The UN Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions, Bruce Waly Ndiaye, visited the United States from September 21 to October 8, 1997, and submitted an addendum regarding his mission to the United States in his 1997 annual report to the UN Commission on Human Rights. U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1998/68/Add.3 (1998). The Special Rapporteur's 1997 annual report and addendum regarding the United States are available at http://daccessdds.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/G98/102/37/PDF/G9810237.pdf?OpenElement.

The United States responded with disappointment to Special Rapporteur Ndiaye's report. The United States described the report as misleading and said that it failed to mention the exhaustive procedural protections in U.S. law that ensure the death penalty is not carried out in an arbitrary manner. The U.S. response also addressed important issues of treaty law, federalism, police brutality, and the death penalty as applied to juveniles and persons with mental disabilities.

On November 2, 1999, Ambassador Michael Southwick, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor, addressed the Third Committee of the General Assembly on the implementation of human rights instruments and the death penalty. The full text of Ambassador Southwick's statement, excerpted below, is available at www.un.int/usa/99_101.htm.

We understand the sentiments that have motivated the opposition to the use of the death penalty around the world and especially in the United States. However, this view represents a significant departure from well-established international norms.

. . . [W]hile international law limits capital punishment to the most serious crimes and requires certain safeguards, most notably due process, existing international law does not prohibit capital punishment. Indeed, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights specifically recognizes the right of states that have not abolished capital punishment to impose it.

We believe . . . that in a democratic society, the criminal justice system, including the punishments prescribed for the most serious crimes, should reflect the will of the people freely expressed and appropriately implemented.

Within the United States, the important question of capital punishment is a subject of ongoing, passionate debate. At present, however, a majority of constituent states of the United States have chosen to retain the option of imposing the death penalty for the most serious crimes. Even in those cases where capital punishment is finally imposed, it is imposed only after a lengthy appeal and judicial review process.

. . . [W]e recognize that many countries have abolished the death penalty under their domestic laws and that a number have accepted treaty obligations to that effect, and we respect those decisions. In the United States, however, our open and democratic processes have led to different results.

b. Michael Domingues v. State of Nevada

This case arose from the 1993 brutal murder of Arjin Chanel Pechpo and her four-year-old son Jonathan Smith by sixteen-year-old Michael Domingues. Following a jury trial in Nevada, Domingues was convicted of first-degree murder, first-degree murder with a deadly weapon, burglary, and robbery with use of a deadly weapon and sentenced to death. The Supreme Court of Nevada affirmed the conviction. Domingues v. State, 917 P.2d 1364 (Nev. 1996). The U.S. Supreme Court denied Domingues' petition for a writ of certiorari. 519 U.S. 968 (1996).

Subsequently, Domingues filed a motion in state court for the correction of an illegal sentence, claiming that, because he was sixteen years old at the time of the murders, his execution would violate the ICCPR and customary international law. The state trial court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court of Nevada affirmed the lower court decision, concluding that the U.S. express reservation to Article 6(5) of the ICCPR "negates [petitioner's] claim that he was illegally sentenced." Domingues v. State, 961 P.2d 1279 (Nev. 1998). Thereafter, Domingues again petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari.

In October 1999 the United States filed an amicus brief urging the Supreme Court to deny the petition for writ of certiorari. In the brief, the United States argued that imposing capital punishment on a minor did not violate U.S. obligations under the ICCPR, customary international law, or a jus cogens peremptory norm of international law. The brief explained further that article 6(5) provides that "[s]entence of death shall not be imposed for crimes committed by persons below eighteen years of age and shall not be carried out on pregnant women." U.S. ratification of the Covenant, however, was conditioned on a declaration that the ICCPR was not self-executing and a reservation to Article 6(5):

> The United States reserves the right, subject to its Constitutional constraints, to impose capital punishment on any person (other than a pregnant woman) duly convicted under existing or future laws permitting the imposition of capital punishment, including such punishment for crimes committed by persons below eighteen years of age.

The full text of the U.S. brief opposing the grant of certiorari, excerpted below, is available at www.usdoj.gov/osg/briefs/1999/2pet/6invit/98-8327.pet.ami.inv.html. See also Digest 2001 at 303–04.

Petitioner contends that his death sentence for murder must be set aside because he was 16 years old when he committed the offense. Petitioner has not argued that the Constitution prohibits the capital punishment of a 16-year-old offender. Cf. Stanford v. Kentucky, 492 U.S. 361 (1989) (rejecting Eighth Amendment challenge to imposition of capital punishment against 16-year-old offender). Rather, petitioner makes three claims based on sources of international law. First, he contends that his sentence violates Article 6(5) of the ICCPR, which prohibits the imposition of capital punishment on an offender who was under 18 years old at the time of his crime. Second, he argues that a rule of customary international law bars the death penalty for 16-year-old offenders, and that principle preempts the application of Nevada's death penalty statute to his case. Third, he contends that the prohibition under customary international law against the death penalty for 16-year-old offenders has risen to the level of a jus cogens or peremptory norm, from which no derogation is permitted under international law. In our view, petitioner has identified no issue of law that merits this Court's review in this case, nor any basis for relief from the judgment of the Nevada Supreme Court.

1. Petitioner first contends that his death sentence contravenes Article 6(5) of the ICCPR. . . .

a. Petitioner first argues (Pet. 5–6, 20–23) that the Senate's reservation to Article 6(5) is invalid under the United States Constitution because, under separation of powers principles, the Senate may not give its selective consent to treaty provisions negotiated by the President. Petitioner argues that a Senate reservation to part of a treaty that the President submits to the Senate for its advice and consent is akin to a presidential line-item veto of congressional legislation, which this Court held unconstitutional in Clinton v. City of New York, 524 U.S. 417 (1998). That argument is flawed for several reasons.

First, the separation of powers claim advanced by petitioner is not presented in this case. Petitioner overlooks that the reservation to Article 6(5) did not originate in the Senate. Rather, that reservation was submitted to the Senate by the President as part of the President's request for the Senate's advice and consent to the ICCPR, and was adopted by the Senate without change. See pp. 1–2, supra. Accordingly, the Senate in no sense vetoed or modified any part of the treaty submitted to it by the President for advice and consent. Rather, it gave its consent to the treaty in the precise form submitted to it by the President.

Second, the Senate has the constitutional authority to reserve its consent to part of a treaty negotiated by the President. The Constitution provides that the President "shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur." U.S. Const. Art. II, § 2, Cl. 2. The President "make[s]" a treaty after the Senate has provided its advice and consent, not before that advice and consent process, when the treaty is negotiated. If the President objects to reservations imposed by the Senate as a condition to its consent to a treaty that the President has negotiated, then the President need not accept the Senate's partial consent to the treaty. The President may decline to deposit an instrument of ratification to the treaty and thereby decline to "make" the treaty. See Restatement (Third) of the Law of the Foreign Relations of the United States § 303 cmt. d (1987) (Restatement); see also Id. § 303 rep. note 3 (noting President Taft's refusal to make arbitration treaties after Senate demanded unwelcome reservations). If, however, the President agrees to the Senate's reservations and "make[s]" the treaty after the Senate has attached reservations to its consent (as was the case with the ICCPR, see pp. 2–3, supra), then those reservations become part of the treaty insofar as the treaty is to be applied in United States courts. Id. § 314.

Unlike the Presidential line-item veto invalidated in Clinton v. City of New York, supra, the Senate's practice of attaching reservations to its consent to treaties also has an extensive historical pedigree, dating to at least the Jay Treaty of 1794 between the United States and Great Britain. See Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, Nov. 19, 1794, 8 Stat. 116. Moreover, although this Court has never squarely decided whether the Senate may attach reservations to its consent to a treaty, the Court has noted that practice on several occasions without indicating any disapproval or questioning of its validity. (fn. omitted). Accordingly, the United States' reservation to Article 6(5) of the ICCPR is valid as a matter of United States constitutional law.

b. Petitioner also argues that, even if the Senate's reservation to Article 6(5) is valid as matter of United States constitutional law, it is not valid as a matter of the international law of treaties, and so the United States must be deemed to have accepted all of Article 6(5) without reservation, including the prohibition against capital punishment for offenders under 18 years of age. Petitioner does not challenge generally the authority of the United States under international law to reserve ratification to parts of treaties. Indeed, reservation is a well-established feature of treaty law and practice by which a state may decline to accept certain provisions of a treaty. See Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (Vienna Convention), May 23, 1969, art. 2(1)(d), 1155 U.N.T.S. 332, 333, 8 I.L.M. 679, 681; (fn. omitted) see also Restatement § 313. Rather, petitioner argues that the reservation to Article 6(5) is invalid because the ICCPR elsewhere makes Article 6(5) nonderogable in times of emergency (Pet. 23–24), and because the reservation is alleged to be incompatible with the object and purpose of the ICCPR (Pet. 25–26).

Even if there were merit to those arguments as a matter of international treaty law, that would not mean that Article 6(5) should be enforced by a domestic court in the face of the United States' reservation. A reservation in which the President and the Senate have concurred is controlling as a matter of domestic law, and prevents the provision of the treaty to which the reservation was taken from being part of the "Treat[y] made * * * under the authority of the United States" that would bind the States under the Supremacy Clause. U.S. Const. Art. VI, Cl. 2. The President, with the concurrence of the Senate, has the constitutional authority to "make" treaties, and the courts have no authority to add provisions to treaties that were not adopted by the other Branches. See The Amiable Isabella, 19 U.S. (Wheat.) 1, 71 (1821). If other nations are dissatisfied with the reservations attached by the United States to its ratification of a treaty, they may present a diplomatic protest or may decline to recognize themselves as being in treaty relations with the United States, but that is a matter between states and not for judicial resolution. Accordingly, where the United States has ratified a treaty subject to a reservation exempting it from a particular provision of the treaty, the courts may not give effect to the provision to which reservation is made on the ground that the reservation violates international law. Cf. Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 598–599 (1884) (if Congress enacts a statute that is inconsistent with a prior treaty, courts must give effect to the statute rather than the treaty).

In any event, petitioner's challenges to the validity of the reservation fall wide of the mark. Petitioner argues that the reservation to Article 6(5) is invalid under the law of treaties because it is contrary to the "object and purpose" of the ICCPR. See Vienna Convention, art. 19(c); Restatement § 313(1)(c). Of the 149 states that are parties to the ICCPR, 11 have objected to the United States' reservation to Article 6(5), and nine of the 11 have objected on the ground that the reservation violated the

ICCPR's object and purpose. See Multilateral Treaties Deposited with the Secretary-General: Status as at 31 Dec. 1994, U.N. Doc. ST/LG/SER.E/13 (1995). Not one of the states that lodged an objection stated that, because of the United States' reservation, it does not recognize the ICCPR as being in force between itself and the United States. State practice therefore supports the conclusion that the United States' reservation to Article 6(5) is valid as a matter of treaty law. See Vienna Convention, art. 20(4)(b) (objection by a contracting state to another state's reservation to part of a treaty does not prevent the treaty from entering into force unless such an intention "is definitely expressed by the objecting State"). (fn. omitted)

Petitioner also argues that, because the ICCPR makes Article 6(5) nonderogable in times of emergency, see ICCPR art. 4(2), Article 6(5) must be so fundamental to the treaty that no reservation may be taken to it. There is no necessary correlation under the ICCPR, however, between the nonderogability of a right and its importance or centrality to the treaty. Several rights of profound importance, such as the right against arbitrary arrest and detention (protected by Article 9(1)) and the right to be informed of the nature of criminal charges brought against one (protected by Article 14(3)(a)), are not made nonderogable under the ICCPR. If the parties to the Covenant had intended to prohibit reservations to Article 6(5), they could have so provided explicitly, as authorized by Article 19(b) of the Vienna Convention, rather than doing so obliquely (as petitioner argues) by making the article nonderogable in times of national emergency. Accordingly, as a matter of treaty law, the United States' reservation to Article 6(5) is valid and effective.

2. Petitioner also contends (Pet. 11–17) that customary international law prohibits Nevada from imposing capital punishment on one who was 16 years old at the time of his offense. This case, however, does not present an appropriate vehicle for this Court's review of that issue. In addition, petitioner's claim cannot in any event proceed past the threshold, in light of actions by the United States Government in international fora objecting to the

a. Customary international law has been defined as "international law result[ing] from a general and consistent practice of states followed by them from a sense of legal obligation." Restatement § 102(2). In a case involving customary international law, this Court stated:

> International law is part of our law, and must be ascertained and administered by the courts of justice of appropriate jurisdiction, as often as questions of right depending upon it are duly presented for their determination. For this purpose, where there is no treaty, and no controlling executive or legislative act or judicial decision, resort must be had to the customs and usages of civilized nations; and as evidence of these, to the works of jurists and commentators, who by years of labor, research and experience, have made themselves peculiarly well acquainted with the subjects of which they treat.

In The Paquete Habana, the Court was articulating a rule of decision in a subject area—the adjudication of prizes—in which federal courts traditionally devised rules of decision in a common law manner. The Court had no occasion to determine the circumstances in which customary international law alone might, in an area within the usual purview of the States (here, criminal punishment), preempt a state statute that is not otherwise subject to attack as conflicting with the responsibilities of the National Government or a source of federal law (such as a federal statute or constitutional provision, or a rule of federal common law emanating from the constitutional structure of the Nation). Nor has the Court had occasion to consider that question since The Paquete Habana was decided.[6] Such a claim raises numerous issues

[6] Although petitioner argues that this Court has decided that customary international law is federal law that preempts contrary state law, see Pet. 11 n.6, 12, the decisions on which he relies do not reach that far. In Banco of considerable difficulty and complexity, with potentially far-reaching significance.[7]

This case does not present an appropriate vehicle for the Court to address those issues, for several reasons. First, the record compiled in the lower courts contains no probative materials concerning the development of customary international law in this area. Cf. Restatement § 113 cmt. c & rep. note 1 (noting that courts have adopted practice of receiving evidence on questions of international law). Thus, there is no record to which this Court might refer to determine whether state practice (at least outside the United States) has reached a consensus that capital punishment should not be imposed on 16-year-old offenders, and (perhaps more important) whether such a consensus, if it exists, reflects

National de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 425–426 (1964), the Court held that the scope of the act of state doctrine must be determined as a matter of federal law in light of the Constitution's entrustment of foreign relations to the national government, but the Court also observed that the act of state doctrine is not compelled by international law, see Id. at 427. In Zschernig v. Miller, 389 U.S. 429 (1968), the Court held invalid a state statute regulating the disposition of intestate property to foreign nations on the ground that its application would interfere with the national government's exclusive conduct of foreign relations; see also Clark v. Allen, 331 U.S. 503, 516–517 (1947) (rejecting similar claim of preemption on facts of that case). Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416 (1920), upheld a treaty against a Tenth Amendment challenge, and Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U.S. 46, 95–98 (1907), recognized the applicability of a form of federal common law, borrowing principles of international law where appropriate, to resolve water disputes between States of the Union.

[7] For example, to determine whether the application of Nevada's death penalty statute to a 16-year-old offender is preempted by customary international law, the Court would likely have to decide whether the legal principle relied on by petitioner has developed with sufficient clarity and obtained sufficient consensus internationally to become a rule of customary international law; whether customary international law, when invoked in domestic courts, is properly understood as federal common law that preempts state law through the Supremacy Clause, U.S. Const. Art. VI, Cl. 2; and whether domestic courts should apply a principle of customary international law to preempt state law when the President and the Senate have entered a reservation to a treaty provision that addresses the same subject, or whether that reservation constitutes a "controlling act" under The Paquete Habana, supra, preventing the application in domestic courts of the rule of customary intentional law invoked by petitioner.

a sense of legal obligation (opinio juris) on the part of states that international law prohibits capital punishment for 16-year-old offenders, rather than a mere convergence of state practice on the subject. "It is often difficult to determine when that transformation [from mere customary state practice to legal obligation] has taken place." Restatement § 102 cmt. c. In view of the significance of reaching a conclusion that customary international law preempts application of a state statute, this Court should not reach such a conclusion without a record that fully supports the proposition relied on by a party that seeks to establish that customary international law preempts state law.

Second, perhaps reflecting the fact that the record has not been developed on this point, the Nevada Supreme Court did not discuss customary international law at all in the opinion below. Nor has any other state supreme court or federal court of appeals addressed the precise issues presented by the petition. On issues of such potentially far-reaching significance, this Court would benefit from the reasoned decisions of lower courts, and should not address those questions in the first instance.

b. In addition, in light of actions taken by the political Branches of the United States Government objecting to the asserted rule of customary international law relied on by petitioner, petitioner's claim does not warrant this Court's review. Given that the Executive Branch has primary responsibility for conducting the foreign relations of the United States, the courts should defer to the position of the Executive Branch as to whether a rule of customary international law is presently binding on the United States in its relations with other Nations, just as they give great weight to the Executive Branch's interpretation of a treaty. Cf. El Al Israel Airlines, Ltd. v. Tsui Yuan Tseng, 119 S. Ct. 662, 671 (1999); Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176, 184–185 (1982).

The United States has in the past taken the position in international fora that customary international law does not prohibit the execution of 16-year-old offenders.[8] The United States has also persistently objected to the development and application of such a principle. The latter point is dispositive here of petitioner's claim based on customary international law, for "[c]ustomary international law, like international law defined by treaties and other international agreements, rests on the consent of states. A state that persistently objects to a norm of customary international law that other states accept is not bound by that norm, * * * just as a state that is not party to an international agreement is not bound by the terms of that agreement." Siderman de Blake v. Argentina, 965 F.2d 699, 715 (9th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 507 U.S. 1017 (1993); accord Restatement § 102 cmt. d ("[I]n principle a state that indicates its dissent from a practice while the law is still in the process of development is not bound by that rule even after it matures.").

In 1986 the United States Government stated in a case before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights that it objected to the application of any rule of customary international law that would proscribe the application of capital punishment to persons who were under 18 at the time of their offenses.[9] In addition, as discussed above, the United States formally entered a reservation to punishment for offenders under 18 years old, it argued that no norm of customary international law had developed barring the execution of offenders under 18 years old. See Memorandum of the United States to the Inter-Am. Comm'n on Human Rights in Case 9647 (James Terry Roach and Jay Pinkerton) 14–17 (July 15, 1986); In re Roach, Case 9647, 38(g)–(h) (Inter.-Am. C.H.R. 1987) (summarizing position of United States). We have lodged with the Clerk copies of the United States' submissions in the Roach and Pinkerton case as well as the decision of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights in that case.

[9] See Memorandum of the United States to the Inter-Am. Comm'n on Human Rights in Case 9647, supra, at 17–19. The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights agreed with the United States in that case that a "customary rule * * * does not bind States which protest the norm," In re Roach, supra, 52, and stated that, "[s]ince the United States has protested the norm, it would not be applicable to the United States should it be held to exist," Id. 54. The Commission also agreed with the United States that there did not at that time exist a norm of customary international law establishing 18 to be the minimum age for the death penalty, although it suggested that such a norm was "emerging," Id. 60. The Commission stated that a binding jus cogens principle of international law had developed prohibiting the Article 6(5) of the ICCPR on that precise question, and that reservation remains in force. Nor (with one narrow exception not applicable here) has the United States heretofore accepted other obligations under international instruments that would preclude the imposition of capital punishment on 16-year-old offenders.[10] The United States' persistent objections to the asserted norm of customary international law relied on by petitioner refutes his contention that that norm now operates within the United States to prevent the State of Nevada from applying its capital punishment statute to petitioner.

The Convention on the Rights of the Child also contains a prohibition against the death penalty for persons who were under 18 at the time of their offenses. See Convention on the Rights of the Child, Nov. 20, 1989, art. 37(a), G.A. Res. 44/25, U.N. GAOR, 44th Sess., Supp. No. 49 at 167, U.N. Doc. A/44/49, 28 I.L.M. 1448, 1470. The United States has not at this point ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Further, in the course of the negotiation of that Convention, the United States stated that it would agree to the adoption by consensus of the provision against capital punishment for juvenile offenders only on the condition that the United States retained the right to enter a reservation to the provision, should it decide to ratify the Convention. See Commission on Human Rights, Report of the Working Group on a Draft Convention on the Rights of the Child, 45th Sess., 2 Mar. 1989, at 101, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1989/48.

execution of children, but it noted that the existence of such a principle did not resolve the case before it, because of the absence of uniform practice concerning the appropriate age of majority. See Id. 55–60.

[10] The American Convention on Human Rights proscribes (among other things) the death penalty for 16- and 17-year-old offenders. See American Convention on Human Rights, Nov. 22, 1969, art. 4(5), 1144 U.N.T.S. 123, 125, 9 I.L.M. 673, 676. The United States has not, however, become a party to the American Convention. Furthermore, at the final drafting conference of the American Convention, the United States urged the deletion of the prohibition on execution of those under 18 years old. See United States: Report of the Delegation to the Inter-American Specialized Conference on Human Rights, 9 I.L.M. 710 (Apr. 22, 1970). In 1978, President Carter proposed that the Senate consider a reservation to American Convention's provisions regarding capital punishment in the event of an eventual ratification. S. Exec. Docs., supra, at XVII, XVIII.

The United States has ratified the Fourth Geneva Convention, which prohibits imposition of the death penalty against a national of another country held during time of war who was under 18 when he committed the offense. See Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, Aug. 12, 1949, art. 68, 6 U.S.T. 3516, 3560, 75 U.N.T.S. 286, 330. That exception to the United States' policy of opposing treaty provisions and the application of a rule of customary international law barring capital punishment for offenders under 18 years of age does not vitiate the United States' status as a persistent objector. The Fourth Geneva Convention addresses only the specific case of foreign nationals held during time of war, and does not address the imposition of capital punishment by a country on one of its own citizens, such as petitioner.

3. Finally, petitioner contends (Pet. 18–20) that his execution is prohibited by a jus cogens norm of international law. A jus cogens norm, also known as a "peremptory norm," has been described as "a norm accepted and recognized by the international community of States as a whole as a norm from which no derogation is permitted." Vienna Convention, art. 53; see also Restatement § 102 rep. note 6. The precise nature and scope of the concept of jus cogens remains uncertain in international law.[11] For present purposes, however, the important point about jus cogens as that concept has been developed by some courts and commentators—which distinguishes it fundamentally from customary international law as discussed above (pp. 14–18, supra)—is that the binding nature of a jus cogens norm does not depend on the consent of a state. See Siderman, 965 F.2d at 715.

In order to hold that there is a jus cogens principle that preempts the application of Nevada's death penalty statute to petitioner, the Court would have to decide that the asserted legal prohibition against capital punishment for 16-year-old offenders has similar force under international law to the prohibitions that are commonly cited as jus cogens, such as those against slavery and genocide; that this Court should recognize such a jus cogens norm that is binding on the United States in the international community, despite the United States' persistent objection to the asserted legal obligation up to this point in international fora; and that domestic courts must give effect to that norm to preempt the application of a state criminal statute, notwithstanding the contrary intentions of the political Branches (including the reservation to a treaty to which the United States is a party).

[11] The very few decisions in United States courts that have addressed the concept of jus cogens norms have described them as "universal and fundamental rights" that include "principles and rules concerning the basic rights of the human person." See, e.g., Siderman, 965 F.2d at 715. It has been suggested that jus cogens norms include prohibitions against slavery and genocide. See Id. at 716–717; Restatement § 702 rep. note 11.

Such contentions, if accepted by this Court, would obviously have profound significance. For the reasons we have given above in discussing petitioner's claim based on customary international law, we submit this case does not present an appropriate vehicle for addressing those far-reaching contentions. Neither the record nor the decision below illuminates in any way the question whether a jus cogens norm against capital punishment for 16-year-old offenders has developed. Nor is there any conflict among lower courts on the question; indeed, we are not aware of any lower court decision that has addressed the question. In addition, there is no other source of decisional law (such as decisions of the International Court of Justice) that this Court might find helpful in resolving the question whether the execution of a 16-year-old offender violates a jus cogens norm. Given the considerable uncertainty as to how it might be ascertained whether a principle of international law has attained the status of jus cogens, see Restatement § 102 rep. note 6; Id. § 702 rep. note 11, we submit that this case does not present an appropriate occasion for the Court to make such a determination in the first instance.

Moreover, the suggestion that the courts, by declaring that the asserted jus cogens norm exists and applies here, should in effect override the judgment of the political Branches that the United States should not be bound by an international legal prohibition against the execution of 16-year-old offenders plainly raises serious separation of powers concerns. In other contexts touching on foreign relations and international law, the courts have declined to substitute their judgment for that of the political Branches; for example, the courts have not applied the provisions of a treaty that have been abrogated by an Act of Congress (see The Head Money Cases, supra) or rules of customary international law that have been rejected by the controlling acts of the political Branches (see Restatement § 115 rep. note 3). Similarly, we submit, there is no occasion for this Court to consider recognizing and giving preemptive force to the purported jus cogens norm relied on by petitioner, in light of the absence of decisional authority regarding the existence of such a peremptory norm and the persistent objection by the United States, through the political Branches, to a prohibition against the execution of 16-year-old offenders including in a formal treaty reservation.

2. Alien Tort Statute and Torture Victims Protection Act

The Alien Tort Statute ("ATS"), also often referred to as the Alien Tort Claims Act ("ATCA"), was enacted in 1789 and is now codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1350. It currently provides that the federal district courts "shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." Id. Since 1980 the ATS has been interpreted by the federal courts in various human rights cases, beginning with Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980). During the 1990s there was dispute as to whether the statute is merely jurisdictional or provides, or permits a court to infer, a private right of action. Compare Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic, 726 F.2d 774, 775 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (concurring opinion of Judge Bork), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1003 (1984) with In re Estate of Marcos, Human Rights Litigation, 25 F.3d 1467, 1475 (9th Cir. 1994), cert. denied sub nom. Estate of Marcos v. Hilao, 513 U.S. 1126 (1995). Courts also upheld jurisdiction under the ATS in certain circumstances against a non-state defendant, e.g., Kadic v. Karadzic, 70 F.3d 232 (2d Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 518 U.S. 1005 (1996). By its terms, this statutory basis for suit is available only to aliens.

The Torture Victims Protection Act ("TVPA"), Pub. L. No. 102–256, 106 Stat. 73, was enacted in 1992 and is codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1350 note. It provides a cause of action in federal courts for individuals (regardless of nationality, including U.S. nationals) who are victims of official torture or extrajudicial killing against "[a]n individual . . . [acting] under actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of any foreign nation." The TVPA contains a ten-year statute of limitations.

Litigation was frequently initiated under both statutes and hence judicial opinions often discuss the two together.

a. Scope

During the 1990s, U.S. courts rendered a number of significant decisions under the ATS and the TVPA. Individually and collectively, these decisions addressed a wide range of issues relevant to the scope and interpretation of these statutes.

Some courts held that in addition to establishing jurisdiction, the ATS "creates a cause of action for violation of specific, universal and obligatory human rights standards which confer fundamental rights upon all people vis-à-vis their own governments." See, e.g., Hilao v. Estate of Marcos (In re Estate of Marcos, Human Rights Litigation), 25 F.3d 1467, 1475 (9th Cir. 1994), cert. denied sub. nom. Estate of Marcos v. Hilao, 513 U.S. 1126 (1995). See also Abebe-Jira v. Negewo, 72 F.3d 844, 848 (11th Cir. 1996); Iwanowa v. Ford Motor Company, 67 F. Supp. 2d 424, 439 (D.N.J. 1999), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 830 (1996); Xuncax v. Gramajo, 886 F. Supp. 162, 179 (D. Mass 1995); Paul v. Avril, 812 F. Supp. 207, 212 (S.D. Fla. 1993).

In Hamid v. Price Waterhouse, 51 F.3d 1411 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1047 (1996), depositors of a failed international bank brought a class action against seventy-seven people, firms, and a foreign country, alleging inter alia violations of RICO and the Alien Tort Statute. The district court dismissed, and plaintiffs appealed. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held inter alia that substantive claims of fraud, breach of fiduciary duty, and misappropriation of funds were not breaches of "the law of nations" for purposes of the ATS. Id. at 1418.

State Action Requirement

A related issue is whether, under the ATS, only state actors can be held liable for violations of international law. Here again, courts reached differing results. See In re Estate of Ferdinand E. Marcos Human Rights Litig., 978 F.2d 493 (9th Cir. 1992); Sanchez-Espinoza v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202 (D.C. Cir. 1985). In contrast, Iwanowa v. Ford Motor Company, 67 F. Supp. 2d 424 (D.N.J. 1999), held that certain forms of conduct violated the law of nations whether undertaken by persons acting under the auspices of a state or only as private individuals ("No logical reason exists for allowing private individuals and corporations to escape liability for universally condemned violations of international law merely because they were not acting under color of law.") Id. at 445.

In Kadic v. Karadzic, 70 F.3d 232 (2d Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 518 U.S. 1005 (1996), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that under the ATS state action is not required for all international torts. This case involved an action against a non-state defendant (the purported head-of-state of the Republica Srpska) for alleged acts of genocide, torture, and other violations of international law. The district court had granted the defendant's motion to dismiss on grounds that it lacked jurisdiction under the ATS to redress acts of torture by private individuals and that the TVPA did not authorize it to adjudicate acts not committed under the laws or authority of a foreign nation. The United States filed a Statement of Interest asserting that the judgment of dismissal by the district court should be vacated inter alia because the district court erred in ruling that plaintiffs could not pursue such claims because Karadzic was not a "state actor." Excerpts from the Second Circuit opinion follow.

Most Americans would probably be surprised to learn that victims of atrocities committed in Bosnia are suing the leader of the insurgent Bosnian-Serb forces in a United States District Court in Manhattan. Their claims seek to build upon the foundation of this Court's decision in Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir.1980), which recognized the important principle that the venerable Alien Tort Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (1988), enacted in 1789 but rarely invoked since then, validly creates federal court jurisdiction for suits alleging torts committed anywhere in the world against aliens in violation of the law of nations. The pending appeals pose additional significant issues as to the scope of the Alien Tort Act: whether some violations of the law of nations may be remedied when committed by those not acting under the authority of a state; if so, whether genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity are among the violations that do not require state action; and whether a person, otherwise liable for a violation of the law of nations, is immune from service of process because he is present in the United States as an invitee of the United Nations.

These issues arise on appeals by two groups of plaintiffs-appellants from the November 19, 1994, judgment of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York (Peter K. Leisure, Judge), dismissing, for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, their suits against defendant-appellee Radovan Karadzic, President of the self-proclaimed Bosnian-Serb republic of "Srpska." Doe v. Karadzic, 866 F. Supp. 734 (S.D.N.Y.1994) ("Doe"). For the reasons set forth below, we hold that subject-matter jurisdiction exists, that Karadzic may be found liable for genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity in his private capacity and for other violations in his capacity as a state actor, and that he is not immune from service of process. We therefore reverse and remand.

* * * *

. . . [The District] Court concluded that "acts committed by non-state actors do not violate the law of nations," Id. at 739. Finding that "[t]he current Bosnian-Serb warring military faction does not constitute a recognized state," Id. at 741, and that "the members of Karadzic's faction do not act under the color of any recognized state law," Id., the Court concluded that "the acts alleged in the instant action[s], while grossly repugnant, cannot be remedied through [the Alien Tort Act]," Id. at 740–41. The Court did not consider the plaintiffs' alternative claim that Karadzic acted under color of law by acting in concert with the Serbian Republic of the former Yugoslavia, a recognized nation.

The District Judge also found that the apparent absence of state action barred plaintiffs' claims under the Torture Victim Act, which expressly requires that an individual defendant act "under actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of any foreign nation," Torture Victim Act § 2(a). With respect to plaintiffs' further claims that the law of nations, as incorporated into federal common law, gives rise to an implied cause of action over which the Court would have jurisdiction pursuant to section 1331, the Judge found that the law of nations does not give rise to implied rights of action absent specific Congressional authorization, and that, in any event, such an implied right of action would not lie in the absence of state action. Finally, having dismissed all of plaintiffs' federal claims, the Court declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over their state-law claims.

Discussion

Though the District Court dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, the parties have briefed not only that issue but also the threshold issues of personal jurisdiction and justiciability under the political question doctrine. Karadzic urges us to affirm on any one of these three grounds. We consider each in turn.

I. Subject-Matter Jurisdiction

Appellants allege three statutory bases for the subject-matter jurisdiction of the District Court—the Alien Tort Act, the Torture Victim Act, and the general federal-question jurisdictional statute.

A. The Alien Tort Act

3. The State Action Requirement for International Law Violations

In dismissing plaintiffs' complaints for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, the District Court concluded that the alleged violations required state action and that the "Bosnian-Serb entity" headed by Karadzic does not meet the definition of a state. Doe, 866 F. Supp. at 741 n. 12. Appellants contend that they are entitled to prove that Srpska satisfies the definition of a state for purposes of international law violations and, alternatively, that Karadzic acted in concert with the recognized state of the former Yugoslavia and its constituent republic, Serbia.

(a) Definition of a state in international law. The definition of a state is well established in international law:

> Under international law, a state is an entity that has a defined territory and a permanent population, under the control of its own government, and that engages in, or has the capacity to engage in, formal relations with other such entities. Restatement (Third) § 201; accord Klinghoffer, 937 F.2d at 47; National Petrochemical Co. of Iran v. M/T Stolt Sheaf, 860 F.2d 551, 553 (2d Cir.1988); see also Texas v. White, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 700, 720, 19 L.Ed. 227 (1868). "[A]ny government, however violent and wrongful in its origin, must be considered a de facto government if it was in the full and actual exercise of sovereignty over a territory and people large enough for a nation." Ford v. Surget, 97 U.S. (7 Otto) 594, 620, 24 L.Ed. 1018 (1878) (Clifford, J., concurring).

Although the Restatement's definition of statehood requires the capacity to engage in formal relations with other states, it does not require recognition by other states. See Restatement (Third) § 202 cmt. b ("An entity that satisfies the requirements of § 201 is a state whether or not its statehood is formally recognized by other states."). Recognized states enjoy certain privileges and immunities relevant to judicial proceedings, see, e.g., Pfizer Inc. v. India, 434 U.S. 308, 318–20, 98 S.Ct. 584, 590–91, 54 L.Ed.2d 563 (1978) (diversity jurisdiction); Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 408–12, 84 S.Ct. 923, 929–32, 11 L.Ed.2d 804 (1964) (access to U.S. courts); Lafontant, 844 F. Supp. at 131 (head-of-state immunity), but an unrecognized state is not a juridical nullity. Our courts have regularly given effect to the "state" action of unrecognized states. See, e.g., United States v. Insurance Cos., 89 U.S. (22 Wall.) 99, 101–03, 22 L.Ed. 816 (1875) (seceding states in Civil War); Thorington v. Smith, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 1, 9–12, 19 L.Ed. 361 (1868) (same); Carl Zeiss Stiftung v. VEB Carl Zeiss Jena, 433 F.2d 686, 699 (2d Cir.1970), cert. denied, 403 U.S. 905, 91 S.Ct. 2205, 29 L.Ed.2d 680 (1971) (post-World War II East Germany).

The customary international law of human rights, such as the proscription of official torture, applies to states without distinction between recognized and unrecognized states. See Restatement (Third) §§ 207, 702. It would be anomalous indeed if non-recognition by the United States, which typically reflects disfavor with a foreign regime—sometimes due to human rights abuses—had the perverse effect of shielding officials of the unrecognized regime from liability for those violations of international law norms that apply only to state actors.

Appellants' allegations entitle them to prove that Karadzic's regime satisfies the criteria for a state, for purposes of those international law violations requiring state action. Srpska is alleged to control defined territory, control populations within its power, and to have entered into agreements with other governments. It has a president, a legislature, and its own currency. These circumstances readily appear to satisfy the criteria for a state in all aspects of international law. Moreover, it is likely that the state action concept, where applicable for some violations like "official" torture, requires merely the semblance of official authority. The inquiry, after all, is whether a person purporting to wield official power has exceeded internationally recognized standards of civilized conduct, not whether statehood in all its formal aspects exists.

(b) Acting in concert with a foreign state. Appellants also sufficiently alleged that Karadzic acted under color of law insofar as they claimed that he acted in concert with the former Yugoslavia, the statehood of which is not disputed. The "color of law" jurisprudence of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 is a relevant guide to whether a defendant has engaged in official action for purposes of jurisdiction under the Alien Tort Act. See Forti v. Suarez-Mason, 672 F. Supp. 1531, 1546 (N.D. Cal.1987), reconsideration granted in part on other grounds, 694 F. Supp. 707 (N.D. Cal.1988). A private individual acts under color of law within the meaning of section 1983 when he acts together with state officials or with significant state aid. See Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 937, 102 S.Ct. 2744, 2753–54, 73 L.Ed.2d 482 (1982). The appellants are entitled to prove their allegations that Karadzic acted under color of law of Yugoslavia by acting in concert with Yugoslav officials or with significant Yugoslavian aid.

III. Justiciability

We recognize that cases of this nature might pose special questions concerning the judiciary's proper role when adjudication might have implications in the conduct of this nation's foreign relations. We do not read Filartiga to mean that the federal judiciary must always act in ways that risk significant interference with United States foreign relations. To the contrary, we recognize that suits of this nature can present difficulties that implicate sensitive matters of diplomacy historically reserved to the jurisdiction of the political branches. See First National Bank v. Banco Nacional de Cuba, 406 U.S. 759, 767, 92 S.Ct. 1808, 1813, 32 L.Ed.2d 466 (1972). We therefore proceed to consider whether, even though the jurisdictional threshold is satisfied in the pending cases, other considerations relevant to justiciability weigh against permitting the suits to proceed.

Two nonjurisdictional, prudential doctrines reflect the judiciary's concerns regarding separation of powers: the political question doctrine and the act of state doctrine. It is the " 'constitutional' underpinnings" of these doctrines that influenced the concurring opinions of Judge Robb and Judge Bork in Tel-Oren. Although we too recognize the potentially detrimental effects of judicial action in cases of this nature, we do not embrace the rather categorical views as to the inappropriateness of judicial action urged by Judges Robb and Bork. Not every case "touching foreign relations" is nonjusticiable, see Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S.

186, 211, 82 S.Ct. 691, 707, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962); Lamont v. Woods, 948 F.2d 825, 831–32 (2d Cir.1991), and judges should not reflexively invoke these doctrines to avoid difficult and somewhat sensitive decisions in the context of human rights. We believe a preferable approach is to weigh carefully the relevant considerations on a case-by-case basis. This will permit the judiciary to act where appropriate in light of the express legislative mandate of the Congress in section 1350, without compromising the primacy of the political branches in foreign affairs.

Karadzic maintains that these suits were properly dismissed because they present nonjusticiable political questions. We disagree. Although these cases present issues that arise in a politically charged context, that does not transform them into cases involving nonjusticiable political questions. "[T]he doctrine 'is one of "political questions," not one of "political cases."' " Klinghoffer, 937 F.2d at 49 (quoting Baker, 369 U.S. at 217, 82 S.Ct. at 710).

A nonjusticiable political question would ordinarily involve one or more of the following factors: [1] a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or [2] a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or [3] the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or [4] the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or [5] an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or [6] the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. at 217, 82 S.Ct. at 710; see also Can v. United States, 14 F.3d 160, 163 (2d Cir. 1994).

With respect to the first three factors, we have noted in a similar context involving a tort suit against the PLO that "[t]he department to whom this issue has been 'constitutionally committed' is none other than our own—the Judiciary." Klinghoffer, 937 F.2d at 49. Although the present actions are not based on the common law of torts, as was Klinghoffer, our decision in Filartiga established that universally recognized norms of international law provide judicially discoverable and manageable standards for adjudicating suits brought under the Alien Tort Act, which obviates any need to make initial policy decisions of the kind normally reserved for nonjudicial discretion. Moreover, the existence of judicially discoverable and manageable standards further undermines the claim that such suits relate to matters that are constitutionally committed to another branch. See Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 227–29, 113 S.Ct. 732, 735, 122 L.Ed.2d 1 (1993).

The fourth through sixth Baker factors appear to be relevant only if judicial resolution of a question would contradict prior decisions taken by a political branch in those limited contexts where such contradiction would seriously interfere with important governmental interests. Disputes implicating foreign policy concerns have the potential to raise political question issues, although, as the Supreme Court has wisely cautioned, "it is 'error to suppose that every case or controversy which touches foreign relations lies beyond judicial cognizance.' " Japan Whaling Ass'n v. American Cetacean Society, 478 U.S. 221, 229–30, 106 S.Ct. 2860, 2865–66, 92 L.Ed.2d 166 (1986) (quoting Baker, 369 U.S. at 211, 82 S.Ct. at 706–07).

The act of state doctrine, under which courts generally refrain from judging the acts of a foreign state within its territory, see Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. at 428, 84 S.Ct. 923, 940, 11 L.Ed.2d 804; Underhill v. Hernandez, 168 U.S. 250, 252, 18 S.Ct. 83, 84, 42 L.Ed. 456 (1897), might be implicated in some cases arising under section 1350. However, as in Filartiga, 630 F.2d at 889, we doubt that the acts of even a state official, taken in violation of a nation's fundamental law and wholly unratified by that nation's government, could properly be characterized as an act of state.

In the pending appeal, we need have no concern that interference with important governmental interests warrants rejection of appellants' claims. After commencing their action against Karadzic, attorneys for the plaintiffs in Doe wrote to the Secretary of State to oppose reported attempts by Karadzic to be granted immunity from suit in the United States; a copy of plaintiffs' complaint was attached to the letter. Far from intervening in the case to urge rejection of the suit on the ground that it presented political questions, the Department responded with a letter indicating that Karadzic was not immune from suit as an invitee of the United Nations. See Habib Letter, supra. [(fn. omitted)] After oral argument in the pending appeals, this Court wrote to the Attorney General to inquire whether the United States wished to offer any further views concerning any of the issues raised. In a "Statement of Interest," signed by the Solicitor General and the State Department's Legal Adviser, the United States has expressly disclaimed any concern that the political question doctrine should be invoked to prevent the litigation of these lawsuits: "Although there might be instances in which federal courts are asked to issue rulings under the Alien Tort Statute or the Torture Victim Protection Act that might raise a political question, this is not one of them." Statement of Interest of the United States at 3. Though even an assertion of the political question doctrine by the Executive Branch, entitled to respectful consideration, would not necessarily preclude adjudication, the Government's reply to our inquiry reinforces our view that adjudication may properly proceed.

As to the act of state doctrine, the doctrine was not asserted in the District Court and is not before us on this appeal. See Filártiga, 630 F.2d at 889. Moreover, the appellee has not had the temerity to assert in this Court that the acts he allegedly committed are the officially approved policy of a state. Finally, as noted, we think it would be a rare case in which the act of state doctrine precluded suit under section 1350. Banco Nacional was careful to recognize the doctrine "in the absence of . . . unambiguous agreement regarding controlling legal principles," 376 U.S. at 428, 84 S.Ct. at 940, such as exist in the pending litigation, and applied the doctrine only in a context—expropriation of an alien's property—in which world opinion was sharply divided, see Id. at 428–30, 84 S.Ct. at 940–41.

Finally, we note that at this stage of the litigation no party has identified a more suitable forum, and we are aware of none. Though the Statement of the United States suggests the general importance of considering the doctrine of forum non conveniens, it seems evident that the courts of the former Yugoslavia, either in Serbia or war-torn Bosnia, are not now available to entertain plaintiffs' claims, even if circumstances concerning the location of witnesses and documents were presented that were sufficient to overcome the plaintiffs' preference for a United States forum.

b. Liability for participation in human rights abuses

Iwanowa v. Ford Motor Company, 67 F. Supp. 2d 424 (D.N.J. 1999) involved a class action on behalf of persons who performed forced labor for Ford Werke in Germany between 1941 and 1945 under inhuman conditions and without compensation. In sustaining the complaint against a motion to dismiss, the district court held that plaintiffs had sufficiently described the "close cooperation" between defendants and Nazi officials and pled sufficient facts to allege that the defendants had acted as agents of the state "under color of Nazi law." This constituted an allegation that defendants were de facto state actors and the court held that defendants were therefore liable under the ATS. The Iwanowa case became moot when the German government and various German companies signed an agreement in December 1999 to settle Nazi-era forced labor claims.

See also Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767, 776 (9th Cir.1996) (affirming district court's jury instruction allowing foreign leader to be held liable upon finding that he "directed, ordered, conspired with, or aided the military in torture, summary execution, and 'disappearance' "); Xuncax v. Gramajo, 886 F. Supp. 162, 179 (D.Mass 1995) (former Guatemalan Minister of Defense could be held liable for compensatory and punitive damages for acts of torture, disappearance, summary execution and arbitrary detention committed by members of the military forces under his command); Doe v. Unocal Corp., 963 F. Supp. 880, 890–91 (C.D. Cal. 1997) (corporate defendants could be held liable for conspiring with state actors to violate the international human rights of the plaintiffs, including through torture, slavery and slave trading); Eastman Kodak v. Kalvin and Carballo, 978 F. Supp. 1078, 1094 (S.D. Fla. 1997) (holding that a private person can be held liable under the ATS for her complicity in bringing about the prolonged arbitrary detention of an individual by foreign governmental authorities—amounting to a "calculated, extortionate imprisonment"—in life threatening circumstances in order to coerce that individual's corporate employer into settlement of a business dispute).

c. Violations of the law of nations

Courts have also had to resolve the meaning of the statutory phrase "tort only in violation of the law of nations." In Filartiga, torture was determined to fall within this language. In Xuncax, the defendant was held to have violated international law by summary execution or "disappearance" of plaintiffs' relatives and by torture, arbitrary detention, and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment. The use of unpaid, forced labor under inhuman conditions during World War II was held in Iwanowa to have violated established norms of customary international law.

In Beanal v. Freeport-McMoRan, Inc., 969 F. Supp. 362 (E.D. La. 1997), aff'd 197 F.3d 161 (5th Cir. 1999), an Indonesian citizen had brought an action against several domestic U.S. corporations that were conducting mining activities in the Republic of Indonesia. The complaint alleged environmental abuses, human rights violations, and genocide under both the Alien Tort Statute and the Torture Victim Protection Act. The district court dismissed the complaint inter alia because Freeport's alleged environmental practices did not appear to have violated the law of nations. It acknowledged that the ATS may be applicable to international environmental torts, citing Aquinda v. Texaco, Inc., 945 F. Supp. 625, 627 (S.D.N.Y. 1996), and Amlon Metals, Inc. v. FMC Corp. 775 F. Supp. 668, 670 (S.D.N.Y. 1991), but held that the alleged violation must be definable, obligatory rather than hortatory, and universally condemned. Beanal, 969 F. Supp. at 370. The relevant norm of customary international law should satisfy a number of requirements: no state condones the act in question and there is a recognizable "universal" consensus of prohibition against it; there are sufficient criteria to determine whether a given action amounts to the prohibited act and thus violates the norm; and the prohibition against it is non-derogable and therefore binding at all times upon all actors. The court of appeals affirmed, holding inter alia that treaties and agreements which did not contain articulable environmental standards were insufficient sources of international law to form the basis of international environmental law claim under ATS, and cautioning that federal courts should exercise "extreme caution" when adjudicating environmental claims under international law, to insure that environmental policies of the United States do not displace environmental policies of other governments. The court of appeals also ruled that the ATS "applies only to shockingly egregious violations of universally recognized principles of international law." Beanal, 197 F.3d at 167.

d. Procedural issues

(1) Failure to exhaust local remedies

In Xuncax the Superior Court held that the TVPA requirement that plaintiff exhaust adequate and available remedies in the place where the conduct giving rise to the claim occurred did not create a prohibitively stringent condition precedent but must be read against the ordinary doctrinal background that exhaustion of remedies in a foreign forum was generally not required when foreign remedies were unobtainable, ineffective, inadequate, or obviously futile. 886 F. Supp. at 178.

In JAMA v. INS, 22 F.Supp.2d 353, 364 (D.N.J. 1998), in which certain asylum seekers sued the INS and others for abuse allegedly suffered in a detention facility operated under contract with the INS, the district court said that there is "no absolute preclusion" of international law claims under the ATS merely because remedies under domestic law were available for the same alleged harm. The court saw no reason why plaintiffs could not seek relief on alternative grounds.

(2) Statute of limitations

In Iwanowa v. Ford Motor Company, 67 F. Supp. 2d 424 (D.N.J. 1999), claimant sued a German manufacturer of motor vehicles and its American parent, seeking compensation and damages for forced labor in the manufacturer's factory, imposed during World War II. The district court, in dismissing the complaint, held inter alia that: the ten-year statute of limitations in the TVPA should apply to this ATS action and that the Paris Reparations Treaty had tolled that statute of limitations on claims against German defendants until superseded by the London Debt Agreement in 1991; but that the statute of limitations had run on claims against the U.S. parent corporation. Id. at 462–63.

e. Non-justiciability

(1) Political question

In Iwanowa v. Ford Motor Company, 67 F. Supp. 2d 424 (D.N.J. 1999), the district court dismissed plaintiffs' forced labor claims arising out of World War II because they raised non-justiciable political questions. Noting that the political question doctrine had its genesis not only in the concept of the separation of powers "but also of the limitation of the judiciary as a judicial body," the court stated that the judiciary should refrain from adjudicating questions of foreign policy for a number of prudential reasons: (1) the relevant materials in a case involving foreign policy would likely come from a multitude of sources, including U.S. and foreign sources, which might be voluminous and thus, potentially unmanageable for individual courts to handle; (2) there was a distinct possibility that the parties might not be able to compile all of the relevant information, thus making any attempt to justify a ruling on the merits of an issue that will affect the nation difficult and imprudent; (3) courts could not predict the international consequences flowing from a decision on the merits; (4) there might not be any standards for courts to apply in issuing a decision on the merits; and (5) courts addressing questions of foreign policy were faced with the task of reviewing initial determinations made by the political branches of government, determinations which were constitutionally committed to those branches. Id. at 484.

The court determined that as an issue affecting U.S. relations with the international community, war reparations fell within the domain of the political branches and were therefore not subject to judicial review. It noted that the executive branch had always taken the position that claims arising out of World War II must be resolved through government-to-government negotiations. "Courts may not pass judgment upon the political negotiations of the executive branch and the international community. Such intrusion into the realm of foreign policy would undermine the executive branch's sole discretion in the field of international relations. See Curtiss-Wright, 299 U.S. at 320, 57 S.Ct. 216." 67 F. Supp.2d at 487. See also Karadzic, supra.

(2) Act of state

In Doe v. Unocal, 963 F. Supp. 880 (C.D. Cal. 1997), plaintiffs sought to hold defendant oil companies liable for human rights abuses in Burma, including forced relocation and forced labor, which had allegedly occurred in conjunction with the construction of a natural gas pipeline by defendants' joint venture under contract to the Burmese State Law and Order Restoration Council ("SLORC"). Plaintiffs asserted that the companies had agreed that SLORC, acting as an agent for the joint venture, would clear forest, level ground, and provide labor, materials and security for the pipeline project, and in fact subsidized SLORC activities in the region. They further asserted that defendants knew or should have known that SLORC had a history of human rights abuses in violation of customary international law. On the oil company's motion to dismiss, the district court held, inter alia, that the act of state doctrine did not preclude consideration of claims based on alleged human rights abuses by Burmese government but did preclude claims based on expropriation of property in Burma by Burmese government.

Regarding alleged human rights violations, the court discounted the "prudential concerns" which it said were embodied in the act of state doctrine. "Because nations do not, and cannot under international law, claim a right to torture or enslave their own citizens, a finding that a nation has committed such acts, particularly where, as here, that finding comports with the prior conclusions of the coordinate branches of government, should have no detrimental effect on the policies underlying the act of state doctrine. Accordingly, the act of state doctrine does not preclude this court from considering claims that are based on legal principles about which the international community has reached unambiguous agreement." Id. at 894–95. See also Karadzic, supra.

H. LABOR

1. Convention Concerning Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) (ILO No. 111)

President William J. Clinton transmitted the ILO Convention Concerning Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) to the Senate on May 18, 1998. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–45 (1998). The text of the President's letter of transmittal is reprinted below. The Senate has not provided its advice and consent to ratification.

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the Convention (No. 111) Concerning Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), adopted by the International Labor Conference at its 42nd Session in Geneva on June 25, 1958. Also transmitted is the report of the Department of State, with a letter dated January 6, 1997, from then Secretary of Labor Robert Reich, concerning the Convention. This Convention obligates ratifying countries to declare and pursue a national policy aimed at eliminating discrimination with respect to employment and occupation. As explained more fully in the letter from Secretary Reich, U.S. law and practice fully comport with its provisions.

In the interest of clarifying the domestic application of the Convention, my Administration proposes that two understandings accompany U.S. ratification. The proposed understandings are as follows:

> The United States understands the meaning and scope of Convention No. 111 in light of the relevant conclusions and practice of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations which have been adopted prior to the date of U.S. ratification. The Committee's conclusions and practice are, in any event, not legally binding on the United States and have no force and effect on courts in the United States.
> The United States understands that the federal nondiscrimination policy of equal pay for substantially equal work meets the requirements of Convention 111. The United States further understands that Convention 111 does not require or establish the doctrine of comparable worth with respect to compensation as that term is understood under United States law and practice.

These understandings would have no effect on our international obligations under Convention No. 111.

Ratification of this Convention would be consistent with our policy of seeking to adhere to additional international labor instruments as a means both of ensuring that our domestic labor standards meet international requirements, and of enhancing our ability to call other governments to account for failing to fulfill their obligations under International Labor Organization (ILO) conventions. I recommend that the Senate give its advice and consent to the ratification of ILO Convention No. 111.

2. Convention Concerning the Abolition of Forced Labor (ILO No. 105)

The Convention Concerning the Abolition of Forced Labor (ILO No. 105), 320 U.N.T.S. 291, entered into force Jan. 17, 1959, was initially transmitted to the Senate on July 22, 1963, see S. Exec. Doc. K, 88-11. By message dated February 19, 1991, President George H.W. Bush urged the Senate to give advice and consent to this treaty. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–3 (1991). The text of the President's Letter of Transmittal is reprinted below, with excerpts from the accompanying letter from the Department of State to the President recommending that ILO Convention No. 105 be transmitted to the Senate, also included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–3.

Upon favorable recommendation by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, see S. Exec. Rep. No. 102–7 (1991), the Senate provided its advice and consent to ratification on May 14, 1991, with the following understandings and declarations:

(a) The United States understands the meaning and scope of Convention No. 105, having taken into account the conclusions and practice of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations existing prior to ratification, which conclusions and practice, in any event, are not legally binding on the United States and have no force and effect on courts in the United States; and

(b) The United States understands that Convention No. 105 does not limit the contempt powers of courts under Federal and State law.

137 CONG. REC. S5728 (daily ed. May 14, 1991).

The Convention (No. 105) Concerning the Abolition of Forced Labor, adopted by the International Labor Conference at Geneva on June 25, 1957, was transmitted to the Senate by President Kennedy on July 22, 1963, with a view to receiving advice and consent to ratification. Although hearings were held in 1967 by the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senate has not acted further on the Convention.

Now, 23 years later, I urge the Senate to consider anew this important Convention and to grant its advice and consent to ratification. Given the length of time that has elapsed, I enclose a new report from the Secretary of State concerning the Convention.

The report of the Secretary of State also contains the texts of two proposed understandings. As explained more fully in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of Labor, the law and practice of the United States fully conform to all obligations contained in the Convention (a copy of the Convention is included as an enclosure to this letter). Ratification of this Convention, therefore, would not require the United States to alter in any way its law or practice in this field. However, to remove the possibility that certain ambiguities might arise after ratification, it is proposed that ratification of the Convention be made subject to these understandings.

Ratification by the United States of selected Conventions of the International Labor Organization (ILO) enhances our ability to take other governments to task for failing to comply with ILO instruments they have ratified. In part for this reason, the Senate has in recent years given its advice and consent to the ratification of ILO Conventions 144, 147, and 160. I accordingly recommend that the Senate also give its advice and consent to the ratification of ILO Convention 105.

LETTER OF SUBMITTAL

* * * *

Convention 105 is a non-self-executing treaty. As such, it cannot be enforced directly through the courts, which are constrained instead to apply U.S. domestic law implementing the terms of the Convention. Because existing domestic law fully conforms to the requirements of the Convention, no additional implementing legislation is required.

While United States law and practice are fully consistent with the requirements of the Convention, two understandings have been proposed to remove the possibility that certain ambiguities might arise after ratification. They are:

(1) The United States understands the meaning and scope of Convention No. 105, having taken into account the conclusions and practice of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations existing prior to ratification, which conclusions and practice, in any event, are not legally binding on the United States and have no force and effect on courts in the United States.
(2) The United States understands that Convention No. 105 does not limit the contempt powers of courts under Federal and State law.

I am pleased to join with the Secretary of Labor in recommending that you urge the Senate to renew its consideration of Convention 105, a step which is consistent with our policy of support for and active participation in the work of the ILO. Given the lapse of time since the Senate last considered the Convention, it is recommended that you send the enclosed, new message to the Senate with a view to receiving advice and consent to ratification of the Convention, subject to the understanding set out above.

3. Convention Concerning Safety and Health in Mines (ILO No. 176)

President William J. Clinton transmitted the Convention Concerning Safety and Health in Mines (ILO No. 176), 2029 U.N.T.S. 209, entered into force June 5, 1998, to the Senate on September 9, 1999. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–8 (1999). The text of an accompanying letter from the Secretary of Labor Alexis M. Herman to the Secretary of State recommending that ILO Convention No. 176 be submitted to the President for transmittal to the Senate is excerpted below and is also included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–8. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee reported favorably on September 5, 2000, S. Exec. Rep. No. 106–16, and the Senate provided its advice and consent to ratification on September 20, 2000, with several understandings and declarations but no reservations. 146 CONG. REC. S8866 (daily ed. Sept. 20, 2000).

DEAR SECRETARY ALBRIGHT: I am writing to request that you submit to the President, for transmittal to the Senate with a request for advice and consent to U.S. ratification, Convention No. 176 concerning Safety and Health in Mines, adopted by the International Labor Conference at its 82nd Session on June 22, 1995.

Convention No. 176 obligates ratifying states, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, to formulate, carry out and periodically review a coherent policy on safety and health in mines, and to develop national laws and regulations to ensure implementation of the Convention's provisions. Steps to be taken include supervision and inspection of mines and maintenance of procedures for reporting and investigating accidents and occupational diseases. The Convention applies to all mines, both surface and underground sites. In regard to preventive and protective measures at the mine, the instrument sets forth the responsibilities of employers and the rights and duties of workers and their representatives.

As Chairman of the President's Committee on the ILO, I have been presented with the report of our Tripartite Advisory Panel on International Labor Standards (TAPILS) with the Panel's conclusions that there are no legal impediments to U.S. ratification of Convention No. 176.

TAPILS undertook an extensive review of Convention No. 176 which included a detailed examination of the precise meaning and obligations of the Convention and of how U.S. law and practice comport with its provisions. A tripartite working group from the Panel also met and corresponded with experts from the International Labor Office in Geneva, Switzerland, to ensure that the ILO shared TAPILS' assessment that the U.S. is in full compliance with the Convention.

Having reviewed TAPILS' legal findings, the President's Committee has unanimously agreed to recommend that the President transmit Convention No. 176 to the Senate with a request for advice and consent to ratification.

I am enclosing the TAPILS report along with a detailed statement of how U.S. law and practice comport with the Convention. The law and practice statement was also prepared under TAPILS' guidance.

I and the other members of the President's Committee believe that ratification of Convention No. 176 will be an important step in terms of U.S. participation in the ILO. I hope that Senate consideration can be requested as expeditiously as possible.

4. The ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work

The ILO adopted the Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work on June 18, 1998. This ILO Declaration is not a treaty or convention but rather a political commitment made by the ILO and its member states to "respect, promote and realize" the following principles that are the subject of certain ILO conventions "recognized as fundamental both inside and outside the [ILO]": "freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining; the elimination of all forms of forced or compulsory labor; the effective abolition of child labor; and the elimination of discrimination in respect of employment and occupation." The ILO helps countries, employers, and workers realize the Declaration's objectives through various technical cooperation projects, and publishes an Annual Review and a Global Report. More information on the Declaration and ILO efforts to advance its goals is available at www.ilo.org/public/english/standards/decl/about/index.htm.

5. China Prison Labor

During the 1990s the United States on several occasions expressed its opposition to the widespread employment of forced prison labor in China. State Department Deputy Spokesman Richard Boucher responded to a question concerning forced labor in China during a September 16, 1991, press briefing by saying: "We have informed the Chinese Government of our insistence that no products of prison labor be imported to the United States. We have received a firm commitment from China to prevent the sale of prison labor products to the United States." See http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/daily_briefings/1991/9109/135.html.

The United States implemented its policy regarding prison labor in China by the August 7, 1992, Memorandum of Understanding on Prohibiting Import and Export Trade in Prison Labor Products ("Prison Labor MOU") signed at Washington, DC between the United States and China. 3 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 33 at 660 (Aug. 17, 1992), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html. The Prison Labor MOU provided:

1. Upon the request of one Party, and based on specific information provided by that Party, the other Party will promptly investigate companies, enterprises or units suspected of violating relevant regulations and laws, and will immediately report the results of such investigations to the other.
2. Upon the request of one Party, responsible officials or experts of relevant departments of both Parties will meet under mutually convenient circumstances to exchange information on the enforcement of relevant laws and regulations and to examine and report on compliance with relevant regulations and laws by their respective companies, enterprises, or units.
3. Upon request, each Party will furnish to the other Party available evidence and information regarding suspected violations of relevant laws and regulations in a form admissible in judicial or administrative proceedings of the other Party. Moreover, at the request of one Party, the other Party will preserve the confidentiality of the furnished evidence, except when used in judicial or administrative proceedings.

4. In order to resolve specific outstanding cases related to the subject matter of this Memorandum of Understanding, each Party will, upon request of the other Party, promptly arrange and facilitate visits by responsible officials of the other party's diplomatic mission to its respective companies, enterprises or units.

The lack of specific verification procedures was the major difficulty in implementing the Prison Labor MOU. A Statement of Cooperation ("SOC") was therefore negotiated and signed at Beijing by the United States and China on March 14, 1994. The established specialized procedures and guidelines were as follows:

> First, when one side provides the other side a request, based on specific information, to conduct investigation of suspected exports of prison labor products destined for the United States, the receiving side will provide the requesting side a comprehensive investigative report within 60 days of the receipt of said written request. At the same time, the requesting side will provide a concluding evaluation of the receiving side's investigative report within 60 days of receipt of the report.
> Second, if the United States government, in order to resolve specific outstanding cases, requests a visit to a suspected facility, the Chinese government will, in conformity with Chinese laws and regulations and in accordance with the [Prison Labor] MOU, arrange for responsible United States diplomatic mission officials to visit the suspected facility within 60 days of the receipt of a written request.
>
> Third, the United States government will submit a report indicating the results of the visit to the Chinese government within 60 days of a visit by diplomatic officials to a suspected facility.
> Fourth, in cases where the U.S. government presents new or previously unknown information on suspected exports of prison labor products destined for the U.S. regarding a suspected facility that was already visited, the Chinese government will organize new investigations and notify the U.S. side. If necessary, it can also be arranged for the U.S. side to again visit that suspected facility.

Fifth, when the Chinese government organizes the investigation of a suspected facility and the U.S. side is allowed to visit the suspected facility, the U.S. side will provide related information conducive to the investigation. In order to accomplish the purpose of the visit, the Chinese side will, in accordance with its laws and regulations, provide an opportunity to consult relevant records and materials on-site and arrange visits to necessary areas of the facility. The U.S. side agrees to protect relevant proprietary information of customers of the facility consistent with the relevant terms of the Prison Labor MOU.

Sixth, both sides agree that arrangements for U.S. diplomats to visit suspected facilities, in principle, will proceed after the visit to a previous suspected facility is completely ended and a report indicating the results of the visit is submitted.

I. INDIGENOUS PEOPLE

1. Draft Inter-American Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples

The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights ("IACHR") of the Organization of American States ("OAS") approved the Draft American Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples ("1997 Draft") on February 26, 1997, at its 95th regular session. The United States continued to participate in negotiations on the 1997 Draft, which was first discussed in OAS meetings in 1999.

On December 19, 1996, the United States submitted general comments on an earlier draft approved by the IACHR at its session of September 18, 1995. U.S. concerns included the distinction between rights and goals, the distinction between collective versus individual rights, and applicable law. The United States suggested that a number of the rights in the draft should have been recast as statements of aspiration or goals, and that references to "peoples" were confusing, given that international law generally protects the rights of individuals as opposed to groups.

In a letter to Ambassador Jorge Taiana, Executive Secretary of the IACHR, dated December 16, 1997, Acting U.S. Representative Ronald D. Godard set forth U.S. concerns with the 1997 Draft. Mr. Godard's letter reiterated the comments made in the U.S. submission of December 19, 1996, and expressed concern over the lack of clarity of the scope of the convention which could be interpreted as according indigenous status to nonindigenous groups. Additionally, Mr. Godard noted that the 1997 Draft proposed a series of rights not recognized under international law, including the right to freely determine political status and freely pursue economic, social, spiritual and cultural development.

The full text of the comments made in the U.S. submission of December 19, 1996, which Mr. Godard reiterated in his letter, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/sl/c8381.htm.

The Government of the United States of America notes that the IACHR made only minor revisions to the text in its most recent revision of the draft Inter-American Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples. We wish to reiterate the comments made in our December 19, 1996 submission.

In this letter we wish to focus on a major concern that has an impact on our position with respect to virtually all of the articles in the draft declaration. This is the lack of clarity with respect to the scope and application of the draft declaration. The current version of the draft text uses the term "indigenous peoples" throughout but does not contain a definition of the term "indigenous." The draft declaration instead states in Article I(1) that "the declaration applies to indigenous peoples as well as peoples whose social, cultural and economic conditions distinguish them from other sections of the national community, and whose status is regulated wholly or partially by their own customs or traditions or by special laws." Additionally, draft Article I(2) states that "self-identification as indigenous shall be regarded as a fundamental criteria for determining the peoples to which the provisions of this declaration apply."

This would not be a problem if the draft declaration merely restated existing principles of international law. For example, under Article 27 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, all persons belonging to ethnic, religious or linguistic minorities (which often will include the indigenous in particular states) are entitled to enjoy all human rights, including "the right, in community with other members of their group, to enjoy their own culture, to profess and practice their own religion, or to use their own language." By comparison, the declaration proposes a series of additional rights for indigenous groups not currently recognized by international law, including under draft Article XV, the right to freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social, spiritual, and cultural development. (fn. omitted)

In the United States more than 550 Indian tribes are recognized as possessing an inherent right of autonomy in their internal affairs, which derives from their original sovereignty. Thus, tribes, like domestic states, function as governments within the overall political framework of the United States.(fn. omitted) However, other groups in the United States have self-identified as "indigenous," including armed militia and "hate" groups that advocate racism as well as groups seeking to take advantage of the rights, services, and benefits accorded by the United States government to Indian tribes. We cannot accept the application of the draft declaration to such groups for both constitutional and practical reasons. Therefore, we will actively oppose inclusion of language such as that appearing in Articles I(1) and (2) which could be interpreted as according indigenous status to nonindigenous groups.

To delineate the proper scope of this declaration, the United States proposed including a substantive definition of the term "indigenous" in the draft declaration. The proposed definition, which derived from a United States Supreme Court case (Montoya v. U.S., 180 U.S. 261, 266 (1901), defining indigenous groups as:

> those groups that (1) are composed of descendants of persons who inhabited a geographic area prior to the sovereignty of the present State or any direct predecessor to the present State; (2) historically exercised sovereignty or attributes of sovereignty; and (3) continue to maintain a distinct community with its own government institutions. (fn. omitted)

A second option is for the draft declaration to incorporate a procedural definition. Such a definition would require States to establish a public and transparent process for determining which groups are indigenous. The United States looks forward to working with other governments with a goal of clarifying the scope of the term "indigenous."

The United States strongly supports adoption of a declaration that recognizes indigenous rights, promotes the elimination of discrimination based on indigenous origin, and fosters an appreciation for and understanding of the value of indigenous cultures and institutions. A clarification of the scope of the declaration will hasten the day when such protections are a reality.

2. Draft UN Declaration of the Rights of Indigenous Peoples

At its 11th session, in July 1993, the UN Working Group on Indigenous Populations, a subsidiary organ of the Sub-Commission on the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights, agreed on a final text for the Draft UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples ("1993 Draft"). Draft Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1994/2/Add.1 (1994). The 1993 Draft is currently under review by the inter-sessional Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights on the Draft Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.

The full text of the 1993 Draft is available at www.unhchr.ch/huridocda/huridoca.nsf/(Symbol)/E.CN.4.SUB.2.RES.1994.45.En?OpenDocument.

Michael J. Dennis, the U.S. Alternate Head of Delegation to the Working Group on the Draft Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, presented a General Comment and a Statement on Standard of Review, as excerpted below, to the Working Group in Geneva, Switzerland at its meeting from November 23 to 30, 1995. The full texts of the U.S. General Comment and Statement on Standard of Review are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

General Comment

* * * *

My government welcomes the opportunity to participate in this working group's consideration of the "United Nations Draft Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples." The United States hopes that the ultimate adoption of a declaration will succeed in focusing attention on the need to protect indigenous rights, fight discrimination based on indigenous origin wherever it occurs, and foster appreciation for, and understanding of, the value of indigenous traditions, cultures, and institutions.

Establishment of the Working Group

The U.S. Government strongly supported the establishment of this working group. We appreciate the efforts of the Working Group on Indigenous People in preparing the draft declaration. This draft provides a point of departure for the work that lies ahead.

USG Commitment On Indigenous Rights

The U.S. Government remains deeply committed to promoting and protecting indigenous rights throughout the United States, as well as throughout the world. Under the United States Constitution, indigenous individuals and groups are guaranteed protection of their vested property rights and of their basic individual rights, including their right to freely associate, engage in religious practices and maintain distinct social and cultural identities.

We want to build a new partnership with our own indigenous communities, a relationship based on recognition of indigenous culture and strengthened through consultation. U.S. policy continues to support the tribal governments of federally recognized American Indian tribes and Alaska Native villages. Relations between the United States and these tribes have been conducted on a government-to-government basis.

Participation of Indigenous Organizations

The United States fought hard during the UNHRC to ensure that indigenous organizations not in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council, including tribal governments, would have an opportunity to contribute to the negotiation. Consensus was achieved on a procedure that will allow "relevant organizations of indigenous people" to apply to participate in the process. Indigenous contributions to the process will be vital to a successful outcome. We are very concerned that not all organizations wishing to participate have been accredited; we hope that the NGO committee will remedy that situation very soon.

The United States stands ready to work in partnership with tribal governments and U.N. members to make the declaration a reality. The wrongs and abuses committed against "First Americans" in U.S. history, and continuing discrimination around the world based on indigenous origin, demand no less.

My Government is committed to working with other governments to ensure a strong and useful declaration that recognizes the rights of indigenous people, and the communities to which they belong. It should go without saying that these rights are universal. We are also committed to promoting dialogue and cooperation between governments and indigenous communities. As President Clinton stated in a recent letter to indigenous communities in the United States, "working together, we can usher in a new era of understanding, cooperation, and respect, leading the way to a bright future for all of our people."

United States Statement on Standard of Review

* * * *

. . . The starting point in assessing the current draft text of the WGIP is GA Resolution 41/120, which sets agreed guidelines for new human rights standard setting. The General Assembly there agreed that new human rights instruments should:

> "(a) Be consistent with the existing body of international human rights law;
> (b) Be of fundamental character and derive from the inherent dignity and worth of the human person;
> (c) Be sufficiently precise to give rise to identifiable and practicable rights and obligations;
> (d) Provide, where appropriate, realistic and effective implementation machinery, including reporting systems; and

Elements of the present text need substantial revision to meet these tests.

1. Consistency with Human Rights Law. The new declaration should build upon, and be consistent with, the principles established in basic human rights instruments such as the Universal Declaration, the Covenants, and the 1992 Declaration on the Rights of Persons Belonging to Linguistic Minorities.

Within this framework of existing principles, the focus should be to (1) affirm that persons belonging to indigenous groups are entitled to exercise fully and effectively their human rights and fundamental freedoms without any discrimination and in full equality under the law; (2) make clear their right to preserve and develop their identity and culture, free from threats of involuntary assimilation; and (3) describe steps governments should take to achieve these ends.

In large measure the draft declaration meets these objectives. But it also includes much that is not a reasonable evolution from existing human rights law.

For example, the document refers extensively to the "rights of indigenous peoples," many of which are in fact statements of social or political goals. They are not recognized as rights in existing international instruments, nor in state practice. Accordingly, the pervasive use of the language of "rights" is both inaccurate and misleading. It tends to diminish the credibility of the Declaration and to lessen the likelihood of its broad acceptance.

It should also not be necessary to convert aspirations or objectives into "rights" in order to draw attention to them. Rather, the term "rights" should be reserved in the declaration for those duties that governments owe their people, the breach of which generally gives rise to a legally enforceable remedy.

2. Precision, Clarity, and Practicability of Rights and Obligations. The existing text has considerable repetition. Important ideas are repeated in different formulations in many paragraphs. Such overlap must be eliminated to avoid ambiguity in interpretation and inconsistency of application.

The draft also tends to group together important but unrelated ideas in single paragraphs. For clarity, key ideas should be stated separately. More important, some key provisions are written in general and imprecise language. It often would be impossible to ascertain whether particular conduct by a State would or would not satisfy the principles enunciated in the Declaration. Much greater precision is required.

3. Attract Broad International Support. The Declaration must seek to build upon existing international law. At the end of the day, the Declaration's influence will be directly related to its ability to enlist the support of key states—notably those with significant indigenous populations—and to shape their conduct. As the text now reads, a number of its formulations will discourage, not encourage, such support. One way to help ensure that the declaration would receive broad international support would be to include a provision in the declaration recognizing that different governments and indigenous populations may take different approaches to the problems the declaration is designed to address. The Declaration should make clear that these governments and indigenous persons have flexibility in interpreting its provisions.

J. RULE OF LAW AND DEMOCRACY PROMOTION

1. Rule of Law

On October 29, 1998, Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright addressed the University of Washington School of Law on rule of law issues. Secretary Albright discussed a range of issues, including corporate responsibility, terrorism, international criminal tribunals and the promotion of human rights and democracy. 9 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 10 at 6–9 (Nov. 1998), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

2. Assistance Programs

During the 1990s, the United States implemented several assistance programs to facilitate the promotion of democracy and the rule of law worldwide. The Education for Development and Democracy Initiative ("EDDI") was established to strengthen educational systems and democratization principles and fortify and extend vital development partnerships between the United States and Africa. A full description of EDDI and its activities and goals is available at www.eddionline.org/index.html.

Also in Africa, the Great Lakes Justice Initiative ("GLJI") sought to promote the rule of law in the Great Lakes region, which includes Rwanda, Burundi and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. GLJI is a multi-donor effort, involving other bilateral donors and multilateral organizations, as well as public-private partnerships, other professional associations, foundations, and NGOs. A full description of GLJI and its activities and goals is available at www.usaid.gov/pubs/bj2001/afr/glji/.

With respect to the former Soviet Union, President George H. W. Bush signed the Freedom for Russia and Emerging Eurasian Democracies and Open Markets Support Act of 1992 ("Freedom Support Act") on October 24, 1992. Pub.

L. No. 102–511, 106 Stat. 3320, 22 U.S.C. § 5811 et seq. The Freedom Support Act authorized a range of programs to support free market and democratic reforms in Russia, Ukraine, Armenia, and the other states of the former Soviet Union. The White House Office of the Press Secretary released a fact sheet regarding the act on April 1, 1992, available at www.fas.org/spp/starwars/offdocs/b920401.htm. President Bush's Statement on signing the Freedom Support Act, excerpted below, is available at http://bushlibrary.tamu.edu/research/papers/1992/92102407.html.

I am proud that the United States has this historic opportunity to support democracy and free markets in this crucially important part of the world. While it is clear to all that the future of the new independent states of the former Soviet Union is in their own hands, passage of the FREEDOM Support Act demonstrates the commitment of the United States to support this endeavor.

Once again, the American people have united to advance the cause of freedom, to win the peace, to help transform former enemies into peaceful partners. This democratic peace will be built on the solid foundations of political and economic freedom in Russia and the other independent states. We must continue to support reformers in Russia, Ukraine, Armenia, and the other new states.

I am pleased that the bill draws our private sector, as never before, into the delivery of technical assistance to Russia and the other new states. Various provisions of this bill will call upon the specialized skills and expertise of the U.S. private sector. S. 2532 will provide support for the trade and investment activities of U.S. companies to help lay the economic and commercial foundations upon which the new democracies will rest. This is an investment in our future as well as theirs.

The IMF quota increase will ensure that the IMF has adequate resources to promote free markets in the former Soviet Union and elsewhere throughout the world. By contributing to a more prosperous world economy, the IMF will expand markets for U.S. exporters and increase jobs for American workers.

This bill will allow us to provide humanitarian assistance during the upcoming winter; to support democratic reforms and free market systems; to encourage trade and investment; to support the development of food distribution systems; to assist in health and human services programs; to help overcome problems in energy, civilian nuclear reactor safety, transportation, and telecommunications; to assist in dealing with dire environmental problems in the region; and to establish a broad range of people-to-people exchanges designed to bury forever the distrust and misunderstanding that characterized our previous relations with the former Soviet Union.

The bill also provides additional resources and authorities to support efforts to destroy nuclear and other weapons, and to convert to peaceful purposes the facilities that produce these weapons.

We undertake these programs of assistance out of a commitment to increased security for ourselves, our allies, and the peoples of the new independent states. These programs will enhance our security through demilitarization and humanitarian and technical assistance. A number of provisions in the bill, however, raise constitutional concerns. Some provisions purport to direct me or my delegates with respect to U.S. participation in international institutions. Under our constitutional system, the President alone is responsible for such matters. I therefore will treat such provisions as advisory.

Furthermore, the bill could interfere with my supervisory power over the executive branch by giving a subordinate official in the Department of State the authority to resolve certain interagency disputes and by regulating how other agencies handle license applications by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. I will interpret these provisions in the light of my constitutional responsibilities.

The bill also authorizes the creation of supposedly nongovernmental entities—the Democracy Corps and a foundation that will conduct scientific activities and exchanges—that would be subject to Government direction, established to carry out Government policies, and largely dependent on Government funding. As I have said before, entities that are neither clearly governmental nor clearly private undermine the principles of separation of powers and political accountability. In determining whether to exercise the authority granted by this bill, I will consider, and I direct the Director of the National Science Foundation to consider, whether these entities can be established and operate in conformity with those principles.

I also note a concern with the provision under which Freedom of Information Act litigation involving the Democracy Corps would be the "responsibility" of the Agency for International Development. This responsibility should not be understood in any way to detract from the Attorney General's plenary litigating authority. Therefore, I direct the Agency for International Development to refer all such matters to the Attorney General consistent with his current authority.

A. ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

1. Headquarters Agreement

On September 21, 1992, President George H.W. Bush transmitted the Organization of American States ("OAS")-United States Headquarters Agreement to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–40 (1992). The Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification on October 6, 1994, 140 CONG. REC. S14467 (Oct. 6, 1994), and the agreement entered into force on November 17, 1994.

The OAS has maintained headquarters in Washington, D.C. since its origins in 1890, but until 1994 it had no formal agreement with the United States. The Headquarters Agreement codified and set forth in detail the arrangements governing the status of the OAS and its activities in the United States. The September 12, 1992, letter from Acting Secretary of State Arnold Kanter submitting the agreement to the President for transmittal to the Senate is set forth in full below.

THE PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit to you the Headquarters Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Organization of American States ("the Agreement"), signed at Washington on May 14, 1992. I recommend that the Agreement be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to approval. The Agreement sets forth the rights and obligations of the Organization of American States ("OAS") and the United States with respect to the OAS headquarters which has been located in Washington for over a century. The OAS has long urged negotiation of a OAS headquarters in the United States. Approval of the Agreement will not only put the status of the OAS in the United States on a clear legal footing, but will be seen as an important symbol of our political commitment to and respect for the Organization.

Many of the provisions of the Agreement elaborate and codify existing arrangements; others clarify matters on which practice was scarce or inconsistent. In a few instances, existing arrangements will be modified. A brief summary of the Agreement's terms follows.

The Agreement provides that the OAS and its General Secretariat shall have legal personality, and affords the OAS the right to hold currency of any kind, with the limitation that the OAS is obligated to pay due regard to the currency laws and regulations of the United States. The Agreement confirms the inviolability of the premises and the archives of the OAS, and provides that all OAS property is immune from judicial attachment.

The Agreement also confirms the exclusive jurisdiction of the OAS with regard to employment disputes. This is consistent with our reading of relevant judicial precedent and the well-recognized need for international organizations to manage their own employment systems. It sets forth the required contents of the OAS "Official Travel Document", which will be accepted by United States authorities as a valid document for international travel. The rights and obligations of the OAS with respect to procurement and use of communications facilities are also defined to ensure appropriate coordination and notification in the event the OAS finds it necessary to use non-commercial communications facilities or facilities which normally require licensing.

The Agreement affords the OAS full immunity from judicial process, thus going beyond the usual United States practice of affording restrictive immunity. In exchange, however, the Agreement requires that the OAS "make provision for appropriate modes of settlement of those disputes for which jurisdiction would exist against a foreign government under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act." In the absence of an agreed mechanism for resolving a particular dispute, the appropriate mode of dispute settlement would be binding arbitration. As the OAS generally includes an arbitration clause in its commercial contracts, this arrangement to a large extent reflects the current situation. The Agreement also sets forth special expedited procedures applicable to small claims.

Under the Agreement, the OAS is assured against being dispossessed of the premises that constitute the headquarters, and entitled to be supplied on equitable terms with public services. The rights and obligations of the United States and the OAS should the OAS move its headquarters or cease to use the buildings for specified official purposes are covered as well. The Agreement specifies the law applicable and the authority of the Parties within the headquarters.

The Agreement provides full diplomatic immunity for a limited number of high level positions, including that of the Secretary General. Such immunity does not attach when the position is filled by a U.S. national. With the exception of these high level officials, OAS officials will continue to have immunity only for acts performed in their official capacity and falling within their official functions. All non-U.S. national officials are, however, granted an exemption from taxation, whether by local, state or federal authorities, on salaries and benefits paid to them by the OAS. This will change the current situation which does not require exemption from state and local taxes. The Agreement also provides immunity for acts of experts in their official capacity and for extension of certain facilities to them.

The Agreement further specifies that privileges and immunities granted to officials and experts are granted in the interest of the OAS and not for the personal benefit of the individuals themselves. The Secretary General has the right and the duty to waive the immunity where such immunity would impede the course of justice and it can be waived without prejudice to the interests of the OAS. The Agreement also provides that the OAS must make appropriate provision for settlement of disputes against officials where they enjoy immunity and the immunity has not been waived by the Secretary General. The Permanent Council can waive the immunity of the Secretary General.

The Agreement makes clear that where the interests of the OAS in the presence of a particular official or other individual in the United States cannot be reconciled with the security interests or the immigration laws of the United States, United States security interests and laws take precedence.

Disputes between the Parties regarding the interpretation or application of the Agreement which cannot be resolved by an agreed mode of settlement will be referred to a panel of three arbitrators for a final decision.

By agreement of the Secretary of State, the Secretary General and the executive director of the entity involved, the Agreement can be extended to other entities in the OAS system which meet certain criteria and which are not dependent upon the OAS General Secretariat for permanent secretariat services. This creates the possibility that the Agreement could be extended to the Inter-American Defense Board, the Pan American Health Organization and other similar entities in the OAS system.

No implementing legislation is required for the United States to perform its obligations under the Agreement. As a treaty, the Agreement will override federal, state and local law with respect to privileges, immunities and exemptions to the extent such laws are inconsistent with its provisions. The provisions of the Agreement are not inconsistent with U.S. immigration laws, which will provide the basis for meeting the commitments established by the Agreement for the admission of aliens.

2. Amendments to OAS Charter

On June 20, 1994, Ambassador Harriet C. Babbit, U.S. Permanent Representative to the Organization of American States, deposited on behalf of the U.S. Government the instrument of ratification to two protocols to the Charter of the Organization of American States, signed at Bogota

April 30, 1948 (2 UST 2394; 119 UNTS 3): (1) the Protocol of Washington, adopted on December 14, 1992, by the Sixteenth Special Session of the General Assembly of the Organization of American States and signed by the United States on January 23, 1993, and (2) the Protocol of Managua, adopted by the Nineteenth Special Session of the OAS General Assembly on June 10, 1993, and signed that day by the United States. The U.S. Senate had given its advice and consent to ratification of the Protocols on May 17, 1994. 140 CONG. REC. S5852 (May 17, 1994).

The Charter amendments of the Protocol of Washington incorporate a procedure for suspending the right of a Member State to participate in OAS policy bodies when its democratically constituted government has been overthrown by force and also address the situation of extreme poverty in the hemisphere. The Protocol of Managua contains structural amendments to consolidate and streamline the institutional mechanisms through which the OAS renders technical cooperation to member states.

Excerpts from a report to the President on the two Protocols from the Department of State, dated December 29, 1993, subsequently transmitted to the Senate by President Clinton on January 26, 1994, appear below. See S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–22 (1994).

* * * *

The United States has consistently supported amending the OAS Charter to strengthen the OAS's capacity to respond to coups. The provisions of the "Protocol of Washington" reflect practical steps that can be taken within the OAS framework that will contribute to policy goals of the United States, of supporting democratic regimes internationally, and of strengthening the multilateral means toward that end.

Upon entering into force, the "Protocol of Washington" would provide for either the suspension, or the lifting of a suspension, of a Member of the Organization whose democratically constituted government has been overthrown by force. Such suspension would not entail expulsion of any OAS Member State. The United States supports the consensus view that suspension should be a last resort, invoked only after other options—diplomatic, political, and economic—have been attempted without success, and that even after suspension, efforts by the OAS should be undertaken to help restore representative democracy in the affected country.

The amendments would add eradication of extreme poverty to the list of seven essential purposes of the Organization of American States now listed in the Charter and would also give prominence to the issue of extreme poverty in other pertinent sections of the Charter. The record of the Conference makes clear that there was no intent to create a legal obligation upon any Member State to eliminate extreme poverty.

With a view to giving further effect to the "Protocol of Washington", the Sixteenth Special General Assembly also instructed the OAS Permanent Council to consider further amendments to the OAS Charter. . . .

At the Nineteenth Special General Assembly held in Managua on June 10, 1993, the "Protocol of Managua", comprising additional amendments to the OAS Charter, was adopted and opened for signature. Upon entry into force, the Protocol would amend the Charter, as amended, by consolidating the existing Chapters XIII and XIV into a new Chapter XIII creating a single Inter-American Council for Integral Development to replace the existing Inter-American Economic and Social Council (CIES) and the Inter-American Council for Education, Science and Culture (CIECC).

The proposed institutional restructuring of the Charter will address important programs and administrative concerns by streamlining the process by which technical cooperation can be effectively delivered to Member States. . . .

In effect, these Charter amendments are tantamount to a fundamental redefinition by OAS Member States of a regional approach to development problems in the hemisphere. The new Council for Integral Development is envisioned as the forum in which discussion and debate of nonpolitical concerns of the hemisphere can take place even at the Ministerial level. At the same time, the Council will ensure that those technical assistance projects that are chosen and executed will be responsive to the economic, social and technical cooperation problems which countries in the region have identified.

* * * *

No legislation would be needed for the United States to implement the Protocols. By their nature the Protocols would have effect principally in the internal operations of an international organization. Appropriate consultations on these matters have been held with staff members of the House and Senate committees concerned with OAS matters. . . .

* * * *

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations reported favorably on the Protocols and recommended that the Senate give its advice and consent to their ratification. S. Exec. Rep. No. 103–28, (1994). An excerpt from the Committee report appears below.

The Protocol of Washington strengthens the ability of the Organization of American States to respond multilaterally to coups and to support democratic regimes in the region. In recent years, no region has made more progress in democratization and liberalization [than] have Latin America and the Caribbean. By 1991, only one country in this region—Cuba—was not led by a democratic government.

In that year, however, this process of democratization was dealt a severe blow by the military overthrow of Haiti's democratically elected President, Father Jean-Bertrand Aristide. This coup, and the conditions of oppression and flagrant human rights violations which have followed, have highlighted the need for stronger institutional capabilities on the part of the OAS to respond to such threats to democracy and stability.

The amendment to the OAS Charter called for in the Protocol of Washington represents an appropriate method by which the [M]ember States can punish and deter the use of force to overthrow a democratic government. Democracy is the most important principle underlying the Organization of American States. . . .

The Protocol of Managua builds on the antipoverty provisions of the Protocol of Washington by streamlining the process by which technical assistance is provided by the OAS to [M]ember States. Together, the two protocols represent a positive and significant change in the way the OAS approaches development problems.

Poverty is one of the most serious problems affecting Latin America, and the committee welcomes this strengthened commitment by the OAS to issues of fighting poverty and developing regional economies.

B. UNITED NATIONS

1. Treatment of Israel in the United Nations

On July 14, 1999, C. David Welch, Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations, appeared before the House International Relations Committee to present the Administration's views on the treatment of Israel at the United Nations.

The full text of the testimony is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/990714_welch_un-israel.html.

* * * *

The treatment of Israel in the United Nations and its affiliated organizations has too often been driven by a desire by some UN members to gain short-term political or rhetorical advantage rather than by the obligation shared by all members to employ the UN system to advance its Charter purposes: the maintenance of international peace and security and the development of friendly relations among nations. The U.S. has consistently opposed efforts in the UN and its organizations that seek to isolate Israel, to subject it to unbalanced or unwarranted criticism, or to interpose the UN in issues reserved for negotiations between the parties in the Middle East. This commitment by all parts of the U.S. government extends back to the founding of the State of Israel and is unwavering.

The United States has always enjoyed the closest cooperation with the Israeli Mission in New York. We have not hesitated to employ our veto in the Security Council when necessary to oppose resolutions that would be damaging to Israel or to the search for peace in the region. In the General Assembly, we have consistently voted against actions that stigmatize Israel and have strongly encouraged other UN members to do likewise. Despite our sustained efforts in this regard, we often find ourselves standing alone or with only a few others on these votes. We continue to assert our positions on these issues and seek ways to expand our ability to influence other delegations.

Let me now turn my attention to specific issues of concern regarding Israel's treatment at the United Nations.

Israel has been effectively denied membership in a regional group. This exclusion prevents Israel from participating fully and effectively in the United Nations. This Administration, like many before it, opposes this prejudice and has worked hard to reverse this injustice. As an interim measure, we have supported Israel's admittance to the Western European and Others Group (WEOG). Most members of the European Union continue to oppose inclusion of Israel in the WEOG. We continue to press the Europeans and report to the Congress on these and other actions in support of Israel's admittance to a regional group.

Primarily because it has been denied regional group membership, Israel is also precluded from membership in other UN bodies —including the Security Council—and is consequently unable to participate fully in their deliberations and decisions. We have made numerous efforts in Washington, New York, and in capitals to reverse this anomaly and allow Israel to contribute fully to the community of nations. Exclusion of Israel from the UN's regional groups and other organizations denies Israel its due as a sovereign UN member, including the opportunity to participate in the full range of international activities conducted at the UN; and it denies the rest of the world the benefits that could flow from Israel's contributions.

Each year, the UN General Assembly adopts a number of resolutions related to the situation in the Middle East. These perennial resolutions (on the Syrian Golan, the Question of Palestine, Israeli Settlements, Palestinian Right to Self-Determination, and Israeli Practices)—some of whose very titles are evidence of their lack of balance—do nothing to advance the search for a just, lasting, and comprehensive peace in the region. Several of these resolutions attempt to address Israeli-Palestinian permanent status issues that must be reserved for the negotiations between the parties themselves. Others advocate language or activities incompatible with the basic principles guiding the search for peace or call for the expenditure of resources which could be utilized in better ways to improve the lives of the Palestinian people. Accordingly, the U.S. opposes these resolutions each year. We continue to work vigorously to convince other nations to join us in rejecting these misguided and counterproductive efforts. We will continue to do so forcefully at this year's General Assembly.

At this year's General Assembly, we intend to propose again a "positive" resolution on the Middle East taking note of the increased likelihood of peace between Israel and its neighbors. The absence of such a resolution in the last two General Assemblies has been an unfortunate manifestation of the down-turn in the peace process. Renewing the positive resolution can be a step toward establishing a voice for the General Assembly that helps, rather than hinders, the search for peace.

In February 1999, the UN General Assembly's Tenth Emergency Special Session recommended that the High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention meet in Geneva on July 15 to discuss enforcement of the Convention with regard to Israeli settlement activities. The U.S. voted against this resolution. We have worked strenuously in the days since its adoption—up to and including today—to cancel or delay this ill-conceived conference. We strongly oppose convening this conference on legal and policy grounds. We have conveyed these objections to a number of other governments at the highest levels. President Clinton has raised this issue personally with the presidents of Switzerland and France. Secretary Albright has had a number of conversations with her counterpart ministers to underscore the approaches we have made in capitals and with other UN delegations. We have also addressed this issue with senior Palestinian and other Arab leaders. We informed Switzerland (in its role as depositary of the Convention) and others that the U.S. would not attend the conference. Australia did likewise. Other countries have expressed their concerns about convening the conference so soon after the formation of the new Israeli government. We continue to believe that convening the conference is a very serious mistake.

In addition to our concern about its negative impact on the peace process, we have serious legal concerns that have not been adequately addressed. The Fourth Geneva Convention contains no provision for an enforcement meeting of the High Contracting Parties. Nor do any of the other treaties of this regime contemplate such an enforcement mechanism.

The Convention does contain provisions to address questions of enforcement (e.g., Article 12 conciliation procedure, Article 149 enquiry procedure), but these do not entail highly public meetings of the High Contracting Parties. The idea of permitting meetings of the High Contracting Parties to address specific questions of application of these rules was raised (by the Arab group) and rejected during the negotiations leading to the adoption of Protocol I Additional of 1977 to the 1949 Geneva Conventions. The negotiating record demonstrates clearly that the High Contracting Parties discussed and rejected precisely this sort of conference.

We also raised concerns about the use of UN funds to offset some of the costs associated with convening this conference. We are continuing our dialogue with senior Secretariat officials to try and ensure that no UN funds are so expended.

* * * *

Finally, I would like briefly to address the issue of General Assembly resolutions 181 and 194. The Administration has made its position very clear on these resolutions. The only basis for the Israeli-Palestinian negotiation are the terms of reference defined in Madrid and the Oslo agreement, UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, and the principle of land for peace. The differences between the Israelis and the Palestinians can only be settled through negotiations.

The United Nations is an organization that mirrors its membership. In the General Assembly, positions adopted or actions taken with the concurrence of a majority of the membership do not always reflect U.S. national policy. On many matters of concern to Israel, the current UN membership often takes action despite the opposing votes of both the U.S. and Israel.

I would like to distinguish the treatment accorded Israel by the UN organization (the Secretary General and his staff) from that accorded by the member states of the United Nations. The former has been and continues to be correct and respectful, as it should be to every UN member.

Israel has experienced both positive and negative treatment over the years from the UN membership. Indeed, the United Nations had an important role in the establishment of the State of Israel. On occasion, the U.S. has been able to employ the United Nations to further our objectives in the peace process as well as help Israel lessen its isolation and more effectively engage in the international arena. We can report a measure of success—such as the repeal of the "Zionism equals racism" resolution—over the UN's history, despite the most recent experiences.

2. Syrian Golan Resolution in the General Assembly

On November 30, 1999, Ambassador A. Peter Burleigh, Deputy U.S. Representative to the United Nations, explained the U.S. vote against a resolution titled "Syrian Golan" in the UN General Assembly. U.N. Doc. A/RES/54/38 (2000). This resolution, inter alia, declared that Israel had "failed to comply with" a 1981 Security Council resolution and determined "that the continued occupation of Syrian Golan and its de facto annexation constitute a stumbling block in the way of a just, comprehensive and lasting peace in the region."

The full text of Ambassador Burleigh's remarks can be found at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/991130_burleigh_un.html.

The United States continues to support a just, comprehensive, and lasting peace in the Middle East. We will do everything we can to assist the parties to reach a negotiated agreement which will resolve their differences. Mr. President, the situation in the Middle East has changed significantly since the last General Assembly. The Sharm el Sheikh Memorandum sets out a timetable for future progress in the peace process. Progress has already been made. The safe passage route between Gaza and the West Bank is operating, the Gaza seaport has been approved, further redeployments have been carried out, additional prisoners have been released and the parties have begun talks on a framework agreement for permanent status.

Despite these positive developments in the peace process, negotiations on the text of a resolution supporting the process were unsuccessful. My government regrets that the General Assembly has thus been deprived of the opportunity to take official notice of the progress already made and express its support and encouragement at this historic attempt to resolve the longstanding Arab-Israeli dispute through peaceful negotiations. . . . My government would like to express its gratitude to the co-sponsors of the resolution on the Middle East peace process, Russia and Norway, for their tireless and dedicated efforts to reach agreement on a text.

Mr. President, the resolution entitled "Syrian Golan," like so many of the other resolutions dealing with the Arab-Israeli dispute, seeks to interject the General Assembly into negotiations. Syria and Israel have both publicly supported the principle of a negotiating process to resolve their differences and resolutions such as this do not contribute to that goal.

The United States will abstain on the resolution on Jerusalem, consistent with our belief that the future of Jerusalem should be decided through permanent status negotiations.

3. Status of the Palestinian Observer Mission

On July 7, 1998, the United Nations General Assembly passed Resolution 52/250 upgrading the status of the Palestinian observer mission, allowing it to co-sponsor resolutions on Middle East issues, to take part in the Assembly's general debate after the last inscribed member state, and to exercise a right of reply. The United States voted against this resolution. U.N. Doc. A/RES/52/250 (1998). Ambassador Bill Richardson, in an explanation provided before the vote explained the United States position that passage of the resolution would not contribute to, and could undermine, the peace process in the Middle East.

The full text of Ambassador Richardson's statement is available in U.N. Doc. A/52/PV.89, at 2.

We have no doubt that most members of this Assembly are sincere supporters of the peace process in the Middle East. They want to see that process moving forward again and are frustrated by the fact that there has been a prolonged impasse. So are we. They want to encourage the parties to make rapid progress on the basis of agreements already achieved. They want to see these negotiations result, at long last, in an agreement that would lead to accelerated negotiations on permanent status. The United States strongly endorses this aim as well. No one has been more energetic in the pursuit of an agreement than we. The fact remains, however, that by taking this action the General Assembly will have made it more difficult to accomplish this objective. Focusing on symbols likely to divide, rather than on steps to promote cooperation, will lead us nowhere. Supporting unilateral gestures which will raise suspicion and mistrust between negotiating partners will not take us closer to our goal.

If this draft resolution is adopted, it will undermine our efforts to get the peace process back on track and will hurt everyone's interests, including those it is most intended to help. Exchanging momentum towards real progress on the ground for symbolic progress in this Hall does not strike us as a good bargain.

Moreover, if this draft resolution is adopted, it could also set a precedent. By overturning decades of practice and precedent in the General Assembly governing the participation of non-members and observers, others who do not enjoy full member status in the United Nations may well press their own claims for enhanced status. This would have serious repercussions for political relations among Member States and would have a deleterious effect on the orderly conduct of United Nations business.

4. Security Council Resolution Regarding Libya's Support for Terrorism

On November 30, 1999, Ronald Neumann, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, spoke before the Middle East Institute on Libyan compliance with Security Council Resolutions related to the downing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, on December 21, 1998.

The full text of Mr. Neumann's remarks is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/991130_neumann_libya.html.

I have not yet addressed the topic that may be of greatest interest to this audience, the future of U.S.-Libyan relations. Until the surrender of the Pan Am 103 suspects for trial, any change in U.S.-Libyan relations was unimaginable. While change can now be imagined, it is not necessarily a near-term likelihood.

The chief current goal of the U.S. Government with respect to Libya is full compliance with the remaining Security Council requirements. These requirements are payment of appropriate compensation, cooperation with the Pan Am 103 investigation and trial, acceptance of the responsibility for the actions of its officials, and a renunciation and an end to support of terrorism and terrorist groups. If Libya complies fully with all these requirements, it will have met the demands of the Security Council.

