crime of cruel and unusual punishment as opposed to murder.

More fundamentally, the difficulty with the support respondent garners from international law is that none of it relates to the practice of nations in relation to extradition treaties. In Rauscher, we implied a term in the Webster-Ashburton Treaty because of the practice of nations with regard to extradition treaties. In the instant case, respondent would imply terms in the Extradition Treaty from the practice of nations with regards to international law more generally. Respondent would have us find that the Treaty acts as a prohibition against a violation of the general principle of international law that one government may not "exercise its police power in the territory of another state." There are many actions which could be taken by a nation that would violate this principle, including waging war, but it cannot seriously be contended that an invasion of the United States by Mexico would violate the terms of the Extradition Treaty between the two nations.

In sum, to infer from this Treaty and its terms that it prohibits all means of gaining the presence of an individual outside of its terms goes beyond established precedent and practice. In Rauscher, the implication of a doctrine of specialty into the terms of the Webster-Ashburton Treaty, which, by its terms, required the presentation of evidence establishing probable cause of the crime of extradition before extradition was required, was a small step to take. By contrast, to imply from the terms of this Treaty that it prohibits obtaining the presence of an individual by means outside of the procedures the Treaty establishes requires a much larger inferential leap, with only the most general of international law principles to support it. The general principles cited by respondent simply fail to persuade us that we should imply in the United States-Mexico Extradition Treaty a term prohibiting international abductions.

Respondent and his amici may be correct that respondent's abduction was "shocking," Tr. of Oral Arg. 40, and that it may be in violation of general international law principles. Mexico has protested the abduction of respondent through diplomatic notes, and the decision of whether respondent should be returned to Mexico, as a matter outside of the Treaty, is a matter for the Executive Branch. We conclude, however, that respondent's abduction was not in violation of the Extradition Treaty between the United States and Mexico, and therefore the rule of Ker v. Illinois is fully applicable to this case. The fact of respondent's forcible abduction does not therefore prohibit his trial in a court in the United States for violations of the criminal laws of the United States.

On July 24, 1992, Alan J. Kreczko, Deputy Legal Adviser, Department of State, testified before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Judiciary Committee on legal and policy issues relating to the Supreme Court decision in Alvarez-Machain and transborder abductions generally.

* * * *

In Alvarez-Machain, the Supreme Court reaffirmed its long-standing principle that US courts have jurisdiction over a criminal defendant regardless of the means by which that defendant was brought before the court. This is the so-called Ker-Frisbie doctrine, which reaches back to the 19th century in the Court's jurisprudence. The Court held that a breach of general international law principles would not affect the jurisdiction of a domestic court. In a dictum, the Supreme Court did acknowledge that in certain circumstances, the breach of an extradition treaty might divest a court of jurisdiction. However, after examining the text and negotiating record of the US-Mexico Extradition Treaty, the Court concluded that a non-consensual abduction from Mexican territory would not violate the treaty.

The Department of State believes that the Court properly interpreted the US-Mexico Extradition Treaty. US extradition treaties—and the Mexico treaty is no exception—do not constitute the exclusive means of recovering fugitives. The United States has, for example, relied on other means such as exclusion, expulsion, or deportation to obtain a fugitive even when extradition treaties exist.

We also agree with the Court that Mexico's understandable concerns about the abduction and the judicial procedures that followed are matters for diplomatic resolution. The United States and Mexico have been, and will remain, involved in intensive diplomatic discussions on this matter. Diplomatic history reveals that states have found a variety of resolutions to disputes over cross-border arrests. In some cases, individuals are returned for prosecution in the original country. In other cases, the individual is retained and prosecuted in the arresting country. We agree that the courts should not interrupt this diplomatic process absent a treaty requirement to that effect.

The Justice Department will explain the reasoning of the Court on the domestic law issues. I would note, however, that the core holding of the Court—that domestic courts generally retain jurisdiction over an individual without regard to how the individual was brought before the court—is not unique to US jurisprudence. It is our understanding that this judicial approach is also followed in, for example, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany.

Reactions of Foreign Governments

The Supreme Court's decision has caused considerable concern among a wide range of governments, particularly in the Americas, but elsewhere as well. Many governments have expressed outrage that the United States believes it has the right to decide unilaterally to enter their territory and abduct one of their nationals. Governments have informed us that they would regard such action as a breach of international law. They have also informed us that they would protect their nationals from such action, that such action would violate their domestic law, and that they would vigorously prosecute such violations. Some countries, as well, have told us that they believe that such actions would violate our extradition treaties with them. Some have also suggested that they will challenge the lawfulness of such abductions in international forums. Some have indicated that the decision could affect their parliaments' review of pending law enforcement agreements with the United States. At the same time, some have noted in private that the decision will cause narcotics traffickers to have an increased fear of apprehension by the United States.

As would be expected, the reaction has been strongest in Mexico, and I will discuss that situation in detail. However, the reaction has been strong throughout Latin America and the Caribbean, for example:

> —The Presidents of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay, and Uruguay issued a declaration on June 26 expressing their concern with the US Supreme Court decision and requesting that the Inter-American Juridical Committee of the Organization of American States (OAS) issue an opinion on the "international juridical validity" of the Alvarez-Machain decision. That request was made formally to the Permanent Council of the OAS on July 15, which adopted a resolution referring this matter to the Juridical Committee.

The reaction has not been confined, of course, to official government statements. Political leaders in and out of government, and commentaries in the media, have generally criticized the decision and the attitude of the US Government that that decision is supposed to represent.

The kind of heated reaction that we have seen is illustrated by an extradition proceeding in Chile entirely unrelated to the Alvarez-Machain controversy. On June 25, the Chilean Supreme Court upheld by a 3-2 vote the Supreme Court president's prior decision to extradite an individual requested by the United States. The two dissenting judges voted to release the individual expressly because the United States, according to them, violates extradition treaties with other countries. Although the Chilean High Court, in summarizing the arguments of the dissent, did not refer directly to Alvarez-Machain, the motivation behind the dissenters' views was clear. Negative reactions, while strongest in Latin America and the Caribbean, have also been voiced more broadly. The Supreme Court's decision led to a rigorous debate in the Canadian Parliament. The Canadian Minister of External Affairs told the Canadian Parliament that any attempt by the United States to kidnap someone in Canada would be regarded as a criminal act and a violation of the US-Canada Extradition Treaty. Spain's President publicly criticized the decision as "erroneous." And the media in Europe generally has been critical of the decision.

These negative reactions reflect a concern that the Alvarez-Machain decision constitutes a "green light" for international abductions. The reactions are grounded in the desire of countries to preserve their sovereignty and territorial integrity and to reassure their nationals. We expect that countries will continue to press this concern with us, bilaterally and multilaterally. As noted above, this matter has already been brought before the OAS.

The US Government has moved actively to isolate the question of whether domestic legal authority exists from the separate question of whether the President will, in fact, exercise that authority. We have reassured other countries that the United States has not changed its policies toward cooperation in international law enforcement, and that the Alvarez-Machain case does not represent a "green light" for the United States to conduct operations on foreign territory.

Specifically, immediately following the Supreme Court's decision, the White House issued a public statement reaffirming that:

> . . . the United States strongly believes in fostering respect for international rules of law, including, in particular, the principles of respect for territorial integrity and sovereign equality of states. US policy is to cooperate with foreign states in achieving law enforcement objectives. Neither the arrest of Alvarez-Machain, nor the . . . Supreme Court decision reflects any change in this policy.

[28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1063 (1992)]

The State Department also made it clear that the President has directed that a strict inter-agency procedure be followed before any such decision could be authorized that will ensure that questions of sovereignty and international law—and our foreign relations with friendly governments—are a fundamental part of the decision-making process.

At the same time, we are not prepared categorically to rule out unilateral action. It is not inconceivable that in certain extreme cases, such as the harboring by a hostile foreign country of a terrorist who has attacked US nationals and is likely to do so again, the President might decide that such an abduction is necessary and appropriate as a matter of the exercise of our right of self-defense. This necessary reservation of right for extreme cases does not, however, detract from our strong support for the principles of sovereignty and territorial integrity generally. To reinforce this point, the White House statement also noted the Administration has in place procedures designed to ensure that US law enforcement activities overseas fully take into account foreign relations and international law. These procedures require that decisions as to extraordinary renditions from foreign territories be subject to full inter-agency coordination and that they be considered at the highest levels of the government.

(2) United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez

As mentioned in Alvarez-Machain, supra, Rene Martin Verdugo-Urquidez, a citizen and resident of Mexico, was indicted in the United States on charges of smuggling narcotics from Mexico. See Digest 1989–1990 at 100–07.

He was also charged with participation in the kidnapping and torture-murder of DEA Special Agent Enrique Camarena Salaza. In his trial on murder charges, Verdugo-Urquidez raised, among other things, a claim that he had been unlawfully kidnapped from Mexico in violation of the U.S.-Mexico extradition treaty. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed a district court decision rejecting Verdugo's claims. United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341 (9th Cir. 1991). The Ninth Circuit held that the United States had breached its obligations under the extradition treaty by authorizing the forcible abduction of Verdugo in Mexico without the consent of the Mexican government. The U.S. Supreme Court vacated the Ninth Circuit decision and remanded in light of its holding in United States v. Alvarez-Machain, supra. United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 505 U.S. 1201 (1992). See 29 F.3d 637 (9th Cir. 1994) (unpublished table decision).

b. Arrest by Canadian official in United States

In a diplomatic note dated April 8, 1991, the U.S. Embassy at Ottawa informed the Canadian Department of External Affairs that a Windsor city police officer had reportedly arrested an American citizen on January 4, 1991, at least 200 yards on the U.S. side of the border line in the Windsor-Detroit tunnel, and had brought the American in a Windsor police cruiser through the tunnel to the Canadian side.

The U.S. Government was gravely concerned, the embassy continued, by the reported infringement of U.S. territorial sovereignty and requested a complete statement of the facts surrounding the incident. If they were confirmed, the U.S. Government wished to know what steps the Government of Canada proposed to take with respect to the American and with respect to the officer who apprehended him, and, also, what remedies were available to the American under Canadian law. The embassy's note stated further:

> As the Government of Canada is aware, under United States law judicial dismissal of criminal charges, or judicially ordered release, of a criminal defendant over government objection is not an appropriate remedy for a violation of territorial sovereignty. The United States Government has taken the position that any remedy for such a violation is properly a matter for diplomatic resolution by the states concerned. In this regard, the > Embassy notes that the Department of External Affairs has previously encouraged through diplomatic channels the release of abducted individuals in such cases. The Embassy therefore requests a statement from the Government of Canada of its intentions in this case. In view of the extensive bilateral cooperation between our two governments, particularly in the law enforcement field, and our respective foreign relations concerns about unlawful transborder seizures, the United States Government looks forward to an amicable resolution of this matter.

The Department of External Affairs replied on May 2, 1991, that it regretted the infringement of U.S. territorial sovereignty. It had requested that the Attorney General of Ontario, through the Canadian Department of Justice, seek the release of the individual in question. This had been done, and Canadian authorities understood that he had returned to the United States. In the meantime, documentation in support of a Canadian request for his provisional arrest and extradition under the U.S.-Canada Treaty on Extradition had been prepared, and the individual had been arrested in the United States pursuant to the request. The Canadian note also stated: "The Extradition Treaty, along with the relevant multilateral conventions, if any, established the only means under which to obtain the return of fugitive offenders."

In response, by its Note No. 133, dated May 23, 1991, the American Embassy welcomed a "cordial, growing and mutually beneficial law enforcement cooperation relationship with the Government of Canada," but stated:

> There is nothing in the texts of either the bilateral extradition treaty or the relevant multilateral conventions, or their negotiating record, which provides a basis for the assertion that these treaties are, or were ever intended to be, the exclusive means by which fugitive offenders can be transferred between Canada and the United States.

3. Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters

Ratification of new treaties

(1) Senate consideration of treaties

During the period 1991–1999, the United States entered into 29 new bilateral treaties providing for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters ("MLATs"), bringing the number of such treaties in force to a total of 38 at the end of 1999. In hearings on law enforcement treaties awaiting advice and consent to ratification during the 1990's before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee ("SFRC"), testimony by Department of State and Department of Justice officials addressed key issues of the MLATs and their role in the increasingly trans-border nature of serious crime. Discussion of extradition treaties in the same hearings and reports is discussed in A.1. supra.

On April 8, 1992, Alan J. Kreczko, Deputy Legal Adviser of the Department of State, testified before the SFRC in support of four MLATs, with Jamaica (July 7, 1989, U.S.-Jam., S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–16 (1991)); Spain (Feb. 9, 1988, U.S.-Spain, S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–21 (1992)); Argentina (Dec. 4, 1990, U.S.-Arg., S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–21 (1992)); and Uruguay (May 6, 1991, U.S.-Uru., S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–19 (1991)). The Senate granted advice and consent to ratification on July 2, 1992. 138 CONG. REC. D844 (daily ed. July 2, 1992).

The full text of Mr. Kreczko's testimony is available in S. Hrg. Doc. No. 102–674 (Apr. 8, 1992). See also 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 547 (1992).

Since our first Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty entered into force with Switzerland in 1977 [May 25, 1973, TIAS No. 8302, 20 UST 2019 (entered into force January 23, 1977)], our MLATs have become an increasingly important tool in the United States' war on crime, in particular transnational crimes such as narcotics trafficking, terrorism, money laundering and export control violations, which require the close cooperation of law enforcement authorities throughout the world.

The proliferation of bilateral mutual legal assistance treaties in recent years reflects the considered judgment and determination of the United States, as well as of our treaty partners, to enhance cooperation in legal assistance and to devise the most efficient and expeditious methods possible within our respective legal systems to facilitate the investigation and prosecution of crime, as well as to support related proceedings.

It is our firm desire to have these kinds of treaty arrangements in place generally around the world. We are limited in meeting this objective by resources and by the readiness of other states for legal or policy reasons to enter into the kinds of arrangements that we seek. We have therefore focused our attention on those countries with which the need and the will on both sides are clear.

* * * *

I would now like to give you a brief overview of the provisions common to all four mutual legal assistance treaties under consideration today. Mutual legal assistance treaties are generally intended to enable law enforcement authorities to obtain evidence abroad in a form admissible in our courts. They supplement rather than supplant existing international arrangements on exchange of information and evidence, such as INTERPOL, law enforcement liaison relationships, and judicial assistance/letters rogatory procedures. (Letters rogatory are written requests from a court in one country to a court in another country for assistance in obtaining evidence.)

One of the most significant U.S. objectives that each of these treaties serves is the establishment of direct, expedited channels of communication through the Central Authorities. . . .

Each of the treaties provides for the same types of assistance which are generally catalogued in the first article. These include service of documents, provision of records, locating persons, taking the testimony of persons, production of documents, execution of requests for search and seizure, and the transfer of persons in custody for testimonial purposes. Some types of assistance available under the MLATs, such as transfer of persons in custody for testimonial purposes, may not be available through letters rogatory. Moreover, MLATs establish a framework that ensures the provision of evidence in admissible form in the requesting state's courts.

One article of particular significance in each of the treaties covers the immobilization, forfeiture and transfer of assets to the extent permitted by each state's internal laws. The evolution in this area of cooperation over the last decade has been striking a reflection of the importance that the United States as well as the world community attaches to the use of these tools in attacking the organization and profitability of international drug trafficking. Although this evolution may not be evident from the language of the MLATs themselves, it is reflected in the commitment of parties to the 1988 United Nations Convention Against Illicit Trafficking in Narcotics Drugs and Psychotropic Substances to adopt measures to enable the confiscation of drug proceeds and to cooperate in the implementation of those measures. The United States and Spain are already parties to this Convention. Argentina and Jamaica and Uruguay have signed but are still in the process of ratifying the Convention.

Because this is still an evolving area, the MLAT provisions in each treaty are drafted in a manner that will take full advantage of new innovations as they develop under the internal laws of each of the parties. The relevant article provides for notification whenever the proceeds of criminal activity are believed to be located in the territory of the other party. This extends to the instrumentalities of crime in the treaties with Argentina and Uruguay. Each treaty requires assistance in forfeiture and restitution proceedings to the extent permitted by each party's internal laws. This obligation extends to assistance in the collection of criminal fines in the treaties with Argentina, Jamaica and Uruguay. The treaties with Argentina, Spain and Uruguay contain a newly developed paragraph which provides for the disposition of forfeited property in accordance with the internal law of the forfeiting state and for the transfer to the other party of the property or proceeds from the sale thereof to the extent permitted by its internal laws. This new dimension to the article was added to U.S. negotiating texts after the adoption of U.S. sharing statutes (18 USC 981(i)(1), 21 USC 881(e) and 19 USC 1616a) which authorize asset transfers to foreign governments under certain circumstances. Although the treaty with Jamaica does not contain this additional paragraph, the article is sufficiently broad to authorize the use of U.S. sharing statutes in the appropriate case.

In 1995 a mutual legal assistance treaty with Panama (April 11, 1991, U.S.-Pan., S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–15 (1991)) received Senate advice and consent. 141 CONG. REC. D609 (May 16, 1995); see 3.a.(2) below. On July 17, 1996, Jamison S. Borek, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, and Mark M. Richard, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, appeared before the SFRC in support of twelve law enforcement treaties, including five bilateral mutual legal assistance treaties. A sixth MLAT, with Nigeria, was referred to the SFRC, but was not considered at that time.

The five mutual legal assistance treaties were with Austria (Feb. 23, 1995, U.S.-Aus., S. Treaty Doc. No. 104 –21 (1995)), Hungary (Dec. 1, 1994, U.S.-Hung., S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–20 (1995)), Republic of Korea, with related exchange of notes (Nov. 23, 1993, U.S.-S. Korea, S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–1 (1995)), Philippines (Nov. 13, 1994, U.S.-Phil., S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–18 (1995)), and United Kingdom, with related exchange of notes (Jan. 6, 1994, U.S.-U.K., S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–2 (1995)). The five treaties received advice and consent to ratification by the Senate on August 2, 1996. 142 CONG. REC. S9661–62 (daily ed. Aug. 2, 1996).

Senator Jesse Helms, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted a number of questions to the Departments of State and Justice in connection with the hearings on the above-mentioned treaties, including the exchange provided below.

Question:
Defendants do not have access to information through MLAT procedures. This disparity between prosecution and defendant in access to MLAT procedures has led some to question the fairness and even the constitutionality of MLATs denying individual rights. At the core of the legal objections is the belief that it is improper in our adversarial system of justice to deny defendants compulsory process and other effective procedures from compelling evidence abroad if those procedures are available to the prosecution. Are there any outstanding legal challenges to existing MLATs? What is the position of the Justice Department regarding the constitutionality of MLATs? Are there any efforts to provide access to information under consideration in current negotiations?
Answer:
There are no legal challenges to any of our existing MLATs. It is the position of the Department of Justice that the MLATs are clearly and unquestionably constitutional. In 1992, Michael Abbell, then-counsel to some members of the Cali drug cartel, did suggest to the Committee that MLATs should permit requests by private persons such as defendants in criminal cases. To our knowledge, no court has adopted the legal reasoning at the core of that argument.

The Department of Justice believes that the MLATs before the Committee strike the right balance between the needs of law enforcement and the interests of the defense. The MLATs were intended to be law enforcement tools, and were never intended to provide benefits to the defense bar. It is not "improper" for MLATs to provide assistance for prosecutors and investigators, not defense counsel, any more than it would be improper for the FBI to conduct investigations for prosecutors and not for defendants. The Government has the job of assembling evidence to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, so it must have the tools to do so. The defense does not have the same job, and therefore does not need the same tools.

None of the MLATs before the Senate provides U.S. officials with compulsory process abroad. None of the treaties require the treaty partner to compel its citizens to come to the United States, and none permit any foreign Government to compel our citizens to go abroad. Rather, the MLATs oblige each country to assist the other to the extent permitted by their laws, and provide a framework for that assistance. Since the Government does not obtain compulsory process under MLATs, there is nothing the defense is being denied.

The MLATs do not deprive criminal defendants of any rights they currently possess to seek evidence abroad by letters rogatory or other means. The MLATs were designed to provide solutions to problems that our prosecutors encountered in getting evidence from abroad. There is no reason to require that MLATs be made available to defendants, since many of the drawbacks encountered by prosecutors in employing letters rogatory had largely to do with obtaining evidence before indictment, and criminal defendants never had those problems.

Finally, it should be remembered that the defendant frequently has far greater access to evidence abroad than does the Government, since it is the defendant who chose to utilize foreign institutions in the first place. For example, the Government often needs MLATs to gain access to copies of a defendant's foreign bank records; in such cases, the defendant already has copies of the records, or can easily obtain them simply by contacting the bank.

On September 15, 1998, Jamison S. Borek, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, and Mark M. Richard, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, testified in support of 38 treaties concerning international law enforcement cooperation, including nineteen bilateral mutual legal assistance treaties. The MLATs were those with Antigua and Barbuda (Oct. 31, 1996, U.S.-Ant. & Barb., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–24 (1997)), Australia (Apr. 30, 1997, U.S.-Aus., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–27 (1997)), Barbados (Feb. 28, 1996, Barb., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–23 (1997)), Brazil (Oct. 14, 1997, U.S.-Braz., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–42 (1998)), Czech Republic (Feb. 4, 1998, U.S.-Czech Rep., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–47 (1998)), Dominica (Oct. 10, 1996, U.S.-Dominica, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–24 (1997)), Estonia (Apr. 2, 1998, U.S.-Est., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–52 (1998)), Grenada (May 30, 1996, U.S.-Gren., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–24 (1997)), Hong Kong (Apr. 15, 1997, U.S.-H.K., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–6 (1997)), Israel (Jan. 26, 1998, U.S.-Isr., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–40 (1998)), Latvia (June 13, 1997, U.S.-Lat., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–34 (1998)), Lithuania (Jan. 16, 1998, U.S.-Lith., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–41 (1998)), Luxembourg, (Mar. 13, 1997, U.S.-Lux., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–11 (1997)) Poland (July 10, 1996, U.S.-Pol., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–12 (1997)), St. Kitts and Nevis (Sept. 18, 1997, U.S.-St. Kitts & Nevis, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–37 (1998)), St. Lucia (Apr. 18, 1996, U.S.-St. Lucia, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–24 (1997)), St. Vincent and the Grenadines (Jan. 8, 1998, U.S.-St. Vincent, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–44 (1998)), Trinidad and Tobago (Mar. 4, 1996, U.S.-Trin. & Tobago, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–22 (1997)), and Venezuela (Oct. 12, 1997, U.S.-Venez., S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–38 (1998)). The treaties received advice and consent from the Senate on October 21, 1998. 144 CONG. REC. S12,974–79 (daily ed. Oct. 21, 1998). In his testimony, Mr. Richard provided an overview of the function of MLATs, set forth below. See also 92 Am. J. Int'l L. 44 (1998).

. . . Mutual legal assistance treaties are intended to enable law enforcement to obtain evidence and information abroad in a form admissible in our courts. MLATs supplement existing arrangements on international exchange of information between police agencies, such as law enforcement liaison relationships, or Interpol. MLATs perform much the same function as letters rogatory in international cooperation.

A letter rogatory is a written request from a court in one country to a court in another country asking the receiving court to aid the requesting court, as a matter of comity, in obtaining evidence located beyond the requesting court's reach. Since we have too few MLATs in force, we use letters rogatory to secure evidence from foreign countries where no MLAT or executive agreement on cooperation is in force. The MLAT provisions build on the authority given to us by Congress in 18 U.S.C. section 1782 to assist foreign countries in the gathering of evidence in the U.S.

A comparison of the way in which letters rogatory requests are made with the MLAT process illustrates the law enforcement benefits of the treaties before the Committee. In the case of letters rogatory, a prosecutor, such as an Assistant United States Attorney, must apply to the court in the U.S. for the issuance of letters rogatory. Once the letter rogatory is signed by the court, it is transmitted through diplomatic channels to the foreign country, traveling to the Department of Justice in Washington, to the State Department, to the appropriate U.S. Embassy abroad, to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the foreign country, then to its Ministry of Justice, and finally to the foreign court. Once the foreign court receives the letter rogatory, that court will execute it, in accordance with the foreign country's rules of evidence and procedure. The evidence obtained through the process is transmitted back to United States through the same torturous route used to present the request.

The MLAT request process is much more efficient for law enforcement purposes. Each of the MLATs establishes a Central Authority for the processing of requests, and the Attorney General is the Central Authority for the United States. By regulation, the Attorney General has delegated her duties to the Criminal Division's Office of International Affairs. The prosecutor seeking evidence under an MLAT works directly with the Office of International Affairs in preparing the request, and the request is signed by the Director of that office. The signed MLAT request is sent directly from the U.S. Central Authority to the Central Authority of the MLAT partner, which will either execute the request immediately, or refer it to the appropriate court or law enforcement agency for execution. Once the requested evidence is obtained, it is returned to the U.S. by the same route. The more streamlined handling of requests is but one reason why MLATs are superior to letters rogatory in obtaining evidence abroad. There are several other reasons.

First, an MLAT obligates each country, consistent with the terms of the treaty, to provide evidence or other assistance. Letters rogatory, on the other hand, are executed solely as a matter of comity, and often completely at the discretion of the requested country's court. Thus, predictability of the response is of critical importance in planning for an upcoming prosecution.

Second, an MLAT, either by itself or together with implementing legislation, can provide a means to overcome the bank secrecy and business confidentiality laws that so often frustrate effective law enforcement. This is especially helpful in the investigation of financial fraud, money laundering, and drug trafficking. Too often, letters rogatory are of limited utility to us because the foreign country's laws on letters rogatory do not permit piercing bank secrecy. For example, the MLAT with the Cayman Islands has been especially valuable to law enforcement in part because that MLAT, coupled with the Cayman Islands' implementing legislation for it, clearly provides the terms upon which bank and business confidentiality must give way to legitimate law enforcement needs.

Third, an MLAT provides an opportunity to devise procedures that permit us to obtain evidence in a form that will be admissible in our courts. The rules of evidence used in our courts may be unheard of in foreign countries, especially countries that have a civil law rather than common law legal system. MLAT negotiations permit the establishment of a procedural framework for ensuring that the evidence produced for us comports with our evidentiary requirements, such as the use of sworn certificates to authenticate bank records in accordance with Title 18, United States Code, Section 3505, or the examining and cross-examining of witnesses in depositions abroad.

(2) Conditions on ratification

In providing advice and consent to the U.S.-Panama MLAT on May 16, 1995, the Senate included a proviso addressing government involvement in narcotics production or distribution:

> . . . The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following . . . proviso[], which shall not be included in the instrument of ratification to be signed by the President: . . . Pursuant to the rights of the United States under this Treaty to deny requests which prejudice its essential public policy or interest, the United States shall deny a request for assistance when the Central Authority, after consultation with all appropriate intelligence, anti-narcotic, and foreign policy agencies, has specific information that a senior government official who will have access to information to be provided under this Treaty is engaged in or facilitates the production or distribution of illegal drugs.

141 CONG. REC. S 6764 (daily ed. May 16, 1995).

On August 2, 1996, the Senate adopted resolutions of advice and consent to ratification of five mutual legal assistance treaties then pending (with Korea, the United Kingdom, Austria, Hungary, and the Philippines), subject to a broader proviso, providing:

> . . . Pursuant to the rights of the United States under this Treaty to deny requests which prejudice its essential public policy or interest, the United States shall deny a request for assistance when the Central Authority, after consultation with all appropriate intelligence, anti-narcotic, and foreign policy agencies, has specific information that a senior government official who will have access to information to be provided under this Treaty is engaged in a felony, including the facilitation of the production or distribution of illegal drugs.

142 CONG. REC. S9661–62 (daily ed. Aug. 2, 1996). See also 91 Am. J. Int'l L. 93 (1997). Similar language was attached to MLATs thereafter.

Conditions placed on advice and consent to ratification of MLATs concerning cooperation with the International Criminal Court beginning in 1998 are discussed in C.2. below.

B. INTERNATIONAL CRIMES

1. Acts of Terrorism

a. Libya terrorist case: Pan Am 103

On December 21, 1988, Pan Am Flight 103 exploded over the town of Lockerbie, Scotland, killing 270 people. In 1991 the United States and the United Kingdom both indicted two Libyans, Abdel Basset al-Megrahi and Lamen Khalifa Fhiman, on charges of placing a bomb on the aircraft. In the United States a grand jury of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia indicted the two for committing the federal crimes of (i) criminal conspiracy to destroy Pan Am 103 and murder those aboard; (ii) sabotage of a U.S.-registered aircraft operating in foreign commerce; (iii) destruction of a U.S.-registered aircraft operating in foreign commerce; (iv) malicious destruction of property used in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce, causing deaths; and (v) terrorist murder of U.S. nationals outside the United States. 18 U.S.C. §§ 32, 371, 844, 2332.

On November 27, 1991, the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States issued virtually identical statements declaring that Libya must surrender the indicted individuals for trial, accept responsibility for the actions of Libyan officials, provide all relevant evidence and information, and pay appropriate compensation. For the U.S. statement, see Letter dated December 20, 1991, from the Permanent Representative of the United States of America to the Secretary-General, U.N. Doc. A/46/827-S/23308 (1991).

On December 20, 1991, France called for Libya to produce all material evidence in its possession and to facilitate access to documents useful in the judicial inquiry in connection with a bomb that destroyed Union de Transports Aeriens Flight 772 ("UTA 772") while in the air over Niger on September 19, 1989. The flight was carrying 170 passengers and crew, all of whom were killed, including seven U.S. citizens. Letter dated December 20, 1991, from the Permanent Representative of France to the Secretary-General, U.N. Doc. A/46/825-S/23306 (1991).

Also in December 1991, the United States, France and the United Kingdom issued a joint declaration on terrorism, reaffirming their "complete condemnation of terrorism in all its forms" and denouncing "any complicity of States in terrorist acts." Noting that they had presented specific demands in connection with the bombings of Pan Am 103 and UTA 772, the declaration concluded:

> [The three States] require that Libya comply with all these demands, and in addition, that Libya commit itself concretely and definitively to cease all forms of terrorist actions and all assistance to terrorist groups. Libya must promptly, by concrete actions, prove its renunciation of terrorism.

Letter dated December 20, 1991 from the Permanent Representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America to the Secretary-General, U.N. Doc. A/426/828-S/23309 (1991).

(1) UN Security Council resolutions

On January 21, 1992, the UN Security Council unanimously adopted Resolution 731, which strongly deplored Libya's failure to respond effectively to the British, U.S., and French requests. U.N. Doc. S/RES/731 (1992). In the resolution, the Security Council urged Libya to provide a "full and effective response to those requests so as to contribute to the elimination of international terrorism." Ambassador Pickering, U.S. Representative to the United Nations, stated: "The Council was faced in this case with clear implications of Government involvement in terrorism as well as with the absence of an independent judiciary in the implicated State."

When Libya failed to comply with Resolution 731, the United States and others began to discuss the possibility of further Security Council action. At the same time, Libya initiated proceedings in the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") against both the United States and the United Kingdom on March 3, 1992, discussed below.

On March 31, 1992, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, the Security Council adopted Resolution 748, in which it decided that "the Libyan Government must now comply without any further delay with paragraph 3 of Resolution 731 (1992) regarding the requests" by the United States, the United Kingdom and France. U.N. Doc. S/RES/748 (1992). It also decided that "the Libyan Government must commit itself definitively to cease all forms of terrorist action and all assistance to terrorist groups," and take concrete actions to demonstrate its renunciation of terrorism. Resolution 748 also required states to impose certain sanctions. See Chapter 16.A.4.c.

On August 13, 1993, the three governments issued a declaration on Libyan terrorism. It stated in part:

> The United States, the United Kingdom and France . . . in the interests of giving Libya one last chance, have asked the Secretary-General of the United Nations to look into the matter and take the necessary steps to achieve the full implementation by the Libyan Government of Resolution 731 (1992) within 40 to 45 days.
>
> If, by October first, the Libyan Government has failed to comply with Resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992), including the transfer to United States or United Kingdom jurisdiction of the Lockerbie suspects and compliance with the requests of French justice on UTA flight 772, we will table a resolution strengthening the sanctions in key oil-related financial and technological areas.
> Once more, our three Governments reiterate that they have no hidden agenda and that, on the contrary, upon full implementation by Libya of Security Council resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992), the conditions would be met for the lifting of sanctions by the Security Council.

Letter dated August 13, 1993, from the Representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America to the Secretary-General, U.N. Doc. A/48/314-S/26304 (1993).

In the absence of compliance by Libya, on December 1, 1993, the Security Council adopted Resolution 883, see Chapter 16.A.4.c. Resolution 883 included a limited assets freeze, an embargo on aircraft or aircraft components, controls on oil production equipment, and language closing certain gaps in the civil aviation sanctions imposed by Resolution 748. Through operative paragraph 16 of the Resolution, the Council expressed readiness to review the sanctions against Libya "with a view to suspending them immediately if the Secretary-General reports to the Council that the Libyan Government has ensured the appearance of those charged with the bombing of Pan Am 103 for trial before the appropriate United Kingdom or United States court and has satisfied the French judicial authorities with respect to the bombing of UTA 772, and with a view to lifting them immediately when Libya complies fully with the requests and decisions in Resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992). . . ."

(2) International Court of Justice

As noted above, on March 3, 1992, Libya filed cases against the United States and the United Kingdom in the International Court of Justice, alleging violations of the Montreal Convention, including failure to turn over evidence against the two accused terrorists to Libya so that it could try them. Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. U.S.), 1992 I.C.J. 89 (Mar. 3); Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. U.K.), 1992 I.C.J. 88 (Mar. 3).

(i) Request for provisional measures

On April 14, 1992, the Court denied Libya's request for provisional measures. Libya v. United States, 1992 I.C.J. 89

(Order of Apr. 14). Excerpts below from the Court's order describe Libya's application to the Court, its request for provisional measures, views of the United States, and the Court's conclusion.

7. Whereas Libya, in its Application, asks the Court to adjudge and declare:

"(a) that Libya has fully complied with all of its obligations under the Montreal Convention;
(b) that the United States has breached, and is continuing to breach, its legal obligations to Libya under Articles 5, (2), 5 (3), 7, 8 (2) and 11 of the Montreal Convention; and
(c) that the United States is under a legal obligation immediately to cease and desist from such breaches and from the use of any and all force or threats against Libya, including the threat of force against Libya, and from all violations of the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and the political independence of Libya";

8. Whereas, later on 3 March 1992, the day on which the Application was filed, the Libyan Government also filed an "urgent request that the Court indicate provisional measures which ought to be taken promptly to preserve the rights of Libya", referring to Article 41 of the Statute of the Court and to Articles 73, 74 and 75 of the Rules of Court; and whereas in that request Libya, referring to Article 74, paragraph 4, of the Rules of Court, also requested the President, pending the meeting of the Court, to exercise the power conferred on him by that provision to call upon the Parties to act in such a way as to enable any Order the Court might make on Libya's request for provisional measures to have its appropriate effects;

* * * *

14. Whereas, by a letter of 6 March 1992, a copy of which was transmitted to Libya by the Registrar, the Legal Adviser of the United States Department of State, referring to the specific request made by Libya under Article 74, paragraph 4, of the Rules of Court, in its request for the indication of provisional measures, stated inter alia that > taking into account both the absence of any concrete showing of urgency relating to the request and developments in the ongoing action by the Security Council and the Secretary-General in this matter . . . the action requested by Libya . . . is unnecessary and could be misconstrued;

>
> 35. Whereas, by a letter of 2 April 1992, a copy of which was transmitted to Libya by the Registrar, the Agent of the United States drew the Court's attention to the adoption of Security Council resolution 748 (1992) the text of which he enclosed; and whereas, in that letter, the Agent stated:
>
> That resolution, adopted pursuant to Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, 'decides that the Libyan Government must now comply without any further delay with paragraph 3 of resolution 731 (1992) of 21 January 1992 regarding the requests contained in documents S/23306, S/23308 and S/23309'. It will be recalled that the referenced requests include the request that Libya surrender the two Libyan suspects in the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 to the United States or to the United Kingdom. For this additional reason, the United States maintains its submission of 28 March 1992 that the request of the Government of the Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for the indication of provisional measures of protection should be denied, and that no such measures should be indicated;
>
> 40. Whereas in its observations on Security Council resolution 748 (1992), presented in response to the Court's invitation, the United States observes that that resolution was adopted under

Chapter VII rather than Chapter VI of the Charter and was framed as a "decision" and contended that, given that binding decision, no object would be served by provisional measures; that, irrespective of the right claimed by Libya under the Montreal Convention, Libya has a Charter-based duty to accept and carry out the decisions in the resolution, and other States have a Charter-based duty to seek Libya's compliance; that any indication of provisional measures would run a serious risk of conflicting with the work of the Security Council; that the Council had rejected (inter alia) Libya's contention that the matter should be addressed on the basis of the right claimed by Libya under the Montreal Convention, which Libya asks the Court to protect through provisional measures; and that the Court should therefore decline the request;

41. Whereas the Court, in the context of the present proceedings on a request for provisional measures, has in accordance with Article 41 of the Statute, to consider the circumstances drawn to its attention as requiring the indication of such measures, but cannot make definitive findings either of fact or of law on the issues relating to the merits, and the right of the Parties to contest such issues at the stage of the merits must remain unaffected by the Court's decision;

42. Whereas both Libya and the United States, as Members of the United Nations, are obliged to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with Article 25 of the Charter; whereas the Court, which is at the stage of proceedings on provisional measures, considers that prima facie this obligation extends to the decision contained in resolution 748 (1992); and whereas, in accordance with Article 103 of the Charter, the obligations of the Parties in that respect prevail over their obligations under any other international agreement, including the Montreal Convention;

43. Whereas the Court, while thus not at this stage called upon to determine definitively the legal effect of Security Council resolution 748 (1992), considers that, whatever the situation previous to the adoption of that resolution, the rights claimed by Libya under the Montreal Convention cannot now be regarded as appropriate for protection by the indication of provisional measures;

44. Whereas, furthermore, an indication of the measures requested by Libya would be likely to impair the rights which appear prima facie to be enjoyed by the United States by virtue of Security Council resolution 748 (1992);

* * * *

46. [The Court] . . . [f]inds that the circumstances of the case are not such as to require the exercise of its power under Article 41 of the Statute to indicate provisional measures.

(ii) Preliminary objections

In June 1995 the United States and the United Kingdom filed preliminary objections in the cases pending against them. The United States argued that the Court lacked jurisdiction under the Montreal Convention, contending that it was not at issue in the case; that the Libyan Application was inadmissible because its claims were superseded by Security Council resolutions; that the intervening Security Council resolutions had rendered the Libyan claims moot; and, in the alternative, that the Court should resolve the case in substance at the preliminary stage and dismiss Libya's claims.

Oral proceedings on these preliminary objections were held from October 13–22, 1997. The United States was represented by David R. Andrews, Legal Adviser of the U.S. Department of State, Michael J. Matheson, Principal Deputy Legal Adviser, John R. Crook, Assistant Legal Adviser, Sean D. Murphy, Counselor for Legal Affairs, U.S. Embassy, The Hague; Oscar Schachter, Professor, Columbia University School of Law, and Elisabeth Zoller, Professor, University of Paris II. Excerpts below provide the views of the United States on the inapplicability of the Montreal Convention and on the role of the Court in the circumstances of this case, involving binding Security Council resolutions under chapter VII of the UN Charter.

On February 27, 1998, the Court rejected the preliminary objections. See Libya v. United States, 1998 I.C.J. 9 (Judgment of Feb. 27, 1998). The Court found that it had jurisdiction, that the Application was admissible and that the objection as to mootness did not, "in the circumstances of the case, have an exclusively preliminary character." As to the U.S. request that it resolve the case in substance now "by deciding, as a preliminary matter, that the relief sought by Libya is precluded," the Court concluded that the United States, "had made a procedural choice the effect of which, according to the express terms of Article 79, paragraph 3, is to suspend the proceedings on the merits" and that the Court "cannot therefore uphold the claim of the United States."

Following actions taken by Libya including surrender of the two accused terrorists for trial by a court in the Netherlands and settlement of claims by individuals against Libya discussed in (3) below, the case was removed from the list of the Court on September 10, 2003, by agreement of the parties. See Digest 2003 at 166. All public documents connected with the case, including transcripts of the oral pleadings, are available at www.icj-cij.org. Because the Court did not reach the merits of the case, the written pleadings are not available.

Excerpts below from the oral proceedings of October 1997 provide the views of the United States.

Mr. Andrews:

1.3. . . . [This case] poses a fundamental challenge to the authority of the United Nations Security Council in maintaining international peace and security. In the origins of the Pan Am 103 murders, the Council identified a threat to peace and security. It specified measures that Libya, the United States, and other countries are obliged to take in response to that threat. Libya comes before this Court contending that actions taken by the United States violate its rights under the Montreal Convention, a treaty designed to bring aircraft terrorists to justice. As we will show in the course of our presentations, Libya's claims are nothing more than collateral attacks on the decisions taken by the Security Council in its efforts to maintain international peace and security. It is our view that the Court does not have jurisdiction over such attacks. This Court should decline to accept Libya's claims in any event because the claims are inadmissible, and have been rendered moot and without practical purpose by the decisions of the Council. Even if the Court believes it should exercise jurisdiction, it should dismiss the Libyan claims in substance on the basis of the legal effect of the Council's decisions.

1.16. First, the Court does not have jurisdiction to entertain these claims. The Court only has jurisdiction over a dispute involving "the interpretation or application" of the Montreal Convention. Libya, however, does not raise any valid claim under the Montreal Convention. Even if Libya could make such a claim, any such claims are superseded by the relevant decisions of the Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which impose different obligations. Thus, Libya's claims can be seen for what they really are—a challenge to the lawfulness of the Council's actions under the Charter. That is not a dispute with the United States over the interpretation or application of the Montreal Convention.

1.17. Second, even assuming the Court had jurisdiction under the Montreal Convention, the Court should dismiss Libya's claims because they are inadmissible. Acceptance of these claims would require the Court to overturn binding decisions of the Security Council that were adopted in the exercise of the Council's Chapter VII functions. We believe that the Council's decisions were plainly lawful and that the proper role for the Court must be to deny Libya's claims for relief.

1.18. Third, even if the Court had jurisdiction to consider these claims and considered them to be admissible, the Court should decline to grant the relief requested by Libya because its claims have been rendered moot by the Council's resolutions. Under the Charter, the obligations created by the Council's decisions under Chapter VII take precedence over inconsistent obligations that might otherwise apply. Ruling on Libya's claims under the Montreal Convention therefore would have no practical effect and serve no valid purpose, and Libya's claims therefore must be dismissed.

1.19. Fourth, should the Court decide that it has and should exercise jurisdiction, and that Libya's claims are admissible, it should resolve the case in substance at this preliminary objections stage. The Court should decide, as a preliminary matter, that the decisions of the Security Council preclude the relief sought by Libya. This case can be disposed of on this basis; there is, therefore, no justification for further proceedings on Libya's claims under the Montreal Convention.

* * * *

Mr. Murphy:

2.4. . . . [T]he Montreal Convention is not the exclusive means by which one State may pursue criminal jurisdiction over a suspect located in another State, even when the two States are parties to the Montreal Convention. The Montreal Convention was intended to increase the opportunities for bringing offenders to justice, but was not intended to foreclose other opportunities outside the Convention. As such, pursuit of those other opportunities by the United States cannot be said to violate any rights of Libya under the Montreal Convention and, concomitantly, cannot give rise to a dispute cognizant under Article 14.

2.5. My second proposition is that, whether or not the Montreal Convention is the exclusive source of law in this area, none of the provisions of the Montreal Convention identified by Libya prohibit, expressly or implicitly, a party from pursuing through peaceful, diplomatic means the surrender for trial of an offender. . . . Consequently, since none of the actions of the United States identified by Libya can reasonably be regarded as potentially violating the Montreal Convention, there is no basis for the Court's jurisdiction in this case.

2.21. . . . [T]he United States has not, at any time, sought the surrender for trial of the two suspects by invoking the Montreal Convention. Rather, the United States has sought to exercise its own national criminal jurisdiction without reference to the Montreal Convention, as Article 5, paragraph 3, of the Convention makes clear it is permitted to do. The United States has criminal jurisdiction to prosecute the two Libyans implicated in the bombing of Pan Am 103, based on the US nationality of the aircraft and on the US nationality of many of the passengers and crew. In the exercise of that jurisdiction, the US is fully empowered to seek custody of these alleged offenders. The Montreal Convention, by its terms, expressly states that such efforts are not excluded.

2.22. Seen in this light, the core issue in this case does not concern Libya's rights under the Montreal Convention; it concerns the right of the United States under general principles of international law to pursue a diplomatic initiative for the surrender for trial of the suspects. Like any other State, the United States has sovereign rights to conduct diplomatic relations, and, more specifically, to seek the surrender for trial of persons alleged to have committed certain crimes against US persons and aircraft.

2.23. The United States also has the right under the United Nations Charter to bring situations which might lead to international friction to the attention of the Security Council and of the General Assembly (United Nations Charter, Art. 35, para. 1). For years prior to and after the adoption of the Montreal Convention, States have referred to the United Nations situations concerning terrorism against civil aviation, as well as international terrorism generally (see US Preliminary Objections, Chap. III). In light of that history, it is simply untenable for Libya to argue that membership in the Montreal Convention precludes referral of a situation of aviation terrorism to the United Nations, or indeed to any other fora, simply because a suspect has turned up in another member State. Were the Court to accept this argument, it could have severe consequences for the ability of States to refer situations to the United Nations concerning not just aviation terrorism, but other forms of terrorism, war crimes, human rights, and drug trafficking as well, since in all of these areas there are treaties with "prosecute or extradite" provisions similar to that of the Montreal Convention. . . .

* * * *

Mr. Crook:

[Following a discussion of the terms of Security Council Resolutions 731, 748 and 883]

3.31. . . . The superiority of obligations under the Charter over obligations under subsequent treaties is clear in international law. This is reflected in Article 30, paragraph 1, of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which states the rule that the treaty later in time generally prevails. However, this rule is made expressly "[s]ubject to Article 103 of the Charter of the United Nations". The Montreal Convention does not override Article 103 of the Charter.

3.32. Libya's contrary position would fundamentally weaken the Charter. Libya's claim would allow States to "opt out" of Chapter VII, or out of any other inconvenient part of the Charter, by concluding inconsistent new treaties. This is a dangerous and wholly unsupported doctrine. It should not be accepted by the Court.

3.33. Libya also contends that it need not comply with the Security Council's Chapter VII resolutions because those resolutions are not based on the Charter or somehow go beyond the scope of the Council's powers under the Charter (Observations and Submissions at para. 4.2). This argument also fails. The Charter gives the Members of the Security Council the responsibility for determining which measures are required to maintain or restore international peace and security. Once the Council has made a decision under Chapter VII, an individual Member of the United Nations cannot refuse to comply because it claims to disagree with the validity of that decision.

3.34. As with the previous argument, Libya's position here is one that could lead to grave damage to the legal order established by the Charter. But, in any case, as I shall show in the last part of my presentation, the measures taken by the Council were quite reasonable and appropriate in relation to the threat to peace and security associated with the bombings of Pan Am 103 and UTA 772.

3.35. It has also been suggested that Article 103 of the Charter, which speaks of obligations, may not extend as well to rights under a treaty or under general international law. Thus, it is appropriate to consider whether the rights of a State under a treaty or general international law can be superseded by action of the Security Council.

3.36. The obligation to comply with Security Council decisions applies fully both to decisions affecting the rights and to those affecting the obligations of States. The relevant provisions of the Charter are phrased broadly and are intended to be broad in effect. They must be in order to assure the effectiveness of the régime of Chapter VII and in interpreting this aspect of the Charter, this Court has not recognized any distinction between "rights" and "obligations". Instead, the Court has stressed the breadth and importance of these Charter provisions (see, e.g., Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1971, p. 54, para. 116; Military and Paramilitary Activities In and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America), Jurisdiction and Admissibility, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1984, p. 440). The scholarly literature has also stressed the breadth of States' obligations to carry out the decisions of the Council. It does not support the view that this duty does not apply to "rights" (see, e.g., The Charter of the United Nations. A Commentary (B. Simma, ed.), pp. 1120 et seq.).

3.37. Moreover, this suggested limitation creates serious difficulties. Suppose a bilateral treaty gives the nationals of each party the right to invest in the territory of the other. Surely the Charter gives the Security Council the power in a Chapter VII situation to require that one party prohibit investments by its nationals in the territory of the other, notwithstanding these treaty provisions.

3.38. The explanation for this is to be found, not just in Article 103, but also in Articles 25 and 48. Their clear language requires States to carry out the decisions of the Security Council. If a State must forego the exercise of some treaty right in order to carry out the binding decisions of the Council, that is simply what the Charter requires. Embargoes, bans on the sale of arms, other compulsory measures adopted by the Council often prevent States from exercising rights under treaties or under general international law. A State may well be prevented by Council action from exercising rights under treaties, such as the right to carry on bilateral air traffic. But that is what the clear language of the Charter requires.

3.39. This Court summarized the situation aptly in its Advisory Opinion in the Namibia case:

> "[W]hen the Security Council adopts a decision under Article 25 in accordance with the Charter, it is for member States to comply with that decision . . . To hold otherwise would be to deprive this principal organ of its essential functions and powers under the Charter." (Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1971, p. 54, para. 116.)

The Court Has Recognized the Effect of the Security Council's Resolutions Under Articles 25 and 103.

3.40. Mr. President, the Court has recognized and given effect to these legal principles regarding Articles 25 and 103 of the Charter. At the Interim Measures stage in 1992, the Court decided that it could not then finally decide the legal effect of resolution 748. Nevertheless, the Court's Order clearly recognized the legal authority of the rules that it established, and stressed States' duties to comply with them. This is clear in paragraph 42 of the Court's Order:

> "Whereas both Libya and the United States, as Members of the United Nations, are obliged to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with Article 45 of the Charter; whereas the Court, at the stage of proceedings on provisional measures, considers that > prima facie this obligation extends to the decision contained in resolution 748 (1992); and whereas, in accordance with Article 103 of the Charter, obligations of the Parties in that respect prevail over their obligations under any international agreement, including the Montreal Convention."

(Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Provisional Measures, Order of 14 April 1992, I.C.J. Reports 1992, p. 126.)

The Court in 1992 thus concluded that prima facie the obligations imposed by resolution 748 governed the case. Libya has shown no reason to arrive at a different conclusion now, when the matter can be finally decided by the Court. The Court should now decide definitively that the obligations imposed by resolutions 748 and 883 govern the disposition of this case. Mr. President, I will now turn to the third main head of my argument, to show how these resolutions were validly adopted by the Council.

* * * *

The Council Is Not Precluded from Requiring Transfer of Persons for Trial.

3.71. Libya contends that the "principles of a sound administration of Justice render it inappropriate or even ultra vires for the Council to adopt resolutions 748 and 883 (e.g., Libyan Observations and Submissions, paras. 4.16, et seq.)

3.72. The contention seems to be that the Council cannot act in matters that have a legal aspect, and in particular, it cannot require the transfer of persons for trial. This cannot stand. The Charter does not place such limits on the Council's powers. Judge Bedjaoui, while questioning the actions of the Council in other respects, confirms that the Council's demand that these individuals be transferred for trial "did not in itself, of course, lie beyond the Council's powers" (M. Bedjaoui, The New World Order and the Security Council, p. 70). The Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia has also upheld the power of the Council to require the transfer of persons for trial in the Tadic case.

3.73. Libya cites the principle of aut dedere aut judicare, that a State may elect whether to prosecute or extradite the alleged offender. It also urges that general international law leaves Libya sole discretion to decide whether to transfer Libyan nationals for prosecution abroad. Libya sometimes contends as well that its constitution precludes the extradition of Libyan nationals.

3.74. I have previously answered Libya's broad claim that the Security Council cannot affect or alter the international legal rights and obligations of States. The Council clearly has extensive power to do so. Many of the forms of mandatory Council action listed in Article 41 of the Charter, such as the interruption of economic relations or of sea, postal or other forms of communication, are likely to impair or supersede pre-existing rights under treaties, customary law, or national law. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that the Council can adopt such measures.

* * * *

Prof. Schachter:

* * * *

4.2. As Members of the Court have recognized, a central legal issue raised in this case concerns the relationship of the Security Council and the Court. The Court is faced with a challenge to binding decisions of the Security Council adopted pursuant to Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. Underlying this challenge is the Libyan contention that the Court in the exercise of its judicial power has the authority and responsibility to judge the legality of the Council's decision. My comments will be addressed mainly to this argument.

4.3. Let me say, first, that the United States recognizes that the United Nations Security Council is an organ whose powers are defined and limited by the Charter of the United Nations. The pertinent resolutions of the Security Council, in this case resolutions 748 and 883, were adopted under the general authority of the Council in Articles 24 and 25 and pursuant to the specific powers laid down in Chapter VII of the Charter, in particular Articles 39 and 41. Article 48 of the Charter also affirms that the actions required to carry out the decisions of the Council shall be taken by all or some of the Members as the Council shall determine. Pursuant to these Articles, the Council has imposed binding obligations not only on Libya but on all other Members of the United Nations.

4.4. Such enforcement measures have the effect in many respects of depriving or curtailing the legal rights of the affected States, and most drastically the rights of the target State, Libya. When a State appeals to this Court to vindicate its legal rights as against the Council's sanctions, the juridical question, as Judge Shahabuddeen remarked, "results not from any collision between the competence of the Security Council and that of the Court" (Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention Arising From the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Provisional Measures, Order of 14 April 1992, I.C.J. Reports 1992, p. 141). Rather, he went on to say, it is more precisely and correctly a collision between rights that the State may have under treaties and the obligations imposed by the mandatory measures of the Council.

4.5. What then is the role of the Court, if it were properly seized of a case under a treaty, faced with a challenge to the validity of the mandatory Council decision? Libya has argued that in that case the Court has the intrinsic authority and responsibility to exercise its judicial function as laid down in the Charter and its Statute. The argument is important and we do not take it lightly. The United States places a high value on the role of the judiciary in international disputes and in particular on the contribution of this Court as a principal organ of the United Nations to the understanding of the Charter and the commitments of member States. We agree with Judge Lachs' much-quoted comment that the Court is the "guardian of legality", though we would add, not the sole guardian. The member States and the other principal organs are all bound to respect and conform to the Charter and international law.

4.6. The issue in the present case cannot be resolved simply by referring to the pre-eminent role of the Court in exercising its judicial function. The challenge by Libya to the Security Council calls into question the basic constitutional structure of the United Nations and the understanding of member States as to powers delegated to the organs and the manner of their application. True, this Court has recognized in one of its first cases that the "political character of an organ cannot release it from the observance of the treaty provisions established by the Charter when they constitute limitations on its powers or criteria for its judgment" (Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1948, p. 64). But it has also recognized that the Court "[u]ndoubtedly . . . does not possess powers of judicial review or appeal in respect of the decisions taken by the United Nations organs concerned" (Legal Consequences of States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1971, p. 45). Both of these propositions have been generally accepted; we regard them as unimpeachable principles of United Nations law and relevant jurisprudence on the issues raised in this case.

4.7. The present case presents its own distinctive facts and juridical configuration. The Court is faced for the first time with a contentious case in which a State claims that a Council decision which has overridden its legal rights has violated the Charter and basic principles of international law. As we already indicated, we do not deny that the Council is obliged to comply with the Purposes and Principles of the Charter and to act within the limits of the powers granted to it.

4.8. However, the salient fact of juridical relevance is that the resolutions in question were decisions taken by the Council in the exercise of its supreme—and unique—responsibility under the Charter. The Council's determination that the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security and that enforcement measures were necessary did not rest on conjecture or theory. The acts of terrorism had cost hundreds of lives; intensive factual investigation pointed to the responsibility of agents of Libya. The worldwide reaction called for effective responses. It was reasonable—one might say, inevitable—that a majority of the Security Council would regard the situation as a threat to international peace and security and take action to ensure that those responsible for the attack would be punished. The Council took action under Chapter VII and imposed the sanctions that it alone was authorized to take.

Mr. Andrews:

7.8. I would only add that Libya's request to this Court—in effect, that the Court review and invalidate resolution 748—would be a step of fundamental significance that would, in our view, drastically alter the existing relationship between the Court and the Council, to the detriment of both institutions. If the Council's decisions under Chapter VII concerning the existence of a threat to peace, and the measures to be adopted to deal with such a threat, were subject to review and reversal by the Court, then the work of both the Court and the Council could be seriously compromised. In particular, the invalidation by the Court of the Council's decisions in the present case would have a dramatic and negative effect on the credibility of the Council's actions to deal with international terrorism.

7.9. The viability of the Council's decisions under Chapter VII rests in very large part on their acceptance by States as binding decisions of the United Nations which must be promptly complied with. For example, the effectiveness and security of United Nations peacekeeping missions depend heavily on the prompt acceptance by States of a legal duty to comply with the Council decisions on which they are based. The review and reversal of such a decision by any other body could seriously compromise the authoritative character of those decisions in general, and gravely complicate the resolution of the threat to the peace in the situation in question. In particular, review of such decisions by the Court could be expected (as in the present case) to take years, during which period the validity and effectiveness of Council decisions would hang in dangerous suspense. For this very reason, the framers of the Charter gave to the Council the responsibility for making the determinations called for in Chapter VII and rejected the notion of judicial review over those determinations.

Prof. Zoller:

3.1. . . . What Libya complains of is that the Montreal Convention has been "set aside": what it requests the Court to do is to "set aside" the Security Council resolutions. In this game of discard, or écarté, each player chooses its law. . . .

3.2. Libya asks the Court to recognize that it has the right to choose its law. The reason it advances—since such an extravagant claim must be justified on one ground or another—is that these resolutions are vitiated by an excès de pouvoir. In this the Libyan approach is characterized by breathtaking effrontery. It is the first time that a State has come before the Court asking it to review the acts of the Security Council. . . . [The United States] has explained to the Court that, owing to the split between contentious and advisory jurisdiction, should the Court have jurisdiction to review the acts of the organs of the organization, such jurisdiction may only validly be exercised in an advisory framework. . . . [I]t is therefore not a question that "the Court remains silent." . . . It is a question of whether the Court chooses to speak in a context which is worthy of its functions as a tribunal and which gives it the assurance of being heard. Such a context, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, can only be that of advisory proceedings.

3.3. Libya made no reply to this argument. Or rather, it replied by rewording its Application, reducing its scope. For Libya, it is in no way a matter of "annulling" the decisions of the Security Council . . . it is a matter of "interpreting" them . . . ; it is merely a matter of "obtaining clarification". . . . In order to comply with Libya's request, the Court would have to do much more than interpret resolutions 731, 748 and 883 of the Security Council. It would have to set them aside. This is what Libya requests the Court to do. . . .

(3) Agreement to try indicted Libyans in Scottish court in the Netherlands

On August 24, 1998, the United States and the United Kingdom proposed to the UN Secretary General that the two Libyans be tried in the Netherlands by Scottish judges. In their letter to the Secretary General, the two countries explained the proposal as set forth below. Attached to the letter were the texts of an intended agreement between the governments of The Netherlands and the United Kingdom and legislation to enable a Scottish court to proceed in The Netherlands. U.N. Doc. S/1998/795 (1998). See also statement of Secretary of State Madeleine Albright at http://secretary.state.gov/www/statements/1998/980824a.html.

3. . . . [I]n the interest of resolving this situation in a way which will allow justice to be done, our Governments are prepared, as an exceptional measure, to arrange for the two accused to be tried before a Scottish court sitting in the Netherlands. After close consultation with the Government of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, we are pleased to confirm that the Government of the Netherlands has agreed to facilitate arrangements for such a court. It would be a Scottish court and would follow normal Scots law and procedure in every respect, except for the replacement of the jury by a panel of three Scottish High Court judges. The Scottish rules of evidence and procedure, and all the guarantees of fair trial provided by the law of Scotland, would apply. Arrangements would be made for international observers to attend the trial. . . .

4. The two accused will have safe passage from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the Netherlands for the purpose of the trial. While they are in the Netherlands for the purpose of the trial, we shall not seek their transfer to any jurisdiction other than the Scottish court sitting in the Netherlands. If found guilty, the two accused will serve their sentence in the United Kingdom. If acquitted, or in the event of the prosecution being discontinued by any process of law preventing any further trial under Scots law, the two accused will have safe passage back to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. Should other offences committed prior to arrival in the Netherlands come to light during the course of the trial, neither of the two accused nor any other person attending the court, including witnesses, will be liable for arrest for such offences while in the Netherlands for the purpose of the trial.

5. The two accused will enjoy the protection afforded by Scottish law. They will be able to choose Scottish solicitors and advocates to represent them at all stages of the proceedings. The proceedings will be interpreted into Arabic in the same way as a trial held in Scotland. The accused will be given proper medical attention. If they wish, they can be visited in custody by the international observers. The trial would of course be held in public, adequate provision being made for the media.

6. Our two Governments are prepared to support a further Security Council resolution for the purpose of the initiative (which would also suspend sanctions upon the appearance of the two accused in the Netherlands for the purpose of trial before the Scottish court) and which would require all States to cooperate to that end. Once that resolution is adopted, the Government of the United Kingdom will legislate to enable a Scottish court to hold a trial in the Netherlands. . . .

7. This initiative represents a sincere attempt by the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States to resolve this issue, and is an approach which has recently been endorsed by others, including the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States, the Movement of Non-Aligned States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (S/1994/373, S/1995/834, S/1997/35, S/1997/273, S/1997/406, S/1997/497, S/1997/529). We are only willing to proceed in this exceptional way on the basis of the terms set out in the present letter (and its annexes), and provided that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya cooperates fully by:

(a) Ensuring the timely appearance of the two accused in the Netherlands for trial before the Scottish court;
(b) Ensuring the production of evidence, including the presence of witnesses before the court;
(c) Complying fully with all the requirements of the Security Council resolutions.

8. We trust that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya will respond promptly, positively and unequivocally by ensuring the timely appearance of the two accused in the Netherlands for trial before the Scottish court. If it does not do so, our two Governments reserve the right to propose further sanctions at the time of the next Security Council review. They also reserve the right to withdraw this initiative.

On August 27, 1998, the UN Security Council passed Resolution 1192, "welcom[ing] the initiative" of the United States and the United Kingdom, deciding that Libya "shall ensure the appearance in The Netherlands of the two accused for the purpose of trial . . . and . . . that any evidence or witnesses in Libya are, upon the request of the court, promptly made available" at the trial. The resolution also reaffirmed the sanctions imposed under resolutions 748 and 883 and decided that they would be "suspended immediately if the Secretary-General reports to the Council that the two accused have arrived in The Netherlands for the purpose of trial . . . and that the Libyan Government has satisfied the French judicial authorities with regard to the bombing of UTA 772." The sanctions could also be suspended if the two appeared before an appropriate U.S. or U.K. court.

Libya surrendered Abdel Basset al-Megrahi and Lamen Khalifa Fhiman on April 5, 1999. On April 6, after the two men had been transferred to Scottish authorities in The Netherlands, they were charged with conspiracy, murder, and contravention of the U.K. Aviation Security Act of 1982. On January 31, 2001, the Scottish court found Abdel Basset al-Megrahi guilty of murder and concluded that there was insufficient evidence to find Al-Amin Khalifa Fahima guilty. The verdict was upheld on appeal by the Scottish High Court of Justiciary, sitting in The Netherlands. 2002 S.C.C.R. 509. See Digest 2001 at 98–99; Digest 2002 at 111–12.

b. Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act

The Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 was signed into law on April 24, 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–132,

110 Stat. 1214 (1996) ("AEDPA"). Among other things, the AEDPA amended the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1605, to provide an exception to immunity for lawsuits against terrorist states (§ 221) (see Chapter 10.A.3.d.); amended the Victims of Crime Act of 1984, 42 U.S.C. § 10601 et seq., to provide assistance and compensation to victims of terrorism (§§ 231–234); authorized the Secretary of State to designate groups as "foreign terrorist organizations," triggering sanctions (§ 302, discussed below); criminalized the provision of material support or resources to designated foreign terrorist organizations (§ 303); prohibited assistance to terrorist states (§§ 321–330, discussed below); provided for removal of alien terrorists and exclusion of members and representatives of terrorist organizations and denial of asylum to alien terrorists (§§ 401–433) (see Chapter 1.C.2.c.); implemented U.S. obligations under the Convention on the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Detection (§§ 601–607) (see B.1.d. below); amended various criminal law provisions to counter terrorism (§§ 701–732, discussed below); and provided that the twelve-mile territorial sea of the United States is within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States for the purposes of the U.S. criminal code. (§ 901) (see Chapter 12.A.6.a.(2).)

(1) Designation of foreign terrorist organizations

Section 301(b) of the AEDPA provides that the purpose of Subtitle A of the act, "Prohibition on International Terrorist Fundraising," is > to provide the Federal Government the fullest possible basis, consistent with the Constitution, to prevent persons within the United States, or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, from providing material support or resources to foreign organizations that engage in terrorist activities.

To that end, section 302 amended the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA") by adding a new § 219, 8 U.S.C. § 1189, to authorize the Secretary of State, in consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General, to designate foreign organizations engaging in terrorist activity that threatens the security of U.S. nationals or the national security of the United States as foreign terrorist organizations ("FTOs"). 8 U.S.C. § 1189(a)(1). For purposes of the act, the term terrorist activity is as defined in § 212(a)(3)(B) of the INA (8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B)). Section 219 also authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to require U.S. financial institutions possessing or controlling assets of any designated foreign terrorist organization to block all financial transactions involving the assets. 8 U.S.C. § 1189(a)(2)(C). Section 219 also sets forth procedures for making a designation, requires creation of an administrative record, and provides for judicial review by designated organizations.

Section 303 of the AEDPA, among other things, added a new § 2339B to the U.S. criminal code, criminalizing provision of "material support or resources" to a designated foreign terrorist organization by anyone "within the United States or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States." 18 U.S.C. § 2339B(a). Section 2339B(d) provides expressly that "[t]here is extraterritorial Federal jurisdiction over an offense under this section." Section 303 also requires financial institutions to block and report funds in its possession or control in which a foreign terrorist organization or its agent has an interest, when the financial institution becomes aware of such funds. 18 U.S.C. § 2339B(a)(2).

On October 2, 1997, Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright designated 30 FTOs, effective October 8, 1997. 62 Fed. Reg. 52,650 (Oct. 8, 1997). On the same date, the Office of Foreign Assets Control, Department of the Treasury, issued implementing regulations, entitled "Foreign Terrorist Organizations Sanctions Regulations." 62 Fed. Reg. 52,493 (Oct. 8, 1997). Designations were effective for two years, 8 U.S.C. § 1189(a)(4)(A). On October 8, 1999, the Secretary of State redesignated 27 FTOs. 64 Fed. Reg. 55,112 (Oct. 8, 1999). In that designation the Secretary also designated al Qaida for the first time.

In 1998 the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California denied a preliminary injunction against enforcement of § 2339B, sought on broad constitutional grounds. It did, however, preliminarily enjoin two provisions of the statute as unconstitutionally vague—those concerning provision of "training" and "personnel" to foreign terrorist groups. Humanitarian Law Project v. Reno, 9 F. Supp. 2d 1176 (C.D. Cal. 1998). The court of appeals affirmed, finding the statutory provision constitutional, with the possible exception of the two terms noted by the district court. 205 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 2000). In 1999 the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upheld the constitutionality of designations challenged by two FTOs, People's Mojahedin Org. of Iran v. United States Dep't of State, 182 F.3d 17 (D.C. Cir. 1999). For further discussion of foreign terrorist organizations, including litigation involving their designation, see Digest 2001 at 109–17; Digest 2002 at 85–94; Digest 2003 at 175–79.

(2) Prohibition on assistance to terrorist states

Subtitle B of the AEDPA, "Prohibition on Assistance to Terrorist States," created a number of new or modified provisions to the criminal code and amended the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended ("FAA"), to impose new restrictions on assistance to terrorist states and countries aiding terrorist states.

Section 321 of the AEDPA added § 2332d to title 18 of the U.S. Code making it an offense to engage in financial transactions with a government that has been designated as a state sponsor of terrorism under § 6j of the Export Administration Act of 1979 ("EAA"), 50 U.S.C. app. § 2405. Section 323 amended § 2339A of title 18 to criminalize, among other things, provision of material support or resources, knowing or intending that they are to be used in preparation for, or in carrying out, a violation of § 2332a, criminalizing use of certain weapons of mass destruction.

Section 325 of the AEDPA added a new § 620G to the FAA, 22 U.S.C. § 2377, prohibiting assistance to the government of any country for which the Secretary of State has made a determination under § 620A (22 U.S.C. § 2371) that "the government of that country has repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism." Section 326 added a new § 620H to the FAA, 22 U.S.C. § 2378, prohibiting assistance to countries that provide lethal military equipment to a country the government of which the Secretary of State has determined is a terrorist government for the purposes of § 6(j) of the EAA or 620A of the FAA. Section 327 required the Secretary of the Treasury to instruct the U.S. executive director of each international financial institution to "use the voice and vote" of the United States to oppose any loan or other use of funds for a country for which the Secretary of State has made a determination under § 6(j) of the EAA or § 620A of the FAA. 22 U.S.C. § 262p–4q.

Section 330 amended the Arms Export Control Act to prohibit the sale or license for export of any defense article or defense service to a foreign country that the President determines "is not cooperating fully with United States antiterrorism efforts" unless the President determines that the transaction is important to the national interests of the United States. 22 U.S.C. § 2781. See also 1.g. below.

(3) Other criminal law modifications

Title VII of AEDPA, "Criminal Law Modifications to Counter Terrorism," among other things, added a new § 2332b to title 18 of the U.S. Code, creating a criminal offense entitled "Acts of terrorism transcending national boundaries." Subsection 2332b(a) enumerated certain crimes of violence and acts creating a risk of bodily injury associated with destruction or damage to "any structure, conveyance, or other real or personal property" within the United States "involving conduct transcending national boundaries" in circumstances described in subsection (b). Such conduct was defined to mean "conduct occurring outside of the United States in addition to the conduct occurring in the United States."

The circumstances in which the offense would be covered by this new section were:

> (A) the mail or any facility of interstate or foreign commerce is used in furtherance of the offense;
>
> (B) the offense obstructs, delays, or affects interstate or foreign commerce, or would have so obstructed, delayed, or affected interstate or foreign commerce if the offense had been consummated;
>
> (C) the victim, or intended victim, is the United States Government, a member of the uniformed services, or any official, officer, employee, or agent of the legislative, executive, or judicial branches, or of any department or agency, of the United States;
>
> (D) the structure, conveyance, or other real or personal property is, in whole or in part, owned, possessed, or leased to the United States, or any department or agency of the United States;
>
> (E) the offense is committed in the territorial sea (including the airspace above and the seabed and subsoil below, and artificial islands and fixed structures erected thereon) of the United States; or
> (F) the offense is committed within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

Section 2332b(e) provided specifically that "[t]here is extraterritorial Federal jurisdiction" for crimes under § 2332b(a).

c. Freezing assets of terrorists disrupting Middle East peace process

On January 23, 1995, President William J. Clinton issued Executive Order No. 12947, "Prohibiting Transactions With Terrorists Who Threaten To Disrupt the Middle East Peace Process," effective January 24, 1995. 60 Fed. Reg. 5079 (Jan. 25, 1995). Finding that "grave acts of violence committed by foreign terrorists that disrupt the Middle East peace process constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States," the President declared a national emergency to deal with that threat under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, 50 U.S.C. §§ 1701 et seq. A statement by the White House Press Secretary dated January 24, 1995, explained that > [t]he President's action . . . provides the Administration with a new tool to combat fundraising in this country on behalf of organizations that use terror to undermine the Middle East peace process. The Executive order makes it harder for such groups to finance these criminal activities by cutting off their access to sources of support in the U.S. and to the U.S. financial system. It is also intended to reach charitable contributions to designated organizations to preclude diversion of such donations to terrorist activities. . . . The Administration will encourage other nations to take similar actions.

Press Release, White House Office of the Press Secretary, President Clinton Takes New Action Against Terrorist Groups that Threaten the Middle East Peace Process (Jan. 24, 1995) (on file with the Clinton White House Virtual Library at http://clinton6.nara.gov/1995/01/1995-01-24-press-secretary-on-executive-order-on-terrorism.html.) The executive order imposed sanctions to be administered by the Office of Foreign Assets Control, Department of the Treasury ("OFAC"), as set forth in excerpts from the order below.

Section 1. Except to the extent provided in section 203(b)(3) and (4) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)(3) and (4)) and in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses that may be issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date:

(a) all property and interests in property of:

(i) the persons listed in the Annex to this order;
(ii) foreign persons designated by the Secretary of State, in coordination with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General, because they are found:
(A) to have committed, or to pose a significant risk of committing, acts of violence that have the purpose or effect of disrupting the Middle East peace process, or
(B) to assist in, sponsor, or provide financial, material, or technological support for, or services in support of, such acts of violence; and
(iii) persons determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, in coordination with the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, to be owned or controlled by, or to act for or on behalf of, any of the foregoing persons, that are in the United States, that hereafter come within the United States, or that hereafter come within the possession or control of United States persons, are blocked;

(b) any transaction or dealing by United States persons or within the United States in property or interests in property of the persons designated in or pursuant to this order is prohibited, including the making or receiving of any contribution of funds, goods, or services to or for the benefit of such persons;
(c) any transaction by any United States person or within the United States that evades or avoids, or has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in this order, is prohibited.

* * * *

Sec. 3. I hereby determine that the making of donations of the type specified in section 203(b)(2)(A) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)(2)(A)) by United States persons to persons designated in or pursuant to this order would seriously impair my ability to deal with the national emergency declared in this order, and hereby prohibit such donations as provided by section 1 of this order.

Sec. 4. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Secretary of State and, as appropriate, the Attorney General, is hereby authorized to take such actions, including the promulgation of rules and regulations, and to employ all powers granted to me by IEEPA as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this order. . . .

Sec. 5. Nothing contained in this order shall create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable by any party against the United States, its agencies or instrumentalities, its officers or employees, or any other person.

OFAC issued a list of "Specially Designated Terrorists Who Threaten To Disrupt the Middle East Peace Process" blocked by Executive Order 12947, also effective January 24, 1995. 60 Fed. Reg. 5084 (Jan. 25, 1995). Updated lists are published periodically in the Federal Register. As explained in the OFAC Federal Register notice,

> . . . The Order blocks all property subject to U.S. jurisdiction in which there is any interest of 12 terrorist organizations that threaten the Middle East peace process as identified in an Annex to the Order. The Order also blocks the property and interests in property subject to U.S. jurisdiction of persons designated by the Secretary of State, in coordination with the Secretary of Treasury and the Attorney General, who are found (1) to have committed, or to pose a significant risk of committing, acts of violence that have the purpose or effect of disrupting the Middle East peace process, or (2) to assist in, sponsor or provide financial, material, or technological support for, or services in support of, such acts of violence. In addition, the Order blocks all property and interests in property subject to U.S. jurisdiction in which there is any interest of persons determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, in coordination with the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, to be owned or controlled by, or to act for or on behalf of, any other person designated pursuant to the Order (collectively "Specially Designated Terrorists" or "SDTs").

On August 20, 1998, President Clinton issued Executive Order 13099, which amended E.O. 12947 by adding several names, including Usama bin Ladin and al Qaida, to the list of people and organizations targeted by the sanctions. 63 Fed. Reg. 45,167 (Aug. 25, 1998).

d. New multilateral terrorism treaties

(1) Convention on the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Detection

On June 29, 1993, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Convention on the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Detection, with technical annex, done at Montreal on March 1, 1991, to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–8 (1993). The Senate gave its advice and consent on November 20, 1993. 139 CONG. REC. S16,857 (daily ed. Nov. 21, 1993). Implementing legislation was enacted on April 24, 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–132, §§ 601–607 (1996), 18 U.S.C. § 841 note. The convention entered into force for the United States on April 24, 1997.

The letter from the President transmitting the treaty to the Senate and excerpts from the accompanying report of the Department of State are set forth below.

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Convention on the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Detection with Technical Annex, done at Montreal on March 1, 1991. The report of the Department of State is also enclosed for the information of the Senate.

The terrorist bombing of Pan Am 103 in December 1988 with the resultant deaths of 270 (including 189 Americans), and the terrorist bombing of UTA flight 772 in September 1989 with the resultant deaths of 171 (including 7 Americans), dramatically demonstrate the threat posed by virtually undetectable plastic explosives in the hands of those nations and groups that engage in terrorist savagery.

This Convention is aimed at precluding such incidents from recurring, as well as others where plastic explosives are utilized, by requiring States that produce plastic explosives to mark them at the time of manufacture with a substance to enhance their detectability by commercially available mechanical or canine detectors. States are also required to ensure that controls are implemented over the sale, use, and disposition of marked and unmarked plastic explosives.

Work on the Convention began in January 1990 under the auspices of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) on the basis of an initial draft prepared by a special subcommittee of the ICAO Legal Committee. That work was completed, and the Convention was adopted by consensus, at an international conference in Montreal in March 1991. The United States and 50 other States signed the Convention. Early ratification by the United States should encourage other nations to become party to the Convention.

I recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to the Convention and give its advice and consent to ratification, subject to the declaration described in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State.

LETTER OF SUBMITTAL

* * * *

The United States was in the forefront of those supporting a multilateral agreement to ensure the detectability of plastic explosives and against the diversion of plastic explosives into the hands of terrorists. The United States approached the negotiations with certain considerations in mind, among them that in order to achieve its intended result any such agreement would have to be accepted by as many States as possible, provide for as universal form and as simple a detection regime as possible, take into account the special circumstances and needs of military and police forces, and impose no dangers or burdens, technical or economic, on the explosives manufacturing industry.

The resulting Convention fully meets all U.S. objectives. It provides for an effective control regime that can be relatively cheaply implemented by all countries, and that will not impede the use, production or development of plastic explosives in their numerous legitimate military, police and industrial applications.

U.S. concerns in this respect were that the marking agent to be introduced into plastic explosives in the course of their manufacture would pose no health or other risks to workers, would not appreciably affect the costs of manufacture, would not affect the explosive characteristics of the material into which it is introduced, and would in fact be detectable by existing mechanical and canine means. Since the Convention was signed in March 1991, the Department of Defense has conducted an extensive testing program to determine whether these standards would be met by one of the marking agents identified in the Technical Annex to the Convention. That program has now been completed, and the agent selected (2,3 dimethyl-2,3 dinitrobutane, or DMNB) has satisfied all relevant criteria.

During the course of the negotiations the question arose whether actions or omissions in violation of the Convention ought to be criminalized in the international sense, that is, whether States should agree as a matter of international law to establish criminal jurisdiction over such offenses and agree, if they did not prosecute an offender found within their territory, to extradite such person. The United States opposed the concept on the grounds that such offenses (e.g. the possession of unmarked explosives) were not inherently sufficiently heinous as to merit being made international crimes, that acts of violence against civil aircraft and other terrorist acts involving such explosives could, as crimes, be adequately dealt with under existing international instruments, that making such behavior an international crime would impede early and widespread acceptance of the Convention by States, and that such matters were more appropriately left to national law. The United States view was widely shared by delegations and ultimately prevailed, so that the Convention contains no international criminal provisions.

THE CONVENTION

The major features of the Convention may be summarized as follows:

(1) Structure: The Convention consists of two parts: the Convention itself, and a Technical Annex which is an integral part of the Convention.
(2) Scope: The Convention applies with respect to the manufacture, possession, use and importation and exportation of so-called plastic explosives, including explosives in flexible or sheet form, as more particularly described in Part 1 of the Technical Annex. Excluded are explosives manufactured or held in limited quantities solely for use in duly authorized research, development, testing, training or forensic science purposes. Also excluded are explosives which are destined to be incorporated, and are incorporated, as an integral part of duly authorized military devices in the territory of a producer State within three years of entry into force of the Convention for that State. An "unmarked" plastic explosive is one that has not had introduced into it one of the detection agents described in Part 2 of the Technical Annex.
(3) Marking and Control of Plastic Explosives: Parties are subject to a cluster of obligations designed to ensure effective control over unmarked plastic explosives in their respective territories. Thus, each State party must, among other things:

> —take necessary and effective measures to prohibit and prevent the manufacture of unmarked plastic explosives;
> —take necessary and effective measures to prevent the movement of unmarked plastic explosives into or out of its territory, except for movements for police or military purposes not inconsistent with the purpose of the Convention and under State control (e.g., military sales and assistance programs, joint cross-border military exercises, and the like);

—take necessary measures to exercise strict and effective control over possession and transfer of unmarked explosives made in or imported into that State prior to the entry into force of the Convention for that State;
—take necessary measures to ensure that all stocks of such unmarked explosives not held by the State's military or police authorities are destroyed or consumed, marked or rendered permanently ineffective, within three years of the entry into force of the Convention for that State;
—take necessary measures to ensure that unmarked plastic explosives held by the State's military or police authorities, other than those incorporated as an integral part of a military device, are destroyed or consumed, marked or rendered permanently ineffective, within fifteen years of the entry into force of the Convention for that State;
—take necessary measures to ensure the destruction, as soon as possible, of any unmarked explosives manufactured after the date of entry into force of the Convention for that State, other than those intended for incorporation, and in fact incorporated, as an integral part of a military device within three years of entry into force of the Convention for that State and those limited quantities which may be required solely for research, testing, training and forensic science purposes.

(2) International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings

On September 8, 1999, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–6 (1999); see also 37 I.L.M. 249 (1998). Following enactment of implementing legislation (18 U.S.C. § 2332f), the Senate provided its advice and consent on December 5, 2001, 147 CONG. REC. S12,462–63 (daily ed. Dec. 5, 2001), and it entered into force for the United States July 26, 2002. See Digest 2001 at 100–04, 106–09.

The President's letter transmitting the treaty to the Senate, and excerpts from the accompanying report of the Department of State submitting the treaty to the President, are set forth below.

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on December 15, 1997, and signed on behalf of the United States of America on January 12, 1998. The report of the Department of State with respect to the Convention is also transmitted for the information of the Senate.

In recent years, we have witnessed an unprecedented and intolerable increase in acts of terrorism involving bombings in public places in various parts of the world. The United States initiated the negotiation of this convention in the aftermath of the June 1996 bombing attack on U.S. military personnel in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia, in which 17 U.S. Air Force personnel were killed as the result of a truck bombing. That attack followed other terrorist attacks including poison gas attacks in Tokyo's subways; bombing attacks by HAMAS in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem; and a bombing attack by the IRA in Manchester, England. Last year's terrorist attacks upon United States embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam are recent examples of such bombings, and no country or region is exempt from the human tragedy and immense costs that result from such criminal acts. Although the penal codes of most states contain provisions proscribing these kinds of attacks, this Convention provides, for the first time, an international framework for cooperation among states directed toward prevention of such incidents and ensuing punishment of offenders, wherever found.

In essence, the Convention imposes binding legal obligations upon States Parties either to submit for prosecution or to extradite any person within their jurisdiction who commits an offense as defined in Article 2, attempts to commit such an act, participates as an accomplice, organizes or directs others to commit such an offense, or in any other way contributes to the commission of an offense by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. A State Party is subject to these obligations without regard to the place where the alleged act covered by Article 2 took place.

Article 2 of the Convention declares that any person commits any offense within the meaning of the Convention if that person unlawfully and intentionally delivers, places, discharges or detonates an explosive or other lethal device in, into or against a place of public use, a state or government facility, a public transportation system, or an infrastructure facility, with the intent (a) to cause death or serious bodily injury or (b) cause extensive destruction of such a place, facility or system, where such destruction results in or is likely to result in major economic loss. States Parties to the Convention will also be obligated to provide one another legal assistance in investigations or criminal or extradition proceedings brought in respect of the offenses set forth in Article 2.

The recommended legislation necessary to implement the Convention will be submitted to the Congress separately.

This Convention is a vitally important new element in the campaign against the scourge of international terrorism. I hope that all states will become Parties to this Convention, and that it will be applied universally. I recommend, therefore, that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to this Convention, subject to the understandings and reservation that are described in the accompanying State Department report.

WILLIAM J. CLINTON.

* * * *

Article 1 defines the four categories of locations mentioned in Article 2 where an attack gives rise to offenses under the Convention, i.e., a "place of public use," a "State or government facility," a "public transportation system," and an "infrastructure facility." These categories of locations were chosen during the negotiations and defined with a view toward criminalizing attacks in locations where attacks would be of greatest concern to the general public. In addition, Paragraph 3 of Article 1 defines "explosive or other lethal device" as including not only conventional explosive or other incendiary devices, but also toxic chemicals, biological agents or toxins or similar substances, and radiation or radioactive material. Thus, the Convention addresses not only bombings using conventional explosives such as those used in the 1996 bombing attack on U.S. servicemen in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia, and the 1998 bombings on United States embassies in East Africa, but also attacks using materials such as those employed in the 1995 attacks on the Tokyo subway system.

* * * *

In a provision of crucial importance for the Convention, Paragraph 1 of Article 8 declares that a State Party which does not extradite an alleged offender in its territory shall "without exception whatsoever and whether or not the offense was committed on its territory" submit the case to its competent authorities for purposes of prosecution, through proceedings in accordance with the laws of that State. Those authorities are obligated to take their decision in the same manner as in the case of any other offense of a grave nature under the law of that State.

In an innovation over the prior counterterrorism conventions, the Convention includes a provision proposed by the United States in Paragraph 2 of Article 8, to the effect that the obligation in Paragraph 1 to extradite or submit for prosecution can be discharged by the temporary transfer of nationals for trial by those States Parties that could not otherwise extradite their nationals, provided both the Requesting and Requested States agree. . . .

* * * *

Article 19, Paragraph 1, provides that nothing in the Convention affects other rights, obligations and responsibilities of States and individuals under international law. Paragraph 2 of Article 19 contains two important exceptions from the scope of the Convention relating to activities of armed forces and military forces of a State.

Under the first exception, the Convention does not apply to the activities of "armed forces during an armed conflict," where such activities are governed by international humanitarian law. This exception is meant to exclude from the Convention's scope the activities of armed forces (which would include both armed forces of States and subnational armed forces), so long as those activities are in the course of an "armed conflict" and are governed by the law of war. Given that suspected offenders may claim the benefit of this "armed conflict" exception to avoid extradition or prosecution under the Convention, it would be useful for the United States to articulate an Understanding regarding the scope of this exception. In this respect, an appropriate source of authority would be the widely accepted provision in Paragraph 2 of Article 1 of Protocol II Additional to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, concluded at Geneva on June 10, 1977, which President Reagan transmitted to the Senate on January 29, 1987, for advice and consent to ratification. Specifically, Protocol II states that "armed conflict" does not include "internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence and other acts of a similar nature." Through an understanding, the United States would make clear that isolated acts of violence that include the elements of the offenses of Article 2 would be encompassed in the scope of the Convention. As a separate matter, the term "international humanitarian law" is not used by United States armed forces and could be subject to varied interpretations. It would therefore be useful for the United States to articulate in the same understanding that for purposes of this Convention this phrase has the same substantive meaning as the law of war. I therefore recommend that the following understanding to Article 19 be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> The United States of America understands that the term "armed conflict" in Article 19 does not include internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence and other acts of a similar nature and that the term "international humanitarian law" has the same substantive meaning as the law of war.

The second exception in Article 19(2) exempts from the Convention's scope of application activities undertaken by military forces of a State in the exercise of their official duties. The official activities of State military forces are already comprehensively governed by other bodies of international law, such as the international instruments relating to the law of war and the international law of state responsibility. This comprehensive exclusion of official activities of State military forces from the Convention's scope was an important U.S. objective in the drafting of this Convention. While such an exclusion might be thought to be implicit in the context of the Convention, the Convention's negotiators thought it best to articulate the exclusion in light of the relatively broad nature of the conduct described in Article 2 and the fact that this conduct overlaps with common and accepted activities of State military forces. Because of the importance of this provision, I recommend that the following understanding to Article 19 be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> The United States of America understands that, pursuant to Article 19, the Convention does not apply in any respect to the activities undertaken by military forces of States in the exercise of their official duties.

The conduct of certain civilians who act in support of official activities of State military forces are also exempted from the Convention's scope of application. . . . In addition, because the Convention does not reach the official activities of State military forces, it similarly does not reach persons, including non-military policy-making officials of States, who might direct or organize the activities of State military forces or who might otherwise have been subject to the ancillary offenses in Article 2 if State military forces had not been excluded from the Convention's scope of application.

The Convention also provides in Article 20(1) that disputes between two or more States Parties concerning the interpretation or application of this Convention may be submitted to ad hoc arbitration, or, failing agreement on the organization of such arbitration, to the International Court of Justice. . . . I recommend that the following reservation to Article 20(1) be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> Pursuant to Article 20(2) of the Convention, the United States of America declares that it does not consider itself bound by Article 20(1), but reserves the right specifically to agree to follow this or any other procedure for arbitration in a particular case.

This reservation would allow the United States to agree to an adjudication by a chamber of the Court in a particular case, if that were deemed desirable.

e. Proposed international conference to define terrorism

On December 4, 1989, the UN General Assembly requested the Secretary General to seek members' views on international terrorism, including the possibility of convening an international conference to define terrorism under UN auspices. G.A. Res. 29, U.N. GAOR, 44th Sess., U.N. Doc. A/RES/44/29 (1989). In response to a December 14, 1990, letter from the Secretary General requesting the views of member states by April 15, 1991, the U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations submitted the views of the United States that the conference would not be useful as proposed, excerpted below.

The full text of the U.S. submission is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The United States believes that a conference to define terrorism and distinguish it from national liberation movements would not be useful. It would address a question on which there is little possibility of achieving consensus. Beginning with the 1937 League of Nations Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Terrorism, the International Community has repeatedly failed in its efforts to reach consensus on a generic definition of terrorism. Convening a conference to revisit this question once again would likely result in a nonproductive debate and would divert the UN's attention and resources from efforts to develop effective, concrete measures against terrorism.

In response to the difficulty in reaching consensus on a generic definition of terrorism, the international community has instead concluded a series of individual conventions that identify specific categories of acts which the entire international community condemn, regardless of the motives of the perpetrators and which require states parties to criminalize the specified conduct, prosecute or extradite the transgressors, and cooperate with other states for the effective implementation of these duties. As listed in Resolution 44/29, these Conventions cover aircraft sabotage, aircraft hijacking, attacks against officials and diplomats, hostage-taking, theft or unlawful use of nuclear material, violence at airports, and certain attacks on or against ships and fixed platforms. By focusing upon specific types of actions which are inherently unacceptable, rather than on questions of motivation or context, this approach has enabled the international community to make substantial progress in the effort to use legal tools to combat terrorism. The United States is concerned that an international conference to define terrorism and to differentiate it from the struggles of national liberation movements might send an ambiguous signal which would undercut the international community's consensus that the acts proscribed by the international anti-terrorism conventions are unacceptable whatever the rationale or context.

Rather than reviving a nonproductive debate over a generic definition of terrorism, the United States believes the UN should concentrate on the practical implementation of Resolution 44/29, which unequivocally condemned as criminal and not justifiable all acts, methods and practices of terrorism wherever and by whomever committed; called for the immediate and safe release of all hostages and for all states to use their political influence to accomplish that end; called on all states to fulfill their obligations under international law by refraining from organizing, instigating, assisting, participating in, encouraging, or acquiescing in terrorist activities or preparation; urged all states to adhere to their obligations under existing international anti-terrorism conventions to prosecute or extradite offenders and to cooperate in the apprehension and prosecution of offenders; and appealed to all states that have not yet done so to become party to the existing international anti-terrorism conventions.

In this regard, the United States notes that while nearly every UN member state is party to the Aircraft Sabotage Convention, the Aircraft Hijacking Convention, and the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, less than half of the UN member states have become party to the Hostage-taking Convention, less than a third have ratified the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Materials, and only a handful of countries have ratified the IMO Maritime Terrorism Convention and the ICAO Airport Security Protocol. The United States firmly believes that in order that these anti-terrorism conventions be made more effective, parties to these conventions should take all appropriate steps to encourage non-parties to accede to them, and parties should use their political influence to encourage other parties to abide by their obligations under these conventions.

In sum, the United States believes UN member states need to make these practical measures their priority rather than to pursue the convening of a conference which is more likely to undermine than strengthen the international consensus with regard to terrorism. . . .

f. Hijacking and hostage-taking

During the 1990s U.S. courts addressed jurisdictional questions raised in prosecutions of individuals charged under the Anti-Hijacking Act, Pub. L. No. 103–272 (1994), 198 Stat. 1240, 49 U.S.C. §§ 46501–02 and the U.S. Hostage Taking Act, Pub. L. No. 98–473 (1984), 98 Stat. 2186, 18 U.S.C. § 1203. These statutes implemented U.S. obligations under the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft of 1970 ("Hague Convention"), 22 U.S.T. 1643, 860 U.N.T.S. 105, and the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages of 1979, TIAS 11081, 1316 U.N.T.S. 205, respectively. Several key opinions are discussed below.

(1) United States v. Yunis

In United States v. Yunis, 924 F. 2d 1086 (D.C. Cir. 1991), the United States prosecuted five defendants who hijacked a Jordanian airliner in Beirut and attempted to fly it to Tunis to meet with a conference of the Arab League in 1985. At trial, the defendants were convicted of aircraft piracy, hostage-taking, and a conspiracy to commit same.

An American investigation identified Yunis as the probable leader of the hijackers. As the circuit court explained, "[u]ndercover FBI agents lured Yunis onto a yacht in the eastern Mediterranean Sea with promises of a drug deal, and arrested him once the vessel entered international waters." After his arrival in the United States, at which time he was arraigned on an original indictment charging him with conspiracy, hostage-taking, and aircraft damage, a grand jury added a charge of air piracy in a superseding indictment. Yunis moved to dismiss for lack of subject matter and personal jurisdiction. The U.S. Circuit Court for the District of Columbia affirmed the opinion of the district court rejecting defendant's arguments, as excerpted below.

A. Jurisdictional Claims

Yunis appeals first of all from the district court's denial of his motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter and personal jurisdiction. See United States v. Yunis, 681 F. Supp. 896 (D.D.C. 1988). Appellant's principal claim is that, as a matter of domestic law, the federal hostage taking and air piracy statutes do not authorize assertion of federal jurisdiction over him. Yunis also suggests that a contrary construction of these statutes would conflict with established principles of international law, and so should be avoided by this court. Finally, appellant claims that the district court lacked personal jurisdiction because he was seized in violation of American law.

1. Hostage Taking Act

Yunis claims that this statute cannot apply to an individual who is brought to the United States by force, since those convicted under it must be "found in the United States." But this ignores the law's plain language. . . . Since two of the passengers on Flight 402 were U.S. citizens, section 1203(b)(1)(A), authorizing assertion of U.S. jurisdiction where "the offender or the person seized or detained is a national of the United States," is satisfied. . . .

Appellant's argument that we should read the Hostage Taking Act differently to avoid tension with international law falls flat. Yunis points to no treaty obligations of the United States that give us pause. Indeed, Congress intended through the Hostage Taking Act to execute the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, which authorizes any signatory state to exercise jurisdiction over persons who take its nationals hostage "if that State considers it appropriate." International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, opened for signature Dec. 18, 1979, art. 5, para. 1, 34 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 39), 18 I.L.M. 1456, 1458. See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 1159, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 418 (1984), reprinted in 1984 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 3710, 3714.