We have said consistently that Libya can and should comply with these requirements. This remains true. On the other hand, U.S. unilateral sanctions were imposed in response to Libya's support for terrorism before the international sanctions came into being. Any consideration of lifting U.S. sanctions before Libya has complied with international demands would be premature.

While U.S. sanctions were imposed because of concerns about Libyan support for terrorism, there have been other sources of contention in U.S.-Libyan relations over the past 3 decades, including Libyan efforts to obtain missiles and weapons of mass destruction. Indeed, Libya continues to pursue programs for the acquisition of WMD and missiles which would threaten U.S. interests, and we continue active efforts to impede them. We continue to want Libya to find a way to address these concerns. For example, if Libya joined the Chemical Weapons Convention, that would be a welcome step toward answering the international community's concerns regarding Libya's WMD programs, and a further signal of Libyan willingness to establish positive relations with other nations.

That said, Libya is not Iraq. We do not seek to maintain sanctions until there is a change of regime in Tripoli. We have seen definite changes in Libya's behavior, specifically declining support for terrorism and increasing support for peace processes in the Middle East and Africa. We hope such changes signal Libya's willingness to behave as a responsible member of the international community.

We would welcome a Libya that complied with all aspects of all UN Security Council resolution conditions, that refrained from the use of terror or support for terrorist groups to pursue its agenda, that abjured weapons of mass destruction, and that helped to bring about peaceful resolutions to regional conflicts.

C. NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION ("NATO")

On February 11, 1998, President Clinton transmitted to the Senate the Protocols on the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 on the accession of Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic, signed December 16, 1997, at NATO Headquarters, Brussels, Belgium. The President's letter requested the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification and transmitted for the Senate's information the report of the Secretary of State dated February 9, 1998, submitting the protocols to the President, excerpted below. See S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–36. THE PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit to you, with a view to its transmission to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification, Protocols to the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 on the accession of Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic. These protocols were opened for signature at Brussels on December 16, 1997, and were signed on behalf of the United States of America and the other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty.

Adding Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic to the NATO Alliance will contribute materially to the national security of the United States. It will advance the efforts we have undertaken with our allies and partners to build an undivided, democratic, and peaceful Europe, which in turn reduces threats to our own national interests. It will strengthen the stability of a region that helped spawn this century's world wars and the Cold War, which we prosecuted at a cost of trillions of dollars and hundreds of thousands of American lives. It will give us capable new allies willing and able to defend our common interests. It will demonstrate continuing American engagement and leadership in transatlantic affairs.

The addition of these three states to NATO is a central element of our transatlantic strategy. This strategy aims to strengthen the favorable security environment in the region created by the seminal events of the past decade: the end of the Cold War, the collapse of the Warsaw Pact, the dissolution of the Soviet Union itself, the rise in its place of a democratic Russia and other newly independent states, the establishment of market democracies throughout Central Europe, the peaceful reunification of Germany, and the conclusion of agreements to reduce and stabilize conventional and nuclear armaments throughout the region.

These transforming events reduce the likelihood of large-scale aggression in Europe, but also present a host of new challenges and dangers. Threats stemming from the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and conflicts fueled by ethnic or religious tensions, such as in Bosnia, loom immediately. Over the longer term, Europe could face the possibility of renewed aggression or threats to its interests. Europe's new democracies must be more fully integrated into the transatlantic region's security, economic, and political institutions in order to prevent the erosion of recent democratic gains and the possibility of conflict.

All these require continuing American engagement in the region's security affairs and changes in European and transatlantic security institutions. To this end, we have strengthened the role of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, opened the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development to new members, pursued the adaptation of the Treaty on Conventional Forces in Europe, worked closely with the European Union and urged its enlargement, supported democratic and market reforms in Russia, Ukraine, and the other newly independent states, and pursued initiatives with states in the region, such as the Charter of Partnership signed with the three Baltic states on January 16.

NATO's unique attributes—an unrivaled military capability, an integrated command structure, and a primary focus on the collective defense of its members—require that this Alliance remain the keystone of our involvement in the transatlantic region's security affairs. Those attributes made NATO a principal instrument of our successful effort to defend the territory and values of the North American and European democracies during the Cold War, and made NATO history's most successful Alliance.

Since then, the Alliance has repeatedly demonstrated its continuing utility and competence. NATO's success in stopping the war in Bosnia underscores its military effectiveness. NATO's completion last December of a thorough reform of its command structure, reducing the number of commands from 65 to 20, testifies to the premium it places on operational coherence. The addition of new members from Central Europe, along with other adaptations in the Alliance's operations and command structure, will further strengthen NATO's effectiveness, protect more of Europe from future threats, and bolster the development of a Europe whole and free. Specifically, the addition of these three democracies to the Alliance will increase the security of the United States in four ways.

First, it will reduce the prospect of threats to Europe's security, such as those we have seen throughout this century, which could harm American interests and potentially involve American forces. Integrating Central European states into NATO will reduce the chances of conflict by ensuring that such states pursue cooperative rather than competitive security policies. It also will help deter potential threats to this region from materializing. These include the dangers posed by the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the means for their delivery. NATO's enlargement can also help address the possibility, although we see it as unlikely, that Russia's democratic transition could fail and that Russia could resume the threatening behavior of the Soviet period. By engaging Russia and enlarging NATO, we will give Russia every incentive to deepen its commitment to democracy and peaceful integration with the rest of Europe, while foreclosing more destructive alternatives.

Second, adding Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic to NATO will make the Alliance stronger and better able to address Europe's security challenges. These states will add approximately 200,000 troops to the Alliance, a commitment to common values and political goals, and a willingness to contribute to the security of the surrounding region, as they have demonstrated through their contribution of over 1,000 troops to the mission in Bosnia. The military and strategic assets of these states will improve NATO's ability to carry out what is and will remain its core mission, collective defense, as well as its other missions.

Third, the process of adding new states to NATO bolsters stability and democratic trends in Central Europe. Partly in order to improve their prospects for membership, states in the region have settled border and ethnic disputes with neighboring states, strengthened civilian control of their militaries, and broadened protections for ethnic and religious minorities. Such actions help to prevent conflicts in the region that could adversely affect American security and economic interests.

Fourth, NATO's enlargement, with other elements of our transatlantic strategy, advances European integration and moves the continent beyond its forced division of the past half century. The perpetuation of Europe's Cold War dividing line would be both destabilizing the morally indefensible. To help erase that line, NATO launched the Partnership for Peace program with 27 non-NATO states, opened its doors to new members, inaugurated a constructive relationship with Russia through the NATO-Russian Founding Act, signed a new charter with Ukraine, and created the Euro-Atlantic Partnership Council.

These Protocols propose to add Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic to NATO as full members, with all privileges and responsibilities that apply to current allies. The core commitment to these three states will be embodied in the existing text of the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949, including the central collective defense provision in Article 5, which has proved its reliability across the decades of the Treaty's existence. Article 5 represents our country's solemn commitment to the security of the other allies, but the Treaty reserves to each NATO member, including the United States, decisions about what specific actions to take should a NATO member be attacked, and fully preserves Congress' Constitutional role in decisions regarding the use of force. During the Fall of 1997, NATO's military authorities concluded the Alliance would be able to meet the Article 5 and other security assurances to the new states from their first day of NATO membership.

The decision to enlarge NATO's membership results from intensive analysis of the implications of this initiative and the qualifications of the three states now proposed for admission. At the Brussels summit in January 1994, NATO declared that the Alliance remained open to membership for other European states, and created the Partnership for Peace program in part to help prepare interested states for possible membership. The Alliance's September 1995 Study on NATO Enlargement set out the rationale and process for adding new members. At its Madrid summit in July 1997, the Alliance invited Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic to begin the process of accession, and declared its determination to keep the door open for other states interested in joining NATO. Between September and November of 1997, NATO held four rounds of accession talks in Brussels with Poland, and five each with Hungary and the Czech Republic. These discussions examined in detail the three states' military capabilities, their willingness to contribute forces to NATO activities, and their readiness to accept the political and legal obligations of NATO membership. These discussions were based in part on Defense Planning Questionnaire responses completed by each of the three states; these questionnaires are NATO's standard instrument for obtaining information on the military contributions of member states.

During the accession talks, the three states accepted NATO's broad approach to security and defense, as outlined in its Strategic Concept and subsequent Alliance statements. They confirmed their intention to participate fully in NATO's military structure and collective defense planning and, for the purpose of taking part in the full range of Alliance missions, to commit the bulk of their armed forces to the Alliance. They accepted the need for standardization and interoperability as part of the foundation for multinationality and flexibility. They expressed their readiness to accept the nuclear element of NATO's strategy and policy and the Alliance's nuclear posture. They accepted NATO's restrictions and procedures for the handling of sensitive information. They also recognized and accepted that the Alliance rests upon a commonality of views, based on the principle of consensus in decision making, and expressed a readiness to contribute to attaining such consensus. Finally, they agreed to assume shares of NATO's common-funded budgets that cumulatively constitute slightly over four percent of the total.

On November 10, 12, and 17, 1997, respectively, the Czech Prime Minister, Polish Foreign Minister, and Hungarian Foreign Minister wrote to NATO Secretary General Javier Solana to confirm that, on the basis of the completed accession talks, their states desired to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and were willing to accept in full all the obligations and commitments pertaining to their membership. At NATO's Ministerial on December 16 in Brussels, I joined all fifteen other NATO ministers in agreeing to make these states full members, subject to the ratification of member governments.

Article 10 of the North Atlantic Treaty states that the Alliance may add "any other European state in a position to further the principles of this Treaty and to contribute to the security of the North Atlantic area." It was on that basis that the Alliance added Greece and Turkey in 1952, the Federal Republic of Germany in 1955, and Spain in 1982. The unanimity of NATO leaders in welcoming Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic into the Alliance reflects the qualifications of each of these states and a confidence that each of them will, in fact, make meaningful contributions to transatlantic security.

The addition of these three states to the Alliance is part of a strategy to improve not only their security and that of current NATO members, but also all other states of Europe, including the Russian Federation. It is the intent of the United States, and of NATO, to avoid any destabilizing redivision of the European continent, and instead to promote its progressive integration. The Alliance declared at its Madrid summit that it will leave the door open for the addition of other new members in the future, and that it will review this process at its next summit, which will be held in Washington in April 1999. It is encouraging that states that aspire to NATO membership, but have not yet been invited to join the Alliance, nonetheless welcomed the series of enlargement decisions at Madrid, the creation of the Euro-Atlantic Partnership Council, and similar steps as beneficial to their own security.

The NATO-Russia Founding Act, signed in May of 1997, has special importance in this regard. The Founding Act opened the way to a new and constructive relationship between the Alliance and Russia. It therefore complements the efforts of individual allies to see a democratic, peaceful Russia integrated into the community of European nations and security structures. To that end, the Founding Act created a new forum, the Permanent Joint Council, which allows NATO and Russia to pursue security issues of mutual interest. The Council first convened at the Ministerial level on September 26 in New York, met among Defense Ministers in Brussels on December 2, and again among Foreign Ministers on December 17.

The Founding Act, the Permanent Joint Council, the integration of Russian forces in the mission in Bosnia, and other actions by NATO stand as evidence to the Russian people that the Alliance's enlargement in no way will threaten Russia's security, but rather will enhance it by deepening democratic stability in Europe. The Founding Act and Permanent Joint Council advance Russia's cooperation with NATO and integration in European affairs, but they also safeguard NATO's freedom of action and the integrity of its decisionmaking. The Founding Act places no restrictions on NATO's ability to respond to the security environment as its own members see fit. Similarly, the Permanent Joint Council has no power to direct or veto actions by the North Atlantic Council, which remains NATO's supreme decisionmaking body. Moreover, all actions within the Permanent Joint Council must proceed by consensus, which provides the United States and each other NATO member with an effective veto over proposed points of discussion or action. The Ministerial meetings of the Permanent Joint Council to date demonstrates that it can be a useful forum for advancing relations with Russia, and that it will not adversely affect NATO's progress on internal issues such as the Alliance's enlargement. NATO's enlargement and related adaptations, which will enhance the security of its members and partners, also will entail financial costs to the United States and our allies over the coming years. At the Madrid summit in July 1997, NATO's leaders commissioned a study of the military requirements of the Alliance's enlargement, and of the resource implications of meeting those requirements. The declaration from that summit expressed the confidence of NATO's leaders that "Alliance costs associated with the integration of new members will be manageable and . . . the resources necessary to meet those costs will be provided." The studies completed by the Alliance this past Fall confirm this view. They estimate that the addition of these three members will require approximately $1.5 billion in expenditures from NATO's common-funded military budgets over the next 10 years. The United States currently provides about one quarter of these common-funded budgets and will continue to do so after the addition of the new states. Thus the additional costs to the United States of adding these three states to the Alliance is estimated to be about $400 million over the next ten years. Adding other states to NATO in the future likely will entail costs as well, although it is not possible to estimate these without knowing which states might be invited and when.

* * * *

The Protocols to the Treaty of 1949 for each of the three states are identical in structure and composed of three Articles. Article I provides that once the Protocol has entered into force, the Secretary General of NATO shall extend an invitation to the named state to accede to the North Atlantic Treaty, and that, in accordance with Article 10 of the Treaty, the state shall become a party to the Treaty on the date it deposits its instrument of accession with the Government of the United States of America. Article II provides that the Protocol shall enter into force when each of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty has notified the Government of the United States of America of its acceptance of the Protocol. Article III provides for the equal authenticity of the English and French texts, and for deposit of the Protocol in the archives of the Government of the United States of America, the depository state for North Atlantic Treaty purposes. The addition of these three states to the Alliance, along with the other elements of our transatlantic strategy, will enable NATO to help accomplish for Europe's east what it has accomplished for Europe's west over the past half century. It will safeguard our own country's vital interests in Europe's well-being, and help ensure that aggression, conflict, and repression do not once again visit that continent as they have too often, and at terrible cost, throughout our lifetimes. I therefore convey these protocols to you with high expectations that their ratification will further strengthen the peace and security of the transatlantic region well into the approaching century.

On March 6, 1998, the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification, with nine declarations and six conditions. 144 CONG. REC. S4217 (May 4, 1998). The Protocols entered into force on December 4, 1998. On May 21, 1998, President Clinton provided the following certification on conditions related to the operation of NATO. 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 940 (May 25, 1998). See further discussion of conditions on ratification in Chapter 4.B.4.c.

TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES :
In accordance with the resolution of advice and consent to the ratification of the Protocols to the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 on the Accession of Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic, adopted by the Senate of the United States on April 30, 1998, I hereby certify to the Senate that;

In connection with Condition (2), (i) the inclusion of Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic in NATO will not have the effect of increasing the overall percentage share of the United States in the common budgets of NATO; (ii) the United States is under no commitment to subsidize the national expenses necessary for Poland, Hungary, or the Czech Republic to meet its NATO Commitments; and (iii) the inclusion of Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic in NATO does not detract from the ability of the United States to meet or to fund its military requirements outside the North Atlantic area; and

In connection with Condition (3), (A) the NATO-Russia Founding Act and the Permanent Joint Council do not provide the Russian Federation with a veto over NATO policy; (B) the NATO-Russia Founding Act and the Permanent Joint Council do not provide the Russian Federation any role in the North Atlantic Council or NATO decision-making including (i) any decision NATO makes on an internal matter; or (ii) the manner in which NATO organizes itself, conducts its business, or plans, prepares for, or conducts any mission that affects one or more of its members, such as collective defense, as stated under Article V of the North Atlantic Treaty; and (C) in discussions in the Permanent Joint Council (i) the Permanent Joint Council will not be a forum in which NATO's basic strategy, doctrine, or readiness is negotiated with the Russian Federation, and NATO will not use the Permanent Joint Council as a substitute for formal arms control negotiations such as the adaptation of the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe, done at Paris on November 19, 1990; (ii) any discussion with the Russian Federation of NATO doctrine will be for explanatory, not decision-making purposes; (iii) any explanation described in the preceding clause will not extend to a level of detail that could in any way compromise the effectiveness of NATO's military forces, and any such explanation will be offered only after NATO has first met its policies on issues affecting internal matters; (iv) NATO will not discuss any agenda item with the Russian Federation prior to agreeing to a NATO position within the North Atlantic Council on that agenda item; and (v) the Permanent Joint Council will not be used to make any decision on NATO doctrine, strategy, or readiness.

D. INTERNATIONAL MARITIME ORGANIZATION

On October 1, 1996, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification amendments to the Convention on the International Maritime Organization, signed at Geneva, March 6, 1948, 9 UST 621 ("the IMO Convention"). See S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–36. The amendments were adopted on November 7, 1991, and November 4, 1993, by the Assembly of the International Maritime Organization ("IMO") at its seventeenth and eighteenth sessions. The Senate gave advice and consent on June 26, 1998, and the 1993 amendments entered into force for the United States on November 7, 2002. The 1991 amendments are not in force. The excerpt below from the President's transmittal describes the amendments.

* * * *

The United States is the world's largest user of international shipping. These amendments strengthen the International Maritime Organization's capability to facilitate international maritime traffic and to carry out its activities in developing strong maritime safety and environmental protection standards and regulations. The IMO's policies and maritime standards largely reflect our own. The United States pays less than 5 percent of the assessed contributions to the IMO.

The 1991 amendments institutionalize the Facilitation Committee as one of the IMO's standing committees. The Facilitation Committee was created to streamline the procedures for the arrival, stay and departure of ships, cargo and persons in international ports. This committee effectively contributes to greater efficiencies and profits for the U.S. maritime sector, while assisting U.S. law enforcement agencies' efforts to combat narcotics trafficking and the threat of maritime terrorism.

The 1993 amendments increase the size of the IMO governing Council from 32 to 40 members. The United States has always been a member of the IMO governing Council. Increasing the Council from 32 to 40 Member States will ensure a more adequate representation of the interests of the more than 150 Member States in vital maritime safety and environmental protection efforts worldwide.

The 1991 amendments institutionalize the Facilitation Committee as one of the IMO's main committees. The 1993 amendments increase the size of the Council from 32 to 40 members, thereby affording a broader representation of the increased membership in the IMO's continuing administrative body.

Support for these amendments will contribute to the demonstrated interest of the United States in facilitating cooperation among maritime nations. To that end, I urge that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to these amendments and give its advice and consent to their acceptance.

International Claims and State Responsibility

A. GOVERNMENT-TO-GOVERNMENT CLAIMS

1. Holocaust-related Claims

a. Tripartite Gold Commission

On September 27, 1946, the United States, France, and the United Kingdom established the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold ("Tripartite [Gold] Commission" or "TGC") to implement Part III of the Agreement on Reparation signed in Paris on January 14, 1946.

The Tripartite Commission issued its final report on September 3, 1998, which described the TGC's purpose and status as follows:

> [Part III] of the Agreement, entitled "Restitution of Monetary Gold" . . . provided that all the monetary gold found in Germany by the Allied Forces, and any monetary gold recovered from third countries to which it was transferred from Germany should be pooled for distribution as restitution to claimant countries in proportion to their respective losses of gold through looting or wrongful removal to Germany. The Governments of the United States of America, France and the United Kingdom were to receive claims and distribute the gold.

* * * *

> For the sake of convenience, the Tripartite Commission was established in Brussels. . . . The status of the Tripartite Commission as an international organization attracting privileges and immunities in respect of its official functions was recognized in Belgian law on 1 August 1952; this law being retroactive to 27 September 1946 . . . The Commissioners and the Secretary General . . . were also specifically accorded the appropriate privileges and immunities.

The Final Report, Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold, Brussels (Sept. 3, 1998), available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

A preliminary distribution of 80 percent of the gold was made in the period from October 1947 to November 1950 to Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and Yugoslavia. Following the 1958 adjudication of all claims submitted to it (except Czechoslovakia's), the TGC made a "quasi-final" distribution of gold, largely completed in 1959. Subsequent distributions to the Netherlands, Poland, and Czechoslovakia were made in 1973, 1976, and 1982, respectively. The last claim under these procedures was paid on October 29, 1996, when Albania received its combined preliminary and quasi-final shares, as discussed in the Final Report.

Work of the TGC after 1996 addressing claims on the residual gold pool is described in excerpts below from the final report. The full text of the final report is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

22. In the summer of 1996, as an end to the Tripartite Commission's work was in sight, an upsurge in public interest in the question of looted gold and other assets belonging to victims of the Nazi regime focused attention on the fact that there would remain in the gold pool about five and a half tons of gold after Albania had received its preliminary and quasi-final distribution. Some Jewish organizations sought to have this residual gold pool donated in large part to these organizations to help finance activities for the benefit of victims of the Nazi regime or their descendants. They argued that some of the gold was not monetary but had been looted from individuals.

23. The British and U.S. Governments undertook research into their official archives, many of which had been available to the public for some years. While this research was carried out, the final distribution of the gold pool was delayed. The results of the Governments' researches revealed that an unquantifiable but small amount of non-monetary gold might inadvertently have been placed in the gold pool. The Nazis often resmelted gold to conceal its origin.

24. At an enlarged meeting of the Tripartite Commission on 27 June 1997, in which representatives from capitals took part, it was agreed that the Tripartite Commission should launch the final distribution by informing the claimant Governments by diplomatic Note of the amount of gold due to them in the final distribution and that the Tripartite Commission was ready to proceed. Simultaneously, the three Governments would inform the claimant Governments by diplomatic Note of the findings of the British and U.S. researches and suggest that they might wish to consider placing all or some of their final share in a fund being established to aid needy victims of Nazi persecutions. This exercise took place in early August when the Chairman and Secretary General of the Tripartite Commission called together the diplomatic representatives in Brussels of the claimant countries (with the exception of those of the successor states to the former Yugoslavia) and handed over copies of the diplomatic Notes referred to above.

The Governments of France, the United Kingdom, and the United States announced the formal closure of the TGC on September 9, 1998, as excerpted below. 9 Dep't St. Dispatch 24 (Oct. 1998), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html; see also www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/980909_gold_dissolution.html.

3. With one exception, all distributions from the gold pool have now been concluded and waivers of claims have been received from each of the recipient countries. A small remaining share of gold and currency allocated to the successor states of the former Yugoslavia has not yet been distributed, but will be held by the three Governments pending agreement among those successor states on its disposition. The Commission has delivered a final report on its work to the three Governments, which have in turn arranged for its delivery to each of the parties to the Paris Agreement. Accordingly, the Commission's work is now completed, and its archives have been transferred to Paris, and will be made available to the public.

4. The Tripartite Commission was able to meet about 64% of the validated claims on the gold pool. . . .

5. In the view of the three Governments, it is appropriate under the circumstances that prevail today—over 50 years after the conclusion of the Paris Agreement—to consider the process of collecting gold for the gold pool complete. At the same time, the three Governments remain mindful of the possibility that additional Nazi-looted gold could yet come to light. The three Governments envisage that any such gold would be handled in a manner consistent with the Paris process.

b. Overview of U.S. actions

On September 14, 1999, Stuart E. Eizenstat, then Deputy Treasury Secretary, testified before the House Banking Committee on Holocaust-related issues in which the United States was involved. World War II Assets of Holocaust Victims: Hearing Before the House Comm. on Banking and Financial Services, 106th Cong. 5–17, 99–125 (1999) (statement of Stuart E. Eizenstat, Deputy Secretary, Department of Treasury). Excerpts below from his testimony summarize major developments in this area during the 1990s.

Additional documents relating to U.S. involvement in holocaust issues are available at www.state.gov/www/regions/

eur/holocausthp.html. See B.4. below concerning litigation mentioned in Mr. Eizenstat's testimony.

* * * *

The effort to bring a measure of justice to Holocaust survivors and their families did not begin with this Administration or this Congress. It has been a consistent part of U.S. policy for half a century.

* * * *

More recently, in 1990, as part of our agreement to the reunification of Germany, the U.S. asked for and received assurances that the German restitution and compensation programs would be extended to victims living in East Germany who, under the policies of the former German Democratic Republic, had until then been denied adequate compensation. In 1996–97, the U.S. Government was directly involved in encouraging the German government to extend the program to victims living in the Russian Federation, Poland, Belarus and the Ukraine who had been "double victims" of both Nazism and Communism.

The U.S. Government has also concluded its own bilateral agreements on this subject. One, concluded in 1992, covered claims for property located in East Germany confiscated by the GDR from U.S. citizens. Additional agreements for one-time payments to U.S. citizens interned during the War in concentration camps were also negotiated.

All of these property restitution and compensation programs, while significant, were not sufficiently comprehensive and thus left gaps. What we have been doing is trying to close these gaps.

* * * *

The International Community

In attempting to achieve justice for Holocaust survivors and their families, we have been joined by many nations. In 1997 the London Gold Conference brought together 42 countries, seeking to uncover the full implications of the Nazi plundering of gold during World War II. At that conference, the international community created a Nazi Persecutee Relief Fund with assets of $61 million, much of which was contributed by nations in the form of gold. The fund is an international effort with contributions from 18 countries. Managed by the British Government, with the account held by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, the Nazi Persecutee Relief Fund channels money precisely to provide basic relief to survivors of Nazi persecution. Each country can target its contribution. With respect to the U.S. pledge to provide $25 million to the Fund, for example, for the first FY 1998 tranche of $4 million, we chose to spend the money providing support to the neediest "double victims" (of both Nazism and Communism) abroad, and selected a proposal by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, an organization representing 23 Jewish NGOs globally, to administer it. The Claims Conference, using its expertise in this field and its pre-existing contacts with local aid networks in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, is currently bringing needed food, medicine and clothing to Holocaust survivors in Ukraine, Belarus, Moldova, and the Baltics. We look forward to working with Congress as we select projects for the FY1999 contribution and as we seek to obtain funding for the FY 2000 final balance of the U.S. pledge.

In 1998, the international community again met, this time at our invitation in Washington, to deal with other assets stolen during the Holocaust and never returned, among them art, insurance, and communal property. This groundbreaking conference set us on our current path, which I shall detail later. Also in 1998, the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims was established under the Chairmanship of former Secretary of State Eagleburger, to honor unpaid insurance claims and create a humanitarian fund for victims. In short, we have seen in the last few years an sharp increase in activity, reflecting a notable international consensus to achieve a measure of justice for Nazi victims of the 20th century, so that we can enter the 21st century with a clearer conscience.

Slave and Forced Labor

* * * *

Our current involvement in this issue dates to the Fall of 1998, when I was asked by the German government to help find a resolution between class action claimants who had filed suit in U.S. courts for wages and damages arising from slave and forced labor during the Nazi era and 16 defendant German corporations. The German companies, recognizing their moral responsibility for the behavior of private companies during the Nazi era, proposed to establish a foundation which would provide payment to those who were forced to work for private industry as well as those who were victims of other actions during the Nazi era in which German companies participated. The German government, in support of its companies, has proposed to establish a government foundation, which would compensate many others who were forced to work for the Nazi state who might not be covered by the private sector foundation.

* * * *

There are two main reasons why we support resolving these claims through a negotiated settlement rather than trial. First, the age of the survivors—now averaging around 80 years—necessitates an expeditious solution. Second, the number of victims who would be covered by the two German foundations would be much greater than those covered by the lawsuits pending in United States Courts. Thus, justice will be better served if agreement can be reached to establish the German foundations, rather than put Holocaust victims at risk in uncertain and lengthy litigation.

* * * *

Insurance

On insurance, efforts to provide rapid and fair resolution of claims have intensified. The International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims, created in November 1998, has been charged with establishing a just process that will expeditiously address the issue of unpaid insurance policies issued to victims of the Holocaust. Under the very able leadership of former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, the Commission has achieved significant progress in creating a claims-based process to pay outstanding insurance claims in the lifetimes of Holocaust survivors. The International Commission includes five leading European insurance companies, representatives of international Jewish survivor and other Jewish organizations, U.S. and European insurance regulators, and the State of Israel. Under Chairman Eagleburger, a fact-based effort to resolve Holocaust insurance claims promptly and fairly is being negotiated. The objective is to provide expeditious resolution of insurance claims without resorting to lengthy litigation that would delay payment to survivors.

* * * *

We continue to believe that the International Commission is the best vehicle for resolving Holocaust-era insurance claims and have great confidence in Chairman Eagleburger's leadership. We commend the five insurers that have voluntarily agreed to join the International Commission—Allianz, Generali, AXA, Zurich, and Winterthur. These companies' commitment to the Commission, demonstrated by the $90 million escrow fund established at the beginning of the process, and their willingness to negotiate on these difficult issues, has helped make possible the progress to date. We call on all insurance companies that hold policies from the Holocaust era to participate in this process. And we call upon all of our states to give those companies participating in this process a safe harbor from regulatory action as they complete the claims process and begin making payments.

Art

Mr. Chairman, I would now like to turn to an issue with which you have great experience and to which you made a significant contribution when you chaired that portion of the Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets dedicated to stolen art. Significant initial progress has been made to restitute art that was confiscated by the Nazis during World War II. The 44 nations participating in the Washington Conference reached consensus on a set of eleven principles relating to Nazi-confiscated art that envision a massive cooperative effort to trace the current location of this art, publicize this information so that pre-War owners can come forward, and reconcile competing claims of ownership to produce just and fair solutions. The Conference specifically urged nations to encourage the use of alternative dispute resolution mechanisms instead of lengthy court proceedings to accomplish our mutual goals more quickly. Since the Conference last December, there have been many positive developments in this area [in steps taken to return individual works of art.]

* * * *

In the United States, the guidelines of the American Association of Museum Directors, similar to the Principles of the Washington Conference, which call upon museums to research their holdings to see if there are any works with a Nazi-World War II provenance, are in the process of implementation. So far, the Association reports that no museum has reported finding such a work. If any are found, the guidelines call upon museums to publicize that fact, so that pre-War owners and their heirs can come forward and a just and fair solution can be worked out between them and the museum.

Communal and Private Property

In the area of property restitution, there has been slow but steady progress in the countries of eastern and central Europe during the past few months. Much remains to be done, however. As these countries seek to join western political and economic institutions, it is important that they adopt laws and practices on property which are consistent with international standards. It is toward that objective that we have been working since I started my activities as U.S. Special Envoy on Property Restitution in eastern and central Europe in 1995. I have visited all of the involved countries at least once to urge the adoption of equitable, transparent and non-discriminatory laws and practices. Officials at all levels of the executive branch have followed up my initiatives, as have many Members of Congress in their meetings with foreign government officials both here and abroad.

Swiss Bank Settlement

In August of 1998, a settlement was arrived at in principle in which our government played a significant part. Under it, two Swiss banks, who were defendants in a class action brought in the Federal District Court in New York alleging they had failed to return dormant bank accounts to the heirs of account holders who died in the Holocaust would settle the suit with a payment of $1.2 billion. Since that time, the parties, the court and a court-appointed special master have been engaged in the lengthy procedures required under class action settlements. The notification process is still underway. A fairness hearing is scheduled for the end of November, after which a distribution plan must be drawn up for comment and subsequent presentation to the court for approval. The earliest date for commencement of distribution is the late spring of next year. While all involved in the case are proceeding conscientiously to conclude it, this shows the drawbacks of this type of litigation when members of the class are of advanced years. We have benefited from this experience in working on the Foundation solution to the slave/forced labor issue, where all involved intend that distribution will be delayed no longer than six months after final agreement.

Presidential Advisory Commission

Last year, the Congress unanimously passed legislation sponsored by you, Mr. Chairman, creating the Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets in the United States, on which I serve and on whose behalf I can speak. The Commission is composed of 21 members, including 8 members of Congress and is chaired by Edgar Bronfman, who has dedicated years to this cause.

The Commission is hard at work fulfilling the mandate given to it by the Congress: to conduct original research into what happened to the assets of Holocaust victims, including art and cultural objects, gold, and other financial instruments, that passed into the possession or control of the U.S. Federal government, including the Federal Reserve. The Commission will then deliver a report to the President and Congress with the facts it has found and its policy recommendations. Similar historical commissions have been established in 17 other countries.

Education and Remembrance

Perhaps the most significant achievement of the Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets was the encouragement it gave to the cause of Holocaust education. . . . That is why the President pledged the U.S. to be a founding member of an international task force to promote Holocaust education worldwide. In addition to the United States, members of the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research include France, Germany, Israel, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Sweden and the United Kingdom. Israel currently chairs the task force.

c. 1995 Nazi persecution claims agreement

In March 1995, German Chancellor Kohl wrote President Clinton to offer an agreement of the kind Germany had concluded with many European countries, in order to compensate Hugo Princz (of Highland Park, New Jersey) and comparable U.S. nationals who were victims of Nazi persecution. On September 19, 1995, U.S. Ambassador to Germany Charles E. Redman and German Foreign Office State Secretary Dr. Hans-Friedrich von Ploetz signed in Bonn the Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany Concerning Final Benefits to Certain United States Nationals Who Were Victims of National Socialist Measures of Persecution, reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 193 (1996). The agreement, excerpted below, covered persons, including Mr. Princz, who were U.S. nationals at the time they were subjected to measures of Nazi persecution and suffered loss of liberty or damage to body or health as a result. An exchange of notes dated September 19, 1995, between Ambassador Redman and Secretary von Ploetz established that "[a]ny payment by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany under this Agreement will be only for the benefit of United States nationals who were victims of National Socialist measures of persecution by reason of their race, their faith or their ideology." Id. The agreement did not cover persons who were subjected to forced labor while not being detained in a concentration camp. For subsequent settlement concerning forced labor claims, see Digest 2000 at 446–50.

The funds provided by Germany pursuant to Article 2 of the agreement were distributed by the Department of State under the authority of 22 U.S.C. § 2668a to persons of whom the Department was aware, who were U.S. citizens at the time the persecution occurred, and who had not received payments from compensation programs funded by the German Government.

The agreement also provided for further negotiations after two years to provide compensation on the same basis to any additional American citizens who met the agreement's criteria. The Foreign Claims Settlement Commission ("FCSC") was authorized to receive any further cases identified under Article 2.2 and to determine whether they fell within the agreement. As described by the FCSC:

> Legislation passed in early 1996 authorized the Commission to receive and adjudicate cases of additional claimants, a process which it completed in March 1998. Following further negotiations, the German Government paid to the United States in June 1999 an additional lump sum of 34.5 million Deutschmarks (about $18 million) in final settlement of any and all claims of United States citizens against Germany for Nazi persecution in concentration camps, whether or not they were adjudicated by the Commission. The Department of the Treasury . . . completed the process of distributing the settlement fund to the claimants previously found eligible for awards.

See www.usdoj.gov/fcsc. See also discussion of Mr. Princz's earlier unsuccessful effort to sue Germany for damages in U.S. courts, Princz v. Germany, 26 F.3d 1166 (D.C. Cir. 1994), discussed in Chapter 10.A.2.b.(1).

Article 1

This Agreement shall settle compensation claims by certain United States nationals who suffered loss of liberty or damage to body or health as a result of National Socialist measures of persecution conducted directly against them. This Agreement shall cover only the claims of persons who, at the time of their persecution, were already nationals of the United States of America and who have to date received no compensation from the Federal Republic of Germany. This Agreement shall, inter alia, not cover persons who were subjected to forced labor alone while not being detained in a concentration camp as victims of National Socialist measures of persecution.

1. For the prompt settlement of known cases of compensation claims covered by Article 1, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany shall pay to the Government of the United States of America three million Deutsche Marks within 30 days of the entry into force of this Agreement.

2. For any possible further cases not known at the present moment, both Governments intend to negotiate two years after the entry into force of this Agreement, an additional lump sum payment based on the same criteria as set forth in Article 1 and derived on the same basis as the amount under paragraph 1.

The distribution of the amounts referred to in Article 2 to the individual beneficiaries shall be left to the discretion of the Government of the United States of America.

Article 4

1. Upon payment of the amount referred to in paragraph 1 of Article 2, the Government of the United States of America declares all compensation claims against the Federal Republic of Germany by the United States nationals benefiting under that paragraph for damage within the meaning of Article 1 suffered by those nationals to be finally settled.

2. Upon payment of the amount referred to in paragraph 2 of Article 2, the Government of the United States of America declares all compensation claims against the Federal Republic of Germany by United States nationals for damage within the meaning of Article 1 to be finally settled.

3. A United States national shall benefit from a payment under this Agreement only if that national executes a waiver of all compensation claims within the meaning of Article 1 against the Federal Republic of Germany and against its nationals (including natural and juridical persons). At the request of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Government of the United States of America shall transmit such waivers to the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany.

d. U.S. historical study

The U.S. research referred to in the TGC final report discussed in A.1.a. supra, was released by the Department of State in May 1997. Preliminary Study on U.S. and Allied Efforts To Recover and Restore Gold and Other Assets Stolen or Hidden by Germany During World War II, prepared by William Z. Slany, Historian of the Department of State, and coordinated by Ambassador Eizenstat, then Under Secretary of Commerce for International Trade and Special Envoy of the Department of State on Property Restitution in Central and Eastern Europe. In an introduction to the report, Ambassador Eizenstat described its contents as set forth below.

This report addresses a vital but relatively neglected dimension of the history of the Second World War and its aftermath, one that became the focus of intense political, diplomatic and media attention over the last year. It is a study of the past with implications for the future.

The report documents one of the greatest thefts by a government in history: the confiscation by Nazi Germany of an estimated $580 million of central bank gold—around $5.6 billion in today's values—along with indeterminate amounts in other assets during World War II. These goods were stolen from governments and civilians in the countries Germany overran and from Jewish and non-Jewish victims of the Nazis alike, including Jews murdered in extermination camps, from whom everything was taken down to the gold fillings of their teeth.

Our mandate from the President in preparing this report was to describe, to the fullest extent possible, U.S. and Allied efforts to recover and restore this gold and other assets stolen by Nazi Germany, and to use other German assets for the reconstruction of postwar Europe. It also touches on the initially valiant, but ultimately inadequate, steps taken by the United States and the Allies to make assets available for assistance to stateless victims of Nazi atrocities. It is in the context of this mandate that the report catalogues the role of neutral countries, whose acceptance of the stolen gold in exchange for critically important goods and raw materials helped sustain the Nazi regime and prolong its war effort. This role continued, despite several warnings by the Allies, even long past the time when these countries had any legitimate reason to fear German invasion.

On the issue of what was referred to as "non-monetary" gold, the introduction concluded:

> The Reichsbank or its agents smelted gold taken from concentration camp internees, persecutees and other civilians, and turned it into ingots. There is clear evidence that these ingots were incorporated into Germany's official gold reserves, along with the gold confiscated from central banks of the countries the Third Reich occupied . . . [and that] a small portion of the gold that entered Switzerland and Italy included non-monetary gold from individual civilians in occupied countries and from concentration camp victims or others killed before they even reached the camps.

The report is available at www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/rpt_9705_ng_links.html.

In June 1998 the United States released a supplement to the preliminary study. U.S. and Allied Wartime and Postwar Relations and Negotiations with Argentina, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, and Turkey on Looted Gold and German External Assets and U.S. Concerns About the Fate of the Wartime Ustasha Treasury, coordinated by Stuart E. Eizenstat, Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business, and Agricultural Affairs, prepared by William Slany, Historian of the Department of State, available at www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/rpt_9806_ng_links.html.

> This supplementary report, like our preliminary study completed in May 1997, reflects a solemn commitment by the United States to confront the largely hidden history of Holocaust-related assets after five decades of neglect. We have pursued this goal on twin tracks: first, we have made accessible a massive body of documents and conducted research to fill in the historical record on the role of the U.S. Government and other governments during and after World War II; second, in consultation with governments and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) on both sides of the Atlantic, we have pushed ahead with a series of diplomatic initiatives to ensure that the completion of this historical record is coupled with an attempt to do justice, however belatedly, in order to honor the memory of the victims and to lift the lives of the survivors of the Holocaust.

In a briefing on release of the supplementary report, Mr. Eizenstat described its findings as set forth below. Mr. Eizenstat's briefing is also available at www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/rpt_9806_ng_links.html.

Our most significant finding in our May 1997 study regarding the financing of the war was the overall movement of looted gold from occupied countries and individual victims flowing to and through Switzerland—primarily the Swiss National Bank—from Germany, and used by Germany to pay for its wartime imports. The Swiss National Bank must have known that some portion of the gold it was receiving from the Reichsbank was looted from occupied countries, due to the public knowledge about the low level of the Reichsbank's gold reserves and repeated warnings from the Allies. The gold received by the Swiss National Bank from the Reichsbank included some which was stolen from Holocaust victims and smelted into disguised gold bars; although there is no evidence that the Swiss National Bank knew of this latter fact.

These findings were confirmed by the bold and probing gold report just released by Switzerland's Bergier Commission on May 25, 1998, that even exceeded our own estimates of the amount of general and looted gold transferred by Germany to the Swiss National Bank. The Bergier Commission also specifically indicated that there was no longer any doubt that the governing board of the Swiss National Bank was informed at an early point in time that the gold they were handling was looted gold taken from other countries. Indeed, the Bergier Report goes even further and indicates—and I quote—"that attentive citizens could read in the Swiss press exactly where the gold which the Reichsbank was circulating came from." This is the kind of hard-hitting and objective analysis we have come to expect from Professor Bergier.

Our first report focused on how Nazi Germany financed its war effort. Switzerland figured prominently because our focus was on looted gold and the key role that that gold played in the German war effort. Today's report focuses on the equally important issue of the uses to which that looted gold was put—the ability of the Nazis to use Swiss francs they obtained in exchange for the gold they looted to purchase critical war materials from the other neutral countries necessary to sustain the war effort: Argentina, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, and Turkey.

By illuminating the trade as well as the financing side of the equation, our two reports together provide a seamless web, a comprehensive and integrated view of the important part the wartime neutrals cumulatively played in the structure of the German war economy. We have focused on the factors which shaped their neutrality and their trading links with both the Axis and the Allies as well as on their handling of looted assets, essentially gold.

* * * *

A third major and new finding involved Nazi gold itself—new materials which have come to our attention since our first report. Let me summarize these as follows. First, we've arrived at new figures of looted gold. Our first report estimated that Switzerland received as much as $414 million—or about $3.5 billion in today's total—of looted and non-looted gold from Nazi Germany, of which we estimated $185 million to $289 million in those dollars were looted. These figures were increased by the recently-released Swiss Bergier Report, which estimated that some $440 million in total gold went to Switzerland—about $4 billion—of which $316 million, or $2.7 billion to $2.8 billion, was looted. These figures taken together—ours and the Swiss figures—now give us a higher and more definitive range of the total of looted and non-looted gold that flowed through Switzerland.

A second new finding with respect to gold is that presented in the separate annex [Annex I] prepared by the US Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations. Their work here is really quite pioneering and quite remarkable. New sources recently came to light that provided additional information about the infamous Melmer account at the Reichsbank, named after Bruno Melmer, the SS officer who was responsible for taking materials, possessions from concentration camp victims and others at killing centers and depositing them in an SS account in the Reichsbank. These new sources provide the most detailed data currently available for the valuable amounts of gold in the SS Melmer account, and yield an estimate of the total value of this gold markedly higher than previous estimates—indeed, two times the estimates in our initial report and in the Bergier Report.

As to the funding of the Tripartite Gold Commission, the Foreword to the Supplementary Report concluded:

> . . . [T]he postwar negotiations that the United States, Britain, and France conducted with the wartime neutrals were protracted and failed to meet fully their original goals: restitution of the looted gold and the liquidation of German external assets to fund the reconstruction of postwar occupied Europe and to provide relief for Jewish and other non-repatriable refugees. This resulted from the intransigence of the neutrals after the War, dissension within Allied ranks, and competing priorities stemming from the onset of the Cold War. Less than $20 million ($14.9 million from Sweden alone) of the up to $240 million in looted gold acquired by the wartime neutrals, apart from Switzerland, was returned to the Tripartite Gold Commission to meet the claims from the central banks of 15 countries.

e. Nazi Persecutee Relief Fund

The 1997 U.S. preliminary report and similar reports prepared by other governments provided the basis for an international conference on Nazi gold, held in London in December 1997. The London Gold Conference, noted in A.2. supra, addressed the questions of establishing how much gold was stolen, where it went, and how final issues should be resolved.

Representatives of the governments attending the conference agreed to establish the International Fund for Needy Victims of Nazi Persecution for Holocaust survivors and their heirs, known as the Nazi Persecutee Relief Fund. The Fund was to be used largely to assist the "double victims" of both Nazism and Communism in Central and Eastern Europe. At that time, the United States made an initial pledge of $4 million for the fund. As noted in Ambassador Eizenstat's testimony, on February 13, 1998, President William J. Clinton signed into law the Holocaust Victims Redress Act, Pub. L. No. 105–158 (1998), providing $25 million for the Nazi Persecutee Fund and an additional $5 million for associated archival research. See also Under Secretary Stuart Eizenstat, Closing Plenary Statement at the London Conference on Nazi Gold, December 4, 1997, available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/971204_eizen_nazigold.html.

f. 1998 Washington Conference; Principles on Nazi-confiscated art

In remarks delivered at the close of the London Gold Conference, Ambassador Eizenstat noted, among other things, that "while the London conference has appropriately focused on gold, we began also to focus today on other assets—including real property, securities, bonds, insurance, and artworks." Closing Plenary Statement at the London Conference on Nazi Gold, December 4, 1997, available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. He announced that the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C. was prepared to host a conference on these issues in the coming year.

The Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets was held from November 30 through December 3, 1998. At its conclusion, the Conference issued the Principles on Nazi-confiscated art to address the treatment and disposition of artwork stolen by the Nazis, available at www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/981203_heac_art_princ.html. The proceedings of the Conference are available at www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/wash_conf_material.html.

* * * *

In developing a consensus on non-binding principles to assist in resolving issues relating to Nazi-confiscated art, the Conference recognizes that among participating nations there are differing legal systems and that countries act within the context of their own laws.

I. Art that had been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted should be identified.

II. Relevant records and archives should be open and accessible to researchers, in accordance with the guidelines of the International Council on Archives.

III. Resources and personnel should be made available to facilitate the identification of all art that had been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted.
IV. In establishing that a work of art had been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted, consideration should be given to unavoidable gaps or ambiguities in the provenance in light of the passage of time and the circumstances of the Holocaust era.
V. Every effort should be made to publicize art that is found to have been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted in order to locate its pre-War owners or their heirs.
VI. Efforts should be made to establish a central registry of such information.
VII. Pre-War owners and their heirs should be encouraged to come forward and make known their claims to art that was confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted.
VIII. If the pre-War owners of art that is found to have been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted, or their heirs, can be identified, steps should be taken expeditiously to achieve a just and fair solution, recognizing this may vary according to the facts and circumstances surrounding a specific case.
IX. If the pre-War owners of art that is found to have been confiscated by the Nazis, or their heirs, can not be identified, steps should be taken expeditiously to achieve a just and fair solution.
X. Commissions or other bodies established to identify art that was confiscated by the Nazis and to assist in addressing ownership issues should have a balanced membership.
XI. Nations are encouraged to develop national processes to implement these principles, particularly as they relate to alternative dispute resolution mechanisms for resolving ownership issues.

* * * *

At the close of the conference, Ambassador Eizenstat, then Under Secretary of State for Economic and Business Affairs, emphasized U.S. support for the principles adopted.

Ambassador Eizenstat's remarks, excerpted below, are available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1998/981203_eizenstat_heac_art.html.

The first three principles envision a massive cooperative effort to trace this art. We call upon museums to search the provenance of their holdings; on governments to open up their World War II and related archives to private researchers; for commercial galleries and auction houses to seek information, document, and make available what information they have. It is important to locate what was confiscated. It is equally important to know what was not confiscated, or what was restituted to the pre-war owners. The taint of "stolen art" should not be applied to works that do not deserve it.

Researchers in Switzerland, Austria, the Netherlands, and France are at work today tracing the provenance of artworks in their national collections. The international auction houses have redoubled their provenance investigations. Non-governmental organizations have launched projects to find lost art and help survivors and their families in the painful task of remembering what they owned and when and how it was seized. The guidelines issued by the American Association of Art Museum Directors and the Museum Directors Conference of the United Kingdom call for institutions to research their collections and make them available as well to outside researchers. All these practices are consistent with these principles. More and more nations are adopting them.

The fourth principle deals with gaps and ambiguities in the provenance of works. The vast displacement of art, the destruction of many records, and the furtive nature of the international market during the War mean there must be some leeway in establishing provenance. Where there is no bill of sale, a diary entry or an insurance listing might be acceptable evidence of pre-war ownership. If a work is not on a Nazi confiscation list, it may be in the archive records of the Monuments and Fine Arts Commission or the secret inventories of the French Resistance, or in other archival collections. Conversely, there may be circumstantial evidence that works were not stolen but sold at market, or restituted to families and subsequently sold. Provenance work is not easy. But I can say from experience that neither was it easy to trace the movement of Nazi gold. Some said it would be impossible. Yet in 2 years of hard work we were able to do it, as was the Swiss Bergier Commission.

The next three principles—numbers 5, 6, and 7—deal with publicizing the information and encouraging resolution of the issues. They include circulating photos of the art and information about it everywhere in the world, through the traditional media and on the new electronic media. Maximum publicity will tell survivors and their families if their art still exists. It will also tell the international art community if questions still exist about a given work. I applaud the Government of France for its initiative in displaying on the Internet a portion of the unclaimed art restituted to France by the Allied military authorities-the so-called MNR collection. An impressive number of other nations and non-governmental organizations are also preparing databases and their own web sites.

* * * *

To illustrate the eighth principle, that solutions should be flexible and just, I commend to you the recent settlement of the disputed ownership of a painting by Degas, "Landscape With Smokestack." The claimant family produced a fairly clear record of ownership. The owner had paid full value with no knowledge of the wartime provenance. Both were in a position to wage a legal battle that could have gone on for years. Instead, they settled on partial payment for the family and donation of the work to the Art Institute of Chicago, where the public could enjoy it and a label accompanying the work acknowledged both parties. Art claims do not have to be winner-take-all propositions, which produce prolonged struggles in the courts, and drain the resources of both parties. In an atmosphere of good will, a wide range of solutions is there to be found.

And there are additional opportunities when the original owner is found to have died without heirs, the subject of the ninth principle. The art could be sold with the proceeds going to victims of the Holocaust and Jewish communities around the world. Or it could be displayed in museums and identified in ways that educate the public about the cultural losses of the Holocaust.

The tenth principle states that to ensure objectivity and to enhance public confidence in their work, national commissions in this field should have members from outside the government, such as art experts, historians and representatives of communities which were victims of the Holocaust and, where appropriate, distinguished persons from other countries.

The final principle—which I suggest today for the first time—speaks to the need to give the other principles vitality. Nations should take specific measures to apply these principles so they can more quickly accomplish our mutual goals. For example, they should strive to develop internal processes, making use of alternative dispute resolution mechanisms, to restitute looted property.

While the proceedings of the conference will be published shortly, they will remain open until the end of the millennium so that nations may submit reports on the progress they have made to put these principles into effect.

g. International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims

In a Memorandum of Understanding of August 25, 1998, European insurance companies, U.S. insurance regulatory authorities, and Jewish and survivor organizations agreed "that a just process shall be established that will expeditiously address the issue of unpaid insurance policies issued to victims of the Holocaust." Specifically, they agreed to establish an International Commission ("IC") and to "actively and voluntarily pursue the goal of resolving insurance claims of Holocaust victims through the IC." The full text of the memorandum, which provided further agreement on the process to be followed by the IC, is available at www.icheic.org/pdf/ICHEIC_MOU.PDF.

On October 21, 1998, the U.S. Department of State's Office of the Spokesman issued a press statement supporting the IC, as excerpted below.

Under Secretary of State Stuart E. Eizenstat today commended the insurance companies, survivor organizations and governments that have agreed to work with the National Association of Insurance Commissioners (NAIC) on the International Commission on Holocaust-era insurance claims. . . .

> "We share fully the goals of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, the World Jewish Congress, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims, and the insurance companies that have joined this process. We have been impressed with the cooperative spirit with which all the participants on the International Commission have approached this critical issue. This Commission, launched by the NAIC, represents a coordinated effort among several groups to resolve Holocaust-era claims promptly and equitably through a voluntary process."

The International Commission (IC) is having its first meeting today in New York City. The composition of the International Commission is balanced: six European and six American representatives, headed by a Chairman acceptable to all Commission members. Decisions will be made by consensus. The IC has a provision for observers from the European Commission, the Jewish community and the State Department. Under Secretary Eizenstat, who will be the State Department observer on the IC, designated J.D. Bindenagel to represent him, as appropriate. . . .

h. Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets

In May 1999 the Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets met in Washington, D.C. At its conclusion, on May 20, 1999, Under Secretary of State Eizenstat provided a briefing, excerpted below. The full text of his remarks is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/990520_eisenstat_heac.html.

At the Washington conference, government delegations from 44 countries, together with representatives of NGOs, art museums, art dealers and auction houses reached consensus on what has now become known as the Washington Conference Principles on Nazi Confiscated Art. These principles would guide the purchase, sale, exhibition and international exchange of artwork and they envision a massive cooperative effort to trace this art, publicize the information and reconcile competing claims of ownership to produce just and fair results.

Many governments have now taken huge steps in light of the Washington Conference Principles. Some of the highlights include—and you'll see more details in the background paper—Austria is continuing the task of adjudicating numerous claims to artwork and their national collection to return any that are shown to have been looted by the Nazis; a collection of artwork was recently returned to the Rothschild family by the Austrian Government and will be auctioned by Christie's of London on July 8. In France, French Government action is underway to find and return Nazi confiscated art. They have some 2,000 looted pieces which are now being displayed, and last month France returned to the Rosenberg family a Monet which had been included in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts' late Monet exhibition. In Russia, a new NGO has been proposed to research Soviet archives; and while the new federal law is under challenge in the Russian Constitutional Court, research continues into archival holdings and art lost from the former Soviet Union is being catalogued.

Here in the U.S., the Association of Art Museum Directors recently reaffirmed its guidelines for dealing with Holocaust-era art which had served as a starting point for our draft of what later became the Washington Conference Principles. I met recently with Christie's and got a very good report about what major auction houses are doing in terms of additional research into the provenance of art.

The Council of Europe has also gotten involved since our conference, and as a result of our conference. Their cultural committee recently held a hearing on art where our State Department coordinator for Holocaust issues and director of the Washington Conference, J.D. Bindenagel, presented our views on these principles. As a result, the Council of Europe is now considering a proposal for all member states of the Council of Europe, which is based in Strasburg, to implement the Washington principles into their own national laws. We've encouraged the Austrian Government and the Council of Europe to consider hosting a meeting on Nazi confiscated art in the Spring of 2000. There's much additional work on art that is going on that you'll see in the background paper.

Second, the Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets in the U.S . . . is building on and continuing the work begun by the interagency working group that produced our 1997 and 1998 reports, as well as the 1998 Washington Conference. . . .

The issue of Holocaust-era insurance claims was one of the most complex and difficult challenges facing the Washington Conference. The establishment of the International Commission on Holocaust-era insurance claims, chaired by former Secretary of State Larry Eagleburger, is a particularly encouraging development because it offers an efficient and effective means of advancing the swift and just resolution of this issue. . . .

* * * *

France joined the Commission soon after it was formed at the last meeting. The Polish Government joined and contributed to the Commission's successful claims decision process. Commission Chairman Eagleburger recently met with Czech President Havel, whose government will be joining at the next meeting. And in the private sector, there are companies, whether they are subject to Europe's regulatory jurisdiction or not, who are considering their participation also in this Commission.

In light of these developments, sanctions against companies participating in the Eagleburger Commission would gravely undermine the Commission's work, to the ultimate disadvantage of Holocaust survivors. We appeal very strongly to all the insurance commissioners in all 50 states to recognize the importance of a safe harbor for all of those insurers who are actively working—and there are now five—within the commission, with more coming—as I've mentioned, the Polish and other insurers.

It would be a detriment to keeping those already in the Commission working in a cooperative way, opening their archives; and it would be a further detriment to the encouragement of additional companies to come into the Commission if companies were still subject to sanctions even if they're participating actively and cooperatively in the Commission's work.

On communal property, the Washington Conference was the first inter-governmental conference to address the restitution of communal property in any detail with the participation of NGOs. . . .

And last and most current, forced and slave labor. This is an issue not on the agenda at the Washington Conference, but which has since become the focus of our efforts in recent months. At my invitation and that of Minister Bodo Hombach, the Minister of the German Chancellery, we held an all-day discussion on May 12 with some 80 representatives of eight governments, about a foundation initiative of German enterprises. The initiative aims at material relief for forced and slave laborers and other victims of Nazi persecution that involved German industry. The foundation initiative envisions the creation of a future fund as well. The participants discussed the essential problem of legal closure for the German companies, which is the sine qua non to make this initiative work.

The goal of this important initiative is to provide victims with payments through a cooperative, fair, and non-bureaucratic arrangement without regard to nationality or religion. In this connection, Minister Hombach and I expressed our understanding of the concern of German enterprises to achieve legal closure with respect to current and future lawsuits.

Gathering the affected parties together on May 12 was a significant accomplishment; it had all the actors necessary—plaintiffs' attorneys, defendants' attorneys, NGOs and governments. Hence the commitment to meeting in working groups, which resulted in moving the process toward closure and making recommendations within 90 days.

QUESTION: What is the current status of sanctions relating to the insurance issues? Could you just bring us up to date on that?

UNDER SECRETARY EIZENSTAT: Yes. A number of states have passed potential sanctions laws—California, Florida, New York—which have in them provisions that would defer sanctions on those insurers that are participating in the international commission.

There is a certain restlessness, which I understand, on the part of some insurers and other political leaders—California, for example—insurance commissioners—to make sure that the International Insurance Commission is proceeding promptly. It is; it is doing yeoman's work. And it would be enormously counterproductive if in California, or other states, this safe harbor were to be removed. This is a really critical issue for the continued participation of insurance companies from Europe, and our ability to get additional insurers involved. I know that some people, like State Senator Hayden, have expressed some concerns. We share their sense of urgency, but again sanctions would be very counterproductive and not justified, given the progress which Secretary Eagleburger's commission has now made—particularly with the May 6 agreement in London.

QUESTION: What do you mean by safe harbor?

UNDER SECRETARY EIZENSTAT: In other words, that if you're participating in the work of the Commission, you should not be subject to de-licensing in the state for failure to pay Holocaust era claims.

2. United States-Chile: Commission Established Under Disputes Treaty

On January 11, 1992, an award was issued by the commission established under the 1914 Treaty for the Settlement of Disputes That May Occur Between the United States and Chile, convened pursuant to an agreement between the two countries dated June 11, 1990, reprinted in 31 I.L.M. 1 (1992). The case considered by the commission involved the deaths of former Chilean Ambassador to the United States Orlando Letelier and American citizen Ronni Moffitt, and the injuries sustained by Michael Moffitt, in a September 21, 1976, car-bombing incident in Washington, D.C. The background of the case and the measures taken by the United States in response to the failure of Chile to extradite, prosecute, or seriously investigate the alleged perpetrators of the murders, three ex-officials of the Chilean Directorate of National Intelligence, are set forth in Digest 1978 at 851–55, Digest 1979 at 50–52 and Digest 1980 at 33–35. See also 83 Am. J. Int'l. L. 352 (1989).

The 1990 agreement, set forth in the award, provided that "[w]ithout admitting liability, the Government of Chile, in order to facilitate the normalization of relations, is willing to make an ex gratia payment . . . to the Government of the United States of America, to be received on behalf of the families of the victims." The governments agreed that "the amount of the ex gratia payment should be equal to that which would be due if liability were established." See Digest 1989–1990 at 537–41. The commission determined that the amount of compensation to be paid to all claimants totaled $2,611,892, including allocations for loss of support, moral damages, health expenses, and other expenses incurred. Excerpts from the award below provide the general criteria the commission used to establish the amount of payment. See also 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 347 (1992).

19. Before proceeding to a precise determination of the payments to be made to the members of the Letelier and Moffit families individually mentioned below, the Commission believes it advisable to indicate the general criteria that it has taken into consideration in setting the amount of those payments.

20. It is necessary to remember, first of all, that according to paragraph 4 of the Compromis, the Commission is to determine the amount of the ex gratia payment to be made by the Government of Chile in conformity with the applicable principles of international law, as though liability were established.

21. In this regard, the judgment handed down by the Permanent Court of International Justice in the Chorzow Factory case (Chorzow Factory, P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 17) cited by the United States and Chile in their respective written presentations, may be taken as enunciating a general rule. The pertinent portion of this judgment reads verbatim as follows: "(R)eparation must, as far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed."

22. The Commission has also kept in mind the need to apply the same rules to the members of the families of Orlando Letelier and of Ronni Moffitt, with no differentiation whatever by reason of their nationality.

23. It should be pointed out that the Commission has followed the same criteria in examining the situation of each of the beneficiaries of these payments. In each of these cases, the Commission has examined the loss of financial support and services and the material and moral damages suffered by each of the claimant family members. The Commission has also examined the appropriateness of the expenses claimed in each case.

24. In respect of interest the Commission has considered that since compensation for the above elements has been expressed at present value it is unnecessary to provide for the payment of interest.

3. U.S.-Germany: Settlement of Property Claims

On May 13, 1992, the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany signed an "Agreement Concerning the Settlement of Certain Property Claims." This Agreement provided for payment of compensation by the Federal Republic to the United States for claims of nationals of the United States (including natural and juridical persons) against the former German Democratic Republic ("GDR") arising from any nationalization, expropriation, intervention or other special measures directed against property of U.S. nationals before October 18, 1976.

The 1992 Agreement established a settlement amount of $190 million for claims that had been awarded by the U.S. Foreign Claims Settlement Commission ("FCSC"), and provided an option under which claimants could elect to forgo their share of the settlement amount and, instead, to pursue their claims through a property claims program then in effect in Germany. The claims at issue had been adjudicated by the FCSC during the period 1978 to 1981, under the German Democratic Republic Claims Program established on October 18, 1976, pursuant to Pub. L. No. 94–542, 90 Stat. 2509, 22 U.S.C. §§ 1644–1644m. In 1981 the FCSC stated that it had issued favorable awards on 1,899 claims (out of 3,898 adjudicated) for a total principal amount of $77,880,352.69. The FCSC also awarded claimants interest, calculated at a 6% simple annual rate from the date on which the property had been taken. See II Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 2350–60 and 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 792 (1992).

On May 29, 1992, Assistant Legal Adviser Ronald J. Bettauer sent a letter of notification to claimants providing information on procedures for obtaining compensation pursuant to the settlement agreement and alerting those who wished to receive a portion of the settlement amount that they could not accept compensation or returned property under the claims program currently in effect in Germany. The letter also noted that claimants attempting to recover under both programs would be subject to suit by the Department of Justice. See 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 795 (1992).

4. United States-Mexico: Request for Espousal

On November 8, 1993, a complaint on behalf of 848 named individuals and "all other individuals similarly situated but at present unknown" was submitted to the Department of State. The claims were based on certain property takings claims of Mexican nationals and their descendants against the United States that were settled by Mexico and the United States in the Convention for the Adjustment and Settlement of Certain Outstanding Claims, signed at Washington November 19, 1941, entered into force April 2, 1942 (the "1941 Convention"). In the complaint, claimants argued that the 1941 settlement constituted a separate illegal taking and requested that the United States espouse this new claim against Mexico. Excerpts below from a letter dated January 11, 1994, from Ronald Bettauer, Assistant Legal Adviser for International Claims and Investment Disputes, U.S. Department of State, explain the inability of the United States to espouse such claims.

The full text of the letter is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Under international law and longstanding practice, the United States may only present to another government the claim of one of its nationals if several requirements have been satisfied. First, the claim must be continuously owned, from the time the claim arises, by a United States national. Second, the claimant must exhaust all available legal remedies in the country against which the claim is brought. Third, the act complained of must constitute a violation of international norms of state responsibility attributable to the government of the country.

These requirements are not satisfied in this case. First, although the descendants of the original claimants may now be United States citizens, all these claims were originally claims of Mexican nationals. Although you have argued that the settlement of the claims by Mexico in 1941 constitutes a separate taking, the underlying claims themselves arose at the time of the initial alleged taking. As such, the international law requirement that a claim be continuously owned by a United States national before the United States Government may present it to another country has not been, and cannot be, met in these land grant cases. Second, although you have referred in the petition to "extensive negotiations" and the presentation to the Mexican Government of a petition and certain documentation, it does not appear that the claimants have exhausted available legal remedies in Mexico. There is no evidence, for instance, that you have filed any legal action in Mexican courts and pursued it through the Mexican legal system.

Finally, contrary to the central premise of your petition, Mexico's failure to pay compensation for claims settled by it under the 1941 Convention does not constitute a violation of that Convention. As the enclosed memorandum notes, and as the United States has consistently explained, the 1941 Convention did not obligate either country to compensate the original owners of the claims. Any such obligation as might exist would arise under domestic law. While under no international legal obligation to do so, the United States enacted legislation under which the original owners of the claims asserted by the United States were compensated for their losses. Mexico did not choose to do the same. However, as the 1941 Convention does not create an obligation to compensate the original owners of the claims, it cannot be said that Mexico has failed to live up to its obligations under that treaty.

Insofar as there appears to be no basis for the United States Government to present these claims against the Government of Mexico, it would not be appropriate to refer them to the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission.

5. United States-Albania: Claims Settlement Agreement

between the United States and Albania. See Chapter 9.A.2.a. Article IV of the Memorandum of Understanding provided for negotiations, upon the request of either government, for the prompt settlement of claims and other financial and property matters that remained unresolved between them.

In 1992 the FCSC requested registration of claims against Albania "for losses resulting from uncompensated nationalization, expropriation, confiscation, or other taking of real property and other property rights and interests by the Albanian regime which took power at the end of World War II." 57 Fed. Reg. 4067 (Feb. 3, 1992). As noted in the Federal Register notice, the registration of the claim would not constitute the filing of a formal claim against Albania, but failure to file would reduce information available for future settlement negotiations.

On July 16, 1993, Ronald J. Bettauer, Assistant Legal Adviser for International Claims and Investment Disputes, issued a notice informing persons with claims that Albania had enacted two laws concerning the return of expropriated or confiscated properties in Albania, excerpted below. The full text is available at 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 93 (1994).

Claims concerning agricultural properties.

The Law on Compensation in Value to Former Owners of Agricultural Land, Law No. 7699, entered into force on May 15, 1993. This law recognizes the right of former owners to ownership of agricultural land for purposes of compensation. The law covers natural and juridical persons who owned land at the time of the issuance of the Law on Agrarian Reform (Law 108, August 29, 1945) or the legal heirs of such persons. Agricultural land refers to all land in Albania designated as agricultural land, including olive groves, orchards, vineyards and lands which were regarded as agricultural in 1945. Under Law No. 7699, former owners or heirs who received agricultural land under Law No. 7501 of July 19, 1991, may receive compensation in value for the difference between the area of agricultural land they originally owned and the area returned to them.

* * * *

Compensation will be provided through state bonds denominated in leks, which will be payable before December 31, 1999, and which will be transferable and saleable. After December 31, 1999, for a 5-year period compensation can also be provided in leks. The bonds will be guaranteed and may be used before the redemption date to purchase state property.

Claims for compensation must be presented to the State Committee for the Compensation of Property in the relevant district within one year after the date of entry into force of the law, i.e., by May 15, 1994.

The law does not cover properties belonging to the former king and to foreign or joint companies. In addition, certain persons may not benefit from compensation under the law, including former collaborators of the Nazi-Fascist occupiers for properties acquired during the occupation, former Communist party and government officials for properties acquired as a result of the abuse of official position as provided by court decision, and persons convicted of massive appropriations of the wealth of the people.

Claims concerning non-agricultural properties.

The Law on the Return and Compensation for Property of Former Owners, Law No. 7698, which covers property (in the form of lots, buildings and anything permanently connected with them, such as residential buildings, factories, workshops, shops, stores and any other type of building) within municipal limits, entered into force on May 15, 1993. The law does not cover properties which fall within the purview of the Law on Compensation in Value for Owners of Agricultural Land.

Under Law No. [7698], the right to ownership is recognized, and all properties that exist in the form of unoccupied lots or unchanged buildings shall be returned to their former owners or their heirs, with some exceptions. Other properties may also be returned, under a complex system of restitution and compensation, depending on the type of property, its current status and use. For example, the availability and amount of restitution or compensation may depend on factors such as use of the property or buildings (whether in public or private use), whether the building or lot is used for purposes for which it was expropriated, whether full compensation was received at the time of expropriation, whether properties have been transferred to third parties (in which case payment of rent may be required), whether improvements have been made by the state or the owner (in which case co-ownership or payments may be required), and whether permanent or temporary construction has been undertaken on lots. The law provides for co-ownership and payment of rents (at specified rates) in certain circumstances.

The law states that a State Committee for the return of property to former owners or for providing compensation has been created in the Council of Ministers for the purpose of certifying claims of former owners that are not otherwise resolved in the law.

* * * *

The United States has begun discussions with Albania for a claims settlement agreement. However, it is not yet clear whether or when such an agreement may be concluded. Any agreement would likely cover only claims for property which was owned by United States nationals at the time of expropriation by Albania. In addition, dual United States-Albanian nationals will be included only if those nationals are domiciled in the United States currently or for at least half the period of time between the taking of their property in Albania and the date [of] entry into force of the agreement. Claimants who wish to pursue restitution or compensation for their property in Albania may wish to proceed to file claims for compensation with the required authorities in Albania.

* * * *

On March 10, 1995, the United States and Albania reached agreement on a $2 million lump sum settlement of claims. Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Albania on the Settlement of Certain Outstanding Claims. The agreement settled the claims of United States nationals against Albania arising from expropriation or other measures affecting property as well as the claims of Albanian nationals against the United States. As defined in an agreed minute to the agreement, the term "United States nationals" would include dual United States—Albanian nationals "only if those nationals are domiciled in the United States currently or for at least half the period of time between when the property was taken and the date of entry into force of the agreement."

Albania agreed to pay the United States $2 million simultaneously with the release of gold to Albania by the Tripartite Gold Commission, discussed in A.1. supra. The agreement entered into force on April 18, 1995, after the parties notified each other that the necessary domestic requirements had been fulfilled. The text of the agreement, excerpted below, is available at 34 I.L.M. 597 (1995).

* * * *

The claims settled pursuant to this agreement are:

(a) the claims of United States nationals (including natural and juridical persons) against Albania arising from any nationalization, expropriation, intervention, and other taking of, or measures affecting, property of nationals of the United States prior to the date of this agreement; and
(b) the claims of nationals of Albania (including natural and juridical persons) against the United States prior to the date of this agreement.

1. Upon entry into force of this agreement, the United States shall inform the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold of its readiness to consent to the release to the Government of Albania, in accordance with the procedures referred to in paragraph 2, of the appropriate amount of gold under Part III of the Agreement of Reparation of January 14, 1946 and the practices and procedures of the Tripartite Gold Commission. The parties understand that release of the gold to Albania requires the consent not only of the United States Government, but also of the Governments of France and the United Kingdom.

2. Simultaneously with the release to Albania of the gold referred to in paragraph 1, Albania shall pay to the United States the settlement amount. Procedures for the simultaneous release and payment will be agreed by the two parties.

The United States shall be exclusively responsible for the distribution of the settlement amount referred to in article 2, to United States nationals for their claims as specified in article 1, in accordance with U.S. law.

Article 5
Albania shall afford United States nationals (including natural and juridical persons) with claims not settled by this agreement the same rights as it affords Albanian nationals under the laws of Albania to pursue and receive compensation, restitution, or any other local remedy available under its domestic restitution or compensation procedures.

6. U.S.-Cambodia: Settlement of Property Claims

On October 6, 1994, representatives of the U.S. Government and of the Royal Cambodian Government, meeting in Washington, signed the Agreement Concerning the Settlement of Certain Property Claims, reprinted in 34 I.L.M. 600 (1995); see also 57 Fed. Reg. 9052 (Mar. 16, 1992). The agreement required U.S. nationals to report claims against the Government of Cambodia or any Cambodian government entity. Under the agreement, Cambodia agreed to pay the sum of $6 million in full and final settlement of claims of the United States and its nationals, arising from expropriation or other measures directed against property at the time of the fall of the Lon Nol government in 1975.

The claims covered were described as follows in Article 1 of the agreement:

> (a) the claims of the United States and of nationals of the United States (including natural and juridical persons) against Cambodia arising from the nationalization, expropriation, or taking of, or other measures directed against, properties, rights, and interests of the United States and its nationals prior to the entry into force of this agreement; and
> (b) the claims of Cambodia and of nationals of Cambodia (including natural and juridical persons) against the United States arising from the nationalization, expropriation, or taking of, or other measures directed against, properties, rights, and interests of Cambodia or Cambodian nationals prior to the entry into force of this agreement.

Article 2, which fixed the settlement amount, also addressed in paragraph 3 the use and treatment of blocked assets:

> Cambodia agrees that the settlement amount shall be paid out of assets of the former Government of the Khmer Republic that are blocked in the United States on the date of the entry into force of this agreement. The United States agrees to unblock all such assets within thirty days of entry into force of this agreement, after payment of the settlement amount out of such assets. The United States agrees to unblock, at the same time, assets of nationals of Cambodia.

* * * *

Article 3 guaranteed that this agreement constituted "a full and final settlement and discharge of the claims covered by this agreement." See 59 Fed. Reg. 60,558 (Nov. 25, 1994).

7. U.S.-Vietnam: Settlement Agreements

On January 28, 1995, in Hanoi, Vietnam, representatives of the Government of the United States and of the Government of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam signed the Agreement Concerning the Settlement of Certain Property Claims ("Claims Settlement Agreement"), reprinted in 34 I.L.M. 685 (1995), and the related Agreement Concerning the Transfer of Diplomatic Properties ("Diplomatic Property Agreement").

a. Claims Settlement Agreement

The claims settled by the agreement with Vietnam arose at the time of the fall of the former Republic of Vietnam. Under the Claims Settlement Agreement, Vietnam agreed to pay the sum of $208,510,481 (the "settlement amount") to the United States, and the United States agreed to unblock all assets of Vietnam, as well as of its nationals. Of the $208,510,481 that Vietnam agreed to pay the United States, $203,504,248 was devoted to satisfaction of claims that had been adjudicated by the U.S. Foreign Claims Settlement Commission under title VII of the International Claims Settlement Act, 22 U.S.C. §§ 1645–16450. The remaining $5,006,233 was devoted to the satisfaction of subrogated claims of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation for payments on investment insurance. On January 28, 1995, the United States and Vietnam also concluded an agreement and amendment concerning the transfer of diplomatic properties.

The Claims Settlement Agreement constituted full and final settlement of claims of each government and its nationals against the other government arising from expropriation or other measures directed against property. The claims agreement did not cover debt. Vietnam agreed to reschedule debt to the United States under the auspices of the Paris Club group of creditor countries. See 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 366 (1995).

Articles 1 and 3 of the Claims Settlement Agreement described the claims covered and the effect of the settlement, as set forth below.

Article I
The claims covered by this agreement are:

a) the claims of the United States and of nationals of the United States (including natural and juridical persons) against Vietnam arising from the nationalization, expropriation, or taking of, or other measures directed against, properties, rights, and interests of the United States or United States nationals prior to the entry into force of this agreement;
b) the claims of Vietnam and of nationals of Vietnam (including natural and juridical persons) against the United States arising from the nationalization, expropriation, or taking of, or other measures directed against, properties, rights and interests of Vietnam or Vietnamese nationals prior to the entry into force of this agreement.

Article 3.
1. Upon payment of the settlement amount, this agreement shall constitute a full and final settlement and discharge of the claims covered by this agreement, and thereafter neither government shall present to the other, on its behalf or on behalf of another, any claim covered by this agreement.
2. Any title to, or right or interest of any kind in, properties included in claims covered by this agreement shall be transferred by operation of this agreement to the government against which the claim had been made upon payment of the settlement amount.
3. If any claim covered by this agreement is presented directly by a national of one country to the government of the other, that government will refer it to the government of the national who presented the claim.

Article 2 of the Claims Settlement Agreement set out the settlement amount in paragraph 1, and specified in paragraph 2 that the United States was to be exclusively responsible for its distribution. Under paragraph 3, the United States agreed to unblock Vietnam's assets within thirty days after entry into force of the agreement (i.e., upon its signature, as provided in Article 4), or of the Agreement Concerning the Transfer of Diplomatic Properties, whichever was later. Vietnam agreed that the settlement amount was to be "paid simultaneously out of such assets." The United States also agreed to unblock at the same time assets of nationals of Vietnam. See 60 Fed. Reg. 12,885 (March 9, 1995).

b. Diplomatic Property Agreement

The United States and Vietnam initialed the Diplomatic Property Agreement on December 14, 1994, and signed it on January 28, 1995. A statement issued by the Department of State on January 27, 1995, indicated, among other things, that the signing of that agreement would resolve remaining diplomatic property issues "thereby clearing the way for opening liaison offices in Washington and Hanoi." 6 Dep't St. Dispatch 6 at 84 (Feb. 6,1995), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html. See discussion in Chapter 9.A.2.j.

The Diplomatic Property Agreement set out in its preamble that the Government of the United States ("USA") was the legal and rightful owner of twenty-two properties in the Socialist Republic of Vietnam ("SRV"), including two in Hanoi, one in Hue, and nineteen in Ho Chi Minh City (formerly Saigon). The preamble also provided that the SRV was the legal and rightful owner of a single property at 2251 R Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. (the former embassy of the Republic of South Vietnam), and that both the United States and the SRV then had custody and control of the other's properties. The preamble noted that both the United States and the Socialist Republic of Vietnam wanted to resolve property issues "in a fair, equitable and expeditious manner and establish liaison offices in Hanoi and Washington . . . [and] recognize that it is in the best interest of the parties for the SRV to return the USA's Properties or provide functional and value equivalent properties and to permit the establishment, maintenance, operation and support of a liaison office in Hanoi . . . [and] for the USA to return to the SRV its R Street Property and permit the establishment, maintenance, operation and support of a liaison office in Washington, D.C."

Recognizing that a fund was needed "to ensure that adequate financial resources are available to compensate the USA for those Properties the SRV cannot return and for which the USA agrees to accept financial compensation," the parties agreed in section I of the agreement to resolve real property issues within one year from the date of signing the agreement on the basis of terms and conditions acceptable to both Governments as set forth in section II of the agreement. Section II addressed further specifics of the transfer arrangements, and included an agreement by the SRV to provide a site for a U.S. diplomatic compound in Hanoi for a term of 99 years. See also 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 366 (1995).

8. Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal

On November 4, 1979, Iranian militants seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, holding diplomatic and consular personnel and other persons seized as hostages. See Case Concerning United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran, 1980 I.C.J. 3, 12. On January 19, 1981, the United States and Iran entered into an international executive agreement embodied in two declarations of the Government of Algeria, known as the Algiers Accords. Declaration of the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria Relating to the Commitments Made by Iran and the United States ("General Declaration") and Declaration of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria Concerning the Settlement of Claims by the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran ("Claims Settlement Declaration"). 20 I.L.M. 223 (1981). The Algiers Accords brought about the release of the American hostages and established the Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal ("Tribunal") at The Hague, the Netherlands, to resolve existing disputes between the two countries and their nationals.

Under the Algiers Accords, the United States released the vast majority of Iran's frozen assets and transferred them directly to Iran or to various accounts to pay outstanding claims. The claims addressed by the Tribunal included claims of U.S. nationals against the Government of Iran, and government-to-government claims between the United States and Iran. See III Cumulative Digest 1981–88 at 3189–3245, subsequent annual Digests, and www.iusct.org.

a. Settlement agreement: Claim 4 of Case B/1

The Ministry of National Defense of the Islamic Republic of Iran filed claims against the United States on November 18, 1981, that sought, inter alia, the return of certain military equipment originally sold to Iran under contracts as part of the U.S. Foreign Military Sales program. See III Cumulative Digest 1981–88 at 3220–24.

One category of the property ("Claim 4") consisted of a large quantity of diverse repair and return items that had been sent to the United States for repair, calibration or modification under FMS contracts providing for such services. The other category consisted of five major items and related parts: a renovated submarine, an F-14 fighter aircraft, an AH–1J helicopter, a Bell 214A helicopter, and a Hawk Air Defense System, all still in the United States for purposes of testing, training, or resale at the time of the seizure of the American Embassy in Tehran on November 4, 1979, and President Carter's subsequent blocking on November 14, 1979, of all Iranian property in the United States.

In a partial award issued August 31, 1988, the Tribunal dismissed the Iranian request for the return of the items but ruled that the United States must compensate Iran for their "full value" as of March 26, 1981. (Under Tribunal jurisprudence, "full value" means "fair market value.") On March 26, 1981, the United States had informed Iran, through Algeria, that the United States was unable to license the export of Iranian military equipment located in the United States—because of the Arms Export Control Act and regulations thereunder—but that it was willing to compensate Iran for its value (by selling the items and depositing the proceeds to Iran's credit in the Foreign Military Sales Trust Fund).

In February 1991 the two governments reached agreement on the total settlement amount for Claim 4, subject to confirmation by the Government of Iran. The original understanding was that the agreed sum would be used to the extent necessary to satisfy the requirement under the Claims Settlement Agreement that Iran maintain the Security Account at a minimum level of $500 million until all arbitral awards against Iran have been satisfied. Iran and the United States ultimately agreed that the settlement amount would be paid directly to Iran, following replenishment of the Security Account from the proceeds of oil sales by Iran to U.S. companies. The proceeds of oil sales fell short of providing full replenishment and, in November 1991, the Government of Iran agreed that part of the settlement payment—$18 million—could be used as necessary for replenishment.

On November 26, 1991, agents for the United States and the Government of Iran signed an agreement in which the United States agreed to pay $278 million, including $18 million into the Security Account to restore its balance to the $500 million minimum. On December 2, 1991, upon the joint request of the parties, the Tribunal accepted the Settlement Agreement in accordance with Article 34, paragraph 1 of its Rules, and issued an arbitral award on agreed terms in accordance with Article 34, paragraph 1 of its rules. Islamic Republic of Iran v. United States, 27 Iran-U.S. Cl. Trib. Rep. 282 (1991). See also 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 352 (1992).

Key articles of the settlement agreement are set forth below.

Article III

Upon the Tribunal's issuance of an Award on Agreed Terms and in contemplation of the undertakings [to pay] in Articles I and II, the United States and Iran shall cause, without delay and with prejudice, all proceedings on, or in relation to the subject matter of Case No. B1 (Claim 4) or capable of arising from it in the Tribunal and in all courts, fora, or before any authority or administrative bodies to be dismissed, withdrawn and terminated, and shall be barred from instituting and/or continuing with any such proceedings before the Tribunal or any other forum, authority or administrative body whatsoever, including but not limited to any court in the United States or Iran. If the items forming the subject matter of Case No. B1 (Claim 4) have been put in issue in other proceedings including, but not limited to, Case No. B1 (Claims 2, 3, and 6), B61 and A15 (II:A and II:B), they are subject to the provisions of this Article.

Article IV

1. In consideration of the covenants, premises, and other agreements contained herein, upon the Tribunal's issuance of an Award on Agreed Terms and in contemplation of the undertakings in Articles I and II, the United States and Iran shall release and forever discharge each other, their affiliates, agencies and instrumentalities, from any claims, rights, interests, and obligations, past, present or future (including in Cases No. B1 (Claims 2, 3 and 6), B61 and A15 (II:A and II:B)), which have been raised, may in the future be raised, or could have been raised in connection with disputes, differences, claims and matters stated in, related to, arising from, or capable of arising from the subject matter of Case No. B1 (Claim 4).

2. Should any claims be pending or filed by a third party in any court or forum against any of the Parties hereto based on any assignment or transfer of rights of any kind from one of the Parties hereto in relation to Case No. B1 (Claim 4), the Party who has effected or caused such assignment or transfer of rights shall be exclusively liable to such third party.

b. Interpretative decision in Case A/27

On February 25, 1993, the Government of Iran filed Case A/27, alleging that the United States breached its obligations under the Algiers Accords by not enforcing Tribunal awards. Iran based its allegations on U.S. courts' refusal to enforce the Tribunal's Partial Award in Avco Corporation v. Iran Aircraft Indus., 19 Iran-U.S. Cl. Trib. Rep. 200 (1988). Iran also pointed to an alleged undue delay by the U.S. courts in enforcing the Tribunal's Award in Gould Marketing Inc. v. Ministry of Defense of the Islamic Republic of Iran, 6 Iran-U.S. Cl. Trib. Rep. 272 (1984). As compensation for the alleged breach by the United States, Iran sought over $5 million in damages. The United States denied any liability, arguing that its obligations under the Algiers Accords were satisfied by its maintenance of domestic judicial procedures through which Iran could satisfy Tribunal awards in its favor. The United States further argued that Tribunal awards would be enforced in accordance with U.S. laws, as provided by the Algiers Accords

On the 27 and 28 of February 1996, the Tribunal held a hearing in the Peace Palace at The Hague. On June 5, 1998, the Tribunal issued its decision. Award No. 586-A27-FT. The text of the Tribunal's findings is set forth below. The full text of the award is available at www.iusct.org/awards/award-586-a27-ft-eng.pdf.

THE TRIBUNAL DETERMINES AS FOLLOWS:

a. By virtue of the refusal by the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to enforce the Avco award, the United States has violated its obligation under the Algiers Declarations to ensure that a valid award of the Tribunal be treated as final and binding, valid, and enforceable in the jurisdiction of the United States.

b. Consequently, the United States is obligated to pay Iran the sum of Five Million Forty-Two Thousand Four Hundred Eighty-One United States Dollars and Sixty-Five Cents (U.S.$5,042,481.65), plus simple interest at the annual rate of 5 percent (365-day basis) from 24 November 1992 up to and including the date of payment of this award.

c. Iran's claim related to the reimbursement of the legal expenses it incurred in pursuing the enforcement of the award in Avco before the Second Circuit and Iran's claim related to the total amount of arbitration costs awarded to Iran by the Tribunal in twenty-four awards are both dismissed.

c. Partial award settling certain bank claims and Iran Air ICJ case

On February 22, 1996, Department of State Spokesman Nicholas Burns announced that the Tribunal had issued a partial award based on the settlement by the United States and Iran of claims in two fora. Iran-United States Claims Tribunal Partial Award Containing Settlement Agreements on the Iranian Bank Claims against the United States and on the International Court of Justice Case Concerning the Aerial Incident of July 3, 1988, dated February 22, 1996, reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 556 (1996).* See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 278 (1996).

* The General Agreement on the Settlement of Certain I.C.J. and Tribunal Cases (reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 566); the Settlement Agreement on the Case Concerning the Aerial Incident of 3 July 1988 ("ICJ Settlement Agreement") (reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 572), and the Settlement Agreement on Certain Claims before the Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal ("Tribunal Settlement Agreement") (reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 593) were all entered into on February 9, 1996.

The ICJ case was also dismissed on February 22, 1996, by order of the ICJ. Order in Case Concerning the Aerial Incident of July 3, 1988, reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 556 (1996)

The settled claims, both brought by Iran against the United States, were:

(1) Iran's claims against the United States concerning certain banking matters, filed before the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal as part of Claim A/15, in which the United States agreed to pay $70 million. (Iran filed case A/15 against the United States on October 25, 1982, arguing inter alia that the United States breached its obligations under the Algiers Accords by failing to terminate certain litigation in U.S. courts. This settlement resolved Claim C of Case A/15, which involved standby letters of credit issued in favor of U.S. claimants against Iran). See 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 278 (1996).

(2) Aerial Incident of 3 July 1988 (Islamic Republic of Iran v. United States) filed in the International Court of Justice ("ICJ"), concerning the downing of Iran Air Flight 655, in which the United States agreed to make ex gratia payments in the amount of $61.8 million. In that case, the U.S.S. Vincennes, during a surface engagement with Iranian gunboats in the Persian Gulf, shot down an unidentified aircraft after repeated, unsuccessful efforts to establish contact with it, believing that the Vincennes was in danger of being attacked by an Iranian military aircraft. After it was shot down, the aircraft was identified as a civilian airliner. Of the 290 persons killed in the downing of Flight 655, 248 were Iranians, whose names are listed in Annex 1 to the ICJ Settlement Agreement. The ICJ Settlement Agreement sets out the terms and conditions for distribution of ex gratia compensation to the heirs and legatees of the victims. For further discussion of the case, see Digest 1989–1990, at 211–17; II Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 2340–49; 83 Am. J. Int'l L. 912 (1989). A Department of State fact sheet summarizing the agreements' principal features is excerpted below, and reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 553 (1996).

The survivors of each victim of the Iran Air shootdown will be paid $300,000 (for wage-earning victims) or $150,000 (for non-wage-earning victims). For this purpose, $61.8 million will be deposited with the Union Bank of Switzerland in Zurich in an account jointly held by the New York Federal Reserve Bank, acting as fiscal agent of the United States, and Bank Markazi, the central bank of Iran. Payments will be made out of this account upon joint payment instruction by the Swiss Embassy in Tehran (acting on our behalf, after consulting with the Department of State with respect to each payment) and the Iranian Bureau of International Legal Services. If additional funds are required, we agree to replenish the account. If there are excess funds or eight years elapse from the date the account is opened, any funds left in the account, including interest earned on the funds, will be returned to the United States.

There is an additional $70 million in the settlement package. Of this, $15 million is to be deposited in the Security Account established as a part of the 1981 Algiers Accords. This Security Account is held at [N.V. Settlement Bank of the Netherlands, a subsidiary of De Nederlandsche Bank in Amsterdam] to pay American claimants who receive Tribunal awards. The remaining $55 million will be deposited in an account at the New York Federal Reserve Bank. Funds can be drawn from this account only (1) for deposits into the Security Account used to pay Tribunal awards to American claimants or for payment of Iran's share of the operating expenses of the Tribunal or (2) to pay debts incurred before the date of the settlement and owed by Iranian banks to U.S. nationals. A debt must have been held by a U.S. national at the time it was incurred and at the time it is presented for payment, and any assignment of the debt must have been before the date of the settlement.

The United States and Iran have reached settlements of legal proceedings in The Hague several times since the Tribunal was established in 1981. These settlements are entered into when the United States believes they are justified on a legal and technical basis, and have no political significance. The bank claims at issue involve Iranian charges that the United States Government did not return appropriate funds from certain bank accounts after the hostage crisis and that the United States took actions that prevented payment of certain letters of credit. In one of the matters covered by the settlement, the Tribunal had found certain U.S. regulations concerning standby letters of credit were not permitted under the Algiers Accords.

With respect to the Iran Air shootdown, immediately after the incident President Reagan offered compensation, on an ex gratia (voluntary) basis, to the families of the victims who died. When Iran brought its case in the ICJ, such payments to Iranian survivors became impossible, but we proceeded to make payments to non-Iranian survivors. With the dismissal of the ICJ case, the United States is finally in a position to carry out its long-standing offer to provide ex gratia compensation.

d. Alleged interference in Iranian political arena: Case A/30

On August 12, 1996, the Islamic Republic of Iran filed a Statement of Claim in the Tribunal against the United States. In this claim, No. A/30, Iran alleged that the United States passed legislation in 1996 authorizing a covert action program against Iran, and that this, in conjunction with the extensive economic sanctions against Iran, interfered in Iran's internal affairs and thus violated U.S. commitments under the Algiers Accords.

On August 8, 1997, the United States filed its Statement of Defense. The full text of the statement, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The Government of Iran, which has a long record of using terrorism and lethal force as an instrument of state policy, is seeking a ruling from the Tribunal that the United States has violated the Algiers Accords by intervening in Iran's internal affairs and enacting economic sanctions against it. Iran asserts that the United States has violated two obligations under the Algiers Accords: the pledge in Paragraph 1 of the General Declaration that it is and will be the policy of the United States not to intervene in Iran's internal affairs, and the requirement in Paragraph 10 of the General Declaration to revoke all trade sanctions imposed in response to Iran's seizing the U.S. Embassy and taking 52 American hostages on November 4, 1979.

This Statement of Defense will show that Iran's claim that the United States has violated the Algiers Accords is utterly without foundation. It will demonstrate that the United States has fully complied with its obligations, and that Iran presents no evidence or legal authority to support its sweeping claims to the contrary. It will demonstrate that Paragraphs 1 and 10 were never intended to insulate Iran from economic measures taken for reasons unrelated to the events addressed in the Algiers Accords. It will also establish that Iran's attempts to bring its claim under customary international law, the Treaty of Amity, and the United Nations Charter are patently without merit. It will go on to show that under general principles of international law, Iran's own unlawful international activities preclude it from bringing its claims. Finally, this Statement of Defense will demonstrate that Iran does not present a case for interim measures. Iran's claim should be rejected.

e. Dual nationality in the context of the Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal

The issue of the dual nationality of claimants has been raised as a jurisdictional concern throughout the Tribunal claims process. See III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 3264–69. Case A/18 had established in 1984 that when a claimant has dual citizenship, the nationality that was the "dominant and effective" nationality would determine the jurisdictional issues. Islamic Republic of Iran v. United States (Case A/18), 5 Iran-U.S. Cl. Trib. Rep. 251 (1984). The A/18 decision also stated:

> To this conclusion the Tribunal adds an important caveat. In cases where the Tribunal finds jurisdiction based upon > a dominant and effective nationality of the claimant, the other nationality may remain relevant to the merits of the claim.

See id. at 265–66.

In Case No. 298, decided January 22, 1993, Chamber Two determined in an interlocutory award that one of the three claimants in the case, Alan Saghi, was a national of both the United States and Iran. James M. Saghi v. Iran, 29 Iran-U.S. Cl. Trib. Rep. 20 (1993). It then reviewed the evidence in Case 298 in light of the A/18 standard, concluding that Allan Saghi's U.S. nationality was the dominant one for the purposes of this case. As to the "A/18 caveat," Chamber Two concluded:

> The caveat is evidently intended to apply to claims by dual nationals for benefits limited by relevant and applicable Iranian law to persons who were nationals solely of Iran. However, as indicated by Chamber Two when it referred to other conduct that could justify refusal of an award in their favor . . . , the equitable principle expressed by this rule can, in principle, have a broader application. Even when a dual national's claim relates to benefits not limited by law to Iranian nationals, the Tribunal may still apply the caveat when the evidence compels the conclusion that the dual national has abused his dual nationality in such a way that he should not be allowed to recover on his claim.

f. Litigation resulting from small claims settlement between Iran and the United States

The Claims Settlement Agreement executed as part of the Algiers Accords provided that "[c]laims of nationals of the United States and Iran that are within the scope of this agreement shall be presented to the Tribunal . . . in the case of claims of less than $250,000, by the Government of such national." As a result, the United States assumed authority to prosecute all such claims ("small claims") before the Tribunal on behalf of U.S. claimants.

In 1990 the United States and Iran reached an agreement to settle not only those claims filed with the Tribunal, but also small claims submitted to the State Department that had not been filed with the Tribunal. In return for Iran's payment to the United States of $105,000,000, the settlement agreement provided for the transfer to Iran (by quitclaim) of all property interests underlying those claims. On June 22, 1990, the Tribunal ratified the settlement agreement and issued an award on agreed terms. On June 28, 1990, the State Department referred the small claims to the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission for final evaluation and determination of award amounts, as provided under Title V, Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1986 and 1987, Pub. L. No. 99–93, 99 Stat. 405, 437 (50 U.S.C. § 1701 note ("Iran Claims Settlement")); see also 22 U.S.C. §§ 1622, 1623 (1994). III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 3214; and Digest 1989–1990 at 230–37.

In 1995 a group of 18 U.S. citizens with claims against Iran that were settled under the small claims settlement agreement brought a case against the United States for the alleged taking of their property through the settlement. On September 18, 1996, the U. S. Court of Federal Claims granted summary judgment on behalf of the United States, finding that no taking of the plaintiffs' property had occurred. Abrahim-Youri v. United States, 36 Fed. Cl. 482 (1996). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed, holding that the government's act of espousing nationals' claims and settling claims for full principal but for less than full amount of claimed interest was not a compensable taking. 139 F.3d 1462 (Fed. Cir. 1997). Excerpts from the opinion and from the concurring opinion of Circuit Judge Clevenger are set forth below (footnotes omitted).

In Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 120 L. Ed. 2d 798, 112 S. Ct. 2886 (1992), the Supreme Court stated that the range of interests that qualify for protection as "property" under the Fifth Amendment are defined by existing rules or understandings that stem from an independent source such as state law. Id. at 1030. In that case the Court was considering the extent to which a regulatory imposition could prohibit development of the plaintiff's real estate. The Court held that background principles, there the state's basic nuisance law, defined the scope of the property right; if the reach of the regulation was coincident with the scope of the state's power to control nuisances, a power that inhered in all land titles, then no compensation would be due. Id.

By like token, it does not strain Lucas beyond its intended purpose to recognize that a similar principle may apply to "property" that arises through consensual international transactions as it does to property interests created by domestic law. Certain sticks in the bundle of rights that are property are subject to constraint by government, as part of the bargain through which the citizen otherwise has the benefit of government enforcement of property rights. As the trial court correctly observed, those who engage in international commerce must be aware that international relations sometimes become strained, and that governments engage in a variety of activities designed to maintain a degree of international amity.

Here, though the choses in action were extinguished, the Government provided an alternative tailored to the circumstances which produced a result as favorable to plaintiffs as could reasonably be expected. Plaintiffs have not shown that they sustained losses that were avoidable under the circumstances. Nor have they shown that those engaged in international transactions with Iran could not have anticipated the need for government intervention. A history of such interventions can been seen in Meade and Gray. A compensable taking has not been established; the fact that plaintiffs are not satisfied with the settlement negotiated by the Government on their behalf does not entitle them to compensation by the United States.

9. United Nations Compensation Commission

a. Establishment and funding

As discussed in Chapter 18.A.2.a., on April 3, 1991, the UN Security Council, acting under chapter VII, passed Resolution 687 to memorialize Iraq's obligations and commitments at the time of the cease-fire to the Gulf War. In Section E of Resolution 687, excerpted below, the Security Council decided to create a fund to pay compensation for losses, damage and injury resulting directly from Iraq's invasion and occupation of Kuwait.

[The Security Council]

16. Reaffirms that Iraq, without prejudice to the debts and obligations of Iraq arising prior to 2 August 1990, which will be addressed through the normal mechanisms, is liable under international law for any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources, or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait;

17. Decides that all Iraqi statements made since 2 August 1990 repudiating its foreign debt are null and void, and demands that Iraq adhere scrupulously to all of its obligations concerning servicing and repayment of its foreign debt;

18. Decides also to create a fund to pay compensation for claims that fall within paragraph 16 above and to establish a Commission that will administer the fund;

19. Directs the Secretary-General to develop and present to the Security Council for decision, no later than thirty days following the adoption of the present resolution, recommendations for the fund to meet the requirement for the payment of claims established in accordance with paragraph 18 above and for a programme to implement the decisions in paragraphs 16, 17 and 18 above, including: administration of the fund; mechanisms for determining the appropriate level of Iraq's contribution to the fund based on a percentage of the value of the exports of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq not to exceed a figure to be suggested to the Council by the Secretary-General, taking into account the requirements of the people of Iraq, Iraq's payment capacity as assessed in conjunction with the international financial institutions taking into consideration external debt service, and the needs of the Iraqi economy; arrangements for ensuring that payments are made to the fund; the process by which funds will be allocated and claims paid; appropriate procedures for evaluating losses, listing claims and verifying their validity and resolving disputed claims in respect of Iraq's liability as specified in paragraph 16 above; and the composition of the Commission designated above;

* * * *

On May 2, 1991, UN Secretary-General Javier Pèrez de Cuèllar presented his report and recommendations to the Security Council pursuant to the provisions of Part E of Resolution 687. The report proposed a compensation commission that would take the form of a claims resolution facility to verify and evaluate the expected claims and administer the payment of compensation. The report also recommended that the commission should function under the authority of the Security Council and that it should be comprised of a Governing Council, panels of commissioners and a secretariat. See www.unog.ch/uncc/introduc.htm.