Nor is jurisdiction precluded by norms of customary international law. The district court concluded that two jurisdictional theories of international law, the "universal principle" and the "passive personal principle," supported assertion of U.S. jurisdiction to prosecute Yunis on hijacking and hostage-taking charges. See Yunis, 681 F. Supp. at 899–903. Under the universal principle, states may prescribe and prosecute "certain offenses recognized by the community of nations as of universal concern, such as piracy, slave trade, attacks on or hijacking of aircraft, genocide, war crimes, and perhaps certain acts of terrorism," even absent any special connection between the state and the offense. See Restatement (THIRD) OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS LAW OF THE UNITED STATES §§ 404, 423 (1987) [hereinafter Restatement]. Under the passive personal principle, a state may punish non-nationals for crimes committed against its nationals outside of its territory, at least where the state has a particularly strong interest in the crime. See id. at § 402 comment g; United States v. Benitez, 741 F.2d 1312, 1316 (11th Cir. 1984) (passive personal principle invoked to approve prosecution of Colombian citizen convicted of shooting U.S. drug agents in Colombia), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1137, 105 S. Ct. 2679, 86 L. Ed. 2d 698 (1985).

* * * *

[T]he statute in question reflects an unmistakable congressional intent, consistent with treaty obligations of the United States, to authorize prosecution of those who take Americans hostage abroad no matter where the offense occurs or where the offender is found. Our inquiry can go no further.

2. Antihijacking Act

. . . The Antihijacking Act of 1974 was enacted to fulfill this nation's responsibilities under the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft (the "Hague Convention"), which requires signatory nations to extradite or punish hijackers "present in" their territory. Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft. . . . This suggests that Congress intended the statutory term "found in the United States" to parallel the Hague Convention's "present in [a contracting state's] territory," a phrase which does not indicate the voluntariness limitation urged by Yunis. . . .

The district court correctly found that international law does not restrict this statutory jurisdiction to try Yunis on charges of air piracy. See Yunis, 681 F. Supp. at 899–903. Aircraft hijacking may well be one of the few crimes so clearly condemned under the law of nations that states may assert universal jurisdiction to bring offenders to justice, even when the state has no territorial connection to the hijacking and its citizens are not involved. . . . But in any event we are satisfied that the Antihijacking Act authorizes assertion of federal jurisdiction to try Yunis regardless of hijacking's status vel non as a universal crime. Thus, we affirm the district court on this issue.

3. Legality of Seizure

Yunis further argues that even if the district court had jurisdiction to try him, it should have declined to exercise that jurisdiction in light of the government's allegedly outrageous conduct in bringing him to the United States. This claim was rejected by the district court before trial. See United States v. Yunis, 681 F. Supp. 909, 918–21 (D.D.C. 1988), rev'd. on other grounds, 859 F.2d 953 (Yunis I).

Principally, Yunis relies on United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974), in which the court held that due process requires courts to divest themselves of personal jurisdiction acquired through "the government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights." Id. at 275. Toscanino establishes, at best, only a very limited exception to the general rule (known as the "Ker-Frisbie doctrine") that "the power of a court to try a person for crime is not impaired by the fact that he had been brought within the court's jurisdiction by reason of a 'forcible abduction.'" Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519, 522, 96 L. Ed. 541, 72 S. Ct. 509 (1952) (citing, inter alia, Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 7 S. Ct. 225, 30 L. Ed. 421 (1886)). Toscanino's rule has, moreover, been limited to cases of "torture, brutality, and similar outrageous conduct," United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 510 F.2d 62, 65 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 1001, 95 S. Ct. 2400, 44 L. Ed. 2d 668 (1975), and the Supreme Court has since reaffirmed the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, see Immigration and Naturalization Serv. v. Lopez-Mendoza, 468 U.S. 1032, 1039, 82 L. Ed. 2d 778, 104 S. Ct. 3479 (1984); United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. 463, 474, 63 L. Ed. 2d 537, 100 S. Ct. 1244 (1980).

Even assuming, arguendo, that a district court could correctly dismiss a case otherwise properly before it for the reasons given in Toscanino, we find no merit in Yunis' claim. In Yunis I, we reviewed the facts . . . in some detail, including the deception used to arrest Yunis, his injuries and hardships while in custody, and the delay between his arrest and arraignment in the United States. . . . [W]e concluded that while the government's conduct was neither "picture perfect" nor "a model for law enforcement behavior," the "discomfort and surprise" to which appellant was subjected did not render his waiver invalid. Yunis I, 859 F.2d at 969. Similarly, we now find nothing in the record suggesting the sort of intentional, outrageous government conduct necessary to sustain appellant's jurisdictional argument. . . .

(2) United States v. Yousef

In United States v. Yousef, 927 F. Supp. 673 (S.D.N.Y. 1996), the United States prosecuted three defendants under the Anti-Hijacking Act for conspiracy and attempted bombings of U.S. commercial airliners operating in East Asia. Defendant Yousef was also charged in the actual bombing of a Philippines airliner. The defendants moved to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, and also claimed that the charges required the prosecution to name a specific victim or target, actual or intended. The three defendants made different arguments, but "in substance each . . . challenge[d] the assertion of extraterritorial jurisdiction by United States courts where the offenses charged did not occur on United States soil, did not involve United States citizens as defendants, or did not result in the death or injury of a United States citizen." The district court rejected these arguments, finding that it not only had the authority to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction in this case, but, "under treaty obligations of the United States, it is required to do so." The court held that the "exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction in this case is reasonable, since the crimes charged have a 'substantial, direct, and foreseeable effect' in the United States and clearly affect United States interests, as would be required by principles of international law." The court also ruled that extraterritorial jurisdiction was appropriate for a conspiracy charge where it was appropriate for the underlying crime.

Finally, the court rejected claims by Yousef concerning his apprehension and presence in the United States. The court found that he had not established a factual basis for his allegations of U.S. involvement in alleged torture suffered while in Pakistan. It also dismissed his argument that he was not properly "found" within the United States as that term is used in the statute because he was extradited to the United States on other charges, citing the district court decision in Yunis, supra.

(3) United States v. Rezaq

In United States v. Rezaq, 134 F.3d 1121 (D.C. Cir. 1998), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 834 (1998), Rezaq, a Palestinian, was accused of hijacking an Egyptian plane and fatally shooting two passengers before being apprehended. He served seven years' imprisonment in Malta for murder, attempted murder, and hostage-taking. On his release, he was arrested by U.S. authorities, tried, and convicted of aircraft piracy under the Anti-Hijacking Act. Rezaq appealed his conviction on several grounds, including that the Hague Convention barred sequential prosecutions for the same offense. The D.C. Circuit rejected his arguments, ruling that the U.S. Constitution's double-jeopardy clause did not apply to prosecutions by different sovereigns, and that it is not double jeopardy to be tried for aircraft piracy after being convicted of murder and hostage-taking.

As to the Hague Convention, the court rejected Rezaq's argument that his case was subject "to a more exacting standard than the traditional double-jeopardy one." Rezaq argued that the Hague Convention's requirement that states "either extradite or prosecute offenders . . . implies that extradition and prosecution are mutually exclusive options [and thus implies that] the Hague Convention intended to bar all sequential prosecutions, whether they occur after extradition or not." The court concluded that the > injunction to extradite or prosecute is not meant to state mutually exclusive alternatives. The extradite-or-prosecute requirement is intended to ensure that states make some effort to bring hijackers to justice, either through prosecution or extradition. There is no indication that Article 4 is intended to go beyond setting a minimum, and limit the options of states. . . . [To read the provision otherwise] could also undermine the Convention's goal of ensuring "punishment of offenders."

Finally, the court rejected Rezaq's argument, like those of Yunis and Yousef, that he had not been "found in the United States" as required by the statute. The court acknowledged that Yunis had originally been brought to the United States on other charges and indicted for air piracy while awaiting trial on those charges while Rezaq was brought to the United States "for the specific purpose of prosecution on hijacking charges." The court found, however, that this distinction did not alter the conclusions reached in Yunis that because the statute implemented the Hague Convention, "the word 'found' means only that the hijacker must be physically located in the United States, not that he must be first detected here."

g. Terrorism-related determinations

Pursuant to § 40A of the Arms Export Control Act, as amended, 22 U.S.C. § 2781, on May 6, 1999, Acting Secretary of State Strobe Talbott determined and certified that "the following countries are not cooperating fully with United States antiterrorism efforts: Afghanistan; Cuba; Iran; Iraq; Libya; North Korea; Sudan; and Syria." 64 Fed. Reg. 26,474 (May 14,1999).

Section 620A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, Pub.L. No. 90–629, 82 Stat. 1320, 22 U.S.C. § 2371, prohibits most assistance, absent a waiver, to "any country if the Secretary of State determines that the government of that country has repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism." Similarly, section 6j of the Export Administration Act, Pub. L. No. 96–72, 93 Stat. 503, 50 U.S.C. app. § 2405(j), requires a validated license for the export of goods or technology to a country if the Secretary of State has determined

> (A) The government of such country has repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism.
> (B) The export of such goods or technology could make a significant contribution to the military potential of such country, including its military logistics capability, or could enhance the ability of such country to support acts of international terrorism.

On August 12, 1993, Secretary of State Warren Christopher determined "that Sudan is a country which has repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism. The list of 6(j) countries as of this time therefore includes Cuba, Iran, Iraq, Libya, North Korea, Sudan, and Syria." 58 Fed. Reg. 52,523 (Oct. 4, 1993). The list remained unchanged throughout the 1990s.

2. War Crimes, Crimes Against Humanity and Genocide

a. U.S. War Crimes Act

On August 21, 1996, the United States adopted legislation implementing its obligations under the Geneva Conventions of 1949 to provide criminal penalties for certain war crimes. Pub. L. No. 104–192, § 2(a), 110 Stat. 2104 (1996), technical correction, Pub. L. No. 104–294, § 6–5(p)(1), 110 Stat. 3510 (1996).

As enacted in 1996, the War Crimes Act provided that "whoever, whether inside or outside the United States, commits a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions, in [certain circumstances], shall be fined under this title or imprisoned for life or any term of years, or both, and if death results to the victim, shall also be subject to the penalty of death." The circumstances to which the provision applied were those in which the perpetrator or victim "is a member of the Armed Forces of the United States or a national of the United States." The act defined "grave breach" to mean "conduct defined as a grave breach in any of the international conventions relating to the laws of warfare signed at Geneva 12 August 1949 or any protocol to any such convention, to which the United States is a party." At the time of enactment two protocols had been drafted—Protocol I (Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts) and Protocol II (Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts.) Neither has been ratified by the United States.

The reference to the perpetrator of the crime as a national of the United States was adopted at the request of the executive branch. A letter from the Department of Defense explained that this "jurisdictional change would hopefully never be required to be used. However, were a U.S. service member the perpetrator of a war crime, such general federal jurisdiction would be necessary to ensure that a former service member could be prosecuted. See Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11 (1955) (no UCMJ jurisdiction over former member of a military service). . . ." See H.Rep. 104–698 (1996) at 13.

The executive branch had also urged that the act be expanded in two key respects not adopted in 1996. First, it urged that the act should provide jurisdiction if the perpetrator were later found in the United States, even where the crime in question had been committed abroad and neither the perpetrator nor the victim were U.S. nationals. See H.Rep. 104–698 at 14–15. In testimony before the Subcommittee on Immigration and Claims, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, June 12, 1996, Principal Deputy Legal Adviser Michael J. Matheson explained that this change would ensure the ability of the United States to fulfill its treaty obligations. He also noted that "[t]his follows a pattern adopted in the U.S. Criminal Code for offenses implicating other international obligations, such as piracy, attacks on internationally-protected persons, and attacks against international civil aviation." War Crimes Act of 1995: Hearing on H.R. 2587 Before the House Subcommittee on Immigration and Claims, Committee on the Judiciary,104th Cong. (1996). The proposal was not enacted.

Second, the executive branch urged a wider reach of the statute to include war crimes other than those meeting the definition of "grave breaches." See H.Rep. 104–698 at 14–15. This proposal was adopted in an amendment in 1997. Pub. L. No. 105–118, 111 Stat. 2436 Title V, § 583 (1997). As amended, 18 U.S.C. § 2441, provided penalties for "war crimes," and defined that term to include conduct:

> (1) defined as a grave breach in any of the international conventions signed at Geneva 12 August 1949, or any protocol to such convention to which the United States is a party;

(2) prohibited by Article 23, 25, 27, or 28 of the Annex to the Hague Convention IV, Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, signed 18 October 1907;
(3) which constitutes a violation of common Article 3 of the international conventions signed at Geneva, 12 August 1949, or any protocol to such convention to which the United States is a party and which deals with non-international armed conflict; or
(4) of a person who, in relation to an armed conflict and contrary to the provisions of the Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby-Traps and Other Devices as amended at Geneva on 3 May 1996 (Protocol II as amended on 3 May 1996), when the United States is a party to such Protocol, willfully kills or causes serious injury to civilians.

No hearings were held in connection with the 1997 amendment; however, excerpts from Mr. Matheson's 1996 testimony on this issue were included in the 1997 House report, H.R. Rep. 105–204 at 3 (1997). Excerpts below from Mr. Matheson's 1996 prepared statement address the need for the legislation, including the executive branch proposals both for the broader range of war crimes adopted in 1997 and for expanded jurisdiction. The full text is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

The United States has played a leading role in international efforts to bring to justice those who have committed war crimes and other violations of international humanitarian law. In his remarks on October 15, 1995, commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Nuremberg Tribunals, President Clinton declared: "We have an obligation to carry forward the lessons of Nuremberg." The President stressed the need to "put into practice the principle that those who violated universal human rights must be called to account for those actions." This is one of the reasons why the United States has so strongly supported the establishment and the work of the United Nations War Crimes Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda. As President Clinton said with regard to persons indicted by those Tribunals:

Those accused of war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide must be brought to justice. They must be tried and, if found guilty, they must be held accountable.

The Congress acted in support of this objective earlier this year by its adoption of Section 1342 of the National Defense Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 1996, which authorized the surrender to the War Crimes Tribunals of persons found in the United States who had been indicted or convicted for offenses within the jurisdiction of those Tribunals.

Although the United States led the effort to create the War Crimes Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, we do not believe that the prosecution of war crimes can be left to international tribunals alone. The mandate of these tribunals is limited to particular conflicts, and as a practical matter these tribunals will not have the ability to deal with most offenders even in those cases. More fundamentally, international law imposes an obligation on individual states to take various measures to prevent and punish the commission of war crimes.

Making such acts criminal under domestic law is essential to deterring them. When such acts do occur, prosecuting those who commit them is essential in helping to prevent their recurrence. If we are to ensure that those who commit war crimes are brought to justice, we must rely first and foremost on the domestic criminal laws and practice of individual states.

Indeed, international law expressly requires states to enact penal legislation, where necessary, to provide for the punishment of those who commit certain war crimes. Parties to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, relating to the laws of warfare ("the 1949 Geneva Conventions") are required to "enact any legislation necessary to provide effective penal sanctions for persons committing, or ordering to be committed, any of the grave breaches" defined in those Conventions. Grave breaches include, among other things, acts such as willful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, and willfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, when committed against sick or wounded combatants, prisoners of war, or civilians.

At the time of the submission of the 1949 Geneva Conventions to the Senate for advice and consent, the Executive Branch advised that implementing legislation was not required, since offenders could be prosecuted under federal and state penal statutes (in the case of crimes within United States jurisdiction) or the Uniform Code of Military Justice (with respect to crimes committed abroad). However, over the years, U.S. courts have handed down a series of decisions which cast doubt on the constitutionality of the exercise by military tribunals of criminal jurisdiction over the acts abroad of various categories of persons who are not in active military service.

It is therefore very useful, in our view, to establish clear jurisdiction in U.S. courts to try any persons for such offenses if they come within U.S. jurisdiction. Furthermore, since 1949 the United States has accepted certain specialized rules of international humanitarian law which may not have an equivalent in existing U.S. criminal statutes.

. . . [T]he Administration supports expanding the types of violations of international humanitarian law to be addressed by H.R. 2587. We suggest that the provision cover not only grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, but a more general category of "war crimes" that would be defined to include certain violations of the laws of war in addition to grave breaches.

Specifically, we believe H.R. 2587 should make it a crime under U.S. law to commit violations of the rules specified in Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II to the 1949 Geneva Conventions that apply during non-international armed conflict, that is, civil wars and other internal conflicts. As the grim experience in Rwanda reminds us, some of the most horrible war crimes occur in internal armed conflicts, as to which the grave breach provisions of the 1949 Geneva Conventions may not be applicable.

For example, Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention prohibits murder, cruel treatment, and torture of persons, such as civilians or captured or wounded combatants, taking no active part in hostilities during a non-international armed conflict. As evidence of the importance of the protections of international law in non-international armed conflicts, the United States has taken the position that the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, which gives the Tribunal jurisdiction over "persons violating the laws or customs of war," includes violations of Common Article 3 and the additional protocols to the Geneva Conventions. We believe that such violations should similarly be treated as war crimes for purposes of U.S. law, and thus should be covered by an expanded H.R. 2587.

Further, H.R. 2587 should be expanded to cover violations of Articles 23, 25, 27, and 28 of the Annex to the Hague Convention IV, Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, of October 18, 1907, applicable to international armed conflict. The 1907 Hague Convention is an important source of international humanitarian law, and it served as an important basis of law for the Nuremberg Tribunal.

Article 23 of the Convention lists a series of acts prohibited in war, including, among other things, using poison weapons, killing individuals who have laid down their arms and surrendered, and employing arms calculated to cause unnecessary suffering. Article 25 prohibits the bombardment of undefended towns, villages, dwellings, or buildings. Article 27 requires forces to take steps to spare, as far as possible, buildings dedicated to religion, art, science, or charitable purposes, historic monuments, hospitals, and places where the sick and wounded are collected, provided they are not being used at the time for military purposes. Article 28 prohibits pillage. Provisions such as these have provided the basis for Article 3 of the Statute of International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, which gives the Tribunal jurisdiction over "persons violating the laws or customs of war."

The Administration believes such violations should also be treated as war crimes in H.R. 2587. Finally, the United States has recently participated in the successful negotiation of an amendment to Protocol II (on land mines) to the Convention on Conventional Weapons, to which the United States is a Party. The amended Protocol, which will soon be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent, will require the imposition of penal sanctions against persons who, in relation to armed conflict and contrary to the provisions of the Protocol, willfully kill or cause serious injury to civilians.*

[Criminalizing such offenses] . . . would ensure, for example, that deliberate, indiscriminate use of anti-personnel mines to harm civilians would constitute an offense under U.S. law. This objective is entirely consistent with Congressional sentiments and Administration policy on ending the humanitarian crisis posed by these weapons.

Expanding U.S. criminal jurisdiction over war crimes will serve not only the purpose of ensuring that the United States is able to comply fully with its obligations under international law, but will also serve as a diplomatic tool in urging other countries to do the same. Currently the U.S. Government's leverage in calling on other governments to enforce the laws of armed conflict is restricted because of the limitations I have noted concerning our own domestic enforcement jurisdiction. H.R. 2587, if amended in the manner we propose, would remedy this defect concerning U.S., enforcement of the laws of armed conflict, particularly with respect to persons who commit such crimes outside the United States but who enter U.S. territory. With this bill, if modified as we suggest, we will set the right example and use it to persuade other governments to abide by and enforce the laws of armed conflict.

b. Overview of global issues

On December 17, 1999, David J. Scheffer, Ambassador-at-Large for War Crimes Issues, addressed the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, Orlando, Florida, on "Milosovic, Pinochet, and Us: Responding to Crimes Against Humanity." Excerpts below from the speech address crimes against humanity in a number of contexts. See C. below for discussion of the International Tribunal for Rwanda and

The first crimes against humanity were prosecuted on an international scale at the Nuremberg trials more than 50 years ago. The Genocide Convention was 50 years old last year, and the Geneva Conventions of 1949 celebrated their 50th anniversary this year. And yet today, on the eve of the new millennium when the technological, economic, and artistic triumph of mankind brings new meaning to civilization, the mega-crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, and significant war crimes still occur. Notwithstanding the end of the Cold War, the last decade has been extraordinary in the wave of atrocities that have engulfed innocent civilian populations. While we must never forget the unparalleled magnitude of the killings during the Holocaust, we must also recognize that on our watch, during our stewardship of civilized society, horrendous mass killings and other serious violations of international humanitarian law are occurring at an astonishing pace across the globe.

* * * *

Today I will share with you some of what we know about events in Chechnya, East Timor, and elsewhere. I will also update you on efforts to bring Milosevic and Pinochet to justice, the recent conclusion of another case from World War II, ongoing efforts to set up a permanent international criminal court to address war crimes, and the atrocities prevention work of the Administration.

Chechnya

The ongoing conflict in Chechnya is very much of concern to all of us who want to see an end to the fighting now going on there. The United States does not question Russia's right to fight terrorism or insurgencies on its soil. However, President Clinton spoke on December 8 and on other occasions of the critical importance of both sides to the conflict respecting the lives and property of civilians. Many other governments in Europe and elsewhere have expressed similar concerns in recent weeks. We have noted that the Russian Government appears to be responding to some of these concerns. Still, current reports from the Grozny theater have not put to rest the serious concerns of the international community about what is happening to civilians in Chechnya.

There have been accusations that Russian forces have intentionally targeted civilians. We call on the Russian Government to conduct a full and impartial investigation of these allegations. We certainly abhor any intentional targeting of civilians. Article 3 of the Fourth Geneva Convention prohibits violence against noncombatants, Article 13 of Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions states that civilians shall not be intentionally attacked, and the OSCE Code of Conduct states that due care must be taken to avoid injury to civilians or their property. Additionally, the customary law of internal armed conflict prohibits the intentional targeting of civilians.

The human cost to date of a military solution in Chechnya has been high, and recent reports of the fighting for the Chechen capital of Grozny and nearby towns have shown that the fighting is fierce. That is why we continue to urge a political solution and why Secretary Albright is meeting with Russian Foreign Minister Ivanov today in Europe.

Nazi War Crimes

The Office of War Crimes Issues facilitates in other countries, where possible, the prosecution of former Nazis accused of serious crimes. Earlier this year, for example, with the assistance of the U.S. Government, the last known surviving concentration camp commander from World War II, Dinko Sakic, was convicted in a court in Zagreb, Croatia. Sakic was given the maximum sentence under Croatian law for war crimes, 20 years in prison. As Sakic is 76, this is effectively a life sentence. His case is currently on appeal to the Croatian Supreme Court.

The Sakic trial is important because it is the first World War II war crimes trial in Eastern Europe. It would not have come about without the work of organizations such as B'nai B'rith and the Simon Wiesenthal Institute. The United States Government and the Government of Israel played an important role in encouraging the governments involved to give this case the highest priority for investigation and prosecution. We provided many documents from the National Archives in Washington to assist the prosecutor's efforts to build a strong case. . . .

* * * *

While the Office of War Crimes Issues pursues justice against individual perpetrators from the Nazi era, the U.S. Government is also closely engaged on the question of monetary compensation for lost assets and slave labor during the Holocaust. This has been a difficult effort, but one on which Treasury Deputy Secretary Stu Eizenstat, formerly an Under Secretary in the State Department, has labored tirelessly for many years. The recent settlement announced in the slave labor cases, and which should be signed today in Berlin, is enormously significant for the victims of Nazi barbarism, and it is precedent-setting.

Pinochet

Let me turn to another part of the world—the pending case against former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet.

As you may recall, Pinochet ruled Chile from the early 1970s to the late 1980s. Pinochet left power in 1990 after losing a 1988 referendum on his continuation in office. He became a Senator-for-Life, which affords him immunity under Chile's 1978 Amnesty law. Since 1978, Chilean courts have limited the application of the 1978 law. A number of Pinochet's subordinates are now facing human rights trials in Chile. There are additional obstacles to prosecution in Chile of Pinochet, including his Senatorial immunity, but human rights groups have commented favorably on progress toward accountability in Chile.

When Pinochet traveled to England in September 1998 to seek medical treatment, a court in Spain sought his extradition. The original basis for the extradition request was a Spanish law asserting universal jurisdiction to try certain kinds of cases, irrespective of where they occurred and without regard to the nationality of the victim. Subsequent decisions by the British courts have limited extraditable charges to torture and conspiracy to torture committed after December 1998. The case has raised a number of important and controversial legal issues because of Pinochet's status as a former head of state and the Spanish court's assertion of jurisdiction over crimes committed in Chile. At present, an October 8 Bow Street Magistrate's ruling that Pinochet is extraditable to Spain is under appeal to Britain's High Court. A decision on that appeal is expected in late March. The U.K. has also responded to a Chilean request that Pinochet be released on humanitarian grounds by offering an independent medical assessment of his condition. That assessment has yet to take place.

The United States has long recognized the importance of accountability and justice, as well as the choices made by countries like Chile to achieve reconciliation in making the transition to democracy. The United States condemned the abuses of the Pinochet Government when it was in power. The extradition of Pinochet to Spain is a matter that we believe can best be solved by the courts of the United Kingdom and by the Governments of Chile, the United Kingdom, and Spain. One thing that the United States Government can do and is doing is to declassify and release all the documents we can, subject to the protection of intelligence sources and methods, regarding political violence and human rights abuses of the Pinochet era. The United States has declassified and released thousands of documents, and thousands more will be released in June.

East Timor

In East Timor civilians paid only a few months ago for their vote to reject autonomy within Indonesia in favor of full independence. The international community was able to use diplomacy to help bring an end to the violence. As widespread violence and intimidation on the part of "pro-autonomy" militias raged, the international community made clear to Jakarta that it was prepared to step in.

If the militias had had their way, the results of the referendum would not have been put into effect and those responsible for atrocities in East Timor would have enjoyed impunity in perpetuity. In the end, the Government of Indonesia, to its credit, ultimately allowed the will of the East Timorese people to prevail. In addition, Jakarta allowed a multinational force to re-establish order in East Timor and handed over power to the United Nations transitional authority.

A number of efforts to piece together what exactly happened in Timor are currently underway. We do know that some 230,000 people were forced to flee their homes, often at gunpoint. As a result of a well-orchestrated, scorched-earth campaign, approximately 80% of the buildings in Dili, the East Timor capital, were burned. We do not yet know how many people were killed or raped in this orgy of violence, but credible reports paint a very grim picture that merits full investigation.

With strong U.S. support, reports of atrocities are being investigated both by a UN-appointed commission and by an Indonesian Commission of Inquiry. We want to see those responsible held accountable. We cannot let go unchallenged the policy —as enunciated last week by the civilian Defense Minister—of exempting Indonesia's top generals from prosecution for murders, torture, rapes, and other atrocities committed by their troops. "We can't go up into the high ranks," Defense Minister Juwono had said, "as they were just carrying out state policy." The implications of this statement are extremely troubling and are in direct contradiction to the law and principles set down more than 50 years ago in Nuremberg. Fortunately, with the weight of public opinion, Indonesian President Abdurraham Wahid reversed the policy, stating that he would allow prosecution of Indonesia's ranking generals if evidence links them to the violence that ravaged East Timor this fall.

Atrocities Prevention

Let me say a word now about prevention of atrocities, a major function of my office. Preventing atrocities and ensuring commitment to humanitarian law requires commitment from many nations. Last year, President Clinton launched an atrocities prevention mechanism that includes the establishment of the Atrocities Prevention Inter-Agency Working Group, which I have the privilege to lead, as a focal point within the U.S. Government for identifying and coordinating policy responses to atrocities. The group focuses on those parts of the world where an outbreak of atrocities is imminent, or where its occurrence requires immediate attention to deter further killing. Recently, we examined both Burundi and Angola as countries where the worst can occur at any moment. We are extremely pleased that Nelson Mandela has just agreed to mediate peace talks between rival groups in Burundi. Ambassador Richard Holbrooke just returned from Angola, where he stressed the need for more preventive actions, including stronger backing for the UN sanctions regime on the rebel group UNITA now so ably coordinated by Canada's permanent representative to the United Nations.

We have also worked with other governments, international organizations, and non-governmental organizations to cooperate on the prevention, amelioration, and prosecution of those responsible for atrocities worldwide. At a conference held at the Holocaust Museum in October, the United States and other participants representing various governmental and non-governmental entities put forth a statement affirming such principles. Some of the key assertions made in this Statement of Principles include:

- The desire to increase respect for and observance of the rights of all persons to live without fear of arbitrary or extrajudicial killing, torture, mutilation, and other serious physical abuse.
- The desire to take all feasible measures to enhance international cooperation and coordinated efforts in the struggle against mass acts of murder, wanton violence, torture, rape as a weapon of war, and other gender-based violence against civilian populations. The deliberate targeting of civilians, especially children, needs special attention.
- The need for intensified efforts to identify patterns of atrocities quickly in order to facilitate prompt responses via the creation of an informal atrocities prevention and response network that will focus on the policy linkages among human rights concerns, atrocities, international law enforcement, and international institutions. Such a network will identify emerging trends and potential responses based on information sharing and will help develop coordinated policy options that will be raised to appropriate governmental and institutional levels.

Diamond Trade

One area that deserves further attention, for example, is how illicit trade fuels conflict. Trade in illicit diamonds, for example, has been known to help finance several conflicts in Africa. All too often, massive civilian carnage has been associated with those conflicts. Consider for a moment the thousands of maimed civilians in Sierra Leone, who have paid for that conflict with their limbs. If we are serious about wanting to prevent atrocities, we need to be willing take on difficult issues such as the linkage between illicit diamond trading and atrocities. We need to consider, specifically, how to devise a new regime to distinguish between diamonds that are "clean" and those that are "bloodied." We are not likely to find any easy answers, but the U.S. Government is committed to working with producing and consuming countries, as well as the diamond industry, toward this end. We owe it to the victims and survivors of bloody conflict to do so.

c. Bosnia

As noted in Chapter 17.A.1., violence in the former Yugoslavia in the 1990s became Europe's bloodiest conflict since World War II. On December 16, 1992, Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger addressed the second meeting of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, in Geneva. The address emphasized the U.S. view that "it is time for the international community to begin identifying individuals who may have to answer for having committed crimes against humanity." In addition to delineating war crimes and crimes against humanity that had been committed, Secretary Eagleburger named individuals who the United States believed were responsible for the commission of the crimes and specified that "[l]eaders such as Slobodan Milosevic, . . .

Radovan Karadzic, . . . and General Ratho Mladic . . . must eventually explain whether and how they sought to ensure, as they must under international law, that their forces complied with international law."

The full text of Secretary Eagleburger's prepared remarks, excerpted below, is available at 3 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 52 at 923 (Dec. 28, 1992), http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

Just under 4 months ago, an important milestone was reached with the convening of the London International Conference on the former Yugoslavia. Commitments were made both by the parties to the Yugoslav conflict and by the international community itself—commitments to ensure unimpeded delivery of humanitarian aid; to lift the barbaric siege of cities; to halt all military flights over Bosnia-Herzegovina; to group all heavy weapons under UN monitoring; to open up and shut down all detention camps; to tighten sanctions against the aggressor; and to prevent the conflict's spread to neighboring regions and countries.

Some of those commitments have been kept, particularly in the area of sanctions monitoring, and in efforts to prevent a further widening of the war. Most importantly, London established a negotiating mechanism centered here in Geneva, which has brought the international community and the various ex-Yugoslav parties together on an ongoing basis, and which, thanks to the efforts of Cyrus Vance and Lord Owen, remains a viable forum for an eventual settlement of the war.

But let us be clear: We find ourselves today in Geneva because most of the commitments made in London have not been kept, and because the situation inside the former Yugoslavia has become increasingly desperate. Thus, we meet to discuss how the international community will respond in order to force compliance with the London agreements, and thereby accelerate an end to the war.

It is clear in reviewing the record since London that the promises broken have been largely Serbian promises broken. It is the Serbs who continue to besiege the cities of Bosnia; Serb heavy weapons which continue to pound the civilian populations in those cities; the Bosnian Serb air forces which continue to fly in defiance of the London agreements; and Serbs who impede the delivery of humanitarian assistance and continue the odious practice of "ethnic cleansing." It is now clear, in short, that Mr. Milosevic and Mr. Karadzic have systematically flouted agreements to which they had solemnly, and yet cynically, given their assent. Today we must, at a minimum, commit ourselves anew to the London agreements by:

— Redoubling our assistance efforts and continuing to press for the opening of routes for aid convoys, so that widespread starvation can be avoided this winter;
— Strengthening our efforts to prevent the war's spillover, particularly in Kosovo, which we will not tolerate; and — Tightening and better enforcing sanctions, the surest means of forcing an early end to the war.

But we must also do more. It is clear that the international community must begin now to think about moving beyond the London agreements and contemplate more aggressive measures. That, for example, is why my government is now recommending that the UN Security Council authorize enforcement of the no-fly zone in Bosnia, and why we are also willing to have the Council re-examine the arms embargo as it applies to the Government of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Finally, my government also believes it is time for the international community to begin identifying individuals who may have to answer for having committed crimes against humanity. We have, on the one hand, a moral and historical obligation not to stand back a second time in this century while a people faces obliteration. But we have also, I believe, a political obligation to the people of Serbia to signal clearly the risk they currently run of sharing the inevitable fate of those who practice ethnic cleansing in their name.

The fact of the matter is that we know that crimes against humanity have occurred, and we know when and where they occurred. We know, moreover, which forces committed those crimes, and under whose command they operated. And we know, finally, who the political leaders are to whom those military commanders were—and still are—responsible.

Let me begin with the crimes themselves, the facts of which are indisputable:

— The siege of Sarajevo, ongoing since April, with scores of innocent civilians killed nearly every day by artillery shelling;
— The continuing blockade of humanitarian assistance, which is producing thousands upon thousands of unseen innocent victims;
— The destruction of Vukovar in the fall of 1991, and the forced expulsion of the majority of its population;
— The terrorizing of Banja Luka's 30,000 Muslims, which has included bombings, beatings, and killings;
— The forcible imprisonment, inhumane mistreatment, and willful killing of civilians at detention camps, including Banja Luka/Manjaca, Brcko/Luka, Krajina/Prnjavor, Omarska, Prijedor/Keraterm, and Trnopolje/Kozarac;
— The August 21 massacre of more than 200 Muslim men and boys by Bosnian Serb police in the Vlasica Mountains near Varjanta;
— The May-June murders of between 2,000 and 3,000 Muslim men, women, and children by Serb irregular forces at a brick factory and a pig farm near Brcko;
— The June mass execution of about 100 Muslim men at Brod; and — The May 18 mass killing of at least 56 Muslim family members by Serb militiamen in Grbavci, near Zvornik.

We know that Bosnian Serbs have not alone been responsible for the massacres and crimes against humanity which have taken place. For example, in late October Croatian fighters killed or wounded up to 300 Muslims in Prozor, and between September 24–26, Muslims from Kamenica killed more than 60 Serb civilians and soldiers.

We can do more than enumerate crimes; we can also identify individuals who committed them. For example:

— Borislay Herak is a Bosnian Serb who has confessed to killing over 230 civilians; and — "Adil and Arif" are two members of a Croatian para-military force which in August attacked a convoy of buses carrying more than 100 Serbian women and children, killing over half of them.

We also know the names of leaders who directly supervised persons accused of war crimes, and who may have ordered those crimes. These include:

— Zeljko Raznjatovic, whose para-military forces, the "tigers," have been linked to brutal ethnic cleansing in Zvornik, Srebrenica, Bratunac, and Grobnica; and who were also linked to the mass murders of up to 3,000 civilians near Brcko;
— Vollslay Seselj, whose "White Eagles" force has been linked to atrocities in a number of Bosnian cities, including the infamous incident at Brcko;
— Drago Prcac, commander of the Omarska Detention Camp, where mass murder and torture occurred; and — Adem Delic, the camp commander at Celebici where at least 15 Serbs were beaten to death in August.

I want to make it clear that, in naming names, I am presenting the views of my government alone. The information I have cited has been provided to the UN War Crimes Commission, whose decision it will be to prosecute or not. Second, I am not prejudging any trial proceedings that may occur; they must be impartial and conducted in accordance with due process. Third, the above listing of names is tentative and will be expanded as we compile further information.

Finally, there is another category of fact which is beyond dispute—namely, the fact of political and command responsibility for the crimes against humanity which I have described. Leaders such as Slobodan Milosevic, the President of Serbia, Radovan Karadzic, the self-declared President of the Serbian Bosnian Republic, and General Ratho Mladic, commander of Bosnian Serb military forces, must eventually explain whether and how they sought to ensure, as they must under international law, that their forces complied with international law. They ought, if charged, to have the opportunity of defending themselves by demonstrating whether and how they took responsible action to prevent and punish the atrocities I have described which were undertaken by their subordinates.

I have taken the step today of identifying individuals suspected of war crimes and crimes against humanity for the same reason that my government has decided to seek UN authorization for enforcing the no-fly zone in Bosnia and why we are now willing to examine the question of lifting the arms embargo as it applies to Bosnia-Herzegovina. It is because we have concluded that the deliberate flaunting of Security Council resolutions and the London agreements by Serb authorities is not only producing an intolerable and deteriorating situation inside the former Yugoslavia, it is also beginning to threaten the framework of stability in the new Europe.

It is clear that the reckless leaders of Serbia, and of the Serbs inside Bosnia, have somehow convinced themselves that the international community will not stand up to them now, and will be forced eventually to recognize the fruits of their aggression and the results of ethnic cleansing. Tragically, it also appears that they have convinced the people of Serbia to follow them to the front lines of what they proclaim to be an historic struggle against Islam on behalf of the Christian West.

It is time to disabuse them of these most dangerous illusions. The solidarity of the civilized and democratic nations of the West lies with the innocent and brutalized Muslim people of Bosnia. Thus, we must make it unmistakably clear that we will settle for nothing less than the restoration of the independent state of Bosnia-Herzegovina with its territory undivided and intact, the return of all refugees to their homes and villages, and, indeed, a day of reckoning for those found guilty of crimes against humanity.

It will undoubtedly take some time before all these goals are realized, but then there is time, too, though not much, for the people of Serbia to step back from the edge of the abyss. There is time, still, to release all prisoners; to lift the siege of cities; to permit humanitarian aid to reach the needy; and to negotiate for peace and for a settlement guaranteeing the rights of all minorities in the independent states of the former Yugoslavia.

But in waiting for the people of Serbia, if not their leaders, to come to their senses, we must make them understand that their country will remain alone, friendless, and condemned to economic ruin and exclusion from the family of civilized nations for as long as they pursue the suicidal dream of a Greater Serbia. They need, especially, to understand that a second Nuremberg awaits the practitioners of ethnic cleansing, and that the judgment, and opprobrium, of history awaits the people in whose name their crimes were committed.

On December 18, 1992, the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution on the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina containing a preambular paragraph referring to "the abhorrent policy of 'ethnic cleansing,' which is a form of genocide." U.N. Doc. A/RES/47/121 (1992). While not necessarily agreeing with the preambular reference at that time, the United States voted in favor of the resolution.

On May 18, 1993, Secretary of State Warren Christopher stated in testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee:

> Some of the acts that have been committed by various parties in Bosnia, principally by the Serbians, could constitute genocide under the 1948 convention if their purpose was to destroy the religious or ethnic group in whole or in part. That seems to me to be a standard that may well have been reached in some of the aspects of Bosnia. Certainly some of the conduct there is tantamount to genocide.

d. Rwanda

In May 1994 officials in the U.S. Department of State concluded that acts of genocide had occurred in Rwanda. In a memorandum to the Secretary of State, dated May 21, 1994, the analysis was set forth as follows. The full text of this previously classified memorandum is available at www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/NSAEBB/NSAEBB53/rw052194.pdf.

DISCUSSION

As defined in the 1948 Genocide Convention, the crime of "genocide" occurs when certain acts are committed against members of a national, ethnic, racial or religious group with the intent of destroying that group in whole or in part. Among the relevant acts are killing, causing serious bodily or mental harm and deliberately inflicting conditions of life calculated to bring about physical destruction of the group. In addition, conspiracy, direct and public incitement and attempts to commit genocide, as well as complicity in genocide, are offenses under the Convention.

. . . [The Office of the Legal Adviser] believes . . . that there is a strong basis to conclude that some of the killings and other listed acts carried out against Tutsis have been committed with the intent of destroying the Tutsi ethnic group in whole or in part. Moreover, there is evidence that some persons in Rwanda have incited genocide or have been complicit in genocide, which would also constitute offenses under the Convention.

A USG statement that acts of genocide have occurred would not have any particular legal consequences. Under the Convention, the prosecution of persons charged with genocide is the responsibility of the competent courts in the state where the acts took place or an international penal tribunal (none has yet been established); the U.S. has no criminal jurisdiction over acts of genocide occurring within Rwanda unless they are committed by U.S. citizens or they fall under another criminal provision of U.S.

law (such as those relating to acts of terrorism for which there is a basis for U.S. jurisdiction).

Although lacking in legal consequences, a clear statement that the USG believes that acts of genocide have occurred could increase pressure for USG activism in response to the crisis in Rwanda. We believe, however, that we should send a clear signal that the United States believes that acts of genocide have occurred in Rwanda. If we do not seize the opportunity presented by fora such as the UNHRC to use the genocide label to condemn events in Rwanda, our credibility will be undermined with human rights groups and the general public, who may question how much evidence we can legitimately require before coming to a policy conclusion.

On February 22, 1995, Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights John Shattuck testified before the House of Representatives Subcommittee on Africa, Committee on International Relations. Excerpts below provide views on the situation in Rwanda and also in Burundi.

. . . The genocidal slaughter in Rwanda is among the greatest human rights catastrophes of our time in both speed and scale. I have traveled twice to Rwanda since the onslaught of the killings in April 1994. I cannot adequately describe some of the things I have seen. From this horror, we are trying to wrest some measure of justice and hope for the future. In particular, we fought hard and successfully for the creation of the UN War Crimes Tribunal for Rwanda. We have contributed personnel and over $1 million in funds to the Tribunal, and were instrumental in helping the UN field human rights monitors in Rwanda, contributing three quarters of a million dollars to this major effort to stabilize the country so that refugees can return, and we are contributing development aid for the rebuilding of the economic and social structures. The establishment of criminal responsibility for genocide is crucial if we are to differentiate victims from aggressors, foster societal reconciliation and overcome the cynical argument that ethnic conflicts cannot be resolved.

The Rwanda genocide was the result of years of mounting interethnic hostility and conflict; it is the cause of the flood of refugees, the depopulation of the country and the continuing instability, which threatens to spread to neighboring countries. In order to address this crisis, all aspects of a human rights response must be present and well integrated.

How is that to be done? First, through the Tribunal. Second, through the deployment of UN monitors whose work and presence will promote stability. Third, we must coordinate the UN peacekeeping operation in Rwanda with humanitarian relief and human rights monitoring and enforcement activities. Fourth, through the UN we must assist the Rwandan government to build national institutions of justice and democracy.

We must also work to prevent a human rights disaster in Burundi akin to that of Rwanda. Here, we are actively supporting efforts to prevent ethnic bloodshed and promote national reconciliation. We will provide $5 million in FY-95 development aid focused on grants to promote dialogue, reconciliation and human rights; we will look to other funds to support the UN's comprehensive plan for human rights advisory services and the OAU monitoring force. We are also pressing for accountability for those responsible for the attempted coup and murder of President Ndayade in October 1993 and the ethnic violence that followed. I have traveled twice to Burundi to investigate and encourage efforts at accountability and reconciliation.

I have discussed Rwanda and Burundi at some length because they are indicative of the new, creative efforts in preventive diplomacy and preemptive conflict resolution that we must develop to manage the post-Cold War human rights challenges that arise along the fault lines within societies and between countries. Many of the old familiar diplomatic and military tools have proven to be of limited utility in addressing these challenges. We are joining our efforts with other governments and nongovernmental organizations to begin to establish mechanisms that will meet these challenges.

e. Iraq

On October 27, 1999, Ambassador Scheffer addressed the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, D.C. on "The Continuing Criminality of Saddam Hussein's Regime." Excerpts below from his prepared text provide an overview of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and possible genocide committed by Saddam Hussein since the 1980s, efforts undertaken to gather evidence, and possible fora for bringing him to justice. On December 13, 2003, U.S. military forces took Saddam Hussein into custody. As this volume was going to press, he was being held by Iraqi officials with the intention of bringing him to trial before the Iraq Special Tribunal on various war crimes and other charges.

Looking back to 1990 and 1991, before the days of the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, it was clear to many international lawyers in those days that Iraqi president Saddam Hussein deserved investigation and prosecution as an international war criminal. His violations of international humanitarian law were considerable even at that time. Yet Saddam Hussein and his colleagues in power—men such as his sons Qusay and Uday, and Ali Hassan al-Majid, the infamous "Chemical Ali"—have not been stigmatized and ostracized by the international community as have been equally infamous men such as Slobodan Milosevic, Radovan Karadzic, Ratko Mladic, Jean Kambanda, and Théoneste Bagasora. Saddam Hussein and his henchmen are still viewed by some governments as legitimate tolerable leaders of a country somehow under siege by the international community. They are viewed as men with whom people want someday to do business, to open up channels of trade, and even to forget and forgive. In reality, these are thugs who terrorize what was once, and could again become, a great nation. The United States Government is determined to see this clique of Iraqi criminals stripped of their power and, if possible, brought to justice. They should benefit from no contracts, no trade, no initiatives that would bestow any legitimacy on their criminal enterprise in Baghdad. They should be isolated, cut off, and brought before the gates of justice. That would be far more generous and humane than what they have offered hundreds of thousands of their victims.

Saddam's Crimes

In Iraq today, atrocities are being carried out by Saddam's army against the inhabitants of the southern marshes with a ferocity that is as widespread, albeit over a longer period of time, as that waged by Milosevic's goons against the Kosovar Albanians. The Iraqi regime's destruction of the environment in the south, making it uninhabitable by the people who live there, is part of that overall campaign. And Saddam's internal war against his political opponents is of a character that begs for description as crimes against humanity. The criminal enterprise is undeniable and glares at anyone who cares to look closely at Iraq today. We intend to keep exposing it for what it is and to work towards the day when the key people in Saddam's regime, who are actually responsible for it, are put behind bars.

I should therefore describe the scope and magnitude of the Iraqi regime's international crimes and who within the leadership clique we think merits investigation.

We have identified nine major criminal episodes under Saddam Hussein's rule in Iraq. Three of the nine episodes continue to this day and, indeed, one of them is accelerating at an alarming rate. These episodes are:

1. In the 1980's, crimes against humanity and possibly genocide in the "Anfal" campaign against the Iraqi Kurds, including the notorious use of poison gas in Halabja in 1988, which killed an estimated 5,000 people in a single attack.
2. In the 1980's, crimes against humanity and war crimes for use of poison gas against Iran, as well as other war crimes against Iran and the Iranian people.
3. In 1990–91, crimes against humanity and war crimes against Kuwait, its people, and its environment during and following the illegal invasion and occupation of that country.
4. 1991, war crimes against Coalition forces during the Gulf War.
5. During the 1990's, possible crimes against humanity and war crimes for illegal human experimentation.
6. Since the 1980's, possible crimes against humanity for killings, ostensibly against political opponents, within Iraq.
7. Since 1991, crimes against humanity and possibly genocide against the Iraqi Kurds in northern Iraq.
8. Since 1991, crimes against humanity and possibly genocide against the peoples of the southern Iraqi marshes.
9. Crimes against humanity and war crimes for possible killings of Iranian prisoners of war.

Like Slobodan Milosevic, Saddam Hussein did not commit these crimes on his own. . . .

The non-governmental group INDICT has come up with a list of 12 people it believes should be indicted by an international war crimes tribunal. In addition to Saddam Hussein, his two sons, and Ali Hassan al-Majid, INDICT's list includes Barzan al-Tikriti, former head of Iraqi Intelligence; Taha Yasin Ramadan, Vice President of Iraq; Watban al-Tikriti, former Minister of the Interior;

Sabawi al-Tikriti, former head of Intelligence and the General Security Organization; Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, vice chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council and former Head of the Revolutionary Court; Muhammad Hamza al-Zubaydi, Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq; Tariq Aziz, Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq; and Aziz Salih Noman, Governor of Kuwait during the Iraqi occupation.

Need for International Investigation and Prosecution

Since some governments are contemplating broader relationships with Baghdad, and since some well-intentioned people seem to believe that our support for sanctions against the Iraqi regime somehow raises questions about our own conduct towards the people of Iraq, we must understand the character and magnitude of Saddam Hussein's criminal enterprise. The Iraqi regime's violations of international humanitarian law have been going on for many years and are, in fact, on-going. This is a man and a regime who have brutally and systematically committed war crimes and crimes against humanity for years, are committing them now and will continue committing them until the international community finally says enough.

I am going to explain in some detail what we are doing to corner Saddam Hussein and his regime within the rule of law. Our primary objective is to see Saddam Hussein and the leadership of the Iraqi regime indicted and prosecuted by an international criminal tribunal. There remains a critical need for such ad hoc international criminal tribunals at the end of the 20th century. The permanent international criminal court envisaged by the Rome Treaty of 1998 will have only prospective jurisdiction when it is established, and that will not happen unless 60 governments ratify the Rome Treaty. Given that four governments have ratified the Rome Treaty to date, one can expect that several years will elapse before such a permanent court can be used, and then only for crimes committed after its establishment. Moreover because of the way the ICC's jurisdiction was set out in article 12 of the Rome statute, Saddam Hussein will be immune from the ICC so long as he only kills Iraqis. That is unacceptable to us, and should be unacceptable to other civilized nations of the world.

For several years, the United States has quietly pursued with member States of the Security Council and with interested governments in the region the goal of an international criminal tribunal that would be established by the UN Security Council. I have personally led this effort since 1997, and I have visited with many governments to seek out their views. We are realistic about where we stand and the prospects for accomplishing our objective. Quiet diplomacy has told us that many governments agree with the principle that something should be done to bring Saddam Hussein and other very high officials to justice. Interestingly, many governments seem to think that the effort will be blocked in the Council by countries willing to defend Saddam Hussein publicly. Given how infamous his crimes have been, this will be an interesting test to see who will defend a regime that has committed both international and internal atrocities that are as horrendous as they are illegal.

. . . [W]e strongly believe even at this stage that the Security Council would be fully justified in establishing an ad hoc international criminal tribunal without the predicate of a Commission of Experts. We say this because a major effort, strongly supported by the U.S Government and other governments and non-governmental organizations, has already been working to gather relevant information about the Iraqi regime so as to be able to make it available to an international prosecutor as soon as one is appointed with jurisdiction over Saddam Hussein and his top assistants.

* * * *

Considerable Evidence of Iraqi War Crimes Exists

For its part, the United States Government will continue to gather and organize a large amount of incriminating information about the Iraqi regime stretching back to the 1980's. The documents we have been working on include:

- First is the archive of 5.5 million pages of captured Iraqi documents taken out of northern Iraq by Human Rights Watch and the U.S. Government. We have transcribed these onto 176 CD-ROM's and I am pleased to announce that the U.S. Government is handing over a set to the Iraq Foundation. These detail in the most minute way the day-to-day nature of the crimes committed by Saddam Hussein's intelligence services against the peoples of northern Iraq.
- Second is an archive of Iraqi documents—over four million pages—captured during the Gulf War in 1991 from Iraqi forces in Kuwait and southern Iraq. These also detail the nature of Iraqi crimes against the Kuwaiti people. I should note in this context the excellent work already done by Kuwaiti prosecutors, the Center for Research and Studies on Kuwait and others there in documenting Saddam Hussein's crimes against the Kuwaiti people.
- Third, the U.S. Government is working to preserve videotapes shot by U.S. cameramen after the Gulf War that have been stored in U.S. Government archives. These will provide important visual evidence of Saddam's crimes in Kuwait, in particular.
- Fourth, the U.S. Government in 1991 and 1992 compiled an archive of classified documents relating to Iraqi war crimes in the Gulf War. While we do not intend to make all of these documents public, we have worked closely with past commissions of experts and tribunals to allow them access to classified material in accordance with U.S. laws that protect sources and methods. We would be willing to do the same for a commission or tribunal looking into the crimes of Saddam Hussein and his henchmen.
- Fifth, the U.S. Government has compiled imagery and other evidence of Saddam's campaign against the people of southern Iraq, particularly the culture of those who live in the southern marshes. Some of this has already been declassified, and I will be showing you some of that in the next few minutes.

Funding and Congressional Support

Seeing Saddam Hussein indicted for his crimes is a goal that the Administration and the Congress all share. In 1997, the House of Representatives voted in favor of such a resolution by a vote of 396–2; in the Senate a similar resolution passed 97–0. Last year Congress expressed its desire to see an international criminal tribunal established to indict Saddam Hussein when it adopted the Iraq Liberation Act.*

3. Narcotrafficking

a. Counternarcotics assistance related to certain aerial interdiction programs

(1) Suspension of certain assistance

The United States has for a number of years provided assistance to foreign countries to support their counternarcotics programs. See 22 U.S.C. § 2291. In Peru and Colombia the assistance included providing flight-tracking information and other forms of technical assistance for the purpose of enabling these countries to locate and intercept aircraft suspected of engaging in illegal drug trafficking. Due to concerns that the two countries were engaging in in-flight destruction of civil aircraft as part of their counternarcotics programs, the Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice, issued an opinion on July 14, 1994, concluding that continued provision of certain assistance to these two countries that could be used in carrying out such "shootdowns" could be found to be a violation of the U.S. Aircraft Sabotage Act. The assistance was suspended.

* Editors' Note: Section 2 of the Iraq Liberation Act, Pub. L. No. 105–338 (1998), set forth findings which, among other things, enumerated crimes committed by Saddam Hussein. In § 6 Congress "urge[d] the President to call upon the United Nations to establish an international criminal tribunal for the purpose of indicting, prosecuting, and imprisoning Saddam Hussein and other Iraqi officials who are responsible for crimes against humanity, genocide, and other criminal violations of international law."

While concluding that the specific statutory provision in question, 18 U.S.C. § 32(b)(2), was applicable to U.S. officials, the opinion also stated that its conclusions "should not be taken to mean that other domestic criminal statutes will necessarily apply to USG personnel acting officially."

The full text of the opinion, excerpted below, is available at www.usdoj.gov/olc/shootdow.htm. Footnotes have been omitted.

[W]e understand that the government of Peru has used weapons against aircraft suspected of transporting drugs and that the government of Colombia announced its intention to destroy in-flight civil aircraft suspected of involvement in drug trafficking. The possibility that these governments might use the information or other assistance furnished by the United States to shoot down civil aircraft raises the question of the extent to which the United States and its governmental personnel may lawfully continue to provide assistance to such programs.

* * * *

I. International law forms an indispensable backdrop for understanding section 32(b)(2). A primary source of international law regarding international civil aviation is the Convention on International Civil Aviation, Dec. 7, 1944, 61 Stat. 1180, T.I.A.S. No. 1591, 15 U.N.T.S. 295 (the Chicago Convention). The Chicago Convention is administered by the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO).

Article 3(d) of the Chicago Convention declares that "[t]he contracting States undertake, when issuing regulations for their state aircraft, that they will have due regard for the safety of navigation of civil aircraft." Parties have interpreted the due regard standard quite strictly, and have argued that this provision proscribes the use of weapons by states against civil aircraft in flight. For example, the United States invoked this provision during the international controversy over the Korean Air Lines Flight 007 (KAL 007) incident. While acknowledging that Article 1 of the Chicago Convention recognized the customary rule that "every State has complete and exclusive sovereignty over the airspace above its territory," the United States argued that the Soviet Union had violated both Article 3(d) and customary international legal norms in shooting down KAL 007. The Administrator of the Federal Aviation Authority stated to the ICAO Council that:

> The ICAO countries have agreed that they will "have due regard for the safety of navigation of civil aircraft" when issuing regulations for their military aircraft. It is self-evident that intercepts of civil aircraft by military aircraft must be governed by this paramount concern.
> The international community has rejected deadly assault on a civil airliner by a military aircraft in time of peace as totally unacceptable. It violates not only the basic principles set forth in the [Chicago] convention but also the fundamental norms of international law. . . .

In the wake of KAL 007, the ICAO Assembly unanimously adopted an amendment to the Chicago Convention to make more explicit the prohibitions of Article 3(d). This amendment, Article 3 bis, reads in part as follows:

> (a) The contracting States recognize that every State must refrain from resorting to the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight and that, in case of interception, the lives of persons on board and the safety of aircraft must not be endangered. This provision shall not be interpreted as modifying in any way the rights and obligations of States set forth in the Charter of the United Nations.

Article 3 bis should be understood to preclude states from shooting down civil aircraft suspected of drug trafficking, and the only recognized exception to this rule is self-defense from attack. We understand that the United States has not yet ratified Article 3 bis. There is, however, support for the view that the principle it announced is declaratory of customary international law.

In addition to the Chicago Convention, the United States has ratified the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation [Sabotage], Sept. 23, 1971, 24 U.S.T. 567, T.I.A.S. 7570 (the Montréal Convention). Article 1 of the latter Convention specifies certain substantive offenses against civil aircraft: in particular, Article 1,1(b) states that "[a]ny person commits an offence if he unlawfully and intentionally . . . destroys an aircraft in service or causes damage to such an aircraft which renders it incapable of flight or which is likely to endanger its safety in flight." Article 1,2 makes it an offense to attempt to commit a previously enumerated offense, or to be an accomplice of an offender. Further, Article 10 requires states "in accordance with international and national law," to "endeavour to take all practicable measures for the purpose of preventing" substantive offenses.

. . . The United States implemented the Convention in 1984 by enacting the Aircraft Sabotage Act, Pub. L. No. 98–473, tit. II, ch. XX, pt. B, §§ 2011–2015, 98 Stat. 1837, 2187 (1984). Congress specifically stated that legislation's purpose was "to implement fully the [Montréal] Convention . . . and to expand the protection accorded to aircraft and related facilities." Id., § 2012(3); see also S. Rep. No. 619, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. (1984), reprinted in 1984 U.S.C.C.A.N. 3682. The criminal prohibition now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 32(b)(2) was enacted as part of that legislation.

II. We turn to the question of criminal liability under domestic law. At least two criminal statutes are relevant to this inquiry. The first is 18 U.S.C. § 32(b)(2), which implements Article 1,1(b) of the Montréal Convention, and prohibits the destruction of civil aircraft. The second is 18 U.S.C. § 2(a), which codifies the principle of aiding and abetting liability.

A. 18 U.S.C. § 32(b)(2) was enacted in 1984, one year after the destruction of KAL 007. The statute makes it a crime "willfully" to "destroy[] a civil aircraft registered in a country other than the United States while such aircraft is in service or cause[] damage to such an aircraft which renders that aircraft incapable of flight or which is likely to endanger that aircraft's safety in flight." The text, structure and legislative history of the statute establish that it applies to the actions of the Peruvian and Columbian officials at issue here.

* * * *

Section 32(b)(2) was intended to apply to governmental actors (here, the military and police forces of Colombia and Peru) as well as to private persons and groups. When Congress adopted section 32(b)(2) in 1984, it had been a crime for nearly thirty years under section 32(a)(1) for anyone willfully to "set[] fire to, damage[], destroy[], disable[], or wreck[] any aircraft in the special aircraft jurisdiction of the United States or any civil aircraft used, operated, or employed in interstate, overseas, or foreign air commerce." 18 U.S.C. § 32(a)(1). This Department has sought, under section 32(a), to prosecute state actors whom it believes to have sponsored terrorist acts (specifically, the bombing of Pan American Flight 103 at the behest of Libya). Because of the obvious linguistic and structural similarities between sections 32(a)(1) and 32(b)(2), we read those sections to have the same coverage in this regard, i.e., to apply to governmental and non-governmental actors alike.

The legislative history of the Aircraft Sabotage Act confirms that Congress intended section 32(b)(2) to reach governmental actions. . . .

Because section 32(b)(2) applies generally to foreign governments, it must apply to shootdowns of foreign-registered civil aircraft by law enforcement officers or military personnel of the governments of Colombia and Peru. The statute contains no exemption for shootdowns in pursuance of foreign law enforcement activity; nor does it exempt shootdowns of aircraft suspected of carrying contraband. USG personnel who aid and abet violations of section 32(b)(2) by the Colombian or Peruvian governments are thus themselves exposed to criminal liability by virtue of 18 U.S.C. § 2(a), see Part II B below.

Our conclusion that section 32(b)(2) applies to governmental action should not be understood to mean that other domestic criminal statutes apply to USG personnel acting officially. Our Office's precedents establish the need for careful examination of each individual statute. For example, we have opined that USG officials acting within the course and scope of their duties were not subject to section 5 of the Neutrality Act, 18 U.S.C. § 960. See Application of Neutrality Act to Official Government Activities, 8 Op. O.L.C. 58 (1984) (Neutrality Act Opinion). . . .

* * * *

III. United States aid to Colombia and Peru might also implicate USG personnel in those governments' shootdown policies on a conspiracy rationale. See 18 U.S.C. § 371. . . .

* * * *

IV. This case is characterized by a combination of factors: it involves a criminal statute that explicitly has extraterritorial reach, that is applicable to foreign government military and police personnel, and that defines a very serious offense. Moreover, our Government is fully engaged in furnishing direct and substantial assistance that is not otherwise available to the foreign nations involved, and at least some of the USG personnel who provide that assistance have actual knowledge that it is likely to be used in committing violations.

Given this combination of factors, we conclude that, in the absence of reliable assurances . . . USG agencies and personnel may not provide information (whether "real-time" or other) or other USG assistance (including training and equipment) to Colombia or Peru in circumstances in which there is a reasonably foreseeable possibility that such information or assistance will be used in shooting down civil aircraft, including aircraft suspected of drug trafficking.

* * * *

V. Our conclusions here must not be exaggerated. We have been asked a specific question about particular forms of USG assistance to the Colombian and Peruvian aerial interdiction programs. The application of the legal standard described here to any other USG programs—including other programs designed to benefit Colombia or Peru—will require careful, fact-sensitive analysis. We see no need to modify USG programs whose connection to those governments' shootdown policies is remote and attenuated, and (as noted above) we perceive no implications for USG assistance to any other foreign country unless another government adopts a policy of shooting down civil aircraft.

Other limitations on our conclusions should be noted. In certain circumstances, USG personnel may employ deadly force against civil aircraft without subjecting themselves to liability under section 32(b)(2). "The act is a criminal statute, and therefore must be construed strictly, 'lest those be brought within its reach who are not clearly included.' " Although these circumstances are extremely limited, they may in fact arise.

Specifically, we believe that the section would not apply to the actions of United States military forces acting on behalf of the United States during a state of hostilities. . . . We do not think that section 32(b)(2) should be construed to have the surprising and almost certainly unintended effect of criminalizing actions by military personnel that are lawful under international law and the laws of armed conflict. . . . Thus, we do not think the statute, as written, should apply to such incidents as the downing on July 3, 1988 of Iran Air Flight 655 by the United States Navy cruiser Vincennes.

Furthermore, even in cases in which the laws of armed conflict are inapplicable, we believe that a USG officer or employee may use deadly force against civil aircraft without violating section 32(b)(2) if he or she reasonably believes that the aircraft poses a threat of serious physical harm to the officer or employee or to another person. A situation of this kind could arise, for example, if an aircraft suspected of narcotics trafficking began firing on, or attempted to ram, a law enforcement aircraft that was tracking it. Assuming that such aggressive actions posed a direct and immediate threat to the lives of USG personnel or of others aboard the tracking aircraft, and that no reasonably safe alternative would dispel that threat, we believe that the use of such force would not constitute a violation of section 32(b)(2).

(2) Legislation

On October 5, 1994, President William J. Clinton signed into law the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal year 1995, which included legislation designed to address the legal issues highlighted in the OLC opinion, discussed above. Pub. L. No. 103–337, div. A, title X, § 1012, 108 Stat. 2663, 2837 (1994). The provision, codified as 22 U.S.C. §§ 2291–94, is set forth below in full.

Official immunity for authorized employees and agents of United States and foreign countries engaged in interdiction of aircraft used in illicit drug trafficking

(a) Employees and agents of foreign countries

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, it shall not be unlawful for authorized employees or agents of a foreign country (including members of the armed forces of that country) to interdict or attempt to interdict an aircraft in that country's territory or airspace if—

(1) that aircraft is reasonably suspected to be primarily engaged in illicit drug trafficking; and
(2) the President of the United States, before the interdiction occurs, has determined with respect to that country that—
    (A) interdiction is necessary because of the extraordinary threat posed by illicit drug trafficking to the national security of that country; and
    (B) the country has appropriate procedures in place to protect against innocent loss of life in the air and on the ground in connection with interdiction, which shall at a minimum include effective means to identify and warn an aircraft before the use of force directed against the aircraft.

(b) Employees and agents of United States

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, it shall not be unlawful for authorized employees or agents of the United States (including members of the Armed Forces of the United States) to provide assistance for the interdiction actions of foreign countries authorized under subsection (a) of this section. The provision of such assistance shall not give rise to any civil action seeking money damages or any other form of relief against the United States or its employees or agents (including members of the Armed Forces of the United States).

(c) Definitions

For purposes of this section:

(1) The terms "interdict" and "interdiction", with respect to an aircraft, mean to damage, render inoperative, or destroy the aircraft.

(2) The term "illicit drug trafficking" means illicit trafficking in narcotic drugs, psychotropic substances, and other controlled substances, as such activities are described by any international narcotics control agreement to which the United States is a signatory, or by the domestic law of the country in whose territory or airspace the interdiction is occurring.

(3) The term "assistance" includes operational, training, intelligence, logistical, technical, and administrative assistance.

(3) Presidential Determinations

On December 1, 1994, President William J. Clinton issued Presidential Determination No. 95–7, as required under subsection (a)(2) of the statute to resume drug interdiction assistance to the Government of Colombia. 59 Fed. Reg. 64,835 (Dec. 15, 1994). On December 8, the President issued the statutorily required determination for Peru in Determination No. 95–9, 59 Fed. Reg. 65,231 (Dec. 19, 1994). The determination for Colombia is set forth below.

Resumption of U.S. Drug Interdiction Assistance to the Government of Colombia

Memorandum for the Secretary of State [and] the Secretary of Defense

Pursuant to the authority vested in me by section 1012 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1995, Public Law 103–337, I hereby determine with respect to Colombia that: (a) interdiction of aircraft reasonably suspected to be primarily engaged in illicit rug trafficking in that country's airspace is necessary because of the extraordinary threat posed by illicit drug trafficking to the national security of that country; and (b) that country has appropriate procedures in place to protect against innocent loss of life in the air and on the ground in connection with such interdiction, which shall at a minimum include effective means to identify and warn an aircraft before the use of force is directed against the aircraft.

b. National emergency concerning significant narcotics traffickers

On October 21, 1995, President William J. Clinton issued Executive Order No. 12,978, Blocking Assets and Prohibiting Transactions with Significant Narcotics Traffickers, 60 Fed. Reg. 54,579 (Oct. 24, 1995), acting under the authority of the Constitution and U.S. law, including the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. §§ 1701 et seq.) ("IEEPA"), the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. §§ 1601 et seq.), and general authorization to delegate executive functions (3 U.S.C. § 301). In the executive order, effective October 22, 1995, the President found that "the actions of significant foreign narcotics traffickers centered in Colombia, and the unparalleled violence, corruption, and harm that they cause in the United States and abroad, constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States," and declared a national emergency to deal with that threat.

Sanctions established by Executive Order 12978, and imposed on the four principal figures in the Cali cartel designated in its annex are set forth below. A notice of the blocking action issued by OFAC, effective October 23, 1995, added designations of over 30 entities and more than 40 individuals. 60 Fed. Reg. 54,582 (Oct. 24, 1995). The comprehensive designation lists are periodically updated in the Federal Register. See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 79, 87 (1996).

SECTION 1. Except to the extent provided in section 203(b) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)) and in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses that may be issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date, I hereby order blocked all property and interests in property that are or hereafter come within the United States, or that are or hereafter come within the possession or control of United States persons, of:
(a) the foreign persons listed in the Annex to this order;
(b) foreign persons determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Attorney General and the Secretary of State:

(i) to play a significant role in international narcotics trafficking centered in Colombia; or
(ii) materially to assist in, or provide financial or technological support for or goods or services in support of, the narcotics trafficking activities of persons designated in or pursuant to this order; and

(c) persons determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Attorney General and the Secretary of State, to be owned or controlled by, or to act for or on behalf of, persons designated in or pursuant to this order.

SEC. 2. Further, except to the extent provided in section 203(b) of IEEPA and in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses that may be issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date, I hereby prohibit the following:
(a) any transaction or dealing by United States persons or within the United States in property or interests in property of the persons designated in or pursuant to this order;

(b) any transaction by any United States person or within the United States that evades or avoids, or has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in this order.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this order:

* * * *

(e) the term "narcotics trafficking" means any activity undertaken illicitly to cultivate, produce, manufacture, distribute, sell, finance or transport, or otherwise assist, abet, conspire, or collude with others in illicit activities relating to, narcotic drugs, including, but not limited to, cocaine.

* * * *

President Clinton transmitted the executive order to Congress in a message dated October 21, 1995, that explained the purpose of the sanctions, as set forth in excerpts below. 31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1914 (Oct. 30, 1995).

Narcotics production has grown substantially in recent years. Potential cocaine production—a majority of which is bound for the United States—is approximately 850 metric tons per year. Narcotics traffickers centered in Colombia have exercised control over more than 80 percent of the cocaine entering the United States.

Narcotics trafficking centered in Colombia undermines dramatically the health and well-being of United States citizens as well as the domestic economy. Such trafficking also harms trade and commercial relations between our countries. The penetration of legitimate sectors of the Colombian economy by the so-called Cali cartel has frequently permitted it to corrupt various institutions of Colombian government and society and to disrupt Colombian commerce and economic development.

The economic impact and corrupting financial influence of such narcotics trafficking is not limited to Colombia but affects commerce and finance in the United States and beyond. United States law enforcement authorities estimate that the traffickers are responsible for the repatriation of $ 4.7 to $ 7 billion in illicit drug profits from the United States to Colombia annually, some of which is invested in ostensibly legitimate businesses. Financial resources of that magnitude, which have been illicitly generated and injected into the legitimate channels of international commerce, threaten the integrity of the domestic and international financial systems on which the economies of many nations now rely.

* * * *

The measures I am taking are designed to deny these traffickers the benefit of any assets subject to the jurisdiction of the United States and to prevent United States persons from engaging in any commercial dealings with them, their front companies, and their agents. These measures demonstrate firmly and decisively the commitment of the United States to end the scourge that such traffickers have wrought upon society in the United States and beyond. The magnitude and dimension of the current problem warrant utilizing all available tools to wrest the destructive hold that these traffickers have on society and governments.

c. Foreign Narcotics Kingpin Designation Act

On December 3, 1999, President William J. Clinton signed into law the Foreign Narcotics Kingpin Designation Act, Title VIII, Intelligence Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 2000, Pub. L. No. 106–120, 113 Stat. 1606 (1999), 21 U.S.C. §§ 1901–1908, 8 U.S.C. § 1182. As indicated in § 802 of the act, it was modeled on the effective sanctions program already in place against Colombian drug cartels, supra. Section 804 required the President to submit both a classified and an unclassified report annually to Congress. The unclassified report would, among other things, publicly identify the "foreign persons that the President determines are appropriate for sanctions" and detail his intent to impose sanctions. Section 805 of the act blocked assets and prohibited transactions with "significant foreign narcotics traffickers." That term was defined in § 808 to mean "any foreign person that plays a significant role in international narcotics trafficking, that the President has determined to be appropriate for sanctions pursuant to this title, and that the President has publicly identified" in the report required under § 804. President Clinton's statement on signing the bill into law follows. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2512 (Dec. 3, 1999). See also Digest 2001 at 143–145.

This Act contains a provision, known as the "Foreign Narcotics Kingpin Designation Act," that establishes a global program targeting the activities of significant foreign narcotics traffickers and their organizations. The new Act provides a statutory framework for the President to institute sanctions against foreign drug kingpins when such sanctions are appropriate, with the objective of denying their businesses and agents access to the U.S. financial system and to the benefits of trade and transactions involving U.S. businesses and individuals. Working with other nations, I intend to use the tools in this provision to combat the national security threat posed to the United States by international drug trafficking.

No nation alone can effectively counter these supra-national criminal organizations. The United States must continue to cooperate with, assist, and encourage other nations to join in coordinated efforts against these organizations. Consequently, as kingpin designations are made under this law, we look forward to working with appropriate host government authorities to pursue additional measures against those designated.

d. Prohibition on assistance to drug traffickers

In 1995 the Department of State issued a proposed rule to implement § 487 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, 22 U.S.C. § 2291f. 60 Fed. Reg. 7737 (Feb. 9, 1995). The new regulations were published as a final rule at 63 Fed. Reg. 36,571 (July 7, 1998), 22 CFR Part 140. As the Federal Register explained, > [s]ection 487(a) directs the President to take all reasonable steps to ensure that assistance provided under the Foreign Assistance Act or the Arms Export Control Act is not provided to or through any individual or entity that the President knows or has reason to believe has been convicted of a violation of, or a conspiracy to violate, any law or regulation of the United States, a State or the District of Columbia, or a foreign country relating to narcotic or psychotropic drugs or other controlled substances; or is or has been an illicit trafficker in any such controlled substance or is or has been a knowing assistor, abettor, conspirator, or colluder with others in the illicit trafficking of any such substance. This rule establishes a single government-wide enforcement mechanism for Section 487.

The 1998 Federal Register notice explained the purpose and structure of the regulation as set forth below.

* * * *

. . . The responsibilities of the President under Section 487 have been delegated to the Secretary of State (E.O. 12163). The Secretary of State is issuing these regulations and has delegated the responsibility for their implementation to the Assistant Secretary for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs . . .

The General Subpart (Subpart A) provides a statement of the regulations' purpose (§ 140.1), based upon the language of Section 487 of the Foreign Assistance Act; identifies the authorities for issuance of the regulations (§ 140.2); and defines key terms used in the regulations (§ 140.3). The broad coverage of the regulations is reflected in the definitions of drug trafficking (§ 140.3(e)), money laundering (§ 140.3(f)), and narcotics offenses (§ 140.3(g)), which are intended to be comprehensive. As noted in the definition of drug trafficking, it encompasses drug-related money laundering. . . .

Two of the key terms defined in the regulations are "covered country" (§ 140.3(d)) and "covered assistance" (§ 140.3(c)). The term "covered country" corresponds to those countries listed on the "majors list," i.e., the list of major illicit drug producing countries and major drug-transit countries, as determined annually by the President and transmitted to the appropriate Congressional committees as required by section 490(h) of the FAA.

* * * *

The term "Country Narcotics Coordinator" is defined in section 140.3(b). . . . [W]e note that the CNC is a key position often held by the Deputy Chief of Mission at a U.S. diplomatic post. In the event that another person were assigned to exercise these functions, that person would necessarily have equally appropriate clearances to handle sensitive law enforcement information.

The Applicability Subpart (Subpart B) explains the scope of the regulations. Their applicability is keyed primarily to "covered individuals and entities" that receive or provide direct or first-tier "covered assistance" and are located or providing assistance within a "covered country." . . .

The regulations are also applicable where a government agency providing covered assistance within a covered country has specifically designated a recipient beyond the first tier (see §§ 140.4(a), 140.7(b)). Additionally, they apply to individuals who receive a scholarship, fellowship, or participant training (unless the assistance is provided through a multilateral institution or international organization and the recipient has not been designated by the agency providing assistance). . . .

The factual circumstances that give rise to application of the regulations are highly varied and may, on occasion, have potentially serious or sensitive foreign relations, national security, or law enforcement consequences. In rare circumstances, such potential consequences may require that, in fulfilling the statutory requirements of Section 487, the procedures set forth in the regulations be expanded, modified, utilized in a different manner or not utilized. This necessary flexibility is provided in the initial clause of § 140.4. In response to comments by one agency raising concerns about possible disclosure of law enforcement investigatory information, however, that section has been amended to provide that §§ 140.13 and 140.14 will apply in all cases.

The Enforcement Subpart (Subpart C) contains an overview (§ 140.5), which outlines the Subpart's scope. The applicable determination procedures, criteria to be applied in deciding whether to withhold assistance or take other measures, and procedures concerning violations identified subsequent to the obligation of funds are set forth in the Enforcement Subpart. The applicability of these procedures varies depending on the nature of the proposed recipient. . . .

The determination procedures set forth in the regulations are applied by the Country Narcotics Coordinator (as defined in § 140.3(b)), who is responsible in the first instance for reviewing available information to determine whether a proposed assistance recipient is to be granted or denied assistance or whether other measures are to be taken to structure the provision of the assistance in such a way as to meet the requirements of Section 487 of the Foreign Assistance Act (§ 140.6(a)). . . .

Section 140.6(a)(6) further provides that it is the Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs (rather than the Country Narcotics Coordinator), in consultation with appropriate bureaus and agencies, who ordinarily will make any decision to withhold assistance or take other measures based on information or allegations that a key individual who is a senior government official of a foreign government has been convicted of a narcotics offense or has been engaged in drug trafficking. Personal involvement at or above the Assistant Secretary of State level is appropriate in such a case because it involves inherently sensitive foreign policy issues. . . . [A] new subsection (b)(3)(v) has been added to make clear that measures other than denial of assistance may be appropriate in certain cases where a negative determination is made as to one or more key individuals.

4. Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Firearms

On June 9, 1998, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Inter-American Convention Against the Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Firearms, Ammunition, Explosives, and other Related Materials, signed at Washington, D.C. on November 11, 1997, for the Senate's advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–49 (June 9, 1998). Excerpts below from the transmittal letter and the accompanying report of the Department of State submitting the treaty to the President for transmittal, also included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–49, address basic aspects of the convention. As this volume was going to press, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had not scheduled hearings on the treaty.

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the Inter-American Convention Against the Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Firearms, Ammunition, Explosives, and Other Related Materials (the "Convention"), adopted at the Special Session of the General Assembly of the Organization of American States (OAS) at Washington on November 13, 1997. The Convention was signed by the United States and 28 other OAS Member States on November 14, 1997, at the OAS Headquarters in Washington. So far, 31 States have signed the Convention and one (Belize) has ratified it. In addition, for the information of the Senate, I transmit the report of the Department of State with respect to the Convention.

The Convention is the first multilateral treaty of its kind in the world. The provisions of the Convention are explained in the accompanying report of the Department of State. The Convention should be an effective tool to assist in the hemispheric effort to combat the illicit manufacturing and trafficking in firearms, ammunition, explosives, and other related materials, and could also enhance the law enforcement efforts of the States Parties in other areas, given the links that often exist between those offenses and organized criminal activity, such as drug trafficking and terrorism.

The Convention provides for a broad range of cooperation, including extradition, mutual legal assistance, technical assistance, and exchanges of information, experiences, and training, in relation to the offenses covered under the treaty. The Convention also imposes on the Parties an obligation to criminalize the offenses set forth in the treaty if they have not already done so. The Convention will not require implementing legislation for the United States.

This treaty would advance important U.S. Government interests, and would enhance hemispheric security by obstructing the illicit flow of weapons to criminals such as terrorists and drug traffickers. In addition, ratification of this Convention by the United States would be consistent with, and give impetus to, the active work being done by the United States Government on this subject in other fora, such as the United Nations, the P-8 Group, and the OAS Inter-American Drug Abuse Control Commission (CICAD).

* * * *

The Convention will not require implementing legislation for the United States. As further discussed below, the existing body of federal laws in the United States is adequate to satisfy the Convention's provisions regarding requirements for legislation, and the other provisions contained in the Convention are self-executing and will not require new legislation.

The Convention includes a Preamble, thirty articles and an Annex. The Preamble makes clear that the Convention is intended to address the problem of transnational trafficking in firearms, and is not meant to regulate the internal firearms trade of the States Parties. The Preamble expressly recognizes, for example, that the Convention "does not commit States Parties to enact legislation or regulations pertaining to firearms ownership, possession or trade of a wholly domestic character. . . ." Furthermore, the Preamble reflects the recognition that States have developed different cultural and historical uses for firearms, and "that the purpose of enhancing international cooperation to eradicate illicit transnational trafficking in firearms is not intended to discourage or diminish lawful leisure or recreational activities such as travel or tourism for sport shooting, hunting, and other forms of lawful ownership and use recognized by the States Parties."

Article 1 ("Definitions") sets forth definitions of a number of terms used in the Convention.

As with the definitions of "firearms," the definitions of "ammunition" and "explosives" contained in relevant United States laws are not identical in all respects to the Convention's definition of such terms. However, the definitions in U.S. law are broad enough to enable the U.S. to comply with the obligations imposed therein. Similarly, although there is no definition of the term "other related materials" as such in U.S. law, items covered under the Convention's definition are subject to regulation under relevant U.S. statutes. For example, all components and parts for firearms are regulated under the Arms Export Control Act, 22 U.S.C. Sec. 2778. The implementing regulations also make it clear that certain accessory items, such as riflescopes, silencers, and flash suppressors, are subject to the import controls of the Act. See 27 C.F.R. Part 47.

The definition of "controlled delivery" was drawn by the negotiators largely from the definition of that term in the United Nations Convention Against the Illicit Trafficking in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, done at Vienna on December 20, 1988. The term is defined as "the technique of allowing illicit or suspect consignments of firearms, ammunition, explosives, and other related materials to pass out of, through, or into the territory of one or more states, with the knowledge and under the supervision of their competent authorities, with a view to identifying persons involved in the commission of offenses referred to in Article IV of the Convention."

* * * *

Article IV ("Legislative Measures") directs States Parties that have not yet done so to adopt the necessary legislative or other measures to establish as criminal offenses under their domestic law the illicit manufacturing of and trafficking in firearms, ammunition, explosives, and other related materials. The Departments of Treasury and Justice have concluded that the obligation to criminalize the acts of illicit manufacturing and trafficking mentioned in Article IV of the Convention can be fully satisfied under various existing federal laws. The Gun Control Act of 1968, 18 U.S.C. Sec. 921 et seq., the National Firearms Act, 26 U.S.C. Sec. 5801 et seq., the Arms Export Control Act, 22 U.S.C. Sec. 2778 et seq. and other federal statutes, e.g., Title 18 U.S.C. Chapter 40, establish criminal penalties for the acts covered under Article IV of the Convention. Accordingly, the United States would not be required to enact any additional legislation to comply with this provision of the Convention.

Article IV also states that, subject to the respective constitutional principles and basic concepts of the legal systems of the States Parties, the criminal offenses established pursuant to the foregoing paragraph must include participation in, association or conspiracy to commit, attempts to commit, and aiding, abetting, facilitating, and counseling the commission of such offenses. Although with respect to some of these acts U.S. law uses a different terminology than the Convention, existing U.S. laws provide for criminal penalties for such acts. Therefore, this provision will not require additional U.S. legislation.

5. Corruption

a. OECD Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions

On May 1, 1998, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development ("OECD") Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–43 (1993); S. Exec. Rpt. 105–19 (1998). The Senate provided advice and consent to ratification on July 31, 1998, 146 CON. REC. S9668 (July 31, 1998), with certain conditions, and the convention entered into force February 15, 1999.

The President's letter of transmittal explained the impetus for the convention from the U.S. perspective as follows:

> Since the enactment in 1977 of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA), the United States has been alone in specifically criminalizing the business-related bribery of foreign public officials. United States corporations have contended that this has put them at a significant disadvantage in competing for international contracts with respect to foreign competitors who are not subject to such laws. Consistent with the sense of the Congress, as expressed in the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988, encouraging negotiation of an agreement within the OECD governing the type of behavior that is prohibited under the FCPA, the United States has worked assiduously within the OECD to persuade other countries to adopt similar legislation. Those efforts have resulted in this Convention that, once in force, will require that the Parties enact laws to criminalize the bribery of foreign public officials to obtain or retain business or other improper advantage in the conduct of international business.

Excerpts below from the April 9, 1998, report of the Department of State submitting the convention to the President and accompanying the transmittal describe the convention and note issues on which the United States had particular comments. The full report is included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–43.

THE PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit to you, with a view to transmittal to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification, the Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions. The Convention was adopted on November 21, 1997 by a conference held in Paris under the auspices of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). It was signed in Paris on December 17, 1997 on behalf of 33 countries, including the United States: 28 of the 29 OECD Member States (all except Australia) and five non-OECD Members who are participants in the OECD's Working Group on Bribery in International Business Transactions.

* * * *

I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, interpretive Commentaries on the Convention that were adopted by the negotiating conference in conjunction with the Convention. Although not submitted for the advice and consent of the Senate, the Commentaries are relevant to the Senate's consideration of the Convention.

* * * *

Article 1(1) of the Convention requires each Party to establish bribery of a foreign public official as a criminal offense under its laws. Such bribery is defined as the intentional offer, promise, or giving of any undue pecuniary or other advantage by any person, whether directly or through intermediaries, to a foreign public official, for that official or for a third party, to induce that official to act or to refrain from acting in relation to the performance of official duties in order to obtain or retain business or other improper advantage in the conduct of international business. Such bribery is further defined in Article 1(2) to include complicity in, including incitement, aiding and abetting, or authorization of an act of bribery of a foreign public official. Attempt and conspiracy to bribe a foreign public official must also be criminalized by each Party to the same extent that attempt and conspiracy to bribe a public official of such Party are criminal offenses. This language is generally consistent with U.S. law. However, to comply fully with the Convention, which covers bribes by "any person," the United States will have to expand the scope of the FCPA to encompass bribes paid by foreign persons who are not affiliated with issuers that have securities registered under the Exchange Act.

"Foreign public official" is defined by Article 1(4) as any person holding a legislative, administrative, or judicial office of a foreign country, whether appointed or elected; any person exercising a public function for a foreign country, including for a public agency or public enterprise; and any official or agent of a public international organization. . . . Paragraph 17 of the Commentaries notes that "public international organization" includes any international organization formed by states, governments, or other public international organizations, including a regional economic integration organization such as the European Community. The FCPA does not cover bribery of officials of "public international organizations." To conform with the Convention, the FCPA will have to be amended to encompass bribery of such officials.

The Convention does not apply to bribes to foreign political parties or party officials per se, although it would cover, by its terms, business-related bribes to foreign public officials made through political parties or party officials, as well as bribes directed by corrupt foreign public officials to political parties or party officials. Paragraph 16 of the Commentaries notes that persons that hold de facto public authority, such as political-party officials in single-party states, may be considered to be foreign public officials under the legal principles of some countries. The United States has urged that bribes paid to foreign political parties and party officials be covered under the Convention, as they are under the FCPA, and such coverage will be a topic of future negotiations within the OECD Working Group on Bribery.

* * * *

Article 4(1) requires that each Party take necessary measures to establish its jurisdiction over bribery of a foreign public official when such offense is committed in whole or in part in its territory. Paragraph 25 of the Commentaries states that the territorial basis for jurisdiction should be interpreted broadly so that an extensive physical connection to the act of bribery is not required. . . . Parties are required, under Article 4(4), to review whether their current bases for jurisdiction are effective with regard to bribery of foreign public officials and, if not, to take remedial steps. Current U.S. law governing foreign bribery contains a territorial element and is generally limited to bribery by U.S. persons and foreign persons affiliated with issuers that have securities registered under the Exchange Act. To implement fully the Convention, the United States will have to expand the FCPA to encompass acts within its territory by other foreign persons. The United States also proposes to assert jurisdiction over the acts of U.S. persons outside the United States.

Article 9(1) requires that each Party, to the fullest extent possible under its laws and relevant treaties and arrangements, provide prompt and effective legal assistance to another Party for the purpose of criminal investigations and proceedings brought by a Party concerning offenses within the scope of the Convention, as well as for the purpose of non-criminal proceedings within the scope of the Convention brought by a Party against a legal person. Pursuant to Article 9(2), where a Party makes mutual legal assistance conditional upon the existence of dual criminality, dual criminality is deemed to exist if the offense for which the assistance is sought is within the scope of the Convention. Article 9(3) states that a Party may not, on the ground of bank secrecy, decline to render mutual legal assistance for criminal matters within the scope of the Convention. This provision is particularly important, because U.S. prosecutions have sometimes been frustrated by difficulty in obtaining foreign evidence because of lack of dual criminality.

Article 10(1) provides that bribery of a foreign public official shall be deemed to be included as an extraditable offense under the laws of the Parties and the extradition treaties between them. Under Article 10(2), a Party that receives a request for extradition regarding bribery of a foreign public official from another Party with which it has no extradition treaty may consider the Convention to be the legal basis for such extradition. Each Party must, pursuant to Article 10(3), ensure that it can either extradite or prosecute its nationals for bribery of a foreign public official. If a Party declines to extradite a person for bribery of a foreign public official solely on the ground that the person is its national, that Party is required to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution. Article 10(4) states that extradition for bribery of a foreign public official is subject to the conditions set out in the domestic law and applicable treaties and arrangements of each Party. Where a Party makes extradition conditional upon the existence of dual criminality, dual criminality shall be deemed to exist if the offense for which extradition is sought is within the scope of Article 1 of the Convention.

* * * *

The Convention is largely consistent with existing U.S. law. However, as set forth above, certain amendments to the FCPA are proposed in order to conform with and to implement the Convention. Proposed legislation is being prepared and is expected to be submitted to the Congress at an early date.

* * * *

The one understanding included in the resolution of ratification related to extradition provisions in Article 10, described above:

> Extradition.—The United States shall not consider this Convention as the legal basis for extradition to any country with which the United States has no bilateral extradition treaty in force. In such cases where the United States does have a bilateral extradition treaty in force, that treaty shall serve as the legal basis for extradition for offenses covered under this Convention.

b. Inter-American Convention Against Corruption

On April 1, 1998, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Inter-American Convention Against Corruption to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–39 (1996); S. Exec. Rpt. No. 106–15 (2000). The Senate gave advice and consent to ratification on July 27, 2000 (146 CONG. REC. S7809 (July 27, 2000)), and the convention entered into force for the United States on October 29, 2000. See also 92 Am. J. Int'l L. 491 (1998); Digest 2000 at 231–38.

The President's letter of transmittal explained, as with the OECD convention discussed in 5.a., supra, that the obligation to criminalize the bribery of foreign government officials "was included in the Convention at the behest of the United States negotiating delegation. In recent years, the United States Government has sought in a number of multilateral fora to persuade other governments to adopt legislation akin to the U.S. Foreign Corrupt Practices Act."

Excerpts below from the March 24, 1998, report of Acting Secretary of State Strobe Talbott, also included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–39, describe the convention and set forth proposed understandings on which ratification should be conditioned. The resolution of ratification included, among other things, these or substantially similar understandings and added understandings (1) on extradition identical to that attached to the OECD convention discussed in 5.a., supra, and (2) on assistance to the International Criminal Court identical to that attached to mutual legal assistance treaties, set forth in C.2.e. below.

THE PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit to you, with a view to its transmittal to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification, the Inter-American Convention Against Corruption ("the Convention"), adopted and opened for signature at the Specialized Conference on Corruption of the Organization of American States (OAS) in Caracas, Venezuela, on March 29, 1996. The Convention was signed by the United States on June 27, 1996, at the twenty-seventh regular session of the General Assembly of the OAS meeting in Panama City, Panama. I recommend that the Convention be transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification.

* * * *

The Convention is the first instrument of its kind in the world to be adopted. It establishes a treaty-based regime of obligations among the OAS member states to combat corruption, including various forms of cooperation analogous to those that exist pursuant to a number of multilateral law enforcement treaties to which the United States is a party. The Convention will enhance the United States' ability to cooperate with, and receive assistance from, other countries in the hemisphere in connection with efforts to prevent, investigate, and prosecute acts of corruption. The Convention will not require implementing legislation for the United States. As further discussed below, the existing bodies of laws and regulations in the United States will be adequate to satisfy the Convention's provisions regarding requirements for legislation, and the other provisions contained in the Convention are self-executing and will not require additional implementing legislation.

The Convention consists of a preamble and twenty-eight articles. Article 1 ("Definitions") defines the following terms: "public function," "public official," "government official," "public servant" and "property." With respect to the definitions of the first four of the terms listed above, it was agreed by the negotiators that the term "at any level of its hierarchy", which is contained in such definitions, was intended to clarify the "vertical" scope of application of the Convention; i.e., that the Convention would cover officials ranging from those at the very top of the government bureaucracy, such as Cabinet-level officials, to those at the lowest levels, such as clerks. The phrase was included at the behest of certain delegations who expressed concern that some of the corruption laws that exist in their countries do not reach officials at the very top levels of government, or, alternatively, those at the lowest levels.

However, the negotiators expressly discussed and understood that the phrase "at any level of its hierarchy" was not intended in this Convention to define the scope of application of the Convention with respect to constituent units of federal states, nor was the Convention as a whole intended to impose obligations with respect to the conduct of state or local officials. To emphasize this point, upon conclusion of the negotiations at the final session of the specialized conference in Caracas, the head of the U.S. negotiating team read the following statement into the record:

> The U.S. would like to reaffirm for the record the statement made earlier by the President of the Working Group for the article on definitions that the conclusions of the Working Group reflect the fact that countries with federal systems of government may not be able to bind their states and municipalities to the obligations under the Convention.

This statement was seconded at the conference by the delegation from Canada and from other States with federal systems. To confirm our understanding on this point, I recommend that the following understanding to Article I be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> The Government of the United States of America understands that the phrase "at any level of its hierarchy" in the first and second subparagraphs of Article 1 refers, in the case of the United States, to all levels of the hierarchy of the federal government of the United States, and that the Convention does not impose obligations with respect to the conduct of officials other than federal officials.

* * * *

Article VII ("Domestic Law") requires that the States Parties, to the extent they have not yet done so, adopt the necessary legislative or other measures to establish as criminal offenses under their domestic law the acts of corruption described in Article VI, as well as to facilitate cooperation among themselves pursuant to the Convention.

At various times during the negotiations, the U.S. delegation described the extensive network of laws already in place in the U.S. that address the various acts of corruption covered under the Convention. Based on the discussions held at the negotiating sessions, the U.S. negotiators do not believe that it is the expectation of any of the other negotiating delegations that the United States would be required to enact any laws beyond those that it already has in place. Indeed, the opinion was voiced that one of the objectives of the Convention is to have the rest of the nations of the hemisphere develop a body of laws on corruption comparable to that which exists in the United States.

There is, however, no single federal anti-corruption law in the United States that uses exactly the terms used in this Convention. Moreover, the network of United States anti-corruption laws is extensive, but not every federal employee is subject to criminal prosecution for every act that could conceivably fall within the definition of the "acts of corruption" in the Convention. In particular, there is no general "attempt" statute in U.S. federal criminal law, although federal statutes make "attempts" criminal in connection with specific crimes. The practical effect of this, however, is debatable. The "acts of corruption" described in Article VI(1)(a) and (b) are defined in such a way as effectively to embrace the acts constituting an attempt within the crime since it is the mere solicitation, acceptance, offering or granting of a bribe which is a crime, without any consummation of an act of bribery or even an agreement to bribe. The literal terms of subparagraph (c), on the other hand, would embrace a situation in which an individual took some preparatory action unknown to anyone, with the "purpose" of profiting illicitly at some future point. Under U.S. law, this would not be criminalized as such, although the conduct in question in a given case might well be prosecutable in the context of some other crime. It should also be noted, with respect to subparagraph (e), that the reference to "instigator" is not intended to require the United States to create a new crime of association denominated "instigation," but rather was included in the Convention merely as an illustrative form of the types of "participation" that the provision intends to cover. Although the U.S. legal system does not recognize the offense of "instigation" as such, it does contemplate equivalent but differently denominated offenses, such as aiding or abetting.

Despite the above, the existing network of laws in place in the United States can reasonably be deemed to satisfy the obligations imposed under the Convention with respect to the enactment of legislation. During the negotiations, the U.S. delegation provided considerable information to other delegations on the nature and content of U.S. law, and it was the understanding of all delegations that Article VII would not be understood to require new legislation in the U.S. substituting the broad wording of Article VI for specific U.S. laws currently in place.

In light of the foregoing, I recommend that the following understanding to Article VII be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> Article VII of the Convention sets forth an obligation to adopt legislative measures to establish as criminal offenses the acts of corruption described in Article VI(1). There is an extensive network of laws already in place in the United States that criminalize a wide range of corrupt acts.

> Although United States laws may not in all cases be defined in terms or elements identical to those used in the Convention, it is the understanding of the United States, with the caveat set forth below, that the kinds of official corruption which are intended under the Convention to be criminalized would in fact be criminal offenses under U.S. law. Accordingly, the United States does not intend to enact new legislation to implement Article VII of the Convention.
> There is no general "attempt" statute in U.S. federal criminal law. Nevertheless, federal statutes make "attempts" criminal in connection with specific crimes. This is of particular relevance with respect to Article VI(1)(c), which by its literal terms would embrace a single preparatory act done with the requisite "purpose" of profiting illicitly at some future time, even though the course of conduct is neither pursued, nor in any sense consummated. The United States will not criminalize such conduct per se, although we would expect significant acts of corruption in this regard to be generally subject to prosecution in the context of one or more other crimes.

Article VIII ("Transnational Bribery") obligates the States Parties, subject to their Constitutions and the fundamental principles of their legal system, to prohibit and punish the offering or granting of a bribe, directly or indirectly, by its nationals, residents, and businesses domiciled there, to a government official of another State in connection with any economic or commercial transaction in exchange for any act or omission in the performance of that official's public functions. This Article was included at the behest of the United States, and was intended to obligate the States Parties to have in place legislation similar to the U.S. Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA).

There are small differences, however, between the wording of Article VIII and that of the FCPA, and a literal reading of Article VIII could suggest that the U.S. would need to revise its laws in some respects to comply with the obligations imposed in the Article. For example, the FCPA specifically excepts from coverage "facilitating payments," i.e., small gratuities sometimes paid to foreign government officials to secure or expedite performance of routine government action. See Title 15, United States Code, Sections 78dd–1(b) and 78dd–2(b). Article VIII, however, contains no such exception. Also, the FCPA applies only to payments made to obtain or retain business, while Article VIII requires criminalization of all payments made "in connection with any economic or commercial transaction," an arguably larger universe. Since Article VIII was included at the behest of the U.S. in order to require other OAS states to enact laws similar to the FCPA, none of the negotiating delegations expected that the U.S. itself would enact new legislation to comply with Article VIII.

In order to be clear on the scope of the U.S. commitment under Article VIII, I recommend that the following understanding be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> With respect to Article VIII, the Government of the United States of America notes that current United States law provides criminal sanctions for transnational bribery. It is the understanding of the Government of the United States of America that no additional legislation is needed for the United States to comply with the obligation imposed in Article VIII.

Article IX ("Illicit Enrichment") is structurally analogous to Article VIII, and was included at the insistence of a number of the Latin American nations. The Article refers to the offense known as "illicit enrichment," which is defined as a significant increase in the assets of a government official that such official cannot reasonably explain in relation to his lawful earnings during the performance of his functions. Like Article VIII, compliance with the obligations imposed under this Article is subject to each State's Constitution and fundamental legal principles.

Although there is no offense of "illicit enrichment" as such in U.S. law, there are a number of laws and regulations in the United States that penalize the same substantive conduct which this article is intended to reach and which is proscribed by the "illicit enrichment" laws that exist in some nations. However, in an illicit enrichment statute of the sort contemplated by the statute, the defendant must bear the burden of establishing the legitimate origin of the assets in question. The Article therefore by its terms calls for States Parties to make the described conduct criminal without requiring an affirmative showing by the State of wrongdoing on the part of the defendant. Since under the U.S. legal system the State must in all cases affirmatively prove that an individual has engaged in wrongdoing before it can impose criminal sanctions on such person, compliance with the literal terms of Article IX would impose on the United States an obligation that would be inconsistent with its Constitution and the fundamental principles of its legal system.

Accordingly, the explicit exception contained in Article IX, which renders compliance with the obligation therein subject to each State's "Constitution and the fundamental principles of its legal system," is applicable to the United States.

This interpretation is consistent with that which was voiced by the U.S. delegation during the negotiations, and which was understood by the other delegations. The negotiators discussed Article IX in detail, and understood that the Article would not require the United States to enact new legislation. To emphasize this point, at the final session of negotiations, the head of the U.S. negotiating delegation read the following statement for the record:

> I stress that we remain perfectly happy to offer assistance and cooperation to those OAS states that have enacted illicit enrichment legislation. However, we do wish to reiterate . . . that we may be unable to adopt such legislation ourselves for constitutional reasons. In addition, we may be obliged to take a reservation to this article because our legislature may not wish to adopt such legislation for reasons unrelated to constitutional law or "fundamental principles," such as the fact that we deal with this issue fully through other laws already in force.

The other delegations accepted this statement, and no objections or dissenting views were voiced.

In order to leave no doubt about the scope of the U.S. commitment under Article IX, I recommend that the following understanding regarding Article IX be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> Article IX obligates the States Parties, subject to the Constitution and fundamental legal principles of their respective legal systems, to establish as an offense the act of "illicit enrichment," as defined in the Article. With respect to this Article, the Government of the United States of America believes that the establishment of such an offense would be inconsistent with the United States Constitution and the fundamental principles of the United States legal system. The United States therefore understands that Article IX does not require the United States to establish a new criminal offense of illicit enrichment. However, the United States intends to provide assistance pursuant to the Convention in accordance with this Article, to the extent permitted by its domestic law.

6. Criminal Procedure in U.S. Courts: Limitation on Availability of Fifth Amendment Privilege

In United States v. Balsys, 524 U.S. 666 (1998), the U.S. Supreme Court resolved a conflict between the U.S. circuit courts over whether the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination could be invoked based on fear of prosecution by a foreign government rather than by the United States or a state of the United States. Compare United States v. Balsys, 119 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 1997) (resident alien ordered to testify at a deposition for lying on his immigrant and visa registration about his involvement as a Nazi criminal could invoke the privilege against self-incrimination based on fear of prosecution by foreign countries) with United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997) (en banc) (resident alien subpoenaed by OSI to testify about his possible involvement in Nazi persecution could not invoke privilege based on fear of prosecution abroad).

In Balsys, the Office of Special Investigations of the Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice ("OSI") sought testimony from Aloyzas Balsys, a resident alien, native of Lithuania, concerning his wartime activities between 1940 and 1944 and his immigration to the United States in 1961. OSI was investigating whether, contrary to his representations on his visa application, Balsys had participated in Nazi persecution during World War II. As explained in the Court's opinion, "[s]uch activity would subject him to deportation for persecuting persons because of their race, religion, national origin, or political opinion under [8 U.S.C.] §§ 1182(a)(3)(E) and 1251(a)(4)(D), as well as for lying on his visa application under §§ 1182(a)(6)(C)(i) and 1251(a)(1)(A)." Balsys, 524 U.S. at 670. Balsys invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination contending that answering questions concerning his wartime activities and immigration could subject him to criminal prosecution by Lithuania, Israel and Germany.

The Court concluded that fear of criminal prosecution by a foreign government could not provide the basis for invocation of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. In so holding, however, the Court confirmed that "resident aliens such as Balsys are considered 'persons' for purposes of the Fifth Amendment and are entitled to the same protections under the [Self-Incrimination] Clause as citizens." It also found the privilege unavailable for fear of deportation because deportation is not a criminal prosecution. The Supreme Court examined and rejected the argument that "cooperative internationalism" in fighting crime warranted a broader reading of the protection, as excerpted below.

The Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment provides that "[n]o person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." U.S. Const., Amdt. 5. Resident aliens such as Balsys are considered "persons" for purposes of the Fifth Amendment and are entitled to the same protections under the Clause as citizens. See Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding, 344 U.S. 590, 596, 73 S.Ct. 472, 477, 97 L.Ed. 576 (1953). The parties do not dispute that the Government seeks to "compel" testimony from Balsys that would make him "a witness against himself." The question is whether there is a risk that Balsys's testimony will be used in a proceeding that is a "criminal case."

* * * *

. . . Balsys[] argu[es] that application of the privilege in situations like his would promote the purpose of preventing government overreaching, which on anyone's view lies at the core of the Clause's purposes. This argument begins with the premise that "cooperative internationalism" creates new incentives for the Government to facilitate foreign criminal prosecutions. Because crime, like legitimate trade, is increasingly international, a corresponding degree of international cooperation is coming to characterize the enterprise of criminal prosecution. (fn. omitted). The mission of the OSI as shown in this case exemplifies the international cooperation that is said to undermine the legitimacy of treating separate governmental authorities as separate for purposes of liberty protection in domestic courts. Because the Government now has a significant interest in seeing individuals convicted abroad for their crimes, it is subject to the same incentive to overreach that has required application of the privilege in the domestic context. Balsys says that this argument is nothing more than the reasoning of the Murphy [v. Waterfront Comm'n of N.Y. Harbor, 378 U.S. 52 (1964)] Court when it justified its recognition of a fear of state prosecution by looking to the significance of " 'cooperative federalism,' " the teamwork of state and national officials to fight interstate crime. 378 U.S., at 55–56, 84 S.Ct., at 1596–1597.

. . . For the Murphy majority, "cooperative federalism" was not important standing alone, but simply because it underscored the significance of the Court's holding that after Malloy it would be unjustifiably formalistic for a federal court to ignore fear of state prosecution when ruling on a privilege claim. Thus, the Court described the "whipsaw" effect that the decision in Malloy [v.

Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)] would have created if fear of state prosecution were not cognizable in a federal proceeding:

> "[The] policies and purposes [of the privilege] are defeated when a witness can be whipsawed into incriminating himself under both state and federal law even though the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination is applicable to each. This has become especially true in our age of 'cooperative federalism,' where the Federal and State Governments are waging a united front against many types of criminal activity." 378 U.S., at 55–56, 84 S.Ct., at 1597 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

Since in this case there is no analog of Malloy, imposing the Fifth Amendment beyond the National Government, there is no premise in Murphy for appealing to "cooperative internationalism" by analogy to "cooperative federalism."[16] . . .

But even if Murphy were authority for considering "cooperative federalism" and "cooperative internationalism" as reasons supporting expansion of the scope of the privilege, any extension would depend ultimately on an analysis of the likely costs and benefits of extending the privilege as Balsys requests. . . .

[16] There is indeed nothing comparable to the Fifth Amendment privilege in any supranational prohibition against compelled self-incrimination derived from any source, the privilege being "at best an emerging principle of international law." See Amann, A Whipsaw Cuts Both Ways, 45 UCLA L.Rev. 1201, 1259 (1998) (hereinafter Amann). In the course of discussing the Eleventh Circuit case raising the same issue as this one, Amann suggests nonetheless that the whipsaw rationale has particular salience on these facts because along with the United States, Lithuania and Israel are signatories to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Dec. 16, 1966, G.A. Res. 2200, which recognizes something akin to the privilege. See Amann 1233, n. 206. The significance of being bound by the Covenant, however, is limited by its provision that the privilege is derogable and accordingly may be infringed if public emergency necessitates. Id., at 1259, n. 354. In any event, Balsys has made no claim under the Covenant, and its current enforceability in the courts of the signatories is an issue that is not before us.

V. This is not to say that cooperative conduct between the United States and foreign nations could not develop to a point at which a claim could be made for recognizing fear of foreign prosecution under the Self-Incrimination Clause as traditionally understood. If it could be said that the United States and its allies had enacted substantially similar criminal codes aimed at prosecuting offenses of international character, and if it could be shown that the United States was granting immunity from domestic prosecution for the purpose of obtaining evidence to be delivered to other nations as prosecutors of a crime common to both countries, then an argument could be made that the Fifth Amendment should apply based on fear of foreign prosecution simply because that prosecution was not fairly characterized as distinctly "foreign." The point would be that the prosecution was as much on behalf of the United States as of the prosecuting nation, so that the division of labor between evidence gatherer and prosecutor made one nation the agent of the other, rendering fear of foreign prosecution tantamount to fear of a criminal case brought by the Government itself.

Whether such an argument should be sustained may be left at the least for another day, since its premises do not fit this case. It is true that Balsys has shown that the United States has assumed an interest in foreign prosecution, as demonstrated by OSI's mandate[18] and American treaty agreements[19] requiring the

[18] According to Order No. 851–79, reprinted in App. 15–17, the OSI shall "[m]aintain liaison with foreign prosecution, investigation and intelligence offices; [u]se appropriate Government agency resources and personnel for investigations, guidance, information, and analysis; and [d]irect and coordinate the investigation, prosecution, and any other legal actions instituted in these cases with the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the United States Attorneys Offices, and other relevant Federal agencies."

[19] The United States and Lithuania have entered into an agreement that provides that the two governments "agree to cooperate in prosecution of persons who are alleged to have committed war crimes . . . agree to provide mutual legal assistance concerning the prosecution of persons suspected of having committed war crimes . . . will assist each other in the location of witnesses believed to possess relevant information about criminal actions

Government to give to Lithuania and Israel any evidence provided by Balsys. But this interest does not rise to the level of cooperative prosecution. There is no system of complementary substantive offenses at issue here, and the mere support of one nation for the prosecutorial efforts of another does not transform the prosecution of the one into the prosecution of the other. Cf. Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121, 122–124, 79 S.Ct. 676, 677–679, 3 L.Ed.2d 684 (1959) (rejecting double jeopardy claim where federal officials turned over all evidence they had gathered in connection with federal prosecution of defendant for use in subsequent state prosecution of defendant). In this case there is no basis for concluding that the privilege will lose its meaning without a rule precluding compelled testimony when there is a real and substantial risk that such testimony will be used in a criminal prosecution abroad.

7. Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind

The International Law Commission adopted the text of the Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind at its forty-eighth session, in 1996. See Report of the 48th session, U.N. GAOR, 51st Sess., Supp. No. 10, U.N. Doc. A/51/10 (1996); see also Yearbook of the International

. . . during World War II, and agree to intermediate and endeavor to make these witnesses available for the purpose of giving testimony in accordance with the laws of the Republic of Lithuania to authorized representatives of the United States Department of Justice." Memorandum of Understanding Between the United States Department of Justice and the Office of the Procurator General of the Republic of Lithuania Concerning Cooperation in the Pursuit of War Criminals, Aug. 3, 1992, reprinted in App. in No. 96–6144 (CA2), p. 396.

The District Court found that though it had not been made aware of a treaty between the U.S. and Israel requiring disclosure of information related to war crimes, OSI had shared such information in the past and that it would be consistent with OSI's mandate from the Attorney General for OSI to do so again. 918 F. Supp. 588, 596 (EDNY 1996).

Law Commission, 1996, vol. II(2). On November 5, 1996, John R. Crook, Assistant Legal Adviser, Office of United Nations Affairs, Office of the Legal Adviser, commented on the draft code before the Sixth Committee, as excerpted below.

The full text of Mr. Crook's comments is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. For a discussion of U.S. comments on an earlier draft, submitted December 9, 1991, see 87 Am. J. Int'l L. 595, 607 (1993).

Our debate begins this morning with the Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind. The General Assembly first requested this work in November of 1947, forty-nine years ago. For twenty-seven of those years, work on the Code lay dormant while the international community wrestled with the problem of defining aggression. The project has been marked by years of controversy and difficulty, reflecting the difficulty and importance of the matters involved.

After all these years, a completed Code is at last before us for consideration. The articles and the accompanying commentaries are rich and detailed, reflecting much work by the Commission and the Special Rapporteurs. This text will require careful study and reflection. . . .

. . . I would like to offer a few general comments and observations.

First, we are pleased that the Commission decided to limit the scope of the draft Code to a core group of serious offenses generally recognized by the international community as involving matters of special gravity. Last year, we joined many other delegations in questioning the inclusion of international terrorism, illicit traffic in narcotic drugs, and "environmental crimes" within the scope of the draft code. The Commission wisely and correctly decided to omit these matters from its final text.

We further appreciate the clarifications of the mental states required for commission of crimes and the definitions of key terms or concepts that are set forth in the commentaries. It may be worth considering whether in some cases it would be more appropriate to have certain aspects of the crimes defined with greater specificity in the articles themselves.

Turning to the article on aggression, we have in the past noted our concerns over the previous definition of the offense of aggression. In its earlier work, the Commission drew from General Assembly Resolution 3314, and from Article 2(4) of the Charter in seeking to define aggression. We did not think that these provided an adequate basis for drafting a criminal law definition, nor did they properly reflect the historical roots of the crime of waging aggressive war in the aftermath of World War II.

In its current text, the Commission appropriately recognized that the draft Code was concerned with the conduct of individuals, not States. It consequently focused on the individual conduct that would be punishable. The Commission sought to ground itself on the Nuremberg precedent when it identified active participation in or ordering the planning, preparation, initiation or waging of aggression committed by a State.

We appreciate the analysis that led the Commission to this result in its desire to complete the Code. The concept of aggression is a difficult one to define; the historical precedents do not offer clear guides. That is why in the context of the negotiations on the international criminal court, we have urged that aggression not be included within the jurisdiction of the proposed new court at this stage. In Article 16, the ILC undertook a serious and considered effort that deserves further reflection.

As to the text on crimes against humanity, which we believe is generally fine, there are some areas that warrant further study. For example, we are interested in further examining the Commission's requirement that an enumerated act be "instigated or directed by a government, any organization, or group," which was included to exclude the situation where an individual commits an inhumane act while acting on his own initiative. It needs to be considered whether this formulation is not overly broad or vague.

Additionally, we have some questions with respect to particular enumerated acts. For example, the Code would deem as a crime against humanity the practice of enforced or involuntary disappearance. While enforced disappearance is a loathsome practice, we are not sure that it appropriately constitutes a matter for universal and international criminal jurisdiction. At the least, these terms could be defined more precisely so that it is clear they encompass recognized criminal conduct.

Next, my government appreciates the Commission's inclusion in the draft Code of crimes against UN and associated personnel. The article provides that certain actions, when committed intentionally and in a systematic manner or on a large scale, against UN and associated personnel constitute crimes against the peace and security of mankind. . . . It may be that certain of the key terms in this article could be defined more precisely in the article itself.

Finally, regarding the Code's proposed descriptions of covered war crimes, the Commission sought to draw a line between those war crimes which are to be left to national jurisdiction and those which are of such consequence as to constitute crimes against the peace and security of mankind. We want to consider further whether the formulation suggested for making the distinction is adequate to the task.

Also, the Code appears to draw in several instances on provisions of Additional Protocols I and II to the 1949 Geneva Conventions. Neither these instruments, nor the concepts drawn from them in this connection, are universally accepted. With the guide of some of the commentary, we want to examine closely the extent to which the provisions in this article are based on conventional or accepted customary law. For example, we have doubts that the provision on damage to the natural environment merits inclusion in the draft Code.

. . . [W]e believe the most appropriate course at this time would be for this Committee and the General Assembly to transmit the Code to governments for their complete assessment and comment. Once these comments are received and collected, we can determine at that time what further steps might be appropriate.

C. INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNALS

1. Ad Hoc Tribunals and Related Issues

a. Establishment of ad hoc tribunals and U.S. participation

(1) Security Council resolutions

The International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia ("International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia" or "ICTY") and the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighboring States ("International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda" or "ICTR") were established in 1993 and 1994, respectively, as subsidiary but independent bodies of the Security Council.

On May 25, 1993, the UN Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter and with the active support of the United States, established the ICTY, headquartered in The Hague. U.N. Doc. S/RES/827 (1993). Resolution 827 established the tribunal "for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia between 1 January 1991 and a date to be determined by the Security Council upon the restoration of peace." The Statute of the ICTY is annexed to Resolution 827. The United States had submitted its views supporting the creation of such an international tribunal in a letter dated April 5, 1993, with a proposed draft charter. U.N. Doc. S/25575 (1993), reprinted in 32 I.L.M. 1203 (1993); see also 87 Am. J.Int'l L. 435 (1993).

On November 8, 1994, the UN Security Council, also acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter and with the active support of the United States, adopted Resolution 955, establishing the ICTR. U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (1994) reprinted in 33 I.L.M. 1598, 1601 (1994). The ICTR was established "for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994." The Statute of the ICTR is annexed to Resolution 955. The courtrooms and registry for the ICTR were established in Arusha, Tanzania, while the investigative and prosecutorial offices were located in Kigali, Rwanda.

Both tribunals were given jurisdiction over genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. As established, the ICTY and the ICTR shared the same appeals chamber and the same Chief Prosecutor. (See Digest 2003 at 219–21 for creation of a new position of Prosecutor for the ICTR and addressing completion of the work of the tribunals. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1503(2003).)

The Security Council resolutions establishing each of the tribunals contained identical language deciding that > all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the present resolution and the Statute of the International Tribunal and that consequently all States shall take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the present resolution and the Statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under [Article 29 of the ICTY statute and Article 28 of the ICTR statute].

Among other things, the referenced articles in the relevant statutes required states to comply with orders for "the surrender or the transfer of the accused" to the tribunal.

(2) Executive agreements

On October 5, 1994, the United States signed an executive agreement with the ICTY governing the surrender of persons sought by the tribunal, which entered into force February 14, 1996. TIAS No. 12570. On January 24, 1995, the United States signed a similar executive agreement with the ICTR, which also entered into force February 14, 1996. TIAS No. 12601, see 1995 U.S.T. LEXIS 125. Under the agreements the United States "agree[d] to surrender to the Tribunal . . . persons . . . found in its territory whom the Tribunal has charged with or found guilty of a violation or violations within the competence of the Tribunal."

(3) Implementing legislation

In 1995 President William J. Clinton signed into law legislation to implement the two agreements. See Pub. L. No. 104–106, div. A, title XIII, Sec. 1342, 110 Stat. 486 (1996), 18 U.S.C. § 3181 note. Section 1342(a) provided, with certain exceptions, that:

> provisions of chapter 209 of title 18, United States Code [18 U.S.C. § 3181 et seq.], relating to the extradition of persons to a foreign country pursuant to a treaty or convention for extradition between the United States and a foreign government, shall apply in the same manner and extent to the surrender of persons, including United States citizens, to—
>
> (A) The International Tribunal for Yugoslavia, pursuant to the Agreement Between the United States and the International Tribunal for Yugoslavia; and
> (B) The International Tribunal for Rwanda, pursuant to the Agreement Between the United States and the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

See C.1.d.(1) below for challenges in U.S. courts to the use of the executive agreement and implementing legislation to surrender a person to the ICTR. For additional discussion of congressional-executive agreements, see Chapter 4.A.2.

(4) Sanctions on countries providing sanctuary to indicted war criminals

Section 570 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, Fiscal Year 1999, as contained in the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act, Pub. L. No. 105–277, 112 Stat. 2681–195 (Oct. 21, 1998), imposed restrictions on assistance for a "country, entity, or canton . . . whose competent authorities have failed, as determined by the Secretary of State, to take necessary and significant steps to apprehend and transfer to the [ICTY ("Tribunal")] all persons who have been publicly indicted by the Tribunal." The earliest version of the section appeared as § 570 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1998, Pub. L. No. 105–118, 111 Stat. 2386, 2429 (1997), and was repeated thereafter.

On November 30, 1998, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright "determine[d] that Serbia and the Republika Srpska Entity of Bosnia and Herzegovina have failed to take [such] necessary and significant steps." 63 Fed. Reg. 68,496 (Dec. 11, 1998). On April 12, 1999, Acting Secretary of State Strobe Talbott issued a waiver, as authorized under § 570, "authorizing a U.S. vote in favor of a World Bank credit to Bosnia, including the Republika Sprska," which would otherwise have been prohibited. 64 Fed. b. Witness and victim protection

On January 28, 1998, David J. Scheffer, U.S. Ambassador at Large for War Crimes Issues, addressed an audience at Fordham University School of Law on the challenges of witness and victim protection in international criminal courts, particularly in crimes involving sexual violence.

The full text of the address, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1998/980128_scheffer_icc.html.

* * * *

The testimony of witnesses, for the prosecution or for the defense, is vital for the international tribunals, particularly since so much of the evidence is dependent on witness testimony rather than on incriminating or exculpatory documents. This is especially true of crimes of sexual violence.

Are crimes of rape and other serious sexual assault violations of international humanitarian law? The answer is yes, whether one is examining the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, or war crimes. While there has been and will be debate over precisely how to define crimes of sexual assault within the context of international humanitarian law, the United States will continue to exercise its leadership to ensure that these serious crimes are fully incorporated in the work of the ad hoc tribunals and in the jurisdiction of the permanent international criminal court.

Some of the witness protection issues for victims of sexual violence are essentially the same as for victims of other crimes. We might look at this problem in three stages:

First, what needs to be done before a witness actually testifies? The tactics are important. For example, it is important for the criminal tribunal to have unmarked cars to travel to meet witnesses. Safe houses, particularly in Bosnia, are essential. Investigators should arrange to meet witnesses in places where it will not be apparent to neighbors that they are cooperating—a requirement in both Bosnia and Rwanda. Also, the timing of the interview is important. Interviews might be arranged when the witness could just be going into town, or going to the market, or on a personal errand. . . .

An important factor that has to be considered in any decision to provide protection is whether the witness in fact is known to be a witness beyond the secrecy of the tribunal. We need to recognize that until a witness' identity is exposed, the tribunals may not need to provide the level of protection that will be required later in the process.

Second, witness protection during the testimony phase is critical. At this juncture the Victims and Witnesses Units of both ad hoc tribunals are important. They must be adequately staffed and well coordinated with the investigators in the Office of the Prosecutor. Investigators are the first line of contact and frequently work more closely with witnesses than does the Victim and Witness Unit of the tribunal. The Victims and Witnesses Unit arranges safe transportation of witnesses from home to the tribunal including accompaniment of secure or vulnerable witnesses where necessary. It liaises with states for exit and entry permits, travel documents, safe conduct agreements and visas. It liaises with host governments for protection, safe accommodation and transportation for witnesses during trials. The Unit liaises with states for pre- and post-trial protection and support services. And it liaises with states for temporary and permanent relocation of witnesses.

Rule 96 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Yugoslav and Rwanda Tribunals recognizes the importance of limiting the defense of consent in challenging victim testimony in connection with cases of sexual assault which fall within the jurisdiction of the tribunals. The United States Government understands the critical importance of this rule and we believe its tenets should be reflected in the rules of the permanent international criminal court.

There are a lot of witnesses required for the cases being litigated by the two ad hoc tribunals, and the same can surely be expected for the permanent international criminal court. The Yugoslav Tribunal used 200 witnesses in 1997 and expects to use at least 340 in 1998. The Rwanda Tribunal used 109 witnesses in 1997 and expects around 330 this year. In 1997 the number of witnesses with additional protective measures totaled 49 for the Yugoslav Tribunal and 51 for the Rwanda Tribunal. In 1998 those numbers are expected to jump to 98 and 257, respectively. The number of relocation requests at the Yugoslav Tribunal in 1997 was one and four more are expected this year. At the Rwanda Tribunal, the number of relocation requests in 1997 was five and is expected to increase to 20 such requests this year. Witnesses with additional support needs numbered 40 last year and should increase to 80 this year at the Yugoslav Tribunal, and numbered 31 last year and should increase to 33 this year at the Rwanda Tribunal. The Rwanda Tribunal had two safe houses last year and will need three in 1998.

In the past, the Victims and Witnesses Units of both Tribunals have relied to an inordinate degree on voluntary contributions to support the critical work of protection. The consequence has been insufficient protection for witnesses and thus degraded capabilities to prosecute and defend indictees, meaning that the conduct of fair trials can be jeopardized. The funding for protection of witnesses must be strengthened. . . .

The third stage of witness protection occurs after testimony is delivered. Perhaps the most significant issue is whether local police will be supportive and protect the witnesses afterwards. Where local police may be hostile, it is important to keep the fact of a witness' testimony secret. That is particularly difficult in the highest-profile cases. Also, states need to take up witness protection as a national issue, both for international and national trials. This is possible in places like Rwanda. Interestingly, some witnesses who testify anonymously will be willing to talk publicly afterwards. It is in this third stage of witness protection where progress is particularly lacking. That is why, for example, in Bosnia the United States is so focused on full implementation of the Dayton Peace Accords, including proper training, screening, and upgrading of local police forces so that they can responsibly begin to assume some of these duties.

* * * *

In the U.N. talks to establish a permanent international criminal court, the United States recognizes how important it will be for the permanent court to understand the significance of witness protection issues. As in national criminal prosecutions, effective witness protection on a state's territory normally would require state consent and the cooperation of local police. Lack of witness protection can be an effective brake on the ability of the ICC prosecutor to prosecute, and it would be exceedingly difficult to overcome a state's non-consent or unwillingness to properly protect witnesses on its territory.

We look forward to further negotiations on relevant articles of the draft statute for the ICC which pertain to witness protection. The United States believes that the Victims and Witnesses Unit of the ICC should be located within the Office of the Prosecutor. We reach this position having observed the performance of the Victims and Witnesses Units of the ad hoc tribunals, where they are located in the Registry. It has not worked to our satisfaction. Witness protection is not a bureaucratic function; it is very serious business that directly involves the Prosecutor, who needs the trust of witnesses and who has a very direct stake in protecting them. Our federal court system places witness protection under the authority of the Department of Justice, not the Administrator of the U.S. Courts.

c. International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia

On July 17, 1995, the United States filed its Submission Concerning Certain Arguments Made by Counsel for the Accused in the Case of Prosecutor v. Tadic, Case No. IT–94–1-T. The United States offered its views on arguments "which bear specifically on its special interest and knowledge as a Permanent Member of the U.N. Security Council and its substantial involvement in the adoption of the Statute of the Tribunal . . . particularly with respect to the validity of the action of the Security Council in creating the Tribunal and the interpretation of the jurisdictional provisions of the Statute." The United States took no position on the guilt or innocence of the accused. The Appeals Chamber of the ICTY held that the Security Council did have authority to create the ad hoc tribunal to prosecute persons accused of genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity, and that international norms concerning fair trial and due process were fully satisfied by the tribunal's statute and rules.

Excerpts below from the U.S. submission address the validity of the Security Council's decisions establishing the ICTY (with most footnotes deleted). The full text of the brief is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

a. Existence of a threat to the peace. Counsel for the Accused argues that the situation in the former Yugoslavia does not constitute a threat to international peace and that there is therefore no basis for action by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter. We disagree. In the case of the former Yugoslavia, the Council has repeatedly (and usually by unanimous vote) determined that the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security,[7] a judgment supported by the Secretary-General and the General Assembly. We believe that no reasonable observer could deny this conclusion.

Armed conflict has occurred and continues to this day among the States of the former Yugoslavia, with heavy military and civilian casualties. Armed units have operated across national borders and States have commanded and provided material support for military operations against their neighbors on many occasions. Large flows of refugees have moved across national borders, trade among the States of the region has been severely disrupted, and neighboring States have been forced to take concerted measures to curb the spread of the conflict to their territories. The fighting has necessitated intervention by the international community in the form of tens of thousands of troops and other personnel of the nations which contribute to or support the U.N. peacekeeping operations in the region. On the whole, only a small handful of other situations in the entire world since World War II have posed as serious a threat to international peace and security as the situation in the former Yugoslavia. Accordingly, the Council has acted well within its Chapter VII authority in determining that there exists a threat to international peace and security.

Counsel for the Accused argues that the Council's authority under Chapter VII is limited to international armed conflicts. This misreads the Charter. Article 41 refers to "threats to international peace and security," not to international armed conflicts. As indicated below, we believe that the conflict in the former Yugoslavia has been, and continues to be, of an international character. Even if this were not the case, the Council may exercise its Chapter VII authority whenever it determines that there is a threat to international peace and security, whether or not caused by an international armed conflict.

Article 39 of the Charter is in no way limited to international armed conflicts and the Council has invoked the authority of Chapter VII on many occasions when no international armed conflict had occurred. Recent examples include the situations in Rwanda, Haiti, and Somalia, and there are many earlier examples. The Council can accordingly properly determine that an internal armed conflict (or a situation involving no armed conflict) threatens international peace and security for the purpose of Article 39, whether because of the risk of outside intervention or the spread of the conflict to other States, the impact on neighboring States of massive refugee flows or severe economic disruption, or the risk of political destabilization of the region.

b. Authority under Chapter VII to create a tribunal.

Counsel for the Accused argues that the creation of a tribunal to try offenses under international humanitarian law is not within the authority of the Security Council under Chapter VII. We disagree.

Article 41 of the Charter provides that the Council "may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions" and then gives an exemplary list of actions which the Council may call upon States to take. This list is not an exclusive enumeration of the measures the Council may take and nothing in Chapter VII limits the Council's choice of means. Accordingly, the decision as to what measures are to be taken is given exclusively to the Council and is not subject to judicial review.

In fact, the Council has resorted to a wide variety of actions under Chapter VII which are not specifically enumerated in the illustrative list in Article 41. This includes, for example, the creation of zones in which overflights are prohibited, the creation of "safe areas"[16] and humanitarian corridors,[17] the granting of compensation to the victims of armed attack,[18] the delimitation of disputed borders,[19] and the prohibition of the acquisition or possession of weapons of mass destruction by a particular State.[20]

* * * *

Further, Article 29 of the Charter provides that the Council "may establish such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions." There is no limitation on the character of such organs, and in fact the Council has created a wide variety of bodies under this authority. They include, for example, observer teams and peacekeeping forces, investigation commissions, commissions charged with enforcement of restrictions on weapons and military activities, commissions charged with demarcation of boundaries, and committees charged with interpreting and administering sanctions regimes. In at least two recent cases, the Council has created subsidiary organs with judicial or quasi-judicial functions: the U.N. Compensation Commission, which decides on the compensation to be given to particular victims of the Gulf War;[26] and the International Tribunal for Rwanda, which has functions closely related to those of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia.[27]

The establishment of the International Tribunal was particularly appropriate in response to the situation in the former Yugoslavia. In Resolution 771, the Council expressly acted under Chapter VII in demanding that all parties to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia cease all breaches of international humanitarian law, reflecting the Council's determination that such violations constitute threats to international peace and security.[28] Such violations pose an ongoing obstacle to peace in the region as they provide motivation for revenge and fuel for those who would foment hatred among groups. Accordingly, an effort to establish the culpability of individuals responsible for atrocities and to deter future violations is a suitable and important step in removing the threat to international peace and security posed by the conflict.

Hence, the Council specifically decided in Resolution 827 that:

> . . . in the particular circumstances of the former Yugoslavia the establishment as an ad hoc measure by the Council of an-international tribunal and the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international law would enable this aim to be achieved and would contribute to the restoration and maintenance of peace. . . .

and that:

> . . . the establishment of an international tribunal and the prosecution of persons responsible for the above-mentioned violations of international humanitarian law will contribute to ensuring that such violations are halted and effectively redressed. . . .[29]

In our view, these decisions are clearly within the purview of the Council under Chapter VII. In creating the Tribunal, the Council was acting to deal with a specific urgent situation presenting a serious threat to the peace. It was not creating new standards for international humanitarian law, nor was it creating a permanent institution to deal with situations other than the former Yugoslavia.

* * * *

Counsel for the Accused argues that the creation of the Tribunal will obstruct rather than assist in the peace process and suggests instead that amnesty for those indicted would be more conducive to peace. This is, however, a judgment of policy and politics that is given by the U.N. Charter to the Security Council, and there is no basis for a judicial body to question that judgment.

In any event, we disagree with the conclusion offered by Counsel for the Accused. . . . Nor is it the case that the authority of the General Assembly has been infringed by the creation of the Tribunal.

The Assembly does not have the Council's Chapter VII authority to deal with threats to the peace or to obligate Member States to comply with Tribunal decisions. But even if the Assembly had all the necessary authority, this would not preclude the Council from exercising its own powers under Chapter VII. In fact, Article 12 of the Charter requires that the Assembly defer to the Council when the latter is exercising its Chapter VII authority in a particular situation.

Furthermore, Resolution 827 provides an ample role for the Assembly in the creation and operation of the Tribunal, including the election of its judges and the approval of its funding. . . . [T]he Assembly has in fact expressed its full support for the Tribunal, has elected its judges and has acted to provide financial support for its operations.[31]

In the case of violations of humanitarian law, the Council has now created ad hoc tribunals in the cases of Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia, and we trust the Council will consider similar action in any future instances of massive violations. It is unconvincing to suggest, as does Counsel for the Accused, that the Council's failure to take similar action with respect to conflicts of past decades in Korea, Vietnam, Algeria, Cambodia and the Belgian Congo somehow estops it from acting now. Such a concept would condemn the international community to refrain from actions necessary to maintain the peace because such actions had not been taken in the past. It would effectively prevent the international community from developing and advancing the system of international law.

c. Independence of the Tribunal.

Counsel for the Accused argues that the creation by the Security Council of the Tribunal necessarily impairs the independence of its judicial functions. We disagree. All judicial bodies are created by political acts; their degree of independence depends on the mandate and rules that govern their operations.

The independence of the Tribunal is prescribed by the mandate given to it by the Council in Resolution 827 and the Statute adopted thereby. Articles 12 and 13 of the Statute call for independent and impartial judges, and the oath of office prescribed by Tribunal rules [Rule 14A] requires an affirmation of impartiality. Article 16 provides that the Prosecutor will act independently and "shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other source." Articles 20 and 21 call for fair trial proceedings and require that the accused be presumed innocent until proved guilty. Article 25 provides a right of appeal against any miscarriage of justice. There is no basis for any allegation that the Tribunal is not independent or that it is subject to influence by the Council in the conduct of its judicial functions.

d. Sovereignty of States.

Counsel for the Accused argues that the creation of the Tribunal by the Security Council is inconsistent with the sovereignty of States under the Charter. We disagree.

The Tribunal was created pursuant to a treaty—the U.N. Charter to which all the relevant States are party. This acceptance of the Charter system was an exercise of the sovereignty of Member States and not an infringement upon it. Article 2(7) of the Charter, which states that the U.N. is not authorized to intervene in matters "which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state", specifically provides that "this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII." As explained above, the Council used this authority to take the measures it deemed necessary to restore and maintain the peace in the former Yugoslavia. Accordingly, that exercise was not an infringement on the sovereignty of any State.

Similarly, we disagree with the assertion by Counsel for the Accused that the creation of the Tribunal improperly gives the Council authority over individuals accused of offenses within the Tribunal's jurisdiction. The relevant law and precedents for the offenses in question here—genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity—clearly contemplate international as well as national action against the individuals responsible. Proscription of these crimes has long since acquired the status of customary international law, binding on all States, and such crimes have already been the subject of international prosecutions by the Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals. Moreover, criminal responsibility for these acts was a part of the law of the former Yugoslavia at the time the offenses were committed. The Council has simply created a new international mechanism for the trial of crimes that were already the subject of international responsiblity.

Moreover, many actions of the Council under Chapter VII directly affect individuals. For example, private individuals are precluded from various dealings with sanctioned countries, and the nationals of sanctioned countries are placed under significant financial and other restrictions. Private individuals are the subject of proceedings under the operations of the U.N. Compensation Commission. Persons who attack or obstruct peacekeeping and enforcement forces authorized by the Council are subject to detention or, if necessary, the use of deadly force.[35] The fact that individuals are affected by Council action in no way invalidates such action.

The Tribunal operates against individuals in the normal way that other international regimes do—that is, through the actions of national and local authorities. The Tribunal acquires custody over individuals by requesting that such authorities defer to the competence of the Tribunal and deliver persons against whom arrest warrants have been issued. During trial, the authorities of the host State detain the accused.

Upon conviction, sentences of imprisonment are carried out by authorities of States which have agreed to serve this function.

e. Involvement in humanitarian law.

Counsel for the Accused argues that it is improper for the Security Council to become involved in humanitarian law. We disagree. All organs of the U.N. are obligated to support and comply with international law in their operations. In the case of the Security Council, the furtherance of international humanitarian law is essential to the accomplishment of one its core functions—the maintenance of international peace and security under Chapter VII.

The Council has often determined that adherence to humanitarian law was an important element in the restoration of peace in particular situations. In fact, it may determine that one of the most serious obstacles to the restoration of peace is the commission of atrocities, which can inflame mutual passions and engender a cycle of violence and reprisal. Accordingly, the Council has frequently called for observance of humanitarian law obligations and has taken steps to encourage observance or to redress the victims of violations. For example, in the case of the invasion of Kuwait, the Council called frequently for compliance with various humanitarian law norms, and later took decisive action to terminate such violations and to provide compensation for the victims. In the case of the various conflicts in the Middle East, the Council has frequently addressed humanitarian law issues and called upon States to comply with humanitarian law obligations. In the case of Rwanda, the Council likewise demanded compliance with such obligations and took various actions—including the creation of a tribunal to try offenders—to deal with violations. Contrary to the suggestion of Counsel for the Accused, the International Committee of the Red Cross has not criticized the creation of the Yugoslav Tribunal, but has supported this action.[40] Moreover, the Council has not attempted to create new humanitarian law or to interfere with the way in which such law is developed. The law to be applied by the Tribunal is well established by conventional and customary law,[41] and affirmed by the General Assembly.[42] Accordingly, the Council's involvement in the enforcement of settled humanitarian law in the case of the former Yugoslavia in response to a threat to international peace and security in the former Yugoslavia is fully consistent with the Council's mandate.

A magistrate judge denied the U.S. Government's first request for surrender, holding that Public Law 104–106, authorizing surrender to the ICTR, was unconstitutional because extradition required a treaty; alternatively, probable cause had not been established. In re Surrender of Ntakirutimana, 988 F. Supp. 1038 (S.D. Tex. 1997). In response to a second request for surrender filed by the United States, the district court judge certified Ntakirutimana's surrender, finding the statute to be constitutional and all other requirements met. In re Surrender of Ntakirutimana, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22173, No. CIV. A. L-98-43 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 5, 1998). The district court denied Ntakirutimana's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed. Ntakirutimana v. Reno, 184 F.3d 419 (5th Cir. 1999), cert denied, 528 U.S. 1135 (2000). Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright signed the warrant to surrender Ntakirutimana at the beginning of March 2000.

Excerpts below from the Fifth Circuit opinion provide the basis for its conclusion that the surrender of Ntakirutimana to the ICTR was constitutional (most footnotes omitted). The Fifth Circuit also found that evidence was sufficient to establish probable cause. The court found Ntakirutimana's arguments challenging the authority of the Security Council to establish the ICTR and maintaining that the ICTR was incapable of protecting his rights, to be beyond the scope of habeas corpus review. See also Digest 2000 at 203–16 providing excerpts from the U.S. brief in opposition to the writ of certiorari and d.(2) below concerning the establishment of the ICTR.

Rwanda has been the source of ongoing ethnic conflict between members of the majority Hutus and minority Tutsis. In April 1994, President Juvenal Habyarimana of Rwanda, a Hutu, was killed when his aircraft crashed due to an artillery attack. The crash triggered a wave of violence by the Hutus against the Tutsis, which resulted in the deaths of between 500,000 and one-million persons. Tutsi rebels triumphed over the Hutus, and the Tutsi-dominated government then requested the U.N. to create an international war crimes tribunal. An investigation by the U.N. established that the mass exterminations of the Tutsis—motivated by ethnic hatred—had been planned for months. . . .

. . . In 1996, Congress enacted Public Law 104–106 to implement the [U.S.-ICTR] Agreement. . . . Among the statutory provisions made applicable is 18 U.S.C. § 3184. This section authorizes a judicial officer to hold a hearing to consider a request for surrender. If the judicial officer finds the evidence sufficient to sustain the charges under the treaty or convention, then the officer certifies to the Secretary of State that the individual may be surrendered. See also 18 U.S.C. § 3186 (conferring final authority on the Secretary of State to order a fugitive's surrender where a judicial officer has ruled that the requirements for extradition have been met).

III. Ntakirutimana alleges that Article II of the Constitution of the United States requires that an extradition occur pursuant to a treaty. It is unconstitutional, he claims, to extradite him to the ICTR pursuant to a statute in the absence of a treaty. Accordingly, he claims it is unconstitutional to extradite him on the basis of the Agreement and Pub. Law 104–106 (the "Congressional-Executive Agreement"). The district court concluded that it is constitutional to surrender Ntakirutimana in the absence of an "extradition treaty," because a statute authorized extradition. We review this legal issue de novo. See United States v. Luna, 165 F.3d 316, 319 (5th Cir. 1999), cert. denied, 526 U.S. 1126, 119 S. Ct. 1783, 143 L. Ed. 2d 811 (1999) (reviewing constitutionality of extradition statute de novo).

To determine whether a treaty is required to extradite Ntakirutimana, we turn to the text of the Constitution. Ntakirutimana contends that Article II, Section 2, Clause 2 of the Constitution requires a treaty to extradite. This Clause, which enumerates the President's foreign relations power, provides in part that "[the President] shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls. . . ." U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. This provision does not refer either to extradition or to the necessity of a treaty to extradite. The Supreme Court has explained, however, that the power to surrender is clearly included within the treaty-making power and the corresponding power of appointing and receiving ambassadors and other public ministers." Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 289, 22 S. Ct. 484, 492, 46 L. Ed. 534 (1902) (citation omitted).

Yet, the Court has found that the Executive's power to surrender fugitives is not unlimited. In Valentine v. United States, 299 U.S. 5, 57 S. Ct. 100, 81 L. Ed. 5 (1936), the Supreme Court considered whether an exception clause[11] in the United States' extradition treaty with France implicitly granted to the Executive the discretionary power to surrender citizens. The Court first stated that the power to provide for extradition is a national power that "is not confided to the Executive in the absence of treaty or legislative provision." Id. at 8, 57 S. Ct. at 102. The Court explained:

[11] The exception clause provided, 'Neither of the contracting Parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens or subjects under the stipulations of this convention.' Valentine, 299 U.S. at 7, 57 S. Ct. at 102 (citations omitted). Historically, "where treaties have provided for the extradition of persons without exception, the United States has always construed its obligation as embracing its citizens." Id. (citation omitted). Exception clauses excuse a government from surrendering its own citizens. [Editors' note: Subsequently, in 1990, 18 U.S.C. § 3196 was enacted, providing that citizens of the United States may be extradited even 'if the applicable treaty or convention does not obligate the United States to extradite its citizens to a foreign country,' if other requirements for extradition are met.]

> [The power to extradite] rests upon the fundamental consideration that the Constitution creates no executive prerogative to dispose of the liberty of the individual. Proceedings against him must be authorized by law. There is no executive discretion to surrender him to a foreign government, unless that discretion is granted by law. It necessarily follows that as the legal authority does not exist save as it is given by act of Congress or by the terms of a treaty, it is not enough that the statute or treaty does not deny the power to surrender. It must be found that statute or treaty confers the power.

Id. at 9, 57 S. Ct. at 102.

* * * *

Valentine indicates that a court should look to whether a treaty or statute grants executive discretion to extradite. Hence, Valentine supports the constitutionality of using the Congressional-Executive Agreement to extradite Ntakirutimana. Ntakirutimana attempts to distinguish Valentine on the ground that the case dealt with a treaty between France and the United States. Yet, Valentine indicates that a statute suffices to confer authority on the President to surrender a fugitive. See id. Ntakirutimana suggests also that Valentine expressly challenged the power of Congress, independent of treaty, to provide for extradition. Valentine, however, did not place a limit on Congress's power to provide for extradition. See id. at 9, 57 S. Ct. at 102 ("Whatever may be the power of the Congress to provide for extradition independent of treaty . . ."). Thus, although some authorization by law is necessary for the Executive to extradite, neither the Constitution's text nor Valentine require that the authorization come in the form of a treaty.

* * * *

. . . Ntakirutimana does not cite to any provision in the Constitution or any aspect of its history that requires a treaty to extradite. Ntakirutimana's argument, which is not specific to extradition, is premised on the assumption that a treaty is required for an international agreement. To the contrary, "the Constitution, while expounding procedural requirements for treaties alone, apparently contemplates alternate modes of international agreements." Laurence H. Tribe, AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW § 4–5, at 228–29 (2d ed. 1988) (explaining that Article 1, § 10 of the Constitution refers to other international devices that may be used by the federal government). "The Supreme Court has recognized that of necessity the President may enter into certain binding agreements with foreign nations not strictly congruent with the formalities required by the Constitution's Treaty Clause." United States v. Walczak, 783 F.2d 852, 855 (9th Cir. 1986) (citations omitted) (executive agreement). More specifically, the Supreme Court has repeatedly stated that a treaty or statute may confer the power to extradite. See, e.g., Valentine, 299 U.S. at 18, 57 S. Ct. at 106; Grin v. Shine, 187 U.S. 181, 191, 23 S. Ct. 98, 102, 47 L. Ed. 130 (1902) ("Congress has a perfect right to provide for the extradition of criminals in its own way, with or without a treaty to that effect, and to declare that foreign criminals shall be surrendered upon such proofs of criminality as it may judge sufficient." (citation omitted)); Terlinden, 184 U.S. at 289, 22 S. Ct. at 492 ("In the United States, the general opinion and practice have been that extradition should be declined in the absence of a conventional or legislative provision." (citation omitted)).

Ntakirutimana next argues that historical practice establishes that a treaty is required to extradite. According to Ntakirutimana, the United States has never surrendered a person except pursuant to an Article II treaty, and the only involuntary transfers without an extradition treaty have been to "a foreign country or territory 'occupied by or under the control of the United States.'" Valentine, 299 U.S. at 9, 57 S. Ct. at 102. This argument fails for numerous reasons. First, Valentine did not suggest that this "historical practice" limited Congress's power. See id. at 9, 57 S. Ct. at 102–03. Second, the Supreme Court's statements that a statute may confer the power to extradite also reflect a historical understanding of the Constitution. See, e.g., id. at 18, 57 S. Ct. at 106; Grin, 187 U.S. at 191, 23 S. Ct. at 102; Terlinden, 184 U.S. at 289, 22 S. Ct.

at 492. Even if Congress has rarely exercised the power to extradite by statute, a historical understanding exists nonetheless that it may do so. Third, in some instances in which a fugitive would not have been extraditable under a treaty, a fugitive has been extradited pursuant to a statute that "filled the gap" in the treaty. See, e.g., Hilario v. United States, 854 F. Supp. 165 (E.D.N.Y. 1994) (upholding extradition pursuant to a post-Valentine statute that granted executive discretion to extradite). Thus, we are unconvinced that the President's practice of usually submitting a negotiated treaty to the Senate reflects a historical understanding that a treaty is required to extradite.

(2) Authority of the Security Council to establish the ICTR

On April 4, 1997, a declaration by Michael J. Matheson, Acting Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, was filed in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas responding to issues concerning the ICTR raised by Ntakirutimana in the extradition proceedings. A number of the same issues had already been addressed by the U.S. brief in Tadic and resolved as to the ICTY by the appellate chamber serving both the ICTY and the ITCR. Excerpts provided below from the declaration address only additional matters specifically related to the ICTR, or raised in the extradition proceedings, including the obligation of the members of the United Nations to comply with Security Council resolutions, and the Report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services on the audit and investigation of the ICTR. (Most footnotes omitted)

The full text of Mr. Matheson's declaration is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

1. I am the Acting Legal Adviser in the Department of State. I have held this position since June 1996, have been Deputy Legal Adviser since 1983, and have been employed by the Department of State as an attorney since 1972. The Office of the Legal Adviser is responsible for providing legal advice to the Secretary of State, including matters relating to the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (the Tribunal). During the course of these responsibilities, I have become familiar with the law relating to the Tribunal and the United Nations. I was personally involved in the establishment of the Tribunal and in the drafting of its Statute. The following is based on my personal knowledge and information available to me as part of my official duties.

2. Authority under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations to create a tribunal. The establishment of the Tribunal to try offenses under international humanitarian law is within the authority of the Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.

* * * *

The establishment of the Tribunal was particularly appropriate in response to the situation in Rwanda. In creating the Tribunal, the Council was acting to deal with a specific urgent situation presenting a serious threat to the peace. An effort to establish the culpability of individuals responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law—and to deter future violations of international humanitarian law—is a suitable and important step in removing the threat to international peace and security posed by the conflict.

Furthermore, it is essential to the establishment and maintenance of a lasting peace that there be some impartial mechanism to bring to justice those responsible for the atrocities committed during the conflict. Thus, providing for the surrender and trial of those accused of atrocities raises important foreign policy issues.

Moreover, it is not the case that the authority of the General Assembly has been infringed by the creation of the Tribunal. The Assembly does not have the Council's Chapter VII authority to deal with threats to the peace or to obligate Member States to comply with Tribunal decisions. But even if the Assembly had all the necessary authority, this would not preclude the Council from exercising its own powers under Chapter VII. In fact, Article 12 of the Charter requires that the Assembly defer to the Council when the latter is exercising its Chapter VII authority in a particular situation.

The Assembly has in fact expressed its full support for the Tribunal, has elected its judges and has acted to provide financial support for its operations.[14]

* * * *

Moreover, the Tribunal is not otherwise in violation of international law. The establishment of the Tribunal is not inconsistent with the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) 6 International Legal Materials 368 (1967), 999 TINTS 171 and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), G.A. Res. 271 A, U.N. Doc. A/819 (1948). Indeed, the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Tribunal of 29 June 1995, ITR/3/Rev4, provide full due process for the accused that are fully consistent with the ICCPR and the UDHR.

These various issues have been considered and resolved with respect to the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia by the Appeals Chamber of that Tribunal (which, under the Statute for the Rwanda Tribunal, also has jurisdiction over appeals from the Trial Chambers of the Rwanda Tribunal).

Furthermore the UDHR is not a treaty and thus bestows no rights on litigants in U.S. courts. While the ICCPR is a treaty, to which the United States is party, a declaration filed with its instrument of ratification clearly conveyed the U.S. intention that it not be self-executing and as a result confers no rights directly on U.S. litigants which can form the basis for relief in U.S. courts, 31 International Legal Materials 648 (1992).

3. Members of the United Nations have an obligation to comply with Security Council Resolutions. The duty of Members of the United Nations to comply with resolutions of the Security Council is made expressly clear in the U.N. Charter. For example, under [14] GA. Res. 51/215, U.N. GAOR, 51st Session, 89th mtg at op. para. 2, U.N. Doc. A/RES/51/215 (1996) (appropriating funds to the Tribunal); G.A. Res. 213, U.N. GAOR, 50th Session, 100th mtg at op. para. 1, U.N. Doc, A/RES/50/213 (1995) (appropriating funds to the Tribunal).

Article 24(1) of the Charter, Members "confer on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the Security Council acts on their behalf." Pursuant to Article 25, Members "agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with" the Charter. Article 103 provides, further, that "[i]n the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members . . . and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail."

Security Council Resolution 955 of November 8, 1994, which created the Tribunal, was a valid exercise of the Council's authority under Chapter VII of the Charter. It decided that "all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs . . . and that consequently all States shall take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the present resolution and the Statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under Article 28 of the Statute. . . ." Article 28 of the Statute, which was adopted by the Council in Resolution 955, provides that "States shall comply without undue delay with any request for assistance or an order issued by a Trial Chamber, including, but not limited to . . . the arrest or detention of persons" and "the surrender or the transfer of the accused to the International Tribunal for Rwanda." Accordingly, the United States has an obligation under the Charter to comply with the order of the Tribunal to surrender the accused to the Tribunal.

4. Report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services on the audit and investigation of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (fn. omitted). In response to a request by the United Nations General Assembly [Resolution 213C (1996)], the Office of Internal Oversight Services conducted an audit and investigation of the Tribunal. The report stated that the judicial independence of the Tribunal is unquestioned. The integrity of the judges and the fairness of trials have not been questioned in the report. Moreover, there is nothing in the report which indicates that the accused would not be able to retain adequate counsel, or otherwise put forward a vigorous defense, under rules which provide due process. Indeed, none of the shortcomings cited in the report bear on the validity of the charges against the accused. However, mismanagement was found and recommendations were made to address the shortcomings identified. The Secretary General has moved promptly to institute necessary changes. The Registrar and the Deputy Prosecutor have been removed from their positions. A new Registrar has been hired. An active search is underway for a Deputy Prosecutor. Attention is being given to witness protection. The other areas where shortcomings were reported, particularly those of a management and administrative nature, are being addressed.

5. The alleged conduct of the accused was a criminal offense at the time and place it occurred. . . . Therefore, it cannot be argued that the accused is being prosecuted for conduct that was not criminal at the time and place it occurred, or that the accused could not reasonably have foreseen that he could be liable to prosecution for murder, genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law.

f. Cambodia

In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific, June 10, 1998, Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Stanley O. Roth provided an update on the situation in Cambodia. Mr. Roth's testimony focused on the prospects in Cambodia for free, fair and credible elections following the seizure of power by Hun Sen in 1997. In concluding, Mr. Roth turned to the issue of bringing Khmer Rouge leaders to justice, as excerpted below. The United States worked with the United Nations and Cambodia to draft legislation to establish Extraordinary Chambers, which would have both international and domestic participation. On October 4, 2004, the legislation was ratified by the Cambodian government. See also Digest 2002 at 148.

I know our primary purpose today was to review the prospects for Cambodia's elections, but I would be remiss if I did not reiterate our policy on justice and accountability for those senior Khmer Rouge leaders responsible for genocide against the Cambodian people, and other serious violations of humanitarian law. Despite the death of Pol Pot in April, we believe strongly that those surviving senior Khmer Rouge leaders responsible for such crimes from 1975–1979 should be held accountable. We have discussed this issue with many governments over the last year, and have made it clear we are prepared to support—and work to implement—any of a variety of options, should these senior Khmer Rouge leaders become accessible to the international community. Our preferred option is to establish an international tribunal similar to the ones established for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. We have circulated a draft resolution with United Nations Security Council members that would accomplish this task.

2. International Criminal Court

a. Preparatory work for the establishment of an international criminal court.

On May 13, 1993, the United States submitted comments to the Secretary-General on the Report of the International Law Commission's Working Group on the Question of an International Criminal Jurisdiction, in accordance with Resolution 47/33 of the UN General Assembly, dated November 25, 1992. U.N. Doc. A/RES/47/33 (1992). See 87 Am. J. Int'l L. 595, 604 (1993). An ILC draft statute for the International Criminal Court was submitted to the United Nations General Assembly in 1994. U.N. GAOR, 49th Sess., Supp. No. 10, U.N. Doc. A/49/10 (1994). On February 17, 1995, the General Assembly established the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of the International Criminal Court to consider major substantive issues arising from the ILC's draft Statute. G.A. Res. 49/53, U.N. Doc. A/RES/49/53 (1994).

Following consideration of a report by the ad hoc committee, on December 11, 1995, the General Assembly established the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court to prepare a draft for submission to a future diplomatic conference. G.A. Res. 50/46, U.N. Doc. A/RES/50/46 (1995). The preparatory committee met from 1996 to 1998.

Since 1994 the UN Sixth Committee (Legal) had regularly included an agenda item on the establishment of an International Criminal Court, and produced a resolution for adoption by the General Assembly. In the Sixth Committee debate, many states, including the United States, presented their views on the then current issues. In a November 1, 1995, statement, Deputy Legal Adviser Jamison S. Borek, U.S. Department of State, described recent efforts, provided the U.S. views on these efforts, and made suggestions for future work on this topic. See U.N. Doc. A/C.6/50/SR.27 (1995).

I would like to touch upon where we have been, where we are, and where we are going. Where we have been is the beginning of an important debate on the substance of establishing a new institution, one which would have a far-reaching impact on world society, and thus one which requires considerable care in its construction and a broad consensus for success.

In 1993, the International Law Commission presented the Sixth Committee with a draft statute that allowed us to proceed beyond the largely academic debate of the prior decades, and focused attention on the details of establishing a court.

Based on comments by Member States here in the Sixth Committee, the Commission revised and further improved its draft, presented it to us, and challenged us to take the next steps. As a result, a year ago, we met to consider those further steps. Many States believed that the time was ripe for convening a diplomatic conference to seek agreement on a final text of the statute for a court. The United States and other States believed that there were still many uncertainties with the draft and requested the Sixth Committee to establish instead an Ad Hoc Committee to allow governments to review and assess the issues involved.

The Ad Hoc Committee met for four weeks in two sessions this past year. Delegations came prepared to provide detailed perspectives on the issues presented. The United States provided extensive comments, both in writing and during the Committee sessions. We did so both in comments submitted to the Secretary-General, and in non-papers made available to those participating in the work of the Committee.

In the view of my delegation, the work has resulted in significant progress. . . .

As the report of the Committee states, "further work on the establishment of an international criminal court has to be done." We embrace the challenge and look forward to a year of intensive work to improve upon the ILC draft statute, including thorough discussions of key issues and the drafting of some revised texts.

All of us have undertaken this task not only in the shadows of history, but also among and in response to the atrocities of our own time. The United States Government's support to the two UN war crimes tribunals has been second to none. Recognizing the challenge before us, President Clinton recently said that "nations all around the world who value freedom and tolerance [should] establish a permanent international court to prosecute, with the support of the United Nations Security Council, serious violations of humanitarian law." Such a permanent international court, in the President's words, "would be the ultimate tribute to the people who did such important work at Nuremburg. . . ." We now need to focus our next steps on what is critically needed to address violations of international humanitarian law and what is pragmatically achievable in a reasonable period of time. . . .

There are many critical issues that need to be explored in greater depth and, we hope, resolved. If we approach the court from an academically pure perspective, without regard for political realities and what States are willing to participate in and fund, we will have wasted our time. The United States has consistently cautioned against unrealistic propositions that would create a court that would be ineffective. Those who wish to accelerate the work of the court need to avoid futile proposals and press for the achievable.

We believe the discussions in the Ad Hoc Committee showed a growing consensus to restrict the jurisdiction of the court to genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. We also heard many governments attracted to the proposition that crimes under the Torture Convention and the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel be incorporated in an appropriate manner into the court's jurisdiction, and we share that attraction. We do not believe that there is enough support to sustain aggression, drug crimes, terrorism crimes, or violations of the Apartheid Convention within the court's jurisdiction. The crimes of terrorism and drug crimes also present particular problems of investigation and prosecution which the court would inevitably be ill-equipped to address. These are crimes committed as part of the ongoing activity of international criminal organizations. The investigation of these crimes requires major police and technical resources which the court will not have. The prosecution of these crimes, moreover, does not occur in isolation, but rather as part of an overall investigative and prosecutorial strategy, in which the choice of who to prosecute and when and how is calculated in order to end the workings of the organization as a whole and to reach the key figures at the top. These cases are thus essentially tied to national investigations and would require a fundamentally different regime, which at best would significantly complicate the design and workings of the court.

We also view the inclusion of the crime of aggression as highly problematic on numerous grounds. This is fundamentally a crime of States, as to which the Security Council would have to play a central role. It thus presents all the risks of politicization in a serious form. It is, moreover, a crime which is still very ill defined. The Nuremburg Tribunal did not have to confront this problem, as it was dealing, after the fact, with a clear and specific case. In the abstract, however, it is not at all universally established what fits even within the limited concept of "waging a war of aggression." What are the possible defenses or mitigating factors in connection with such a charge? What if it concerns disputed territory? Where there is a conflict which is settled by reference to the International Court of Justice, for example, does the losing party automatically become guilty of an aggressive war? What about controversial concepts such as humanitarian intervention or a war of liberation? Including the crime of aggression would require clear, universally-accepted answers to these questions. In short, Mr. Chairman, we join those who support focusing, in the first instance, on the core crimes of international humanitarian law for which there is universal support.

The proposal, endorsed by some governments but never proposed by the International Law Commission, that the court have "inherent jurisdiction" over violations of humanitarian law (other than possibly the crime of genocide) is ill-conceived in our view and will not achieve the broad support necessary for a viable court. We have provided our views on this on a number of occasions, and will continue to do so.

The question of consent deserves further consideration, as the current focus on territoriality will often yield unfair and illogical results. As it stands, moreover, the nationals of a State could be subject to investigation and prosecution when the State itself is not even party to the court. As many have noted, it is also important to elaborate further the principle of complementarity. We believe that bona fide national investigations and prosecutions will always be preferable, where possible, for many reasons. We believe that, for a permanent court which will face many possible and unknown cases, national jurisdiction should enjoy a presumption of regularity. It is not appropriate simply to mirror the War Crimes Tribunal provisions, as these were designed with specific situations in mind, in which one could fairly prejudge the incapacity of national institutions when the statutes were designed. It requires no subtle judgment when institutions are wholly destroyed or incapable of functioning due to armed conflict. It is a much more difficult, intrusive and subtle judgment to say that a functioning national system is not bona fide.

There is an important role for the Security Council to play in the work of the court. We have heard the role of the Security Council criticized as unduly tainting the independence of a judicial body. Ironically, allowing a State unfettered discretion to launch cases against another State, regardless of whether the resulting international prosecution would be necessary or effective, has even greater potential for political misuse. Under the current draft, the initiation of cases would be subject to whatever political agenda a particular State may have, rather than a collective decision by the Council that in fact would be less likely to reflect a political bias than that of an individual State. In any event, the reality of the hard core categories of crimes is that they are in almost all cases relevant to the matters of which the Security Council is likely to be seized, and which are part of the Council's mandate under the Charter of the United Nations to maintain and restore international peace and security. A primary purpose in establishing a permanent international criminal court is to avoid the necessity of the Security Council establishing ad hoc tribunals to deal with crimes arising under international humanitarian law. The statute should recognize the authority of the Security Council to refer situations to the court, and to do so in a way, as the delegation of Canada suggested on Monday, that will ensure that all States must cooperate with the court. At the same time, however, it would be for the prosecutor and the court—not the Security Council—to decide which specific cases should be initiated and against whom. As others have noted, the court must be an independent judicial institution, without interference from political bodies. The role of the Security Council thus can be defined so that it in no way undermines the judicial independence of the court, its judges and its prosecutor, but rather strengthens the court in addressing the important cases that would be part of its mandate.

Beyond questions of subject matter jurisdiction, many other issues need to be resolved, including the structure, organization and financing of the court, its primacy in relation to bona fide State jurisdiction, and the rules of evidence and procedure under which it would function. While the UN ad hoc tribunals provide a point of departure, the creation of a permanent institution of more general jurisdiction raises many problems which the drafters of the tribunal statutes did not have to resolve.

It is important to continue work in the same spirit and approach as the Ad Hoc Committee. In particular, we must ensure that all critical issues are carefully reviewed. It is essential not to set unrealistic deadlines for this work. Further deliberation is needed to ensure thoughtful review of the remaining issues and to garner the kind of widespread support needed for a truly effective and global court.

* * * *

In our prior interventions, we have touched on the many issues that will need to be reviewed. We must ensure that the due process rights of defendants are protected. We must ensure that legitimate efforts of local authorities to investigate and prosecute crimes are not harmed, while at the same time providing the court with sufficient authority so that it can act effectively where it has jurisdiction. . . . [W]e must not rush a decision that could, as a result of haste, allow us to wind up with a court that is ineffective and not widely endorsed.

In sum, my delegation is ready to move forward with attempts to establish a permanent international criminal court. We are mindful of the difficulties inherent in establishing a new institution of such complexity, but we stand ready to make a diligent effort, in every hope of a successful conclusion.

An address by David J. Scheffer, U.S. Ambassador at Large for War Crimes Issues, at the Peace Palace, The Hague, the Netherlands on September 19, 1997, entitled "The Future of International Criminal Justice" discussed the state of negotiations at that time. Excerpts below describe the U.S. position on the independence of the court and the U.S. proposal for a requirement of Security Council or State Party referral of "situations" to the Prosecutor for further investigation as to charges against specific individuals.

As we approach the 21st century, individuals—of whatever rank in society—who participate in serious and widespread international crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, or war crimes must no longer act with impunity. Throughout history the "enemy" has been the belligerent nation or rebel army threatening international peace and security. But the other reality is that war criminals and genocidaire are the common enemies of all civilized peoples. They must come to learn that while they may run, they cannot escape the long reach of international law that finally shows some promise of being enforced. There is no doubt that the Yugoslav and Rwanda Tribunals have been critical first steps. But in the 21st Century we will need a permanent court that both deters such heinous crimes globally and stands prepared to investigate and prosecute their perpetrators.

As the head of the U.S. delegation to those talks, I can confirm that the precedents being established in The Hague and in Arusha inform the discussions and stimulate much deliberation. There is no question that the momentum of the UN talks is driven in significant part by the example of the ad hoc tribunals and the need to ensure that a similar institution of justice will be available in the future.

* * * *

It is appropriate that in this historic chamber I discuss the issue that particularly vexes the UN talks, namely the independence of the ICC. There have been those governments which argue that the independence of the Court is assured only if the Prosecutor has unfettered authority to initiate cases, without any role for the Security Council or the consent of interested states. There are other governments which insist on the consent of a range of states before any case can be prosecuted before the ICC.

The United States has proposed an alternative procedure that we believe best ensures both the independence of the ICC and the practical use of the Court to prosecute crimes of genocide, humanity, and war. In our view, no case should be initiated by the Prosecutor unless the over-all situation pertaining to that case has been referred to the Prosecutor. But once there has been a referral, the Prosecutor has discretion to investigate and prosecute an individual case.

Therefore, under the U.S. proposal neither a State Party nor the Security Council would lodge a complaint against a single individual with the Prosecutor. The Prosecutor, and the Prosecutor alone, would determine whom to investigate and whom to seek indictments against. He or she would have the expertise and capabilities—more so than a State Party or the Security Council—to conduct investigations and make the critical determinations of which individuals should be held criminally responsible for commission of the core crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes.

The targeting of an individual for criminal responsibility is serious business that should be as far removed from political considerations as possible; only a highly qualified and respected Prosecutor should be entrusted with that duty for the ICC if it is not being undertaken at the national level. In this respect, the independence of the Prosecutor would be qualified only in terms of other important provisions of the Statute. The United States has reserved its position on the consent of any States to the prosecution of a case pending further review of negotiations in other key issues, including the role of the Security Council and the strength of the complementarity regime, or deferral to national jurisdiction.

We believe that the Security Council and State Parties to the statute of the ICC should be empowered to refer overall situations to the Prosecutor where there has been apparent commission of one or more of the core crimes in the Court's jurisdiction. The referral would request the Prosecutor to investigate the situation for the purpose of determining whether one or more specific persons should be charged with commission of such crime. We have emphasized that the State Party should have to refer a situation or matter; the State Party would not lodge a complaint against one or more named individuals as contemplated by most other governments and by the International Law Commission in its draft statute. This procedure would mirror the referral procedure for the Security Council which is acceptable to a wide range of governments.

However, if the situation referred by the State Party to the ICC concerns a dispute or situation pertaining to international peace and security or an act of aggression which is being dealt with by the Security Council, then the Security Council should approve that referral of the entire situation to the ICC. In our view, the UN Charter responsibilities of the Security Council for the maintenance and restoration of international peace and security permit no alternative to that procedure.

Therefore, our proposal would require that no prosecution may be commenced before the ICC arising from a dispute or situation pertaining to international peace and security or an act of aggression which is being dealt with by the Security Council without the prior consent of the Security Council that such dispute or situation can be adjudicated, for purposes of individual criminal responsibility, by the ICC.

The referral power of the Security Council should be established so that the Council can bring to the ICC's attention situations that span the scope of the Council's responsibilities under the Charter, including both enforcement actions and peaceful actions relating to disputes the continuance of which would likely endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. We are, after all, striving to establish a court that will serve as a deterrent for the commission of core crimes as well as the judge of them. If peace can be served, and further core crimes deterred, with the rendering of justice by the ICC without the Security Council taking the extraordinary step of using its enforcement powers under Chapter VII of the Charter, then we believe that is a worthy procedure to incorporate in the statute of the Court.

If the Security Council were to act under Chapter VII in its referral of a situation to the ICC, then it could choose to direct the Court to exercise mandatory powers similar to those currently employed by the International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda. Whether or not the Council acts under Chapter VII, it could choose to refer a situation for action by the Court under whatever rules are finally established for complementarity and state consent. But governments need to keep in mind the Council's potential for a mandatory referral under Chapter VII authority as further progress is made in drafting the procedural rules of the Court, and then make whatever adjustments may be necessary.

The United States views the combination of the State Party referral procedure and the Security Council referral procedure as providing the ICC with a potentially wider and more significant range of cases to prosecute.

The Security Council is indeed a political institution, but then so too are governments. The argument we often hear that reference to the Security Council invites political influence into the work of the ICC continues to ignore the fact that any State Party lodging a complaint against a single individual also invites political influence into the work of the Court. Our proposal seeks to minimize political considerations in deciding which individuals to bring to the bar of justice. The U.S. proposal seeks to maximize the opportunities for both State Parties and the Security Council to bring whole-scale atrocities and war crimes to the doorstep of the Prosecutor and invite him or her to bring the perpetrators of those crimes to justice.

The United States recently proposed that the Security Council be expanded up to 20 or 21 Member States so that new permanent members could be added, including nations from the developing world. When the Security Council reform process concludes, we expect that the representation of a much wider cross-section of the global society will have been accomplished. Any decision that the Security Council makes with respect to the referral of a situation to the ICC thus will reflect the considered judgment of that larger and more representative group of nations. The Security Council is a principal, but not static, organ of the United Nations. The reform process reflects the interest of Member States in making sure the Security Council remains an effective and representative institution.

The grim reality of our effort to establish an international criminal court is that it is required to hold accountable the perpetrators of atrocities that presumably will occur in the future, since the ICC will have only prospective jurisdiction. This presumption is the darker vision of the next century. Our common hope must be that the establishment of a permanent court will defeat that presumption through the power of deterrence. Working with other governments, the United States will spare no effort to create a fair and effective permanent international criminal court as soon as possible to realize that hope.

This brings me to my final and most important point for you to consider today. There remains a widening and immediate gap in international criminal justice, between the two ad hoc International Tribunals established by the Security Council and the proposed ICC which will likely have only prospective jurisdiction. With increasing frequency, the Security Council is posed with the question of accountability for real-time and serious violations of international humanitarian law. "Tribunal fatigue" by Council Members and the still distant creation of a permanent court have combined to create a gap for mechanisms of accountability for massive crimes which have been committed in our times.

We must urgently fill this gap in our judicial institutions. The problem is complex, the solution illusive, and the political will of governments largely untested. But this is a challenge we must confront, today. The victims of too many atrocities and war crimes which have gone untended deserve our best efforts.

On October 23, 1997, Ambassador Bill Richardson, U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations, made a statement before the Sixth Committee (Legal) of the 52nd General Assembly regarding the agenda item "Establishment of an International Criminal Court." UNGAOR 6th Comm., 52nd Sess., Agenda Item 150, at 5–7, U.N. Doc. A/C.6/52 SR.13 (1998). The statement, building on Ambassador Scheffer's remarks, supra, provided U.S. views on the then upcoming diplomatic conference to adopt a statute for a permanent international criminal court.

The full text of Ambassador Richardson's statement is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

I am pleased to address the Sixth Committee on a subject of great importance to the United States and the international community. In this connection, I would like to recall today the remarks of the President of the United States to the General Assembly almost exactly a month ago. Speaking before the General Assembly on September 22, he said:

> To punish those responsible for crimes against humanity and to promote justice so that peace endures, we must maintain our strong support for the United Nations' war crime tribunals and truth commissions. And before the century ends, we should establish a permanent international court to prosecute the most serious violations of humanitarian law.

This reflects, of course, the fundamental position of support for a fair, efficient and effective court which we have expressed before, but with a particular emphasis on the timing which we now envision based on the road we see before us and developments and progress which have already occurred.

* * * *

The [court's] basic rules and procedures must necessarily include the fundamentals of the criminal law procedures of the court. Certainly we cannot expect to agree on, nor do we need to elaborate, every single rule. At the same time, however, we cannot leave the court as it stands now, totally formless and uncertain, torn between civil and common law. The fundamental outlines of procedure, including the important subject of defendants' rights, must be clear before any State is asked or expected to sign on to the court.

We must also finish the very considerable work that has already been done on general principles of criminal law. Further, we must clarify and elaborate the rules on the cooperation of States with the Tribunal, the powers of the Tribunal to compel and enforce cooperation, and the powers of the Tribunal to investigate on its own. Experience with the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, for example, demonstrates that effective rules in this area are a sine qua non for the future of an international criminal court.

It is neither prudent nor wise to leave such supposed "details" unresolved, as there may be surprising controversy and difference of opinion, and a total absence of shared assumptions, about even very simple, albeit essential, procedures and rules.

We must also still reach a common designation and better definition of crimes. It is in our view important that jurisdiction be confined initially to the truly "hard core" crimes of genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity. These crimes and the court's jurisdiction should, moreover, be further and more precisely defined so as to focus clearly on those well-established crimes of serious international concern.

* * * *

. . . . Another important area which remains to be resolved is that of the structure and administration of the Court, including the question of oversight and funding. As has also been shown by experience with the ad hoc tribunals, there are potential pitfalls in these areas as well, which can make the difference between the success and failure of a permanent court.

Based on our consideration of the question over the past years, we have come to the conclusion that the Court should not be a direct part of, or administratively dependent on, the United Nations. Obviously, a linkage with the Security Council is essential, because of the Security Council's central role in the maintenance of international peace and security and its mandatory and enforcement powers. At the same time, however, the court needs to function independently—not only from the Security Council, but even more critically from the vast bureaucracy, structure and unrelated operations of the United Nations.

* * * *

At the same time, the court will need some mechanisms of oversight by States parties. These would not be the large and relatively cumbersome mechanisms of the United Nations, nor should they be in any way intrusive of the independent functioning of the court.

Such a mechanism can be important, however, to ensure a necessary measure of oversight and accountability, especially as concerns fiscal matters, to guard against irreconcilable issues arising between the different and, to varying degrees, independent components of the Court, and to provide a mechanism for the approval of necessary adjustments which might be made from time to time, for example, in the rules of procedure.

In addition, as a corollary of the above and also as an independent matter, we believe that it is essential for there to be a treaty-based funding scheme. While it is reasonable for the United Nations to make a very significant contribution when a situation or matter is referred by the Security Council, it is not acceptable to expect the United Nations to bear the entire cost of the Court.

To do so risks dooming the ICC to a permanently underfunded status, on the one hand, while also jeopardizing the overall necessary budgetary constraints of the United Nations. There should not be a trade-off between U.N. programs and prosecutorial priorities, nor should the other operations of the United Nations wax and wane depending on the incidence of serious international crime. Moreover, independence from United Nations mechanisms entails fiscal independence as well.

These are only some of the more important issues which lie ahead of us. It is important to bring our best efforts, wisest judgment, and maximum flexibility to bear to see that they are resolved as quickly as possible in a way that best promotes the future authority, integrity, and effectiveness of the court.

On March 31, 1998, in remarks to the Washington College of Law, American University in Washington, D.C., Ambassador Scheffer addressed the issue of U.S. policy on international criminal tribunals. His remarks included a discussion of a recent U.S. proposal for strengthening complementarity—deferral to national systems—and the need for the court to avoid undermining efforts of countries such as the United States that "shoulder the burden of international security."

The Clinton Administration believes that a core purpose of an international criminal court must be to advance a simple norm: countries should bring to justice those who commit genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes, or turn suspects over to someone who will, such as an impartial and effective international court.

Our long-term vision is the prevention of heinous crimes through effective national law enforcement buttressed by the deterrence of an international court. The permanent court must ensure that national legal systems with the will and ability to prosecute persons who commit these crimes are permitted to do so, while guaranteeing that perpetrators of these crimes acting in countries without competent, functioning legal systems nonetheless will be held accountable.

In that spirit, the U.S. delegation introduced a proposal last week that would strengthen the principle of "complementarity" that requires deferral to capable national judicial systems. The U.S. proposal states that when a matter (that is, a situation in which crimes within the jurisdiction of the court may have been committed) has been referred to the Court, a State may step forward and commit itself to investigating its own citizens or others within its jurisdiction who may be suspects for commission of crimes in that matter. If the Prosecutor defers to that State, then there should be a certain period of time to allow the State to take the lead, following which the Prosecutor can challenge the State's performance if it proves lacking.

On the other hand, right at the outset the Prosecutor may decide that the requesting State's legal system has collapsed or is unavailable, or it is unable or unwilling to genuinely investigate and prosecute the suspects. Under those circumstances, the Prosecutor may seek the views of the Court to uphold or deny the decision to override State jurisdiction. The issue could be appealed to the Appeals Chamber, where a super-majority number of the Appeals judges would need to approve the Prosecutor's decision to launch investigations. We anticipate that expedited procedures for the judges' actions could be formulated in the Rules of the Court.

This proposal is extremely important to the United States Government. In our view, it takes account of our interest in protecting against unwarranted prosecutions of our nationals, as well as nationals of other responsible members of the international community, while ensuring the prosecution of those who should be brought before an international tribunal. Our proposal also seeks to honor a fundamental tenet of the principle of complementarity, namely, that at the outset of a referral of an overall matter, a State can seize the opportunity to enforce the law itself provided it is capable and willing to do so. Other governments are examining this proposal closely and the non-governmental community is beginning to comment on it.

Because of its responsibilities for international peace and security, the U.N. Security Council must have an important role in the permanent court's work. The jurisdiction of the court will involve many conflicts that are properly being addressed by the Security Council. The court cannot be used to undermine the Council's critical work. Governments need to agree on how to preserve this vital role for the Council while pursuing justice.

The Security Council also should be able to refer armed conflicts or atrocities to the court for investigation and direct all countries to cooperate with the court if necessary. The Council may need to assist the court with the enforcement of its orders.

Many governments and non-governmental organizations seek a prosecutor who can self-initiate investigations and seek indictments against anyone anywhere. Justice Arbour has spoken eloquently in support of this proposition. However, we believe there must be reasonable limits on the prosecutor's scope of action and reasonable procedures which will activate the prosecutor's powerful duties.

We have proposed that first a State Party to the treaty or the Security Council must refer an overall matter to the court. Then, provided the crimes are sufficiently grave, the prosecutor would be free to investigate the situation and prosecute alleged perpetrators. This would mirror the Yugoslav and Rwanda Tribunals and ensure that the prosecutor has the necessary backing to get the job done. If neither any State Party nor the Security Council believes that a situation should be referred to the Court, that speaks powerfully against the need or wisdom of court involvement.

At this session of the Preparatory Committee the U.S. delegation has been particularly concerned about complications in negotiating the fundamental stages of the criminal process. . . . We, along with a number of other delegations, believe it is imperative to develop a straightforward, simplified procedure that can stand as a common vision for delegations from a variety of jurisdictions and legal traditions. . . .

For example, there needs to be a single method for arrest of a person based upon an independent judicial determination of probable cause. In lieu of two or three different concepts in the negotiations about how one confirms or formalizes charges, there needs to be a form of preliminary hearing that satisfies civil and common law jurisdictions alike. Between those two stages, procedures for arrest and surrender by national authorities needs to be controlled by provisions of the statute which require much higher levels of agreement. While such issues may not be the grist of public debate, they are the gut of the Court's statute and negotiators' most time consuming endeavor. The outcome of this proposal remains open, but the reaction so far has been very encouraging.

What hard realities—beyond theory—must we all consider in connection with the negotiations for a permanent international criminal court? First, the permanent court must not handcuff governments that take risks to promote peace and security and undertake humanitarian missions. It should not be a political forum in which to challenge legitimate actions of responsible governments by targeting their military personnel for criminal investigation and prosecution. Human rights groups advocating speedy military interventions to save human lives should be most sensitive to this reality. Otherwise, ironically, a permanent court would undermine efforts to confront the worst assaults on humankind.

Many countries shoulder the burden of international security. The U.S. military, in particular, is called upon to carry out mandates of the Security Council, to help defend our allies and friends, to achieve humanitarian objectives, to combat international terrorism, to rescue Americans and others in danger, to prevent the proliferation or use of weapons of mass destruction, and to defend our national security from a wide range of threats. Other governments participate in our military alliances or in U.N. or other multinational peacekeeping operations. Our armed forces are deployed globally and need to be able to fulfill their legitimate responsibilities without unjustified exposure to criminal legal proceedings.

b. Rome Conference for the Adoption of the Statute of the International Criminal Court.

In its 52nd session, the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution to convene the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, subsequently held in Rome from June 15 to July 17, 1998. G.A. Res. 52/160, U.N. Doc. A/RES/52/160 (1998).

In remarks at Rome, July 15, 1998, Ambassador Scheffer commented on the status of ongoing negotiations on the establishment of the International Criminal Court. After reiterating the long standing U.S. support for creating an appropriate court, Ambassador Scheffer concluded:

> The world desperately needs this mechanism for international justice, but it must be a community, not a club. It will need the cooperation of governments to operate effectively, and it will not achieve its objectives by ignoring the legitimate concerns of many governments. The United States and other countries have critical responsibilities around the world that are crucial to the protection of civilian populations. A scheme that ignores > these responsibilities is not going to serve the vital interest of the court. . . . There is still time to achieve our common vision for international justice.

> The full text of his remarks is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1998/980715_scheffer_icc.html.
> On July 17, 1998, the Conference adopted the Statute of the International Criminal Court ("Rome Treaty") by a vote of 120–7, with twenty-one abstentions. The United States voted no. The United States explained its negative vote as set forth below. The full record of the explanations of vote can be found at www.un.org/icc/index.htm.

The United States does not accept the concept of jurisdiction in the Statute and its application over non-States parties. . . . Any attempt to elaborate a definition of the crime of aggression must take into account the fact that most of the time it was not an individual act, instead wars of aggression existed. The Statute must also recognize the role of the Security Council in determining that aggression has been committed. No State party can derogate from the power of the Security Council under the United Nations Charter, which has the responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.

The United States will not support resolution "e" in the final act. Including crimes of terrorism and drug crimes under the Court will not help the fight against those crimes. The problem is not one of prosecution but of investigation, and the Court will not be well equipped to do that.

c. U.S. views on adoption of the Rome Treaty

On July 23, 1998, Ambassador Scheffer testified on behalf of the Department of State before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. S. Hrg. Doc. No. 105–724 (1998). His testimony, excerpted below, reported on both the objectives achieved and the continuing concerns of the United States in the treaty adopted at the recently completed UN Diplomatic Conference on the Establishment of a permanent International Criminal Court.

Among the objectives we achieved in the statute of the court were the following:

— An improved regime of complementarity (meaning deferral to national jurisdictions) that provides significant protection, although not as much as we had sought.
— A role preserved for the UN Security Council, including the affirmation of the Security Council's power to intervene to halt the court's work.
— Sovereign protection of national security information that might be sought by the court.
— Broad recognition of national judicial procedures as a predicate for cooperation with the court.
— Coverage of internal conflicts, which comprise the vast majority of armed conflicts today.
— Important due process protections for defendants and suspects.
— Viable definitions of war crimes and crimes against humanity, including the incorporation in the statute of elements of offenses. We are not entirely satisfied with how the elements have been incorporated in the treaty, but at least they will be a required part of the court's work. We also were not willing to accept the wording proposed for a war crime covering the transfer of population into occupied territory.
— Recognition of gender issues.
— Acceptable provisions based on command responsibility and superior orders.
— Rigorous qualifications for judges.

— Acceptance of the basic principle of state party funding.
— An Assembly of States Parties to oversee the management of the court.
— Reasonable amendment procedures.
— A sufficient number of ratifying states before the treaty can enter into force, namely 60 governments have to ratify the treaty.

The U.S. delegation also sought to achieve other objectives in Rome that in our view are critical. I regret to report that certain of these objectives were not achieved and therefore we could not support the draft that emerged on July 17th.

First, while we successfully defeated initiatives to empower the court with universal jurisdiction, a form of jurisdiction over non-party states was adopted by the conference despite our strenuous objections. In particular, the treaty specifies that, as a precondition to the jurisdiction of the court over a crime, either the state of territory where the crime was committed or the state of nationality of the perpetrator of the crime must be a party to the treaty or have granted its voluntary consent to the jurisdiction of the court. We sought an amendment to the text that would have required both of these countries to be party to the treaty or, at a minimum, would have required that only the consent of the state of nationality of the perpetrator be obtained before the court could exercise jurisdiction. We asked for a vote on our proposal, but a motion to take no action was overwhelmingly carried by the vote of participating governments in the conference.

We are left with consequences that do not serve the cause of international justice. Since most atrocities are committed internally and most internal conflicts are between warring parties of the same nationality, the worst offenders of international humanitarian law can choose never to join the treaty and be fully insulated from its reach absent a Security Council referral. Yet multinational peacekeeping forces operating in a country that has joined the treaty can be exposed to the court's jurisdiction even if the country of the individual peacekeeper has not joined the treaty. Thus, the treaty purports to establish an arrangement whereby U.S. armed forces operating overseas could be conceivably prosecuted by the international court even if the United States has not agreed to be bound by the treaty. Not only is this contrary to the most fundamental principles of treaty law, it could inhibit the ability of the United States to use its military to meet alliance obligations and participate in multinational operations, including humanitarian interventions to save civilian lives. Other contributors to peacekeeping operations will be similarly exposed.

Mr. Chairman, the U.S. delegation certainly reduced exposure to unwarranted prosecutions by the international court through our successful efforts to build into the treaty a range of safeguards that will benefit not only us but also our friends and allies. But serious risks remain because of the document's provisions on jurisdiction.

Our position is clear: Official actions of a non-party state should not be subject to the court's jurisdiction if that country does not join the treaty, except by means of Security Council action under the UN Charter. Otherwise, the ratification procedure would be meaningless for governments. In fact, under such a theory, two governments could join together to create a criminal court and purport to extend its jurisdiction over everyone, everywhere in the world. There will necessarily be cases where the international court cannot and should not have jurisdiction unless the Security Council decides otherwise. The United States has long supported the right of the Security Council to refer situations to the court with mandatory effect, meaning that any rogue state could not deny the court's jurisdiction under any circumstances. We believe this is the only way, under international law and the UN Charter, to impose the court's jurisdiction on a non-party state. In fact, the treaty reaffirms this Security Council referral power. Again, the governments that collectively adopt this treaty accept that this power would be available to assert jurisdiction over rogue states.

Second, as a matter of policy, the United States took the position in these negotiations that states should have the opportunity to assess the effectiveness and impartiality of the court before considering whether to accept its jurisdiction. At the same time, we recognized the ideal of broad ICC jurisdiction. Thus, we were prepared to accept a treaty regime in which any state party would need to accept the automatic jurisdiction of the court over the crime of genocide, as had been recommended by the International Law Commission in 1994. We sought to facilitate U.S. participation in the treaty by proposing a 10-year transitional period following entry into force of the treaty and during which any state party could "opt-out" of the court's jurisdiction over crimes against humanity or war crimes. We were prepared to accept an arrangement whereby at the end of the 10-year period, there would be three options—to accept the automatic jurisdiction of the court over all of the core crimes, to cease to be a party, or to seek an amendment to the treaty extending its "opt-out" protection. We believe such a transition period is important for our government to evaluate the performance of the court and to attract a broad range of governments to join the treaty in its early years. While we achieved the agreement of the Permanent Members of the Security Council for this arrangement as well as appropriate protection for non-party states, other governments were not prepared to accept our proposal. In the end, an opt-out provision of seven years for war crimes only was adopted.

Unfortunately, because of the extraordinary way the court's jurisdiction was framed at the last moment, a country willing to commit war crimes could join the treaty and "opt out" of war crimes jurisdiction for seven years while a non-party state could deploy its soldiers abroad and be vulnerable to assertions of jurisdiction.

Further, under the amendment procedures states parties to the treaty can avoid jurisdiction over acts committed by their nationals or on their territory for any new or amended crimes. This is protection we successfully sought. But as the jurisdiction provision is now framed, it purports to extend jurisdiction over non-party states for the same new or amended crimes.

The treaty also creates a proprio motu—or self-initiating prosecutor—who, on his or her own authority with the consent of two judges, can initiate investigations and prosecutions without referral to the court of a situation either by a government that is party to the treaty or by the Security Council. We opposed this proposal, as we are concerned that it will encourage overwhelming the court with complaints and risk diversion of its resources, as well as embroil the court in controversy, political decision-making, and confusion.

In addition, we are disappointed with the treatment of the crime of aggression. We and others had long argued that such a crime had not been defined under customary international law for purposes of individual criminal responsibility. We also insisted, as did the International Law Commission in 1994, that there had to be a direct linkage between a prior Security Council decision that a state had committed aggression and the conduct of an individual of that state. The statute of the court now includes a crime of aggression, but leaves it to be defined by a subsequent amendment to be adopted seven years after entry into force. There is no guarantee that the vital linkage with a prior decision by the Security Council will be required by the definition that emerges, if in fact a broadly acceptable definition can be achieved. We will do all we can to ensure that such linkage survives.

We also joined with many other countries during the years of negotiation to oppose the inclusion of crimes of terrorism and drug crimes in the jurisdiction of the court on the grounds that this could undermine more effective national efforts. We had largely prevailed with this point of view only to discover on the last day of the conference that the Bureau's final text suddenly stipulated, in an annexed resolution that would be adopted by the conference, that crimes of terrorism and drug crimes should be included within the jurisdiction of the court, subject only to the question of defining the relevant crimes at a review conference in the future. This last-minute insertion in the text greatly concerned us and we opposed the resolution with a public explanation. We said that while we had an open mind about future consideration of crimes of terrorism and drug crimes, we did not believe that including them will assist in the fight against these two evil crimes. To the contrary, conferring jurisdiction on the court could undermine essential national and transnational efforts, and actually hamper the effective fight against these crimes. The problem, we said, was not prosecution, but rather investigation. These crimes require an ongoing law enforcement effort against criminal organizations and patterns of crime, with police and intelligence resources. The court will not be equipped effectively to investigate and prosecute these types of crimes.

Finally, we were confronted on July 17th with a provision stipulating that no reservations to the treaty would be allowed. We had long argued against such a prohibition and many countries had joined us in that concern. We believed that at a minimum there were certain provisions of the treaty, particularly in the field of state cooperation with the court, where domestic constitutional requirements and national judicial procedures might require a reasonable opportunity for reservations that did not defeat the intent or purpose of the treaty.

Mr. Chairman, the Administration hopes that in the years ahead other governments will recognize the benefits of potential American participation in the Rome treaty and correct the flawed provisions in the treaty.

In the meantime, the challenge of international justice remains. The United States will continue as a leader in supporting the common duty of all law-abiding governments to bring to justice those who commit heinous crimes in our own time and in the future. The hard reality is that the international court will have no jurisdiction over crimes committed prior to its actual operation. So more ad hoc judicial mechanisms will need to be considered. We trust our friends and allies will show as much resolve to pursue the challenges of today as they have to create the future international court.

d. Subsequent U.S. policy on the Rome Treaty

The United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of the International Criminal Court, pursuant to Resolution F of the Final Act of the Rome Conference, established the Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court with a mandate to prepare proposals for the arrangements that would be needed for the operation of the court. U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/10 (1998); see www.un.org/law/icc/statute/finalfra.htm. Resolution F stipulated that the Secretary-General of the United Nations should convene the Preparatory Commission as early as possible, at a date to be decided by the General Assembly.

Furthermore, the resolution stipulated that the Commission would prepare draft texts of specified documents including a relationship agreement between the court and the UN, an agreement on privileges and immunities, and the financial regulations and rules of the court. It provided that the texts of the rules of procedure and evidence and the elements of crimes should be finalized by June 30, 2000. In addition the Commission was entrusted with preparing proposals for a provision on crimes of aggression to be included in the statute in accordance with its provisions. The Preparatory Commission was open to representatives of all States that had signed the final action and other States that had been invited to participate in the Conference, thus including the United States.

Ambassador Scheffer headed the U.S. delegation to the three sessions of the Preparatory Commission held in 1999. In a February 23, 1999, address entitled "Deterrence of War Crimes in the 21st Century" at the Twelfth Annual U.S. Pacific Command, International Military Operations and Law Conference held in Honolulu, Hawaii, Ambassador Scheffer summarized U.S. objectives for the Preparatory Commission meetings, and outlined the U.S. involvement as of that date.

The United States has had and will continue to have a compelling interest in the establishment of a permanent international criminal court (ICC). Such an international court, so long contemplated and so relevant in a world burdened with mass murderers, can both deter and punish those who might escape justice in national courts. As head of the U.S. delegation to the ICC talks since mid-1997, I can confirm that the United States has had an abiding interest in what kind of court the ICC would be in order to operate efficiently, effectively and appropriately within a global system that also requires our constant vigilance to protect international peace and security. Our refusal to support the final draft of the treaty in Rome last summer was grounded in law and in the reality of our international system.