The Security Council adopted Resolution 692 on May 20, 1991, in which it accepted certain of the Secretary-General's recommendations and established the UN Compensation Commission as a subsidiary organ of the UN Security Council, to be located at the UN Office in Geneva, and the UN Compensation Fund. Resolution 692 also directed the Governing Council to proceed to implement the provisions of Section E, "taking into account" the other recommendations in the Secretary General's report, and requested all states and international organizations to cooperate with the decisions of the Governing Council in such implementation.

On August 15, 1991, the Security Council adopted Resolution 706, S/RES/706 (1991), permitting the import by UN member states of oil products originating from Iraq for a six-month period, up to a value of $1.6 billion for certain purposes, and Resolution 705, S/RES/705 (1991), deciding that the compensation to be paid by Iraq through the UNCC should "not exceed thirty percent of the annual value of its exports of petroleum and petroleum products." When Iraq failed to take advantage of Resolution 706, the Security Council arranged for the UNCC to draw limited funds from the Working Capital Fund of the United Nations from reimbursable voluntary contributions from governments. See www.unog.ch/uncc/introduc.htm. On October 2, 1992, the Security Council issued Resolution 778, S/RES/778 (1992), requesting UN Member States to temporarily transfer to a UN escrow account up to $200 million apiece in Iraqi oil proceeds paid after the imposition of UN sanctions on Iraq. The escrowed funds were used in part to fund the activities of the UNCC. *See C*hapter 16.A.5.b.(1).

In December 1996, the "oil-for-food" procedure envisaged in Resolution 986, S/RES/986 (1995) was finally launched and the UNCC began to receive a percentage of the proceeds of Iraq's oil sales, thereby permitting it to continue its operations uninterrupted and to begin to make regular compensation payments to successful claimants. See discussion of the oil-for-food program in Chapter 16.A.5.b.

b. Claims categories and procedures

The UNCC accepted the claims of individuals, corporations, and governments. These claims were submitted by the governments involved or by international organizations, for those individuals who were not in a position to have their claims filed by a government. The Governing Council designated six categories of claims:

Category A claims were for people who fled Kuwait at the time of, or as a result of, the Iraqi invasion. These claims, payable in fixed amounts, were mostly for departure costs and losses, including injuries incurred as a result of the departure from Kuwait.

Category B claims, also payable in fixed amounts, were for personal injury losses and costs, including claims for serious personal injuries such as death.

Category C claims were for other individual losses or costs up to $100,000 in value.

Category D claims were for individual losses that were for amounts greater than $100,000.

Category E claims were claims brought by corporations, and Category F claims were those brought by governments and international organizations.

The Governing Counsel established deadlines for the filing of the various categories of claims. The deadline of January 1, 1995, was set for the filing of all claims for individuals (categories A-D). Category E and F claims were to be filed by January 1, 1996, with the exception of environmental claims in Category F, which had to be filed before February 1, 1997. See www.unog.ch/uncc/theclaims.htm.

On September 10, 1991, the Office of the Legal Adviser, Department of State, issued Public Notice 148 providing background information concerning the UNCC and the criteria established for individual claims. This notice was distributed along with the first decision of the Governing Council, entitled the "Criteria for Expedited Processing of Urgent Claims,"

* * * *

United Nations Security Council Resolution 687, adopted on April 3, 1991, reaffirms Iraq's liability under international law for any direct loss, damage or injury to foreign governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of its unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait. Resolution 687 further creates a fund to pay compensation for such claims out of Iraqi oil revenues and establishes the Compensation Commission to administer the fund and pay claims.

In accordance with United Nations Security Council Resolution 692, the Compensation Commission has three organs: (1) a Governing Council composed of the 15 members of the Security Council; (2) an Executive Secretary appointed by the U.N. Secretary General, with a staff of administrators and experts; and (3) a series of Commissioners (to provide technical advice and process claims) to be appointed by the Governing Council.

The first session of the Governing Council took place in Geneva from July 23–August 2.

The Council elected a President (Ambassador [Philippe J.] Berg of Belgium), adopted simple rules, and approved criteria for the expedited processing of the first categories of claims. (The text of the criteria is set forth below.) The U.N. Secretary General also appointed a senior Peruvian diplomat (Carlos Alzamora) as Executive Secretary. Additionally, a series of experts is being appointed to provide advice until Commissioners can be selected.

The criteria adopted by the Governing Council concern individuals who suffered personal losses during the Iraqi invasion and occupation of Kuwait. Governments may submit consolidated claims for up to $100,000 per person on behalf of their nationals and (in their discretion) residents. It is expected that these claims will be reviewed on an expedited basis by Commissioners, who will make recommendations to the Governing Council on the total amount to be paid to each Government. Each Government will then allocate these sums to its claimants.

The criteria also state that compensation will not be provided for attorneys' fees or other expenses for claims preparation. Moreover, any compensation, whether in funds or in kind, already received from any source will be deducted from the total amount of losses suffered. Special fixed payments of $2,500 per person are available, without the need to document the actual amount of loss, with respect to persons who departed the area, or who suffered serious personal injury or the death of a close family member. If a claim is made for $2,500 for departure without proof of loss, the individual is not eligible to claim additional departure losses later. However, making a claim for this amount for death or serious injury will not prevent further claims for additional amounts.

The criteria further state that governments are encouraged to submit claims for both categories within six months from the date on which the Executive Secretary circulates to Governments the appropriate claims forms. We expect the Governing Council to produce the claims forms within the next two months.

After the claims forms are established, the United States Government will collect, consolidate and submit them to the Compensation Commission. Claims forms will be distributed to all individuals who have reported claims against Iraq to the Department of Treasury, pursuant to its census of claims. (See 56 F.R. 5636, February 11, 1991.)

The Governing Council has stated its intent to establish as promptly as possible criteria for additional categories of claims to permit consolidated submissions by Governments for all losses covered by Security Council Resolution 687 (including losses by individuals in excess of $100,000, business losses, and environmental damage and loss of natural resources).

c. Filing procedures

On December 23, 1991, the Department of State announced that the UNCC had approved and circulated the forms to be used by individuals to file their claims for losses up to $100,000, i.e. Category C claims. (Forms for other types of claims were to be available at a later date.) Key provisions of the announcement are included below. See 3 Dep't St. Dispatch 1 at 3 (Jan. 1, 1992) available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html; 57 Fed. Reg. 421 (Jan. 6, 1992). See also 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 346 (1992).

* * * *

Fixed amounts may be claimed for departure ($2,500 or $4,000, depending on whether the claimant is filing additional claims), serious personal injury ($2,500), and the death of a spouse, child, or parent ($2,500) without documentation of the amount of loss. Where adequate documentation is available, claimants may claim compensation in any amount up to $100,000. Individuals whose losses exceed $100,000 can file for the first $100,000 now and claim the rest at a later stage.

. . . [A]ny compensation, whether in cash or in kind, received from any source will be deducted from the total amount of losses suffered. . . . The Department will submit the claims of U.S. citizens and, as authorized by the claims criteria adopted by the Governing Council of the Compensation Commission, will be prepared to consider submitting claims of residents of the United States.

As of July 1, 1992, the Commission will begin processing claims submitted by governments up to that date. . . .

d. UNCC decisions

The UNCC proceeded to adopt decisions further refining the claims process. Among these were UNCC Decision 3, adopted October 23, 1991, pursuant to paragraph 6 of the UNCC's Criteria for Processing Urgent Claims. Decision 3 provided definitions and approaches to personal injury and mental suffering claims. Such claims were to be processed prior to the claims of corporations or governments. For the full text see, www.unog.ch/uncc/decision/dec_03.pdf.

Decision 9, issued March 6, 1992, addressed the compensation for business losses and defined types of damages and valuation. This decision was meant to address the various concerns surrounding the Category "E" claims, including the possibility for double claiming for compensation as an individual and as a business entity. The decision further emphasized the importance of seeking compensation from all of the available sources before resorting to filing a UNCC claim. For the full text, see www.unog.ch/uncc/decision/dec_09.pdf.

Decision 11, issued June 26, 1992, addressed the eligibility of members of the Allied Coalition's armed forces to seek compensation from the compensation fund. The decision denied compensation to these individuals unless three qualifications were met:

> (a) the compensation is awarded in accordance with the general criteria already adopted; and
> (b) they were prisoners of war as a consequence of their involvement in Coalition military operations against Iraq in response to its unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait; and

On March 23, 1994, in response to the realization that even if the claims were reimbursed on a pro rata basis, there would not be enough money in the compensation fund to satisfy all of the claims at once, the UNCC issued Decision 17. This decision reaffirmed the prioritization of the claims by category, and established that the individual injury claims in Category A, B, and C would be processed according to the date filed. These claims were to receive compensation from the fund prior to the other categories of claims. In the event of a shortfall of funds at any given time, awards would be paid on a pro rata basis until fully paid. The text of the decision is available at www.unog.ch/uncc/decision/dec_17.pdf.

10. International Law Commission Draft Articles on State Responsibility

In 1947 the General Assembly of the United Nations established the International Law Commission ("ILC"). Under the ILC Statute, the Commission "shall have for its object the promotion of the progressive development of international law and its codification" G.A. Res. 174 (II), U.N. GAOR, 2d Sess., Res. at 296, U.N. Doc. A/519 (1947). One of the first topics for the ILC to address was the issue of State responsibility, an undertaking that occasioned protracted debates and negotiations over the exact responsibilities that should be included in its draft articles on this topic. In 1996, the ILC completed a full draft of its Articles on State Responsibility. In December 1997 the United States submitted comments regarding the draft articles, excerpted below. The U.S. comments urged the ILC to "focus on developing a clear set of legal principles well-anchored in customary international law. . . ."

In August 2001 the ILC published its Draft Articles on the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, ILC 53d Report, U.N. GAOR, 56th Sess., Supp. No. 10, at 43, U.N. Doc. A/56/10 (2001), available at www.un.org/law/ilc/texts/State_responsibility/responsibilityfra.htm. The UN General Assembly took note of these articles on January 28, 2002. G.A. Res. 56/83, U.N. GAOR, 56th Sess., Supp. No. 10, U.N. Doc. A/RES/56/83 (2002).

The United States agrees with the Commission that a statement of the law of state responsibility must provide guidance to states with respect to the following questions: When does an act of a state entail international responsibility? What actions are attributable to the state? What consequences flow from a state's violation of its international responsibility? Customary international law provides answers to these questions, but the Commission has in many instances not codified such norms but rather proposed new substantive rules. In particular, the sections on countermeasures, crimes, dispute settlement, and state injury contain provisions that are not supported by customary international law.

Therefore, these comments first address the following areas of the draft, which, in the U.S. view, contain the most serious difficulties:

* Countermeasures: While we welcome the recognition that countermeasures play an important role in the regime of state responsibility, we believe that the draft articles contain unsupported restrictions on their use.

* International Crimes: The United States strongly opposes the inclusion of distinctions between delicts and so-called "state crimes," for which there is no support under customary international law and which undermine the effectiveness of the state responsibility regime as a whole.

* Reparation: While many of the points in the section on reparation reflect customary international law, other provisions contain qualifications that undermine the well-established principle of "full reparation."

* Dispute Settlement: Because of certain flaws in the dispute settlement procedure, we urge that Part Three be made optional.

* Standing and Injury: Important elements of article 40's definition of an injured state lack support under customary international law and would lead to undesirable consequences.

The above-mentioned comments are followed by a discussion of other topics, including attribution of acts to a state; the relationship of the articles to the United Nations Charter; temporal aspects of breach; and assistance in the commission of a wrongful act by another state.

Because the articles would be used by states, tribunals and individuals, it is important that they be effective, practical, and sound, which certain elements of the current draft are not. We urge the Commission to focus on developing a clear set of legal principles well-anchored in customary international law and free from excessive detail and unsubstantiated concepts.

I. Countermeasures

International law generally permits countermeasures in order to bring about the compliance of a wrongdoing state with its international obligations. The limits on countermeasures are far from clear, though there is general consensus that principles of proportionality and necessity apply. In this section, the United States recommends that the Commission (1) clarify the definition of countermeasures, (2) substantially revise the dispute settlement provisions pertaining to countermeasures, (3) recast the rule of proportionality, and (4) delete or substantially revise the prohibitions on countermeasures.

1. Draft Article 30

We support draft article 30's reflection of the settled view that countermeasures "have a place in any legal regime of State responsibility." See G. Arangio-Ruiz (Special Rapporteur), Fifth Report on State Responsibility, U.N. Doc. A/CN.4/453 (May 12, 1993), para. 36. The article acknowledges that an otherwise unlawful act loses its unlawful character when it "constitutes a measure legitimate under international law" in response to a prior unlawful act. We agree that draft article 30 concerns only acts of a state that are otherwise "not in conformity with an obligation of that State towards another State". See Draft Article 30. Thus, the scope of draft article 30 does not extend to the entire range of responsive actions by states, such as measures of retorsion, actions that might be termed "unfriendly" but that do not violate international obligations. . . .

Similarly, we do not understand draft article 30 to alter or otherwise affect the rights and obligations of states under the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and the customary international law of treaties. The International Court of Justice recently has drawn an even sharper distinction with respect to treaty law and state responsibility, stating that "these two branches of international law obviously have a scope that is distinct." Case Concerning the Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Project (Hungary v. Slovakia), 25 September 1997, at para. 47 [hereinafter Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Case]. A state may have a range of alternatives available under the law of treaties in response to a breach by another state of a provision of a treaty in force between the two states. The treaty may provide for specific responses, such as dispute settlement procedures or other measures. A state may also be entitled to reciprocal measures, which are outside article 30's definition of countermeasures. Article 30 should not be read as precluding states from taking measures designed to maintain "the condition of reciprocity in the law of treaties." See, e.g., E. Zoller, Peaceful Unilateral Remedies 18 (1984).

In this connection, it bears noting that draft article 37 on lex specialis states that "the provisions of this Part [Two] do not apply where and to the extent that the legal consequences of an internationally wrongful act of a State have been determined by other rules of international law relating specifically to that act." The United States strongly supports the principle of draft article 37 and believes that it should also apply to Part I of the draft. For instance, two states could devise an agreement where one of the circumstances precluding wrongfulness would not apply even where, in similar circumstances, the draft articles would indeed apply. Or parties could arrive at an agreement whereby each waives the rule of exhaustion of local remedies, even where that rule would normally apply under draft article 22.

2. Limitations on Countermeasures

The United States agrees that under customary international law an injured state takes countermeasures "in order to induce [the wrongdoing State] to comply with its obligations." See Draft Article 47(1). See also Case Concerning the Air Services Agreement of March 27, 1946 Between the United States of America and France, 18 R:I.A.A. 417, 443 (1978) [hereinafter Air Services Case] (stating that an injured state "is entitled . . . to affirm its rights through 'counter-measures' "). In addition, we agree that counter-measures under customary international law are governed by principles of necessity and proportionality. Chapter III as a whole, however, unacceptably limits the use and purposes of counter-measures by imposing restrictions not supported under customary international law.

a. Mandatory Dispute Settlement Provisions

Under customary international law, a demand for cessation or reparation should precede the imposition of countermeasures. See, e.g., Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Case at para. 84 ("the injured State must have called upon the State committing the wrongful act to discontinue its wrongful conduct or to make reparation for it"); Air Services Case at 420. Article 48, however, goes beyond customary international law in two significant respects.

(i) Prior Negotiation

Article 48, in conjunction with draft article 54, requires an injured state to seek negotiations before taking countermeasures.

However, customary international law does not require an injured state to seek negotiations prior to taking countermeasures, nor does it prohibit the taking of countermeasures during negotiations. The Air Services Case Tribunal, for instance, noted that it "does not believe that it is possible, in the present state of international relations, to lay down a rule prohibiting the use of countermeasures during negotiations . . ." Air Services Case at 445. The requirement for prior negotiations may prejudice an injured state's position by enabling a wrongdoing state to compel negotiations that delay the imposition of countermeasures and permit it to avoid its international responsibility.

The draft treats this problem by providing an exception from the prior-negotiation requirement for "interim measures of protection which are necessary to preserve [the injured state's] rights." Draft Article 48(1). This exception is vague and may lead to contradictory conclusions by states seeking to apply it. In particular, the draft does not indicate whether interim measures of protection would, like countermeasures, be unlawful absent the precipitating wrongful act. If not, then it would be unnecessary to enunciate a principle of interim measures. However, if interim measures fall within the definition of draft article 30 but short of "full-scale countermeasures," Commentaries at 311, it is unclear how in concrete circumstances the term might be applied.

Rather than opening the section on countermeasures to disputes over the meaning of interim measures, the draft should reflect the fundamental customary rule that countermeasures are permissible prior to and during negotiations. We would therefore urge the Commission to clarify draft article 48 by stating that countermeasures are permissible as a means to induce such compliance prior to and during negotiations.

(ii) Compulsory Arbitration

Article 48(2) contains two flaws with respect to the draft's system of arbitration. First, it states that "an injured State taking countermeasures shall fulfill the obligations in relation to dispute settlement arising under Part III . . ." This refers to draft article 58(2), which states that where the dispute involves the taking of countermeasures by the injured state, "the State against which they are taken is entitled at any time unilaterally to submit the dispute to an arbitral tribunal" constituted under the articles. Compulsory arbitration of this sort is not supported by customary international law, would be unworkable in practice, and would establish a novel system whereby an injured state may be compelled to arbitrate a dispute. There is no basis in international law or policy for subjecting the injured state to such a requirement when it pursues countermeasures in response to a wrongful act of another state. Indeed, this compulsory system is in contrast to draft article 58(1), which states that the parties may submit other disputes under the articles to arbitration "by agreement." We think that this creates a serious imbalance in the treatment of injured and wrongdoing states. In addition to extending the period during which a wrongdoing state may remain in breach of its obligations, this system imposes on the injured state the high cost of arbitrating the dispute. Draft article 60 exacerbates the problem of delay by providing for ICJ review. We believe that this system of compulsory arbitration would impose an unacceptable cost on injured states that must resort to countermeasures.

In addition, draft article 48(2) states that "an injured state taking countermeasures shall fulfill" the obligations under article 58(2) "or any other binding dispute settlement procedure in force" for the parties. We understand that article 48(2) merely seeks to preserve other existing mechanisms in force between the parties. See Commentaries at 312–13. However, to the extent that article 48(2) may be read as imposing additional requirements, the article lacks support under customary international law. For instance, article 48(2) should not be misinterpreted as constituting consent to resort to dispute settlement procedures where the existing procedure requires mutual consent. Such an outcome would be unacceptable. Further, draft article 48(3)'s requirement that countermeasures be suspended while dispute settlement mechanisms are "being implemented in good faith" is vague and may lead to further delay and abuse by the wrongdoing state.

Article 48 as a whole should, at the least, be placed in an optional dispute settlement protocol. As a mandatory system of conditions, it is without foundation under customary international law and undermines the ability of states to affirm their rights by countermeasures.

b. The Rule of Proportionality

The United States agrees with the Commission that under customary international law a rule of proportionality applies to the exercise of countermeasures. See, e.g., Memorial and Reply of the United States in the Air Services Case, excerpted in M. Nash, 1978 Digest of U.S. Practice in International Law 768, 776. International law does not, however, provide clear guidance with respect to how states and tribunals should measure proportionality. One school states that the countermeasure must be related to the degree of inducement necessary to satisfy the original debt, R. Phillimore, 3 Commentaries upon International Law 16 (1885), or "the amount of compulsion necessary to get reparation", H. Lauterpacht, 2 Oppenheim's International Law 141 (1952). See Commentaries at 316–17, footnotes 130 and 132. Elsewhere, it is stated that the countermeasure must be compared "to the act motivating them," Naulilaa Case, 2 R.I.A.A. 1011, 1028 (Portugal v. Germany) (1928). See also Air Services Case at 443 (the countermeasure requires "some degree of equivalence with the alleged breach"). We agree that, in some circumstances, the countermeasure must be related to the principle implicated by the international wrong. Similarly, the wrongful act may illustrate what kind of measure might be effective to bring the wrongdoing state into compliance with its obligations.

Draft article 49 evaluates the proportionality of a countermeasure by accounting for "the degree of gravity of the internationally wrongful act and the effects thereof on the injured State." We believe that this formulation gives undue emphasis to the "gravity" of the antecedent violation as the measure of proportionality. In the U.S. view, draft article 49 should reflect both trends identified above with respect to proportionality. Proportionality means principally that countermeasures should be tailored to induce the wrongdoer to meet its obligations under international law, and that steps taken toward that end should not escalate but rather serve to resolve the dispute. A conception of proportionality that focuses on a vague concept of "gravity" of the wrongful act reflects only one aspect of customary international law. As Professor Zoller has written, proportionality is not confined to relating the breach to the countermeasure but rather to "put into relationship the purpose aimed at, return of the status quo ante, and the devices resorted to in order to bring about that return." Zoller at 135. See also Elagab at 45. Cf. Commentaries at 319.[7]

Because countermeasures are principally exercised to bring a return to the status quo ante, a rule of proportionality should weigh the aims served by the countermeasure in addition to the importance of the principle implicated by the antecedent wrongful act. In addition, the Commentaries explain article 49's formulation, "shall not be out of proportion," by stating that "a countermeasure which is disproportionate, no matter what the extent, should be prohibited to avoid giving the injured State a degree of leeway that might lead to abuse." Commentaries at 319 (emphasis added). The United States believes that this interpretation does not accord with customary practice. See, e.g., Naulilaa Case at 1028 (countermeasures are "excessive" where they "are out of all proportion to the act motivating them"); Air Services Case at 444 (measures taken by the United States "did not appear to be clearly disproportionate"). Proportionality is a matter of approximation, not precision, and requires neither identity nor exact equivalency in judging the lawfulness of a countermeasure. Customary law recognizes that, in some circumstances, a degree of response greater than the precipitating wrong may be appropriate to bring the wrongdoing state into compliance with its obligations. The United States believes this interpretation should be reflected in the text of draft article 49.

c. Prohibited Countermeasures

The United States believes that article 50's prohibitions on the resort to countermeasures do not in all cases reflect customary international law and may serve to magnify rather than resolve disputes. First, article 50 would prohibit categories of countermeasures without regard to the precipitating wrongful act. However, article 49's rule of proportionality generally would limit the range of permissible countermeasures and would, in most circumstances, preclude resort to the measures enumerated in article 50. To that extent, draft article 50 is unnecessary. Second, draft article 50 may add layers of substantive rules to existing regimes without clarifying either the specific rules or the law of state responsibility. Thus, the duplication of rules in areas such as diplomatic and consular relations and human rights may complicate disputes rather than facilitate their resolution.

Third, the section relies on vague language that would amplify the areas of dispute. For instance, draft article 50(b) disallows the use of "extreme economic or political coercion designed to endanger the territorial integrity or political independence of the State which has committed the internationally wrongful act." What is "extreme"? What measures fall under the rubric of "economic or political coercion"? What kinds of economic or political measures would "endanger the territorial integrity or political independence" of a State? Cf. Elagab at 191–196. These are subjectively adduced criteria for which no supporting state practice is cited. Similarly, draft article 50(d) refers to "any conduct which derogates from basic human rights," without defining derogation or "basic" human rights. The language of article 50(d) provides only limited guidance, for there are very few areas of consensus, if any, as to what constitutes "basic human rights". Article 50(e) similarly does not provide useful guidance in determining whether a countermeasure would be permissible. Just as there is little agreement with respect to "basic" human rights and political and economic "coercion," the content of peremptory norms is difficult to determine outside the areas of genocide, slavery, and torture.

III. Reparation and Compensation

While the draft articles restate the customary obligation to provide reparation, they also create several significant loopholes that might be exploited by wrongdoing states to avoid the requirement of "full reparation" identified in draft article 42(1).

1. The Principle of Reparation

Draft article 42(1) appears to state correctly that a wrongdoing state is under an obligation to provide "full reparation" to an injured state, in addition to ceasing unlawful conduct as required by customary law and set forth in draft article 41. Nonetheless, the Commission has provided two potentially significant exceptions from the general principle of full reparation.

First, subparagraph two of article 42 provides vaguely for an "accounting" of "the negligence or the willful act or omission" of the injured state or national "which contributed to the damage." It is unclear whether this subsection intends to impose a concept of contributory negligence, which under a common law approach night completely negate the responsibility of the wrongdoer, see, e.g., Dobbs, Torts and Compensation: Personal Accountability and Social Responsibility for Injury 256 (2d ed. 1993), or whether it foresees some partial deviation from the "full reparation" standard. Draft article 42(2) could be read as incorporating a contributory fault standard, allowing a wrongdoing state to avoid its obligation to provide reparation simply by positing the negligence of the injured state. Such a standard, we suspect, would be unacceptable to most states, as it is to the United States.

The commentary to paragraph 2 suggests that the drafters may have intended to express a comparative fault principle. See Commentaries at 278 ("to hold the author State liable for reparation of all of the injury would be neither equitable nor in conformity with the proper application of the causal link theory"). The United States appreciates the difficulties posed by the circumstance where an injured state or national bears some responsibility for the extent of his damages. However, the concept of comparative fault is neither established in the international law of state responsibility nor clearly explicated in article 42(2). Cf. id. footnote 160. More important, comparative fault introduces an imprecise concept susceptible to abuse by wrongdoing states who might argue that the principle of comparative fault should be applied to relieve them of responsibility to provide reparation.

The second loophole is created by article 42(3). It states, without support in customary international law, that reparation shall never "result in depriving the population of a State of its own means of subsistence." Draft Article 42(3). While there may arise extreme cases where a claim for prompt reparation could lead to serious social instability, the language of article 42(3) could provide a legal and rhetorical basis for a wrongdoing state to seek to avoid any duty to provide reparation even where it has the means to do so. The draft article provides too subjective a formula, opening too many avenues for abuse. The Commentaries suggest that "some members disagreed with the inclusion of paragraph 3." See Commentaries at 279. The United States agrees with the objectors; the inclusion of article 42(3) in the draft articles is unacceptable.

2. Restitution in Kind

Restitution in kind has long been an important remedy in international law and plays a singular role in the cases where a wrongdoing state has illegally seized territory or historically or culturally valuable property. See, e.g., Chorzow Factory Case at 47; Case Concerning Temple of Preah Vihar (Cambodia v. Thailand), 1962 I.C.J. 6, 36–37. Still, compensation appears to be the preferred and practical form of reparation in state practice and international case law. See, e.g., Brownlie at 211 ("it is also clear that in practice specific restitution is exceptional") (emphasis in original).

Draft article 43 nonetheless provides two exceptions which the Commission might usefully clarify. Article 43(c) provides that restitution in kind may "not involve a burden out of all proportion to the benefit which the injured State would gain from obtaining restitution in kind instead of compensation." This exception may enable states to avoid the duty to provide restitution in kind in appropriate circumstances. To the extent that the phrase "a burden out of all proportion" is left undefined, this exception would undermine the useful principle that restitution is preferred in some circumstances.

Article 43(d) precludes restitution where it would "seriously, jeopardize the political independence or economic stability" of the wrongdoing state. Such broad terms, left undefined and without an established basis in international practice, provide nothing to injured states but give hope to wrongdoing states seeking to avoid providing an appropriate remedy. In particular, the draft does not explain just what "serious" jeopardy might include. While subsection (d) may have relatively limited practical effect given the priority of compensation over restitution in practice, the inclusion of broad concepts providing for the avoidance of responsibility is likely to have effects beyond the narrow provision of article 43. The United States urges the Commission to delete the provision.

3. Compensation

Draft article 44 states the long-established principle reflected in customary international law and innumerable bilateral and multilateral agreements that a wrongdoing state must provide compensation to the extent that restitution in integrum is not provided. The principle was stated clearly by the Permanent Court of International Justice in the Chorzow Factory Case, where it noted that the appropriate remedy is "restitution in kind, or, if this is not possible, payment of a sum corresponding to the value which a restitution in kind would bear." . . .

Nonetheless, paragraph two of draft article 44 provides an unacceptable qualification to the requirement of "any economically assessable damage" by stating that interest "may" be covered. The special rapporteur recognized that both state practice and the literature "seem[] to be in support of awarding interest in addition to the principal amount of compensation." G. Arangio-Ruiz (Special Rapporteur), Second Report on State Responsibility, U.N. Doc. A/CN.4/425, at 57–59 (June 9, 1989). The suggestion of the draft article itself, however, is that interest is not required. This suggestion goes counter not only to the overwhelming majority of case law on the subject but also undermines the "full reparation" principle. Numerous instances of international practice support the provision of interest. See, e.g., S.S. Wimbledon Case, 1923 P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 1, at 15, 33; Chorzow Factory Case at 47; Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. United Mexican States, 4 R.I.A.A. 134, 137 (Dec. 6, 1926). The most significant and contemporary reflection of customary law concerning compensation may be found in the holdings of the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal, which has consistently awarded interest as "an integral part of the 'claim' which it has a duty to decide." . . . Similarly, the United Nations Compensation Commission, responsible for assessing damage and distributing awards for claims arising out of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, decided that "interest will be awarded from the date the loss occurred until the date of payment, at a rate sufficient to compensate successful claimants for the loss of use of the principal amount of the award." . . . The few contrary decisions do not undermine the near universal acceptance in international practice and arbitration of the necessity of the provision of interest in the award.

The Commission should close this loophole by stating that compensation "shall include interest," a proposition that expresses clearly and correctly the content of the law and practice of states. In the absence of this revision to draft article 44(2), the United States believes that article 44 will not reflect the customary law on compensation but would, in fact, be a step backward in the international law on reparation.

IV. Dispute Settlement

Part Three of the draft articles recognizes that negotiation (article 54), good offices and mediation (article 55), and conciliation (article 56) all play an important role in international dispute settlement. However, the articles go further by making the resort to such tools binding at the request of any state party to a dispute (though the recommendations of the Conciliation Commission may not be binding, participation by both parties seems to be required).

While the attempt to advance the cause of peaceful settlement of disputes is laudable, we see several serious problems in the framework set forth in the draft articles. Most important, to the extent that the draft articles compel resort to such modes of dispute settlement, this framework does not reflect customary international law. Indeed, such a system is unlikely to find widespread acceptance among states. Further, a mechanism designed to meet all possible disputes would not meet the very real differences that arise under the law of state responsibility. Thus, this system likely will be ineffective in resolving many disputes. Finally, such procedures, especially relating to the conciliation process, are slow and expensive, imposing possibly long delays and high costs. Rather than requiring such a procedure, the draft should allow states, upon mutual agreement, to resort to such mechanisms.

The provision of an arbitral tribunal under draft article 58(1), to which parties may "by agreement" submit their disputes, is unexceptional but unnecessary for the draft articles to function effectively. If, for instance, states are willing to agree to submit their dispute to an international tribunal, they may establish such a tribunal on their own accord or with the assistance of a third party (a disinterested state or international organization, for instance). The United States would support an optional set of dispute settlement procedures for states to follow if it would help them to resolve disputes. See discussion above at § 2(a) (dispute settlement provisions for countermeasures).

Draft article 60's provision of an appellate function to the International Court of Justice—couched as a challenge to the "validity of an arbitral award"—would likely discourage states from signing on to the compulsory system of the draft articles. Together with the strict limitations on countermeasures, a challenge to an arbitral body's decision would extend the period during which a state must await reparation for a wrongdoing state's violation. As it relates to countermeasures, Part Three suggests that a wrongdoing state might remain in breach of its obligations and yet require a variety of steps, culminating perhaps years after the original wrongdoing in a challenged arbitration and a proceeding before the ICJ. Aside from being a highly complex aspect of law enforcement, this sets up an inefficient system which will impose excessive costs on injured states.

The United States believes that the long-term credibility of a code of state responsibility would be undermined by linking it to a mandatory system of dispute settlement that imposes potentially high costs on states, is ignored by states or, even worse, is seen as unbalanced in its treatment of wrongdoing and injured states. The dispute settlement provisions should be deleted in favor of a single nonbinding provision that encourages states to negotiate a resolution of their disputes, if necessary by resort to mutually agreeable conciliation or mediation, or to submit to procedures under existing agreements, or to submit by mutual agreement their disputes to binding arbitration or judicial decision.

VII. Relationship of Draft Articles to the UN Charter

The Commission has sought "quite specific comments by States," Commentaries at 139, footnote 226, with respect to the questions raised by draft article 39, which states that the "legal consequences of an internationally wrongful act" set out in the draft articles "are subject, as appropriate, to the provisions and procedure of the Charter of the United Nations relating to the maintenance of international peace and security."

The United States agrees with the objective of draft article 39 in emphasizing that the Charter's allocation of responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security rests with the Security Council, and that an act of a state, properly undertaken pursuant to a Chapter VII decision of the Security Council, cannot be characterized as an internationally wrongful act. State responsibility principles may inform the Security Council's decision-making, but the draft articles would not govern its decisions.

The Charter states clearly that its obligations prevail over any other international agreements. See UN Charter, art. 103 (stating that "in the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail"). Article 103 not only establishes the preeminence of the Charter, but it makes clear that subsequent agreements may not impose contradictory obligations on states. Thus, the draft articles would not derogate from the responsibility of the Security Council to maintain or restore international peace and security.

The responsibility of the Council, and the coordinate responsibility of member states to implement Council decisions, pervades the Charter. Article 2(5) states, for instance, that "all Members shall give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the present Charter . . ." In Article 25,

"the Members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the present Charter." Similarly, Article 48 commits member states to take the "action required to carry out the decisions of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security." In accordance with these articles, therefore, member states are obligated to "carry out" decisions of the Council under Chapter VII with respect to the maintenance of peace and security. The Charter does not provide an exception for existing obligations states might owe other states.

The discretion of the Council, moreover, is broad. See UN Charter, art. 24(2). Thus, the Council has authority to take all necessary action, consistent with the purposes and principles of the Charter, to maintain or restore international peace and security. The Council, in connection with its Chapter VII responsibilities, may "deny a State's plea of necessity" or "a State's right to take countermeasures." Commentaries at 139, footnote 226.

Conclusion

Several years ago two scholars commented, with respect to the Commission's efforts to codify the law of state responsibility, that "no other codification project goes so deeply into the 'roots,' the theoretical and ideological foundations of international law, or has created comparable problems." M. Spinedi and B. Simma, "Introduction," in Spinedi and Simma eds., United Nations Codification of State Responsibility vii (1987). Indeed, as one reviews the draft articles, it becomes clear that the project of codification deserves exceedingly careful review and revision. As these comments have indicated, the United States believes that, while there is much to be commended in the draft articles, there are also several serious and substantial flaws. To a significant degree, the draft contains provisions that do not reflect customary international law. In those cases where progressive development might be warranted, the draft articles take steps in directions that unacceptably complicate the structure of enforcement of international norms.

If the major flaws of the draft are not addressed and corrected, it will be difficult for the project to obtain the wide support from the international community necessary for a movement toward a state responsibility convention.

11. Settlement of USSR Lend-Lease Debt

During World War II, many Allied countries borrowed money from the United States to help fund the war effort. In the years following the war, the United States worked with these countries to allow for a repayment process through trade contracts and property leases.

During the early 1970s, the United States and the USSR negotiated a repayment system that was dependent on most-favored-nation status for the USSR. Because this trade relationship was not established, the debt repayments for the USSR were delayed indefinitely. In 1993 Assistant Secretary of State for Legislative Affairs Janet G. Mullins responded to an inquiry from Senator Carl Levin concerning the status of the Soviet Union's debt repayment.

The full text of the letter, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The Soviet Union's debt to the United States arising out of World War II was settled by the U.S.-USSR lend-lease agreement signed October 18, 1972. The agreement provided for three mandatory payments totaling $48 million ($12 million was paid on October 18, 1972, $24 million on July 1, 1973, and $12 million on July 1, 1975) and payment of the balance of $674 million in regular installments extending to July 1, 2001. Repayment of the $674 million was contingent on the U.S. extending most-favored-nation treatment (MFN) to the Soviet Union under terms "no less favorable" than those provided in a 1972 commercial agreement, which never entered into force.

A side letter to the 1972 agreements also conditioned repayment of the $674 million on the restoration of "export credits, guarantees and insurance through the Export–Import Bank and other similar credits for the purchase of American goods, on terms appropriate to the transactions." Since MFN is not yet available to the USSR, and export credits are restricted, the Soviet obligation to pay on the $674 million balance had not yet been triggered.

The USSR is obligated to resume repayment when the President waives the Jackson-Vanik amendment, eliminating an obstacle to export credits and MFN treatment; the U.S. Congress approves the U.S.-Soviet Trade Agreement, signed June 1, 1990, which accords MFN status to the Soviet Union; and the Congress provides for the normal availability of export credits. The President has indicated he is prepared to waive Jackson-Vanik when the Soviet Union passes emigration legislation which meets international standards, and that he will then submit the 1990 Trade Agreement to Congress for approval and work with Congress on export credits to the Soviet Union.

12. Moscow Embassy Arbitration

On June 17, 1992, Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Russian Federation Minister of Foreign Affairs Andrey Kozyrev signed the Memorandum of Mutual Understanding Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Russian Federation on Settlement of the Problem of the New Embassy Administrative Buildings in Washington and Moscow. This Memorandum settled an arbitration dispute that had arisen in 1985 based on the alleged intentional defects, delays, and performance failures in the construction of the new U.S. Embassy in Moscow. For a further discussion of the arbitration, and the text of the Memorandum, see III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 3307–17.

13. 1995 Belarus Balloon Shoot-down

On September 12, 1995, a gas balloon participating in the Coupe Gordon Bennett international balloon race was shot down by a helicopter of the Belarussian Air Force, resulting in the loss of the two pilots on board. These two pilots, Alan Fraenckel and John Stuart-Jervis, were American citizens representing the Virgin Islands Aero Club. The U.S. State Department began negotiations with the Government of Belarus to attempt to achieve some type of compensation for the families of the victims. At the end of 2003 these negotiations were still unresolved.

In June 1999 Assistant Secretary of Legislative Affairs Barbara Larkin responded to a letter from Senators Connie Mack and Bob Graham concerning the status of the negotiations.

The letter, excerpted below, is available in full at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The Department of State has held two substantive and productive rounds of discussions with the Government of Belarus concerning our claim for compensation arising out of the balloon shootdown. During these talks, the United States has presented a number of documents substantiating the calculation of damages and legal basis of the claim. The Government of Belarus has agreed that compensation is due in this matter.

However, the eviction of our Ambassador from his residence in Minsk last summer severely strained U.S.—Belarussian bilateral relations and suspended dialogue in most other areas. We have been working with the Belarussian government to resolve that dispute. Nevertheless, we soon plan to propose another round of talks on the balloon shootdown issue. When our Ambassador does return to Minsk, the United States will be in a better position to press on this and many other important issues.

B. PRIVATE CLAIMS BY INDIVIDUALS

1. Claims Against the United States by Panamanian Businesses

In May 1991 a number of Panamanian businesses filed suit seeking damages from the United States for its allegedly negligent failure to protect their businesses in Panama City between December 20, 1989, and January 10, 1990. The businesses alleged that during that period, United States armed forces occupied Panama City and therefore assumed a duty to maintain law and order pursuant to Articles 42 and 43 of Regulations annexed to the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Law and Customs of War on Land ("1907 Hague Convention"), 1 Bevans 631, 36 Stat. 2277.

As a consequence of the United States' purported breach of its international obligations, plaintiffs alleged that their businesses were looted, burned and destroyed by Panamanian civilians. Plaintiffs sought to hold the United States responsible for compensation under the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1346 and 2671 et seq., and the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350.

The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia granted the government's motion to dismiss on the basis of U.S. sovereign immunity. Goldstar (Panama) S.A. v. United States, No. 91–725 (E.D. Va. Sept. 6, 1991). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed. Goldstar (Panama) S.A. v. United States, 967 F.2d 965 (4th Cir. 1992). Because it found that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction, the court of appeals did not find it necessary to reach the question of whether the issue presented a political question, not subject to judicial review.

Excerpts from the court of appeals decision dismissing claims under the Alien Tort Statute on the basis of U.S. sovereign immunity are provided below (footnotes omitted).

Goldstar's first contention is that jurisdiction is proper under the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350. That provision states: "The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." Id. While this statute would facially appear to grant jurisdiction for Goldstar's action, the Alien Tort Statute has been interpreted as a jurisdictional statute only—it has not been held to imply any waiver of sovereign immunity. Sanchez-Espinoza v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202, 207 (D.C. Cir. 1985); Canadian Transp. Co. v. United States, 663 F.2d 1081, 1092 (D.C. Cir. 1980). Thus, any party asserting jurisdiction under the Alien Tort Statute must establish, independent of that statute, that the United States has consented to suit.

Goldstar contends that the United States has waived sovereign immunity under the provisions of the Hague Convention, a multilateral international treaty to which the United States is a signatory. The relevant provision of that document states, "A belligerent party which violates the provisions of the said Regulations shall, if the case demands, be liable to pay compensation. It shall be responsible for all acts committed by persons forming part of its armed forces." Hague Convention Respecting the Law and Customs of War on Land, 1907, art. 3, 36 Stat. 2277, 2290. The "Regulations," referenced by the treaty, contain a provision relating to the circumstance in which one nation occupies the territory of another:

> The authority of the legitimate power having in fact passed into the hands of the occupant, the latter shall take all the measures in his power to restore, and ensure, as far as possible, public order and safety, while respecting, unless absolutely prevented, the laws in force in the country.

Hague Convention, Annexed Regulations, art. 43, 36 Stat. at 2306. Under Goldstar's theory, the United States failed to comply with the duty imposed on occupying nations by Article 43 of the Hague Convention. Accordingly, Goldstar contends that the United States is liable for compensation under Article 3 of the Convention, and that Article 3 must be interpreted as a self-executing waiver of sovereign immunity with regard to such claims.

International treaties are not presumed to create rights that are privately enforceable. See Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 598–99, 28 L. Ed. 798, 5 S. Ct. 247 (1884); Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253, 314, 7 L. Ed. 415 (1829). Courts will only find a treaty to be self-executing if the document, as a whole, evidences an intent to provide a private right of action. United States v. Thompson, 928 F.2d 1060, 1066 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 116 L. Ed. 2d. 222, 112 S. Ct. 270 (1991); Diggs v. Richardson, 555 F.2d 848, 851 (D.C. Cir. 1976). The Hague Convention does not explicitly provide for a privately enforceable cause of action. Moreover, we find that a reasonable reading of the treaty as a whole does not lead to the conclusion that the signatories intended to provide such a right. . . .

In sum, we hold that the Hague Convention is not self-executing and, therefore, does not, by itself, create a private right of action for its breach. As a result, we find that neither the Hague Convention nor, derivatively, the Alien Tort Statute, constitutes a waiver of sovereign immunity for the type of action advanced by Goldstar. Accordingly, Goldstar cannot establish subject matter jurisdiction under the terms of the Alien Tort Statute.

2. LIBERTAD Act: Title III

On May 17, 1996, Attorney General Janet Reno published in the Federal Register a summary of the provisions of Title III of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (LIBERTAD) Act, Pub. L. No. 104–114, approved March 12, 1996. 61 Fed. Reg. 24,955 (May 17, 1996). Under Title III, entitled Protection of Property Rights of United States Nationals, the notice explained, "a United States national with a claim to property expropriated by the Government of Cuba on or after January 1, 1959, may bring a private lawsuit in U.S. federal district court against a person who traffics in that property beginning three months after Title III's effective date [subject to certain requirements, conditions, and possible suspensions]. The scheduled effective date is August 1, 1996, subject to the President's authority to suspend Title III."

Subsequently, on July 16, 1996, President Clinton reported to the Congress his determination to allow Title III to take effect August 1, 1996, but also to suspend the right to bring an action under Title III for six months beyond August 1, 1996. The President determined that these actions were "necessary to the national interests" of the United States and "would expedite a transition to democracy in Cuba." In a statement accompanying his letters, the President explained his reasons for permitting Title III to become effective on August 1, and for suspending the right to file suit for six months, excerpted below. See also 91 Am. J. Int'l L. 110 (1997).

The full text of President Clinton's letter and his accompanying statement and the White House fact sheet, all dated July 16, 1996, are available at 32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1265 (July 22, 1996). See also statement of Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business, and Agricultural Affairs Stuart E. Eizenstat, July 16, 1997, concerning continued suspension of Title III and international cooperation, available at www.state.gov/www/regions/wha/970716a_eizenstat.html.

Title III allows U.S. nationals to sue foreign companies that profit from American-owned property confiscated by the Cuban regime. The law also provides me with the authority to suspend the date on which Title III enters into force, or the date on which U.S. nationals can bring suit, if I determine that suspension is necessary to the national interests and will expedite a transition to democracy in Cuba. I have decided to use the authority provided by Congress to maximize Title III's effectiveness in encouraging our allies to work with us to promote democracy in Cuba.

I will allow Title III to come into force. As a result, all companies doing business in Cuba are hereby on notice that by trafficking in expropriated American property, they face the prospect of lawsuits and significant liability in the United States.

This will serve as a deterrent to such trafficking—one of the central goals of the LIBERTAD Act.

At the same time, I am suspending the right to file suit for six months. During that period, my Administration will work to build support from the international community on a series of steps to promote democracy in Cuba. These steps include: increasing pressure on the regime to open up politically and economically; supporting forces for change on the island; withholding foreign assistance to Cuba; and promoting business practices that will help bring democracy to the Cuban workplace.

At the end of that period, I will determine whether to end the suspension, in whole or in part, based upon whether others have joined us in promoting democracy in Cuba. Our allies and friends will have a strong incentive to make real progress because, with Title III in effect, liability will be established irreversibly during the suspension period and suits could be brought immediately when the suspension is lifted. And for that very same reason, foreign companies will have a strong incentive to immediately cease trafficking in expropriated property—the only sure way to avoid future lawsuits.

We will work with our allies when we can. But they must understand that for countries and foreign companies that take advantage of expropriated property the choice is clear: They can cease profiting from such property. They can join our efforts to promote a transition to democracy in Cuba. Or they can face the risk of full implementation of Title III.

* * * *

Title III continued to be suspended for six-month periods throughout the 1990s. A fact sheet released by the Department of State January 15, 2000, described the President's actions as excerpted below.

The full text of the fact sheet is available at www.state.gov/www/regions/wha/fs_000115_titleIII_suspen.html.

In January 1997, the President cited significant progress in the development of the multilateral initiative and renewed the suspension for another 6 months in order to consolidate and further develop the multilateral approach. At that time, he said he would expect to continue to suspend the Title III lawsuit provision as long as our friends and allies continue their efforts to promote a transition to democracy in Cuba. In July 1997, January 1998, July 1998, January 1999, and July 1999, the President noted additional concrete steps to promote democracy and human rights when he announced additional 6-month suspensions.

The President's initiative to gain international support for democracy in Cuba—the most ambitious since Castro seized power—is yielding tangible positive results. In the past 6 months, governments, non-governmental organizations, and the private sector have taken additional important steps to promote democracy in Cuba. Cuban officials at home and abroad continue to hear a concerted message in support of democratic change.

3. U.S. Interest in the Enforcement of Arbitral Awards

In 1988, Revpower Limited, a U.S. company, contracted with Shanghai Far East Aero-Technology Import and Export Corporation ("SFAIC") to establish an industrial battery plant in Shanghai. According to Revpower, SFAIC was owned by a state-owned Chinese company, Shanghai Aviation Industry Corporation ("SAIC"), and created specifically to do business with Revpower.

Subsequently, a dispute developed between Revpower and SFAIC over pricing, and Revpower filed a complaint with the Arbitration Institute of the Stockholm Chamber of Commerce. On July 13, 1993, the Arbitration Institute awarded Revpower $4.9 million plus interest.

Efforts to enforce the award in Chinese courts met with protracted delays. By the time Revpower was able to enforce its award, SFAIC had no assets to satisfy the judgment. SFAIC filed for bankruptcy soon thereafter. As of 1999, Revpower was a creditor in the SFAIC bankruptcy action, but had not received any portion of its award. Assistant Secretary of State for Legislative Affairs Barbara Larkin explained the U.S. position regarding the Revpower case in a January 1998 letter to Senator Bob Graham:

> The Department of State is very concerned about the difficulties U.S. companies have faced in enforcing arbitral awards in China, and is quite familiar with the Revpower case in particular. We have been very active in raising these issues with the Chinese government, and have emphasized the importance of establishing a fair and transparent investment climate in China that includes adequate legal and judicial protection for all parties. Moreover, we have indicated to the Chinese that timely and fair resolution of Revpower and other investment disputes would send a positive signal to U.S. businesses about the investment climate in China. Enforcement of arbitral awards has been an issue of particular focus of both the Department of State and the Department of Commerce in our communications with Chinese government officials, and we have both raised the Revpower dispute repeatedly as an example of this problem. . . .

4. Holocaust-related Claims

As noted in Mr. Eizenstat's September 14, 1999, testimony in A.1.b., supra, private claimants brought suit in U.S. courts during the 1990s against certain foreign governments, corporations, and banks for claims arising out of the Nazi period. Some claims against Swiss and Austrian banks were settled in court. See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, 105 F.Supp.2d 139 (E.D.N.Y. 2000); In re Austrian and German Holocaust Bank Litigation, 80 F.Supp.2d 184 (S.D.N.Y. 2000), aff'd sub nom. D'Amato v. Deutsche Bank, 236 F.3d 78 (2d Cir. 2001). See Digest 2000 at 445–46, 460.

In 2000–2001, most of the remaining claims against banks, insurance companies, and companies allegedly using slave and forced labor were voluntarily dismissed by the claimants in favor of negotiated payment mechanisms. Mr. Eizenstat played a facilitative role in negotiations among foreign governments and other entities in creating these payment mechanisms but the United States did not espouse these claims. See, e.g., In re Nazi Era Cases Against German Defendants Litigation, 198 F.R.D. 429 (D.N.J. 2000); In re Austrian and German Holocaust Litigation, 250 F.3d 156 (2d Cir. 2001). See Digest 2000 at 446–60, 485–89; Digest 2001 at 386–413; Digest 2002 at 430–34

In 1997 the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois dismissed claims against Germany based on enslavement during World War II, and against Germany and the claims conference for an alleged conspiracy to deprive plaintiff of full compensation for his injuries. Sampson v. Federal Republic of Germany and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, Inc., 975 F. Supp. 1108 (N.D. Ill. 1997), aff'd 250 F.3d 1145 (7th Cir. 2001). The court of appeals found that suit against Germany was barred by the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, concluding that there was no implied waiver exception to foreign sovereign immunity for jus cogens violations, and that plaintiff lacked standing to sue the claims conference. See Digest 2000 at 473–85.

In 1999 the state of California passed two pieces of legislation relevant to claims during the Nazi period. The California Holocaust Victim Insurance Relief Act ("HVIRA") required, among other things, that insurers doing business in California that sold insurance polices to persons in Europe in effect between 1920 and 1945 file certain information about those policies with the California Insurance Commissioner. That statute was ultimately found unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court as pre-empted by federal foreign policy. American Insurance Association v. Garamendi, 539 U.S. 396, rehearing denied, 124 S.Ct. 35 (2003). See Digest 2000 at 460–73; Digest 2001 413–17; Digest 2002 at 415–29; Digest 2003 at 462–68.

Also in 1999 California enacted a statute permitting World War II forced laborers to sue the companies that benefited from their labor. Cal. Civ. Proc. Code § 354.6 (West 1999). Most of the claims under this statute were brought against Japanese companies. The Ninth Circuit found that the statute intruded "on the federal government's exclusive power to make and resolve war, including the procedure for resolving war claims." Deutsch v. Turner, 324 F.3d 692 (9th Cir. 2003), as amended, March 6, 2003. See Digest 2000 at 500–40; Digest 2001 at 339–40; Digest 2003 at 468–71.

Cases brought under § 354.6 in California state courts were also dismissed. E.g., Mitsubishi Materials Corp. v. Superior Court of Orange County (Dillman, real party in interest), 113 Cal. App. 4th 55 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. 2003); See Digest 2002 at 434–456; Digest 2003 at 471–72. and Taiheiyo Cement Corp. v. Superior Court (Jae Won Jeong, Real Party in Interest), 12 Cal. Rptr. 3d 32 (Cal. App. 2nd Dist. 2004). See Digest 2002 at 434–56 and Digest 2003 at 472–74.

In Florida, the 1998 Florida Holocaust Victims Insurance Act, Fla. Stat. § 626.9543, was found to violate Constitutional due process limits on legislative jurisdiction. Gerling Global Reins. Corp. of America v. Gallagher, 267 F.3d 1228 (11th Cir. 2001). See Digest 2001 at 414 n.3.

Diplomatic Relations, Succession and Continuity of States

A. DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS AND RECOGNITION

1. Issues of Recognition Under U.S. Law

a. President's constitutional authority to recognize

On May 16, 1995, Walter Dellinger, Acting Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice, issued a memorandum opinion for the Counsel to the President concerning the constitutionality of a pending legislative proposal (S. 770) that would have required the recognition of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. The bill, introduced in the Senate on May 9, 1995, stated that "[i]t is the policy of the United States that—(1) Jerusalem should be recognized as the capital of the State of Israel; (2) groundbreaking for construction of the United States Embassy in Jerusalem should begin no later than December 31, 1996; and (3) the United States Embassy should be officially open in Jerusalem no later than May 31, 1999." S. 770, 104th Cong. § 3(a) (1995). It would also have required that not more than fifty percent of the funds appropriated to the State Department for FY heading 1997 under the "Acquisition and Maintenance of Buildings Abroad" could be obligated until the Secretary of State determined and reported to Congress that construction had begun on the site of the U.S. Embassy in Jerusalem. S. 770, § 3(b).

In concluding that these requirements would be unconstitutional, Mr. Dellinger's memorandum discussed the President's exclusive "recognition" authority under the United States Constitution. Excerpts from Mr. Dellinger's memorandum follow.

* * * *

It is well settled that the Constitution vests the President with the exclusive authority to conduct the Nation's diplomatic relations with other States. This authority flows, in large part, from the President's position as Chief Executive, U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 1, and as Commander in Chief, id. art. II, § 2, cl. 1. It also derives from the President's more specific powers to "make Treaties," id. art. II, § 2, cl. 2; to "appoint Ambassadors . . . and Consuls," id.; and to "receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers," id. art. II, § 3. The Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized the President's authority with respect to the conduct of diplomatic relations. See, e.g., Department of Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 529 (1988) (the Supreme Court has "recognized 'the generally accepted view that foreign policy was the province and responsibility of the Executive' ") (quoting Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280, 293–94 (1981)); Alfred Dunhill of London, Inc. v. Republic of Cuba, 425 U.S. 682, 705–06 n.18 (1976) ("[T]he conduct of [foreign policy] is committed primarily to the Executive Branch."); United States v. Louisiana, 363 U.S. 1, 35 (1960) (the President is "the constitutional representative of the United States in its dealings with foreign nations"); see also Ward v. Skinner, 943 F.2d 157, 160 (1st Cir. 1991) (Breyer, C.J.) ("[T]he Constitution makes the Executive Branch . . . primarily responsible" for the exercise of "the foreign affairs power."), cert. denied, 503 U.S. 959 (1992); Sanchez-Espinoza v. Reagan, 770 F.2d 202, 210 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (Scalia, J.) ("[B]road leeway" is "traditionally accorded the Executive in matters of foreign affairs."). Accordingly, we have affirmed that the Constitution "authorize[s] the President to determine the form and manner in which the United States will maintain relations with foreign nations." Issues Raised by Provisions Directing Issuance of Official or Diplomatic Passports, 16 Op. O.L.C. 18, 21 (1992).

Furthermore, the President's recognition power is exclusive. See Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 410 (1964) ("Political recognition is exclusively a function of the Executive."); see also Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 204 (1987) ("[T]he President has exclusive authority to recognize or not to recognize a foreign state or government, and to maintain or not to maintain diplomatic relations with a foreign government."). It is well established, furthermore, that this power is not limited to the bare act of according diplomatic recognition to a particular government, but encompasses as well the authority to take such actions as are necessary to make the power of recognition an effective tool of United States foreign policy. United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 229 (1942) (The authority to recognize governments "is not limited to a determination of the government to be recognized. It includes the power to determine the policy which is to govern the question of recognition.").

* * * *

In general, because the venue at which diplomatic relations occur is itself often diplomatically significant, Congress may not impose on the President its own foreign policy judgments as to the particular sites at which the United States' diplomatic relations are to take place. More specifically, Congress cannot trammel the President's constitutional authority to conduct the Nation's foreign affairs and to recognize foreign governments by directing the relocation of an embassy. This is particularly true where, as here, the location of the embassy is not only of great significance in establishing the United States' relationship with a single country, but may well also determine our relations with an entire region of the world. Finally, to the extent that S. 770 is intended to affect recognition policy with respect to Jerusalem, it is inconsistent with the exclusivity of the President's recognition power.

Finally, it does not matter in this instance that Congress has sought to achieve its objectives through the exercise of its spending power, because the condition it would impose on obligating appropriations is unconstitutional. See United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 74 (1936); 16 Op. O.L.C. at 28–29 ("As we have said on several prior occasions, Congress may not use its power over appropriation of public funds 'to attach conditions to Executive Branch appropriations requiring the President to relinquish his constitutional discretion in foreign affairs.' ") *(*quoting Issues Raised by Foreign Relations Authorization Bill, 14 Op. O.L.C. 37, 42 n.3 (1990)) (quoting *Constitutionality of Proposed Statutory Provision Requiring Prior Congressional Notification for Certain CIA Covert Action*s, 13 Op. O.L.C. 258, 261–62 (1989)).

b. Unrecognized governments: access to U.S. courts

In response to a request from the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, by letter dated November 29, 1995, the United States submitted a Statement of Interest in Meridien International Bank Ltd. v. Government of the Republic of Liberia, 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 499 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 19, 1996). The Statement of Interest stated that the executive branch had determined that allowing the second Liberian National Transitional Government ("LNTG II") access to American courts to present claims and defenses on behalf of the Republic of Liberia would be consistent with U.S. foreign policy even though the United States had not officially recognized that government and that the court should defer to the executive branch determination in this case.

The Statement of Interest, with an attached declaration by William H. Twaddell, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, summarized events in the six-year Liberian civil war and the series of failed peace agreements as of that date. It also outlined the deployment of a peacekeeping force, the Economic Community of West African States Military Observer Group ("ECOMOG") in August 1990 and the formation at that time of an Interim Government of National Unity of the Republic of Liberia ("IGNU") and the installation of a coalition government in March 1994, the Liberian National Transitional Government ("LNTG I").

Excerpts below from the Statement of Interest address the available access by unrecognized governments to U.S. courts (footnotes and references to paragraphs in the Twaddell declaration and to other attachments to the Statement of Interest are omitted).

The full text of the Statement of Interest is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

In August 1995, all the warring factions signed an agreement. That agreement provides for a broad-based transitional government. The United States believes that this agreement offers the best hope to date of resolving the six-year conflict and supports its implementation. A cease-fire went into effect on August 26, 1995, and is generally holding.

The new transitional government (the LNTG II), headed by a six-member Council of State, was installed on September 1, 1995. The LNTG II is the first transitional government to include the leaders of the key factions in the conflict. . . . No other entity or faction claims to be the government of Liberia in lieu of the LNTG II. . . . National elections are scheduled for August 1996. . . .

It would be consistent with the foreign policy interests of the United States for the Court to confer standing upon the LNTG II in this lawsuit to present claims and defenses on behalf of the Republic of Liberia. It is well established that courts must defer to determinations made by the Executive branch as to what government is to be regarded as representative of a foreign state in litigation pending before domestic courts. . . .

Although the Department of State has not announced formal recognition of any entity as the government of Liberia, the absence of such formal recognition "cannot serve as the touchstone for determining whether the Executive branch has 'recognized' a foreign nation for the purpose of granting that government access to United States courts." National Petrochemical Co. of Iran v. M/T Stolt Sheaf, 860 F.2d 551, 554 (2d Cir. 1988). Rather, as part of the President's implied power to maintain international relations, "the Executive branch must have the latitude to permit a foreign nation access to United States Courts. . . ." Id., at 555. "Because the purpose of denying the privilege of suit to governments not recognized by the Executive branch is solely to give full effect to that branch's sensitive political judgments, a determination by the Executive branch that the unrecognized government, or its instrumentality, should be allowed to sue would naturally free a court from any restrictions placed on the exercise of its jurisdiction." National Oil Corp. v. Libyan Sun Oil Co., 733 F.Supp. 800, 807 (D. Del. 1990) (quoting Transportes Aereos de Angola Ronair, Inc., 544 F.Supp. 858, 863–64 (D. Del. 1982)). For example, in M/T Stolt Sheaf, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that formal recognition was not necessary for Iran to gain access to United States courts, especially where the Executive branch had evinced a willingness—through treaties, documents, and other ties, as well as the submission of a statement of interest—to permit the government of Iran to avail itself of Federal forum[s].

In four prior civil actions, the Executive branch submitted Statements of Interest urging that the respective courts accord the IGNU standing to assert claims and defenses on behalf of the Republic of Liberia in those actions, e.g., Meridien International Bank v. Government of the Republic of Liberia, 91 Civ. 127 (D.N.J. 1991); Meridien International Bank v. Government of the Republic of Liberia, 91 Civ. 0302 (S.D.N.Y. 1991); Liberian National Petroleum Co. v. Government of the Republic of Liberia, 90 Civ. 5514 (S.D.N.Y. 1992); Republic of Liberia v. Bickford, 787 F.Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1992). Moreover, in Republic of Liberia and the National Patriotic Reconstruction Assembly Government of Liberia v. Liberian Services, Inc., 92 Civ. 145 (E.D. Va. 1992), the United States filed a Statement of Interest urging the Court not to confer standing upon the National Patriotic Reconstruction Assembly Government of Liberia to assert claims and defenses on behalf of the Republic of Liberia in that case.

More recently, the Department of State had been requested by the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York to effectuate service via diplomatic channels pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1608(a)(4) on the Republic of Liberia in a pending case, Yona International Limited v. Republic of Liberia and National Bank of Liberia, 94 Civ. 3937 (RPP). In a letter dated November 8, 1995, Conrad K. Harper, Legal Adviser for the Department of State, responded to an inquiry by the Court on the status of the service request. That letter explained that the Department had not effected service on the Republic of Liberia "because of instability in that country, the lack of a government recognized by the United States in Liberia, and the consequent absence of normal diplomatic channels between Liberia and the United States through which service would usually be accomplished." Subsequent to that letter, the LNTG II has become more stable. It has accepted service in the Yona case. The LNTG II has also indicated that it is prepared to accept service of process effected pursuant to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1602 et seq. (the "FSIA"), including § 1608(a) (3), in other cases.

As in M/T Stolt Sheaf, 860 F.2d at 551, the Executive branch here evinces a willingness to permit the LNTG II to avail itself of a Federal forum. Accordingly, this court should defer to the Executive branch and confer standing upon the LNTG II to present claims and defenses on behalf of the Republic of Liberia in this action.

On January 19, 1996, the court held that, on the basis of the U.S. Statement of Interest, LNTG II had standing to assert claims and defenses on behalf of Liberia in the action. Meridien Int'l Bank Ltd. v. Gov't of the Republic of Liberia, 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 499 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 19, 1996). See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 263 (1996).

c. Other issues of state recognition

On occasion, the question arises in U.S. courts whether citizens from "unrecognized" countries or dependent territories qualify for purposes of "alienage" jurisdiction in federal court under the U.S. Constitution, art. III, § 2, cl. 1. See Matimak Trading Co. v. Khalily, 118 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 1997), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 1091 (1998); Favour Mind Limited v. Pacific Shores, Inc., 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18887 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 7, 1999), discussed in Chapter 5.A.2.

The question of what constitutes a "foreign country" also arises in connection with the foreign country exception to the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2680(k). See, e.g., Smith v. United States, 953 F.2d 1116 (9th Cir. 1991) (Antartica); Rossini v. United States, 82 F.3d 423 (9th Cir. 1996) (Morocco).

2. Establishment of Diplomatic Relations and Recognition of States

a. Albania

Albania was the last of the Central and East European countries to move away from communism. In December 1990 the government agreed to hold multi-party elections taking place on March 31, 1991, marking an end to a 47-year reign of totalitarian and isolationist rule by the communist party. The United States strongly supported the movement of Albania toward democratic and economic reform. Diplomatic relations resumed between the United States and Albania after Foreign Minister Muhamet Kapllani and Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs Raymond Seitz signed a memorandum of understanding at the Department of State on March 15, 1991. See Background Note at www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/bgn/3235.htm.

b. Angola

On May 31, 1991, the National Union for Total Independence of Angola ("UNITA") and the Luanda government of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola ("MPLA") signed the Angola Peace Accords, marking the end of a 16-year war in Angola. The United States, in conjunction with the Soviet Union, helped negotiate a United Nations monitored cease-fire and a political settlement that included free and fair multi-party elections and legalization of political parties. Excerpts below from Secretary of State Baker's remarks at the peace accord signing ceremony in Lisbon, Portugal, announced plans to open a U.S. liaison office. 2 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 23 at 408–09 (June 10, 1991), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

Those of us in the international community who have worked long and hard to reach this settlement know that implementation of these binding peace accords will not be easy. Time and again in the months and years ahead, the will of the Angolan people and their leaders will be severely tested.

But we are here today to say that Angola shall not stand alone. For our part, the United States will do all we can to assist Angola's transition to democracy. For we are convinced that democracy offers Angola the best chance for enduring peace and well-being at home and for stability and prosperity in the region.

We will support Angola's new multi-party system and help to ensure that the upcoming national elections are truly fair and free. Working through the Joint Commission, we will help provide the resources for voter education programs and for maximum popular participation in the election process.

Moreover, the United States shall fully meet all our commitments as observers to these peace accords. We will open a liaison office in Luanda and participate actively in the work of the Joint Political Military Commission and of the commission which will verify the cease fire.

We will honor our obligation not to provide any lethal materiel to anyone in Angola, and we will closely monitor other countries to the same end.

* * * *

On September 16, 1991, President George H.W. Bush met with Angolan President José Eduardo dos Santos at the White House. A White House Press Office statement indicated that the President "reiterated our firm commitment to the full and timely implementation of all aspects of the Accords" and informed President dos Santos that the United States "remain[ed] committed to establishing diplomatic relations with the government which emerges from free and fair internationally monitored elections." The full text of the statement by the Press Secretary is available at http://bushlibrary.tamu.edu/research/papers/1991/91091605.html.

The United States opened a liaison office in Luanda on January 10, 1992, in order to facilitate U.S. participation in the implementation of the peace accords and to work as an official observer to the newly formed Joint Political and Military Commission, which oversaw the implementation of all aspects of the agreement. See www.state.gov/r/pa/ho/po/com/10361.htm.

Multi-party elections were held in Angola on September 29, 1992. The United States, the United Nations, and others certified the elections as generally free and fair. The Government of the Republic of Angola affirmed its commitment to provide broadened participation at all levels of government to the major opposition party, UNITA, in the spirit of national reconciliation. President José Eduardo dos Santos became the constitutional head of state despite the fact that he did not obtain the 50% majority required to win the presidency. A presidential run-off election was to follow within 30 days, but that became unachievable. The government institutionalized a democratic system and swore in the democratically elected National Assembly.

Violence and bloodshed marked a post-electoral crisis in Angola with allegations that the elections were fraudulent. See testimony of Acting Assistant Secretary for African Affairs Jeffrey Davidow in a hearing before the Subcommittee on Africa of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, November 19, 1992, 3 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 49 at 866–67 (Dec. 7, 1992), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

On May 19, 1993, President Clinton announced the U.S. recognition of the Government of Angola. Excerpts from the President's statement are set forth below. 29 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 908 (May 24, 1993).

In 1992, after years of bitter civil war, the people of Angola held a multi-party election that the United States, the United Nations, and others monitored and considered free and fair. Since taking office on January 20, I have tried to use the possibility of U.S. recognition as a leverage toward promoting an end to the civil war and hostilities and, hopefully, the participation of all relevant political groups in the Government of Angola.

Sadly, the party that lost the election, UNITA, resumed the fighting before the electoral process could even be completed. And UNITA has now refused to sign the peace agreement currently on the table. The Angolan Government, by contrast, has agreed to sign that peace agreement, has sworn in a democratically elected national assembly, and has offered participation by UNITA at all levels of government.

Today we recognize those achievements by recognizing the Government of the Republic of Angola. It is my hope that UNITA will accept a negotiated settlement and that it will be a part of this government. I intend to continue working closely with the Government of Angola and with UNITA to achieve a lasting peace settlement and a vibrant democracy there. I hope the efforts of the United States have been helpful. I am confident that the Government of Angola has more than earned the recognition that the United States extends today.

* * * *

In a letter of June 8, 1993, Secretary of State Warren Christopher proposed that the United States and Angola conduct diplomatic relations. That proposal was accepted by letter of June 17, 1993, from President dos Santos and confirmed in a declaration executed at Luanda on June 21, 1993. See 87 Am. J. Int'l L. 595 (1993). Excerpts from the Secretary's letter are set forth below.

. . . The United States was proud to contribute to the process of consolidating peace and preparing for the transition to democracy in Angola. The elections last September represented a significant step in that process.

* * * *

Not only was it the electoral process, but also the appropriate context of democratic and human rights that led to President Clinton's May 19 announcement of U.S. recognition of the Government of the Republic of Angola. It is in the same context that I am now pleased to propose that our two countries conduct diplomatic relations. Upon your agreement to the establishment of U.S.-Angolan diplomatic relations, our mission in Luanda would be the United States embassy.

c. Slovenia, Croatia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina

As discussed in Chapters 17.A.1 and 18.A.4., widespread armed conflict existed in the former Yugoslavia throughout the 1990s. On April 7, 1992, The White House Office of the Press Secretary issued a statement by President George H.W. Bush, announcing the U.S. recognition of Slovenia, Croatia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina. 28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 601 (Apr. 7, 1992).

* * * *

The United States recognizes Bosnia-Hercegovina, Croatia, and Slovenia as sovereign and independent states and will begin immediately consultations to establish full diplomatic relations. The United States accepts the pre-crisis republic borders as the legitimate international borders of Bosnia-Hercegovina, Croatia, and Slovenia.

We take this step because we are satisfied that these states meet the requisite criteria for recognition. We acknowledge the peaceful and democratic expression of the will of the citizens of these states for sovereignty.

We will continue to work intensively with the European Community [EC] and its member states to resolve expeditiously the outstanding issues between Greece and the republic of Macedonia, thus enabling the United States to recognize formally the independence of that republic as well. The United States will also discuss with the governments of Serbia and Montenegro their interest in remaining in a common state known as Yugoslavia.

The United States views the demonstrated commitment of the emerging states to respect borders and to protect all Yugoslav nationalities as an essential element in establishing full diplomatic relations. Equally, we view such a commitment by Serbia and Montenegro as essential to proceed in discussions on their future status.

On August 6, 1992, in remarks to the press "on the situation in Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia and what the United States, working with the international community, is doing to contain and defuse this escalating crises," President Bush announced, among other things, his intent to establish diplomatic relations:

> [W]e must support the legitimate governments of Slovenia, Croatia, and Bosnia-Hercegovina. To this end, I have decided that the United States will move now to establish full diplomatic relations with those governments. I will shortly submit to the Senate my nominations for ambassadors to these posts.

The full text of the remarks by the President is available at 28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1392 (Aug. 6, 1992).

On August 11, 1992, Croatia and Slovenia accepted the U.S. proposal to establish full diplomatic relations, and Bosnia-Herzegovina did so on August 14. On August 25, the United States opened embassies in Zagreb and Ljublijana and announced plans to open an embassy in Sarajevo "when the security situation permit[ted]." See Chronology: Developments Related to the Crisis in Bosnia, March 10–August 28, 1992, 3 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 35 at 676–79 (Aug. 31, 1992), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

d. Czechoslovakia

On December 31, 1992, at midnight, the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, or Czechoslovakia, ceased to exist and was succeeded by two separate and independent states, the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic. The United States formally recognized the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic as independent states on January 1, 1993, and full diplomatic relations with each of them were immediately established. A statement by White House Press Secretary Marlin Fitzwater, January 1, 1993, 4 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 3 at 35 (Jan. 18, 1993), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html, is excerpted below.

The President today recognized the new Czech and Slovak Republics and offered to establish full diplomatic relations. In an exchange of letters, Czech Prime Minister Klaus and Slovak Prime Minister Meciar welcomed US recognition and accepted our offer of full diplomatic relations.

Both leaders provided assurances that the new states will fulfill the obligations and commitments of the former Czechoslovakia and will abide by the principles and provisions of the UN Charter, the Charter of Paris, the Helsinki Final Act, and subsequent CSCE [Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe] documents. They also pledged to prevent the proliferation of destabilizing military technology, to respect human rights and fundamental freedoms, to uphold international standards concerning national minorities, and to move rapidly to create free market economies.

The United States looks forward to full and mutually productive relations with the new Czech and Slovak states. We commend both republics for the peaceful means by which their separation was carried out. In the interest of ensuring stability and prosperity in the region and speeding full integration into the international community, the United States urges continued close regional cooperation among the states of Central Europe.

Our ambassador to Czechoslovakia will remain in Prague as the US ambassador to the Czech Republic. We look forward to appointing an ambassador to the Slovak Republic as soon as possible.

e. Cambodia

U.S.-Cambodian relations began to deteriorate in the early 1960s and diplomatic relations were officially broken by Cambodia in May 1965, but were reestablished on July 2, 1969. Diplomatic relations continued after the establishment of the Khmer Republic but again ceased with the evacuation of the U.S. mission on April 12, 1975. The United States condemned the brutal character of the Khmer Rouge regime between 1975 and 1979. Efforts in the 1980s by the Association of Southeast Asian Nations ("ASEAN") to achieve a comprehensive political settlement were supported by the United States and were successfully accomplished on October 23, 1991. It was on that date that the Paris Conference (initially convened in mid-1989 to include the various internal Cambodian parties, representatives of 18 concerned countries and the UN Secretary General, see Digest 1989–1990 at 527–37) was reconvened to sign a comprehensive settlement. Shortly thereafter, the U.S. mission in Phnom Penh opened on November 11, 1991, headed by designated U.S. Special Representative Charles H. Twining, Jr.

When the freely elected Royal Government of Cambodia was formed on September 24, 1993, the United States and the Kingdom of Cambodia immediately established full diplomatic relations. The U.S. mission was upgraded to the U.S. Embassy and in May 1994, Mr. Twining became the U.S. Ambassador. After factional fighting in 1997, the United States suspended bilateral assistance to the Cambodian Government. Since that time, U.S. assistance to the Cambodian people has been provided mainly through nongovernmental organizations, which flourish in Cambodia. See Background Note at www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/bgn/2732.htm.

f. Eritrea

On April 27, 1993, Eritrean authorities announced that in an April 23–25 referendum the Eritrean people voted overwhelmingly for independence from Ethiopia, a result that the Ethiopian Government respected. Eritrean authorities considered Eritrea a sovereign country as of April 27. Following this announcement, the U.S. Consulate at Asmara advised the authorities that the United States recognized Eritrea as an independent state. On April 28, 1993, the Department of State's Spokesman, Richard Boucher, confirmed that formal steps to establish diplomatic relations with Eritrea were underway. See Statement by Department Spokesman Richard Boucher, April 28, 1993, reprinted in 4 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 18 at 320 (May 3, 1993), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

In a note to Eritrean Secretary of Foreign Relations Mahmud Sharifu, U.S. Ambassador Marc Allen Baas congratulated the Eritrean people on their independence, and proposed arrangements for the basis of establishing diplomatic relations between the United States and Eritrea. The United States urged the Eritreans to declare that Eritrea considered itself bound by agreements to which Ethiopia was a party at the time of Eritrean independence.

First, I seek your concurrence that our diplomatic relations will be conducted in accordance with the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and, in particular, that the status and privileges and immunities of the U.S. Mission and its members will be governed by that agreement. Second, I seek your confirmation of our understanding that bilateral agreements between the United States and Ethiopia in force as of this date are also in force as between the United States and Eritrea. As relations between our two countries progress, we are, of course, prepared to review any such agreements to determine whether they should be revised, terminated, or replaced to take into account developments in U.S.-Eritrean relations.

* * * *

In a note dated June 3, 1993, addressed to the U.S. Consulate at Asmara, the Department of External Affairs of the Provisional Government of Eritrea confirmed its agreement to establish diplomatic relations in accordance with the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. The Eritrean provisional government also confirmed that bilateral agreements between the United States and Ethiopia in force as of June 3, 1993, would continue in force between the United States and Eritrea pending review by both sides.

On June 11, 1993, diplomatic relations between Eritrea and the United States were established with an appointed chargé d'affaires, and continued with the first U.S. Ambassador arriving later that year. See also 87 Am. J. Int'l L. 595, 597–98 (1993).

g. Andorra

In March 1993, by popular referendum, Andorra achieved independence from Spain and France, which had co-ruled the territory since 1278. France and Spain immediately recognized the new state and established embassies. Consistent with the U.S. Government's practice towards European microstates, the U.S. Consulate General in Barcelona became responsible for both diplomatic and consular functions for Andorra and the U.S. Ambassador to Spain was accredited as ambassador to Andorra. Diplomatic relations were officially established with Andorra on February 21, 1995. See Background Note at www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/bgn/3164.htm.

h. Republic of Palau

Following the entry into force of the Compact of Free Association with Palau, the United States and Palau agreed that relations between the two Governments would be conducted in accordance with the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. In addition to diplomatic missions, the Governments could establish and maintain other offices on terms and in locations as might be mutually agreed. The agreement entered into force on March 2, 1995. Agreement Concerning Relations Under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, Dec. 14, 1994, U.S.-Palau, TIAS. No. 12587. See Chapter 5.B.2.b.(3); s*ee also* 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 761, 766–67 (1995).

The United States first named an ambassador to the Republic of Palau on July 2, 1996, also serving as ambassador to the Philippines and resident in the Philippines.

i. Haiti

On February 7, 1991, President Jean-Bertrand Aristide took office following a presidential election that was deemed largely fair and free. President Aristide was overthrown that September in a violent coup. Following the coup, President Aristide began a three-year exile in the United States, while an unconstitutional military de facto regime governed Haiti. See discussion of U.S. sanctions during this period in Chapter 16.A.2.

In a letter dated October 27, 1992, Steven K. Berry, Acting Assistant Secretary for Legislative Affairs, U.S. Department of State, responded to questions from U.S. Congressman Sam M. Gibbons concerning the continued presence of a U.S. ambassador in Haiti.

The full text of the letter is set forth below.

I am responding to your October 8 letter asking, on behalf of Mr. Frank Chapman, why the United States continues to have an ambassador in Haiti.

While the United States does not accept the current regime in Haiti, we do accept President Aristide as Haiti's legitimate President and also accept as legitimate those parliamentary and local officials duly elected in the December 1990 elections which brought President Aristide to office. We have concluded that we can best support the restoration of democratic government to Haiti and oversee other U.S. interests there by maintaining a fully functioning embassy.

Nonetheless, we do not currently have an ambassador in Haiti. Ambassador Alvin Adams departed Haiti after a normal tour of duty in July; since then our Embassy has been headed by a Charge d'Affaires. In August President Bush nominated Roland Kuchel, a career Foreign Service officer, to succeed Ambassador Adams, but the nomination has not yet received Senate confirmation.

The U.S. remains committed to the goal of democratic government in Haiti. Our efforts, in conjunction with the OAS, have yielded some positive results. Discussions between the representatives of President Aristide and Mr. Bazin in early September resulted in the deployment of an OAS civilian presence to Haiti and hold the promise of further talks aimed at starting negotiations toward a settlement. We remain hopeful that a settlement will be reached soon.

On July 31, 1994, the United Nations Security Council adopted Resolution 940, authorizing member states to use all necessary means to facilitate the departure of Haiti's de facto leadership, in order to restore the constitutionally elected government. U.N. Doc. S/RES/940 (1994). On October 15, 1994, after international forces oversaw the end of military rule, President Aristide and other exiled elected officials returned to Haiti.

j. Vietnam

A statement released by U.S. Department of State Spokesman Michael D. McCurry on May 26, 1994, announced that the United States and Vietnam had reached an agreement on the legal framework for opening liaison offices in Hanoi and Washington. See Daily Press Briefing, May 26, 1994, available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/daily_briefings/1994/9405/940526db.html. The agreement was established by an exchange of letters between Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Winston Lord and Vietnamese Vice Foreign Minister Le Mai, dated May 20, 1994, at Washington and May 21, 1994, at Hanoi. Vice Foreign Minister Le Mai's letter accepted the terms set forth in Mr. Lord's letter and stated that Vietnam "wishes that the relationship between the two countries develop on the basis of respect for independence, sovereignty, non-intervention in each other's domestic affairs, equality, and mutual interests."

Excerpts from Mr. Lord's letter are set forth below. See also 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 728 (1994).

Further to President Clinton's announcement of February 3, 1994, concerning the lifting of the trade embargo and establishment of a United States liaison office in Vietnam and the Vietnam Foreign Ministry statement of February 4, 1994, on behalf of the United States Government, I am pleased to propose that our two governments establish offices in our respective countries. We propose that these liaison offices would, pending further progress in our overall relations, function in accordance with the terms described herein.

Since both the United States and the Socialist Republic of Vietnam are parties to the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (VCCR), I propose as a general principle that our two governments conduct their relations within the framework of this universally respected international instrument. Consistent with the purposes of the VCCR, I propose that both governments agree on the need to provide all standard consular services.

The initial official presence of the United States in Vietnam and that of Vietnam in the United States would be "liaison offices" at the level of Consulate General, the head of which would hold the title of "Chief of the Liaison Office" with the rank of Consul General. Further discussions would be held early to determine such matters as the initial number of staff to be assigned to the respective liaison offices.

The staff members of our respective liaison offices, and their families forming part of their households, will enjoy all of the facilities, privileges, and immunities that are provided for in the VCCR. Based on mutual agreement, we will pursue provision of appropriate facilities, privileges, and immunities to other personnel.

The United States is prepared to accept the establishment of a comparable liaison office of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam in the United States.

While taking this step, the U.S. Government believes that there remain many technical and substantive issues that will have to be resolved between our two governments before full normalization of our relations can be realized, particularly progress on American POWs and MIAs. In this context, we welcome Vietnam's statements reaffirming its commitment to assist on the POW/MIA issues as well as its decision to begin a bilateral dialogue on human rights issues. We hope the establishment of liaison offices will enable us to make further progress on these and other issues of interest to both countries.

In addition to the exchange of letters, the United States and Vietnam signed an "Agreed Minute," reading as follows.

A Vietnamese delegation, led by Mr. Nguyen Xuan Phong, Director, Americas Department, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and a United States delegation, led by Mr. James H. Hall, Director, Office of Vietnam [sic], Laos and Cambodia Affairs, Department of State, met periodically between February 28 and May 7, 1994, to discuss the opening of liaison offices in their respective countries, following the February 3, 1994 statement of the President of the United States and the February 4, 1994 statement of the Vietnamese Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The two delegations agreed to the texts of the proposed letters to be exchanged between their respective governments that would provide the framework for the creation of their respective liaison offices.

In addition to the matters addressed in the texts of the proposed letters, the delegations agreed to the following:

1) Vietnam and U.S. liaison offices would serve as vehicles to deal with the issues of interest to both countries.

2) Liaison office employees may participate in dialogue and liaison office premises may be used for dialogue on any issue of concern between the two countries.

3) Consistent with the purposes of the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (VCCR), the liaison offices will provide all standard consular services.

4) Both states reaffirm their policies of not supporting or condoning efforts to overthrow or destabilize the other government, and pledge to inform their citizens of their responsibilities to observe local laws. Moreover, U.S. neutrality and related laws impose substantial criminal and civil penalties for individuals within the U.S. who knowingly provide financial or materiel support for efforts to destabilize foreign governments.

5) The two sides will notify each other immediately, but no later than within 96 hours, of the arrest or detention of passport holders of the sending state. If it is not possible to notify the sending state within 96 hours because of communications difficulties, the receiving state will provide notification as soon as possible. The receiving state will provide consular access to the detained person within 48 hours after notification.

6) Each country will provide reciprocal and non-discriminatory treatment to the liaison office of the other.

7) All citizens of the receiving state would be equally treated in terms of employment at the liaison office of the sending state, without discrimination regardless of their prior affiliation with the sending state.

8) Occupation of respective diplomatic properties would be based on simultaneousness. Each side would assist the other to find suitable temporary office and residential space on a reciprocal and non-discriminatory basis.

After twenty years of severed ties, President Clinton announced on July 11, 1995, the formal normalization of diplomatic relations with Vietnam. 31 WEEKLY COMP.

PRES. DOC. 1217–19 (July 17, 1995). See also discussion of Diplomatic Property Agreement signed January 28, 1995, in Chapter 8.A.7.b.

By notes exchanged in Hanoi, Vietnam, on August 5, 1995, Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Manh Cam confirmed the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and the Socialist Republic of Vietnam by mutual consent on July 12, 1995. See remarks of Secretary Christopher at the signing ceremony and related documents at 6 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 33 at 630 (Aug. 14, 1995), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

Secretary Christopher's note to Foreign Minister Cam is set forth below. See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 79 (1996).

Further to President Clinton's announcement of July 11 in Washington, D.C. and Prime Minister Vo Van Kiet's announcement of the following day in Hanoi, I have the honor to confirm that the United States of America and the Socialist Republic of Vietnam established diplomatic relations by mutual consent on July 12, and to propose that we establish permanent diplomatic missions in our respective countries and exchange ambassadors.

It is the understanding of the United States that our relations will be conducted within the framework of the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (VCDR), which is in force for both of our countries.

I look forward to receiving your concurring response in behalf of the Government of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam.

* * * *

Foreign Minister Cam's note to Secretary Christopher accepting these terms reaffirmed the "position of the Government of Vietnam as expressed in the July 12, 1995 statement by Prime Minister Vo Van Kiet that the Government of Vietnam is ready to join the Government of the United States of America in leaving the past behind and building together a new relationship between the two countries on the basis of equality, respect for each other's independence, sovereignty, non-intervention in each other's internal affairs, mutually beneficial co-operation, and in keeping with the universal principles of international law."

A separate exchange of letters, also dated August 5, 1995, between the Director, Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia Affairs, Department of State, Dennis G. Harter, and the Director, Department of American Affairs, the Vietnam Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Nguyen Xuan Phong, addressed problems posed by the dual nationality of individuals assigned to the respective diplomatic and consular missions and/or their dependents. See id.

Mr. Harter's letter is excerpted below.

In light of the historic announcements by President Clinton and Prime Minister Vo Van Kiet of the decision to establish diplomatic relations between the United States of America and the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, and the exchange of letters between Secretary of State Christopher and Minister of Foreign Affairs Cam of this date, consistent with arrangements made related to relations between our two governments, and the need for diplomatic and consular missions to be accorded the status necessary for their proper functioning, I have the honor to confirm the following understanding:

The two governments agree that they will provide for diplomatic and consular agents, administrative and technical staff and their dependents of the sending state promptly and expeditiously to renounce citizenship of the receiving state under the law of the receiving state.

* * * *

Mr. Phong agreed, adding that

> [w]ithin the framework of the related provisions stipulated by the Vietnamese law Vietnam will give priority to resolve the above requests as soon as possible. To that end, those who want to renounce their citizenship or nationality should cooperate with the Vietnamese authorities by fully completing all necessary procedures required by Vietnamese regulations.

In a further note, also dated August 5, 1995, Vice Foreign Minister Le Mai informed Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Winston Lord that Le Van Bang would take charge of the Embassy of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam in the United States in the capacity of chargé d'affaires ad interim.

On June 18, 1997, Jeffrey Bader, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, testified before the Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific, House Committee on International Relations, on the U.S. policy toward Vietnam. Excerpts of his statement are set forth below.

Vietnam's desire to improve relations with the U.S. has led it to engage us on a number of issues of concern to us, in many cases flexibly. These include: POW/MIA accounting, establishment of diplomatic relations, resettlement opportunities abroad for Vietnamese boat people and return of some of them to Vietnam, economic and commercial cooperation, protection of intellectual property rights, repayment of sovereign debt, security dialogue, and law enforcement cooperation. I would now like to turn to U.S. policy in Vietnam—what we have been doing and some next steps.

Since the early 1990s, the U.S. has been proceeding cautiously in developing relations with Vietnam, following a road map conceived in the Bush Administration. In 1994, in light of progress in POW/MIA accounting and the successful implementation of the Paris Peace Accords, the Clinton Administration lifted the trade embargo on Vietnam. The U.S. opened a Liaison Office in Hanoi later in 1994. On July 11, 1995, President Clinton announced our establishment of diplomatic relations, and on May 9, former Congressman Pete Peterson took up his duties as our Ambassador to Vietnam.

* * * *

Obtaining the fullest possible accounting of American POW/MIAs from the Vietnam War continues to be our highest priority with regard to Vietnam. . . .

In 1993, the President set out four specific areas in which cooperation by the Vietnamese would be examined as a basis for further improvement in relations:

— Resolving discrepancy cases and live sightings, as well as conducting field activities. With the assistance of the SRV, we have been able to confirm the fate of all but 48 of the 196 "last known alive" high priority cases; i.e., persons known to have survived their capture or aircraft loss, but who did not return alive. After evaluating over 1,850 reports that POW/MIAs had been sighted alive since 1975 and over 140 field investigations, we have found "no compelling evidence that any American remains alive in captivity in Southeast Asia."
— Recovering and repatriating remains. This month, JTF-FA (Joint Task Force-Full Accounting) began the 46th JFA (Joint Field Activity) in Vietnam, 26 of these since January 1993. These joint U.S.-Vietnamese operations and unilateral Vietnamese turnovers of remains have produced 211 sets of remains since 1993. During these activities, Vietnamese and Americans work together under harsh and dangerous conditions to recover remains of the missing.
— Accelerating efforts to provide documents that will help lead to the fullest possible accounting. The Vietnamese creation of teams in 1994 to search nationwide for documents and records has provided new leads. Joint research teams have reviewed and photographed approximately 28,000 archival items. In 1995 and 1996, Vietnamese officials unilaterally turned over 300 documents totaling 500–600 untranslated pages. We have conducted more than 195 oral history interviews of Vietnamese veterans and officials.

— Providing further assistance in implementing trilateral investigations with Laos. Since the Vietnamese agreed in December 1994 to cooperate on recovery operations in Laos, 22 Vietnamese witnesses have assisted in field activities in Laos, providing information that led to the repatriation in 1996 of remains associated with cases of 12 unaccounted-for Americans.

Taking into account all information available to the government, the President signed a Presidential Determination on December 3, 1996 that Vietnam is cooperating in full faith in all four of these areas.

The arrival of Pete Peterson in Hanoi provides us an invaluable asset as we pursue the goal of fullest possible accounting. As a former POW, he brings a special, unique commitment and credibility to this task. At the same time, he has already demonstrated an extraordinary ability to communicate with the Vietnamese, enabling him to build a framework of cooperation necessary to further the goal of accounting for our POW/MIAs.

* * * *

In January of this year, we reached agreement with the Vietnamese.

We are working with Congress to open a Consulate General in Ho Chi Minh City. Opening a Consulate General is very much in our own interest. It will enable us to provide consular and business services to the 3,000 Americans resident in Ho Chi Minh City and 75,000 American tourists visiting annually. There is a huge demand for immigrant and non-immigrant visas, which currently must be handled at great expense to the U.S. Government out of Bangkok. When it opens, Ho Chi Minh City will be one of the biggest visa-issuing posts in East Asia and the Pacific. A presence in Ho Chi Minh City will enable us to more closely monitor the economic, social, and human rights situation in the South.

Because of the embargo and the absence of contacts between our two countries for so long, the U.S.-Vietnam economic relationship is one of the handful in the world which should experience dramatic growth in the years to come and create jobs for Americans as exports grow. For this to happen, Vietnam needs to eliminate trade barriers and continue to develop an institutional and legal framework meeting the needs of American business.

* * * *

The U.S. and Vietnam have begun to normalize relations on a wide front. The result is an increasingly complex relationship. The U.S. and Vietnam have a tragic history. Healing the wounds of war takes time, effort, and good will. We are moving toward a time when Americans will truly see Vietnam not as a war but as a country, and the Vietnamese not as former enemies but as a people with whom Americans can build a relationship based on reconciliation and shared hopes for the future. We still have much more work ahead of us.

B. CONTINUITY AND SUCCESSION AND RELATED ISSUES

1. Yugoslavia

a. Succession to the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

On April 27, 1992, Serbia-Montenegro announced the creation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("FRY"), claiming that the FRY was now "the state, international legal and political personality" of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("SFRY"). Such a continuation of statehood would have entailed the assumption by only one of the entities that emerged from the break-up of the SFRY(in this case, Serbia and Montenegro) of certain non-divisible rights and obligations of the predecessor state, including the right to continue its membership in international organizations. A letter dated April 28, 1992, to Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office, from the Permanent Mission of the SFRY, informed the United Nations that the Assembly of the SFRY at its session held on April 27, 1992, had promulgated the Constitution of the FRY, excerpted below.

The full text of the letter is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Under the Constitution, on the basis of a continuing personality of Yugoslavia and the legitimate decisions by Serbia and Montenegro to continue to live together in Yugoslavia, the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia is transformed into the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia consisting of the Republic of Serbia and the Republic of Montenegro.

Strictly respecting the continuity of the international personality of Yugoslavia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia shall continue to fulfil all the rights conferred to and obligations assumed by the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in international relations, including its membership in all international organizations and participation in international treaties ratified or acceded to by Yugoslavia. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia as a founding member of the United Nations acknowledges its full commitment to the world organizations, the United Nations Charter. . . .

The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia shall cooperate with other participants of the Conference on Yugoslavia in order, inter alia, to ensure a speedy and just distribution of the rights and responsibilities of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the other republics, if they wish it, to continue an independent membership in international organizations and participation in international treaties.

As noted in A.2.c., supra, the United States had already recognized Slovenia, Croatia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina. On May 22, 1992, Slovenia, Croatia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina were admitted to the United Nations, with the support of the United States. On that occasion, the U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations stated, "If Serbia and Montenegro desire to sit in the U.N., they should be required to apply for membership and be held to the same standards as all other applicants." On May 30, 1992, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 757, co-sponsored by the United States, imposing immediate sanctions against Serbia-Montenegro and specifically noting that "the claim by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations has not been generally accepted." U.N. Doc. S/RES/757 (1992).

On August 24, 1992, Ambassador Alexander F. Watson, U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations, addressed this issue in a statement at the 46th Session of the United Nations General Assembly, in Plenary, on the resumed Session on Bosnia-Herzegovina. U.N. Doc. A/46/PV.90 at 7 (1992).

. . . It is the firm position of my government that the United States does not recognize Serbia-Montenegro as the continuation of the former Yugoslavia. Therefore, the claim by Serbia-Montenegro to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations cannot be accepted and the United States believes that this should be confirmed by passage of appropriate resolutions by the Security Council and General Assembly. Pending such action by the Security Council and General Assembly, the participation of the Representatives of Serbia-Montenegro in the activities of the Security Council or the General Assembly should be viewed as without prejudice to the disposition of this issue. We ask that all states join in putting an end to the charade that the brutal, expansionist regime currently in power in Belgrade is entitled to the rights and privileges of the former Yugoslavia. We urge your support for a Security Council resolution asking the General Assembly to determine that the former Yugoslavia no longer exists. To pretend otherwise is a disservice to all.

* * * *

On September 22, 1992, the UN General Assembly, acting on a recommendation of the Security Council of September 19, adopted a resolution in which it stated that it

> [c]onsiders that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) cannot continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations; and therefore decides that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it shall not participate in the work of the General Assembly;

U.N. Doc. A/RES/47/1 (1992). The U.S. delegation provided an explanation of its vote in support of the resolution, as set forth in full below.

We meet this evening to address the extraordinary consequences of one of the great tragedies of our time. The conflict in the territory of the former Yugoslavia endangers the security of us all, for it challenges the democratic and peaceful world order we seek. We can have no more important goal than the achievement of peace. We support all practical efforts to bring peace to the territory of the former Yugoslavia. In this regard, we have listened closely to the message of Prime Minister Panic. We welcome warmly his stated desire for peace. We respect what he is trying to do and will follow his efforts closely. We look for his desires to be translated into effective action. We stand ready to help him in his efforts for peace.

With respect to that search for peace, we want to stress that the action taken today by the General Assembly reflects only the realities of the situation in the former Yugoslavia. Although that action is without precedent, it was by no means completely unforeseen. Forty-five years ago, the UN Sixth (Legal) Committee formulated principles to guide the United Nations in deciding membership questions related to the break up of states. Those principles suggest that when a member state breaks up, if there is no clearly predominant portion remaining that can fairly be said to be the continuation of the former states, the former state's legal personality is considered extinguished and no state is entitled to continue its membership in the United Nations.

Prior to its dissolution, the SFRY was one of the most decentralized nations in the world. Since then, there has been no agreement among the former Yugoslavia Republics on the status of the former Yugoslavia's UN seat. Similarly, none of the former republics is so clearly a predominant portion of the original state so as to be entitled to be treated as the continuation of that state. My government has, therefore, made clear all along that we cannot accept Serbia-Montenegro's claim to the former Yugoslavia's seat. We view the action by the Security Council and General Assembly as the appropriate response in this extraordinary situation.

Today's action confirms that this issue—like other membership questions—should be decided by the General Assembly upon that recommendation of the Security Council. Other bodies throughout the UN system should now follow up on the decision of the General Assembly and act quickly to ensure that Serbia-Montenegro no longer remains in the seat of the former Yugoslavia.

Resolution 777 (1992), which the Security Council adopted over the weekend, recognized that the former Yugoslavia has ceased to exist. Upon the recommendation of the Council, today's General Assembly resolution rejects the claim of Serbia-Montenegro to continue the membership of the former Yugoslavia. This is not a suspension of a member state, as some may claim. Rather, following up on the actions of the Security Council, the General Assembly has simply decided that the former Yugoslavia has ceased to exist and that its membership in the United Nations has therefore expired.

Since the Council and General Assembly have confirmed that Serbia-Montenegro is not the continuation of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, it follows automatically that Serbia-Montenegro must apply for membership, just as the other former Yugoslavia Republics have done, if it wishes to participate in the United Nations.

When it applies, Serbia-Montenegro will be judged by the same criteria as all new states. Like all applicants, Serbia-Montenegro will have to demonstrate that it is willing and able to fulfill the obligations of the UN Charter, including the obligation to comply with binding resolutions of the Security Council. We hope that its desire to become a member of the United Nations will serve as a strong incentive for Serbia-Montenegro to honor these obligations. Until such time as it applies and is formally admitted, Serbia-Montenegro, like any other country that is not a member of the United Nations, cannot participate in the work of the General Assembly or its committees and specialized agencies unless specifically invited to do so.

Macedonia was admitted as a member of the United Nations on April 18, 1993. U.N. Doc. A/RES/47/225 (1993). The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was admitted as a new member of the United Nations on November 1, 2000, following its application for membership. U.N. Doc. A/RES/55/12 (2000); see Digest 2000 at 561–63.

b. Protection of successor state assets

James B. Foley, Deputy Spokesman for the U.S. Department of State, released a statement on September 29, 1997, regarding the protection of the Yugoslav successor state assets.

The full text of the statement is set forth below, available at http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings/statements/970929a.html.

The U.S. government reiterates that it unequivocally rejects the assertion of the "Federal Republic of Yugoslavia" (the "FRY") that it is the sole successor state to, or the sovereign continuation of, the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). Consistent with customary international law, the United States considers that all five successor states, Bosnia & Herzegovina, Croatia, the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Slovenia and the "FRY" are equal successors to the SFRY. The United States is joined in this view by the international community.

The outer wall of sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro remains fully in force. These sanctions include a prohibition on membership in international organizations such as the UN and the OSCE and access to international financial institutions as well as normalization of relations with the United States.

Progress on succession issues continues to be a central element of the outer wall of sanctions. Belgrade continues to be the main impediment to progress towards a resolution on this issue. Belgrade's record in other areas has also fallen far short of acceptable, including cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, resolving the problems in Kosovo, and real progress on democratization.

In keeping with our policy on furthering progress on state succession issues, and our continuing efforts to protect successor state assets, today the United States filed, at the request of the U.S. District Court in New York, statements of interest in two cases, Beogradska Banka v. Interenergo and Jugobanka v. U.C.F. International and Slovenijales. These two cases involve claims by "Federal Republic of Yugoslavia" (FRY) banks against commercial entities of two other successor republics of the former Yugoslavia (SFRY) regarding defaulted loans.