On December 8, 1998, we joined consensus in the UN General Assembly to adopt a resolution creating the Preparatory Commission on the ICC. . . . The United States has taken the lead in the elements discussions. This summer the PrepCom will afford an opportunity for concerns we and others have had about the effectiveness and acceptance of the Court to be addressed. This is an important opportunity to correct the Treaty. We believe the problems in the treaty which prevent us from signing it can be solved, and that it is in the interest of all governments to address those problems now so that we can all be active partners in the ICC. There is far more to lose in the effectiveness of the ICC if the United States is not a treaty partner than there is to gain from its current dubious regime of jurisdiction. As I said at the United Nations last October, we do not pretend to know all the answers. We hope some creative thinking can be generated in the months ahead.

At the Rome conference last summer, the U.S. delegation worked with other delegations, many of whose governments are sitting in this room today, to achieve important objectives. One major objective was a strong complementarity regime, namely, deferral to national jurisdiction. A key purpose of the international criminal court should be to promote observance and enforcement of international humanitarian law by domestic legal systems. Therefore, we were pleased to see the adoption of Article 18 (preliminary rulings regarding admissibility), which is drawn originally from an American proposal, and its companion Articles 17 and 19. We considered it only logical that, when an investigation of an overall situation is initiated, relevant and capable national governments be given an opportunity under reasonable guidelines that respect the authority of the court to take the lead in investigating their own nationals or others within their jurisdiction.

Our negotiators struggled, successfully, to preserve appropriate sovereign decision-making in connection with obligations to cooperate with the court. Some delegates were tempted to require unqualified cooperation by states parties with all court orders, notwithstanding national judicial procedures that would be involved in any event. Such obligations of unqualified cooperation were unrealistic and would have raised serious constitutional issues not only in the United States but in many other jurisdictions. Part 9 of the statute represents hard-fought battles in this respect. The requirement that the actions of states parties be taken "in accordance with national procedural law" or similar language is pragmatic and legally essential for the successful operation of the court.

The U.S. experience with the Yugoslav Tribunal has shown that some sensitive information collected by a government could be made available as lead evidence to the prosecutor, provided that detailed procedures were strictly followed. We applied years of experience with the Yugoslav Tribunal to the challenge of similar cooperation with a permanent court. It was not easy. Some delegations argued that the court should have the final determination on the release of all national security information requested from a government. Our view prevailed in Article 72: a national government must have the right of final refusal if the request pertains to its national security. In the case of a government's refusal, the court may seek a remedy from the Assembly of States Parties or the Security Council.

The United States helped lead the successful effort to ensure that the ICC's jurisdiction over crimes against humanity included acts in internal armed conflicts and acts in the absence of armed conflict. We also argued successfully that there had to be a reasonably high threshold for such crimes.

U.S. lawyers insisted that definitions of war crimes be drawn from customary international law and that they respect the requirements of military objectives during combat and of requisite intent. We had long sought a high threshold for the court's jurisdiction over war crimes, since individual soldiers often commit isolated war crimes that by themselves should not automatically trigger the massive machinery of the ICC. We believe the definition arrived at serves our purposes well: "The Court shall have jurisdiction in respect of war crimes in particular when committed as a part of a plan or policy or as part of a large-scale commission of such crimes." A major achievement of Article 8 of the treaty is its application to war crimes committed during internal armed conflicts. In order to widen acceptance of the application of the statute to war crimes committed during internal armed conflicts, the United States helped broker language that excludes situations of internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence, and other acts of a similar nature.

One of the more difficult, but essential, issues to negotiate was the coverage of crimes against women, in particular either as a crime against humanity or as a war crime. The U.S. delegation worked hard to include explicit reference to crimes relating to sexual assault in the text of the statute. Rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, enforced sterilization, and any other form of sexual violence of significant magnitude were included as crimes. As I mentioned earlier, our emphasis on the elements of crimes resulted in Article 9 of the treaty, which requires their preparation—a task that governments are now undertaking in New York. We also were instrumental in creating acceptable definitions of command responsibility and the defense of superior orders.

These accomplishments and others in the Rome Treaty are significant. But the U.S. delegation was not prepared at any time during the Rome Conference to accept a treaty text that represented a political compromise on fundamental issues of international criminal law and international peace and security. We could not negotiate as if certain risks could be easily dismissed or certain procedures of the permanent court would be infallible. We could not bargain away unique security requirements or our need to uphold basic principles of international law even if some of our closest allies reached their own level of satisfaction with the final treaty text. The United States made compromises throughout the Rome process, but we always emphasized that the issue of jurisdiction had to be resolved satisfactorily or else the entire treaty and the integrity of the court would be imperiled.

The theory of universal jurisdiction for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes seized the imagination of many delegates negotiating the ICC treaty. They appeared to believe that the ICC should be empowered to do what some national governments have done unilaterally, namely, to enact laws that empower their courts to prosecute any individuals, including non-nationals, who commit one or more of these crimes. Some governments have enacted such laws, which theoretically, but rarely in practice, make their courts arenas for international prosecutions. Of course, the catch for any national government seeking to exercise universal jurisdiction is to exercise personal jurisdiction over the suspect. Without custody, or the prospect of it through an extradition proceeding, a national court's claim of universal jurisdiction necessarily and rightly is limited.

The ICC is designed as a treaty-based court with the unique power to prosecute and sentence individuals, but also to impose obligations of cooperation upon the contracting states. A fundamental principle of international treaty law is that only states that are party to a treaty should be bound by its terms. Yet Article 12 of the ICC treaty reduces the need for ratification of the treaty by national governments by providing the court with jurisdiction over the nationals of a non-party state. Under Article 12, the ICC may exercise such jurisdiction over anyone anywhere in the world, even in the absence of a referral by the Security Council, if either the state of the territory where the crime was committed or the state of nationality of the accused consents. Ironically, the treaty exposes non-parties in ways that parties are not exposed. Why is the United States so concerned about the status of non-party states under the ICC treaty? Why not, as many have suggested, simply sign and ratify the treaty and thus eliminate the problem of nonparty status? First, fundamental principles of treaty law still matter and we are loath to ignore them with respect to any state's obligations vis-a-vis a treaty regime. While certain conduct is prohibited under customary international law and might be the object of universal jurisdiction by a national court, the establishment of, and a state's participation in, an international criminal court are not derived from custom but, rather, from the requirements of treaty law.

Second, even if the Clinton Administration were in a position to sign the treaty, U.S. ratification could take many years and stretch beyond the date of entry into force of the treaty. Thus, the United States could have non-party status under the ICC treaty for a significant period of time. The crimes within the court's jurisdiction also go beyond those arguably covered by universal jurisdiction, and court decisions or future amendments could effectively create "new" and unacceptable crimes. Moreover, the ability to withdraw from the treaty, should the court develop in unacceptable ways, would be negated as an effective protection.

Equally troubling are the implications of Article 12 for the future willingness of the United States and other governments to take significant risks to intervene in foreign lands in order to save human lives or to restore international or regional peace and security. The illogical consequence imposed by Article 12, particularly for nonparties to the treaty, will be to limit severely those lawful, but highly controversial and inherently risky, interventions that the advocates of human rights and world peace so desperately seek from the United States and other military powers. There will be significant new legal and political risks in such interventions, which up to this point have been mostly shielded from politically motivated charges. In Rome the U.S. delegation offered various proposals to break the back of the jurisdiction problem. The other permanent members of the Security Council joined us in a compromise formula during the last week of the Rome conference. One of our proposals was to exempt from the court's jurisdiction conduct that arises from the official actions of a nonparty state acknowledged as such by that nonparty. This would require a nonparty state to acknowledge responsibility for an atrocity in order to be exempted, an unlikely occurrence for those who usually commit genocide or other serious violations of international humanitarian law. Regrettably, our proposed amendments to Article 12 were rejected on the premise that the proposed take it or leave it draft of the treaty was so fragile that, if any part were reopened, the conference would fall apart.

The final text of the treaty includes the crime of aggression, albeit undefined until a Review Conference seven years after entry into force of the treaty when only the states parties to the treaty at that time determine the meaning of aggression. This political concession to the most persistent advocates of a crime of aggression without a consensus definition and without the linkage to a prior Security Council determination that an act of aggression has occurred, should concern all of us. The Preparatory Commission is addressing the issue, however, and we hope it will proceed responsibly in the years ahead. If handled poorly, this issue alone could fatally compromise the ICC's future credibility.

e. Understandings to treaties concerning cooperation with the ICC

In granting advice and consent to ratification to extradition and mutual legal assistance treaties pending before the Senate in 1998, the Senate attached understandings related to cooperation with the International Criminal Court.

The resolution of ratification, prohibiting resurrender to the International Criminal Court so long as the United States was not a party to the Rome Treaty, was attached to each extradition treaty then pending. For example, the understanding attached to the extradition treaty with Luxembourg provided:

> (a) UNDERSTANDING.—The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following understanding, which shall be included in the instrument of ratification:
>
> PROHIBITION ON EXTRADITION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT.—The United States understands that the protections contained in Article 17 concerning the Rule of Specialty would preclude the resurrender of any person from the United States to the International Criminal Court agreed to in Rome, Italy, on July 17, 1998, unless the United States consents to such resurrender; and the United States shall not consent to the transfer of any person extradited to Luxembourg by the United States to the International Criminal Court agreed to in Rome, Italy, on July 17, 1998, unless the treaty establishing that Court has entered into force for the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as required by Article II, section 2 of the United States Constitution.

144 CONG. REC. S12,991 (daily ed. Oct. 21, 1998).

On the same day, the Senate attached the following understanding, limiting provision of assistance, to the resolutions of ratification on pending mutual legal assistance treaties to the ICC:

> UNDERSTANDING. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following understanding, which shall be included in the instrument of ratification:
>
> PROHIBITION ON ASSISTANCE TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT. The United States shall exercise its rights to limit the use of assistance it provides under the Treaty so that any assistance provided by the Government of the United States shall not be transferred to or otherwise used to assist the International Criminal Court agreed to in Rome, Italy, on July 17, 1998, unless the treaty establishing the court has entered into force for the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as required by Article II, section 2 of the United States Constitution.

144 CONG. REC. S12,986 (daily ed. Oct. 21, 1998).

Treaty Affairs

A. CAPACITY TO MAKE

1. Treaties Generally

Two articles by Robert E. Dalton, Assistant Legal Adviser for Treaty Affairs, were published in 1999 and 2000 on various issues related to international agreements entered into by the United States. "National Treaty Law and Practice: United States" contained a survey of issues related to treaties and executive agreements, including a discussion of executive authorization and internal approval procedures, legislative approval, reservations, consultations with the legislature and the public, legal bases for agreements not formally approved by the legislature, publication and transmittal requirements, incorporation into national law, legally binding decisions of international organizations, implementing multilateral conventions, termination, and depositary problems. National Treaty Law and Practice, Vol. II: Austria, Chile, Colombia, Japan, Netherlands, United States, Studies in Transnational Legal Policies No. 30, American Society of International Law, 1999 (Monroe Leigh et al. eds.).

"Participation in Treaty Regimes: Putting the Constitutional and Legal Issues in Historical Perspective" described the underpinnings of the treaty power in the U.S. Constitution and its historical development as reflected in U.S. practice and court decisions. It also included a discussion of challenges to the exercise of the treaty power and review of three decisions of U.S. courts in which treaties or language included in treaties have been found to be defective. Delegating State Powers: The Effect of Treaty Regimes on Democracy and Sovereignty, Transnational Publishers (Thomas M. Franck, ed., 2000).

2. Executive Agreements

a. Trade agreements executed as congressional-executive agreements: The Uruguay Round Agreements

On July 29, 1994, Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice ("OLC"), concluded in a memorandum to Ambassador Michael Kantor, U.S. Trade Representative, that the Uruguay Round Agreements did not require ratification by the Senate as a treaty, but could constitutionally be executed by the President and approved and implemented by act of Congress. Such agreements are referred to as congressional-executive agreements. The Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations, which, among other things, established the World Trade Organization, is discussed in Chapter 11.B.2.a.

Professor Laurence H. Tribe disagreed with this conclusion. A further OLC memorandum, dated November 22, 1994, replied to "two later papers by Professor Laurence H. Tribe, and his testimony before the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, that have disputed our conclusion on that subject." Memorandum to Ambassador Michael Kantor, United States Trade Representative, from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, OLC, re: Whether Uruguay Round Agreements Required Ratification as a Treaty. As explained in the November memorandum, OLC concluded that the Uruguay Round Agreements could constitutionally be adopted by the passage of implementing legislation by both the House and the Senate, signed by the President.

The full text of the November memorandum, excerpted below (most footnotes omitted) is available at www.usdoj.gov/olc/gatt.htm.

I. The Treaty Clause

Professor Tribe argues that there exists, for constitutional purposes, "a discrete subset of international agreements properly categorized as treaties."* Professor Tribe "readily admit[s]," however, "that the Constitution itself provides little guidance about the content of this category." He also concedes that "[t]he Supreme Court has never addressed directly the constitutionality of using the congressional-executive agreement to deal with matters that fall within the Constitution's 'treaty' category." Nor does he attempt "to construct any sort of general test for determining whether any given agreement should be considered a treaty." Despite that, Professor Tribe insists that "the Uruguay Round warrants the high level of deliberation and consensus that the formal requirements of the Treaty Clause guarantee."

Like Professor Tribe, we find that neither the text of the Constitution, nor the materials surrounding its drafting and ratification, nor subsequent Supreme Court case law interpreting it, provide clear-cut tests for deciding when an international agreement must be regarded as a "treaty" in the constitutional sense, and submitted to the Senate for its "Advice and Consent" under the Treaty Clause, U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. In such circumstances,

* Editors' note: Professor Tribe's views referenced in the memorandum are set forth in a letter to the President from Professor Laurence H. Tribe (September 12, 1994); Memorandum to Walter Dellinger, Abner J. Mikva, George J. Mitchell and Robert Dole, from Laurence H. Tribe, re: The Constitutional Requirement of Submitting the Uruguay Round as a Treaty (October 5, 1994); The World Trade Organization and the Treaty Clause: The Constitutional Requirement of Submitting the Uruguay Round of GATT as a Treaty, Prepared Statement of Laurence H. Tribe Before the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation (October 18, 1994).

a significant guide to the interpretation of the Constitution's requirements is the practical construction placed on it by the Executive and Legislative Branches acting together. See, e.g., The Pocket Veto Case, 279 U.S. 655, 689–90 (1929) ("[l]ong settled and established practice is a consideration of great weight in a proper interpretation of constitutional provisions of this character. Compare . . . State v. South Norwalk, 77 Conn. 257, 264 [(1904)], in which the court said that a practice of at least twenty years duration 'on the part of the executive department, acquiesced in by the legislative department, while not absolutely binding on the judicial department, is entitled to great regard in determining the true construction of a constitutional provision the phraseology of which is in any respect of doubtful meaning.' "); Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 610 (1952) (Frankfurter, J., concurring) ("The Constitution is a framework for government. Therefore the way the framework has consistently operated fairly establishes that it has operated according to its true nature."). Indeed, the Court has been particularly willing to rely on the practical statesmanship of the political branches when considering constitutional questions that involve foreign relations. See, e.g., United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 273 (1990); Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654, 686 (1981); see also Harold H. Koh, The National Security Constitution 70–71 (1990) (historical precedent serves as "quasi-constitutional custom" in foreign affairs); Griffin B. Bell & H. Miles Foy, The President, the Congress, and the Panama Canal: An Essay on the Powers of the Executive and Legislative Branches in the Field of Foreign Affairs, 16 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 607, 640–41 (1986); Gerhard Casper, Constitutional Constraints on the Conduct of Foreign and Defense Policy: A Nonjudicial Model, 43 U. Chi. L. Rev. 463, 478 (1976).

Such practical construction has long established . . . that "there are many classes of agreements with foreign countries which are not required to be formulated as treaties" for constitutional purposes.[9] Most pertinently here, practice under the Constitution has established that the United States can assume major international trade obligations such as those found in the Uruguay Round Agreements when they are negotiated by the President and approved and implemented by Act of Congress pursuant to procedures such as those set forth in 19 U.S.C. §§ 2902 & 2903.[10] In following these procedures, Congress acts under its broad Foreign Commerce Clause powers,[11] and the President acts pursuant to his constitutional responsibility for conducting the Nation's foreign affairs.[12] The use of these procedures, in which both political branches deploy sweeping constitutional powers, fully satisfies the Constitution's requirements; the Treaty Clause's provision for concurrence by two-thirds of the Senators present is not constitutionally mandatory for international agreements of this kind.[13]

[10] For a survey of the various statutory régimes relating to international trade agreements in the period from 1930 onwards, see Harold H. Koh, Congressional Controls on Presidential Trade Policymaking After I.N.S. v. Chadha, 18 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 1191, 1192–1208 (1986). On Congressional-Executive agreements generally, see Kenneth C. Randall, The Treaty Power, 51 Ohio St. L.J. 1089, 1093–96 (1990).

The Treaty Clause should not be interpreted to curtail Congress's power under the Foreign Commerce Clause. See Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244, 313 (1901) (White, J., joined by Shiras and McKenna, JJ., concurring); id. at 370 (Fuller, C.J., joined by Harlan, Brewer and Peckham, JJ., dissenting).

[12] See, e.g., Department of Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 529 (1988) (Supreme Court has "recognized 'the generally accepted view that foreign policy was the province and responsibility of the Executive.' ") (quoting Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280, 293–94 (1981)); Alfred Dunhill of London, Inc. v. Republic of Cuba, 425 U.S. 682, 705–06 n.18 (1976) ("the conduct of [foreign policy] is committed primarily to the Executive Branch"); United States v. Louisiana, 363 U.S. 1, 35 (1960) (President is "the constitutional representative of the United States in its dealings with foreign nations.").

[13] Although we insist on the variety of legal instruments by which the United States may make agreements with foreign nations, we do not dispute Professor Tribe's view that some such agreements may have to be ratified as treaties. . . . Whatever may be true of other international agreements such as the United Nations Charter, see Tribe GATT Memorandum at 8, our contention is only that trade agreements such as the Uruguay Round Agreements do not require ratification as "treaties."

* * * *

One recurring kind of dispute over the Treaty Clause has been whether international agreements could be given effect by Executive action alone, or whether they required submission to the Senate for its concurrence. See, e.g., 2 Messages and Papers of the Presidents 33 (James D. Richardson ed., 1896) (President Monroe's message to the Senate of April 6, 1818, expressing uncertainty whether the Executive alone could make an international agreement for the naval disarmament of the Great Lakes, or whether Senate advice and consent was required.) A second type of recurring dispute, more pertinent here, centered on the respective powers of the Senate and the House of Representatives in such areas as the regulation of foreign trade, where different clauses of the Constitution assign responsibilities either to one House alone or to both Houses together. As Secretary of State Dulles explained in testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1953, there is an undefined, and probably undefinable, borderline between international agreements which require two-thirds Senate concurrence, but no House concurrence, as in the case of treaties, and agreements which should have the majority concurrence of both Chambers of Congress. . . . This is an area to be dealt with by friendly cooperation between the three departments of Government which are involved, rather than by attempts at constitutional definition, which are futile, or by the absorption, by one branch of Government, of responsibilities which are presently and properly shared. Treaties and Executive Agreements, Hearings Before a Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 83d Cong., 1st Sess. 828 (1953).

Intra-branch disputes over the Treaty Clause can be traced as far back as 1796, when Representative Albert Gallatin argued that the "[t]reaty-making power . . . may be considered as clashing" with Congress's "authority of regulating trade," and that "[a] difference of opinion may exist as to the proper construction of the several articles of the Constitution, so as to reconcile those apparently contradictory provisions." 5 Annals of Cong. 437 (1796); see also id. at 466–74 (arguing that Foreign Commerce Clause limits Treaty Clause); Note, United States Participation in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, 61 Colum. L. Rev. 505, 511 (1961); contrast Tribe Letter at 3 (Treaty Clause limits Foreign Commerce Clause).

Again, in 1844, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, under Senator Rufus Choate, presented a report on the Prussian and Germanic Confederation Treaty, in which the Committee urged rejection of the treaty because "the legislature is the department of government by which commerce should be regulated and laws of revenue be passed. The Constitution, in terms, communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it, in terms, to no other. Without engaging at all in an examination of the extent, limits, and objects of the power to make treaties, the committee believe that the general rule of our system is indisputably that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgement or participation, to Congress." Compilation of Reports of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 1789–1901, S. Doc. No. 231, 56th Cong., 2d Sess., pt. 8, at 36 (1901).

From time to time, the House of Representatives has also insisted that a treaty be made dependent on the consent of both Houses of Congress. This has occurred when, for example, the House's power over appropriations has been at issue, as in the Gadsden purchase treaty of 1853 and the Alaskan purchase treaty of 1867. In 1880, the House asserted that the negotiation of a commercial treaty that fixed duties on foreign imports would be an unconstitutional invasion of its prerogatives over the origination of revenues; in 1883, it demanded, in connection with a proposed commercial treaty with Mexico, to have a voice in treaties affecting revenue.

In 1898, the United States annexed Hawaii by joint resolution, Joint Res. 55, 30 Stat. 750 (1898), even though the Senate had previously rejected an annexation treaty, and even though opponents of the measure argued strenuously both in Congress and in the press that such an annexation could be accomplished only by treaty, and not by a simple legislative act.[23]

[23] See Memorandum for Abraham D. Sofaer, Legal Adviser, Department of State, from Douglas W. Kmiec, Acting Ass't Att'y General, Office of Legal Counsel, re: Legal Issues Raised by the Proposed Presidential Proclamation to Extend the Territorial Sea, 12 Op. O.L.C. 301, 320–21 (1988) (preliminary print).

More recently, the court in Edwards v. Carter, 580 F.2d 1055 (D.C. Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 907 (1978), rejected the claim by members of the House of Representatives that the treaty power could not be used to transfer the Panama Canal to Panama. The plaintiffs relied on the Constitution's Property Clause, U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 2, which commits to "[t]he Congress" the power "to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States." The court answered this claim by pointing out that > [t]he grant of authority to Congress under the property clause states that "The Congress shall have Power . . . ," not that only the Congress shall have power, or that the Congress shall have exclusive power. In this respect the property clause is parallel to Article I, § 8, which also states that "The Congress shall have Power . . ." Many of the powers thereafter enumerated in § 8, involve matters that were at the time the Constitution was adopted, and that are at the present time, also commonly the subject of treaties. The most prominent example of this is the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, Art. [I], § 8, cl. 3, and appellants do not go so far as to contend that the treaty process is not a constitutionally allowable means for regulating foreign commerce. It thus seems to us that, on its face, the property clause is intended not to restrict the scope of the treaty clause, but, rather, is intended to permit Congress to accomplish through legislation what may concurrently be accomplished through other means provided in the Constitution.

580 F.2d at 1057–58. As the court noted, the Constitution on its face permits foreign commerce to be regulated either through the Treaty Clause or through the Foreign Commerce Clause. Nothing in the language of the Constitution privileges the Treaty Clause as the "sole" or "exclusive" means of regulating such activity. In actual practice, Congress and the President, understanding that nothing in the Constitution constrained them to choose one procedure rather than the other, have followed different procedures on different occasions.

In general, these inter- and intra-branch disputes over the scope of the Treaty Clause have been resolved through the political process, occasionally with marked departures from prior practices. See Goldwater v. Carter, 444 U.S. 996, 1004 n.1 (1979) (Rehnquist, J., concurring in judgment); John O. McGinnis, Constitutional Review by the Executive in Foreign Affairs and War Powers: A Consequence of Rational Choice in the Separation of Powers, 56 Law & Contemp. Probs. 293, 305–08 (Autumn 1993). For example, after the House of Representatives objected to the concentration of power over Indian affairs in the hands of the Senate through the Treaty Clause, Congress in 1871 enacted a rider to an Indian appropriation bill declaring that no fresh treaties were to be made with the Indian nations. 16 Stat. 544, 566 (1871). Although the United States had been making Indian treaties for almost a century before that enactment, see United States v. Kagama, 118 U.S. 375, 382 (1886), after 1871 "the federal government continued to make agreements with Indian tribes, many similar to treaties, that were approved by both Senate and House," but "the House's action sounded the death knell for treaty making." Felix S. Cohen, Handbook of Federal Indian Law 107 & n.370 (1982 ed.). The policy of the 1871 enactment remains in effect. See 25 U.S.C. § 71. . . .

The existence of such recurring disputes over the scope and meaning of the Treaty Clause undermines any dogmatic claim that a major trade agreement such as the Uruguay Round Agreements, which stands at the intersection of the foreign affairs, revenue raising and commerce powers, must be ratified as a treaty and cannot be implemented by the action of both Houses of Congress. The distinctions between the Federal government's treaty power and the other constitutional powers in play are simply too fluid and dynamic to dictate the conclusion that one method must be followed to the complete exclusion of the other. Here, if anywhere, is an area where the sound judgment of the political branches, acting in concert and accommodating the interests and prerogatives of one another, should be respected. It is simply mistaken to suggest that this established practice of mutual adjustment and cooperation on a constitutional question of inherent uncertainty reflects mere "political convenience rather than constitutional commitment." [as suggested by Professor Tribe]. None of the three political branches involved in working out the procedure for Congressional-Executive agreements has abdicated its constitutional responsibility; none has endangered the basic, structural provisions of Articles I and II.

Finally, Professor Tribe's newly-crafted account of the treaty power entails that the Federal Government may diminish State sovereignty by employing the Treaty Clause to ratify an international agreement, but not by using any other constitutional procedure for giving such an agreement effect. . . . On this view, the Federal Government is not constitutionally prohibited from curtailing State sovereignty to a certain degree, but it may not accomplish such a curtailment by the ordinary Article I process of legislation. We find that conclusion odd and unconvincing. If the Federal Government may not trespass on State sovereignty beyond certain limits, then the attempt to do so by making a treaty would not remove the constitutional infirmity: it is by now well-established that treaties may not violate basic constitutional ordinances, including the principles of federalism. See, e.g., Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957) . . . On the other hand, if it does lie within the Federal Government's power to curtail State sovereignty under an international agreement, we see no reason why the Government may not invoke Article I procedures for giving effect to that agreement. In short, if the Uruguay Round Agreements unduly invade State sovereignty, ratification as a treaty will not save them from unconstitutionality; if they are not an undue invasion, they can be given effect by Act of Congress.

II. The Uruguay Round Agreements and Presidential Power

In considering Professor Tribe's critique of the Uruguay Round Agreements—which focuses on the asserted impairment that the agreement causes to State sovereignty—it should be borne in mind that judicial decisions have treated GATT as effectively a "Treat[y]," and hence "supreme Law," within the meaning of the Supremacy

Clause, U.S. Const., art. VI, § 2, and have held provisions of State law to be superseded by the GATT when in conflict with it. It is also important to remember that the existing GATT arrangements include dispute resolution procedures, which often involve referring disputes to panels of individuals, who act in an individual and not a governmental capacity. Professor Tribe does not contend that the existing version of GATT or the dispute resolution procedures that have developed under it are unconstitutional as applied to the Federal or State governments of this country; rather, he alleges that "[t]he Uruguay Round's establishment of the World Trade Organization [the WTO] and its dispute resolution mechanisms represents a [constitutionally] significant departure from prior versions of GATT." Specifically, Professor Tribe objects that if the WTO's dispute settlement body (or an Appellate Body on appeal) were "to find a United States law 'GATT-illegal,' the United States would be bound by that decision unless it could persuade the entire GATT membership by consensus to overturn the adverse decision. . . . Unlike other WTO decisions under the Uruguay Round, dispute panel decisions, or Appellate Body decisions in the instance of an appealed case, would be final, unless every WTO Member nation agrees to reject the panel or Appellate Body's recommendation. . . . This 'reverse consensus' requirement is a 180-degree turnaround from prior GATT practice; it means that individual nations, including the United States, no longer maintain a de facto veto over GATT dispute panel decisions. This turnaround . . . is alone sufficient to distinguish the Uruguay Round's potential effects on state sovereignty from the effects of all previous GATT agreements."

Under existing GATT practice, "the Contracting Parties, acting jointly as a whole, have jurisdiction over the final disposition of the dispute procedure."[34] Although decisions on adoption of panel reports have always been made by consensus, the existing GATT permits a vote on these matters. Thus, while the United States, in practice, can exercise a "veto" over any adverse panel decision, [34] John H. Jackson, GATT as an Instrument for the Settlement of Trade Disputes, 1967 Proc. Am. Soc'y Int'l L. at 149.

this could be changed under existing GATT rules. The Uruguay Round Agreements would alter this procedure by making the panel's or Appellate Body's report final unless the WTO States "decide[] by consensus not to adopt the [panel or] Appellate Body report" within a set period.[35]

. . . Under the current version of GATT, the States could equally well be said to be "in the hands of the Executive," for the simple reason that the President, as the sole constitutional actor who may represent the United States abroad, alone speaks for the United States in the GATT organization. Thus, the President, through his delegate, possesses the "veto" over the outcome of a dispute resolution under existing GATT practice, and may refuse to exercise it. In other words, State laws may, even under the current version of GATT, be finally determined to be "GATT-illegal" unless the Executive Branch takes affirmative action to prevent that result.

Moreover, it is misleading to suggest that the WTO procedures of the Uruguay Round Agreements place State law "at the mercy of the Executive Branch and the Trade Representative." . . . even if the Executive Branch decides to bring an action against a State for the purpose of having a State law declared invalid for inconsistency with the Uruguay Round Agreements, the implementing legislation explicitly precludes the WTO panel's (or Appellate Body's) report from being considered "binding or otherwise accorded deference" by the court that hears the case. See S. 2467, § 102(b)(2)(B)(i). Thus, the State law cannot be declared invalid by the Executive Branch acting unilaterally, even if the Executive is armed with a WTO report that has found the State law GATT-illegal; rather, the independent action of another branch of the government—the courts—is required.[40]

[40] Professor Tribe acknowledges that the detailed scheme of the implementing legislation, which is designed to make recourse to the courts unlikely, "offers a noteworthy protection to states." Tribe Prepared Statement

Furthermore, given the breadth of the joint authority of Congress and the President in the field of foreign relations, it would be the truly extraordinary case indeed in which Presidential action in that area, when supported by an Act of Congress, could amount to an unconstitutional invasion of State sovereignty. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. at 635 (Jackson, J., concurring) (Presidential power in such cases is "at its maximum"). The Supreme Court has held that even unilateral Executive action, relying on the President's inherent constitutional powers alone, may constitute a "treaty" for purposes of the Supremacy Clause, and hence supersede contrary State law. Thus, in United States v. Belmont, 301 U.S. 324, 331–32 (1937), the Court upheld a unilateral Executive agreement in the face of contrary State law, declaring that > complete power over international affairs is in the national government and is not and cannot be subject to any curtailment or interference on the part of the several states. . . . In respect of all international negotiations and compacts, and in respect of our foreign relations generally, state lines at 22. The implementing legislation would set up a Federal-State consultation process to keep the States informed of Uruguay Round Agreements matters that would affect them. The States are to be notified by the United States Trade Representative of actions by foreign WTO members that might draw their laws into the WTO dispute resolution process, consulted regarding the matter, and involved in the development of this country's position if the matter is taken up in the dispute resolution process. Should the WTO find a State law to be GATT-illegal, the Trade Representative must consult with the State concerned in an effort to develop a mutually agreed response. See S. 2467, § 102(b)(1). In short, the States are to be continuously and closely involved with the Executive in any matter that may involve a challenge to State law under the Uruguay Round Agreements.

The implementing legislation provides other important protections to State law. No plaintiffs other than the Executive Branch may challenge a State law for inconsistency with the Uruguay Round Agreements, and in any action it brings, the Executive bears the burden of proof. Before bringing any such action, moreover, the Executive Branch must report to, and consult with, congressional committees in both Houses. See S. 2467, § 102(b)(2). Here again, as in the WTO phase of any challenge to State law, the political branches must take account of the State's views.

> disappear. As to such purposes the State of New York does not exist. Within the field of its powers, whatever the United States rightfully undertakes, it necessarily has warrant to consummate.

In United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 233 (1942), the Court, again upholding a unilateral Executive agreement over State law, reaffirmed that "[p]ower over external affairs is not shared by the States; it is vested in the national government exclusively. It need not be so exercised as to conform to state laws or state policies, whether they be expressed in constitutions, statutes, or judicial decrees." Again, in Zschernig v. Miller, 389 U.S. 429, 432, 434 (1968), the Court struck down a State probate statute requiring an inquiry into "the type of governments that obtain in particular foreign nations" as "an intrusion by the State into the field of foreign affairs which the Constitution entrusts to the President and the Congress." And in Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 68 (1941), the Court stated that the field of international relations is "the one aspect of our government that from the first has been most generally conceded imperatively to demand broad national authority." See also United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19, 35 (1947) ("peace and world commerce are the paramount responsibilities of the nation, rather than an individual state"); The Chinese Exclusion Case, 130 U.S. 581, 606 (1889) ("[f]or local interests the several States of the Union exist, but for national purposes, embracing our relations with foreign nations, we are but one people, one nation, one power"); Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U.S. 275, 280 (1875) (the Federal Government "has the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations: the responsibility for the character of those regulations, and for the manner of their execution, belongs solely to the national government. If it be otherwise, a single State can, at her pleasure, embroil us in disastrous quarrels with other nations."); Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U.S. (14 Pet.) at 570 (plurality op.) ("[a]ll the powers which relate to our foreign intercourse are confided to the general government"); cf. Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 424 (1964) (problems posed by "act of state" doctrine implicate foreign relations and thus "are uniquely federal in nature"); Goldwater v.

Carter, 444 U.S. at 1005, n.2 (Rehnquist, J., concurring in the judgment) (State courts may not "trench upon exclusively federal questions of foreign policy").

Accordingly, we cannot agree that the powers assigned to the President by the Uruguay Round Agreements and their implementing legislation would be unconstitutional (unless the agreement were ratified as a treaty) because they might be exercised in a manner that persuaded the courts to rule that State laws were superseded. Against the massive powers of Congress and the President, acting together, to control the Nation's foreign policy and commerce, the claims of State sovereignty have little force.[42]

III. The World Trade Organization

. . . The proposed arrangements for the WTO do not represent an invasion of State sovereignty that can be cured only if the Uruguay Round Agreements are ratified as a treaty; rather, the Uruguay Round Agreements are similar in kind to earlier, Congressionally-approved trade pacts, including NAFTA and the Tokyo Round Codes, that were not, and that did not have to be, ratified as treaties.

* * * *

[42] In the context of domestic legislation that assertedly threatens to impair State sovereignty, the Court has held that "States must find their protection . . . through the national political process." South Carolina v. Baker, 485 U.S. 505, 512 (1988). If that is the case when Congress acts under the Interstate Commerce Clause, the States' procedural rights in the national legislature can hardly be more extensive when the Foreign Commerce Clause is the source of Congress's authority. See, e.g., Bethlehem Steel Corp. v. Board of Com'rs of Dep't of Water & Power, 80 Cal. Rptr. at 803, 804 ("[t]he California Buy American Act, in effectively placing an embargo on foreign products, amounts to a usurpation by this state of the power of the federal government to conduct foreign trade policy. . . . Only the federal government can fix the rules of fair competition when such competition is on an international basis. Foreign trade is properly a subject of national concern, not state regulation. . . . A state law may not stand 'as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress.' ") (quoting Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. at 67).

Neither the WTO, nor any dispute settlement panels, will have the authority to enter injunctions or impose monetary sanctions against member countries. Nor will they be able to order any member country that has a federal system to change its component governments' laws. While a WTO dispute settlement may opine on whether a law is inconsistent with a member's obligations under the Uruguay Round Agreements, it is up to the parties to decide how to resolve the situation. The complaining country may suspend reciprocal trade concessions if alternative forms of settlement—e.g., compensation in the form of additional trade concessions, or a change in the defending country's domestic law—are not made. The suspension of trade concessions by a complaining country is likely to mean a temporary increase in the tariffs it imposes on the defending country's goods. No suspension of trade concessions can exceed the amount of the trade injury. Because our foreign trading partners would be able to increase tariffs on American goods even more easily in the absence of a trade agreement, it is hard to see how the attempt in the Uruguay Round Agreements to resolve trade disputes between member countries and to prevent the unilateral imposition of retaliatory tariffs could amount to an unconstitutional invasion of State or local sovereignty.

* * * *

Conclusion

We remain persuaded that, in deciding not to submit the Uruguay Round Agreements to the Senate for the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present, the President is acting in a wholly proper and constitutional manner. Like other recent trade agreements, including NAFTA, the United States-Canada Free Trade Agreement, the United States-Israel Free Trade Agreement and the Tokyo Round Agreement, the Uruguay Round Agreements may constitutionally be executed by the President and approved and implemented by Act of Congress.

b. Status of AIT-TECRO agreement

On October 9, 1998, the United States filed its Reply in Support of Motion to Dismiss for Lack of Jurisdiction in Defense Procurement Division, Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office in the United States v. United States, No. 97–292C (Ct. Claims 1998). In this case, the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office in the United States ("TECRO"), which is the non-governmental entity authorized to conduct unofficial relations with the United States on behalf of the people on Taiwan, sued the United States seeking refunds of the harbor maintenance tax ("HMT") imposed under 26 U.S.C. § 4461 as applied to its exports from the United States by sea. Its complaint alleged that imposition of the HMT was unconstitutional under Article 1, § 9, clause 5 (the "export clause") of the U.S. Constitution and the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. It also claimed exemption from taxation conferred by an agreement between plaintiff and the American Institute on Taiwan ("AIT"), the non-governmental entity authorized to conduct unofficial relations with the people on Taiwan on behalf of the United States. Agreement on Privileges, Exemptions and Immunities Between The American Institute In Taiwan And The Coordination Council For North American Affairs, Oct. 2, 1980.

In its October 1998 brief, the United States argued that the U.S. Federal Court of Claims lacked jurisdiction over the exemption claim because the United States had not waived its sovereign immunity. The United States argued that the claim "gr[ew] out of" a congressionally-authorized agreement properly considered a treaty within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1502, which enumerates exceptions to statutory U.S. waiver of sovereign immunity in certain circumstances. This conclusion was consistent with "the general rule and practice among nations that treaty disputes between governments are not justiciable in domestic courts." On October 30, 1998, the complaint was dismissed in an unpublished order.

The full text of the brief, excerpted below (footnotes omitted), is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Unofficial relations between the United States and the people on Taiwan are conducted through the American Institute in Taiwan, on behalf of the United States, and plaintiff, the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office, on behalf of the people on Taiwan. Those entities are parties to an Agreement on Privileges, Exemptions and Immunities. In count three of the complaint, plaintiff challenges the Harbor Maintenance Tax as a violation of an alleged exemption from taxation contained in the Agreement.

The Tucker Act's waiver of sovereign immunity is limited by 28 U.S.C. § 1502, which divests this Court of jurisdiction to entertain a claim growing out of a treaty. Plaintiff's count three, a request for money damages based upon an alleged breach of a congressionally-authorized agreement, is such a claim, and should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

Like its predecessor, the United States Court of Claims, the United States Court of Federal Claims is a court of limited jurisdiction. Dynalectron Corp. v. United States, 4 Cl. Ct. 424, 428, aff'd, 758 F.2d 665 (Fed. Cir. 1984). Absent congressional consent to entertain a claim against the United States, this Court lacks authority to grant relief. United States v. Testan, 424 U.S. 392, 399 (1976); United States v. Sherwood, 312 U.S. 584, 586 (1941).

A waiver of sovereign immunity, and thus consent to be sued, must be expressed unequivocally and may not be implied. Library of Congress v. Shaw, 478 U.S. 310 (1986); United States v. King, 395 U.S. 1, 4 (1969). As the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has stated, "[i]n construing a statute waiving the sovereign immunity of the United States, great care must be taken not to expand liability beyond that which was explicitly consented to by Congress." Fidelity Construction Co. v. United States, 700 F.2d 1379, 1387 (Fed. Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 826 (1983).

Section 1502 of Title 28, United States Code, limits the waiver of sovereign immunity contained in the Tucker Act. Section 1502 states:

> Except as otherwise provided by Act of Congress, the United States Court of Federal Claims shall not have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States growing > out of or dependent upon any treaty entered into with foreign nations.

Plaintiff's count three satisfies both requirements of the statute, placing it beyond this Court's jurisdiction. In that count, plaintiff cites an agreement properly considered a "treaty entered into with [a] foreign nation[]" within the meaning of the statute; plaintiff's claim "grows out of" that agreement.

The word "treaty" generally has a broader meaning than just those documents that satisfy the treaty clause of the Constitution. The word "treaty . . . ordinarily refers to an international agreement concluded between sovereigns, regardless of the manner in which the agreement is brought into force." Weinberger v. Rossi, 456 U.S. 25, 29 (1982). See also B. Altman & Co. v. United States, 224 U.S. 583 (1912) (construing the word "treaty" in a statute to "include international agreements concluded by the President under congressional authorization").

The Court of Claims also has equated "international executive agreements with treaties for purposes of Section 1502." Hughes Aircraft Co. v. United States, 534 F.2d 889 (Ct. Cl. 1976). Thus, in Hughes, a Memorandum of Understanding between the United States and the United Kingdom "neither proclaimed by the President, ratified by the Senate, nor submitted for ratification, as required for treaty status pursuant to Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution," was nonetheless considered to be a "treaty" for purposes of section 1502. 534 F.2d at 903 n.17; See also Yassin v. United States, 76 F. Supp. 509, 516 (Ct. Cl. 1948); Great Western Ins. Co. v. United States, 112 U.S. 193 (1884). The Hughes Court explained:

> [T]he reason for this equation is that the fundamental separation-of-powers policy underlying [section] 1502, i.e., to avoid undue judicial interference (e.g., by construction of particular treaty terms and provisions) with the Executive Branch's conduct of foreign relations, is equally applicable to both forms of international compact.

534 F.2d at 903 n.17.

Interference with the conduct of foreign relations is similarly implicated here. Although the agreement cited in the complaint is not a "treaty" ratified by Congress, it does facilitate the conduct of unofficial foreign relations with the people on Taiwan, as explained below.

After the United States established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China in 1979, and ended relations with the Republic of China (Taiwan), Congress enacted the Taiwan Relations Act (TRA). The TRA was enacted "to promote the foreign policy of the United States" and "to help maintain peace, security, and stability in the Western Pacific." 22 U.S.C. § 3301(a). The Act declared that "the policy of the United States" was "to preserve and promote extensive, close and friendly . . . relations between the people of the United States and the people on Taiwan." 22 U.S.C. S 3301(b). Congress sought to "promote the foreign policy of the United States by authorizing the continuation of commercial, cultural, and other relations between the people of the United States and the people on Taiwan." 22 U.S.C. § 3301(a)(2).

Under the Act, unofficial relations are conducted on behalf of the United States by a nonprofit corporation called the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT), and by a counterpart organization on behalf of the people on Taiwan. 22 U.S.C. § 3305(a); 3309(a). That Taiwan instrumentality is plaintiff, the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office (TECRO), formerly known as the Coordination Council for North American Affairs (CCNAA). Exec. Order No. 13014, 61 Fed. Reg. 42,963 (1996); Exec. Order No. 12143, 44 Fed. Reg. 37,191 (1979).

The TRA makes plain that "[t]he absence of diplomatic relations or recognition shall not affect the application of the laws of the United States with respect to Taiwan. . . . " 22 U.S.C. § 3303(a). The TRA expressly states that "[f]or all purposes, including actions in any court of the United States, the Congress approves the continuation of all treaties and other international agreements, including multilateral conventions, entered into by the United States and the governing authorities on Taiwan" before January 1, 1979, unless and until terminated in accordance with law. Id. § 3303(c). The TRA further provides that, "[w]henever the President or any agency of the United States is authorized or required by or pursuant to the laws of the United States to enter into, perform, enforce, or have in force an agreement . . . relative to Taiwan, such agreement . . . shall be entered into, performed, and enforced, in the manner and to the extent directed by the President, by or through the Institute." Id. § 3305(b). Finally, the TRA requires the Secretary of State to transmit to Congress the text of any agreement to which the Institute is a party (unless such public disclosure would prejudice national security interests). Id. § 3311(a). Pursuant to the Taiwan Relations Act, AIT has entered into at least 87 agreements with TECRO since 1979. See 61 Fed. Reg. 33,948 (1996) (listing AIT-TECRO agreements as of July 1, 1996); see also Treaties in Force 315–316 (January 1, 1997) (listing pre-1979 U.S.-Taiwan agreements currently in force); New York Chinese TV Programs Inc. v. U.E. Enterprises, Inc., 954 F.2d 847, 849–52 (2d Cir. 1992) (holding that the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation that the Republic of China signed with the United States in 1946 remains in force).

The TRA expressly authorizes the President to extend to "the Taiwan instrumentality and its appropriate personnel, such privileges and immunities . . . as may be necessary to the effective performance of their functions" upon the granting of comparable privileges and immunities to AIT and its personnel by Taiwan. 22 U.S.C. S 3309(c). The status of AIT and TECRO and their privileges and immunities are spelled out in the 1980 Agreement on Privileges, Exemptions and Immunities Between the American Institute in Taiwan and the Coordination Council for North American Affairs. 61 Fed. Reg. 33, 950 (1996) ("AIT-TECRO Agreement"). See Taiwan v. United States District Court, 128 F.3d at 714. Under section 3309(c) and the provisions of the TRA regarding the execution and implementation of agreements between AIT and TECRO, the AIT-TECRO Agreement must be considered a "treaty" for purposes of the Tucker Act.

Additional provisions of the TRA also mandate this conclusion. Section 4 of the TRA, 22 U.S.C. § 3303, states:

> (a) The absence of diplomatic relations or recognition shall not affect the application of the laws of the United > States with respect to Taiwan, and the laws of the United States shall apply with respect to Taiwan in the manner that the laws of the United States applied with respect to Taiwan prior to January 1, 1979.

>
> (b) The application of subsection (a) of this section shall include, but shall not be limited to, the following:
> (1) Whenever the laws of the United States refer or relate to foreign countries, nations, states, governments, or similar entities, such terms shall include and such laws shall apply with respect to Taiwan.

Under section 3303 (b)(1), when a law of the United States refers to "nations," that term "shall include . . . Taiwan." Section 1502 of the Tucker Act refers to a treaty entered into "with foreign nations." Thus, under the TRA, the AIT-TECRO Agreement, expressly authorized by Congress and governing the status of the counterpart organizations through which unofficial relations are conducted, must be considered a "treaty entered into with foreign nations" under the Tucker Act. Indeed, this is how the law would have treated any such agreement with Taiwan prior to 1979, and, thus, how the law "shall apply with respect to Taiwan" and the AIT-TECRO Agreement today. See, e.g., Dupont Circle Citizens Association v. BZA, 530 A.2d 1163 (1987) (holding that main office of TECRO in the United States should be treated as a foreign government chancery for the purpose of laws governing the location, replacement, and expansion of foreign government chanceries in the District of Columbia).

In sum, the AIT-TECRO Agreement is a congressionally-authorized agreement, promulgated under a statute promoting the foreign policy of the United States to promote peace and stability in the Pacific region. The Agreement, therefore, should be treated like a treaty for purposes of section 1502.

Plaintiff's third cause of action "grows out of" the AIT-TECRO Agreement and, therefore, satisfies the second requirement of section 1502. . . .

Declining to exercise jurisdiction over count three would comport with the general rule and practice among nations that treaty disputes between governments are not justiciable in domestic courts. Over 100 years ago, in the Head Money Cases, the Supreme court ruled:

> A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and the honor of the governments which are parties to it. If these fail, its infraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamations, so far as the injured party chooses to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war. It is obvious that with all this the judicial courts have nothing to do and can give no redress.

112 U.S. 580, 598 (1884).

When a claim is brought by a foreign government against the United States alleging a treaty violation, principles of non-justiciability and sovereign immunity intersect, and the very conduct of foreign relations may be affected. To guard against unwarranted interference, then, a foreign government generally may not bring suit in our domestic courts against the United States to enforce rights allegedly conferred upon that foreign government in an international agreement.

From its earliest days, the Supreme Court has regarded as nonjusticiable claims that the United States has not acted in accordance with a treaty's obligations to a foreign nation, holding: "that the power to determine these matters ha[s] not been confided to the judiciary, which has no suitable means to exercise it, but to the executive and legislative departments of our government; and that they belong to diplomacy and legislation, and not to the administration of the laws." Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 194–95 (1888).

To rule otherwise would implicate the features of a non-justiciable political question described in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962). . . .

Not all cases involving foreign relations raise political questions. Nonetheless, the Supreme Court has recognized that decisions concerning foreign relations are inherently political in nature: "Not only does resolution of such issues frequently turn on standards that defy judicial application, or involve the exercise of a discretion demonstrably committed to the executive or legislature; but many such questions uniquely demand single-voiced statement of the Government's views." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. at 211.

c. Modification of treaty obligations by congressional-executive agreement

On November 25, 1996, Christopher Schroeder, Acting Assistant Attorney General, OLC, issued a Memorandum for Alan J. Kreczko, Special Assistant to the President and Legal Adviser to the National Security Counsel re: Validity of Congressional-Executive Agreements that Substantially Modify the United States' Obligations under an Existing Treaty. Mr. Kreczko had requested an opinion regarding whether Congress can authorize the President to enter into an executive agreement that substantially modifies the obligations which the United States would otherwise have under a pre-existing treaty, or whether such modifications could only be effected with the advice and consent of the Senate, pursuant to the treaty-making power, U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl.2. Based on analysis of applicable international and constitutional law, OLC concluded that it lay within the power of Congress to authorize the President, through an executive agreement, substantially to modify the United States' international obligations under an arms control (or other political-military treaty); Senate advice and consent was not required. Excerpts from the OLC memorandum follow.

I. At the outset, it is essential to recognize the dual nature of treaties, as instruments of both domestic and international law. As the Supreme Court has said,

> [a] treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and the honor of the governments which are parties of it. If these fail, its infraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamations, so far as the injured party chooses to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war. It is obvious that with all this the judicial courts have nothing to do and can give no redress. But a treaty may also contain provisions which confer certain rights upon the citizens or subjects of one of the nations residing in the territorial limits of the other, which partake of the nature of municipal law, and which are capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country.

Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 598 (1884).

A "treaty," therefore, has two aspects: insofar as it is self-executing, it prescribes a rule of domestic or municipal law and, as a compact or contract between nations, it gives rise to binding obligations in international law.

II. Under the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution, treaties, like Acts of Congress, are made "supreme Law," U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2; Maiorano v. Baltimore & Ohio R.R. Co., 213 U.S. 268, 272–73 (1909). Accordingly, "treaty provisions, which are self-executing in the sense that they require no additional legislation to make them effective, are equivalent to and of like obligation with an act of Congress." Further, insofar as a treaty incorporates a rule of domestic law, the Supreme Court has long held that it may be modified or repealed by a later Act of Congress. See Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. at 599. . . .

Accordingly, it lies within the power of Congress to modify the substantive obligations that a treaty imposes upon the United States, or to authorize the President to modify those obligations, insofar as those treaty obligations are binding as a matter of domestic or municipal law. The advice and consent of the Senate are not necessary to achieve that outcome.

III. A. The unilateral modification or repeal of a provision of a treaty by Act of Congress, although effective as a matter of domestic law, will not generally relieve the United States of the international legal obligations that it may have under that provision. See Pigeon River Improvement, Slide & Boom Co. v. Charles W. Cox, Ltd., 291 U.S. 138, 160 (1934) . . .

B. As with contracts of other kinds, however, the parties to a treaty may agree to modify the obligations to which the treaty gives rise. It is "a general principle of [international] law recognized by civilized nations" that "[a]ny legal position, or system of legal relationships, can be brought to an end by the consent of all persons having legal rights and interests which might be affected by their termination." International Status of South-West Africa, 1950 I.C.J. 128, 167 (July 11) (Separate Opinion of Judge Read). As a general rule of international law, therefore, "[a] treaty may be amended by agreement between the parties." Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, art. 39, reprinted in Ian Brownlie (ed.), Basic Documents in International Law 404. . . .

* * * *

The only remaining question, therefore, is whether, as a matter of constitutional law, the President has the power to modify, by means of an executive agreement authorized by Act of Congress, the international legal obligations that the United States has under a treaty, or whether the only constitutional method by which the President may achieve that end is through the advice and consent of the Senate. . . .

IV. A. "When the President acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at its maximum, for it includes all that he possesses in his own right plus all that Congress can delegate." Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 635 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring) . . . We believe that the inherent powers of the President over foreign affairs, coupled with whatever powers Congress can and does delegate to him in this area, are constitutionally sufficient to enable the President to make an executive agreement that substantially modifies the international legal obligations of the United States under a prior treaty.

The Constitution makes the President the Nation's "guiding organ in the conduct of our foreign affairs. . . . He . . . was entrusted with . . . vast powers in relation to the outside world. . . ." Ludecke v. Watkins, 335 U.S. 160, 173 (1948). Pursuant to his inherent powers, the President has made executive agreements with other countries, not submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent or to Congress for its approval, including agreements that regulated the use of military forces. Congress too—as distinct from the Senate under its treaty-making power—has some power to vary the international legal obligations of the United States. So, for example, in Weinberger v. Rossi, 456 U.S. at 32, the Supreme Court implied that Congress, if it expressed its intent with sufficient clarity, could effect the abrogation of the United States' international obligations, as set forth in international agreements for the hiring of local nationals at the United States' overseas military bases. It can reasonably be maintained that, if Congress may effect the abrogation of international obligations, it has some power to authorize the President to modify them.

B. The practice of the two branches discloses many examples of binding agreements that Presidents have made with foreign States, relying on the inherent authority of the Executive, as affirmed and amplified by Congress. . . . Over the years, Congress has authorized or sanctioned additional agreements concerning a wide variety of subjects including, inter alia, the protection of intellectual property rights, acquisition of territory, national participation in various international organizations, foreign trade, foreign military assistance, foreign economic assistance, atomic energy cooperation, and international fishery rights. S. Rpt. 53 at 52–53.

The constitutionality of such "congressional-executive agreements" is firmly established. Accord S. Rpt. 53 at 58. The Supreme Court long ago rejected arguments that such agreements constitute an invalid delegation of power to the President or the House of Representatives, or an improper invasion of the Senate's treaty-making power. See J.W. Hampton, Jr. & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, 410–11 (1928). . . .

C. Of particular relevance here, the practice of the political branches underscores that the President has the authority to make Congressional-Executive agreements with our treaty partners that substantially modify the United States' rights or obligations under those treaties.

Congress has enacted legislation in the political-military field that permits the modification of the United States' international obligations through a Congressional-Executive Agreement as an alternative to the treaty-making process [citing the Arms Control and Disarmament Act of 1961, as amended] codified in relevant part at 22 U.S.C. § 2573(b). . . .

Further, in a 1990 study, the Congressional Research Service identified three Congressional-Executive Agreements since 1970 of a political-military nature; each of them could arguably have been adopted as a treaty instead. . . .

Congress has also ratified, by legislation, Executive acts that substantially modified pre-existing treaty (or other international) obligations. . . .

In light of these judicial and historical precedents, we conclude that Congress may authorize the President, through an executive agreement, substantially to modify the United States' international obligations under an arms control (or other political-military) treaty.

d. Executive agreements providing for waiver of subrogated claims of federal agencies and for waiver of states' claims against a foreign government

In a memorandum of June 7, 1995, OLC responded to a request for an opinion concerning whether the National Aeronautics and Space Administration ("NASA") could enter into executive agreements under which it agreed to waive subrogated claims on behalf of other federal agencies. Memorandum for Conrad K. Harper, Legal Adviser, Department of State, from Teresa Wynn Roseborough, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, OLC, re: Waiver of Claims for Damages Arising out of Cooperative Space Activity. The memorandum concluded that NASA had no express statutory authority to waive subrogated claims on behalf of other federal agencies and that "Congress' broad grant to NASA of discretion to enter into agreements" on such terms as it deems appropriate "does not extend to agreements with foreign governments." Neither did NASA have implied statutory authority to do so. However, as explained in the excerpts from the memorandum set forth below, the President could enter into an executive agreement under which subrogated claims against a foreign government were waived in exchange for a reciprocal waiver from the foreign government, and he could delegate that authority to an agency head. The President's authority to enter into an executive agreement could bind the fifty states and the District of Columbia to a waiver of state claims.

IV. President's Constitutional Authority

We have concluded that the President may enter into international agreements providing for the waiver of subrogated claims of federal agencies in return for a reciprocal waiver from the other State. This conclusion, however, is subject to the following challenges and limitations.

The President's authority to enter into international agreements containing such a waiver derives principally from his constitutional authority to conduct foreign affairs. The Constitution has long been interpreted to grant the President plenary authority to represent the interests of the United States in dealings with foreign States, subject only to limits specifically set forth in the Constitution or to such statutory limitations that the Constitution permits Congress to impose by exercise of its enumerated powers.[19] As part of this authority, the President may enter into "sole" executive agreements—international agreements based on the President's own constitutional powers.[20]

Although the President's authority to enter into sole executive agreements is well established, the precise limitations that may exist on the proper scope of those agreements is far from settled. As one commentator has noted, "constitutional issues and controversies have swirled about executive agreements concluded by the President wholly on his own authority. . . . Periodically, Senators (in particular) have objected to some agreements, and the Bricker Amendment sought to curtail or regulate them, but the power to make them remains as vast and its constitutional foundations and limits as uncertain as ever."[21]

The leading cases on sole executive agreements support—though not unequivocally—the President's authority to enter into agreements disposing of government claims. In United States v. Belmont, 301 U.S. 324 (1937), and United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203 (1942), the Court upheld the validity of the Litvinov Assignment, by which, through exchange of diplomatic correspondence, the Soviet Union assigned to the United States its claims against U.S. nationals. The Litvinov Assignment was part of an overall settlement of claims between the Soviet Union, the United States, and their nationals, undertaken to clear the way for United States recognition of the Soviet government.

The Belmont and Pink opinions establish the President's broad authority to enter into sole executive agreements that deal with international claims. However, the Litvinov Assignment was executed pursuant to the President's recognition of the Soviet Union, and the opinions rely in part on that fact. Accordingly, it could be argued that they support only the limited proposition that the President may enter into sole executive agreements that accompany the exercise of his core power to recognize foreign governments. We reject this narrow reading. The opinions impose no such restriction, but rather, find authority for the Assignment in the President's authority as "sole organ" of the federal government in the field of international relations.[22] Even so, Belmont and Pink are not dispositive because, although the Litvinov Assignment anticipated an overall settlement of claims between the two governments, the Assignment itself appears only to have involved the assignment of Soviet claims to the United States—not the release by the United States of its claims.

In Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654 (1981), the Court upheld the President's authority to suspend individuals' claims pursuant to an executive order that, among other things, established the U.S.-Iran Claims Tribunal. In addition to relying upon the "general tenor" of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, the Hostage Act, and the International Claims Settlement Act[23] (which the Court found implicitly to authorize the challenged executive action), the Court emphasized the U.S. government's longstanding practice of exercising its sovereign authority to settle claims of its nationals against foreign governments and noted that those settlements frequently occur through executive agreements.

If the President has authority to dispose of claims of individuals in furtherance of U.S. foreign policy objectives, it would seem reasonable to conclude that he must have authority to waive claims of federal agencies. Dames & Moore, however, did not so squarely raise separation of power concerns. Here, arguably, the President would be encroaching on Congress' control over the federal fisc by declining to recover monies otherwise subject to claim by the United States. Although this argument is not without force, we are not persuaded by it in its current context, and we conclude that there would be no impermissible encroachment upon congressional authority. First, this is not an instance of the executive branch bestowing a unilateral gift. The waivers are mutual. The United States is getting what it gives. More important, the President's action must be considered against the backdrop of the statutes governing NASA and its operations. By enacting the insurance-indemnification scheme, Congress expressed its intent to commit very substantial resources to support NASA's activities. In contrast to the indemnification system of the Commercial Space Launch Act, which caps the government's indemnification at a certain amount, Congress granted NASA unlimited indemnification authority. In addition, Congress endorsed a program of international cooperation, placed NASA under the foreign policy guidance of the President, and granted the President the authority to enter into international agreements to promote international cooperation. Congress has at least implicitly approved of the long-standing practice of NASA and other federal agencies who are using NASA's services waiving their own claims for damages, which likely represents the greatest risk of financial exposure to the United States.

Taken together, we believe that this statutory framework supports the conclusion that the President would not encroach upon congressional authority by entering into a mutual waiver of claims with a foreign State. Moreover, waiving claims for damages coincides with two other sources of Presidential power: the President's prosecutorial discretion and his authority as chief administrator of the executive branch. Conceptually a waiver operates similarly to a decision not to pursue a certain class of claims—an executive decision that is generally within the prerogative of the President.

We further conclude that the President may delegate this authority to an appropriate agency head. The President is generally authorized under 3 U.S.C. § 301 to delegate to heads of executive agencies "any function vested in the President by law." This Office has interpreted section 301 as conferring a very broad grant of delegation authority. However, the legislative history indicates that section 301 was intended only to authorize the delegation of functions vested in the President by statute.

The scope and source of the President's authority to delegate responsibility conferred upon him by the Constitution is less clear. We have recognized that the President possesses "inherent" authority to delegate, and that this is not restricted to delegation of duties conferred by statute. In Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 117 (1926), the Court declared the general principle sustaining the delegation by the President of the exercise of his executive authority:

> The vesting of the executive power in the President was essentially a grant of the power to execute the laws. But the President alone and unaided could not execute the laws. He must execute them by the assistance of subordinates.

We have endorsed the statement of the exception to this general rule expressed by one commentator that:

> Where . . . from the nature of the case, or by express constitutional or statutory declaration, the personal, individual judgment of the President is required to be exercised, the duty may not be transferred by the President to anyone else.[32]

Thus, this Office has concluded that the President may not delegate his authority to undertake specific functions that are expressly vested in him by the Constitution, such as to grant a pardon, or to transmit and proclaim the ratification of a treaty.[33] And we have suggested that there may be greater limits on his delegation authority in the area of foreign affairs. For instance, we have advised that it would be "safer" to conclude that the President may not delegate his authority to terminate international trade agreements, and to carry out certain duties relating to military assistance, defense programs, and foreign aid. This limitation is based on the view that these were "basic decisions relating to international relations and involve[d] far-reaching policy considerations."[34] The waivers at issue here, in contrast, do not implicate, at least in their individual application, far-reaching policy considerations. The President would exercise his individual judgment that mutual, government-wide waivers under these particular circumstances are in the public interest; he would delegate merely the application of that judgment to particular agreements. Accordingly, we conclude that the President may delegate his authority to enter into mutual waivers of claims for damages that arise pursuant to cooperative space activity.

V. Authority to Waive States' Claims

You have also asked us to advise whether the federal government could bind the fifty states and the District of Columbia to a waiver of state claims. NASA correctly notes that under the terms of its agreements, it does not purport to waive states' claims. However, when federal states enter into international agreements, they are generally viewed as binding their constituent units as well as the central government. Moreover, absent an express agreement to the contrary, the central government generally is responsible for the failure of the constituent units to fulfill their legal obligations.[36]

* * * *

[36] Ivan Bernier, International Legal Aspects of Federalism 88 (1973) (As a matter of international law, "there can be no doubt that a federal state is responsible for the conduct of its member states."). According to the Restatement, federal states sometimes have sought special provisions in international agreements to take account of restrictions upon the power of the central government to deal with certain matters by international agreement. "Some proposed 'federal-state clauses' would permit a federal state to leave implementation to its constituent units, incurring no violation of international obligation if implementation fails. Even without a special provision, a federal state may leave implementation of its international obligations to its constituent units, but the central government remains responsible if the obligation is not fulfilled." Restatement § 302, reporters' note 4. . . .

It is a fundamental principle of our constitutional law that our foreign affairs are governed by the federal government and that the state governments may not interfere.[37] Moreover, sole executive agreements that purport to create legal obligations, like statutes and treaties, are "the supreme Law of the Land" for purposes of the Supremacy Clause, art. VI, cl. 2, and thus bind the states.[38] Accordingly, it would seem that there would be no question but that the federal government could, in pursuance of its foreign policy objectives, prohibit states from bringing certain claims against foreign countries. Yet, as Professor Henkin notes, despite many such "light, flat statements" that U.S. foreign relations are strictly national, they "are not in fact wholly insulated from the States."[39] Not surprisingly, the scope of state authority in this regard is not well defined.

The Supreme Court has upheld limitations imposed on the states by the federal government in matters concerning foreign affairs. In both Belmont and Pink, the Court held that the Litvinov Assignment—a sole executive agreement—would prevail over any inconsistent state policy. In Zschernig v. Miller, 389 U.S. 429 (1968), the Court held that Oregon inheritance law that required probate courts to inquire into the type of government in particular foreign countries before permitting citizens of those countries to inherit property from Oregon residents was an invalid intrusion into the field of foreign affairs. See also Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416 (1920) (upholding, against state's tenth amendment challenge, federal statute that executed a treaty protecting migratory birds).

We are aware of no cases upholding state challenges to federal international agreements on the ground of impermissible interference with state sovereignty.[41] There is, however, dicta suggesting hypothetical constitutional limitations on the federal government's ability to enter into international agreements that override state law. See Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890) ("It would not be contended that [the treaty power] extends so far as to authorize what the constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent."); Islamic Republic of Iran v. Pahlavi, 62 N.Y.2d 474, 486 (1984) ("[I]t is questionable whether the Federal Government could guarantee a New York forum by treaty without violating constitutional principles of federalism and separation of powers.").

It could perhaps be argued that the states' right at issue here—the ability to bring claims to recover monies due the state—is a core state prerogative and more like the hypothetical examples of impermissible encroachments on the states than, for instance, the state policy against giving effect to confiscations of assets situated in the state and the inheritance laws at issue in Belmont, Pink, and Zschernig. However, this seems strained as compared to the federal government's undisputed authority to maintain friendly relations with foreign governments, which, arguably, could be compromised by suits filed by states. We believe the weight of authority supports the President's power to waive states' claims against a foreign government.

[41] It is generally accepted that the Tenth Amendment does not apply to impose limits on the subject matter of international agreements. Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. at 434 (federal treaty power is not checked by any "invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment"); Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 18 (1957) (plurality opinion) ("To the extent that the United States can validly make treaties, the people and the States have delegated their power[s] to the National Government and the Tenth Amendment is no barrier."); Restatement § 302 cmt. d ("[T]he Tenth Amendment . . . does not limit the power to make treaties or other agreements.").

e. Non-publication of certain international agreements

On February 16, 1996, the Department of State issued a final rule amending Title 22, Code of Federal Regulations, Part 181, to provide that certain international agreements other than treaties will not be published in United States Treaties and Other International Agreements or in the Treaties and Other International Acts Series. Coordination and Reporting of International Agreements: Determination Not To Publish Certain Agreements, 61 Fed. Reg. 7070 (Feb. 26, 1996). As provided in the regulations, the purpose of Part 181 is to implement the provision of 1 U.S.C. §§ 112a and 112b, known as the Case-Zablocki Act, Pub. L. No. 92-403, 86 Stat. 619 (1972), on the reporting to Congress, coordination with the Secretary of State and publication of international agreements. 22 C.F.R. § 181.1 (1996). Part 181 was amended in 1996 by adding a new Section, 22 C.F.R. § 181.8 (1996), set forth below, listing the categories of international agreements that would not be published.

Sec. 181.8 Publication.

(a) The following categories of international agreements will not be published in United States Treaties and Other International Agreements:
  (1) Bilateral agreements for the rescheduling of inter-governmental debt payments;
  (2) Bilateral textile agreements concerning the importation of products containing specified textile fibers done under the Agricultural Act of 1956, as amended;

(3) Bilateral agreements between postal administrations governing technical arrangements;
(4) Bilateral agreements that apply to specified military exercises;
(5) Bilateral military personnel exchange agreements;
(6) Bilateral judicial assistance agreements that apply only to specified civil or criminal investigations or prosecutions;
(7) Bilateral mapping agreements;
(8) Tariff and other schedules under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and under the Agreement of the World Trade Organization;
(9) Agreements that have been given a national security classification pursuant to Executive Order No. 12958 or its successors; and

(b) Agreements on the subjects listed in paragraphs (a) (1) through (9) of this section that had not been published as of February 26, 1996.

(c) Any international agreements in the possession of the Department of State, other than those in paragraph (a) (9) of this section, but not published will be made available upon request by the Department of State.

The reasons for the amendment were set forth in the notice of proposed rule. 60 Fed. Reg. 54,319 (Oct. 23, 1995), excerpted below. See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 265 (1996).

* * * *

Until 1994, the Case-Zablocki Act, 1 U.S.C. Sec. 112a, directed the Department of State to publish in United States Treaties and Other International Agreements "all treaties to which the United States is a party * * * and all international agreements other than treaties to which the United States is a party." See 1 U.S.C. Sec. 112a. Due to resource constraints, the Department of State has been unable to publish agreements promptly. The Department's experience, however, has been that public requests have been received for very few of the unpublished agreements. In many instances the agreements that have not been published are printed by private publishers. In other cases, agreements may not be of interest to the public because they address narrow, technical subjects. In view of these considerations, Congress enacted Public Law 102–236 in 1994, to amend the Case-Zablocki Act by authorizing the Secretary of State to "determine that publication of certain categories of agreements is not required if the following criteria are met:

(1) Such agreements are not treaties which have been brought into force for the United States after having received Senate advice and consent pursuant to section 2(2) of Article II of the Constitution of the United States;

(2) The public interest in such agreements is insufficient to justify their publication, because (A) as of the date of enactment of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1994 and 1995, the agreements are no longer in force; (B) the agreements do not create private rights or duties, or establish standards intended to govern government action in the treatment of private individuals; (C) in view of the limited or specialized nature of the public interest in such agreements, such interest can adequately be satisfied by an alternative means; or (D) the public disclosure of the text of the agreement would, in the opinion of the President, be prejudicial to the national security of the United States; and

(3) Copies of such agreements (other than those in paragraph (2)(D)), including certified copies where necessary for litigation or other purposes, will be made available by the Department of State upon request."

. . . Non-publication of the [specified] categories of agreements will substantially eliminate the existing publication backlog, thus permitting future agreements to be published in a more timely manner. Moreover, in selecting the following categories, the Department has focussed on a few areas that have a large volume of agreements that do not appear to be of general public interest or are frequently revised and readily available from private sources. . . .

* * * *

Agreements in the [specified] categories (except classified agreements) will continue to be listed in the Department of State's annual publication Treaties in Force.

Finally, it should be noted that United States agencies frequently enter into contracts and similar arrangements with other governments that the Department of State does not consider to constitute international agreements under the criteria established in the Department's regulations at 22 CFR 181.2. These include, for example, nonbinding political commitments. They also include such arrangements as bilateral agreements extending grants of $25 million or less by the Agency for International Development to foreign governments and P.L. 480 agreements under which the United States sells food commodities to foreign governments. The Department of State does not publish such arrangements, as it considers them not to be international agreements within the meaning of the Case Act.

3. International Documents of a Non-Legally Binding Character

A Congressional inquiry requested the views of the Department of State concerning the practice of signing documents such as the Trilateral Statement concluded at Moscow on January 14, 1994, by President William J. Clinton, Russian Federation President Boris Yeltsin, and Ukraine President Leonid M. Kravchuk, and the status of such documents under both United States and international law and practice. Robert E. Dalton, Assistant Legal Adviser for Treaty Affairs, prepared the following memorandum, "International Documents of a Non-Legally Binding Character," dated March 18, 1994, which was used as a basis for the response to the request. See also 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 515 (1994).

It has long been recognized in international practice that governments may agree on joint statements of policy or intention that do not establish legal obligations. In recent decades, this has become a common means of announcing the results of diplomatic exchanges, stating common positions on policy issues, recording their intended course of action on matters of mutual concern, or making political commitments to one another.

These documents are sometimes referred to as non-binding agreements, gentlemen's agreements, joint statements or declarations. The title of the document is not determinative as to whether it establishes legal obligations, but rather the intent of the parties, as reflected in the language and context of the document, the circumstances of its conclusion, and the explanations given by the parties.

Two of the better known older twentieth-century examples involving the United States are the Lansing-Ishii exchange of notes of November 2, 1917, on Japanese immigration to the United States (often described as a "Gentlemen's Agreement"), which both countries considered not to be legally binding, and the Joint Declaration made on August 14, 1941, by President Franklin Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, a document more commonly known as the Atlantic Charter.

The existence of a large number of such non-binding documents led the International Law Commission, when developing the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, to consider whether or not such documents should be included within its definition of "treaty". The Commission decided against their inclusion by incorporating in its definition the requirement that an international agreement must be "governed by international law" in order to be a treaty. That this was the Commission's intention is confirmed by the legislative history of the article. See Report of the International Law Commission to the General Assembly (1959 2 Y. B. Int'l Law Comm. 96–97 (1959)).

The leading article on this subject is Munch, "Non-Binding Agreements", 29 Zeitschrift fur Auslandisches Offentliches Recht und Volkerrecht 1 (1969)—an article that appeared six months before the adoption of the Convention (and that is footnoted in Professor Oscar Schachter's editorial, "The Twilight Existence of Nonbinding International Agreements", 71 Am. J. Int'l L. (1977), pp. 296–297). Munch summarizes the Commission's discussion on this issue and sets out a comprehensive collection of non-binding documents of which the Commission had taken note. In light of the evidence adduced by the Commission documenting this practice, the Conference on the Law of Treaties held in Vienna in May 1969 refused to adopt an amendment that would have led to the application of the Convention's rules to non-binding documents.

In 1965, the American Law Institute adopted the Restatement (Second), Foreign Relations Law of the United States. The subject of non-binding documents was discussed in Comments f and g of Section 115. The former, subtitled "Intention to create legal relationships", read:

> A question may arise as to whether statements or declarations of heads of state or government, foreign ministers, or other officials engaged in the conduct of foreign relations create international legal agreements as distinguished from statements of policy or political objectives. In order to create an international agreement as defined in . . . this Section, the statement of the parties must express more than a present intention or a personal or political commitment. . . .

The distinction between an agreement that results in a binding commitment under international law and one that does not is not always clear, and there are no absolute tests for determining whether an agreement constitutes a binding commitment. . . . American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law (Second), Foreign Relations Law of the United States (1965), p. 365.

Comment g, "Gentlemen's agreement", stated:

> Two or more states may enter into an understanding which is clearly intended to affect their relations with each other but not to be binding legally. Such an understanding, sometimes called a "gentlemen's agreement," is not an international agreement as defined in this Section.

Ibid., p. 366.

Following the adoption of the Case-Zablocki Act, Pub. L. 92-403, approved August 22, 1972, 86 Stat. 619, 1 U.S.C. 112b, which required the Secretary of State to transmit to the Congress the text of "any international agreement . . . other than a treaty, to which the United States is a party" within a specified time, the question arose as to what documents should be reported. In order to permit a uniform determination of that question, the Act was amended by the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 1979, Pub. L. 95-426, approved October 7, 1978, 92 Stat. 963, to provide that the President, acting through the Secretary of State, should promulgate such rules and regulations as might be necessary to carry out the Act.

Pursuant to that authority, the Department of State issued regulations on the reporting of international agreements on July 13, 1981. The regulations established general criteria to be applied in deciding whether a document constituted an international agreement for the purposes of the Act. Each of four specified criteria had to be met in order for a document to be reportable. The first criterion is the most relevant to the subject of this memorandum.

(1) Identity and intention of the parties.—A party to an international agreement must be a state, a state agency, or an intergovernmental organization. The parties must intend their undertaking to be legally binding, and not merely of political or personal effect. Documents intended to have political or moral weight, but not intended to be legally binding, are not international agreements. . . . In addition, the parties must intend their undertaking to be governed by international law, although this intent need not be manifested by a third-party dispute settlement mechanism or any express reference to international law. 22 CFR, Pt. 181, § 181.2 (Apr. 1, 1993), p. 597.

The intention of the parties standard referred to above was also used by the International Court of Justice in the only instance in which a party to a case sought to establish the Court's jurisdiction on the basis of a document that was not legally binding. In the Aegean Sea Continental Shelf case (Greece v. Turkey), Greece alleged that the Court had jurisdiction on the basis of a joint communique issued at Brussels on May 21, 1975, following an exchange of views between the Prime Ministers of Greece and Turkey. Language to the effect that they had decided that the problems dividing the two countries, including the Aegean Sea continental shelf, should be resolved by the Court at The Hague was not regarded by the Court as sufficient to establish jurisdiction. Aegean Sea Continental Shelf, Judgment, 1978 I.C.J. Reports 3, at 44.

Documents of a non-legally binding character were concluded between the time of the original enactment of the Case-Zablocki Act in 1972 and its amendment in 1977 and 1978. A notable example was the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe signed at Helsinki on August 1, 1975, by President Ford and other national leaders. Clearly, the intention of the parties was that this was a politically binding, not a legally binding, document. Later that year, on October 7, 1975, Secretary of State Kissinger, accompanied by the Legal Adviser of the Department, Monroe Leigh, testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on memoranda of agreement between the Governments of Israel and the United States. He observed that not all of the provisions in documents containing U.S. commitments submitted to the Committee amounted to binding undertakings. He noted that they included:

> . . . [A]ssurances by the United States of our political intentions. These are often statements typical of diplomatic exchange: in some instances they are merely formal re-affirmations of existing American policy. Other provisions refer to contingencies which may never arise and are related, sometimes explicitly, to present circumstances subject to rapid change.

The fact that many provisions are not by any standard international commitments does not mean, of course, that the United States is morally or politically free to act as if they did not exist. On the contrary, they are important statements of diplomatic policy and they engage the good faith of the United States so long as the circumstances that gave rise to them continue. But they are not binding commitments of the United States. Early Warning System in Sinai: Hearings before the Sen. Comm. on For. Rel., 94th Cong., 1st sess. (1975), pp. 206, 211.

[Other] documents of a non-binding character include the Bonn Declaration of 1978 and the Shanghai Communique of [1972]. The former was a multilateral document; the latter, a bilateral one. The Department replied to a request from the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to explain the legal significance of the Bonn Declaration as follows:

> While the Declaration issued in Bonn is an important political commitment, it is not an international agreement within the meaning of United States law or international law since the parties did not evidence an intent to be legally bound. There is no indication of intention to depart from the established international practice of concluding non-binding communiques at the conclusion of a summit meeting. Accordingly, while we expect that the Bonn Summit participants will comply with the accord, it is not a legally binding commitment.

Asst. Secty. of State Douglas J. Bennet, Jr., to Senator John J. Sparkman, letter dated Aug. 14, 1978, to be found at Dept. of State File No. P78 0130-0487, and at the 1978 Digest, p. 799.

The Department has consistently taken a similar position with respect to the Shanghai Communique, which addressed, inter alia, the question of U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. For example, in his testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on August 18, 1982, Assistant Secretary of State John M. Holdridge said:

> We should keep in mind that what we have here is not a treaty or agreement but a statement of future U.S. policy. We intend to implement this policy, in accordance with our understanding of it. . . . I can further assure you that, having participated closely in the negotiations, I am confident that the Chinese are fully cognizant of that understanding. 82 Dept. of State Bulletin, No. 2067, Oct. 1982, pp. 19, 21.

A recent study prepared for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress stated that non-binding documents existed in many forms, including declarations of intent, joint communiques, joint statements (as well as final acts of conferences), and informal arrangements. It noted that even with respect to documents that are legally non-binding, the parties affected may to some degree expect adherence.

The study referred to a statement by the Department of State of the difference between a legally binding obligation and a political obligation in describing "certain declarations, intended to be politically rather than legally binding, exchanged in connection with the START Treaty," as follows:

> An undertaking or commitment that is understood to be legally binding carries with it both the obligation of each Party to comply with the undertaking and the right of each Party to enforce the obligation under international law. A "political" undertaking is not governed by international law and there are no applicable rules pertaining to compliance, modification, or withdrawal. Until and unless a Party extricates itself from its "political" undertaking, which it may do without legal penalty, it has given a promise to honor that commitment, and the other Party has every reason to be concerned about compliance with such undertakings. If a party contravenes a political commitment, it will be subject to an appropriate political response.

4. Role of Hong Kong

On May 3, 1997, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification the Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Hong Kong for the Surrender of Fugitive Offenders, signed at Hong Kong on December 20, 1996 ("Agreement"). S. Treaty Doc. No. 105-3 (1997). As described in the transmittal letter, the Agreement was intended "to enhance cooperation between the law enforcement communities of the United States and Hong Kong, and provide a framework and basic protections for extraditions after the reversion of Hong Kong to the sovereignty of the People's Republic of China ("PRC") on July 1, 1997." The accompanying report of the Department of State dated February 4, 1997, submitting the treaty to the President, also included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 105-3, explained that the Agreement would be considered a treaty for purposes of U.S. law:

> Although entitled an "Agreement" to reflect Hong Kong's unique juridical status, for purposes of U.S. law, the instrument will be considered to be a treaty, and therefore I am submitting it to you for transmittal to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. In that regard, I note that Hong Kong is entering into the Agreement with the authorization of "the sovereign government which is responsible for its foreign affairs." At present, that is the United Kingdom. However, the PRC has also approved the Agreement and authorized its continuation in force after July 1, 1997 through approval of the Sino-British Joint Liaison Group. . . .

A diplomatic note of January 24, 1997, to the Department of State from the British Embassy in Washington, D.C., explaining the process for negotiation of this and other bilateral treaties with Hong Kong was included in the report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee recommending that the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification. S. Exec. Rep. No. 105-2 (1997). Excerpts from the note are set forth below.

Her Britannic Majesty's Embassy present their compliments to the United States Department of State and have the honour to inform the United States Department of State of the arrangements agreed between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the People's Republic of China relating to the application to Hong Kong after 30 June 1997 of bilateral agreements and, in particular, to extradition arrangements between the United States and the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region of the PRC (HKSAR).

The Status of the Sino-British Joint Declaration on the Question of Hong Kong

The Sino-British Joint Declaration on the Question of Hong Kong, signed on 19 December 1984, is an international treaty, registered at the United Nations, under which the United Kingdom undertakes to restore sovereignty over Hong Kong to China with effect from 1 July 1997 and the Chinese Government sets out the basic policies that it undertakes to implement regarding Hong Kong, including that the HKSAR shall have a high degree of autonomy except in the fields of foreign affairs and defence. The HKSAR will be vested with executive, legislative and independent judicial power, including that of final adjudication. . . .

The Authority of the Sino-British Joint Liaison Group

The British and Chinese Governments agreed in the Joint Declaration to establish a Joint Liaison Group to discuss the effective implementation of the Joint Declaration as well as matters relating to the smooth transfer of government at midnight, on 30 June 1997. . . .

General principles relating to the continued application of existing bilateral agreements to HKSAR

During the Joint Declaration negotiations, Britain and China agreed that, in line with the high degree of autonomy to be enjoyed by the HKSAR in the areas described in para 3 above, the HKSAR could have its own network of agreements with third countries, separate from China, in these areas. . . .

* * * *

The process the two governments agreed in the Joint Liaison Group enables the Hong Kong Government to negotiate the agreements it needs and allows these agreements to continue in effect after the handover without any further action or checking by China, since the entire process will have been scrutinised and agreed by the Chinese Government through the Joint Liaison Group.

The basic steps in the process carried out through exchanges in the Joint Liaison Group are:

— a Model Agreement, eg a model Surrender of Fugitive Offenders Agreement, is negotiated and agreed;
— on behalf of the Hong Kong Government, the British Government asks the Chinese Government to approve a list of negotiating partners;
— once the Chinese Government approves the proposed partners, the British Foreign Secretary signs a formal entrustment authorising the Hong Kong Government to negotiate on its own behalf with those partners on the basis of the Model Agreement;
— once the Hong Kong Government and an approved partner reach agreement, they initial the text. The British Government pass the initialled text to the Chinese Government through the Joint Liaison Group for approval.

The Chinese Government may seek clarification if the initialed text departs significantly from the Model Agreement. Further negotiations between the Hong Kong Government and the approved partner may be necessary. Once the Chinese Government has approved the initialed text, the Hong Kong Government and the approved partner can sign the agreement.

An agreement so concluded and brought into force before the handover will remain in effect after the handover, notwithstanding that China may itself separately have concluded a bilateral agreement in the same area with the same approved partner.

The HK/US Agreement for the Surrender of Fugitive Offenders

In line with the process described above, the Joint Liaison Group has agreed a Model Surrender of Fugitive Offenders Agreement and the Chinese Government has approved a number of negotiating partners, including the United States, with which the Hong Kong Government has, under entrustment by the British Foreign Secretary, concluded new agreements for the surrender of fugitive offenders to replace the existing agreements extended to Hong Kong by the United Kingdom, and to continue in force after the handover.

In the case of the HK/US Surrender of Fugitive Offenders agreement, the Chinese Government approved the text of the agreement during the thirty-seventh plenary meeting of the Joint Liaison Group, held in Peking from 17 to 19 September 1996.

. . . The HK/US Agreement for the Surrender of Fugitive Offenders was duly signed in Hong Kong on 20 December 1996 by the United States Consul-General in Hong Kong and the Hong Kong Secretary for Security. The British Senior Representative to the Joint Liaison Group and a Chinese Representative to the Joint Liaison Group were present at the signing ceremony.

Her Britannic Majesty's Embassy wishes to draw to the attention of the United States Department of State a statement issued by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesman on 21 January, at Annex C. The British Government endorses the Chinese Government's statement that the Hong Kong-US Surrender of Fugitive Offenders Agreement shall remain valid after 30 June 1997.

* * * *

S. Exec. Rep. No. 105–2 also included written responses to questions posed by members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Jamison S. Borek, Deputy Legal Adviser, Department of State, answered a question from Senator Helms concerning the status of the treaty and its implementation, indicating, among other things, that the United States had received confirmation of PRC support of the treaty:

> We believe that the treaty can be successfully implemented because it is the Hong Kong government and not the PRC which has the power and authority to fulfill its obligations under the treaty.
> We expect that the PRC will respect this Agreement; indeed, it has provided us with a diplomatic note expressly confirming its support of the treaty. Furthermore, the relationship between the PRC and Hong Kong in this area is spelled out in the Joint Declaration and Basic Law, and we expect the PRC to honor its commitments under both.

Two other agreements with Hong Kong were likewise treaties for purposes of U.S. law: (1) The Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Hong Kong on Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters, with Annex, (S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–6 (1997); see Chapter 3.A.3.) and (2) the Agreement Between the Government of the United States and the Government of Hong Kong for the Transfer of Sentenced Persons (S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–7 (1997); see Chapter 2.C.2.)

5. Regional Economic Integration Organizations

The interest of regional economic integration organizations ("REIOs"), such as the European Union ("EU"), in becoming parties to treaties or members of international organizations raises legal issues in which the United States is engaged. Several issues arising during the 1990s are discussed below.

a. Agreement to Promote Compliance with International Conservation and Management Measures by Fishing Vessels on the High Seas

On April 25, 1994, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Agreement to Promote Compliance with International Conservation and Management Measures by Fishing Vessels on the High Seas, adopted at Rome by the Conference of the UN Food and Agriculture Organization ("FAO"), November 24, 1993, to the Senate for advice and consent to acceptance. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–24 (1994). Pursuant to Article XI, the Agreement would enter into force upon the receipt by the Director-General of FAO of the twenty-fifth instrument of acceptance. The Senate provided advice and consent to acceptance on October 7, 1994, 140 CONG. REC. D1221 (1997). The United States deposited its instrument of acceptance on December 19, 1995.

As provided in Article X, the Agreement is "open to acceptance by any Member or Associate Member of FAO, and to any non-member State that is a member of the United Nations, or of the specialized agencies of the United Nations or of the International Atomic Energy Agency." The report of the Secretary of State to the President submitting the treaty to the President for transmittal to the Senate, also included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–24, explained that pursuant to Article X the EU could become a party to the treaty:

> . . . The EU, which is a Member of FAO and which participated actively in the negotiations leading to the Agreement, is eligible to become party to the Agreement, subject to certain requirements set forth in Article X(4) relating to the division of competence between the EU and its Member States.

Article X(4) addressed issues of allocation of responsibility between a REIO and its member states, providing:

> When a regional economic integration organization becomes a Party to this Agreement, such regional economic integration organization shall, in accordance with the provision of Article II.7 of the FAO Constitution, as appropriate, notify such modifications or clarifications to its declaration of competence submitted under Article II.5 of the FAO Constitution as may be necessary in light of its acceptance of this Agreement. Any Party to this Agreement may, at any time, request a regional economic integration organization that is a Party to this Agreement to provide information as to which, as between the regional economic integration organization and its Member States, is responsible for the implementation of any particular matter covered by this Agreement. The regional economic integration organization shall provide this information within a reasonable time.

b. Madrid Protocol

On July 19, 1996, Joanna R. Shelton, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Trade Policy and Programs, testified before the House Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Intellectual Property and Judicial Administration, on the Protocol Relating to the Madrid Agreement Concerning the International Registration of Marks ("Madrid Protocol"). Ms. Shelton's testimony noted the benefits that could be derived from the Madrid Protocol; because of issues concerning treatment of REIOs, however, she stated that "we continue to believe that it is not in the best interests of the United States to become party to the Protocol as it now stands. The problem rests not with the substance of its provisions—but rather the way in which the Madrid Protocol is currently structured."

Following further negotiations, the Council of the European Union provided an approved Statement of Intent to address U.S. objections in a letter dated February 2, 2000. As a result, on September 5, 2000, the President transmitted the Madrid Protocol to the Senate for advice and consent to accession. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–41 (2000). The United States became a party to the Madrid Protocol on November

2, 2003. In giving advice and consent to ratification, however, the Senate required the President to notify the Senate of "any nonconsensus vote . . . in which the total number of votes cast by the European Community and its member states exceeded the number of member states of the European Community." 148 CONG. REC. S10640 (Oct. 17, 2002). See Digest 2000 at 297–308*; Digest 2003* at 702–04.

Excerpts below from Ms. Shelton's testimony explain the U.S. concerns with the protocol as drafted. The full text of the prepared testimony is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

Our concerns about the Madrid Protocol center on provisions concerning so-called "intergovernmental organizations." As explained below, these provisions would give unfair advantages to the member states of such organizations, which would undermine U.S. interests with respect to the Madrid Protocol and other aspects of international intellectual property protection, as well as our overall treaty practices.

By way of background, international agreements are traditionally concluded among states. Although the European Union (EU) is not a state, its member states have transferred to it some of their powers to conclude and implement international agreements. In the drafting of treaties and the operation of international organizations, the United States has looked for ways to accommodate European integration. As European integration proceeds and develops, however, the United States must be careful that those accommodations do not put the United States at a disadvantage.

. . . [W]e do not object to states forming Regional Economic Integration Organizations (REIOs), such as the EU, nor have we ever concluded that participation by REIOs in international agreements is objectionable. Indeed, the United States generally has supported participation by REIOs, including the EU, in multilateral fora. Furthermore, we recognize that REIOs can be effective instruments for fostering economic integration and well-being. Nevertheless, their participation in international agreements must be carefully monitored.

* * * *

Our principal objections to the Madrid Protocol are:

(1) that it allows an "intergovernmental organization" to have an additional vote separate and independent from its member states;
(2) that it allows an "intergovernmental organization" to be counted independently toward the number of entities required to bring the protocol into force despite the fact that its member states also may be counted;
(3) that it grants voting rights to "intergovernmental organizations" without requiring an unambiguous declaration of competence; and
(4) that it grants rights to "intergovernmental organizations."

EU Voting

From the debate over competence emerged the EU contention that "shared competency" required the EU to have its own vote separate and independent from that of its member states.

The issue of competent authority is inextricably linked to the issue of voting. . . . [T]he U.S. has long opposed granting a vote to REIOs separate and independent from their member states, and our policy is not to become party to agreements where concurrent voting by REIOs and their member states is allowed. In these cases, the U.S. has viewed such voting as an unwarranted expansion of rights under the agreement which may well work to the detriment of U.S. interests. If its member states were to cede competent authority to the EU on the substance of the Madrid Protocol, we would have no problem with the EU voting the position of the fifteen member states of the European Communities. However, we cannot accept a situation where an assertion of "shared competency" would suggest that the EU is entitled to a separate sixteenth vote exclusive of and in addition to those of its member states.

* * * *

Counting REIO Ratification Toward Bringing the Treaty into Force

A corollary of the EU voting issue is the provision of the Madrid Protocol that would permit a REIO and its member states to be counted separately toward bringing the Protocol into force. We have opposed this provision of the Protocol for the same reasons we have objected to concurrent voting by a REIO and its member states—that such a provision represents an unwarranted expansion of the powers of REIOs and their member states which has no basis in international law. Consequently, we cannot agree to any provision that would allow a REIO as well as its member states to count toward bringing an agreement into force.

Declaration of Competence

Another objection to the current text of the Madrid Protocol is the absence of a requirement for an unambiguous declaration of the allocation of competence as between the intergovernmental organization and its member states.

As party to an agreement, the United States has a legal and practical need to know which party has responsibility for implementing the particular obligations of an agreement. Consequently, before entering into an agreement, we regularly have requested from REIOs and their member states a clear statement as to allocation of competence.

The issue of competent authority arose in the Madrid Protocol when the EU and its member states were unwilling to provide a definitive statement as to where responsibility for the implementation of the Protocol resided. Rather, the EU and its member states attempted to introduce a new concept they characterized as "shared competence." Under this arrangement, the EU and its member states claimed to each have full, separate and independent responsibility for substantive trademark matters under the Madrid Protocol. This proposal, heretofore unknown in international law and practice, served to introduce uncertainty into the administration of the Madrid Protocol that we believe could work to the disadvantage of the United States.

Lack of Definition of Intergovernmental Organization

When states have transferred competence to negotiate and implement treaties to a supranational body, that body may be an appropriate treaty partner. On the other hand, a looser grouping of states—for example, one that is largely a political compact—would lack the legal and practical ability to honor commitments it made in a treaty. For this reason, when treaties permit supranational bodies to become parties, they typically define such bodies with precision. For example, the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer defines those categories of organizations eligible to participate as organizations constituted by sovereign states, having competence in matters covered by the agreement, and having been duly authorized to become party to the agreement. The Madrid Protocol, however, contains no safeguards to address our concerns about "non-states."

USG Engagement on EU Voting

Because we are not party to the underlying treaty, the Madrid Agreement Concerning the International Registration of Marks, our role in negotiating the Protocol was limited. We nevertheless made known our views on EU voting to the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) and to EU member states.

Since the Protocol was concluded, we have actively engaged the EU and WIPO member states on the issue of EU voting. Through a series of demarches to foreign governments, we have explained our views and solicited their support for our position. Our view has garnered significant support among the countries of East Asia and Latin America, so much so that voting provisions were dropped from the recently-concluded Trademark Law Treaty in order to avoid granting the EU an extra vote. In addition, the issue has been shelved in the negotiations for the Hague Agreement Concerning the International Deposit of Industrial Designs.

B. CONCLUSION, ENTRY INTO FORCE, RESERVATIONS, APPLICATION AND TERMINATION

1. Provisional Application

From time to time, the United States provisionally applies the terms of a treaty pending its entry into force. For example, the United States agreed with Mexico and with Russia to recognize provisional boundaries set forth in an exchange of notes in each case accompanying a treaty on maritime boundaries. See discussion in Chapter 12.A.3.a. and 13.A.4.a.(9), respectively.

In some cases, a treaty may expressly provide for provisional application. For example, Article 7 of the 1994 Agreement Relating to Implementation of Part XI of the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea ("1994 Agreement") provided that, until the 1994 Agreement entered into force, it would be applied provisionally from November 16, 1994, by (1) States which consented to the adoption of the 1994 Agreement (i.e., by voting in favor of the resolution by which the UNGA adopted the 1994 Agreement) unless such State indicated otherwise; (2) States which signed the 1994 Agreement, again unless such State indicated otherwise; (3) other States (i.e., those not UN members) which consented to provisional application through notification to the Depositary; and (4) States which acceded to the 1994 Agreement. Those States that applied the 1994 Agreement provisionally were required to do so "in accordance with their national or internal laws and regulations." The 1994 Agreement entered into force on July 28, 1996.