The U.S. government will support the adjudication of these claims in order to protect former SFRY financial assets. Allowing these cases to go forward fulfills our responsibility to help protect former Yugoslav assets for the benefit of all the successor states until they reach an agreement on their allocation. Failure to permit timely adjudication of these claims could seriously risk diminution of the value of the assets involved. For example, over time, there is a risk that applicable statutes of limitation will lapse; that evidence will be lost; and that the debtors could fall into bankruptcy or otherwise become unable to repay the valid debts.

Any payments in favor of the plaintiff banks in these cases must, under U.S. law, be paid only into escrow or otherwise blocked accounts pending resolution of the succession and asset allocation issues among the five successor states. It is the view of the U.S. government that going forward with adjudication of the plaintiff's cases will not prejudice any successor state claims against the assets of the SFRY and does not imply nor would it result in the allocation of any SFRY assets.

As part of the United States' continuing efforts to protect successor state assets, the U.S. government intends to facilitate the reconstitution of bank records from "FRY" banks in order to establish what assets and liabilities are legally valid and extant. However, the U.S. government will not authorize "FRY" banks to resume operations in the United States.

The allocation of SFRY assets remains unresolved pending the conclusion of an agreement among the five successor states. At present, negotiations towards this end are under way in Brussels under the authority of the High Representative Carlos Westendorp, and conducted by the Special Negotiator Sir Arthur Watts. In an effort to lend support to these negotiations and to promote a prompt and successful outcome, the United States will explore ways to assist the Special Negotiator in resolving outstanding succession issues among the successor states.

The United States calls on all the successor states to the SFRY, and in particular the "FRY", to cooperate with Sir Arthur Watts in resolving these outstanding issues.

2. Former Soviet Union

When the former U.S.S.R. broke up, President George H.W. Bush formally recognized each of the twelve Republics (not including the Baltics*) at the same time. As with Yugoslavia, the United States faced numerous issues regarding the rights and obligations of the new states of the U.S.S.R., including rights to membership in international organizations and conferences, allocation of assets and debts, claims against the predecessor state, and obligations under international agreements.

* The United States never accepted the forcible incorporation of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania into the Soviet Union, and continued to recognize those states diplomatically.

The United States viewed each newly created state of the former U.S.S.R. as a successor state, and not a "continuation" state. However, in certain cases, the United States did endorse the notion that Russia was the continuation of the U.S.S.R., where rights and obligations were indivisible and could not be recreated, such as the permanent seat of the U.S.S.R. in the UN Security Council and the U.S.S.R.'s nuclear weapons state status under the Non-Proliferation Treaty. See discussion of treaty succession issues in Chapter 4.B.6.a.

Russia's assumption of the U.S.S.R.'s seat in the United Nations was supported by relevant factors, including Russia's proportion of the population of the former U.S.S.R. (over fifty percent of the population of the former U.S.S.R.); as well as its territory (seventy-seven percent of the territory of the former U.S.S.R.) and resources. The Russian Federation obtained formal agreement by all the members of the Commonwealth of Independent States, in the Alma Ata Accords, that it should occupy the seat of the former U.S.S.R. in UN bodies. Moreover, because two of the larger Soviet Republics, Ukraine and Byelorussia, had through historical anomaly been members of the UN since its inception, the residual U.S.S.R., for purposes of the UN membership, had always consisted overwhelmingly of Russia.

On December 21, 1991, in Alma Ata, Kazakhstan, at the formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States ("CIS"), leaders of the eleven republics joining the commonwealth signed five instruments: (1) Protocol to the Agreement establishing the Commonwealth of Independent States; (2) Alma Ata Declaration; (3) Minutes of the meeting of Heads of Independent States (on the military); (4) Agreement on coordinating bodies of the Commonwealth of Independent States (on institutions); and (5) Decision by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States (on United Nations membership) ("Decision"). See Letter dated 27 December 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Belarus to the United Nations to the Secretary-General, transmitting the documents as annexes I–V, U.N. Doc. A/47/60 (Dec. 30, 1991), reprinted in 31 I.L.M. 138 (1992). An agreement on joint measures with respect to nuclear weapons, signed by the four republics with nuclear arms on their territories, and a statement by the delegation of the Republic of Belarus (on conditions for membership in the CIS, adopted unanimously at Alma Ata) were transmitted as annexes VI and VII.

In Article 12 of the Alma Ata Declaration, the states agreed to fulfill treaty and other international obligations of the former U.S.S.R. See Chapter 4.B.6.A. Excerpts below from the Decision address UN membership

The States participating in the Commonwealth, referring to article 12 of the Agreement establishing the Commonwealth of Independent States, Proceeding from the intention of each State to discharge the obligations under the Charter of the United Nations and to participate in the work of that Organization as full Members,

Bearing in mind that the Republic of Belarus, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Ukraine were founder Members of the United Nations, Expressing satisfaction that the Republic of Belarus and Ukraine continue to participate in the United Nations as sovereign independent States,

Resolved to promote the strengthening of international peace and security on the basis of the Charter of the United Nations in the interests of their peoples and of the entire international community,

Have decided that:

1. The States of the Commonwealth support Russia's continuance of the membership of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in the United Nations, including permanent membership of the Security Council, and other international organizations.
2. The Republic of Belarus, the RFSFR and Ukraine will extend their support to the other States of the Commonwealth in resolving issues of their full membership in the United Nations and other international organizations.

During these last few months, you and I have witnessed one of the greatest dramas of the 20th century, the historic and revolutionary transformation of a totalitarian dictatorship, the Soviet Union, and the liberation of its peoples. As we celebrate Christmas, this day of peace and hope, I thought we should take a few minutes to reflect on what these events mean for us as Americans.

For over 40 years, the United States led the West in the struggle against communism and the threat it posed to our most precious values. This struggle shaped the lives of all Americans. It forced all nations to live under the specter of nuclear destruction.

That confrontation is now over. The nuclear threat, while far from gone, is receding. Eastern Europe is free. The Soviet Union itself is no more. This is a victory for democracy and freedom. It's a victory for the moral force of our values. Every American can take pride in this victory, from the millions of men and women who have served our country in uniform, to millions of Americans who supported their country and a strong defense under nine Presidents.

New, independent nations have emerged out of the wreckage of the Soviet empire. Last weekend, these former Republics formed a Commonwealth of Independent States. This act marks the end of the old Soviet Union, signified today by Mikhail Gorbachev's decision to resign as President.

I'd like to express, on behalf of the American people, my gratitude to Mikhail Gorbachev for years of sustained commitment to world peace, and for his intellect, vision, and courage. I spoke with Mikhail Gorbachev this morning. We reviewed the many accomplishments of the past few years and spoke of hope for the future.

Mikhail Gorbachev's revolutionary policies transformed the Soviet Union. His policies permitted the peoples of Russia and the other Republics to cast aside decades of oppression and establish the foundations of freedom. His legacy guarantees him an honored place in history and provides a solid basis for the United States to work in equally constructive ways with his successors.

The United States applauds and supports the historic choice for freedom by the new States of the Commonwealth. We congratulate them on the peaceful and democratic path they have chosen, and for their careful attention to nuclear control and safety during this transition. Despite a potential for instability and chaos, these events clearly serve our national interest.

We stand tonight before a new world of hope and possibilities for our children, a world we could not have contemplated a few years ago. The challenge for us now is to engage these new States in sustaining the peace and building a more prosperous future.

And so today, based on commitments and assurances given to us by some of these States, concerning nuclear safety, democracy, and free markets, I am announcing some important steps designed to begin this process.

First, the United States recognizes and welcomes the emergence of a free, independent, and democratic Russia, led by its courageous President, Boris Yeltsin. Our Embassy in Moscow will remain there as our Embassy to Russia. We will support Russia's assumption of the U.S.S.R.'s seat as a permanent Member of the United Nations Security Council. I look forward to working closely with President Yeltsin in support of his efforts to bring democratic and market reform to Russia.

Second, the United States also recognizes the independence of Ukraine, Armenia, Kazakhstan, Belarus, and Kyrgyzstan, all States that have made specific commitments to us. We will move quickly to establish diplomatic relations with these States and build new ties to them. We will sponsor membership in the United Nations for those not already members.

Third, the United States also recognizes today as independent States the remaining six former Soviet Republics: Moldova, Turkmenistan, Azerbaijan, Tadjikistan, Georgia, and Uzbekistan. We will establish diplomatic relations with them when we are satisfied that they have made commitments to responsible security policies and democratic principles, as have the other States we recognize today.

These dramatic events come at a time when Americans are also facing challenges here at home. I know that for many of you these are difficult times. And I want all Americans to know that I am committed to attacking our economic problems at home with the same determination we brought to winning the cold war.

I am confident we will meet this challenge as we have so many times before. But we cannot if we retreat into isolationism. We will only succeed in this interconnected world by continuing to lead the fight for free people and free and fair trade. A free and prosperous global economy is essential for America's prosperity. That means jobs and economic growth right here at home.

This is a day of great hope for all Americans. Our enemies have become our partners, committed to building democratic and civil societies. They ask for our support, and we will give it to them. We will do it because as Americans we can do no less.

For our children, we must offer them the guarantee of a peaceful and prosperous future, a future grounded in a world built on strong democratic principles, free from the specter of global conflict.

May God bless the people of the new nations in the Commonwealth of Independent States. And on this special day of peace on Earth, good will toward men, may God continue to bless the United States of America. Good night.

3. Czech and Slovak Republics

As discussed in A.2.d., supra, the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic ("Czechoslovakia") ceased to exist on December 31, 1992, and was succeeded by two countries: the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic. A diplomatic note from the Czechoslovak foreign ministry to the U.S. Embassy in Prague outlined the status of the Czech Republic and Slovak Republic representation at the United Nations after January 1, 1993. It informed the U.S. Embassy that Czechoslovakia's membership at the United Nations would cease to exist on December 31, 1992. However, it stated that both the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic would apply for UN membership in the first days of 1993. In that connection, it clarified that, after January 1, 1993, the permanent mission staff of Czechoslovakia would represent interests of both successor states, and that the mission staff would simultaneously be working on termination of the current mission and arrangements for the membership of new successor states as well as inauguration of permanent missions of these states to the United Nations in New York.

4. Hong Kong

On July 1, 1997, Hong Kong became a Special Administrative Region ("SAR") of the People's Republic of China. To provide for a non-contentious transfer of sovereignty over Hong Kong, and to retain the social and economic system, rights, and freedoms the people of Hong Kong enjoyed as a British colony, China and the United Kingdom signed the 1984 United-Kingdom-People's Republic of China Joint Declaration ("Joint Declaration"). The Joint Declaration established the "one country, two systems" approach to Hong Kong. As discussed in Chapter 4.A.4., the Joint Declaration also provided that international agreements to which the People's Republic of China was not a party, but that did currently apply to Hong Kong, could remain implemented. Article 3(2) of the Joint Declaration provided, in relevant part, that the SAR would "enjoy a high degree of autonomy, except in foreign and defense affairs which are the responsibilities of the Central People's Government." However, Article 3(10) provided that the SAR, utilizing the name "Hong Kong, China," could on its own "maintain and develop economic and cultural relations and conclude relevant agreements with states, regions, and relevant international organizations."

On March 7, 1997, the United States and China concluded negotiations and initialed the text of the Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the People's Republic of China Regarding the Maintenance of the United States Consulate General in the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region and an Agreed Minute. The agreement contained no limitations on the size or existing operations of the Consulate General and guaranteed a broad range of privileges and immunities for U.S. officials and specific protections for U.S. nationals arrested or otherwise detained by Hong Kong authorities. The agreement was signed in Beijing on March 25 during a visit by Vice President Gore and entered into force on July 1, 1997. The text of the agreement is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. Further information on the Basic Law and the Joint Declaration and a discussion of U.S. interests is available in the United States-Hong Kong Policy Act Report, as of March 31, 1997, www.state.gov/www/regions/eap/970331_us-hk_pol_act_rpt.html.

Jeffrey A. Bader, Department of State, Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, testified on these issues before the House International Relations Committee, Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific, on February 13, 1997.

In less than 140 days, Hong Kong will revert to Chinese sovereignty. At midnight on June 30, more than a century and a half of British colonial rule will end and Hong Kong will become a Special Administrative Region of the People's Republic of China. This transfer of sovereignty is without precedent or historic parallel, and it has commanded increasing attention around the world. . . . It is an opportune time to review Hong Kong's progress toward reversion and its implications for the United States.

Hong Kong's intended status after reversion is spelled out in two important documents: the 1984 Sino-British Joint Declaration and the 1990 Basic Law promulgated by the People's Republic of China. Together, these documents are China's promise that, although sovereignty will change, Hong Kong's way of life will not.

The Joint Declaration provides for the transition of sovereignty from the United Kingdom to China. Unlike other areas of China, however, Hong Kong will retain a high degree of autonomy in all matters except foreign affairs and defense. The social and economic systems, lifestyle, and rights and freedoms enjoyed by the Hong Kong people in the post-July Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (HKSAR) will remain unchanged for at least fifty years. The Joint Declaration established the concept of "one country, two systems" for Hong Kong and is a treaty registered with the United Nations.

The Basic Law provides the fundamental governing framework for implementing the "one country, two systems" principle in Hong Kong consistent with China's commitments in the Joint Declaration. It says that the PRC socialist system and policies will not be extended to the territory. And the Basic Law reiterates the Joint Declaration promise to allow Hong Kong to exercise a high degree of autonomy and to exercise separate executive, legislative, and judicial power after 1997.

We believe Hong Kong's best interests would be served by faithful attention to the commitments in the Joint Declaration. In it, China has made an extraordinary series of pledges about Hong Kong's future. The Joint Declaration establishes a framework that can, if honored and effectively implemented, help assure that Hong Kong remains the vibrant and attractive place it is today. Among other things, the Joint Declaration provides that:

— Hong Kong will have independent courts, with ultimate judicial authority resting in a local Court of Final Appeal;
— Hong Kong residents, not non-Hong Kong PRC officials, will occupy all important government and civil service positions, including the Chief Executive;
— Hong Kong laws will apply;

— Hong Kong's finances will be independent of China, and no tax revenues will be collected for or sent to Beijing;
— Hong Kong will continue to maintain its own currency, the Hong Kong Dollar, which will be freely convertible;
— Hong Kong police will maintain public order;
— Hong Kong will be empowered to enter into international agreements in a wide range of areas; and — Hong Kong people will elect their legislature.

United States policy toward Hong Kong is therefore grounded in a determination to help preserve Hong Kong's prosperity and way of life. Let me review the basis of that policy. Like previous administrations, the Clinton Administration strongly supports the Joint Declaration. It provides a sound basis for a smooth transfer of sovereignty and a comprehensive and rational framework for Hong Kong's continued stability and prosperity. But, it is not only our policy that underscores support for the Joint Declaration. While recognizing that Hong Kong will become a part of China, the U.S.-Hong Kong Policy Act establishes domestic legal authority to treat Hong Kong as an entity distinct from the PRC after reversion. This accepts and reinforces the Joint Declaration concept of "one country, two systems."

U.S. interests—and those of Hong Kong itself—are best served by faithful implementation of the commitments made in the Joint Declaration. As I have stated, we are not parties to the agreement, and specific arrangements for Hong Kong's transition have been matters for the British, the Chinese, and the Hong Kong people to decide. But we do play a strong supportive role to ensure that our interests are protected.

An inter-agency memorandum of June 1997 described, among other things, the application of U.S. regulations and laws to Hong Kong after reversion, as excerpted below. See also Chapter 4.B.6.d. concerning treaty succession issues.

* * * *

In 1992 Congress enacted the US—Hong Kong Policy Act, 22 U.S.C. 55701, et seq. ("the HKPA"), which provides legislative authority to treat post-reversion Hong Kong as being a separate and distinct legal entity from the PRC in those areas in which Hong Kong will continue to exercise a "high degree of autonomy."

The HKPA expresses United States policy to further Hong Kong's autonomy by playing an active role in supporting Hong Kong's prosperity and status as an international financial center and by maintaining and expanding bilateral relations and agreements with Hong Kong in areas such as trade, investment, finance, aviation, shipping, communications, and tourism.

In addition, the HKPA provides in (§ 201(a), 22 U.S.C. § 5721(a)) that > the laws of the United States shall continue to apply with respect to Hong Kong, on and after July 1, 1997, in the same manner as the laws of the United States were applied with respect to Hong Kong before such date unless otherwise expressly provided by law or by Executive order under section 202.

Under § 202 (22 U.S.C. § 5722), the President may make a determination that Hong Kong is not sufficiently autonomous to justify treatment under a particular law of the United States, or any provision thereof, different from that accorded the People's Republic of China . . . (and) may issue an Executive order suspending the application of section 201(a) to such law or provision of law.

Thus, after July 1, existing U.S. statutes and regulations affecting Hong Kong will remain applicable as if there were no reversion to the PRC. If, on or after July 1, 1997, it emerges that Hong Kong is not sufficiently autonomous to justify treatment separate from the PRC under U.S. law, the President may issue an order suspending the application of relevant statutes or parts of statutes to Hong Kong.

5. Macau

The April 13, 1987, Joint Declaration of the Government of the People's Republic of China and the Government of the Republic of Portugal on the Question of Macau recorded China's resumption of the exercise of sovereignty over Macau on December 20, 1999. The Macau Special Administrative Region of the People's Republic of China would continue to enjoy a high degree of autonomy on all matters other than defense and foreign affairs. Similar to Hong Kong, Macau would retain its current lifestyle and legal, social, and economic systems until at least the year 2049, under the "one country, two systems" approach. The United States fully supported the resumption of Chinese sovereignty of Macau.

Paragraph 2 of the March 25, 1997, agreement between the United States and the PRC regarding the U.S. Consulate General in the Hong Kong SAR ("Agreement") discussed supra, provided:

> The Government of the People's Republic of China takes note of the consular function which the Consulate General of the United States in Hong Kong performs in Macau, and agrees to the continuation of this function after the Government of the People's Republic of China resumes the exercise of sovereignty over Macau with effect from December 20, 1999.

In a diplomatic note of September 27, 1999, from the U.S. Embassy in Beijing to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China, the United States referred to the Agreement and the agreed minute of March 7, 1997, and stated that it > wished to confirm that, on or after December 20, 1999, the Macau Special Administrative Region ("Macau") shall be an integral part of the consular district of the United States Consulate General in Hong Kong SAR, and that said Agreement, including the agreed Minute, shall govern the United States consular presence and services in Macau, and shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to Macau.

By reply note of October 1999, the PRC Ministry of Foreign Affairs concurred that as of December 20, 1999, "the American Consulate General in Hong Kong can execute the consular duty in Macao Special Administrative Region as of December 1999, when the Government of the People's Republic of China resumes sovereignty over Macao, and the relevant items of the Agreement apply to Macao SAR too."

The full texts of the diplomatic notes are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Immunities and Related Issues

A. SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY

Under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act ("FSIA"), 28 U.S.C. §§ 1330, 1602–1611, a state and its organs, agencies and instrumentalities are immune from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts unless one of the specified exemptions in the statute applies. The FSIA provides the sole basis for obtaining jurisdiction over a foreign sovereign in U.S. courts. Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428 (1989); Saudi Arabia v. Nelson, 507 U.S. 349 (1993). For a number of years before enactment of the FSIA in 1976, courts abided by "suggestions of immunity" from the U.S. Department of State. When the Department of State filed no suggestion, however, the courts made the determination. The FSIA was enacted "in order to free the Government from the case-by-case diplomatic pressures, to clarify the governing standards, and to 'assur[e] litigants that . . . decisions are made on purely legal grounds and under procedures that insure due process,' H.R. Rep. No. 94–1487, p. 7 (1976)." Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 488 (1983).

In the FSIA, Congress codified the "restrictive" theory of sovereign immunity, under which a state is entitled to immunity with respect to its sovereign or public acts, but not those that are private or commercial in character. The United States had previously adopted the restrictive theory in the so-called "Tate Letter" of 1952, reproduced at Dep't State Bull. No. 26 at 984–85 (1952). See Alfred Dunhill of London, Inc. v. Cuba, 425 U.S. 682, 711–15 (1976). Generally speaking, with regard to "commercial activities," a state engages in commercial activity when it exercises "only those powers that can also be exercised by private citizens" as distinct from "powers peculiar to sovereigns." Id. at 704. The test for making this distinction under the FSIA is the nature of the transaction in question—the outward form of the conduct that the foreign state performs or agrees to perform—as opposed to the intent behind it—the reason why the foreign state engages in the activity. See Republic of Argentina v. Weltover, Inc., 504 U.S. 607, 614 (1992) ("the commercial character of an act is to be determined by reference to its 'nature' rather than its 'purpose' ").

From the beginning the FSIA has provided certain other exceptions to immunity, such as by waiver or agreement to arbitrate. Over time, amendments to the FSIA incorporated additional exceptions. In 1996 an exception to immunity from suit in U.S. courts for certain acts of state-sponsored terrorism was enacted in the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–132, 110 Stat. 1214 (1996) ("AEDPA" or "Antiterrorism Act"). The antiterrorism exception, codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(7), and related developments are discussed in section A.3.d. below.

The various statutory exceptions set forth at §§ 1605(a)(1) to (7) have been subject to extensive judicial interpretation. Accordingly, much of U.S. practice in the field of sovereign immunity is developed by U.S. courts in litigation to which the U.S. Government is not a party and in which it does not otherwise participate. The following items represent only a selection of the relevant decisional material from the 1990s.

1. Scope: Definition of Foreign State

The following cases involve the interpretation of the definition of "state" under §§ 1603(a) and (b) of the FSIA, which provide:

> (a) A "foreign state," except as used in section 1608 of this title, includes a political subdivision of a foreign state or an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state as defined in subsection (b).

(b) An "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state" means any entity—

(1) which is a separate legal person, corporate or otherwise, and

(2) which is an organ of a foreign state or political subdivision thereof, or a majority of whose shares or other ownership interest is owned by a foreign state or political subdivision thereof, and

(3) which is neither a citizen of a State of the United States as defined in section 1332(c) and (d) of this title nor created under the laws of any third country.

(1) Status of PLO

Klinghoffer v. S.N.C. Achille Lauro Ed Al Tri-Gestione Motonave Achille Lauro In Amministrazione Straordinaria., 937 F.2d 44 (2d Cir. 1991), arose out of the 1985 highjacking of an Italian passenger liner, the Achille Lauro, off the Egyptian coast and the murder of a U.S. citizen passenger, Leon Klinghoffer, by terrorists affiliated with the Palestine Liberation Organization ("PLO"). On appeal from the district court's denial of the PLO's motion to dismiss, the court ruled that, lacking a defined territory or permanent population as well as the capacity to enter into genuine formal relations with other nations, the PLO was not a "state" for purposes of immunity under the FSIA, nor was it immune from suit in the United States as a result of its status as a permanent observer at the United Nations. Moreover, the fact that the United States had not extended formal diplomatic recognition to the PLO did not deprive it of capacity to be sued. The court of appeals stated:

> While unrecognized regimes are generally precluded from appearing as plaintiffs in an official capacity without the > Executive Branch's consent, see Banco Nacional v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 388, 410–11, 84 S.Ct. 923, 931, 11 L.Ed.2d 804 (1964); National Petrochemical Co [of Iran v. M/T Stolt, 860 F.2d 551 at 554–55 (2d Cir. 1988)], there is no bar to suit where an unrecognized regime is brought into court as a defendant. Cf. United States v. Lumumba, 741 F.2d 12, 15 (2d Cir. 1984) (contempt proceeding against attorney claiming to be representative of the "Republic of New Afrika," an unrecognized nation), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 855, 107 S.Ct. 192, 93 L.Ed.2d 125 (1986).

(2) Status of Bolivian Air Force

Transaero, Inc. v. La Fuerza Aerea Boliviana, 30 F.3d 148 (D.C. Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 513 U.S. 1150 (1995), involved the alleged failure of the Bolivian Air Force to pay Transaero, a New York corporation and supplier of aircraft parts, the interest it was due under a credit agreement entered into in May of 1981. After obtaining a default judgment in the Eastern District of New York, see 24 F.3d 457 (2d Cir. 1994), Transaero registered the judgment in the District Court of the District of Columbia for enforcement purposes. The Bolivian Air Force moved for summary judgment, claiming that the district court in New York lacked personal jurisdiction because service of process had not complied with § 1608(a) of the FSIA, applicable to service on a "foreign state or political subdivision of a foreign state." The lower court found that the air force was an "agency or instrumentality" of Bolivia and that Transaero's method of service therefore had been adequate under § 1608(b) of the act.

On appeal to the D.C. Circuit, the U.S. Government submitted an amicus curiae brief arguing that the armed forces of a sovereign nation, whose core function is the defense of that nation, are presumptively part of the state itself under the FSIA, although the presumption can be rebutted with a strong showing of separateness. The U.S. brief contended that the district court should have looked to the core function of the air force in trying to determine the entity's relation to the Bolivian state. Moreover, the government argued, the district court should have focused its inquiry on such factors as where the liability for a judgment against the Bolivian Air Force would lie, and whether the Bolivian Air Force operated with assets separate from those of the central state. The full text of the U.S. brief is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The court of appeals agreed, holding that the lower court lacked personal jurisdiction over the Bolivian Air Force under the FSIA because service had not complied with the more stringent requirements of 28 U.S.C. § 1608(a), 30 F.3d at 154, as explained in the excerpt below (footnotes omitted).

* * * *

The question, then, is whether the core functions of the armed forces of a foreign sovereign are governmental or commercial. We hold that armed forces are as a rule so closely bound up with the structure of the state that they must in all cases be considered as the "foreign state" itself, rather than a separate "agency or instrumentality" of the state. The "powers to declare and wage war" are among the "necessary concomitants" of sovereignty. United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 318, 81 L.Ed. 255, 57 S.Ct. 216 (1936). Since the passage of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, the two federal cases to squarely consider the question have held that a foreign military force is a "foreign state" rather than an "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state." See Marlowe v. Argentine Naval Comm'n, 604 F.Supp. 703, 707 (D.D.C. 1985); Unidyne, 590 F.Supp. at 400. Apart from authority it is hard to see what would count as the "foreign state" if its armed forces do not. Any government of reasonable complexity must act through men organized into offices and departments. If a separate name and some power to conduct its own affairs suffices to make a foreign department an "agency" rather than a part of the state itself, the structure of section 1608 will list too far to one side. We hold that the armed forces of a foreign sovereign are the "foreign state" and must be served under section 1608(a).

* * * *

b. Agencies and instrumentralities

In Gates v. Victor Fine Foods, 54 F.3d 1457 (9th Cir. 1995), the appellate court held that the Alberta Pork Producers Development Corporation, established by legislation of the Province of Alberta, Canada, for purposes of promoting the pork industry, was an "agency or instrumentality" of a foreign government for purposes of the FSIA and was therefore entitled to immunity. However, a pork processing plant headquartered in British Columbia and wholly owned by the Alberta Pork Producers Development Corporation was not entitled to immunity under the FSIA because the plant was not an "agency or instrumentality" of a foreign government nor was its owner "a foreign state or political subdivision thereof." To be an "agency or instrumentality" for purposes of the FSIA, the court said, the entity in question must either be an "organ of a foreign state" or have a majority of its shares owned by "a foreign state or political subdivision thereof." The pork processing plant in Gates was an ordinary plant that could not be considered an "organ" of the Province of Alberta and it was owned by the Alberta Pork Producers Development Corporation, which is an agency or instrumentality of a foreign government but not "a foreign state or political subdivision thereof."

c. Government officials

(1) El-Fadl v. Central Bank of Jordan

El-Fadl v. Central Bank of Jordan, 75 F.3d 668 (D.C. Cir. 1996) involved the filing of a wrongful termination suit against the Central Bank of Jordan by the Jordan-based former regional manager of the Central Bank's District of Columbia subsidiary and accusations against the Central Bank and its Governor and Deputy Governor of malicious prosecution and false arrest. The district court dismissed the complaint against the Central Bank and its Governor and Deputy Governor on grounds of immunity under the FSIA. The court of appeals agreed, finding inter alia that an individual can qualify as an "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state" for purposes of immunity under the FSIA, citing Chuidian v. Philippine National Bank, 912 F.2d 1095 (9th Cir. 1990) (see Digest 1989–1990 at 302–11). The Court found that the Governor and Deputy Governor had fired the plaintiff while discharging their official responsibilities on behalf of the Central Bank, and that each of them enjoyed sovereign immunity as an "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state," precluding suit against them for firing an employee of the Central Bank's subsidiary.

(2) Byrd v. Corporacion Forestal y Industrial de Olancho SA

In Byrd v. Corporacion Forestal y Industrial de Olancho SA, 182 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1999), discussed in A.3.c.(4) below, the Fifth Circuit upheld immunity under the FSIA of two named defendants despite allegations that they acted beyond their official capacity. The court stated:

> Appellees argue that Pacheco and Figueroa acted beyond their official capacity, and therefore fall outside the shelter of the FSIA. Appellees claim that Figueroa and Pacheco's conduct demonstrates that they acted out of personal gain and that they subverted their official positions to advance their personal objectives. . . . These allegations, however, are not legally sufficient to strip FSIA immunity from Pacheco and Figueroa. See Chuidian, 912 F.2d at 1106–1107. In Chuidian, the Ninth Circuit rejected the argument that personal motives convert an official action into an individual one. The court observed that "the most [plaintiff] Chuidian can allege is that [defendant] Danza experienced a convergence between his personal interest and his official duty and authority." Id. at 1107. "Such a circumstance does not serve to make his action any less an action of his sovereign." Id.

2. No Exception for Jus Cogens Violations

a. Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina

A violation of jus cogens does not in itself confer jurisdiction under the FSIA. In Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina, 965 F.2d 699 (9th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 507 U.S. 1017 (1993), an Argentine family, including a U.S. citizen daughter, sued the Republic of Argentina and one of its provinces based on alleged torture of an Argentine citizen and expropriation of property by military officials. The action was dismissed on grounds of immunity under the FSIA, and plaintiffs appealed. The appellate court found that the prohibition against official torture had attained the status of jus cogens but held that an alleged violation of a jus cogens norm did not in itself confer jurisdiction over a foreign state under the FSIA. The court reversed the dismissal of the claims on other grounds; see, e.g., 3.a. below. Excerpts below from the court's decision explain the court's analysis and conclusions relating to plaintiff's theory based on jus cogens. See also 3.a.(1) and e.(1), below.

. . . [W]e conclude that . . . [u]nder international law, any state that engages in official torture violates jus cogens.

The question in the present case is what flows from the Sidermans' allegation that Argentina tortured Jose Siderman and thereby violated a jus cogens norm. . . .

The Sidermans posit that because sovereign immunity derives from international law, jus cogens supersedes it. "Jus cogens norms represent the fundamental duties incident to international life. They are an essential component of the modern law definition of sovereignty." [Belsky, Merva & Roht-Arriaza, Implied Waiver Under the FSIA: A Proposed Exception to Immunity for Violations of Peremptory Norms of International Law, 77 Calif. L. Rev. 365, 392 (1989).] International law does not recognize an act that violates jus cogens as a sovereign act. A state's violation of the jus cogens norm prohibiting official torture therefore would not be entitled to the immunity afforded by international law.

Unfortunately, we do not write on a clean slate. We deal not only with customary international law, but with an affirmative Act of Congress, the FSIA. . . . [W]e conclude that if violations of jus cogens committed outside the United States are to be exceptions to immunity, Congress must make them so. The fact that there has been a violation of jus cogens does not confer jurisdiction under the FSIA.

* * * *

b. Jus cogens violations not implied waivers

Other cases attempted to bring jus cogens violations under the implied waiver exception to sovereign immunity in § 1605 (a)(1) of the FSIA.

(1) Princz v. Federal Republic of Germany

In 1993 Hugo Princz, a Holocaust survivor, sued the Federal Republic of Germany, seeking to recover money damages for injuries he suffered and for slave labor he performed while a prisoner in Nazi concentration camps. The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held that it had subject matter jurisdiction over Princz's claim. Princz v. Fed. Republic of Germany, 813 F.Supp. 22 (D.D.C. 1992). Germany appealed and the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit reversed this holding, dismissing the case. 26 F.3d 1166 (D.C. Cir. 1994). The appellate court examined, but did not decide, whether the FSIA applied retroactively to the events occurring in 1942–1945 in this case; see 4.a., below. The court examined plaintiff's arguments that the case fell within several of the FSIA exceptions, if the act did apply retroactively, but concluded that "the terrible events giving rise to this case . . . come[ ] within no exception in the Act." The court's analysis in concluding that the jus cogens violations in this case did not bring the case under the implied waiver exception is excerpted below. See also Chapter 8.A.1.c. concerning the 1995 German agreement to compensate Princz and comparable U.S. nationals who were victims of Nazi persecution.

. . . [I]t is doubtful that any state has ever violated jus cogens norms on a scale rivaling that of the Third Reich. . . .

The amici argue that interpreting the FSIA to imply a waiver where a violation of jus cogens norms has occurred "would reconcile the FSIA with accepted principles of international law." Citing Adam Belsky, Implied Waiver Under the FSIA: A Proposed Exception to Immunity for Violations of Peremptory Norms of International Law, 77 Cal. L. Rev. 365 (1989). Although no reported decision considers the amici's specific argument that a violation of jus cogens norms forfeits immunity under the implied waiver provision of the FSIA, the Ninth Circuit has stated broadly that "the fact that there has been a violation of jus cogens does not confer jurisdiction under the FSIA." Siderman de Blake, 965 F.2d at 719.

Moreover, the amici's jus cogens theory of implied waiver is incompatible with the intentionality requirement implicit in § 1605(a)(1). See Foremost-McKesson, Inc. v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 284 U.S. App. D.C. 333, 905 F.2d 438, 444 (D.C. Cir. 1990), quoting Frolova v. Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, 761 F.2d 370, 377 (7th Cir. 1985) (courts "rarely find that a nation has waived its sovereign immunity . . . 'without strong evidence that this is what the foreign state intended' "); accord Drexel Burnham Lambert v. Committee of Receivers, 12 F.3d 317, 326 (2d Cir. 1993); Joseph v. Office of the Consulate General, 830 F.2d 1018, 1022 (9th Cir. 1987); Zercinek v. Petroleos Mexicanos, 614 F.Supp. 407, 411 (S.D. Tex. 1985), aff'd, 826 F.2d 415 (5th Cir. 1987). That requirement is also reflected in the examples of implied waiver set forth in the legislative history of § 1605(a)(1), all of which arise either from the foreign state's agreement (to arbitration or to a particular choice of law) or from its filing a responsive pleading without raising the defense of sovereign immunity. See H.R. Rep. 1487, 94th Cong. 2d Sess., 18 (1976); Sen. Rep. 1310, 94th Cong. 2d Sess., 18 (1976). And as the Seventh Circuit has observed, "since the FSIA became law, courts have been reluctant to stray beyond these examples when considering claims that a nation has implicitly waived its defense of sovereign immunity." Frolova, 761 F.2d at 377.

In sum, an implied waiver depends upon the foreign government's having at some point indicated its amenability to suit. Mr. Princz does not maintain, however, that either the present government of Germany or the predecessor government of the Third Reich actually indicated, even implicitly, a willingness to waive immunity for actions arising out of the Nazi atrocities. We have no warrant, therefore, for holding that the violation of jus cogens norms by the Third Reich constitutes an implied waiver of sovereign immunity under the FSIA.[1] [1] Our dissenting colleague Judge Wald suggests, in effect, that because the Congress has not expressly excluded suits for the violation of jus cogens norms from the scope of § 1605(a)(1), international law requires that we "construe the [FSIA] to encompass an implied waiver exception" for such suits, thus providing jurisdiction over Mr. Princz's claims. Dis. Op. at 17. While it is true that "international law is a part of our law," Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. at 700, it is also our law that a federal court is not competent to hear a claim arising under international law absent a statute granting such jurisdiction. Judge Wald finds that grant through a creative, not to say strained, reading of the FSIA against the background of international law itself.

We think that something more nearly express is wanted before we impute to the Congress an intention that the federal courts assume jurisdiction over the countless human rights cases that might well be brought by the victims of all the ruthless military juntas, presidents-for-life, and murderous dictators of the world, from Idi Amin to Mao Zedong. Such an expansive reading of § 1605(a)(1) would likely place an enormous strain not only upon our courts

(2) Smith v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

Smith v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 101 F.3d 239 (2nd Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 520 U.S. 1204 (1997), involved three lawsuits filed against the Government of Libya alleging that it had been responsible for the bombing destruction of Pan American Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland. The district court dismissed the suits for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, on the basis of the FSIA. On appeal, plaintiffs argued that by violating international jus cogens norms, Libya had impliedly waived its sovereign immunity. The appellate court affirmed the dismissals, as excerpted below (footnotes omitted). The court also noted that two other courts of appeal had already rejected the contention that a violation of a jus cogens standard constitutes an implied waiver within the meaning of the FSIA, citing to Princz v. Federal Republic of Germany and Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina, supra. See also 3.a.(2), b.(1) and f.(1) below.

The contention that a foreign state should be deemed to have forfeited its sovereign immunity whenever it engages in conduct that violates fundamental humanitarian standards is an appealing one. . . . The argument is premised on the idea that because observance of jus cogens is so universally recognized as vital to the functioning of a community of nations, every nation impliedly waives its traditional sovereign immunity for violations of such but, more to the immediate point, upon our country's diplomatic relations with any number of foreign nations. In many if not most cases the outlaw regime would no longer even be in power and our Government could have normal relations with the government of the day—unless disrupted by our courts, that is.

Like Judge Wald, we recognize that this suit may represent Mr. Princz's last hope of reparation. Still, we cannot responsibly make the inferential leap that would be required in order to provide him with the federal forum he seeks.

The issue we face, however, is not whether an implied waiver derived from a nation's existence is a good idea, but whether an implied waiver of that sort is what Congress contemplated by its use of the phrase "waiver . . . by implication" in section 1605(a)(1) of the FSIA. We have no doubt that Congress has the authority either to maintain sovereign immunity of foreign states as a defense to all violations of jus cogens if it prefers to do so or to remove such immunity if that is its preference, and we have no doubt that Congress may choose to remove the defense of sovereign immunity selectively for particular violations of jus cogens, as it has recently done in the 1996 amendment of the FSIA. . . .

Whether or not an implied waiver might, in some circumstances, arise from a foreign state's actions not intimately related to litigation, we conclude that Congress's concept of an implied waiver, as used in the FSIA, cannot be extended so far as to include a state's existence in the community of nations—a status that arguably should carry with it an expectation of amenability to suit in a foreign court for violations of fundamental norms of international law.

* * * *

[W]hen Congress recently amended the FSIA to remove the sovereign immunity of foreign states as a defense to acts of international terrorism, it enacted a carefully crafted provision that abolishes the defense only in precisely defined circumstances. . . .

Our reluctance to construe the concept of implied waiver to include all violations of jus cogens is . . . based on our understanding of what the 94th Congress meant when it illustrated the inexact phrase "waiver . . . by implication" with examples drawn entirely from the context of conduct related to the litigation process. We recognize that the examples given in the House Report are not necessarily the only circumstances in which an implied waiver might be found. . . . Nevertheless, they indicate the principal context that Congress had in mind . . . and, at a minimum, they preclude a sweeping implied waiver for all violations of jus cogens.

3. Exceptions to Immunity

a. Existing treaty provisions

Section 1604 of the FSIA provides that a state is immune "subject to existing international agreements to which the United States is a party at the time of enactment of this Act."

(1) Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina

In Siderman, 965 F.2d 699, A.2.a. supra, the Ninth Circuit held that allegations of acts of official torture in violation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights ("UDHR") or the UN Charter do not suffice to bring claims within the "existing treaty provisions" exception. The court noted that in Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428 (1989), the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the argument that an exception to immunity could be based on the Geneva Convention on the High Seas and the Pan American Maritime Neutrality Convention. The Siderman court noted that although those conventions "were quite specific about the rights to compensation of merchant ships in time of war . . . the [Amerada Hess] Court was unwilling to hold that the treaties expressly conflicted with the immunity created by the FSIA, and thus found section 1604 inapplicable."

As to the UN Charter, the Siderman court concluded: "We cannot, consistently with Amerada Hess, accept the . . . argument that the U.N. Charter expressly conflicts with the FSIA when the Charter does not even discuss compensation or individual remedies." The court also found "no indication in the FSIA or its legislative history that Congress intended the term 'international agreements' to include non-binding resolutions of the General Assembly of the United Nations," such as the UDHR. 956 F.2d at 719–20.

(2) Smith v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

In Smith v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 101 F.3d 239 (2nd Cir. 1996), A.2.b.(2) supra, the court rejected a different argument based on the UN Charter, as excerpted below.

Appellants do not assert that any provision of the UN Charter subjects Libya to suit in the United States. Instead, they reason that Article 25 of the Charter binds all member nations to abide by decisions of the Security Council taken under Chapter VII of the Charter and contend that Security Council Resolution 748, adopted on March 31, 1992, commits Libya to pay compensation to the victims of Pan Am Flight 103.

* * * *

We reject the contention for the threshold reason that the FSIA's displacement of immunity, applicable to international agreements in effect at the time the FSIA was adopted, does not contemplate a dynamic expansion whereby FSIA immunity can be removed by action of the UN taken after the FSIA was enacted. Such a contention would encounter a substantial constitutional issue as to whether Congress could delegate to an international organization the authority to regulate the jurisdiction of United States courts. It would take an explicit indication of Congressional intent before we would construe an act of Congress to have such an effect. . . . There is no such indication in section 1604.

* * * *

b. Implied waiver

The FSIA allows a foreign state to waive its immunity either "explicitly or by implication." 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(1). As discussed in A.2.b. supra, courts have held that violations of jus cogens norms do not constitute implied waivers under the FSIA. The Second Circuit noted in Smith v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya that the examples in the legislative history of the implied waiver provision were "drawn entirely from the context of conduct related to the litigation process."

(1) Smith v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

Plaintiffs in Smith, b.(2) supra, had also argued that Libya impliedly waived its immunity by reason of a paragraph in a letter from the Secretary of the Libyan government's "People's Committee for Foreign Liaison and International Cooperation" to the Secretary General of the United Nations guaranteeing payment of any judgment against two Libyan suspects in the bombing of Pan Am 103. The court rejected this theory of implied waiver, finding that "[a] generalized undertaking to pay the debt of a national . . . does not imply that the guaranteeing state agrees to be sued on such an undertaking in a United States court." Smith, 101 F.3d at 246.

(2) Cabiri v. Government of the Republic of Ghana

In Cabiri v. Government of the Republic of Ghana, 165 F.3d 193 (2nd Cir. 1999), cert. denied, 527 U.S. 1022 (1999), the plaintiff, who served as Ghana's trade representative to the United States, enjoyed the use of a house in Westbury, New York pursuant to his employment contract. In 1986 Ghana summoned the plaintiff home, where he was allegedly detained and tortured, and undertook to discharge him from his post. When Ghana subsequently sued in state court to evict the plaintiff's family from the Westbury house, he asserted counterclaims for breach of contract, abuse of trust, fraudulent misrepresentation, false imprisonment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff's wife also asserted a counterclaim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. After the parties settled the eviction proceeding, the Cabiris repleaded their counterclaims in an action against Ghana in federal court. On appeal from the district court's dismissal of the claims, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals held that the counterclaim exception to the FSIA in § 1607 (providing an exception to immunity for counterclaims "arising out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the claim of the foreign state") applied to the breach of contract claim, insofar as such claim arose out of same transactions as the state eviction action brought by Ghana. The court held that Ghana had not impliedly waived its sovereign immunity to the other claims, however, by bringing the eviction action after Ghanaian authorities had released the plaintiff. In so holding it characterized the implied waiver theory in Siderman as "new and dubious" and stated: "We agree with the district court that the eviction action lacks a direct connection to the Cabiris' claims in this lawsuit. . . . Even assuming that Siderman were sound and persuasive, the opinion itself disclaims the broader reach that the Cabiris claim for it." (fn. omitted) 165 F.3d at 202.

See also Saudi Arabian Airlines Corp. v. Tamimi, 176 F.3d 274 (4th Cir. 1999). The court found that Saudi Arabian Airlines Corporation, wholly owned by the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, qualified as a "foreign state" under the FSIA and had not impliedly waived its sovereign immunity to a garnishment action by informing ex-wife that an employee had irrevocably authorized and directed airline to deduct child support payments from his salary in the future.

c. Commercial activities

Section 1605(a)(2) of the FSIA provides that a foreign state is not immune from suit in any case "in which the action is based upon a commercial activity carried on in the United States by the foreign state; or upon an act performed in the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere; or upon an act outside the territory of the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere and that act causes a direct effect in the United States." Two cases before the U.S. Supreme Court during the 1990s and a few of the many lower court cases during the period that considered whether alleged activities are "commercial" within the meaning of the FSIA are discussed below.

(1) Weltover, Inc. v. Republic of Argentina

In Weltover, Inc. v. Republic of Argentina, 753 F.Supp. 1201 (S.D.N.Y. 1991), aff'd, 941 F.2d 145 (2d Cir. 1991), foreign creditors brought an action in federal court in New York against the Republic of Argentina and its central bank, Banco Central de la Argentina, alleging that defendants had breached their obligations arising out of the Argentine government's issuance of certain bonds payable in U.S. dollars ("Bonods"). The Bonods, valued at approximately $1.3 billion, provided for payment of principal and interest in New York, London, Frankfurt, or Zurich in U.S. dollars, with interest based on the London Interbank Rate for Eurodollar deposits. The Central Bank became unable to meet its payment obligations and attempted to reschedule payments, but the Bonod holders refused to accept the rescheduling and brought an action to compel defendants to honor their contractual obligations. Argentina moved to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, but that motion was denied by the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, and defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed the lower court's decision, holding that the issuance of the bonds as a public debt constituted "commercial activity" within the FSIA's exception in § 1605(a)(2) and the subsequent nonpayment of that debt was therefore a "commercial activity," as well. "Where a sovereign enters the marketplace as a commercial actor, a subsequent breach of the commercial contract retains that commercial nature," 941 F.2d at 151. The appellate court also held that the nonpayment of debt payable in the United States met the statutory requirement of § 1605(a)(2) that the acts in question must cause a "direct effect in the United States."

Defendants sought Supreme Court review of the court of appeals decision. In March 1992 the U.S. Government filed a brief as amicus curiae in support of the plaintiffs, contending that the court of appeals had in fact correctly interpreted the FSIA. The Supreme Court agreed, 504 U.S. 607 (1992).

Excerpts from the Court's opinion follow (footnotes omitted).

* * * *

Respondents and their amicus, the United States, contend that Argentina's issuance of, and continued liability under, the Bonods constitute a "commercial activity" and that the extension of the payment schedules was taken "in connection with" that activity. The latter point is obvious enough, and Argentina does not contest it; the key question is whether the activity is "commercial" under the FSIA.

The FSIA defines "commercial activity" to mean:

> "[E]ither a regular course of commercial conduct or a particular commercial transaction or act. The commercial character of an activity shall be determined by reference to the nature of the course of conduct or particular transaction or act, rather than by reference to its purpose." 28 U.S.C. § 1603(d).

This definition, however, leaves the critical term "commercial" largely undefined: The first sentence simply establishes that the commercial nature of an activity does not depend upon whether it is a single act or a regular course of conduct, and the second sentence merely specifies what element of the conduct determines commerciality (i.e., nature rather than purpose), but still without saying what "commercial" means. Fortunately, however, the FSIA was not written on a clean slate. As we have noted, see Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 486–489 (1983), the Act (and the commercial exception in particular) largely codifies the so called "restrictive" theory of foreign sovereign immunity first endorsed by the State Department in 1952. The meaning of "commercial" is the meaning generally attached to that term under the restrictive theory at the time the statute was enacted. See McDermott Int'l, Inc. v. Wilander, 498 U.S. 337, 342 (1991) ("[W]e assume that when a statute uses [a term of art], Congress intended it to have its established meaning"); NLRB v. Amax Coal Co., 453 U.S. 322, 329 (1981); Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 263 (1952).

This Court did not have occasion to discuss the scope or validity of the restrictive theory of sovereign immunity until our 1976 decision in Alfred Dunhill of London, Inc. v. Republic of Cuba, 425 U.S. 682. Although the Court there was evenly divided on the question whether the "commercial" exception that applied in the foreign sovereign immunity context also limited the availability of an act of state defense, compare id., at 695–706 (plurality) with id., at 725–730 (Marshall, J., dissenting), there was little disagreement over the general scope of the exception. The plurality noted that, after the State Department endorsed the restrictive theory of foreign sovereign immunity in 1952, the lower courts consistently held that foreign sovereigns were not immune from the jurisdiction of American courts in cases "arising out of purely commercial transactions," id., at 703, citing, inter alia, Victory Transport, Inc. v. Comisaria General, 336 F.2d 354 (2nd Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 381 U.S. 934 (1965), and Petrol Shipping Corp. v. Kingdom of Greece, 360 F.2d 103 (2nd Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 931 (1966). The plurality further recognized that the distinction between state sovereign acts, on the one hand, and state commercial and private acts, on the other, was not entirely novel to American law. See 425 U.S., at 695–696, citing, inter alia, Parden v. Terminal R. Co., 377 U.S. 184, 189–190 (1964) (Eleventh Amendment immunity); Bank of the United States v. Planters' Bank of Georgia, 9 Wheat. 904, 907–908 (1824) (same); New York v. United States, 326 U.S. 572, 579 (1946) (opinion of Frankfurter, J.) (tax immunity of States); and South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 461–463 (1905) (same). The plurality stated that the restrictive theory of foreign sovereign immunity would not bar a suit based upon a foreign state's participation in the marketplace in the manner of a private citizen or corporation. 425 U.S., at 698–705. A foreign state engaging in "commercial" activities "do[es] not exercise powers peculiar to sovereigns"; rather, it "exercise[s] only those powers that can also be exercised by private citizens." Id., at 704. The dissenters did not disagree with this general description, see id., at 725. Given that the FSIA was enacted less than six months after our decision in Alfred Dunhill was announced, we think the plurality's contemporaneous description of the then prevailing restrictive theory of sovereign immunity is of significant assistance in construing the scope of the Act.

In accord with that description, we conclude that when a foreign government acts, not as regulator of a market, but in the manner of a private player within it, the foreign sovereign's actions are "commercial" within the meaning of the FSIA. Moreover, because the Act provides that the commercial character of an act is to be determined by reference to its "nature" rather than its "purpose," 28 U.S.C. § 1603(d), the question is not whether the foreign government is acting with a profit motive or instead with the aim of fulfilling uniquely sovereign objectives. Rather, the issue is whether the particular actions that the foreign state performs (whatever the motive behind them) are the type of actions by which a private party engages in "trade and traffic or commerce," Black's Law Dictionary 270 (6th ed. 1990). See, e.g., Rush Presbyterian St. Luke's Medical Center v. Hellenic Republic, 877 F.2d 574, 578 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 937 (1989). Thus, a foreign government's issuance of regulations limiting foreign currency exchange is a sovereign activity, because such authoritative control of commerce cannot be exercised by a private party; whereas a contract to buy army boots or even bullets is a "commercial" activity, because private companies can similarly use sales contracts to acquire goods, see, e.g., Stato di Rumania v. Trutta, [1926] Foro It. I 584, 585–586, 589 (Corte di Cass. del Regno, Italy), translated and reprinted in part in 26 Am. J. Int'l L. 626–629 (Supp. 1932).

The commercial character of the Bonods is confirmed by the fact that they are in almost all respects garden variety debt instruments: they may be held by private parties; they are negotiable and may be traded on the international market (except in Argentina); and they promise a future stream of cash income. We recognize that, prior to the enactment of the FSIA, there was authority suggesting that the issuance of public debt instruments did not constitute a commercial activity. Victory Transport, 336 F.2d, at 360 (dicta). There is, however, nothing distinctive about the state's assumption of debt (other than perhaps its purpose) that would cause it always to be classified as jure imperii, and in this regard it is significant that Victory Transport expressed confusion as to whether the "nature" or the "purpose" of a transaction was controlling in determining commerciality, id., at 359–360. Because the FSIA has now clearly established that the "nature" governs, we perceive no basis for concluding that the issuance of debt should be treated as categorically different from other activities of foreign states.

Argentina contends that, although the FSIA bars consideration of "purpose," a court must nonetheless fully consider the context of a transaction in order to determine whether it is "commercial." Accordingly, Argentina claims that the Court of Appeals erred by defining the relevant conduct in what Argentina considers an overly generalized, a contextual manner and by essentially adopting a per se rule that all "issuance of debt instruments" is "commercial." See 941 F.2d, at 151 (" '[I]t is self evident that issuing public debt is a commercial activity within the meaning of [the FSIA]' "), quoting Shapiro v. Republic of Bolivia, 930 F.2d 1013, 1018 (2nd Cir. 1991). We have no occasion to consider such a per se rule, because it seems to us that even in full context, there is nothing about the issuance of these Bonods (except perhaps its purpose) that is not analogous to a private commercial transaction.

Argentina points to the fact that the transactions in which the Bonods were issued did not have the ordinary commercial consequence of raising capital or financing acquisitions. Assuming for the sake of argument that this is not an example of judging the commerciality of a transaction by its purpose, the ready answer is that private parties regularly issue bonds, not just to raise capital or to finance purchases, but also to refinance debt. That is what Argentina did here: by virtue of the earlier FEIC contracts, Argentina was already obligated to supply the U.S. dollars needed to retire the FEIC insured debts; the Bonods simply allowed Argentina to restructure its existing obligations. Argentina further asserts (without proof or even elaboration) that it "received consideration [for the Bonods] in no way commensurate with [their] value," Brief for Petitioners 22. Assuming that to be true, it makes no difference. Engaging in a commercial act does not require the receipt of fair value, or even compliance with the common law requirements of consideration.

Argentina argues that the Bonods differ from ordinary debt instruments in that they "were created by the Argentine Government to fulfill its obligations under a foreign exchange program designed to address a domestic credit crisis, and as a component of a program designed to control that nation's critical shortage of foreign exchange." Id., at 23–24. In this regard, Argentina relies heavily on De Sanchez v. Banco Central de Nicaragua, 770 F.2d 1385 (5th Cir. 1985), in which the Fifth Circuit took the view that "[o]ften, the essence of an act is defined by its purpose"; that unless "we can inquire into the purposes of such acts, we cannot determine their nature"; and that, in light of its purpose to control its reserves of foreign currency, Nicaragua's refusal to honor a check it had issued to cover a private bank debt was a sovereign act entitled to immunity. Id., at 1393. Indeed, Argentina asserts that the line between "nature" and "purpose" rests upon a "formalistic distinction [that] simply is neither useful nor warranted." Reply Brief for Petitioners 8. We think this line of argument is squarely foreclosed by the language of the FSIA. However difficult it may be in some cases to separate "purpose" (i.e., the reason why the foreign state engages in the activity) from "nature" (i.e., the outward form of the conduct that the foreign state performs or agrees to perform), see De Sanchez, supra, at 1393, the statute unmistakably commands that to be done. 28 U.S.C. § 1603(d). We agree with the Court of Appeals, see 941 F.2d, at 151, that it is irrelevant why Argentina participated in the bond market in the manner of a private actor; it matters only that it did so. We conclude that Argentina's issuance of the Bonods was a "commercial activity" under the FSIA.

The remaining question is whether Argentina's unilateral rescheduling of the Bonods had a "direct effect" in the United States, 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(2). In addressing this issue, the Court of Appeals rejected the suggestion in the legislative history of the FSIA that an effect is not "direct" unless it is both "substantial" and "foreseeable." 941 F.2d, at 152; contra, America West Airlines, Inc. v. GPA Group, Ltd., 877 F.2d 793, 798–800 (9th Cir. 1989); Zernicek v. Brown & Root, Inc., 826 F.2d 415, 417–419 (5th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1043 (1988); Maritime Int'l Nominees Establishment v. Republic of Guinea, 224 U.S. App. D.C. 119, 135–136, 693 F.2d 1094, 1110–1111 (1982), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 815 (1983); Ohntrup v. Firearms Center Inc., 516 F.Supp. 1281, 1286 (E.D. Pa. 1981), aff'd, 760 F.2d 259 (3rd Cir. 1985). That suggestion is found in the House Report, which states that conduct covered by the third clause of § 1605(a)(2) would be subject to the jurisdiction of American courts "consistent with principles set forth in section 18, Restatement of the Law, Second, Foreign Relations Law of the United States (1965)." H.R. Rep. No. 94–1487, p. 19 (1976). Section 18 states that American laws are not given extraterritorial application except with respect to conduct that has, as a "direct and foreseeable result," a "substantial" effect within the United States. Since this obviously deals with jurisdiction to legislate rather than jurisdiction to adjudicate, this passage of the House Report has been charitably described as "a bit of a non sequitur," Texas Trading & Milling Corp. v. Federal Republic of Nigeria, 647 F.2d 300, 311 (CA2 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1148 (1982). Of course the generally applicable principle de minimis non curat lex ensures that jurisdiction may not be predicated on purely trivial effects in the United States. But we reject the suggestion that § 1605(a)(2) contains any unexpressed requirement of "substantiality" or "foreseeability." As the Court of Appeals recognized, an effect is "direct" if it follows "as an immediate consequence of the defendant's . . . activity," 941 F.2d at 152.

The Court of Appeals concluded that the rescheduling of the maturity dates obviously had a "direct effect" on respondents. It further concluded that that effect was sufficiently "in the United States" for purposes of the FSIA, in part because "Congress would have wanted an American court to entertain this action" in order to preserve New York City's status as "a preeminent commercial center." Id., at 153. The question, however, is not what Congress "would have wanted" but what Congress enacted in the FSIA. Although we are happy to endorse the Second Circuit's recognition of "New York's status as a world financial leader," the effect of Argentina's rescheduling in diminishing that status (assuming it is not too speculative to be considered an effect at all) is too remote and attenuated to satisfy the "direct effect" requirement of the FSIA. Ibid.

We nonetheless have little difficulty concluding that Argentina's unilateral rescheduling of the maturity dates on the Bonods had a "direct effect" in the United States. Respondents had designated their accounts in New York as the place of payment, and Argentina made some interest payments into those accounts before announcing that it was rescheduling the payments. Because New York was thus the place of performance for Argentina's ultimate contractual obligations, the rescheduling of those obligations necessarily had a "direct effect" in the United States: Money that was supposed to have been delivered to a New York bank for deposit was not forthcoming. We reject Argentina's suggestion that the "direct effect" requirement cannot be satisfied where the plaintiffs are all foreign corporations with no other connections to the United States. We expressly stated in Verlinden that the FSIA permits "a foreign plaintiff to sue a foreign sovereign in the courts of the United States, provided the substantive requirements of the Act are satisfied," 461 U.S. at 489.

Finally, Argentina argues that a finding of jurisdiction in this case would violate the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, and that, in order to avoid this difficulty, we must construe the "direct effect" requirement as embodying the "minimum contacts" test of International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316 (1945). Assuming, without deciding, that a foreign state is a "person" for purposes of the Due Process Clause, cf. South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 323–324 (1966) (States of the Union are not "persons" for purposes of the Due Process Clause), we find that Argentina possessed "minimum contacts" that would satisfy the constitutional test. By issuing negotiable debt instruments denominated in U.S. dollars and payable in New York and by appointing a financial agent in that city, Argentina "'purposefully avail[ed] itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the [United States],'" Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 475 (1985), quoting Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S. 235, 253 (1958).

(2) Nelson v. Saudi Arabia

Scott Nelson, an American citizen, filed suit against the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, claiming damages for torture and unlawful detention allegedly committed in Saudi Arabia. Nelson had been hired in the United States as a monitoring systems engineer for the King Faisal Specialist Hospital in Riyadh. He alleged that, in the course of performing his duties under his employment contract with the hospital, he was detained and tortured by agents of the Saudi government in retaliation for reporting safety violations at the hospital. He brought suit for his injuries against Saudi Arabia, the hospital, and Royspec, a corporation owned and controlled by the government of Saudi Arabia (collectively, "Saudi Arabia"). The district court concluded that Nelson's claims were not based upon commercial activities carried on in the United States, as required by the FSIA, and granted Saudi Arabia's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Nelson v. Saudi Arabia, 1989 WL 435302 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 11, 1989). The Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, 923 F.2d 1528 (11th Cir. 1991).

Defendants sought Supreme Court review of the court of appeals decision. The U.S. Government submitted a brief as amicus curiae in support of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, contending that the court of appeals erred in deciding that jurisdiction could be exercised under the first clause of the FSIA's commercial activity exception, which allows adjudication of a suit against a foreign state that "is based upon a commercial activity carried on in the United States by the foreign state."

The Supreme Court agreed with this analysis and concluded that Nelson's action was not "based upon a commercial activity" within the meaning of the first clause of § 1605(a)(2) of the FSIA, and accordingly reversed the judgment of the court of appeals. Saudi Arabia v. Nelson, 507 U.S. 349 (1993). Excerpts below provide the history of the litigation and the Supreme Court's analysis of the issues presented (footnotes omitted).

* * * *

In 1988, Nelson and his wife filed this action against petitioners in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida seeking damages for personal injury. The Nelsons' complaint sets out 16 causes of action, which fall into three categories. Counts II through VII and counts X, XI, XIV, and XV allege that petitioners committed various intentional torts, including battery, unlawful detainment, wrongful arrest and imprisonment, false imprisonment, inhuman torture, disruption of normal family life, and infliction of mental anguish. Id., at 6–11, 15, 19–20. Counts I, IX, and XIII charge petitioners with negligently failing to warn Nelson of otherwise undisclosed dangers of his employment, namely, that if he attempted to report safety hazards the Hospital would likely retaliate against him and the Saudi Government might detain and physically abuse him without legal cause. Id., at 5–6, 14, 18–19. Finally, counts VIII, XII, and XVI allege that Vivian Nelson sustained derivative injury resulting from petitioners' actions. Id., at 11–12, 16, 20. Presumably because the employment contract provided that Saudi courts would have exclusive jurisdiction over claims for breach of contract, id., at 47, the Nelsons raised no such matters.

The District Court dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1330 1602 et seq. It rejected the Nelsons' argument that jurisdiction existed, under the first clause of § 1605(a)(2), because the action was one "based upon a commercial activity" that petitioners had "carried on in the United States." Although HCA's recruitment of Nelson in the United States might properly be attributed to Saudi Arabia and the Hospital, the District Court reasoned, it did not amount to commercial activity "carried on in the United States" for purposes of the Act, id., at 94–95. The court explained that there was no sufficient "nexus" between Nelson's recruitment and the injuries alleged. "Although [the Nelsons] argu[e] that but for [Scott Nelson's] recruitment in the United States, he would not have taken the job, been arrested, and suffered the personal injuries," the court said, "this 'connection' [is] far too tenuous to support jurisdiction" under the Act, id., at 97. Likewise, the court concluded that Royspec's commercial activity in the United States, purchasing supplies and equipment for the Hospital, id., at 93–94, had no nexus with the personal injuries alleged in the complaint; Royspec had simply provided a way for Nelson's family to reach him in an emergency, id., at 96.

The Court of Appeals reversed [923 F.2d 1528 (11th Cir. 1991)]. It concluded that Nelson's recruitment and hiring were commercial activities of Saudi Arabia and the Hospital, carried on in the United States for purposes of the Act, id., at 1533, and that the Nelsons' action was "based upon" these activities within the meaning of the statute, id., at 1533–1536. There was, the court reasoned, a sufficient nexus between those commercial activities and the wrongful acts that had allegedly injured the Nelsons: "the detention and torture of Nelson are so intertwined with his employment at the Hospital," the court explained, "that they are 'based upon' his recruitment and hiring" in the United States, id., at 1535. The court also found jurisdiction to hear the claims against Royspec, id., at 1536. After the Court of Appeals denied petitioners' suggestion for rehearing en banc, App. 133, we granted certiorari, 504 U.S. 972 (1992). We now reverse.

The Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act "provides the sole basis for obtaining jurisdiction over a foreign state in the courts of this country." Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428, 443 (1989). Under the Act, a foreign state is presumptively immune from the jurisdiction of United States courts; unless a specified exception applies, a federal court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over a claim against a foreign state. Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 488–489 (1983); see 28 U.S.C. § 1604; J. Dellapenna, Suing Foreign Governments and Their Corporations 11, and n.64 (1988).

Only one such exception is said to apply here. The first clause of § 1605(a)(2) of the Act provides that a foreign state shall not be immune from the jurisdiction of United States courts in any case "in which the action is based upon a commercial activity carried on in the United States by the foreign state." The Act defines such activity as "commercial activity carried on by such state and having substantial contact with the United States," § 1603(e), and provides that a commercial activity may be "either a regular course of commercial conduct or a particular commercial transaction or act," the "commercial character of [which] shall be determined by reference to" its "nature," rather than its "purpose." § 1603(d).

There is no dispute here that Saudi Arabia, the Hospital, and Royspec all qualify as "foreign state[s]" within the meaning of the Act. Brief for Respondents 3; see 28 U.S.C. §§ 1603(a), (b) (term "foreign state" includes "an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state"). For there to be jurisdiction in this case, therefore, the Nelsons' action must be "based upon" some "commercial activity" by petitioners that had "substantial contact" with the United States within the meaning of the Act. Because we conclude that the suit is not based upon any commercial activity by petitioners, we need not reach the issue of substantial contact with the United States.

We begin our analysis by identifying the particular conduct on which the Nelsons' action is "based" for purposes of the Act. See Texas Trading & Milling Corp. v. Federal Republic of Nigeria, 647 F.2d 300, 308 (2nd Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1148 (1982); Donoghue, Taking the "Sovereign" Out of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act: A Functional Approach to the Commercial Activity Exception, 17 Yale J. Int'l L. 489, 500 (1992). Although the Act contains no definition of the phrase "based upon," and the relatively sparse legislative history offers no assistance, guidance is hardly necessary. In denoting conduct that forms the "basis," or "foundation," for a claim, see Black's Law Dictionary 151 (6th ed. 1990) (defining "base"); Random House Dictionary 172 (2d ed. 1987) (same); Webster's Third New International Dictionary 180, 181 (1976) (defining "base" and "based"), the phrase is read most naturally to mean those elements of a claim that, if proven, would entitle a plaintiff to relief under his theory of the case. See Callejo v. Bancomer, S.A., 764 F.2d 1101, 1109 (5th Cir. 1985) (focus should be on the "gravamen of the complaint"); accord, Santos v. Compagnie Nationale Air France, 934 F.2d 890, 893 (7th Cir. 1991) ("An action is based upon the elements that prove the claim, no more and no less"); Millen Industries, Inc. v. Coordination Council for North American Affairs, 272 U.S. App. D.C. 240, 246, 855 F.2d 879, 885 (1988).

What the natural meaning of the phrase "based upon" suggests, the context confirms. Earlier, see n.3, supra, we noted that § 1605(a)(2) contains two clauses following the one at issue here. The second allows for jurisdiction where a suit "is based . . . upon an act performed in the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere," and the third speaks in like terms, allowing for jurisdiction where an action "is based . . . upon an act outside the territory of the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere and that act causes a direct effect in the United States." Distinctions among descriptions juxtaposed against each other are naturally understood to be significant, see Melkonyan v. Sullivan, 501 U.S. 89, 94–95 (1991), and Congress manifestly understood there to be a difference between a suit "based upon" commercial activity and one "based upon" acts performed "in connection with" such activity. The only reasonable reading of the former term calls for something more than a mere connection with, or relation to, commercial activity.

In this case, the Nelsons have alleged that petitioners recruited Scott Nelson for work at the Hospital, signed an employment contract with him, and subsequently employed him. While these activities led to the conduct that eventually injured the Nelsons, they are not the basis for the Nelsons' suit. Even taking each of the Nelsons' allegations about Scott Nelson's recruitment and employment as true, those facts alone entitle the Nelsons to nothing under their theory of the case. The Nelsons have not, after all, alleged breach of contract, see supra, at 4, but personal injuries caused by petitioners' intentional wrongs and by petitioners' negligent failure to warn Scott Nelson that they might commit those wrongs. Those torts, and not the arguably commercial activities that preceded their commission, form the basis for the Nelsons' suit.

Petitioners' tortious conduct itself fails to qualify as "commercial activity" within the meaning of the Act, although the Act is too "'obtuse'" to be of much help in reaching that conclusion. Callejo, supra, at 1107 (citation omitted). We have seen already that the Act defines "commercial activity" as "either a regular course of commercial conduct or a particular commercial transaction or act," and provides that "[t]he commercial character of an activity shall be determined by reference to the nature of the course of conduct or particular transaction or act, rather than by reference to its purpose." 28 U.S.C. § 1603(d). If this is a definition, it is one distinguished only by its diffidence; as we observed in our most recent case on the subject, it "leaves the critical term 'commercial' largely undefined." Republic of Argentina v. Weltover, Inc., 504 U.S. 607, 612 (1992); see Donoghue, supra, at 499; Lowenfeld, Litigating a Sovereign Immunity Claim—The Haiti Case, 49 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 377, 435, n.244 (1974) (commenting on then draft Act) ("Start with 'activity,' proceed via 'conduct' or 'transaction' to 'character,' then refer to 'nature,' and then go back to 'commercial,' the term you started out to define in the first place"); G. Born & D. Westin, International Civil Litigation in United States Courts 479–480 (2d ed. 1992). We do not, however, have the option to throw up our hands. The term has to be given some interpretation, and congressional diffidence necessarily results in judicial responsibility to determine what a "commercial activity" is for purposes of the Act.

We took up the task just last Term in Weltover, supra, which involved Argentina's unilateral refinancing of bonds it had issued under a plan to stabilize its currency. . . .

* * * *

Unlike Argentina's activities that we considered in Weltover, the intentional conduct alleged here (the Saudi Government's wrongful arrest, imprisonment, and torture of Nelson) could not qualify as commercial under the restrictive theory. The conduct boils down to abuse of the power of its police by the Saudi Government, and however monstrous such abuse undoubtedly may be, a foreign state's exercise of the power of its police has long been understood for purposes of the restrictive theory as peculiarly sovereign in nature. See Arango v. Guzman Travel Advisors Corp., 621 F.2d 1371, 1379 (5th Cir. 1980); Victory Transport Inc. v. Comisaria General de Abastecimientos y Transportes, 336 F.2d 354, 360 (2nd Cir. 1964) (restrictive theory does not extend immunity to a foreign state's "internal administrative acts"), cert. denied, 381 U.S. 934 (1965); Herbage v. Meese, 747 F.Supp. 60, 67 (D.D.C. 1990), affirmance order, 292 U. S. App. D.C. 84, 946 F.2d 1564 (D.C. Cir. 1991); K. Randall, Federal Courts and the International Human Rights Paradigm 93 (1990) (the Act's commercial activity exception is irrelevant to cases alleging that a foreign state has violated human rights). Exercise of the powers of police and penal officers is not the sort of action by which private parties can engage in commerce. "[S]uch acts as legislation, or the expulsion of an alien, or a denial of justice, cannot be performed by an individual acting in his own name. They can be performed only by the state acting as such." Lauterpacht, The Problem of Jurisdictional Immunities of Foreign States, 28 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 220, 225 (1952); see also id., at 237.

The Nelsons and their amici urge us to give significance to their assertion that the Saudi Government subjected Nelson to the abuse alleged as retaliation for his persistence in reporting Hospital safety violations, and argue that the character of the mistreatment was consequently commercial. One amicus, indeed, goes so far as to suggest that the Saudi Government "often uses detention and torture to resolve commercial disputes." Brief for Human Rights Watch as Amicus Curiae 6. But this argument does not alter the fact that the powers allegedly abused were those of police and penal officers. In any event, the argument is off the point, for it goes to purpose, the very fact the Act renders irrelevant to the question of an activity's commercial character. Whatever may have been the Saudi Government's motivation for its allegedly abusive treatment of Nelson, it remains the case that the Nelsons' action is based upon a sovereign activity immune from the subject matter jurisdiction of United States courts under the Act.

In addition to the intentionally tortious conduct, the Nelsons claim a separate basis for recovery in petitioners' failure to warn Scott Nelson of the hidden dangers associated with his employment. The Nelsons allege that, at the time petitioners recruited Scott Nelson and thereafter, they failed to warn him of the possibility of severe retaliatory action if he attempted to disclose any safety hazards he might discover on the job. See supra, at 4. In other words, petitioners bore a duty to warn of their own propensity for tortious conduct. But this is merely a semantic ploy. For aught we can see, a plaintiff could recast virtually any claim of intentional tort committed by sovereign act as a claim of failure to warn, simply by charging the defendant with an obligation to announce its own tortious propensity before indulging it. To give jurisdictional significance to this feint of language would effectively thwart the Act's manifest purpose to codify the restrictive theory of foreign sovereign immunity. Cf. United States v. Shearer, 473 U.S. 52, 54–55 (1985) (opinion of Burger, C.J.).

The Nelsons' action is not "based upon a commercial activity" within the meaning of the first clause of § 1605(a)(2) of the Act, and the judgment of the Court of Appeals is accordingly reversed.

(3) Holden v. Canadian Consulate

In Holden v. Canadian Consulate, 92 F.3d 918 (9th Cir. 1996), a former commercial officer sued the Canadian Consulate in San Francisco for wrongful termination, asserting various claims including age and sex discrimination after she lost her job when the consulate was closed. The consulate appealed from the denial of its motion to dismiss, contending that because plaintiff had been a fulltime government employee and part of its "internal administrative staff," her employment was per se governmental. The court of appeals affirmed the denial of the motion to dismiss, finding that the employment contract constituted "commercial activity" within the meaning of the relevant FSIA exception. The court noted that the plaintiff had not been a member of the foreign government's diplomatic service, civil service or military personnel, was not provided the same benefits as foreign service officers, and did not receive any civil service protections from the Canadian Government. Rather, her job involved trade promotion, responding to inquiries from Canadian companies regarding information on prospective buyers, providing assistance in obtaining sales representation or wholesale distributors, furnishing names and appointments with trade contacts and evaluating the sales potential of a particular product—all functions analogous to those performed by a marketing agent. By contrast, she had not been involved in making policy, did not engage in any lobbying activities or legislative work, and could not speak for the foreign state.

(4) Byrd v. Corporacion Forestal y Industrial de Olancho SA

In Byrd v. Corporacion Forestal y Industrial de Olancho SA, 182 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1999), Byrd and others connected with a Honduran sawmill brought suit in Mississippi state court. As described in the court of appeals decision:

> This case begins with a sawmill in Honduras. The sawmill is owned by defendant-appellant Corporacion Forestal y Industrial de Olancho, S.A., ("CORFINO"), a private corporation organized and existing under the laws of Honduras, and which is almost entirely (98% of its shares) owned and controlled by the Republic of Honduras through a governmental entity known as Corporation Hondurena de Desarrolla Forestal ("COHDEFOR"). Running CORFINO at the time the facts alleged in this lawsuit took place are the two remaining defendants-appellants . . . [b]oth . . . adult resident citizens of Honduras.
> Briefly, the factual setting of this case revolves around a power struggle between CORFINO's former business partners as to the control of the sawmill and its accompanying financial rewards. The losers of this struggle are suing the winners on several business-related legal theories, such as breach of contract. . . .

Id. at 382.

CORFINO leased its chief asset, the sawmill, to a U.S. citizen; that lease was assigned to Simmons Lumber Company, S.A., a private Honduran corporation owned by American citizens including two of the plaintiffs; Simmons Lumber was then acquired by Great Southern, a Mississippi company owned by American citizens. Plaintiff Byrd, a U.S. citizen, was CEO of Great Southern, among other things.

Following removal to federal court, the district court denied defendants' motions to dismiss on grounds of sovereign immunity and lack of personal jurisdiction. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, finding the requisite "direct effect in the United States" from the complex business interactions with U.S. individuals and entities, as excerpted below.

. . . [A]pellees contend that appellants' Honduras business activities, upon which the complaint was based, had a direct effect in the United States, and that these activities serve as a jurisdictional nexus for our subject matter jurisdiction. Appellees point to five business activities:

(1) Appellants' leasing the sawmill, which produces and sells woods products;
(2) Appellants' knowledge that Byrd and others would obtain a loan of $1 million to refurbish the mill;
(3) Appellants' request of proof of Byrd and Simmons Lumbers' good financial standing;
(4) Appellants' knowledge that the lease required the appellees would acquire fire insurance (worth $2 million), a bank guarantee to cover utilities (worth $55,000); and
(5) Appellants' knowledge and implicit consent, every step of the way, that Americans were being involved in the project.

In making this argument, appellees rely heavily on our decision in Voest-Alpine Trading USA Corp. v. Bank of China, 142 F.3d 887 (5th Cir.), cert. denied 525 U.S. 1041, 119 S.Ct. 591, 142 L.Ed.2d 534 (1998). In Voest-Alpine, we held that a nontrivial financial loss to a plaintiff was sufficient to confer the district court with subject matter jurisdiction. See id. at 897. There, an American corporation brought an action against the Bank of China when that bank refused to honor a letter of credit it had issued to the benefit of the American corporation. See id. at 890. The plaintiff corporation had instructed the defendant bank to wire the $1.2 million to plaintiff's Texas bank. See Id. at 890. We found that the failure to pay on a letter of credit caused a direct effect in the United States because "Voest-Alpine's nonreceipt of funds in its Texas bank account followed as an immediate consequence of the Bank of China's actions." Id. at 896.

Appellants submit that Voest-Alpine is distinguishable. . . .

. . . On these facts, however, we cannot agree with the appellants. According to appellees' allegations, appellants foresaw and perhaps even helped to plan the financial harms which occurred to appellees. The mere fact that appellees were the assignee of the lease at issue does nothing to weaken the relationship between appellees and appellants; appellees' status as assignee means that they replace for all effective purposes the original lessee. We therefore conclude that the district court correctly asserted subject matter jurisdiction over the appellants under this clause of the commercial activity exception to the FSIA.

(5) Cicippio v. Islamic Republic of Iran

In Cicippio v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 30 F.3d 164 (D.C. Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 513 U.S. 1078 (1995), which arose prior to the adoption of the anti-terrorism exception in § 1607(a)(7) discussed in A.3.d. below, plaintiffs sought damages for a number of intentional torts and violations of international law based on the abduction and subsequent torture of U.S. citizens Joseph Cicippio and David Jacobson in Lebanon by Islamic fundamentalists hired by the State of Iran. Captors made demands for the return of Iranian assets frozen in the United States and payment of ransom by relatives. The court of appeals rejected initial efforts to bring a claim under the "commercial activity" exception to the FSIA, as excerpted below. The court also held that the FSIA's "noncommercial tort" exception did not apply because the alleged tortious actions did not occur in the United States. See also Cicippio v. the Islamic Republic of Iran, 18 F.Supp. 2d 62 (D.C.D.C. 1998) (finding jurisdiction under the subsequently enacted anti-terrorism exception).

* * * *

. . . Unless an act takes place in a commercial context it would be impossible to determine whether it is conducted in the manner of a private player in the market. Otherwise, any act directed by a foreign government and carried out by irregular operatives in whatever circumstances could be thought commercial including isolated acts of assassination, extortion, blackmail, and kidnapping (for, perhaps, the sexual pleasure of a depraved monarch). That can hardly be what Congress meant by commercial activity nor what the Weltover Court thought were typical acts of market participants.

. . . That money was allegedly sought from relatives of the hostages could not make an ordinary kidnapping a commercial act any more than murder by itself would be treated as a commercial activity merely because the killer is paid. Perhaps a kidnapping of a commercial rival could be thought to be a commercial activity. If so, it would not be because the kidnappers demanded a ransom, but because the kidnapping took place in a commercial context.

There remains the question whether the kidnapping can be thought as an act, not itself a commercial activity, but taken in connection with commercial activity elsewhere. The commercial activity under that reading would be presumably, the Iranian government's continued effort to gain the unfreezing of its assets in the United States. We do not think, however, that those efforts are properly regarded under the Act as commercial. The United States government was acting purely as a sovereign regulator when it froze the assets of Iran and its citizens, and the government of Iran's alleged efforts to release the freeze were likewise peculiarly sovereign. When two governments deal directly with each other as governments, even when the subject matter may relate to the commercial activities of its citizens or governmental entities, or even the commercial activity conducted by government subsidiaries, those dealings are not akin to that of participants in a marketplace. Governments negotiating with each other invariably take into account non-marketplace considerations—most obviously political relations—and so they cannot be thought to be behaving, in that setting, as businessmen.

(6) Virtual Defense and Development International, Inc. v. Republic of Moldova

In Virtual Defense and Development International, Inc. v. Republic of Moldova, 133 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C. 1999), an American consulting firm sued the Republic of Moldova for breach of contract, alleging that it was entitled to a commission for brokering Moldova's sale of Soviet-designed MiG-29 aircraft to the United States. In denying Moldova's motion to dismiss, the district court held that the sale of military aircraft by a foreign sovereign was a "commercial activity" within the meaning of § 1605(a)(2), even though the aircraft in question were capable of firing nuclear weapons, as excerpted below (footnotes omitted).

Moldova contends that the commercial activity exception does not apply in this instance because the type of action at issue, i.e., the sale of planes capable of firing nuclear weapons, is not the "type of action[ ] by which a private party engages in trade and traffic or commerce" because only sovereign nations own or sell these planes. Weltover, 504 U.S. at 614, 112 S.Ct. 2160 (internal quotations omitted). However, the legislative history surrounding the FSIA states that:

> [T]he fact that goods or services to be procured through a contract are to be used for public purpose is irrelevant; it is the essentially commercial nature of an activity or transaction that is critical. Thus a contract by a foreign government to buy provisions or equipment for its armed forces or to construct a government building constitutes a commercial activity.

H.Rep. No. 94–1487, 94th Cong., 2d Sess., reprinted in 1976 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 6604, 6615 (emphasis added). In addition "[s]everal cases construing FSIA also make clear that a contract by a foreign government to buy equipment for its armed services constitutes a commercial activity to which sovereign immunity does not apply." McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 758 F.2d 341, 349 (8th Cir. 1985) (citing Behring Int'l v Imperial Iranian Air Force, 475 F.Supp. 383, 388–90 (D.N.J. 1979) ("actions of Iranian Air Force in contracting for freight forwarding services is commercial and not sovereign"); Texas Trading & Milling v. Federal Republic of Nigeria, 647 F.2d 300, 309 (2d Cir. 1981) (dictum) ("contract by foreign government 'for the sale of army boots' constitutes a 'commercial activity' "); National Amer. Corp. v. Federal Republic of Nigeria, 448 F.Supp. 622, 627, 641–42 (S.D.N.Y. 1978).

In the instant case, Moldova acted as a private participant in the market when it engaged in discussions with Virtual regarding the sale of the MiGs and when it eventually sold the MiGs to the United States. The mere fact that the goods sold by Moldova were MiG-29 planes does not change the nature of Moldova's actions. Accordingly, the court concludes that the relevant actions of Moldova constitute commercial activities within the definition espoused in the FSIA.

The court also rejected Moldova's contention that the sale in question lacked the requisite jurisdictional 'nexus' to the United States, as excerpted below.

The mere solicitation of Virtual in the United States may constitute a sufficient nexus with the United States. See In re Papandreaou, 139 F.3d 247, 253 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (stating that "our cases do not foreclose the possibility that some degree of solicitation in the U.S. might satisfy the 'substantial contact' requirement"). Here, not only did Moldova solicit Virtual, a United States corporation, in the United States, but it also authorized Virtual to deal solely with United States entities or those approved by the United States government. These facts lead the court to conclude that the nexus requirement of the FSIA has been fulfilled.

It is true that the actions taken in the United States were those of Virtual, not Moldova, but they were taken based on Moldova's letter providing Virtual with the authority to do so on its behalf.

In Maritime International Nominees Establishment v. Republic of Guinea, 693 F.2d 1094, 1104 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (hereinafter MINE), the court held that even though the actions in question were carried on by an agent, they could still be attributed to the foreign state for purposes of the section 1605(a)(2) exception. Moreover, the legislative history surrounding a foreign sovereign's representation in the United States by an agent suggests that "a foreign state, in Congress's view, can surrender immunity by virtue of activities committed by an agent, and that, consequently, the 'carried on by' requirement can be interpreted in light of broad agency principles." MINE, 693 F.2d at 1105. "We also think it appropriate to note the well-established principle that, in assessing personal jurisdiction under either a constitutional due process standard or a statutory standard, courts may look to the contacts between the forum and agents of the defendant." MINE, 693 F.2d at 1105 (citing Texas Trading, 647 F.2d at 314–15).

Alternatively, if the commercial activity at issue is characterized as the actual negotiations to hire Virtual to broker the sale of the MiGs, then the third clause of the commercial activity exception is applicable. The nexus requirement of the commercial activity exception of the FSIA may be fulfilled if the action at issue was based "upon an act outside of the territory of the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere and that act causes a direct effect in the U.S." 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(2). Here, Virtual traveled to Moldova to discuss and negotiate an agreement by which it would broker the sale of the MiG-29 planes. The actual negotiations took place in Moldova.

The focus of the inquiry then is whether the breach of the agreement, which was formed in Moldova, had a direct effect in the United States. . . .

Because Virtual is solely a United States corporation and the alleged contract contemplated that Virtual would receive compensation from the profits of the sale of the MiG-29 planes, the court concludes that the alleged breach of contract had a direct effect in the United States. In sum, whether the commercial activity in this case is described as (1) the actions taken by Virtual in its position as an agent of Moldova, or (2) the negotiation process to hire Virtual to act on behalf of Moldova, the court concludes that the nexus requirement is satisfied. Accordingly, the court concludes that it may exercise jurisdiction over Moldova for the purposes of this lawsuit.

Finally, the court declined to dismiss the claims on the basis of the Act of State doctrine.

d. Acts of state-sponsored terrorism

(1) Legislation

(i) Enactment of anti-terrorism exception to FSIA

As noted above, in 1996 Congress amended the FSIA to provide a limited exception to sovereign immunity in certain circumstances in U.S. courts for claims resulting from acts of state-sponsored terrorism. The Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 ("AEDPA"or "Antiterrorism Act"), Pub. L. No. 104–132, 110 Stat. 1214, created an exception to the immunity of foreign sovereigns in claims "for personal injury or death caused by an act of torture, extrajudicial killing, aircraft sabotage, hostage taking, or the provision of material support or resources for such act (as defined in § 2339A of title 18) if such act or provision of material support is engaged in by an official, employee, or agent of such foreign state while acting within the scope of his or her office, employment, or agency." The exception was made available only for states "designated as state sponsors of terrorism under § 6(j) of the Export Administration Act of 1979 (50 U.S.C. app. § 2405(j)) or § 620A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. § 2371) at the time the act occurred, unless later so designated as a result of such act." At the time of enactment seven states were so designated: Cuba, Iran, Iraq, Libya, North Korea, Sudan, and Syria. Furthermore, the exception was made unavailable if > (i) the act occurred in the foreign state against which the claim has been brought and the claimant has not afforded the foreign state a reasonable opportunity to arbitrate the claim in accordance with accepted international rules of arbitration; or

> (ii) neither the claimant nor the victim was a national of the United States (as that term is defined in § 101(a)(22) of the Immigration and Nationality Act [8 USCS § 1101(a)(22)]) when the act upon which the claim is based occurred.

Pub. L. No. 104–132, § 221(a)(1), codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(7). See also Digest 2001 at 460–75 and Digest 2002 at 523–27 concerning later amendment to § 1605(a)(7).

(ii) Availability of assets for execution

A number of default judgments were obtained under the new antiterrorism exception during the 1990s. See Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 999 F.Supp.1 (D.D.C. 1998); Cicippio v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 18 F.Supp. 2d 62 (D.D.C. 1998); and Alejandre v. Republic of Cuba, 996 F.Supp. 1239 (S.D. Fla. 1997)*.

* In Alejandre, the court explained the special nature of "default" judgments under the FSIA:

> The personal representatives of three of the deceased instituted this action against the Republic of Cuba ("Cuba") and the Cuban Air Force to recover monetary damages for the killings. One of the victims was not a U.S. citizen and his family therefore could not join in the suit. This is the first lawsuit to rely on recent legislative enactments that strip foreign states of immunity for certain acts of terrorism. Neither Cuba nor the Cuban Air Force has defended this suit, asserting through a diplomatic note that this Court has no jurisdiction over Cuba or its political subdivisions. A default was thus entered against both Defendants on April 23, 1997 pursuant to Rule 55(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Because this is a lawsuit against a foreign state, however, the Court may not enter judgment by default. Rather, the claimants must establish their "claim or right to relief by evidence that is satisfactory to the Court." 28 U.S.C. § 1608(e) (1994); see Compania Successful plaintiffs encountered difficulty in finding assets against which their judgments could be executed, however. Under the FSIA, property of a foreign state in the United States is immune from attachment or execution, unless an exception under § 1610 or 1611 of Title 28 provides otherwise.

In 1998 Congress amended § 1610 of the FSIA to provide that blocked and regulated assets "shall be subject to execution or attachment in aid of execution of any judgment relating to a claim for which a foreign state (including any agency or instrumentality of such state) claiming such property is not immune under section 1605(a)(7)." See Treasury and General Governmental Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 1999, as contained in Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act for FY 1999, Pub. L. 105–277, Div. A, Title I, § 117 (1998), codified as 28 U.S.C. § 1610(f). Specifically, the new § 1610(f) applied to "any property with respect to which financial transactions are prohibited or regulated pursuant to section 5(b) of the Trading with the Enemy Act (50 U.S.C. App. 5(b)), section 620(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2370(a)), sections 202 and 203 of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1701–1702), or any other proclamation, order, regulation, or license issued pursuant thereto." New subsection (f)(2) provided that the Departments of State and the Treasury, at the request of a party in whose favor such a judgment had been issued, "shall fully, promptly, and effectively assist any judgment creditor or any court executing against the property of that foreign state or any agency or instrumentality of such state." Section 117(d), Interamericana Export-Import, S.A. v. Compania Dominicana de Aviacion, 88 F.3d 948, 951 (11th Cir. 1996). These three consolidated cases proceeded to trial on November 13, 14, and 20, 1997, on the issues of liability and damages. Because the Court finds that neither Cuba nor the Cuban Air Force is immune from suit for the killings, and because the facts amply prove both Defendants' liability and Plaintiffs' damages, the Court will enter judgment against Defendants.

however, authorized a Presidential waiver of the attachment provision "in the interest of national security."

On October 21, 1998, President William J. Clinton executed such a waiver in Presidential Determination 99-1, 63 Fed. Reg. 59,921 (Oct. 21, 1998). In his statement on signing Public Law No. 105–277 into law on the same date, President Clinton explained his decision to waive § 117 as follows:

> . . . If [section 117] were to result in attachment and execution against foreign embassy properties, it would encroach on my authority under the Constitution to "receive Ambassadors and other public ministers." Moreover, if applied to foreign diplomatic or consular property, section 117 would place the United States in breach of its international treaty obligations. It would put at risk the protection we enjoy at every embassy and consulate throughout the world by eroding the principle that diplomatic property must be protected regardless of bilateral relations. Absent my authority to waive section 117's attachment provision, it would also effectively eliminate the use of blocked assets of terrorist states in the national security interests of the United States, including denying an important source of leverage. In addition, section 117 could seriously affect our ability to enter into global claims settlements that are fair to all U.S. claimants, and could result in U.S. taxpayer liability in the event of a contrary claims tribunal judgment. To the extent possible, I shall construe section 117 in a manner consistent with my constitutional authority and with U.S. international legal obligations, and for the above reasons, I have exercised the waiver authority in the national security interest of the United States.

(2) Execution of judgments

(i) Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran

In Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran, No. 97–396, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8910 (D.D.C. June 6, 2000), the court summarized efforts during 1999 to execute on the judgment (noted in d.(1)(ii) supra; see also A.4.b. below), as excerpted below. In the 2000 order the court quashed the writ of attachment against Iran's Foreign Military Sales Fund ("FMS Fund") because the funds were held in the U.S. Treasury, and attachment was barred by the doctrine of U.S. sovereign immunity, absent an effective waiver, as decided in 74 F.Supp. 2d 18, referenced below. See Digest 2000 at 543–48 for the U.S. brief in this case.

The present matter represents another effort by plaintiff Stephen M. Flatow to execute the judgment he obtained against the Islamic Republic of Iran under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act ("FSIA"), 28 U.S.C. § 1602–11 (1996 and Supp. 1999), for the wrongful death of his daughter Alisa, who was killed in a 1995 terrorist bombing of a tourist bus in Gaza. See Flatow v. The Islamic Republic of Iran, et al., 999 F.Supp. 1, 5 (D.D.C. 1998) (entering default judgment against Iran and its codefendants and finding them jointly and severally liable for compensatory damages, loss of accretions, solatium and $225,000,000.00 in punitive damages). Thus, far, each of Flatow's previous attempts to satisfy his judgment against Iran have proven fruitless. See, e.g., Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran, et al., 76 F.Supp.2d 16, 18 (D.D.C. 1999) (quashing writs of attachment directed against Iranian real estate in Washington, D.C., including the former Iranian embassy, and two bank accounts containing funds generated by the State Department's lease of such properties to third parties); Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran, et al., 76 F.Supp.2d 28, 29 (D.D.C. 1999) (quashing writ of attachment directed at arbitration award issued by Iran-United States Claims Tribunal in favor of Iran against garnishee); Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran, et al., 74 F.Supp.2d 18, 25 (D.D.C. 1999) (quashing writ of attachment issued to the United States Treasury, directed at "all credits held by the United States to the benefit of the Islamic Republic of Iran"); Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran, et al., 67 F.Supp.2d 535, 543 (D. Md. 1999) (quashing writs of execution against nonprofit foundation's property). The present writ of attachment is directed to the Secretary of Defense and purports to attach the "property of the Defendants, The Islamic Republic of Iran and/or The Iranian Ministry of Information and Security . . . , which is believed to be in the possession, care, custody, held in trust, or otherwise within the control and/or jurisdiction of the United States Department of Defense," including defendants' Foreign Military Sales Accounts ("FMS"), all accounts related to such FMS Accounts, and all accounts, property, credits, or "assets of any type whatsoever." . . .

. . . As the United States correctly notes, this court's prior decision quashing plaintiff's writ directed at "all credits held by the United States to the benefit of the Islamic Republic of Iran" disposes of the present writ as well. In that opinion, the court held that because plaintiff had failed to identify an unequivocal waiver, the writ of attachment against the U.S. Treasury was barred by sovereign immunity as a suit against the United States. Flatow, 74 F.Supp.2d at 22 (finding that funds were held in U.S. Treasury and that their attachment constitutes a suit against the United States, which is barred by sovereign immunity absent "an explicit, unequivocal waiver"). . . .

(ii) Alejandre v. Telefonica Larga Distancia De Puerto Rico, Inc.

In Alejandre v. Republic of Cuba., 996 F.Supp. 1239 (S.D. Fla. 1997), survivors of American victims whose unarmed civilian airplanes were shot down by the Cuban Air Force over international waters on February 24, 1996, obtained judgments against the Republic of Cuba and the Cuban Air Force. The district court found that the exception to immunity in 1605(a)(7) applied to both defendants because the Cuban Air Force, as an agent of the terrorist-sponsoring Cuban Government, had committed an act of extrajudicial killing by shooting down the airplane.

The plaintiffs thereafter obtained writs of execution and garnishment against certain debts owed to a Cuban telecommunications company, Empresa de Telecomunicaciones de Cuba, S.A. ("ETECSA"), Alejandre v. Republic of Cuba, 42 F.Supp. 2d 1317 (S.D. Fla. 1999). The court of appeals vacated the judgment and remanded with instructions to dissolve the writs of garnishment insofar as they sought to garnish amounts owed to ETECSA. Alejandre v. Telefonica Larga Distancia de Puerto Rico, Inc., 183 F.3d 1277 (11th Cir. 1999), reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, Alejandre v. Republic of Cuba, 205 F.3d 1357 (11th Cir. 1999).

The court of appeals explained that the lower court had "concluded that the carriers' debts were owed to ETECSA (rather than directly to the Cuban Government itself) and that the Cuban Government's control over ETECSA was insufficient to render ETECSA responsible for the Government's debt to the plaintiffs. . . . Nevertheless, the court held ETECSA responsible for the Government's debt on the ground that a contrary holding would unjustly prevent the plaintiffs from collecting their judgment and would override the legislative policy in favor of broadening the assets that may be executed upon to compensate victims of terrorist attacks." See 183 F.3d at 1282.

The court agreed that "ETECSA was a government instrumentality because the Cuban Government owned or controlled the companies that held a majority of ETECSA's stock." Id. at 1283. The court also found, however, that ETECSA had separate juridical status and that payments to it could not be subject to garnishment to satisfy judgments against the government itself. The court's analysis is excerpted below (footnotes omitted).

The exception upon which the plaintiffs relied below is 28 U.S.C. § 1610(a)(7) (West Supp. 1999), n.14 which provides:

> The property in the United States of a foreign state, . . . used for a commercial activity in the United States, shall not be immune from attachment in aid of execution . . . upon a judgment entered by a court of the United States . . . [if] the judgment relates to a claim for which the foreign state is not immune under section 1605(a)(7), regardless of whether the property is or was involved with the act upon which the claim is based.

The last requirement of this exception is clearly met here, as the plaintiffs' underlying judgment against the Cuban Government related to a claim from which the Government was not immune by virtue of section 1605(a)(7). Thus, assuming arguendo that the amounts owed to ETECSA are property in the United States used for a commercial activity therein, these amounts are not immune from garnishment if ETECSA constitutes a "foreign state" for purposes of this exception. This question might appear to be easily answered: ETECSA is an instrumentality as defined by section 1603(b), and section 1603(a) declares that the term "foreign state" under the FSIA includes an instrumentality, so ETECSA is a "foreign state" under section 1610(a)(7). The Supreme Court's decision in First National City Bank v. Banco Para El Comercio Exterior de Cuba, 462 U.S. 611, 103 S.Ct. 2591, 77 L.Ed.2d 46 (1983) [hereinafter Bancec], however, teaches that things are not that simple.

According to Bancec, "the language and history of the FSIA clearly establish that the Act was not intended to affect the substantive law determining the liability of a foreign state or instrumentality, or the attribution of liability among instrumentalities of a foreign state." Id. at 620, 103 S.Ct. at 2597.

Instead, government instrumentalities enjoy a presumption of separate juridical status vis-a-vis the foreign government to which they are related. While Bancec applied this presumption for purposes of determining whether an instrumentality could be held substantively liable for the debts of its related foreign government, subsequent decisions have also applied it in determining whether an exception to immunity that applies to the government may be attributed to the instrumentality as well. See id. at 613, 103 S.Ct. at 2593 (considering whether Citibank could set off value of branches nationalized by Cuban Government against amount Citibank owed to presumptively separate Cuban instrumentality); Hercaire, 821 F.2d at 564–65 (considering whether waiver of immunity by foreign government also operated to deprive presumptively separate instrumentality of immunity). We must consider, therefore, whether this presumption may be overcome in order to make ETECSA's assets the property of a "foreign state" (i.e., the property of the Cuban Government), thus rendering the exception to immunity in section 1610(a)(7) applicable to ETECSA and making ETECSA substantively liable for the Government's debt to the plaintiffs. See Letelier v. Republic of Chile, 748 F.2d 790, 793 (2d Cir. 1984).

In Bancec, the Supreme Court highlighted two situations in which a plaintiff may overcome the presumption of separate juridical status enjoyed by an instrumentality. First, when a corporate entity is so extensively controlled by its owner that a relationship of principal and agent is created, the Court observed that one may be held liable for the actions of the other. Second, the Court recognized the broader equitable principle that the doctrine of corporate entity will not be regarded where to do so would work fraud or injustice or defeat overriding public policies. See Bancec, 462 U.S. at 629–630, 103 S.Ct. at 2601–02. In either situation, the plaintiff bears the burden of proving that the instrumentality is not entitled to separate recognition. See Foremost-McKesson, Inc. v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 284 U.S. App. D.C. 333, 905 F.2d 438, 447 (D.C. Cir. 1990); Letelier, 748 F.2d at 795.