In transmitting the 1994 Agreement to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification, the United States stated that, at the time of its signature on July 29, 1994, the United States indicated that it intended to apply the agreement provisionally pending ratification. See further discussion in Chapter 12.A.1.

2. Applicability of Treaties to Taiwan

a. 1946 FCN treaty applicable to Taiwan

On January 24, 1992, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed a lower court ruling that certain Taiwanese television programs were eligible for copyright protection under U.S. law. New York Chinese TV Programs, Inc. v. U.E.

Enters., Inc., 954 F.2d 847 (2d Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 827 (1992). Plaintiff New York Chinese TV had been granted the exclusive license to distribute in New York and New Jersey video cassette copies of certain television programs from Taiwan for which American copyrights had been obtained. Defendants in the case had attempted to sell the same programs in the same states. New York Chinese TV sued, claiming, among other things, that defendants' reproduction and sale of the videotapes violated plaintiff's rights under the Copyright Act of 1978, 17 U.S.C. §§ 101–110. The United States filed a Statement of Interest in support of plaintiff's position on September 26, 1988. The district court ruled for plaintiff, endorsing the views expressed in the Statement of Interest. 1989 U.S.Dist. LEXIS 2760 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 8, 1989). See I Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 256–59.

On appeal in October 1991, the United States filed a brief as amicus curiae. The U.S. brief reiterated its position that the 1946 Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation ("FCN treaty") between the United States and the then Republic of China ("ROC") continued in force pursuant to the terms of the Taiwan Relations Act, 22 U.S.C. §§ 3301–3316 ("TRA"). As a result, Article IX of the FCN Treaty satisfied the language in the Copyright Act extending copyright protection to "a national, domiciliary, or sovereign authority of a foreign nation that is a party to a copyright treaty to which the United States is also a party." 17 U.S.C. § 104(b)(1). As a matter of domestic law, the U.S. argued, the TRA "has continued copyright protection for Taiwanese nationals under section 104(b) [of the Copyright Act] after January 1, 1979. . . . Congress, for domestic purposes, has simply extended the effectiveness of a piece of domestic legislation (section 104(b)(1)) by another piece of domestic legislation (the TRA)."

The U.S. brief also refuted defendants' Constitution-based arguments. The United States argued that the TRA did not constitute an "amendment" of the FCN Treaty and that, even if it were an "amendment," there was no constitutional impediment to taking such action through a "legislative-executive agreement" rather than a "treaty" entered into with the advice and consent of the Senate under Article II of the Constitution.

The Second Circuit opinion providing the legal context of the issue and confirming copyright protection is excerpted below (footnotes omitted).

Recognition of the PRC . . . necessitated derecognition of the ROC. Accordingly, on December 30, 1978, then-President Jimmy Carter signed a memorandum "recognizing the government of the People's Republic of China as the sole legal government of China and . . . terminating diplomatic relations with the Republic of China." President's Memorandum for All Departments and Agencies: Relations With the People on Taiwan, reprinted in 1979 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 75 (hereinafter President's Memorandum).

The President's Memorandum acknowledged that, despite its termination of diplomatic relations with Taiwan, the United States still wished to maintain "commercial, cultural, and other relations with the people of Taiwan without official government representation and without diplomatic relations." Id. As part of this policy, the President's Memorandum directed that > Existing international agreements and arrangements in force between the United States and Taiwan shall continue in force and shall be performed and enforced by departments and agencies beginning January 1, 1979, in accordance with their terms and, as appropriate, through that instrumentality.

Id.

Since 1979, the Executive Branch has consistently used the President's Memorandum's mandate as a basis for continuing to honor the FCN Treaty. The State Department annually publishes Treaties in Force, listing all treaties that are honored by the United States. Significantly, each edition of Treaties in Force published since the United States derecognized Taiwan in 1979 includes the FCN Treaty as a valid and enforceable treaty.

Derecognition of Taiwan prodded Congress to ensure that Taiwan's status as a major United States trading partner remained unscathed. Accordingly, Congress passed the Taiwan Relations Act ("TRA") codified at 22 U.S.C. § 3301, et seq., "to preserve and promote extensive, close, and friendly commercial, cultural, and other relations between the people of the United States and the people on Taiwan" and to "declare that peace and stability in the area are in the political, security, and economic interests of the United States." 22 U.S.C. § 3301(b)(1), (2).

The substantive provisions of the TRA are analogous to the President's Memorandum. Like the President's Memorandum, the TRA states that the > absence of diplomatic relations or recognition shall not affect the application of the laws of the United States with respect to Taiwan . . . in the [same] manner that the laws of the United States applied with respect to Taiwan prior to January 1, 1979.

22 U.S.C. § 3303(a). More specifically, the TRA mandates > the continuation in force of all treaties and other international agreements . . . entered into by the United States and the governing authorities on Taiwan recognized by the United States as the Republic of China prior to January 1, 1979, and in force between them on December 31, 1978, unless and until terminated in accordance with law.

Id. § 3303(c).

1. The "Treaty" Requirement of Section 104(b)(1)

As noted previously, Section 104(b)(1) [of the Copyright Act] permits the granting of copyright protection to works authored by citizens of a foreign nation if that nation is a party to a copyright treaty with the United States. Defendants argue that the United States and Taiwan no longer have such a treaty. This conclusion rests on two premises. First, defendants contend that the FCN Treaty lapsed in 1979 when the United States derecognized Taiwan. Second, defendants assert that the TRA cannot resurrect the obligations imposed by the FCN Treaty because that would require a new treaty, and the TRA is not a treaty.

To be sure, the TRA is not a "treaty." A "treaty" is a contract between nations. . . . The TRA is solely a domestic statute. . . .

The difficulty with the defendants' argument lies in their root premise that the FCN Treaty lapsed upon derecognition of Taiwan. It is well settled that "on the question whether a treaty has ever been terminated, governmental action in respect to it must be regarded as of controlling importance." Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 285, 46 L. Ed. 534, 22 S. Ct. 484 (1902). Moreover, the judiciary should refrain from determining whether a treaty has lapsed, and instead should defer to the wishes of the elected branches of government. See Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 194, 31 L. Ed. 386, 8 S. Ct. 456 (1888). In this case, both Congress and the Executive Branch have, with rare clarity, determined that the United States must continue to honor the FCN Treaty, despite official diplomatic derecognition of Taiwan.

The TRA requires the United States to honor all previous treaties and international agreements with Taiwan. Among these obligations is the FCN Treaty, which was explicitly noted by the House of Representatives in its report on the TRA. H.R. Rep. No. 26, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 10–11 (1979). Thus, we find that Congress indisputably intended that the FCN Treaty remain a valid and enforceable treaty.

Similarly, the Executive Branch has not wavered from honoring the FCN Treaty. Each edition of the State Department pamphlet Treaties in Force published between 1979 and the present date lists the FCN Treaty as a valid treaty. Moreover, we have not located any proclamation from either the President or any Executive Agency renouncing the United States' obligations under the FCN Treaty.

Because both Congress and the Executive Branch agree that the FCN treaty is to continue in effect, and because of the deference we owe to the political branches of the government in treaty matters, we hold that the FCN treaty remains a valid and enforceable treaty.

* * * *

We do not quarrel with defendants' assertion that a significant amendment to a treaty must follow the mandate of the Treaty Clause, and therefore must be proposed by the President, and be ratified following the advice and consent of the Senate. We find, however, that the TRA has not amended the FCN Treaty in such fashion as to implicate the Treaty Clause.

The TRA simply inserted a new name in the FCN Treaty to replace the derecognized "Republic of China," and to recognize the realities of a changed political landscape. . . .

* * * *

A change in the name of a party to a treaty is not an "amendment" to that treaty. Cf. Arnbjornsdottir-Mendler v. United States, 721 F.2d 679 (9th Cir. 1983) (treaty between the United States and Denmark applied to Iceland after Iceland had declared its independence from Denmark). Rather, a treaty is "amended" only if the obligations imposed by that treaty change. The TRA certainly has not changed any of the substantive requirements of the FCN Treaty.

Finally, we are mindful of the strong commercial relationship ties between the United States and Taiwan. Indeed, Taiwan's trade with the United States has increased nearly four-fold since 1979. This trade would surely go elsewhere if the FCN, the bedrock of the U.S.-Taiwanese commercial relationship, were to crumble suddenly. Taiwan, moreover, has unfailingly relied upon the FCN Treaty to provide protection of its own copyright laws to works authored by American citizens. Taiwan would have little reason to honor the FCN Treaty if the United States were to turn its back on the Treaty. Thus, our holding encourages the United States to provide copyright protection to works authored by Taiwanese citizens, and insures that Americans will receive copyright protection of their works in Taiwan.

b. Taiwan not bound by Warsaw Convention never adhered to by ROC

Mingtai Fire & Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. ("Mingtai") insured a package that was lost during shipment from Taiwan to San Jose, California. Mingtai alleged that the package contained computer chips worth over $83,000 and brought suit against United Parcel Service and United Parcel Service International, Inc. (collectively "UPS"), the carrier of the package, in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California. Mingtai argued that the loss was covered under the Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules Relating to International Transportation by Air ("Warsaw Convention"), Oct. 12, 1929, 49 Stat. 3000, T.S. No. 876, 49 U.S.C. § 40105 note. UPS took the position that the Warsaw Convention did not apply to Taiwan and that its air carrier liability was thus limited to the $100 released value provided by the air waybill. The district court agreed with the UPS position, finding that Taiwan, which is not a party to the Warsaw Convention, was not bound by the People's Republic of China's ("PRC's") adherence to the Convention. Mingtai Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. UPS, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23535 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 10, 1997).

Mingtai appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. Excerpts below from the brief for the United States as amicus curiae filed in the court of appeals described the interest of the United States in the case and its view that the case had been decided correctly by the district court because the Republic of China ("ROC") had never adhered to the treaty.

The full text of the U.S. brief is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

The question presented on this appeal is whether the adherence to an international agreement by the People's Republic of China ("PRC") binds Taiwan. The United States has a very strong interest in ensuring that it does not. The United States has not recognized in the PRC a power to bind Taiwan to the PRC's international commitments. To the contrary, through executive orders and legislation, the President and Congress have ensured that the United States may maintain separate relations with the authorities on Taiwan.

The United States submits this amicus brief to make clear that plaintiff's position, if accepted, would create significant foreign policy problems for the United States. As this Court has recognized, the views of the executive branch on matters of foreign policy are entitled to great weight. . . .

* * * *

. . . At the core of the [Warsaw] Convention is a series of provisions governing the nature and scope of a carrier's liability for three categories of harms—personal injury, damaged or lost goods or baggage, and damage due to delay—that occur in the course of international air travel.

The Warsaw Convention applies if the place of departure and the place of destination are situated . . . within the territories of two parties to the Convention. . . . See Warsaw convention, Article 1.

. . . The United States adhered to the Convention in 1934. See T.S. No. 896, 49 Stat. 3000 (1934). The Republic of China ["R.O.C."] never adhered to the Convention. See Goldhirsch, The Warsaw Convention Annotated: A Legal Handbook App. 9 (1988).

The People's Republic of China adhered to the Convention in 1958. See Shawcross & Beaumont, Air Law App. 17 (1997). In adhering to the Convention, the PRC made a declaration purporting to extend the Convention to Taiwan. See id. at App. 21 n. 8 (declaration stating that the Convention "will of course apply to the entire Chinese territory including Taiwan"). In response to the PRC's declaration, the United States informed the Polish government—the depository for the Warsaw Convention —that, since [at that time] the United States recognized "the Government of the Republic of China as the only legal Government of China and does not recognize the so-called 'People's Republic of China', it regards this action as being without legal effect." . . . The authorities on Taiwan have consistently maintained that the R.O.C. never adhered to the Convention and that Taiwan is therefore not bound by its terms.

* * * *

The court of appeals affirmed the district court's decision. Mingtai Fire & Marine Insurance Co, Ltd. v. UPS, 177 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 951 (1999). Excerpts below from the court's decision explain its conclusion that "the Warsaw Convention does not apply to the lost air cargo in this case and the district court properly upheld the limitation of liability in the air waybill." (footnotes deleted).

* * * *

[The provisions of the TRA] strongly imply that, despite the absence of official relations, the United States continues to deal separately with Taiwan. With the passage of the Act, the United States not only continued in force its treaties with Taiwan that antedated derecognition; it also gave no indication that existing or future agreements with the newly recognized China would be binding upon Taiwan.

The State Department's publication Treaties in Force makes explicit what is implicit in the Act. Treaties in Force contains sections listing bilateral treaties with various countries. See U.S. Dep't of State, Treaties in Force iii–iv (1997). There are separate sections listing the bilateral treaties between (1) the United States and "China" and (2) the United States and "China (Taiwan)". See id. . . .

More specific to the question presented here, "China" is listed as a signatory to the Warsaw Convention, while "China (Taiwan)" is not. See id. at 329–30. This listing of "China" does not appear to encompass Taiwan, because . . . where both China and Taiwan are signatories to a treaty, Treaties in Force so indicates. . . .

We need not, however, merely rely upon the implications of the Act and the statements in and structure of Treaties in Force. Instead, we have the benefit of the Executive's express position on the issue presented. In an amicus brief and at oral argument, the United States made plain its position that China's adherence to the Convention does not bind Taiwan. In Taiwan v. United States District Court, we were similarly presented with a question concerning Taiwan's status, regarding which the United States filed a brief as amicus curiae. See 128 F.3d at 718. We noted that the United States' position was "entitled to substantial deference in light of the 'primacy of the Executive in the conduct of foreign relations' and the Executive Branch's lead role in foreign policy," and thus held in accordance with that position. Id. (quoting First Nat'l City Bank v. Banco Nacional de Cuba, 406 U.S. 759, 767, 32 L. Ed. 2d 466, 92 S. Ct. 1808 (1972)). Similarly here, the United States' position is entitled to deference.

While Mingtai argues that the district court violated separation of powers by rejecting its position, it instead would be an intrusion into the political sphere for this court to rule in Mingtai's favor and effectively to hold, contrary to every indication of executive and legislative intent, that Taiwan has tacitly been recognized by the United States as a party to any treaty signed by China. We will not do so. We caution, however, that we do not independently determine the status of Taiwan; instead, we merely recognize and defer to the political departments' position that Taiwan is not bound by China's adherence to the Warsaw Convention.

3. Treaty Interpretation

a. Relationship between treaty and domestic law

On January 12, 1999, the Supreme Court held that a "recovery for a personal injury suffered 'on board [an] aircraft or in the course of any of the operations of embarking or disembarking,' . . . if not allowed under the [Warsaw] Convention, is not available at all." El Al Isr. Airlines, Ltd. v. Tsui Yuan Tseng, 525 U.S. 155 (1999). In so doing, it reversed a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, 122 F.3d 99 (1997), and resolved a split among the circuits on the interpretation of the Warsaw Convention on this issue.

In the case presented, the plaintiff sought tort damages from El Al Israel Airlines in New York state court because she had been subjected to "an intrusive security search" before boarding an El Al flight to Tel Aviv. As explained in excerpts from the Court's decision set forth below, Article 17 of the Warsaw Convention limits carrier liability for personal injury damages to "bodily injury" from an "accident . . . sustained . . . in the course of any of the operations of embarking or disembarking," as those terms are used in the convention. The intrusive security search did not fit either of these terms, and thus the question presented was whether a passenger who suffered personal injury within the scope of the Warsaw Convention, but who could not meet the conditions set forth in Article 17 for establishing that a carrier was liable under the convention itself, could nonetheless seek relief under the law of a state of the United States.

The U.S. filed an amicus brief arguing that the Warsaw Convention language should be interpreted to mean that any personal injury action brought by a passenger against a carrier for events arising in international air travel must be subject to the conditions and limits of the convention in Article 17. See www.usdoj.gov/osg/briefs/1998/3mer/1ami/97-0475.ami.mer.supp.html. Excerpts from the opinion of the Supreme Court adopting this view are set forth below. (footnotes ommited.)

At the outset, we highlight key provisions of the treaty we are interpreting. Chapter I of the Warsaw Convention, entitled "SCOPE—DEFINITIONS," declares in Article 1(1) that the "Convention shall apply to all international transportation of persons, baggage, or goods performed by aircraft for hire." 49 Stat. 3014. Chapter III, entitled "LIABILITY OF THE CARRIER," defines in Articles 17, 18, and 19 the three kinds of liability for which the Convention provides. Article 17 establishes the conditions of liability for personal injury to passengers:

> "The carrier shall be liable for damage sustained in the event of the death or wounding of a passenger or any other bodily injury suffered by a passenger, if the accident which caused the damage so sustained took place on board the aircraft or in the course of any of the operations of embarking or disembarking." 49 Stat. 3018.

. . . Article 24, referring back to Article[] 17 . . . instructs:

* * * *

> "(2) In the cases covered by article 17 the provisions of the preceding paragraph shall also apply, without prejudice to the questions as to who are the persons who have the right to bring suit and what are their respective rights." Id., at 3020.

* * * *

We accept it as given that El Al's search of Tseng was not an "accident" within the meaning of Article 17, for the parties do not place that Court of Appeals conclusion at issue. . . . We also accept, again only for purposes of this decision, that El Al's actions did not constitute "wilful misconduct"; accordingly, we confront no issue under Article 25 of the Convention. . . . The parties do not dispute that the episode-in-suit occurred in international transportation in the course of embarking.

Our inquiry begins with the text of Article 24, which prescribes the exclusivity of the Convention's provisions for air carrier liability. "It is our responsibility to give the specific words of the treaty a meaning consistent with the shared expectations of the contracting parties." Saks, 470 U.S. at 399. "Because a treaty ratified by the United States is not only the law of this land, see U.S. Const., Art. II, § 2, but also an agreement among sovereign powers, we have traditionally considered as aids to its interpretation the negotiating and drafting history (travaux preparatoires) and the postratification understanding of the contracting parties." Zicherman, 516 U.S. at 226.

Article 24 provides that "cases covered by article 17"—or in the governing French text, "les cas prevus a l'article 17"—may "only be brought subject to the conditions and limits set out in the Convention." 49 Stat. 3020. That prescription is not a model of the clear drafter's art. We recognize that the words lend themselves to divergent interpretation.

In Tseng's view, and in the view of the Court of Appeals, "les cas prevus a l'article 17" means those cases in which a passenger could actually maintain a claim for relief under Article 17. So read, Article 24 would permit any passenger whose personal injury suit did not satisfy the liability conditions of Article 17 to pursue the claim under local law.

In El Al's view, on the other hand, and in the view of the United States as amicus curiae, "les cas prevus a l'article 17" refers generically to all personal injury cases stemming from occurrences on board an aircraft or in embarking or disembarking, and simply distinguishes that class of cases (Article 17 cases) from cases involving damaged luggage or goods, or delay (which Articles 18 and 19 address). So read, Article 24 would preclude a passenger from asserting any air transit personal injury claims under local law, including claims that failed to satisfy Article 17's liability conditions, notably, because the injury did not result from an "accident," see Saks, 470 U.S. at 405, or because the "accident" did not result in physical injury or physical manifestation of injury, see Floyd, 499 U.S. at 552.

Respect is ordinarily due the reasonable views of the Executive Branch concerning the meaning of an international treaty. See Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176, 184–185, 72 L. Ed. 2d 765, 102 S. Ct. 2374 (1982) ("Although not conclusive, the meaning attributed to treaty provisions by the Government agencies charged with their negotiation and enforcement is entitled to great weight."). We conclude that the Government's construction of Article 24 is most faithful to the Convention's text, purpose, and overall structure.

A. The cardinal purpose of the Warsaw Convention, we have observed, is to "achieve uniformity of rules governing claims arising from international air transportation." Floyd, 499 U.S. at 552; see Zicherman, 516 U.S. at 230. The Convention signatories, in the treaty's preamble, specifically "recognized the advantage of regulating in a uniform manner the conditions of . . . the liability of the carrier." 49 Stat. 3014. To provide the desired uniformity, Chapter III of the Convention sets out an array of liability rules which, the treaty declares, "apply to all international transportation of persons, baggage, or goods performed by aircraft." Ibid. . . .

* * * *

A complementary purpose of the Convention is to accommodate or balance the interests of passengers seeking recovery for personal injuries, and the interests of air carriers seeking to limit potential liability. Before the Warsaw accord, injured passengers could file suits for damages, subject only to the limitations of the forum's laws, including the forum's choice of law regime. This exposure inhibited the growth of the then-fledgling international airline industry. . . .

* * * *

The drafting history of Article 17 is consistent with our understanding of the preemptive effect of the Convention. The preliminary draft of the Convention submitted to the conference at Warsaw made air carriers liable "in the case of death, wounding, or any other bodily injury suffered by a traveler." Minutes 264; see Saks, 470 U.S. at 401. In the later draft that prescribed what is now Article 17, airline liability was narrowed to encompass only bodily injury caused by an "accident." See Minutes 205. It is improbable that, at the same time the drafters narrowed the conditions of air carrier liability in Article 17, they intended, in Article 24, to permit passengers to skirt those conditions by pursuing claims under local law.

* * * *

Decisions of the courts of other Convention signatories corroborate our understanding of the Convention's preemptive effect. In Sidhu, the British House of Lords considered and decided the very question we now face concerning the Convention's exclusivity when a passenger alleges psychological damages, but no physical injury, resulting from an occurrence that is not an "accident" under Article 17. See 1 All E.R. at 201, 207. Reviewing the text, structure, and drafting history of the Convention, the Lords concluded that the Convention was designed to "ensure that, in all questions relating to the carrier's liability, it is the provisions of the Convention which apply and that the passenger does not have access to any other remedies, whether under the common law or otherwise, which may be available within the particular country where he chooses to raise his action." Ibid. Courts of other nations bound by the Convention have also recognized the treaty's encompassing preemptive effect. The "opinions of our sister signatories," we have observed, are "entitled to considerable weight." Saks, 470 U.S. at 404 (internal quotation marks omitted). The text, drafting history, and underlying purpose of the Convention, in sum, counsel us to adhere to a view of the treaty's exclusivity shared by our treaty partners.

* * * *

For the reasons stated, we hold that the Warsaw Convention precludes a passenger from maintaining an action for personal injury damages under local law when her claim does not satisfy the conditions for liability under the Convention. . . .

b. Relationship between treaty and subsequent customary international law

By letter dated July 1, 1991, John O. McGinnis, Deputy Assistant Attorney General of the U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel ("OLC"), informed Deputy Legal Adviser Alan J. Kreczko that the Department of Justice would defer to the Department of State's view that the 1958 Convention on the Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone ("1958 Convention") did not prevent the United States from extending its contiguous zone to twenty-four nautical miles by Presidential proclamation.

As noted in the OLC letter, the 1958 Convention provides that the nation's contiguous zone "may not extend beyond twelve miles from the baseline from which the breadth of the territorial sea is asserted." A memorandum prepared by David Small, Assistant Legal Adviser for Oceans, International Environmental and Scientific Issues, U.S. Department of State, dated April 5, 1989, and forwarded to OLC by Legal Adviser Abraham D. Sofaer on April 24, 1989, explained that a consensus had emerged since 1958 that a twenty-four mile contiguous zone was permissible under international law. On September 2, 1999, President William J. Clinton issued Proclamation 7219, extending the U.S. contiguous zone to 24 nautical miles. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1684 (Sept. 2, 1999); 64 Fed. Reg. 48,701 (Sept. 8, 1999). See Chapter 12.A.2.

Summary

Under international law, a treaty rule may lose its effect if the parties accept an inconsistent customary norm and do not intend the treaty to constitute a special regime among themselves. The process has safeguards and allows written international law to be developed without creating unrealistic rigidity. Though various concerns prevented express codification of this principle in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, it has ample support. The 1958 Convention parties have accepted a norm permitting 24 nautical mile contiguous zones and are not applying Article 24(2) as a special regime. It no longer binds the U.S. internationally.

The Constitution does not generally constrain the President under a treaty where the treaty does not constrain the U.S. internationally. There were no Executive Branch representations to the Senate at the time of ratification that Article 24(2) was part of a special regime. Accordingly, Article 24(2) does not constitutionally bar Presidential proclamation of a 24 nautical mile contiguous zone.

The 24 nautical mile rule is not controversial and involves no vested rights. Congressional consultations indicated no substantive concern with it. The record of similar action by other parties to the 1958 Convention indicates that no other party will object.

I. International law

A. Supersession of the 12 nautical mile limit

The 24 nautical mile contiguous zone provision of the 1982 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea (LOS) (Article 33) was non-controversial in the LOS negotiations. The United States has accepted the 24 nautical mile contiguous zone rule as customary international law. See, e.g., Statement by the President, March 10, 1983, 19 Weekly Comp. Pres. Docs. 383 (recognizing the rights of coastal states as reflected in the 1982 LOS Convention); see also Restatement (3d), Foreign Relations Law of the United States, § 511(b), comment(k), and Introductory Note to Part V (1988). Thirty-six states now have contiguous zones greater than 12 nautical miles.

Moreover, the parties to the 1958 Convention, in fact, accept the supersession of the 12 nautical mile rule of Article 24(2) among themselves: eleven parties have extended their zones beyond 12 miles; our recent survey of those parties turned up no reports of protests (except for a U.S. protest before we accepted the extended limits). To date, we have found no indication that any state party to the 1958 Convention is in the position of a "persistent objector" to the 24 nautical mile contiguous zone rule. A Dutch official recently expressed the prevailing international attitude: "[The Netherlands] has never objected to any country extending its contiguous zone beyond twelve miles; it assesses an extension of the contiguous zone equal to the territorial sea as consequential to the extension of the territorial sea." (The Hague 0100, 5 January 1989.)

The contiguous zone case has a direct analogue in 1958 High Seas Convention and the 200 nautical mile exclusive economic (or fishing) zone. Such zones are recognized in the 1982 LOS Convention and are now claimed by one hundred and two states. Thirty-four of them, the U.S. included, remain party to the 1958 High Seas Convention, which is inconsistent with such zones, inter alia, in providing for freedom of fishing for all states (Article 2) in all parts of the sea beyond the territorial sea (Article 1). We surveyed these states party: their experience too was acquiescence, not protest, since the mid-1970's. After the President's 1983 proclamation of our 200 mile EEZ, the United States received some objections to picking out a portion of the 1982 LOS "package deal", but these were not legal protests.

B. Theoretical bases for the supersession

These cases are not treated by the states party to the 1958 conventions or generally understood by international law authorities as involving treaty breach, at least by the states which acted after the initial few extensions. A variety of theories, some overlapping, support this legal result.

1. Emergence of a new inconsistent customary rule modifying the operation of a prior treaty

Article 68(c) of the 1964 ILC draft articles on the law of treaties stated that "the operation of a treaty may be modified by subsequent emergence of a new rule of customary law relating to matters dealt with in the treaty and binding upon all the parties." 2 ILC Yearbook 198 (1964); adopted unanimously, 1 ILC Yearbook 318 (1964). The government comments on this draft article and the comments of the ILC members on this and its predecessor (Article 73 of the Third Report on the Law of Treaties, 2 ILC Yearbook 53 (1964)) evidence acceptance of the rule as existing customary law, although there were some questions raised about the appropriateness of including it in the convention and some sentiment that it was more appropriately conceived of as a rule of interpretation than application or modification. See Annex: Summary of Consideration of Draft Law of Treaty Articles on Informal Modification, attached to this memorandum. The United States found the formulation "literally accurate and in keeping with the long recognized principle that treaties are to be applied in the context of international law and in accordance with the evolution of that law." Citing difficulties its codification might lead to, the U.S. suggested leaving the principle "to be applied under the norms of international law in general . . ." 2 ILC Yearbook 358 (1966), quoted in Annex, 3–4. The ILC later dropped Article 68(c) because "the question would in any given case depend to a large extent on the intentions of the parties" and the relation between customary and treaty norms was too complex, id. at 236; at the same time, the ILC broadened the interpretation article to encompass subsequent changes in law. Id. at 222, Annex, 5–6.

The principle is generally accepted. Case Concerning Delimitation of the Continental Shelf, (U.K./France), infra. 10; Restatement, 5102, Comment j; 1 Rousseau, Droit International-Public 344 (1970); Reuter, Introduction au Droit des Traités 117–118 (2nd ed. 1985); Schachter, General Course in Public International Law 178 Receuil des Cours 98 (1982); Thirlway, International Customary Law and Codification 130–142 (1972); Morelli, Observations on Treaty Termination, 1 Annuaire de l'Inst. de Droit Int'l 296–29 (1967); Giraud, Modification et terminaison des traités collectifs, Annuaire 49, 54–59 (1961); R. Pinto, La Prescription en Droit International, 87 Receuil 431–432 (1955); Villager, Customary International Law and Treaties 207–234 (1985). The instances in which certain provisions of the 1958 LOS conventions have been displaced by new inconsistent customary rules are cited as prime examples of this principle in operation. Restatement, 5102, Comment j; Schachter, at 98; Villager, at 213.

One explanation of the principle is that the treaty and customary law rule are essentially equal sources and that the latter will control in the case of incompatibility. Such a principle would be highly questionable if it operated without regard to the possible intent of the parties that a treaty provision remain binding among themselves. See, U.K. comment on article 68(c), 2 ILC Yearbook 345 (1966), and Sixth Report on the Law of Treaties, id. at 90. However, as the ILC made clear in dropping article 168(c) and encompassing subsequent law changes in the interpretation articles, the principle's application depends largely on the parties' intent. This is reflected in the Restatement formulation: "A new rule of customary law will supersede inconsistent obligations created by earlier agreement if the parties so intend and the intention is clearly manifested." Restatement, § 102, Comment j.

2. Properly interpreting a law-stating treaty as not originally intended to maintain a special regime

The result may also be explained as a matter of treaty interpretation, not modification, "taking into account" the customary factors: the treaty's object and purpose, subsequent practice in its application which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation and any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between them. Vienna Convention, Article 31(3)(a), (b) and (c).

The purpose of parties in concluding a treaty may be to establish and maintain a special arrangement among themselves, for example a regional code of conduct. The emergence of a new inconsistent general rule of customary law, applicable in the relations of the regional arrangement parties with non-parties, would not supercede the regional code in the relations of the parties inter se, unless the new rule were a peremptory norm of international law. Vienna Convention, Article 64.

The general purpose of law-stating treaties, however, is to render accessible, clarify, crystallize or develop general international law. Such treaty rules are drafted as general rule statements, e.g., "the contiguous zone shall not exceed twelve miles." They do not commit parties to persistent objection to emerging change: it is implicit that a treaty rule may became obsolete; the parties may accept an inconsistent norm, making the original object and purpose in stating the treaty rule impossible to achieve. To consider the parties bound inter se in those circumstances would artificially convert the treaty rule to a special regime, absent reason to believe the parties intended it. Vamvoukos, Termination of Treaties in International Law 214 (1985) ("... even in a case where recourse to objective tests cannot justify an application of the rebus doctrine, one may reach the conclusion, by interpreting the treaty, that the changes are of such a nature that the continuation of the treaty would be incompatible with the original intention of the parties"). In the case of the 1958 law of the sea conventions, the parties' practice evidences agreement that the obsolete provisions were not intended as a special regime in these circumstances.

While this might appear to strain the line between interpreting a treaty and modifying its effects, it is consonant with the LOS process since the 1950's and is precisely the kind of interpretive possibility contemplated during the drafting of Vienna Article 31(3) and left open by its wording. . . .

3. Subsequent practice establishing tacit consent of all the parties to modify the treaty's effect

The distinction between new inconsistent custom changing a treaty's interpretation and modifying its effect is of little practical significance, especially for states which accept the broader principle, reflected in Article 68(b) of the 1964 ILC draft articles, that, even in cases where changed customary law is not involved, the effect of a treaty may be modified by "subsequent practice of the parties in the application of the treaty establishing their agreement to" the modification. 2 ILC Yearbook 198 (1964). That article, renumbered 38, was unfortunately worded and was deleted at the Vienna diplomatic conference. Some governments voiced constitutional concern about informal treaty amendment and some doubted its status as customary law. However, most governments commenting on the issue, including the U.S., accepted as custom that a treaty's effect may be modified by such practice. Annex p. 7.

* * * *

Omission of Article 38 from the Vienna Convention is, in any event, not conclusive. The Convention's preamble affirms "that the rules of customary international law will continue to govern questions not regulated by" its provisions. H. Thierry, S. Sur, J. Combacau, C. Vallee, Droit International Public, 4th ed., 98 (Article 38 disappeared from the Convention because of the uncertainty it brought to written law. But the Convention is not exhaustive in this regard. This type of modification can perfectly well subsist under general international law, on condition that the agreement of the parties is clearly established) (informal translation). Moreover, the Article 38 principle may be inferred from the well-accepted principle that treaties may be terminated by tacit agreement. The ILC considered that, when termination by obsolescence or desuetude occurred, it was based on the parties' consent to abandon the treaty, which was to be implied from their conduct and was covered by draft article 51(b) on termination by consent. 2 ILC Yearbook 237 (1966). . . .

* * * *

4. Suspending operation of a treaty provision as a response to material breach

The actions of the first few parties to deviate from a treaty norm may be in a legal gray area. If those actions are considered in material breach, the remaining practice may be viewed as a lawful response by tacit agreement, consistent with customary law reflected in Article 60(2)(a) of the Vienna Convention, which provides: "[a] material breach of a multilateral treaty by one of the parties entitles . . . the other parties by unanimous agreement to suspend the operation of the treaty in whole or in part . . . as between all the parties." (For a party to the Vienna Convention, Article 65 requires notice.)

5. Loss of treaty provision force through estoppel

While original intent or later tacit consent of the parties may adequately explain modification of the effect of a treaty provision, estoppel may be the underlying principle in cases such as the 1958 LOS Conventions. "A considerable weight of authority supports the view that estoppel is a general principle of international law, resting on principles of good faith and consistency and shorn of the technical features to be found in national law." Vamvoukos, at 294; See, separate opinions of Fitzmaurice and Alfaro and authorities cited therein, Case concerning the Temple of Preah Vihar, 1962 ICJ Reports 39–51, 62–66. "The primary foundation" of estoppel or waiver of right by failure to protest "is the good faith that must prevail in international relations." Alfaro, at 44. Estoppel is implicit in, not a derogation from, the principle pacta sunt servanda, of which good faith is also a fundamental element. Thus, at the Vienna Conference, Sir Humphrey Waldock "expressed surprise that some delegations should think article 38 constituted a quasi-violation of the principle pacta sunt servanda, especially as the legal basis of the article was good faith. The provision was based on the principle that a State which had taken up a position on a point of law, particularly in the interpretation of treaties, and allowed another State to act in accordance with that understanding of the legal position, could not go back on its representation of the legal position and declare the act performed illegal." Official Records, 215; Annex, 11.

In the present case, both the parties which have already extended their contiguous zone and those which have acquiesced would be estopped from objecting to an extension of the U.S. contiguous zone to 24 nautical miles. "The absence of protest may . . . in itself become a source of legal right inasmuch as it is related to—or forms a constituent element of—estoppel or prescription." Lauterpacht, Sovereignty Over Submarine Areas, 27 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 393–39. (19S0). The extensions were formal open state actions, monitored by many maritime states—and by the U.N. Secretariat, which disseminated the information to all member states. The eleven parties which extended their contiguous zone asserted a jurisdictional right over the vessels of the other parties and, with the acquiescing parties, contributed to the demise of the 12 nautical mile limit as actual or potential customary law. Given their conduct, for parties to invoke Article 24(2) against new contiguous zone extenders would be discriminatory and abuse the "good faith" element of pacta sunt servanda.

* * * *

Under all these approaches, the subsequent developments modify the operation or application of the treaty provision, not the treaty provision itself. See, e.g., H. Briggs, 1 ILC Yearbook 165 (1966), and Statement of Netherlands, Official Records, 213, summarized Annex, 10. The distinction between modifying a treaty and modifying its effect may be unimportant except to avoid unnecessary doctrinal issues, such as the alleged principle of "formal parallelism" that "'modifications of a treaty at the domestic level should follow the same procedure as the original text." See, Statement of France, Official Records, 208–209, summarized Annex 7. In the case of law-stating treaties, the unmodified convention provision ceases to be internationally controlling; the new norm, as custom, becomes controlling for the parties. "At that stage, denunciation clauses, or other formal means provided for amending or terminating the convention will have become irrelevant; failure to invoke them produces inconclusive results, since the conventional rule is ex hypothesi no longer in force." Villager, at 215–216.

C. Arbitral and Judicial Precedent

The possibility of lawful change in the effect of a treaty, without formal textual amendment, is confirmed by substantial judicial and arbitral precedent.

In the Case concerning the Temple of Preah Vihar, 1962 ICJ Reports 6, 33–34, the I.C.J. held that Thailand had acquiesced by its conduct in a French map which placed the temple in Cambodia. The map "adopted an interpretation of the treaty settlement which caused the map line, in so far is it may have departed from the line of the watershed, to prevail over the relevant clause of the treaty." The Court explained that it could have reached the same result were it to deal with the matter "as one solely of ordinary treaty interpretation."

In the Case Concerning the Interpretation of the Air Transport Services Agreement, (U.S. and France), XVI Reports of Int'l Arbitral Awards 6, 62–63 (1963) (Ago, President; Reuter and de Vries), the tribunal found that subsequent practice had given the United States a legal route right which could not be derived by interpreting the air transport agreement. It stated that a course of conduct "may in fact be taken into account not merely as a useful means for interpreting the Agreement, but also . . . as a possible source of a subsequent modification, arising out of certain actions or certain attitudes, having a bearing on the juridical situation of the Parties and on the rights that each of them could properly claim."

In its Namibia advisory proceeding, 1971 ICJ Reports 16, 22, the I.C.J., despite Article 27(3) of the Charter which requires the "affirmative vote" of the permanent members, accepted an advisory opinion request made by the U.N. Security Council through a vote in which a permanent member abstained. The Court stated that "presidential rulings and the positions taken by members of the Council, in particular its permanent members, have consistently and uniformly interpreted the practice of voluntary abstention by a permanent member as not constituting a bar to the adoption of resolutions."

In the Case Concerning the Delimitation of the Continental Shelf, (U.K. and France), XVII Reports of Int'l Arbitral Awards 3, 37 (1977)(Castren, President; Briggs, Gros, Ustor, Waldock), the Court recognized "the importance of the evolution of the law of the sea which is now in progress and the possibility that a development in customary law may, under certain conditions, evidence the assent of the States concerned to the modification, or even termination, of previously existing treaty rights and obligations." However, the Court rejected the contention of France that this had by then occurred with the 1958 Continental Shelf Convention.

D. The legal policy

The possibility that an obsolete treaty norm will lose its legal force meets the concern that use of conventions to codify and develop customary law would rigidify that law unduly, but does not introduce harmful instability. Villager, at 225; see also Rousseau, at 348–352. Law must adapt to the evolving needs of the international community. "It would clearly be rash to assume that international law in codified form, however great the care and effort with which it is prepared and drafted, will remain the most satisfactory solution of the problems with which it attempts to grapple, whatever changes may occur in international relationships." Thirlway, at 125. Amendment of a multilateral treaty is cumbersome and often impracticable for reasons which have nothing to do with the viability of a particular treaty norm. Requiring denunciation to escape one obsolete provision would unnecessarily destroy an otherwise valuable convention. Emergence of new custom and obsolescence of an inconsistent treaty rule require substantial open state practice and do not arise out of capricious action by one party over the objection of others. Dissenters have significant ability to preserve their customary law position from an emerging norm and even greater ability to protect their treaty position from loss through tacit agreement or estoppel.

E. Conclusion

Although one must be careful about the circumstances in which the principle is invoked, customary law permits the international legal effect or operation of a treaty provision to change through subsequent developments among the parties, particularly their acceptance of a customary norm inconsistent with a general norm stated by treaty.

This has occurred with regard to Article 24(2) of the 1958 Convention on the Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone: having accepted the new customary law norm and its enjoyment by those eleven parties which have already extended their contiguous zones beyond twelve miles, the parties are no longer legally in a position to invoke the convention's twelve mile language to bar similar action by another party.

Finally, should a party dispute our understanding of its position, the issue would be whether to refrain from exercising contiguous zone jurisdiction over its vessels, not whether to refrain from adopting that jurisdiction as a general matter.

II. Constitutional Issues

As a general matter, the President has "the power to determine how far this country will claim territorial rights in the marginal sea as against other nations." United States v. Louisiana, 363 U.S. 1, 35 (1960); see also Proclamation 5928, December 27, 1988 (extending the U.S. territorial sea to 12 nautical miles). A fortiori, the President has the power to extend a maritime jurisdiction under international law which is less than full sovereignty, such as the contiguous zone. This has been done by Presidential action with respect to the exclusive economic zone. Proclamation 5030, March 10, 1983.

The question has been raised, however, whether Article 24(2) of the 1958 Territorial Sea Convention limits the President's authority to extend the contiguous zone beyond 12 nautical miles. That it does not do so in present circumstances flows from two constitutional considerations: first, the President may unilaterally determine for the United States that Article 24(2) no longer binds the United States as a matter of international law; and second, a treaty provision's force in domestic law is generally no greater than its international law force.

A. Presidential Authority to Act on the International Plane

It is well-established that the President is "the sole organ of the federal government in the field of international relations." United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 320

(1936); see also 10 Annals of Congress 613 (1800) (Representative John Marshall) (President "the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations"), rpt. in 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) Appendix note 1, at 26.

The President's constitutional authority to act for the United States in international relations includes the power to engage in state practice that contributes to or dissents from the establishment of customary norms, as well as the power to assess the customary norms relevant to United States action. As a leading scholar has stated,

> "It is principally the President, 'sole organ' of the United States in its international relations, who is responsible for the behavior of the United States in regard to international law, and who participates on her behalf in the indefinable process by which customary international law is made, unmade, remade. He makes legal claims for the United States and reacts to the claims of others; he performs acts reflecting views on legal questions and justifies them under the law, in diplomatic exchange, in judicial or arbitral proceedings, in international organizations or in the public forum."

L. Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution 188 (1972). His constitutional authority also includes significant power with relation to the operation of treaties. As Alexander Hamilton stated:

> "[The President's] power of determining virtually upon the operation of national treaties, as a consequence of the power to receive public ministers, is an important instance of the right of the executive to decide upon the obligations of the country with regard to foreign nations. Hence . . . , treaties can only be made by the President and Senate jointly, but their activity may be continued or suspended by the President alone."

A. Hamilton, Letters of Pacificus and Helvidius on the Proclamation of Neutrality of 1793, at 12–13 (Gideon ed. 1845). But cf. Taylor v. Morton, 23 Fed. Cas. 784, 786 (C.C. Mass. 1855); 4 Moore, Digest of International Law 321 (1906) (quoting Jan. 2, 1791, letter of James Madison intimating that Senate must participate in decision to declare a treaty void).

* * * *

Acts in exercise of the foreign relations power may contribute to the modification or termination of a treaty provision. For example, when another party acts inconsistently with a treaty provision, it is the President who must determine whether it constitutes a material breach. Since such breach renders a treaty voidable but not void, a decision must also be made on the appropriate response under international law, e.g., suspension or termination of the agreement in whole or in part or acquiescence or waiver on behalf of the United States. It is settled that the President has the power to waive the right of the United States to terminate a treaty for breach by another party. Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 474–76 (1913) . . . Implicit in this is the view that the executive can exercise the U.S. right rather than waive it. . . . If he acquiesces in general violations of the treaty by the other parties, this can have the effect of terminating the treaty obligation. See 5 Hackworth, Digest of International Law 340–41; 14 M. Whiteman, Digest of International Law 441 (1970).

> "The President is, of course, without authority, except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to modify a treaty provision. There are, however, instances in which he, acting through the Secretary of State, has tacitly acquiesced in action by foreign governments which had the effect of modifying stipulations in our treaties."

Memorandum of the Solicitor for the Department of State (Hackworth), Feb. 28, 1931, quoted in 5 Hackworth, supra, at 340.

The Court has also deferred to the executive branch in determining whether a treaty was abrogated due to the outbreak of war, Clark v. Allen, 331 U.S. 503, 508–09 (1947) . . . or was abrogated by the operation of law, due to the absorption of the other party into another state, Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270

(1902) . . . Similarly, during World War II, the Attorney General ruled that the President had the authority to suspend or declare inoperative a peacetime treaty on the grounds of rebus sic stantibus. 40 Op. Att'y Gen. 119 (1941). As the Attorney General stated:

> "Attention to the observance of treaties is an executive responsibility. . . . The facts which bring into operation the right to declare the convention inoperative or suspended, are within the knowledge of and can be promptly and adequately appraised by the executive department; and it is proper that the President, as 'the sole organ of the nation in its external relations,' should speak for the nation in announcing action which international law clearly permits."

Id. at 123.

Another relevant and more routinely exercised aspect of the President's foreign affairs power is that the President has the initial and primary responsibility to interpret and apply treaty provisions. The President has submitted treaty construction issues to the Senate only in exceptional instances. S. Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement 369 (2d ed. 1916). While courts may interpret treaty provisions in the context of cases properly before them, they have traditionally given great weight to the interpretations of the Executive Branch. See Sullivan v. Kidd, 254 U.S. 433 (1921); Charlton V. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 468 (1913); Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 194–95 (1888); Restatement 326; L. Henkin, supra, at 167. Were the issue to arise before our courts, substantial deference would be given to the Executive Branch view that the 1958 Territorial Sea Convention was adopted as a law-stating treaty and was not intended to constitute a special regime, particularly given that no contrary interpretation was presented to the Senate during the ratification process. See Four Conventions and an Optional Protocol Formulated at the United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, Message of the President, Exec. J-N, 86th Cong. 2d Sess. (1959) (Conventions were mixture of codification of existing law and progressive development); Law of the Sea Conventions, Rpt. of the Senate Comm. on For. Rel.,

Exec. Rpt. No. 5, 86th Cong. 2d Sess. (1960); Conventions on the Law of the Sea, Hearings before the Senate Comm. on For. Rel., 86th Cong. 2d Sess. (1960) (testimony of Arthur Dean, head of U.S. delegation to UN Law of Sea Conference).

Thus, in the context of the contiguous zone extension, the President, as the "sole organ of the United States in its external relations," has the constitutional authority (1) to determine that customary international law now permits a 24 nautical mile contiguous zone, (2) to assess the intent of the 1958 Convention parties regarding the preservation of Article 24(2) as a special regime, (3) to acquiesce in conduct by other parties inconsistent with the wording of the 1958 Territorial Sea Convention, thereby leading to the termination of Article 24(2) by estoppel and (4) to decide that Article 24(2) no longer is operative under international law for the United States.

B. Treaties as Domestic Law

Article VI of the Constitution declares that treaties are among the "supreme law of the land." Although this provision appears largely to have been intended to ensure that the states abide by federal treaty obligations, see, S. Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement 153 (2d ed. 1916); L. Henkin, supra, at 129, treaties are viewed as on a par with statutes, and, if self-executing, can be given direct effect by U.S. courts. Moreover, treaties are among the laws that the President must "faithfully execute." U.S. Constitution, Art. II, sec. 2; see Restatement (Third), at S 111, comment c . . .

The status of treaties as law of the land, however, does not mean that they are in all respects equivalent to statutes. Treaties are, at root, compacts among sovereigns. Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 598 (1884); Federalist No. 75. They become the law of the land through the combined action of the President and Senate—the "fourth branch of government" as Hamilton called it. See L. Henkin, supra, at 130. More importantly, their status as "law of the land" depends on their status as international law. Except perhaps with respect to treaties that create vested rights, "(a) rule of international law or an international agreement has no status as law of the United States if the United States is not in fact bound by it: for example, . . . a provision in a treaty that is invalid or has been terminated or suspended." Restatement (Third), at S 111, comment b; see also id. at S 339, Reporters' Note 1; L. Henkin, supra, at 160. . . .

Based on these principles, it follows that, if Article 24(2) of the 1958 Territorial Sea Convention has been superseded on the international plane by a new rule of customary international law permitting a 24 nautical mile contiguous zone, then Article 24(2) no longer has effect as a law of the United States and need not be "faithfully executed" by the President. Henkin, supra, at 168 note (President's duty to see that treaties are faithfully executed ceases to apply if President terminates the treaty pursuant to his foreign affairs powers).

It is important to note that to reach this conclusion one need not reach the question of whether customary international law will supersede a statute. See Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. 677, 700 (1900) (only resort to customary international law if there is "no controlling executive or legislative act"). Treaty and custom both operate on the international plane and, on that plane, the customary norm can supersede the treaty norm; this terminates the domestic legal effects of the treaty because those effects are derivative of the treaty's status as binding under international law. In contrast, statutes derive their effect from independent action of domestic institutions. . . .

. . . It would be anomalous to have our domestic law on the obligations of the United States vis-a-vis other nations derive from but become more restrictive than our international law obligations. Where (i) the treaty has not created vested rights, (ii) the new rule of customary international law is clearly recognized as internationally controlling by the executive and (iii) there were no contrary assurances on which the Senate relied in granting advice and consent, there is no good reason to adopt a constitutional rule creating such an anomaly. . . .

C. Conclusion

In light of the international legal considerations set forth in the first section of this memorandum, Article 24(2) has lost its controlling effect internationally for the United States. The Constitution does not provide Article 24(2) with independent continuing legal force and, therefore, does not require the President to refrain from exercising his foreign affairs power to extend the contiguous zone of the United States beyond the 12 nautical mile limit stated in that Article.

c. Status of treaties under domestic and international law

In a December 15, 1997, letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal, eight former Legal Advisers of the Department of State replied to the view expressed in a November 17, 1997, letter that the United States was not legally obligated to pay its arrearages to the United Nations because its treaty obligations are not legally binding under U.S. law. The letter, from Abram Chayes, Leonard Meeker, Monroe Leigh, Herbert Hansell, Roberts Owen, Davis Robinson, Abraham Sofaer, and Conrad Harper, is set forth below in full.

As former Legal Advisers, we wish to reply to John R. Bolton's piece in the Wall Street Journal of November 17, 1997. In his piece, Mr. Bolton expresses his view that the United States is not legally obligated to pay its arrearages to the United Nations. We find that the piece fails to distinguish between obligations under U.S. law and obligations (including treaty obligations) under international law.

Mr. Bolton writes that "treaties have no special or higher status than other acts of Congress or, for that matter, than the U.S. Constitution." This is correct, as a matter of U.S. law. But what is lawful under U.S. law may not be lawful under international law. This is not because international law is "higher" than U.S. law, but because it imposes a separate set of obligations voluntarily undertaken and owed from one or more countries to other countries.

Mr. Bolton writes that "treaties are 'law' only for U.S. domestic purposes." "In their international operation, treaties are simply 'political' obligations," thus suggesting that treaty obligations may be set aside as mere matters of political discretion. This is a misconception. Contrary to Mr. Bolton's assertion, it is clear that treaties are legally binding in their international operation.

The United States government has demonstrated that it regards treaties as binding in their international operation. For example, when France and the Soviet Union refused in the early 1960s to pay their assessments for UN peacekeeping operations, the United States Department of State relied on the UN Charter, a treaty to which the United States is a party, when it challenged the legality of the French and Soviet withholdings. Article 17(2) of the UN Charter says that: "The expenses of the Organizations shall be borne by the Members as apportioned by the General Assembly." Citing this provision, the U.S. State Department asserted that "the [UN] General Assembly's adoption and apportionment of the Organization's expenses create a binding international legal obligation on the part of States Members to pay their assessed shares." (1979 Digest of United States Practice in International Law, p. 226). The State Department did not inquire whether French or Soviet domestic law excused the nonpayment of assessments. Nor did the International Court of Justice, which ruled (Advisory Opinion on Certain Expenses of the United Nations, 1962) that all members of the United Nations are legally bound by the Charter to pay their assessments.

Mr. Bolton also argues that "treaty obligations can be unilaterally modified or terminated by Congressional action." This is true only in the limited sense that a party to a contract retains the power to breach his contract and accept the legal consequences of his illegal act. Although international treaty law recognizes certain grounds for modifying or terminating treaty obligations, unilateral acts of domestic legislative bodies are not recognized, in themselves, as such.

We appreciate the opportunity to correct any misunderstanding which Mr. Bolton's piece may have created.

4. Reservation Practice and Related Issues

a. No-reservation clauses

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has on a number of occasions expressed the view that the inclusion of articles prohibiting reservations to treaties—"no-reservation clauses" —is inconsistent with the Senate's "constitutional prerogatives" relating to treaties.

For example Article XXII of the Chemical Weapons Convention (discussed in Chapter 18.C.1.) provides:

> The Articles of this Convention shall not be subject to reservations. The Annexes of this Convention shall not be subject to reservations incompatible with its object and purpose.

On April 24, 1997, in its resolution of advice and consent to ratification of the convention, the Senate included two conditions relating to this issue. 143 CONG. REC. S3570 (Apr. 24, 1997). See also S. Treaty Doc. No. 103-21 (1993). The first required the President to certify prior to deposit of the U.S. instrument of ratification that the United States had informed "all other States Parties to the Convention that the Senate reserves the right, pursuant to the Constitution of the United States, to give advice and consent to ratification of the Convention subject to reservations, notwithstanding Article XXII of the Convention."

In addition, the seventeenth condition made a number of findings concerning the Senate's role in giving advice and consent to treaties, which included one noting that "[d]uring the 85th Congress, and again during the 102d Congress, the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate made its position on this issue [of no-reservations clauses] clear when stating that 'the President's agreement to such a prohibition cannot constrain the Senate's constitutional right and obligation to give its advice and consent to a treaty subject to any reservation it might determine is required by the national interest.' " This condition also set forth the sense of the Senate that:

(i) the advice and consent given by the Senate in the past to ratification of treaties containing provisions which prohibit amendments or reservations should not be construed as a precedent for such provisions in future treaties;

(ii) United States negotiators to a treaty should not agree to any provision that has the effect of inhibiting the Senate from attaching reservations or offering amendments to the treaty; and

(iii) the Senate should not consent in the future to any article or other provision of any treaty that would prohibit the Senate from giving its advice and consent to ratification of the treaty subject to amendment or reservation.

In the 102nd Congress, referred to above, the Senate had voted its advice and consent to ratification of the Agreement for the Implementation of the Provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982 Relating to the Conservation and Management of Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks, with Annexes, discussed in Chapter 13.A.4.a.(4)(ii), subject to one declaration. 142 CONG. REC. S7209 (June 27, 1996). The declaration provided:

> It is the Sense of the Senate that "no reservations" provisions as contained in Article 42 have the effect of inhibiting the Senate from exercising its constitutional duty to give advice and consent to a treaty, and the Senate's approval of this treaty should not be construed as a precedent for acquiescence to future treaties containing such a provision.

b. International Law Commission on Reservations to Treaties

(1) Preliminary conclusions of 1997

At the fifty-second session of the United Nations General Assembly in New York, October 27–November 7, 1997, the Sixth Committee (Legal) considered the report of the forty-ninth session of the International Law Commission ("ILC") in Geneva, May 12–July 18, 1997. U.N. Doc. A/52/10, available at www.un.org/law/ilc/reports/1997/97repfra.htm. Among the issues considered were "Preliminary Conclusions of the International Law Commission on Reservations to Normative Multilateral Treaties Including Human Rights Treaties" contained in the ILC report; see www.un.org/law/ilc/reports/1997/chap5.htm.

The report of the Sixth Committee, U.N. Doc. A/52/648, available at www.un.org/law/ga52.htm, stated that "[t]here was general support [for the ILC view] that the regime established by the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969 regarding reservations should be maintained and is applicable to all treaties, including human rights treaties, despite certain ambiguities and lacunae. There was also discussion on the role of treaty-monitoring bodies."

Robert Dalton, Assistant Legal Adviser for Treaty Affairs, presented the views of the United States in support of the preliminary conclusions. A summary of his presentation, set forth below, was included in the summary record of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 147, November 4, 1997. U.N. Doc. A/C.6/52/SR.21. See also discussion of General Comment 24 in Chapter 6.B.3.

20. Mr. Dalton (United States of America) said that his delegation welcomed the Commission's reaffirmation of the basic principles of treaty law in its preliminary conclusions. The flexible rules on reservations that had evolved since the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice regarding the Convention on the Punishment and Prevention of the Crime of Genocide had enabled many States to accede to treaties and had thereby played a key role in the rapid development of international law. There was therefore no need to amend the Vienna regime and the Commission's work should take the form of a guide to practice rather than a new convention.

21. His delegation also agreed with the Commission's view that the legal reservations regime was unitary and that there could be no exceptions in the case of human rights. Where special regimes might be applicable, for example in the cases covered by article 20, paragraphs 2 and 3, of the 1969 Vienna Convention, a special mechanism was provided.

22. Although human rights treaty monitoring bodies were entitled to formulate comments or recommendations regarding reservations, they nevertheless did not have the power to set aside a reservation or make legal determinations regarding the validity of a reservation. That was the prerogative of States, which must in any event abide by the obligations stemming from the treaties to which they were signatories.

23. Regional instruments could provide for exceptions to the reservations regime, on condition that they did so expressly.

(2) Guide to Practice: 1999

On November 3, 1999, Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs John H. Crook addressed the Sixth Committee (Legal) concerning the report of the 51st session of the ILC, as it related to reservations to treaties. In the 51st session of the ILC, held in Geneva, May 3–July 23, 1999, the Commission adopted draft guidelines pertaining to the first chapter of the Guide to Practice on Reservations to Treaties. The report of the 51st session, including the guidelines, U.N. Doc. No. A/54/10, is available at www.un.org/law/ilc/reports/1999/english/99repfra.htm.

Mr. Crook's remarks are excerpted below and are available in full at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

. . . [W]e welcome the Commission's adoption on first reading of 18 draft guidelines and commentaries designed to constitute the first chapter of its proposed Guide to Practice. . . .

It is interesting that in its presentation, the proposed Guide to Practice is different in its approach from the three Vienna Conventions dealing with the law of treaties. The rules contained in those conventions' articles are what are important. The ILC's commentary may throw light on the meaning of particular Vienna Convention articles, but States seldom, if ever, look at that commentary before citing the Convention rule. With the Commission's guidelines, the contrary may be true. We suspect that States will be more likely to make use of the commentary than the guidelines themselves.

Professor Pellet and his colleagues on the Commission are to be congratulated for having marshaled an impressive array of published materials together with additional examples of state practice furnished by 22 governments. I am pleased that the United States was able to contribute to this effort. As a result, governments have a comprehensive view of state practice in respect of reservations for the first time since the drafting more than thirty years ago of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties between States. This overview should be a valuable resource for States when they are drafting treaty provisions relating to reservations, declarations, and interpretative declarations; when considering the possibility of making reservations themselves; or when examining whether or not to respond to reservations or interpretative declarations made by other States.

The definitions that establish separate categories of statements that may be made by a State in respect of a treaty have the potential to shape State practice in the future if States see the guidelines as authoritative. This could lead the way to better analysis of the alternatives other than reservations by which a State may express its attitude to a treaty. The choice of a specific alternative described in the guidelines may persuade another State that it need not respond to a particular statement communicated to it by a bilateral treaty partner or circulated to it by the depositary of a multilateral treaty.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, let me note that the United States has a practice of incorporating understandings in its instruments of ratification. In the practice of the United States an "understanding" is an interpretive statement for the purpose of clarifying or elaborating, rather than changing, the provisions of an agreement. Under the terms of Draft Guideline 1.4.4, which deals with general policy statements, it would appear that understandings by the United States may fall outside the scope of the Guide to Practice. This is so because they do not purport to produce a legal effect on the treaty. Nevertheless, the commentary on the guideline may not be entirely clear. It may be well for this part of the Commentary to be considered further when the Commission turns to its second reading.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the Commission for its willingness to include in Guideline 1.5 a discussion of the applicability of unilateral statements, including reservations, to bilateral treaties. As the commentary indicates, my Government has the most fully developed practice in this area, but other States also make interpretative declarations in respect of bilateral treaties. We believe that it is useful to include a provision on the subject within the Draft Guidelines.

c. Conditions on entry into force of NATO accession protocols

As discussed in Chapter 7.C., the U.S. Senate included a number of declarations and conditions in its resolution of advice and consent to ratification of the Protocols to the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 on the Accession of Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic. 144 CONG. REC. S4217 (May 4, 1998). On May 21, 1998, President William J. Clinton wrote to the Senate thanking the Senate for providing advice and consent to the protocols but commenting as follows on the resolution of ratification:

> The resolution of ratification that the Senate has adopted contains provisions addressing a broad range of issues of interest and concern, and I will implement the conditions it contains. As I have indicated following approval of earlier treaties, I will of course do so without prejudice to my authorities as President under the Constitution, including my authorities with respect to the conduct of foreign policy. I note in this connection that conditions in a resolution of advice and consent cannot alter the allocations of authority and responsibility under the Constitution.

The full text of President Clinton's message is available at 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRESS. DOC. 938 (May 25, 1998) On the same day, in addition to the certification relating to the operations of NATO discussed in Chapter 7.C., President Clinton, in keeping with the Senate resolution, certified that the governments of Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic "are fully cooperating with United States efforts to obtain the fullest possible accounting of captured and missing U.S. personnel from past military conflicts or Cold War incidents, to include (A) facilitating full access to relevant archival material, and (B) identifying individuals who may possess knowledge relative to captured and missing U.S. personnel, and encouraging such individuals to speak with United States Government officials." 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 940 (May 25, 1998).

d. Domingues v. Nevada

In 1998 the Supreme Court of Nevada affirmed the conviction and imposition of the death penalty on Michael Domingues for a murder committed when he was sixteen despite his arguments that his execution would violate the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights ("ICCPR"), customary international law, and a jus cogens norm. Domingues v. State, 961 P.2d 1279 (Nev. 1998), cert. denied, Domingues v. Nevada, 528 U.S. 963 (1999). As discussed in Chapter 6.G.1.b., the U.S. brief opposing the grant of certiorari refuted, inter alia, Domingues' arguments that the U.S. reservation to Article 6(5) of the ICCPR was invalid as a matter of U.S. constitutional law and as a matter of the international law of treaties.

5. Depositary Functions

(1) U.S. views on changes to the text of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court

As depositary of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, adopted at a United Nations diplomatic conference on July 17, 1998, the UN Secretary General informed states of certain proposed corrections to the original text of the statute by note dated September 25, 1998. In response, the U.S. Mission to the United Nations responded by diplomatic note, excerpted below, noting U.S. concerns and objections regarding the proposed changes. The United States participated in negotiating the Rome Statute and was entitled to become a party, but had declined to sign it at the time of this exchange. See Chapter 3.C.2.

The full text of the note is available as note 1 at http://untreaty.un.org/ENGLISH/bible/englishinternetbible/partI/chapterXVIII/treaty10.asp#N6.

* * * *

First, the United States wishes to draw attention to the fact that, in addition to the corrections which the Secretary-General now proposes, other changes had already been made to the text which was actually adopted by the Conference, without any notice or procedure. The text before the Conference was contained in A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76 and Adds. 1–13. The text which was issued as a final document, A/CONF.183/9, is not the same text. Apparently, it was this latter text which was presented for signature on July 18, even though it differed in a number of respects from the text that was adopted only hours before. At least three of these changes are arguably substantive, including the changes made to Article 12, paragraph 2(b), the change made to Article 93, paragraph 5, and the change made to Article 124. Of these three changes, the Secretary-General now proposes to "re-correct" only Article 124, so that it returns to the original text, but the other changes remain. The United States remains concerned, therefore, that the corrections process should have been based on the text that was actually adopted by the Conference.

Second, the United States notes that the Secretary-General's communication suggests that it is "established depositary practice" that only signatory States or contracting States may object to a proposed correction. The United States does not seek to object to any of the proposed corrections, or to the additional corrections that were made earlier and without formal notice, although this should not be taken as an endorsement of the merits of any of the corrections proposed. The United States does note, however, that insofar as arguably substantive changes have been made to the original text without any notice or procedure, as noted above in relation to Articles 12 and 93, if any question of interpretation should subsequently arise it should be resolved consistent with A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76, the text that was actually adopted.

More fundamentally, however, as a matter of general principle and for future reference, the United States objects to any correction procedure, immediately following a diplomatic conference, whereby the views of the vast majority of the Conference participants on the text which they have only just adopted would not be taken into account. The United States does not agree that the course followed by the Secretary-General in July represents "established depositary practice" for the type of circumstances presented here. To the extent that such a procedure has previously been established, it must necessarily rest on the assumption that the Conference itself had an adequate opportunity, in the first instance, to ensure the adoption of a technically correct text. Under the circumstances which have prevailed in some recent conferences, and which will likely recur, in which critical portions of the text are resolved at very late stages and there is no opportunity for the usual technical review by the Drafting Committee, the kind of corrections process which is contemplated here must be open to all.

In accordance with Article 77, paragraph 1 (e) of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, the United States requests that this note be communicated to all States which are entitled to become parties to the Convention.

(2) United States as depositary

The Office of Treaty Affairs in the Office of the Legal Adviser is responsible for functions connected with the U.S. role as depositary for multilateral treaties. As of the end of 1999, the United States was designated as depositary for treaties in the following categories: Antarctica, Atomic Energy, Civil Aviation, Biological Weapons, Finance, Fisheries, North Atlantic Treaty, Nuclear Weapons, Peace, Pollution, Satellite Communications, Outer Space, Telecommunications, United Nations, Wills, and the World Meteorological Organization. A full list as of 1999 is available at www.state.gov/s/c8183.htm.

6. Succession

a. Breakup of the USSR

After the collapse of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1991, discussed in Chapter 9.B.2., questions arose regarding the impact that the dissolution would have on the bilateral and multilateral treaty agreements of the former Soviet Union. In December 1991 all of the successor states except Georgia agreed to establish the Commonwealth of Independent States ("CIS") and to "guarantee in accordance with their constitutional procedures the discharge of the international obligations deriving from treaties and agreements concluded by the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics . . ." Armenia-Azerbaijan-Belarus-Kazakhstan-Kyrgyzstan-Moldova-Russian Federation-Tajikistan-Turkmenistan-Uzbekistan-Ukraine: Agreements Establishing the Commonwealth of Independent States, Done at Minsk, Dec. 8, 1991, and Done at Alma Ata, Dec. 21, 1991, reprinted at 31 I.L.M. 138, 149 (1992). Georgia joined the CIS in December 1993, bringing the CIS to twelve members.

In a speech to the American Society of International Law, April 1, 1992, Edwin D. Williamson, Legal Adviser of the U.S. Department of State, discussed issues of state succession in the breakup of the Soviet Union. Excerpts below address aspects related to treaty succession. See also Edwin D. Williamson and John E. Osborn, A U.S. Perspective on Treaty Succession and Related Issues in the Wake of the Breakup of the USSR and Yugoslavia, 33 Va. J. Int'l L. 261 (1993).

The full text of Mr. Williamson's April 1992 speech is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The breakup of the Soviet Union has presented our office with a host of fascinating issues. None are more compelling, at least as a theoretical legal matter, than the question of succession to treaty rights and obligations by the now-independent former republics. Indeed, given the unsettled nature of international law as to treaty succession—indeed, one might say the lack of it—it may well be that international practice in connection with the dissolution of the Soviet Union will prove to be critical to the future shape of the law. Today I would first like to give you a sense of some of the considerations that have gone into the formulation of our legal position on treaty succession and on several related issues, and then briefly review some of the policy consequences of this legal position.

Some international legal sources have adopted bright-line tests to determine whether or not states succeed to the rights and obligations of pre-existing treaties. The 1978 Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties (which the United States has not signed and which has not entered into force) provides that former colonies (and other territories dependent upon a dominant state for the conduct of foreign policy) are entitled to a "clean slate" upon attaining their independence, but that all other states are bound to the treaties of their predecessor. The Third Restatement of the Law on Foreign Relations specifically rejects this approach, favoring instead a "clean slate" for all new states, regardless of whether or not they were dependent colonies.

State practice

We considered these sources in the course of our analysis but, given the absence of a governing multilateral treaty on state succession, we have looked principally to state practice to inform our views on this subject. As you are all aware, there are divergent approaches that have been employed with respect to treaty succession in this century. As a general matter, state practice may be viewed as falling along a continuum. At one end of this continuum, where a portion of the state breaks away from the primary, predecessor state, the practice tends to support a "clean slate" approach. At the other extreme, where a state divides into its constituent parts, the practice supports the continuity of existing treaty rights and obligations.

Examples of the breakup of states in which continuity of treaty obligations followed include the following:

— The greater Colombian Union, formed between 1820 and 1830, which later dissolved into Colombia, Ecuador and Venezuela.
— The Union of Norway and Sweden, dissolved in 1905.
— The separation of Austria and Hungary in connection with the dissolution of the Austro-Hungarian empire after World War I.
— The separation of Syria from Egypt in connection with the dissolution of the United Arab Republic.

In each such case, although there were exceptions, the general practice was to treat the newly emerging states as bound by the terms of the existing treaties entered into by their predecessor unions.

In contrast, in the wake of the following separations, the practice of the majority of states has been to treat the newly emerging state as having a "clean slate" to establish anew the terms of their treaty relationships:

— The secession of Panama from Colombia in 1903 (though France did not accept the view of the U.S. and the UK that Panama was not bound by Colombia's treaties).
— The secession of Finland from the Soviet Union after World War I.
— The separation of Poland and Czechoslovakia from the Austro-Hungarian empire after World War I (though, as noted above, the "core" states of Austria and Hungary were deemed to succeed to the existing treaty rights and obligations).
— The secession of Pakistan from India in 1947 (though it was held to certain treaty terms under a devolution agreement).

Rationale for and impact of rules

We believe that U.S. interests in maintaining the stability of legal rights and obligations are, on balance, better served by adopting a presumption that treaty relations remain in force.

This is consistent with our efforts to foster respect for the rule of law around the world. In the broadest sense, therefore, we would favor the development of international legal principles that foster stability of legal rights and obligations. When this principle is applied to specific circumstances that arise from the establishment of new states in the late twentieth century, the desirability of maintaining existing treaty arrangements becomes readily apparent. Indeed, notwithstanding the clear applicability of the "clean slate" rule, the complex web of treaty relationships now extant has led many former colonies to adhere to the treaties of their predecessors under the terms of devolution agreements. Moreover, such adherence is especially vital to our own national security when the treaty obligations at issue concern arms control and nuclear weapons issues, as is true with respect to the former republics.

In sum, while we recognize that the law in this area is somewhat unsettled, we have decided that the better legal position is to presume continuity in treaty relations between the United States and the former republics. In other words, as a general principle, agreements between the United States and the USSR that were in force at the time of the dissolution of the union will be presumed to continue in force as to the former republics.

What is the legal basis for adopting this position? Except for the Baltic States, which we never recognized as part of the Soviet Union, we regard the concurrent emergence of Russia and the other former republics to have stemmed from what was essentially the complete breakup of the union. Thus, continuity of treaty relations is supported by our reading of state practice, and by the policy considerations underlying this rule. Perhaps most importantly, continuity has been supported by the republics themselves, who affirmed this approach in the Alma Ata declaration when they guaranteed the "fulfillment of international obligations stemming from the treaties and agreements of the former U.S.S.R."

This approach will not lead to the continuation in force of all agreements with all republics. There would be exceptions even under a strict rule of continuity, such as where the agreement is relevant only to the territory of one republic, or if it is simply not feasible to continue a particular agreement on its terms. The parties may, in any event, terminate a treaty by consensual agreement, or by unilateral action in accordance with its terms. Nevertheless, a presumption of continuity helps to preserve what is, by and large, a useful legal framework for the conduct of relations, and neither the United States nor the republics have the time and resources to renegotiate such a framework.

Application to specific treaties

It is generally advantageous, for example, for all republics to continue as parties to multilateral agreements of general application to all states. This would include agreements on law enforcement matters, including the major anti-terrorism and narcotics treaties; the major conventions on armed conflict, such as the 1949 Geneva conventions; the major environmental treaties, such as those on endangered species and marine pollution; nuclear agreements not giving special status to the USSR, including the IAEA statute and the Physical Protection Convention; and arms control agreements not giving special status to the USSR, including the Biological Weapons Convention, the Geneva Gas Protocol, the Limited Test Ban Treaty, and the Seabed Treaty, as well as to agreements creating international organizations where the USSR is not given special status, such as those for WHO, IMO, ILO, UNIDO and WMO.

It is also advantageous to continue bilateral agreements establishing general rules for relations of general application, such as agreements governing diplomatic and consular relations, including those relating to diplomatic properties and privileges and immunities and the issuance of visas; agreements on narcotics trafficking and Nazi war criminals; and agreements on atomic energy and various forms of cooperation.

Exceptions to continuity

As I noted earlier (and as the Vienna Convention recognizes), however, even under a rule of continuity there are agreements as to which continuation in force with a new state, either on the same terms as the original party or at all, would be inappropriate. The most obvious case would be where continuity would be inconsistent with the nature of the treaty regime or object and purpose of the treaty. Other exceptions to continuity exist for (1) agreements relating specifically to territory in or under the control of one or another republic (e.g., aviation agreements establishing routes, certain fisheries agreements); (2) agreements which allocate quotas or rights on the premise that the former USSR is a single territory (e.g., the bilateral textile agreement and CAFE); and (3) agreements which are relevant only to those republics with certain nuclear or military capacity.

Approach with the republics

As a practical matter, given the unsettled nature of the governing legal rules and the diversity of agreements in question, we believe that the only way to establish clearly with the republics what agreements remain in force is on an explicit, case-by-case basis. During the coming months, we expect to engage each republic in bilateral discussions to confirm which of the bilateral agreements will continue in force, and to determine which should be modified or terminated. In the interim, we continue to regard the various agreements as generally continuing in force with all of the republics until we have made a clear determination to the contrary.

(1) Russian Federation

> In a diplomatic note of January 13, 1992, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation requested heads of diplomatic missions in Moscow to inform their governments that the Russian Federation would continue to carry out obligations under international treaties concluded by the U.S.S.R., and that the Government of the Russian Federation would perform the functions of the depositary for corresponding multilateral agreements in place of the Government of the U.S.S.R. See telegram from the American embassy in Moscow to the Department of State, telegram No. 01654, dated January 17, 1992, available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm; see also II Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 1936–37.

(2) Ukraine

As noted above, the United States held discussions with technical experts of various successor states regarding succession to bilateral treaties between the United States and the USSR. In resolving questions of succession with Ukraine, the two governments agreed, by an exchange of notes between the American Embassy at Kiev and the Ukraine Ministry of Foreign Affairs in May 1995, to continue in force thirty-eight bilateral treaties set out in an annex to their respective notes. Excerpts from the text of the embassy's note No. 420/95 are set forth below. See also 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 761 (1995).

In conducting their discussions, the experts took as a point of departure the continuity principle set forth in Article 34 of the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties.* In examining the texts they found that certain treaties to which

* Editor's note: Article 34 of the UN Convention on the Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, Aug. 23, 1978, reads:

1. When a part or parts of the territory of a State separate to form one or more States, whether or not the predecessor State continues to exist:

(a) any treaty in force at the date of the succession of States in respect of the entire territory of the predecessor State continues in force in respect of each successor State so formed;

the principle applied had since expired by their terms. Others had become obsolete and should not be continued in force between the two countries. Finally, after a treaty-by-treaty review, which included an examination of the practicability of the continuance of certain specific treaties, they recommended that our two Governments agree no longer to apply those treaties.

In light of the foregoing, the Embassy proposes that, subject to [the] condition that follows, the United States of America and Ukraine confirm the continuance in force as between them of the treaties listed in the Annex to this note.

Inasmuch as special mechanisms have been established to work out matters concerning succession to bilateral arms limitation and related agreements concluded between the United States and the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, those agreements were not examined by the technical experts. Accordingly, this note does not deal with the status of those agreements and no conclusion as to their status can be drawn from their absence from the list appearing in the Annex.

With respect to those treaties listed in the Annex that require designations of new implementing agencies or officials by Ukraine, the United States understands that Ukraine will inform it of such designations within two months of the date of this note.

If the foregoing is acceptable to the Government of Ukraine, this note and the Ministry's note of reply concurring therein shall constitute an agreement between our two Governments which shall enter into force on the date of receipt by the Embassy of the Ministry's note in reply.

(b) any treaty in force at the date of the succession of States in respect only of that part of the territory of the predecessor State which has become a successor State continues in force in respect of that successor State alone.

2. Paragraph 1 does not apply if:

(a) the States concerned otherwise agree; or

(b) it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that the application of the treaty in respect of the successor State would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions for its operation.

In its reply, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs confirmed that the Embassy's note was acceptable to the Government of Ukraine and that the Embassy's note and the Ministry's note of reply "shall constitute an agreement on this issue between our two Governments which shall enter into force on the date of receipt by the Embassy of the Ministry's note of reply." May 15, 1995 Telegram from the American Embassy Kiev to Department of State, No. 5960 (May 19, 1995), available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The annex listed thirty-eight agreements, including agreements dealing with such matters as problems arising during World War II, deep seabed areas, cooperation to combat illegal traffic in narcotics, scientific and technical cooperation, and reactions to emergencies.

(3) Succession to ABM treaty

One treaty that attracted particular attention in the context of succession was the Treaty on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems, May 26, 1972, U.S.-U.S.S.R., 23 U.S.T. 3435, TIAS No. 7503. ("ABM Treaty"), signed on May 26, 1972, by President Richard M. Nixon and General Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union L.I. Brezhnev. A companion interim agreement putting a moratorium on the acquisition or production of strategic offensive systems was signed on the same date. Interim Agreement Between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on Certain Measures with Respect to the Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms ("Interim Agreement"), May 26, 1972, U.S.-U.S.S.R., 23 U.S.T. 3462, T.I.A.S. No. 7504. The ABM Treaty and the Interim Agreement are known as the SALT I Accords.

On October 9, 1992, ten of the member states of the CIS signed a resolution in Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan, specifically asserting their succession to the Soviet Union's rights and obligations under the ABM Treaty.

(i) Negotiation of Memorandum of Understanding on Succession

Five years later, the United States and the four former Soviet Republics in which facilities referenced in the ABM Treaty were located—Belarus, Kazakhstan, Russia, and Ukraine—signed the Memorandum of Understanding Relating to the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems of May 26, 1972, Sept. 26, 1997 ("Memorandum of Understanding on Succession" or "MOUS"). The MOUS would have established that the parties to the ABM Treaty were the United States, Belarus, Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine. For the purposes of the MOUS and the ABM Treaty, the latter four states were referred to as the USSR successor states.

Pursuant to the MOUS provisions, the USSR successor states would have collectively assumed the rights and obligations of the USSR. This meant that only a single ABM deployment area would have been permitted among the four successor states. Furthermore, given the limit of 15 ABM launchers at ABM test ranges permitted for the USSR, 15 would have been collectively permitted under the MOUS. As discussed below, however, the MOUS never entered into force.

The full text of the MOUS, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The United States of America, and the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation and Ukraine, hereinafter referred to for purposes of this Memorandum as the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) Successor States,

Recognizing the importance of preserving the viability of the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems of May 26, 1972, hereinafter referred to as the Treaty, with the aim of maintaining strategic stability,

Recognizing the changes in the political situation resulting from the establishment of new independent states on the territory of the former USSR,

Have, in connection with the Treaty, agreed as follows:

* * * *

Article III
Each USSR Successor State shall implement the provisions of the Treaty with regard to its territory and with regard to its activities, wherever such activities are carried out by that State, independently or in cooperation with any other State.

* * * *

Article V
A USSR Successor State or USSR Successor States may continue to use any facility that is subject to the provisions of the Treaty and that is currently located on the territory of any State that is not a Party to the Treaty, with the consent of such State, and provided that the use of such facility shall remain consistent with the provisions of the Treaty.

Article VI
The USSR Successor States shall collectively be limited at any one time to a single anti-ballistic missile (ABM) system deployment area and to a total of no more than fifteen ABM launchers at ABM test ranges, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty and its associated documents, including the Protocols of July 3, 1974.

Article VII
The obligations contained in Article IX of the Treaty and Agreed Statement "G" Regarding the Treaty shall not apply to transfers between or among the USSR Successor States.

(ii) U.S. domestic issues

The Senate acted on several occasions during the negotiation of the MOUS to require that the MOUS be submitted for advice and consent to ratification by the Senate. Section 232(a) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1995, Pub. L. No. 103–337, 108 Stat. 2663 (1994), provided:

> Requirement for Use of Treaty Making Power.—The United States shall not be bound by any international agreement entered into by the President that would substantively modify the ABM Treaty unless the agreement is entered pursuant to the treaty making power of the President under the Constitution.

In signing Pub. L. No. 103–337 into law, President William J. Clinton took issue with this provision, stating that "section 232, relating to modifications to the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, cannot restrict the constitutional options for congressional approval of substantive modifications of treaties." 30 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1955 (Oct. 5, 1994).

In May 1996 the Senate included a similar provision in S. 1745, National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1997. Section 233(a) of the bill would have added specifically that international agreements to which the United States was not to be bound "include[ed] any agreement that would add one or more countries as signatories to the [ABM] treaty or would otherwise convert the treaty from a bilateral treaty to a multilateral treaty."

A June 26, 1996, memorandum prepared by the Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice, determined that there were "serious doubts about the constitutionality of section 233(a), given that it intrudes on two exclusively Executive prerogatives: the power to interpret and execute treaties, and the power of recognition." Memorandum from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice, to the Counsel to the President re: Constitutionality of Legislative Provision Regarding ABM Treaty. The provision was not included in the final text of the law, Pub. L. No. 104–201.

Excerpts from the memorandum follow. The full text is available at: www.usdoj.gov/olc/abmjq.htm.

Section 233(a) raises serious constitutional questions. It is "a basic principle of our constitutional scheme that one branch of the Government may not intrude upon the central prerogatives of another." Loving v. United States, No. 94–1966, slip op. at 7 (U.S. June 3, 1996); see also Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 850 (1986). It follows that Congress may not hamper or curtail the prerogatives that the Constitution commits exclusively to the Executive branch. See Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 694 (1988); Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 726 (1986). We have serious doubts about the constitutionality of section 233(a), given that it intrudes on two exclusively Executive prerogatives: the power to interpret and execute treaties, and the power of recognition.

1. The dissolution of the former Soviet Union during the autumn and winter of 1991 required the United States to re-evaluate the bilateral treaties that had existed between the Soviet Union and itself, including the ABM Treaty. (footnote omitted) Both President Bush and President Clinton operated on the general principle that the treaty rights and obligations of the former Soviet Union had passed to the successor States, (footnote omitted) unless the terms or the object and purpose of the treaty required a different result. As the Legal Adviser to the State Department during the Bush Administration explained,

> [a]s an operating principle, agreements between the United States and the USSR that were in force at the time of the dissolution of the Soviet Union have been presumed to continue in force with respect to the former republics. What is the legal basis for adopting this position? Except for the Baltic states, which the United States never recognized as part of the Soviet Union, we regarded the emergence of Russia and the other former republics to have stemmed from what was essentially the complete breakup of the Soviet Union. Thus, continuity of treaty relations is supported by our reading of state practice, and by policy considerations underlying this rule. Perhaps most importantly, however, continuity has been supported > by the republics themselves, who affirmed this approach in the Alma Ata Declaration when they guaranteed the "fulfillment of international obligations stemming from the treaties and agreements of the former U.S.S.R."

Edwin D. Williamson and John E. Osborn, A U.S. Perspective on Treaty Succession and Related Issues in the Wake of the Break-up of the USSR and Yugoslavia, 33 Va. J. Int'l L. 261, 264–65 (1993).

Congress was well aware that the Executive branch was conducting discussions with Russia and several other successor States regarding their rights and obligations under the ABM Treaty, and it twice "urged" the President to pursue such discussions on particular topics. See Missile Defense Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102–190, § 233(c), 105 Stat. 1321, 1322, reprinted as note to 10 U.S.C. § 2431; National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1994, Pub. L. No. 103–160, § 232(c), 107 Stat. 1547, 1593.

The United States' presumption that the successor States are generally subject to our bilateral treaties with the former Soviet Union is rooted, not only in the United States' past diplomatic practice, but in its understanding of international law. In a May 10, 1995 diplomatic note to the Government of Ukraine, the United States took as its point of departure the "continuity principle" of article 34 of the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, Aug. 22, 1978, 17 I.L.M. 1488, 1509, which reads in relevant part:

> 1. When a part or parts of the territory of a State separate to form one or more States, whether or not the predecessor State continues to exist:
>
> (a) any treaty in force at the date of the succession of States in respect of the entire territory of the predecessor State continues in force in respect of each successor State so formed . . .

The State Department informs us that the resolution of succession questions after the dissolution of a State has been regarded as a function of the Executive branch, and that many executive agreements have been concluded that recognized the succession of new States to the treaty rights and obligations of their predecessors. Furthermore, the State Department advises us, such agreements have not been regarded as treaty amendments or as new treaties requiring Senate advice and consent, but rather as the implementation of existing treaties.

2. It belongs exclusively to the President to interpret and execute treaties. This is a direct corollary of his constitutional responsibility to "take care" that the laws are faithfully executed. See U.S. Const. art. II, § 3; Goldwater v. Carter, 444 U.S. 996, 1000 n.1 (1979) (Powell, J., concurring in judgment) (President has "duty to execute" treaty provisions). (footnote omitted) As the Congressional Research Service has stated, "[t]he executive branch has the primary responsibility for carrying out treaties and ascertaining that other parties fulfill their obligations. . . . The executive branch interprets the requirements of an agreement as it carries out its provisions." Treaties and Other International Agreements: The Role of the United States Senate, S. Rpt. No. 53, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. xxiv–xxv (Comm. Print 1993).

The responsibility to interpret and carry out a treaty necessarily includes the power to determine whether, and how far, the treaty remains in force. . . . [Moreover], "[u]nder the law of the United States, the President has the power . . . to elect in a particular case not to suspend or terminate" a treaty. [Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 339(c) (1987)]. Accordingly, in circumstances in which a State that was a party to a bilateral treaty with the United States has been dissolved, the President must determine, in executing the treaty, whether and how far it remains in force, whether another State or States has or have succeeded to it, and whether their actions do or do not constitute compliance with its terms. In this instance, the President has determined that the ABM Treaty's obligations should be imputed to the Soviet Union's successor States, including Russia. Congress may not interfere with or direct the President's interpretation and execution of a treaty any more than it may do so in the case of a statute. Under the proposed legislation, however, Congress appears to be impermissibly interfering in the President's discharge of those responsibilities with respect to the ABM Treaty, thus violating separation of powers principles. See Nixon v. Administrator of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 443 (1977).

We are aware that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, in its Report on the Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces (INF) Treaty, maintained that it is a constitutional requirement that "[t]he meaning of a treaty is to be determined in light of what the Senate understands the Treaty to mean when it gives its advice and consent." Treaties and Other International Agreements: The Role of the United States Senate, S. Rpt. No. 53, at 95. While we have not been able to review the entire record of the Senate's ratification of the ABM Treaty, we would point out that the treaty was adopted against a background of diplomatic practice by the United States and other nations, and that "where a state divides into its constituent parts, the [diplomatic] practice supports the continuity of existing treaty rights and oibligations." Although the dissolution of the Soviet Union was not likely to have been contemplated when the ABM Treaty was ratified, insofar as the Senate may be taken to have had an understanding of what the treaty would mean in such circumstances, that understanding would have been informed by the pattern of diplomatic practice in similar contingencies. Thus, we do not believe that the Executive branch's interpretation of the ABM Treaty contradicts the Senate's understanding at the time of ratification.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee also maintained that it is constitutionally required that "[t]he President may not amend a treaty without the agreement of the parties and the advice and consent of the Senate." Treaties and Other International Agreements: The Role of the United States Senate, S. Rpt. No. 53, at 95. Section 233(a) appears to be designed to apply this principle to the ABM Treaty, by deeming "any agreement that would add one or more countries as signatories to the treaty or [that] would otherwise convert the treaty from a bilateral treaty to a multilateral treaty" to constitute a "substantive[] modif[ication]" of the treaty.

We would take issue with the proposition that the inclusion of other Soviet successor States along with the United States and Russia as parties to the ABM Treaty would necessarily comprise a substantive modification of that treaty, such as to require Senate advice and consent. We think this in part because of the international law and general diplomatic practice regarding successorship, and in part because, even without the addition of Ukraine, Belarus, Kazakhstan, and possibly other successor States, the ABM Treaty will remain in effect as between the United States and Russia. Thus, although some changes in the administration of the ABM Treaty may be entailed by the inclusion of other successor States as parties, we do not see why their inclusion must be considered a matter of "substantively modifying," as distinct from "interpreting" and "implementing," the treaty. If the changes do not rise to the level of substantive modifications, then to insist that the proposed executive agreements be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent would appear to intrude on the President's exclusive authority to interpret and implement treaties.

* * * *

3. Section 233(a) also raises a serious constitutional question with respect to the President's recognition power.

It is by now firmly established that the power of recognition is exclusively Executive in character. See Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 410 (1964) ("Political recognition is exclusively a function of the Executive."). . . . A Presidential decision to recognize, or not to recognize, a foreign State or government is binding upon the other organs of the Federal Government: for instance, "[i]t has long been established that only governments recognized by the United States and at peace with us are entitled to access to our courts, and that it is within the exclusive power of the Executive Branch to determine which nations are entitled to sue." Pfizer, Inc. v. Government of India, 434 U.S. 308, 319–20 (1978). In sum, the President's recognition authority is not only exclusive, but broad.

The question of determining which States are the "successors" to a State that, like the former Soviet Union, has been completely dissolved, is a matter for the President alone to determine in the exercise of his recognition authority. Moreover, we believe, in determining which States are the successors of a dissolved State, the President may also determine which of the successors are bound by the former State's treaty obligations towards the United States, and the extent to which they are so bound. The power to recognize newly emergent States formed from a State's dissolution thus encompasses the power to determine the treaty consequences of their successorship to the parent State.

One of the elements of the recognition of these newly emergent States was and is their succession to applicable Soviet treaties. By purporting to determine that the addition of these successor States to the ABM Treaty would constitute an amendment to that treaty requiring the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, the proposed legislation would act in derogation of the President's recognition power. Because the recognition power is exclusively Presidential, it is doubtful that Congress may take that step.

On May 14, 1997, the Senate again addressed this issue through a condition to its advice and consent to ratification of the Document Agreed Among the States Parties to the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe of November 19, 1990 ("CFE Flank Document"). 143 CONG. REC. S4476. See Chapter 18.B.3.b. Condition 9 was entitled "Senate prerogatives on multilateralization of the ABM Treaty." After referring to § 232 of Pub. L. No. 103–337, supra, and to language included in the conference report accompanying Pub. L. No. 104–201, condition 9 provided as follows:

> (B) Certification required.—Prior to the deposit of the United States instrument of ratification [to the CFE Flank Document], the President shall certify to the Senate that he will submit for Senate advice and consent to ratification any international agreement—

(i) that would add one or more countries as States Parties to the ABM Treaty, or otherwise convert the ABM Treaty from a bilateral treaty to a multilateral treaty; or
(ii) that would change the geographic scope or coverage of the ABM Treaty, or otherwise modify the meaning of the term "national territory" as used in Article VI and Article IX of the ABM Treaty.

On May 15, 1997, President Clinton transmitted a message to the Senate objecting to aspects of the imposition of conditions in the resolution of ratification as inconsistent with his Constitutional authorities. 143 CONG. REC. S4587. Nevertheless, he stated his intent to implement the conditions without prejudice to his Constitutional authorities. The message is excerpted below.

* * * *

I am gratified that the Senate has given its advice and consent to the ratification to the CFE Flank Document . . .

I must, however, make clear my view of several of the Conditions attached to the resolution of advice and consent to ratification, including Conditions 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 9 and 11. These Conditions all purport to direct the exercise of authorities entrusted exclusively to the President under our Constitution, including for the conduct of diplomacy and the implementation of treaties. The explicit limitation on diplomatic activities in Condition 3 is a particularly clear example of this point. As I wrote the Senate following approval of the Chemical Weapons Convention, a condition in a resolution of ratification cannot alter the allocation of authority and responsibility under the Constitution. I will, therefore, interpret the Conditions of concern in the resolution in a manner consistent with the responsibilities entrusted to me as President under the Constitution. Nevertheless, without prejudice to my Constitutional authorities, I will implement the Conditions in the resolution.

Condition (9), which requires my certification that any agreement governing ABM Treaty succession will be submitted to the Senate for advice and consent, is an issue of particular concern not only because it addresses a matter reserved to the President under our Constitution, but also because it is substantively unrelated to the Senate's review of the CFE Flank Document. It is clearly within the President's authorities to determine the successor States to a treaty when the original Party dissolves, to make the adjustments required to accomplish such succession, and to enter into agreements for this purpose. Indeed, throughout our history the executive branch has made a large number of determinations concerning the succession of new States to the treaty rights and obligations of their predecessors. The ABM Succession MOU negotiated by the United States effectuated no substantive change in the ABM Treaty requiring Senate advice and consent. Nonetheless, in light of the exceptional history of the ABM Treaty and in view of my commitment to agree to seek Senate approval of the Demarcation Agreements associated with the ABM Treaty, I have, without prejudice to the legal principles involved, certified, consistent with Condition (9), that I will submit any agreement concluded on ABM Treaty succession to the Senate for advice and consent.

The certification referred to in relation to condition 9 was included in reports to both the House and Senate relating to a number of conditions, available at 143 CONG. REC. S4587 and H2697 (May 15, 1997). The issue was mooted by the decision of President George W. Bush to withdraw from the ABM Treaty. See Digest 2001 at 829–33.

b. Reunification of Germany

In conjunction with the reunification of Germany, on April 22, 1991, delegations of the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States of America held consultations regarding agreements that had been entered into between the United States and the German Democratic Republic ("GDR"). At the conclusion of the meeting, representatives of the two delegations signed a protocol, excerpts of which appear below. See also 85 Am. J. Int'l L. 539 (1991), which includes the list of terminated agreements from the annex referenced below.

The German side emphasized the significance that it attached to Article 12 of the Treaty of August 31, 1990 between the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic on the Establishment of German Unity (Unification Treaty)* which had been notified to the United States of America.

In the course of the consultations the delegations noted that most of the international agreements between the United States and the German Democratic Republic had expired in accordance

* Editors' footnote: Article 11 and 12 of the Treaty on the Establishment of German Unity (Unification Treaty), Aug. 31, 1990, 30 I.L.M. 463, 471–72 (1991), provided as follows:

Article 11
Treaties of the Federal Republic of Germany
The Contracting Parties proceed on the understanding that international treaties and agreements to which the Federal Republic of Germany is a contracting party, including treaties establishing membership of international organizations or institutions, shall retain their validity and that the rights and obligations arising therefrom, with the exception of the treaties named in Annex 1, shall also relate to the territory specified in Article 3 of this Treaty. Where adjustments become necessary in individual cases, the all-German Government shall consult with the respective contracting parties.

Article 12
Treaties of the German Democratic Republic
(1) The Contracting Parties are agreed that, in connection with the establishment of German unity, international treaties of the German Democratic Republic shall be discussed with the contracting parties concerned with a view to regulating or confirming their continued application, adjustment or expiry, taking into account protection of confidence, the interests of the states concerned, the treaty obligations of the Federal Republic of Germany as well as the principles of a free, democratic basic order governed by the rule of law, and respecting the competence of the European Communities.

(2) The united Germany shall determine its position with regard to the adoption of international treaties of the German Democratic Republic following consultations with the respective contracting parties and with the European Communities where the latter's competence is affected.

(3) Should the united Germany intend to accede to international organizations or other multilateral treaties of which the German Democratic Republic but not the Federal Republic of Germany is a member, agreement shall be reached with the respective contracting parties and with the European Communities where the latter's competence is affected.

with international law on October 3, 1990 with the unification of Germany. A list of those agreements appears in the Annex.

The delegations further agreed that three agreements required reference to experts. As to the first of these, the agreement regarding inspections on the territory of the German Democratic Republic under the treaty of December 8, 1987 on the elimination of intermediate-range and shorter-range missiles, the German delegation made reference to Article[s] 3 and 11 and to Annex I, Chapter I, Section I, paragraph 10 of the Unification Treaty. The other agreements requiring examination by experts are the agreement concerning trade in certain steel products signed on November 21, 1989 and the arrangements with respect to property in Berlin concluded between the United States and the German Democratic Republic late in 1987.

The German side indicated that it intended to publish officially in due course a list of the terminated agreements. The United States side said that the United States would annotate its records to reflect the termination of the agreements in the Annex.

* * * *

In September 1990 the U.S. Senate had taken the unusual step of addressing application of a treaty entered into with the Federal Republic of Germany in the event of reunification. In its resolution of advice and consent to the Tax Convention with the Federal Republic of Germany, with related protocol, S. Treaty Doc. No. 101–10 (1989), S. Exec. Rep. 101–27 (1990), the Senate included the following understanding:

> That in the event that the German Democratic Republic and the Federal Republic of Germany unite under the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Convention will apply, according to its terms, to residents of the area currently comprising the German Democratic Republic, and to income from sources within, and to capital situated in, such area, only at such time as the laws imposing the covered national taxes in the area currently comprising the German Democratic Republic and the laws imposing the covered national taxes in the area currently > comprising the Federal Republic of Germany are identical in substance. The preceding sentence shall not affect the application of the Convention to any income or capital to which the Convention would apply absent unification.

136 CONG. REC. S13293 (1990).

c. Czech Republic and Slovak Republic

On January 1, 1993, the United States recognized the new Czech and Slovak Republics. See Chapter 9.A.2.d. A statement by White House Press Secretary Marlin Fitzwater on that date indicated that "[b]oth leaders provided assurances that the new states will fulfill the obligations and commitments of the former Czechoslovakia and will abide by the principles and provisions of the UN Charter, the Charter of Paris, the Helsinki Final Act, and subsequent CSCE [Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe] documents."

d. Hong Kong

As noted in A.4., supra, on June 30, 1997, Hong Kong reverted to the sovereignty of the People's Republic of China. See discussion in Chapter 9.B.4. In order to encourage the autonomous functioning of Hong Kong, Congress enacted the Hong Kong Policy Act. ("HKPA"), Pub. L. No. 102–283, 106 Stat 1448 (1992) which noted the U.S. recognition and acceptance of the then-pending transfer of sovereignty over Hong Kong to the PRC and, in particular, the ability of Hong Kong to conclude new agreements either on its own or with the assistance of the Government of China. 22 U.S.C. § 5701(1)(E). With respect to succession, the Act declared that the United States intended to "continue to fulfill its obligations to Hong Kong under international agreements, so long as Hong Kong reciprocates, regardless of whether the People's Republic of China is a party to the particular international agreement . . ." 22 U.S.C. § 5712(2).

The government-wide memorandum excerpted in Chapter 9 provided as follows concerning the effect of reversion on treaty relations with the United States.

* * * *

Application of Multilateral and Bilateral Treaties

The HKPA also "approves the continuation in force" of treaties and international agreements applicable to Hong Kong unless or until terminated in accordance with law. § 201(b), 22 U.S.C. 85721(b). Based on this authority, principles of international law, and relevant agreements between the UK, PRC, Hong Kong, and United States, as appropriate, most multilateral agreements will continue to apply to Hong Kong but the situation with regard to bilateral agreements is more complicated.

Multilateral Agreements Now Applicable to Hong Kong. The UK and PRC have agreed generally in the Joint Declaration that multilateral agreements which are currently applicable to Hong Kong should continue to apply. There will be few if any exceptions. Thus, the presumption is that any given multilateral agreement will continue to apply to Hong Kong, including some treaties to which the PRC itself is not a party. To confirm the exact status of each agreement, the People's Republic of China is providing formal notice to the various treaty depositaries. Because the UK and the PRC may have different reservations, declarations, and understandings with respect to each agreement, the PRC notes will specify which, if any, reservations, declarations, or understandings will apply to Hong Kong. In addition, where the agency calls for a central administering authority, the PRC may separately indicate what agency would be the "central authority" for Hong Kong.

New Multilateral Agreements. The PRC is a party to a few multilateral agreements that the UK did not extend to Hong Kong, so it is possible that some additional agreements will apply to Hong Kong in the future that have not previously applied. We understand that the PRC intends to consult with the HKSAR government after July 1 before deciding on the applicability of any such agreements so that notification regarding their applicability can be expected only in the future.

The Office of Treaty Affairs of the Office of the Legal Adviser will be taking note of the notifications which are received. This information will be circulated periodically and will be included in the publication Treaties In Force beginning with the 1998 edition. . . .

Bilateral Agreements with the U.K. With respect to bilateral agreements, the UK, Hong Kong, and the PRC all agree that existing agreements between the U.S. and UK will cease to apply to Hong Kong as of July 1. This is consistent with the principle of international law which provides that, when a part of a territory (e.g., Hong Kong) becomes part of another country (e.g., China), agreements of the former sovereign cease to apply and instead the applicable agreements are those in force for the new sovereign. (This is sometimes called the "Moving Treaty Frontier Rule.") The United States will regard these agreements as terminating by application of law (insofar as they concern Hong Kong) as of midnight June 30.

Given the unique circumstances of Hong Kong, however, there will be exceptions to the Moving Treaty Frontier rule with respect to certain agreements between the US and Hong Kong and also agreements between the US and the PRC.

Bilateral Agreements with Hong Kong. Current agreements directly between the United States and Hong Kong—that is, where the United States and Hong Kong are the named parties and not the United Kingdom—will continue in force. This includes [agreements on postal matters, taxation, and aviation].

There has also been agreement in principle to negotiate a new agreement relating to the reciprocal granting of authorizations to permit licensed amateur radio operators of either country to operate their stations in the other country, to replace the US–UK agreement.

In addition, we are seeking Senate advice and consent for three new agreements between the United States and Hong Kong [on extradition, mutual legal assistance, and prisoner transfer; see Chapter 3.A.1.b.(3)(ii), 3.A.3, and Chapter 2.C.2., respectively.]

Bilateral Agreements with PRC. The applicability of bilateral agreements between the US and the PRC has been discussed with both PRC and Hong Kong officials, but has not been finally agreed, pending further consultations between the PRC and HKSAR. In general, however, it is not likely that any US–PRC agreement which addresses a subject-matter within the Hong Kong government's sphere of autonomy will be applied to Hong Kong. Rather, in such areas it will generally be more appropriate to negotiate new agreements directly with Hong Kong which can be adapted to and take account of the different system and conditions. An exception could be where the US, Hong Kong, and PRC agree that it is feasible and desirable to include Hong Kong within a US–PRC treaty regime, e.g. because the terms of the US–PRC agreement do not require any changes to apply to Hong Kong.

* * * *

On June 27, 1997, communications submitted by the PRC and the United Kingdom to UN Secretary General Kofi Annan concerning applicability of multilateral treaties to Hong Kong were circulated to permanent missions of UN members and specialized agencies. U.N. Doc. No. NV/97/35, reprinted in 36 I.L.M. 1675 (1997).

Federal Foreign Affairs Authority

A. FOREIGN RELATIONS LAW OF THE UNITED STATES

1. U.S. Relations with Taiwan and Hong Kong

See discussion in Chapter 4.A.4, and B.2.

2. Alienage Diversity Jurisdiction

In 1995 Matimak Trading Co. Ltd. ("Matimak"), a corporation organized under the laws of Hong Kong, with its principal place of business there, sued Albert Khalily and D.A.Y. Kids Sportswear Inc., two New York corporations, in the Southern District of New York, for breach of contract. Matimak invoked the court's alienage diversity jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(2). That provision authorizes district court jurisdiction where the matter in controversy exceeds $50,000, exclusive of interest and costs, and the action "is between . . . citizens of a State and citizens or subjects of a foreign state." A default judgment was entered against the defendants, which D.A.Y. subsequently sought to vacate.

On June 10, 1996, the district court sua sponte raised the issue of subject matter jurisdiction under the alienage diversity provision and permitted the parties to submit short briefs on the jurisdictional issue, which it characterized as "whether this court lacks subject matter jurisdiction because Hong Kong is not recognized by the United States as a foreign state." See Matimak Trading Co. Ltd. v. Khalily, 936 F. Supp.

151 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). Matimak contended that the court had subject matter jurisdiction under § 1332 on the basis that Hong Kong was a de facto "foreign state." Attached to its letter brief was a June 21, 1996, letter from James G. Hergen, Assistant Legal Adviser for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, U.S. Department of State. Mr. Hergen affirmed that "it would be consistent with the foreign policy interests of the United States and the commercial interests of its nationals that courts in the United States be available to resolve private commercial claims between the United States and Hong Kong nationals and business enterprises." Mr. Hergen also explained that the requirements for diversity jurisdiction were satisfied in this case since the "reference to 'subjects'" in the statute could be understood as a reference to the "numerous colonial subjects" of the European powers, such as Hong Kong nationals, "who were not necessarily citizens of their respective foreign States."

On August 19, 1996, the district court vacated the default judgment and dismissed the case without prejudice. The court rejected plaintiff's arguments as based on "policy considerations," which were inappropriate "because it is not the role of the judiciary to recognize foreign states. . . ." Id. at 152. Distinguishing other cases, the court took the view that "foreign state" for purposes of the alienage diversity provision required full diplomatic recognition and held that the lack of such recognition of Hong Kong as a foreign sovereign by the United States was fatal to plaintiff's arguments.

On August 28, 1996, plaintiff appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. The United States submitted a brief as amicus curiae, supporting the existence of alienage diversity jurisdiction in this case. The Court of Appeals rejected the arguments put forth by the United States and affirmed the district court decision. Matimak Trading Co. Ltd. v. Khalily, 118 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 1997), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 1091 (1998).

In its decision, the court identified three issues to be considered and found against Matimak on all three. The three issues were characterized as follows:

> (1) whether Hong Kong is a "foreign state," such that Matimak is a "citizen or subject" of a "foreign state"; (2) whether Matimak is a "citizen or subject" of the United Kingdom, by virtue of Hong Kong's relationship with the United Kingdom when it brought suit; and (3) whether any and all non-citizens of the United States may ipso facto invoke alienage jurisdiction against a United States citizen.

Id. at 79. The court concluded that "Matimak is not a 'citizen or subject' of a foreign state. It is thus stateless. And a stateless person—the proverbial man without a country—cannot sue a United States citizen under alienage jurisdiction." Id. at 86.

In so holding, the court rejected the views of the United States provided in its amicus brief, excerpted below (footnotes omitted). The basis for the Matimak decision was subsequently rejected by the Supreme Court in JPMorgan Chase Bank v. Traffic Stream(BVI) Infrastructure Ltd., 536 U.S. 88 (2002), which adopted the views of the United States in finding that a foreign corporation organized under the laws of the British Virgin Islands was a "citize[n] or subjec[t] of a foreign state" for purposes of federal jurisdiction under the alienage diversity statute. See Digest 2002 at 227–31.

The full texts of the U.S. amicus brief and the letter of James Hergen filed in the district court are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.

* * * *

A HONG KONG CORPORATION IS A "SUBJECT" OF A "FOREIGN STATE" FOR PURPOSES OF ALIENAGE DIVERSITY JURISDICTION.

* * * *

1. Plaintiff may invoke the alienage diversity jurisdiction of the federal courts to resolve its dispute in this case because, in the last analysis, Hong Kong nationals, including corporations, are subjects of United Kingdom sovereignty.

* * * *

The United States' international agreements with Hong Kong are identified in the State Department's authoritative "Treaties In Force" under the heading of the "United Kingdom." See Treaties In Force 280, 290 (1996). "Treaties In Force" also notes the Consular Convention currently in effect between the United States and "His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas." 3 U.S.T. 3426, 3427, TIAS No. 2494 (1952). As Treaties In Force explains, that Convention is "applicable to all territories over which the United States has jurisdiction or international responsibility and to all British Territories." Treaties In Force, supra, at 282 (emphasis added); see Consular Convention, art. 1, sec. (2), 3 U.S.T. at 3427 ("Convention applies * * * on the part of His Majesty * * * to all His Majesty's colonies and protectorates * * *"). The Convention also defines those "nationals" of each country who may avail themselves of the consular arrangements established by that agreement. "[I]n relation to His Majesty," the Convention defines "nationals" to include "all citizens of the United Kingdom and colonies * * *, including, where the context permits, all juridical entities duly created under the law of any of those territories." Consular Convention, Art. 2, sec. (4), 3 U.S.T. at 3428 (emphasis added). In short, for purposes of section 1332(a)(2), Hong Kong nationals should be viewed as subjects of United Kingdom sovereignty, as recognized by the United States.

b. The last phrase of the Consular Convention emphasized above, raises an important issue related to the question presented here. The plaintiff in this case, of course, is a corporation, rather than a natural person. A corporation, for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, is viewed as a "citizen" or "subject" of the entity under whose sovereignty it is created. See National S.S. Co. v. Tugman, 106 U.S. 118, 121 (1882) (Harlan, J.). Compare Windert Watch Co., 468 F. Supp. at 1244. The obvious purpose of this attribution is to align the corporation with the entity under whose authority it was created. In this case, that sovereign authority is the British Crown.

As a Hong Kong corporation, plaintiff is governed by the Hong Kong Companies Ordinance, which is modelled on the British Companies Act of 1948. Commercial Laws Of The World, Hong Kong Companies Ordinance, Chapter 32 (Foreign Tax Law Pub. 1994). The authority under which that statute was enacted is ultimately traceable to the British Crown. The Letters Patent for Hong Kong issued by the Crown make clear that sovereignty and authority over Hong Kong is reserved to the British Crown. Laws Of Hong Kong (App. I), Letters Patent ¶¶ VIII–XII, at C4 (rev. ed. 1989). Further, the instructions issued by the British Crown to the Governor of Hong Kong also reserve final approval of all Hong Kong Ordinances (including, presumably, the Companies Ordinance applicable to plaintiff) to the Crown, as transmitted through one of British Principal Secretaries of State. Laws of Hong Kong (App. I), Royal Instructions XXVIII, at D11 (rev. ed. 1989). Hence, the final authority for approval of the Hong Kong Companies Ordinance under which plaintiff operates is the British Crown. Since the ultimate sovereign authority over the plaintiff-corporation is the British Crown, plaintiff should be treated as a subject of United Kingdom sovereignty for purposes of section 1332.

* * * *

4. Finally, there are significant practical reasons for holding that a Hong Kong corporation can either sue or be sued in federal court under the alienage diversity provision. As Mr. Hergen noted in the State Department's letter, as of 1994, Hong Kong was the United States' 12th largest trading partner, with direct United States financial investment of almost 12 billion dollars. App. 16. Congress also recently enacted the United States-Hong Kong Policy Act of 1992, which makes clear that Congress wants the strong U.S.-Hong Kong relations (including commercial relations) to continue after July 1, 1997, the date on which Hong Kong becomes a special administrative region of the People's Republic of China. See 22 U.S.C. §§ 5711–15. These strong ties, economic and otherwise, provide substantial practical justification for holding that a Hong Kong corporation can either sue or be sued in federal court under the alienage diversity provision. As Mr. Hergen states in his letter, " 'it would be consistent with the foreign policy interests of the United States and the commercial interests of its nationals that courts in the United States be available to resolve private commercial claims between the United States and Hong Kong nationals and business enterprises.' "

* * * *

The status of Hong Kong corporations was re-examined in Favour Mind Limited v. Pacific Shores, Inc., 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18887 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (not reported), an action brought by a Hong Kong corporation subsequent to Hong Kong's 1997 reversion to the sovereignty of the People's Republic of China. The court noted that "defendant's jurisdictional challenge demands resolution of the precise question left open in Matimak, namely whether a Hong Kong corporation may assert alienage diversity jurisdiction in federal district court in the wake of Hong Kong's reversion to China." The court first found that "post-reversion Hong Kong like pre-reversion Hong Kong is not a foreign state, either de jure or de facto," for purposes of such jurisdiction. The court denied defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, however, agreeing with the United States as amicus that corporations of post-reversion Hong Kong are citizens of China, clearly a foreign state for the purposes of alienage diversity juridiction: "The Matimak analysis produces a different result here both because Hong Kong's relationship with China is materially different than Hong Kong's relationship with Great Britain, and because China has explicitly stated that Hong Kong corporations are citizens of China, something Great Britain never did." The court noted:

> China places great significance on its resumption of sovereignty over Hong Kong, a sovereignty which China considers to have been unjustly and only temporarily interrupted by a century of British rule. . . . A judicial finding that Hong Kong corporations are not citizens of China would engender precisely the harm to our foreign relations that the founders intended to forestall through the creation of alienage jurisdiction.

3. Preemption of State Laws by Federal Statutes and Treaties

a. International maritime commerce

In 1989 the supertanker Exxon Valdez spilled crude oil off the coast of Alaska, the largest oil spill in U.S. history. Both the U.S. Congress and the state of Washington took steps aimed at preventing future oil spills. Congress enacted the Oil Pollution Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101–380, 104 Stat. 484 (1990), 33 U.S.C. §§ 2701–19 ("OPA"). The state of Washington created a new agency and directed it to establish standards to provide the "best achievable protection" from oil spill damages. The regulations adopted by Washington applied to all ships, including foreign-flag vessels. Wash. Admin. Code §§ 317–21–010, et seq. (1996). The International Association of Independent Tanker Owners ("Intertanko"), a trade association of tanker operators of both U.S. and foreign registry, sued in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington. Intertanko sought declaratory and injunctive relief against state and local officials responsible for enforcing the new state regulations on the ground that they were preempted by federal law. The district court upheld the state's regulations. Int'l Ass'n of Indep. Tanker Owners v. Locke, 947 F. Supp. 1484 (W.D. Wash. 1996). The Ninth Circuit affirmed. 148 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 1998), rehearing en banc denied, 159 F.3d 1220 (9th Cir. 1998).

The United States participated in the case at the appellate level and filed a petition with the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, which was granted in 1999. United States v. Locke, 527 U.S. 1063 (1999). In its brief on the merits in the Supreme Court, filed October 22, 1999, and discussed below, the United States argued that the Washington state regulations were preempted by a comprehensive federal scheme, composed of federal legislation, U.S. Coast Guard regulations, and international treaty obligations. On March 6, 2000, the Supreme Court reversed the appellate decision, finding some of the Washington regulations to be preempted and remanding as to others. United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89 (2000). In August 2000 Washington rescinded its regulations. Excerpts below from the unanimous Supreme Court decision by the Chief Justice explain the international nature of the Washington maritime traffic and provide the Court's analysis of the preemptive effect of federal laws and regulations in this case.

* * * *

The maritime oil transport industry presents ever-present, all too real dangers of oil spills from tanker ships, spills which could be catastrophes for the marine environment. After the supertanker Torrey Canyon spilled its cargo of 120,000 tons of crude oil off the coast of Cornwall, England, in 1967, both Congress and the State of Washington enacted more stringent regulations for these tankers and provided for more comprehensive remedies in the event of an oil spill. The ensuing question of federal pre-emption of the State's laws was addressed by the Court in Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151, 55 L. Ed. 2d 179, 98 S. Ct. 988 (1978).

* * * *

The State of Washington embraces some of the Nation's most significant waters and coastal regions. . . . Of special significance in this case is the inland sea of Puget Sound, a 2,500 square mile body of water consisting of inlets, bays, and channels. More than 200 islands are located within the sound, and it sustains fisheries and plant and animal life of immense value to the Nation and to the world.

Passage from the Pacific Ocean to the quieter Puget Sound is through the Strait of Juan de Fuca, a channel 12 miles wide and 65 miles long which divides Washington from the Canadian Province of British Columbia. The international boundary is located midchannel. Access to Vancouver, Canada's largest port, is through the strait. Traffic inbound from the Pacific Ocean, whether destined to ports in the United States or Canada, is routed through Washington's waters; outbound traffic, whether from a port in Washington or Vancouver, is directed through Canadian waters. The pattern had its formal adoption in a 1979 agreement entered by the United States and Canada. Agreement for a Cooperative Vessel Traffic Management System for the Juan de Fuca Region, 32 U.S.T. 377, TIAS No. 9706.

II

The State of Washington has enacted legislation in an area where the federal interest has been manifest since the beginning of our Republic and is now well established. The authority of Congress to regulate interstate navigation, without embarrassment from intervention of the separate States and resulting difficulties with foreign nations, was cited in the Federalist Papers as one of the reasons for adopting the Constitution. E.g., The Federalist Nos. 44, 12, 64. In 1789, the First Congress enacted a law by which vessels with a federal certificate were entitled to "the benefits granted by any law of the United States." Act of Sept. 1, 1789, ch. 11, § 1, 1 Stat. 55. The importance of maritime trade and the emergence of maritime transport by steamship resulted in further federal licensing requirements enacted to promote trade and to enhance the safety of crew members and passengers. See Act of July 7, 1838, ch. 191, 5 Stat. 304; Act of Mar. 3, 1843, ch. 94, 5 Stat. 626. In 1871, Congress enacted a comprehensive scheme of regulation for steam powered vessels, including provisions for licensing captains, chief mates, engineers, and pilots. Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 100, 16 Stat. 440.

. . . Where Congress had acted . . . the [Supreme] Court had little difficulty in finding state vessel requirements were pre-empted by federal laws which governed the certification of vessels and standards of operation. . . .

Against this background, Congress has enacted a series of statutes pertaining to maritime tanker transports and has ratified international agreements on the subject. . . .

1. The Tank Vessel Act

The Tank Vessel Act of 1936, 49 Stat. 1889, enacted specific requirements for operation of covered vessels. The Act provided that "in order to secure effective provisions against the hazards of life and property," additional federal rules could be adopted with respect to the "design and construction, alteration, or repair of such vessels," "the operation of such vessels," and "the requirements of the manning of such vessels and the duties and qualifications of the officers and crews thereof." The purpose of the Act was to establish "a reasonable and uniform set of rules and regulations concerning . . . vessels carrying the type of cargo deemed dangerous." H. R. Rep. No. 2962, 74th Cong., 2d Sess., 2 (1936). The Tank Vessel Act was the primary source for regulating tank vessels for the next 30 years, until the Torrey Canyon grounding led Congress to take new action.

2. The Ports and Waterways Safety Act of 1972

Responding to the Torrey Canyon spill, Congress enacted the Ports and Waterways Safety Act of 1972 (PWSA). The Act, as amended by the Port and Tanker Safety Act of 1978, 92 Stat. 1471, contains two somewhat overlapping titles, both of which may, as the Ray Court explained, preclude enforcement of state laws, though not by the same pre-emption analysis. Title I concerns vessel traffic "in any port or place under the jurisdiction of the United States." 110 Stat. 3934, 33 U.S.C. § 1223(a)(1) (1997 ed. Supp. III). Under Title I, the Coast Guard may enact measures for controlling vessel traffic or for protecting navigation and the marine environment, but it is not required to do so. Ibid.

Title II does require the Coast Guard to issue regulations, regulations addressing the "design, construction, alteration, repair, maintenance, operation, equipping, personnel qualification, and manning of vessels . . . that may be necessary for increased protection against hazards to life and property, for navigation and vessel safety, and for enhanced protection of the marine environment." 46 U.S.C. § 3703(a).

The critical provisions of the PWSA described above remain operative, but the Act has been amended, most significantly by the Oil Pollution Act of 1990 (OPA), 104 Stat. 484. OPA, enacted in response to the Exxon Valdez spill, requires separate discussion.

3. The Oil Pollution Act of 1990

The OPA contains nine titles, two having the most significance for these cases. Title I is captioned "Oil Pollution Liability, and Compensation" and adds extensive new provisions to the United States Code. See 104 Stat. 2375, 33 U.S.C. § 2701 et seq. (1994 ed. and Supp. III). Title I imposes liability (for both removal costs and damages) on parties responsible for an oil spill. § 2702. Other provisions provide defenses to, and limitations on, this liability. 33 U.S.C. §§ 2703, 2704. Of considerable importance to these cases are OPA's saving clauses, found in Title I of the Act, § 2718, and to be discussed below.

* * * *

At the outset, it is necessary to explain that the essential framework of Ray, and of the PWSA which it interpreted, are of continuing force, neither having been superseded by subsequent authority relevant to these cases. In narrowing the pre-emptive effect given the PWSA in Ray, the Court of Appeals [in this case] relied upon OPA's saving clauses, finding in their language a return of authority to the States. Title I of OPA contains two saving clauses [under the heading "Preservation of State authorities"]. . . .

The Court of Appeals placed more weight on the saving clauses than those provisions can bear, either from a textual standpoint or from a consideration of the whole federal regulatory scheme of which OPA is but a part.

* * * *

From the text of OPA and the long-established understanding of the appropriate balance between federal and state regulation of maritime commerce, we hold that the pre-emptive effect of the PWSA and regulations promulgated under it are not affected by OPA. We doubt Congress will be surprised by our conclusion, for the Conference Report on OPA shared our view that the statute

"does not disturb the Supreme Court's decision in Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151, 55 L. Ed. 2d 179, 98 S. Ct. 988 (1978)." H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 101–653, 101, p. 122 (1990). The holding in Ray also survives the enactment of OPA undiminished. . . .

The state laws now in question bear upon national and international maritime commerce, and in this area there is no beginning assumption that concurrent regulation by the State is a valid exercise of its police powers. Rather, we must ask whether the local laws in question are consistent with the federal statutory structure, which has as one of its objectives a uniformity of regulation for maritime commerce. No artificial presumption aids us in determining the scope of appropriate local regulation under the PWSA, which, as we discuss below, does preserve, in Title I of that Act, the historic role of the States to regulate local ports and waters under appropriate circumstances. At the same time, as we also discuss below, uniform, national rules regarding general tanker design, operation, and seaworthiness have been mandated by Title II of the PWSA.

The Ray Court confirmed the important proposition that the subject and scope of Title I of the PWSA allows a State to regulate its ports and waterways, so long as the regulation is based on "the peculiarities of local waters that call for special precautionary measures." 435 U.S. at 171. Title I allows state rules directed to local circumstances and problems, such as water depth and narrowness, idiosyncratic to a particular port or waterway. Ibid. There is no pre-emption by operation of Title I itself if the state regulation is so directed and if the Coast Guard has not adopted regulations on the subject or determined that regulation is unnecessary or inappropriate. This principle is consistent with recognition of an important role for States and localities in the regulation of the Nation's waterways and ports. E.g., Cooley, 12 HOW at 319 (recognizing state authority to adopt plans "applicable to the local peculiarities of the ports within their limits"). It is fundamental in our federal structure that states have vast residual powers. Those powers, unless constrained or displaced by the existence of federal authority or by proper federal enactments, are often exercised in concurrence with those of the national government. McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. Ed. 579 (1819).

As Ray itself made apparent, the States may enforce rules governed by Title I of the PWSA unless they run counter to an exercise of federal authority. The analysis under Title I of the PWSA, then, is one of conflict pre-emption, which occurs "when compliance with both state and federal law is impossible, or when the state law 'stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objective of Congress.'" . . . In this context, Coast Guard regulations are to be given pre-emptive effect over conflicting state laws. . . .

While Ray explained that Congress, in Title I of the PWSA, preserved state authority to regulate the peculiarities of local waters if there was no conflict with federal regulatory determinations, the Court further held that Congress, in Title II of the PWSA, mandated federal rules on the subjects or matters there specified, demanding uniformity. Id., at 168. ("Title II leaves no room for the States to impose different or stricter design requirements than those which Congress has enacted with the hope of having them internationally adopted or has accepted as the result of international accord. A state law in this area . . . would frustrate the congressional desire of achieving uniform, international standards"). . . .

* * * *

. . . Local rules not pre-empted under Title II of the PWSA pose a minimal risk of innocent noncompliance, do not affect vessel operations outside the jurisdiction, do not require adjustment of systemic aspects of the vessel, and do not impose a substantial burden on the vessel's operation within the local jurisdiction itself.

* * * *

We have determined that Washington's regulations regarding general navigation watch procedures, English language skills, training, and casualty reporting are pre-empted. Petitioners make substantial arguments that the remaining regulations are preempted as well. It is preferable that the remaining claims be considered by the Court of Appeals or by the District Court within the framework we have discussed. . . .

. . . The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and remand[ed] for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

In its opinion the Court did not reach arguments raised by the United States concerning preemption of the state regulations by international treaties. The Court stated:

> The United States argues that these treaties, as the supreme law of the land, have preemptive force over the state regulations in question here. . . . The existence of the treaties and agreements on standards of shipping is of relevance, of course, for these agreements give force to the longstanding rule that the enactment of a uniform federal scheme displaces state law, and the treaties indicate Congress will have demanded national uniformity regarding maritime commerce. See Ray, 435 U.S. at 166 (recognizing Congress anticipated "arriving at international standards for building tank vessels" and understanding "the Nation was to speak with one voice" on these matters). In later proceedings, if it is deemed necessary for full disposition of the case, it should be open to the parties to argue whether the specific international agreements and treaties are of binding, preemptive force. . . .

Id. The U.S. brief on certiorari had set forth its views on the treaty issue, as excerpted below (footnotes omitted).

2. International Treaties And Maritime Agreements . . . Have Preemptive Force

In addition to identifying the preemptive scope of the PWSA, the Court in Ray also noted that in passing that Act, "Congress expressed a preference for international action and expressly anticipated that foreign vessels would or could be considered sufficiently safe for certification by the Secretary if they satisfied the requirements arrived at by treaty or convention." 435 U.S. at 167–168. Thus, to the extent an international agreement creates a standard that is embodied in Coast Guard regulations or is formally recognized by the Coast Guard as applicable, that standard will also preempt a contrary state law.

Since Ray was decided, the United States has also become party to numerous international agreements regulating tankers that independently have preemptive power over state laws. An international treaty can have just as much preemptive force as a federal statute. See U.S. Const. Art. VI. This Court has recognized that, "[u]nder principles of international law, the word ['treaty'] ordinarily refers to an international agreement concluded between sovereigns, regardless of the manner in which the agreement is brought into force." Weinberger v. Rossi, 456 U.S. 25, 29 & n.5 (1982) (citing Restatement of Foreign Relations, Pt. III, introd. note at 74 (Tent. Draft No. 1, 1980)). Under international law, an international treaty or agreement is binding on all political subdivisions of the ratifying nation, and a party would not be excused from compliance because of the actions of a political subdivision.

Because international agreements reflect the intentions of nation-states, this Court has emphasized that any concurrent power held by States in fields that are the subject of international agreements is "restricted to the narrowest of limits." Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 68 (1941). Thus, where the United States has exercised the authority of the Nation, a State "cannot refuse to give foreign nationals their treaty rights because of fear that valid international agreements might possibly not work completely to the satisfaction of state authorities." Kolovrat v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 187, 198 (1961). Accordingly, whether viewed through the lens of preemption by treaty or interference with the federal government's exclusive authority to conduct the foreign affairs of the United States, this Court has repeatedly struck down state laws that conflict with duly promulgated federal law touching on matters of international concern. See, e.g., Zschernig v. Miller, 389 U.S. 429 (1968); United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 232 (1942); United States v. Belmont, 301 U.S. 324, 327 (1937).

Those considerations have particular force in this case, because Congress has long recognized the importance of international rules in promoting safety and environmental protection in vessel operations. For example, although the Tank Vessel Act of 1936 contained a provision requiring vessels to carry a certificate of inspection evidencing compliance with the terms of the Act, it specifically provided that "the provisions of this subsection shall not apply to vessels of a foreign nation having on board a valid certificate of inspection recognized under law or treaty by the United States." 49 Stat. 1890. Congress included similar language in the PWSA, see § 201, 86 Stat. 429, 46 U.S.C. 391a(5) (Supp. V 1975), as amended by the PTSA, see § 5, 92 Stat. 1486–1487, 46 U.S.C. 3711.

As a result, under current law, a foreign vessel's compliance with international standards will satisfy domestic requirements for entering United States ports or waters. See, e.g., 46 U.S.C. 3303 (Supp. III 1997) ("A foreign country is considered to have inspection laws and standards similar to those of the United States when it is a party to an International Convention for Safety of Life at Sea to which the United States Government is currently a party."); 46 U.S.C. 3711(a) ("The Secretary may accept any part of a certificate, endorsement, or document, issued by the government of a foreign country under a treaty, convention, or other international agreement to which the United States is a party, as a basis for issuing a [U.S.] certificate of compliance."). The certification requirements imposed by international conventions and codes such as the STCW Convention, MARPOL, ISM Code, and SOLAS require extensive enforcement efforts by the Coast Guard. See note 5, supra; 33 C.F.R. 151.01 (MARPOL), 96.100 (ISM Code); 46 C.F.R. 10.101(a)(2), 12.01–1(a)(2), 15.101 (STCW), 199.01(b) (SOLAS). With regard to SOLAS, for example, Congress has specifically provided that a SOLAS certificate shall be respected by the United States, see 46 U.S.C. 3303 (Supp. III 1997), and by executive order the President has directed the Coast Guard to enforce SOLAS, see Exec. Order No. 12,234, 3 C.F.R. 277 (1981). The various provisions of SOLAS, MARPOL, STCW, and the ISM Code must be taken into account, in conjunction with Coast Guard regulations that implement those agreements, to assess whether individual state rules are preempted.

As the Court emphasized in Ray, "[t]he Supremacy Clause dictates that the federal judgment that a vessel is safe to navigate United States waters prevail over the contrary state judgment." 435 U.S. at 165. Congress no more intended to permit States to frustrate that federal purpose here, where the relevant certifications concern training, manning, and related policies, than it did in Ray, in which the Court specifically addressed design and construction standards. See United States v. Belmont, 301 U.S. at 331 ("In respect of all international negotiations and compacts, and in respect of our foreign relations generally, state lines disappear. As to such purposes the State of New York does not exist.").

b. Trade with Burma

In 1996 the State of Massachusetts adopted legislation regulating procurement by state entities from companies that did business with Burma. Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 7, §§ 22G–22M (1998). In a suit brought by the National Foreign Trade Council, a trade association whose members included companies affected by the Massachusetts law, the U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts permanently enjoined enforcement of the state law, holding that it unconstitutionally impinged on the federal government's exclusive authority to conduct foreign affairs. National Foreign Trade Council v. Baker, 26 F. Supp. 2d 287, 291 (D. Mass. 1998). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit affirmed, finding that the state statute unconstitutionally interfered with the foreign affairs power of the federal government, violated the "dormant" Foreign Commerce Clause and the Supremacy Clause of the U.S. Constitution, and was preempted by federal sanctions against Burma. National Foreign Trade Council v. Natsios, 181 F.3d 38, 45 (1st Cir. 1999).

On June 19, 2000, the Supreme Court affirmed the holding of the lower courts, finding that the Massachusetts law was invalid under the Supremacy Clause of the U.S. Constitution. Crosby v. National Foreign Trade Council, 530 U.S. 363, 388 (2000). See Digest 2000 at 319–40 for a discussion of the case and excerpts from the U.S. brief as amicus curiae, filed in February 2000.

c. California ballot initiative Proposition 187

On November 8, 1994, the voters of the state of California adopted by referendum an initiative known as Proposition 187. See 1994 Cal. Legis. Serv., Prop. 187 (West). Section one of the proposition set forth as its purpose to "provide for cooperation between [the] agencies of state and local government with the federal government, and to establish a system of required notification by and between such agencies to prevent illegal aliens in the United States from receiving benefits or public services in the State of California."

A statement released by the U.S. Embassy in Mexico on November 9, 1994, stated that U.S. Ambassador James R. Jones "cautioned that this is not the policy of the United States. It is the policy of a single state with which our federal government disagrees. . . . The Ambassador further stated his belief that the state proposition is unconstitutional, and that it will be challenged in the courts of the U.S."

Immediately after Proposition 187 was passed, actions challenging the constitutionality of the initiative were brought by a number of plaintiffs in state and federal courts in California. Five actions filed in the federal district court against the governor and attorney general of California and other state officials were consolidated in the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California. See League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Wilson, 908 F. Supp. 755 (C.D. Cal. 1995) ("LULAC"). As described in that opinion, the initiative's eight substantive provisions, §§ 2–9, "require law enforcement, social services, health care and public education personnel to (i) verify the immigration status of persons with whom they come in contact; (ii) notify certain defined persons of their immigration status; (iii) report those persons to state and federal officials; and (iv) deny those persons social services, health care, and education." The district court had issued a temporary restraining order enjoining implementation of §§ 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9 of the initiative on November 16, 1994, and a preliminary injunction enjoining implementation and enforcement of those sections on December 14, 1994.

In LULAC, the district court granted in part and denied in part motions for summary judgment filed by plaintiffs contending that Proposition 187 was unconstitutional. The court noted that the question of whether part or all of Proposition 187 was preempted under federal law was governed by the Supreme Court's decision in De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351 (1976), which established three tests to determine whether a state act related to immigration is preempted. Under the first test, "since the 'power to regulate immigration is unquestionably exclusively a federal power,' any state statute which regulates immigration is 'constitutionally proscribed.' " Even if the state law is not found to be a regulation of immigration, it is preempted if it was the "'clear and manifest purpose of Congress' . . . to 'occupy the field' which the statute attempts to regulate" or if the state law "conflicts with federal law making compliance with both state and federal law impossible." The court found that Proposition 187 "create[d] an impermissible state scheme to regulate immigration and [was] preempted under the first and second De Canas tests" because:

> [t]he classification, notification and cooperation/reporting provisions in sections 4 through 9 of the initiative, taken together, constitute a regulatory scheme (1) to detect persons present in California in violation of state-created categories of lawful immigration status; (2) to notify state and federal officials of their purportedly unlawful status; and (3) to effect their removal from the United States.

The court also found that the subsections of §§ 5, 6 and 8 denying law enforcement, social services, health care and post-secondary education benefits might be constitutionally implemented, but only if state regulations could be promulgated whereby state agents "do not themselves determine whether a person is lawfully present in the United States and only verify a person's immigration status for benefits denial purposes by relying on determinations made by the INS. . . ." 908 F. Supp. at 771. The court held, however, that the provisions of § 7, which prohibited elementary and secondary schools from admitting or permitting attendance of illegal alien children, were preempted by federal law "[i]n light of the United States Supreme Court's decision in Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982) in which the Court held that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits states from excluding undocumented alien children from public schools." Id. at 774.

In May 1997 the defendants indicated that they did not intend to promulgate implementing regulations and that they wished the Court to decide the issues without any such regulations. In the meantime, additional relevant federal law was enacted in the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–193, 110 Stat. 2105 (1996), 42 U.S.C. § 601 ("PRA"). See League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Wilson, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3418 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 13, 1998).

As the court explained in the March 1998 opinion:

> [o]n August 22, 1996, the President signed the PRA. The PRA creates a comprehensive statutory scheme for determining aliens' eligibility for federal, state and local benefits and services. It categorizes all aliens as "qualified" or not "qualified" and then denies public benefits based on that categorization. In the PRA, Congress expressly stated a national policy of restricting the availability of public benefits to aliens. [8 U.S.C. § 1601].

The court concluded:

> . . . [T]he PRA ousts state power to legislate in the area of public benefits for aliens. When President Clinton > signed the PRA, he effectively ended any further debate about what the states could do in this field. As the Court pointed out in its prior Opinion, California is powerless to enact its own legislative scheme to regulate immigration. It is likewise powerless to enact its own legislative scheme to regulate alien access to public benefits. It can do what the PRA permits, and nothing more. Federal power in these areas was always exclusive and the PRA only serves to reinforce the Court's prior conclusion that substantially all of the provisions of Proposition 187 are preempted under De Canas v. Bica. Only sections 2, 3 and 10 are enforceable.*

4. Protection from Disclosure of Confidential Communication from a Foreign Government

On November 29, 1994, Leslie R. Weatherhead filed a request for disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552 ("FOIA"), of a letter from officials of the Government of Great Britain to U.S. officials concerning a sensitive extradition matter involving his client. The United States summarized the case as follows in a submission to the Supreme Court at a later stage of the ensuing litigation:

> This case involves a request under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. 552, for a copy of a letter, dated July 28, 1994, sent by the Home Office of the British government to the United States Department of Justice concerning the extradition of [Weatherhead's] client . . . and another person from the United Kingdom to the United States, to stand trial on charges of conspiring to murder the United States Attorney for the District of Oregon. The extradition was a sensitive matter between > the two nations. The letter from the Home Office was classified and withheld under Exemption 1 of FOIA, 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(1), because it constituted a confidential communication by a foreign government and the breach of that confidentiality by the United States could reasonably be expected to harm the national security. The United States' decision to withhold the document was based, in large part, on the position of the British government (in which our government concurred) that such correspondence between governments is ordinarily confidential and that the letter accordingly should remain confidential.

U.S. Motion to Vacate the Judgment of the Court of Appeals and Remand the Case with Directions to Dismiss the Case as Moot, November 23, 1999, discussed further below.

In the litigation, the State Department had submitted affidavits explaining that disclosure and the resultant breach of the British government's trust would damage the United States' foreign relations both by impairing the ability of the United States to engage in and receive confidential diplomatic communications and by impeding international law enforcement cooperation.

The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Washington initially ordered the document disclosed, but reconsidered its decision after undertaking in camera review and agreed with the United States in an unreported decision that the letter was exempt from disclosure under 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(1). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court, ordering the United States to release the letter. Weatherhead v. United States, 157 F.3d 735 (9th Cir. 1998). The Supreme Court granted certiorari, 527 U.S. 1063 (1999).

In his brief on the merits in the Supreme Court of November 19, 1999, Weatherhead for the first time disclosed a letter dated November 16, 1994, that he had received from the British Consul in Seattle, Washington, containing much of the substance of the Home Office letter. Neither the U.S.

Department of State nor the British Home Office had been aware of the Consul's letter. In light of that letter, however, the British government informed the United States that it no longer insisted upon maintaining the confidentiality of the Home Office letter and requested the United States to release it. The letter was declassified and provided to Weatherhead.

Because these developments rendered the case before the Supreme Court moot, the United States filed a motion with the Supreme Court on November 23, 1999, to vacate the court of appeals decision since it could not now be reviewed. The Supreme Court vacated the decision in a one-sentence order on December 3, 1999. United States v. Weatherhead, 528 U.S. 1042 (1999). See also 199 F.3d 1375 (9th Cir. 2000).

The U.S. motion explained its reasons for requesting vacatur, as excerpted below. The full text is available at www.state.gov/sl/c8183.htm. U.S. replies filed December 1999 are available at www.usdoj.gov/osg/briefs/1999/3mer/2mer/98-1904.mer.supp.rep.html.

3. The adverse consequences for the national security of the erroneous ruling by the court of appeals extend well beyond the circumstances of this case; they threaten the same harm to the foreign relations of the United States generally that led the United States to request review by this Court in the first place. . . .

The court of appeals' decision refusing to afford any deference to the conclusion of Executive Branch officials that the harm to national security against which the Executive Order protects includes the harm arising from the very act of disclosure likewise exceeded the proper boundaries of judicial review and, if permitted to stand, would significantly handicap the government's ability to protect foreign government communications. . . .

Vacatur of the court of appeals' now unreviewable judgment is . . . of great importance to the Executive Branch's ability to conduct foreign relations and administer its own Executive Order in a manner that protects vital diplomatic interests. In the absence of a single, uniform rule governing the standard of deference owed

Executive Branch classification decisions under Exemption 1, FOIA plaintiffs will have an incentive to file suit within the circuit that accords classification judgments the least amount of deference. From a practical perspective, a lack of cohesion in the judicial standards governing review of classification decisions by the Executive will deny Executive Branch officials and foreign governments a stable framework within which to engage in candid exchanges of diplomatic information, thereby creating a real danger of "restricting the flow of essential information to the Government." FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 628 n.12 (1982). It will be of little solace to those United States diplomats whose assurances of confidentiality would be rendered empty promises under the Ninth Circuit's decision—or to foreign governments whose secrets would be exposed within the Ninth Circuit—that their expectation of confidentiality might have carried the day in another region of the United States. From the foreign government's perspective and from ours, "an uncertain privilege, or one which purports to be certain but results in widely varying applications by the courts, is little better than no privilege at all." Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 393 (1981).

Relatedly, the prospect that courts may make their own independent judgments about maintaining the confidentiality of national security information—either because deference is not deemed to have been "justified" through an unspecified "initial showing" in a particular case, or because of a disagreement with the Executive Branch about the causes and nature of damage to foreign relations that may be taken into account—would have an immediate and deleterious impact on the Executive's conduct of diplomatic and other foreign relations. . . .

Excerpts below from the U.S. brief on the merits, filed in the Supreme Court in October 1999, provide further background of the case and address the obligations of the United States to protect confidential communications with another government and the importance of preserving its right to do so under the national security exemption of the FOIA. THE COURT OF APPEALS DISREGARDED THE REQUIREMENT UNDER THE CONSTITUTION AND THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT THAT IT ACCORD THE UTMOST DEFERENCE TO THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH'S DETERMINATION THAT THE REQUESTED INFORMATION MUST BE CLASSIFIED IN THE INTEREST OF NATIONAL SECURITY

Section 552(b)(1) of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) exempts from disclosure all matters that are "specifically authorized under criteria established by Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy" and "are in fact properly classified pursuant to such an Executive order." The Executive Order applicable to this case is Executive Order No. 12958, 3 C.F.R. 333 (1996). It provides that information may be classified if four conditions are met. Only the fourth condition is at issue in this case. That criterion is that the original classification authority—here, the responsible State Department official—has "determine[d] that the unauthorized disclosure of the information reasonably could be expected to result in damage to the national security" and has been "able to identify or describe th[at] damage." Exec. Order. No. 12958, § 1.2(a)(4). The uncontested State Department declarations meet that standard. They identify and describe a concrete harm to the United States' foreign policy interests—a breach of the trust of an important ally. They also explain how disclosure of the letter in violation of that trust reasonably could be expected to damage the United States' foreign relations with Great Britain and other nations by impairing the United States' ability to engage in and obtain confidential diplomatic communications and by impeding international law enforcement cooperation. That explanation fully satisfied the governing Executive Order and, therefore, also satisfied Exemption 1 of FOIA.

A. The President's Constitutional Responsibilities For National Defense And Foreign Relations Include The Authority, Long Recognized By Congress, To Protect Confidential National Security Information

* * * *

1. The Executive Branch's "authority to classify and control access to information bearing on national security  flows primarily from th[e] constitutional investment of power in the President  as head of the Executive Branch and as Commander in Chief," and thus "exists quite apart from any explicit congressional grant." Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 527 (1988). The President's exclusive authority to "receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers," U.S. Const. Art. II, § 3, provides further textual grounding specifically for the Executive's primacy in managing the Nation's diplomatic relations. Accordingly, "courts traditionally have been reluctant to intrude upon the authority of the Executive" over the management of national security information, because of "the generally accepted view that foreign policy [is] the province and responsibility of the Executive." Egan, 484 U.S. at 529–530 (quoting Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 293–294 (1981)). With respect to that area of Presidential responsibility, "the courts have traditionally shown the utmost deference." Egan, 484 U.S. at 530 (emphasis added) (quoting United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 710 (1974)).

The President's paramount authority in the area of foreign relations has been recognized since the founding of the Republic. Thomas Jefferson advised President Washington that "[t]he transaction of business with foreign nations is Executive altogether. It belongs then to the head of that department, except as to such portions of it as are specially submitted to the Senate. Exceptions are to be construed strictly." 16 The Papers of Thomas Jefferson 379 (J. Boyd, ed. 1961). In an early extradition matter involving Great Britain, John Marshall, who was then a Member of Congress, declared that the President is "the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations," and that "[t]he [executive] department  is entrusted with the whole foreign intercourse of the nation." Speech of March 7, 1800, in 4 The Papers of John Marshall 104–105 (C. T. Cullen ed., 1984).

2. It also has been recognized "since the beginning of the Republic" that the "President's constitutional authority to control the disclosure of documents and information relating to diplomatic communications" is an indispensable adjunct of his foreign affairs power. Thus, John Jay explained in The Federalist No. 64:

> There are cases where the most useful [foreign policy] intelligence may be obtained, if the persons possessing it can be relieved from apprehensions of discovery.  [T]here doubtless are many [such persons] who would rely on the secrecy of the President, but who would not confide in that of the Senate, and still less in that of a large popular assembly. The convention have done well, therefore, in so disposing of the power of making treaties that although the President must in forming them, act by the advice and consent of the Senate, yet he will be able to manage the business of intelligence in such manner as prudence may suggest.

The Federalist No. 64, at 392–393 (C. Rossiter ed., 1961).

So complete is the President's ability to protect against the unauthorized disclosure of foreign relations information that it includes the authority to withhold information about foreign affairs and diplomatic negotiations even from Congress, "if in [the President's] judgment disclosure would be incompatible with the public interest;" and that is so notwithstanding the Senate's role under Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution in giving its advice and consent to the making of treaties. That discretion to withhold confidential national security information even from Congress, or to restrict the extent of Congress's access to it, has been exercised by almost every President, from the time of George Washington to the present, in those instances when the President has determined that disclosure would be "incompatible with the public interest." President Washington refused to lay before the House of Representatives instructions, correspondence, and documents underlying the negotiation of the Jay Treaty because "[t]o admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand and to have as a matter of course all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power would be to establish a dangerous precedent." 1 J. Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents 195 (1896). The "wisdom" of that decision "was recognized by the House itself and has never since been doubted." United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 320 (1936). That is because "[a] discretion in the Executive Department how far and where to comply in such cases is essential to the due conduct of foreign negotiations." 20 The Papers of Alexander Hamilton 68 (H. Syrett ed., 1974) (Letter from Alexander Hamilton to President Washington (Mar. 7, 1796)).

President Tyler likewise withheld from the House of Representatives correspondence between the United States and Great Britain over the United States' Northeastern and Northwestern boundaries, because "no communication could be made by me at this time on the subject of its resolution without detriment or danger to the public interests." 4 J. Richardson, supra, at 101, 201–211. President Polk declined to comply with a request from the House of Representatives for information concerning efforts to negotiate a peaceful resolution of disputes with Mexico because disclosure "could not fail to produce serious embarrassment in any future negotiation between the two countries." Id. at 566.

Correspondingly, Congress historically has accorded the utmost deference to such Presidential judgments in the foreign policy area. "A statement that to furnish the information is not compatible with the public interest rarely, if ever, is questioned." Curtiss-Wright, 299 U.S. at 321. . . .

In short, at the time Congress amended Exemption 1 of FOIA in 1974, Congress itself had, over the course of almost 200 years, consistently acquiesced in decisions by the President to decline to furnish information pertaining to foreign affairs, or otherwise accommodated his requests to maintain the confidentiality of such information. And, where the Executive Branch has made such information available to Congress, the conditions of secrecy have been respected between the Branches, so that confidentiality could be maintained as against the outside world. That history of congressional respect for the Executive's judgments concerning the confidentiality of information about foreign relations or national defense provides compelling support for a rule of great deference to the Executive's classification judgments in the context of FOIA, which provides for disclosure of non-exempt documents to the public at large.

B. The Complex And Delicate Character Of Diplomatic Relations Requires That Courts Also Accord Utmost Deference To Executive Branch Determinations To Preserve The Confidentiality Of National Security Information

Like Congress, the courts have historically afforded the Executive Branch's foreign policy judgments and concomitant classification decisions the utmost deference, reflecting the distinct institutional roles and capabilities of the two Branches:

> [T]he very nature of executive decisions as to foreign policy is political, not judicial. Such decisions are wholly confided by our Constitution to the political departments of the government, Executive and Legislative. They are delicate, complex, and involve large elements of prophecy. They are and should be undertaken only by those directly responsible to the people whose welfare they advance or imperil. They are decisions of a kind for which the Judiciary has neither aptitude, facilities nor responsibility and which has long been held to belong in the domain of political power not subject to judicial intrusion or inquiry.

Chicago & S. Air Lines, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 111 (1948); accord Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 165–166 (1803). Accordingly, "[e]ven if there is some room for the judiciary to override the executive determination [on classification], it is plain that the scope of review must be exceedingly narrow." New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 758 (1971) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

First, deference to the Executive Branch is indispensable because the impact that revelation of a foreign government's confidences would have on the conduct of the Nation's foreign policy cannot be assessed in a vacuum. The United States' relationship with a particular foreign government—especially as close an ally as Great Britain—necessarily involves multiple negotiations and dialogues about a variety of sensitive subjects at any given time. In light of the inevitable give-and-take and delicate balancing of interests that such ongoing relations entail, courts considering Executive Branch declarations in FOIA cases must keep in mind that geopolitical developments outside the courtroom can give a document a sensitivity that is not apparent to a non-expert from the face of the document.

Second, judgments about the harm to foreign relations and national security necessarily entail large elements of prediction, and those predictive judgments "must be made by those with the necessary expertise in protecting classified information." Egan, 484 U.S. at 529.

* * * *

Executive Order No. 12,958 itself incorporates those elements of judgment and prediction in safeguarding the Nation's secrets. It permits the classification of information if the responsible classifying official "determines," on the basis of his or her expertise, that disclosure "reasonably could be expected to result in damage to the national security." Id. § 1.2(a)(4). Courts must respect such determinations. Executive Branch experts are better acquainted than courts, for example, with the politically sensitive and volatile context in which a government extradites one of its own citizens to stand trial in a foreign land, and the adverse consequences that might ensue for a foreign government if a confidential diplomatic communication with the United States were to be disclosed.

Third, diplomatic relationships come with a history and a future. With respect to any particular nation at any given time, the United States may be attempting to repair a serious breach in relations, to set the foundation for a new and enduring relationship, or to build upon and expand a prior history of cooperation. In that context, the old saw that "timing is everything" assumes critical weight. Elections, coups, no-confidence votes, and unforeseen domestic developments in a foreign country can transform overnight the significance and sensitivity of a communication. Likewise, a judicial order to breach a foreign government's trust and disclose a sensitive communication that issues at a time when the Executive Branch is struggling to repair or maintain contacts with that government due to other developments in the international arena could have grave and enduring repercussions for United States' foreign policy.

* * * *

International law enforcement efforts and extradition matters, like those at issue in this case, well illustrate the need for substantial judicial deference to the "broad view of the scene," Marchetti, 466 F.2d at 1318, and to the contextual judgment that Executive Branch officials bring to bear on classification decisions. "[R]elations with foreign nations  are necessarily implied in the extradition of fugitives from justice." United States v. Rauscher, 119 U.S. 407, 414 (1886). . . .

For those reasons, the concerns that State Department officials expressed (Pet. App. 53a, 57a–58a, 62a–63a) about the real-world impact of breaching Great Britain's confidence on the United States' law enforcement efforts in the United Kingdom and more generally with other nations do not "lack []  particularity" (id. at 12a). Quite the opposite, they reflect realistic appraisals of a complicated and intertwined diplomatic situation by State Department experts who have the institutional responsibility and experience to see the foreign relations "forest" and not just the particular "tree" before the court, and who thus can foresee the ripple effect that a single breach of trust would have on important United States foreign policy and international law enforcement objectives. "The judiciary is not well-positioned to shoulder primary responsibility for assessing the likelihood and importance of such diplomatic repercussions." INS v. Aguirre-Aguirre, 119 S. Ct. 1439, 1445 (1999).

C. Courts Likewise Must Accord The Utmost Deference To Executive Branch Classification Decisions Concerning Documents That Are The Subject Of Suits Under The Freedom Of Information Act

* * * *

1. The Utmost Deference Is Owed To The Executive's Interpretation Of Its Own Executive Order That Damage To The National Security Includes Harm Resulting From The Act Of Disclosing A Confidential Communication From A Foreign Government

* * * *

. . . [C]ases recognize the utter unworkability of a scheme under which courts would make their own independent judgments about maintaining the confidentiality of national security information—either because deference is not deemed to have been "justif[ied]" through an unspecified "initial showing" in a particular case, or because of a disagreement with the Executive Branch about the causes and nature of damage to foreign relations that may be taken into account. . . .

* * * *

Preserving the confidentiality of communications in the area of international law enforcement and extradition is critical in its own right. Under the extradition treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom, like most of the extradition treaties entered into by the United States in the last fifteen years, the government from whom extradition is requested is obligated to represent the requesting State in the extradition proceedings. When extradition is contested, as it was by respondent's client, the requesting and sending governments may spend years engaged in sensitive communications pertaining to issues raised in the legal proceedings, the location of fugitives, investigative sources and methods, investigative or prosecutorial strategies, security issues, humanitarian concerns, and the domestic and diplomatic repercussions of the extradition. One government may question the strength of a case or the commitment of the other government to a pending extradition matter, or it may seek to assuage particular political or humanitarian concerns in the sending country. With many countries whose legal systems differ from ours, concerns about the nature of the criminal proceedings, the motivation for the prosecution, or conditions of incarceration may be expressed confidentially that neither government would wish to have voiced publicly.

With respect to international law enforcement more generally, preserving the trust and ongoing cooperation of foreign governments and protecting the confidentiality of the candid information they share—as participants in transnational efforts to prevent terrorism, to locate and bring to justice international fugitives, and to combat (for example) narcotics trafficking, alien smuggling, and illegal weapons sales—represent distinct foreign policy objectives, separate and apart from any individual criminal matter. Given the vital importance of cultivating an atmosphere of trust in which candid and timely exchanges of information can be encouraged, "[g]reat nations, like great men, should keep their word." Sims, 471 U.S. at 175 (quoting FPC v. Tuscarora Indian Nation, 362 U.S. 99, 142 (1960) (Black, J., dissenting)). "Effectiveness in handling the delicate problems of foreign relations requires no less." United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 229 (1942).

Accordingly, this Court should reject the court of appeals' counterintuitive and perilous conclusion that no threat of "harm" to the "foreign relations of the United States" (Exec. Order No. 12,958, § 1.1(l)) is presented by the prospect of a foreign government limiting or terminating negotiations or cooperation with the United States on a sensitive matter, or refusing to afford reciprocal protection for the confidences of the United States, if its confidences are not preserved. The "changeable and explosive nature of contemporary international relations," Haig, 453 U.S. at 292, and the breach of trust that disclosure of the British government's confidences would cause in foreign relations generally and in the delicate arena of international law enforcement and extradition in particular, warrant reversal of the court of appeals' judgment.

5. Foreign Policy Issues in U.S. Legislation

a. Presidential authorities

On November 3, 1993, the Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice ("OLC"), provided a memorandum to the Counsel to the President concluding as follows (footnotes omitted):

> Presidential signing statements . . . may on appropriate occasions perform useful and legally significant functions. These functions include . . . (3) informing Congress and the public that the Executive believes that a particular provision would be unconstitutional in certain of its applications, or that it is unconstitutional on its face, and that the provision will not be given effect by the Executive Branch to the extent that such enforcement would create an unconstitutional condition.
>
>
> . . . [T]he President may use a signing statement to announce that, although the legislation is constitutional on its face, it would be unconstitutional in various applications, and that in such applications he will refuse to execute it. . . . Relatedly, a signing statement may put forward a "saving" construction of the bill, explaining that the President will construe it in a certain manner in order to avoid constitutional difficulties. . . .
>
> More boldly still, the President may declare in a signing statement that a provision of the bill before him is flatly unconstitutional, and that he will refuse to enforce it. . . .

Memorandum for Bernard N. Nussbaum, Counsel to the President, from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, re: The Legal Significance of Presidential Signing Statements (Nov. 3, 1993). The full text of the memorandum, including an appendix providing historical examples of Presidential signing statements, is available at www.usdoj.gov/olc/signing.htm.

On November 2, 1994, OLC provided a memorandum to the Counsel to the President on the underlying issue of the President's authority to decline to execute unconstitutional statutes. The memorandum "start[ed] with a proposition that I believe to be uncontroversial: there are circumstances in which the President may appropriately decline to enforce a statute that he views as unconstitutional." Recognizing that this proposition "does not offer sufficient guidance as to the appropriate course in specific circumstances," the memorandum also offered a series of propositions, including that "[t]he President has enhanced responsibility to resist unconstitutional provisions that encroach upon the constitutional powers of the Presidency. . . ." Memorandum for the Honorable Abner J. Mikva, Counsel to the President, from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, re: Presidential Authority to Decline to Execute Unconstitutional Statutes (Nov. 2, 1994). b. Presidential signing statements

On a number of occasions during the 1990s the President included language in signing statements preserving his Constitutional prerogatives in this manner. A few examples invoking the President's Constitutional powers as Commander-in-Chief and in foreign affairs are provided below.

On October 5, 1999, in signing the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2000, Pub. L. No. 106–65. President William J. Clinton objected to a number of provisions, including as excerpted below. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1927 (Oct. 11, 1999).

. . . Although I have serious reservations about some portions of this Act, I believe S. 1059 provides for a strong national defense, maintains our military readiness, and supports our deep commitment to a better quality of life for our military personnel and their families.

I am concerned about section 1232, which contains a funding limitation with respect to continuous deployment of United States Armed Forces in Haiti pursuant to Operation Uphold Democracy. I have decided to terminate the continuous deployment of forces in Haiti, and I intend to keep the Congress informed with respect to any future deployments to Haiti; however, I will interpret this provision consistent with my Constitutional responsibilities as President and Commander in Chief.

A number of other provisions of this bill raise serious constitutional concerns. Because the President is the Commander in Chief and the Chief Executive under the Constitution, the Congress may not interfere with the President's duty to protect classified and other sensitive national security information or his responsibility to control the disclosure of such information by subordinate officials of the executive branch (sections 1042, 3150, and 3164). Furthermore, because the Constitution vests the conduct of foreign affairs in the President, the Congress may not direct that the President initiate discussions or negotiations with foreign governments (section 1407 and 1408). Nor may the Congress unduly restrict the President's constitutional appointment authority by limiting the President's selection to individuals recommended by a subordinate officer (section 557). To the extent that these provisions conflict with my constitutional responsibilities in these areas, I will construe them where possible to avoid such conflicts, and where it is impossible to do so, I will treat them as advisory. I hereby direct all executive branch officials to do likewise.

In 1994, President Clinton noted a number of areas of disagreement in signing the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1994 and 1995, as excerpted below. 30 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 948 (May 9, 1994).

* * * *

Section 141 would require the Department of State to allow local guard contracts awarded to U.S. firms to be paid in U.S. dollars in certain countries. Because many countries require that payment for services rendered locally be paid in local currency, this provision could force the United States to violate both host country law and its obligations under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. I will seek to implement this section in the manner most consistent with U.S. obligations under international law.

Other provisions raise constitutional concerns. Article II of the Constitution confers the Executive power of the United States on the President alone. Executive power includes special authority in the area of foreign affairs. Certain provisions in H.R. 2333, however, could be construed so as to interfere with the discharge of my constitutional responsibilities.

For example, section 412 (reforms in the World Health Organization), section 501 (protection of refugee women and children), section 527(b) (loans by international financial institutions to governments that have expropriated property of U.S. citizens), and section 823 (loans or other payments by international financial institutions for the purpose of acquiring nuclear materials by non-nuclear states), purport specifically to direct the President on how to proceed in negotiations with international organizations. These provisions might be construed to require the Executive branch to espouse certain substantive positions regarding specific issues. I support the policies underlying these sections. My constitutional authority over foreign affairs, however, necessarily entails discretion over these matters. Accordingly, I shall construe these provisions to be precatory.

Section 221 (the establishment of an office in Lhasa, Tibet), section 236 (an exchange program with the people of Tibet), and section 573 (an Office of Cambodian Genocide Investigation, the activities of which are to be carried out primarily in Cambodia), could also interfere with the President's constitutional prerogatives. I am sympathetic to the goals of these provisions. However, they could be construed to require the President to negotiate with foreign countries or to take actions in those countries without their consent. I will, therefore, implement them to the extent consistent with my constitutional responsibilities.

* * * *

Section 401 requires certain withholdings from U.S. assessed contributions for the United Nations (U.N.) regular budget, and from the fiscal year 1994 supplemental until the President makes the requisite certification that the U.N. has established an office of and appointed an Inspector General, empowered with specified authorities. Section 404 also sets forth ceilings on assessments on the United States for peacekeeping contributions. Although I share the Congress' goal of encouraging U.N. reform and broader cost sharing, I cannot endorse the method proposed by these provisions because they could place the United States in violation of its international treaty obligations if reform is not achieved within the stated time.

Section 407 sets forth new reporting and notification requirements, including a requirement for 15-day advance notification (with no waiver provision) before the United States provides certain in-kind assistance to support U.N. peacekeeping operations. It is understood that the Congress, however, does not consider this provision to be subject to the regular procedures on reprogramming notifications. It is imperative at times to provide such assistance on an urgent basis to further U.S. foreign policy interests. I will, therefore, construe these reporting and notification requirements consistent with my constitutional prerogatives and responsibilities as Commander in Chief and head of the Executive branch. I also note the understanding reached with the Congress that this notification process will not include congressional "holds" on assistance when notification does occur.

On October 28, 1991, in signing the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, FY 1992, Pub. L. No. 102–140, President George H. W. Bush addressed the issue of Constitutional prerogatives in international negotiations as excerpted below. 27 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1529 (Oct. 28, 1991).

Section 503 of the Act prohibits the use of funds to issue Israel-only passports and more than one official or diplomatic passport to Government employees in certain circumstances. This prohibition applies to issuing passports for the purpose of complying with the policy of some Arab League nations of denying entry to persons whose passports reflect that they have previously visited Israel. I am sympathetic to the goals of this provision and have made this issue part of the Administration's discussions with the countries that engage in such practices.

The Constitution, however, vests exclusive authority in the President to control the timing and substance of negotiations with foreign governments and to choose the officials who will negotiate on behalf of the United States. A purported blanket prohibition on the use of funds to issue more than one official or diplomatic passport to U.S. Government officials could interfere with the President's ability to conduct diplomacy by denying U.S. diplomats the documentation necessary for them to travel to all countries in the Middle East and could upset delicate and complex negotiations. I therefore am directing the Secretary of State to ensure that this provision does not interfere with my constitutional prerogatives and responsibilities.

B. CONSTITUENT ENTITIES

1. General

In a letter of April 12, 1991, the U.S. Department of Justice provided comments on a draft U.S. General Accounting Office ("GAO") report entitled "U.S. Possessions, Applicability of Relevant Provisions of the U.S. Constitution." Letter from Harry H. Flickinger, Assistant Attorney General for Administration, to Linda G. Morra, Director, Human Services Policy and Management Issues, GAO, reprinted as Appendix VIII in H.R. Rep. 104–713, Part 1 at 66–87 (1996). Excerpts from the letter below address additional legal issues primarily concerning Puerto Rico's status.

* * * *

I. . . . [W]e shall focus first on the applicability of the Territory Clause of the Constitution (art. IV, § 3, cl. 2)[1] to the Commonwealths of Puerto Rico and the Northern Mariana Islands and the territories of Guam, American Samoa, and the Virgin Islands. Those five areas are under the sovereignty of the United States,[2]

---

[1] The Territory Clause provides in pertinent part: "The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States."

[2] The United States acquired sovereignty over those five areas as follows: Puerto Rico and Guam, Article II of the Treaty of Paris of December 10, 1898, 30 Stat. 1754, 1755; American Samoa, cessions of April 10, 1900 and July 16, 1904, accepted, ratified, and confirmed by the Act of February 20, 1929, 48 U.S.C. § 1661; Virgin Islands, Convention with Denmark of August 4, 1916, Art. I, 39 Stat (Pt. II) 1706; Northern Mariana Islands Covenant, Section 101, 90 Stat. 263, 264 (1976), 48 U.S.C. § 1681 note.

but not States or included in States. National Bank v. County of Yankton, 101 U.S. 129, 133 (1880) has established that "[a]ll territory within the jurisdiction of the United States not included in any State must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress" under the Territory Clause.

Various factions within the Commonwealths of Puerto Rico and the Northern Mariana Islands have argued that the Territory Clause does not apply there. (fn. omitted) The United States has sovereignty in these Commonwealths, however, and under the Constitution and applicable law, the source of constitutional authority for exercise of federal authority in all areas under the sovereignty of the United States is the Territory Clause. The argument that the Territory Clause does not apply is tantamount to a claim that there is no constitutional source for federal lawmaking in Puerto Rico and the Northern Marianas, and that these entities are basically independent sovereigns. Not surprisingly, every court to consider the Territory Clause issue has reaffirmed that the Territory Clause provides the fundamental constitutional source of authority governing the relationship between the U.S. and the Commonwealths.

* * * *

II. . . . As a general observation, we would avoid the use of the term "possession" when referring to the territories of American Samoa, Guam and the Virgin Islands, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands and Puerto Rico. . . . In our view, the term "an unincorporated area under the sovereignty of the United States that is not a Sate or included in a State" technically would be more accurate. . . .

Background

According to the Insular Cases and their progeny (fn. omitted), areas under the sovereignty of the United States that are not States fall into two categories: incorporated and unincorporated. The first group comprises those that are destined to become States; to those the Constitution of the United States applies in full. Included in the other group are those areas that are not intended for statehood; to those only fundamental parts of the Constitution apply of their own force. Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244, 290–91 (1901). Although the Court has not precisely defined which parts of the Constitution are fundamental, it has held various parts to be fundamental. See, Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298, 312–13 (1922) (due process); Examining Board v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 599–601 (1976) (Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or the Equal Protection Element of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment (fn. omitted)); Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465, 468–71 (1979) (prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure either of the Fourth Amendment directly or by operation of the Fourteenth Amendment.)

On the other hand, the right to a jury trial has not been held fundamental, Balzac, supra; see also, Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands v. Atalig, 723 F.2d 682 (9th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1244 (1984).

Apart from those provisions that apply to the insular areas of their own force, Congress has introduced other parts of the Constitution into them by legislation. . . . Sometimes those provisions have been made applicable only as a protection against the local government. See e.g., the Bill of Rights in the Organic Acts of Guam and the Virgin Islands, 48 U.S.C. §§ 1421b (a)–(t); 1561 (except the last two paragraphs). On the other hand, some constitutional provisions have been introduced into those areas so as to be effective against the federal government. See e.g., 48 U.S.C. § 1421b(u) (Guam); the Covenant with the Northern Mariana Islands, 48 U.S.C. § 1681 note, § 501; 48 U.S.C. § 1561, penultimate paragraph (Virgin Islands). . . .

* * * *

The Uniformity Clause of art. I, § 8, cl. 1 of the Constitution provides that all duties, imports, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. In 1901 the Supreme Court held in Downes v. Bidwell, supra, one of the Insular Cases, and involving custom duties, that this clause did not apply to special customs duties imposed on imports from Puerto Rico to the United States, because Puerto Rico, as an unincorporated territory, was not a part of the United States within the meaning of the Uniformity Clause. In spite of that decision, Puerto Rico is now a part of the customs territory of the United States. 19 U.S.C. § 1401(h). The other four insular areas, however, are not. Id. Covenant with the Northern Mariana Islands, Section 603.

Similarly, because the insular areas are exempt from the uniformity requirement with respect to taxation, the federal income tax is not required to apply to income from sources within an insular area earned by a resident of that area. 26 U.S.C. §§ 931, 932, 936. . . .

The Constitution contains another uniformity requirement, art. I, § 8, cl. 4, relating to rules of naturalization and bankruptcy laws. Statutes have been enacted on the theory that these two uniformity requirements do not extend to the insular areas. . . .

Since the term "national" refers to all persons who owe permanent allegiance to the United States, whether citizens or not, we suggest that the report refer to the residents of American Samoa who owe permanent allegiance to the United States but are not United States citizens, as "non-citizen nationals," in accord with the 1986 amendment to § 341 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1452(b).

* * * *

The Commerce Clause (art. I, § 8, cl. 3 of the Constitution) confers upon Congress the power "To regulate Commerce with Foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." There are two aspects to the Commerce Clause; first, the power of Congress to enact legislation; and second, the clause's negative implication that prohibits the States from burdening interstate or foreign commerce, frequently called the Dormant Commerce Clause. The question is whether those two aspects of the Commerce Clause also apply to the unincorporated insular areas.

The judicial decisions in this area have not been consistent.

2. Palau

a. Not "foreign nation" for U.S. domestic law purposes

Prior to the 1994 termination of the Trusteeship Agreement applicable to Palau, see 2.b., below, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit vacated a judgment by the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York that had denied a motion by Palau to remand a money judgment action to state court. Morgan Guar. Trust Co. v. Republic of Palau, 924 F.2d 1237 (2d Cir. 1991). Plaintiff banks in the case were guarantors of loans made to Palau for the construction of an electric power plant and fuel storage facility. Palau defaulted. The banks repaid the loans and then brought an action in New York State Supreme Court against Palau to recover their losses. The case was removed to federal court under the removal jurisdiction of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1441(d), which provides for the removal of "any civil action brought in a State court against a foreign state as defined in 1603(a)" (emphasis added). See Morgan Guar. Trust Co. v. Republic of Palau, 639 F. Supp. 706 (S.D.N.Y. 1986).

On appeal, the Second Circuit disagreed with the district court's conclusion that Palau was a foreign state within the meaning of the applicable statutes, finding that "there was no basis for the exercise of removal jurisdiction in this case and that the district court therefore erred in denying the Banks' motion to remand the action to the New York Supreme Court." The court of appeals also noted that the same consideration would preclude original jurisdiction over Palau under the FSIA in federal court. The court's analysis of the status of Palau as a trust territory at the time of the litigation is provided below.

Although both the removal and original jurisdiction provisions refer to the definition of foreign state found in section 1603(a), the section is more descriptive than definitional:

> A "foreign state", except as used in section 1608 of this title [pertaining to service], includes a political subdivision of a foreign state or an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state as defined in subsection (b) [defining agency or instrumentality of foreign state].

To resolve the dispute whether the Republic of Palau is a foreign state subject to original or removal jurisdiction, it therefore is necessary to examine other sources for guidance.

In United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 318–319, 81 L. Ed. 255, 57 S. Ct. 216 (1936), the Supreme Court listed the following attributes of sovereign statehood: the power to declare and wage war; to conclude peace; to maintain diplomatic ties with other sovereigns; to acquire territory by discovery and occupation; and to make international agreements and treaties. Under international law, a state is said to be an entity possessed of a defined territory and a permanent population, controlled by its own government, and engaged in or capable of engaging in relations with other such entities. Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 201 (1987) ("Restatement 3d"). We recently referred to this definition in the course of holding that recognition of a state that satisfies the elements of the definition does not require recognition of the particular government in control of the state. National Petrochemical Co. of Iran v. M/T Stolt Sheaf, 860 F.2d 551, 553 (2d Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1081, 103 L. Ed. 2d 840, 109 S. Ct. 1535 (1989).

According to international law, a sovereign state has certain well accepted capacities, rights and duties:

(a) sovereignty over its territory and general authority over its nationals;
(b) status as a legal person, with capacity to own, acquire, and transfer property, to make contracts and enter into international agreements, to become a member of international organizations, and to pursue, and be subject to, legal remedies;
(c) capacity to join with other states to make international law, as customary law or by international agreement.

Restatement 3d § 206.

Palau simply does not have the attributes of statehood, and cannot be considered a foreign sovereign. See World Communications Corp. v. Micronesian Telecomms. Corp., 456 F. Supp. 1122

(D. Haw. 1978); People of Saipan v. United States Dept. of Interior, 356 F. Supp. 645 (D. Haw. 1973), aff'd as modified, 502 F.2d 90 (9th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 420 U.S. 1003, 95 S. Ct. 1445, 43 L. Ed. 2d 761 (1975). We are willing to accept the proposition that a trust territory held under United Nations auspices is not a territory "belonging to the United States" within the meaning of the territorial clause of the Constitution. U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 2. Accordingly, the authority to govern Palau does not rest upon the rule-making powers granted to Congress by the Constitution for the regulation of territories or other property that "belong" to the United States. Id. Rather, it is the Trusteeship Agreement, entered into under the treaty-making power of the Constitution, that provides the authority for the governance of Palau by the United States. U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. See McKibben, The Political Relationship Between the United States and Pacific Islands Entities: The Path to Self-Government in the Northern Mariana Islands, Palau, and Guam, 31 Harv. Int'l L.J. 257, 264 (1990). The Trusteeship Agreement, of course, confers upon the United States "full power of administration, legislation and jurisdiction over the territory," as well as the right to apply "such of the laws of the United States as it may deem appropriate." A more wide-ranging authority to govern is hard to imagine. The United States exercised that authority at the time of the transactions giving rise to this action, and continues to exercise it.

We take judicial notice of the fact that the United Nations Security Council has approved the termination of the trusteeship arrangement as to the Northern Mariana Islands, which has acquired the status of commonwealth, and the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia, both of which have agreed to Compacts of Free Association with the United States. N.Y. Times, Dec. 24, 1990, at A5, col. 1. Palau therefore is the sole remaining part of the Pacific Trust Territory remaining under the trusteeship. It seems clear that Palau must continue as a trust territory until the United Nations Security Council acts to relieve the United States of its responsibilities under the trust. See Clark, Self-Determination and Free Association—Should the United Nations Terminate the Pacific Islands Trust?, 21 Harv. Int'l L.J. 1, 6 (1980).

While Palau's approval of a Compact of Free Association might hasten the day, the status quo continues. See generally Armstrong & Hills, The Negotiations for the Future Political Status of Micronesia (1980–1984), 78 Am. J. Int'l L. 484 (1984). Whether United Nations termination of the Pacific Territory Trust as to Palau is essential for Palau to be considered a foreign state within the meaning of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act is a question that need not be answered here. While it appears to us that termination at least is necessary to the acquisition of de jure status, the district court determined that Palau has achieved a de facto status as a foreign state, and it is to this determination that we now turn.

The district court found that the Compact of Free Association between the United States and Palau, "which was ratified in a Palauan plebiscite on February 24, 1986," served to establish "Palau's independent sovereignty and equal diplomatic status in the international community." Morgan Guar. Trust, 639 F. Supp. at 709. This finding of ratification, erroneous in light of subsequent events, underlies the district court's conclusion that the trusteeship has been "effectively" terminated and that Palau has "de facto" sovereignty with only some "further acts" standing in the way of "complete unfettered sovereignty." Id. at 716. In fact, the Compact of Free Association never has been ratified by Palau, and the limited powers of self-government afforded to Palau under its Constitution do not justify a finding of "de facto" sovereignty.

It seems to us that a political entity whose laws may be suspended by another cannot be said to be possessed of sovereignty of any kind, de facto or de jure. That is the case with respect to the United States and Palau. Moreover, the Palauan courts are not independent of the United States. The Justices of the High Court of Palau are appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the court is constrained to apply the law of the United States in effect in the territory, including the executive orders of the Secretary of the Interior. See Matter of Bowoon Sangsa Co., Ltd., 720 F.2d 595, 600–01 (9th Cir. 1983). This, too, is inconsistent with the concept of sovereignty. In Bowoon Sangsa, the Ninth Circuit characterized Palau as "quasi-sovereign." Id. at 602. The district court in this case recognized the authority of the High Commissioner (now the Secretary of the Interior) to screen budgets, conduct audits and process grants for the executive branch of the Palauan government. The reality is that the United States has ultimate authority over the governance of Palau, see Sablan Constr. Co. v. Government of Trust Territory, 526 F. Supp. 135, 141 (D.N. Mar. I., App. Div. 1981), and it therefore cannot be said that Palau is an entity "under the control of its own government," Restatement 3d § 201. Neither can it be said to be sovereign over its own territory, with general authority over its nationals in the manner contemplated by Restatement 3d § 206(a).

* * * *

Our conclusion in this case well may have been different had the Compact of Free Association been fully approved by the parties to the Compact. Such approval would have marked the entry of Palau into the final stage of its transition to self-government and would have signaled the certain and unavoidable termination of the Trusteeship. See United States v. Covington, 783 F.2d 1052, 1056 (9th Cir. 1985) (confession given in Republic of the Marshall Islands after approval of free association status treated as given in "foreign country"), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 831, 107 S. Ct. 117, 93 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1986); Commonwealth of Northern Mariana Islands v. Atalig, 723 F.2d 682, 687 (9th Cir.) (application of local law after approval of Covenant granting Commonwealth status to Northern Mariana Islands), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1244, 82 L. Ed. 2d 826, 104 S. Ct. 3518 (1984). Subject to the control of its internal and external affairs by the United States, deficient in all the major attributes of statehood, its Compact of Free Association remaining unapproved after seven plebiscites, the Republic of Palau concedes its lack of sovereignty. We are constrained to agree.

b. Entry into force of Compact of Free Association with Palau

On October 1, 1994, the Compact of Free Association between the United States and the Republic of Palau ("Compact") entered into force. This terminated the last of the U.S. obligations under the terms of the Trusteeship Agreement of 17 July 1947 establishing the UN Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands ("TTPI"). See Trusteeship Agreement for the Former Japanese Mandated Islands, Approved by the Security Council April 2, 1947, entered into force July 18, 1947, 61 Stat. 3301, TIAS No. 1665, 8 U.N.T.S. 189 (1947).

(1) Presidential Proclamation

On September 27, 1994, President William J. Clinton issued Proclamation 6726, providing that "on October 1, 1994, 1:01 p.m. local time in Palau the Compact will enter into force between the United States and the Republic of Palau, and Palau will thereafter be self-governing and no longer subject to the Trusteeship." 59 Fed. Reg. 49,777 (Sept. 29, 1994). The proclamation summarized the history of the U.S. role in the TTPI, the background of the Compact with Palau, and its approval by both Palau and the United States, as set forth below.

Since July 18, 1947, the United States has administered the United Nations Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands ("Trust Territory"), which has included the Northern Mariana Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands, and Palau.

On November 3, 1986, a Covenant between the United States and the Northern Mariana Islands came into force. This Covenant established the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands as a self-governing Commonwealth in political union with and under the sovereignty of the United States.

On October 21, 1986, in the case of the Republic of the Marshall Islands, and on November 3, 1986, in the case of the Federated States of Micronesia, Compacts of Free Association with the United States became effective. Under the Compacts, the Federated States of Micronesia and the Republic of the Marshall Islands became self-governing sovereign states, in free association with the United States. Following the changes in political status of the Northern Mariana Islands, the Marshall Islands, and the Federated States of Micronesia, the Trusteeship Agreement ceased to be applicable to those entities and only Palau remained as the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

On January 10, 1986, the Government of the United States and the Government of Palau concluded a Compact of Free Association similar to those that the United States entered into with the Republic of the Marshall Islands and with the Federated States of Micronesia. As in those instances, it was specified that the Compact with Palau would come into effect upon (1) mutual agreement between the Government of the United States, acting in fulfillment of its responsibilities as Administering Authority of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Government of Palau; (2) the approval of the Compact by the two Governments, in accordance with their constitutional processes; and (3) the approval of the Compact by plebiscite in Palau.

In Palau the Compact has been approved by the Government in accordance with its constitutional processes and by a United Nations-observed plebiscite on November 9, 1993, a sovereign act of self-determination. In the United States the Compact was approved by Public Law 99–658 of November 14, 1986, and Public Law 101–219 of December 12, 1989.

On May 25, 1994, the Trusteeship Council of the United Nations concluded that the Government of the United States had satisfactorily discharged its obligations as the Administering Authority under the terms of the Trusteeship Agreement and that the people of Palau had freely exercised their right to self-determination and considered that it was appropriate for the Trusteeship Agreement to be terminated. The Council asked the United States to consult with the Government of Palau and to agree on a date, on or about October 1, 1994, for entry into force of their new status agreement.

On July 15, 1994, the Government of the United States and the Government of the Republic of Palau agreed, pursuant to section 411 of the Compact of Free Association, that as between the United States and the Republic of Palau, the effective date of the Compact shall be October 1, 1994.

As of this day, September 27, 1994, the United States has fulfilled its obligations under the Trusteeship Agreement with respect to the Republic of Palau. On October 1, 1994, the Compact will enter into force between the United States and the Republic of Palau, and Palau will thereafter be self-governing and no longer subject to the Trusteeship. In taking these actions, the United States is implementing the freely expressed wishes of the people of Palau.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, WILLIAM J. CLINTON, President of the United States of America, by the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including sections 101 and 102 of the Joint Resolution to approve the "Compact of Free Association" between the United States and the Government of Palau, and for other purposes, approved on November 14, 1986 (Public Law 99–658), and section 101 of the Joint Resolution to authorize entry into force of the Compact of Free Association between the United States and the Government of Palau, and for other purposes, approved on December 12, 1989 (Public Law 101–219), and pursuant to section 1002 of the Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in Political Union with the United States of America, and consistent with sections 101 and 102 of the Joint Resolution to approve the "Compact of Free Association" and for other purposes, approved on January 14, 1986 (Public Law 99–239), do hereby find, declare, and proclaim as follows:

Section 1. I determine that the Trusteeship Agreement for the Pacific Islands will be no longer in effect with respect to the Republic of Palau as of October 1, 1994, at one minute past one o'clock p.m. local time in Palau. This constitutes the determination referred to in section 1002 of the Covenant with the Northern Mariana Islands (Public Law 94–241).

Sec. 2. The Compact of Free Association with the Republic of Palau will be in full force and effect as of October 1, 1994, at one minute past one o'clock p.m. local time in Palau.

Sec. 3. I am gratified that the people of the Republic of Palau, after 47 years of Trusteeship, have freely chosen to establish a relationship of Free Association with the United States.

(2) Resolution of legal challenges to ratification in Palau

As noted in the proclamation, new status arrangements for other entities of the Trust Territory had entered into force eight years earlier, in 1986. See 1 Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 442–55. The United States had initially envisaged that the new status arrangements for all of the entities of the Trust Territory could enter into force simultaneously. However, when it became apparent that the entry into force of the Compact of Free Association with Palau would be delayed due to a series of legal actions, the United States decided to proceed with the new status of the other three entities.

In a letter to Congress dated July 26, 1994, the President indicated that litigation in Palau continued to make the date of entry into force of the Compact uncertain. The letter transmitted relevant documents "in accordance with section 101 of the Compact of Free Association Palau Act, Public Law 101–219 (December 12, 1989), section 101(d)(1)(C) and (2) of the Compact of Free Association Approval Act, Public law 99–658 (November 14, 1986), and section 102(b) of the Compact of Free Association Act of 1985, Public Law 99–239 (January 14, 1986)," including > an agreement between Palau and the United States establishing October 1, 1994, as the effective date for the Compact, provided that all lawsuits in Palau challenging the Compact have been resolved by that date. . . .

The letter explained:

> The Congress . . . required that approval of the Compact be free of legal challenge in Palau and that I certify that there are no legal impediments to the ability of the United States to carry out fully its responsibilities and to exercise its rights under the defense-related provisions of the Compact. There is currently a lawsuit challenging the Compact in Palau. I will make this final certification once that lawsuit is resolved.
>
> The July 15, 1994, Agreement Regarding the Entry Into Force of the Compact of Free Association establishes October 1, 1994, as the effective date of the Compact, provided that all legal challenges in Palau have been resolved by that date ("provided that the requirements of section 101(1) of United States Public Law 101–219 (December 12, 1989) have been met"). See Senate Report

> No. 101–189, at 9 (1989). If all legal challenges in Palau have not been resolved by that date, the agreement provides that the effective date shall be the earliest possible date thereafter as established by exchange of letters between the two governments. . . .

See 89 Am.J. Int'l L. 96 (1995). The July 15 agreement and July 26 letter from the President are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The litigation over approval of the Compact dated from a 1981 Supreme Court of Palau decision holding that approval of any Compact would require a 75% majority. The decision was based on Article II, § 3 of the constitution of Palau, effective January 1, 1981, which required approval by 75% of the registered voters of any agreement that authorized the "use, testing, storage or disposal of nuclear, toxic chemical, gas or biological weapons intended for use in warfare." As explained by the Second Circuit in Morgan Guar., supra,

> The Compact of Free Association between the United States and Palau originally was submitted for approval by the Palauan people with the condition that a separate bilateral agreement would be entered into permitting the United States to locate nuclear devices in Palau. After two plebiscites failed to produce the 75% approval required by the Palau Constitution, the Compact was renegotiated to allow the United States to "operate nuclear capable or nuclear propelled vessels and aircraft within the jurisdiction of Palau without either confirming or denying the presence or absence of such weapons within the jurisdiction of Palau." See Compact of Free Association, Pub. L. No. 99–658, tit. III, § 324, 100 Stat. 3672 (1986). The Compact as modified was approved by a 72% margin in a plebiscite held on February 21, and reported on February 24, 1986. Because of the change in the nuclear use provision, the Compact was thought to be outside the 75% requirement on the third go-around. Accordingly, the Compact was considered adopted and was approved by Congress and the President of the United States. See Approval of the Compact of Free > Association with the Government of Palau, Pub. L. No. 99–658, tit. I, § 101, 100 Stat. 3672 (1986); Exec. Order No. 12,569, 51 Fed. Reg. 37,171 (1986).

> Shortly after the approval of the Compact by Congress and the President, the Supreme Court of Palau determined that the revised language of the Compact did not serve to eliminate the 75% majority requirement and held that the Compact had not been approved at the third referendum. See Gibbons v. Salii, No. 8–86, at 2 (Sup. Ct. Palau, App. Div. Sept. 17, 1986). . . .

Morgan Guar. Trust Co. v. Republic of Palau, 924 F.2d 1237, 1240 (2d Cir. 1991).

The Palau constitution was amended in 1987 to reduce the required Compact referendum majority from 75% to a simple majority. That amendment was struck down by the Palau Supreme Court in 1988, finding that the proposed amendment had not been approved as required by Article XIV(1) of the constitution before being submitted to the voters. Fritz v. Salii, 1 ROP Intrm. 521 (1988). Although the Compact had by then been approved in four plebiscites, by votes of 72, 67, 62 and 73 percent, none had met the 75 percent requirement. See Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 442–51.

In November 1992 the constitution was once again amended through a public referendum to allow the Compact to be passed by a simple majority rather than 75 percent. On October 8, 1992, the Palau Supreme Court had rejected a suit seeking to prevent the referendum from going forward, finding that the proposed amendment had been approved as required by the constitution. Gibbons v. Etpison, 3 ROP Intrm. 385A (Tr. Div. 1992). On July 2, 1993, the Court denied a suit challenging the referendum after the fact, rejecting claims that the ballot was misleading or insufficiently informative. Gibbons v. Etpison, 3 ROP Intrm. 398 (Tr. Div. 1993). The two cases were consolidated and affirmed on appeal. Gibbons v. Etpison, 4 ROP Intrm. 1 (1993).

A plebiscite on the Compact was held on November 9, 1993, and, on November 19, 1993, the Palau Election Commission certified that the Compact had been approved, with 68.26% of the voters in favor.

On January 3, 1994, two new complaints were filed seeking nullification of the constitutional amendment and compact ratification. Wong v. Nakamura, Civil Action No. 1–94, and Sumang v. Republic of Palau, Civil Action No. 2–94. These suits alleged failure to satisfy constitutional and statutory requirements and coercion by the United States. The two suits were consolidated and dismissed, the Court rejecting all claims. Wong v. Nakamura, 4 ROP Intrm. 331 (Tr. Div. 1994), appeal dismissed, 4 ROP Intrm. 262 (1994).

Finally, in a letter of September 14, 1994, from Kuniwo Nakamura, President of the Republic of Palau, to Winston Lord, Assistant Secretary, Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, U.S. Department of State, President Nakamura stated that no legal challenges remained:

> The Government of Palau is pleased to notify the Government of the United States that the approval of the Compact of Free Association between Palau and the United States by the requisite percentage of votes cast in the referendum conducted pursuant to the Constitution of Palau on November 9, 1993 is free from any legal challenge in the Courts of Palau.
> Furthermore, under the statute of limitations contained in Section 114) of Republic of Palau Public Law No. 4–9, the time period during which any such challenge could be brought expired on January 2, 1994, and no such challenges are now pending in the Courts of Palau.

(3) Admission to United Nations and establishment of diplomatic relations with United States

On November 10, 1994, the Security Council adopted Resolution 956, terminating the Trusteeship Agreement applicable to Palau, S/RES/956 (1994). Set forth below is a declaration transmitted by Palau on November 10, 1994, to the Secretary-General of the United Nations stating the position of the Government of the Republic of Palau with regard to international agreements that had been applied to the Republic of Palau prior to termination of the Trusteeship Agreement. The full text is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

With regard to bilateral treaties concluded by the United States on behalf of the Republic of Palau, or applied or extended by the former to the latter prior to termination of the Trusteeship Agreement with respect to the Republic of Palau, the Government of the Republic of Palau will continue to apply within its territory, on a basis of reciprocity, terms of all such treaties until October 1, 1999, unless abrogated or modified earlier by mutual consent. At the expiration of that period, or any subsequent extension period properly notified, the Government of the Republic of Palau will regard such of these treaties which could not by the application of the rules of customary international law be regarded as otherwise surviving, as having terminated. It is the earnest hope of the Government of the Republic of Palau that during the aforementioned period of examination, the normal processes of diplomatic negotiations will enable it to reach satisfactory accord with the State parties concerned upon the possibility of the continuance or modification of such treaties.

With regard to multilateral treaties previously applied, the Government of the Republic of Palau intends to review each of them individually and to communicate to the depositary in each case what steps it wishes to take, whether by way of confirmation of termination, confirmation of succession or accession. . . .

* * * *

In an agreement signed at Washington, December 14, 1994, the Governments of the United States of America and of the Republic of Palau agreed that relations between the two Governments were to be conducted in accordance with the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, and that, in addition to diplomatic missions, the Governments might establish and maintain other offices on terms and in locations as may be mutually agreed. The agreement entered into force March 2, 1995. See also 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 761 (1995).

The agreement provided (in Article II, paragraph 1) that diplomatic agents accredited under the Vienna Convention were also authorized to carry out, in addition to functions under that Convention, all functions that resident representatives are otherwise authorized to perform under the Compact of Free Association (which was signed by the two Governments on January 10, 1986, and became effective on October 1, 1994) and its subsidiary agreements.

3. Puerto Rico

a. Proposed Puerto Rican status legislation

On several occasions during the 1990s the U.S. Congress considered legislation regarding Puerto Rico's political status. During the 102nd Congress, two bills were introduced, H.R. 316 and S. 244, that would have provided for a referendum in Puerto Rico to allow residents to express their preference of political status from among the options of statehood, independence, and continued commonwealth status. The bills also provided for appropriate U.S. legislation to implement the choice.

On February 7, 1991, Attorney General Dick Thornburgh testified on S. 244 before the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, stating:

> President [George H.W. Bush] and his Administration strongly favor the right of the people of Puerto Rico to choose their political status by means of a referendum. . . . In [the President's] view, it is inconsistent for us to 'applaud the exciting and momentous movements toward freedom in Eastern Europe, Latin America and elsewhere while refusing to grant to our own citizens the right to self-determination.' . . . We believe that the approach of S. 244, with certain necessary modifications [of a purely legal or constitutional character] can be an appropriate vehicle to achieve this goal.

Statement of Dick Thornburgh, Attorney General, before the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, February 7, 1991, available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. Bills relating to Puerto Rico's political status were also introduced in the 103rd Congress (H.Con.Res. 94, H.R. 4442, and H.R. 5005), the 104th Congress (H.R. 3024), and 105th Congress (H.R. 856). Although no legislation was enacted, Puerto Rico held status plebiscites in both 1993 and 1998. In the 1993 plebiscite the status gaining the most votes (48.6%) was retention of commonwealth status. In 1998 a majority of voters rejected all four options offered—'territorial' commonwealth, free association, statehood, and independence, choosing instead "none of the above." See The Results of the 1998 Puerto Rico Plebiscite, Report to Members, House Committee on Resources, 106th Cong. (1999).

Excerpts from Mr. Thornburgh's 1991 testimony below provided an analysis of several legal aspects relevant to the different status possibilities for Puerto Rico. See also Letter from Harry H. Flickinger, Assistant Attorney General for Administration, to Linda G. Morra, Director, Human Services Policy and Management Issues, GAO, reprinted as Appendix VIII in H.R. Rep. 104–713, Part 1 at 66–87 (1996), excerpted in B.1. supra.

* * * *

At present, Puerto Rico is a commonwealth under the sovereignty of the United States. It has been given the right to organize a government pursuant to a constitution of its own adoption. . . .