The court disregarded the presumptively separate juridical status of ETECSA by invoking the second situation mentioned in Bancec: that the corporate entity will not be regarded where to do so would work fraud or injustice or defeat overriding public policies. The court did not rely upon the fraud element of this rule, and indeed there appears to be no evidence in the record that would support a finding of fraud. For example, the plaintiffs made no showing that the apparent novation that transferred the rights and obligations of EMTELCUBA (an alter ego responsible for the debts of the Cuban Government, see supra note 7) under the Operating Agreements to ETECSA was entered into for the purpose of insulating payments made under those Agreements from garnishment by the Cuban Government's creditors. Instead, the court rested its decision on concerns about injustice and public policy. The core of the court's legal rationale was that failing to disregard ETECSA's separate status "not only would prevent [the plaintiffs] from collecting their court-ordered final judgment for the victims of a grave violation of international law, but also would override the clear legislative policy against such terrorist attacks and in favor of broadening the property which may be executed [upon] to compensate for them." Alejandre II, 42 F.Supp. 2d at 1339. In particular, the court concluded that 28 U.S.C. § 1610(f)(1)(A) constituted an "express[ ] legislative commitment to subject the property of a government instrumentality to attachment or execution to satisfy a judgment against [a] terrorist foreign state." Id.

Upon reviewing this rationale de novo, we conclude that it is not a sufficient basis for overcoming the presumption of separate juridical status that ETECSA enjoys. While the district court's concern about the injustice of preventing plaintiffs from collecting their judgment is understandable, this concern is present in every case in which a plaintiff seeks to hold an instrumentality responsible for the debts of its related government. Allowing the Bancec presumption of separate juridical status to be so easily overcome would effectively render it a nullity. We recognize that the district court made an effort to distinguish this case based upon the gravity of the underlying violation of international law. Given the absence of any evidence that ETECSA was involved in the violation, however, we fail to see how this distinction is relevant to the question of whether ETECSA's separate juridical status should be overcome.

With regard to the district court's public policy concerns, we agree that recent enactments evince a congressional policy against terrorist attacks and in favor of making additional property of governments that sponsor terrorism (such as Cuba) available to compensate victims of such attacks. We disagree, however, with the district court's conclusion that Congress—in section 1610(f)(1)(A)—took the further step of overriding the Bancec presumption of separate juridical status by making instrumentalities responsible for the debts of their related terrorist-sponsoring governments. Section 1610(f)(1)(A) provides:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of law, . . . any property with respect to which financial transactions are prohibited or regulated pursuant to [certain statutes, including those authorizing the CACR] . . . [or any] license issued pursuant thereto, shall be subject to execution or attachment in aid of execution of any judgment relating to a claim for which a foreign state (including any agency or instrumentality of such state) claiming such property is not immune under section 1605(a)(7).

The effect of this section is not to subject property claimed by the instrumentality ETECSA to execution in order to satisfy the plaintiffs' judgment against the Cuban Government, but to allow the plaintiffs to execute upon property claimed by the Government itself in order to satisfy their judgment (which relates to a claim from which the Government was not immune by virtue of section 1605(a)(7)) without first obtaining a license under the CACR. See 31 C.F.R. § 515.203(e). Congress has previously demonstrated in the FSIA context that it knows how to express clearly an intent to make instrumentalities substantively liable for the debts of their related foreign governments. Absent such a clear expression, which does not appear in section 1610(f)(1)(A), we see no reason to interpret that section as contravening Congress' original understanding that the FSIA "[is] not intended to affect the substantive law determining the liability of a foreign state or instrumentality, or the attribution of liability among instrumentalities of a foreign state." Bancec, 462 U.S. at 620, 103 S.Ct. at 2597.

* * * *

The court of appeals also concluded that plaintiffs had failed to establish an alter ego relationship between the Cuban Government and ETECSA.

For further discussion of similar efforts to attach, see Digest 2000 at 543–60. Subsequent legislation to provide compensation for American victims of terrorism and their families is discussed in Digest 2000 at 540–42.

(3) Constitutionality of 1605(a)(7)

In Rein v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 995 F.Supp. 325 (E.D.N.Y. 1998), aff'd in part, dismissed in part, 162 F.3d 748 (2nd Cir. 1998), cert. denied, 527 U.S. 1003 (1999), the survivors and representatives of persons killed aboard Pan Am Flight 103 above Lockerbie, Scotland in December 1988, brought suit against Libya to recover damages for wrongful death, pain and suffering, and a variety of other injuries. The plaintiffs based their jurisdictional claim on § 1605(a)(7). Libya challenged the provision as an unconstitutional bill of attainder and an ex post facto law and argued that it unconstitutionally delegated legislative power. The district court denied Libya's motion to dismiss finding inter alia that the provision was constitutional and that the court had subject matter jurisdiction. The court of appeals affirmed. It found the bill of attainder and ex post facto challenges not ripe for review because those issues "are germane, if at all, only to the potential imposition of punitive damages in this suit and not to the existence of jurisdiction." 162 F.3d at 761.

The court of appeals did review the lower court's decision "that § 1605(a)(7) does not unconstitutionally delegate legislative power." Id. at 762. The court of appeals rejected the lower court's reasoning that § 1605(a)(7) only deprived Libya of an affirmative defense and thus did not determine jurisdiction at all, citing Verlinden, B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 493–94 (1983). The court concluded, however, that > in the particular case before us there was no delegation at all. The decision to subject Libya to jurisdiction under § 1605(a)(7) was manifestly made by Congress itself rather than by the State Department. At the time that § 1605(a)(7) was passed, Libya was already on the list of state sponsors of terrorism. No decision whatsoever of the Secretary of State was needed to create jurisdiction over Libya for its alleged role in the destruction of Pan Am 103. That jurisdiction existed the moment that the AEDPA amendment became law.

In June 1998 the U.S. Government had filed a brief as intervenor and argued that the FSIA properly provided for subject matter jurisdiction over the cases against Libya, addressing all of the challenges raised by Libya to the statute's constitutionality, most of which were not addressed by the court. The full text of the U.S. brief, as excerpted below (most footnotes omitted), is available at 1998 WL 34088648 (2d Cir. 1998).

ARGUMENT

I. The Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act Is Fully Consistent With The Constitution Insofar As It Provides Subject Matter Jurisdiction For Private Civil Suits Against Foreign States That Engage In Acts Such As Aircraft Sabotage.

On appeal, Libya argues that the FSIA is unconstitutional insofar as it provides subject matter jurisdiction in these cases by eliminating sovereign immunity from a civil suit seeking damages caused by aircraft sabotage by Libya. Libya contends first (Br. at 15–22) that FSIA Section 1605(a)(7) violates the constitutional separation of powers principle by making Article III federal court jurisdiction depend upon a determination by an Executive Branch official, designating Libya as a state sponsor of terrorism. Next, Libya asserts (Br. at 22–26) that this part of the FSIA is a prohibited bill of attainder since it focuses upon a small group of states designated by the Secretary of State. Finally, Libya also asserts (Br. at 26–28) that the provision at issues constitutes forbidden ex post facto punishment.

These arguments are all misconceived, and we show below that the district court was correct to reject them.

A. Foreign Sovereign Immunity Is a Matter of Grace and Comity Bestowed by the Political Branches of our Government.

It is important as background to recognize first what Libya does not dispute: "foreign sovereign immunity is a matter of grace and comity on the part of the United States, and not a restriction imposed by the Constitution." Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 486 (1982).

Simply put, sovereign immunity for foreign states in our courts is a privilege that may be restricted by Congress and the Executive Branch as they choose; it is not any kind of right that a foreign state has in relation to the U.S. Government or the citizens of the United States. "By reason of its authority over foreign commerce and foreign relations, Congress has the undisputed power to decide, as a matter of federal law, whether and under what circumstances foreign nations should be amenable to suit in the United States." Id. at 493 (emphasis added). Congress enacted the FSIA, which "comprehensively regulat[ed] the amenability of foreign nations to suit in the United States" pursuant to its "unquestioned Art. I powers." Id. at 493, 496.

Not only do the political departments of our government have the discretion to determine whether a foreign state is amenable to suit in U.S. courts but, in an analogous context, the Supreme Court has recognized that access to U.S. courts by a foreign state is also based on considerations of comity by the political branches. See Banco Nacionale de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 409 (1964) (access by sovereign states to U.S. courts turns on considerations of comity by the political branches).

* * * *

B. Nothing in the Constitution Prohibits Congress from Basing Federal Court Jurisdiction on an Underlying Determination Made by the Executive, Which Does Not Affect a Determination of Liability.

Libya contends that Congress cannot base subject matter jurisdiction on a determination by the Executive Branch that Libya is a state sponsor of terrorism. Libya alleges that Section 1605(a)(7) makes an impermissible delegation of authority to the Executive Branch because only Congress can establish the jurisdiction of the Federal courts.

1. As a threshold matter, there is considerable doubt that the constitutional separation of powers doctrine provides protection to Libya in the way that this foreign state claims.

The Supreme Court has made clear that the constitutional principle of separating the powers among three branches of government is a central aspect of the constitutional framework in order to protect individual liberties, by ensuring that no one branch of the national government can become dominant over the others. The declared purpose of separating the powers vested by the Constitution into the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Branches was to "diffus[e] power the better to secure liberty." Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 694 (1988), quoting Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 635 (1952) (Jackson, J. concurring).

"The structure of our Government as conceived by the Framers of our Constitution disperses the federal power among the three branches * * * placing both substantive and procedural limitations on each. The ultimate purpose of this separation of powers is to protect the liberty and security of the governed." Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252, 272 (1991). "The essence of the separation of powers concept * * * is essential to the liberty and security of the people. Each branch, in its own way, is the people's agent, its fiduciary for certain purposes." Ibid., quoting Levi, Some Aspects of Separation of Powers, 76 Columbia L. Rev. 385–86 (1976).

Thus, the Supreme Court has explained that "courts have consistently regarded the Bill of Attainder Clause * * * and the principle of the separation of powers only as protections for individual persons and private groups, those who are peculiarly vulnerable to nonjudicial determinations of guilt." South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 324 (1966). . . .

Given its purpose to protect individual liberty interests, the separation of powers doctrine accordingly has no relevance when a foreign state is seeking to invalidate an Act of Congress that denies that state the benefit of immunity in U.S. courts.

2. Even if the separation of powers principle applied to Libya in this context, that nation's attack against the FSIA on this ground is mistaken.

Libya's argument is wrong because Congress has itself established the basis for jurisdiction over Libya through the FSIA. Congress has decided that, if the Secretary of State has made the appropriate designation of state sponsorship of terrorism, federal district court jurisdiction exists for certain tort suits. We thus disagree with any notion in the district court's opinion (see App. 102, 104) that a district court has discretion to decide not to exercise jurisdiction if the necessary determination has been made (unless there are some independent, valid grounds for abstention by the court). Congress has legislated that jurisdiction will exist in the described circumstances. Therefore, Libya's argument has to be that jurisdiction cannot under any circumstances legislatively be made dependent on a finding by the Executive.

* * * *

As long as Congress sets constitutionally sufficient bounds on the Executive's exercise of discretion, the Supreme Court has rejected arguments like Libya's claim, which asserts that Congress cannot delegate certain types of authority to the executive. The Supreme Court has upheld broad delegations of authority to the Executive in a wide variety of areas, and has never accepted an argument that the type of delegation at issue here cannot be made. See, e.g., Skinner v. Mid-America Pipeline Co., 490 U.S. 212 (1989) (taxing power); Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361 (1989) (power over sentencing).

* * * *

Similarly, courts have consistently held that diversity jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(a)(2) and 1332(a)(4)—which provide, respectively, for federal court jurisdiction in cases involving citizens of foreign states, and foreign states as plaintiffs—is predicated upon Executive Branch recognition of the relevant foreign state. See, e.g., Pfizer v. India, 434 U.S. 308, 318–320 & n.19 (1978); Matimak Trading Co., 118 F.3d at 79–84. Courts have also recognized that the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in cases involving ambassadors and consuls, under Article 3, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution, and 28 U.S.C. § 1251(b)(1), extends only to diplomatic representatives who are accredited in the sole and absolute discretion of the Executive Branch. See United States v. Egorov, 222 F.Supp. 106, 108–109 (E.D.N.Y. 1963); United States v. Fitzpatrick, 214 F.Supp. 425, 433, 441 (S.D.N.Y. 1963); United States v. Melekh, 193 F.Supp. 586, 596–97 (N.D.Ill. 1961).

Likewise, federal courts have accepted as conclusive the State Department's accreditation of a diplomat for the purpose of determining whether that individual is immune from the jurisdiction of United States courts. See Abdulaziz v. Metropolitan Dade County, 741 F.2d 1328, 1331 (11th Cir. 1984); Jungquist v. Nahyan, 940 F.Supp. 312, 321–22 (D.D.C. 1996).

Indeed, in a large area of the law, federal court jurisdiction is similarly dependent upon a prior determination by the Executive. Under the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. § 704), the sovereign immunity of the United States has been waived to allow judicial review when there has been "final agency action." See, e.g., National Wildlife Federation v. Goldschmidt, 677 F.2d 259, 262–63 (2d Cir. 1982). Thus, jurisdiction through that statute is made dependent on an initial determination by the Executive. Prior to final agency action, the matter is unripe and thus not within the courts' jurisdiction, even if an agency has asserted jurisdiction over a private party through institution of administrative charges.

Libya's argument on this point is thus based on a constitutional restriction that does not exist.

It is also important to remember, as the district court pointed out (App. 107–09), that the Executive plays no role in deciding in this case whether or not Libya is liable; the district court alone considers and rules upon the merits of the plaintiffs' allegations. Consequently, there is no intrusion by the Executive Branch at the behest of Congress into the province of the Judicial Branch. All that Congress has done is to condition whether a case gets to the courts on a prior determination made by the Executive. There is nothing unusual or unconstitutional about such a delegation of authority.

Indeed, prior to the enactment of FSIA, determinations as to the immunity of foreign states were almost exclusively made by the Executive Branch on a case-by-case basis, and recognized and followed by the courts. The initial "responsibility for deciding questions of sovereign immunity fell primarily upon the Executive acting through the State Department, and the courts abided by 'suggestions of immunity' from the State Department." Verlinden, 486 U.S. at 487 (emphasis added); see also Republic of China, 348 U.S. at 360 ("[a]s the responsible agency for the conduct of foreign affairs, the State Department is the normal means of suggesting to the courts that a sovereign be granted immunity from a particular suit" and "[i]ts failure or refusal to suggest such immunity has been accorded significant weight by this Court").

* * * *

For these reasons, Libya's separation of powers claim, even if cognizable, lacks merit.

C. No Bill of Attainder Is Present Here.

Libya's challenge based on the Bill of Attainder Clause similarly lacks merit. But on this claim too there is strong doubt that Libya is within the zone of interests protected by the constitutional provision it invokes.

As quoted above, the Supreme Court has already stated that the Bill of Attainder Clause protects only "individuals and private groups." South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. at 324. Libya has provided no ground for instead finding that this clause provides protection to foreign states. In any event, if the substance of Libya's bill of attainder argument is reached, the Court should conclude that there is no constitutional violation by the FSIA.

* * * *

"The proscription against bills of attainder reaches only statutes that inflict punishment on the specified individual or group." Selective Service, 468 U.S. at 851 (emphasis added). Accord Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603, 613 (1960). Thus, even a statute that imposes burdens on a single individual—identified in the statute by name—is not a forbidden bill of attainder if it does not impose punishment within the meaning of the constitutional proscription. Nixon, 433 U.S. at 472–73.

It is important to recognize that the Bill of Attainder Clause has been given a narrow reach by the Supreme Court, and has rarely been invoked to condemn legislation. The Court has struck down statutes on bill of attainder grounds only five times in this nation's history. In each case the government had sought to punish "members of a political group thought to present a threat to the national security." United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437, 453 (1965).

* * * *

These principles lead ineluctably to the conclusion that Section 1605(a)(7) is not a bill of attainder. There has been no legislative determination of guilt or imposition of punishment here at all. As emphasized earlier, the FSIA provision that Libya challenges merely removes Libya's ability to invoke sovereign immunity in order to stop a suit at the outset; nothing in the FSIA imposes any kind of liability on Libya. Rather, the suit will now go forward and Libya will have a full opportunity to defend itself on the merits.

* * * *

In this instance, Libya has provided no unmistakable evidence of a legislative intent to punish it through amendment of the FSIA. The fact that, as Libya points out in its brief (at 24 n.10), a legislator stated her view that the 1996 amendment would serve the cause of "justice" (see 142 Cong. Rec. H2132 (daily ed. March 13, 1996) and 142 Cong. Rec. H3603 (daily ed. April 18, 1996)) does not establish that Congress had a punitive intent. See Doe v. Pataki, 120 F.3d 1263, 1277–78 (2d Cir. 1997) (the subjective view of one legislator does not satisfy plaintiff's burden to produce "unmistakable evidence of punitive intent"), cert. denied, 118 S.Ct. 1066 (1998).

D. The 1996 FSIA Amendment Is Not An Unconstitutional Ex Post Facto Law.

Libya's claim that Section 1605(a)(7) is a forbidden ex post facto law is also wrong, and was correctly rejected by the district court (App. 108a–109). However, on this point too, before reaching the merits, we urge the Court to hold that Libya's claim to sovereign immunity is not within the protection afforded by this constitutional provision.

* * * *

The ex post facto doctrine is inapplicable here for the reasons discussed above concerning the bill of attainder argument. This constitutional doctrine is directed at protecting individuals from arbitrary penal sanctions that unfairly deprive them of a liberty interest. It has no applicability to whether a foreign state may be immune from possible liability for civil tort damages, particularly compensatory ones. Libya's ex post facto claim mistakenly seeks to enshrine as a constitutional right a benefit that may be bestowed by the United States as a matter of grace. For the reasons stated earlier, Libya is not criminally punished or subjected to a penal sanction simply because the United States decides to remove its immunity from a civil suit. And, the FSIA does not establish criminal sanctions, or civil penalties, or any standards for determining civil liability; it merely governs whether Libya is amenable to suit.

II. The Assertion Of Personal Jurisdiction Over The Libyan Government Defendants Here Is Consistent With The Constitution.

As noted earlier, under the FSIA, once subject matter jurisdiction has been established and service has been made, personal jurisdiction exists. Here, the Libyan government defendants argue that the exercise of personal jurisdiction over them by the district court violates the Due Process Clause. Libya contends (Br. at 29–38) that, even as a foreign nation it is protected by the Due Process Clause, and that the facts alleged in the complaints fail to demonstrate sufficient contacts with the United States to permit the assertion of jurisdiction.

A. As Libya discusses (Br. at 28–29), this Court held before the adoption of Section 1605(a)(7) that foreign states are "persons" covered by the Due Process Clause to the extent that jurisdiction cannot be asserted over them in court absent sufficient minimum contacts. See Texas Trading, 647 F.2d at 313; Shapiro v. Republic of Bolivia, 930 F.2d 1013, 1019 (2d Cir. 1991).

Given its determination that the states of our Union are not "persons" under the Due Process Clause (see South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. at 323–24), the Supreme Court has reserved this issue. See Republic of Argentina v. Weltover, 504 U.S. 607, 619 and n.2 (1992). See also Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 999 F.Supp. 1, 1998 WestLaw 111500, at *16–*19 (D.D.C. March 11, 1998) (finding that foreign states are not "persons" under the Due Process Clause); Palestine Information Office v. Shultz, 674 F.Supp. 910, 919 (D.D.C. 1987) ("If the States of the Union have no due process rights, then a 'foreign mission' qua 'foreign mission' surely can have none"), affirmed on other grounds, 853 F.2d 932 (D.C. Cir. 1988).[8]

In light of this Court's precedent, this issue need not be reexamined at this point. As we now show, the district court correctly concluded that there is an adequate basis for assertion of personal jurisdiction in a case like this, as Section 1605(a)(7) explicitly provides.

B. The Supreme Court has emphasized on many occasions that "[d]ue process, unlike some legal rules, is not a technical conception with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances." Cafeteria and Restaurant Workers Union v. McElroy, 367 U.S. 886, 895 (1961). Thus, in its seminal decision in International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316 (1945), the Court expressly eschewed a rigid formula for delineating the contacts necessary to exercise personal jurisdiction and satisfy due process concerns. Each case requires evaluation in light of its own facts and circumstances in order to ensure that the exercise of jurisdiction complies with "fair play and substantial justice." Ibid.

Thus, the exercise of personal jurisdiction is permitted "only when the nonresident defendant possesses sufficient "minimum contacts" with the forum state so that the assertion of personal jurisdiction over the defendant is consistent with "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." Bensmiller v. E.I. Dupont, 47 F.3d 79, 84 (2d Cir. 1995) (quoting International Shoe, 326 U.S. at 316).

The "defendant's conduct and connection with the forum State are such that [it] should reasonably anticipate being haled into court there." World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286, 297 (1980). See also Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Robertson-Ceco Corp., 84 F.3d 560, 567–68 (2d Cir.) (due process test for personal jurisdiction has related components of whether "minimum contacts" exist, and whether the assertion of jurisdiction over the defendant comports with traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice, that is, whether it is "reasonable under the circumstances of the particular case"), cert. denied, 117 S.Ct. 508 (1996).

[8] The fact that a foreign state might not be a "person" for purposes of the Due Process Clause would not mean that a federal court could treat it unfairly in the process of litigation, just as it does not mean that a state within the Union can be so treated despite the fact that it is not a "person." Article III may itself contain an inherent requirement that the federal courts, as an aspect of their institutional existence, treat those before them in a fair and just way.

For purposes of personal jurisdiction under the FSIA, the relevant forum for assessing contacts is the entire United States. See Texas Trading, 647 F.2d at 314. In addition, a court may assess the relevant factors as part of a continuum whereby a lesser showing of actual contacts may be fortified by a substantial showing that justice and fairness support the exercise of personal jurisdiction (which is true in this instance). Metropolitan Life, 84 F.3d at 568–69.

Traditional indicia of minimum contacts that focus on a defendant's commercial activities in the forum state are of limited value in evaluating the propriety of personal jurisdiction under Section 1605(a)(7) of the FSIA. Where, as here, Congress clearly intended that Section 1605(a)(7) reach extraterritorial conduct, the relevant inquiry is not whether a defendant state has "purposefully avail[ed] itself of the privilege of conducting activities" within the United States, thus "invoking the benefits and protections of its law," as is typically the case. See Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S. 235, 253 (1958).

Rather, insofar as the minimum contacts analysis applies to cases involving allegations of claims such as aircraft sabotage by foreign state defendants, the courts should consider whether the effects of a defendant state's actions upon or within the United States are sufficient to provide "fair warning" (Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 472 (1985)) that those responsible for the conduct in question may be subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. The original legislative history of the FSIA indicates that the immunity provisions of the Act by themselves were intended to "prescribe the necessary contacts which must exist before our courts can exercise personal jurisdiction." See H.R. Rep. No. 94–1487 at 13, 1976 U.S.C.A.A.N. at 6612.[9] [9] Because FSIA Section 1605(a)(7) applies solely to victims or claimants who are U.S. nationals, the harm that Congress intended would be addressed by this provision was that directed at the United States. Thus, apart from "minimum contacts" analysis, this provision alone might serve as the basis for exercising personal jurisdiction over foreign states for claims arising thereunder.

The Supreme Court has held as a matter of general principle that intentional torts that are directed at, and generate effects within, a forum may give rise to personal jurisdiction. Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783, 788–90 (1984) (personal jurisdiction upheld in California over Florida newspaper that published libelous story concerning actress residing in California). Where defendants are "not charged with mere untargeted negligence" but, "[r]ather, their intentional, and allegedly tortious, actions were expressly aimed at" the forum, the exercise of personal jurisdiction is proper. Id. at 789. The defendants "knew that the brunt of that injury would be felt" in the forum and, thus, could reasonably anticipate being haled into court there. Id. at 789–90. "An individual injured in California need not go to Florida to seek redress from persons who, though remaining in Florida, knowingly cause the injury in California." Id. at 790.

Thus, an intentional act committed outside a forum state, but which has effects within the forum can confer jurisdiction over a defendant who has never physically entered the forum. Indeed, to defeat personal jurisdiction, "a defendant who purposefully has directed his activities at forum residents * * * must present a compelling case that the presence of some other considerations would render jurisdiction unreasonable." Burger King, 471 U.S. at 477.

Application of these principles to the allegations in these cases requires the conclusion that personal jurisdiction is proper. In deciding minimum contacts issues, the allegations in the complaint must be taken as true. Seetransport Wiking Trader v. Navimpex Centrala Navala, 989 F.2d 572, 580 (2d Cir. 1993). In addition, this Court must evaluate the "totality of the circumstances" surrounding defendants' contacts with the relevant forum. PDK Labs, Inc. v. Friedlander, 103 F.3d 1105, 1109 (2d Cir. 1997).

At issue here is the destruction of a U.S. flag aircraft, owned by U.S. corporations, and in route to the United States on a regularly scheduled flight, with 189 U.S. nationals aboard. The destruction of Pan Am 103 unquestionably had a far-reaching impact on the United States—even beyond the significant fact that 189 U.S. nationals were killed—for, as with all terrorist acts, it was designed to harm the interests of the United States.

This latter point should be a key one in any weighing of jurisdictional fairness considerations.

The bombing posed immediate and significant security concerns for the United States and its aviation industry in seeking to protect international air travel aboard U.S. flag carriers, and other carriers flying to and from the United States. Such terrorist acts also pose other significant harms to U.S. businesses and the domestic economy through, for example, a decline in passenger travel and increased operating, insurance, and potential liability costs.

Moreover, "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice" strongly support a finding of personal jurisdiction here. Any foreign person, entity, or state responsible for the intentional destruction of a U.S. aircraft, particularly one flying to the United States with many U.S. nationals aboard, "should reasonably anticipate being haled into court" in the United States. Any foreign state must surely know that the United States has a substantial interest in the protection of its flag carriers and nationals in international air travel from terrorist activity, and can reasonably expect that any action that harmed this interest would subject it to a response in many forms, including possible civil actions in U.S. courts. See Flatow, 1998 Westlaw at 111500, *16–*18. It is certainly in the interests of fairness and justice to do so.

In its brief, Libya discusses in some depth the factual circumstances in several other cases and tries to show that they involved greater contacts than are present here, or that they demonstrate that mere effects on the forum state are insufficient. However, none of the cases discussed by Libya involves allegations of the intentional destruction of a U.S. carrier aircraft carrying U.S. nationals, when the terrorist act is designed to have an impact upon, and indeed harm, the United States. These other cases are of little help here other than to lay down general principles. As this Court has observed, ultimately, personal jurisdiction inquiries are "'necessarily fact sensitive because each case is dependent upon its own particular circumstances.'" PDK Labs, 103 F.3d at 1108.

Libya also complains about the retroactive nature of the change in sovereign immunity and the fact that it will now have to defend itself in court on the basis of conduct that occurred while Libya believed it was immune from suit. However, the Supreme Court has comfortably upheld the validity of statutory schemes that impose liability after the fact for prior conduct. See, e.g., Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. v. R.A. Gray & Co., 467 U.S. 717 (1984).

In light of the harmful effects that the Pan Am 103 bombing had on the United States, the purposeful creation of these effects in the United States, and the fairness of holding Libya to answer in this forum for its alleged intentional tort, a finding of personal jurisdiction in this case is amply supported.

* * * *

Libya sought certiorari to the Supreme Court to challenge the Second Circuit's holding. In May 1999 the U.S. government submitted a brief on the petition for a writ of certiorari, arguing that the court of appeals correctly held that § 1605(a)(7) was constitutional as applied to the suit against Libya and that the Second Circuit's holding did not conflict with any decision of the Supreme Court or of another court of appeals and, therefore, warranted no further review. The Supreme Court denied Libya's petition for writ of certiorari. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. Rein, 527 U.S. 1003 (1999).

As the court of appeals correctly held, Section 1605(a)(7) as applied to this suit involves "no delegation of legislative power and, necessarily, no unconstitutional delegation either." Pet. App. 36a. Under Section 1605(a)(7), a foreign state's susceptibility to suit for acts such as aircraft sabotage generally turns on whether that state was "designated as a state sponsor of terrorism * * * at the time the act occurred." 28 U.S.C. 1605(a)(7)(A) (Supp. III 1997). Libya had been designated by the Executive Branch as a state sponsor of terrorism well before the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, and before the enactment of Section 1605(a)(7). See p. 3, supra. Thus, when Congress enacted Section 1605(a)(7), it thereby divested Libya of sovereign immunity for the acts alleged in this case. See Pet. App. 35a ("No decision whatsoever of the Secretary of State was needed to create jurisdiction over Libya for its alleged role in the destruction of Pan Am 103."); Id. at 36a (Section 1605(a)(7) "creates jurisdiction directly at the behest of Congress and without any intervening decision by another body."). Moreover, the legislative history suggests that enactment of Section 1605(a)(7) was intended, at least in part, to divest Libya of sovereign immunity in suits concerning Pan Am Flight 103. See note 2, supra. The statute divested Libya of immunity for the acts at issue in this case by incorporating an action previously taken by the Executive Branch; because of this particular sequence of events, no subsequent exercise of delegated authority under Section 1605(a)(7) could either remove or restore Libya's immunity for those acts. Indeed, even if Executive Branch officials had removed Libya from the list of state sponsors of terrorism after AEDPA was enacted, Libya could not assert sovereign immunity in the instant suit, since a subsequent delisting would not alter the fact that the country was "designated as a state sponsor of terrorism * * * at the time the act occurred." 28 U.S.C. 1605(a)(7)(A) (Supp. III 1997).

As the court of appeals observed, an "issue of delegation might be presented if another foreign sovereign—one not identified as a state sponsor of terrorism when § 1605(a)(7) was passed—was placed on the relevant list by the State Department and, on being sued in federal court, interposed the defense that Libya now raises." Pet. App. 35a. As set forth below, Section 1605(a)(7) would be constitutional as applied in that setting as well. But regardless of the proper disposition of that hypothetical case, application of Section 1605(a)(7) to this suit raises no significant constitutional concern.

2. Although the question is not presented in this case, Section 1605(a)(7) would be constitutional even as applied to a country designated as a "state sponsor of terrorism" after the enactment of AEDPA. Section 1605(a) establishes precise and detailed rules concerning the circumstances under which foreign states will be subject to suit in the federal courts. The fact that application of those rules depends in part on Executive Branch determinations creates no constitutional infirmity. To the contrary, Congress's approach is fully consistent with the significant constitutional role and expertise of the Executive Branch in the area of foreign relations. Cf. Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654, 679–680 (1981) (explaining the "longstanding practice" by which the President has undertaken to settle claims of United States nationals against foreign countries); United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319, 320 (1936) (observing that "the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation," and that "he, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries").

As the court of appeals recognized, this Court in Jones v. United States, 137 U.S. 202 (1890), "upheld the existence of federal court jurisdiction even though that jurisdiction depended on a factual determination that had been delegated to the Department of State." Pet. App. 33a. The Court in Jones rejected a constitutional challenge to provisions of the Guano Islands Act of August 18, 1856, Rev. Stat. §§ 5570–5578 (1878 ed.). The Act provided that "any island, rock, or key, not within the lawful jurisdiction of any other government, and not occupied by the citizens of any other government, * * * may, at the discretion of the President, be considered as appertaining to the United States." § 5570. It further stated that crimes committed in such areas "shall be deemed committed on the high seas, on board a merchant-ship or vessel belonging to the United States." § 5576. The Court in Jones sustained the defendant's conviction for a murder committed on Navassa Island, an area that had been designated pursuant to the Act as "appertaining to the United States." The Court rejected the defendant's constitutional challenge to the Act's jurisdictional provisions, explaining that "[w]ho is the sovereign, de jure or de facto, of a territory is not a judicial, but a political question, the determination of which by the legislative and executive departments of any government conclusively binds the judges." 137 U.S. at 212; see also Id. at 224 (concluding that the Act was "constitutional and valid" and affirming the defendant's conviction).

The application of other jurisdictional rules also depends in part on determinations made by the Executive Branch. Diversity jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. 1332(a)(2) and (4)-the statutory provisions that vest the federal district courts with jurisdiction in cases involving citizens of foreign states, and cases in which foreign states are plaintiffs-is predicated upon Executive Branch recognition of the relevant foreign state. See, e.g., Matimak Trading Co. v. Khalily, 118 F.3d 76, 79–85 (2d Cir. 1997) (Hong Kong corporation held not to be a citizen of a foreign state for purposes of diversity jurisdiction because the United States did not recognize Hong Kong as a sovereign state when the suit was filed), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 1091 (1998). This Court's original jurisdiction in cases involving ambassadors and consuls, see U.S. Const. Art. III, § 2, Cl. 2; 28 U.S.C. 1251(b)(1), extends only to diplomatic representatives who are accredited in the sole and absolute discretion of the Executive Branch. See In re Baiz, 135 U.S. 403, 417–418, 428–432 (1890). Diplomatic immunity from suits in United States courts is determined by the State Department's accreditation of a diplomat. See Abdulaziz v. Metropolitan Dade County, 741 F.2d 1328, 1331 (11th Cir. 1984). Head-of-state immunity turns on an Executive Branch determination that a particular individual should be treated as the official head of state. See, e.g., Lafontant v. Aristide, 844 F.Supp. 128, 131–134 (E.D.N.Y. 1994); see also Kadic v. Karadzic, 70 F.3d 232, 248 (2d Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 518 U.S. 1005 (1996).

Petitioners' constitutional claim is particularly misconceived given the manner in which issues of foreign sovereign immunity were resolved before the FSIA was enacted in 1976. Until the enactment of the FSIA, "initial responsibility for deciding questions of [foreign] sovereign immunity fell primarily upon the Executive acting through the State Department, and the courts abided by 'suggestions of immunity' from the State Department." Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 487 (1983); see also Id. at 486 ("this Court consistently has deferred to the decisions of the political branches-in particular, those of the Executive Branch-on whether to take jurisdiction over actions against foreign sovereigns and their instrumentalities"); National City Bank v. Republic of China, 348 U.S. 356, 360 (1955) ("[a]s the responsible agency for the conduct of foreign affairs, the State Department is the normal means of suggesting to the courts that a sovereign be granted immunity from a particular suit"). Although the FSIA reflects Congress's determination that the prior case-by-case approach created unnecessary diplomatic and practical difficulties, see Verlinden, 461 U.S. at 488, nothing in this Court's decisions suggests that the pre-FSIA regime was inconsistent with the Constitution.

3. Petitioners also contend (Pet. 18–23) that the court of appeals erred in holding that it lacked pendent appellate jurisdiction over their other constitutional and statutory challenges to the district court's decision. The United States intervened in this case pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 2403(a) to defend the constitutionality of Section 1605(a)(7). Although the United States argued in the court of appeals that petitioners' additional constitutional claims failed on the merits, we took no position regarding the scope of that court's appellate jurisdiction. Accordingly, the United States will not address that question at the current stage of the proceedings unless requested to do so by this Court.

e. Expropriation

In claims for takings of property, courts examine whether an exception to immunity exists under the FSIA—either the commercial activities exception in § 1605(a)(2), A.3.c. supra, or the international takings exception in § 1605(a)(3), or both. Section 1605(a)(3) provides an exception to immunity in cases "in which rights in property taken in violation of international law are in issue and the property . . . is present in the United States in connection with a commercial activity carried on in the United States by the foreign state; or . . . owned or operated by an agency or instrumentality of the foreign state . . . engaged in a commercial activity in the United States."

(1) Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina

In Siderman, 965 F.2d 699 (9th Cir. 1992), A.2.a. supra, plaintiffs alleged, among other things, that Argentina had expropriated Inmobiliaria del Nor-Oeste, S.A. ("INOSA"), an Argentine corporation owned by the plaintiffs, which included the Hotel Gran Corona, and was retaining the profits from the hotel's continued operation. The district court dismissed the expropriation claims on the basis of the act of state doctrine. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the court could not reach the act of state issue unless it first determined that it had jurisdiction under the FSIA, which it had not done. The Ninth Circuit found that the expropriation claims, as alleged, appeared to fall within both the commercial activities exception set forth in § 1605(a)(2) and the international takings exception of § 1605(a)(3) for purposes of jurisdiction at that stage of the litigation. The court relied on evidence that "Argentina advertises the Hotel Gran Corona in the United States and solicits American guests through its U.S. agent" and that "numerous Americans have stayed at the Hotel, which accepts all the major American credit cards." Id. at 709. The court added: "Because of Argentina's acts in the United States—the solicitation and acceptance of reservations—Americans spend money at the Hotel Gran Corona, money which the Sidermans claim rightfully belongs to them . . . Argentina undertakes those acts, furthermore, in connection with commercial activity elsewhere, mainly its operation of the Hotel. The Sidermans' claims thus fall squarely within . . . the commercial activity exception." Id. at 710.

As to the international takings exception, the court concluded that it was available to the one plaintiff who was not a citizen of Argentina. As to the others, however, the exception "does not apply where the plaintiff is a citizen of the defendant country at the time of the expropriation, because 'expropriation by a sovereign state of the property of its own nationals does not implicate settled principles of international law,'" citing Chuidian v. Philippine Nat'l Bank, 912 F.2d 1095, 1105 (9th Cir. 1990). On the basis of these findings, the Ninth Circuit remanded to the district court to allow Argentina to refute the indications of jurisdiction under the FSIA. If the court found that it had jurisdiction under the FSIA, Argentina could raise the act of state issue at that time.

As to the takings claim, the court reasoned as excerpted below.

. . . At the jurisdictional stage, we need not decide whether the taking actually violated international law; as long as a "claim is substantial and non-frivolous, it provides a sufficient basis for the exercise of our jurisdiction." West v. Multibanco Comermex, S.A., 807 F.2d 820, 826 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 482 U.S. 906 . . . (1987). In West, we described three requisites under international law for a valid taking. First, "valid expropriations must always serve a public purpose." 807 F.2d at 831. Second, "aliens [must] not be discriminated against or singled out for regulation by the state." Id. at 832. Finally, "an otherwise valid taking is illegal without the payment of just compensation." Id. . . .

Susana Siderman de Blake's claim that Argentina violated the international law of expropriation is substantial and non-frivolous. The complaint alleges that Argentina officials seized INOSA for their personal profit and not for any public purpose. The complaint also alleges that Argentina seized INOSA because the Siderman family is Jewish—a discriminatory motivation based on ethnicity. See Restatement § 712 Comment f (noting that "taking that singles out aliens generally, or aliens of a particular nationality, or particular aliens, would violate international law"). Finally, none of the Sidermans has received any compensation for the seizure, let alone just compensation. As in West, we have no difficulty concluding that the Sidermans' complaint contains "substantial and non-frivolous" allegations that INOSA was taken in violation of international law.

Beyond establishing that property has been taken in violation of international law, Susan Siderman de Blake must demonstrate that the expropriated property, or property exchanged for it, is owned or operated by an agency or instrumentality of Argentina and that the agency or instrumentality is engaged in commercial activity in the United States. The Sidermans' allegations establish that INOSA itself has become an agency or instrumentality of Argentina. . . . The final requirement under clause two—that the agency or instrumentality must be engaged in a commercial activity in the United States—is also met. The Sidermans' allegations concerning Argentina's solicitation and entertainment of American guests at the Hotel Gran Corona and the hotel's acceptance of American credit cards and traveler's checks are sufficient at this stage of the proceedings to show that Argentina is engaged in a commercial activity in the United States. . . .

We hold that the Sidermans' complaint and declarations allege sufficient facts to bring their expropriation claims within both the commercial activity and international takings exceptions to the FSIA's grant of foreign sovereign immunity. We emphasize the preliminary nature of our holding; following further development of the factual record on remand, the district court ultimately must determine whether the FSIA exceptions do or do not apply to the expropriation claims. . . .

(2) Soudavar v. Islamic Republic of Iran

In Soudavar v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 186 F.3d 671 (5th Cir. 1999), shareholders in the Khawar Industrial Group ("KIG"), one of the largest industrial enterprises in Iran and a licensee of Mercedes-Benz, sued the Government of Iran alleging that Iran had expropriated their property and nationalized KIG in 1979. Although the law instituting the nationalization made certain provisions for the compensation of KIG's shareholders, the plaintiffs had never been paid. The district court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals vacated the district court's dismissal for failure to state a claim but dismissed the suit for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The court of appeals analyzed the claim under the commercial activities exception, finding that it lacked the requisite jurisdictional nexus with the United States to satisfy that exception: "At the time of the expropriation, the Plaintiffs lived in Iran and their property was in Iran. Hence, the financial loss occurred in Iran. The fact that the Plaintiffs have since become United States residents does not alter this analysis." Id. at 674.

f. Noncommercial tort

Section 1605(a)(5) provides that a foreign state is not immune to suit in any case ". . . in which money damages are sought against a foreign state for personal injury or death, or damage to or loss of property, occurring in the United States and caused by the tortious act or omission of that foreign state or of any official or employee of that foreign state while acting within the scope of his office or employment." The exception does not, however, apply to "(A) any claim based upon the exercise or performance or the failure to exercise or perform a discretionary function regardless of whether the discretion be abused, or (B) any claim arising out of malicious prosecution, abuse of process, libel, slander, misrepresentation, deceit, or interference with contract rights."

(1) Smith v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

In Smith v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 101 F.3d 239 (2d Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 520 U.S. 1204 (1997), A.2.b.(2) supra, which involved claims against the Government of Libya arising out of the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals rejected a contention that Pan Am Flight 103 should be considered to have been territory of the United States for purposes of the noncommercial tort exception. Plaintiffs' argument relied on the principle that "a nautical vessel 'is deemed to be a part of the territory' of 'the sovereignty whose flag it flies.'" See United States v. Flores, 289 U.S. 137 (1933). The court concluded that > the fact that a location is subject to an assertion of United States authority does not necessarily mean that it is the "territory" of the United States for purposes of the FSIA. Cases rejecting FSIA jurisdiction over foreign states for torts committed at United States embassies make this > point clear. See Persinger v. Islamic Republic of Iran, . . . 729 F.2d 835, 839–42 (D.C. Cir. 1984); McKeel v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 722 F.2d 582, 87–88 (9th Cir. 1983).

101 F.3d at 246. See also Rein v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 995 F.Supp. 325 (E.D.N.Y. 1998), aff'd in part, dismissed in part, 162 F.3d 748 (2d Cir. 1998), cert. denied, 527 U.S. 1003 (1999) (finding jurisdiction under subsequently-enacted anti-terrorism exception, discussed in A.3.d.(3). supra).

(2) Moran v. Kingdom of Saudi Arabia

In Moran v. Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, 27 F.3d 169 (5th Cir. 1994), plaintiff, a civilian employee of the U.S. Department of Defense, was seriously injured in an automobile accident, allegedly caused by Royal Saudi Arabian Air Force personnel, at a U.S. Air Force base in Mississippi. He sued the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, among others. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the district court's dismissal of his suit against Saudi Arabia, holding that the noncommercial tort activities exception to the FSIA, in cases covering personal injury and property damage caused by tortious acts or omissions of officers or employees, was limited to actions by those individuals within the scope of their employment at the time of the incident and did not apply to an accident caused while the foreign national was on private business. The court explained:

> The exception can only be met if the officer or employee of the foreign state was acting within the scope of his employment at the time he committed the tortious act or omission. Liu v. Republic of China, 892 F.2d 1419, 1425 (9th Cir. 1989), cert. dismissed, 497 U.S. 1058 . . . (1990). Therefore, the "scope of employment" provision of the "tortious activity" exception requires a finding that the doctrine of respondeat superior applies to the tortious act or omission committed by the officer or employee of the foreign state. Id.

27 F.3d at 173. In this case, a Saudi airman, who was temporarily assigned to the base by the Saudi Arabian Air Force to receive air traffic controller training, was on his way to a personal doctor's appointment at the time of the accident. The appeals court affirmed the district court's conclusion that, under the applicable state law of Mississippi, the airman was driving for personal reasons, his actions were outside the scope of his employment, and therefore the exception to sovereign immunity was inapplicable to Saudi Arabia.

See also Kozorowski v. Russian Federation, No. 93–16388, 1997 U.S. App. LEXIS 26266, 124 F.3d 211 (Table) (9th Cir. 1997) affirming dismissal of an action involving claims against the Russian Federation and its agents for wrongful death, intentional infliction of emotional distress, conspiracy, and fraud and deceit arising out of the executions of plaintiffs' relatives in western Russia during World War II, on a finding that the noncommercial tort did not apply. The court concluded that, assuming the FSIA applied retroactively, claims related to the killings could not satisfy the requirements of 1605(a)(5) because they did not occur in the United States and that other claims constituted libel and fraud, both excluded from the noncommercial tort exception in 1605(a)(5)(B).

g. Arbitration

Section 1605(a)(6) of the FSIA provides:

> A foreign state shall not be immune from the jurisdiction of courts of the United States or of the States in any case . . . in which the action is brought . . . to confirm an award made pursuant to . . . an agreement to arbitrate, if . . . the agreement or award is or may be governed by a treaty or other international agreement in force for the United States calling for the recognition and enforcement of arbitral awards.

In Creighton Ltd v. Government of the State of Qatar, 181 F.3d 118 (D.C. Cir. 1999), the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia examined two theories put forward by Creighton for finding subject matter jurisdiction over Qatar consistent with the FSIA in a case brought in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to enforce an arbitral award. In that case, Qatar had agreed to arbitrate in France any contractual disputes with Creighton Limited, a Cayman Islands corporation with offices in Tennessee that Qatar hired to build a hospital in Doha. Because both the United States and France are parties to the New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, the arbitral award that Creighton Limited subsequently obtained against Qatar from the International Chamber of Commerce in Paris was clearly enforceable in U.S. courts. The court stated: "If Qatar were a private party, then there could be no doubt about the subject matter jurisdiction of the district court; because it is a foreign state, however, we must consider the effect of the FSIA upon the court's power to hear this case." 181 F.3d at 121.

The court first examined and rejected Creighton's claim that Qatar had implicitly waived its sovereign immunity to suit in United States by agreeing to the arbitration in France. Relying inter alia on Seetransport Wiking Trader v. Navimpex Centrala, 989 F.2d 572, 577 (2d Cir. 1993), the court concluded that since Qatar had not signed the Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, "we do not think that its agreement to arbitrate in a signatory country, without more, demonstrates the requisite intent to waive its sovereign immunity in the United States" under § 1605(a)(1) of the FSIA. 181 F.3d 123.

Turning to the arbitration exception in 1605(a)(6), the court noted that Qatar did not contest that this provision "applies by its terms to this action," thus providing an exception to Qatar's sovereign immunity. Id. The court dismissed the suit, however, for lack of personal jurisdiction, finding that Qatar had not waived its objection to personal jurisdiction in the United States by agreeing to arbitrate in France, and that Qatar lacked minimum contacts with the United States with respect to the construction contract.

4. Retroactivity of the FSIA

a. Princz v. Federal Republic of Germany

As discussed in A.2.b.(1)., supra, Hugo Princz sued the Federal Republic of Germany, seeking to recover money damages for injuries he suffered and for slave labor he performed while a prisoner in Nazi concentration camps. The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held that it had subject matter jurisdiction over Hugo Princz's claim against the Federal Republic of Germany for slave labor performed in Nazi concentration camps. Germany appealed. The Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit reversed this holding, and dismissed the case. Princz v. Federal Republic of Germany, 26 F.3d 1166 (D.C. Cir. 1994). The appellate court examined, but did not decide, whether the FSIA applied retroactively to the events occurring in 1942–1945 in this case. In analyzing the statutory exceptions to immunity, if the FSIA did apply, the court of appeals determined that the FSIA's commercial activity exception (§ 1605(a)(2)) would not apply to Mr. Princz's claims because, even if leasing prisoners as slave labor were considered a commercial activity, such activity did not have a "direct effect in the United States." Nor did it agree with the contention that the Third Reich had impliedly waived Germany's sovereign immunity for purposes of § 1605(a)(1) by violating jus cogens norms of the law of nations. Portions of the majority opinion relating to the retroactivity issue are excerpted below.

In 1995 the United States and Germany reached an agreement to provide compensation for Princz and certain other U.S. nationals. See Chapter 8.A.1.c.

II. ANALYSIS

Germany argues that the district court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over Mr. Princz's complaint for damages sounding in tort and quasi contract because the FSIA is the only basis for obtaining jurisdiction over a foreign sovereign in the courts of the United States and this case comes within no exception to the rule of sovereign immunity codified in that Act. In the alternative, Germany argues that the FSIA does not apply retroactively to this case, and that Germany is therefore entitled to absolute sovereign immunity under the law of this circuit as it stood at the time the Nazis enslaved Mr. Princz. . . .

A. What Law Applies?

The FSIA was enacted in 1976. If it applies to this case, which arose from events occurring from 1942 to 1945, then it "provides the sole basis for obtaining jurisdiction over a foreign state in federal court." Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428, 439, 109 S.Ct. 683, 690, 102 L.Ed.2d 818 (1989). Under the Act, the general rule is that of sovereign immunity, subject to various statutory exceptions.

If the FSIA does not apply to this case, then we are presumably remitted to the practice that prevailed in the federal courts during 1942–45, when the events now in suit occurred. During that time, indeed from 1812, when the Supreme Court decided The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 116, 132, 3 L.Ed. 287, until 1952 the United States, as a matter of grace and comity, granted foreign sovereigns "virtually absolute immunity" from suit in the courts of this country. Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 486, 103 S.Ct. 1962, 1967, 76 L.Ed.2d 81 (1983). For their part, the courts consistently . . . deferred to the decisions of the political branches—in particular, those of the Executive Branch—on whether to take jurisdiction over actions against foreign sovereigns and their instrumentalities.

Until 1952, the State Department ordinarily requested immunity in all actions against friendly foreign sovereigns. Id. (citations omitted). In the first half of the 20th century the "restrictive" theory of sovereign immunity increasingly gained international acceptance. Restatement (Third) of The Foreign Relations Law of the United States, Ch. 5 p. 391 (1987). . . .

By enacting the FSIA in 1976, the Congress substantially codified the restrictive theory of sovereign immunity. . . .

There is a strong argument in favor of applying the FSIA retroactively. . . . In declaring the purpose of the FSIA, the Congress directed that "[c]laims of foreign states to immunity should henceforth be decided by courts of the United States and of the States in conformity with the principles set forth in this chapter." 28 U.S.C. § 1602. This suggests that the FSIA is to be applied to all cases decided after its enactment, i.e. regardless of when the plaintiff's cause of action may have accrued. . . .

Indeed, under the teaching of a recent Supreme Court case, application of the FSIA to the pre-1952 events here in suit may not even count as "a genuinely 'retroactive' effect". Landgraf v. USI Film Products, 511 U.S. 244, ——, 114 S.Ct. 1483, 1503, 128 L.Ed.2d 229 (1994). Only a statute that "would impair rights a party possessed when he acted, increase a party's liability for past conduct, or impose new duties with respect to transactions already completed" is truly retroactive. Id. 511 U.S. at ——, 114 S.Ct. at 1505. A statute affecting jurisdiction, on the other hand, "usually 'take[s] away no substantive right but simply changes the tribunal that is to hear the case.' Hallowell [v. Commons], 239 U.S. [506] 508, 36 S.Ct. [202] 202, [60 L.Ed. 409.] Present law normally governs in such situations because jurisdictional statutes 'speak to the power of the court rather than to the rights or obligations of the parties,' Republic Nat. Bank of Miami, [v. U.S.] 506 U.S. [80, ——] 113 S.Ct. [554] 565 [121 L.Ed.2d 474] (Thomas, J., concurring)." Id. 511 U.S. at ——, 114 S.Ct. at 1502. At least when one of the several states is a defendant, an exception of immunity from suit is not such a "right." . . .

We do not have to decide whether the FSIA applies to pre-1952 events, however, in order to resolve this case. . . . [E]ven if the FSIA does apply here, none of the statutory exceptions to foreign sovereign immunity appliees. On the other hand, if the FSIA does not apply to Mr. Princz's claims, and even if Germany is not immune from suit under the pre-FSIA law that would apply, then . . . a federal district court does not have jurisdiction over Mr. Princz's claims because they arise in tort and quasi contract. Mr. Princz offers no case law, and we are aware of none, suggesting that a court can revive the pre-FSIA diversity jurisdiction of § 1332 over cases brought by a United States citizen against a foreign state in order to entertain a case arising from pre-FSIA facts. In either event, therefore, the district court is without subject matter jurisdiction of the present case.

b. Flatow v. The Islamic Republic of Iran

In Flatow v. The Islamic Republic of Iran, 999 F.Supp. 1 (D.D.C. 1998), Stephen Flatow, the father of an American citizen killed in 1995 in a terrorist attack in Gaza, filed a wrongful-death action against the Islamic Republic of Iran and various Iranian officials under the FSIA's terrorism exception to the FSIA, discussed in A.3.d., supra. Although the events complained of by the plaintiff occurred more than a year prior to the enactment of the terrorism exception, the District Court for the District of Columbia, in its opinion excerpted below, found that § 1605(a)(7) did provide a basis for subject matter jurisdiction and entered a default judgment against Iran in favor of Flatow in the amount of $247,513,220.

* * * *

Although the events complained of herein occurred more than a year prior to the enactment of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(7) provides a basis for subject matter jurisdiction. Congress has expressly directed the retroactive application of 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(7) in order to further a comprehensive counterterrorism initiative by the legislative branch of government:

> The amendments made by this subtitle shall apply to any cause of action arising before, on or after the date of the enactment of this Act [April 24, 1996].

§ 221(c) of Pub. L. 104–132. As the Supreme Court has stated with respect to the application of legislation to pre-enactment conduct, "where congressional intent is clear, it governs." Kaiser

Aluminum & Chemical Corp. v. Bonjorno, 494 U.S. 827, 837, 108 L.Ed.2d 842, 110 S.Ct. 1570 (1990). Although the application of statutes to pre-enactment conduct is traditionally disfavored, see Bowen v. Georgetown Hospital, 488 U.S. 204, 102 L.Ed.2d 493, 109 S.Ct. 468 (1988), where "Congress has expressly prescribed the statute's proper reach[,] there is no need to resort to judicial default rules." Landgraf v. USI Film Products, 511 U.S. 244, 271, 128 L.Ed.2d 229, 114 S.Ct. 1483 (1994).

Furthermore, the state sponsored terrorism exception to foreign sovereign immunity is a remedial statute. It creates no new responsibilities or obligations; it only creates a forum for the enforcement of pre-existing universally recognized rights under federal common law and international law. See, e.g., Alvarez-Machain v. United States, 107 F.3d 696, 702 (9th Cir. 1997), cert. denied, 118 S.Ct. 60 (1997) (discussing Torture Victim Protection Act). As with all other civil jurisdiction statutes, 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(7) "'speak[s] to the power of the courts rather than to the rights or obligations of the parties.'" Landgraf, 511 U.S. at 274 (discussing Civil Rights Act of 1991) (citation omitted). Almost all courts have upheld the retroactive application of long-arm statutes. See 2 SUTHERLAND ON STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION at § 41.09 citing McGee v. International Life Ins. Co., 355 U.S. 220, 2 L.Ed.2d 223, 78 S.Ct. 199 (1957).

At the time of the act complained of herein, the terrorist acts enumerated in 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(7) were federal criminal offenses, see 18 U.S.C. § 2331. Given mounting Congressional frustration at the refusal of the federal courts to find jurisdiction in cases such as Princz, Pan Am 103, Cicippio, and Nelson, and the progressive development of United States legislation and jurisprudence on the subject of jus cogens violations, see, e.g., Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767; Kadic v. Karadzic, 70 F.3d 232; Abebe-Jira v. Negewo, 72 F.3d 844 (11th Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 136 L.Ed.2d 51, 117 S.Ct. 96 (1996); Cabiri v. Assasie-Gyimah, 921 F.Supp. 1189 (S.D.N.Y. 1996); Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980); Xuncax v. Gramajo, 886 F.Supp. 162 (D. Mass. 1995). See also Princz, 26 F.3d at 1176 (D.C. Cir. 1994) (Wald, J., dissenting), the creation of an exception to foreign sovereign immunity which provides jurisdiction over foreign state perpetrators of the acts enumerated in 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(7) should not have been unanticipated. "Any expectation . . . [to the contrary] . . . is rightly disturbed." Cabiri, 921 F.Supp. at 1195–96 (S.D.N.Y. 1996) (discussing Torture Victim Protection Act), citing Landgraf, 511 U.S. at 273–275.

The Islamic Republic of Iran in particular has been aware of United States policy condemning international terrorism at least since the 1979–1981 hostage crisis in Tehran. It has been continuously designated a state sponsor of terrorism since January 19, 1984. Its continued support of terrorist groups has prompted the United States to suspend diplomatic relations and participate in the international embargo, including extraordinary enforcement measures such as trade restrictions. See U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, PATTERNS OF GLOBAL TERRORISM 1995 at 23; Iran and Libya Sanctions Act of 1996, Pub. L. 104–72, 104th CONG., 2D SESS. (August 5, 1996), 110 Stat. 1541. As international terrorism is subject to universal jurisdiction, Defendants had adequate notice that their actions were wrongful and susceptible to adjudication in the United States. Eric S. Kobrick, The Ex Post Facto Prohibition and the Exercise of Universal Jurisdiction over International Crimes, 87 COLUM. L. REV. 1515, 1528–30 (1987) (concluding that criminal statutes apply retroactively to international terrorist acts).

Therefore, the state sponsored terrorism provision implicates no Constitutionally protected interest which would prohibit the application of 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(7) to pre-enactment conduct.

5. Injunctions and Equitable Remedies

In Hilao v. Estate of Ferdinand Marcos, 94 F.3d 539 (9th Cir. 1995), a class of alleged victims of torture and victims' representatives brought an action against the estate of Ferdinand Marcos, the deposed president of the Philippines. The district court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, which included a permanent injunction preventing the Republic of Philippines from entering into agreements with Marcos's estate to transfer to the Philippines assets of the estate that the Republic asserted were looted from its treasury. Because the Republic was entitled to sovereign immunity, the court of appeals held the injunction was unenforceable.

B. HEAD OF STATE IMMUNITY

1. Aristide

Lafontant v. Aristide, 844 F.Supp. 128 (E.D.N.Y. 1994), involved a claim against President Jean-Bertrand Aristide of Haiti for the alleged extrajudicial killing of a political opponent. As the court stated: "The question posed by this case is whether the recognized head of a state who has violated the civil rights of a person by having him killed can avoid civil prosecution in this country by virtue of his status." Id. at 129–30. In dismissing the claims against President Aristide pursuant to the U.S. Suggestion of Immunity, the court answered this question in the affirmative. Excerpts below from the court's opinion review the common law head-of-state immunity doctrine and its application to this case, including the court's analysis concluding that neither the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act nor the Torture Victim Protection Act modified the doctrine of head of state immunity or altered the binding nature of the Executive Branch's suggestions of immunity pursuant to that doctrine.

The U.S. Suggestion of Immunity is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. See also discussion of Torture Victim Protection Act in Chapter 6.G.2.

II. Law

A. Common Law Head-of-State Immunity

A head-of-state recognized by the United States government is absolutely immune from personal jurisdiction in United States courts unless that immunity has been waived by statute or by the foreign government recognized by the United States. A visiting head-of-state is generally immune from the jurisdiction of a foreign state's courts. See, e.g., Mr. Saltany v. Reagan, 702 F.Supp. 319 (D.C.C 1988), order aff'd in part, reversed in part (on other grounds), 886 F.2d 438 (D.C.Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 932, 110 S.Ct. 2172, 109 L.ED.2d 501 (1990) (granting head-of-state immunity to Prime Minister of England in suit alleging violations of international law); Kilroy v. Windsor, Civ. No. C-78-291 (N.D.Ohio 1978), (Prince Charles, The Prince of Wales, granted immunity from suit alleging human rights violations in Northern Ireland), excerpted in 1978 Dig.U.S.Prac.Int'l L. 641–43; Psinakis v. Marcos, Civ. No. C-75-1725 (N.D.Cal. 1975), excerpted in 1975 Dig.U.S.Prac. Int'l L. 344–45 (immunity granted to then-President Marcos following suggestion of immunity by the Executive Branch); Kendall v. Saudi Arabia, 65 Adm. 885 (S.D.N.Y. 1965), reported in 1977 Dig.U.S.Prac.Int'l L. 1017, 1053–34.

Head-of-state immunity, like foreign sovereign immunity, is premised on the concept that a state and its ruler are one for purposes of immunity. As early as 1812 the Supreme Court embraced the notion, grounded in customary international law, that a head-of-state is absolutely "exempted" from the jurisdiction of the receiving state's courts. Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 116, 3 L.Ed. 287 (1812).

This absolute form of immunity is based on the notion that all states are equal and that no one state may exercise judicial authority over another. The foreign head-of-state, as representative of his nation, enjoys extraterritorial status when travelling abroad because he would not intend "to subject himself to a jurisdiction incompatible with his dignity, and the dignity of his nation." Id. at 137, 3 L.Ed. 287, see also L. Henkin, International Law 893 (2d Ed. 1987).

Head-of-state immunity is also supported by the doctrine of comity—that is to say, each state protects the immunity concept so that its own head-of-state will be protected when he or she is abroad. Comity has been described as:

> neither a matter of absolute obligation . . . nor of mere courtesy and good will . . . [b]ut it is the recognition which one nation allows within its territory to the legislative, executive or judicial acts of another nation, having due regard both to international duty and convenience, and to the rights of its own citizens or of other persons who are under the protection of its laws.

Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U.S. 113, 163–64, 16 S.Ct. 139 143, 40 L.Ed. 95 (1895). This concept of doing to others as you would have them do to you is the principal rationale for a number of important doctrines of international law. See, e.g., Mitsubishi Motors Corp. v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, Inc. 473 U.S. 614, 105 S.Ct. 3346, 87 L.Ed.2d 444 (1985) (rationale for enforcing arbitration agreements in international contracts rests on comity); The Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U.S. 1, 92 S.Ct. 1907, 32 L.Ed. 513 (1972) (rationale for enforcing forum selection clauses in international contracts rests on comity); First Nat'l City Bank v. Banco Nacional de Cuba, 406 U.S. 759, 762, 92 S.Ct. 1808, 1810, 32 L.Ed.2d 513 (1972) (Act of State rule based on comity).

Like the related doctrine of diplomatic immunity, head-of-state immunity is required to safeguard mutual respect among nations. See, Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States (1986) §§ 464, 455 (diplomatic immunity). Heads of state must be able to freely perform their duties at home and abroad without the threat of civil and criminal liability in a foreign legal system. See, Note, Resolving the Confusion Over Head of State Immunity; The Defined Rights of Kings, 86 Colum.L.Rev. 169 (1986).

The immunity extends only to the person the United States government acknowledges as the official head-of-state. Recognition of a government and its officers is the exclusive function of the Executive Branch. Whether the recognized head-of-state has de facto control of the government is irrelevant; the courts must defer to the Executive determination. Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 410, 84 S.Ct. 923, 031, 11 L.Ed.2d (1964) (Act of State doctrine premised on Executive Branch's recognition of state in question). Presidential decisions to recognize a government are binding on the courts, and the courts must give them legal effect. United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 230, 62 S.Ct. 552, 565, 86 L.Ed 706 (1942) (Executive Branch's determination that recognition of Soviet Union required settlement of claims is binding on the courts).

Since determination of who qualifies as a head-of-state is made by the Executive Branch, it is not a factual issue to be determined by the courts. No judicial hearing or factual determination aside from receipt of the State Department's communication is warranted.

In United States v. Noriega, 746 F.Supp. 1506 (S.D.Fla. 1990), General Noriega, prosecuted criminally in this country, challenged jurisdiction, arguing that he was entitled to head-of-state immunity. Noriega had never been officially recognized by the United States as the head-of-state of Panama. Instead, the United States had recognized President Eric Arturo Delvalle, even though General Noriega held de facto power in Panama and was dealt with as if he were head-of-state by United States officials. General Noriega argued that because he was the de facto ruler of Panama, he was entitled to head-of-state immunity. Noriega, 746 F.Supp. at 1520. This argument was rejected because the grant of immunity is a privilege which the United States may withhold from any claimant. The fact that Noriega controlled Panama did not entitle him to head-of-state immunity absent explicit recognition from the United States. Id. at 1520. The court noted that if Noriega's argument that he was entitled to head-of-state immunity were accepted, "illegitimate dictators [would be granted] the benefit of their unscrupulous and possibly brutal seizures of power." Id. at 1521.

In Saltany v. Reagan, 702 F.Supp. 319 (D.D.C. 1988), residents of Libya brought suit against Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of the United Kingdom, for alleged violations of international law. Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 517 the State Department submitted an immunity letter, suggesting that the court grant Prime Minister Thatcher immunity as the head of government of a friendly foreign state. The court accepted the State Department's suggestion as conclusive, and granted immunity. Saltany, 702 F.Supp. At 320. See also, Restatement (Second) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States (1962) § 66 (defining head-of-state as either the head-of-state or head of government, thus both Queen and Prime Minister are considered the head-of-state); Kilroy v. Windsor (Prince Charles, The Prince of Wales), Civ. No. C-78-291 (N.D.Ohio 1978), excerpted in 1978 Dig.U.S.Prac. Int'l L. 641–43, (holding Prince Charles as heir apparent to the throne is head-of-state in accordance with State Department suggestion of immunity).

The government of a foreign state which is recognized by the Executive Branch may waive its head-of-state immunity. In In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 817 F.2d 1108 (4th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 890, 108 S.Ct. 212, 98 L.Ed.2d 176 (1987), Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos, the former leaders of the Philippines, were found civilly liable for failing to comply with federal grand jury subpoenas. The court held that the doctrine of head-of-state immunity is not an individual right but an "attribute of state sovereignty," a privilege that can be revoked by the foreign state. Corazon Aquino was recognized by the United States as the then head-of-state of the Philippines. The Aquino government waived Mr. and Mrs. Marcos' residual head-of-state or diplomatic immunity in a note to the United States government. The court honored President Aquino's waiver, holding that application of head-of-state immunity to the Marcoses would "clearly offend the present Philippine government, and would therefore undermine the international comity that the head-of-state immunity doctrine is designed to promote." Id. at 1111; see also, Mr. And Mrs. Doe v. United States, 860 F.2d 40 (2nd Cir. 1988).

Similarly, the court held that the foreign government waived immunity in Paul v. Arvil, 812 F.Supp. 207 (S.D.Fla. 1993). Prosper Avril, the ex-Lieutenant-General of the Armed Forces of Haiti and former military ruler of Haiti was sued for alleged violations of international law. Defendant moved to dismiss, claiming head-of-state immunity. The government of Haiti waived any immunity enjoyed by Mr. Avril. Mr. Avril argued that by following Haiti's suggestion of waiver the court would "encourage countries to disavow those former leaders who do not curry favor with the new government." Paul, 812 F.Supp. at 210. The court held that the Haitian government then recognized by the United States could waive head-of-state immunity of the former head of military government, and that waiver extends to whatever "residual" head-of-state immunity defendant possessed. Id.

Waiver of head-of-state immunity is analogous to waiver provisions in the Vienna Convention of Diplomatic Relations, April 18, 1961, 23 U.S.T. 3227, TIAS. No. 7502, 500 U.N.T.S. 95, Articles 31(a), 31(2), and 29, which provide that the immunity of diplomatic agents may be waived by the sending state. Such waiver must be explicit. See Libra Bank Ltd. v. Banco Nacional de Costa Rica, 676 F.2d 47 49 (2d Cir. 1982) (requirement of explicit waiver of foreign sovereign immunity prevents "inadvertent, implied or constructive waiver in cases where the intent of the foreign state is equivocal or ambiguous").

B. Application of Common Law Immunity to Facts

President Aristide is the head-of-state of the Republic of Haiti who is recognized by the U.S. government. He enjoys head-of-state immunity unless there has been a waiver of immunity.

Plaintiff contends that the Republic of Haiti has waived President Aristide's immunity. She argues that the failure of the military rulers of Haiti to comply with the terms of the Governor's Island Agreement constitutes an implied waiver of President Aristide's right to legally govern Haiti and claim head-of-state immunity.

This argument is invalid for several reasons. First, the terms of the Governor's Island agreement do not explicitly or implicitly condition President Aristide's status as President of Haiti on his return to Haiti. Second, even if the agreement did provide for the forfeiture of President Aristide's status, recognition of a head-of-state by courts of the United States is an issue for resolution by the Executive Branch of the United States government. A court may not make an independent inquiry into the facts underlying our government's decision. See United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 62 S.Ct. 552, 86 L.Ed. 796 (1942).

The warrant for President Aristide's arrest issued by a Haitian court and a personal note allegedly signed by President Aristide that purports to declare his renunciation of the Presidential office are without effect on the issue of immunity. Assuming without deciding that these documents are valid, they cannot affect the court's treatment of the suggestion of immunity. The court must rely on the Executive's determination of who is a lawful head-of-state.

Here there has been no explicit waiver of President Aristide's immunity recognized as a waiver by the United States. Unlike In re Mr. And Mrs. Doe, 860 F.2d 40 (2nd Cir. 1988), where the recognized Philippines government specifically waived the Marcoses' head-of-state immunity, the unrecognized de facto rulers of Haiti have no power to and have not undertaken any action accepted by our government as an implicit waiver of immunity. While not decisive, we note that the recognized Ambassador of Haiti to the United States has submitted a letter stating affirmatively that President Aristide is the head-of-state of the Republic of Haiti, and that the embassy does not waive any of the sovereign, head-of-state, or diplomatic immunities that he may enjoy.

The United States government does not recognize the de facto military rulers of Haiti. It has repeatedly condemned their regime. The United Nations has also severely criticized their illegal seizure of power. See, The Situation of Democracy and Human Rights in Haiti: Report of the Secretary General, U.N. GAOR, 47th Sess., Agenda Item 22, U.N. Doc. A/47/975 (July 12, 1993). Because the United States does not recognize the de facto government, that government does not have the power to waive President Aristide's immunity.

Granting President Aristide head-of-state immunity will further the goals of comity. The State Department, in its suggestion of immunity letter, states that "permitting this action to proceed against President Aristide would be incompatible with the United States' foreign policy interests."

The United States foreign policy goal of encouraging democratic elections is strengthened by recognizing President Aristide as the democratically elected head of Haiti. Numerous Executive Orders supporting President Aristide establish that the Republic of Haiti is a "friendly foreign state."

Even, however, if the goal of the United States were less lofty, it would make no difference. In this matter the courts are bound by executive decision.

C. Lack of Statutory Modification of Immunity Law

No statute has modified the long standing rule of international and common law. The two statutes which need to be considered are the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act and the Torture Victim Protection Act.

1. Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act

Any uncertainty as to the current scope of head-of-state immunity is due to passage of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act ("FSIA") in 1976. See Mr. And Mrs. Doe v. United States, 860 F.2n 40, 45 (2nd Cir. 1988); see also, Note, Resolving the Confusion Over Head of State Immunity: The Defined Rights of Kings, 86 Colum.L.Rev. 169, 175 (1986). Until 1952, courts adhered to the theory of absolute immunity, granting foreign states immunity for both public and private acts. In 1952, the State Department published the Tate letter adopting a restrictive theory of immunity which gave foreign states immunity for official public acts, but not for private or commercial acts. Even after 1952, however, the State Department continued to decide immunity issues and submit suggestion of immunity letters distinguishing public and other kinds of acts.

In 1976 the FSIA codified the doctrine of restrictive immunity and transferred the power to make determinations of sovereign immunity based upon public-private-commercial distinctions from the State Department to the federal courts. See H.R.Rep. No. 1487 94th Cong. 2nd Sess. 7, reprinted in 1976 U.S.Code Cong. and Admin.News 6604, 6606 ("A principal purpose of this bill is to transfer the determination of sovereign immunity from the executive branch to the judicial branch, thereby reducing foreign policy implications of immunity determinations and assuring litigants that these often crucial decisions are made on purely legal grounds").

The FSIA created specific, limited exceptions to sovereign immunity, including a commercial activity exception and a tort exception. . . .

* * * *

The Supreme Court held that the FSIA must be applied by district courts in every suit against a foreign sovereign since subject-matter jurisdiction in such cases depends on the existence of a specified exception to foreign sovereign immunity contained in the FSIA. Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 493, 103 S.Ct. 1962, 1971, 76 L.Ed.2d 81 (1983).

Because the FSIA is the sole basis for obtaining jurisdiction over a foreign sovereign, courts have found that the FSIA superseded the State Department's role in "suggesting" sovereign immunity. See Vulcan Iron Works Inc. v. Polish American Machinery Corp., 470 F.Supp. 1060 (S.D.N.Y. 1979) (discussing the legislative history of FSIA and finding Congress particularly concerned with the "politicization" of the suggestion of immunity process in commercial suits).

In Chuidain v. Philippine National Bank, 912 F.2d 1095 (9th Cir. 1990), a Philippine national brought suit against a Philippine government official for dishonoring a letter of credit issued by the Republic of the Philippines to Chuidian. The United States government submitted a suggestion of immunity letter. The court, after determining that there was little practical difference between a suit against a state and against an individual acting in his official capacity, held that the pre-1976 common law suggestion of immunity approach was invalid with respect to foreign sovereign immunity. Chuidian, 912 F.2d at 1103. Because none of the exceptions to the FSIA had been satisfied, the court held that jurisdiction was lacking. Id. at 1106.

The critical question remains: does the common law head-of-state immunity survive the FSIA? The term "head-of-state" is not mentioned in the FSIA. It defines "foreign state" as the state and its agencies or instrumentalities, providing in pertinent part:

> (a) A "foreign State," except as used in section 1608 of this title [service of process], includes a political subdivision > of a foreign state or an agency of instrumentality of a foreign state as defined in subsection (b)

> (b) An "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state" means any entity—
> (1) which is a separate legal person, corporate or otherwise, and

28 U.S.C. § 1603 (1982).

There is some support for the application of immunity under the FSIA to individuals as "instrumentalities" of foreign states. See Kline v. Kaneko, 685 F.Supp. 386 (S.D.N.Y. 1988) (holding Mexican Secretary of Government can be sued in his official capacity and is entitled to FSIA protection); Mueller v. Diggelman, No.82 Civ. 5512, WL 25419 (S.D.N.Y. 1981) (Swiss court is "organ" of state); Rios v. Marshall, 530 F.Supp. 351 (S.D.N.Y. 1981) (foreign labor board is "instrumentality" under FSIA, thus entitling board officials to protection). No case has, however, construed "agency or instrumentality" to include a head-of-state.

The legislative history of the FSIA does not directly address the issue of head-of-state immunity, stating that "an entity which does not fall within the definitions of 1603(a) or (b) would not be entitled to sovereign immunity in any case before a Federal or State court." H.R.Rep. No. 1487, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 15, reprinted in 1976 U.S. Code Cong. and Admin.News 6604, 6614.

That history does demonstrate that the FSIA is not "intended to affect either diplomatic or consular immunity." H.R.Rep. No. 1487, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 12, reprinted in 1976 U.S.Code Cong. and Admin.News, 6610.

> Since the bill deals only with the immunity of foreign states and not its diplomatic or consular representatives, section > 1695(a)(5) [the non-commercial tort exception] would not govern suits against diplomatic or consular representatives but only suits against the foreign state.

Id. at 6620.

One of the Congressional hearings on the bill touched briefly on the role of head-of-state immunity under the FSIA. In testimony before Congress, a Justice Department official discussed hypothetical situations where an exception to foreign sovereign immunity might apply under the FSIA. Focusing on the commercial activity exception, he explained how the FSIA would enable foreign corporations that are government agencies, such as Lufthansa, a West German Government Corporation Airline, to be sued in United States courts. He went on to emphasize that "Now we are not talking, Congressmen, in terms of permitting suit against the Chancellor of the Federal Republic. . . . That is an altogether different question." Immunities of Foreign States: Hearing on H.R. 3493 Before the Subcomm. on Claims and Governmental Relations of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. 16 (1976) (statement of Bruno Ristau, Chief, Foreign Litigation Unit, Civil Division, Department of Justice).

In Estate of Silme G. Domingo v. Republic of the Philippines, 694 F.Supp. 782 (W.D.Wash. 1988), plaintiffs brought suit against then-President Marcos for participation in an alleged conspiracy to "silence his political opposition." The State Department submitted a head-of-state immunity letter. The court granted President Marcos immunity, rejecting plaintiff's argument that in enacting the FSIA, Congress intended to completely eliminate the suggestion of immunity procedure. Relying on the legislative history of the FSIA, the court concluded that Congress did not intend to modify the suggestion of immunity procedure with respect to heads-of-state. Citing to the House report, supra at 6610, (which establishes that enactment of the FSIA was not intended to affect the immunity of diplomatic or consular officials), it reasoned that because it would be illogical to accord a lesser degree of immunity to a foreign head-of-state than to a diplomat appointed by that head-of-state, the legislative history of the FSIA supports the proposition that the FSIA was not meant to alter head-of-state immunity.

The view that the FSIA is inapplicable to a head-of-state comports with both the history of the FSIA and the underlying policy of comity. The FSIA was not designed to apply to diplomatic or other consular officials. Instead, it was crafted primarily to allow state-owned companies, which had proliferated in the communist world and in the developing countries, to be sued in United States courts in connection with their commercial activities. The FSIA took these cases out of the political arena of the State Department, while leaving traditional head-of-state and diplomatic immunities untouched. Scholars have argued that the willingness of the State Department, which co-authored the FSIA, to continue issuing suggestions of immunity for heads-of-state, and the willingness of courts to defer to such suggestions evidences the FSIA's nonapplicability to heads of state. See, Note, Resolving the Confusion Over Head of State Immunity: The Defined Rights of Kings, 86 Colum.L.Rev. 169, 175 n.24 and accompanying text (1986). Both comity and the Executive's plenary role in fashioning foreign policy suggest that the State Department needs to retain decisive control of grants of head-of-state immunity, by preserving the pre-FSIA "absolute" theory of immunity. The language and legislative history of the FSIA, as well as case law, support the proposition that the pre-1976 suggestion of immunity procedure survives the FSIA with respect to heads-of-state.

2. Torture Victim Protection Act

Plaintiff argues that President Aristide should be denied immunity because head-of-state immunity extends only to official acts, and the alleged extrajudicial killing is not an official act under color of law. The scope of head-of-state immunity in this regard has not been conclusively established.

The Second Circuit, in Mr. And Mrs. Doe v. United States, 860 F.2d 40 (2nd Cir. 1988), decided that head-of-state immunity for former President Marcos and his wife had been waived by the Philippines. In dicta, however, the court, citing Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, stated "we believe there is respectable authority for denying head-of-state immunity to a former head-of-state for private or criminal acts in violation of American law." Id. at 45. See also

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, John Doe # 700, 817 F.2d 1108, 1111 (4th Cir. 1987), cert. denied 484 U.S. 890, 108 S.Ct. 212, 98 L.Ed.2d 176 (1987) (declining to decide whether head-of-state immunity extends to unauthorized acts carried out during Mr. Marcos' term or whether it would have been limited to official authorized acts).

Plaintiff relies upon this dicta and the Torture Victim Protection Act ("TVPA"). She sues President Aristide in his individual and official capacity for committing "private, unauthorized criminal acts." Her theory for circumventing head-of-state immunity is unacceptable.

The TVPA on its face does give federal courts jurisdiction over some suits against foreign officials who kill illegally on foreign territory. It provides in part:

> (a) Liability.—An individual who, under actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of any foreign nation—
> (1) subjects an individual to torture shall, in a civil action, be liable for damages to that individual; or
> (2) subjects an individual to extrajudicial killing shall, in a civil action, be liable for damages to the individual's legal representative, or to any person who may be a claimant in an action for wrongful death.
> (b) Exhaustion of remedies.—A court shall decline to hear a claim under this section if the claimant has not exhausted adequate and available remedies in the place in which the conduct giving rise to the claim occurred.
> Sec. 3. Definitions
> (a) Extrajudicial Killing.—For the purposes of this Act, the term "extrajudicial killing means a deliberated killing not authorized by a previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognizable as indispensable by civilized peoples. Such term, however, does not include > any such killing that, under international law, is lawfully carried out under the authority of a foreign nation.

It can be assumed for the purpose of this memorandum, that the killing described in the plaintiff's complaint falls within the statute. Nevertheless, as indicated below, the TVPA does not negate head-of-state immunity. Enacted after Mr. and Mrs. Doe v. United States, 860 F.2d 40 (2nd Cir. 1988), the TVPA is the governing law on the extent of subject matter jurisdiction over foreign tortfeasors not of authority of the courts to exercise personal jurisdiction over a head-of-state.

The TVPA codifies the holding in Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980) which assumed subject matter jurisdiction over foreign individuals (but not states or state agencies) in the case of torture in violation of international law under the Judiciary Act of 1789, ch. 20 § 9(b), 1 Stat. 73, 77 (1789) codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (1948) ("The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States"). Like the FSIA, the language of the TVPA does not specifically mention heads-of-state.

The legislative history of the TVPA lends ample support for the proposition that the Act was not intended to trump diplomatic and head-of-state immunities. See, e.g., Sen.Comm. on the Judiciary, The Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991, S.Rep. No. 249, 102nd Cong., 1st Sess. 7–8 (1991) ("The TVPA is not intended to override traditional diplomatic immunities which prevent the exercise of jurisdiction by U.S. courts over foreign diplomats. . . . Nor should visiting heads of state be subject to suits under the TVPA."); House Comm. on the Judiciary, The Torture Victims Protection Act of 1991, H.R.Rep. No. 367, 102nd Cong., 1st Sess., Pt. 1 (1991), 1992 U.S.Code Cong. and Admin. News 84, 88 ("nothing in the TVPA overrides the doctrines of diplomatic and head-of-state immunity. . . . These doctrines would generally provide a defense to suits against foreign heads of state and other diplomats visiting the United States on official business.").

The Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States (1986) also buttresses this view of continuing head-of-state and diplomatic immunity. Reporter's Note 14 reads:

> Heads of state or government. Ordinarily, a proceeding against a head-of-state or government that is in essence a suit against the state is treated like a claim against the state for purposes of immunity. When a head-of-state or government comes on an official visit to another country, he is generally given the same personal inviolability and immunities as are accorded to members of special missions, essentially those of an accredited diplomat.

How the TVPA interacts with the FSIA was recently indicated by the Ninth Circuit in In re Estate of Ferdinand E. Marcos Human Rights Litigation, 978 F.2d 493 (9th Cir. 1992), cert. denied 508 U.S. 972, 113 S.Ct. 2960, 125 L.Ed.2d 661 (1993). A Philippine citizen brought an action under the TVPA for wrongful death in connection with the extrajudicial killing of her son. Defendant was Imee Marcos-Manotoc, the daughter of former President Ferdinand Marcos and head of military intelligence, who allegedly instructed the police and military intelligence personnel under her control to murder plaintiff's son.

Estate of Marcos did not involve head-of-state immunity. The court found that an "agency or instrumentality" of a foreign state for purposes of the FSIA includes individuals acting in their official capacity. Estate of Marcos, 978 F.2d at 496. Defendant there argued that since Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428, 434, 109 S.Ct. 683, 688, 102 L.Ed.2d 818 (1989), dictates that the FSIA controls the Alien Tort Statute, regardless of whether she was acting in her official capacity, plaintiff must satisfy an exception of immunity in the FSIA for jurisdiction to lie. Because the "tort exception" requires that the tortious conduct occur in the United States, defendant argued that there was no jurisdiction under the FSIA. Estate of Marcos, 978 F.2d at 497.

The court held that the FSIA does not immunize acts of individuals which are outside the scope of their official duties, or beyond the scope of their authority. Id. It found that since the defendant acted on her own without the authority of the state, she could not be considered an "agency or instrumentality" for purposes of the FSIA and that the TVPA was applicable. Id. Because, the court indicated, the TVPA applies to individuals while the FSIA applies to states and state actors, the TVPA will only apply to state actors when they act in their individual capacity —as the defendant, the court held, did in Estate of Ferdinand E. Marcos Human Rights Litigation. Cf. Chuidian v. Philippine National Bank, 912 F.2d 1095, 1102 (9th Cir. 1990) (holding individuals acting in official capacity immune under FSIA and citing Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, 690 n.55, 98 S.Ct. 2018, 2035 n.55, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978) and Morongo Band of Mission Indians v. California State Board of Equalization, 858 F.2d 1376, 1382 n.5 (9th Cir. 1988) in context of a suit against foreign sovereign); Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980) (official torture which violates customary international law is actionable under Alien Tort Statute); Forti v. Suarez-Mason, 672 F.Supp. 1531 (N.D.Cal. 1987) (acts by Argentine military and police constitute official torture actionable under Alien Tort Statute but acts of private torture do not violate international law and are not actionable).

We need not consider whether an act of President Aristide in ordering the killing would be official or private because he now enjoys head-of-state immunity. The courts are barred from exercising personal jurisdiction over him.

III. Conclusion

The State Department has submitted a letter of immunity. It speaks for the President of the United States. Its suggestion of immunity is controlling with respect to President Aristide. The court must defer to the Executive on this matter.

2. Karadzic

As discussed in Chapter 6.G.2.a., Kadic v. Karadzic, 70 F.3d 232 (2d Cir. 1995), involved an action for compensatory and punitive damages (as well as injunctive relief) brought by victims of rape and other human rights violations against Radovan Karadzic, the former self-proclaimed Bosnian Serb president, for killings, torture, and other human rights abuses and violations of international law under, inter alia, the Alien Tort Statute. The federal district court dismissed the case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Doe v. Karadzic, 866 F.Supp. 734 (S.D.N.Y. 1994). The Second Circuit reversed.

As to head of state immunity, the court of appeals noted that the district court had stated "that the Court might be deprived of jurisdiction if the Executive Branch were to recognize Karadzic as the head of state of a friendly nation, . . . and that this possibility could render the plaintiffs' pending claims requests for an advisory opinion. The District Judge recognized that this consideration was not dispositive but believed that it 'militates against this Court exercising jurisdiction.' Doe, 866 F.Supp. at 738."

The United States filed a Statement of Interest with the Second Circuit, arguing that Radovan Karadzic was not entitled to head-of-state immunity. The court of appeals agreed:

> . . . [W]e note that the mere possibility that Karadzic might at some future date be recognized by the United States as the head of state of a friendly nation and might thereby acquire head-of-state immunity does not transform the appellants' claims into a nonjusticiable request for an advisory opinion, as the District Court intimated. Even if such future recognition, determined by the Executive Branch, . . . would create head-of-state immunity, . . . it would be entirely inappropriate for a court to create the functional equivalent of such an immunity based on speculation about what the Executive Branch might do in the future.

3. Noriega

In United States v. Noriega, 746 F.Supp. 1506 (S.D. Fla. 1990), the former Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega was convicted in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida of conspiracy to commit racketeering, racketeering, conspiracy to manufacture, import and distribute cocaine, distribution of cocaine, manufacture of cocaine, and traveling in interstate or foreign commerce to promote unlawful enterprise. At the time of his indictment in February 1988, Noriega served as commander of the Panamanian Defense Forces in the Republic of Panama, and he claimed head of state immunity on the ground that he had functioned as the de facto, if not de jure, leader of his country. The trial court rejected that argument because the U.S. Government never recognized Noriega as Panama's legitimate, constitutional ruler. 746 F.Supp. at 1519–20. The Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit affirmed. United States v. Noriega, 117 F.3d 1206 (11th Cir. 1997), reh'g denied, 128 F.3d 734 (11th Cir. 1997). Excerpts from the decision of the Eleventh Circuit are set out below.

Noriega first argues that the district court should have dismissed the indictment against him based on head-of-state immunity. He insists that he was entitled to such immunity because he served as the de facto, if not the de jure, leader of Panama.

The Supreme Court long ago held that "[t]he jurisdiction of courts is a branch of that which is possessed by the nation as an independent sovereign power. The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself." The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 116, 136, 3 L.Ed. 287 (1812). The Court, however, ruled that nations, including the United States, had agreed implicitly to accept certain limitations on their individual territorial jurisdiction based on the "common interest impelling [sovereign nations] to mutual intercourse, and an interchange of good offices with each other. . . ." Id. at 137. Chief among the exceptions to jurisdiction was "the exemption of the person of the sovereign from arrest or detention within a foreign territory." Id. (emphasis added).

The principles of international comity outlined by the Court in The Schooner Exchange led to the development of a general doctrine of foreign sovereign immunity which courts applied most often to protect foreign nations in their corporate form from civil process in the United States. See Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 486, 103 S.Ct. 1962, 76 L.Ed.2d 81 (1983). To enforce this foreign sovereign immunity, nations concerned about their exposure to judicial proceedings in the United States:

> follow[ed] the accepted course of procedure [and] by appropriate representations, sought recognition by the State Department of [their] claim of immunity, and asked that the [State] Department advise the Attorney General of the claim of immunity and that the Attorney General instruct the United States Attorney for the [relevant district] to file in the district court the appropriate suggestion of immunity. . . .

Ex Parte Republic of Peru, 318 U.S. 578, 581, 63 S.Ct. 793, 795, 87 L.Ed. 1014 (1943) (citations omitted). As this doctrine emerged, the "Court consistently [ ] deferred to the decisions of the political branches—in particular, those of the Executive Branch—on whether to take jurisdiction over actions against foreign sovereigns and their instrumentalities." Verlinden B.V., 461 U.S. at 486, 103 S.Ct. at 1967.

In 1976, Congress passed the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act ("FSIA"), 28 U.S.C. §§ 1602–1611. . . . Because the FSIA addresses neither head-of-state immunity, nor foreign sovereign immunity in the criminal context, head-of-state immunity could attach in cases, such as this one, only pursuant to the principles and procedures outlined in The Schooner Exchange and its progeny. As a result, this court must look to the Executive Branch for direction on the propriety of Noriega's immunity claim. See Kadic v. Karadzic, 70 F.3d 232, 248 (2d Cir. 1995). . . .

Generally, the Executive Branch's position on head-of-state immunity falls into one of three categories: the Executive Branch (1) explicitly suggests immunity; (2) expressly declines to suggest immunity; or (3) offers no guidance. Some courts have held that absent a formal suggestion of immunity, a putative head of state should receive no immunity. See, e.g., In re Doe, 860 F.2d 40, 45 (2d Cir. 1988). In the analogous pre-FSIA, foreign sovereign immunity context, the former Fifth Circuit accepted a slightly broader judicial role. It ruled that, where the Executive Branch either expressly grants or denies a request to suggest immunity, courts must follow that direction, but that courts should make an independent determination regarding immunity when the Executive Branch neglects to convey clearly its position on a particular immunity request. See Spacil v. Crowe, 489 F.2d 614, 618–19 (5th Cir. 1974) (granting petition for writ of mandamus directing district court to follow government's suggestion of immunity in civil case).

Noriega's immunity claim fails under either the Doe or the Spacil standard. The Executive Branch has not merely refrained from taking a position on this matter; to the contrary, by pursuing Noriega's capture and this prosecution, the Executive Branch has manifested its clear sentiment that Noriega should be denied head-of-state immunity. Noriega has cited no authority that would empower a court to grant head-of-state immunity under these circumstances. Moreover, given that the record indicates that Noriega never served as the constitutional leader of Panama, that Panama has not sought immunity for Noriega and that the charged acts relate to Noriega's private pursuit of personal enrichment, Noriega likely would not prevail even if this court had to make an independent determination regarding the propriety of immunity in this case. See generally In re Doe, 860 F.2d at 45 (noting that "there is respectable authority for denying head-of-state immunity to a former head-of-state for private or criminal acts" and finding that immunity claim was waived by the government of the foreign defendant). Accordingly, we find no error by the district court on this point.

4. Sheikh Zayed and Dubai Defendants

Suggestions of immunity were filed on behalf of Sheikh Zayed (President of the United Arab Emirates) in two lawsuits related to the BCCI financial scandal, described in excerpts below. The first suit, Hartmann. v. Sheikh Zayed Bin Sultan Al-Nahyan., 94 Civ. 5547 (S.D.N.Y.), brought by three former outside directors of BCCI, involving allegations of fraud and other violations of U.S. law, was voluntarily dismissed against Zayed and other defendants by plaintiffs. The second case, First American Corp. v. Al-Nahyan, 948 F.Supp. 1107 (D.D.C. 1996), involved allegations of illegal attempts to acquire ownership and control of banking interests in the United States. The court, rejecting arguments that the FSIA governs the immunity of heads of state, held that it was bound by the U.S. Suggestion of Immunity and that Sheikh Zayed was therefore immune from the court's jurisdiction in light of his position as a sitting head of state. Id. at 1119. As to other defendants, referred to as the "Dubai Defendants," the court found that the FSIA did not apply and that neither the act of state nor head of state immunity doctrine barred the suit.

Relevant excerpts from the district court memorandum opinion in First American Corp. v. Al-Nahyan (footnotes omitted) are set forth below. The Suggestions of Immunity filed in Hartmann and First American Corp. are available at www. state.gov/s/1/c8183.htm.

* * * *

The central issue in this case involves an allegation that the defendants, as senior officers, managers, agents and nominees for the Bank of Credit and Commerce International ("BCCI"), illegally and secretly sought to acquire ownership and maintain control of First American Corporation ("FAC") and First American Bankshares ("FAB"), collectively known as First American. The 282-page, 687-paragraph Complaint charges 30 defendants with violations of the Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"), codified at 18 U.S.C. § 1962, common law fraud, breach of fiduciary duty, other tortious conduct, and civil conspiracy. . . .

[Included among the 30 defendants are the "Dubai Defendants":] 1. His Highness Sheikh Zayed Bin Sultan Al-Nahyan ("H.H. Sheikh Zayed"), President of the United Arab Emirates

("UAE") and Ruler of the Emirate of Abu Dhabi. H.H. Sheikh Zayed is also the Chairman of the Supreme Council of Rulers of the UAE, which is the UAE authority responsible for making policy decisions and promulgating and implementing UAE laws;
2. His Highness Sheikh Khalifa Bin Zayed Al-Nahyan ("H.H. Sheikh Khalifa"), the eldest son of Sheikh Zayed and Crown Prince and Deputy Ruler of the Emirate of Abu Dhabi. H.H. Sheikh Khalifa is the designated successor to H.H. Sheikh Zayed as the Ruler of Abu Dhabi. H.H. Sheikh Khalifa was appointed Prime Minister of Abu Dhabi in 1971 and is currently the Chairman of the Abu Dhabi Investment Authority, Chairman of the Supreme Petroleum Council and Deputy Supreme Commander of the UAE Armed Forces;

4. His Excellency Ghanim Faris Al-Mazrui ("H.E. Mazrui") the principal financial advisor to the Ruling Family of Abu Dhabi. This defendant is also the Secretary General of the Abu Dhabi Investment Authority, Chairman of the Department of Private Affairs of Sheikh Zayed, Chairman of the "Committee for the Follow-Up and Supervision of Private Investments" ("Investment Committee") and holds various positions in several Abu Dhabi banks, including BCCI Holdings, BCCI Overseas and BCCI S.A.;

* * * *

Contrary to [two co-defendants'] argument that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1602 et seq., governs H.H. Sheikh Zayed's immunity, the enactment of the FSIA was not intended to affect the power of the State Department, on behalf of the President as Chief Executive, to assert immunity for heads of state or for diplomatic and consular personnel. Lafontant v. Aristide, 844 F.Supp. 128, 137 (E.D.N.Y. 1994); see, e.g., 22 U.S.C. § 254a–e. The United States has filed a Suggestion of Immunity on behalf of H.H. Sheikh Zayed, and courts of the United States are bound to accept such head of state determinations as conclusive. Ex Parte Peru, 318 U.S. at 589; Spacil v. Crowe, 489 F.2d 614, 617 (5th Cir. 1974); Lafontant, 844 F.Supp. at 137 & 139; see Abdulaziz v. Metropolitan Dade County, 741 F.2d 1328, 1331 (11th Cir. 1984); Carrera v. Carrera, 84 U.S. App. D.C. 333, 174 F.2d 496, 497 (D.C. Cir. 1949). Accordingly, the Suggestion of Immunity as to H.H. Sheikh Zayed will be accepted here.

* * * *

First, the Dubai Defendants assert that this Court has no subject matter jurisdiction over this case with regard to them due to the FSIA, act of state doctrine and doctrine of head of state immunity. They argue that "as members of the Ruling Family of the Emirate of Dubai or their alleged 'alter egos' [Stock Holding Company and Crescent Holding Company], [they] are foreign sovereigns, and their investments are investments of public funds." Dubai Defendants' Motion to Dismiss, at 2 & 7–11 (emphasis in original). They contend that their alleged conduct does not fall within an exception to the FSIA, id. at 12, and that both the act of state doctrine and doctrine of head of state immunity bar this suit. Id. at 22–27.

* * * *

. . . [T]the FSIA does not apply to these defendants' actions. The Complaint plainly alleges that the Dubai Defendants are being sued for acts directing their "personal holding compan[ies] and alter ego[s]" to participate in the scheme to fraudulently acquire and maintain ownership of First American. Complaint at ¶ ¶ 20–23 (emphasis added). Use of corporate entities created under the laws of a third country, as the plaintiffs allege Sheikh Rashid and Sheikh Mohammed used their alter egos-Stock Holding Company and Crescent Holding Company-are "presumptively engaging in activities that are either commercial or private in nature." H.R.Rep. No. 94–1487, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 15 (1976) U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 6604, 6613–14; S.Rep. No. 94–1310, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 15 (1976) U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 6604, 6613–14; see Leith v. Lufthansa German Airlines, 793 F.Supp. 808, 810 n.2 (N.D.Ill. 1992). The acts alleged as private investments to act as sham nominees are not activities that are traditionally considered to be "sovereign or governmental in nature." Herbage, 747 F.Supp. at 67. Assuming the facts alleged are true, the plaintiffs have adequately pled that the Dubai Defendants accepted sham loans from BCCI in their personal capacities to acquire and maintain ownership of First American. The FSIA is, therefore, no bar to this suit against these defendants.

The act of state doctrine is equally inapplicable. This doctrine only applies if "the relief sought or the defense interposed would have required a court of the United States to declare invalid the official act of a foreign sovereign performed within its own territory." W.S. Kirkpatrick v. Environmental Tectonics Corp., 493 U.S. 400, 405, 110 S.Ct. 701, 704, 107 L.Ed.2d 816 (1990). As noted above, the allegations against the Dubai Defendants do not implicate "official act[s] of a foreign sovereign;" therefore, the act of state doctrine does not apply.

Nor are the Dubai Defendants entitled to head of state immunity as members of the ruling family of Dubai. The State Department has not suggested immunity on their behalf, and their claim is further undermined since the United States recognizes the Emirate of Dubai only as a political subdivision of the UAE, not as an independent state. See Drexel Burnham Lambert v. Committee of Receivers, 810 F.Supp. 1375, 1377 (S.D.N.Y. 1993), rev'd on other grounds, 12 F.3d 317 (2d Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1069, 114 S.Ct. 1645, 128 L.Ed.2d 365 (1994). Moreover, while there is considerable doubt whether Dubai has the defining characteristics of an independent state under international law, see 1973 Dig.U.S.Prac.Int'l Law 17; Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations § 201 (1987), even were Dubai entitled to recognition as an independent state, the Dubai Defendants would not be entitled to head of state immunity, because none is a sitting head of state. See, e.g., Lafontant, 844 F.Supp. at 132; Republic of Philippines v. Marcos, 665 F.Supp. 793, 797 (N.D.Cal. 1987). See generally Jerrold L. Mallory, Note, Resolving the Confusion Over Head of State Immunity: The Defined Rights of Kings, 86 Colum.L.Rev. 169 (1986).

In Alicog v. Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, 860 F.Supp. 379 (S.D. Tex. 1994), aff'd, 79 F.3d 1145 (table) (5th Cir. 1996), plaintiffs alleged they had been falsely imprisoned and abused while working as servants for the Saudi Royal family in the United States; they filed suit against the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, King Fahd, and other individuals in Texas state court. The King and Kingdom removed the case to federal court, where the claims against the King were dismissed pursuant to a Suggestion of Immunity filed by the United States, and the claims against the Kingdom were dismissed for lack of jurisdiction under the FSIA. The text of the Suggestion of Immunity is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. As to head of state immunity, the court stated:

> Under long-standing international law, the head of a state as recognized by the executive branch of the United States government is immune from personal jurisdiction in United States courts unless that immunity has been waived by our statute or by the foreign government. See 28 U.S.C. § 517 (1966); Saltany v. Reagan, 702 F.Supp. 319, 320 (D.D.C. 1988); Lafontant v. Aristide, 844 F.Supp. 128, 131–32 (E.D.N.Y. 1994). The immunity extends only to the person the United States government acknowledges as the head of state. See Lafontant, 844 F.Supp. at 132. Even if there were a dispute about the actual government in Saudi Arabia, this court must accept the recognition by the United States as conclusive.
> Because there is no dispute and, in any event, because the United States has appeared in this action to acknowledge that King Fahd is the head of state of Saudi Arabia, the king's motion to dismiss will be granted.

6. Pope John Paul II

Pope John Paul II was a named defendant in Guardian F. v. Archdiocese of San Antonio, No. 93-CI-11345 (D. Tex., Mar. 15, 1994), in which plaintiff alleged sexual abuse by a Roman Catholic priest. The United States filed a Suggestion of Immunity recognizing the Pope as the sitting head of state of the Vatican City. Noting the binding nature of the Suggestion, the court dismissed the claims against the Pope. Both the text of the Suggestion of Immunity and the Order dismissing the claims against the Pope are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

C. DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR IMMUNITY

1. Diplomatic Immunity

The United States is a party to the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations done at Vienna Apr. 18, 1961, 23 UST 3227, 500 U.N.T.S. 95 (entered into force for the United States on Dec. 13, 1972) ("VCDR" or "Convention"). It is the practice of U.S. courts to accept the certification by the Department of State of an individual's diplomatic status and entitlement to immunity under the Convention. See, for example, Zdravkovich v. Consul General of Yugoslavia, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS, 15466 (D.C. Cir. June 23, 1998) ("The courts are required to accept the State Department's determination that a foreign official possesses diplomatic immunity from suit. See Carrera v. Carrera, 174 F.2d 496, 497 (D.C. Cir. 1949); Abdulaziz v. Metro. Dade County, 741 F.2d 1328, 1331 (11th Cir. 1984)."). It is also accepted that the VCDR is considered to be a self-executing treaty in U.S. law. Article 32(1) of the VCDR provides that a sending state may waive the immunity of its diplomatic officers.

The Diplomatic Relations Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95–393, 92 Stat. 808, as amended, codified at 22 U.S.C. §§ 254a et seq., provides for diplomats from states that are not parties to the Convention to receive the same privileges and immunities as those of states parties and codifies certain provisions of the Convention as they apply to diplomats from states that are parties. Section 5 of the Act requires dismissal of any action or proceeding brought against an individual entitled to immunity under the Convention (or any other laws extending diplomatic privileges and immunities). 28 U.S.C. § 254d.

In May 1998 the Office of Foreign Missions (in conjunction with the Office of Protocol) in the Department of State published a revised edition of its pamphlet entitled "Diplomatic and Consular Immunity: Guidance for Law Enforcement and Judicial Authorities." Department of State Publication 10524 (rev. May 1998). The pamphlet describes the various categories of foreign mission personnel and the privileges and immunities to which each is entitled, for the benefit of law enforcement officials and others who encounter such issues in practice. The publication may be requested by appropriate judicial and law enforcement offices by email to OFMInfo@state.gov. See also discussion of diplomatic immunity in 767 Third Avenue Associates v. Permanent Mission of the Republic of Zaire to the United Nations, 988 F.2d 295 (2d Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 819 (1993), in D.2. below.

a. Effect of waiver of criminal immunity in civil case

On December 31, 1997, John A. Knab, as Personal Representative of the Estate of Joviane Waltrick, filed a suit seeking damages from the Republic of Georgia and Georgui Makhardaze, a Georgian diplomat who had been involved in a fatal traffic accident in Washington, D.C., resulting in the death of Ms. Waltrick. The District Court of the District of Columbia dismissed the complaint against the diplomat, finding that Georgia had not waived his civil immunity. Knab v. Republic of Georgia, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8820 (D.D.C. May 29, 1998).

Responding to a formal request from the U.S. State Department, the Republic of Georgia had waived the diplomat's immunity from criminal prosecution "so that he can be prosecuted in the United States for the accident that took place on January 3, 1997, in Washington, D.C." The defendant pled guilty and was sentenced to prison. Subsequently, plaintiff filed this case seeking compensation in a civil action for claims related to the accident. On January 9, 1998, plaintiff asked the State Department to request a waiver from the Republic of Georgia for defendant's civil immunity. As described in the court's opinion:

> The State Department replied that it was not its practice to seek waiver of immunity for civil cases. . . . The State Department also stated its opinion that, pursuant to Article 39(2) of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, defendant Makharadze "has residual immunity from the civil jurisdiction of U.S. courts only 'with respect to acts performed . . . in the exercise of his functions as a member of the mission.'" The Department noted, however, that defendant Makharadze would be amenable to suit if the Court determined that "his actions were nondiplomatic in nature."

Excerpts below provide the court's analysis of the defendant's residual immunity to civil actions. Claims against the Republic of Georgia were resolved through settlement by the parties.

Under Article 32(1) of the Vienna Convention, a sending state may waive the immunity of its diplomatic officers, if it wishes.[2] However, such a waiver must be "express," Vienna Convention Art. 32(2). . . .

There is no doubt that the Republic of Georgia expressly waived Makharadze's immunity from criminal jurisdiction when it waived "the diplomatic immunity for Mr. George Makharadze, so that he can be prosecuted in the United States, for the accident that took place on January 3, 1997, in Washington, D.C."

[2] It appears, however, that a diplomatic officer may not, of his own accord, waive his immunity. See e.g., Logan v. Dupuis, 990 F.Supp. 26, 31 (D.D.C. 1997). Therefore, defendant Makharadze has not waived his immunity by appearing in this action, as plaintiff argues, because he lacks the authority to execute such a waiver. Furthermore, even if defendant could waive his immunity, the Court finds that defendant's appearance would not serve as a sufficient waiver.

However, the waiver does not explicitly discuss immunity from civil jurisdiction. Thus, the crucial question is whether the Republic of Georgia has waived defendant's civil immunity as well as his criminal immunity. The Court has been unable to find any published precedent that is directly germane to this issue; surprisingly, it appears to be a question of first impression.

Plaintiff primarily argues that the Vienna Convention does not contemplate a "limited waiver" of immunity; that is, plaintiff asserts that a waiver of any diplomatic immunity waives all diplomatic immunity. . . .

The Court agrees with plaintiff that a "limited waiver" does not seem possible under the Vienna Convention. For example, the Republic of Georgia could not waive defendant's immunity from criminal jurisdiction for purposes of one criminal prosecution and then seek to assert it in another criminal prosecution. However, Article 31 of the Convention does not confer immunity in a single blanket statement, but confers criminal immunity in one sentence and civil and administrative immunity separately, in another sentence. This suggests that the Convention considers immunity from criminal jurisdiction and immunity from civil and administrative jurisdiction to be distinct privileges. Therefore, it is possible that a state may waive one immunity and not waive the other, just as a person may waive his attorney-client privilege as to one document but not as to another. Such a waiver of criminal, but not civil, immunity is not a "limited waiver," but is instead a complete waiver of one immunity, which does not necessarily affect the other, distinct immunity. For this reason, the Republic of Georgia's waiver of defendant Makharadze's criminal immunity does not necessarily affect his civil immunity.

Plaintiff also argues that the Republic of Georgia has, in fact, waived defendant's civil immunity as well as his criminal immunity. While the evidence could perhaps support an inference of such a waiver, however, it certainly does not establish an explicit waiver. . . .

In addition, the State Department has suggested its opinion that defendant Makharadze's civil immunity remains intact. . . .

Although the Court is not obliged to defer to the State Department's opinion, it finds the letter useful evidence. Because plaintiff has not presented any evidence, beyond speculation and hearsay, to suggest that the Republic of Georgia's waiver extends beyond the context of criminal liability, the Court cannot find that it has waived defendant's immunity from civil jurisdiction.

B. Defendant's Current Diplomatic Status

It is undisputed that defendant Makharadze no longer performs diplomatic functions in this country. Plaintiff argues that, even if defendant's immunity from civil jurisdiction is not waived, it does not protect him from suit because he no longer enjoys diplomatic status.

Again, the Court is faced with an issue rarely discussed by American courts. Article 39 of the Vienna Convention states that an official's privileges and immunities end when his diplomatic functions cease. Because defendant Makharadze's diplomatic functions ceased in October of 1997, he no longer enjoys the blanket, functional immunities conferred by the Vienna Convention. However, Article 39 provides that a residual immunity subsists with respect to "acts performed by such a person in the exercise of his functions as a member of the mission." Therefore, defendant's immunity remains intact for acts performed in the exercise of his duties as a diplomatic officer of the Republic of Georgia.

Plaintiff does not contend that the accident on January 3, 1997, occurred outside the scope of those duties; indeed, the Amended Complaint explicitly asserts that defendant Makharadze was acting within the scope of his duty [as part of plaintiff's claims against the Republic of Georgia]. (fn. omitted) Thus, there is no reason to suppose that this accident lies outside the protection of defendant's residual immunity. (fn. omitted) For this reason, defendant's current status does not affect the force of his immunity from civil jurisdiction.

b. Exceptions to diplomatic immunity

(1) Commercial activity exception

In Tabion v. Mufti, 73 F.3d 535 (4th Cir. 1996), the Counselor of the Embassy of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan and his wife were sued for allegedly violating the Fair Labor Standards Act during plaintiff's employment as a domestic. The plaintiff argued that the diplomat's employment of her to perform domestic duties constituted a "commercial activity" for which no immunity is provided under Article 31(1)(c) of the VCDR. In the U.S. Statement of Interest, referred to below, the United States also pointed out that the VCDR's exception for commercial activity is narrower than the FSIA exception for jurisdiction over commercial activities in 28 U.S.C. § 1603(d).

The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the district court's finding that the diplomats were immune. Excerpts from the opinion follow (footnotes omitted). The U.S. Statement of Interest is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The Vienna Convention provides diplomats with absolute immunity from criminal prosecution and protection from most civil and administrative actions brought in the "receiving State," i.e., the state where they are stationed. Article 31 lists three exceptions to a diplomat's civil immunity. Chief among them, and at issue here, is the elimination in Article 31(1)(c) of immunity from actions "relating to any professional or commercial activity exercised by the diplomatic agent in the receiving State outside his official functions." 23 U.S.T. at 3241. Also relevant to the present matter is Article 42's pronouncement that "[a] diplomatic agent shall not in the receiving State practice for personal profit any professional or commercial activity." Id. at 3247.

The United States Department of State narrowly interprets the Article 31(1)(c) exclusion based on the agreement's negotiating history. In a statement of interest filed in the present matter, the State Department concluded that the term "commercial activity" as used in the exception "focuses on the pursuit of trade or business activity; it does not encompass contractual relationships for goods and services incidental to the daily life of the diplomat and family in the receiving State." Statement of Interest of the United States at 4. Substantial deference is due to the State Department's conclusion. See Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176, 184–85, 72 L.Ed.2d 765, 102 S.Ct. 2374 (1982); Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571, 579 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016, 89 L.Ed.2d 312, 106 S.Ct. 1198 (1986), judgment vacated, 10 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 1994); Spacil v. Crowe, 489 F.2d 614, 619 (5th Cir. 1974).

* * * *

It is evident . . . that the phrase "commercial activity," as it appears in the Article 31(1)(c) exception, was intended by the signatories to mean "commercial activity exercised by the diplomatic agent in the receiving State outside his official functions." Day-to-day living services such as dry cleaning or domestic help were not meant to be treated as outside a diplomat's official functions. Because these services are incidental to daily life, diplomats are to be immune from disputes arising out of them.

* * * *

(2) Exception for "real action relating to private immovable property"

In Logan v. Dupuis, 990 F.Supp. 26 (D.D.C. 1997), the court was required to address, among other things, the scope of the exception to diplomatic immunity for "a real action relating to private immovable property" contained in article 31(1)(a) of the VCDR. In this litigation, Logan, a landlord, sought compensation from his tenant, the Alternative Representative of Canada at the Permanent Mission of Canada to the Organization of American States, to whom he had rented an apartment in the District of Columbia. According to the complaint, Dupuis had notified Logan that he planned to vacate the property pursuant to a "diplomatic clause" in the lease, which provided that if the lessee were transferred from Washington "by reason of his official duties" the lease would be terminable upon sixty days written notice. However, Logan alleged that Dupuis was not in fact transferred from the Washington, D.C. area nor did he meet other requirements for early termination of the lease. The district court dismissed the case, finding no applicable exception to defendant's diplomatic immunity. Excerpts from the district court's opinion follow.

This would be a garden-variety breach of contract case, but for the diplomatic status of Dupuis, which potentially shields him from the personal jurisdiction of this Court.[2]

[2] Subject matter jurisdiction appears to lie through 28 U.S.C. § 1351, which vests in federal district courts original jurisdiction over "all civil actions and proceedings against . . . (2) members of a mission or members of their families (as such terms are defined in section 2 of the Diplomatic Relations Act.)." An Agreement between the United States and the Organization of American States, 26 U.S.T. 1026 (Mar. 20, 1975), authorized by 22 U.S.C. § 288g, provides that representatives of OAS member states and their staffs are entitled to "the same privileges and immunities in the United States, subject to corresponding conditions and obligations, as the United States accords to diplomatic envoys who are accredited to it." Whether federal subject matter jurisdiction is cast as a privilege or an obligation, it applies to suits involving members of a diplomatic mission to the United States, and thus appears to apply to Dupuis by virtue of the Agreement.

Contrary to plaintiff's assertion in his Motion to Reinstate Complaint, the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) is inapplicable to the instant action, where the complaint contains no indication that Dupuis entered the lease on behalf of the government of Canada. The FSIA does not confer jurisdiction over foreign diplomats as such, but is the source of federal jurisdiction over suits involving foreign states or their instrumentalities. See Joseph v. Office of the Consulate General of Nigeria 830 F.2d 1018 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. denied 485 U.S. 905, 108 S.Ct. 1077, 99 L.Ed.2d 236 (FSIA governs landlord-tenant dispute where premises leased on behalf of foreign consulate; immunity of consular officer is determined by Vienna Convention on Consular Relations).

II. The question of diplomatic immunity has raised both procedural and substantive complications in this case.[3] With respect to procedure, Dupuis was duly served with the complaint on May 14, 1997, but has not filed an answer or other pleading, and apparently has no intention of doing so. (fn. omitted) On June 4, 1997, a three-page document was filed with the Court by unknown persons, which contained a certification from the Assistant Chief of Protocol of the Department of State that (1) defendant Dupuis is a diplomatic agent entitled to the privileges and immunities set forth in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 23 U.S.T. 3227; TIAS 7502; 500 U.N.T.S. 95, and (2) the government of Canada does not intend to waive any immunity enjoyed by Dupuis. . . .

A Memorandum & Order of July 11, 1997 noted that Dupuis had asserted diplomatic immunity on June 4, 1997, and that plaintiff's motion provided no reason why such immunity did not obtain under the Vienna Convention; accordingly, the motion for entry of default judgment was denied, and the complaint was dismissed without prejudice. On July 25, 1997, however, plaintiff Logan filed a motion to reinstate the complaint, stating that he had been unaware of the defendant's assertion of immunity, and arguing on several grounds that the defendant's diplomatic status does not confer immunity in the context of this lawsuit.

Shortly thereafter, on August 7, 1997, the Court (and the plaintiff) received a letter from the Office of the Legal Adviser at the Department of State, to which was attached a second certification of immunity from the Assistant Chief of Protocol. The certification, like that filed on June 4, 1997, stated that Dupuis is a diplomatic agent who is accorded "privileges and immunities as provided in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations." The certification included, inter alia, an excerpt of Article 31 of the Convention. . . .

[3] See August 7, 1997 Letter from Mary Catherine Malin, Office of the Legal Adviser, Department of State, docket no. 10–1 ("We understand that neither the government of Canada nor Mr. Dupuis intend to take action with respect to [the] above referenced case. . . .")

However, neither the letter nor the attached certification addressed plaintiff's contention that the Convention, by its own terms, does not shield defendant from the instant suit.[4]

Relying on the State Department certification that the defendant's immunity is governed by the Convention, and noting the exception in Article 31 for "a real action relating to private immovable property"—a provision previously called to the Court's attention by plaintiff in his motion to reinstate the complaint—a Memorandum & Order of August 22, 1997 stated that "unless defendant Lionel Alain Dupuis files an opposition to the Motion to Reinstate Complaint on or before September 1, 1997, the Motion will be treated as conceded and default will be reinstated." There have been no subsequent filings by Dupuis or by the Department of State.

III. The failure of Dupuis to answer the complaint or to respond directly to plaintiff's motion may be based on sound diplomatic policy,[5] but it has unfortunately hampered the resolution of the immunity issue in this court, where "the self-interests of the adversaries are relied upon to provide the foundation for sound adjudication." See 13A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice & Procedure, 2d. Civil § 3530 (1984). Here, while the parties appear to agree that the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations defines the scope of immunity to which Dupuis is entitled,

[4] For this reason, the State Department letter is taken to be a certification of diplomatic status, rather than a suggestion of immunity. See Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations § 464 cmt. f (1987) (noting that in addition to certifying a person's diplomatic status, the State Department "will sometimes 'suggest' whether immunity should be granted in the circumstances" of a particular case, and that "such a suggestion is [ ] binding on the courts") (emphasis supplied).

[5] The August 7, 1997 letter from the State Department states: "We understand that neither the government of Canada nor Mr. Dupuis intend to take action with respect to [the] above referenced case, as the government of Canada maintains the position that the receiving state is obligated to take the necessary measures to protect the immunity of diplomatic envoys accredited to it. In reciprocal situations abroad, the United States requests the foreign ministry certify directly to the local court the immunity of U.S. diplomats."

only the plaintiff has advanced an interpretation of the Convention as it applies to the present case. Specifically, plaintiff argues that his suit—which pertains to lease of residential property by defendant in the District of Columbia—falls within the exception to diplomatic immunity contained in Article 31(1)(a) of the Convention for "a real action relating to private immovable property situated in the territory of the receiving State." Unchallenged by the defendant, plaintiff's reading of the Convention appeared, on the basis of plain language, to be correct, and was thus adopted in the Memorandum & Order of August 22, 1997.

However, further research suggests that plaintiff's interpretation of Article 31(1)(a) is inaccurate. While few courts (and, apparently, none in the United States) have had occasion to address the issue, treatises on the law of diplomatic immunity suggest that the term "real action" as used in Article 31(1)(a) does not encompass all civil suits pertaining to real property. One of the leading commentaries on the Convention states:

> The essence of the term "real action" is that the relief sought is either a declaration of title to the property, an order for sale by authority of the court, or an order for possession. The term is used in the sense of an action in rem, and the action in rem is given the sense which it has in many civil law jurisdictions, which, unlike English law, allow proceedings in rem in respect of immovable property.

Eileen Denza, Diplomatic Law 159–60 (1976). See also Charles J. Lewis, State and Diplomatic Immunity 139 (3d ed. 1990) ("[I]t appears from the commentators that 'action reélle' in the original text of the Convention is an action where the ownership or possession of land is in question, and therefore it would be straining the meaning to say that a claim to effect repairs, as opposed to one to take over possession of the premises, was a real action.") While plaintiff's suit concerns real property, it is essentially a breach-of-contract claim, rather than a dispute over title or possession that would normally give rise to in rem jurisdiction. Cf. Agostini v. De Antueno, 199 Misc. 191, 99 N.Y.S.2d 245 (1950) (holding that court has in rem jurisdiction over action to recover possession of real property held by a diplomat) (pre-Convention opinion).

A treaty is to be interpreted "in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in light of its object and purpose." Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, art. 31(1), May 23, 1969, 1155 U.N.T.S. 331 (entered into force January 27, 1980), reprinted in 8 I.L.M. 679 (1969).[6] In this case, the term "real action" has an ordinary legal meaning that does not include.

III. Plaintiff also asserts that his suit falls within another exception to the general immunity conferred by Article 31 of the Convention, that contained in paragraph 1(c): "an action relating to any [6] Although the United States is not a party to the Vienna Convention, it regards the substantive provisions of the Vienna Convention (and specifically, Article 31) as codifying the customary international law of treaties. See Restatement (Third) of The Foreign Relations Law of The United States, Part III, introductory note (1986).

Breach-of-contract actions. See Black's Law Dictionary (6th ed. 1991) (A real action, "[a]t common law, [was] one brought for the specific recovery of lands, tenements, or hereditaments. . . . Among [civil law countries], real actions, otherwise called 'vindications,' were those in which a man demanded something that was his own."). There is no evidence that parties to the Convention intended to attribute any special meaning to the term apart from its historical definition. Denza at 161. By contrast, plaintiff's position rests on reading "real action" to mean "action relating to real property," an interpretation so broad as to encompass not only suits involving rental leases, but any dispute—a claim concerning construction and repair work, an insurance coverage dispute, a personal injury action—somehow related to a piece of real property. Such an expansive reading of "real action" is inconsistent with Article 31 as a whole, which provides diplomats with general immunity from civil jurisdiction, subject to only three exceptions. The purpose of the Convention as stated in the preamble—"to ensure the efficient performance of the functions of diplomatic missions"—confirms that the exceptions to diplomatic immunity should be read narrowly.

In sum, plaintiff's suit for breach of a real estate rental contract does not constitute a "real action relating to private immovable property;" thus, Article 31(1)(a) of the Convention provides no basis for an exercise of this Court's jurisdiction.

professional or commercial activity exercised by the diplomatic agent in the receiving State outside his official functions."

In support of this proposition, plaintiff cites Joseph v. Office of Consulate General, 830 F.2d 1018 (9th Cir. 1987), contending that the court . . . found that the rental of a private residence for a consular officer fell within the exception set forth in Article 31, at paragraph 1.(c). That court found that the consular [sic] had entered the market place as a commercial actor, and that neither the rental agreement nor the alleged breach of that agreement constituted sovereign activities for which he would otherwise be immune from civil lawsuits.

Pl's Mot. to Reinstate. at 4

Plaintiff misreads Joseph, which makes no mention of Article 31(1)(c), but is based instead on the "commercial activity" exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, which governs the jurisdictional immunity of foreign states, rather than individual foreign diplomats.[7] See 28 U.S.C. § 1603 et seq. While the reasoning of the Joseph court could conceivably be applied to interpret Article 31(1)(c) by analogy, another circuit court has recently examined the parameters of Article 31(1)(c) directly. In Tabion v. Mufti, 73 F.3d 535 (4th Cir. 1996), the Fourth Circuit addressed whether the employment of a domestic servant by a foreign diplomat constituted "commercial activity" for purposes of Article 31(1)(c), such that the employment relationship could be the subject of a civil suit in a U.S. court. After considering the term in the context of the Convention as a whole, with regard for the interpretation of "commercial activity" advanced by the State Department both prior to and after ratification of the Convention by the United States, the Tabion court held that contracts for goods and services "incidental to [a diplomat's] daily life" do not fall within the scope of the "commercial activity" exception of Article 31(1)(c). 73 F.3d at 538–39. Moreover, the Tabion court explicitly declined to use the "commercial activity" exception of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act as an interpretative guide to Article 31(1)(c) of the Convention, on grounds that it is a domestic statute rather than a treaty, that it was not a textual source for the Convention, and that Congress did not intend the Act to affect diplomatic immunity under Convention. Id. at 539 n.7.

The Tabion analysis of Article 31(1)(c) is both germane and persuasive. (fn. omitted) The defendant's efforts to secure housing for himself, albeit through a commercial transaction, do not constitute "professional or commercial activity exercised by [a] diplomatic agent" as contemplated by Article 31(1)(c). Thus, they are not excepted from the general immunity from civil jurisdiction accorded to diplomatic agents under the Convention.

IV. Notwithstanding any immunity to which the defendant may be entitled, plaintiff argues that the defendant has waived such immunity by entering a lease which "contemplated adjudication of any dispute in the local and federal courts." Pl's Mot. to Reinstate at 2. Article 32 of the Convention governs waiver of diplomatic immunity, and provides in pertinent part:

1. The immunity from jurisdiction of diplomatic agents . . . may be waived by the sending State.

2. Waiver must always be express.

(emphasis supplied). Dupuis thus has no authority to waive his immunity from civil jurisdiction; that is the prerogative of the government of Canada, which, to date, has declined to do so.[9] Moreover, there are no provisions in the lease which expressly address—let alone purport to waive—the diplomatic immunity otherwise enjoyed by Dupuis. Plaintiff's "waiver of immunity" theory thus cannot be reconciled with the Convention. (fn. omitted).

[9] See August 6, 1997 State Department certification at 2 ("The Permanent Mission of Canada to the Organization of American States has further informed the Department of State that the Government of Canada does not waive Mr. Lionel Alain Dupuis's diplomatic immunity.").

The international conference responsible for drafting the Convention also adopted a resolution which "recommends that the sending state should waive the immunity of members of its diplomatic mission in respect of civil claims of persons in the receiving state when this can be done without impeding the performance of the functions of the mission, and that, when immunity is not waived, the sending state should use its best endeavors to bring about a just settlement of the claims." Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations § 464 Rep. Note 14 (1986). However, waiver and settlement are remedies to be pursued through diplomatic, rather than judicial channels. See Grant V. McClanahan, Diplomatic Immunity 86 (1989) ("Where a citizen or a company has suffered damages and cannot get redress through litigation because of diplomatic immunity, the protocol office [of the State Department] makes itself available to both sides to seek a resolution of the problem.").

In light of the foregoing, an accompanying Order shall vacate the Memorandum & Order of August 22, 1997, and deny plaintiff's Motion to Reinstate Complaint.

(3) Suits against insurers

Section 7 of the Diplomatic Relations Act, codified at 22 U.S.C. § 1364, permits "direct actions" for personal injury, death or property damage against the insurers of individuals entitled to immunities under the VCDR or the 1946 Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, Feb. 13, 1946, 21 U.S.T. 1418, 1 U.N.T.S. 16 (entered into force for the United States on April 29, 1970). Such actions are within the original and exclusive jurisdiction of the federal district courts.

In Urlic v. American International Group, No. 96 Civ. 1177, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5947 (S.D.N.Y. May 1, 1997), plaintiff, a U.S. citizen, sought to recover damages for personal injury and loss of consortium arising from an accident in Croatia involving a vehicle owned by the United Nations Protection Force ("UNPROFOR") and operated at the time in question by an individual affiliated with UNPROFOR. Defendants denied that they were in fact the insurers of UNPROFOR and asserted that, in any event, § 1364 was inapplicable to accidents occurring outside the United States. The court agreed and granted their motion to dismiss. Relevant excerpts from the court's opinion are reproduced below.

Section 1364 was enacted in 1978 as part of the Diplomatic Relations Act (the "Act"), Pub. L. No. 95–393, 92 Stat. 808 (1978). The Act, which constituted a substantial revision of [U.S. domestic] law of diplomatic immunity, contained two provisions which are of relevance to this lawsuit. Section 6 of the Act, now codified at 22 U.S.C. § 254e, requires members of diplomatic missions to acquire liability insurance for risks "arising from the operation in the United States of any motor vehicle, vessel, or aircraft." Section 7 of the Act, codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1364, which forms the basis for this lawsuit, establishes a right of action on behalf of a person injured by a member of a diplomatic mission to proceed directly against the wrongdoer's insurer. These two provisions were meant to correct the inequity which would arise when a person was injured by a member of a diplomatic mission and subsequently left without a remedy because the wrongdoer was entitled to diplomatic immunity. Windsor v. State Farm Ins. Co., 509 F.Supp. 342, 344–45 (D.D.C. 1981). This inequity was remedied by (1) requiring diplomats to obtain insurance and (2) allowing injured persons to sue the diplomats' insurers directly. Id. at 345. The legislative history of the Act sets forth the intent of Congress:

> During the consideration of this legislation, it became apparent that the most serious problems of diplomatic immunity arose in connection with traffic accidents caused by foreign diplomats. Strong support was shown for mandatory liability insurance as a method of providing redress for victims of accidents caused by diplomatic personnel. Furthermore, the hearings pointed out that a procedure merely requiring diplomatic personnel to carry liability insurance . . . would not, by itself, insure an > opportunity to obtain compensation since certain diplomatic personnel are personally immune from suit. To provide an effective remedy, Senator Mathias and the administration witnesses urged the committee to enact, as part of the comprehensive revision of United States law dealing with diplomatic immunity, a "direct action" statue which would allow an injured party to sue the insurance company directly, without infringing upon the inviolability of a diplomat in those instances where personal immunity from suit may be validly invoked on behalf of the diplomat under the Vienna Convention or under other applicable international agreements. Such a mechanism is provided for in section 7. . . .

Taking into consideration all evidence of legislative intent, including the language of the Act itself as well as its legislative history, we conclude that Plaintiffs have failed to overcome the presumption that Congress intended section 1364 to apply solely to injuries occurring within the United States. The express language of the Act contains no reference to the applicability of section 1364 where an American citizen is injured in a foreign country by a person who has diplomatic immunity. The only express reference to territoriality is contained in section 6 of the Act, which imposes an insurance requirement only for those risks "arising from the operation in the United States of any motor vehicle, vessel, or aircraft." (emphasis added) Plaintiffs point out that the words "in the United States" do not appear in section 7 of the Act, which creates the direct right of action that Plaintiffs seek to invoke. However, we do not find this argument persuasive. The legislative history of the Act shows that the insurance requirement of section 6 and the direct action provision of section 7 were meant to go hand-in-hand to provide relief to persons injured by diplomats. See S.Rep. No. 95–1108, at 3 (stating that requiring diplomats to carry insurance would not be sufficient to accord complete relief to injured persons; a right to sue the diplomats' insurers would also be necessary); S.Rep. No. 95–958, at 8 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 1935 (stating that witnesses at committee hearings "urged the committee to adopt a 'direct action' provision to accompany any legislation that might impose a mandatory liability insurance requirement on the diplomatic community. Therefore, section 7 [of the Act] creates a substantive right of an injured or damaged party to proceed directly against the insurance company where the insured diplomat enjoys immunity from suit.").

The legislative history of the Act reveals that Congress was largely concerned with the problem of automobile accidents caused by negligent diplomats on the streets of Washington, D.C., New York City, and other parts of the United States. . . .

Plaintiffs resort to two possible grounds in an attempt to overcome the presumption against extraterritorial effect, but these grounds lack merit. First, Plaintiffs contend that the presumption should not apply to a statute, such as section 1364, which does not regulate conduct, but merely serves to create a right to sue. However, this argument does not comport with existing precedent. The Second Circuit has indicated that the presumption should apply to all types of statutes. . . .

Second, Plaintiffs contend that the presumption against extraterritorial effect is overcome by the broad language of section 1364, which lacks an express statement disclaiming extraterritorial effect, and by the broad remedial purpose of the statute, which seeks to provide relief to Americans injured by tortfeasors who have diplomatic immunity. However, the presumption cannot be overcome merely by pointing to broad terminology in the statute. . . .

Finally, we note that other courts have accorded the presumption so much weight as to deny extraterritorial effect even in circumstances where there existed some evidence of a legislative intent to reach conduct occurring in foreign countries. See, e.g., Labor Union of Pico Korea, 968 F.2d at 194 (holding that section 301 of Labor Management Relations Act did not apply extraterritorially, despite fact that section 301 contained language making it applicable "without regard to the citizenship of the parties."); Hammell v. Banque Paribas, 780 F.Supp. 196, 199–200 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) (holding that New York Human Rights Law did not apply extraterritorially, despite fact that statute was expressly made applicable to acts "committed outside this state [New York]."). In the case at bar, there is no evidence of legislative intent to give extraterritorial effect to section 1364, which would of course entail trials in this country arising out of accidents occurring abroad. Such trials often present special problems with respect to the availability of witnesses and proof. Although Congress has an interest in the protection of American citizens wherever they are injured, we conclude that the presumption against extraterritoriality has not been overcome.

2. Consular Privileges and Immunities

The United States is a party to the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, done at Vienna Apr. 24, 1963, 21 U.S.T. 77, 596 U.N.T.S. 261 (entered into force for the United States December 24, 1969) ("VCCR").

In Gerritsen v. Consulado General de Mexico, 989 F.2d 340 (9th Cir. 1993), a political protester sued senior officials of the Mexican Consulate General in Los Angeles. As described by the court of appeals, > Gerritsen . . . distributed Spanish and English language pamphlets, newspapers, and handbills near the Consulate; he gave speeches (sometimes using a loudspeaker or megaphone) there; and, sometimes attempted to confront the Consulate officials directly about various policies of the Mexican government.

> Gerritsen's theory is that Mexican Consulate officials, the City of Los Angeles and its employees, park security guards, the LAPD, and the FBI conspired to deprive him of his First Amendment rights to distribute political literature, engage in political speech, and participate in other expressive activities. He alleges that the consular defendants inhibited his activities by asking him to desist in his protests and disruptions of consular business, > threatening to take legal action against him, assaulting him, falsely imprisoning him, and kidnapping him.

On appeal from the district court's summary judgment ruling in favor of the Consulate General and several consular officers, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. Excerpts below address the immunity of the two consular officials.

Immunity of consular officials is governed by Article 43 of the Vienna Convention: "Consular officers and consular employees shall not be amenable to the jurisdiction of the judicial or administrative authorities of the receiving State in respect to acts performed in the exercise of the consular functions." 21 U.S.T. at 104. The term "consular functions" is defined in the several clauses of Article 5. Only one of these clauses is relevant here, 5(m), the catch-all provision which states:

> . . . any other functions entrusted to a consular post by the sending State which are not prohibited by the laws and regulations of the receiving State or to which no objection is taken by the receiving State or which are referred to in the international agreements in force between the sending State and the receiving State.

21 U.S.T. at 82–85.

. . . The functions of protecting the dignity and premises of the Consulate are reasonable functions of a foreign mission in this country, and they are not illegal in and of themselves. . . . [W]e agree [with the district court] that this was a "consular function" within the meaning of the Vienna Convention.

This does not end our inquiry, however, as the Vienna Convention also requires that the acts for which the consular officials seek immunity must be "performed in the exercise of the consular functions" in question . . .

We . . . conclude, based upon the record before us . . . , that the defendants' actions constitute reasonable efforts to effectuate the consular function of maintaining the dignity and safety of the Consulate. Consul Escobar's reliance on government officials in the host country (including the local police and the U.S. Attorney) was reasonable in the context of Gerritsen's repeated disruptions and refusals to leave the Consulate. Likewise, Escobar's and Silva's verbal warnings and threats, without accompanying physical contact, were attempts to persuade Gerritsen to leave the area or to desist from disrupting consular business.

In Ford v. Clement, 834 F.Supp. 72 (S.D.N.Y. 1993), aff'd without opinion, 29 F.3d 621 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 513 U.S. 974 (1994) plaintiff Sonia Ford, the Vice Consul for Maritime Affairs for the Panamian Consulate in New York, brought an action against Consul General Luis Felipe Clement and the Republic of Panama alleging that the Consul General had, among other things, improperly caused her to be discharged. The court noted that "[a]ccording to a September 21, 1990, letter from Richard Gookin, Associate Chief of Protocol for the United States Department of State, the United States had, effective September 5, 1990, recognized Mr. Clement as a consular officer in New York and extended to him the immunities set out in the [VCCR]." 834 F.Supp. At 74. Mr. Gookin had stated further that "whether a particular action or activity would be considered to be an exercise of a person's consular functions is a matter for judicial determination." Citing Gerritsen, supra, the court addressed a "two-part inquiry" to determine whether "the actions of the consular officials implicated some 'consular function' " and whether the acts for which the consular officials sought immunity were " 'performed in the exercise of the consular functions' " in question. Id. at 75. The court dismissed the claims, concluding that > . . . Mr. Clement's actions in dealing with Mrs. Ford and in communicating with Panamanian officials regarding

> Mrs. Ford were "performed in the exercise of" his consular functions of managing and supervising the consular staff so as to effectuate other consular functions. Moreover, although the finding of immunity may leave Mrs. Ford without a remedy in American courts, "some unfairness to the wronged party is inherent in the notion of immunity." Koeppel, 704 F.Supp. at 524. It would be unsound international policy to allow the courts of one nation to sit in judgment about the delicate policy decisions of another nation regarding the supervision and management of its consular personnel, especially those at the level of vice consul. The claims against Mr. Clement must therefore be dismissed.[3]

See also Mateo v. Perez, 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4871 (S.D.N.Y. 1999), involving a claim of defamation against the Consul General of the Dominican Republic in New York City arising inter alia from statements made at a press conference. The defendant moved to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction based on consular immunity under Article 43 of the VCCR and jurisdictional immunity under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act ("FSIA"). The district court found the FSIA inapplicable. Citing Ford and Gerritsen, supra, however, the court noted that Article 43 affords immunity protections when the alleged actions were performed in the exercise of consular functions, and scheduled an evidentiary hearing to resolve that issue.

Using the same analysis, the court in Berdakin v. Consulado de la Republica de El Salvador, 912 F.Supp. 458

[3] . . . [T]he dismissal of an action under the Vienna Convention "does not leave foreign consuls free to abuse legal rights with impunity." Koeppel, 704 F.Supp. at 523. The State Department possesses means to deal with the unacceptable behavior of foreign diplomats. See Heaney v. Government of Spain, 445 F.2d 501, 505 (2d Cir. 1971); Vienna Convention, Article 23 (receiving state may declare a consular officer "persona non grata").

(C.D. Cal. 1995), involving an action against the Consulate and Consul General of El Salvador by a landlord alleging breach of a lease for consulate premises, found the Consul General immune under the VCCR. In that case the Consul had entered into the lease for the space occupied by the Consulate. The Court concluded "that obtaining space in which to operate the Consulate is a legitimate consular function, and that entering into a lease to procure such space is a reasonable means of fulfilling that function. The possibility that the Consul's actions in vacating the premises constitute a breach of the lease does not affect the Court's conclusion that the Consul's acts which plaintiff complains of were performed in the exercise of consular functions."

D. INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

1. International Organizations Immunities Act

The International Organizations Immunities Act of 1945 ("IOIA"), Title I of the Act of Dec. 29, 1945, ch. 652, 59 Stat. 669, codified as amended at 22 U.S.C. §§ 288–288k, specifies the privileges and immunities to which certain public international organizations are entitled under U.S. law. The term "international organization" is defined to mean "a public international organization in which the United States participates pursuant to any treaty or under the authority of any Act of Congress authorizing such participation or making an appropriation for such participation, and which shall have been designated by the President through appropriate Executive order as being entitled to enjoy the privileges, exemptions, and immunities provided in this subchapter." The IOIA provides that designated international organizations enjoy immunity from suit and judicial process to the extent provided to foreign governments, immunity of assets from execution, and inviolability of archives. A list of designated organizations is available at 22 U.S.C. § 288 note.

a. Designations

In addition to international organizations already designated under the IOIA, during the period 1991–1999, the following organizations were designated by executive order as indicated:

Border Environmental Cooperation Commission, Exec. Order No. 12904, Mar. 16, 1994, 59 Fed. Reg. 13,179.

Commission for Labor Cooperation, Exec. Order No. 12904, Mar. 16, 1994, 59 Fed. Reg. 13,179.

European Space Agency [formerly European Space Research Organization (ESRO)], Exec. Order No. 11318, Dec. 5, 1966, 31 Fed. Reg. 15,307; Exec. Order No. 11351, May 22, 1967, 32 Fed. Reg. 7511; Exec. Order No. 11760, Jan. 17, 1974, 39 Fed. Reg. 2343; Exec. Order No. 12766, June 158, 1991, 56 Fed. Reg. 28,463.

Hong Kong Economic and Trade Offices, Exec. Order No. 13052, June 30, 1997, 62 Fed. Reg. 35,659.

International Criminal Police Organization (INTERPOL) (limited privileges), Exec. Order No. 12425, June 16, 1983, 48 Fed. Reg. 28,069; Exec. Order No. 12971, Sept. 15, 1995, 60 Fed. Reg. 48,617.

International Development Law Institute, Exec. Order No. 12842, Mar. 29, 1993, 58 Fed. Reg. 17,081.

International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources, Exec. Order No. 12986, Jan. 18, 1996, 61 Fed. Reg. 1693.

Interparliamentary Union, Exec. Order No. 13097, Aug. 7, 1998, 63 Fed. Reg. 43,065.

Israel-United States Binational Industrial Research and Development Foundation, Exec. Order No. 12956, Mar. 13, 1995, 60 Fed. Reg. 14,199.

Korean Peninsula Energy Development Organization, Exec. Order No. 12997, Apr. 1, 1996, 61 Fed. Reg. 14,949.

North American Development Bank Exec. Order No. 12904, Mar. 16, 1994, 59 Fed. Reg. 13,179.

North Pacific Marine Science Organization, Exec. Order No. 12894, Jan. 26, 1994, 59 Fed. Reg. 4237.

Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons, Exec. Order No. 13049, June 11, 1997, 62 Fed. Reg. 32,471.

World Trade Organization, Exec. Order No. 13042, Apr. 9, 1997, 50 Fed. Reg. 28,301.

b. Enforcement of child and spousal support orders

In July 1998 the Department of State responded to complaints concerning the difficulty of obtaining documents from international organizations to determine the salary and benefits of international organization employees involved in family law proceedings and of obtaining enforcement of U.S. child and spousal support decrees entered against employees of international organizations. Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright sent a diplomatic note to the chiefs of all international organizations designated under the IOIA requesting that voluntary steps be taken to resolve the issue. The Secretary also sent a personal cover letter to chief officials of the United Nations, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the Inter-American Development Bank making a special appeal for their leadership on this issue. In response, all major international organizations headquartered in the United States that had not already done so formulated and published a written policy on employee failure to pay court-ordered child and spousal support. Following promulgation of the new policies, compliance with child and spousal support court orders improved markedly. The full text of the July 1998 diplomatic note, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

It is recognized and generally accepted that international organizations need privileges and immunities in order to carry out their functions. The United States Government believes, however, that it is highly inappropriate for international organizations to allow their privileges and immunities to be used by employees of the organizations to avoid meeting their court-ordered obligations to divorced spouses and dependent children. Recent cases drawn to the attention of the Department of State indicate that the practices and policies of some international organizations are not effective in ensuring prompt compliance with court orders in family separations and divorce proceedings involving employees of the organizations.

The Secretary of State requests that steps be taken promptly to ensure that all international organizations designated under the IOIA voluntarily provide court-ordered or subpoenaed information required to determine the salary and benefits of an employee involved in divorce and family law proceedings, and that all international organizations voluntarily take steps to enforce court-ordered payments to divorced spouses and dependent children. Moreover, the Secretary of State requests that the international organizations' policies and practices in this regard are transparent and readily available to employees and spouses who may be engaged in family separation and divorce proceedings.

The Secretary of State commends those international organizations which have already taken steps to establish such practices and policies, and encourages others to do so as soon as possible. Otherwise, the perception that immunities are being used to avoid just financial obligations is likely to lead to the imposition of non-voluntary remedies which may result in either a diminution of privileges and immunities under the IOIA or protracted litigation, neither of which is in the best interest of the international organizations community.

The United States Government is considering various means to address this problem. To enable the Department of State to represent accurately to other entities of the United States Government the international organizations' policies and practices with respect to court-ordered child and spouse support, as well as measures taken to inform employees and spouses of these practices and policies, the chiefs of the international organization are also requested to provide the Department of State with the most current information available about their organization on this subject. . . .

c. Garnishment proceeding

In Atkinson v. Inter-American Development Bank, 156 F.3d 1335 (D.C. Cir. 1998), the plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment in the district court that her former husband's employer, the Inter-American Development Bank ("Bank") was not immune from garnishment proceedings under the IOIA. At the request of the former husband, the Bank had previously paid appellant monthly alimony and child support from salary due him. This action sought to enforce two state court judgments by garnishing his wages.

The court of appeals affirmed the dismissal of the declaratory judgment action by the district court, stating that the IOIA entitled the Bank to "'enjoy the same immunity from suit and every form of judicial process as is enjoyed by foreign governments, except to the extent that such organizations may expressly waive their immunity for the purpose of any proceedings or by the terms of any contract.' 22 U.S.C. § 288a(b)." In addressing plaintiff's argument that the Bank had waived its immunity, the court noted that the Agreement Establishing The Inter-American Development Bank, Apr. 8, 1959, Art. XI, Section 3, 10 U.S.T. 3068, 3095, had been construed as waiving immunity for some suits, but found that that waiver was not applicable here.

The plaintiff also contended "that the IOIA, by virtue of its reference to 'the same immunity from suit and every form of judicial process as is enjoyed by foreign governments,' . . . incorporates the commercial activities exception to immunity, a central doctrine of the modern law governing the immunity of foreign governments from judicial process." She argued that payment of wages constituted a commercial activity so that her garnishment proceeding was not barred. The court rejected this argument, as excerpted below (footnotes omitted). Finally, the court found that, even if there were a commercial activity exception, it would not apply to the garnishment proceeding.

The key phrase at issue in this case is the "same immunity . . . as is enjoyed by foreign governments." 22 U.S.C. § 288a(b) (emphasis added). Obviously, the 1945 Congress was legislating in shorthand, referring to another body of law—the law governing the immunity of foreign governments—to define the scope of the new immunity for international organizations. But did the 1945 Congress mean to refer to the law governing the immunity of foreign governments as it existed in 1945, or to incorporate as well—as appellant claims—subsequent (i.e., post-1945) changes to that body of law? When Congress enacted the IOIA in 1945, foreign sovereigns enjoyed—contingent only upon the State Department's making an immunity request to the court—"virtually absolute immunity." Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 486. . . . In 1952, however, the landscape changed when the State Department announced its adoption of the restrictive theory of immunity, under which immunity is confined to suits involving the foreign sovereign's public acts, and does not extend to cases arising out of a foreign state's strictly commercial acts. . . . In 1976, Congress addressed problems of political pressure and non-uniformity inherent in this dual branch scheme by codifying the principle of restrictive immunity and shifting responsibility for its application to the courts. Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976. . . .

* * * *

The text of the IOIA unfortunately provides no express guidance on whether Congress intended to incorporate in the IOIA subsequent changes to the law governing the immunity of foreign sovereigns. That does not mean, however, that the statutory text is completely unhelpful. As explained above, the IOIA sets forth an explicit mechanism for monitoring the immunities of designated international organizations: the President retains authority to modify, condition, limit, and even revoke the otherwise absolute immunity of a designated organization. See 22 U.S.C. § 288. It seems, therefore, that Congress was content to delegate to the President the responsibility for updating the immunities of international organizations in the face of changing circumstances. This built-in mechanism for updating the IOIA undermines appellant's claim that Congress intended a different updating mechanism: automatic alteration of the scope of immunity under the IOIA in accordance with developments in the law governing the immunity of foreign sovereigns.

The legislative history supports this reading. The Senate Report describes the provision delegating to the President the authority to modify an organization's immunities as "permitting the adjustment or limitation of the privileges in the event that any international organization should engage, for example, in activities of a commercial nature." S. REP. No. 861, 79th Cong., 1st Sess., at 2 (1945). . . .

In light of this text and legislative history, we think that despite the lack of a clear instruction as to whether Congress meant to incorporate in the IOIA subsequent changes to the law of immunity of foreign sovereigns, Congress' intent was to adopt that body of law only as it existed in 1945—when immunity of foreign sovereigns was absolute. (As we noted above, absolute immunity under the IOIA is merely a baseline that is subject to modification by executive order.) . . .

2. Inviolability of Missions to the United Nations

In 767 Third Avenue Associates v. Permanent Mission of the Republic of Zaire, 988 F.2d 295 (2d Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 819 (1993), the landlord of Zaire's Mission to the United Nations sought to evict it from the rental premises for failure to pay rent due. The U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York granted the landlord summary judgment and Zaire appealed. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed, holding that the inviolability of Zaire's Mission to the United Nations under international and U.S. law precluded its forcible eviction. The United States had filed an amicus curiae brief and appeared in support of the Mission's inviolability. Excerpts from the Second Circuit opinion follow.

This appeal emerges out of a landlord-tenant dispute. When the Zaire mission to the United Nations occupying leased space on the east side of midtown Manhattan repeatedly fell into arrears on its rent, it was sued by its landlord. The tenant's defense against being evicted was diplomatic immunity. A district court refused to credit this defense and instead granted summary judgment to the landlord for back rent and also awarded it possession of the premises, ordering United States Marshals to remove the Mission physically if it failed to vacate in a timely manner.

Enforcement of an owner's common law right to obtain possession of its premises upon the tenant's non-payment of rent may not override an established rule of international law. Nor under the guise of local concepts of fairness may a court upset international treaty provisions to which the United States is a party. The reason for this is not a blind adherence to a rule of law in an international treaty, uncaring of justice at home, but that by upsetting existing treaty relationships American diplomats abroad may well be denied lawful protection of their lives and property to which they would otherwise be entitled. That possibility weighs so heavily on the scales of justice that it militates against enforcement of the landlord's right to obtain possession of its property for rental arrears.

* * * *

The inviolability of a United Nations mission under international and U.S. law precludes the forcible eviction of the Mission. Applicable treaties, binding upon federal courts to the same extent as domestic statutes, see Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Franklin Mint Corp., 466 U.S. 243, 260–61, 104 S.Ct. 1776, 1786–87, 80 L.Ed.2d 273 (1984); United States v. Palestine Liberation Org., 695 F.Supp. 1456, 1464 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), establish that Zaire's Permanent Mission is inviolable. The district court erred in misinterpreting the applicable treaties and in carving out a judicial exception to the broad principle of mission inviolability incorporated in those agreements.

Although the United States' support for appellant is based solely on a number of relevant treaties, the district court rested its decision in part on an interpretation of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1602–1611 (1988). That Act deserves brief discussion since the landlord continues to raise its provisions. While Sage Realty correctly asserts that Congress aimed to permit courts to make sovereign immunity determinations, see Id. § 1602, plaintiffs give short shrift to the Act's explicit provision that it operates "[s]ubject to existing international agreements to which the United States is a party." Id. § 1609. Because of this provision the diplomatic and consular immunities of foreign states recognized under various treaties remain unaltered by the Act. See Mashayekhi v. Iran, 515 F.Supp. 41, 42 (D.D.C. 1981) ("Under the FSIA . . . , what were then 'existing international agreements' remain[] valid and superior to the FSIA wherever terms concerning immunity contained in the previous agreement conflict with the FSIA."); see also 14 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3662, at 393 (2d ed. 1985) (the FSIA was "not[ ] intended to alter either diplomatic or consular immunity"). Since international agreements entered into by the United States control the protections that must be accorded to and the obligations owed to the Mission by the United States, the Act does not govern our decision.

II. International Agreements

A. Generally

The international agreements presented us and relied upon by the United States all pre-date the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. They include the United Nations Charter, 59 Stat. 1031 (1945), the Agreement Between the United Nations and the United States of America Regarding the Headquarters of the United Nations, June 26–Nov. 21 1947, 61 Stat. 754, 756 [hereafter the U.N. Headquarters Agreement], the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, adopted Feb. 13, 1946, 21 U.S.T. 1418 [hereafter the U.N. Convention on Privileges and Immunities], and the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, done Apr. 18, 1961, 23 U.S.T. 3227 [hereafter the Vienna Convention].

The first three of those treaties provide for various diplomatic protections and immunities without specific reference to mission premises. The U.N. Charter, for example, provides "[r]epresentatives of the Members of the United Nations and officials of the Organization shall similarly enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organization." U.N. Charter, supra, Art. 105(2). The U.N. Headquarters Agreement states that representatives of member states "shall, whether residing inside or outside the headquarters district, be entitled in the territory of the United States to the same privileges and immunities . . . as it accords to diplomatic envoys accredited to it." U.N. Headquarters Agreement, supra, Art. V(4). The Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations recites in somewhat more detail that representatives of member states shall "enjoy the following privileges and immunities: (a) immunity from personal arrest or detention . . . ; (b) inviolability for all papers and documents; . . . (g) such other privileges, immunities and facilities not inconsistent [with] the foregoing as diplomatic envoys enjoy. . . ." U.N. Convention on Privileges and Immunities, supra, Art. IV, § 11.

B. Vienna Convention

While these Treaty provisions standing alone shed little light on the immunities granted a permanent mission, the 1961 Vienna Convention speaks directly to the issue of mission premises. Article 22 of that Convention declares:

> 1. The premises of the mission shall be inviolable. The agents of the receiving State may not enter them, except with the consent of the head of the mission.

Article 22, section 2 of the Vienna Convention goes on to note a host state's "special duty" to protect "the premises of the mission" from "any intrusion or damage" and "prevent any disturbance of the peace of the mission or impairment of its dignity"; Article 22, section 3 further states that the premises of a mission shall be immune from "search, requisition, attachment or execution." Mission premises covered by the Convention include both owned and leased property. See Report of the International Law Commission, Diplomatic Intercourse and Immunities, U.N. GAOR, 13th Sess., Supp. 9, U.N. Doc. A/3859 (1958), reprinted in [1958] II Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 89, 95, U.N. Doc. A/CN.4/SER.A/1958/Add.1.

The other treaties referred to above are consistent with the Vienna Convention's broad interpretation of inviolability, and support the notion that the United States and the United Nations recognize extensive immunity and independence for diplomats, consulates and missions abroad. But because the Vienna Convention remains the most applicable of the treaties cited, our discussion centers on it.

With that connection as a starting predicate, we observe that the district court's judgment—and Sage's arguments supporting it—fail to take into full account the plain language of Article 22. That language contains the advisedly categorical, strong word "inviolable" and makes no provision for exceptions other than those set forth in Article 31, which are irrelevant to our discussion because they relate to personal activities not carried out on behalf of the sending state. Instead of interpreting the deliberately spare text of the Vienna Convention, the district court read into it an exception of its own making. It first observed that "the notion of protection from eviction from privately owned leased premises was not specifically addressed by any of the treaties." This statement is correct so far as it goes. But we part company with the district court when—using that statement as a foundation—it improperly concluded that this case must therefore fall under an unspecified exception to the rule safeguarding a mission's inviolability.

As the United States correctly points out, the drafters of the Vienna Convention considered and rejected exceptions, opting instead for broad mission inviolability. For instance, one proposal in an early Convention draft offered an exception to the prohibition on any non-consensual entry by the receiving state. The exception posed was one to be strictly limited to emergencies presenting "grave and imminent risks" to life, property or national security. See Diplomatic Intercourse and Immunities, Projet de codification du droit relatif aux relations et immunites diplomatiques, U.N. Doc. A/CN.4/91, reprinted in [1955] II Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 9, 11, U.N. Doc. A/CN.4/SER.A./1955/Add.1. This proposed exception that would have altered the rule of mission inviolability then existing under customary international law, Id. at 16, was not adopted. The 1957 draft of the article covering the subject of mission inviolability rejected the proposed exception, and this exception never resurfaced in later drafts. See Report of the International Law Commission, Diplomatic Intercourse and Immunities, U.N. GAOR, 12th Sess., Supp. 9, U.N. Doc. A/3223 (1957), reprinted in [1957] II Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 131, 136, U.N. Doc. A/CN.4/SER.A/1957/Add.1 [hereafter 1957 Report of Int'l Law Comm'n]. The commentary to the draft article that was ultimately adopted explicitly emphasized the lack of exceptions to inviolability, stating "the receiving State is obliged to prevent its agents from entering the premises for any official act whatsoever." Id. at 137. Nothing could be stated more plainly.

C. History Leading to Vienna Convention

History supports the concept of inviolability expressed in Article 22. Among the laws of nations is the notion that ambassadors must be received and that they must suffer no harm. Diplomatic Intercourse and Immunities, Memorandum prepared by the Secretariat, U.N. Doc. A/CN.4/98, reprinted in [1956] II Y.B. Int'l L. Comm'n 129, 132, U.N. Doc. A/CN.4/SER.A/1956/Add.1 [hereafter Secretariat Memorandum]. Beginning 1000 years ago when merchants went to foreign lands seeking trade, they sought to have their disputes settled by judges of their choice administering their own national laws. In 1060, for example, Venice was granted the right to send magistrates to Constantinople to try Venetians charged in civil and criminal cases. 1957 Report of Int'l Law Comm'n, supra, at 73. A similar process occurred in the western part of the Mediterranean basin where special magistrates called "consul judges" were appointed to settle disputes between foreign traders and local merchants. Id. at 74. Because of the growth of international trade the use of consuls spread. By 1251 Genoa had a consul in Seville and in 1402 there were consuls of the Italian republics in London and the Netherlands. Before the end of the fifteenth century England had consuls in Italy and Scandinavia. Id.

In the 16th and 17th centuries individual states took over from traders the task of sending consuls, and the function of the consul was dramatically altered. Judicial duties were eliminated and replaced by the diplomatic functions of looking after the state's interests in trade, industry and shipping. As official state representatives, consuls enjoyed corresponding privileges and immunities. By the 18th century all the major trading states had exchanged consuls. The United States set up its first consulate in France in 1780. Id. at 75.

Because of the extraordinary growth of consulates during the 19th century, attempts to codify the rules of international law on that subject began in the 20th century. Id. at 77–78. A forerunner of these attempts was the Congress of Vienna in 1815. Rosalyn Higgins, Editorial Comment, The Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities: Recent United Kingdom Experience, 79 Am.J.Int'l L. 641, n.3 (1985) [hereafter Higgins, Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges]. In 1927 the Inter-American Commission of Jurists prepared a draft of 26 articles on consuls, which served as the basis for the Convention regarding Consular Agents signed at Havana, Cuba on February 28, 1928. In 1932 Harvard Law School prepared drafts of conventions for the codification of international law on diplomatic privileges and immunities. The International Law Commission added the subject "consular intercourse and immunities" to those selected for codification at the first session of the United Nations Secretariat in 1949, which the General Assembly approved, and began by the usual appointment of a Special Rapporteur on this question. See 1957 Report of Int'l Law Comm'n, supra, at 82. The study continued from 1956 to 1959 and his commentary provided the foundation work leading to the 1961 Vienna Convention at which 81 nations participated. Higgins, Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges, supra, at 641 n.3.

The Vienna Convention entered into force April 24, 1964. One hundred and thirteen member states have ratified it, including the United States on December 13, 1972. See Office of the Legal Advisor, U.S. Department of State, Treaties in Force: A List of Treaties and Other Agreements of the United States in Force on January 1, 1991; Satow's Guide to Diplomatic Practice 106–09 (Lord Gore-Booth ed., 5th ed. 1988). History establishes beyond question therefore that the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations was intended to and did provide for the inviolability of mission premises, archive documents, and official correspondence. See Parry & Grant, Encyclopedic Dictionary of International Law 193 (Clive Parry et al. eds., 1988).

III. Inviolability Recognized Without Exception

A. Under International Law

The fact that the Vienna Convention codified longstanding principles of customary international law with respect to diplomatic relations further supports the view that the Convention recognized no exceptions to mission inviolability. See Higgins, Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges, supra, at 642 (The Vienna Convention "is agreed to be largely confirmatory of existing customary law."); Secretariat Memorandum, supra, at 134. The Convention codified a wide range of diplomatic protections accorded foreign missions over the centuries, see Higgins, Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges, supra, at 641–42, and recognized the independence and sovereignty of mission premises that existed under customary international law.

Under such law the inviolability of mission premises had become by the 18th century an established international practice, see Satow's Guide to Diplomatic Practice, supra, at 106–09, and represented an integral part of the diplomatic privileges accorded envoys abroad. See Francis Deak, Immunity of a Foreign Mission's Premises From Local Jurisdiction, 23 Am.J.Int'l L. 582, 587 (1929); 1 L. Oppenheim, International Law 793–95 (H. Lauterpacht ed., 8th ed. 1955). The United States and other nations had abided by the inviolability of mission premises long before the Vienna Convention entered into force. See IV Green H. Hackworth, Digest of International Law 562 (1942) (noting that Foreign Service regulations recognized mission inviolability years before the convention was concluded).

Although diplomatic privilege and mission inviolability arose under various now-outdated theories, including Grotius' notion of the "sacredness of Ambassadors" and the conception of the diplomat as personifying the foreign state's sovereign, see Lori J.

Shapiro, Foreign Relations Law: Modern Developments in Diplomatic Immunity, 1989 Ann.Surv.Am.L. 281, 282 [hereafter Shapiro, Developments], modern international law has adopted diplomatic immunity under a theory of functional necessity. See Id. at 283. Under that doctrine, the United States recognizes the privileges of foreign diplomats in the U.S. with the understanding that American diplomats abroad will be afforded the same protections from intrusions by the host state. The most secure way to guarantee this protection, the United States tells us, is through blanket immunities and privileges without exception.

The risk in creating an exception to mission inviolability in this country is of course that American missions abroad would be exposed to incursions that are legal under a foreign state's law. Foreign law might be vastly different from our own, and might provide few, if any, substantive or procedural protections for American diplomatic personnel. Were the United States to adopt exceptions to the inviolability of foreign missions here, it would be stripped of its most powerful defense, that is, that international law precludes the nonconsensual entry of its missions abroad. Another related consideration is the frequent existence of a small band of American nationals residing in foreign countries, often business personnel. Recent history is unfortunately replete with examples demonstrating how fragile is the security for American diplomats and personnel in foreign countries; their safety is a matter of real and continuing concern. Potential exposure of American diplomats to harm while serving abroad and to American nationals living abroad is not "pure conjecture," as plaintiffs blithely assert.

The narrow reading of the Vienna Convention urged by Sage Realty and adopted by the district court is inadequately supported. Citing only selective examples of the protection accorded by the Convention and other international agreements, Sage Realty fails to account for the functional necessity of mission inviolability. In a weak attempt to demonstrate that only extreme behavior is covered by Article 22, plaintiffs refer to a 1986 meeting of the U.N. General Assembly urging the suppression of terrorist action against missions and a 1967 U.N. study noting that the U.S. is under an obligation to protect the U.N. headquarters district from

"hostile demonstrations" outside mission premises. Similarly, the district court relied upon selected search and seizure type of protections afforded to missions and their documents to insist that only sudden unexpected intrusions are governed by the Convention. However, as explained below, the circumstance of a sudden intrusion is largely beside the point and results in a restricted view of the Vienna Convention at odds with its purport and practice.

B. Purpose and Practice Under Article 22

To begin with, the examples used by the district court do not conflict with the broad language of "inviolability" appearing in the Convention's text, nor do they confute the longstanding international support for mission inviolability. Instead, upon proper analysis, sudden intrusion and protection against search and seizure further support the sanctity of mission premises. Nothing in the commentary to the draft articles suggests that fears about "mob violence" and "unannounced seizures" were ever the main concerns underlying diplomatic immunities, as the district court mistakenly believed. See, e.g., 1957 Report of Int'l Law Comm'n, supra, at 137 (emphasizing respect due to a mission, noting that process servers may not even serve papers without entering at the door of a mission because that would "constitute an infringement of the respect due to the mission"). Perhaps most telling, no support may be found for an interpretation of limited inviolability in either the commentary to the Vienna Convention or the scholarly literature concerning the convention and the customary international law principles it codified.

Plaintiffs' position is also refuted by what has occurred in practice. The United States has consistently respected the complete inviolability of missions and consulates. Even in extreme cases U.S. authorities will not enter protected premises without permission following, for example, bomb threats. Nor have local authorities been permitted to enter to conduct health and building safety inspections without the consent of the mission involved. See, e.g., Eleanor C. McDowell, Digest of United States Practice in International Law 1976 198–99 (1977). An affidavit from the counselor for Host Country Affairs for the United States Mission to the United Nations attests that after the Soviet mission to the U.N. was bombed in 1979, the FBI and local police officers were all refused entry to the mission until the Soviets consented to allow certain law enforcement officers to enter. Absent such consent, the United States tells us, government officials would not have attempted to enter the Soviet mission's premises.

Additional support for the position we take here is found in decisional law. The Supreme Court has made clear: "When the parties to a treaty both agree to the meaning of a treaty provision, and that interpretation follows from the clear treaty language, [the court] must, absent extraordinarily strong contradictory evidence, defer to that interpretation." Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176, 184–85, 102 S.Ct. 2374, 2379, 72 L.Ed.2d 765 (1982); accord In re Air Disaster at Lockerbie, Scotland on December 21, 1988, 928 F.2d 1267, 1280 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 920, 112 S.Ct. 331, 116 L.Ed.2d 272 (1991). This case presents such a situation. Treaty language uses the term "inviolability" and the Convention contains no exceptions relevant to this case. Because the United States agrees to an accepted interpretation of the Vienna Convention, and because no evidence appears of a contrary interpretation advanced by any of the United Nation members, all of whom are parties to the Convention, see G.A. Res. 41/78, U.N. GAOR, 41st Sess., Supp. No. 53, at 260, U.N. Doc. A/41.53 (1986) (General Assembly resolution emphasizing inviolability of missions as prerequisite to carrying on diplomatic functions and stressing States' duties to protect mission premises as required by international law), federal courts must defer to the language of Article 22. Cf. Concerned Jewish Youth v. McGuire, 621 F.2d 471, 474 (2d Cir. 1980) (recognizing U.S. obligations under Article 22 of the Vienna Convention), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 913, 101 S.Ct. 1352, 67 L.Ed.2d 337 (1981).

Hence, that portion of the district court's order awarding Sage Realty immediate possession of the premises and directing U.S. Marshals to remove the mission, its effects, and its personnel physically from the premises must be reversed.

IV. Contrary Holding Foreclosed

We recognize that there are negative policy implications from the ruling we propose. The undisputed economic burden of inviolability, for example, falls most heavily upon the private landlord, not on the government that urges inviolability of mission premises. Yet, an interest in fairness to the landlord does not justify creating a judicial gloss on the concept of mission inviolability

Particularly in recent years, attention has focused on an array of abuses of diplomatic privilege, see, e.g., Higgins, Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges, supra, at 642–43 (noting diplomats and their families committing wide range of petty and more serious offenses in England), and a number of reforms to various diplomatic immunities have been suggested. See Shapiro, Developments, supra, at 281, 294–306. Nevertheless, reform of mission inviolability has not been undertaken, and the doctrine continues without exception to be the rule. Cf. Higgins, Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges, supra, at 646 ("[N]otwithstanding popular and ill-informed views to the contrary, the inviolability of premises is not lost by the perpetration from them of unlawful acts."). Reforming the Vienna Convention may well be a valid objective. But federal courts are an inappropriate forum to accomplish the amendment of a multilateral treaty to which the United States is a party. See Shapiro, Developments, supra, at 295 (judicial reform "would threaten a loss of consistency in the application of the Vienna Convention from country to country and could have dangerous international repercussions in the form of reciprocal action by other states").

Congress is of course the branch of government best suited to address the full array of concerns involved in altering the Vienna Convention. Already, the legislature has enacted the Diplomatic Relations Act of 1978, 22 U.S.C. §§ 254a–e (1988), to counter some of the more flagrant abuses of diplomatic privilege observed in this country. That Act gives the President the power "on the basis of reciprocity" to establish privileges and immunities for missions and their members "which result in more favorable or less favorable treatment than is provided under the Vienna Convention." Id. § 254c. Although the act requires liability insurance coverage for diplomatic missions and their representatives and families to insure against negligence arising from the operation of motor vehicles, vessels or aircraft, Id. § 254e, it contains no restrictions on mission inviolability. While Congress and the President—via the Diplomatic Relations Act—possess the power to limit mission inviolability, neither has chosen to exercise that power. Our sister branches of government may more appropriately initiate whatever revision, if any, of the Vienna Convention is deemed necessary. Cf. Palestine Liberation Org., 695 F.Supp. at 1465 ("Congress has the power to enact statutes abrogating prior treaties or international obligations entered into by the United States").

This is not to say that Sage Realty is left wholly without a remedy for the mission's egregious, albeit explicable, shortcoming in rent payments. The Zairian Mission has not raised any challenge to the district court's authority to award monetary damages in favor of the landlord. Such judgment—even absent forcible eviction—is not without weight: to date, diplomatic efforts and pressure have proven extraordinarily successful at getting Zaire to pay the judgment for its back rent. The State Department has diligently pursued the matter on behalf of plaintiffs and went so far as to demand the expulsion of several Zairian diplomats if the judgment was not paid by a certain deadline.

A landlord in Sage Realty's position that desires to rent to a foreign mission may also be able to protect itself by requesting a waiver of inviolability in advance or by demanding additional security. The market rate for rent to such tenants might itself rise to incorporate risks posed by mission inviolability. In any event, the district court's worry that landlords in New York's rental market might shut out foreign missions because of their untouchable status appears overblown, especially since Sage Realty apparently continues negotiating for a new lease with the Zairian mission. If a sophisticated landlord like Sage Realty bears some risk in renting to a U.N. mission, it is not without notice of the diplomatic immunities with which it may later become entangled.

3. Tax Assessment on World Bank Contractor

International Bank for Reconstruction and Development v. District of Columbia, 171 F.3d 687 (D.C. Cir. 1999), involved an action against the District of Columbia seeking recovery of tax-deficiency assessments levied against an independent contractor that provided services for the cafeteria operations of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development ("World Bank" or "Bank"). This case involved the tax immunity conferred on the Bank pursuant to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act of 1945, 22 U.S.C. §§ 286–286m. Article VII, § 9(a) provides: "The Bank, its assets, property, income and its operations and transactions authorized by this Agreement, shall be immune from all taxation and from all customs duties. The Bank shall also be immune from liability for the collection or payment of any tax or duty." The district court granted summary judgment for the Bank on the ground that operation of the food-service program fell within the scope of the "operations and transactions" for which the Bank enjoyed immunity. On appeal, the D.C. Circuit reversed, holding that while the property, income, operations and transactions of the Bank were immune from federal, state, and local taxation, the private contractor's provision of food services was not "an 'operation' of the Bank" (emphasis in the original). Therefore, the court concluded, the private contractor "in performing its food service contract at the World Bank's headquarters, did not share the Bank's immunity from the District's laws and use taxes."

E. ACT OF STATE

Under the act of state doctrine as developed by courts in the United States, U.S. courts generally abstain from sitting in judgment on acts of a governmental character done by a foreign state within its own territory. Because this doctrine is often invoked in cases involving issues of immunities, act of state is addressed here. See I Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 1713, and Digest 2001 at 525–56 for a discussion of W.S. Kirkpatrick & Co. v. Environmental Tectonics, 493 U.S. 400 (1990). See also, Faysound Ltc. v. Walter Fuller Aircraft Sales, Inc., 748 F.Supp. 1365 (E.D. Ark. 1990) (no act of state where treaty sets clear governing legal standards and where receiver acted under authority of a foreign court); Virtual Defense and Development International, Inc. v. Republic of Moldova, 133 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C. 1999) (no act of state in cancellation of commercial contract); World Wide Minerals, Ltd. v. Republic of Kazakhstahn, 116 F.Supp.2d 98 (D.D.C. 2000) ("act of state" doctrine precluded adjudication of claim against state because U.S. court would have to review foreign state's denial of export permits.) See also Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina, 965 F.2d 699 (9th Cir. 1992), as discussed in A.3.e.(1), supra; First American Corp. v. Al-Nahyan, 948 F.Supp. 1107 (D.D.C. 1996), in B.4., supra.

In 1997 in the context of defendants' claims that lawsuits should be dismissed under the act of state doctrine, the district court invited the Department of State to submit its views in National Coalition Government of the Union of Burma v. Unocal, 176 F.R.D. 329 (C.D. Cal. 997) and John Doe I v. Unocal 963 F.Supp. 880 (C.D. Cal. 1997) "concerning the ramifications this litigation may have on the foreign policy of the United States as established by congress and the Executive." In response, the United States filed a Statement of Interest attaching the letter of Michael J. Matheson, Acting Legal Adviser of the Department of State, which noted the "very preliminary procedural stage" of both cases and the resulting lack of a developed record. The Department of State did not express a view as to whether the "act of state" doctrine was implicated in these cases but advised the court that "adjudication of the claims based on allegations of torture and slavery would not prejudice or impede the conduct of U.S. foreign relations with the current government of Burma."

F. OTHER ISSUES

1. Cause of Action Against Official, Employee, or Agent of a Foreign State in Certain Circumstances

Following the enactment of the exception to the sovereign immunity of foreign states designated as state sponsors of terrorism for certain claims resulting from acts of state-sponsored terrorism (22 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(7), see A.3.d. supra), Congress adopted a provision creating a private right of action against officials, employees, or agents of a designated foreign state, as follows:

> (a) An official, employee, or agent of a foreign state designated as a state sponsor of terrorism . . . while acting within the scope of his or her office, employment, or agency shall be liable to a United States national . . . for personal injury or death caused by acts of that official, employee, or agent for which the courts of the United States may maintain jurisdiction under section 1605(a)(7) . . . for money damages which may include economic damages, solatium, pain, and suffering, and punitive damages if the acts were among those described in section 1605(a)(7).
> (b) Provisions related to statute of limitations . . . that would apply to an action brought under 28 U.S.C. 1605(f) and (g) shall also apply to actions brought under this section. No action shall be maintained under this section if an official, employee, or agent of the United States, while acting within the scope of his or her office, employment, or agency would not be liable for such acts if carried out within the United States.

This provision, entitled "Civil Liability for Acts of State Sponsored Terrorism," was enacted on September 30, 1996, as § 589 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1997, in Pub. L. No. 104–208, 110 Stat. 3009–172 (1996), reprinted at 28 U.S.C.A. § 1605 note (West Supp. 1997). The provision is referred to as the "Flatow Amendment" or "Flatow Act" in recognition of the family of Alisa Flatow, a woman who died as the result of a terrorist bombing in Gaza. Although the District Court for the District of Columbia characterized the provision as an amendment to § 1605(a)(7), reading it as applicable to claims against the state (Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 999 F.Supp. 1 (D.D.C. 1998), courts have subsequently recognized that it is not an amendment to the FSIA and that it is applicable only to individuals acting in their official capacity, as specified. See, e.g., Cicippio-Puleo v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 353 F.3d 1024 (D.C. Cir. 2004).

2. Service of Process

As discussed in B.2., supra, Kadic v. Karadzic, 70 F.3d 232 (2d Cir. 1995), involved an action for compensatory and punitive damages (as well as injunctive relief) brought by victims of rape and other human rights violations against Radovan Karadzic, the former self-proclaimed Bosnian Serb president, under, inter alia, the Alien Tort Statute for killings, torture and other human rights abuses and violations of international law. Karadzic had been served while visiting the United Nations and argued that he was immune from service of process as an invitee of the United Nations and under federal common law. The appellate court rejected these theories, as excerpted below.

* * * *

II. Service of Process and Personal Jurisdiction

Appellants aver that Karadzic was personally served with process while he was physically present in the Southern District of New York. In the Doe action [consolidated in this case], the affidavits detail that on February 11, 1993, process servers approached Karadzic in the lobby of the Hotel Intercontinental at 111 East 48th St. in Manhattan, called his name and identified their purpose, and attempted to hand him the complaint from a distance of two feet, that security guards seized the complaint papers, and that the papers fell to the floor. Karadzic submitted an affidavit of a State Department security officer, who generally confirmed the episode, but stated that the process server did not come closer than six feet of the defendant. In the Kadic action, the plaintiffs obtained from Judge Owen an order for alternate means of service, directing service by delivering the complaint to a member of defendant's State Department security detail, who was ordered to hand the complaint to the defendant. The security officer's affidavit states that he received the complaint and handed it to Karadzic outside the Russian Embassy in Manhattan. Karadzic's statement confirms that this occurred during his second visit to the United States, sometime between February 27 and March 8, 1993. Appellants also allege that during his visits to New York City, Karadzic stayed at hotels outside the "headquarters district" of the United Nations and engaged in non-United Nations-related activities such as fund-raising.

Fed.R.Civ.P. 4(e)(2) specifically authorizes personal service of a summons and complaint upon an individual physically present within a judicial district of the United States, and such personal service comports with the requirements of due process for the assertion of personal jurisdiction. See Burnham v. Superior Court of California, 495 U.S. 604, 110 S.Ct. 2105, 109 L.Ed.2d 631 (1990).

Nevertheless, Karadzic maintains that his status as an invitee of the United Nations during his visits to the United States rendered him immune from service of process. He relies on both the Agreement Between the United Nations and the United States of America Regarding the Headquarters of the United Nations, reprinted at 22 U.S.C. § 287 note (1988) ("Headquarters Agreement"), and a claimed federal common law immunity. We reject both bases for immunity from service.

A. Headquarters Agreement

The Headquarters Agreement provides for immunity from suit only in narrowly defined circumstances. First, "service of legal process . . . may take place within the headquarters district only with the consent of and under conditions approved by the Secretary-General." Id. § 9(a). This provision is of no benefit to Karadzic, because he was not served within the well-defined confines of the "headquarters district," which is bounded by Franklin D. Roosevelt Drive, 1st Avenue, 42nd Street, and 48th Street, see Id. annex 1. Second, certain representatives of members of the United Nations, whether residing inside or outside of the "headquarters district," shall be entitled to the same privileges and immunities as the United States extends to accredited diplomatic envoys. Id. § 15. This provision is also of no benefit to Karadzic, since he is not a designated representative of any member of the United Nations.

A third provision of the Headquarters Agreement prohibits federal, state, and local authorities of the United States from "impos[ing] any impediments to transit to or from the headquarters district of . . . persons invited to the headquarters district by the United Nations . . . on official business." Id. § 11. Karadzic maintains that allowing service of process upon a United Nations invitee who is on official business would violate this section, presumably because it would impose a potential burden—exposure to suit—on the invitee's transit to and from the headquarters district. However, this Court has previously refused "to extend the immunities provided by the Headquarters Agreement beyond those explicitly stated." See Klinghoffer v. S.N.C. Achille Lauro, 937 F.2d 44, 48 (2d Cir. 1991). We therefore reject Karadzic's proposed construction of section 11, because it would effectively create an immunity from suit for United Nations invitees where none is provided by the express terms of the Headquarters Agreement.

The parties to the Headquarters Agreement agree with our construction of it. In response to a letter from plaintiffs' attorneys opposing any grant of immunity to Karadzic, a responsible State Department official wrote: "Mr. Karadzic's status during his recent visits to the United States has been solely as an 'invitee' of the United Nations, and as such he enjoys no immunity from the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States." Letter from Michael J. Habib, Director of Eastern European Affairs, U.S. Dept. of State, to Beth Stephens (Mar. 24, 1993) ("Habib Letter"). Counsel for the United Nations has also issued an opinion stating that although the United States must allow United Nations invitees access to the Headquarters District, invitees are not immune from legal process while in the United States at locations outside of the Headquarters District. See In re Galvao, [1963] U.N.Jur.Y.B. 164 (opinion of U.N. legal counsel); see also Restatement (Third) § 469 reporter's note 8 (U.N. invitee "is not immune from suit or legal process outside the headquarters district during his sojourn in the United States").

B. Federal common law immunity

Karadzic nonetheless invites us to fashion a federal common law immunity for those within a judicial district as a United Nations invitee. He contends that such a rule is necessary to prevent private litigants from inhibiting the United Nations in its ability to consult with invited visitors. Karadzic analogizes his proposed rule to the "government contacts exception" to the District of Columbia's long-arm statute, which has been broadly characterized to mean that "mere entry [into the District of Columbia] by non-residents for the purpose of contacting federal government agencies cannot serve as a basis for in personam jurisdiction," Rose v. Silver, 394 A.2d 1368, 1370 (D.C. 1978); see also Naartex Consulting Corp. v. Watt, 722 F.2d 779, 785–87 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (construing government contacts exception to District of Columbia's long-arm statute), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1210, 104 S.Ct. 2399, 81 L.Ed.2d 355 (1984). He also points to a similar restriction upon assertion of personal jurisdiction on the basis of the presence of an individual who has entered a jurisdiction in order to attend court or otherwise engages in litigation. See generally 4 Charles A. Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1076 (2d ed. 1987).

Karadzic also endeavors to find support for a common law immunity in our decision in Klinghoffer. Though, as noted above, Klinghoffer declined to extend the immunities of the Headquarters

Agreement beyond those provided by its express provisions, the decision applied immunity considerations to its construction of New York's long-arm statute, N.Y.Civ.Prac.L. & R. 301 (McKinney 1990), in deciding whether the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) was doing business in the state. Klinghoffer construed the concept of "doing business" to cover only those activities of the PLO that were not United Nations-related. See 937 F.2d at 51.

Despite the considerations that guided Klinghoffer in its narrowing construction of the general terminology of New York's long-arm statute as applied to United Nations activities, we decline the invitation to create a federal common law immunity as an extension of the precise terms of a carefully crafted treaty that struck the balance between the interests of the United Nations and those of the United States.

* * * *

In sum, if appellants personally served Karadzic with the summons and complaint while he was in New York but outside of the U.N. headquarters district, as they are prepared to prove, he is subject to the personal jurisdiction of the District Court.

A. TRANSPORTATION BY AIR

1. International Civil Aviation Organization

a. Montreal Protocol No. 4

The Protocol to Amend the 1929 Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules Relating to International Carriage by Air signed at Warsaw on 12 October 1929, as Amended by the Protocol Done at the Hague on 28 September 1955, Signed at Montreal on 25 September 1975 ("Montreal Protocol No. 4") modernized documentation requirements for transport by air, primarily to meet the pressing needs of the air cargo industry. President Gerald R. Ford transmitted Montreal Protocol No. 4 in tandem with Montreal Protocol No. 3 (on passenger liability regime) to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification in 1977. S. Treaty Doc. No. 95–2 (1977). As described in the report of the Department of State accompanying the transmittal, > [d]uring [the early 1970s] it became clear that the role of gold in the international monetary system would be greatly diminished with no major currency convertible into gold. The Warsaw Convention, the Hague Protocol, and the Guatemala City Protocol (as well as numerous other international treaties) express liability limits in terms > of gold, and thus a different unit was required to express these limits. At the Montreal Conference, the gold clause was deleted, and in its place a clause based on the "Special Drawing Right" (SDR) of the International Monetary Fund was adopted.

> The Montreal Conference adopted four separate protocols. . . . Montreal Protocol No. 4 includes basic amendments to the cargo provisions of the Warsaw Convention as revised by the Hague Protocol, including an SDR clause.

The Senate did not act at the time because of concerns relating to Montreal Protocol No. 3. On September 28, 1998, the Senate gave advice and consent to ratification of Montreal Protocol No. 4, which entered into force for the United States on March 4, 1999. 144 CONG. REC. S11,059 (Sept. 28, 1998). The resolution of ratification also directed the Secretary of the Senate to return Montreal Protocol No. 3 to the President.

On May 28, 1999, the United States signed the Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules for International Carriage by Air, done at Montreal ("Montreal Convention"). Upon entry into force for the United States, this convention, where applicable, would supersede the Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules Relating to International Carriage by Air, done at Warsaw October 12, 1929, as amended, 49 Stat. 3000, note following 49 U.S.C. § 40105 ("Warsaw Convention"). 2. Arbitration Between The United States and The United Kingdom Over Heathrow Airport User Charges

On March 11, 1994, representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom agreed by an exchange of notes at Washington on terms settling a dispute between the United States and the United Kingdom. The dispute concerned user charges imposed on U.S. airlines at Heathrow Airport, London, by the British Airports Authority and subsequently (after privatization) by British Airports Authority Public Limited Company (BAA plc). The United States had initiated the arbitration, following unsuccessful efforts to resolve the dispute through consultations, by a note from the Department of State to the British Embassy at Washington on December 16, 1988. The British Government concurred and a tribunal was established in The Hague.

The settlement followed an award on liability issued by the tribunal on November 30, 1992, in which the tribunal ruled in favor of the United States on several important questions. Among other things, it agreed with the United States that the United Kingdom had not fulfilled its "best efforts" obligation under Article 10, paragraph 1 of the bilateral Agreement Concerning Air Services, done at Bermuda, July 23, 1977, 28 U.S.T. 5367 ("Bermuda II") to ensure that user charges were "just and reasonable."

Under the settlement agreement, the United Kingdom paid $29.5 million to the United States. On April 26, 1994, the Department of State disbursed over $28 million to the affected U.S. airlines: Pan American World Airways, Trans World Airlines, United Airlines, and American Airlines. The United Kingdom also agreed, among other things, to ensure that BAA plc would phase out international "peak" pricing at Heathrow's terminals, so that the differential would be eliminated entirely as of April 1, 1998. The phase-out was designed to produce significant benefits for carriers serving Heathrow during peak periods, including U.S. carriers.

In addition, as part of the settlement, the United Kingdom agreed to drop an arbitration that it had requested on October 13, 1993, also under Article 10 of Bermuda II, regarding charges at U.S. airports, and the United States agreed to encourage its airports to consult with airline users in setting landing and other user fees.

Finally, under the settlement agreement, the parties deleted Article 1(o) and Article 10 from the Bermuda II Agreement, substituting new texts for them, and deprived a 1983 memorandum of understanding between the two countries of effect.

For a further discussion of the arbitration, including the 1992 Tribunal award, see III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 3317–24; see also 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 738 (1994).

3. U.S. Litigation Concerning Warsaw Convention

The U.S. Supreme Court addressed issues of interpretation of Article 17 of the Warsaw Convention in three cases during the 1991–1999 period: Eastern Airlines v. Floyd, 499 U.S. 530 (1991), Zicherman v. Korean Air Lines Co., 516 U.S. 217 (1996), and El Al Israel Airlines, Ltd. v. Tsui Yuan Tseng, 525 U.S. 155 (1999).

Article 17 of the Warsaw Convention provides:

> The carrier shall be liable for damage sustained in the event of the death or wounding of a passenger or any other bodily injury suffered by a passenger, if the accident which caused the damage so sustained took place on board the aircraft or in the course of any of the operations of embarking or disembarking.

As discussed below, the Supreme Court concluded in Floyd that the term "bodily injury" did not encompass mental or psychic injuries absent any physical injury, and in Zicherman that compensable damages were to be determined by domestic law under the forum's choice-of-law rules. In El Al Israel Airlines, discussed in Chapter 4.B.3.a., the Court held that "the Warsaw Convention precludes a passenger from maintaining an action for personal injury damages under local law when her claim does not satisfy the conditions for liability under the Convention."

a. Mental or psychic injuries

On April 17, 1991, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the term "bodily injury" in Article 17 does not encompass "mental or psychic injuries" absent any physical injury. Eastern Airlines v. Floyd, 499 U.S. 530, 552 (1991). Plaintiffs in the case claimed damages solely for mental distress arising out of a forced landing of an Eastern Airlines flight in Miami after engine failure nearly caused the plane to be ditched in the Atlantic Ocean. Eastern Airlines conceded that the engine failure and preparations for ditching the plane amounted to an "accident" under Article 17. The District Court concluded that mental anguish alone is not compensable under Article 17. In re Eastern Airlines, Inc., Engine Failure, Miami Int'l Airport, 629 F.Supp. 307, 314 (S.D.Fla. 1986). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit reversed, holding that the phrase "lesion corporelle" in the authentic French text of Article 17 encompasses purely emotional distress. Eastern Airlines v. Floyd, 872 F.2d 1462, 1471 (11th Cir. 1989). After a lengthy analysis of the term at issue, the Supreme Court reversed the court of appeals, stating:

> [w]e conclude that an air carrier cannot be held liable under Article 17 when an accident has not caused a passenger to suffer death, physical injury, or physical manifestation of injury. Although Article 17 renders air carriers liable for "damage sustained in the event of" ("dommage survenu en cas de") such injuries, see 49 Stat. 3005, 3018, we express no view as to whether passengers can recover for mental injuries that are accompanied by physical injuries. That issue is not > presented here because respondents do not allege physical injury or physical manifestation of injury.

499 U.S. at 552–53.

The Court stated further that although Eastern urged it to "hold that the Warsaw Convention provides the exclusive cause of action for injuries sustained during international air transportation," it declined to reach that question because it had not been addressed below and certiorari had not been granted to consider it. Id.

Excerpts below from the Court's opinion provide its analysis of the interpretative question presented (footnotes omitted).

* * * *

"When interpreting a treaty, we 'begin "with the text of the treaty and the context in which the written words are used."' " Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft v. Schlunk, 486 U.S. 694, 699 (1988), quoting Societe Nationale Industrielle Aerospatiale v. United States District Court, 482 U.S. 522, 534 (1987), quoting Air France v. Saks, 470 U.S. 392, 397 (1985). Accord, Chan v. Korean Air Lines, Ltd., 490 U.S. 122, 134 (1989); Maximov v. United States, 373 U.S. 49, 53–54 (1963). "Other general rules of construction may be brought to bear on difficult or ambiguous passages." Volkswagenwerk, supra, at 700. Moreover, " 'treaties are construed more liberally than private agreements, and to ascertain their meaning we may look beyond the written words to the history of the treaty, the negotiations, and the practical construction adopted by the parties.' " Saks, supra, at 396, quoting Choctaw Nation of Indians v. United States, 318 U.S. 423, 431–432 (1943). Accord, Volkswagenwerk, supra, at 700. We proceed to apply these methods in turn.

Because the only authentic text of the Warsaw Convention is in French, the French text must guide our analysis. See Saks, supra, at 397–399. The text reads as follows:

> "Le transporteur est responsable du dommage survenu en cas de mort, de blessure ou de toute autre lesion corporelle subie par un voyageur lorsque l'accident qui a cause le dommage s'est produit a bord de l'aeronef ou au cours de toutes operations d'embarquement et de debarquement." 49 Stat. 3005 (emphasis added).

The American translation of this text, employed by the Senate when it ratified the Convention in 1934, reads:

> "The carrier shall be liable for damage sustained in the event of the death or wounding of a passenger or any other bodily injury suffered by a passenger, if the accident which caused the damage so sustained took place on board the aircraft or in the course of any of the operations of embarking or disembarking." 49 Stat. 3018 (emphasis added).

Thus, under Article 17, an air carrier is liable for passenger injury only when three conditions are satisfied: (1) there has been an accident, in which (2) the passenger suffered "mort," "blessure," "ou . . . toute autre lesion corporelle," and (3) the accident took place on board the aircraft or in the course of operations of embarking or disembarking. As petitioner concedes, the incident here took place on board the aircraft and was an "accident" for purposes of Article 17. See 872 F. 2d, at 1471. Moreover, respondents concede that they suffered neither "mort" nor "blessure" from the mishap. Therefore, the narrow issue presented here is whether, under the proper interpretation of "lesion corporelle," condition (2) is satisfied when a passenger has suffered only a mental or psychic injury.

We must consider the "French legal meaning" of "lesion corporelle" for guidance as to the shared expectations of the parties to the Convention because the Convention was drafted in French by continental jurists. See Saks, supra, at 399. Perhaps the simplest method of determining the meaning of a phrase appearing in a foreign legal text would be to consult a bilingual dictionary. Such dictionaries suggest that a proper translation of "lesion corporelle" is "bodily injury." See, e.g., J. Jeraute, Vocabulaire Francais-Anglais et Anglais-Francais de Termes et Locutions Juridiques 205 (1953) (translating "bodily harm" or "bodily injury" as "lesion ou blessure corporelle"); see also id., at 95 (translating the term "lesion" as "injury, damage, prejudice, wrong"); id., at 41 (giving as one sense of "corporel" the English word "bodily"); 3 Grand Larousse de la Langue Francaise 1833 (1987) (defining "lesion" as a "modification de la structure d'un tissu vivant sous l'influence d'une cause morbide"). These translations, if correct, clearly suggest that Article 17 does not permit recovery for purely psychic injuries. Although we have previously relied on such French dictionaries as a primary method for defining terms in the Warsaw Convention, see Saks, supra, at 400, and n. 3, we recognize that dictionary definitions may be too general for purposes of treaty interpretation. Our concerns are partly allayed when, as here, the dictionary translation accords with the wording used in the "two main translations of the 1929 Convention in English." Mankiewicz 197. As we noted earlier, the translation used by the United States Senate when ratifying the Warsaw Convention equated "lesion corporelle" with "bodily injury." See supra, at 535. The same wording appears in the translation used in the United Kingdom Carriage by Air Act of 1932. See L. Goldhirsch, The Warsaw Convention Annotated: A Legal Handbook 199, 204 (1988) (hereinafter Goldhirsch). We turn, then, to French legal materials, Saks, 470 U.S., at 400, to determine whether French jurists' contemporary understanding of the term "lesion corporelle" differed from its translated meaning.

In 1929, as in the present day, lawyers trained in French civil law would rely on the following principal sources of French law: (1) legislation, (2) judicial decisions, and (3) scholarly writing. See generally 1 M. Planiol & G. Ripert, Traite elementaire de droit civil, pt. 1, Nos. 10, 122, 127 (12th ed. 1939) (Louisiana State Law Inst. trans. 1959); F. Geny, Methode d'Interpretation et Sources en Droit Prive Positif Nos. 45–50 (2d ed. 1954) (Louisiana State Law Inst. trans. 1963); R. David, French Law: Its Structure, Sources, and Methodology 154 (M. Kindred trans. 1972). Our review of these materials indicates neither that "lesion corporelle" was a widely used legal term in French law nor that the term specifically encompassed psychic injuries.

In sum, neither the Warsaw Convention itself nor any of the applicable French legal sources demonstrates that "lesion corporelle" should be translated other than as "bodily injury"—a narrow meaning excluding purely mental injuries. However, because a broader interpretation of "lesion corporelle" reaching purely mental injuries is plausible, and the term is both ambiguous and difficult, see supra, at 535, we turn to additional aids to construction.

* * * *

Our review of the documentary record for the Warsaw Conference confirms—and courts and commentators appear universally to agree—that there is no evidence that the drafters or signatories of the Warsaw Convention specifically considered liability for psychic injury or the meaning of "lesion corporelle." See generally Minutes. Two explanations commonly are offered for why the subject of mental injuries never arose during the Convention proceedings: (1) many jurisdictions did not recognize recovery for mental injury at that time, or (2) the drafters simply could not contemplate a psychic injury unaccompanied by a physical injury. See, e.g., Husserl v. Swiss Air Transport Co., 388 F. Supp. 1238, 1249 (SDNY 1975) (Husserl II); Cie Air France v. Teichner, 39 Revue Francaise de Droit Aerien 232, 242, 23 Eur. Tr. L. 87, 101 (Israel 1984); Mankiewicz 144–145; Miller 123–125. Indeed, the unavailability of compensation for purely psychic injury in many common and civil law countries at the time of the Warsaw Conference persuades us that the signatories had no specific intent to include such a remedy in the Convention. Because such a remedy was unknown in many, if not most, jurisdictions in 1929, the drafters most likely would have felt compelled to make an unequivocal reference to purely mental injury if they had specifically intended to allow such recovery.

In this sense, we find it significant that, when the parties to a different international transport treaty wanted to make it clear that rail passengers could recover for purely psychic harms, the drafters made a specific modification to this effect. The liability provision of the Berne Convention on International Rail, drafted in 1952, originally conditioned liability on "la mort, les blessures et toute autre atteinte, a l'integrite corporelle." International Convention Concerning the Carriage of Passengers and Luggage By Rail, Berne, Oct. 25, 1952, 242 U. N. T. S. 355, Article 28, p. 390. The drafters subsequently modified this provision to read "l'integrite physique ou mentale." See Additional Convention to the International Convention Concerning the Carriage of Passengers and Luggage by Rail (CIV) of Feb. 25, 1961, Relating to the Liability of the Railway for Death of and Personal Injury to Passengers, done Feb. 26, 1966, Art. 2, reprinted in Transport: International Transport Treaties V-52 (Kluwer Publishers) (Supp. 1–10, Jan. 1986) (emphasis added).

The narrower reading of "lesion corporelle" also is consistent with the primary purpose of the contracting parties to the Convention: limiting the liability of air carriers in order to foster the growth of the fledgling commercial aviation industry. . . .

We also conclude that, on balance, the evidence of the post-1929 "conduct" and "interpretations of the signatories," Saks, 470 U.S., at 403, supports the narrow translation of "lesion corporelle."

* * * *

We must also consult the opinions of our sister signatories in searching for the meaning of a "lesion corporelle." See Saks, 470 U.S., at 404. The only apparent judicial decision from a sister signatory addressing recovery for purely mental injuries under Article 17 is that of the Supreme Court of Israel. That court held that Article 17 does allow recovery for purely psychic injuries. See Cie Air France v. Teichner, 39 Revue Francaise de Droit Aerien, at 243, 23 Eur. Tr. L., at 102.

. . . . In reaching this conclusion, the court emphasized the post-1929 development of the aviation industry and the evolution of Anglo-American and Israeli law to allow recovery for psychic injury in certain circumstances. . . . Even if we were to agree that allowing recovery for purely psychic injury is desirable as a policy goal, we cannot give effect to such policy without convincing evidence that the signatories' intent with respect to Article 17 would allow such recovery. . . .

Moreover, we believe our construction of Article 17 better accords with the Warsaw Convention's stated purpose of achieving uniformity of rules governing claims arising from international air transportation. . . .

b. Compensable damages

On January 16, 1996, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in an action brought under Article 17 of the Warsaw Convention that the convention leaves the issue of determining compensable damages to be determined by domestic law under the forum's choice-of-law rules. Zicherman v. Korean Air Lines Co., 516 U.S. 217 (1996). In that case, which concerned the death of a passenger on Korean Airlines Flight KE007 when it was shot down over the Sea of Japan by a Soviet military aircraft in 1983, the Court also determined that the applicable law was the Death on the High Seas Act, 46 U.S.C. App. §§ 761–68 ("DOHSA").

Petitioners in Zicherman, mother and sister of one of the passengers, Muriel Kole, sought damages that included loss of society following the relative's death in the shootdown. Petitioners prevailed on their claims in district court. In re Korean Air Lines Disaster of Sept. 1, 1983, 807 F. Supp. 1073 (S.D.N.Y. 1992). On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit found that general maritime law supplied the substantive compensatory damages law to be applied and that, under such law, only dependents could recover for loss of society. Zicherman v. Korean Air Lines Co., 43 F.3d 18 (2d Cir. 1994). It therefore vacated the award to the mother and remanded to the district court for determination as to whether the sister was a dependent.

The Supreme Court first examined the airline's contention that the Warsaw Convention itself did not allow loss-of-society damages in the case. The Court found that Article 17 "leave[s] the specification of what harm is legally cognizable to the domestic law applicable under the forum's choice of law rules." 516 U.S. at 231. The parties had stipulated that if the issue of compensable harm was unresolved by the Warsaw Convention, it would be governed by the law of the United States. The Court concluded that "[b]ecause DOHSA permits only pecuniary damages, petitioners are not entitled to recover for loss of society. We therefore need not reach the question whether, under general maritime law, dependency is a prerequisite for loss-of-society damages." Id. Because the claims of mother and sister were based on loss of society, the Court affirmed the Second Circuit opinion as to the mother and vacated the opinion insofar as it remanded the sister's claim to allow her to establish dependency. See also discussion of the shootdown incident in II Cumulative Digest 1981–88 at 2199–212.

Excerpts follow from the Court's analysis of Article 17 of the Warsaw Convention in determining that it did not resolve the issue of compensable harm but left that issue to domestic law (footnotes omitted).

The first and principal question before us is whether loss of society of a relative is made recoverable by [Article 17].

It is obvious that the English word "damage" or "harm"—or in the official text of the Convention, the French word "dommage"—can be applied to an extremely wide range of phenomena, from the medical expenses incurred as a result of Kole's injuries (for which every legal system would provide tort compensation), to the mental distress of some stranger who reads about Kole's death in the paper (for which no legal system would provide tort compensation). It cannot seriously be maintained that Article 17 uses the term in this broadest sense, thus exploding tort liability beyond what any legal system in the world allows, to the farthest reaches of what could be denominated "harm." We therefore reject petitioners' initial proposal that we simply look to English dictionary definitions of "damage" and apply that term's "plain meaning." Brief for Petitioners 7–9.