The residents of Puerto Rico have enjoyed United States citizenship since 1917, and Puerto Rico's sons and daughters have contributed to American society in every walk of life. . . .

Puerto Ricans . . . govern themselves through a freely elected commonwealth government, and actively participate in United States presidential primaries and national party conventions. Not since 1967, however, have the people of Puerto Rico had the opportunity to vote on the form of their continuing relationship with the United States. . . .

* * * *

I would . . . like to highlight some aspects of the substantive proposals for statehood and commonwealth that we find troubling. . . .

Should the statehood option be chosen, we believe it is unnecessary and indeed inappropriate to delay the onset of statehood for five years following the adoption of implementing legislation. To do so would not achieve what we presume is the desired result, that is, to avoid constitutional concerns under the tax uniformity provision of the Constitution, U.S. Const. Art. I, § 8, cl. 1, which requires that "all Duties, Imposts and Excises . . . be uniform throughout the United States." The five-year delay apparently would be aimed at permitting, before statehood, a transition from Puerto Rico's current, favored, tax status as an unincorporated territory to strict tax uniformity. This approach overlooks two crucial points.

First, it appears to assume that the Uniformity Clause would apply to Puerto Rico only after it actually became a state. This assumption, however, is incorrect. At present, Puerto Rico is exempt from the requirements of the Uniformity Clause only because it is an "unincorporated" territory; that is, a territory that has not been incorporated into "the United States" because it has not previously been anticipated that Puerto Rico would become a state. Under the Supreme Court's precedents, however, Puerto Rico would become an incorporated territory once it becomes destined for statehood. Puerto Rico therefore would become subject to the requirements of the Uniformity Clause as soon as Congress passes implementing legislation to make Puerto Rico a state. Therefore, for purposes of applying the Uniformity Clause, it makes no difference whatsoever whether statehood becomes effective immediately or is delayed for five years.

This does not mean, however, that Puerto Rico's tax status must be changed immediately once the decision is made to bring Puerto Rico into the union as a state. . . . Whether Puerto Rico becomes a state or an incorporated territory, the Uniformity Clause permits tax transition provisions, provided they are narrowly tailored to prevent specific and identified problems of economic dislocation that Congress concludes would otherwise result from the transition from a non-incorporated territorial status to either an incorporated territorial or state status. . . .

. . . [W]hatever political status option is chosen by the people of Puerto Rico should not be delayed by unfounded constitutional concerns.

We also have concerns with some of the provisions that define the commonwealth option. For example, section 402(a) would declare that Puerto Rico "enjoys sovereignty, like a state, to the extent provided by the Tenth Amendment," and that "[t]his relationship is permanent unless revoked by mutual consent." These declarations are totally inconsistent with the Constitution.

Under the Territory Clause of the Constitution, U.S. Const. Art. IV, § 3, cl. 2, an area within the sovereignty of the United States that is not included in a state must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. Congress cannot escape this Constitutional command by extending to Puerto Rico the provisions of the Tenth Amendment, which by its terms applies only to the relationship between the federal government and states. We also doubt that Congress may effectively limit, by a statutory mutual consent requirement, its constitutional power under the Territory Clause to alter Puerto Rico's commonwealth status in some respect in the future. Not even so-called "enhanced commonwealth" can ever hope to be outside this constitutional provision.

. . . With these concerns addressed, we would hope that this legislation can be moved toward quick passage, so that the people of Puerto Rico may make the historic decision about their political destiny that S. 244 would permit.

b. Presidential memorandum

On November 30, 1992, President George H.W. Bush issued a document entitled "Memorandum on the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico for the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies." 28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2324 (Dec. 7, 1992). The memorandum addressed the administrative treatment of Puerto Rico by the United States, as excerpted below.

Puerto Rico is a self-governing territory of the United States whose residents have been United States citizens since 1917 and have fought valorously in five wars in the defense of our Nation and the liberty of others.

On July 25, 1952, as a consequence of steps taken by both the United States Government and the people of Puerto Rico voting in a referendum, a new constitution was promulgated establishing the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. The Commonwealth structure provides for self-government in respect of internal affairs and administration, subject to relevant portions of the Constitution and the laws of the United States. As long as Puerto Rico is a territory, however, the will of its people regarding their political status should be ascertained periodically by means of a general right of referendum or specific referenda sponsored either by the United States Government or the Legislature of Puerto Rico.

Because Puerto Rico's degree of constitutional self-government, population, and size set it apart from other areas also subject to Federal jurisdiction under Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution, I hereby direct all Federal departments, agencies, and officials, to the extent consistent with the Constitution and the laws of the United States, henceforward to treat Puerto Rico administratively as if it were a State, except insofar as doing so with respect to an existing Federal program or activity would increase or decrease Federal receipts or expenditures, or would seriously disrupt the operation of such program or activity. With respect to a Federal program or activity for which no fiscal baseline has been established, this memorandum shall not be construed to require that such program or activity be conducted in a way that increases or decreases Federal receipts or expenditures relative to the level that would obtain if Puerto Rico were treated other than as a State.

* * * *

This guidance shall remain in effect until Federal legislation is enacted altering the current status of Puerto Rico in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the people of Puerto Rico. The memorandum for the heads of executive departments and agencies on this subject, issued July 25, 1961, is hereby rescinded.

c. Role of the United States in foreign affairs

From time to time issues arise related to Puerto Rico's commonwealth status and the conduct of foreign affairs. Excerpts below from an August 1995 letter from Anne W. Patterson, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, explained, among other things, the Department of State's conclusions that it could not agree to the Governor of Puerto Rico attending a meeting of the Association of Caribbean States ("ACS") but had no objection to his attending a meeting of the Caribbean Tourism Organization ("CTO").

The reasons for the Department's divergent positions with respect to the Governor's attendance at the ACS and CTO meetings deserve explanation, as they may not be obvious. Under the U.S. Constitution, our federal government, acting primarily through the Department of State, is responsible for conducting the foreign affairs of the United States. Notwithstanding Puerto Rico's commonwealth relationship with the United States, it has no legal authority to engage in foreign relations activities, absent the express permission of U.S. federal authorities.

Within this framework, the Department has tried to regulate the scope and propriety of Puerto Rico's foreign activities on a case-by-case basis. Puerto Rican participation in some international activities, such as those of a technical, cultural or sports nature, have frequently received our approval. Other activities, however, can be more problematic and therefore require closer scrutiny because they could have material impact on important U.S. foreign policy issues or constitutional prerogatives.

The Association of Caribbean States (ACS) is an example of an issue that can be problematic. We have stated previously, as in the Department's letter of March 15, 1994 to the Secretary of State of Puerto Rico, that Puerto Rico's participation in the ACS would not be appropriate given the stated goals of the ACS Charter and given Cuba's participation in that organization, to cite just two considerations. . . . For these reasons, the Department considers it unacceptable that Puerto Rico's Governor participate in the ACS meeting.

By contrast, the Department has no objection to Puerto Rico's participation in the upcoming CTO meeting, provided that meeting is a separate, distinct event that is unrelated to the ACS meeting. We recognize that Puerto Rico is already a member of the CTO, which we consider as essentially a technical organization, whose goals are not inherently inconsistent with U.S. foreign policy interests. We therefore approve of Puerto Rico's participation in the CTO, despite Cuba's membership in that organization.

As you know, U.S. and Puerto Rican authorities have recently had very useful written and oral exchanges with a view to coordinating more effectively our joint efforts to deal with Colombian drug trafficking activities and counter-narcotics programs, as they may impact Puerto Rico. . . .

* * * *

Because cooperation with foreign governments on counter-narcotics and other major foreign policy matters is so inherently "federal" in nature, we consider it essential as a matter of general policy that Puerto Rico coordinate with the Department in advance regarding any matters that Puerto Rican officials wish to discuss in meetings with foreign officials.

4. Claims to Submerged Lands by Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands

In May 1992 Special Representatives of the President of the United States and the Governor of the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands ("CNMI") held consultations in Santa Fe pursuant to § 902 of the Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in Political Union with the United States ("Covenant"), 48 U.S.C. § 1801. During those consultations, the United States stated that it would support federal legislation granting to the CNMI the submerged lands surrounding each of the Mariana Islands out to three nautical miles in the same manner as those lands were conveyed by the U.S. Congress to Guam, American Samoa and the U.S. Virgin Islands in 1974. At the conclusion of the round of consultations, on May 22, 1992, the CNMI Special Representative indicated that it opposed the U.S. position, stating that the United States had promised during the Covenant negotiations to confirm the Commonwealth's title to submerged lands through administrative action.

In September 1992 the State Department Office of the Legal Adviser concluded a review of the question of the CNMI's rights to submerged lands offshore each of its islands. The Office of the Legal Adviser found that the only potentially relevant statement in the negotiating record of the Covenant had been made in informal talks in May 1973, when a U.S. representative indicated that vesting the submerged lands surrounding the Mariana Islands in the Marianas government under the Covenant was to occur in the same manner as in the case of the states of the United States and other territories, i.e., by act of Congress. The resulting Covenant and accompanying documents were silent on the issue. The review also examined contemporary understandings of references to submerged lands in the CNMI Constitution as well as claims by CNMI to submerged lands deriving from Japanese law and identified two Marianas laws asserting maritime claims as if CNMI were an independent nation. For later developments on this issue, see Digest 2002 at 246–59.

The full text of the U.S. analysis of these issues, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. See also letter from Harry H. Flickinger, Assistant Attorney General for Administration, to Linda G. Morra, Director, Human Services Policy and Management Issues, GAO, reprinted as Appendix VIII in H.R. Rep. 104–713, Part 1 at 66–87 (1996), excerpted in 1, supra.

I. Covenant Negotiations

* * * *

CNMI Constitution

The conclusion that the Covenant negotiators were not considering Marianas claims to submerged lands is confirmed by the CNMI Constitution and the Commission on Federal Laws.

* * * *

A careful reading of Article XI makes clear that the CNMI Constitution recognizes four distinct categories of public lands. . . .

The Constitutional provision refers to those submerged lands "to which the Commonwealth now or hereafter may have a claim under United States law". Several points should be made about this clause. First, it refers only to those submerged lands to which the Commonwealth "may have a claim" as opposed to those lands to which it previously had, or later gained, title, a situation common to the other three categories of land mentioned in this article. Thus the CNMI Constitution asserts no preexisting title to submerged lands except that to which title is vested in the CNMI by the actions of the United States. Second, the clause refers only to those submerged lands to which a CNMI claim of ownership arises under "United States law," and not under some other law or source. This limitation is repeated in the Constitution's Article XIV reference to the CNMI's marine resources arising "under United States law".

This textual analysis is supported by the Analysis of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands prepared by the CNMI Constitutional Convention and approved on December 6, 1976. . . . The Analysis was approved by the Convention "with the direction that it be available to the people along with the Constitution for their consideration before the referendum on the Constitution."

. . . The Analysis . . . suggests that no submerged lands were included in the lands covered by the preceding three categories, notwithstanding the cross-reference to Title 67 of the Trust Territory Code. The Analysis discusses submerged lands (on page 144) as follows:

> Section 1 includes all submerged lands to which the Commonwealth now or at any time in the future may have any right, title or interest. The United States is the owner of submerged lands off the coasts of the states under territorial waters. The states have no rights in these lands beyond that transferred by the United States. The federal power over these lands is based on the provisions of the United States Constitution with respect to defense and foreign affairs. Under article 1, section 104, of the Covenant, the United States has defense and foreign affair powers with respect to the Commonwealth and thus has a claim to the submerged lands off the coast of the Commonwealth as well. Section 1 recognizes this claim and also recognizes that the Commonwealth is entitled to the same interest in the submerged lands off its coasts as the United States grants to the states with respect to the submerged lands off their coasts. Under this section, any interest in the submerged lands granted to the states or to the Commonwealth in the future also will become part of the public lands of the Commonwealth.

It appears that the drafters of the CNMI Constitution believed then, contrary to the present position of the CNMI Special Representatives, that the submerged lands would belong to the United States and not to the CNMI until the U.S. Congress enacted legislation giving the CNMI an interest in them.

The Constitution was approved by the people of the Northern Marianas Islands in a 1977 referendum.

Northern Mariana Islands Commission on Federal Laws

The foregoing conclusions are bolstered by the recommendations of the Northern Mariana Islands Commission on Federal Laws, appointed by the President in 1980 pursuant to Section 504 of the Covenant, to survey the laws of the United States and to make recommendations to the U.S. Congress as to what laws should be made applicable to the Northern Marianas. . . .

The issue of submerged lands was addressed in the Commission's Second Interim Report to Congress, August 1985, pages 172–188. The Commission recommended that:

> Legislation should be enacted to convey to the Northern Mariana Islands any property rights of the United States in lands permanently or periodically covered by tidal waters within three geographical miles of the coastlines of the Northern Mariana Islands.

(A nautical mile is also called a geographic mile, or 1,820 meters. A. Shalowitz, Shore and Sea Boundaries, vol. I, page 25 (1962).) The Commission noted that "The proposed legislation is similar to laws already enacted to convey federal interests in submerged lands of the States of the Union, Guam, the Virgin Islands, and American Samoa." The Commission concluded its recommendation as follows:

> The legislation would be without prejudice to any claims the Northern Mariana Islands may have to submerged lands seaward of those conveyed by the legislation. The legislation would become effective on termination of the trusteeship, when sovereignty over the Northern Mariana Islands becomes vested in the United States.

Id. at 172. The recommendation is then followed by an extensive discussion of the rationale for the legislation, and sets forth some arguments for and against United States and CNMI ownership of the submerged lands.

With regard to the question of Federal ownership, the discussion notes that prior to termination of the Trusteeship the United States could have no claim of ownership. (On the other hand, the Analysis made no claim that the Northern Marianas had sovereignty over the submerged lands prior to termination of the Trusteeship.) The Analysis recites the terms of Secretarial Orders 2969 and 2989 and Covenant Section 801 (see below). The Analysis then turns (p. 177) to the question of ownership following termination of the Trusteeship, as follows:

> On termination of the trusteeship, sovereignty over the Northern Mariana Islands will become vested in the United States. Covenant §§ 101, 1003(c). At that time, ownership of the submerged lands adjacent to the Northern Mariana Islands becomes uncertain. Substantial arguments favor the proposition that the Northern Mariana Islands will continue to be the owner of those submerged lands at that time. There is, however, respectable argument to the contrary, that the Federal Government and not the Northern Mariana Islands will be the owner at that time.

Before setting out those arguments, the Analysis notes that the proposed legislation "resolves the issue, as it has been resolved for all other permanently-inhabited jurisdictions under the American flag, by conveying any and all interests the United States may have to the Northern Mariana Islands on termination of the trusteeship."

In stating the case for United States ownership of the submerged lands on termination of the trusteeship, the Analysis recalls that Texas, an independent nation prior to admission to the union, relinquished her sovereignty and "by that relinquishment, her proprietary claims to the submerged lands adjacent to her shores," citing United States v. Texas, 339 U.S. 707, 717–18 (1950). . . .

The Analysis makes the case for continued ownership by the Northern Mariana Islands of adjacent submerged lands after termination of the trusteeship by reliance on Section 801 of the Covenant and on Marianas law including submerged lands in public lands. The Analysis asserts it makes "little sense" for the United States to "agree in the Covenant that the government of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands should transfer title to the Northern Mariana Islands on or before termination of the trusteeship, only to have the title revert to the United States on that date under the doctrine of United States v. Texas". Inexplicably, the Analysis makes no reference to the provisions of the Marianas Constitution quoted above.

II. The CNMI Special Representatives rely on Secretarial Orders 2969 and 2989, and Covenant Section 801, for their claim to submerged lands.

Department of the Interior Secretarial Order 2969

The 1973 U.S. policy on early return of public lands was implemented through Secretarial Order 2969, December 26, 1974, Transfer of Trust Territory Public Lands to District Control. Section 4 of that Order authorized and directed the High Commissioner, upon formal request by a district legislature, "to transfer and convey . . . to each district legal entity all right, title and interest of the Government of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands in public lands, except Ujelang Atoll, within their respective districts." The CNMI argues that Order contemplates the transfer of submerged lands because the definition of "public lands" in Section 2(c)(1) of the Order refers to "those lands defined as public lands by Section 1 and 2, Title 67, of the Trust Territory Code".

Section 1 of Title 67 of the TTPI Code defines public lands—without mentioning submerged lands—"as being those lands situated within the Trust Territory which were owned or maintained by the Japanese government as government or public lands, and such other land as the government of the Trust Territory has acquired or may hereafter acquire for public purposes."

On the other hand, section 2, entitled "rights in areas below high water mark", explicitly refers to rights in "marine areas", as follows:

> (1) That portion of the law established during the Japanese administration of the area which is now the Trust Territory, that all marine areas below the ordinary high water-mark belong to the government, is hereby confirmed as part of the law of the Trust Territory, with the following exceptions [not here relevant].

This definition clearly includes tidal lands, i.e., those lands between the high and low water lines that uncover at low tide. It could also be read to extend to submerged lands, since the breadth of the territorial sea and submerged lands in international law is traditionally measured from the low water mark on shore.

Submerged Lands under Japanese Law

The TTPI Code, including sections 1 and 2 of Title 67 of the Trust Territory Code, does not define the seaward extent of the submerged lands appertaining to the Northern Mariana Islands, except by reference to Japanese law. Japan administered the Mariana Islands between World War I and World War II. During that time Japan claimed and recognized three nautical miles as the maximum breadth of its territorial sea. Prior to 1945 no state asserted rights over the resources of the continental shelf seaward of the territorial sea. Accordingly, sections 1 and 2 of Title 67 of the Trust Territory Code cannot be read to refer to submerged lands extending seaward more than three nautical miles from the low water line along the coast of each Mariana island.

* * * *

Submerged Lands under International Law

Prior to the 1980s, international law recognized three nautical miles as the maximum breadth of the territorial sea and continental shelf claims seaward of the territorial sea to a depth of 200 meters or beyond where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources of seabed. The 200 meter isobath generally lies less than five nautical miles off shore of the Northern Mariana Islands.

* * * *

Submerged Lands, Public Lands and Tidelands under Federal Law

. . . [A]lthough the Secretary of the Interior, the High Commissioner and the Resident Commissioner may arguably have had the authority to transfer title to the submerged lands out to three nautical miles surrounding the Mariana Islands, none of them so acted prior to termination of the Trusteeship with respect to the Northern Mariana Islands, on November 3, 1986, and the Islands coming under the sovereignty of the United States as of 12:01 a.m., November 4, 1986. (Presidential Proclamation 5564, Nov. 3, 1986, 3 C.F.R. 146 (1986 Comp.).)

Federal property (including submerged lands) cannot be conveyed or disposed of except as authorized by Act of Congress. Under Article IV, section 3, clause 2, of the U.S. Constitution, only the Congress can "dispose" of the property of the United States. An officer of the United States cannot do so by administrative action, unless authorized by U.S. law. Sioux Tribe of Indians v. United States, 316 U.S. 317, 326 (1942). Hence, upon termination of the trusteeship in 1986, when the United States acquired title to submerged lands as an attribute of its sovereignty over the Northern Mariana Islands under the Covenant, United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19 (1947), and United States v. Texas, 339 U.S. 707 (1950), only an act of Congress could serve to divest the United States of title to the submerged lands. No U.S. law expressly addressing submerged lands around the Northern Marianas existed at the moment of trusteeship termination, and none has since. So whatever effect that Orders 2969 and 2989 might have had in authorizing conveyance of submerged lands before termination ceased at the moment of termination.

The CNMI may argue that Section 801 of the Covenant, being a Joint Resolution, Pub.L. 94–241, is such an act. However, Section 801 speaks of "real property" and makes no mention of submerged lands. In the context of the Covenant negotiations, "real property" refers to public lands. Under federal law, public lands do not include tide lands, i.e., land that is covered and uncovered by the ebb and flow of the tide. . . .

Consequently, as a general rule a provision dealing with the conveyance of public lands does not include permanently submerged lands. Montana v. United States, 450 U.S. 544, 550–57 (1981). Congress has not enacted a definition of "real property" or "public lands" of general applicability; rather the terms are differently defined in several statutes, none of which include submerged lands. Of particular significance is the fact that neither term is used in the 1953 Submerged Lands Act, 43 U.S. §§ 1301–1315, which vested "title and ownership of the lands beneath the navigable waters within the boundaries of the several States". 43 U.S. § 1311(a).

III. Congressional Action

The United States Congress has not yet acted to convey any submerged lands to the CNMI, as it has done for other U.S. territories: Guam, American Samoa and the U.S. Virgin Islands in 1974 (by 48 U.S.C. § 1705), and Puerto Rico in 1917 and 1980 (control and administration only, by 48 U.S.C. § 749).

IV. CNMI Marine Sovereignty Act of 1980 and Submerged Lands Act

From the foregoing it is apparent that in 1985 the Commission on Federal Laws had to deal with conflicting views of the ownership and seaward extent of the submerged lands. This situation arose in part because of two public laws enacted by the Marianas Legislature in 1979 and 1980 (one of which was reenacted in 1988).

The Marianas Marine Sovereignty Act of 1980, Public Law 2–7, 2 CMC § 1101 et seq., asserted a number of maritime claims as if the CNMI were an independent nation entitled to archipelagic status, with a 12 mile territorial sea surrounding archipelagic waters enclosed by archipelagic straight baselines, a 24 mile contiguous zone, and a 200 mile exclusive economic zone. This act also recognized certain rights of other nations in its "sovereign waters" such as innocent passage, archipelagic sea lanes passage, existing submarine cables and navigational freedoms in its exclusive economic zone.

The Marianas Submerged Lands Act, Public Law 6–13, 2 CMC § 1201 et seq., effective January 3, 1988, replaced in its entirety the Submerged Lands Act, Marianas Public Law 1–23, as amended by Marianas Public Law 2–7. Both laws claimed the "submerged lands" 200 miles seaward, as follows:

> all lands below the ordinary high water mark extending seaward to the outer limit of the exclusive economic zone established pursuant to the Marine Sovereignty Act of 1980 . . . or to any line of delimitation between such zone and a similar zone of any adjacent State.

This legislation also purports to assign to the Marianas Director of Natural Resources the responsibility for the management, use and disposition of the submerged lands of the Commonwealth, including exploration licenses, development leases and permits for the extraction of petroleum or mineral deposits, as well as granting him significant enforcement powers of arrest and detention of foreign flag vessels, as well as other civil and criminal penalties.

This legislation is plainly void as being in direct conflict with the Marianas Constitution, the Covenant and the Constitution of the United States. Under Section 102 of the Covenant, the Covenant, together with the applicable provisions of the U.S. Constitution, treaties and laws of the United States, are the supreme law of the Northern Mariana Islands. As noted in the Section by Section Analysis of the Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, prepared by the Marianas Political Status Commission, and issued February 15, 1975:

> In this respect Section 102 is similar to Article VI, Clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States, which makes the Constitution, treaties and laws of the United States the supreme law in every state of the United States. This means that federal law will control in the case of a conflict between local law (even a state's constitution) and a valid federal law.

Conclusions

The United States Government owns the submerged lands out to 200 nautical miles surrounding the Northern Mariana Islands unless and until Congress says otherwise. The Covenant and its negotiating history, as well as the CNMI Constitution and related documents, support this conclusion. CNMI actions to the contrary are void.

5. Navassa, a Guano Island

On November 20, 1998, the United States filed a Memorandum in Support of Motion to Dismiss or, in the Alternative, for Summary Judgment in Warren v. United States, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Civil Action No. 97–2415 (PLF). In that case, the plaintiff asserted ownership of, and the right to mine guano on, Navassa Island. Among other things, Warren contested the U.S. claim of sovereignty over Navassa Island and sought fee simple title to the island. The U.S. District Court of the District of Columbia granted the U.S. Government's motion for summary decision on the ground that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the claims following a hearing held on February 16, 2000. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit affirmed the district court on appeal, holding, among other things, that "[t]he [Guano Islands] Act conveyed only a license that was revocable at will by the United States, and that revocation occurred when the President reserved Navassa Island for navigational purposes in 1916 pursuant to [a] 1913 congressional appropriation." Warren v. United States, 234 F.3d 1331 (D.C. Cir. 2000).

Excerpts below from the court's opinion address the legal framework applicable to the status of guano islands under U.S. law and of Navassa specifically.

Navassa Island is an island of less than three square miles, located in the Caribbean Sea between Haiti and Jamaica, approximately 100 miles south of Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. See OFFICE OF THE GENERAL COUNSEL, U.S. GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE, PUB. NO. GAO/OGC-98-5, REPORT TO HOUSE COMM. ON RESOURCES, U.S. INSULAR AREAS: APPLICATION OF U.S. CONSTITUTION 47 (1997); Jones v. United States, 137 U.S. 202, 205, 34 L. Ed. 691, 11 S. Ct. 80 (1890). Peter Duncan discovered the Island, and claimed it for the United States on November 18, 1857, pursuant to the Guano Islands Act of August 18, 1856, 48 U.S.C. §§ 1411–1419 (1994). See Jones, 137 U.S. at 204–06, 217.

The Guano Islands Act provides for islands, rocks, or keys, not within the jurisdiction of any other government, to "be considered as appertaining to the United States," if a United States citizen discovers upon them a deposit of guano and provides notice of discovery to the Department of State. 48 U.S.C. §§ 1411, 1412. Upon giving the appropriate notice, "the discoverer, or his assigns . . . may be allowed, at the pleasure of Congress, the exclusive right of occupying such island, rocks, or keys, for the purpose of obtaining guano, and of selling and delivering the same to citizens of the United States." 48 U.S.C. § 1414.

On December 8, 1859, then-Secretary of State, Lewis Cass, issued a proclamation granting Edward Cooper, the assignee of Peter Duncan, "all the privileges and advantages intended by [the] act." Jones, 137 U.S. at 206. . . .

* * * *

* * * *

. . . The Coast Guard maintained lighthouse facilities on Navassa Island until September 1996, at which time the Coast Guard removed its equipment and facilities from the property. See Hearing Tr. at 31.

On July 16, 1996, Warren requested permission from the Coast Guard to land on Navassa Island to shoot a documentary. . . . He stated [in his request that] "although Navassa is U.S. owned, we understand that even U.S. Citizens such as ourselves are required to get your permission to land there." Id. On September 11, 1996, the United States granted Warren's request to visit the Island, subject to his submission of a waiver of liability and acceptance of responsibility form prior to landing. . . . The following day, Warren submitted a letter providing "notice of his discovery, occupation and possession of Navassa Island." . . . The letter claimed that the Coast Guard had abandoned the Island, and requested that the Department of State enter and certify Warren's claim of discovery under the Guano Islands Act. . . .

On January 7, 1997, the Department of State sent an interim response to Warren, indicating that Navassa Island was already under United States' jurisdiction and that the matter had been taken under advisement. . . . On January 16, 1997, the Secretary of the Interior issued Order No. 3205, placing the civil administration of Navassa Island under the Director of the Office of Insular Affairs. See Secretary's Order No. 3205, Department of the Interior (Jan. 16, 1997). . . . Secretary's Order No. 3205, Amendment No. 1, Department of the Interior (Jan. 14, 1998). . . . Order No. 3205 was superseded by a Memorandum of Understanding entered between the Office of Insular Affairs and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service on April 22, 1999, pursuant to which the Fish and Wildlife Service currently manages Navassa Island as a National Wildlife Refuge. See Memorandum of Understanding between the Director, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the Director, Office of Insular Affairs (Apr. 22, 1999), reprinted in J.A. 388–90.

II. ANALYSIS

The Quiet Title Act ("QTA") is the "exclusive means by which adverse claimants [may] challenge the United States' title to real property." . . .

In this case, there is undisputed evidence in the record demonstrating that Warren and his predecessors in interest "knew or should have known" that the United States claimed an interest in Navassa Island more than 12 years before Warren filed his quiet title action. Actual notice of the United States' adverse claim of title to Navassa Island was given to Warren's predecessor in interest, James Woodward, as early as 1915, in a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Department of Commerce. . . . In response to a communication from Woodward to President Wilson in which Woodward offered to sell Navassa Island to the United States, Assistant Secretary Sweet informed Woodward that "as the title to the island [of Navassa] is in the United States it is considered unnecessary to take any measures looking to the purchase of land on the island in connection with the establishment of a lightstation thereon." Id.

Warren's predecessors in interest were also afforded constructive notice of the United States' claim to Navassa Island. The most significant instance of such notice arose in 1916, when President Woodrow Wilson, pursuant to a congressional authorization, issued a Proclamation declaring that all of Navassa Island was unqualifiedly reserved for a lighthouse base. The Proclamation stated that > the said Island of Navassa in the West Indies be and the same is hereby reserved for lighthouse purposes, such reservation being deemed necessary in the public interests, subject to such legislative action as the Congress of the United States may take with respect thereto.

39 Stat. 1763 (1916) (emphasis added).

* * * *

The presidential Proclamation reserving Navassa Island for lighthouse purposes, coupled with the Coast Guard's practice of restricting access, and, for some years, denying access altogether, to the Island, as well as the Government's consistent claims of sole and exclusive ownership, reasonably and clearly indicated that the United States had revoked any outstanding rights or interests to "occupy" Navassa Island for the purpose of mining guano. Warren's predecessors in interest therefore had actual and constructive notice of the United States' claims to Navassa Island and its resources more than 12 years before Warren brought his suit to quiet title to the Island in his favor.

* * * *

Even if the Court had jurisdiction to hear the quiet title action, it is abundantly clear that the Guano Islands Act did not convey any fee ownership interest in the land or minerals to a discoverer. As the Supreme Court explained in Duncan v. Navassa Phosphate

Co., 137 U.S. 647, 34 L. Ed. 825, 11 S. Ct. 242 (1891), the interest conveyed under the Act was in the nature of a "usufruct" or license to mine guano that was terminable "at the pleasure of Congress." Id. at 652–53. "The whole right conferred upon the discoverer and his assigns is a license to occupy the island for the purpose of removing the guano." Id. at 651. The Act conveyed only a license that was revocable at will by the United States, and that revocation occurred when the President reserved Navassa Island for navigational purposes in 1916 pursuant to the 1913 congressional appropriation.

Human Rights

A. GENERAL

1. Country Reports on Human Rights Practices

The Department of State prepares and submits to Congress annual Country Reports on Human Rights Practices in compliance with §§ 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 ("FAA"), Pub. L. No. 87–195, 75 Stat. 424, as amended, and section 504 of the Trade Act of 1974 ("Trade Act"), Pub. L. No. 93–618, 88 Stat. 1978 (1975), as amended. The FAA requires the Secretary of State to transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, by February 25 of each year "a full and complete report regarding (1) the status of internationally recognized human rights, within the meaning of subsection (a)—(A) in countries that receive assistance under this part, and (B) in all other foreign countries which are members of the United Nations and which are not otherwise the subject of a human rights report under this Act. . . ." The Trade Act requires "an annual report to Congress on the status of internationally recognized worker rights within each beneficiary developing country, including the finding of the Secretary of Labor with respect to the beneficiary country's implementation of its international commitments to eliminate the worst forms of child labor." These reports are often cited as the authoritative source for U.S. views on various aspects of human rights practice in other countries.

The Country Reports on Human Rights Practices cover internationally recognized individual, civil, and political and worker rights, as set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and are available for the years 1999 through 2003 at www.state.gov/g/drl/hr/c1470.htm, and for the years 1993 through 1999 at www.state.gov/www/global/human_rights/drl_reports.html.

2. World Conference on Human Rights

On June 25, 1993, representatives of 171 states adopted by consensus the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action of the World Conference on Human Rights, thus concluding the two-week World Conference on Human Rights (June 14–25 1993, Vienna, Austria) and presenting to the international community a common plan for the strengthening of human rights around the world. The approximately 7,000 participants at the Vienna Conference included government delegates, academics, representatives of treaty bodies and national institutions, and representatives of more than 800 non-governmental organizations ("NGOs"). The U.S. delegation was led by Under Secretary-designate for Global Affairs Tim Wirth and later by Assistant Secretary John Shattuck.

The Vienna Declaration reaffirmed the basic human rights principles that have evolved since World War II and recognized that "all human rights are universal, indivisible and interdependent and interrelated" and that "the lack of development may not be invoked to justify the abridgement of internationally recognized human rights." The Vienna Declaration also supported the creation of a Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women, and recommended the proclamation by the UN General Assembly of an international decade of the world's indigenous peoples.

Perhaps the most significant development in Vienna was the recommendation that the United Nations establish a High Commissioner for Human Rights. The UN General Assembly endorsed the Vienna Declaration on December 20, 1993, U.N. Doc. A/RES/48/121 (1994). On the same date, it created that position, with a mandate to promote and protect all human rights as laid forth in the Vienna Declaration. U.N. Doc. A/RES/48/141 (1994). Secretary of State Warren Christopher addressed the delegates of the World Conference on Human Rights on its opening day, as excerpted below.

The full text of Secretary Christopher's remarks are reprinted in 4 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 25 at 441–44 (June 21, 1993), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html; see also http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dossec/1993/9306/930614dossec.html.

* * * *

Democracy is the moral and strategic imperative for the 1990s. Democracy will build safeguards for human rights in every nation. Democracy is the best way to advance lasting peace and prosperity in the world.

In this post-Cold War era, we are at a new moment. Our agenda for freedom must embrace every prisoner of conscience, every victim of torture, every individual denied basic human rights. It must also encompass the democratic movements that have changed the political map of our globe.

The great new focus of our agenda for freedom is this: expanding, consolidating and defending democratic progress around the world. It is democracy that establishes the civil institutions that replace the power of oppressive regimes. Democracy is the best means not just to gain—but to guarantee—human rights.

In the battle for democracy and human rights, words matter, but what we do matters much more. What all of our citizens and governments do in the days ahead will count far more than any discussions held or documents produced here.

I cannot predict the outcome of this Conference. But I can tell you this: The worldwide movement for democracy and human rights will prevail. My delegation will support the forces of freedom—of tolerance, of respect for the rights of the individual—not only in the next few weeks in Vienna, but every day in the conduct of our foreign policy throughout the world. The United States will never join those who would undermine the Universal Declaration and the movement toward democracy and human rights.

* * * *

Today, on behalf of the United States, I officially present to the world community an ambitious action plan that represents our commitment to pursue human rights, regardless of the outcome of this Conference. This plan will build on the UN's capacity to practice preventive diplomacy, safeguard human rights, and assist fledgling democracies. We seek to strengthen the UN Human Rights Center and its advisory and rapporteurial functions. We support the establishment of a UN High Commissioner for Human Rights.

* * * *

The United States will also act to integrate our concerns over the inhumane treatment of women into the global human rights agenda. We will press for the appointment of a UN Special Rapporteur on Violence Against Women. We will also urge the UN to sharpen the focus and strengthen the coordination of its women's rights activities.

* * * *

My country will pursue human rights in our bilateral relations with all governments—large and small, developed and developing. America's commitment to human rights is global, just as the UN Declaration is universal.

As we advance these goals, American foreign policy will both reflect our fundamental values and promote our national interests. It must take into account our national security and economic needs at the same time that we pursue democracy and human rights. We will maintain our ties with our allies and friends. We will act to deter aggressors. And we will cooperate with like-minded nations to ensure the survival of freedom when it is threatened.

The United States will promote democracy and protect our security. We must do both—and we will.

3. Human Rights and Foreign Policy

On April 19, 1994, John Shattuck, Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, testified before the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations. Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations, FY95: Hearing Before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, 103rd Cong. 635–687 (1994) (statement of John H. Shattuck, Dept. of State, Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs). Mr. Shattuck summarized the State Department's democracy and human rights agenda and noted nine areas in which the United States made the promotion of democracy and human rights a major part of its foreign policy agenda, as excerpted below.

* * * *

First, we are working with other countries to build new institutions of human rights accountability.

We have led the effort to create a war crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and we are seeking a similar institution for Iraq. We have participated in the establishment and implementation of a truth commission in El Salvador and are working with others to explore a similar institution in Guatemala. And we are funding a wide range of programs to improve the administration of justice in many countries.

Second, as you indicate, Mr. Chairman, we are linking trade and economic relations to human rights, we believe in many ways for the first time, including of course the conditioning of aid and trade on human rights improvements, and I will go over a few of the specifics in one moment.

Third, this administration's foreign policy proceeds from the recognition that economic development, political development, human rights protection, and democracy protection must be seen as a whole. We have now an interagency working group on democracy and human rights policy, which I will chair, and will bring greater focus and coordination to our work in this entire integrated area, as will the reorganization and expansion of my bureau as the new bureau of democracy, human rights and labor.

Fourth, we are working to build or strengthen multilateral institutions like the Commission for Security Cooperation in Europe, the Organization of American States, as well as the U.N., to address racial, ethnic, and religious conflict, institutions that can work to defuse conflicts before they lead to gross human rights violations.

Fifth, we are integrating for the first time women's rights into all aspects of our human rights policy. We have in recent months cast a spotlight on trafficking in child prostitution in Thailand. We have seen, too, that systematic rape as a tool of so-called ethnic cleansing can be defined as genocide under the genocide convention. We have endorsed ratification of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women. We've helped lead the effort to establish a U.N. special rapporteur on violence against women, and woven women's issues throughout our annual country reports.

Sixth, we are working to meet U.S. international human rights obligations by pressing for the immediate ratification of two important human rights treaties, the convention on racial discrimination and the Women's Convention. We have also expedited a review of the Rights of the Child Convention and the American Convention on Human Rights. And we are playing a lead role—and I might note you, Mr. Chairman, are playing the leading roll—in efforts to develop an international moratorium on the export of land mines, in keeping with a recent U.N. General Assembly resolution, and to establish permanent international control mechanisms to address this devastating global problem.

Seventh, we are working to strengthen the United Nations human rights machinery. We led the effort in the General Assembly to create a U.N. high commissioner on human rights and the war crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. We are seeking greater resources for U.N. human rights center activities, including advisory services, the special rapporteur system and the fund for victims of torture. And we are working with other countries to streamline and improve the functioning of the U.N. Human Rights Convention.

Eighth, we are supporting those brave men and women around the world who are the shock troops and leaders of the global movement for human rights and democracy, and are operating in nongovernmental organizations in many very difficult circumstances.

Finally, we are tightening the focus and coordination of our programs to promote democracy and human rights abroad. The interagency working group will serve as an important venue for the exchange of information on program plans to apply U.S. government resources for the greatest impact and efficiency and to avoid overlap.

* * * *

In the field of criminal justice, which is the focus of so many human rights problems, we are working in four areas: investigative techniques, prosecution and defense, judicial performance, and prison improvements and reform. What is needed and achievable will vary, of course, from country to country. In this work the State Department takes the lead, and we cooperate closely with AID, the Department of Justice, our embassies, NGOs, and the cooperating governments themselves in developing programs that will meet a country's needs and be effective.

Let me give you a few very brief examples of the kinds of programs that we're talking about: Rule of law programs in Egypt, conducted through a $2.8 million grant to provide training and technical assistance to the Egyptian judiciary as well as a judicial training system run by USIA; support in Russia for the reintroduction of jury trials through a program of training exchanges with the Russian Legal Academy; and the development in Central Asia of a rule of law project for the region designed to help those societies reform their Soviet-style legal codes and programs.

4. Human Rights and the Lessons of the Holocaust

Ambassador Madeleine K. Albright, U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations, addressed the Symposium on Human Rights and the Lessons of the Holocaust at the University of Connecticut's Thomas J. Dodd Research Center on October 17, 1995. Ambassador Albright discussed the U.S. approach to human rights and international law, including UN peacekeeping and democracy promotion efforts, U.S. support of UN human rights bodies, the establishment of the international criminal tribunals for Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia, and U.S. policy on women's and children's rights as articulated by First Lady Hillary Clinton at the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing (see C.2.c. below).

. . . [A] discussion of international law and human rights is timely. We observe this year the fiftieth anniversary of the end of World War II, the founding of the United Nations and the beginning of the Nuremberg trials. Like the leaders of a half century ago, we have been witnesses to seismic political change. Like them, we have inherited an unsettled world, beset by squabbles, unsatisfied ambitions and new dangers. Like them, we have a responsibility to build the institutions and strategies that will ensure security and defend freedom in a new and transformed era.

Because we live in a country that is democratic, trade-oriented, respectful of the law and possessed of a powerful military whose personnel are precious to us, we will do better and feel safer in an environment where our values are widely shared, markets are open, military clashes are constrained and those who run roughshod over the rights of others are brought to heel.

The United Nations is one means we use to create and sustain such an environment. And one of our top priorities at the UN is to build mechanisms that will contribute on a long-term basis to human rights and peace.

Accordingly, we were the prime movers behind the successful effort to establish a UN High Commissioner for Human Rights.

We have worked to increase the budget and effectiveness of the UN Human Rights Center. We have decided to seek Senate consent to the ratification of two important human rights agreements—the Convention Prohibiting All Forms of Discrimination Against Women and the Convention on the Rights of the Child. We are principal supporters of the UN Voluntary Fund to aid the victims of torture. And we have worked hard to maintain the integrity and increase the application of one of the noble documents in human history—the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Eleanor Roosevelt, a great First Lady of the United States, had a prominent role in drafting that Declaration. Americans have grounds for pride that, last month in Beijing, our current First Lady eloquently reaffirmed our nation's commitment to it.

. . . Hillary Clinton has been an advocate for women's rights and children's rights all her adult life. No one should have been surprised by the message she delivered in Beijing.

That message was simple, but powerful:

Violence against women must stop;

Girls should be valued equally with boys;

Women should have equal access to education, health care and the levers of economic and political power;

Family responsibilities should be shared; and Freedom of expression is a prerequisite to human rights, which include women's rights.

Although much was made of the venue, the fact is that both the First Lady's speech and the one I made the next day would have conveyed this same message if the Conference had been held in Malawi, Uzbekistan or Staten Island. Ours was a universal message, directed not at China, in particular, but at all countries.

The UN's Women's Conference produced a strong consensus document that reflects our support for enabling women to participate as equals in the political and economic life of every society. That consensus will serve as a standard towards which each government should now strive, spurred on by the network of nongovernmental organizations that was so effective and so central to the discussions in Beijing.

On a related matter, we have worked steadily with the UN and with other countries to make UN peace operations more effective and successful. The end of the Cold War made UN peacekeeping both more possible and more necessary. As a result, the number and complexity of operations expanded dramatically. Although there were successes, serious problems arose in coordinating the military and humanitarian responses to complex emergencies; resources were not always allocated efficiently; and mandates were not always realistic.

There are some now, on Capitol Hill and elsewhere, who would respond to these shortcomings by killing UN peacekeeping altogether. If this destructive view should prevail, and peacekeepers are withdrawn, we could expect wider war in the Balkans, higher tensions in tinderbox regions such as Cyprus and the Middle East, a renewed threat to democracy in Haiti and a further series of humanitarian disasters in Africa.

These consequences are not acceptable. UN peacekeeping should not be killed; it should be strengthened. We are working with others to increase training, improve management, reform procurement, provide better coordination and see that the lessons of past successes and failures are learned. We believe a special effort is needed to sharpen the UN's capacity to respond rapidly to a crisis. Discipline is required in establishing the scope and mandate of new operations. And realism is essential in assessing what the UN can and cannot do.

UN peacekeeping cannot produce a perfect world, but it does contribute to an environment that is less violent, more stable and more democratic than it otherwise would be. It provides the President with an option between unilateral action and standing aside when emergencies arise. And it is an important tool for the enforcement of international standards and law.

Another such tool is economic sanctions. Since the end of the Persian Gulf War, strict economic and weapons sanctions have been in place against Iraq. Their purpose is to prevent that country from once again developing weapons of mass destruction or threatening its neighbors with aggression.

The American position is that Iraq must comply, in full, with all relevant UN Security Council resolutions before the Council should consider easing or lifting the sanctions regime. We do not wish to inflict pain on the population of Iraq. But so far, Saddam Hussein has turned down proposals that would allow him to sell oil to buy humanitarian supplies. His regime also continues to waste huge sums building palaces and lavish infrastructure projects that benefit a very few. Meanwhile, Iraq's compliance with the Security Council resolutions remains sporadic, selective, and incomplete.

The United States believes that the burden of proof should be on Iraq to demonstrate its peaceful intentions and that only a policy of firmness has a realistic chance of altering Iraqi behavior for the better. Saddam Hussein's complaints about the unfairness of all this reminds me of the story about the schoolboy who came home with his face damaged and his clothes torn. When his mother asked him how the fight started, he said: "It started when the other guy hit me back."

Libya also is the subject of sanctions, because of its refusal to hand over for trial the individuals indicted for the bombing of PAN AM 103 in 1988. Since that time, Libya has proposed a variety of schemes for a trial; unfortunately, none of these ideas meet the standard set by the Security Council, which is a trial either in the United Kingdom or the United States. We have pushed hard to maintain sanctions to keep the heat on the Qadhafi regime, and we would prefer stronger ones, including an oil embargo, if the Libyans remain intransigent.

Haiti, like Iraq before Operation Desert Storm, illustrates both the importance of sanctions as a sign of international resolve, and their insufficiency, at times; in obtaining the results we want. For three years, the Council and the Organization of American States pursued a peaceful and just end to the Haitian crisis. The international community tried condemnation, persuasion, isolation and negotiation. At Governors Island, the military's leader signed an agreement that would have allowed the restoration of the democratically-elected government, but then refused to implement it. Sanctions were imposed, suspended, re-imposed and finally strengthened. The illegitimate leaders were given every opportunity to leave.

The decision to seek Council support for the restoration of democratic rule to Haiti by force if necessary reflected the extraordinary set of circumstances that existed: including the blatant illegitimacy of the de facto leaders; the brutal repression; the violation of a UN-brokered agreement; the risk of renewed attempts at flight by desperate people aboard unseaworthy vessels; the expulsion of human rights monitors; the insufficiency of sanctions; and the existence of strong support regionally and overseas for decisive action.

* * * *

In addition to peacekeeping and sanctions, a third tool used by the UN to enforce international law flows directly from the precedent of Nuremberg—the ad hoc tribunal for war crimes and other violations of international humanitarian law. There are two such tribunals—for Rwanda and former Yugoslavia. The United States has done much to establish, organize, finance and assist these tribunals, and I am pleased that we have had strong backing from many in Congress including Senator Chris Dodd and Representative Sam Gejdenson.

* * * *

There are those who ridicule the effort to prosecute those responsible for such crimes; those who say that assembling the physical evidence, apprehending suspects and obtaining credible testimony will be too difficult, too time-consuming, too expensive. But the Administration does not believe the difficulty of the tribunals' work should bar the attempt. Just because we cannot guarantee everything does not mean we should do nothing.

More than 20 indictments already have been handed down by the Yugoslav tribunal and 200 alleged perpetrators of the Rwanda genocide are under investigation. Governments will be obliged to hand over for trial those indicted who are within their jurisdiction. The tribunals are empowered to request the Security Council to take enforcement action against any government that fails to do so. The indicted, themselves, will face the choice of standing trial or becoming international pariahs, trapped within the borders of their own lands, subject to immediate arrest should they leave.

The United States agrees with the tribunals' prosecutor, Judge Goldstone, that suspects should be pursued regardless of rank, position, or stature. There is not, and there should never be, a statute of limitations on the force and effect of the tribunals' indictments.

Further, we do not accept the view that the killings in Rwanda and the Balkans can simply be shrugged off as the inevitable side-effects of ethnic conflict. How could we? We remember that Adolf Hitler once defended his plan to kill Jews by asking the rhetorical question: "Who, after all, remembers the Armenians?" And we recall the words written in 1940 by the poet and essayist Archibald MacLeish:

> Murder is not absolved of immorality by committing murder. Murder is absolved of immorality by bringing men to think that murder is not evil. This only the perversion of the mind can bring about. And the perversion of the mind is only possible when those who should be heard in its defense are silent. . . .

Establishing the truth about what happened in Rwanda and the Balkans is essential not only to justice, but to peace. Responsibility for the atrocities committed does not rest with the Serbs or Hutus or any other people as a group; it rests with the individuals who ordered and committed the crimes. And true reconciliation will not be possible in these societies until the perception of collective guilt is expunged and personasibility is assigned.

I should point out, in addition, that those who suggested that indictment of Bosnian Serb leaders would make it impossible to negotiate peace have been proven wrong. Instead, the indictments have contributed to divisions within that leadership, thereby weakening the hardest liners and making progress towards peace easier to achieve.

Delivering international justice is a job governments alone cannot always do. Institutions like the Dodd Research Center can play a vital role by helping to inform and shape public opinion, and by drawing historical connections between the tasks we face and those confronted by our predecessors.

The legal profession is also tested. The American Bar Association's Coalition for International Justice is one example of how lawyers have mobilized to support the war crimes tribunals. Some of those most involved are children of participants in the Nuremberg and Tokyo prosecutions. The new generation has not dropped the baton.

* * * *

Today, we are called upon to develop a new framework for protecting our territory, our people and our interests. In devising that framework, we will build on the firm foundation provided by the UN Charter and other sources of international law. We will seek to extend the sway of civil society; to codify new standards; and to summon the will to enforce with greater consistency and effectiveness standards long established.

5. Prohibition on Assistance to Certain Security Forces

Beginning with fiscal year 1997, statutory language prohibited provision of certain assistance to "any unit of the security forces of a foreign country if the Secretary of State has credible evidence to believe such unit has committed gross violations of human rights, unless the Secretary determines and reports to [Congress] that the government of such country is taking steps to bring the responsible members of the security forces unit to justice." Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, FY 1997 ("FOAA"), as contained in Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act, FY 1997, Pub. L. No. 104–208, 110 Stat. 3009 (1996). As originally enacted, the language applied only to appropriations to carry out international narcotics control programs funded by the FOAA. For fiscal year 1998, nearly identical language was made applicable to all funds made available by the FOAA. FOAA, FY 1998, § 570, Pub. L. No. 105–118, 111 Stat. 2386 (1997). That provision, which has been repeated in the annual FOAA since that time, also required the Secretary of State "to promptly inform the foreign government" of the basis for any withholding pursuant to this section and "to the maximum extent practicable, assist the foreign government in taking effective measures to bring the responsible members of the security forces to justice."

6. Interagency Working Group on Human Rights Treaties

On December 10, 1998, President Clinton signed Executive Order 13107, which affirmed the United States' commitment to respect and implement its obligations under ratified human rights treaties and established an Interagency Working Group on Human Rights Treaties for the purpose of providing guidance, oversight, and coordination with respect to questions concerning the adherence to and implementation of human rights obligations and related matters. 63 Fed. Reg. 68,991 (Dec. 15, 1998). The Executive Order is excerpted below.

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, and bearing in mind the obligations of the United States pursuant to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT), the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD), and other relevant treaties concerned with the protection and promotion of human rights to which the United States is now or may become a party in the future, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Implementation of Human Rights Obligations. (a) It shall be the policy and practice of the Government of the United States, being committed to the protection and promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms, fully to respect and implement its obligations under the international human rights treaties to which it is a party, including the ICCPR, the CAT, and the CERD.

(b) It shall also be the policy and practice of the Government of the United States to promote respect for international human rights, both in our relationships with all other countries and by working with and strengthening the various international mechanisms for the promotion of human rights, including, inter alia, those of the United Nations, the International Labor Organization, and the Organization of American States.

Sec. 2. Responsibility of Executive Departments and Agencies. (a) All executive departments and agencies (as defined in 5 U.S.C. 101–105, including boards and commissions, and hereinafter referred to collectively as "agency" or "agencies") shall maintain a current awareness of United States international human rights obligations that are relevant to their functions and shall perform such functions so as to respect and implement those obligations fully. The head of each agency shall designate a single contact officer who will be responsible for overall coordination of the implementation of this order. Under this order, all such agencies shall retain their established institutional roles in the implementation, interpretation, and enforcement of Federal law and policy.

(b) The heads of agencies shall have lead responsibility, in coordination with other appropriate agencies, for questions concerning implementation of human rights obligations that fall within their respective operating and program responsibilities and authorities or, to the extent that matters do not fall within the operating and program responsibilities and authorities of any agency, that most closely relate to their general areas of concern.

Sec. 3. Human Rights Inquiries and Complaints. Each agency shall take lead responsibility, in coordination with other appropriate agencies, for responding to inquiries, requests for information, and complaints about violations of human rights obligations that fall within its areas of responsibility or, if the matter does not fall within its areas of responsibility, referring it to the appropriate agency for response.

Sec. 4. Interagency Working Group on Human Rights Treaties. (a) There is hereby established an Interagency Working Group on Human Rights Treaties for the purpose of providing guidance, oversight, and coordination with respect to questions concerning the adherence to and implementation of human rights obligations and related matters.

(b) The designee of the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs shall chair the Interagency Working Group, which shall consist of appropriate policy and legal representatives at the Assistant Secretary level from the Department of State, the Department of Justice, the Department of Labor, the Department of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and other agencies as the chair deems appropriate. The principal members may designate alternates to attend meetings in their stead.

(c) The principal functions of the Interagency Working Group shall include:

(i) coordinating the interagency review of any significant issues concerning the implementation of this order and analysis and recommendations in connection with pursuing the ratification of human rights treaties, as such questions may from time to time arise;

(ii) coordinating the preparation of reports that are to be submitted by the United States in fulfillment of treaty obligations;

(iii) coordinating the responses of the United States Government to complaints against it concerning alleged human rights violations submitted to the United Nations, the Organization of American States, and other international organizations;

(iv) developing effective mechanisms to ensure that legislation proposed by the Administration is reviewed for conformity with international human rights obligations and that these obligations are taken into account in reviewing legislation under consideration by the Congress as well;

(v) developing recommended proposals and mechanisms for improving the monitoring of the actions by the various States, Commonwealths, and territories of the United States and, where appropriate, of Native Americans and Federally recognized Indian tribes, including the review of State, Commonwealth, and territorial laws for their conformity with relevant treaties, the provision of relevant information for reports and other monitoring purposes, and the promotion of effective remedial mechanisms;

(vi) developing plans for public outreach and education concerning the provisions of the ICCPR, CAT, CERD, and other relevant treaties, and human rights-related provisions of domestic law;

(vii) coordinating and directing an annual review of United States reservations, declarations, and understandings to human rights treaties, and matters as to which there have been nontrivial complaints or allegations of inconsistency with or breach of international human rights obligations, in order to determine whether there should be consideration of any modification of relevant reservations, declarations, and understandings to human rights treaties, or United States practices or laws. The results and recommendations of this review shall be reviewed by the head of each participating agency;

(viii) making such other recommendations as it shall deem appropriate to the President, through the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, concerning United States adherence to or implementation of human rights treaties and related matters; and

(ix) coordinating such other significant tasks in connection with human rights treaties or international human rights institutions, including the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and the Special Rapporteurs and complaints procedures established by the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

(d) The work of the Interagency Working Group shall not supplant the work of other interagency entities, including the President's Committee on the International Labor Organization, that address international human rights issues.

B. UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS

1. Fiftieth Anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights

1998 marked the fiftieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted and proclaimed by United Nations General Assembly Resolution 217 A (III) on December 10, 1948 "as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction." U.N. Doc. A/RES/3/217 (1948).

In an opinion editorial in the Washington Times on December 10, 1998, Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright commented on the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as excerpted below.

Today, human rights activists and government officials will gather together in New York, Washington, Paris, and elsewhere to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of one of the most significant events of this century. When the world proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on December 10, 1948, it announced that freedom and the rule of law, rather than hatred and the rule of force, would serve as our guiding principles.

* * * *

In the United States, we honor the Declaration not just by celebrating its birthday but by embracing its principles. Eleanor Roosevelt, who played a crucial role in the Declaration's drafting, once said that human rights begin "in small places close to home . . . places where every man, woman, and child seeks equal justice, equal opportunity, equal dignity without discrimination. Unless these rights have meaning there, they will have little meaning anywhere." Americans take her admonition very seriously.

Thus our tradition of human rights advocacy in foreign policy is a reflection of our own practices. We seek to promote human rights overseas because we try to uphold them at home. We speak out about abuses, no matter where they occur. But we also establish institutions—like the U.S. Civil Rights Commission and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission—to investigate and respond to potential human rights abuses inside the United States. We also cooperate with outside investigations—whether by non-governmental organizations like Amnesty International or

United Nations Special Rapporteurs—even when we disagree with their premises or their conclusions.

This two-track approach reflects both our commitment to the universality of human rights and our openness as a democratic society. We are proud of our political and judicial systems and welcome any examination. In contrast, the world's dictators deny human rights to their own citizens, persecute those who raise concerns through government channels, and refuse entry to outside investigators.

The Universal Declaration is nothing less than a blueprint for freedom. If its promise is ever to become a reality, each of us must make its principles a part of our own lives. As Eleanor Roosevelt said, "The destiny of human rights is in the hands of all our citizens in all our communities." Live the principles of the Universal Declaration and teach them to our children. Add your voice to that of a human rights organization. Get your church, temple, or mosque active in religious freedom issues. Find out what your union or company is doing to prevent child labor. Only then will our children and grandchildren live in a world where "all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights."

In remarks to the UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva, Switzerland on March 25, 1998, Ambassador Bill Richardson, U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations, addressed specific challenges to the world at the time of the fiftieth anniversary, as excerpted below.

The full text of Ambassador Richardson's address is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1998/980325_richardson_rights.html

* * * *

. . . [E]gregious abuses continue in many countries, and tremendous human rights challenges remain. To be sure, the political and economic context in which abuses occur has varied over time. However, our principles—and our obligation to insist on respect for the universal standards that inform the work of this body—remain constant.

In the former Yugoslavia where communist authorities once exerted tight controls over the civil and political affairs of their people, we now confront abuses in the context of ethnic and civil conflict. Not far from this conference hall, we have witnessed all too effective efforts to promote fear and hatred through the manipulation of ethnic politics.

Since the signing of the Dayton Peace Accords, a fragile peace has slowly begun to take hold in Bosnia, and the human rights violations of the past are giving way to a new spirit of reconciliation and the prospect of a more peaceful and stable future. The fragile progress, however, stands in contrast to the situation in Kosovo, where in recent weeks the conscience of the world has been outraged by reports of summary executions by Serbian police. There can be no justification for the shelling of villages, the burning of houses, and the murder of innocent men, women, and children, all of which we are seeing in Kosovo. We saw what can result from ethnic intolerance and violence earlier in this decade in the former Yugoslavia. The International community failed to respond effectively then. We must not repeat that mistake today.

The international community must not tolerate the brutal use of force as a means for solving domestic problems. We believe that the leaders of the former Republic of Yugoslavia must enter into a real dialogue on the future of Kosovo. Moreover, full and immediate access to Kosovo by representatives and rapporteurs of the Human Rights Commission is imperative.

Mr. Chairman, in recent years, the increasing incidence of civil conflict has elevated the importance of human rights monitors receiving access to troubled areas. Such monitors play a critical role in deterring abuses and establishing accountability. This is why the United States has strongly supported the efforts of UN monitors in central Africa and why we continue to urge the Government of the Congo to permit the UN Secretary General's Investigative Team to perform its mission.

The United States, along with the international community, has been outraged by the massacres of innocent civilians over the past year in Algeria. So-called Islamic terrorists are murdering thousands of innocent people. Women and children are not being spared from this unspeakable horror, with young women often being taken hostage and held in cruel and inhumane captivity. The United States condemns these monstrous crimes. There are many allegations inside Algeria about the killings, and the paramount need is for a credible, independent verification of the facts. The United Nations must be willing and able to help Algeria meet its human rights obligations in the face of appalling terrorist atrocities.

We welcome the access that the Algerian Government is affording to international journalists, parliamentarians, and others. Broadening and deepening such cooperation would serve an important step forward. In our view, a visit to Algeria by the UN Special Rapporteur on Summary, Extrajudicial and Arbitrary Executions and by international NGO groups would be a positive step for improving transparency in Algeria. Algeria has made progress toward building a multiparty democracy, but many Algerians have yet to reject violence as a political tool. The best hope for Algeria's future is to include in a credible political process all those who renounce violence and embrace democratic norms.

Mr. Chairman, a third new human rights challenge is ensuring that civil and political rights—and human rights institutions that are critical to the development of any modern society—are no less a priority than the remarkable economic progress that many states have enjoyed. In this respect, there may be no more appropriate example than the case of China.

As I noted earlier, the question of universality applies to each and every human being, and the people of the People's Republic of China are no exception. Over the past year, China has engaged in a dialogue with the United States and others on the issue of human rights. Dialogue is an important first step, but let us be clear: It is no substitute for action. In particular, we have begun constructive discussions with Chinese officials about the rule of law, and we note Chinese efforts to implement legal reforms. But rule of law is more than rule by law. Law must be used impartially and effectively to guarantee and protect internationally-recognized human rights. The rule of law cannot be distorted by the needs of any political party, and no individual can act above the law itself.

The Government of China has announced it will accede to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. We welcome this step, which commits China to ending some of its serious human rights violations, and hope signature occurs soon. This commitment to meeting the provisions of the Covenant means that the Chinese will be voluntarily reporting, and permitting experts to examine, its practices. We regard this as an important step forward, and we will be watching closely to ensure that the process works effectively and that it produces genuine results.

Mr. Chairman, the Covenant that China is preparing to sign provides that all its citizens must have freedom of expression, and it prohibits arbitrary arrest or detention, torture or cruel and degrading punishment, and arbitrary or unlawful interference with family, home, or correspondence. The Covenant is clear in stating that minorities shall not be denied the right to their own culture, religion, or language. And, under provisions of the Covenant, China will be required to allow all its citizens freedom of expression, thought, conscience, and religion. Although these rights are fundamental elements of both the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and although they are accepted standards throughout the world, they are still repeatedly violated throughout China. Citizens who publicly criticize the government, ruling party, or the leadership are subject to harassment, arrest and imprisonment.

There remain in China over 2,000 persons imprisoned for "counter-revolutionary offenses." We believe these cases should be reviewed, and that prisoners who have done nothing more than exercise their rights should be released. In this regard, we welcome the recent release of Wei Jingsheng and several other dissidents and hope these will be followed by further releases.

Beyond imprisonment for counter-revolution, thousands are detained without trial for up to three years in "re-education through labor camps." Despite laws to the contrary, torture or cruel and degrading punishment continues to occur. China's people do not enjoy the right to choose their leaders in free elections above the village level. Ethnic Tibetans live under social and political controls threatening Tibet's unique cultural, religious, and linguistic heritage. And the Chinese government restricts religious practices and, in many cases, threatens, intimidates, and detains members of unregistered churches.

We urge China to correct these abuses and to make its laws conform with the standards of the International Covenants. If it follows such a course, China, like other states, will find there is no inconsistency between its goal of social stability and ideal of liberty and freedom. On the contrary, the two are mutually reinforcing.

2. U.S. Ratification of International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights

The United States signed the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights ("ICCPR" or "Covenant") on October 5, 1977, and the Senate provided its advice and consent to ratification on April 2, 1992. International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, U.N. Doc. A/RES/2200 (XXI) (1966), 999 U.N.T.S. 171, entered into force March 23, 1976. The ICCPR entered into force for the United States on August 9, 1992.

The United States became party to the ICCPR subject to a number of reservations, understandings, and declarations, and a proviso, as excerpted below. See 138 CONG. REC. S4781 (daily ed., Apr. 2, 1992).

* * * *

I. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following reservations:

(1) That Article 20 does not authorize or require legislation or other action by the United States that would restrict the right of free speech and association protected by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

(2) That the United States reserves the right, subject to its constitutional constraints, to impose capital punishment on any person (other than a pregnant woman) duly convicted under existing or future laws permitting the imposition of capital punishment, including such punishment for crimes committed by persons below 18 years of age.

(3) That the United States considers itself bound by Article 7 to the extent that "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" means the cruel and unusual treatment or punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth and/or Fourteenth Amendments to the constitution of the United States.

(4) That because U.S. law generally applies to an offender the penalty in force at the time the offence was committed, the United States does not adhere to the third clause of paragraph 1 of article 15.

(5) That the policy and practice of the United States are generally in compliance with and supportive of the Covenant's provisions regarding treatment of juveniles in the criminal justice system. Nevertheless, the United States reserves the right, in exceptional circumstances, to treat juveniles as adults, notwithstanding paragraphs 2 (b) and 3 of Article 10 and paragraph 4 of Article 14. The United States further reserves to these provisions with respect to individuals who volunteer for military service prior to age 18.

II. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following understandings, which shall apply to the obligations of the United States under this Covenant:

(1) That the Constitution and laws of the United States guarantee all persons equal protection of the law and provide extensive protections against discrimination. The United States understands distinctions based upon race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or any other status—as those terms are used in article 2, paragraph 1 and article 26—to be permitted when such distinctions are, at minimum, rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective. The United States further understands the prohibition in paragraph 1 of Article 4 upon discrimination, in time of public emergency, based "solely" on the status of race, color, sex, language, religion or social origin not to bar distinctions that may have a disproportionate effect upon persons of a particular status.

(2) That the United States understands the right to compensation referred to in Articles 9 (5) and 14 (6) to require the provision of effective and enforceable mechanisms by which a victim of an unlawful arrest or detention or a miscarriage of justice may seek and, where justified, obtain compensation from either the responsible individual or the appropriate governmental entity. Entitlement to compensation may be subject to the reasonable requirements of domestic law.

(3) That the United States understands the reference to "exceptional circumstances" in paragraph 2 (a) of Article 10 to permit the imprisonment of an accused person with convicted persons where appropriate in light of an individual's overall dangerousness, and to permit accused persons to waive their right to segregation from convicted persons. The United States further understands that paragraph 3 of Article 10 does not diminish the goals of punishment, deterrence, and incapacitation as additional legitimate purposes for a penitentiary system.

(4) That the United States understands that subparagraphs 3 (b) and (d) of Article 14 do not require the provision of a criminal defendant's counsel of choice when the defendant is provided with court-appointed counsel on grounds of indigence, when the defendant is financially able to retain alternative counsel, or when imprisonment is not imposed. The United States further understands that paragraph 3 (e) does not prohibit a requirement that the defendant make a showing that any witness whose attendance he seeks to compel is necessary for his defense. The United States understands the prohibition upon double jeopardy in paragraph 7 to apply only when the judgment of acquittal has been rendered by a court of the same governmental unit, whether the Federal Government or a constituent unit, as is seeking a new trial for the same cause.

(5) That the United States understands that this Covenant shall be implemented by the Federal Government to the extent that it exercises legislative and judicial jurisdiction over the matters covered therein, and otherwise by the state and local governments; to the extent that state and local governments exercise jurisdiction over such matters, the Federal Government shall take measures appropriate to the Federal system to the end that the competent authorities of the state or local governments may take appropriate measures for the fulfillment of the Covenant.

III. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following declarations:

(1) That the United States declares that the provisions of Articles 1 through 27 of the Covenant are not self-executing.

(2) That it is the view of the United States that States Party to the Covenant should wherever possible refrain from imposing any restrictions or limitations on the exercise of the rights recognized and protected by the Covenant, even when such restrictions and limitations are permissible under the terms of the Covenant. For the United States, Article 5, paragraph 2, which provides that fundamental human rights existing in any State Party may not be diminished on the pretext that the Covenant recognizes them to a lesser extent, has particular relevance to Article 19, paragraph 3, which would permit certain restrictions on the freedom of expression. The United States declares that it will continue to adhere to the requirements and constraints of its Constitution in respect to all such restrictions and limitations.

(3) That the United States declares that it accepts the competence of the Human Rights Committee to receive and consider communications under Article 41 in which a State Party claims that another State Party is not fulfilling its obligations under the Covenant.

(4) That the United States declares that the right referred to in Article 47 may be exercised only in accordance with international law.

IV. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following proviso, which shall not be included in the instrument of ratification to be deposited by the President:

Nothing in this Covenant requires or authorizes legislation, or other action, by the United States of America prohibited by the Constitution of the United States as interpreted by the United States.

On March 29, 1995, Conrad K. Harper, Legal Adviser of the Department of State, appeared before the UN Human Rights Committee at its 53rd session in support of the ICCPR, as part of the U.S. Government's presentation of its first implementation report under the Covenant. Among other topics, he addressed the reservations, understandings and declarations that formed the basis for U.S. ratification of the Covenant. The full text of his statement, as excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. See also 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 589 (1995).

* * * *

Turning to the reservations, understandings and declarations . . . I want to emphasize the following points:

The United States has in fact accepted the obligations of the Covenant with very few exceptions and limitations. Taken as a whole, the group may seem large: there are 5 reservations, 5 understandings, and 4 declarations. A careful reading will demonstrate that each of these provisions is addressed to quite limited and specific issues and that each is in fact justified.

Existing U.S. law complies with the Covenant, taking into account the reservations and understandings. In fact, the Covenant essentially sets forth the individual rights and freedoms which are in fact enjoyed by all Americans under the Constitution of the United States, the Bill of Rights, federal law and the Constitutions and laws our 50 States, our territories and dependencies.

Speaking generally, most of the reservations, understandings and declarations can be grouped around three sets of issues; (a) how we intend to give effect to the Covenant as a matter of domestic law, (b) the fact that certain rights (such as freedom of speech) are given greater protection under our Constitution than under the Covenant, and (c) certain limited differences in approach to the criminal justice system.

We have taken no "general" reservations to Covenant. We have not, for example, subjected our adherence to unidentified provisions of the U.S. Constitution.

Finally, there exists an extensive body of law in the United States to protect and promote the rights articulated in the Covenant. We have discussed this body of law in considerable detail in our report. Through these provisions, the rights set forth in the Covenant are already reflected in existing U.S. law. For this reason, we did not propose special or separate implementing legislation.

Domestic Implementation

Non-Self-Executing: As a matter of domestic law, we have declared the substantive provisions of the Covenant to be "non-self-executing." This declaration is not a reservation and does not affect our international obligations under the Covenant. Rather, it means that the Covenant does not, by itself, create private rights enforceable in U.S. courts; that can only be achieved by federal legislation.

In point of fact, existing U.S. law already contains the rights set forth in the Covenant as well as numerous mechanisms by which those rights can be protected and asserted. In other words, although Covenant rights are not themselves directly actionable in U.S. courts, their analogues in domestic law can be and are fully adequate to the purposes of the Covenant. Since existing U.S. law complies with the Covenant on the basis on which we have ratified, and since U.S. law already permits redress and remedies for violations of those rights, we have not proposed new legislation directly implementing the Covenant.

Some have criticized our approach as reflecting a refusal to change our law to conform to the Covenant. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that the decision to make the treaty "non-self-executing" reflects a strong preference, both within the Administration and in the Senate, not to use the unicameral treaty power of the U.S. Constitution to effect direct changes in the domestic law of the United States. If the Congress, both House and Senate, desires to change existing domestic laws, it will do so by statute, in the customary legislative process. In fact, a number of non-governmental organizations have been working in the Congress for consideration of draft legislation to remove the need for a number of reservations and understandings.

Federal-State: Moreover, we have indicated that we shall carry out our obligations under the Covenant in a manner consistent with the federal nature of our form of government. Again, this is not a reservation and does not affect our international obligations under the Covenant, but rather concerns the steps to be taken domestically by the respective federal and state authorities.

Constitutional Protections

Freedom of Speech: In some instances Covenant provisions impinge upon fundamental rights protected by the U.S. Constitution. In particular, Article 20 would directly conflict with our constitutional guarantee of free speech by requiring the prohibition of propaganda for war and of advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence. We therefore took a clear and strong reservation to Article 20.

Similarly, the provisions of Article 19 permit certain restrictions on the fundamental right of freedom of opinion and expression which are not compatible with our Constitutional guarantees of free speech. We could not impose such restrictions and we have clearly stated our view that other states should do so only where absolutely necessary. In this instance, we insist on affording greater protections for individual rights than the Covenant requires.

Non-Discrimination and Equal Protection: The Constitution and laws of the United States guarantee all persons equal protection of the law and provide extensive protections against discrimination. Our law, like the law of most if not all countries, permits certain lawful distinctions to be made among individuals when those distinctions are, at minimum, rationally related to a legitimate government objective. We have stated our understanding that the non-discrimination provisions in the Covenant, which we accept, do not prevent such distinctions.

Criminal Justice Issues

Other Covenant provisions, while not touching on constitutional issues, vary from existing U.S. law in certain respects, requiring us to condition U.S. adherence either on a narrowly-tailored reservation or on a statement of our understanding of what the Covenant in fact requires. Most of these concern the working of our criminal justice system.

Capital Punishment: The most significant of these, and perhaps the most controversial, is our reservation to the prohibition in Article 6 against the imposition of the death penalty for crimes committed by persons below 18 years of age. U.S. law permits the imposition of capital punishment for crimes committed by juvenile offenders aged 16 or 17. The execution of people for crimes committed while they were under the age of 16 has been ruled unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court and does not occur.

We have also taken a reservation to Article 7, which makes clear that we do not accept the "death row phenomenon" as constituting "cruel, unusual or degrading treatment or punishment", as the European Court of Human Rights recently held.

We understand that capital punishment has been abolished or severely limited in many countries in the world. In the United States, there is a continuing debate over this issue, including dispute over provisions which permit courts to treat juveniles as adults in certain limited situations. Current U.S. law reflects the democratically-expressed will of the American people. Our Supreme Court has upheld its constitutionality. Capital punishment is not prohibited by the Covenant or, more generally, by international law.

Right to Compensation: The Covenant can be read to give everyone an absolute right in all situations to compensate for unlawful arrest or detention or miscarriage of justice. We believe the proper reading of this provision is that states are obliged to provide effective and enforceable mechanisms by which victims may seek and, where justified, obtain such compensation; moreover, the actual entitlement to compensation may be subject to reasonable requirements of domestic law. That is the situation under U.S. law. Accordingly, we have proposed an understanding to this effect.

The remainder of our reservations and understandings concern technical issues of the criminal justice system, which may be addressed most appropriately in the context of responses to your questions and comments. Before turning the floor over to my colleagues from the Department of Justice and the Department of the Interior, I want to make a few final observations.

First, the process of treaty ratification in the United States is an open one, and in the case of the Covenant it involved extensive consultation and coordination with the non-governmental community, including human rights advocates, academics and practitioners. As you know, the hearings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee were open, and a large number of non-governmental organizations testified and submitted written comments so that their views could be taken into account by the Senate.

Second, the preparation of our report to this Committee also involved many departments and agencies of the federal government as well as extensive consultations with the non-governmental human rights community. We actively solicited the comments and submissions of the NGOs as to the contents of the report, and while they were not directly involved in the drafting and editing, we continued an active dialogue through the preparation of the report.

Copies of the Covenant and the Report have been provided to each state Attorney General and to state bar associations, as a way of promoting awareness of the Covenant and of the rights it protects. We know that the Report—or portions of it—are already being used in a number of the many courses on human rights taught in universities and law schools around the country, and parts will likely be incorporated in new editions of textbooks in the field.

Finally, I can assure the Committee that we shall have a continuing review of how our responsibilities under the Covenant are implemented, of the need for maintaining our reservations, understandings and declarations in light of future developments, and of how future legislation comports with the Covenant.

3. Human Rights Committee General Comment 24

At its 52nd session on November 4, 1994, the UN Human Rights Committee, established under the ICCPR, adopted

General Comment 24 on issues relating to reservations made upon ratification or accession to the ICCPR or its optional protocols ("General Comment 24"). U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.6 (1994). General Comment 24 asserted that virtually all reservations to the ICCPR are prohibited, that prohibited reservations are void, and that states that have entered prohibited reservations remain parties to the ICCPR without benefit of those reservations.

On March 13, 1995, Conrad K. Harper, Legal Adviser of the Department of State, provided the views of the United States with regard to General Comment 24, as set forth below in full.

There can be no serious question about the propriety of the Committee's concern about the possible effect of excessively broad reservations on the general protection and promotion of the rights reflected in the Covenant, nor any reasonable doubt regarding the general desirability of reservations that are specific, transparent and subject to review with an eye to withdrawal. General Comment 24, however, appears to go much too far.

1. Role of the Committee

The last sentence of paragraph 11 could be read to present the rather surprising assertion that it is contrary to the object and purpose of the Covenant not to accept the Committee's views on the interpretation of the Covenant. This would be a rather significant departure from the Covenant scheme, which does not impose on States Parties an obligation to give effect to the Committee's interpretations or confer on the Committee the power to render definitive or binding interpretations of the Covenant. The drafters of the Covenant could have given the Committee this role but deliberately chose not to do so. In this respect, it is unnecessary for a State to reserve as to the Committee's power or interpretive competence since the Committee lacks the authority to render binding interpretations or judgments. The last sentence can, however, be read more naturally and narrowly in the context of the paragraph as a whole, to assert simply that a reservation may not be taken to the reporting requirement. This narrower view would be consistent with the clear intention of the Convention.

In this regard, the analysis in paragraphs 16–20 is of considerable concern. Here the Committee appears to reject the established rules of interpretation of treaties as set forth in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and in customary international law. The Committee appears to dispense with the established procedures for determining the permissibility of reservations and to divest States Parties of any role in determining the meaning of the Covenant, which they drafted and joined and of the extent of their reciprocal treaty obligations. This is done, moreover, by simple fiat. It is deeply troubling that the Committee appears to have so little respect for established legal principle.

2. Acceptability of Reservations: Governing Legal Principles

The question of the status of the Committee's views is of some significance in light of the apparent lines of analysis concerning the permissibility of reservations in paragraphs 8–9. It is clear that a State cannot exempt itself from a peremptory norm of international law by making a reservation to the Covenant. It is not at all clear that a State cannot chose to exclude one means of enforcement of particular norms by reserving against inclusion of those norms in its Covenant obligations. The proposition that any reservation which contravenes a norm of customary international law is per se incompatible with the object and purpose of this or any other convention, however, is a much more significant and sweeping premise. It is, moreover, wholly unsupported by and is in fact contrary to international law. As recognized in the paragraph 10 analysis of non-derogable rights, an "object and purpose" analysis by its nature requires consideration of the particular treaty, right, and reservation in question.

With respect to the actual object and purpose of this Covenant, there appears to be a misunderstanding. The object and purpose was to protect human rights, with an understanding that there need not be immediate, universal implementation of all terms of the treaty. Paragraph 7 (which forms the basis for the analysis in paragraph 8 and subsequently) seems to assert that each of the substantive articles reflects the Covenant's object and purpose—the unstated implication being that any reservation contravenes the object and purpose. Such a position would, of course, wholly mistake the question of the object and purpose of the Covenant insofar as it bears on the permissibility of reservations. In fact, a primary object and purpose of the Covenant was to secure the widest possible adherence, with the clear understanding that a relatively liberal regime on the permissibility of reservations should therefore be required.

3. Specific Reservations

The precise specification of what is contrary to customary international law, moreover, is a much more substantial question than indicated by the Comment. Even where a rule is generally established in customary international law, the exact contours and meaning of the customary law principle may need to be considered. Paragraph 8, however, asserts in a wholly conclusory fashion that a number of propositions are customary international law which, to speak bluntly, are not. It cannot be established on the basis of practice or other authority, for example, that the mere expression (albeit deplorable) of national, racial or religious hatred (unaccompanied by any overt action or preparation) is prohibited by customary international law. The Committee seems to be suggesting, moreover, that the reservations which a large number of States Parties have submitted to Article 20 are per se invalid. Similarly, while many are opposed to the death penalty in general and the juvenile death penalty in particular, the practice of States demonstrates that there is currently no blanket prohibition in customary international law. Such a cavalier approach to international law by itself would raise serious concerns about the methodology of the Committee as well as its authority.

Another point worthy of clarification is whether the Committee really intends that, in the many areas which it mentions in paragraphs 8–11, any reservation whatsoever is impermissible, or only those which wholly vitiate the right in question. At the end of paragraph 8, for example, it is suggested that reservations to particular clauses of Article 14 may be acceptable, although no reservations could be taken to the article as a whole. Presumably, the same must also be true for many of the other subjects mentioned. For example, even where there is a reservation to Article 20, one would not expect such a reservation to apply to advocacy of racial hatred which constitutes incitement to murder or other crime.

4. Domestic Implementation

The discussion in paragraph 12, as it stands, is very likely to give rise to misunderstandings in at least two respects. First, it may be cited as an assertion that States Parties must allow suits in domestic courts based directly on the provisions of Covenant. Some countries do in fact have such a scheme of "self-executing" treaties. In other countries, however, existing domestic law already provides the substantive rights reflected in the Covenant as well as multiple possibilities for suit to enforce those rights. Where these existing rights and mechanisms are in fact adequate to the purposes of the Covenant, it seems most unlikely that the Committee intends to insist that the Covenant be directly actionable in court or that States must adopt legislation to implement the Covenant. As a general matter, deciding on the most appropriate means of domestic implementation of treaty obligations is, as indicated in Article 40, left to the international law and processes of each State Party.

Rather, the Committee is probably concerned about the case in which a State has joined the Covenant but lacks any means under its domestic law by which Covenant rights may be enforced. The State could even have similar constitutional guarantees which are simply ignored. Such an approach would not, of course, be consistent with the fundamental principle of pacta sunt servanda.

Second, the discussion in paragraph 12 might also be viewed in an overly sweeping fashion by some as critical of any reservation whatsoever which is made to conform to existing law. Of course, since this is the motive for a large majority of the reservations made by States in all cases, it is difficult to say that this is inappropriate in principle. Indeed, one might say that the more seriously a State Party takes into account the necessity of providing strictly for domestic implementation of its international obligations, the more likely it is that some reservations may be taken along these lines. It appears that the comment is not intended to make such a criticism, but rather is aimed at the particular category of sweeping reservations which preserve complete freedom of action and render uncertain one's obligations as a whole, e.g., that the Covenant as a whole is subordinated to the full unspecified range of national law.

5. Effect of Invalidity of Reservations

It seems unlikely that one can misunderstand the concluding point of this General Comment, in paragraph 20, that reservations which the Committee deems invalid are simply void and severable, so that the State remains a party to the Covenant and bound by its provisions without benefit of the reservations. Since this conclusion is so completely at odds with established legal practice and principles and even the express and clear terms of adherence by many States, it would be welcome if some helpful clarification could be made.

C. DISCRIMINATION

1. Race

On September 28, 1966, the United States signed the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, ("Race Discrimination Convention" or "Convention") G.A. Res. 2106 (XX), Annex, U.N. Doc. A/RES/2106 (XX) (1966), 660 U.N.T.S. 195, entered into force January 4, 1969. President Jimmy Carter transmitted the Convention to the Senate on February 23, 1978. In his letter of transmittal, President Carter stated:

> The Racial Discrimination Convention deals with a problem which in the past has been identified with the > United States; ratification of this treaty will attest to our enormous progress in this field in recent decades and our commitment to ending racial discrimination.

See S. Treaty Doc. No. 95–18 (1978). However, despite several hearings during 1979, the Senate took no action with respect to the treaty.

On April 26, 1994, Acting Secretary of State Strobe Talbott wrote to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee ("SFRC") to convey the strong support of President William J. Clinton's Administration for the prompt ratification of the Convention. His letter enclosed a memorandum "analyzing the requirements of the Convention against relevant provisions of current U.S. law and explaining the reasoning behind each of the reservations, understandings and declarations." S. Exec. Rep. 103–29 (1994). Acting Secretary Talbott wrote in part:

> Contemporary U.S. domestic law provides strong protections against racial discrimination in all fields of public endeavor, as well as effective methods of redress and recourse for those who despite these protections nonetheless become victims of discriminatory acts or practices. Accordingly, as indicated in the enclosed analysis, subject to a few necessary reservations and understandings, the requirements of this treaty are consistent with existing U.S. law. Early ratification by the United States would, however, serve to underscore our national commitment to the international promotion of the fundamental values and principles reflected in this widely-accepted treaty.
> Even more importantly, U.S. ratification would enhance our ability to take effective steps within the international community to confront and combat the increasingly destructive discrimination which occurs against minorities around the world on national, racial and ethnic grounds. Ethnic animosity and hatred have become a tragically common feature of the post-Cold War political landscape, one which has strained the abilities of existing institutions to contain and control and which increasingly calls for new approaches and new solutions to what are in many cases centuries-old animosities.

On June 24, 1994, the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification with reservations, an understanding and a declaration as set forth below. See 140 CONG. REC. S7634 (daily ed. June 24, 1994).

---

* * * *

I. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following reservations:

(1) That the Constitution and laws of the United States contain extensive protections of individual freedom of speech, expression and association. Accordingly, the United States does not accept any obligation under this Convention, in particular under articles 4 and 7, to restrict those rights, through the adoption of legislation or any other measures, to the extent that they are protected by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

(2) That the Constitution and laws of the United States establish extensive protections against discrimination, reaching significant areas of non-governmental activity. Individual privacy and freedom from governmental interference in private conduct, however, are also recognized as among the fundamental values which shape our free and democratic society. The United States understands that the identification of the rights protected under the Convention by reference in article 1 to fields of 'public life' reflects a similar distinction between spheres of public conduct that are customarily the subject of governmental regulation, and spheres of private conduct that are not. To the extent, however, that the Convention calls for a broader regulation of private conduct, the United States does not accept any obligation under this Convention to enact legislation or take other measures under paragraph (1) of article 2, subparagraphs (1) (c) and (d) of article 2, article 3 and article 5 with respect to private conduct except as mandated by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

(3) That with reference to article 22 of the Convention, before any dispute to which the United States is a party may be submitted to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice under this article, the specific consent of the United States is required in each case.

II. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following understanding, which shall apply to the obligations of the United States under this Convention:

That the United States understands that this Convention shall be implemented by the Federal Government to the extent that it exercises jurisdiction over the matters covered therein, and otherwise by the state and local governments. To the extent that state and local governments exercise jurisdiction over such matters, the Federal Government shall, as necessary, take appropriate measures to ensure the fulfillment of this Convention.

III. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following declaration:

That the United States declares that the provisions of the Convention are not self-executing.

On May 11, 1994, Conrad K. Harper, Legal Adviser of the Department of State, had testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in support of the Convention, as excerpted below. The full text of Mr. Harper's testimony, reprinted in 5 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 22 at 354–57 (May 30, 1994), is available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

The Clinton Administration is committed to eradicating race-based discrimination in our society and ensuring equal opportunity for all. Respect for human rights and individual dignity—regardless of racial or ethnic background—is a fundamental tenet of a just and civilized society.

Over the past century, we have made significant advances in the struggle for racial equality in this country. Our Constitution and laws establish important safeguards for ensuring that individuals are not denied employment, housing, education, or other rights or benefits because of racial or ethnic animus. The principle of anti-discrimination is deeply embedded in our legal and social fabric.

But while we have made progress along the path to racial equality, we have more distance to travel. The Clinton Administration intends to make every effort to ensure that the goal of equal opportunity becomes ever more a reality. The International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination is an important expression of this commitment.

The convention was signed by the United States in 1966 and transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification in 1978. Apart from a hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1979, no further action has been taken. On behalf of the President, we urge the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to report favorably on this convention with a recommendation that the Senate give its advice and consent to prompt ratification. Ratification of this convention will send a clear signal of our commitment to eradicate unlawful racial and ethnic discrimination.

The convention—already ratified by more than 135 countries—creates an important standard that members of the international community must strive to meet. Although the fundamental rights set forth in this treaty already are recognized in U.S. laws, not all countries have codified the principle of equal protection in their legal systems or permit effective redress for acts of discrimination. By working collectively with other nations to eliminate unlawful discrimination based on race, color, descent, or national or ethnic origin, we shall promote respect for the rule of law and human rights abroad. This goal is particularly important in light of the extraordinary challenge to peace and security today resulting from racial tension and ethnic conflict.

Ratification of this convention will comport with our domestic laws. The substantive provisions of the convention embody, with only a few exceptions, the requirements of the Constitution and laws of the United States. Where necessary, we have proposed a reservation, understanding, or declaration to make clear that the scope of U.S. obligations under the convention is consonant with U.S. law. Although such qualifications are relatively few and do not undermine in any way the central purpose or object of the convention, they clarify our legal standards and ensure that our acceptance of the convention is fully consistent with the U.S. Constitution and laws.

A detailed legal analysis of the treaty's requirements and their relationship to U.S. constitutional law as interpreted over time by U.S. courts was previously submitted to the committee under separate cover on April 26 by the Acting Secretary of State, Strobe Talbott. For the convenience of the committee, let me summarize the central provisions in the convention and then explain the relatively few reservations, understandings, and declarations we have submitted.

Central Provisions

Article 1. The convention is designed to forbid racial and ethnic discrimination in all aspects of public life. Article 1(1) defines "racial discrimination" as:

> Any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the recognition, enjoyment or exercise, on an equal footing, of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural or any other field of public life.

Although this definition is relatively broad, Article 1(2) and Article 1(3) impose certain limits. For instance, the convention does not apply to distinctions, exclusions, restrictions, or preferences made between citizens and non-citizens; nor does it affect legal provisions concerning acquisition of nationality and citizenship or naturalization, provided that such provisions do not discriminate against any particular nationality. Moreover, Article 1(4) explicitly exempts "special measures" taken for the sole purpose of securing adequate advancement of certain racial or ethnic groups or individuals requiring such protection. As a result, the convention leaves undisturbed existing U.S. law regarding affirmative action programs. Article 2 requires states parties to take a series of specified steps or measures to eliminate racial discrimination, including:

(a) Ensuring that all public authorities and institutions act in conformity with that basic obligation;

(b) Not sponsoring, defending, or supporting racial discrimination by any persons or organizations;

(c) Reviewing governmental policies and amending, rescinding, or nullifying discriminatory laws and regulations at all levels of political organization;

(d) Bringing to an end, by all appropriate means, racial discrimination by "any persons, group or organization;" and

(e) Encouraging, where appropriate, integrationalist multiracial organizations and movements.

Under Article 3, states parties condemn racial segregation and apartheid and agree to prevent, prohibit, and eradicate all such practices in territories under their jurisdiction. Article 4 requires states parties to condemn propaganda and organizations based on racial hatred or superiority. Under Article 5, states parties undertake to guarantee the right of everyone, without distinction as to race, color, or national or ethnic origin, to equality before the law in the enjoyment of the rights—among others—to equal treatment before the courts and security of the person and protection against violence and bodily harm; political rights, including universal and equal suffrage, freedom of movement and residence, peaceful assembly and association, thought, conscience, religion, opinion, and expression; the rights to nationality, to marriage, to own and inherit property, to work, to form and join unions, and to housing, medical care, education, cultural activities, and access to public facilities.

Article 6 requires states parties to ensure everyone within their jurisdiction effective protection and remedies against acts of discrimination contrary to this convention, which violate human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to seek just and adequate reparation or satisfaction for any damage suffered as a result of such discrimination.

Finally, under Article 7, states parties undertake to institute measures to combat prejudice and promote tolerance in the fields of teaching, education, culture, and training.

Articles 8 through 16. As an oversight mechanism, the convention establishes in Articles 8 through 16 a Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination—an autonomous body of 18 experts of high moral standing and acknowledged impartiality who are elected by states parties to four-year terms. This committee considers detailed reports from states parties on the legislative, judicial, administrative, or other measures they have adopted or which give effect to the provisions of the convention. The first such report is due within one year of entry of the convention into force for the state concerned; supplementary reports are due thereafter every two years.

The committee also submits an annual report to the UN General Assembly. The committee generally meets twice a year, usually in New York or Geneva. Although it is not a court, it may hear complaints by one state party against another concerning non-compliance with convention requirements. Such disputes, if not settled by mutual agreement, may be resolved by the committee or, at its discretion, referred to a non-binding conciliation commission. To date, no such disputes have been brought.

States parties may, by declaration—on an optional basis—also recognize the competence of the committee to consider communications from individuals or groups claiming to be victims of a violation by that state of any of the rights set forth in the convention. The United States has not availed itself of this option. A state that makes such a declaration also may establish a national body to receive and consider such petitions from individuals within its jurisdiction on an initial basis; petitioners who fail to receive satisfaction from such a body within six months may communicate directly with the committee.

Both mechanisms—the individual and the state-to-state—are non-binding. The convention contains no provision for the referral of either state-to-state complaints or individual petitions from the committee to the International Court of Justice (ICJ). Article 22 of the convention does provide, however, that disputes between two or more parties with respect to the interpretation or application of the convention which are not settled by negotiation or other methods may be submitted to the ICJ at the request of either party.

Reservations, Understandings, And Declarations

As a general matter, the substantive provisions of the convention reflect the anti-discrimination principles inherent in our constitutional scheme. They require the United States to do what it already is legally obligated to do—eradicate unlawful racial or ethnic discrimination. Ratification of this convention will constitute an important expression of U.S. commitment to fulfill its legal obligation to ensure equality under law.

Nonetheless, while the convention generally comports with U.S. laws, certain provisions appear either to be inconsistent with current law or sufficiently ambiguous as to warrant additional clarification. As a result, we have proposed several reservations, declarations, and understandings to clarify the nature and scope of the obligations we shall undertake.

The most important of these is required by the First Amendment to our Constitution. Specifically, we have proposed a reservation regarding Article 4 of the convention, which, as noted above, requires states parties to condemn propaganda and organizations based on racial hatred or superiority. Article 4 requires states parties to:

(a) Make criminal the dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred, incitement to racial discrimination, and acts of violence or incitement to such acts against any race or group of persons of another color or ethnic origin;

(b) Prohibit organizations and propaganda which promote and incite racial discrimination; and

(c) Forbid public authorities or institutions, national or local, from promoting or inciting racial discrimination.

As a matter of national policy, the U.S. Government has long condemned racial discrimination and has engaged in many activities designed to combat prejudices leading to racial discrimination and to promote tolerance and understanding among racial and ethnic groups. Such programs include those under the authority of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Bilingual Education Act, the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961, the International Education Act, and the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities Act of 1965.

Nonetheless, because the rights to free expression and association are fundamental values in our constitutional structure, any governmental restrictions on expressive activity must be viewed with suspicion and must survive the most stringent scrutiny. Although speech likely to cause imminent violence and certain forms of bias-related criminal conduct may be proscribed consistent with the First Amendment, the government generally may not impose regulations aimed at the content of expression. However objectionable certain opinions or ideas may be, the Constitution requires that such expression be constitutionally protected. As the Supreme Court consistently has recognized:

> The constitutional right of free expression is intended to remove governmental restraints from the arena of public discussion, putting the decision as to what views shall be voiced largely into the hands of each of us in the belief that no other approach would comport with the premise of individual dignity and choice upon which our political system rests.

Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 24 (1971).

Because Article 4 mandates the suppression and criminalization of certain expression because of its content and also implicates the freedom of association, we believe it is inconsistent with existing First Amendment principles. We thus have proposed a reservation indicating that the United States will not accept any obligation to restrict rights to free expression and association protected by the U.S. Constitution and laws. The text of this reservation is set forth at page 12 of the detailed legal analysis to which I referred earlier. Such a reservation will make clear that U.S. ratification of the convention is informed by and contingent upon existing constitutional norms.

The second reservation we have proposed pertains to private conduct. We are concerned that certain provisions in the convention might be interpreted as prohibiting conduct beyond the proper scope of governmental regulation under existing U.S. law. Our concerns are derived from the breadth of the definition of "racial discrimination" under Article 1(1); the obligation imposed on states parties in Article 2(1)(d) to bring an end to all racial discrimination "by any persons, group or organization;" and the specific requirements of paragraphs 2(1)(c) and (d), Articles 3 and 5.

As explained in greater detail in our legal analysis, the Constitution and laws of the United States establish extensive protection against discrimination, including certain conduct by private actors. The "state action" requirement of the Fourteenth Amendment recognizes that in certain cases conduct by private individuals is actionable if such conduct is "fairly attributable" to the state. (Lugar v. Edmonson, 457 U.S. 922, 937 (1982)). Likewise, the federal civil rights statute, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, reaches conduct by individuals acting "under color of" state law. (See West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42 (1988)). In addition, the Thirteenth Amendment's prohibition against slavery and involuntary servitude encompasses private as well as governmental action. Congress may regulate private conduct not only through the Thirteenth Amendment but also through its Article I commerce and spending powers, as it did in passing Title II and Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which, respectively, prohibit private entities from discriminating in public accommodations and employment. Further discussion of U.S. law regarding private conduct is included in our legal analysis at pp. 12–15.