There are only two thinkable alternatives to that. First, what petitioners ultimately suggest: that "dommage" means what French law, in 1929, recognized as legally cognizable harm, which petitioners assert included not only "dommage matériel" (pecuniary harm of various sorts) but also "dommage moral" (non pecuniary harm of various sorts, including loss of society). In support of that approach, petitioners point out that in a prior case involving Article 17 we were guided by French legal usage: Air France v. Saks, 470 U.S. 392 (1985) (interpreting the term "accident"). See also Eastern Airlines, Inc. v. Floyd, 499 U.S. 530 (1991) (interpreting the Article 17 term "lésion corporelle"). What is at issue here, however, is not simply whether we will be guided by French legal usage vel non. Because, as earlier discussed, the dictionary meaning of the term "dommage" embraces harms that no legal system would compensate, it must be acknowledged that the term is to be understood in its distinctively legal sense—that is, to mean only legally cognizable harm. The nicer question, and the critical one here, is whether the word "dommage" establishes as the content of the concept "legally cognizable harm" what French law accepted as such in 1929. No case of ours provides precedent for the adoption of French law in such detail. In Floyd, we looked to French law to determine whether "lésion corporelle" indeed meant (as it had been translated) "bodily injury"—not to determine the subsequent question (equivalent to the question at issue here) whether "bodily injury" encompassed psychic injury. See 499 U.S., at 536–540. And in Saks, once we had determined that in French legal terminology the word "accident" referred to an unforeseen event, we did not further inquire whether French courts would consider the event at issue in the case unforeseen; we made that judgment for ourselves. See 470 U.S., at 405–407.

It is particularly implausible that "the shared expectations of the contracting parties," id., at 399, were that their mere use of the French language would effect adoption of the precise rule applied in France as to what constitutes legally cognizable harm. Those involved in the negotiation and adoption of the Convention could not have been ignorant of the fact that the law on this point varies widely from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, and even from statute to statute within a single jurisdiction. Just as we found it "unlikely" in Floyd that Convention signatories would have understood the general term "lésion corporelle" to confer a cause of action available under French law but unrecognized in many other nations, see 499 U. S., at 540, so also in the present case we find it unlikely that they would have understood Article 17's use of the general term "dommage" to require compensation for elements of harm recognized in France but unrecognized elsewhere, or to forbid compensation for elements of harm unrecognized in France but recognized elsewhere. Many signatory nations, including Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Germany, the Netherlands, the Soviet Union, and Sweden did not, even many years after the Warsaw Convention, recognize a cause of action for non pecuniary harm resulting from wrongful death, see 11 International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law: Torts, ch. 9, pp. 15–18 (A. Tunc ed. 1972); Floyd, supra, at 544–545, n. 10.

The other alternative, and the only one we think realistic, is to believe that "dommage" means (as it does in French legal usage) "legally cognizable harm," but that Article 17 leaves it to adjudicating courts to specify what harm is cognizable. That is not an unusual disposition. Even within our domestic law, many statutes that provide generally for "damages," or for reimbursement of "injury," leave it to the courts to decide what sorts of harms are compensable . . .

That this is the proper interpretation is confirmed by another provision of the Convention. Article 17 is expressly limited by Article 24, which as translated provides:

> (1) In the cases covered by articles 18 and 19 any action for damages, however founded, can only be brought subject to the conditions and limits set out in this convention.
> (2) In the cases covered by article 17 the provisions of the preceding paragraph shall also apply, without prejudice to the questions as to who are the persons who have the right to bring suit and what are their respective rights." 49 Stat. 3020 (emphasis added).

The most natural reading of this Article is that, in an action brought under Article 17, the law of the Convention does not affect the substantive questions of who may bring suit and what they may be compensated for. Those questions are to be answered by the domestic law selected by the courts of the contracting states. Petitioners contend that, because Article 24 refers to the parties' "respective rights," this provision defers to domestic law only on the "procedural" issues of who has standing to sue and how the proceeds of a damages award under Article 17 should be divided among eligible claimants. It does not seem to us that the question of who is entitled to a damages award is procedural; and in any event limiting Article 24 to procedural issues would render it superfluous, since Article 28(2) provides that "[q]uestions of procedure shall be governed by the law of the court to which the case is submitted." 49 Stat. 3021. More importantly, petitioners' reading of Article 24(2) would produce a strange regime in which 1929 French law (embodied in the Convention) determines what harms arising out of international air accidents must be indemnified, while current domestic law determines who is entitled to the indemnity and how it is to be divided among claimants. When presented with an equally plausible reading of Article 24 that leads to a more comprehensible result—that the Convention left to domestic law the questions of who may recover and what compensatory damages are available to them—we decline to embrace a reading that would produce the mélange of French and domestic law proposed by petitioners.

Because a treaty ratified by the United States is not only the law of this land, see Const., Art. II, section 2, but also an agreement among sovereign powers, we have traditionally considered as aids to its interpretation the negotiating and drafting history (travaux préparatoires) and the post-ratification understanding of the contracting parties. Both of these sources confirm that the compensable injury is to be determined by domestic law. In the drafting history, the only statements we know of that directly discuss the point were made by the Comité International Technique d'Experts Juridiques Aériens (CITEJA), which did the preparatory work for the two Conferences (1925 in Paris, 1929 in Warsaw) that produced the Warsaw Convention. . . . Both these statements make clear that the questions of who may recover, and what compensatory damages they may receive, were regarded as intertwined; and that both were unresolved by the Convention and left to "private international law"—i.e., to the area of jurisprudence we call "conflict of laws," dealing with the application of varying domestic laws to disputes that have an interstate or international component.

4. United States-Canada Air Transport Agreement

On February 24, 1995, in Ottawa, Canada, representatives of the United States and of Canada signed an Air Transport Agreement that entered into force the same day. 1995 U.S.T. LEXIS 232. The agreement superseded the Air Transport Agreement, with exchange of notes, Jan. 17, 1966, as amended; the Nonscheduled Air Services Agreement, with annexes and exchanges of notes, May 8, 1974; the Agreement Concerning Regional, Local and Commuter Services, effected by exchange of notes, Aug. 21, 1984, as amended; the Agreement on Aviation Security, Nov. 21, 1986; and the Agreement Relating to Air Navigation, effected by exchange of notes, July 28, 1938. See also 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 589, 596 (1995).

Five annexes were attached to the Agreement. Annex I, Scheduled Air Transportation, covered passenger/combination route authorities and all-cargo services (with special provisions for the phase-in period described in Annex V); fifth freedom services (prohibited, except on routes as therein specified and with indicated limitations); blind sector (in transit) rights; route flexibility/change of aircraft; and intermodal services. Annex II set out provisions for slots (including free slots for Canada) at Chicago O'Hare and New York La Guardia Airports, and access (including nonstop air services) to (and from) Washington National Airport. Annex III covered charter air transportation. Annex IV provided for continuation of designations and license authorizations; and Annex V set out details regarding the transition phase of the Agreement.

The Department of State summarized the principal features of the agreement in a background statement transmitted to Congress under the Case Act*, excerpted below.

See 89 Am. J. Int'l. L. 597 (1996).

This agreement creates a liberal transborder structure over a three-year phase-in period to replace the current restrictive bilateral air services agreement, which has been in effect since 1966. The subject agreement evolved from a framework established through information consultations . . . [and] addresses longstanding Canadian concerns over the competitive challenge posed by the size and strength of U.S. carriers by granting Canadian carriers immediate access to major U.S. airports through a one-time allocation of take-off and landing slots at no cost. Access by U.S. carriers to Canada's three principal airports in Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto will be gradually expanded over the three-year phase-in. Following this transition, carriers will be permitted to respond to consumer demand with respect to routes, frequencies and prices, and carriers of both sides will be able to compete on an equal footing for the business of shippers and travellers.

Other key elements of the new agreement include open code sharing between U.S. and Canadian airlines to all U.S. and Canadian points, virtually unrestricted rights for airlines of both countries to operate all-cargo services between the U.S. and Canada, and a dispute resolution mechanism keyed to the particular nature of the bilateral aviation market. Under the agreement, limited customs facilities will be established so that nonstop service can be conducted between Washington National Airport and Canada as long as the flights originate at Canadian airports with U.S. Customs and INS preclearance facilities.

Under Article 1, each party grants to the other the following rights for the conduct of international air transportation by its airlines: the right to fly across its territory without landing; the right to make stops in its territory for nontraffic purposes; and the rights otherwise specified in the Agreement. Article 1 also provides that nothing therein shall be deemed to confer on the airline or airlines of one party the rights to take on board in the other's territory passengers, their baggage, cargo, or mail carried for compensation and destined for another point in the territory of that other party.

* * * *

Article 4, Fair Competition, follows:

1. Each Party shall allow a fair and equal opportunity for the designated airlines of both Parties to compete in providing the international air transportation governed by this Agreement.

2. Neither Party shall unilaterally limit the volume of traffic, frequency or regularity of service, or the aircraft type or types operated by the designated airlines of the other Party, except as may be required for customs and other government inspection services, technical, operational, or environmental reasons under uniform and nondiscriminatory conditions consistent with Article 15 of the Convention [which provides for continuation of the two parties' program of joint preparation of agreed true origin and destination statistics for air passenger traffic over routes operated pursuant to the Agreement].

3. Neither Party shall impose on the other Party's designated airlines a first-refusal requirement, uplift ratio, no-objection fee, or any other requirement with respect to capacity, frequency or traffic that would be inconsistent with the purposes of this Agreement.

4. Neither Party shall require the filing of schedules, programs for charter flights, or operational plans by airlines of the other Party for approval, except as may be required on a non-discriminatory basis to enforce the uniform conditions foreseen by paragraph 2 of this Article or as may be specifically authorized in Annex III

[Charter Air Transportation] to this Agreement. If a Party requires filings for information purposes, it shall minimize the administrative burdens of filing requirements and procedures on air transportation intermediaries and on designated airlines of the other Party.

The provisions of Article 4 are subject to limitations during the transition period specified in Annex V (which is one year in respect of all-cargo services; two years in respect of passenger/combination services at Montreal and Vancouver; and three years in respect of passenger/combination services at Toronto).

* * * *

Article 8, User Charges, provides that (1) user charges for air navigation services/air traffic control must be just and reasonable, and assessed on terms not less favorable than the most favorable terms available to any other airline in providing similar international air transportation; (2) user charges for airport, aviation security, and related facilities and services shall be just, reasonable, not unjustly discriminatory, equitably apportioned among categories of users, and "[i]n any event . . . assessed . . . on terms not less favorable than the most favorable terms available to any other airline in providing similar international air transportation at the time the charges are assessed." . . .

5. Civil Aviation Agreements with Japan and France

In 1998 the United States entered into agreements substantially liberalizing the U.S.-Japan and U.S.-France relationships in civil aviation. These agreements eliminated restrictions on airline operations for both passenger and cargo services as part of the U.S. policy of opening world aviation markets to competition.

Highlights of the United States-Japan Agreement (April 20, 1998), are discussed in the following excerpt from a February 2, 1998, fact sheet released by the State Department following the initialing of a detailed framework for an agreement on January 30, 1998.

The fact sheet is available at www.clintonpresidentialcenter.org/legacy/013098-fact-sheet-on-japan-civil-aviation-agreement.htm.

- Non-incumbent "combination" carriers, Delta, American and Continental, gain the right to offer an additional 90 weekly round-trip flights between the U.S. and Japan, nearly tripling their access to this market. Combination carriers carry both passengers and cargo.
- Two new non-incumbent carriers will be able to enter the U.S.-Japan market, one immediately and another in two years.
- Non-incumbent all-cargo carriers, UPS and Polar Air Cargo, gain valuable new opportunities to transport cargo to destinations beyond Japan. An additional all-cargo carrier will be able to enter the market in four years.

This agreement eliminates restrictions and resolves disputes for incumbent carriers.

- This agreement lifts all restrictions on the number of flights operated and points served between the U.S. and Japan by incumbent combinations and all-cargo carriers—United Airlines, Northwest Airlines and Federal Express.
- This agreement resolves the long-standing dispute over our incumbent carriers' right to fly from Japan to other international points beyond Japan.

Code Sharing is permitted for the first time. U.S. and Japanese carriers can code share freely, U.S. carriers can code share among themselves on many operations to Japan and beyond, and U.S. carriers can code share with third-country carriers on operations to and beyond Japan.

Other new services will be available. Charter operations will increase in two years from the current 400 flights per year to 600 flights per year, rising eventually to 800 flights.

Distribution and pricing provisions will promote competition. U.S. carriers are guaranteed a fair and equal opportunity to contract with wholesalers and travel agents and to set up enterprises to market their services directly to consumers. The parties have agreed to meet by May 1998 to consider further steps to liberalize pricing. Liberalization will continue to move forward. The parties will begin talks within three years regarding a fully liberalized agreement. If we do not reach that goal by 2002, supplemental rights will be available. For example, non-incumbent combination carriers will gain the right to operate up to 35 additional weekly round-trip flights between the U.S. and Japan.

Highlights of the United States-France Agreement are discussed in the following excerpt from a Department of Transportation press release, dated June 18, 1998, on the signature of the U.S.-France aviation agreement.

Prior to the agreement, the U.S.-France market was the largest U.S. aviation market not governed by a bilateral agreement. . . . The agreement:

- Removes restrictions on the number of passenger airlines that may serve the market and the routes that they may serve.
- Allows, during the five-year transition period, U.S. passenger airlines to add nine new daily services from the United States.
- Removes limits on code-sharing services between U.S. and French airlines. Code sharing, a marketing arrangement whereby one airline puts its code on the flight of another airline, has become an increasingly important way for carriers to provide seamless service to passengers.
- Allows U.S. airlines to code-share to France with third country carriers, with restrictions only on code-share services to France via third countries. All other kinds of code sharing are open, with no limits on capacity, frequencies and cities served. Two alliances may immediately code share to France via third countries, with additional alliances added during the transition and a completely unrestricted regime thereafter.

- Lifts all restrictions on airline pricing initiatives in two years.
- Allows U.S. cargo airlines to sharply increase service and competition between France and the United States and points beyond. The United States may designate two airlines in addition to Federal Express to serve the all-cargo market in 1998 and two others later in the transition period. The agreement removes all restrictions on the number of U.S.-France routes the designated all-cargo carriers may serve.

6. Cuban Downing of U.S.-Registered Planes in International Airspace (Brothers To The Rescue Shoot Down)

On February 24, 1996, Cuban military aircraft shot down in international airspace north of Cuba two unarmed U.S.-registered civilian aircraft belonging to Brothers to the Rescue, a Miami-based humanitarian organization engaged in searching for and aiding Cuban refugees in the Straits of Florida. President Clinton told reporters later that day that he "condemn[ed] this action in the strongest possible terms" and had "directed the United States Coast Guard units in the area to conduct search and rescue operations . . . ordered United States military forces in the area to provide support to the search and rescue operations and to ensure that it is fully protected [and] instructed our interest section in Havana to seek an immediate explanation for this incident from the Cuban Government." 32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 374 (Mar. 4, 1996).

On February 26, the President also announced that he was ordering further U.S. measures, set forth below. Id. at 381.

* * * *

First, I am asking that Congress pass legislation that will provide immediate compensation to the families, something to which they are entitled under international law, out of Cuba's blocked assets here in the United States. . . .

Second, I will move promptly to reach agreement with the Congress on the pending Helms-Burton Cuba legislation so that it will enhance the effectiveness of the embargo in a way that advances the cause of democracy in Cuba.

Third, I have ordered that Radio Marti expand its reach. All the people of Cuba must be able to learn the truth about the regime in Havana-the isolation it has earned for itself through its contempt for basic human rights and international law.

Fourth, I am ordering that additional restrictions be put on travel in the United States by Cuban officials who reside here, and that visits by Cuban officials to our country be further limited.

Finally, all charter air travel from the United States to Cuba will be suspended indefinitely.

On February 25, on instruction from the President, Ambassador Madeleine Albright, the U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations (and during February 1996, President of the UN Security Council), convened an emergency session of the Council. Following consideration of the matter by the Security Council, on February 27, 1996, Ambassador Albright, as its President, made a statement strongly deploring the incident, excerpted below. U.N. Doc. S/PRST/1996/9 (1996).

The Security Council recalls that according to international law, as reflected in Article 3 bis of the International Convention on Civil Aviation of 7 December 1944 added by the Montreal Protocol of 10 May 1984, States must refrain from the use of weapons against civil aircraft in flight and must not endanger the lives of persons on board and the safety of aircraft. States are obliged to respect international law and human rights norms in all circumstances.

The Security Council requests that the International Civil Aviation Organization investigate this incident in its entirety and calls on the Governments concerned to cooperate fully with this investigation. The Council requests that the International Civil Aviation Organization report its findings to the Council as soon as possible. The Council will consider that report and any further information presented to it without delay.

The Cuban-American community in Florida announced its intention to hold a wreath-laying ceremony near the site of the downing to commemorate the four victims. In a press briefing on February 29, 1996, White House Press Secretary Michael McCurry noted that the President had asked the administration to work with those involved to make sure that the event was dignified, peaceful and lawful. He added that the President would issue orders making clear that unauthorized entry by U.S. aircraft and vessels into Cuban territory was prohibited, that "firm legal action will face those that violate this prohibition." At the same time, and the United States expected "restraint and compliance with international standards from the Cubans" so that there would be no repeat of the tragic incident. The Press Secretary also reported on actions the President was taking "to guard the safety of our citizens and residents and to ensure that they abide by United States [and] international law."

. . . First, the President has approved a strong warning to the Cuban government not to violate basic norms of international conduct. We will not tolerate the loss of American lives.

Second, the President has directed the Coast Guard to provide support to participants in the memorial ceremony Saturday in international territory. Coast Guard vessels and aircraft will be on the site to help participants identify and reach the location where the planes were shot down. The Coast Guard will also be on hand to detect and warn against any unauthorized incursions into Cuban waters or air space. Coast Guard and FAA officials will be meeting with organizers of the memorial service today . . . in South Florida to offer exactly that type of assistance.

Third, the President is issuing a proclamation directing the Secretary of Transportation to take action to prevent United States vessels from entering Cuban territorial waters without permission. If we have information that a vessel intends to enter Cuban waters without authorization, it will not be permitted to leave and will be subject to immediate seizure. If an unauthorized U.S. vessel does leave and enters Cuban territorial waters, upon its return the vessel will be subject to seizure and its captain, owner and crew subject to fine and imprisonment.

Fourth, the President has asked the Secretary of Transportation to issue an emergency order directed at United States aircraft prohibiting unauthorized entry into Cuban air space and providing for swift and strong enforcement actions upon its return. Any person who violates Cuban air space will be subject to the maximum penalties permitted by law [See 61 Fed. Reg. 8702 (Mar. 5, 1996)].

On March 1, 1996, President Clinton issued Proclamation 6867, "Declaration of a National Emergency and Invocation of Emergency Authority Relating to the Regulation of the Anchorage and Movement of Vessels." 61 Fed. Reg. 8843 (Mar. 5, 1996), excerpted below.

Whereas, on February 24, 1996, Cuban military aircraft intercepted and destroyed two unarmed U.S.-registered civilian aircraft in international airspace north of Cuba;

Whereas the Government of Cuba has demonstrated a ready and reckless willingness to use excessive force, including deadly force, in the ostensible enforcement of its sovereignty;

Whereas, on July 13, 1995, persons in U.S.-registered vessels who entered into Cuban territorial waters suffered injury as a result of the reckless use of force against them by the Cuban military; and

Whereas the entry of U.S.-registered vessels into Cuban territorial waters could again result in injury to, or loss of life of, persons engaged in that conduct, due to the potential use of excessive force, including deadly force, against them by the Cuban military, and could threaten a disturbance in international relations;

Now, Therefore, I, William J. Clinton, President of the United States of America, by the authority vested in me by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including section 1 of title II of Public Law 65–24, ch. 30, June 15, 1917, as amended (50 U.S.C. 191), sections 201 and 301 of the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.), and section 301 of title 3, United States Code, find and do hereby proclaim that a national emergency does exist by reason of a disturbance or threatened disturbance of international relations. In order to address this national emergency and to secure the observance of the rights and obligations of the United States, I hereby authorize and direct the Secretary of Transportation (the "Secretary") to make and issue such rules and regulations as the Secretary may find appropriate to regulate the anchorage and movement of vessels, and delegate to the Secretary my authority to approve such rules and regulations, as authorized by the Act of June 15, 1917.

Section 1. The Secretary may make rules and regulations governing the anchorage and movement of any vessel, foreign or domestic, in the territorial waters of the United States, which may be used, or is susceptible of being used, for voyage into Cuban territorial waters and that may create unsafe conditions and threaten a disturbance of international relations. Any rule or regulation issued pursuant to this proclamation may be effective immediately upon issuance as such rule or regulation shall involve a foreign affairs function of the United States.

Sec. 2. The Secretary is authorized to inspect any vessel, foreign or domestic, in the territorial waters of the United States, at any time, to place guards on any such vessel; and, with my consent expressly hereby granted, take full possession and control of any such vessel and remove the officers and crew, and all other persons not specifically authorized by the Secretary to go or remain on board the vessel when necessary to secure the rights and obligations of the United States.

Sec. 3. The Secretary may request assistance from such departments, agencies, officers, or instrumentalities of the United States as the Secretary deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this proclamation. Such departments, agencies, officers, or instrumentalities shall, consistent with other provisions of law and to the extent practicable, provide requested assistance.

Sec. 4. The Secretary may seek assistance from State and local authorities in carrying out the purposes of this proclamation. Because State and local assistance may be essential for an effective response to this emergency, I urge all State and local officials to cooperate with Federal authorities and to take all actions within their lawful authority necessary to prevent the unauthorized departure of vessels intending to enter Cuban territorial waters.

The Brothers to the Rescue incident increased bipartisan sentiment in Congress to pass strong sanctions legislation. President Clinton signed into law the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (LIBERTAD) Act of 1996 ("LIBERTAD Act") on March 12, 1996. See Pub. L. No. 104–114, 110 Stat. 785 (1996). See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 442, 448 (1996). The LIBERTAD Act is discussed in B.4.c. below, and in Chapter 1.C.2.f., Chapter 8.B.2., and Chapter 16.A.3.b. Litigation arising from the incident is discussed in Chapter 10.A.3.d.(ii).

B. TRADE

1. Enforcement of Trade Agreements in the 1990s

In testimony to the Subcommittee on International Trade of the Senate Finance Committee, Susan G. Esserman, General Counsel of the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, discussed U.S. implementation and enforcement of trade agreements in the 1990s. In her testimony, delivered on February 23, 1999, Ms. Esserman emphasized the importance of international trade for the U.S. economy and the U.S.

interest in promoting free trade and the rule of law. Topics included in Ms. Esserman's overview included enforcement through the dispute settlement and committee process of the World Trade Organization ("WTO"), bilateral trade-related agreements, and dispute consultations and arbitration under the North American Free Trade Agreement ("NAFTA").

The full text of the testimony, excerpted below, is available at www.usconsulate.org.hk/uscn/trade/general/ustr/1999/0223.htm.

Full implementation of trade agreements is critical to securing their full benefits, to maintaining public confidence in an open trading system, and therefore to the success of trade policy generally. To ensure that agreements yield the benefits bargained for, we have developed an ongoing strategy of active use of the dispute settlement provision of our trade agreements, vigorous monitoring and enforcement of trade agreements, strategic application of U.S. trade laws, and continued engagement in multilateral, regional, bilateral and sectoral negotiations.

* * * *

—We assert U.S. rights through mechanisms in the World Trade Organization, including the stronger dispute settlement mechanism created in the Uruguay Round, and the WTO Committees and Bodies charged with monitoring implementation and surveillance of agreements and disciplines.

—We vigorously monitor and enforce our bilateral agreements.

—We invoke U.S. trade laws in conjunction with bilateral and WTO mechanisms to promote compliance.

—We provide technical assistance to trade partners, especially in developing countries to ensure that key Agreements like the Agreement on Basic Telecommunications and TRIPs are implemented on schedule.

—Through NAFTA's trilateral work program, tariff acceleration, and use or threat of NAFTA's dispute settlement mechanism, we seek to promote America's interests under the Agreement.

* * * *

One of our primary venues for enforcing agreements and asserting U.S. rights is the WTO's dispute settlement mechanism. To ensure that the United States secures the full benefits of the WTO Agreements, we insisted on a strong, binding and expeditious dispute settlement system for the WTO.

* * * *

The WTO dispute settlement system has proven valuable in achieving tangible gains for American companies and workers, and also as a deterrent—our trading partners know it is ready and available to us if they do not fulfill their obligations. We have been successful in reaching rapid resolution of our complaints through early settlement, and have also achieved substantial benefits from full litigation and resulting panel decisions which enforce our rights.

* * * *

One of our priorities in the Uruguay Round was to ensure that the WTO would be a forum for ongoing liberalization, implementation and consultation. Strict attention to the implementation of agreements by the Committees and Bodies that report to the WTO General Council has helped ensure the realization of this goal.

These Committees are charged with reviewing implementation and regulation of each WTO agreement. They thus often provide us with our first opportunity to raise concerns about implementation without having to begin the process of dispute settlement.

* * * *

These Bodies also give us a chance to ensure full implementation of commitments on schedule, which is especially important since most of the Agreements negotiated in the Uruguay Round that contain transition periods or phase-in provisions are to be fully implemented by the end of this year.

* * * *

and Title VII, which we will re-authorize by Executive Order—are of critical importance to ensure full implementation of both bilateral and multilateral agreements. They work in tandem with dispute settlement procedures, and also assist us in completing and enforcing agreements with trading partners that are not WTO members or in areas not covered by WTO rules.

Section 301 is an effective tool for securing compliance through the WTO dispute settlement system. Section 301 and the new WTO rules are stronger in combination than either would be alone. This is because the WTO provides us, for the first time, the automatic right to suspend trade benefits if a trading partner fails to implement a WTO panel report. This means we can use the leverage inherent in Section 301 in those situations across the full range of products and sectors covered by the WTO without the risk of running afoul of our own trade commitments or drawing counter-retaliation.

Finally, let me address the North American Free Trade Agreement. This agreement governs a majority of our trade with our two largest export markets, and apart from the WTO is our only major trade agreement with a binding dispute settlement mechanism. On both counts, ensuring full implementation of this agreement is very important to us.

* * * *

To date, we have been able to address most NAFTA-related disputes through consultations, without resort to NAFTA arbitration panel procedures. Over the five-year history of the agreement, fewer than four matters per year have been referred to government-to-government consultations under NAFTA Chapter 20, and a total of only two matters have been submitted to Chapter 20 arbitration panels.

This infrequent use of panel procedures reflects the commitment of the three NAFTA governments to reach agreement on areas of dispute, and the strength of the NAFTA's institutions. These include working groups on each of NAFTA's substantive areas, frequent discussions among NAFTA coordinators, and meetings of the NAFTA Free Trade Commission at both the Deputy and Ministerial levels. When issues have been referred to NAFTA consultations, the consultations and subsequent meetings of the Free Trade Commission have been able to focus the issues and draw political-level attention where needed, often resulting in a settlement without resort to arbitration.

* * * *

In summary, Mr. Chairman, the last few years have witnessed both a large expansion of our network of bilateral and multilateral agreements, and a strategic effort to ensure full enforcement of these agreements. We have devoted more resources to enforcement as the need has grown, and have effectively used the authority Congress has given us to concentrate on the trading partners and sectors of most importance to the United States. And our work has paid off in rising exports and improving job opportunities in the United States, and the advance of the rule of law abroad.

2. World Trade Organization

a. Signature of Uruguay Round agreements establishing the World Trade Organization

On December 15, 1993, the United States joined over 100 other countries in concluding the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (the "GATT"). On April 15, 2004, U.S. Trade Representative Mickey Kantor and other government ministers signed the "Final Act Embodying the Results of the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations" in Marrakesh, Morocco. The Final Act included the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization ("WTO"), reprinted in 33 I.L.M. 1 (1994). On January 1, 1995, the WTO was established.

On December 15, 1993, President William J. Clinton had notified Congress, in accordance with section 1103(a)(1) of the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988, Pub. L. No. 100–418, 102 Stat. 1107, as amended, 19 U.S.C. § 2903(a)(1) (1988), of his intent to enter into the trade agreements resulting from the Uruguay Round. 58 Fed. Reg. 67,263 (Dec. 15, 1993). As explained in the President's notification, > in accordance with the procedures in the [Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness] Act, the United States will not enter into the agreements outlined above until April 15, 1994. After the agreements have been signed, they will be submitted for congressional approval, together with whatever legislation and administrative actions may be necessary or appropriate to implement the agreements in the United States. The agreements will not take effect with respect to the United States, and will have no domestic legal force, until the Congress has approved them and enacted any appropriate implementing legislation.

An Executive Summary prepared by the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative accompanying the President's notification described the twenty-one agreements concluded in the following areas: (1) Market Access for Goods; (2) Agriculture; (3) Textiles and Clothing; (4) Safeguards; (5) Antidumping; (6) Subsidies and Countervailing Measures; (7) Trade-Related Investment Measures; (8) Import Licensing Procedures; (9) Customs Valuation; (10) Preshipment Inspection; (11) Rules of Origin; (12) Technical Barriers to Trade; (13) Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures; (14) Services; (15) Trade-Related Intellectual Property Rights; (16) Dispute Settlement; (17) Establishment of the World Trade Organization; (18) GATT Articles; (19) Trade Policy Review Mechanism; (20) Ministerial Decisions and Declarations; and (21) Government Procurement. 58 Fed. Reg. 67,263 (Dec. 15, 1993).

Congress approved the results of the negotiations, including U.S. participation in the WTO in the Uruguay Round Agreements Act ("URAA"), Pub. L. No. 103–465, 108 Stat. 4809 (1994), signed into law by President Clinton December 8, 1994. The President issued Proclamation 6763 on December 23, 1994, which, among other things, implemented tariff and other customs treatment resulting from the Uruguay Round. 60 Fed. Reg. 1007 (Jan. 4, 1995). See Chapter 4.A.2.a. for a discussion of the constitutionality of completing the Uruguay Round instruments through this Congressional procedure rather than through advice and consent to ratification of a treaty as that term is used in Article 2, section 2 of the Constitution.

The text of all of the Uruguay Round Agreements can be found on the World Trade Organization's website at www.wto.org. The Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights is discussed in D.1. below. See also 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 312, 320 (1994).

Further excerpts below from President Clinton's notification to Congress describe the various key agreements. 58 Fed. Reg. 67,263.

In section 1101 of the [Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness] Act the Congress set as the first overall U.S. negotiating objective for the Uruguay Round more open, equitable and reciprocal market access. I am particularly pleased to advise you that the Uruguay Round results will provide an unprecedented level of new market access opportunities for U.S. goods and services exports. In the attachment to this letter is a summary description of the agreements on market access for goods and services that we have achieved in the Round. Of special note are the number of areas where we and our major trading partners have each agreed to reduce tariffs on goods to zero. The schedules of commitments reflecting market access in services cover a wide range of service sectors that are of great interest to our exporting community.

The Agreement on Agriculture will achieve, as Congress directed, more open and fair conditions of trade in agricultural commodities by establishing specific commitments to reduce foreign export subsidies, tariffs and non-tariff barriers and internal supports.

The Agreement on Textiles and Clothing provides for trade in textiles and apparel to be fully integrated into the GATT for the first time. As a result, trade in textiles will be subject to the same disciplines as other sectors. This transition will take place gradually over an extended period. At the same time, the agreement provides an improved safeguards mechanism. It also requires apparel exporting countries to lower specific tariff and non-tariff barriers, providing new market opportunities for U.S. exporters of textile and apparel goods. The agreement contributes to the achievement of the U.S. negotiating objectives of expanding the coverage of the GATT while getting developing countries to provide reciprocal benefits.

In fulfillment of the second overall U.S. negotiating objective, the reduction or elimination of barriers and other trade-distorting policies and practices, the Uruguay Round package includes a number of agreements to reduce or eliminate non-tariff barriers to trade. These agreements . . . address Safeguards, Antidumping, Subsidies and Countervailing Measures, Trade-Related Investment Measures, Import Licensing Procedures, Customs Valuation, Preshipment Inspection, Rules of Origin, Technical Barriers to Trade, and Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures. The agreements strengthen existing GATT rules and, for the first time in the GATT, discipline non-tariff barriers in the areas of investment, rules of origin and preshipment inspection. The agreements preserve the ability of the United States to impose measures necessary to protect the health and safety of our citizens and our environment and to enforce vigorously our laws on unfair trade practices.

The Agreement on Government Procurement will provide new opportunities for U.S. exporters as a result of the decision to expand the coverage of the agreement to government procurement of services and construction; we will, however, only extend the full benefits of the agreement to those countries that provide satisfactory coverage of their own procurement. Negotiations on improvements in the Agreement on Trade in Civil Aircraft and on a Multilateral Steel Agreement are continuing. . . .

As a result of the Agreement on Trade-Related Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) and the General Agreement on Trade in Services (GATS), we will now have for the first time internationally agreed rules covering areas of trade of enormous importance to the United States. . . . GATS contains legally enforceable provisions dealing with both cross-border trade and investment in services and sectoral annexes on financial services, labor movement, telecommunications and aviation services. More than 50 countries have submitted schedules of commitments on market access for services. The TRIPS agreement provides for the establishment of standards for the protection of a full range of intellectual property rights and for the enforcement of those standards both internationally and at the border.

The Uruguay Round has produced a number of other agreements that will create a more effective system of international trading disciplines and procedures.

The Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes will provide for a more effective and expeditious dispute resolution mechanism and procedures which will enable better enforcement of United States rights. Congress identified the establishment of such a system as the first principal U.S. trade negotiating objective for the Round. The procedures complement U.S. laws for dealing with foreign unfair trade practices such as section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974.

The Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization will facilitate the implementation of the trade agreements reached in the Uruguay Round by bringing them under one institutional umbrella, requiring full participation of all countries in the new trading system and providing a permanent forum to address new issues facing the international trading system. . . . Creation of the WTO will contribute to the achievement of the second principal U.S. negotiating objective of improving the operation of the GATT and multilateral trade agreements.

The U.S. objective of improving the operation of the GATT is also furthered by a number of understandings, decisions and declarations regarding the GATT and its operations. The Trade Policy Review Mechanism will enhance surveillance of members' trade policies. The Understandings Concerning Interpretation of Specific Articles of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994 (GATT 1994) concern the Interpretation of Articles II:1(b), XVII, XXIV, XXVIII and XXXV, and Balance-of-Payments Provisions. There is also an Understanding in respect of Waivers of Obligations Under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994.

The Ministerial Decisions and Declarations state the views and objectives of Uruguay Round participants on a number of issues relating to the operation of the global trading system, provide for the continuation of the improvements to the dispute settlement system that became effective in 1989 and deal with other matters concerning the dispute settlement system. The Ministerial Decisions and Declarations that are now proposed for adoption are described in the attachment. At this time, implementing legislation does not appear to be necessary for these instruments.

I will continue to consult closely with the Congress as we conclude the Round. There are a few areas of significance that we were unable to resolve at this time. In order to ensure more open, equitable and reciprocal market access, in certain agreements we have made U.S. obligations contingent on receiving satisfactory commitments from other countries, and we will continue to work to ensure that the best possible agreement for the United States is achieved. I will not enter into any agreement unless I am satisfied that U.S. interests are protected.

b. Agreement on financial services

On October 6, 1995, at Geneva, the United States and other WTO member-countries entered into an Interim Agreement on Trade in Financial Services, done as the second protocol to the General Agreement on Trade in Services ("GATS"), reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 203 (1995). At the time that Uruguay Round negotiations concluded in 1994, the United States and a number of other developed countries had unresolved concerns about market access commitments in the financial services area and with developing country market access commitments in the financial services sector. Accordingly, while an interim set of financial services obligations and commitments were put into effect for six months after the adoption of the Uruguay Round WTO Agreements, negotiations on financial services continued through June 30, 1995. Although progress was made in improving market access commitments, the United States was still not prepared to offer full Most Favored Nation ("MFN")* treatment and offered only partial MFN to other parties in this 1995 interim agreement.

This led to a GATS Council decision to engage in an additional round of negotiations, for sixty days, beginning on November 1, 1997. Excerpts from a December 13, 1997, joint statement by Treasury Secretary Rubin and U.S. Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky on the conclusion of the 1997 WTO Financial Services negotiations follow. The text of the entire joint statement can be found at USTR's website at www.treas.gov/press/releases/rr2112.htm.

We are pleased to announce that the United States has led a successful effort to conclude multilateral negotiations that will open financial services markets to US suppliers of banking, securities, insurance and financial data services. The agreement that we secured . . . is dramatically improved from the one that concluded in 1995. . . . This deal covers 95% of the global financial services market as measured in revenue. With this deal, 102 WTO members now have market-opening commitments in the financial services sector. . . .

* A report by the Congressional Research Service described MFN status as follows:

"Normal trade relations" (NTR), or "most-favored-nation" (MFN), trade status is used to denote nondiscriminatory treatment of a trading partner. Only a few countries do not have NTR status in trade with the United States. In practice, duties on the imports from a country which has been granted NTR status are set at lower, concessional rates than those from countries that do not receive such treatment." In a footnote, the report explained that "MFN has been used in international agreements and until recently in U.S. law to denote the fundamental trade principle of non-discriminatory treatment. However, 'MFN' was replaced in U.S. law, on July 22, 1998, by the term 'normal trade relations' (P.L. 105–206). MFN is still used in international trade agreements." A well-functioning financial services industry is key to economic growth in any country, as we have seen in the United States. . . . This agreement levels the playing field in global financial markets, providing new opportunities for U.S. financial service firms.

At the same time, this agreement will foster the development of financial markets, especially in developing countries, helping lay the foundation for sustained growth. Many countries had already begun the process of financial sector liberalization, but in the past had hesitated to lock in those measures. This agreement locks in that progress and, in addition, substantially advances the process of market opening abroad.

Financial services, together with the Information Technology Agreement (ITA) and the agreement in the WTO to lock in market opening commitments on telecommunications services, now completes the triple play of solid global market opening agreements we have reached in the past year. All three cover sectors where the United States is the most competitive . . . [and] where the United States has minimal or non-existent trade barriers, but the rest of the world . . . present substantial entry barriers for our companies.

c. Agreement on Basic Telecommunications Services

On February 15, 1997, the United States and 68 other countries entered into the Agreement on Basic Telecommunications Services ("Basic Telecom Agreement"), done as the fourth protocol to GATS. The United States had played an instrumental role in getting Uruguay Round negotiators to agree to extend negotiations on basic telecommunications services past the April 1994 conclusion of the Uruguay Round. The Agreement entered into effect on January 1, 1998. United States Trade Representative Barshefsky testified before the House Commerce Committee, Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Trade & Consumer Protection on March 19, 1997, regarding the achievements and requirements of the Basic Telecom Agreement. Her testimony is excerpted below and the full text is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The WTO Basic Telecom Agreement represents a change of profound importance. It is an achievement greater than we could have reasonably expected three years ago at Buenos Aires. A 60-year tradition of telecommunications monopolies and closed markets will give way to market opening, deregulation and competition—the principles championed in the United States and embodied in the 1996 Telecommunications Act. We did not expect at Buenos Aires that these principles would be adopted widely by both the industrialized nations and by so many other countries. The Basic Telecom Agreement was negotiated among 69 countries —both developed and developing—that account for over 99% of WTO member telecom revenues. It ensures that U.S. companies can compete against and invest in all existing carriers. Before this Agreement, only 17 percent of the top 20 telecom markets were open to U.S. companies; now they have access to nearly 100 percent of these markets. The range of services and technologies covered by this Agreement is breath-taking. From submarine cables to satellites, from wide-band networks to cellular phones, from business intranets to fixed wireless for rural and underserved regions, the market access opportunities cover the entire spectrum of innovative communications technologies pioneered by American industry and workers.

The Agreement has four parts: market access, investment, procompetitive regulatory principles and enforcement. With respect to market access, the Agreement provides U.S. companies market access for local, long-distance and international service through any means of network technology, either on a facilities basis or through resale of existing network capacity. On investment, the Agreement ensures that U.S. companies can compete against, acquire or hold a significant stake in telecom companies around the world. Finally, 65 countries adopted procompetitive regulatory principles based upon the landmark 1996 Telecommunications Act.

And lastly, this Agreement is fully enforceable through WTO dispute settlement [procedures], supplemented where necessary by U.S. trade laws.

* * * *

Scope of Market Access Commitments

* * * *

Our international long distance industry will gain access to serve over 52 markets in Europe, Asia, Latin American and Africa, and in 49 markets they will gain access to provide these and other services by satellite. U.S. industry will gain the right to use their own facilities and to work directly with their customers everywhere their customers go—providing seamless end-to-end services, instead of transferring calls to local providers at extra cost. From the European Community to Korea, from Japan to El Salvador, Mexico and Canada, countries have made these commitments. And the range of services that can be provided internationally includes all voice and data services, provided by fixed or by wireless service networks or both.

This Agreement also provides market access and effective interconnection rights for the resale of telecom services. Almost every offer made in these negotiations to provide market access for facilities-based competition also included the opportunity to resell service and to interconnect with existing networks at reasonable rates, terms and conditions.

* * * *

Investment and regulatory commitments

* * * *

Our firms will gain not only the opportunity to compete but they will also benefit for the first time from fair rules and effective enforcement. Sixty-five countries representing 93% of the world market have bound themselves to enforceable regulatory principles based upon the framework for competition that this Committee championed in the landmark Telecommunications Act of 1996. Fifty-five of these countries have agreed to a uniform, specific set of regulatory principles. The global adoption of these procompetition principles, known as the Reference Paper, is an extraordinary testimony to the compelling nature of Congress' vision in this area.

The Reference Paper commits foreign countries to establish independent regulatory bodies, guarantees that our companies will be able to interconnect with networks in foreign countries at reasonable prices, requires governments to take action to prevent anti-competitive practices such as cross-subsidization, and mandates transparency of government regulations and licensing. We will be able to enforce all of these rights, as well as the market access and investment commitments, at the WTO and through our own legislation. The Agreement takes effect on January 1, 1998. Countries remain free to improve further their offers and we will work to that end.

d. U.S. reports to WTO committees

(1) Agriculture

In its 2000 Trade Policy Agenda and 1999 Annual Report to Congress, Chapter II at 65, USTR provided an assessment of the first five years of operation under the WTO Agreement on Agriculture, as excerpted below.

The full text of the report, issued in March 2000, is available through the U.S. Trade Representative Press Office. The WTO chapter of the report is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8185.htm.

Status

The WTO Committee on Agriculture oversees implementation of and adherence to the Agreement on Agriculture. It provides a vital forum for consultation and, in many cases, resolution of issues resulting from the commitments made in the Uruguay Round. The Committee is also charged with monitoring the follow-up to the 1995 Marrakesh Ministerial Decision on Measures Concerning the Possible Negative Effects of the Reform Program on Least Developed and Net Food Importing Developing Countries. During 1999, the Committee concluded its work on the Analysis and Information Exchange (AIE) that had been mandated by the WTO's 1st Ministerial Conference in Singapore. The AIE was charged with reviewing issues arising out of the implementation of the Uruguay Round Agreement and identifying possible areas to address in the continuation of the agriculture reform process, mandated as part of the WTO's built-in agenda.

Assessment of the First Five Years of Operation

The Agreement on Agriculture represents a major step forward in bringing agriculture more fully under WTO disciplines. The creation of new trade rules and specific market-opening commitments has transformed the world trading environment in agriculture from one where trade was heavily distorted and basically outside effective GATT disciplines to a rules-based system that quantifies, caps and reduces trade-distorting protection and support. Prior to the establishment of the Agreement, Members were able to block imports of agricultural products, provide essentially unlimited production subsidies to farmers, and dump surplus production on world markets with the aid of export subsidies. As a consequence, U.S. farmers and ranchers were denied access to other countries' markets and were undercut by subsidized competition in world markets.

The WTO Agreement on Agriculture set out a framework that imposed disciplines in three critical areas affecting trade in agriculture.

1. First, the Agreement places limits on the use of export subsidies. Products that had not benefited from export subsidies in the past are banned from receiving them in the future. Where Members had provided export subsidies in the past, the future use of export subsidies was capped and reduced.
2. Second, the Agreement set agricultural trade on a more predictable basis by requiring the conversion of non-tariff barriers, such as quotas and import bans, into simple tariffs. Currently, trade in agricultural products can only be restricted by tariffs. Quotas, discriminatory licensing, and other non-tariff measures are now prohibited. Also, all agricultural tariffs were "bound" in the WTO and made subject to reduction commitments; a decision by a Member to impose tariff rates above a binding would violate WTO obligations. Creating a "tariff-only" system for agricultural products is an important advance, yet too many high tariffs and administrative difficulties with tariff-rate quota systems that replaced the non-tariff barriers continue to impede international trade of food and fiber products.

3. Third, the Agreement calls for reduction commitments on trade-distorting domestic supports, while preserving criteria-based "green box" policies that can provide support to agriculture in a manner that minimizes distortions to trade. Governments have the right to support farmers if they so choose. However, it is important that this support be provided in a manner that causes minimal distortions to production and trade.

As a result, farmers all over the world benefit from access to new markets and improved access to existing markets, face less subsidized competition, and now have a solid framework for addressing agricultural trade disputes. Yet it is clear that full agricultural reform is a long-term endeavor. Hence, the Agreement also called for new negotiations on agriculture beginning in 1999, as part of the "built-in" agenda of the WTO.

The Committee on Agriculture has proven since its inception to be a vital instrument for the United States in monitoring and enforcing agricultural trade commitments that were undertaken by other countries in the Uruguay Round. Members agreed to provide annual notifications of progress in meeting their commitments in agriculture, and the Committee has met frequently to review the notifications and monitor activities of Members to ensure that trading partners honor their commitments.

Under the watchful eye of the Committee, Members have, for the most part, been in compliance with the agricultural commitments that they undertook in the WTO. However, there have been important exceptions where clear violations of Uruguay Round commitments have adversely affected U.S. agricultural trade interests. In these situations, the Agriculture Committee has frequently served as an indispensable tool for resolving conflicts before they become formal WTO disputes. The following are some examples:

- Resolution of issues related to the use of export subsidies in Hungary, benefiting U.S. exports of grains, fruits and vegetables by nearly $10 million.
- Elimination of restrictions on beef imports by Switzerland that affected approximately $15 million in U.S. exports.
- Resolution of issues related to access for pork and poultry in the Philippines. In the case of pork, resolution of this issue meant additional U.S. exports of up to $70 million, and in the case of poultry, of up to $20 million.
- Resolving issues associated with Turkey's imposition of a tax on imported cotton, important to U.S. exports of more than $150 million.
- Resolution of issues related to the implementation of a tariff-rate quota on poultry in Costa Rica helped to triple U.S. exports to that country in 1998.
- Questioning Canada concerning a milk pricing scheme that appeared to be in violation of Canada's export subsidy commitments. Building on a process that began with the Committee's discussion, the United States eventually won a WTO dispute settlement case on this issue, benefiting U.S. exporters by reining in unfairly subsidized dairy exports from Canada.

Major Issues in 1999

In 1999, the Committee on Agriculture remained an effective forum for raising agricultural trade issues of concern to participating Members. The United States played a leading role in the Committee's activities, working with other countries to ensure broad-based compliance with WTO commitments on agriculture.

* * * *

The following are some of the more important specific issues that were raised in the Committee:

Notifications: The Committee reviewed more than 250 notifications detailing the implementation of market access commitments, particularly with regard to tariff-rate quota commitments and the special agricultural safeguards, and compliance with export subsidy and domestic support commitments. . . .

Member-specific issues: The Committee also provides the opportunity to clarify or resolve specific policies and issues of interest to Members. During 1999, issues raised included use of unused export subsidies from previous years in the current year, or the so-called "rollover" provisions (European Union, Turkey, United States); noncompliance with export subsidy commitments leading to modifications in the use of those measures (Poland, Thailand); domestic support programs (EU, the Republic of Korea, Thailand, Norway, United States, Czech Republic) inadequate implementation of tariff-rate quota commitments (Venezuela, South Africa, Czech Republic, the Republic of Korea, Japan); compliance with tariff bindings (Panama, Chile); and inappropriate application of agricultural safeguards (Republic of Korea). The United States also questioned the Republic of Korea about market access restrictions on U.S. beef; this issue is now in formal dispute settlement.

Analysis and Information Exchange. In addition to its work on the specific trade issues mentioned above, the Committee continued its work in the informal AIE forum, prompting a wide-ranging exchange on topics of relevance to the built-in agenda negotiations on agriculture. More than 80 papers on issues affecting agricultural trade reform were presented during the AIE process. The United States submitted papers on a number of trade issues, including the administration of tariff-rate quotas and trade in products involving new technologies. Issues raised by other Members included non-trade concerns, special and differential treatment for developing countries, export credits, and domestic support. Although the forum was curtailed in September 1999, as mandated by the Singapore Ministerial, the AIE process proved vital in preparing and identifying areas of interest for the new negotiations on agriculture.

(2) Sanitary and phytosanitary measures

On December 8, 1997, USTR published a notice and request for comments on the three-year review of the Agreement on Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures ("SPS Agreement.") 62 Fed. Reg. 64,618 (Dec. 8, 1997). The notice described the agreement and U.S. views as excerpted below. In March 1998 the United States submitted its Preliminary Outline of Issues for Consideration by the SPS Committee as Part of the Triennial Review of the SPS Agreement, available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

The United States was aware during the Uruguay Round that unjustified sanitary and phytosanitary (SPS) measures have often restricted U.S. agricultural exports, even after tariffs or other nontariff barriers have been reduced or eliminated. To address this problem, the SPS Agreement was negotiated to ensure that WTO members would not impose protectionist trade barriers disguised as SPS measures. The importance of the SPS Agreement to agricultural trade is reflected in Article 14 of the Agreement on Agriculture, which emphasizes that WTO members have agreed to give effect to the SPS Agreement.

The SPS Agreement reflects a careful balance of rights and obligations. The Agreement safeguards WTO members' rights to adopt and implement regulations to protect human, animal and plant life or health (including food safety and environmental measures), and to establish the level of protection of life and health they deem to be appropriate.

The United States has a strong interest in preserving these rights, which ensure the ability to maintain the U.S. standards of public health and environmental protection.

At the same time, the SPS Agreement establishes obligations designed to ensure that an SPS measure is in fact intended to protect against the risk asserted, rather than to serve as a disguised trade barrier. In particular, the Agreement requires that a measure adopted to protect human, animal and plant life and health be based on science and a risk assessment, and that it be no more restrictive than is necessary to achieve the intended level of human, animal or plant health protection.

The same balance is sought in the SPS Agreement's provisions relating to international sanitary and phytosanitary standards, guidelines and recommendations. Recognizing that the harmonization of international standards may contribute both to improved protection of human, animal and plant life and health and to the removal of unnecessary trade barriers, the Agreement calls for each WTO member to use relevant international standards as a basis for establishing its SPS measures, subject to other provisions of the Agreement. At the same time, the Agreement makes clear that it does not require "downward harmonization," and that no WTO member is required to adopt an international standard if doing so would result in a lower level of human, animal or plant health protection than that government has determined to be appropriate.

In the SPS Committee, the United States has pushed aggressively for full and effective implementation of WTO members' commitments under the SPS Agreement. For example, the United States has provided strong leadership in promoting implementation of the Agreement's transparency and notification provisions, in order to ensure effective surveillance of WTO members' SPS measures. Members' notifications of new SPS measures and other important information are now available on the WTO's internet home page (http://www.wto.org). The SPS Agreement's notification procedures, which provide an opportunity for the United States to comment on other WTO members' draft SPS measures in advance, have proven to be increasingly useful in identifying potential trade problems and facilitating the resolution of differences before trade is actually affected.

In recent years, the United States has successfully resolved a number of bilateral trade problems associated with the application of SPS measures in key overseas markets. In these negotiations, reference to the requirements of the SPS Agreement has been an important factor in U.S. trading partners' decisions to eliminate or modify scientifically unjustified SPS measures. The United States has also made active use of the procedures of the WTO Dispute Settlement Body (DSB) to push for the removal of scientifically unjustified SPS measures which have a major impact on U.S. exports.

(3) Trade and environment

In its 2000 Trade Policy Agenda and 1999 Annual Report to Congress, Chapter II at 123, USTR reviewed the first five years of the CTE's existence and highlighted issues of 1999. The full text of the report, issued in March 2000, is available through the U.S. Trade Representative Press Office. The WTO chapter of the report is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Status

The Committee on Trade and Environment (CTE) was created by the WTO General Council on January 31, 1995 pursuant to the Marrakesh Ministerial Decision on Trade and Environment. The mandate of the CTE is to make appropriate recommendations to the Ministerial Conference as to whether, and if so what, changes are needed in the rules of the multilateral trading system to foster positive interaction between trade and environment measures and to avoid protectionist measures.

Assessment of the First Five Years of Operation

The CTE has played an important role in bringing together government officials from trade and environment ministries to build a better understanding of the complex links between trade and environment. Among other things, this has helped to address the serious problem of lack of coordination between trade and environment officials in many governments. In addition, the CTE has produced useful recommendations calling for transparency in ecolabeling and launching the creation of a data base of all environmental measures that have been notified under WTO transparency rules.

The CTE has also engaged in important analytical work, helping to identify areas where trade liberalization holds particular potential for yielding environmental benefits. Win-win opportunities that have been identified thus far include the elimination or reduction of agriculture subsides that promote unsustainable farming practices and fisheries subsidies that contribute to over fishing, and the elimination of barriers to environmental goods and services.

Major Issues in 1999

The WTO Committee on Trade and Environment met three times during 1999, pursuant to its mandate. The United States contributed to this process by, inter alia, working to build a consensus that both important trade and environmental benefits can be achieved by addressing agricultural subsidies, fisheries subsidies that contribute to overfishing and the liberalization of trade in environmental goods and services. Multilateral Environmental Agreements (MEAs): Inclusion of trade measures in MEAs has been and will continue to be essential to meeting the objectives of certain agreements but may raise questions with respect to WTO obligations. Over the course of the year, the CTE helped strengthen WTO Members' understanding of MEAs and trade by holding the third in a series of meetings with representatives from a number of MEA Secretariats at which those representatives briefed the committee members on recent developments in their respective agreements. There continue to be sharp differences of view within the CTE on whether there is a need to clarify WTO rules in this area. The United States holds the view that the WTO broadly accommodates trade measures in MEAs.

Market Access: Work in this area continued to focus on the environmental implications of reducing or eliminating trade-distorting measures. There is a broad degree of consensus in the Committee that trade liberalization, in conjunction with appropriate environmental policies, can yield environmental benefits. Discussion continued over the course of the year on the potential for such a "double dividend" in the agriculture sector. The Committee also discussed in depth the potential environmental benefits of reducing or eliminating fisheries subsidies, drawing on a previously tabled paper on this subject by the United States. Further work in the area was taken up at the Third Ministerial. Discussion also took place on the benefits of improving market access for environmental services and goods. The Committee also discussed the environmental implications of trade liberalization in other sectors, including forestry and energy.

TRIPS: The Committee had a brief discussion of the relationship between the TRIPS Agreement and the environment. As in the past, a few countries advanced arguments for consideration of changes to the TRIPS Agreement to address "contradictions" between the WTO and the Convention on Biological Diversity. The United States once again made clear its view that there are no contradictions between the WTO and the Convention on Biological Diversity.

Relations with NGOs: The United States, joined by several other Members, emphasized the need for further work to develop adequate mechanisms for involving NGOs in the work of the WTO and adequate public access to documents. Following through on this work, in the Third Ministerial process the United States proposed that the WTO General Council's 1996 agreement on Guidelines for Relations with NGOs be reviewed and substantially improved, and the United States continues to lead efforts at enhancing the WTO's transparency, including destruction of documents.

e. 50th Anniversary of the GATT

In a speech before the WTO at the Commemoration of the 50th Anniversary of the GATT, May 18, 1998, President Clinton reviewed the accomplishments of the world trading system since the end of World War II, and addressed the transformation the United States wished to see in the new millennium. 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 926 (May 25, 1998).

The President focused on the need for harmonization in international trade in the areas of free trade, protection of labor and the environment, electronic commerce and accountability. Excerpts follow.

The challenge of the millennial generation therefore is to create a world trading system attuned to the pace and scope of the new global economy, one that offers opportunity for all our people, and one that meets the profound environmental challenges we share.

We took the first, vital step when we created the World Trade Organization in 1995—a goal that had eluded our predecessors for nearly half a century. The Uruguay Round that founded the WTO amounted to the biggest tax cut in world history—$76 billion a year when fully implemented. And in just four years, world trade is up 25 per cent.

* * * *

Now, we must build on these achievements with a new vision of trade, to build a modern WTO ready for the 21st Century.

First, we must pursue an ever-more-open global trading system.

Today, let me state unequivocally that America is committed to open trade among all nations. Economic freedom and open trade have brought unprecedented prosperity in the 20th Century—they will widen the circle of opportunity in the 21st Century. In my own country, one third of the strong economic growth we have enjoyed these past five years was generated by exports. For every country engaged in trade, open markets dramatically widen the base of possible customers for our goods and services. We must press forward. Redoubling our efforts to tear down barriers to trade will spur growth in all our countries. It will create good jobs and boost incomes. It will bring new opportunities for our people. And it will advance the free flow of ideas, information and people that are the lifeblood of democracy and prosperity.

Globalization is not a policy choice—it is a fact. But all of us face a choice. We can work to shape these powerful forces of change to the benefit of our people. Or we can retreat behind walls of protection—and get left behind in the global economy. At a moment when, for the first time in human history, a majority of the world's people live under governments of their own choosing . . . when the argument over which is better—free enterprise or state socialism—has been won . . . when people on every continent seek to join the free market system, those of us who have benefited from that system and led it cannot turn our backs. For my part, I am determined to pursue an aggressive market opening strategy in every region of the world. And I will continue to work with members of both parties in the Congress of the United States to secure fast-track negotiating authority.

Second, we must recognize that in the new economy, the way we conduct trade affects the lives and livelihoods, the health and the safety of families around the world.

The WTO was created to lift the lives of ordinary citizens; it should listen to them. I propose the WTO, for the first time, provide a forum where business, labor, environmental and consumer groups can speak out and help guide the further evolution of the WTO. When this body convenes again, I believe that the world's trade ministers should sit down with representatives of the broad public to begin this discussion.

Third, we must do more to harmonize our goal of increasing trade with our goal of improving the environment and working conditions.

Enhanced trade can and should enhance—not undercut—the protection of the environment. Indeed, the WTO Agreement in its preamble explicitly adopts sustainable development as an objective of open trade, including a commitment to preserve the environment and to increase the capacity of doing so. Therefore, international trade rules must permit sovereign nations to exercise their right to set protective standards for health, safety and the environment and biodiversity. Nations have a right to pursue those protections—even when they are stronger than international norms. I am asking that a high-level meeting be convened, to bring together trade and environmental ministers, to provide strong direction and new energy to the WTO's environmental efforts in the years to come, as has been suggested by the European Commission.

Likewise, the WTO and the International Labour Organization should commit to work together, to make certain that open trade lifts living conditions, and respects the core labor standards that are essential not only to workers rights, but to human rights everywhere. I ask the two organizations' Secretariats to convene at a high level to discuss these issues. This weekend, G-8 leaders voiced support for the ILO's adoption of a new declaration and a meaningful follow-up mechanism on core labor standards when the ILO Ministers meet next month in Geneva. I hope you will add your support. We must work hard to ensure the ILO is a vibrant institution. Today, I transmitted to the Senate for ratification the ILO Convention aimed at eliminating discrimination in the workplace.

* * * *

Fourth, we must modernize the WTO by opening its doors to the scrutiny and participation of the public.

* * * *

Today, when one nation challenges the trade practices of another, the proceeding takes place behind closed doors. I propose that all hearings by the WTO be open to the public, and all briefs by the parties be made publicly available. To achieve this end, we must change the rules of this organization. But each of us can do our part—now. The United States today formally offers to open up every panel that we are a party to—and I challenge every other nation to join us in making this happen.

Today, there is no mechanism for private citizens to provide input in these trade disputes. I propose that the WTO provide the opportunity for stakeholders to convey their views, such as the ability to file 'amicus briefs', to help inform the panels in their deliberations.

Today, the public must wait weeks to read the reports of these panels. I propose that the decisions of these trade panels be made available to the public as soon as they are issued.

Fifth, we must have a trading system that taps the full potential of the Information Age.

I ask the nations of the world to join the United States in a standstill on any tariffs to electronic transmissions sent across borders. We cannot allow discriminatory barriers to stunt the development of the most promising new economic opportunity in decades. Earlier today, at the Summit with the EU, we agreed to deepen our collaboration in this area. And last week, Prime Minister Hashimoto and I agreed to move forward together, with a market-oriented private sector-led approach to enhance privacy, protect intellectual property, and encourage the free flow of information and commerce on the Internet. I hope we can build a consensus that this is the best way to harness the remarkable potential of this new means of communication.

Sixth, a trading system for the 21st Century must be comprised of governments that are open, honest, and fair in their practices.

* * * *

With its insistence on rules that are fair and open, the WTO plays a powerful role toward open and accountable government—but the WTO has not done enough. By next year, all Members of the WTO should agree that government purchases should be made through open and fair bidding. This single reform could open up $3 trillion of business to competition around the world. And I ask every nation in the world to adopt the anti-bribery convention developed by the OECD. Both these steps would promote investor confidence and stability.

Finally, we must develop an open global trading system that moves as fast as the marketplace.

In an era in which product life-cycles are measured in months, and information and money move around the globe in seconds, we can no longer afford to take seven years to finish a trade round, as happened during the Uruguay Round, or let decades pass between identifying and acting on a trade barrier. In the meantime, new industries arise, new trading blocs take shape, and governments invent new trade barriers every day.

We should explore what new type of trade negotiating round is best suited to the new economy. We should explore whether there is a way to tear down barriers without waiting for every issue in every sector to be resolved before any issue in any sector is resolved. We should do this in a way that is fair and balanced, that takes into account the needs of nations large and small, rich and poor. But I am confident we can go about the task of negotiating trade agreements in a way that is faster and better than today.

f. WTO Millenium Round of trade negotiations

In November 1999, the United States hosted the Third Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in Seattle, Washington ("Seattle Ministerial"). This meeting was to launch the "Millenium Round" of trade negotiations to build upon the Uruguay Round of trade negotiations that had culminated in the establishment of the WTO in 1995. While the Uruguay Round agreements had contemplated a built-in agenda of negotiations on agricultural and services trade, it was expected that a more wide-ranging set of negotiations would occur. In anticipation of the Seattle Ministerial, Ambassador Susan Esserman, Deputy U.S. Trade Representative, addressed the WTO General Council Session at Geneva, Switzerland on July 29, 1999, setting forth U.S. priorities for an agenda for the Millenium Round.

The full text of Ambassador Esserman's remarks, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

Our consultations thus far have indicated that in the work ahead, we must give special focus to the built-in agenda, broadening market access, implementation of existing commitments and ensuring that our actions reinforce the shared commitment to further integrate countries into the system.

IMPLEMENTATION OF EXISTING COMMITMENTS

We agree with others on the need to give priority in the leadup and at Seattle to the issue of implementation. By the end of this year, Members must meet Uruguay Round commitments under the Agreements on Intellectual Property, TRIMs, Subsidies, and Customs Valuation. In succeeding years, final liberalization commitments under the Agreement on Clothing and Textiles as well as certain aspects of the TRIPS and Subsidies Agreement will phase in. Likewise, Uruguay Round tariff commitments will soon be realized in full. These commitments represent the balance of concessions which allowed completion of the Uruguay Round and have helped realize its benefits since then. Their implementation is critical to confidence in the system, and to the credibility of any new negotiations.

* * * *

We also call upon those WTO Members which have not ratified the Basic Telecommunications and Financial Services Agreements to do so, in order to ensure that all Members can benefit from their commitments and that they can win the benefits of competition, transparency and technological progress these Agreements offer.

THE NEW ROUND

Second, we must develop a negotiating agenda that meets the major priorities WTO Members have laid out. While much consultation remains ahead as to specific objectives, we believe the core of the agenda should be market access concerns including agriculture, services and non-agricultural goods, with benchmarks to ensure that the negotiations remain on schedule.

Once consensus on the agenda is achieved, we can then adopt the appropriate structure for negotiations. It is clear, of course, that any final package must be broad enough to create a political consensus by addressing the market access priorities of all Members. This should be complemented and balanced by a work-program to address areas in which consensus does not yet exist for negotiations; and by a series of measures to improve the WTO's own functioning.

Specifically, our ideas would include the following.

1. Market Access

Market access negotiations should cover the built-in agenda of agriculture and services, and also address non-agricultural goods.

In agriculture, in liberalizing trade we have the potential to create broader opportunities for farmers, promote nutrition and food security through ensuring the broadest possible supplies of food, help improve productivity, enhance development, and address trade-distorting measures which increase pressure on land, water and habitat. To secure this opportunity, we would hope to set objectives including:

—Completely eliminating, and prohibiting for the future, all remaining export subsidies as defined in the Agreement on Agriculture.
—Substantially reducing trade-distorting supports and strengthening rules that ensure all production-related support is subject to discipline, while preserving criteria-based "green box" policies that support agriculture while minimizing distortion to trade;
—Lower tariff rates and bind them, including but not limited to zero/zero initiatives;
—Improving administration of tariff-rate-quotas;
—Strengthening disciplines on the operation of state trading enterprises;
—Improved market access through a variety of means to the benefit of least-developed Members by all other WTO Members; and —Addressing disciplines to ensure trade in agricultural biotechnology products is based on transparent, predictable and timely processes.

In services, the major accomplishment in the Uruguay Round was the General Agreement on Trade in Services itself. In many cases, however, actual sector-by-sector market-opening commitments simply preserved the status quo. Effective market access, and removal of restrictions, will both stimulate trade and help address many broader economic and social issues.

Examples include improving the efficiency of infrastructure sectors including communications, power, transport and distribution; easing commerce in goods, thus helping to create new opportunities for manufacturers and agricultural producers; and helping to foster competition and transparency in financial sectors. To realize these opportunities, we would hope to set objectives including the following:

—Liberalize restrictions in a broad range of services sectors;
—Ensure that GATS rules anticipate the development of new technologies; —Prevent discrimination against particular modes of delivering services, such as electronic commerce or rights of establishment; and —Develop disciplines to ensure transparency and good governance in regulations of services.

In non-agricultural goods, we can continue the progress of the past fifty years in raising living standards and promoting worldwide development by removing tariff and non-tariff barriers.

We want to engage in broad market access negotiations in the next Round. Here we would build upon the Accelerated Tariff Liberalization initiative, calling for liberalization of eight specific sectors, by maximizing opportunities for more broad-based market-opening. Specific objectives would include:

—Reduce existing tariff disparities;
—Provide recognition to Members for bound tariff reductions made as part of recent autonomous liberalization measures, and for WTO measures.
—Use of applied rates as the basis for negotiation, and incorporation of procedures to address non-tariff measures and other measures affecting conditions for imports; and —Improve market access for least developed WTO Members by all other Members, through a variety of means.

2. Forward Work Program and Other Issues

Clearly, some Members have interests beyond this set of core issues. Others have noted great concern about the difficulty of fulfilling existing commitments. The built-in agenda provides for substantial reviews of existing Agreements, like that of TRIPs next year, which will be important to determining future decisions. We will review all suggestions carefully, and work with other delegations for an ambitious but manageable agenda, capable of completion within three years.

We may find that certain issues would be appropriate for a forward work-program that would help Members, including ourselves, more fully understand the implications of newer topics and build consensus for the future.

One especially important case is the question of the relationship between trade and core labor standards. As President Clinton has stated, the development of the trading system must come together with efforts to ensure respect for these standards, and its results must include benefits for working people in all nations. While the Singapore Declaration on core labor standards was an important first step, more attention to the intersection of trade and core labor standards is warranted as governments and industries wrestle with the complex issues of globalization and adjustment. As we stated in January, we believe a recommendation should be forwarded to the Ministers for the establishment of a forward work-program in the WTO to address trade issues (e.g. abusive child labor, the operation of export processing zones, etc.) relating to labor standards and where Members of the WTO would benefit from further information and analysis on this relationship and developments in the ILO. We further urge consideration of specific institutional links between the ILO and the WTO to help facilitate a common agenda on issues of concern to both organizations.

3. Institutional Reform

The past five years of experience with the WTO have also revealed areas in which the institution can be further strengthened. These would help Members take maximum advantage of the opportunities offered by international trade; ensure that the work of the WTO and international organizations in related fields is mutually supportive and does as much as possible to advance the larger vision of a more prosperous, sustainable and just world economy; and strengthen public support for the WTO.

Substantial achievements are possible in areas including:

Institutional reforms that can strengthen transparency, ensure citizen access and build public support for the WTO and its work. Here, objectives would include:

—Improving means for stakeholder contacts with delegations and the WTO; and —Enhancing transparency in procedures to the maximum extent possible.

Capacity-building, to ensure that all Members can implement commitments, use dispute settlement effectively and take maximum advantage of market access opportunities. Specific areas here would include:

—Improve cooperation among international organizations in identifying and delivering technical assistance, and explore ways to improve coherence in the interaction among bilateral donors, international organizations and nongovernmental organizations;
—Build upon and expand the Integrated Framework concept;
—Ensure the most effective use of resources on technical assistance programs;
—Strengthen capacity-building efforts on regulatory and other infrastructure needs; and —Explore a development partner program for the least-developed nations.

We have been consulting with delegations on these ideas in the last several weeks and look forward to continuing to develop a joint effort.

Trade facilitation, which will ensure that less developed economies and small businesses can take full advantage of a more open world economy. Here, objectives would include:

—Clarify and strengthen the transparency requirements of WTO Agreements;
—Helping to improve customs and other trade-related procedures, so as to increase transparency and facilitate more rapid release of goods;

4. Sustainable Development and Committee on Trade and the Environment

As we embark on this new Round, we must be guided by our shared commitment to sustainable development, including protection of the environment, as enshrined in the Preamble of the WTO. This would include a number of areas:

—First, it underlines the importance of institutional reforms.
—Second, pursuing trade liberalization in a way that is supportive of high environmental standards.
—Third, identifying and pursuing those areas of trade liberalization that hold particular promise for also yielding direct environmental benefits—so-called "win-win" opportunities. Examples include elimination of tariffs on environmental goods through the Accelerated Tariff Liberalization initiative; liberalization of trade in environmental services; and elimination of fishery subsidies that contribute to overcapacity. We can work together in an effort to identify other areas in which these two priorities of WTO Members complement and support one another.

To help in ensuring that we accomplish these objectives, we are tabling a number of proposals, including a proposal to use the Committee on Trade and the Environment as a forum to identify and discuss the environmental implications of issues under negotiation in the round.

At the Seattle Ministerial,WTO members failed to reach agreement on an agenda for the Millenium Round. (Negotiations on agriculture and services, which were mandated by the WTO's "built-in agenda" did begin in early 2000.) The Seattle Ministerial was also the site of large anti-globalization protests. The Statement by Ambassador Charlene Barshefsky, the United States Trade Representative, at the closing plenary session of the Seattle Ministerial on December 3, 1999, following a decision to suspend, is excerpted below.

Over the past four days, we engaged in intense discussion and negotiations on one of the core questions facing the world today: the creation of a global trading economy for the next century. The delegates have taken up some of the most profound and important issues and policy decisions imaginable, including issues that previous Rounds could not resolve, and matters that have not come before the trading system in the past. They took up these issues with good will and mutual respect, and made progress on many of them.

However, the issues before us are diverse, complex and often novel. And together with this, we found that the WTO has outgrown the processes appropriate to an earlier time. An increasing and necessary view, generally shared among the members, was that we needed a process which had a greater degree of internal transparency and inclusion to accommodate a larger and more diverse membership.

This is a very difficult combination to manage. It stretched both the substantive and procedural capacity of the Ministerial, and we found as time passed that divergences of opinion remained that would not be overcome rapidly. Our collective judgment, shared by the Director-General, the Working Group Chairs and Co-Chairs, and the membership generally, was that it would be best to take a time out, consult with one another, and find creative means to finish the job.

Therefore, Ministers have agreed to suspend the work of the Ministerial. During this time, the Director-General can consult with delegations and discuss creative ways in which we might bridge the remaining areas in which consensus does not yet exist, develop an improved process which is both efficient and fully inclusive, and prepare the way for successful conclusion. The Ministerial will then resume its work.

g. Claims under the WTO's dispute resolution mechanisms

(1) Overview of U.S. participation in WTO dispute resolution system

The establishment of a binding system of dispute resolution to settle allegations that commitments under the WTO agreements had been violated was a principal negotiating objective of the United States during the Uruguay Round. Charlene Barshefsky, U.S. Trade Representative, described the WTO's dispute resolution system, and the U.S. experience during the first five years of its existence, in testimony before the Trade Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Finance, June 20, 2000. Excerpts below include a review of key cases involving the United States during that period.

The full text of Ambassador Barshefsky's prepared testimony, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

U.S. TRADE INTERESTS AND ENFORCEMENT POLICY

In 1999, the United States was the world's largest exporting and importing nation, carrying on $2.2 trillion in two-way goods and services trade with the world. This represents a $1 trillion expansion of trade since 1992, contributing substantially to the remarkable record of growth, rising living standards and job creation the United States built in the 1990s. Thus far in the year 2000 as well, both exports and imports are growing rapidly.

This remarkable expansion of trade owes a great deal to the network of nearly 300 trade agreements the Clinton Administration has negotiated over the past seven years. Of special importance was the creation of the World Trade Organization in 1995. The WTO's creation deepened the achievements of its predecessor, the GATT, through a one-third cut in world tariff rates and the elimination of quotas, and broadened the GATT with new agreements covering agriculture, sanitary and phytosanitary measures, services, intellectual property, trade-related investment measures, and other issues—the vast majority of which apply to all of the WTO's 137 members.

Of course, to win the full economic benefit of the WTO and each other agreement we negotiate, both for America's concrete trade interests and the broader strengthening of the rule of law, we must ensure that our trading partners will fulfil the commitments they have made. And in this work—together with our creation of USTR's first special unit dedicated solely to monitoring and enforcement of agreements; and the use of our domestic trade laws and other measures—the WTO's dispute settlement mechanism is of central importance.

WTO DISPUTE SETTLEMENT UNDERSTANDING

In the Uruguay Round negotiations, Congress made a more effective GATT dispute settlement system a principal U.S. negotiating objective. The result is the WTO's Dispute Settlement Understanding, created at the foundation of the WTO itself, which enables us to assert our rights and protect our interests in the trading system more effectively than ever before. At the same time, the dispute settlement system fully respects American sovereignty, as panels have no power to order any WTO member to change its laws, nor to impose retaliation. The most important changes it makes vis-a-vis the previous GATT system include:

—Imposition of stringent time limits for each stage of the dispute settlement process, including the time for implementation of panel recommendations;
—Creation of an Appellate Body to review panel interpretations of WTO agreements and legal issues;
—Automatic adoption of panel or Appellate Body reports and of requests for retaliation in the absence of a consensus to reject the report or request; and —Automatic authority for complaining parties to retaliate on request, including in sectors outside the subject of the dispute, if panel recommendations are not implemented or there is no mutually satisfactory solution to the matter.

In those cases where our trading partners are not fulfilling their commitments, in comparison to the dispute settlement options available under the WTO's predecessor, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, we have found the WTO dispute settlement mechanism to be more reliable, as it eliminates opportunities to block panel results; more comprehensive, in that it covers all the WTO agreements while the GATT system covered only goods; and more timely in securing results.

DISPUTE SETTLEMENT PROCEDURES

Before I review our experience in detail, let me set out the procedures the Dispute Settlement Understanding establishes. In essence, although there are opportunities to settle disputes at each stage of the process—and we take these opportunities whenever possible, consistent with our basic interests in the case—a completed WTO case can involve up to five stages and take as much as one year. The process is as follows:

First, having identified a probable violation of WTO obligations, we begin by requesting consultation with the government whose measure is in dispute. This is the initial step, and after the consultation request the parties are given sixty days before a complaining party may request establishment of a panel.

Second, if no settlement is reached in this period, we request formation of a panel. These panels generally have three members, who may not be citizens of either party to the dispute unless both parties agree. The panel hears arguments and reviews evidence over a period of six to nine months.

Third, on completing its review, the panel gives the parties to the dispute a complete draft of its report, including findings and conclusions. The parties may provide written comments on the draft and the panel must hold a meeting at any party's request to consider those comments.

Fourth, the panel completes and releases its report, which must be adopted by the Dispute Settlement Body within 60 days after it is issued unless one of the parties to the dispute files an appeal with the WTO Appellate Body.

Fifth, in the event of an appeal, a three-person appellate panel, drawn from an Appellate Body of seven independent experts, reviews the case and issues a finding within 60 to 90 days. Governments found in violation of their obligations have a "reasonable period of time" to comply, normally not to exceed 15 months.

Most cases are concluded at this point, and in many cases the party has complied in less than a year.

If governments do not comply with the panel or Appellate Body findings, complaining parties have the right to retaliate, in an amount equivalent to the damage done by the violation. This standard is equivalent to that in section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, which permits the Trade Representative to apply retaliation equivalent in value to the burden or restriction being imposed on U.S. commerce.

EXPERIENCE WITH DSU TO DATE

Let me now turn to our experience with the dispute settlement mechanism in practice since 1995. Since 1995, WTO members have filed a total of 202 complaints on 159 distinct matters. Of these, the United States has filed 53 complaints. Our experience in these cases has helped dispel some early fears and misconceptions; develop ideas on further improvements and reforms to the system, both in terms of effectiveness and procedural transparency; and on the whole, confirmed that the Dispute Settlement Understanding is a fundamental improvement in the world trading system and in the enforcement of U.S. trade rights.

To illustrate this, let me now turn to a detailed review of the cases in which the United States has been involved since 1995.

CASES BROUGHT BY THE UNITED STATES

Since the WTO's creation, we have been the world's most active user of the WTO dispute settlement mechanism. Our goal in filing cases is two-fold: first, to protect U.S. rights in cases of high economic interest or precedential importance to American industries, farmers and workers; and second, to ensure that our trading partners understand the importance of compliance with WTO rules. And while we have not agreed with panel findings in every single case, we believe the record shows that the dispute settlement mechanism has enabled us to reach these goals.

Of the 53 cases we have filed to date, 28 have been brought to conclusion. Of these we have prevailed in 25, winning 13 cases in panel proceedings and successfully settling 12 others. In the vast majority of cases, our trading partners have acted to eliminate the violations; in the only two cases where they have failed to do so, we have exercised our right to retaliate.

1. Favorable Settlement

Our hope in filing cases, of course, is to secure U.S. rights rather than to engage in prolonged litigation. Therefore, whenever possible we have sought to reach favorable settlements that eliminate the violation without having to resort to panel proceedings. We have been able to achieve this preferred result in 12 of the 28 cases resolved so far:

—Australia: salmon import ban. Australia recently eliminated its ban on imports of salmon from Canada and the United States after Canada successfully challenged Australia's ban in the WTO. The United States had sought its own consultations with Australia in November 1995 and participated in the Canadian litigation as an interested third party; and U.S. salmon exporters will benefit from the result.

—Brazil: auto investment measures. In August 1996 the United States requested consultations under WTO dispute settlement procedures concerning Brazil's local content requirements for automotive investment. The United States and Brazil reached a settlement agreement in March 1998.

—European Union: market access for grains. In July 1995 the United States invoked WTO dispute settlement procedures to enforce the EU's WTO obligations on imports of grains. Before a panel was established, we reached a settlement. The settlement ensured implementation of the EU's market access commitments on grains, including rice, and provided for consultations on the EU's "reference price system."

—Greece: copyright protection. In 1998 we held consultations with the Greek government because a significant number of television stations in Greece regularly broadcasted copyrighted motion pictures and television programs without the authorization of the copyright owners. Effective remedies against such copyright infringements were not provided. In September 1998, the Greek government enacted new legislation to crack down on pirate stations, and the rate of television piracy fell significantly in 1999. We continue to monitor the situation, to ensure continued enforcement.

—Hungary: agricultural export subsidies. In March 1996 the United States, joined by five other countries, began a process of consultations with Hungary under WTO dispute settlement procedures concerning Hungary's lack of compliance with its scheduled commitments on agricultural export subsidies. We reached an agreement with Hungary and the WTO approved a temporary waiver that specifies a program to bring Hungary into compliance with its commitments.

—Japan: protection of sound recordings. As a result of WTO consultations, Japan changed its law to grant full copyright protection for sound recordings. The Recording Industry Association of America estimated the value of this case at $500 million in annual sales.

—Korea: shelf-life standards for beef and pork. The United States and Korea consulted under WTO dispute settlement procedures and reached a settlement in July 1995 addressing Korea's arbitrary, government-mandated shelf-life restrictions that were a barrier to U.S. exports of many food products, including beef and pork.

—Pakistan: patent protection. The United States used WTO dispute settlement procedures to enforce Pakistan's obligation under the TRIPS agreement to establish a "mailbox" mechanism for patent applications. In July 1996 the United States requested that the matter be referred to a panel. We subsequently settled this case in February 1997 after Pakistan issued an ordinance bringing its law into conformity with its TRIPS obligations.

—Philippines: pork and poultry imports. The United States used WTO dispute settlement to challenge tariff-rate quotas and other measures maintained by the Philippines on pork and poultry imports. Following WTO consultations, the Philippines agreed in February 1998 to reform its restrictive tariff-rate quotas and licensing practices.

—Portugal: patent protection. The United States invoked WTO dispute settlement procedures to challenge Portugal's patent law, which failed to provide the minimum twenty years of patent protection required by the TRIPS agreement. As a result of the U.S. challenge, Portugal announced a series of changes to its system, to implement its WTO obligations. A settlement was notified to the WTO in October 1996.

—Sweden: enforcement of intellectual property rights. In May 1997 the United States requested consultations with Sweden concerning Sweden's failure to implement its obligations under the TRIPS agreement. The following year, Sweden passed legislation addressing U.S. concerns.

—Turkey: theater box-office taxes. The United States requested consultations in June 1996 under WTO procedures concerning Turkey's tax on box office receipts from foreign films. Turkey maintained a discriminatory "municipality" tax on box office revenues from showing foreign films, but not domestic films. The United States and Turkey reached a settlement in July 1997, and Turkey eliminated its discriminatory tax.

2. Panel Successes

When our trading partners have not been willing to negotiate settlements, we have pursued our cases to conclusion. This has occurred 13 times:

—Argentina: Textiles—Argentina has complied with a WTO ruling against its statistical tax on imports and specific duties on various textile, apparel and footwear items in excess of its tariff commitments.

—Australian Leather—We are very close to an agreement with Australia on actions it will take in response to WTO rulings against its export subsidies on automotive leather; and if we fail to reach agreement, the WTO will authorize us to retaliate.

—Canada: Magazines—Canada has eliminated barriers to U.S. magazines, and created new tax and investment benefits and opportunities for U.S. publishers to sell and distribute magazines in Canada.

—Canada: Export Subsidies for Dairy—Canada has reduced its subsidized exports of dairy products, coming into compliance with its WTO obligations on butter, skimmed milk powder, and an array of other dairy products; beginning in the 2000–2001 marketing year, Canada will not be able to export more than 9,076 tons of subsidized cheese, which is less than half of the volume exported in recent years.

—India: Non-Tariff Barriers—India has eliminated import bans and other quantitative restrictions on 2,700 specific types of goods. This is among India's most significant modern trade policy reforms, opening new markets for U.S. producers of consumer goods, textiles, agricultural products, petrochemicals, high technology products and other industrial products.

—India: Intellectual Property Rights—India has complied with its WTO intellectual property rights obligations prior to providing patent protection for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical inventions;

—Indonesia: Autos—Indonesia has eliminated its 1996 National Car Program, including local content requirements which discriminated against imports of U.S. automobiles;

—Japan: Varietal Fruits—Japan has eliminated restrictions on imports of apples, cherries and other fruit, which U.S. growers estimate will help them export more than $50 million a year of apples and other products to Japan;

—Japan: Distilled Spirits—Japan has eliminated discriminatory taxes on U.S. exports of distilled spirits. As a result, U.S. exports of these products in the year after implementation of the panel finding grew by 23%, or $14 million—faster growth than our exports to other markets, in spite of the Japanese recession;

—Korea: Distilled Spirits—Korea has eliminated discriminatory taxes on U.S. exports of distilled spirits.

—Mexico: High-Fructose Corn Syrup: The United States successfully challenged Mexico's HFCS antidumping determination in WTO dispute settlement panel proceedings. Mexico did not appeal the panel's findings, and has indicated it will comply with the rulings by September 22, 2000.

Finally, of course, two cases of particular concern involve European Union violations of WTO obligations on beef and bananas. These are unique in our 25 successfully concluded cases, in that the EU has failed to implement findings of both the dispute panel and the Appellate Body, failing to lift its unscientific ban on imports of U.S. meat, and adopting a new banana import regime that perpetuates WTO violations previously found by a WTO panel and the Appellate Body. In response, the Administration has imposed retaliation consistent with our WTO rights, on products totaling $308 million worth of EU exports to the United States. We continue to work toward a positive resolution of these cases.

3. Unfavorable Panel Findings

Of the 28 cases completed where we were the plaintiff, WTO panels have not ruled in favor of the United States in three cases.

One case involved Europe's reclassification of local-area network computer equipment from one tariff category to another. The WTO findings in that case, however, were of no effect; we succeeded in negotiating the elimination of tariffs on both categories of goods through the multilateral Information Technology Agreement (ITA). The EU has met its obligation to remove the tariffs, and the equipment now enters the EU duty-free regardless of its classification.

In another case, we challenged various Japanese laws, regulations, and requirements affecting imports of photographic film and paper. The WTO panel in this case did not find sufficient evidence that Japanese Government measures were responsible for changes in the conditions of competition between imported and domestic photographic materials. Japan in this case made a number of assertions as to the openness of its photographic film and paper market, and we are actively monitoring the market to ensure that opportunities for U.S. photographic film and paper are in line with Japan's representations.

In a third case, just concluded yesterday, the United States decided not to appeal a panel finding that Korea's government procurement obligations did not cover an airport project which had not been explicitly included in Korea's coverage list. Nevertheless, the Korean Government has informed us that the entities procuring for that project intend to open remaining procurements to foreign bidders.

CASES BROUGHT AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

The United States has also been the subject of 39 complaints in the WTO, of which eight have completed all phases of litigation and ten were resolved in a mutually satisfactory manner. Eleven others are presently inactive, while the rest remain in various stages of litigation. Of the eight completed complaints, in one case, a WTO panel upheld the WTO-consistency of Section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974; in the other seven, panels found some aspect of U.S. practice inconsistent with our WTO obligations. In such cases, we have respected our obligations, as we expect others to do. A review of the cases is as follows:

—Section 301 (EU): The WTO panel found that Section 301 (the principal U.S. domestic trade law addressing foreign trade barriers) [19 U.S.C. §§ 2411–2420] is fully consistent with our WTO obligations, both as a legal matter and in terms of our administration of the statute. [The panel report was adopted January 27, 2000. WTO Doc. WT/DS152/R (Dec. 22, 1999).]

—Reformulated Gasoline (Venezuela, Brazil): In a dispute regarding an Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) regulation on conventional and reformulated gasoline, a WTO panel found against one aspect of the regulation that treated domestic companies differently than their foreign competitors. In that case, the WTO Appellate Body took a broad view of the WTO's exception for conservation measures, thus affirming that clean air is an exhaustible natural resource covered by that exception. The WTO ruling recognized the U.S. right to impose special enforcement requirements on foreign refiners that sought treatment equivalent to U.S. refiners. The ability of the United States to achieve the environmental objective of that regulation was never in question, and EPA was able to issue a revised regulation that fully met its commitment to protect health and the environment while meeting U.S. obligations under the WTO. [See 62 Fed. Reg. 45,533 (Aug. 28, 1997).] No changes have been made to the Clean Air Act.

—Shrimp/Turtle (India, Thailand, Malaysia, Philippines): In a dispute involving U.S. restrictions on imports of shrimp harvested in a manner harmful to endangered species of sea turtles (the "Shrimp-Turtle" law), the Appellate Body found our law to be fully within the scope of the WTO's exception for conservation measures, and U.S. import restrictions on shrimp harvested in a manner harmful to sea turtles have remained fully in effect. The Appellate Body did, however, find problems with implementation of the law. For example, it noted that procedures for determining whether countries meet the law's requirements did not provide adequate due process, because exporting nations were not given formal opportunities to be heard, and were not given formal written explanations of adverse decisions; and that the application of the law to Asian countries had been discriminatory, as Western Hemisphere nations had been given substantially more time than Asian countries to comply with its requirements, and were afforded greater opportunities for technical assistance.

Since the decision, we have addressed these procedural issues in a manner which has enhanced rather than weakened sea turtle conservation policies. In July 1999 the State Department revised its procedures to provide more due process to countries applying for certification under the Shrimp-Turtle law. The United States is also now negotiating a comprehensive sea turtle conservation agreement with the countries of the Indian Ocean region, including the complaining countries, and has offered additional technical assistance. [In 2001 the WTO determined that the United States had fully complied with its 1998 decision. WTO Doc. WT/DS58/RW (June 15, 2001). See Digest 2001 at 752–56.]

—Textiles and Apparel (Costa Rica): A WTO panel concurred with Costa Rica's complaint about U.S. import restrictions on underwear. The panel finding, however, led to no policy changes, as the U.S. measure at issue was imposed in March 1995 for a two-year period, expiring one month after dispute settlement proceedings concluded.

—Textiles and Apparel (India): A measure on wool shirts from India was unilaterally terminated by the U.S. interagency Committee on Implementation of Textile Agreements (which oversees the U.S. textile import program) due to changed commercial conditions. U.S. production in this category had increased and imports from India in this category had plummeted. The WTO panel did not recommend that the United States make any changes, and no action by the United States was necessary.

—DRAMs (Korea): In a dispute involving a Commerce Department antidumping order on dynamic random access memory chips (DRAMs) from Korea, we prevailed on all but one of the claims raised by Korea. Specifically, Korea won on its claim that the standard in Commerce's regulations (and, thus, the standard applied to the DRAMs order) for revoking an antidumping order should have been whether the retention of the order was "necessary" instead of whether it was "not likely" that dumping would continue or recur if the order were revoked. Commerce amended the regulation in question by incorporating the "necessary" standard from the Antidumping Agreement, made a redetermination of its revocation decision by applying this new regulation to the facts, and concluded that retention of the order was "necessary" in light of evidence showing that a resumption of dumping by the Korean exporters was likely.

—Foreign Sales Corporation (EU): In a case challenging the Foreign Sales Corporation (FSC) provisions in U.S. tax law, the WTO Appellate Body ruled that the FSC tax exemption constitutes a prohibited export subsidy under the WTO Subsidies Agreement, and also violates the WTO Agreement on Agriculture. The panel and Appellate Body reports were adopted on March 20, 2000. In response, we have presented to the European Union a detailed proposal which we believe addresses the problem. We remain hopeful that we will be able to resolve our differences over the regime in a cooperative and constructive manner. [On May 7, 2003, the DSB authorized imposition of countermeasures against the United States up to $4.043 billion. United States—Foreign Sales Corporation ("FSC") tax provisions (DS108), available at www.worldtradelaw.net/reports/wtopanels/us-fsc(panel)(21.5).pdf. See Digest 2003 at 660–61; see also Digest 2001 at 653–63, Digest 2002 at 677–91.]

—Leaded Bar (EU): Finally, the EU prevailed in its case involving the Commerce Department's "change-in-ownership" methodology, as applied in three administrative reviews of its countervailing duty order on leaded bars from the United Kingdom. The panel found Commerce's methodology to be inconsistent with the WTO Subsidies Agreement, and the WTO Appellate Body upheld that finding. Meanwhile, the countervailing duty order in question was revoked by operation of law, on January 1, 2000, under the Department of Commerce's "sunset review" procedures.

(2) Cases concerning beef and bananas

As mentioned in Ambassador Barshefsky's testimony, two cases of particular concern to the United States during the period concerned European Union violations of WTO obligations on beef and bananas.

(i) EC regime for the importation, sale and distribution of bananas

In 1995 USTR initiated an investigation under U.S. law with respect to the European communities' ("EC") banana regime and requested consultations with the EC. At the request of the United States, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Mexico, the WTO subsequently established a dispute settlement panel to examine the regime. On September 25, 1997, the WTO Dispute Settlement Body adopted the report of the panel and the WTO Appellate Body, concluding that the EC banana regime violated GATT and GATS. The WTO recommended that the EC bring the inconsistent measures into conformity with its obligations under those agreements by January 1, 1999. The United States sought further relief from the WTO when modifications adopted by the EC on that date did not cure the violations. On April 6, 1999, the WTO arbitrators concluded that the United States was being harmed by the EC's banana regime and the Dispute Settlement Body ("DSB") authorized the United States to suspend concessions covering trade in an amount of $191.4 million because of the injury to U.S. economic interests caused by the European Union's failure to implement a WTO-consistent banana regime.

On April 11, 2001, the United States and the European Commission reached agreement to resolve the dispute. The new EC system took effect July 1, 2001, with a simultaneous lifting of sanctions by the United States. See 66 Fed. Reg. 35,689 (July 6, 2001). See Digest 2001 at 649–51.

. . . On September 27, 1995, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative initiated an investigation pursuant to section 302(b)(1) of the Trade Act with respect to the EC banana regime and, in accordance with section 303(a) of the Trade Act, promptly requested consultations with the EC pursuant to the DSU and relevant provisions of several WTO agreements. [60 FR 52026]. The EC regime was designed, among other things, to take away a major part of the banana distribution business of U.S. companies. Subsequently the United States, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Mexico jointly requested the establishment of a WTO dispute settlement panel to examine the regime. Both the panel and the WTO Appellate Body found the EC banana regime in violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994 (GATT) and the General Agreement on Trade in Services (GATS). On September 25, 1997, the DSB adopted the report of the panel, as modified by the Appellate Body. The resulting DSB recommendations and rulings include, inter alia, the recommendation that the EC bring the measures found to be inconsistent with the GATT and the GATS into conformity with its obligations under those agreements. A WTO-appointed arbitrator subsequently determined that the "reasonable period of time" for the EC to implement the DSB recommendations and rulings would expire by January 1, 1999.

Based on the results of the WTO dispute settlement proceedings, the USTR on February 10, 1998, determined pursuant to section 304 of the Trade Act that the EC banana regime violates trade agreements. [63 FR 8248]. The USTR further determined that the EC's undertaking to implement all of the recommendations and rulings of the WTO reports by January 1, 1999 constituted for the purposes of section 301(a)(2)(B)(i) the taking of satisfactory measures to grant the rights of the United States under those trade agreements. Therefore, pursuant to section 301(a)(2), the USTR terminated the investigation without taking action under section 301 of the Trade Act. The USTR stated in the termination notice that it would monitor the EC's implementation of the DSB recommendations and rulings under section 306 of the Trade Act.

On January 1, 1999, modifications to the EC banana regime became effective (EC Regulations 1637/98 and 2362/98), and the EC claimed that these modifications brought its banana regime into conformity with its WTO obligations. However, these regulations perpetuate discriminatory aspects of the EC banana regime that were identified in the DSB's recommendations and rulings as inconsistent with WTO agreements. Therefore, on January 14, 1999, in accordance with U.S. rights under Article 22 of the DSU, the United States requested authorization from the DSB to suspend the application to the EC, and member States thereof, of tariff concessions and related obligations under the GATT covering trade in an amount of US $520 million. [www.ustr.org, Press Release 99-01]. On January 29, the EC objected to the level of suspension proposed by the United States and the matter was referred to arbitration pursuant to Article 22.6 of the DSU. Under DSU procedures, the arbitration should have been completed by March 2, 1999. However, on March 2 the arbitrators issued only an initial decision and requested further information from the parties. On March 3, USTR announced that the U.S. Customs Service would begin withholding liquidation and reviewing the sufficiency of bonds on imports of selected European products. The purpose of this announcement was to ensure that, upon issuance of the arbitrators' final decision, the United States would be in the same position to take action as it would have been had the arbitrators issued their decision by the March 2 deadline.

On April 6, the arbitrators issued their final decision determining that the level of nullification or impairment suffered by the United States as a result of the EC's WTO-inconsistent banana regime is $191.4 million per year and that the United States is entitled to suspend the application to the European Communities and its member States of tariff concessions and related obligations under the GATT covering trade up to that amount. A meeting of the DSB was then scheduled for April 19, 1999, at which the DSB, pursuant to Article 22.7 of the DSU, grant[ed] authorization for such suspension of concessions.

(ii) EC: Measures concerning meat and meat products (hormones) (WT/DS26, 48)

On May 20, 1996, the WTO Dispute Settlement Body established a panel in response to a challenge by the United States and Canada to a European Union ban on imports of meat from animals to which any of six hormones for growth promotional purposes had been administered. Effective July 29, 1999, USTR suspended the application of tariff concession and related obligations by imposing a 100% ad valorem rate of duty on three products of certain member states of the European Communities ("EC") as a result of the EC's failure to implement the subsequent recommendations and rulings of the WTO in the case. 64 Fed. Reg. 40,638 (July 27, 1999). As described in the Federal Register, "[t]his action constitute[d] the exercise of U.S. rights under Article 22 of the WTO Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes (DSU) and [was] taken pursuant to the authority granted to the USTR under section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, as amended." Excerpts below from the Federal Register notice describe the case as of that date.

. . . In December 1985, the EC adopted a directive on livestock production restricting the use of natural hormones to therapeutic purposes, banning the use of synthetic hormones, and prohibiting imports of animals, and meat from animals, to which hormones had been administered. That directive was later declared invalid by the European Court of Justice on procedural grounds and had to be re-adopted by the Council, unchanged, in 1988 ("the Hormone Directive"). These measures, including the ban on the import of meat and meat products produced from animals to which certain hormones had been administered (the "hormone ban"), became effective January 1, 1989.

Following entry into force on January 1, 1995, of the WTO Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures ("SPS Agreement"), the United States and, later, Canada, invoked formal WTO dispute settlement proceedings against the hormone ban. Prior to the establishment of the WTO panel, the EC replaced the Hormone Directive with another directive that re-codified and expanded the hormone ban. On May 20, 1996, the DSB established a dispute settlement panel ("the WTO panel") to examine the consistency of the hormone ban with the EC's WTO obligations.

On August 18, 1997, the WTO panel issued its report finding that the hormone ban is not based on scientific evidence, a risk assessment, or relevant international standards, in contravention of the EC's obligations under the SPS Agreement. Upon an appeal to the WTO Appellate Body, on January 16, 1998, the Appellate Body affirmed that the hormone ban is not consistent with the EC's obligations under the SPS Agreement. At a meeting held on February 13, 1998, the DSB adopted the Panel and Appellate Body reports regarding the EC's hormone ban. The EC subsequently requested four years to implement the DSB recommendations. The United States could not agree to this proposed implementation period, and the matter was referred to a WTO arbitrator. The arbitrator determined that the reasonable period of time for implementation was fifteen months, and would expire on May 13, 1999. The EC did not implement the DSB recommendations and rulings regarding its hormone ban by May 13, 1999. Accordingly, on May 17, 1999, and in accordance with U.S. rights under Article 22 of the DSU, the United States requested authorization from the DSB to suspend the application to the EC, and member States thereof, of tariff concessions and related obligations under the GATT covering trade in an amount of $202 million. The EC objected to the level of suspension proposed by the United States, and claimed that the trade damage suffered by the United States was only $53 million. Pursuant to Article 22.6 of the DSU, the matter was referred to arbitration. The DSU provides that such arbitrations must be completed within 60 days of the end of the reasonable period of time for implementation, or in this case, by July 12, 1999.

The arbitrators issued their final decision on July 12, 1999, and determined that the level of nullification or impairment suffered by the United States as a result of the EC's WTO-inconsistent hormone ban was $116.8 million per year. Accordingly, upon DSB authorization, the United States is entitled under the DSU to suspend the application to the European Communities and its member States of tariff concessions and related obligations under the GATT covering trade up to that amount. A meeting of the DSB is scheduled for July 26, 1999, at which time the DSB, pursuant to Article 22.7 of the DSU, will grant authorization for such suspension of concessions.