The government's ability to proscribe certain private conduct is, however, not unlimited. Our constitutional framework recognizes that individual freedom and protection from governmental interference are vital to a free and democratic society. For this reason, some private conduct is not actionable—even if discriminatory—provided no nexus exists between individual and governmental action.

Exactly how far the drafters of the convention intended to sweep in regulating discriminatory conduct remains unclear. On the one hand, it could be argued that the reference to "public life" in the definition of "racial discrimination" in Article I limits the reach of the convention to conduct involving some measure of governmental involvement or "state action." On the other hand, the negotiating history of the convention is ambiguous on this point. Moreover, the committee appears to have adopted an expansive view of the convention, interpreting it to reach racial discrimination perpetuated by any person or group against another. We cannot be sure, therefore, that the term "public life" carries with it the same limits on governmental regulation as is contemplated under U.S. law. Some forms of private individual or organizational conduct that currently are outside the permissible scope of governmental regulation in his country could well become actionable under the convention, thereby offending existing constitutional norms.

Because we wish to make clear that the obligations undertaken by the U.S. are limited by U.S. constitutional and statutory provisions, we have proposed a reservation indicating that:

> To the extent that the Convention calls for a broader regulation of private conduct, the United States does not accept any obligation . . . to enact legislation or take other measures under paragraph (1) of Article 2, subparagraphs (1)(c) and (d) of Article 2, Article 3 and Article 5 with respect to private conduct except as mandated by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The text of the reservation is included at pp. 14–15 in our legal analysis submitted to the committee. We believe such a measure is prudent and will ensure that the U.S. does not embrace any obligation it cannot appropriately assume.

The third reservation we have submitted concerns submission to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. Such a reservation parallels those taken to the Genocide and Torture Conventions. Although this Administration strongly supports the use of international dispute-resolution mechanisms in appropriate cases, we believe it is prudent for the U.S. Government to retain the ability to decline to become involved in a case that may be brought by another country for frivolous or political reasons. In any case, the ICJ has played no practical role under this treaty. Indeed, to date, no case has been brought to the ICJ under this convention.

The primary mechanism for reviewing implementation of the convention is through consideration of reports submitted by states parties to the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. The committee also provides a mechanism for resolution of state-to-state complaints. The United States plans to submit to both mechanisms. Finally, there is ample opportunity in the United States to seek redress of alleged acts of discrimination.

In addition to these three reservations, we have proposed an understanding which expresses our view that with respect to implementation of the convention, the federal government will have responsibility over matters under its jurisdiction and that, otherwise, implementation shall be the responsibility of state and local governments. This is to make clear that ratification does not preempt state and local anti-discrimination initiatives. The understanding also makes clear that where states and localities have jurisdiction over such measures, the federal government will ensure compliance. We adopted a similar provision in ratifying the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights in 1992 and believe such an understanding is appropriate here.

Finally, we have submitted a proposed declaration indicating that the convention's provisions are not self-executing. Under Article VI, Clause 2 of the Constitution, duly ratified treaties become the supreme law of the land, equivalent to a federal statute. By making clear that this convention is not self-executing, we ensure that it does not create a new or independently enforceable private cause of action in U.S. courts. We have proposed and the Senate has concurred in the same approach to previous human rights treaties, such as the UN Convention Against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1990) and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1992).

As was the case with the earlier treaties, existing U.S. law provides extensive protection and remedies against racial discrimination sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the present convention. In addition, federal, state, and local laws already provide a comprehensive basis for challenging discriminatory statutes, regulations, and other governmental actions in court, as well as certain forms of discriminatory conduct by private actors. There is thus no need for the establishment of additional causes of action to enforce the requirements of the convention. By adopting these proposed reservations, declarations, and understandings, we signify the seriousness with which the United States accepts the obligations the convention imposes. By being forthright about the legal constraints under which we operate and specific about our obligations as we interpret them, we make clear that we shall meet the obligations we assume in a manner fully consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. Since the major thrust of the convention comports with U.S. law, the qualifications on U.S. ratification are few and do not undermine the central tenets or purposes of the convention.

Other Issues

I wish also to point out that in our extensive analysis of the convention's potential impact on our domestic law, we have identified other issues about which the Senate should be aware but which do not warrant inclusion in the Senate's resolution of advice or consent or in the instrument of ratification as specific reservations, understandings, or reservations. These issues relate to convention provisions regarding ethnic origin and descent; special measures, known as "affirmative action"; implementing legislation; provisions relating to discriminatory purpose and effect; territorial application; state-to-state complaints; individual petitions; and financial implications of ratification. Our analysis of each is set forth in the detailed legal memorandum which we hope will become part of the committee's report on the convention so that it will be readily accessible to interested parties.

Of these, perhaps the most noteworthy is Article 2(1)(c) of the convention, which requires states parties to:

> Take effective measures to review governmental, national and local policies which have the effect of creating or perpetuating racial discrimination. The provision also requires states parties to "amend, rescind or nullify any laws and regulations" that have such effects.

The negotiating history of the convention leaves unclear the precise scope of a state party's obligation under Article 2(1)(c). We believe, however, that the provision does not require the invalidation of every race-neutral law, regulation, or practice that causes some degree of adverse impact on racial groups. This conclusion is confirmed by the committee's recently adopted General Recommendation XIV which states that:

> In seeking to determine whether an action has an effect contrary to the convention, it will look to see whether that action has an unjustifiable disparate impact upon a group distinguished by race, colour, descent, or national origin.

The committee's use of the term "unjustifiable disparate impact" indicates its view that the convention reaches only those race-neutral practices that both create statistically significant racial disparities and that are unnecessary. This view is consistent with the standards for proving disparate impact under Title VII, the Title VI implementing regulations, and the Fair Housing Act, as well as with the requirements for proving a violation of the Equal Protection Clause or of the federal civil rights statutes.

Conclusion

In sum, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination embodies the anti-discrimination principles animating U.S. law. U.S. ratification of this convention—long awaited by other countries—will be an important expression of our commitment to eradicate unlawful racial and ethnic discrimination and to ensure equal opportunity for all. By demonstrating our resolve to eliminate discrimination at home, we shall encourage respect for human rights and the rule of law abroad and, in so doing, join with other nations in building a fairer, more pluralistic, and, ultimately, more just environment for everyone.

a. Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women

> On November 12, 1980, President Jimmy Carter transmitted the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women ("CEDAW" or "Convention"), signed by the United States on July 17, 1980, to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification, with certain conditions. S. Treaty Doc. No. 96–53 (1980). The Senate has not taken action on the Convention.

On September 13, 1994, Secretary of State Warren Christopher wrote to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to convey the strong support of President William J. Clinton's administration for the prompt ratification of CEDAW. Secretary Christopher wrote in part:

> Ratification of the Convention at this time would serve both to underscore our commitment to women's rights and to enhance our ability to protect and promote those rights internationally. With the Fourth World Conference on Women impending, it is in the U.S. interest to ratify this treaty promptly, since we are the only country in the Western Hemisphere which has not. In particular, participation by the United States in the work of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, which oversees implementation of the treaty by States Parties, would provide an opportunity for the United States to play an even more active and effective role in the articulation and advancement of the principles of non-discrimination and equality for women around the world.

On September 27, 1994, Jamison S. Borek, Deputy Legal Adviser of the Department of State, testified before the SFRC in support of CEDAW, as excerpted below. Senate Resolution 237, submitted to the Senate on November 19, 1999, urged the ratification of the Convention, but the Senate took no action.

The full texts of Secretary Christopher's letter to the SFRC and Deputy Legal Adviser Borek's testimony before the SFRC are available in Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women: Hearing Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 103rd Cong. (1994).

. . . Ratification of this Convention will be an important expression of our shared commitment to the protection and promotion of the rights of women at home and abroad, just as the recent endorsement of the International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination evidenced our common goal of promoting respect for human rights and individual dignity—regardless of racial or ethnic background—as a fundamental tenet of a just and civilized society.

The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in December, 1979. The United States participated actively in its negotiation, voted in favor of its adoption, and signed it in July, 1980. President Carter transmitted the convention to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification in November of that same year. However, apart from a field hearing in Massachusetts chaired by Senator John Kerry in 1988, no further action was taken until this Committee held a hearing in August 1990, at which very strong support for ratification was voiced.

We believe it is time to ratify. As Secretary Christopher's September 13 letter to you indicates, Mr. Chairman, ratification of the Convention at this time will serve to underscore our commitment to women's rights and enhance our ability to protect and promote these rights internationally. By excluding ourselves from the process and dialogue which is centered on this treaty, we hamper our own efforts to work effectively with them in promoting women's rights around the globe.

Already ratified by some 136 countries, including virtually all of our democratic allies, the Convention creates an internationally agreed standard of non-discrimination. In this regard, the Treaty builds on the principle of non-discrimination contained in the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the 1966 Covenant on Civil and Political Rights—a treaty to which the United States is already a party—and the 1967 UN Declaration on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women.

Although widely accepted and proclaimed by states parties, the prohibition against gender-based discrimination has not in fact been effectively implemented in many countries, nor have they permitted effective redress for instances of discrimination.

Regrettably, discrimination against women continues to be pervasive around the world. United States ratification of this important human rights instrument would permit us to work collectively with other nations to help eliminate discrimination against women and generally to promote the rule of law and respect for human rights.

Ratification of this Convention on the basis we have proposed would also comport with our domestic laws. The substantive provisions of the Convention embody, with relatively few exceptions, principles already reflected in the constitution and laws of the United States. In those few areas where the Convention would impose an obligation or undertaking which is not contained in existing domestic law, we have proposed a reservation or understanding, as appropriate, to make clear that the scope of U.S. obligations under the Convention is consistent with U.S. law. These qualifications are relatively few and do not undermine the central object or purpose of the Convention. They serve, however, to clarify our legal undertakings and to ensure that our acceptance of the Convention is fully consistent with our Constitution and laws.

As a general matter, the substantive provisions of the Constitution and statutes of the United States already oblige us to do what the Convention requires: to eradicate unlawful discrimination based on gender and to promote equality of treatment and access for women in many different areas of our national life. Indeed . . . current federal law and practice are, in almost every area touched upon by the Convention, sufficient to satisfy its requirements. For that reason, no new implementing legislation is considered necessary to give effect to the Convention.

Nonetheless, while the Convention generally comports with U.S. laws, there are a few requirements which clearly go beyond existing law and to which we must therefore take a reservation. We have proposed four such reservations.

The first of these relates to private conduct. As was the case with the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, we are concerned that this Convention could be interpreted to prohibit conduct which lies beyond the proper scope of governmental regulation under existing United States law. These concerns stem principally from the breadth of the definition of "discrimination against women" under Article 1; the specific obligations imposed on states parties under Article 2 to eliminate discrimination against women by "any person, organization or enterprise" and to abolish "customs and practices" which constitute discrimination against women; and the potentially broad reach of the general obligations imposed by Article 3. Similar concerns are raised by the reference to modification of "social and cultural patterns of conduct" in Article 5, the reference in Article 7 to participation in non-governmental organizations and associations, and the application of Article 13 to participation in recreational activities, sports and all aspects of cultural life.

. . . [T]he Constitutional prohibitions against gender discrimination generally apply only where there is sufficient governmental involvement so as to satisfy the "state action" requirement. Even those federal anti-discrimination statutes that apply to private conduct do not extend to all such conduct. For example, Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act does not apply to private employers with fewer than 15 employees, religious institutions, or tax-exempt private clubs. Similarly, Title IX of the Education Act Amendments of 1972 does not apply to private institutions that receive no federal funds. Moreover, certain types of private institutions that do receive federal funds are exempted from the strictures of Title IX. Finally, religious organizations are generally not subject to gender discrimination laws.

For these reasons, it is appropriate to condition U.S. ratification upon a reservation, similar to the one approved earlier this year by this Committee in its consideration of the international Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, which acknowledges the limitations imposed by the U.S. Constitution and laws upon the ability of the federal government to regulate private conduct. The text of that reservation is as follows:

> "The Constitution and laws of the United States establish extensive protections against discrimination, reaching all forms of governmental activity as well as significant areas of non-governmental activity. However, individual privacy and freedom from governmental interference in private conduct are also recognized as among the fundamental values of our free and democratic society. The United States > understands that by its terms the Convention requires broad regulation of private conduct, in particular under Articles 2, 3 and 5. The United States does not accept any obligation under the Convention to enact legislation or to take any other action with respect to private conduct except as mandated by the Constitution and laws of the United States."

The second reservation concerns women in the military, and more specifically the assignment of women to units and positions directly involving combat. Although nothing in the Convention specifically refers to women in the military, Articles 2(f) and 7 are conceivably broad enough to be interpreted in such a fashion. U.S. law has periodically contained gender-based preferences and restrictions related to military service. Today, the principal statutory restriction (10 U.S.C. 6015) has been repealed and women are now permitted to volunteer for—and do in fact serve in—all of the armed services. Women attend the service academies without restriction and are increasingly represented at the senior levels of the commissioned and non-commissioned ranks and grades in all services.

In particular, women may serve without restriction in all non-combat units and in many but not all combat positions. However, the Department of Defense and the military services retain certain policies that preclude women from serving in units and positions whose mission requires routine engagement in direct combat on the ground. See e.g., P.L. 103–160, 542. We understand that further changes in military policy affecting women are to be established to take into account the costs of establishing necessary sleeping and privacy arrangements in some situations and other factors such as the physical requirements of some assignments.

This Administration fully supports continued efforts to afford women the broadest opportunities to serve in the military. However, to retain the required flexibility to address potential future changes of this nature, it is considered appropriate to condition ratification upon a reservation as follows:

> "Under current U.S. law and practice, women are permitted to volunteer for military service without restriction, and > women in fact serve in all U.S. armed services, including in combat positions. However, the United States does not accept an obligation under the Convention to assign women to all military units and positions which may require engagement in direct combat."

The third reservation concerns equality of remuneration in the workplace. Under Article 11(l)(d), women are entitled to non-discrimination with respect to "equal remuneration, including benefits, and to equal treatment in respect of work of equal value, as well as equality of treatment in the evaluation of the quality of work."

This provision reflects a potentially broad definition of the concept of equal pay for women, requiring equal compensation for jobs judged to be of comparable worth according to requisite knowledge, skill, effort and responsibility, and considering the working conditions under which the work is performed. The Convention nowhere uses the term "comparable worth," and a number of states parties have not adopted the "comparable worth" doctrine in their domestic law. It appears, however, that the committee established by the Convention takes a broader view than would comport with current U.S. law, and this view may find support in the negotiating history of the Convention.

Pay equity is an established principle in U.S. law and practice. The equal pay act of 1963 mandates equal pay for men and women who are performing jobs of equal skill, effort and responsibility under similar working conditions unless the pay differential is justified by one of four exceptions: seniority system, merit system, system based on the quality or quantity of production, or any factor other than sex. Courts have interpreted the act to mandate equal pay for "substantially similar" jobs; claims of unequal pay for comparable but unequal work are inapplicable under the statute. Moreover, the U.S. Supreme Court has recognized that Title VII reaches cases of wage disparity when jobs are not identical if the disparity is the result of intentional discrimination.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has concluded, however, that the concept of comparable worth is not cognizable under Title VII, and the federal courts have consistently rejected the concept of comparable worth. Accordingly, it is considered appropriate to condition ratification upon a reservation as follows:

> "U.S. law provides strong protections against gender discrimination in the area of remuneration, including the right to equal pay for equal work in jobs that are substantially similar. However, the United States does not accept any obligation under this Convention to enact legislation establishing the doctrine of comparable worth as that term is understood in U.S. practice."

Ratification of the Convention on that basis would not, of course, preclude the United States (or its constituent states) from adopting the legal doctrine of comparable worth in the future.

The fourth and final reservation concerns the provision of paid maternity leave. Article 11(2)(b) provides that states parties shall take appropriate measures "to introduce maternity leave with pay or with comparable social benefits without loss of former employment, seniority or social allowances."

Current U.S. law and practice provide for substantial maternity and parental leave benefits in many employment situations. The Pregnancy Discrimination Act, for example, prohibits employers from providing less-favorable treatment of pregnancy-related conditions in comparison to other conditions. The Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993 provides, among other things, that public and private sector employees who meet the statutory requirements may take up to twelve weeks of unpaid leave in any twelve-month period for the birth or adoption of a child, acquiring a foster child, the serious illness of a child, spouse or parent, or the serious illness of the employee. The FMLA requires covered employers to maintain group health benefits during the leave and to restore the employee to the same or an equivalent position (with equivalent pay and benefits) at the end of the eligible leave period. The FMLA also creates a commission on leave which is to study the impact on employers and employees of policies which provide temporary wage replacement during periods of family or medical leave.

However, no federal or state law now requires employers to provide paid leave or leave with comparable social benefits in connection with pregnancy or childbirth. Nor does U.S. law require provision of "comparable social benefits" in lieu of paid maternity leave. However, the states of New York, New Jersey, California, Hawaii and Rhode Island, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico have temporary disability insurance laws that provide partial salary replacement for non-work related disabilities, including childbirth and pregnancy-related conditions.

Accordingly, ratification should be conditioned upon an express reservation to the requirements of Article 11(2)(b), as follows:

> "Current U.S. law contains substantial provisions for maternity leave in many employment situations but does not require paid maternity leave. Therefore, the United States does not accept an obligation under Article 11(2)(b) to introduce maternity leave with pay or with comparable social benefits without loss of former employment, seniority or social allowances."

Again, ratification of the Convention on that basis would not preclude the United States (or its constituent states) from adopting laws in the future which guarantee paid maternity leave or leave with comparable social benefits.

We have also proposed three interpretive understandings, to clarify the extent of U.S. undertakings under the Convention. The first of these concerns the question of federalism. . . . Nothing in U.S. law prohibits the federal government from committing its constituent units to the goal of nondiscrimination. Indeed, the Constitution of the United States does just that. However, it is not necessary to "federalize" such areas, or to take them out of the hands of the state and local governments, in order to ensure that the fundamental requirements of the Convention are respected and complied with at all levels of government within the United States. In some areas, it would be inappropriate to federalize. For example, state and local communities have always taken the lead in public education. Although the constitutional proscription against gender discrimination still applies, federal control over education, particularly in the areas of curricula, administration, programs of instruction, and the selection and content of library resources, textbooks, and instructional materials, is expressly limited by statute. Measures to ensure fulfillment of the Convention in these areas will include activities that conform to these statutory limitations.

It is for this reason that the administration proposes to condition ratification of the Convention upon a "federalism" understanding similar to those previously approved by this committee and the full Senate in connection with the ratification of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination:

> "The United States understands that this Convention shall be implemented by the federal government to the extent that it exercises jurisdiction over the matters covered therein, and otherwise by the state and local governments. To the extent that state and local governments exercise jurisdiction over such matters, the federal government shall, as necessary, take appropriate measures to ensure the fulfillment of this Convention."

Second, we have included an understanding addressed to issues of freedom of speech, expression and assimilation. In contrast to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, this Convention does not contain a specific provision barring discriminatory speech. It is therefore not necessary to include a reservation to protect first amendment rights. Nonetheless, some of the provisions of the Convention could be interpreted to implicate first amendment rights, and we believe it important to clarify for the record, domestically as well as internationally, that we do not accept any obligation which would impinge upon constitutionally protected rights of speech and association. Most importantly, we want to ensure that Article 5 is not construed as imposing obligations on states parties to take action against those who advocate "the idea of inferiority or the superiority of either of the sexes." Under U.S. law, the free speech guarantees of the first amendment generally permit individuals to disseminate such "ideas," however abhorrent they may be.

For this reason, the Administration proposes to clarify for the committee and all other states parties the limits imposed on governmental action in this regard by the U.S. Constitution, through adoption of the following understanding:

> "The Constitution and laws of the United States contain extensive protections of individual freedom of speech, expression and association. Accordingly, the United States does not accept any obligation under this Convention, in particular under Articles 5, 7, 8 and 13, to restrict those rights, through the adoption of legislation or any other measures, to the extent that they are protected by the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Finally, we have proposed an understanding related to free health care services, as addressed in Article 12. Article 12(l) requires states parties to take "all appropriate measures" to eliminate discrimination against women in the field of health care in order to assure equal access to health care services "including those related to family planning." Under Article 12(2), states parties must also ensure to women "appropriate services in connection with pregnancy, confinement and the post-natal period, granting free services where necessary, as well as adequate nutrition during pregnancy and lactation."

As a general matter, this provision poses no problems for the United States. The equal protection clause of the U.S. Constitution prohibits public institutions from discriminating against women with respect to access to health care, and in practice women do have equal access to such care, as well as to services specifically related to family planning and in connection with pregnancy, confinement or the post-natal period. Although not all health care institutions or providers (whether private or governmentally-funded) are required to, or do in fact, provide family planning information or services, a woman in the United States can obtain such services as readily as a man. In any event, Article 12(l) does not require the affirmative provision of family planning services generally, or of any specific service (such as contraceptive devices or abortion), but rather mandates equality of access.

The undertaking to provide "appropriate services in connection with pregnancy . . . granting free service where necessary" arguably imposes a greater burden. Again, this provision does not require the provision of any particular services, but leaves to each state party the decision of which services are "appropriate" in which circumstances, as well as the decision about whether and when it is "necessary" to make services freely available.

While federal law currently does not guarantee health care coverage and nutrition during pregnancy, and while state medicaid programs do not necessarily cover all pregnant women who cannot afford adequate insurance on their own, federal law does provide substantial assistance to pregnant women and infants. As you know, even wider coverage has been proposed as part of the Administration's health care proposal. We do not believe, however, that the Convention requires it. . . . [W]e believe that the current provisions of federal and state law and programs are legally adequate to satisfy the international legal obligations under this Treaty. Nonetheless, because federal programs may not guarantee the availability of funds to provide all needed services, we believe it is appropriate to assert the following understanding with respect to Article 12:

> "The United States understands that Article 12 permits states parties to determine which health care services are appropriate in connection with family planning, pregnancy, confinement and the post-natal period, as well as when the provision of free services is necessary, and does not mandate the provision of particular services on a cost-free basis."

Finally . . . we have proposed two declarations, both of which will be familiar to you because they reflect the same approach to issues we have addressed in earlier treaties. The first declares the provisions of this treaty to be "non-self-executing." The primary intent of such a declaration is to clarify that the treaty will not create a new or independently enforceable private cause of action in U.S. courts.

As was the case with previously considered human rights treaties, it is our considered view that existing U.S. law provides extensive protections against gender-based discrimination and remedies sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the present Convention. Moreover, federal, state and local laws already provide a comprehensive basis for challenging discriminatory statutes, regulations and other governmental actions in court, as well as certain forms of discriminatory conduct by private actors.

Given the extensive protections already present in U.S. law, there is no discernible need for the establishment of additional causes of action or new avenues of litigation in order to enforce the essential requirements of the Convention. Declaring the Convention to be non-self-executing in no way lessens the obligation of the United States to comply with its provisions as a matter of international law.

The second declaration concerns the Treaty's dispute settlement mechanism. Article 29(l) of this Convention provides for the referral of disputes between states parties concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention, if not settled by negotiation, first to arbitration and then to the International Court of Justice in conformity with the statute of the court. Article 29(2) provides that a state party may declare, at the time of signature, ratification or accession, that it does not consider itself bound by the provisions of Article 29(l).

Following the same approach to this issue as the Administration proposed in connection with the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination, in which the Senate concurred, the Administration proposes to make the declaration contemplated by Article 29(2), declining to accept the Court's jurisdiction in all such cases and retaining the right to decide the question on a case-by-case basis. The Administration strongly supports the use of international dispute resolution mechanisms in appropriate cases, but continues to believe it is prudent for the United States government to retain the ability to decline participation in a case which may be brought by another country for frivolous or political reasons.

In fact, recourse to the International court of Justice is only an ancillary possibility for dispute resolution and has not played an important role in implementing this Treaty (indeed, no state has ever brought a claim to the Court under this Convention). Instead, the principal oversight functions are performed by the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women . . . and the United States fully accepts the competence of the Committee in that regard.

The Administration does not believe that making this declaration will significantly curtail the possibility of effective resolution of any disputes, should they arise, or undermine the oversight of implementation of the Treaty's provisions.

[I]n concluding, I want to point out what the Convention does not do. I feel compelled to address this topic because, in preparing for this hearing, I reviewed the record of the Committee's 1990 hearing and was rather surprised at some of the claims made about the potential impact of the Convention on our laws and social fabric.

Most importantly, I think it should be clear that we are not talking about amending the U.S. Constitution or indeed changing U.S. law in any respect. In the past, some characterized the Convention as a vehicle for radical social engineering and legal innovation which would somehow impinge upon "the timeless legal and moral values" on which our nation was founded. This is not at all the case. The Convention is consistent with firmly rooted principles of equal treatment and opportunity which are already part of our heritage and tradition. . . . [F]or the most part our law is already in compliance. With the reservations which we propose, we do not see any need for additional legislation to implement the treaty.

Some have asserted that the Convention would interfere with the federal-state balance of power under the Constitution. Again, that is not in fact the case, and our "federalism" understanding is intended to make that as clear as possible. The Convention will not require the government to regulate inter-personal relationships, as a few have suggested. It will not destroy traditional family values. It will not subject women to the draft, should that institution ever need to be revived. Nor will it undermine the separation of church and state, or require churches and religious institutions to change their practices and beliefs, for example by admitting women to the clergy.

It will not require abortion on demand. Nothing in the Convention, and particularly nothing in Article 12, requires states parties to guarantee access to abortion. This Convention is "abortion neutral." Whether or not abortion should be considered an "appropriate service in connection with pregnancy" is left to each state party in its discretion.

The requirement in Article 16(l)(e) that states parties ensure men and women "the same rights to decide freely and responsibly on the number and spacing of their children" is not a mandate for coercive family planning; to the contrary, it is an obligation on the government not to interfere with the ability of women to make such personal, fundamental decisions but instead to accord them that freedom "on a basis of equality" with men. We already do that in this country.

b. Trafficking in women

A memorandum from President William J. Clinton, released on International Women's Day, March 11, 1998, urged the Senate to provide its advice and consent to ratification of CEDAW, highlighted the Violence Against Women Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103–322, § 40503, 108 Stat. 1946 (1994), and urged greater U.S. efforts to prevent trafficking in women. The text of the memorandum is available at www.clintonfoundation.org/legacy/031198-presidential-memo-on-combating-violence-against-women.htm.

Harold Hongju Koh, Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor, testified on the problem of trafficking in women and children before the House Committee on International Relations on September 14, 1999. Trafficking of Women and Children in the International Sex Trade: Hearing Before the House Comm. on International Relations, 106th Cong. 8–13 (1999) (statement of Harold Hongju Koh, Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor).

On March 22, 1994, John Shattuck, Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor testified before the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on International Security, International Organizations and Human Rights on the sexual exploitation of women and children, as excerpted below. Human Rights Abuses Against Women: Hearing Before the House Comm. On Foreign Affairs, 103rd Cong. 108–120 (1994) (statement of John H. Shattuck, Dept. of State, Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs).

Because of U.S. prodding, violence against women is an increasing focus of UN human rights activity. A top priority is ensuring that the War Crimes Tribunal investigating the former Yugoslavia addresses the systematic rape of women as an instrument of ethnic cleansing. In Kenya, the U.S. has worked with and contributed funds for the UN High Commissioner for Refugees to combat the rape of Somali refugee women. The UNHCR program addressed several facets of the problem, from enhanced physical security to providing counseling to victims, to strengthening the capacity of the Kenyan police. There has subsequently been some improvement.

Trafficking in Women and Children

Child prostitution and the trafficking of women and children are not only abhorrent to the United States, they are a violation of fundamental human rights principles set forth in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Convention on the Suppression of Traffic in Persons and the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others. The 1993 Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, prepared by my Bureau, chronicle these activities in many countries, including Burma, Thailand, India, Bangladesh, and the Philippines. But this is not just a Third World problem: some of the women victimized by this practice are reportedly sent to Japan, Cyprus, Belgium, and other Western countries.

The 1993 report on Thailand offers this description of the trade:

> "The trend of trafficking in women from hill tribes and neighboring countries continued. Brothel operators reportedly favor such women because they are cheaper to buy and their inability to speak Thai makes them easier to control. In a widely publicized brothel raid in Ranong in July, 150 Burmese women were arrested by police as illegal immigrants and prostitutes. Many of the women claimed they were tricked into coming to Thailand by offers of employment. The women were kept locked in dormitory-style rooms, and many complained they were physically abused by the brothel operators if they refused to work as prostitutes. Because they are considered illegal immigrants, the women have no right to legal counsel or health care while imprisoned."

The picture that emerges from the State Department Human Rights Report and from the book produced by Human Rights Watch is of a desperate situation. Many of the women contract AIDS. Most are unable to ask for help because they cannot speak the local language, do not know where they are, fear the retribution of brothel owners, and, as illegal aliens, have few legal rights. Sadly, many women became involved in prostitution with the complicity of their families.

In Burma the problem is compounded by other egregious human rights violations. Many Burma women trafficked into prostitution come from areas of civil war where government soldiers have conducted a violent campaign against the civilian population. Many are afraid to go home. The Clinton Administration has recently conducted a review of our policy toward Burma. We are taking a more activist approach to encourage the restoration of a lawful, democratic government in that country—a government more likely to protect its people from the abuses described in the State Department and Asia Watch reports.

The primary responsibility for curbing the trafficking of women through Thailand and for protecting women from such abuses rests with the Government of Thailand. Prime Minister Chuan has said that he is committed to addressing the problem of child prostitution in Thai society, and his government has taken some limited steps in that direction. Shortly after the Chuan government's election in September 1992, it declared that child prostitution would no longer be tolerated. The government spent months drafting legislation intended to stiffen penalties for brothel owners and procurers, especially those involving children. The draft bill would permit the punishment of men who patronize underage prostitutes. The draft version has been passed to the juridical council for review; once approved by the council, it will be submitted to Parliament. Unfortunately, the proposed legislative reform has not yet been matched by any serious effort to step up law enforcement actions against traffickers and brothel owners, who continue to operate largely with impunity.

In addition to legislation, the Chuan government is considering other steps to address the problem. In 1992–1993, welfare and occupational centers were set up to provide training for young people in the north, in an effort to remove incentives for entering prostitution and to rehabilitate prostitutes who return. The Thai government also hopes that the decision this year to extend compulsory education from six to nine years will deter some young girls from migrating to urban areas as prostitutes. In addition, the government has launched an educational campaign on social values designed to persuade parents not to sell their daughters into prostitution.

A U.S. Action Plan

Earlier this month I traveled to Thailand, to urge the Thai government to take more aggressive action to promote the welfare of women, including fighting against trafficking and child prostitution. I discussed these issues with the Deputy Prime Minister and with the Ministers of the Interior and Foreign Affairs. We discussed the new measures the government is taking, and I raised the urgent necessity of investigating and prosecuting offenders. We also discussed the health problems inherent in prostitution, particularly ways to prevent contraction of HIV. The Deputy Prime Minister assured me that women's issues were a high priority for the Chuan government, not only in the area of trafficking and prostitution, but also in terms of promoting equal opportunity in the workplace. These issues, and related problems of workplace safety and child employment, are now firmly on our bilateral agenda with Thailand.

We are also addressing the problem programmatically, and I had an opportunity to review first-hand U.S. programs in Thailand. The Peace Corps sponsors an AIDS awareness program in brothels. USAID recently established an AIDS prevention program in Thailand, which provides AIDS education to both brothel workers and patrons, as well as helping prostitutes find alternative forms of employment. USAID also provides scholarships to keep high-risk girls in school. This year it is funding a study to see how young rural women with little education can find employment in the telecommunications industry as technicians—a heretofore male profession. In addition to these programs in Thailand, the State Department also provides nearly $1 million in assistance to Burmese refugees in the border area.

We are planning to take further steps, as well. Drawing on the findings of our 1993 human rights report we are considering how the development of additional diplomatic efforts and training programs to combat trafficking in women in Thailand and Burma. This is an area where NGOs and experts outside government can play an extremely valuable role. We welcome their ideas and will continue to draw on their expertise.

Beyond educational efforts, we urgently need to encourage countries in which trafficking of women and children goes on with impunity to enact new laws, and to enforce existing laws. A particular target of this stepped up law enforcement should be government officials who participate in or condone trafficking, as well as brothel owners and traffickers. Additional efforts must also be made to assist victims with counseling, health services, training, and alternative economic opportunities. The reason why child prostitution and trafficking continue to flourish in the face of legal prohibition is that the real offenders, the people who make money out of this traffic in women's bodies and lives, are not arrested. As the Human Rights Watch report indicates, arresting the women and girls does nothing to stop the practice. On the contrary, fear of arrest is one of the factors that chains women to the brothels.

The trafficking of Burmese women and children into Thailand is just one manifestation of a problem that crosses geographic boundaries. As part of our new focus on this issue, the Clinton Administration is initiating several important actions to combat the problem worldwide:

As we open relations with Vietnam, we are including this issue in our human rights dialogue. In December 1993, all embassies were instructed to screen the human rights records of all candidates for U.S.-sponsored training and education. This includes military and police training, antinarcotics training, foreign faculty appointments to defense schools, USIA programs, and other U.S.-sponsored training. The State Department instructions to posts indicate this screening should cover involvement in the trafficking of women and children.

Human rights training is now being included in some IMET programs. The State Department is working with the Department of Defense to ensure that the rights of women are fully addressed as part of this training. The issue of trafficking is expressly addressed. Similar training of U.S. employees is equally important. My Bureau runs seminars on human rights for State Department officers assigned abroad, as well as for personnel from other agencies, including DOD and DEA. We regularly invite NGOs to address these classes and their input has been-invaluable.

The 1994 Country Reports will emphasize violations of women's human rights, with special attention to the role of government officials in the trafficking of women and children. Such information has not been sufficiently collected or reported in the past, and it is the key to the problem of lax law enforcement and impunity. Embassies have been asked to report more extensively on patterns of trafficking, so that we can trace both where the women are coming from and which countries they are being sent to.

There have been allegations that some of the women lured into prostitution are destined for the U.S. My Bureau is working with the Bureau of Consular Affairs on guidance to embassies regarding screening visa applicants. Under U.S. law, persons who are traveling to the U.S. to engage in prostitution and persons who traffic in prostitutes are ineligible to receive U.S. visas. We will work with the Consular Affairs Bureau to develop methods that will help posts identify traffickers.

These are some of the new steps the U.S. can take on its own. However, we will also engage other countries in our efforts to attack the trafficking problem. In that regard, the U.S. will strongly urge that violations of women's human rights, including trafficking in women and children, be high on the agenda of the UN's Fourth World Conference on Women, to be held in Beijing in 1995. The U.S. will also urge that the newly created Special Rapporteur on Violence Against Women investigate this issue.

c. Fourth World Conference on Women at Beijing

The United Nations Fourth World Conference on Women was held in Beijing from September 4 through 15, 1995. At the conclusion of the conference, the United States joined in adopting the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing Declaration ("Beijing Declaration"). The full text of the Beijing Declaration is available at www.un.org/womenwatch/daw/beijing/platform/declar.htm. In remarks to the Conference on September 5, 1995, First Lady Hillary Clinton enunciated the U.S. view on women's rights and gender equality, as excerpted below. The voices of this conference and of the women at Hairou must be heard loud and clear:

It is a violation of human rights when babies are denied food, or drowned, or suffocated, or their spines broken, simply because they are born girls.

It is a violation of human rights when women and girls are sold into the slavery of prostitution.

It is a violation of human rights when women are doused with gasoline, set on fire and burned to death because their marriage dowries are deemed too small.

It is a violation of human rights when individual women are raped in their own communities and when thousands of women are subjected to rape as a tactic or prize of war.

It is a violation of human rights when a leading cause of death worldwide among women ages 14 to 44 is the violence they are subjected to in their own homes.

It is a violation of human rights when young girls are brutalized by the painful and degrading practice of genital mutilation.

It is a violation of human rights when women are denied the right to plan their own families, and that includes being forced to have abortions or being sterilized against their will.

If there is one message that echoes forth from this conference, it is that human rights are women's rights . . . And women's rights are human rights.

3. Religion

a. International Religious Freedom Act of 1998

On Oct. 27, 1998, Congress passed the International Religious Freedom Act ("IRFA"), 22 U.S.C. §§ 6401–6481, Pub. L. No. 105–292, 112 Stat. 2787, as excerpted below. IRFA mandated the establishment of an Office of International Religious Freedom within the Department of State, headed by an Ambassador-at-Large who acts as the principal advisor to the President and Secretary of State in matters concerning religious freedom abroad. It also mandated the establishment of the independent, bipartisan United States Commission on International Religious Freedom and a Special Adviser on International Religious Freedom at the National Security Council, and submission of an annual report to Congress on International Religious Freedom.

In 1999 Congress amended IRFA in Pub. L. No. 106–55, 113 Stat. 401, to make a technical correction referred to in the President's signing statement, excerpted below. The amendment clarified the conditions under which the President could take into account other substantial measures that the United States had taken against a country in determining whether additional measures should be imposed on that country under IRFA.

The October 27, 1998 statement by President William J. Clinton upon signing IRFA into law is excerpted below. 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2149–50 (Nov. 2, 1998).

Today I have signed into law H.R. 2431, the "International Religious Freedom Act of 1998." My Administration is committed to promoting religious freedom worldwide, and I commend the Congress for passing legislation that will provide the executive branch with the flexibility needed to advance this effort.

The United States was founded on the right to worship freely and on respect for the right of others to worship as they believe. My Administration has made religious freedom a central element of U.S. foreign policy. When we promote religious freedom we also promote freedom of expression, conscience, and association, and other human rights. This Act is not directed against any one country or religious faith. Indeed, this Act will serve to promote the religious freedom of people of all backgrounds, whether Muslim, Christian, Jewish, Buddhist, Hindu, Taoist, or any other faith.

* * * *

Section 401 of this Act calls for the President to take diplomatic and other appropriate action with respect to any country that engages in or tolerates violations of religious freedom. This is consistent with my Administration's policy of protecting and promoting religious freedom vigorously throughout the world. We frequently raise religious freedom issues with other governments at the highest levels. I understand that such actions taken as a matter of policy are among the types of actions envisioned by section 401.

I commend the Congress for incorporating flexibility in the several provisions concerning the imposition of economic measures. Although I am concerned that such measures could result in even greater pressures—and possibly reprisals—against minority religious communities that the bill is intended to help, I note that section 402 mandates these measures only in the most extreme and egregious cases of religious persecution. The imposition of economic measures or commensurate actions is required only when a country has engaged in systematic, ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom accompanied by flagrant denials of the right to life, liberty, or the security of persons—such as torture, enforced and arbitrary disappearances, or arbitrary prolonged detention. I also note that section 405 allows me to choose from a range of measures, including some actions of limited duration.

The Act provides additional flexibility by allowing the President to waive the imposition of economic measures if violations cease, if a waiver would further the purpose of the Act, or if required by important national interests. Section 402(c) allows me to take into account other substantial measures that we have taken against a country, and which are still in effect, in determining whether additional measures should be imposed. I note, however, that a technical correction to section 402(c)(4) should be made to clarify the conditions applicable to this determination. My Administration has provided this technical correction to the Congress.

I regret, however, that certain other provisions of the Act lack this flexibility and infringe on the authority vested by the Constitution solely with the President. For example, section 403(b) directs the President to undertake negotiations with foreign governments for specified foreign policy purposes. It also requires certain communications between the President and the Congress concerning these negotiations. I shall treat the language of this provision as precatory and construe the provision in light of my constitutional responsibilities to conduct foreign affairs, including, where appropriate, the protection of diplomatic communications.

Section 107 requires that the Secretary of State grant U.S. citizens access to U.S. missions abroad for religious activities on a basis no less favorable than that for other nongovernmental activities unrelated to the conduct of the diplomatic mission. State Department policy already allows U.S. Government mission employees access to U.S. facilities for religious services in environments where such services are not available locally. The extension of this practice to U.S. citizens who generally enjoy no privileges and immunities in the host state has the potential to create conflicts with host country laws and to impair the ability of U.S. missions to function effectively. Care also must be taken to ensure that this provision is implemented consistent with the First Amendment. Accordingly, I have asked the Department of State to prepare guidance to clarify the scope of this provision and the grounds on which mission premises are generally available to nongovernmental organizations.

Finally, I will interpret the Act's exception in section 405(d) concerning the provision of medicines, food, or other humanitarian assistance to apply to any loans, loan guarantees, extensions of credit, issuance of letters of credit, or other financing measures necessary or incidental to the sale of such goods. Additionally, I will interpret the license requirements in section 423 regarding specified items to apply only to countries of particular concern.

b. Annual Department of State report on religious freedom

Pursuant to the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998 ("IRFA"), the first annual Department of State report on international religious freedom was submitted on September 9, 1999. Robert A. Seiple, the first appointed Ambassador-at-Large for International Freedom, made the following statement to the Subcommittee on International Operations and Human Rights House Committee on International Relations on October 6, 1999.

The full text of the statement is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Each of the 194 Country Reports begins with a statement about applicable laws and outlines whether the country requires registration of religious groups. It then provides a demographic overview of the population by religious affiliation, outlines problems encountered by various religious groups, describes societal attitudes and finishes with an overview of U.S. policies.

The drafting process was similar to that used in preparing the Human Rights Reports. We worked diligently to include as much factual information as possible, relying not only on our other sources but also on material from experts in the academia, non-governmental organizations and the media. Our guiding principle was to ensure that all relevant information was assessed objectively, thoroughly and fairly as possible. We hope that Congress finds the report to be an objective and comprehensive resource.

The International Religious Freedom Act also requires that the President, or in this case his designee, the Secretary of State, review the status of religious freedom throughout the world in order to determine which countries should be designated as countries of particular concern. As the Chairman and the Committee Members know, we have delayed the designations in order to give the Secretary ample time to consider all the relevant data, as well as my own recommendations. She has been reading relevant parts of the report itself, which was not completed until September 8th. Designations must be based on those reports, as well as on the Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, and all other information available to us.

I am pleased to tell you that the Secretary has completed her review. We will shortly send to the Congress an official letter of notification in which we will detail the Secretary's decision with respect to any additional actions to be taken. While I am not prepared today to discuss those actions, I do wish to announce the countries that the Secretary intends to designate under the act as countries of particular concern. They are Burma, China, Iran, Iraq, and Sudan.

The Secretary also intends to identify the Taliban in Afghanistan, which we do not recognize as a government, and Serbia, which is not a country, as particularly severe violators of religious freedom. I will be happy to take your questions about the restrictions on the exercise of religious freedom in all of these areas.

I would also note that there are many other countries that our report discusses where religious freedoms appear to be suppressed. In some instances, like Saudi Arabia, those countries are beginning to take steps to address the problem. In some countries, such as North Korea, religious freedoms may be suppressed, but we lack the data to make an informed assessment. We will continue to look at these cases and collect information so that, if a country merits designation under the act, we will so designate it in the future.

Let me turn briefly to the subject of U.S. actions to promote religious freedom abroad.

Secretary Albright has said that our commitment to religious liberty is even more than the expression of American ideals. It is a fundamental source of our strength in the world. The President, the Secretary of State and many senior U.S. officials have addressed the issue of freedom in venues throughout the world. Secretary Albright some time ago issued formal instructions to all U.S. diplomatic posts to give more attention to religious freedom both in reporting and in advocacy.

During the period covered by this report, all of 1998 and the first 6 months of 1999, the U.S. engaged in a variety of efforts to promote the right of religious freedom and to oppose violations of that right. As prescribed in the International Religious Freedom Act, the Executive Summary describes U.S. actions to actively promote religious freedom.

Drawing on the individual reports, it describes certain activities by U.S. Ambassadors, other embassy officials and other high-level U.S. officials, including the President, the Secretary, Members of Congress, as well as the activities of my own office.

Our staff has visited some 15 countries in the last several months, including China, Egypt, Vietnam, Uzbekistan, Serbia, Russia, Indonesia, Laos, Kazakhstan, Israel, Saudi Arabia, France, Germany, Austria, and Belgium. We have met with hundreds of officials, NGO's, human rights groups, religious organizations and journalists, here and abroad. I am delighted to report to you that our office has become a clearing house for people with information about religious persecution and discrimination and for the persecuted themselves. By fax, telephone, e-mail and direct visits they tell us their stories. We listen, record, and, when appropriate, we act.

At the very least, we believe we have created a process by which their stories can be verified and integrated into our annual report. With persistence and faith, perhaps our efforts will lead to a reduction in persecution and an increase in religious freedom.

Mr. Chairman, I have provided in my written statement a description of U.S. efforts in three countries, China, Uzbekistan, and Russia, where Congress has shown particular interest and in which we have expended considerable diplomatic effort. In China, our collective efforts on behalf of persecuted minorities, and I include Members of Congress in that collective, have been persistent and intense, but have unfortunately had little effect on the behavior of the Chinese Government. In Uzbekistan, our efforts have met with some success, although it certainly is too soon to discern long-term or systemic change for the better. In Russia, our interventions with the Russian government have apparently blunted the effects of a bad religion law.

* * * *

To protect freedom of religion is not simply to shield religious belief and worship. It is that, but it is more. When we defend religious freedom, we defend every human being who is viewed as an object or a product to be used or eliminated according to the purposes of those with power.

D. CHILDREN

1. Convention on the Rights of the Child

The United States signed the Convention on the Rights of the Child on February 16, 1995. U.N. Doc. A/44/25 (1989), entered into force September 2, 1990. In remarks to the Plenary of the 54th Session of the UN General Assembly on the Tenth Anniversary of the Convention on the Rights of the Child on November 11, 1999, Ambassador Betty King, U.S. Representative on the Economic and Social Council, addressed the fact that the United States had not ratified the convention and described U.S. policies and actions supporting the rights of children. U.N. Doc. A/54/PV.52 (1999).

The full text of Ambassador King's statement is available at www.un.int/usa/99_112.htm.

* * * *

The year 1999 marks the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Convention on the Rights of the Child. One of the top priorities of any nation should be the enhancement and protection of the rights of children. Children constitute one of the most vulnerable groups within the boundaries of any state. They are victims of violence, disease, malnutrition and sexual exploitation. They represent over fifty percent of the world's refugees, displaced persons, and conflict victims. They are often separated from their families, deprived of education, and too frequently, forcibly recruited by armed factions. Millions of children under the age of 15 around the world are employed full or part-time in what can be described as exploitative child labor. Children are at the mercy of the adults around them. They have little say so in their affairs. They cry out for help that is frequently not there.

The United States remains committed to the betterment of children nationally and internationally. As a nation, we place the highest priority on the well-being of children, not only at home, but around the world. Both our President and First Lady have spoken out on several occasions on the importance of improving the quality of life of children. Recently, President Clinton addressed the International Labor Organization in Geneva on this issue. . . . Our commitment to the protection of children's rights is unquestionable. We help children at risk through support for multilateral programs, NGOs and a wide variety of official bilateral assistance and diplomatic initiatives. We are major supporters of many UN programs that have a substantial focus on helping children, such as UNICEF, UNHCR, UNDP, and WFP, just to name a few. Bilaterally, the US Agency for International Development has been a major supporter of child health programs for 25 years. Today, more than 4 million child deaths are prevented annually due to critical life-saving health services provided by USAID.

And what about the heinous practice of trafficking in children? For thousands of children around the world it means bondage, rape, prostitution, and physical brutality. A year ago, President Clinton established a strategy, which focuses on prevention, protection for victims and prosecution of traffickers. The world community must bond together to put an end to this despicable practice.

Although the United States has not ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child, our actions to protect and defend children both at home and abroad clearly demonstrate our commitment to the welfare of children. The international community can remain assured that we, as a nation, stand ready to assist in any way we can to enhance and protect the human rights of children wherever they may be.

On October 27, 1999, Ambassador Sim Farar, U.S. Representative to the 54th General Assembly at the United Nations, addressed the Third Committee of the General Assembly on the subject "Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Children," summarizing U.S. policies and actions supporting the rights of children. U.N. Doc. A/C.3/54/SR.24 (1999).

Mr. Chairman, we have worked arduously to improve the quality of life of our children. While we cannot say that we have come up with an answer to all of the problems that children face in our society today, we have, under President Clinton, passed several pieces of legislation such as the Family Medical Leave Act, the Multi-Ethnic Placement Act, the Children's Health Insurance Program, and the Adoption and Safe Families Act.

At the same time, the United States is very much concerned about the well being of children around the world. We are strong supporters of the recently adopted ILO convention on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labor. President Clinton spoke in June of this year before the ILO in Geneva—the first American President to do so. As the President indicated then, he has directed all federal agencies of the Unites States government to make absolutely sure that they are not buying any products made with abusive child labor. The Department of Labor, in consultation with the Department of State, and Treasury, is preparing a list of products by country that would form the basis for the certification requirement. This list will be published shortly. President Clinton is a strong advocate of universal ratification of ILO convention 182 and has submitted it to the U.S. Senate for advice and consent to ratification. In Fiscal Year 1999, the United States increased its contribution to the ILO's International Program for the Elimination of Child Labor (IPEC) ten-fold, to about 30 million dollars, making the U.S. the largest contributor to the IPEC program. We are requesting an additional 30 million for Fiscal Year 2000, and the next four fiscal years.

Mr. Chairman, the United States is also deeply concerned about the heinous practice of trafficking in children. Every year some one to two million women and children are caught up in the snares of this practice, lured by the offer of good jobs and better working conditions. For children, the result, however, is all too often bondage, rape, prostitution and physical brutality. President Clinton established a strategy a year ago, which focuses on prevention, protection for victims, and prosecution of traffickers. The U.S. is working actively with other governments to pursue these policies.

We could not get very far, however . . . with any of these programs unless we work together towards improving the health of children around the world. The United States has supported child health programs for the last 25 years. Today, more than 4 million child deaths are prevented annually due to critical life-saving health services provided by the U.S. Agency for International Development.

. . . I would like to say a few words about children who are victims of war. We welcome the report of the Special Representative for Children in Armed Conflict, Mr. Olara Otunnu, and appreciate his commitment to protect all children affected by armed conflict. The United States strongly supported the Security Council resolution adopted in August of this year on "Children and Armed Conflict". As Ambassador Nancy Soderberg said before the Security Council at that time "We believe that it is time to exert pressure to implement the many existing norms to prevent further abuse and brutalization of children. We should not let our attention be distracted by debates on the margin of the problem but focus on where the real abuses are—with children even younger than fifteen whose lives are totally distorted by their recruitment into armed conflict and brutality—becoming both perpetrators and victims." For those children, we ask the High Commissioner for Human Rights to look at ways in which the programs may be expanded to address the protection and rehabilitation of children caught up in the scourge of war.

* * * *

Mr. Chairman, in our efforts, we must not forget the plight of street children. An estimated 100 million children work or live on the streets of the developed and developing worlds. These children are frequently the innocent victims of national economic and political collapse or transition. The strategies of USAID's Displaced Children and Orphans Fund for addressing the needs of these children stress the primary importance of the family and community-based care and protection as the first line of defense. This year, Mr. Chairman, the Fund addressed a new category of vulnerable children: children with disabilities. Stigmatized by cultural values and religious beliefs, children with disabilities are often hidden in back rooms or are permanently placed in government institutions, displaced from communities and society. The Displaced Children and Orphans Fund is supporting community-based approaches to provide care and training in life-skills.

* * * *

. . . [W]e must band together to say that there are some things that we cannot and will not tolerate. I would like to close by repeating the words of President Clinton before the ILO this past June:

- We will not tolerate children being used in pornography and prostitution.
- We will not tolerate children in slavery or bondage.
- We will not tolerate children being forcibly recruited to serve in armed conflict.

- We will not tolerate young children risking their health and breaking their bodies in hazardous and dangerous working conditions.

2. Convention on the Worst Forms of Child Labor

President William J. Clinton transmitted the Convention concerning the Prohibition and Immediate Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labor ("Convention 182") to the Senate on August 5, 1999. reprinted in 38 I.L.M. 1207 (1999), entered into force Nov. 19, 2000. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–5 (1999). President Clinton's letter of transmittal is provided below.

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification of the Convention (No. 182) Concerning the Prohibition and Immediate Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labor, adopted by the International Labor Conference at its 87th Session in Geneva on June 17, 1999, I transmit herewith a certified copy of that Convention. I transmit also for the Senate's information a certified copy of a recommendation (No. 190) on the same subject, adopted by the International Labor Conference on the same date, which amplifies some of the Convention's provisions. No action is called for on the recommendation.

The report of the Department of State, with a letter from the Secretary of Labor, concerning the Convention is enclosed.

As explained more fully in the enclosed letter from the Secretary of Labor, current United States law and practice satisfy the requirements of Convention No. 182. Ratification of this Convention, therefore, should not require the United States to alter in any way its law or practice in this field.

In the interest of clarifying the domestic application of the Convention, my Administration proposes that two understandings accompany U.S. ratification.

The proposed understandings are as follows:

> The United States understands that Article 3(d) of Convention 182 does not encompass situations in which children are employed by a parent or by a person standing in the place of a parent on a farm owned or operated by such parent or person.
> The United States understands that the term "basic education" in Article 7 of Convention 182 means primary education plus one year: eight or nine years of schooling based on curriculum and not age.

These understandings would have no effect on our international obligations under Convention No. 182. Convention No. 182 represents a true breakthrough for the children of the world. Ratification of this instrument will enhance the ability of the United States to provide global leadership in the effort to eliminate the worst forms of child labor. I recommend that the Senate give its advice and consent to the ratification of ILO Convention No. 182.

The Senate provided its advice and consent to ratification on November 5, 1999, with understandings and declarations, as excerpted below:

> (a) Understandings. . . . Children Working on Farms.—The United States understands that Article 3(d) of Convention 182 does not encompass situations in which children are employed by a parent or by a person standing in place of a parent on a farm owned or operated by such parent or person. . . .
>
> Basic Education.—The United States understands that the term "basic education" in Article 7 of Convention 182 means primary plus one year: eight or nine years of schooling, based on curriculum and not age.
> (b) Declaration. . . . Treaty Interpretation.—The Senate affirms the applicability to all treaties of the constitutionally based principles of treaty interpretation set forth in Condition (1) of the resolution of ratification of the INF Treaty, approved by the Senate on May 27, > 1988, and Condition (8) of the resolution of ratification of the Document Agreed Among the State Parties to the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe, approved by the Senate on May 14, 1997.

The Senate's advice and consent was also subject to the following proviso, which was not included in the instrument of ratification deposited by the President:

> (c) Proviso. . . . Supremacy of the Constitution.—Nothing in the Treaty requires or authorizes legislation or other action by the United States of America that is prohibited by the Constitution of the Untied States as interpreted by the United States.

145 CONG. REC. S14226 (daily ed. Nov. 5, 1999).

E. DEVELOPMENT

1. Food Aid Convention 1999

The United States signed the Food Aid Convention 1999 on June 16, 1999, and President William J. Clinton transmitted the treaty to the Senate on October 13, 1999. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–14 (1999). The Food Aid Convention 1999 replaced the Food Aid Convention 1995, S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–4 (1997).

Under the Food Aid Convention 1995, donors pledged to provide specified minimum tonnages of food aid, mainly as grain, annually to developing countries. The 1999 Convention continued the objective of contributing to world food security and improving the ability of the international community to respond to emergency food situations and other food needs of developing countries. It incorporated several new features with the objective of improving transportation and local agricultural development, and expanded the list of eligible products to include vitamins, edible oils, milk powder, and other nutritional supplements. The Department of State letter, dated September 2, 1999, submitting the Food Aid Convention 1999 to the President for transmittal to the Senate is provided below.

The President: I have the honor to submit to you, with a view to transmission to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification, the Food Aid Convention 1999, which was open for signature at the United Nations Headquarters, New York, from May 1 through June 30, 1999. The Convention was signed by the United States on June 16, 1999.

The Food Aid Convention 1999 replaces the Food Aid Convention 1995, which expired June 30, 1999. The Food Aid Convention is one of two constituent instruments that constitute the International Grains Agreement, to which the United States is a party. (The second part—the Grains Trade Convention 1995—was recently extended for two years without amendment.) The Convention entered into force internationally on July 1 and will remain in force until June 30, 2002, unless extended further.

At the December 1996 World Trade Organization meeting in Singapore, Ministers charged the Food Aid Committee, the organization that administers the Food Aid Convention, with negotiating a new Convention to establish a level of food aid commitments that would cover as wide a range of donors and donative foodstuffs as possible, in order to meet the legitimate needs of developing countries. From February 1998 to April 1999, the United States and other governments party to the Food Aid Convention 1995 engaged in negotiations to draft this new Convention in a manner that reflected these objectives as well as the changing nature of food assistance.

The Food Aid Convention provides an international, donors-only forum to discuss food assistance. Under the Food Aid Convention 1999, donor members make minimum annual commitments which can be designated either by quantity or, pursuant to a new provision, the value of the food aid they will provide to developing countries. As did its predecessor, the Food Aid Convention 1999 commits the United States to donate or sell on concessional terms at least 2.5 million tons of food aid annually. All parties to the 1995 Convention—the United States, the European Community (and its member states), Japan, Canada, Australia, Norway, Switzerland and Argentina—are already parties or intend to participate in the new Convention. Certain donors previously have purchased U.S. grains to meet their food aid pledges.

While the basic principles and objectives of the Food Aid Convention 1995 have not changed, there are several important innovations in the new Convention, including:

— broadening the list of eligible commodities beyond grains and legumes to include such critical food products as edible oils and milk powder;
— encouraging members to fortify their contributed food and to provide dietary supplements such as vitamins by counting these products toward a member's annual contribution;
— encouraging donors to provide food aid to difficult-to-reach destinations by permitting transport and other operational costs to be counted toward a member's contributions; — promoting local agricultural development and markets in recipient countries; and — improving information-sharing and coordination among members.

Among other benefits, these changes have made the Food Aid Convention 1999 a more flexible instrument, one that it is hoped will encourage new members and the provision of additional food aid. On July 2, 1999, the Food Aid Committee granted the United States (and certain other countries) an extension until June 30, 2000, to deposit its instrument of ratification to this Convention. As it has previously, the United States will provisionally apply the Food Aid Convention to ensure that there is an adequate supply of food aid, particularly as needed for emergencies.

The Secretary of Agriculture joins me in recommending that this Convention be transmitted to the Senate for its early and favorable consideration.

The Senate provided its advice and consent to ratification on September 20, 2000, with the following declarations:

> (a) Declarations. . . . (1) No Diversion.—United States contributions pursuant to this Convention shall not be diverted to government troops or security forces in countries which have been designated as state sponsors of terrorism by the Secretary of State. (2) Private Voluntary Organizations.—To the maximum feasible extent, distribution of United States contributions under this Convention should be accomplished through private voluntary organizations. (3) Treaty Interpretation.—The Senate affirms the applicability to all treaties of the constitutionally based principles of treaty interpretation set forth in Condition (1) of the resolution of ratification of the INF Treaty, approved by the Senate on May 27, 1988, and Condition (8) of the resolution of ratification of the Document Agreed Among the State Parties to the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe, approved by the Senate on May 14, 1997.

The Senate's advice and consent was also subject to the following proviso, which was not included in the instrument of ratification deposited by the President:

> (b) Proviso. . . . (1) Supremacy of the Constitution.—Nothing in the Convention requires or authorizes legislation or other action by the United States of America that is prohibited by the Constitution of the United States as interpreted by the United States.

146 CONG. REC. S8866 (daily ed. Sept. 20, 2000).

2. Horn of Africa Recovery and Food Security Act

In 1992 Congress enacted the Horn of Africa Recovery and Food Security Act ("Horn Act"), 102 Pub. L. No. 274, 106 Stat. 115, to "assure the people of the Horn of Africa the right to food and other basic necessities of life and to promote peace and development in the region." Id. Specifically, the Horn Act concerned Ethiopia (and now Eritrea), Sudan, Somalia, and Djibouti. It contained a number of Congressional findings and policy statements regarding the causes of political and economic insecurity and instability in the Horn, and statements of United States policy to address the problems in each country. Section 6(f) of the act authorized the provision to Ethiopia, Somalia, and Sudan of assistance under Part I, Chapters 1 (Development Assistance) and 10 (Development Fund for Africa) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, notwithstanding provisions of law which would otherwise restrict assistance to those countries. Section 6(e) required such assistance to be provided only through certain public international organizations or private and voluntary organizations as defined by § 496(e)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act. At various points in time, these countries had been subject to restrictions on assistance, due to debt delinquency, overthrow of a democratically elected head of government by decree or military coup, or terrorism.

F. TORTURE

1. Ratification of the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

On October 27, 1990, the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification of the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ("Torture Convention"), subject to certain reservations, understandings and declarations. 136 CONG. REC. S17,486 (daily ed. Oct. 27, 1990). U.N. Doc. A/RES/39/46 (1984), entered into force June 26, 1987. See Digest 1989–1990 at 176–90; I Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 823–52. On October 24, 1994, President William J. Clinton deposited the instrument of ratification with the United Nations, and the Torture Convention entered into force for the United States thirty days later.

2. Implementation of the Torture Convention

a. Extradition procedures in case alleging torture

On February 10, 1998, the United States filed a letter brief in the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in In the Matter of the Extradition of Chee Fan Chen, No. 97–15609, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 22125 (9th Cir. Sept. 4, 1998), appeal from D.C. No. MC-95-00140-LKK (E.D. Cal.), responding to a request for information concerning the extradition process that addressed applicability of the Torture Convention, as excerpted below.

The full text of the letter is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

The Court asked the [U.S. Attorney] to respond to several questions, which are paraphrased as follows. Has the Secretary of State ever imposed conditions on an extradition? If so, has the Secretary ever sent a monitor to the requesting country to ensure that the conditions were complied with? Would the Secretary send a monitor if she were to impose conditions on an extradition? Does the Secretary follow some statute, regulation, guideline, or other policy or procedure in determining whether to extradite or to condition an extradition—especially in the face of allegations the requested person nay be subjected to inhumane treatment by the requesting state? What criteria does she consider? The Court asked Chen's counsel to address what significance, if any, must or should the Court attach to the Secretary's Country Report.

The [U.S. Attorney] has consulted with the Department of State and submits the following response to the Court's questions.

There is no statute or published regulation applicable to the Secretary's decision-making process in determining whether to sign an extradition warrant or whether to impose conditions on an extradition. Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ("Torture Convention"), prohibits, among other things, the extradition of a person to a country where "there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture." Understandings included in the United States instrument of ratification of the treaty establish that the United States interprets this phrase to mean "if it is more likely than not that he would be tortured." The obligation imposed by the Convention with regard to extradition is vested with the Secretary of State as the United States official with ultimate responsibility for determining whether a fugitive will be extradited. Decisions on extradition are presented to the Secretary[1] only after a fugitive has been found extraditable by a United States judicial officer and given an opportunity to challenge the finding by seeking a writ of habeas corpus.

The Secretary of State has taken steps to ensure United States Government compliance with our obligation under the Torture Convention. All bureaus in the Department and all posts abroad have been advised that, in order to implement this obligation, the Secretary will consider in all extradition cases whether a person facing extradition "is more likely than not" to be tortured in the country requesting extradition. All Department bureaus and posts abroad have been requested to provide any information relevant to the issue of torture in a particular extradition case to the office of the Legal Adviser and the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor.

In each case where allegations relating to torture are made or the issue is otherwise brought to the Department's attention, appropriate policy and legal offices review and analyze all available information relevant to the case in preparing a recommendation to the Secretary. If the person wanted for extradition has attempted to raise this issue during judicial proceedings, any relevant information provided to the court is reviewed. The fugitive, on his own or through counsel, and other interested parties may also submit additional written documentation to the Department of State for consideration in reaching the decision on extradition.

[1] Within the Department of State, the statutory authority to make decisions on signing of extradition warrants has been delegated only to the Deputy Secretary. Thus, all requests for surrender are submitted to the Secretary personally or to the Deputy Secretary. For ease of reference here, the term "Secretary" should be read to include the Deputy Secretary.

The review also considers other information available to the Department concerning judicial and penal conditions and practices of the requesting country, including the information contained in the State Department's annual Human Rights Reports, and the possible relevance of that information to the individual whose surrender is at issue.

The Human Rights Reports are the official State Department reports to Congress on human rights conditions in individual countries for a given year as mandated by law (sections 116(d) and 502(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, and section 505(c) of the Trade Act of 1974, as amended).[2] The Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor, which drafts the Human Rights Reports and provides advisory opinions on asylum requests in deportation proceedings under section 207 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, is a key participant in this process.

Based on the resulting analysis of all relevant information, the Secretary may decide to surrender the fugitive to the requesting state, to deny surrender of the fugitive, or to surrender the fugitive subject to conditions or after receiving assurances she deems appropriate. The Secretary has indeed reached a decision to sign a warrant in several cases only after receiving adequate assurances of humane treatment from the requesting state. Such assurances are sought and received where necessary regardless of whether the requesting state is a party to the Torture Convention. In situations where follow-up monitoring by the United States Government has been deemed necessary, that responsibility is generally carried out by the relevant United States embassy or consulate in the country to which the person is extradited. With rare exception, the Department has not found it necessary to send anyone from Washington for this purpose.

[2] The government contends this Court should consider the Human Rights Report in the same manner it should consider all other material presented regarding Chen's claim that his extradition should be denied based on humanitarian reasons: the Court should defer that inquiry to the Secretary of State under the well-settled rule of non-inquiry and should refuse to recognize the existence of a "humanitarian exception" to that rule.

Because the Secretary follows a principled decision-making process with appropriate concern for the treatment a requested person will receive if returned to a requesting country, this Court should not hesitate to rule that there is no "humanitarian exception" to the rule of non-inquiry.

In an unpublished disposition, see Chen v. United States Marshal (in re Chen), 161 F.3d 11 (9th Cir. 1998), the Ninth Circuit affirmed the dismissal of Chen's habeas corpus petition, as excerpted below.

* * * *

There is little reason to expect Chen will face torture upon extradition. Chen cites several examples of official torture of pretrial detainees in Singapore, but nearly all of these involved either political prisoners or efforts to secure confessions. The crime with which Chen is charged was apolitical, and the facts are essentially admitted, making a confession (forced or otherwise) unnecessary.

Nor does Chen face a mandatory death sentence. Singapore law mandates the death penalty for those convicted of murder, see Singapore Penal Code § 302, but it also permits a variety of affirmative defenses to the charge of murder, including "grave and sudden provocation," "heat of passion," and self-defense, see id. § 300 (exceptions), and guarantees the basic elements of due process, including the right to counsel and the right to cross-examine adverse witnesses, see Singapore Crim. Proc.Code §§ 188, 195.

Singapore appears to depart further from United States jurisprudence in permitting a murder conviction if the defendant intentionally causes an injury "sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death," even if neither death nor serious injury were intended. See Singapore Penal Code § 300(c). However, this reduced mens rea requirement—somewhat analogous to our doctrine of "implied malice"—is not so "antipathetic to [the] court's sense of decency," see Gallina v. Fraser, 278 F.2d 77, 79 (2nd Cir. 1960), as to invoke the humanitarian exception to the rule of non-inquiry.

Constitutional claims may be raised on habeas review of a finding of extraditability, see In re Burt, 737 F.2d. 1477, 1483–84 (7th Cir. 1984); Plaster v. United States, 720 F.2d 340, 348–49 (4th Cir. 1983); see also Neely v. Henkel, 180 U.S. 109, 122–23, 21 S.Ct. 302, 45 L.Ed. 448 (1901) (considering but denying extraditee's constitutional claims), but conduct of United States officials must be at issue, see id. Chen challenges anticipated mistreatment by Singaporean officials, but argues that the "participation by United States officials in the extradition constitutes joint action sufficient to trigger constitutional rights." In Burt, 737 F.2d at 1487, the Seventh Circuit acknowledged the possibility of such joint action analysis in exceptional extradition cases. However, if the entirely permissible conduct of the United States in detaining Chen and facilitating his extradition could alone bring Singapore's conduct within the scope of the Eighth Amendment, the rule of non-inquiry would be a dead letter in nearly every extradition case.

b. Statutorily-required implementing regulations

In October 1998 the U.S. Congress enacted legislation declaring that:

> [i]t shall be the policy of the United States not to expel, extradite, or otherwise effect the involuntary return of any person to a country in which there are substantial grounds for believing the person would be in danger of being subjected to torture, regardless of whether the person is physically present in the United States.

Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998 ("FARR Act"), § 2242(a), as contained in Division G of Title XXII of the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1999, Pub. L. No. 105–277, 112 Stat. 2681–822 (1998). The FARR Act also required "the heads of the appropriate agencies [to] prescribe regulations to implement the obligations of the United States under Article 3 of the [Torture Convention], subject to any reservations, understandings, declarations, and provisos contained in the United States Senate resolution of ratification of the Convention." FARR Act, § 2242(b).

Subsection 2242(d) addressed the role of the judiciary, as follows:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of law, and except as provided in the regulations described in subsection (b), no court shall have jurisdiction to review the regulations adopted to implement this section, and nothing in this section shall be construed as providing any court jurisdiction to consider or review claims raised under the convention or this section, or any other determination made with respect to the application of the policy set forth in subsection (a), except as part of the review of a final order or removal pursuant to section 242 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1252).

Section 2242(c) provided that "[t]o the maximum extent consistent with the obligations of the United States under the [Torture] Convention . . . the regulations . . . shall exclude from the protection of such regulations aliens described in section 241(b)(3)(B) of the Immigration and Nationality Act ["INA"] (8 U.S.C. 1231(b)(3)(B))." The INA provides certain exceptions to a prohibition on deportation to a country if an alien's life or freedom would be threatened because of the alien's race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion. Regulations issued by the Department of Justice, Immigration and Naturalization Service, to implement the Torture Convention in deportation proceedings, discussed in (2), below, addressed the application of the INA provision.

Section 2242(e) provided that "[n]othing in this section shall be construed as limiting the authority of the Attorney General to detain any person under any provision of law, including, but not limited to, any provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act."

(1) Department of State: Implementation in the context of extradition

(i) Promulgation of regulations

On February 26, 1999, the Department of State issued regulations, excerpted below, required by the FARR Act to address claims of torture in the context of extradition. 64 Fed. Reg. 9435 (Feb. 26, 1999), 22 C.F.R. pt. 95. As noted, the regulations recorded the process already in place in the Department of State.

* * * *

. . . This rule implements certain obligations in the context of extradition undertaken by the United States as party to the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ("Torture Convention"). Article 3 of the Torture Convention provides that no State party "shall expel, return ('refouler') or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture." Promulgation of the rule is required by section 2242 of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998, Pub.L.No. 105–277, which provides that, not later than 120 days after the date of enactment of that Act, "the heads of the appropriate agencies shall prescribe regulations to implement the obligations of the United States under Article 3 of the [Torture Convention], subject to any reservations, understandings, declarations, and provisos contained in the United States Senate resolution of ratification of the Convention."

Pursuant to sections 3184 and 3186 of Title 18 of the United States Criminal Code, the Secretary of State is the U.S. official responsible for determining whether to surrender a fugitive to a foreign country by means of extradition. In order to implement the obligation assumed by the United States pursuant to Article 3 of the Convention when making this determination, the Department considers, when appropriate, the question of whether a person facing extradition from the U.S. "is more likely than not" to be tortured in the State requesting extradition. These regulations record the already existing procedures followed in this consideration.

PART 95—IMPLEMENTATION OF TORTURE CONVENTION IN EXTRADITION CASES

Sec. 95.1. Definitions.

(a) Convention means the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, done at New York on December 10, 1984, entered into force for the United States on November 10, 1994. Definitions provided below in paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section reflect the language of the Convention and understandings set forth in the United States instrument of ratification to the Convention.

(b) Torture means: (1) Any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions.

(2) In order to constitute torture, an act must be specifically intended to inflict severe physical or mental pain or suffering and that mental pain or suffering refers to prolonged mental harm caused by or resulting from:

(i) The intentional infliction or threatened infliction of severe physical pain or suffering;
(ii) The administration or application, or threatened administration or application, of mind altering substances or other procedures calculated to disrupt profoundly the senses or the personality;

(iii) The threat of imminent death; or

(iv) The threat that another person will imminently be subjected to death, severe physical pain or suffering, or the administration or application of mind altering substances or other procedures calculated to disrupt profoundly the senses or personality.

(3) Noncompliance with applicable legal procedural standards does not per se constitute torture.

(4) This definition of torture applies only to acts directed against persons in the offender's custody or physical control.

(5) The term "acquiescence" as used in this definition requires that the public official, prior to the activity constituting torture, have awareness of such activity and thereafter breach his or her legal responsibility to intervene to prevent such activity.

(6) The term "lawful sanctions" as used in this definition includes judicially imposed sanctions and other enforcement actions authorized by law, provided that such sanctions or actions were not adopted in order to defeat the object and purpose of the Convention to prohibit torture.

(7) Torture is an extreme form of cruel and inhuman treatment and does not include lesser forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

(c) Where there are substantial grounds for believing that [a fugitive] would be in danger of being subjected to torture means if it is more likely than not that the fugitive would be tortured.

(d) Secretary means Secretary of State and includes, for purposes of this rule, the Deputy Secretary of State, by delegation.

Sec. 95.2 Application.

(a) Article 3 of the Convention imposes on the parties certain obligations with respect to extradition. That Article provides as follows:

(1) No State party shall expel, return ("refouler") or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

(2) For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights.

(b) Pursuant to sections 3184 and 3186 of Title 18 of the United States Criminal Code, the Secretary is the U.S. official responsible for determining whether to surrender a fugitive to a foreign country by means of extradition. In order to implement the obligation assumed by the United States pursuant to Article 3 of the Convention, the Department considers the question of whether a person facing extradition from the U.S. "is more likely than not" to be tortured in the State requesting extradition when appropriate in making this determination.

Sec. 95.3 Procedures.

(a) Decisions on extradition are presented to the Secretary only after a fugitive has been found extraditable by a United States judicial officer. In each case where allegations relating to torture are made or the issue is otherwise brought to the Department's attention, appropriate policy and legal offices review and analyze information relevant to the case in preparing a recommendation to the Secretary as to whether or not to sign the surrender warrant.

(b) Based on the resulting analysis of relevant information, the Secretary may decide to surrender the fugitive to the requesting State, to deny surrender of the fugitive, or to surrender the fugitive subject to conditions.

Sec. 95.4 Review and construction.

Decisions of the Secretary concerning surrender of fugitives for extradition are matters of executive discretion not subject to judicial review. Furthermore, pursuant to section 2242(d) of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998, Pub.L.No. 105–277, notwithstanding any other provision of law, no court shall have jurisdiction to review these regulations, and nothing in section 2242 shall be construed as providing any court jurisdiction to consider or review claims raised under the Convention or section 2242, or any other determination made with respect to the application of the policy set forth in section 2242(a), except as part of the review of a final order of removal pursuant to section 242 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1252), which is not applicable to extradition proceedings.

(ii) Response to inquiry concerning regulations

On April 28, 1999, David R. Andrews, Legal Adviser of the Department of State, responded to an inquiry concerning the regulations from the World Organization Against Torture USA. The response described the procedures in place for review of torture concerns in the context of extradition and explained that nothing in the Torture Convention required the U.S. obligations in the extradition context to be implemented by the judicial rather than the executive branch of the U.S. government.

I am writing on behalf of the Secretary of State in response to your letter of April 12, 1999. You have raised several concerns related to the regulations recently promulgated by the Department of State concerning implementation of the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ("Torture Convention") in extradition cases. I want to assure you that the Department is and has been fully implementing its obligation under the Torture Convention not to extradite a person to another State where he would be more likely than not to be tortured. As noted in the Federal Register, the regulations, issued as required by section 2242 of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998 (Public Law 105–277), record procedures already in place. We are confident that these regulations and the procedures followed are in full compliance with the requirements of the Torture Convention.

As you are undoubtedly aware, the process of extradition from the United States is controlled by section 3181 et. seq. of Title 18 of the U.S. Criminal Code. Under those provisions, a person must first be found extraditable through a judicial proceeding. For a person found extraditable, sections 3184 and 3186 place the decision as to whether or not to extradite with the Secretary of State. Under the long-established "rule of non-inquiry," courts do not address issues raised concerning the treatment of fugitives on return to the country requesting their extradition, holding instead that such issues are reserved to the Secretary of State in making the final extradition decision. See e.g., Ahmad v. Wigen, 910 F.2d 1063, 1064–66 (2d Cir. 1990).

In order to ensure compliance with our obligation under the Torture Convention, the Department has advised all bureaus in the Department and all posts abroad that the Secretary will consider whether a person facing extradition "is more likely than not" to be tortured in the country requesting extradition when appropriate in making an extradition decision. All Department bureaus and posts abroad have been requested to provide any information relevant to the issue of torture in a particular extradition case to the Office of the Legal Adviser and the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor.

In each case where allegations relating to torture are made or the issue is otherwise brought to the Department's attention, appropriate offices review and analyze available information relevant to the case in preparing a recommendation to the Secretary. If the person wanted for extradition has attempted to raise this issue during judicial proceedings, any relevant information provided to the court is reviewed. The fugitive, on his own or through counsel, and other interested parties may also submit additional written documentation to the Department of State for consideration in reaching the decision on extradition. The review also considers other information available to the Department concerning judicial and penal conditions and practices of the requesting country, including the information contained in the State Department's annual Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, and the possible relevance of that information to the individual whose surrender is at issue. The Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor, which edits the Country Reports and prepares them for delivery to Congress as well as providing advisory opinions on asylum requests and withholding of removal, is a key participant in this process.

Based on the resulting analysis of all relevant information, the Secretary may decide to surrender the fugitive to the requesting State, to deny surrender of the fugitive, or to surrender the fugitive subject to conditions or after receiving assurances she deems appropriate. This range of options can only truly be exercised by the executive branch, through its foreign affairs function.

* * * *

You have also questioned the absence of an adjudication process on this issue and asked for clarification of the statement in section 95.4 of the Department's regulations that the Secretary's final decision is a matter of executive discretion not subject to judicial review. As discussed above, sections 3184 and 3186 clearly make this decision a matter of the Secretary's discretion. Nothing in the Torture Convention requires that the international obligation undertaken by the United States in the extradition context must be implemented by the judicial rather than the executive branch. Indeed, the Torture Convention was ratified by the United States on the understanding that it was not self-executing.

The recent enactment of section 2242 calling for promulgation of the regulations does not change this fact. It states that the international obligation under Article 3 of the Torture Convention "shall be the policy of the United States" and requires the issuance of regulations. In so doing, section 2242 explicitly provides that "no court shall have jurisdiction to review the regulations adopted to implement this section, and nothing in this section shall be construed as providing any court jurisdiction to consider or review claims raised under the Convention or this section, or any other determination made with respect to the application of the policy" (with an exception for cases under the Immigration and Nationality Act, not applicable to extradition). This is consistent with the judicially developed rule of non-inquiry.

Finally, because these regulations involve a foreign affairs function of the United States, they are exempt from the notice and comment requirement of 5 U.S.C. 553.

(2) Immigration and Naturalization Service: Implementation in the context of deportation

On February 19, 1999, the Department of Justice, Immigration and Naturalization Service issued regulations concerning the Convention on Torture in the context of deportation as an interim rule, effective March 22, 1999. 64 Fed. Reg. 8478 (Feb. 19, 1999); corrected 64 Fed. Reg. 13,881 (Mar. 23, 1999), 8 C.F.R. pts 3, 103, 208, 235, 238, 240, 241, 253, and 507. The accompanying Supplementary Information statement described the regulations as excerpted below.

* * * *

. . . [Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture] is similar in some ways to Article 33 of the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees. The Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, July 28, 1951, 189 U.N.T.S. 137 (hereinafter Refugee Convention). Article 33 provides that "[n]o Contracting State shall expel or return ('refouler') a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion." The United States currently implements Article 33 of the Refugee Convention through the withholding of removal provision in section 241(b)(3) (formerly section 243(h)) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA or the Act). That provision, as interpreted by the courts, requires the Attorney General to withhold an alien's removal to a country where it is more likely than not that the alien's life or freedom would be threatened on account of one of the five grounds mentioned above. See INS v. Stevic, 467 U.S. 407, 429–30 (1984).

However, there are some important differences between withholding of removal under section 241(b) (3) of the Act and Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture. First, several categories of individuals, including persons who assisted in Nazi persecution or engaged in genocide, persons who have persecuted others, persons who have been convicted of particularly serious crimes, persons who are believed to have committed serious non-political crimes before arriving in the United States, and persons who pose a danger to the security of the United States, are ineligible for withholding of removal. See INA section 241(b) (3) (B). Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture does not exclude such persons from its scope. Second, section 241(b) (3) applies only to aliens whose life or freedom would be threatened on account of race, religion, nationality, and membership in a particular social group or political opinion. Article 3 covers persons who fear torture that may not be motivated by one of those five grounds. Third, the definition of torture does not encompass all types of harm that might qualify as a threat to life or freedom. Thus, the coverage of Article 3 is different from that of section 241(b) (3): broader in some ways and narrower in others.

Until the October 21, 1998 legislation, there was no statutory provision to implement Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture in United States domestic law. When the United States Senate gave advice and consent to ratification of the Convention Against Torture, it made a declaration that Articles 1 through 16 were not self-executing. Recognizing, however, that ratification of the Convention represented a statement by the United States to the international community of its commitment to comply with the Convention's provisions to the extent permissible under the Constitution and existing federal statutes, the Department of Justice sought to conform its practices to the Convention by ensuring compliance with Article 3 in the case of aliens who are subject to removal from the United States.

In order to conform to the Convention before the enactment of implementing legislation, the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS or Service) adopted a pre-regulatory administrative process to assess the applicability of Article 3 to individual cases in which an alien is subject to removal. Under this pre-regulatory administrative process, upon completion of deportation, exclusion, or removal proceedings and prior to execution of a final order of removal, the INS has considered whether removing an alien to a particular country is consistent with Article 3. If it is determined that the alien could not be removed to the country in question consistent with Article 3, the INS has used its existing discretionary authority to ensure that the alien is not removed to that country for so long as he or she is likely to be tortured there. See INA Sec. 103 (a); 8 CFR 2.1.

In formulating its pre-regulatory administrative process to conform to Article 3 in the context of the removal of aliens, the INS has been careful not to expand upon the protections that Article 3 grants. Only execution of an order of removal to a country where an alien is more likely than not to be tortured would violate the Convention. Therefore, the INS has not addressed the question of whether Article 3 prohibits removal in an individual case until there is a final administrative order of removal to a place where an alien claims that he or she would be tortured, and until all appeals, requests for review, or other administrative or judicial challenges to execution of that order have been resolved. This approach has allowed the INS to address the applicability of Article 3 to a case only when actually necessary to comply with the Convention. It has also allowed an individual alien to exhaust all avenues for pursuing any other more extensive benefit or protection for which he or she may be eligible before seeking the minimal guarantee provided by Article 3 that he or she will not be returned to a specific country where it is likely that he or she would be tortured. At the same time, this approach has allowed the INS, the agency responsible for executing removal orders, to ensure that no order is executed under circumstances that would violate the Convention.

* * * *

Structure of Rule

Generally, the rule creates two separate provisions for protection under Article 3 for aliens who would be tortured in the country of removal. The first provision establishes a new form of withholding of removal under Sec. 208.16(c). This type of protection is only available to aliens who are not barred from eligibility for withholding of removal under section 241(b) (3) (B) of the Act. The second provision, under Sec. 208.17(a), concerns aliens who would be tortured in the country of removal but who are subject to the bars contained in section 241(b)(3)(B) of the Act. These aliens may only be granted deferral of removal, a less permanent form of protection than withholding of removal and one that is more easily and quickly terminated if it becomes possible to remove the alien consistent with Article 3. Deferral of removal will be granted based on the withholding of removal application to an alien who is likely to be tortured in the country of removal but who is barred from withholding of removal. Section 208.17(d) sets out a special, streamlined procedure through which the INS may seek to terminate deferral of removal when appropriate.

Withholding of Removal Under the Convention Against Torture

Revised Sec. 208.16 (c) creates a new form of withholding of removal, which will be granted to an eligible alien in removal proceedings who establishes that he or she would be tortured in the proposed country of removal. This section references new Sec. 208.18 (a), which contains the definition of torture, and provides that this definition will be applied in all determinations about eligibility for this new form of withholding, or for deferral of removal.

An alien granted withholding under new Sec. 208.16(c) would be treated similarly to an alien granted withholding of removal under Sec. 208.16(b), the regulatory provision implementing section 241(b)(3) of the Act. The rule provides at Sec. 208.16(c)(2) that, in order to be eligible for withholding of removal under Article 3, an alien must establish that it is more likely than not that he or she would be tortured in the country in question. Imposition of this burden of proof on the alien gives effect to one of the Senate understandings upon which ratification was conditioned, which provides that "the United States understands that the phrase, 'where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture,' as used in Article 3 of the Convention, to mean 'if it is more likely than not that he would be tortured.'" The ratification history makes clear that this understanding was intended to ensure that the standard of proof for Article 3 would be the same standard as that for withholding of removal under section 241(b)(3) of the Act, then section 243(h) of the Act. See, e.g., Convention Against Torture, submitted to the Senate, May 20, 1988, S. Treaty Doc. No. 100–20, at 6 (1988) (hereinafter S. Treaty Doc. No. 100–20).

* * * *

Deferral of Removal Under the Convention Against Torture

Although aliens who are barred from withholding of removal under Sec. 241(b) (3) (B) of the Act are not eligible for withholding under 208.16(c), the Article 3 implementing statute directs that any exclusion of these aliens from the protection of these regulations must be consistent with United States obligations under the Convention, subject to United States reservations, understandings, declarations, and provisos conditioning ratification. Section 2242(c) of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998. Article 3 prohibits returning any person to a country where he or she would be tortured, and contains no exceptions to this mandate. Nor do any of the United States reservations, understandings, declarations, or provisos contained in the Senate's resolution of ratification provide that the United States may exclude any person from Article 3's prohibition on return because of criminal or other activity or for any other reason. Indeed, the ratification history of the Convention Against Torture clearly indicates that the Executive Branch presented Article 3 to the Senate with the understanding that it "does not permit any discretion or provide for any exceptions * * *." Convention Against Torture: Hearing Before the Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, 101st Cong., 18 (1990)

(statement of Mark Richard, Deputy Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division, DOJ).

Wherever possible, subsequent acts of Congress must be construed as consistent with treaty obligations. See, e.g., Cook v. United States, 288 U.S. 102, 120 (1933) ("[a] treaty will not be deemed to have been abrogated or modified by a later statute, unless such purpose on the part of Congress has been clearly expressed."). Here, Congress has not indicated an intent to modify the obligations imposed by Article 3. In fact, Congress has clearly expressed its intent that any exclusion of aliens described in section 241(b)(3)(B) of the Act from the protection of these regulations must be consistent with Article 3. The obligation not to return such an alien to a country where he or she would be tortured remains in effect. Thus, while this rule does not extend the advantages associated with a grant of withholding of removal to aliens barred under section 241(b)(3)(B) of the Act, it does ensure that they are not returned to a country where they would be tortured.

To this end, the rule creates a special provision under Sec. 208.17(a) for deferral of removal when an alien described in section 241(b)(3)(B) of the Act has been ordered removed to a country where it has been determined that he or she would be tortured. . . .

* * * *

Termination of Deferral of Removal

The most important distinction between withholding of removal and deferral of removal is the mode of termination. Section 208.17(d) will provide for a streamlined termination process for deferral of removal when it is no longer likely that an alien would be tortured in the country of removal.

Under existing regulations, withholding can only be terminated when the government moves to reopen the case, meets the standards for reopening, and meets its burden of proof to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the alien is not eligible for withholding. The termination process for deferral of removal is designed to be much more accessible, so that deferral can be terminated quickly and efficiently when appropriate.

* * * *

Implementation of the Convention Against Torture

Section 208.18 sets out a number of provisions governing the implementation of the Convention Against Torture provisions. This section contains the definition of torture that will apply in both the withholding and deferral contexts, rules about the applicability of the new provisions, and a section clarifying that this rule does not expand the availability of judicial review to aliens who assert claims to protection under the Convention Against Torture.

* * * *

Cases in Which Diplomatic Assurances Are Considered

Section 208.18(c) sets out special procedures for cases in which the Secretary of State forwards to the Attorney General assurances that the Secretary has obtained from the government of a specific country that an alien would not be tortured if returned there. In some cases, it may be possible for the United States to actually reduce the likelihood that an alien would be tortured in a particular country. The nature and reliability of such assurances, and any arrangements through which such assurances might be verified, would require careful evaluation before any decision could be reached about whether such assurances would allow an alien's removal to that country consistent with Article 3. This paragraph sets out special procedures under which the Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of State, will assume responsibility for assessing the adequacy of any such assurances in appropriate cases. Cases will be handled under this provision only if such assurances are actually forwarded to the Attorney General by the Secretary of State for consideration under this special process. It is anticipated that these cases will be rare.

In cases in which the Secretary has forwarded assurances under this provision, the procedures for administrative consideration of claims under the Convention Against Torture set out elsewhere in this rule will not apply. Further, the rule provides that the Attorney General's authority to make determinations about the applicability of Article 3 in such a case may be exercised by the Deputy Attorney General or by the Commissioner, but may not be further delegated. Thus the rule ensures that cases involving the adequacy of diplomatic assurances forwarded to the Attorney General by the Secretary of State will receive consideration at senior levels within the Department of Justice, which is appropriate to the delicate nature of a diplomatic undertaking to ensure that an alien is not tortured in another country. Under § 208.17(f), these special procedures may also be invoked in appropriate cases for considering whether deferral of removal should be terminated.

c. Claimed reviewability of Secretary of State extradition decision

In 1998 the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California denied a petition for habeas corpus alleging that the extradition magistrate's order certifying extraditability violated Article 3 of the Torture Convention. Cornejo-Barreto v. Seifert, SA CV-97-00843-AHS (C.D. Cal. Oct. 7, 1998). The district court found that Article 3 is not self-executing and therefore "does not give Cornejo-Barreto rights which are enforceable in a judicial proceeding." The court also found that "the rule of non-inquiry in extradition cases has historically precluded United States courts from inquiring into the possible treatment of a fugitive, such as Cornejo-Barreto, if he is returned to Mexico."

Appeals from this and a second habeas corpus petition resulted in conflicting language in two Ninth Circuit opinions on the reviewability of the Secretary of State's decision to extradite in light of the FARR Act. See 219 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2000) and 379 F.3d 1075 (9th Cir. 2004). In further developments, the Ninth Circuit sitting en banc dismissed the case as moot and vacated the 2004 opinion while leaving the 2000 opinion standing. 389 F.3d 1307 (9th Cir. 2004). As this volume went to press, the U.S.Government was endeavoring to change the outcome as to the two opinions. See also Digest 2001 at 71–87.

d. Submission of Initial Report to the Committee Against Torture

The United States submitted its Initial Report to the Committee Against Torture, pursuant to its obligation under Article 19 of the Torture Convention, on October 15, 1999. The full text of the report is available at www.state.gov/www/global/human_rights/torture_index.html. A briefing on the Initial Report, as excerpted below, was provided to the Committee Against Torture on October 15, 1999 by Harold Hongju Koh, Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor, and James E. Castello, Associate Deputy Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice. The full text of the briefing is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/991015_koh_rpt_torture.html.

The right to be free from torture is an indelible element of the American experience. Our country was founded by people who sought refuge from severe governmental repression and persecution and who, as a consequence, insisted that a prohibition against the use of cruel or unusual punishment be placed into the Bill of Rights. As our report today notes, "Torture is [now] prohibited by law throughout the United States. It is categorically denounced as a matter of policy and as a tool of state authority. In every instance, torture is a criminal offense. No official of the government, federal, state or local, civilian or military, is authorized to commit or to instruct anyone else to commit torture. Nor may any official condone or tolerate torture in any form. No exceptional circumstances may be invoked as a justification for torture."

It would be a mistake, however, to regard opposition to torture as a uniquely American concept. Article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides that "[n]o one shall be subjected to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment." Thus, the right to be free from torture is a universally recognized human right profoundly inter-linked with other human rights. For example, eliminating the use of torture not only reinforces individual dignity and physical health but also protects freedom of speech, expression, assembly, religion and the press. Likewise, making illegal the practice of securing criminal confessions through torture not only establishes and maintains the credibility of the judicial system but also protects the internationally recognized right of due process. For these reasons, no government can justify the use of torture or other cruel and unusual punishments as a means of policing or protecting its citizens.

Within the United States, as we fully acknowledge in this report, there continue to be areas of concern, contention and criticism. But we note that torture does not occur in the United States, except in aberrational situations and never as matter of policy. When it does, it constitutes a serious criminal offense, subjecting the perpetrators to prosecution and entitling the victims to various remedies, including rehabilitation and compensation. Any act falling within the Convention's definition of torture is clearly illegal and prosecutable everywhere in the country. We acknowledge areas where we must work harder because we believe the first step is to identify torture wherever it exists. We believe that this report is both comprehensive and candid. We have accurately and thoroughly exposed our strengths and failings and call upon other signatory states, as well as the entire international community, to do the same.

One of the cornerstones of our commitment to promoting human rights and ending torture is the Annual Country Reports on Human Rights, now in their 27th year. These reports, which we submit to Congress every February, examine how governments around the world adhere to international human rights standards as embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Convention Against Torture and Other International Human Rights Standards. Every individual country report examines whether a country has committed torture or other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment. It is a hallmark of our country reports that they openly report on torture wherever it occurs. Our experience demonstrates that such honest reporting helps to curtail abusive practices in many countries.

At the UN Human Rights Commission each spring and at the UN General Assembly each fall, we support countries' specific resolutions that mention cases of torture and thematic resolutions that support the work of the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture. We urge all countries to cooperate fully with the Rapporteur, underscoring how vitally important it is that the Rapporteur be independent and have full access to human rights activists and abuse victims with full safeguards protecting these sources.

Moreover, where there is evidence of torture we demand an accounting. Torturers must be shown that they cannot act with impunity; and thus, for example, the U.S. took the lead in pushing for the formation of an international criminal tribunal on The Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda to bring to justice those responsible for torture and other crimes. We've worked very closely with the Tribunal for The Former Yugoslavia to document a wide array of human rights abuses, war crimes and crimes against humanity, including torture in Kosovo.

We are also seeking to establish mechanisms of accountability for the Khmer Rouge and the current regime in Iraq and we support the work of truth commissions the world over, including the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in South Africa, as well as those in Guatemala and El Salvador. Most recently, the U.S. supported the establishment by the UN of an international commission of inquiry to look into the tragic events which took place in East Timor in connection with the recent voting there.

* * * *

The Department of Justice also has established a working group dedicated to identifying and taking appropriate action—whether prosecution, extradition or deportation—against alleged torturers who have sought to use the U.S. to hide from responsibility for their crimes.

We also work to ensure that the U.S. military and police training do not benefit known human rights violators and that we do not sell U.S.-produced equipment to those who commit such abuses. The Administration's commitment to this principle was reinforced by recent legislation requiring increased attention to the record of security force units receiving our assistance.

But this is not merely a matter of enforcing the law but, rather, one of Administration policy. We have worked hard to ensure that our embassies understand the new provisions of the Foreign Operations and DOD Appropriations Act and that each embassy has a plan in place to ensure that it will comply with the law.

G. JUDICIAL PROCEDURE, PENALTIES AND RELATED ISSUES

1. Death Penalty

a. U.S. responses to UN bodies

Various United Nations bodies criticized the United States for its death penalty policies in the 1990s. The United States responded to these criticisms by assuring the international community that the United States and the individual constituent states guarantee due process and provide exhaustive appeals before capital punishment is carried out, and that U.S. policies and practice are consistent with its obligations under international law. Also, the United States expressed its view that in a democratic society, the criminal justice system, including the punishments prescribed for the most serious crimes, should reflect the will of the people, freely expressed and appropriately implemented. In the United States, the use of the death penalty is a decision left to democratically elected governments at the federal level and at the level of each individual state.