3. North American Free Trade Agreement

a. Negotiation and entry into force

The North American Free Trade Agreement ("NAFTA") joined Mexico, Canada and the United States in a free trade agreement, removing barriers to trade and investment among the three countries. Negotiations on NAFTA were substantively concluded on August 12, 1992. See White House fact sheet issued August 12, 1992, at http://bushlibrary.tamu.edu/ research/papers/1992/92081201.html. On October 7, 1992, President George H.W. Bush, President Carlos Salinas of Mexico and Prime Minister Brian Mulroney of Canada initialed the NAFTA in San Antonio, Texas. President Bush signed the NAFTA in a ceremony at the Organization of American States building December 17, 1992. See http://bushlibrary.tamu.edu/research/papers/1992/92121704.html.

On December 8, 1993, President William J. Clinton signed the North American Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act, Pub. L. No. 103–182, 107 Stat. 2057 (1993) ("NAFTA Act") into law. Proclamation No. 6641, issued by President Clinton on December 15, 1993, among other things, implemented the NAFTA with respect to the United States and incorporated in the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States the tariff modifications and rules of origin to carry out or apply the NAFTA, pursuant to section 201 and 202 of the NAFTA Act, 19 U.S.C. §§ 3331 and 3332. 58 Fed. Reg. 66,867 (Dec. 20, 1993).

Tariffs. NAFTA eliminates all tariffs on U.S., Mexican, and Canadian goods by 2008. Many will be removed immediately and others will be phased out over 5, 10, and 15 years.

Rules of Origin. Rules of origin define goods eligible for NAFTA treatment and prevent "free riding" by third countries. Only goods produced in North America qualify for NAFTA treatment. Goods containing imported components qualify if they are transformed enough to result in a tariff classification change. In some cases, goods also must have a specified percentage of North American content. There is a special rule of origin for textiles and apparel.

Customs. NAFTA expands and improves on procedures in the U.S.-Canada FTA and provides for uniform regulations to ensure consistent interpretation, application, and administration of the rules of origin.

Quotas. NAFTA eliminates import and export quotas unless consistent with the GATT or explicitly mentioned in the agreement.

National Treatment. NAFTA reaffirms GATT principles preventing discrimination against imported goods.

Standards. NAFTA prohibits use of product standards as a trade barrier but preserves each country's right to establish and enforce its own product standards, particularly those designed to promote health and safety and to protect human, animal, and plant life and the environment.

Government Procurement. NAFTA opens new procurement markets in Mexico, particularly the petrochemical, heavy electrical, and pharmaceutical areas.

Safeguards. NAFTA partners can impose a safeguard action during the transition period if increased imports constitute a "substantial cause or threat" of "serious injury" to a domestic industry. This follows GATT practice.

Agriculture. NAFTA eliminates immediately or phases out tariffs on agricultural goods. It converts most quotas and other quantitative restrictions to tariff rate quotas, which allow a certain quantity of a product to enter duty-free. These tariff rate quotas will apply to U.S. exports of corn, dry beans, powdered milk, poultry, malted barley, animal fats, potatoes, and eggs. For some products—such as wheat, grapes, tobacco, other dairy products, and day-old chicks—quotas and other quantitative restrictions will be converted to tariffs, which then will be phased out. U.S. standards regarding food imports will be maintained. Special agricultural safeguards for certain import-sensitive products will be available to limit the impact of sudden import surges.

Energy. NAFTA lifts investment restrictions on most of the basic petrochemicals industry and on most electricity generating facilities. It eliminates or phases out tariffs on oil and gas field equipment and on coal.

Autos. NAFTA provides for the immediate reduction of Mexican duties on vehicle imports and a timetable for their elimination. It eliminates Mexican quotas on new auto imports. It also removes tariffs on certain automotive parts and phases out others. It reduces the Mexican domestic-content requirement to zero over 10 years and reduces Mexico's trade balancing requirement.

Textiles and Apparel. NAFTA eliminates some tariffs immediately and phases out others over a 10-year period. It removes quotas on imports from Mexico that qualify under the rules of origin.

Financial Services. NAFTA allows investment by U.S. and Canadian firms in the Mexican banking market. It provides for the elimination of all restrictions on such investment by January 2000. U.S. and Canadian insurance firms with existing joint ventures in Mexico may increase their ownership to 100%. The agreement also permits U.S. insurance companies to issue reinsurance policies and establish subsidiaries in Mexico. It allows U.S. and Canadian companies to invest in the brokerage industry in Mexico.

Transportation. NAFTA eliminates, over a 5-year period, current restrictions on access by U.S. and Canadian trucking companies to Mexico. It gives charter and bus tour operators full access to the Mexican market. It allows U.S. and Canadian investment in Mexican bus and truck companies, in international cargo subsidiaries, and in Mexican port facilities. The agreement does not alter U.S. safety standards.

Telecommunications. NAFTA eliminates duties and nontariff barriers on most Mexican imports of telecommunications equipment—including private branch exchanges, cellular systems, satellite transmission, earth station equipment, and fiber optic transmission systems. It also eliminates restrictions on foreign investment in voice mail and other value-added and information services. North American firms will have access to and use of public telecommunications networks and services.

Investment. NAFTA provides for member state investors to receive the more favorable of national or MFN treatment in setting up operations or acquiring firms. It phases out most performance requirements over 10 years and states that NAFTA partners may not impose new ones. The agreement guarantees the free transfer of capital and profits and that investors will be compensated at the fair market value of the investment in cases of expropriation.

Intellectual Property. NAFTA protects North American producers in two new areas: computer programs and compilations of individually protected material. It establishes a minimum 50-year term for the protection of sound recordings and motion pictures. The agreement requires companies to register both service marks and trademarks. It prohibits compulsory licensing or mandatory linking of trademarks. It provides protection for independently created industrial designs and for trade secrets and proprietary information.

Environment. NAFTA maintains existing federal and subfederal standards. It allows a country to prohibit entry of goods that do not meet its standards. The agreement states that parties, including states, may enact tougher standards and permits each country to impose environmental requirements on foreign investment.

Implementation. The governments will establish the Free Trade Commission to ensure that NAFTA is implemented properly. Commission working groups will monitor implementation of the various chapters of the agreement.

Dispute Settlement. NAFTA extends the dispute settlement provisions of the U.S.-Canada FTA to Mexico while providing new safeguards to ensure fairness. It establishes the North American Free Trade Commission and a Secretariat to administer the panel review system. The mechanism for resolution is as follows:

(1) Notification and consultation between parties;
(2) If no resolution, referral to the Commission;
(3) If necessary, referral to a panel of private sector experts; and
(4) Resolution or retaliation.

If the defending party does not comply with the panel ruling, the other party may suspend equivalent trade benefits until the dispute is resolved.

b. Supplemental agreements to NAFTA

In 1993 Canada, Mexico, and the United States concluded three side agreements to NAFTA. These side agreements dealt with cooperation on the environment, with labor standards, and with trade restrictions in response to import surges. Excerpts below from USTR fact sheets, released August 13, 1993, describe the three agreements. The full texts of the fact sheets and related documents, including summaries of the labor and environmental agreements (as agreed by the parties) are available at 4 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 34 at 589–96 (Aug. 23, 1993), http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html. The North American Agreement on Environmental Cooperation can be found at www.cec.org/pubs_info_resources/law_treat_agree/naaec/index.cfm?varlan=English. The North American Agreement on Labor Cooperation, reprinted at 32 I.L.M. 1480 (1993), is also available on the website of the Commission for Labor Cooperation, www.naalc.org/english/agreement.shtml.

NAFTA Supplemental: Agreement on Labor Cooperation

Historic Undertaking. This is the first labor agreement negotiated specifically to accompany and build on a trade agreement. . . . The Agreement on Labor Cooperation will promote improved labor conditions and strong enforcement of national labor laws in all three countries of North America.

Labor Commission. The Agreement creates a new Commission on Labor Cooperation, with each country represented on a Council by its top, cabinet-level labor official.

—The Council has a broad mandate to work cooperatively on labor issues, including occupational health and safety, child labor, benefits for workers, minimum wages, industrial relations, legislation on formation and operation of unions and the resolution of labor disputes, and many others.

—The Council will be able to obtain public advice and assistance in these activities.

* * * *

Labor Principles and Objectives. The objectives of the agreement include promotion of improved labor laws and standards, effective enforcement of these laws, encouraging competition based on rising productivity and quality, and the promotion of key labor principles that will be set out in an annex.

These principles include such vital issues as protection against child labor, the right to strike and to bargain collectively, freedom of association, minimum employment standards, including minimum wages, elimination of employment discrimination, and prevention of occupational accidents and diseases.

Transparency and Domestic Enforcement. Each country undertakes to ensure transparency of its laws and to enforce those laws through several means. . . .

Access to Fair Domestic Procedures. The Agreement establishes detailed requirements, consistent with U.S. law and process, to assure fair administrative and judicial review. . .

* * * *

Encouraging Effective Enforcement by Governments. The Agreement has several avenues to encourage effective national enforcement of labor laws.

* * * *

The intent of these many processes is to encourage voluntary improvement of enforcement through exposure of problems. Trade sanctions are truly a last resort, since the intent is to encourage parties to enforce their law, not to establish new trade barriers. Canada in fact has agreed to make dispute settlement panel judgements on fines and remedial actions automatically enforceable in its domestic court, which obviates any need for trade sanctions vis-a-vis Canada.

NAFTA Supplemental: Agreement on Environmental Cooperation

Historic Undertaking. This is the first environmental agreement negotiated specifically to accompany and build on a trade agreement. . . . The Agreement on Environmental Cooperation will ensure that economic growth is consistent with goals of sustainable development.

New Independent Organization. The Agreement creates a new Commission on Environmental Cooperation. The three countries' top environmental officials (the EPA Administrator for the United States) will comprise the Commission's Council.

—A Joint Advisory Committee made up of nongovernmental organizations from all three countries will advise the Council in its deliberations.

* * * *

Environmental Obligations. The NAFTA partners commit themselves to undertake important environmental policies regarding the development, implementation, and enforcement of their environmental laws.

—Countries guarantee their citizens access to national courts to petition governments to undertake enforcement actions and to seek redress of harm.

—Countries will ensure the openness of judicial and administrative proceedings and transparent procedures for the creation of environmental laws and regulations.

—Canada, Mexico and the United States pledged to ensure that their laws and standards continue to provide high levels of environmental protection and to work cooperatively in enhancing protections.

—They have committed to effectively enforce those laws, a commitment backed up by a dispute settlement process.

—The agreement does not affect the rights of states and provinces under the NAFTA to maintain standards at levels higher than the federal governments.

—Countries are obligated to report on the state of their environments, and to promote environmental education, scientific research, and technological development.

—They will work toward limiting trade in toxic substances that they have banned domestically.

The Commission's Agenda. A major goal of the Commission is to broaden cooperative activities among the NAFTA partners. . . .

Public Participation and Dispute Settlement. Transparency is the hallmark of the agreement, and citizens of all three countries will be free to make submissions to the Commission on their concerns related to the full range of environmental issues.

* * * *

The dispute settlement process provides, in the end, for sanctions if countries have failed to correct problems of nonenforcement.

NAFTA Supplemental: Agreement on Import Surges

"Early Warning System". The understanding on import surges establishes a new mechanism for consultations among the NAFTA countries and for examining economic factors, including employment, in the region. It is meant to anticipate national trade measures, authorized under the NAFTA, to respond to increased imports.

For example, a country might call for consultations and a joint examination in the committee as a result of declining employment in a particular industry.

NAFTA Safeguard Provisions. The NAFTA itself contains several important provisions to safeguard a country's industry and workers against import surges.

—A bilateral safeguard mechanism permits the "snap-back" to pre-NAFTA or MFN tariff rates for up to three years—or four years for extremely sensitive products—if increased imports from Mexico are a substantial cause of or threaten serious injury to a domestic industry.

—A global safeguard mechanism allows the imposition of tariffs or quotas on imports from Mexico and/or Canada as part of a multilateral safeguard action when imports from either or both countries are a substantial cause of or threaten serious injury to a domestic industry.

—Sensitive agriculture products are handled specially in the form of tariff-rate quotas, where high MFN tariffs kick in above a specified quantity of imports.

—Sensitive textile and apparel products also have special safeguard provisions to respond to those industries' needs.

Remarks by President Clinton on signing the side agreements in Washington D.C., September 14, 1993, excerpted below, are available at 4 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 37 at 622 (Sept. 13, 1993), http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

The environmental agreement will, for the first time ever, apply trade sanctions against any of the countries that fails to enforce its own environmental laws. I might say to those who say that that's giving up our sovereignty, for people who have been asking us to ask that of Mexico: How do we have the right to ask that of Mexico if we don't demand it of ourselves? It's nothing but fair. This is the first time that there have ever been trade sanctions in the environmental law area. This ground-breaking agreement is one of the reasons why major environmental groups, ranging from the Audubon Society to the Natural Resources Defense Council, are supporting NAFTA.

The second agreement ensures that Mexico enforces its laws in areas that include worker health and safety, child labor, and the minimum wage. And I might say, this is the first time in the history of world trade agreements when any nation has ever been willing to tie its minimum wage to the growth in its own economy. What does that mean? It means that there will be an even more rapid closing of the gap between our two wage rates. And as the benefits of economic growth are spread in Mexico to working people, what will happen? They'll have more disposable income to buy more American products, and there will be less illegal immigration because more Mexicans will be able to support their children by staying home. This is a very important thing.

The third agreement answers one of the primary attacks on NAFTA that I've heard for a year, which is: Well, you can say all this, but something might happen that you can't foresee. Well, that's a good thing; otherwise, we never would have had yesterday. I mean, I plead guilty to that. Something might happen that Carla Hills didn't foresee, or George Bush didn't foresee, or Mickey Kantor or Bill Clinton didn't foresee. That's true. Now, the third agreement protects our industries against unforeseen surges in exports from either one of our trading partners. And the flip side is also true. Economic change, as I said before, has often been cruel to the middle class, but we have to make change its friend. NAFTA will help to do that.

* * * *

Together, the efforts of two administrations now have created a trade agreement that moves beyond the traditional notions of free trade, seeking to ensure trade that pulls everybody up instead of dragging some down while others go up. We have put the environment at the center of this in future agreements. We have sought to avoid a debilitating contest for businesses where countries seek to lure them only by slashing wages or despoiling the environment.

c. Claims under the dispute mechanisms of the NAFTA

Chapter 20 of the NAFTA included a government-to-government dispute settlement mechanism for settling disputes between the United States, Canada, and Mexico over the interpretation and application of the NAFTA. The NAFTA also included dispute resolution mechanisms that allow individuals to challenge decisions made by the NAFTA governments in the area of antidumping and countervailing duties (Chapter 19) and investment (Chapter 11). Information on past and pending disputes may be obtained from the U.S. section of the NAFTA Secretariat, which maintains case files on panel, committee, and tribunal proceedings. See www.nafta-sec-alena.org. Information on Chapter 11 disputes is also available on the Department of State website at www.state.gov/s/l/c3439.htm.

(1) Chapter 20: Interpretation or application disputes

Chapter 20 of the NAFTA set out detailed procedures for the resolution of disagreements that may arise between the NAFTA Parties over the interpretation or application of the agreement. The steps set out in Chapter 20 are intended to resolve disputes by agreement where possible. The process begins with government-to-government consultations. If the dispute is not resolved, a party may request a meeting of the NAFTA Free Trade Commission, comprised of the Trade Ministers of the parties. If the Commission is unable to resolve the dispute, a consulting party may call for the establishment of a five-member arbitral panel. The NAFTA Secretariat makes available decisions in Chapter 20 proceedings at www.nafta-sec-alena.org/DefaultSite/index_e.aspx?ArticleID=76.

Following consultations with Canada, on July 14, 1995, the United States requested the establishment of a Chapter 20 arbitral panel to resolve a dispute regarding Canada's application of customs duties to certain U.S. agricultural goods imported into Canada. The United States alleged that Canada increased its tariffs on these goods—which included poultry, dairy, eggs, margarine, and barley products—in 1995, contrary to NAFTA obligations. On December 2, 1996, the Chapter 20 panel found that Canada's application of customs duties to these U.S. agricultural goods conformed with Canada's obligations under the NAFTA. The decision of the panel is available at www.nafta-sec-alena.org/DefaultSite/index_e.aspx?DetailID=393. In the Matter of Tariffs applied by Canada to Certain U.S.-Origin Agricultural Products, Secretariat File No. CDA-95-2008-01.

On December 18, 1995, Mexico sought consultations with the United States, pursuant to Chapter 20 dispute resolution procedures, regarding U.S. limitations on Mexican cross-border trucking services. After consultations and a meeting of the NAFTA Free Trade Commission failed to resolve the dispute, on September 22, 1998, Mexico filed a formal complaint against the United States under Chapter 20.

Mexico's complaint alleged that the United States had violated a number of NAFTA obligations by refusing to end restrictions on Mexican cross-border trucking services and investment in the U.S. trucking industry, while at the same time offering national treatment to Canadians. A panel decision of February 6, 2001, finding that the continued moratorium violated NAFTA, is available at www.nafta-sec-alena.org/DefaultSite/index_e.aspx?DetailID=394. In the Matter of Cross-Border Trucking Services, Secretariat File No. USA-MEX-98-2008-01. See also Digest 2002 at 666–70. On December 10, 1999, the United States requested consultation on the issue of Mexico's alleged reciprocal denial of access of U.S. cross-border trucking services. While consultations were later held, no panel was established.

On January 14, 1997, Mexico also requested a Chapter 20 panel to resolve a dispute with the United States over safeguard measures imposed by the United States on imports of certain broom corn brooms. In particular, the United States had imposed a three-year tariff increase on imports following an investigation by the U.S. International Trade Commission. The panel issued a decision on January 30, 1998. It found that, because of deficiencies in the U.S. International Trade Commission's findings, the U.S. safeguards measures were a continuing violation of U.S. obligations under the NAFTA. See www.nafta-sec-alena.org/DefaultSite/index_e.aspx?DetailID=394. In The Matter of The U.S. Safeguard Action Taken on Broomcorn Brooms from Mexico, Secretariat File No. USA-97-2008-01.

(2) Chapter 19: Review of antidumping and countervailing duty determinations

Article 1904 established a mechanism to provide an alternative to judicial review by domestic courts of final determinations in antidumping and countervailing duty cases, with review by independent binational panels. A panel is established when a request for panel review is filed with the NAFTA Secretariat by an industry asking for a review of such a decision involving imports from a NAFTA country. These panels, made up of individuals from the importing and exporting NAFTA countries at issue, do not interpret international rules. They review the determinations of the government agencies for consistency with the national laws on antidumping and countervailing duties of the importing NAFTA country. Panel decisions are final and binding, and may not be appealed to domestic courts. Chapter 19 also included an extraordinary challenge mechanism, see NAFTA Article 1904.13, which can be used to appeal panel decisions in instances in which there are substantial allegations of legal error or gross misconduct by the panel. The U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement, which preceded the NAFTA, included a similar dispute resolution mechanism for the appeal of antidumping and countervailing duty decisions. Panel decisions in Chapter 19 cases, decisions by extraordinary challenge committees, and decisions rendered by U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement panels can be found on the NAFTA Secretariat's website at www.nafta-sec-alena.org/DefaultSite/index_e.aspx?DetailID=76.

(3) Chapter 11: Investor-state dispute settlement

Chapter 11 contained a number of provisions designed to protect cross-border investors and facilitate the settlement of investment disputes. For example, each NAFTA Party must accord investors from the other NAFTA Parties national and most-favored-nation (i.e. non-discriminatory) treatment and may not expropriate investments of those investors except in accordance with international law. Chapter 11 permits an investor of one NAFTA Party to seek money damages for measures taken by one of the other NAFTA Parties that allegedly violate provisions of Chapter 11. Investors may initiate arbitration against the NAFTA Party under the Arbitration Rules of the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law ("UNCITRAL Rules") or the Arbitration (Additional Facility) Rules of the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes ("ICSID Additional Facility Rules"). The Department of State is the lead agency representing the U.S. Government in Chapter 11 cases, with the exception of The Loewen Group, Inc., v. United States case, for which the Department of Justice served as the lead agency.

Chapter 11 cases have been filed against each of the NAFTA Parties. Links to publicly available pleadings and awards in Chapter 11 cases are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c3439.htm.

(i) Claims filed against the United States

Three claims were brought against the United States under Chapter 11 of the NAFTA during the 1990s.

The first claim filed against the United States under Chapter 11 was The Loewen Group, Inc., v. United States. Loewen was commenced against the United States with a notice of arbitration on October 30, 1998. The Loewen Group, Inc. ("TLGI"), then a Canadian corporation involved in the death-care industry, and Raymond L. Loewen, its chairman and CEO at the time of the events at issue, filed claims under the ICSID Additional Facility Rules in their individual capacities and on behalf of Loewen Group International, Inc., TLGI's U.S. subsidiary (collectively "Loewen"). Loewen sought damages for alleged injuries arising out of litigation in which the company was involved in Mississippi state courts in 1995–96. Loewen alleged violations of three provisions of NAFTA—the anti-discrimination principles set forth in Article 1102, the minimum standard of treatment required under Article 1105, and the prohibition against uncompensated expropriation set forth in Article 1110. Loewen requested damages in excess of $600 million. On June 26, 2003, the tribunal dismissed the claims against the United States in their entirety on the grounds that Loewen's reorganization as a U.S. company deprived the tribunal of jurisdiction and that Loewen had failed to exhaust remedies reasonably available under the domestic judicial system. See Digest 2003 at 610–15. See also Digest 2002 at 623–41; Digest 2001 at 623–42. The notice of arbitration, pleadings filed by the United States and Loewen, and tribunal decisions in the case are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c3755.htm.

On September 1, 1999, the United States received a notice of arbitration in the Mondev International Ltd. v. United States claim. Mondev International Ltd., a Canadian real-estate development corporation, submitted a claim under the ICSID Additional Facility Rules on its own behalf for losses allegedly suffered by Lafayette Place Associates ("LPA"), a Massachusetts limited partnership it owns and controls. Mondev alleged losses arising from a decision by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts and from Massachusetts state law. Mondev alleged that Massachusetts' statutory immunization of the Boston Redevelopment Authority from intentional tort liability was incompatible with international law, and that a decision of the Supreme Judicial Court was arbitrary and capricious and amounted to a denial of justice. Mondev also alleged that the United States failed to meet its Chapter Eleven obligations by not according LPA national treatment (Art. 1102); by not according it treatment in accordance with international law (Art. 1105); and by expropriating its investment without compensation (Art. 1110). Mondev claimed damages of not less than $50 million. Following briefing and a hearing on competence and liability, the tribunal dismissed all claims against the United States. See Digest 2002 at 607–16. The notice of arbitration, pleadings filed by the United States, and tribunal decisions in the case can be found at www.state.gov/s/l/c3758.htm.

On December 3, 1999, the United States received a notice of arbitration from Methanex Corporation, a Canadian marketer and distributor of methanol. Methanex submitted a claim to arbitration under the UNCITRAL rules on its own behalf for alleged injuries resulting from a California ban on the use or sale in California of the gasoline additive MTBE. Methanol is an ingredient used to manufacture MTBE. Methanex contended that a California Executive Order and the regulations banning MTBE expropriated parts of its investments in the United States in violation of Article 1110, denied it fair and equitable treatment in accordance with international law in violation of Article 1105, and denied it national treatment in violation of Article 1102. Methanex claimed damages of $1 billion. On August 7, 2002, the tribunal issued a partial award finding that Methanex had not established jurisdiction. See Digest 2002 at 616–23; see also Digest 2001 at 574–611; Digest 2003 at 615–36. The notice of arbitration, pleadings filed by the United States and Methanex, hearing transcripts, and tribunal decisions in the case can be found at www.state.gov/s/l/c5818.htm.

(ii) Claims by U.S. investors

Article 1128 of the NAFTA provides that "[o]n written notice to the disputing parties, a Party may make submissions to a Tribunal on a question of interpretation of this Agreement." On November 9, 1999, the United States made a submission under Article 1128 in Metalclad Corporation v. The United Mexican States. The United States addressed two issues: 1) that the actions of local governments are subject to the NAFTA standards and 2) that the state parties intended that Article 1110(1) reflect customary international law as to categories of expropriation. The text of the U.S. submission is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c3752.htm; see also excerpts in Digest 2000 at 679–83.

Two awards were issued in cases brought by U.S. claimants during the 1990s: Robert Azinian v. The United Mexican States, the first dispute under NAFTA to be resolved by an award on the merits, and Ethyl Corp. v. Government of Canada. The United States did not make submissions under Article 1128 in either case. Links in Spanish in Azinian are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c3750.htm; the tribunal's award on jurisdiction in Ethyl Corp., issued June 24, 1998, is reprinted in 38 I.L.M. 708 (1999); s*ee also www.state.gov/s/l/c3745.htm*.

4. Other Trade-Related Issues

a. Free Trade Agreement of the Americas

(1) First Summit of the Americas: Adoption of Declaration of Principles and Plan of Action

The first steps toward the Free Trade Agreement of the Americas ("FTAA") were taken at a meeting at Miami in December of 1994. At this meeting, known as the Summit of the Americas, the United States and the heads of state and government of thirty-three other countries of the Americas agreed to a Declaration of Principles and a Plan of Action envisioning the unification of the economies of the Americas into a single free trade area. The agreement contemplated the conclusion of FTAA negotiations by the year 2005, and the Plan of Action set forth initial steps to be taken by the thirty-four countries. Excerpts from what came to be known as the Miami Declaration and Plan of Action relevant to the proposed FTAA are below. The Declaration of Principles and Plan of Action also envisioned actions related to democracy, poverty, sustainable development and the environment. The full texts of the Declaration of Principles and Plan of Action are available at www.summit-americas.org/miamidec.htm and www.summit-americas.org/miamiplan.htm.

Declaration of Principles

Partnership for Development and Prosperity: Democracy, Free Trade and Sustainable Development in the Americas

The elected Heads of State and Government of the Americas are committed to advance the prosperity, democratic values and institutions, and security of our Hemisphere. For the first time in history, the Americas are a community of democratic societies. Although faced with differing development challenges, the Americas are united in pursuing prosperity through open markets, hemispheric integration, and sustainable development. We are determined to consolidate and advance closer bonds of cooperation and to transform our aspirations into concrete realities.

We reiterate our firm adherence to the principles of international law and the purposes and principles enshrined in the United Nations Charter and in the Charter of the Organization of American States (OAS), including the principles of the sovereign equality of states, non-intervention, self-determination, and the peaceful resolution of disputes. We recognize the heterogeneity and diversity of our resources and cultures, just as we are convinced that we can advance our shared interests and values by building strong partnerships.

* * * *

Summit of the Americas Plan of Action

The heads of state and government participating in the 1994 Summit of the Americas in Miami, Florida, desirous of furthering the broad objectives set forth in their Declaration of Principles and mindful of the need for practical progress on the vital tasks of enhancing democracy, promoting development, achieving economic integration and free trade, improving the lives of their people, and protecting the natural environment for future generations, affirm their commitment to this Plan of Action.

II. PROMOTING PROSPERITY THROUGH ECONOMIC INTEGRATION AND FREE TRADE

9. Free Trade in the Americas

1) While pursuing economic integration and free trade in the Hemisphere, we reinforce our strong commitment to multilateral rules and disciplines. We endorse full and rapid implementation of the Uruguay Round, active multilateral negotiations in the World Trade Organization, bilateral and subregional trade agreements, and other trade arrangements that are consistent with the provisions of the GATT/WTO and that do not raise barriers to other nations.

2) Extraordinary achievements have been made by countries of the Hemisphere in trade liberalization and subregional integration. Free trade and increased economic integration are key factors for sustainable development. This will be furthered as we strive to make our trade liberalization and environmental policies mutually supportive, taking into account efforts undertaken by the GATT/WTO and other international organizations. As economic integration in the Hemisphere proceeds, we will further secure the observance and promotion of worker rights, as defined by appropriate international conventions. We will avoid disguised restrictions on trade, in accordance with the GATT/WTO and other international obligations.

3) We will strive to maximize market openness through high levels of discipline as we build upon existing agreements in the Hemisphere. We also will strive for balanced and comprehensive agreements, including among others: tariffs and non-tariff barriers affecting trade in goods and services; agriculture; subsidies; investment; intellectual property rights; government procurement; technical barriers to trade; safeguards; rules of origin; antidumping and countervailing duties; sanitary and phytosanitary standards and procedures; dispute resolution; and competition policy.

4) We recognize that decisions on trade agreements remain a sovereign right of each nation. In addition, recognizing the importance of effective enforcement of international commitments, each nation will take the necessary action, in accordance with its own legislation and procedures, to implement the agreements in the areas covered by this Plan of Action.

5) As we work to achieve the "Free Trade Area of the Americas," opportunities such as technical assistance will be provided to facilitate the integration of the smaller economies and increase their level of development.

* * * *

(2) Second Summit of the Americas

Following the First Summit of the Americas, working groups from the relevant trade ministries and a series of ministerial meetings identified trade measures that would be affected by an FTAA and examined possible approaches to negotiations of an FTAA among all 34 countries.

In April 1998 a Second Summit of the Americas was held in Santiago, Chile. The excerpt below from the Santiago Declaration adopted at the Second Summit announced the formal launch of the FTAA negotiations and described the principles and objectives under which the negotiations would be conducted. The Declaration and Plan of Action are available at www.summit-americas.org/chiledec.htm and www.summit-americas.org/chileplan.htm.

We, the democratically-elected Heads of State and Government of the countries of the Americas, have met in Santiago, Chile, in order to continue the dialogue and strengthen the cooperation we began in Miami in December 1994. Since that time, significant progress has been made in the formulation and execution of joint plans and programs in order to take advantage of the great opportunities before us. We reaffirm our will to continue this most important undertaking, which requires sustained national efforts and dynamic international cooperation.

Today, we direct our Ministers Responsible for Trade to begin negotiations for the FTAA, in accordance with the March 1998 Ministerial Declaration of San José. We reaffirm our determination to conclude the negotiation of the FTAA no later than 2005, and to make concrete progress by the end of the century. The FTAA agreement will be balanced, comprehensive, WTO-consistent and constitute a single undertaking.

We note with satisfaction the preparatory work by the Ministers Responsible for Trade over the past three years which has strengthened our trade policies, fostered understanding of our economic objectives and facilitated dialogue among all participating countries. We appreciate the significant contribution of the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB), the Organization of American States (OAS), and the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC), acting as the Tripartite Committee.

The FTAA negotiating process will be transparent, and take into account the differences in the levels of development and size of the economies in the Americas, in order to create the opportunities for the full participation by all countries. We encourage all segments of civil society to participate in and contribute to the process in a constructive manner, through our respective mechanisms of dialogue and consultation and by presenting their views through the mechanism created in the FTAA negotiating process. We believe that economic integration, investment, and free trade are key factors for raising standards of living, improving the working conditions of the people of the Americas and better protecting the environment. These issues will be taken into account as we proceed with the economic integration process in the Americas.

The region has made significant advances in both monetary and fiscal policy as well as in price stability and liberalizing our economies. The volatility of capital markets vindicates our decision to strengthen banking supervision in the Hemisphere and to establish regulations relating to disclosure and reporting of banking information.

b. United States-Korean agreements on steel, meat and other food products, and automobiles Trade disputes have often been the subject of bilateral negotiations. Such negotiations were used at times to resolve complaints of unfair trade practices involving a specific sector or product in order to terminate, on mutually agreeable terms, proceedings under U.S. domestic law or those before international bodies such as the WTO. Excerpted below are three USTR press releases, explaining the major components of agreements reached with the Government of Korea in 1995.

The press releases are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. The Department of Commerce's Trade Compliance Center's Trade and Related Agreements Database ("TARA"), available at www.tcc.mac.doc.gov lists such agreements still active and binding between the United States and its trading partners covering non-agricultural manufactured products and services.

On July 14, 1995, U.S. Trade Representative Mickey Kantor announced an agreement on steel sheet and pipe and tube products:

> the Government of Korea has agreed to the establishment of a consultative mechanism to discuss key economic trends and data concerning steel sheet and pipe and tube products. The Korean government will also notify the United States in advance of any government measure introduced to control steel production, pricing or exports, and make certain the Korean steel industry fully understands that the government no longer interferes in pricing or production. . . . The forum will meet periodically over the next twelve months, and may be renewed by mutual decision by both governments.

As a result, the press release indicated, "the [U.S.] Committee on Pipe and Tube Imports [which had] filed a Section 301 [of the Trade Act of 1974, 19 U.S.C. § 2411] petition against Korea, alleging that the Korean government restricts exports of steel sheet and pipe and tube, and controls prices of steel sheet . . . have decided to withdraw their petition . . . ."

On July 20, 1995, Ambassador Kantor announced agreement on barriers to U.S. food exports with South Korea. His press release is excerpted below.

* * * *

The dispute, which arose in early 1994, concerned Korea's government-mandated shelf-life standards which adversely affect a range of U.S. food exports, such as vacuum-packed beef and pork, frozen patties and sausages, poultry, and other products.

Last month, Korean authorities met with the United States in Geneva to explain Korea's laws and regulations concerning the shelf-life of food products. Those discussions contributed to the final settlement, which will be forwarded to the Chairman of the Dispute Settlement Body in Geneva today.

Korea agreed to phaseout its current system and, similar to most other countries, allow manufacturers to set their own "use-by" dates. For chilled, vacuum-packed pork and beef and all frozen food, including beef, pork and poultry, Korea's new system will come into effect on July 1, 1996. For all dried, packaged, canned or bottled products, the manufacturer's use-by system will go into effect on October 1 of this year.

In the interim, Korea has established specific government mandated shelf-life dates that will allow trade to take place until the new system takes effect. The settlement also covers other concerns raised by the U.S. meat industry, including pork tendering procedures.

As a result of this settlement, the United States Government is terminating the investigation of the Korean restrictions affecting U.S. meat imports under Section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974. In addition, both sides agreed to begin work immediately on drafting a joint letter to the WTO Dispute Settlement Body, aimed at resolving another case regarding Korea's residue testing and inspection of imported agricultural products.

* * * *

On September 28, 1995, Ambassador Kantor announced that the U.S. and South Korea had reached agreement to increase market access for U.S. and foreign passenger vehicles into Korea. A fact sheet released on that date described the resulting memorandum of understanding as excerpted below.

General

The U.S. and Korea reached a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) on autos on September 28, 1995. The MOU agreement contains provisions on Korea's auto tax system, standards and certification procedures, advertising, auto financing, consumer perceptions and future consultations.

Auto Taxes

Korea's annual vehicle registration tax, cited as the single most onerous barrier identified by the Big Three automakers, will be reduced for cars with larger engines as follows:

* * * *

Korea also will lower the special excise tax on all medium and large cars from 25 to 20 percent, a reduction of 20 percent.

These two tax cuts will reduce the tax burden on cars with larger engines by an average $2,800 per vehicle. This is a 15 percent reduction in the overall tax burden.

Standards and Certification Procedures

Korea will substantially reduce the amount of documentation required to secure safety approval for each new car model, saving U.S. manufacturers thousands of hours of labor for each model.

Korea will raise the threshold for required documentation and testing from 100 to 500 autos, effective immediately, and to 1000 autos by 1998. This change recognizes the high quality of U.S. automobiles and will allow U.S. manufacturers to introduce new models more easily.

To fulfill Korea's new pass-by noise standards, Korea will allow U.S. automakers to use internationally recognized noise test procedures at laboratories in the United States without further testing in Korea.

TV Advertising

By eliminating "locked time," Korea will, for the first time, give foreign firms equal access to TV advertising time. Currently, access is severely restricted for new entrants.

Consumer Perceptions

Korea's Trade Ministry will send a letter to the Korean Automobile Importers and Dealers Association (KAIDA) which will state that ownership of a foreign car, in and of itself, does not constitute grounds for a tax audit or other government harassment. Consumer fears of such harassment has dampened demand for foreign vehicles.

Consultative Mechanism

Korea agrees to further consultations to monitor market access for foreign autos. In monitoring the results of the MOU, the following quantitative and qualitative criteria will be used:

the change in the number and value of foreign autos sold in Korea, in total and by country of export;

specific official actions to improve consumer perception of imports;

implementation of all other measures set out in the MOU, including standards, certification and advertising measures, taxes and tariffs.

In addition, both governments will continue to consult on Korean taxation policies.

c. U.S.-European Union understanding related to LIBERTAD Act

As discussed in Chapter 1.C.2.f., Title IV § 401 of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (LIBERTAD) Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–114, 110 Stat. 785 (1996) (popularly known as "the Helms-Burton Act"), prohibited visa issuance to, and required exclusion of, any alien whom the Secretary of State determined had confiscated or directed the confiscation of property a claim to which is owned by a United States national, had converted such property for personal gain, had trafficked in such property, or was a corporate officer, principal or shareholder with a controlling interest of an entity which had been involved in the confiscation of or trafficking in such property. See also A.6. supra.

On May 3, 1996, the EU asked for WTO consultations concerning the Helms-Burton Act, as well as three pre-existing provisions of U.S. Cuban boycott legislation, regarding their consistency with the GATT and the GATS. On November 20, 1996, the DSB established a panel in response to the EU's request. In response to the appointment of the panel, USTR and the Department of Commerce announced that unless the dispute with the EU was resolved promptly, the United States would issue a formal statement to the effect that the panel was not competent to decide the matter inasmuch as the challenged measures reflected longstanding U.S. foreign policy and national security concerns regarding Cuba. See 1998 Trade Policy Agenda and 1997 Annual Report of the President of the United States on the Trade Agreements Program, available through the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative Press Office. The WTO chapter of the report is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

On April 11, 1997, Under Secretary of Commerce Stuart E. Eizenstat, Special Representative of the President and the Secretary of State for the Promotion of Democracy in Cuba, announced that the United States and the European Commission had reached an understanding that "serves a number of important U.S. interests." Under Secretary Eizenstat continued:

> It creates the first real opportunity to develop multilateral disciplines deterring and inhibiting investment in confiscated property and the first time the EU has agreed to develop such international norms. The agreement avoids placing our foreign policy interests before the WTO, an organization designed to facilitate trade, not arbitrate foreign policy disputes. It protects existing and future property claims in Cuba by U.S. citizens. And it better enables the U.S. and the EU to work together to further our ultimate goal of a democratic Cuba.

Mr. Eizenstat's statement is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. The understanding also addressed European Union concerns with the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act ("ILSA"), discussed in Chapter 16.A.4.a.

On April 25, 1997, the dispute panel chairman gave notice that the EC had formally requested the panel to suspend the panel proceedings. See also 91 Am. J. Int'l L. 493, 497 (1997). The text of the Understanding with the European Union, excerpted below, is available at http://europa.eu.int/comm/external_relations/us/extraterritoriality/understanding_04_97.htm.

Libertad Act

Both sides confirm their commitment to continue their efforts to promote democracy in Cuba. On the EU side, these efforts are set out in the Common Position adopted by the Council on 1 December 1996.

The U.S. reiterates its presumption of continued suspension of Title III during the remainder of the President's term so long as the EU and other allies continue their stepped up efforts to promote democracy in Cuba. Each side will encourage other countries to promote democracy and human rights in Cuba.

The EU and the U.S. agree to step up their efforts to develop agreed disciplines and principles for the strengthening of investment protection, bilaterally and in the context of the Multilateral Agreement on Investment (MAI) or other appropriate international fora. Recognizing that the standard of protection governing expropriation and nationalization embodied in international law and envisioned in the MAI should be respected by all States, these disciplines should inhibit and deter the future acquisition of investments from any State which has expropriated or nationalized such investments in contravention of international law, and subsequent dealings in covered investments. Similarly, and in parallel, the EU and U.S. will work together to address and resolve through agreed principles the issue of conflicting jurisdictions, including issues affecting investors of another party because of their investments in third countries.

The EU and U.S. agree to make best efforts to develop the above disciplines and principles in bilateral consultations before 15 October 1997, and to subsequently introduce jointly corresponding proposals in the MAI negotiations.

The U.S. Administration, at the same time as the above bilateral consultations commence, will begin to consult with Congress with a view to obtaining an amendment providing the President with the authority to waive Title IV of the Act once the bilateral consultations are completed and the EU has adhered to the agreed disciplines and principles. In the circumstances of such adherence it is expected that such a waiver would be granted.

In the meantime, the U.S. notes the President's continuing obligation to enforce Title IV. Consistent with the guidelines for implementation, the U.S. will apply rigorous standards to all evidence submitted to the Department of State for use in enforcing Title IV. The U.S. is committed to a thorough, deliberate process in order to ensure careful implementation of Title IV. This will involve discussions with all affected parties in order to consider all relevant information prior to Title IV actions.

Iran and Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA)

Both sides recognize that it is in their combined interests to work together to counter the threat to international security posed by Iran and Libya. In this regard, the U.S. notes the common agenda on terrorism being developed under the New Transatlantic Agenda and EU measures to inhibit the spread of weapons of mass destruction. The U.S. reiterates the President's commitment to implement ILSA. The U.S. intends to implement the Act in a deliberate and fair manner, taking into consideration its international obligations. Taking into account the measures taken by the EU, in particular those recently announced with respect to Iran, the U.S. will continue to work with the EU toward the objectives of meeting the terms 1) for granting EU Member States a waiver under Section 4.C. of the Act with regard to Iran, and 2) for granting companies from the EU waivers under Section 9.C. of the Act with regard to Libya.

WTO Case

In the light of all of the above, the EU agrees to the suspension of the proceedings of the WTO panel. The EU reserves all rights to resume the panel procedure, or begin new proceedings, if action is taken against EU companies or individuals under Title III or Title IV of the Libertad Act or if the waivers under ILSA referred to above are not granted or are withdrawn. The EU shall notify the United States at least seven days in advance of making a written submission to the panel, and upon delivery of such submission this Understanding shall cease to have effect.

This Understanding reflects the fact that the U.S. Administration is obligated to implement the Libertad Act and ILSA. The U.S. takes the position that the present Understanding conveys no legal commitment that waivers will be granted under ILSA.

d. Japan-United States joint statement on the Framework for a New Economic Partnership

On July 10, 1993, at the Tokyo Summit of the G-7, the United States and Japan agreed upon the establishment of the Japan-U.S. Framework for a New Economic Partnership.

The framework was designed to address friction over trade imbalances between the United States and Japan by, among other steps, allowing for the negotiation of a series of agreements between Japan and the United States in different sectors of the economy. The agreement also committed the United States to take steps to decrease the U.S. budget deficit, and Japan to increase imports of goods and services from the United States and elsewhere. The joint statement is excerpted below, and is available at http://170.110.214.18/tcc/data/commerce_html/TCC_Documents/Japan_Framework/Japan_Framework.html.

Reaffirming their understanding at their meeting of April 1993, the Prime Minister of Japan and the President of the United States agree to establish the Japan-United States Framework for a New Economic Partnership, as described below.

Basic Objectives

The Framework will serve as a new mechanism of consultations for Japan-United States economic relations. This new economic relationship must be balanced and mutually beneficial, and firmly rooted in the shared interest and responsibility of the United States and Japan to promote global growth, open markets, and a vital world trading system. These consultations will take place under the basic principle of two-way dialogue.

The Framework provides a structure for an ongoing set of consultations anchored in biannual meetings of the Heads of Government. The goals of this Framework are to deal with structural and sectoral issues in order substantially to increase access and sales of competitive foreign goods and services through market-opening and macroeconomic measures; to increase investment; and to promote international competitiveness; and to enhance bilateral economic cooperation between the United States and Japan.

Japan will actively pursue the medium-term objectives of promoting strong and sustainable domestic demand-led growth and increasing the market access of competitive foreign goods and services, intended to achieve, over the medium term, a highly significant decrease in its current account surplus, and to promote a significant increase in global imports of goods and services, including from the United States. In this context, Japan will take measures including fiscal and monetary measures as necessary to realize these objectives.

The United States will also actively pursue the medium-term objectives of substantially reducing its fiscal deficit, promoting domestic saving, and strengthening its international competitiveness. Steady implementation of these efforts on both sides is expected to contribute to a significant reduction in both countries external imbalances.

The United States and Japan are committed to an open and multilateral trading system that benefits all nations. Benefits under this Framework will be on a Most Favored Nation basis.

Consultations will be limited to matters within the scope and responsibility of government.

The two Governments are committed to implement faithfully and expeditiously all agreed-upon measures taken pursuant to this Framework. Both Governments agree that tangible progress must be achieved under this Framework.

The two Governments will utilize this Framework as a principal means for addressing the sectoral and structural areas covered within it. If issues within these areas arise, both sides will make utmost efforts expeditiously to resolve differences through consultations under the Framework or, where appropriate, under applicable multilateral agreements.

e. 1995 United States-Japan automobile trade agreement under the 1993 Framework for a New Economic Partnership

Consultations under the 1993 Framework, supra, resulted in the negotiation of several additional agreements. One of these agreements was a 1995 agreement on Measures by the Government of Japan and the Government of the United States of America Regarding Autos and Auto Parts ("1995 Auto Agreement"), reprinted in 34 I.L.M. 1482. This agreement addressed concerns that the Japanese sector was not open to imports of autos and auto parts from the United States.

Excerpted below are the goals and general policies set forth in the 1995 Auto Agreement, available in full on the Department of Commerce's website at www.mac.doc.gov/japan/source/menu/autos/usjfinal.html. The 1995 Auto Agreement expired on December 31, 2000.

I. GOALS AND GENERAL POLICIES

A. The goals of the Framework for A New Economic Partnership (the "Framework") established by the "Joint Statement on the Japan-United States Framework for A New Economic Partnership" of the Heads of Governments of Japan and the United States of America (the "United States") on July 10, 1993 are to deal with structural and sectoral issues in order substantially to increase access and sales of competitive foreign goods and services through market opening and macroeconomic measures; to increase investment; to promote international competitiveness; and to enhance bilateral economic cooperation between the United States and Japan.

B. To accomplish these goals with respect to the Japanese autos and auto parts sector, the Government of Japan and the Government of the United States each has decided to implement the measures contained in this document, "Measures by the Government of Japan and the Government of the United States of America Regarding Autos and Auto Parts" (the "Measures") with the objective of achieving significantly expanded sales opportunities to result in a significant expansion of purchases of foreign parts by Japanese firms in Japan and through their transplants, as well as removing problems which affect market access, and encouraging imports of foreign autos and auto parts in Japan.

C. All measures described in this document (including measures related to changes in regulations) are to be taken consistent with laws and regulations applicable to each country and international law.

D. The Government of Japan and the Government of the United States affirm the principle that vehicle manufacturers, auto parts suppliers and vehicle dealers should deal with suppliers based on the principles of free and open competition without adverse discrimination based on capital affiliation.

E. The Government of Japan and the Government of the United States reaffirm the principles of the Framework, including the principle that all measures of the Measures (including Sections II.A and IV.B) are to be taken on a most-favored-nation basis. In this regard, the Government of Japan is prepared to take similar measures in relation to any third countries.

f. Natural rubber agreement

On June 19, 1996, President William J. Clinton transmitted the International Natural Rubber Agreement, 1995, to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–27 (1996); see also S. Exec. Rep. No. 104–21 (1996). The Senate provided advice and consent on September 25, 1996. 142 CONG. REC. 11248 (Sept. 25, 1996). The report of the Department of State submitting the agreement to the President described the agreement as "stabiliz[ing] natural rubber prices within predetermined, but flexible, ranges through operation of a buffer stock . . . ." The report also expressed the U.S. intention to move to a free market:

> While the International Natural Rubber Organization (INRO), established by the Agreement, has been useful, the U.S. Government believes that free markets are better able to serve the interest of both consumers and producers. For that reason we have announced our intention that INRA 1995 will be the last we join. U.S. participation in INRA 1995 responds directly to concerns expressed by U.S. rubber companies and unions that a transition period is needed to allow industry time to prepare for a free market in natural rubber and to allow for the further development of alternative institutions to manage market risk.

The agreement entered into force definitively February 14, 1997. See also 92 Am. J. Int'l L. 642, 648 (1996). The agreement was terminated effective October 13, 1999, in accordance with Resolution 212 (XXXXI) adopted by the International Natural Rubber Council at its forty-first session held in Kuala Lumpur September 30, 1999.

g. Other trade-related U.S. Government actions

(1) Fast track authority

Between 1974 and 1994, trade agreements were negotiated pursuant to legislation that conferred "fast track" authority on the President. Such legislation required the President to notify Congress before entry into a trade agreement, consult with congressional committees during the negotiations, and obtain approval of both the Senate and the House of Representatives before entering into the agreement. Once the agreement was reached, however, fast track authority confined congressional consideration of the legislation approving and implementing the trade agreement to a process with mandatory deadlines, no amendment, and limited debate.

Fast track authority expired in 1994, after the Uruguay Round WTO Agreements were reached (see B.2.a., supra), and was not renewed during the remainder of the 1990s. A more detailed summary of fast track authority developments during this period is available in a CRS Issue Brief for Congress, available at http://fpc.state.gov/documents/organization/12409.pdf.

(2) Most-favored-nation trade status

The Jackson-Vanik Amendment (sections 402 and 409 of the Trade Act of 1974, 19 U.S.C. §§ 2432, 2439) sets forth certain freedom of emigration criteria for certain countries (most Communist or formerly Communist states). Section 2432(a) makes countries ineligible for normal trade relations* and other benefits. That section provides:

> . . . To assure the continued dedication of the United States to fundamental human rights, and notwithstanding any other provision of law, . . . products from any nonmarket economy country shall not be eligible to receive nondiscriminatory treatment (normal trade relations), such country shall not participate in any program of the Government of the United States which extends credits or credit guarantees or investment guarantees, directly or indirectly, and the President of the United States shall not conclude any commercial agreement with any such country, . . . [when] the President determines that such country—
> (1) denies its citizens the right or opportunity to emigrate;
> (2) imposes more than a nominal tax on emigration or on the visas or other documents required for emigration, for any purpose or cause whatsoever; or > (3) imposes more than a nominal tax, levy, fine, fee, or other charge on any citizen as a consequence of the desire of such citizen to emigrate to the country of his choice . . .

A nonmarket economy country is not subject to the measures in 2432(a) if the President determines that it is not violating freedom of emigration as enumerated in 2432(a)(1)-(3) or exercises Presidential waiver authority (upon a determination that a waiver will substantially promote the objectives of the Amendment and upon receipt of assurances that the emigration practices of the country will lead substantially to the achievement of those objectives).

During the period 1991–1999, the President issued waivers with respect to the following countries (waivers are subject to annual renewal):

* See Editors' note in B.2.b. above.

1991: Bulgaria, Mongolia, Romania

1992: Albania, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Ukraine, Uzbekistan

1998: Vietnam

During the same period, the President determined that the following countries were in full compliance with the freedom of emigration requirements of Jackson-Vanik (full compliance determinations are not subject to renewal but require semi-annual reporting on continued compliance):

1991: Czechoslavakia (predating the January 1, 1993 split into the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic)

1993: Bulgaria

1994: Russia

1995: Romania

1996: Mongolia

1997: Albania, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Ukraine, Uzbekistan

During the same period, several countries were removed from coverage under Title IV of the Trade Act of 1974, which includes the Jackson-Vanik Amendment. In Pub. L. No. 102–182, December 4, 1991, Congress directly extended nondiscriminatory treatment to the products of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, and terminated the application of Title IV to those countries (effective December 15, 1991).

Such "graduation" of several other countries from Title IV was handled through a two-step process: first, Congress passed legislation authorizing the President to terminate the application of Title IV to certain countries and extend nondiscriminatory treatment to their products, and then the President carried this out by presidential determination or proclamation. Pub. L. No. 102–182 authorized such action with regard to Czechoslovakia and Hungary, and in Presidential Determination No. 92–21 of April 10, 1992, the President determined that Title IV should no longer apply to those countries. Bulgaria was addressed in Pub. L. No. 104–162, July 18, 1996, and Proclamation 6922 of September 27, 1996 (32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1827 (Sept. 30, 1996)). Romania came next, the subject of Pub. L. No. 104–171, August 3, 1996, and Proclamation 6951 of November 7, 1996 (32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2265 (Nov. 11, 1996)). Mongolia received similar treatment in Pub. L. No. 106–36, June 25, 1999, followed by Proclamation 7207 of July 1, 1999 (35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1189 (July 5, 1999)).

China was originally granted a Presidential waiver on October 23, 1979, and that waiver was extended annually throughout the period 1991–1999. In 1993 President William J. Clinton waived the application of 2432(a) and (b) to China for the coming year, 58 Fed. Reg. 31,329 (June 1, 1993), and issued Executive Order 12,850 establishing conditions for further renewal in addition to the criteria that appear in the Jackson-Vanik Amendment. 58 Fed. Reg. 31,327 (June 1, 1993). Section 1 of the executive order added the following conditions to waiver recommendations by the Secretary of State to the President:

> —extension will substantially promote the freedom of emigration objectives of section 402 of the Act; and
>
> —China is complying with the 1992 bilateral agreement between the United States and China concerning prison labor.
>
> (b) In making this recommendation the Secretary shall also determine whether China has made overall, significant progress with respect to the following:
>
> —taking steps to begin adhering to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;
>
> —releasing and providing an acceptable accounting for Chinese citizens imprisoned or detained for the non-violent expression of their political and religious beliefs, including such expression of beliefs in connection with the Democracy Wall and Tiananmen Square movements;

—ensuring humane treatment of prisoners, such as by allowing access to prisons by international humanitarian and human rights organizations;

—protecting Tibet's distinctive religious and cultural heritage; and —permitting international radio and television broadcasts into China.

At a press conference at Washington on May 26, 1994, President Clinton announced his decision that the United States would renew China's most-favored-nation ("MFN") trading status, pursuant to the criteria and procedure established in the executive order. The President agreed, he said, with the conclusion of Secretary of State Warren M. Christopher that China had not achieved "overall significant progress in all the areas outlined in the executive order relating to human rights and that serious human rights abuses continued in China." As indicated in excerpts below from his statement, President Clinton concluded, however, that renewal of the waiver to maintain China's MFN trading status offered "the best opportunity to lay the basis for long-term sustainable progress in human rights and for the advancement of . . . other [U.S.] interests with China." He also decided to de-link consideration of general human rights performance (apart from freedom of emigration) from the annual review of extension of the Jackson-Vanik waiver for China.

The full text of President Clinton's remarks is reprinted in 5 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 22 at 345 (1994), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html. See also 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 745 (1994).

I have received Secretary Christopher's letter . . . as required by last year's executive order, reporting to me on the conditions in that executive order. . . . [C]learly, there was progress made in important areas, including the resolution of all emigration cases, the establishment of a memorandum of understanding with regard to how prison labor issues would be resolved, the adherence to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and other issues. Nevertheless, serious human rights abuses continue in China, including the arrest and detention of those who peacefully voice their opinions and the repression of Tibet's religious and cultural traditions.

The question for us now is, given the fact that there has been some progress but that not all the requirements of the executive order were met, how can we best advance the cause of human rights and the other profound interests the United States has in its relationship with China.

. . . Extending MFN will avoid isolating China and, instead, will permit us to engage the Chinese with not only economic contacts but with cultural, educational, and other contacts, and with a continuing aggressive effort in human rights—an approach that I believe will make it more likely that China will play a responsible role, both at home and abroad.

I am moving, therefore, to delink human rights from the annual extension of most-favored-nation trading status for China. That linkage has been constructive during the past year. But I believe, based on our aggressive contacts with the Chinese in the past several months, that we have reached the end of the usefulness of that policy, and it is time to take a new path toward the achievement of our constant objectives. We need to place our relationship into a larger and more productive framework.

In view of the continuing human rights abuses, I am extending the sanctions imposed by the United States as a result of the events in Tiananmen Square, and I am also banning the import of munitions, principally guns and ammunition, from China. I am also pursuing a new and vigorous American program to support those in China working to advance the cause of human rights and democracy.

This program will include increased broadcasts for Radio Free Asia and the Voice of America, increased support for non-governmental organizations working on human rights in China, and the development with American business leaders of a voluntary set of principles for business activity in China. . . . Even as we engage the Chinese on military, political and economic issues, we intend to stay engaged with those in China who suffer from human rights abuses. The United States must remain a champion of their liberties.

I believe the question, therefore, is not whether we continue to support human rights in China, but how we can best support human rights in China and advance our other very significant issues and interests. . . . I believe the course I have chosen gives us the best chance of success on all fronts. . . .

To those who argue that in view of China's human rights abuses we should revoke MFN status . . . I am persuaded that the best path for advancing freedom in China is for the United States to intensify and broaden its engagement with that nation.

* * * *

A summary of Secretary of State Warren Christopher's report to the President, released by the White House Office of the Press Secretary, May 26, 1994, included a list of sanctions that would remain in place against China in light of its poor human rights performance. 5 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 22 at 346 (1994), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

* * * *

At the same time, owing to China's failure to achieve "overall, significant progress" in the terms envisioned by Executive Order 12850, certain sanctions imposed following the 1989 Tiananmen Square tragedy will remain in force. The President will determine, in the course of ongoing review of China's human rights performance, whether and when it might be appropriate to lift these sanctions . . . [which] are:

(1) Suspension of weapons deliveries under both commercial and government programs;

(2) Denial of licenses for dual-use civilian technology items for the Chinese police or military;

(3) Suspension of consideration of licenses for U.S. Munitions List items;

(4) Ineligibility of China to participate in programs under the Trade and Development [Assistance Program], Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC), and the U.S.-Asia Environment Partnership Program; and

(5) Withholding of U.S. support for World Bank and other multilateral development bank lending to China except for projects meeting basic human needs.

Imposition of Import Ban on Weapons and Ammunition

Under legal authority granted by the Arms Export Control Act to restrict arms imports on foreign policy grounds, there will be an immediate import ban on munitions from China, consisting primarily of arms and ammunition.

On November 15, 1999, the United States and China agreed on certain terms and conditions for China's accession to the World Trade Organization ("WTO"). On October 10, 2000, President Clinton signed into law Pub. L. No. 106–286, 141 Stat. 880, entitled "An Act to authorize extension of nondiscriminatory treatment (normal trade relations treatment) to the People's Republic of China, and to establish a framework for relations between the United States and the People's Republic of China." Pursuant to § 101(b) of the act, President George W. Bush certified to Congress on November 9, 2001, that the "terms and conditions for the accession of China to the WTO [i.e., those agreed to by the WTO members as a whole] are at least equivalent to those agreed between the United States and China on November 15, 1999." China formally became a WTO member on December 11, 2001. On December 27, 2001, President George W. Bush issued Proclamation 7516, granting permanent normal trading relations status to the People's Republic of China and terminating application of Jackson-Vanik provisions to China, effective January 1, 2002. 67 Fed. Reg. 479 (Jan. 4, 2002); see also White House press statement at www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2001/12/20011227–2.html.

C. INVESTMENT

1. 1991 Statement on United States Foreign Direct Investment Policy

On December 26, 1991, President George H. W. Bush issued a statement reaffirming the United States position on foreign direct investment. The statement, the first issued since 1983, concerned U.S. policy on both foreign direct investment in the United States, and foreign direct investment by U.S. investors abroad, and is available at http://bushlibrary.tamu.edu/research/papers/1991/91122605.html.

A statement issued by the White House on the same date explained the U.S. policy and discussed elements of the U.S. trade and investment agenda at the time that reflected the U.S. policy in favor of the free flow of foreign direct investment.

The full text of the statement is available at http://bushlibrary.tamu.edu/research/papers/1991/91122606.html.

* * * *

1. Foreign Direct Investment in the United States

* * * *

The United States provides foreign investors fair, equitable, and nondiscriminatory treatment as a matter of both law and practice. While there are exceptions, generally related to national security, such exceptions are few; they limit foreign investment only in certain sectors, such as atomic energy, air and water transport, and telecommunications. These exceptions are consistent with our international obligations.

Consistent with this policy, the Exon-Florio Amendment to the Defense Production Act [50 U.S.C. App. § 2170] provides the President with authority to suspend or prohibit foreign mergers, acquisitions, and takeovers, where there is credible evidence of a threat to the national security.

2. U.S. Direct Investment Abroad

The United States believes that U.S. investment abroad should also receive fair, equitable, and nondiscriminatory treatment. The basic tenet of our policy is that U.S. investors should be accorded the better of national or most-favored-nation treatment. U.S. investors should receive the most favorable treatment offered by the host country to any investor, foreign or domestic, at the time of establishment and thereafter.

Accordingly, the United States continues to seek the reduction and elimination of practices by governments which restrict, distort, discriminate against, prohibit, or place unreasonable burdens on foreign direct investment.

* * * *

3. U.S. Initiatives

The United States has a number of initiatives underway to enhance the free flow of foreign direct investment in accordance with market forces.

—In the Uruguay round, the United States is negotiating key multilateral agreements to eliminate trade-related investment measures; to protect trade-related intellectual property; and to promote trade in services, an area where many investment rules have prohibited highly competitive U.S. service industries from doing business abroad.

—The United States, Canada, and Mexico are negotiating the North American free trade agreement, in which we are seeking to liberalize investment principles consistent with U.S. bilateral investment treaties.

—In the Enterprise for the Americas Initiative, the United States and its partners are working with the Inter-American Development Bank to help nations of Latin America and the Caribbean to liberalize their investment regimes. To assist in carrying out these reforms, the United States has spearheaded the formation of a multilateral investment fund for Latin America and the Caribbean, which will be administered by the Inter-American Development Bank. Japan, Canada, Spain, Portugal, and several of the largest Latin American countries have agreed to join the United States in contributing to this fund. Others are actively considering joining.

—The United States has signed bilateral investment treaties with 16 countries in Eastern Europe, Latin America, the Caribbean, Africa, and Asia and is negotiating such agreements with a number of other countries. These treaties represent important commitments to investment reform. They incorporate the principle of nondiscriminatory treatment; affirm international law standards for expropriation, including the principle of prompt, adequate, and effective compensation; provide for freedom of financial flows; and permit investors to take investment disputes to international arbitration.

—The United States is also vigorously promoting the adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights. Such protection is essential for the flow of investment into both developed and developing countries.

—At the initiative of the United States, member countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development are studying ways to strengthen multilateral commitment to open, nondiscriminatory treatment of investment.

—The United States will continue to encourage Japan to remove its investment barriers as an important goal of the Structural Impediments Initiative talks.

2. Bilateral Investment Treaties

During the 1990s, the United States concluded 35 bilateral investment treaties ("BITs"), twenty-two of which entered into force during the period. Set forth below is a fact sheet prepared by the State Department's Bureau of Economic and Business Affairs, explaining the key objectives and components of the U.S. BIT program.

The fact sheet is available at www.state.gov/www/issues/economic/7treaty.html.

The U.S. Bilateral Investment Treaty (BIT) program supports several key U.S. Government economic policy objectives, from protection of U.S. interests overseas to promotion of market-oriented policies in other countries to promotion of U.S. exports.

The BIT program's basic aims are to:

- Protect U.S. investment abroad in those countries where U.S. investors' rights are not protected through existing agreements such as our treaties of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation;
- Encourage adoption in foreign countries of market-oriented domestic policies that treat private investment fairly; and
- Support the development of international law standards consistent with these objectives.

The U.S. Government also believes that adequate and effective protection for intellectual property rights is an essential element of an attractive investment climate. Consequently, prospective BIT partners are generally expected, at the time the BIT is signed, to make a commitment to implement all World Trade Organization (WTO) Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) agreement obligations within a reasonable period of time.

The U.S. Government has placed a priority on negotiating BITs with countries undergoing economic reform and where we believe we can have a significant impact on the adoption of liberal policies on the treatment of foreign direct investment. BITs also complement and support our regional initiatives on investment liberalization in the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation Forum (APEC) and the Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA). In addition, BITs lay the policy groundwork for broader multilateral initiatives in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) and eventually, the World Trade Organization (WTO).

U.S. Bilateral Investment Treaties provide U.S. investors with six basic benefits:

First, our BITs ensure that U.S. companies are entitled to be treated as favorably as their competitors.

- U.S. investors are entitled to the better of national treatment or most favored nation (MFN) treatment when they seek to initiate investment and throughout the life of that investment, subject to certain limited and specifically described exceptions listed in annexes or protocols to the treaties.

Second, BITs establish clear limits on the expropriation of investments and entitle U.S. investors to be fairly compensated.

- Expropriation can occur only in accordance with international law standards, that is, for a public purpose, in a nondiscriminatory manner, under due process of law, and accompanied by payment of prompt, adequate, and effective compensation.

Third, BITs provide U.S. investors the right to transfer funds into and out of the host country without delay using a market rate of exchange. This covers all transfers related to an investment, including interest, proceeds from liquidation, repatriated profits and infusions of additional financial resources after the initial investment has been made. Ensuring the right to transfer funds creates a predictable environment guided by market forces.

Fourth, BITs limit the ability of host governments to require U.S. investors to adopt inefficient and trade distorting practices. For example, performance requirements such as local content or export quotas are prohibited.

- This provision may also open up new markets for U.S. producers and increase U.S. exports. U.S. investors protected by BITs can purchase competitive U.S.-produced components without undue restriction on inputs in their production of various products.
- U.S. investors protected by BITs can also import other U.S.-produced products for distribution and sale in the local market. They cannot be forced, as a condition of establishment or operation, to export locally produced goods back to the U.S. market or to third-country markets.

Fifth, BITs give U.S. investors the right to submit an investment dispute with the treaty partner's government to international arbitration. There is no requirement to use that country's domestic courts.

Sixth, BITs give U.S. investors the right to engage the top managerial personnel of their choice, regardless of nationality.

BITs that were negotiated and entered into force in the 1990s included treaties with the following countries (date of entry into force in parentheses): Albania (1998); Argentina (1994); Armenia (1996); Bulgaria (1994); Republic of Congo (1994); Czech Republic (1992); Ecuador (1997); Estonia (1997); Georgia (1997); Jamaica (1997); Kazakhstan (1994); Kyrgyzstan (1994); Latvia (1996); Moldova (1994); Mongolia (1997); Poland (1994); Romania (1994); Slovakia (1992); Sri Lanka (1993); Trinidad & Tobago (1996); Tunisia (1993); and Ukraine (1996).

A number of other BITs were negotiated and signed in the 1990s, but had not entered into force by the end of the decade. These include BITs with the following countries (date of signature in parentheses): Azerbaijan (1997); Bahrain (1999); Belarus (1994); Bolivia (1998); Croatia (1996); El Salvador (1999); Honduras (1995); Jordan (1997); Lithuania (1998); Mozambique (1998); Nicaragua (1995); Russia (1992); and Uzbekistan (1994).

A complete list of bilateral investment treaties and their current status can be found on the website of the State Department's Bureau of Economic and Business Affairs at www.state.gov/e/eb/. Excerpted below are materials discussing selected aspects of the BIT program in the 1990s.

a. Azerbaijan

The Treaty Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Azerbaijan Concerning the Encouragement and Reciprocal Protection of Investment, with Annex, was signed August 1, 1997, at Washington, the fourth such treaty signed between the United States and a Transcaucasian or Central Asian country. President William J. Clinton transmitted the treaty, with annex, together with an amendment to the treaty set forth in an exchange of diplomatic notes dated August 8 and August 25, 2000, to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on September 12, 2000. The accompanying September 8, 2000, report of the Department of State submitting the treaty to the President explained:

> The Treaty with Azerbaijan is based on the 1994 U.S. prototype BIT and satisfies the U.S. principal objectives in bilateral investment treaty negotiations:
>
> —All forms of U.S. investment in the territory of Azerbaijan are covered.
> —Covered investments receive the better of national treatment or most-favored-nation (MFN) treatment both while they are being established and thereafter, subject to certain specified exceptions.
> —Specified performance requirements may not be imposed upon or enforced against covered investments.
> —Expropriation is permitted only in accordance with customary international law standards.
> —Parties are obligated to permit the transfer, in a freely usable currency, of all funds related to a covered investment, subject to exceptions for specified purposes.
> —Investment disputes with the host government may be brought by investors, or by their covered investments, to binding international arbitration as an alternative to domestic courts.

Further excerpts from the report describe key provisions and the core principles of U.S. bilateral investment treaties during this period. The President's transmittal, including the Department of State report, is available in S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–47 (2000). The treaty entered into force August 2, 2001.

THE PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit to you the Treaty Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Azerbaijan Concerning the Encouragement and Reciprocal Protection of Investment, with Annex, signed at Washington on August 1, 1997, together with an amendment to the Treaty set forth in an exchange of diplomatic notes dated August 8, 2000 and August 25, 2000. I recommend that this Treaty, with Annex and the related diplomatic notes, be transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification.

Article I (Definitions)

* * * *

Investment, Covered Investment

The Treaty's definition of investment is broad, recognizing that investment can take a wide variety of forms. Every kind of investment is specifically incorporated in the definition; moreover, it is explicitly noted that investment may consist or take the form of any of a number of interests, claims, and rights.

The Treaty provides an illustrative list of the forms an investment may take. Establishing a subsidiary is a common way of making an investment. Other forms that an investment might take include equity and debt interests in a company; contractual rights; tangible, intangible, and intellectual property; and rights conferred pursuant to law, such as licenses and permits. Investment as defined by the Treaty generally excludes claims arising solely from trade transactions, such as a sale of goods across a border that does not otherwise involve an investment.

The Treaty defines "covered investment" as an investment of a national or company of a Party in the territory of the other Party. An investment of a national or company is one that the national or company owns or controls, either directly or indirectly. Indirect ownership or control could be through other, intermediate companies or persons, including those of third countries. Control is not specifically defined in the Treaty; ownership of over 50 percent of the voting stock of a company would normally convey control, but in many cases the requirement could be satisfied by less than that proportion, or by other arrangements.

The broad nature of the definitions of "investment," "company," and "company of a Party" means that investments can be covered by the Treaty even if ultimate control lies with non-Party nationals. A Party may, however, deny the benefits of the Treaty in the limited circumstances described in Article XII.

* * * *

Article II (Treatment of Investment)

Article II contains the Treaty's major obligations with respect to the treatment of covered investments.

Paragraph 1 generally ensures the better of national or MFN treatment in both the entry and post-entry phases of investment. It thus prohibits, outside of exceptions listed in the Annex, "screening" on the basis of nationality during the investment process, as well as nationality-based post-establishment measures. For purposes of the Treaty, "national treatment" means treatment no less favorable than that which a Party accords, in like situations, to investments in its territory of its own nationals or companies. For purposes of the Treaty, "MFN treatment" means treatment no less favorable than that which a Party accords, in like situations, to investments in its territory of nationals or companies of a third country. The Treaty obliges each Party to provide whichever of national treatment or MFN treatment is the most favorable. This is defined by the Treaty as "national and MFN treatment." Paragraph 1 explicitly states that the national and MFN treatment obligation will extend to state enterprises in their provision of goods and services to covered investments.

Paragraph 2 states that each Party may adopt or maintain exceptions to the national and MFN treatment standard with respect to the sectors or matters specified in the Annex. Further restrictive measures are permitted in each sector. (The specific exceptions are discussed in the section entitled "Annex" below.) In the Annex, Parties may take exceptions only to the obligation to provide national and MFN treatment; there are no sectoral exceptions to the rest of the Treaty's obligations. Finally, in adopting any exception under this provision, a Party may not require the divestment of a preexisting covered investment.

Paragraph 2 also states that a Party is not required to extend to covered investments national and MFN treatment with respect to procedures provided for in multilateral agreements concluded under the auspices of the World Intellectual Property Organization relating to the acquisition or maintenance of intellectual property rights. This provision clarifies that certain procedural preferences granted under intellectual property conventions, such as the Patent Cooperation Treaty, fall outside the BIT. This exception parallels those in the Uruguay Round's Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) and the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA).

Paragraph 3 sets out a minimum standard of treatment based on standards found in customary international law. The obligations to accord "fair and equitable treatment" and "full protection and security" are explicitly cited, as is each Party's obligation not to impair, through unreasonable and discriminatory means, the management, conduct, operation, and sale or other disposition of covered investments. The general reference to international law also implicitly incorporates other fundamental rules of customary international law regarding the treatment of foreign investment. However, this provision does not incorporate obligations based on other international agreements.

Paragraph 4 requires that each Party provide effective means of asserting claims and enforcing rights with respect to covered investments.

Paragraph 5 ensures the transparency of each Party's regulation of covered investments.

Article III (Expropriation)

Article III incorporates into the Treaty customary international law standards for expropriation. Article III also includes detailed provisions regarding the computation and payment, adequate, and effective compensation.

Paragraph 1 describes the obligations of the Parties with respect to expropriation and nationalization of a covered investment. These obligations apply to both direct expropriation and indirect expropriation through measures "tantamount to expropriation or nationalization" and thus apply to "creeping expropriations"—a series of measures that effectively amounts to an expropriation of a covered investment without taking title.

Paragraph 1 further bars all expropriations or nationalizations except those that are for a public purpose; carried out in a non-discriminatory manner; in accordance with due process of law; in accordance with the general principles of treatment provided in Article II(3); and subject to "prompt, adequate, and effective compensation."

Paragraph 2, 3, and 4 more fully describe the meaning of "prompt, adequate, and effective compensation." The guiding principle is that the investor should be made whole.

* * * *

Article V (Transfers)

Article V Protects investors from certain government exchange controls that limit current and capital account transfers, as well as limits on inward transfers made by screening authorities and, in certain circumstances, limits on returns in kind.

In paragraph 1 each Party agrees to "permit all transfers relating to a covered investment to be made freely and without delay into and out of its territory." Paragraph 1 also provides a list of transfers that must be allowed. The list is non-exclusive, and is intended to protect flows to both affiliated and non-affiliated entities.

Paragraph 2 provides that each Party must permit transfers to be made in a "freely usable currency" at the market rate of exchange prevailing on the date of transfer. "Freely usable" is a term used by the International Monetary Fund; at present there are five "freely usable" currencies; the U.S. dollar, Japanese yen, German mark, French franc, and British pound sterling.

In paragraph 3, each Party agrees to permit returns in kind to be made where such returns have been authorized by an investment authorization or written agreement between a Party and a covered investment or a national or company of the other Party.

Paragraph 4 recognizes that, notwithstanding the obligations of paragraphs 1 through 3, a Party may prevent a transfer through the equitable, non-discriminatory and good faith application of laws relating to bankruptcy, insolvency, or the protection of the rights of creditors; securities; criminal or penal offenses; or ensuring compliance with orders or judgments in adjudicatory proceedings.

Article VI (Performance Requirements)

Article VI prohibits either Party from mandating or enforcing specified performance requirements as a condition for the establishment, acquisition, expansion, management, conduct, or operation of a covered investment. The list of prohibited requirements is exhaustive and covers domestic content requirements and domestic purchase preferences, the "balancing" of imports or sales in relation to exports or foreign exchange earnings, requirements to export products or services, technology transfer requirements, and requirements relating to the conduct of research and development in the host country. Such requirements are major burdens on investors and impair their competitiveness.

The last sentence of Article VI makes clear that a Party may, however, impose conditions for the receipt or continued receipt of benefits and incentives.

Article IX (Settlement of Disputes Between One Party and a National or Company of the Other Party)

Article IX sets forth several means by which disputes brought against a Party by an investor (specifically, a national or company of the other Party) may be resolved.

Article IX procedures apply to an "investment dispute," which is any dispute arising out of or relating to an investment authorization, an investment agreement, or an alleged breach of rights conferred, created, or recognized by the Treaty with respect to a covered investment.

In the event that an investment dispute cannot be settled amicably, paragraph 2 gives an investor an exclusive (with the exception in paragraph 3(b) concerning injunctive relief, explained below) choice among three options to settle the dispute. These three options are: (1) submitting the dispute to the courts or administrative tribunals of the Party that is a party to the dispute; (2) invoking dispute-resolution procedures previously agreed upon by the national or company and the host country government; or (3) invoking the dispute-resolution mechanisms identified in paragraph 3 of Article IX.

Under paragraph 3(a), the investor can submit an investment dispute to binding arbitration 3 months after the dispute arises; provided that the investor has not submitted the claim to a court or administrative tribunal of the Party or invoked a dispute resolution procedure previously agreed upon. The investor may choose among the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID) (Convention Arbitration), the Additional Facility of ICSID (if Convention Arbitration is not available), ad hoc arbitration using the Arbitration Rules of the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL), or any other arbitral institution or rules agreed upon by both parties to the dispute.

Before or during such arbitral proceedings, however, paragraph 3(b) provides that an investor may seek, without affecting its right to pursue arbitration under this Treaty, interim injunctive relief not involving the payment of damages from local courts or administrative tribunals of the Party that is a party to the dispute for the preservation of its rights and interests. This paragraph does not alter the power of the arbitral tribunals to recommend or order interim measures they may deem appropriate.

Paragraph 4 constitutes each Party's consent to the submission of investment disputes to binding arbitration in accordance with the choice of the investor.

Paragraph 5 provides that any non-ICSID Convention arbitration shall take place in a country that is a party to the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Arbitral Awards. This provision facilitates enforcement of arbitral awards.

In addition, in paragraph 6, each Party commits to enforcing arbitral awards rendered pursuant to this Article. The Federal Arbitration Act (9 U.S.C. 1 et seq.) satisfies the requirement for the enforcement of non-ICSID Convention awards in the United States. The Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes Act of 1966 (22 U.S.C. 1650–1650a) provides for the enforcement of ICSID Convention awards.

Paragraph 7 ensures that a Party may not assert as a defense, or for any other reason, that the investor involved in the investment dispute has received or will receive reimbursement for the same damages under an insurance or guarantee contract.

Paragraph 8 provides that, for the purposes of this article, the nationality of a company in the host country will be determined by ownership or control, rather than by place of incorporation.

This provision allows a company that is a covered investment to bring a claim in its own name.

Article XV (Application to Political Subdivisions and State Enterprises of the Parties)

Paragraph 1(a) makes clear that the obligations of the Treaty are applicable to all political subdivisions of the Parties, such as provincial, State, and local governments.

Paragraph 1(b) recognizes that under the U.S. federal system, States of the United States may, in some instances, treat out-of-State residents and corporations in a different manner than they treat in-State residents and corporations. The Treaty provides that the national treatment commitment, with respect to the States, means treatment no less favorable than that provided by a State to U.S. out-of-State residents and corporations.

Paragraph 2 extends a Party's obligations under the Treaty to its state enterprises in the exercise of any delegated governmental authority. This paragraph is designed to clarify that the exercise of governmental authority by a state enterprise must be consistent with a Party's obligations under the Treaty.

* * * *

Paragraph 4 stipulates that the Annex shall form an integral part of the Treaty.

Annex

U.S. bilateral investment treaties allow for exceptions to national and MFN treatment, where the Parties' domestic regimes do not afford national and MFN treatment, or where treatment in certain sectors or matters is negotiated in and governed by other agreements. Future derogations from the national treatment obligations of the Treaty are generally permitted only in the sectors or matters listed in the Annex, pursuant to Article II(2), and must be made on an MFN basis unless otherwise specified therein.

During a review of the Treaty in preparation for its submittal to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification, the Parties determined that there was an ambiguity in the Annex. This ambiguity reflected a misunderstanding regarding whether Azerbaijan had taken an exception from its national and MFN treatment obligation for insurance services. To resolve this ambiguity, the Parties agreed in an exchange of notes to amend the Treaty. Specifically, as amended, the Annex now takes an explicit exception from the parties' respective national and MFN treatment obligations for insurance services, and in so doing, removes a U.S. commitment to limit its exception for insurance services. The Annex, as amended, is further described below.

Under a number of statutes, many of which have a long historical background, the U.S. federal government or States may not necessarily treat investments of nationals or companies of Azerbaijan as they do U.S. investments or investments from a third country. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Annex list the sectors or matters subject to U.S. exceptions.

The U.S. exceptions from its national treatment obligation are: atomic energy; customhouse brokers; licenses for broadcast, common carrier, or aeronautical radio stations; COMSAT; subsidies or grants, including government-supported loans, guarantees, and insurance; State and local measures exempt from Article 1102 of the North American Free Trade Agreement pursuant to Article 1108 thereof; and landing of submarine cables.

The U.S. exceptions from its national and MFN treatment obligation are: fisheries; air and maritime transport, and related activities; banking, insurance, securities, and other financial services; and one-way satellite transmissions of Direct-to-Home (DTH) and Direct Broadcasting Satellite (DBS) television services and of digital audio services.

The Treaty is the first to include a U.S. exception from its national and MFN treatment obligation for one-way satellite transmission of DTH and DBS television services and of digital audio services. This exception was added to the prototype BIT following conclusion of the 1997 WTO Basic Telecommunications Services Agreement to be consistent with the U.S. position taken with respect to that agreement. The Treaty is the first BIT negotiated after conclusion of the 1997 WTO Basic Telecommunications Services Agreement.

Paragraph 3 of the Annex lists Azerbaijan's exceptions from its national treatment obligation, which are: ownership of land, its subsoil, water, plant and animal life, and other natural resources; ownership of real estate (during the transition period to a market economy); ownership or control of television and radio broadcasting and other forms of mass media; air transportation; preparation of stocks and bond notes issued by Azerbaijan; fisheries; and construction of pipelines for transportation of hydrocarbons.

Paragraph 4 of the Annex lists Azerbaijan's exceptions from its national and MFN treatment obligation, which are: banking, insurance, securities, and other financial services.

As described above, Article II states the general obligation of the Parties to accord national and MFN treatment to covered investments except in those sectors or with respect to the matters specified in the Annex. Neither the United States nor Azerbaijan took an exception in their respective Annex entries with respect to all leasing of minerals or pipeline rights-of-way on government lands. Accordingly, this Treaty affects the implementation of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act (MLLA) (30 U.S.C. 181 et seq.) and 10 U.S.C. 7435, regarding Naval Petroleum Reserves, with respect to nationals and companies of Azerbaijan. The Treaty provides for resort to binding international arbitration to resolve disputes, rather than denial of mineral rights or rights to naval petroleum shares to investors of the other Party, as is the current process under the statute. U.S. domestic remedies, would, however, remain available for use in conjunction with the Treaty's provisions.

The MLLA and 10 U.S.C. 7435 direct that a foreign investor be denied access to leases for minerals on on-shore federal lands, leases of land within the Naval Petroleum and Oil Shale Reserves, and rights-of-way for oil or gas pipelines across on-shore federal lands, if U.S. investors are denied access to similar or like privileges in the foreign country.

Azerbaijan's extension of national treatment in these sectors will fully meet the objectives of the MLLA and 10 U.S.C. 7435. Azerbaijan was informed during negotiations that, were it to include this sector in its list of treatment exemptions, the United States would (consistent with the MLLA and 10 U.S.C. 7435) exclude the leasing of minerals or pipeline rights-of-way on Government lands from the national and MFN treatment obligations of this Treaty.

b. Argentina

On January 19, 1993, President George H.W. Bush transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Argentine Republic Concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investment, with Protocol, signed at Washington on November 14, 1991, and an amendment to the Protocol effected by an exchange of notes at Buenos Aires on August 24 and November 6, 1992. The treaty is reprinted in 31 I.L.M. 124 (1992).

In his letter of transmittal, the President observed that the Treaty was the first bilateral investment treaty with a Latin American country to be transmitted to the Senate since the announcement of his Enterprise for the Americas Initiative in June 1990. He noted that "[t]he treaty's standstill and rollback of Argentina's trade-distorting performance requirements are precedent-setting steps in opening markets for U.S. exports. In this regard, as well as in its approach to dispute settlement, the treaty will serve as a model for our negotiations with other South American countries."

The accompanying January 13, 1993, report of the Department of State submitting the treaty to the President for transmittal and included in the transmittal documents, S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–2 (1993), is excerpted below. See also 87 Am. J. Int'l L. 433 (1993).

* * * *

The bilateral investment treaty (BIT) with Argentina represents an important milestone in the BIT program. . . . Argentina, like many Latin American countries, has long subscribed to the Calvo Doctrine, which requires that aliens submit disputes arising in a country to that country's local courts. The conclusion of this treaty, which contains an absolute right to international arbitration of investment disputes, removes U.S. investors from the restrictions of the Calvo Doctrine and should help pave the way for similar agreements with other Latin American states.

* * * *

As does the model BIT, the Argentina treaty allows sectoral exceptions to national and MFN treatment, as set forth in [the] protocol to the treaty. The U.S. exceptions are designed to protect governmental regulatory interests and to accommodate the derogations from national treatment and, in some cases, MFN treatment in existing state or federal law.

Sectors and matters which the U.S. excepts from national treatment are air transportation; ocean and coastal shipping; banking; insurance; energy and power production; custom house brokers; ownership and operation of broadcast or common carrier radio and television stations; ownership of real property; ownership of shares in the Communications Satellite Corporation; the provision of common carrier telephone and telegraph services; the provision of submarine cable services; and use of land and natural resources. The United States also reserves the right to make or maintain limited exceptions to national treatment with respect to certain programs involving government grants, loans, and insurance.

U.S. exceptions from both national and MFN treatment which are based on reciprocity are mining on the public domain; maritime services and maritime- related services; and primary dealership in United States government securities.

The Argentine exceptions to national treatment are real estate in the Border Areas; air transportation; shipbuilding; nuclear energy centers; uranium mining; insurance; and fishing. "Mining" was included in Argentina's list of national treatment exceptions at the time the treaty was signed but was deleted by an amendment effected by exchange of notes August 24 and November 6, 1992. This will ensure that treaty protections will be extended to an additional sector of significant commercial interest to U.S. investors.

In no sectors of the Argentine economy are there restrictions on MFN treatment to be accorded to U.S. investments.

Regarding the obligation not to impose performance requirements, the Argentina treaty contains a protocol provision which recognizes that Argentina currently maintains performance requirements in the automotive industry. These performance requirements may not be intensified, and Argentina undertakes to exert its best efforts to eliminate them within the shortest possible period, and will ensure their elimination no later than eight years from the entry into force of the treaty. Pending such elimination, Argentina undertakes that these performance requirements shall not be applied in a manner that places existing investments at a competitive disadvantage to any new entrants in this industry.

Achieving such a roll-back of existing performance requirements is a landmark accomplishment and should serve as a model for agreements with other countries which maintain analogous requirements.

The treaty with Argentina addresses, for the first time in the U.S. BIT program, debt-equity conversion programs, under which an investor purchases debt of a country at a discount and receives local currency in an amount equivalent to the debt's face value. These programs normally require that the investor postpone repatriating the investment made with the local currency obtained in the conversion. Investors may choose to enter into such programs because they obtain more local currency than they otherwise would receive for a given amount of foreign exchange. The treaty's protocol provides that any deferral of transfers agreed to under debt-equity conversion programs would not be superseded by the treaty's guarantee of transfers without delay. This provision in the protocol was added at the suggestion of the United States. The United States has been generally supportive of debt-equity conversion programs as part of the overall solution to the debt problem and has considered them to be an important element in commercial bank financing programs which reduce debt and debt service.

c. Czechoslovakia

On October 22, 1991, the United States and Czechoslovakia signed a bilateral investment treaty, one of a number of such treaties signed with Central and Eastern European countries in the 1990s as those countries transitioned to market economies. On June 2, 1992, President George H.W. Bush transmitted the Treaty, Protocol and related exchange of letters to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. The treaty entered into force on December 19, 1992. After the breakup of Czechoslovakia in 1993, the treaty continued in effect for the successor states, the Czech Republic and Slovakia.

An excerpt from the letter from the report of the Department of State submitting the treaty to the President for transmittal to the Senate follows. See S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–31 (1992).

* * * *

This is the second U.S. treaty containing investment protections with a former Communist country of Central or East Europe, following the U.S.-Poland treaty concerning business and economic relations signed March 21, 1990. This Treaty will assist the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic (CSFR) in its transition to a market economy by creating favorable conditions for U.S. private investment, helping to attract such investment and, thus, strengthening the development of the private sector.

* * * *

The CSFR is privatizing many of its state-owned companies and decided that it could not ensure national treatment with respect to the privatization process. Therefore, in a related exchange of letters to the treaty, the CSFR states that prior approvals may be required when (i) U.S. nationals or companies acquire majority ownership of state companies, or (ii) U.S. nationals or companies acquire the equity interest of the CSFR in companies. The CSFR further undertakes to apply the approval process in a way not to discourage or prohibit U.S. investment, to accord U.S. investment MFN treatment in this process, and to consult with the U.S. within two years of the treaty's entry into force with a view to phasing out this approval requirement.

This treaty, consistent with the other model BITs, does not oblige a Party to extend to the other Party's investments the advantages accorded to third country investments by virtue of binding obligations that derive from full membership in a free trade area or customs union. The Protocol confirms that such investment-related obligations may arise from economic relationships that include free trade areas and customs unions, notwithstanding that these relationships include trade obligations as well.

The BIT with the CSFR provides that an investment dispute between a Party and a national or company, including a dispute involving an investment authorization or the interpretation of an investment agreement, may be submitted to international arbitration six months after the dispute arose. Exhaustion of local remedies is not required. The treaty identifies several procedures for arbitration, at the investor's option: the International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes ("ICSID"), upon CSFR adherence to the ICSID Convention; the ICSID Additional Facility; or ad hoc arbitration under the Arbitration Rules of the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL).

The BIT with the CSFR, as does the U.S.-Poland treaty, contains several provisions designed to resolve problems that U.S. business traditionally has faced in the centrally-controlled, non-market economies of Central and East Europe, and which may continue to impede U.S. investments during the transition to a market economy.

One such provision is a guarantee that nationals and companies of either Party receive non-discriminatory treatment with respect to an expanded and detailed list of activities associated with their investments. These include: access to registrations, licenses, and permits; access to financial institutions and credit markets; access to their funds held in financial institutions; the importation and installation of business equipment; advertising and the conduct of market studies; the appointment of commercial representatives; direct marketing; access to public utilities; and access to raw materials. The right to non-discriminatory treatment in these activities requires that the CSFR grant U.S. nationals and companies treatment no less favorable than that granted to enterprises that remain under state ownership or control.

The treaty also provides, in a related exchange of letters, that the CSFR will designate an entity to assist U.S. nationals and companies overcome problems relating to bureaucracy and lack of knowledge. The entity's tasks will include providing up-to-date information on business and investment regulations, collecting and disseminating information regarding investment projects and financing, and coordinating with the CSFR agencies, at all levels, to facilitate U.S. investment.

3. OPIC Investment Incentive Agreements

The Overseas Private Investment Corporation ("OPIC") was established as a development agency of the U.S. government in 1971. See 22 U.S.C. § 2191. OPIC, which operates on a self-sustaining basis, "helps U.S. businesses invest overseas, fosters economic development in new and emerging markets, complements the private sector in managing the risks associated with foreign direct investment, and supports U.S. foreign policy." See www.opic.gov. OPIC supports, insures, and finances U.S. investment projects in eligible countries that are financially sound, promise significant benefits to the development of the host country, and foster private initiative and competition. As of the end of 1999, OPIC supported investment projects in some 140 emerging and developing markets. See OPIC, 1999 Annual Report. Pursuant to statutory authority, the United States generally enters into bilateral investment incentive agreements with individual foreign governments in order for OPIC to operate insurance and guaranty programs covering American private investment in signatory countries. These executive agreements contain provisions for the subrogation of the U.S. government or OPIC to the rights of investors who may be compensated for losses arising out of OPIC coverage, and for international arbitration between the United States and the foreign government of issues of public international law arising out of such coverage, including the question of the amount of compensation required in the case of expropriation. See also discussion of OPIC agreement with UNMIK, Chapter 17.B.3.b.(2).

a. Agreement with Russia

During the 1990s, OPIC signed a number of agreements to begin operations in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Republics, as those economies transitioned to free markets. In remarks offered at the United States-Russia Business Summit on June 17, 1992, in Washington, D.C., President George H.W. Bush explained the role that OPIC investment incentive agreements played in U.S. support for the transition of Russia to a free market economy.

President Bush's remarks, excerpted below, are available at http://bushlibrary.tamu.edu/research/papers/1992/92061700.html.

. . . [M]y message to this conference is simple: Neither Government programs nor multilateral assistance is going to get this job done. Neither of those can do it. Private sector participation in the economies of Russia and the other states, especially involvement by American business, is critical to the success of Russia's bold venture into free markets. And that participation must be on a vast scale, measured in billions of dollars, for the challenge to be met.

To that end, I'm pleased to announce that . . . OPIC is going to have an agreement between the U.S. and Russia, and that one enters into force today. This agreement's going to permit OPIC to provide investment insurance to American private investors. It's also going to provide additional financing and investor services for joint ventures in other products in the Federation. With OPIC and Ex-Im, everyone wins. Russia can tap into the ingenuity of American business in our capital goods, our know-how, and our technology, which are indeed the best in the entire world. In my view that help will enable Russia to develop its food and health sectors, recover its energy resources, privatize state industries, and convert military plants to civilian production.

b. Amended agreement with the German Democratic Republic

The United States had negotiated an investment incentive agreement in 1990 under which OPIC would operate in eastern Germany with the German Democratic Republic ("GDR"), but that agreement had not entered into force at the time the GDR was united with the Federal Republic of Germany ("FRG"). Upon reunification, necessary amendments were effected through an exchange of notes verbale in 1991. The notes confirmed the terms of the agreement negotiated with the GDR and provided that "[t]he OPIC Agreement shall be applicable in the territory of the former German Democratic Republic and Berlin (East)," with conforming amendments. The agreement entered into force on August 9, 1991. The text of the U.S. note is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

c. Agreements with the Palestine Liberation Organization for the Benefit of the Palestinian Authority and with Israel

On September 12, 1994, Ruth R. Harkin, President and Chief Executive Officer of OPIC, signed agreements on encouragement of investment with both the PLO for the benefit of the Palestinian Authority and with Israel. Agreement on Encouragement of Investment Between the United States of America and the Palestine Liberation Organization for the Benefit of the Palestinian Authority Pursuant to the Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area and Agreement on Encouragement of Investment Between the United States of America and Israel. Article I of each agreement provided that the term "Area" as used in the agreement means "areas for which arrangements are being established for Palestinian interim self-government, as set forth in Articles I and IV of the Declaration of Principles [on Interim Self-Government Arrangements, signed in Washington, D.C. on September 13, 1993.]" See Chapter 17.A.2.b.(2) and (4).

Article 5 of the OPIC-PLO agreement provided:

> (a) The PLO shall ensure that the Palestinian Authority acts in compliance with the terms of this Agreement.
> (b) The PLO shall seek to include in the Agreement establishing the Palestinian Council pursuant to the Declaration of Principles a provision continuing the provisions of this agreement in force and effect throughout the interim period provided for in the Declaration of Principles.

Article 5 of the OPIC-Israel agreement provided:

> The Government of the State of Israel shall agree in response to a request by the PLO to include in the Agreement establishing the Palestinian Council pursuant to the Declaration of Principles a provision continuing the provisions of this agreement in force and effect throughout the interim period provided for in the Declaration of Principles.

Article 6 of each agreement provided as follows:

> (a) This Agreement shall enter into force when signed by both Parties.
> (b) This Agreement shall be carried out consistent with the framework of the Declaration of Principles and its current and future implementing agreements to the full extent the [Palestinian Authority and its successors] [Israel] exercise authority relevant to this Agreement in the Area.
> (c) This Agreement shall continue in force until the end of the interim period provided for in the Declaration of Principles unless terminated by the Issuer by providing written notice to the Palestinian Authority or its successor. After expiration or termination of this Agreement its provisions shall, with respect to Investment Support provided while the Agreement was in force, remain in force so long as such Investment Support remains outstanding, but in no case longer than twenty years after expiration of the Agreement.

4. OECD Multilateral Agreement on Investment Negotiations

Between 1995 and 1998, the United States and other member countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development ("OECD") engaged in negotiations that attempted to create an international treaty that would provide a broad multilateral framework for international investment – the Multilateral Agreement on Investment ("MAI"). The objective was to produce an agreement with high standards for investment regimes and investment protection, and with effective dispute settlement procedures. Documents related to the negotiation of the MAI are available at www1.oecd.org/daf/mai/toc.htm.

Excerpted below is testimony delivered by Assistant Secretary of State for Economic and Business Affairs Alan Larson, on March 6, 1998, to the U.S. House of Representatives International Relations Committee, Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade. The testimony explained the standards outlined in the draft MAI, and U.S. policy concerns and objectives in reaching any final agreement.

The full text of the testimony is available at 9 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 3 at 30 (April 1998), http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

The fundamental principle underlying this and other investment agreements is the principle of non-discrimination. Such agreements do not generally call into question the sovereign right of governments to regulate as long as regulation does not single out or discriminate against investors based on their nationality.

Developing an international framework for treatment of foreign investment is not our only objective in the MAI. Another primary objective is to ensure that the MAI contributes to the achievement of our goal of fostering stronger global efforts to protect the environment, to respect internationally recognized core labor standards and to achieve sustainable development. Many important issues must be resolved, however, before we will have an agreement that will achieve these objectives.

The basic architecture of the MAI follows the familiar lines of the forty-one Bilateral Investment Treaties that American administrations have negotiated since the mid-eighties and of the investment chapter of the North American Free Trade Agreement. We are, of course, seeking to make improvements wherever we can. The main features of the MAI are expected to include;

—non-discrimination (the better of national or most-favored-nation treatment) for our investment abroad and the application of these principles not only after an investment is established but also when an investor is seeking to establish investments;

—disciplines on performance requirements that distort trade and investment;

—freedom to make any investment-related transfers, such as profits, capital, royalties and fees, whether into or out of the country where the investment takes place;

—international law standards for expropriation and compensation, consistent with U.S. legal principles and practice; and —access to international arbitration for disputes between Parties and also for individual investors when they suffer specific harm from alleged breaches of the agreement.

We are negotiating with other members of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. Our negotiating partners include twenty nine advanced countries of Europe, Asia and North America, together with the European Union. Taken together, these countries are the largest sources of, and the largest destinations for, flows of foreign investment. The OECD has a long track record of dealing with investment issues, as well as the broader social and environmental issues that all modern economies must address. OECD countries tend to have high labor standards and good records on environmental protection.

While OECD countries provide an important critical mass for a multilateral investment agreement, we do not support a closed arrangement. Rather, the agreement will be open for accession by other countries willing and able to accept its obligations.

A number of developing and transition economies are following the negotiations closely and some have indicated an interest in being charter members. Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Hong Kong, and Slovakia are observers, while Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania have also indicated their interest in acceding to the MAI.

From the beginning, the United States has insisted that we will not support a MAI that does not result in a satisfactory balance of commitments and meaningful improvements in the access of American firms to foreign markets. At this time, we are unsatisfied with the commitments on the table. Some of our partners are seeking ambiguous and sweeping carve-outs, including proposals by the EU for a carve-out for "Regional Economic Integration Organizations" and proposals by several countries for a general carve-out for cultural industries. We also have significant objections to country specific exceptions requested by many of our negotiating partners. Dramatic improvements will be necessary, and this can come only through careful study and negotiation.

Negotiators also need to give detailed attention to provisions of the agreement dealing with regulatory and enforcement issues. From the beginning, the U.S. delegation has argued that the provisions of this proposed agreement simply cannot interfere with normal, non-discriminatory regulatory activities in such areas as health, safety and the environment. In particular, we want to ensure that the expropriation article of the MAI cannot be used inappropriately to challenge regulatory decisions. Other countries, initially skeptical of our proposals, are now more receptive. Hard work will be required to translate this receptivity into satisfactory legal text.

The U.S. is one of the most open economies in the world and generally places few restrictions on foreign investment. Thus, we have little to fear from new multilateral rules. Nevertheless, we are determined to protect existing measures where we may wish, for important policy reasons, to reserve our right to discriminate or otherwise deviate from our MAI commitments.

We have, for example, taken exceptions to protect existing non-conforming measures at the state and local level. We have proposed other exceptions consistent with those we took in NAFTA and take in our Bilateral Investment Treaties (BITs). We have been careful to preserve our freedom of maneuver in the future in such areas as programs to support minorities. We have also proposed U.S. exceptions for subsidies and government procurement; these would protect future as well as existing programs which discriminate against foreign investors. However, these last two are areas where our trading partners hope for greater U.S. commitments.

Like our BITs and the investment chapter of NAFTA, the MAI envisions provisions for state-to-state and investor-state dispute settlement. Though rarely used in these agreements, dispute settlement provisions provide an important tool of last resort for U.S. business, especially in countries where legal protections and court systems are not well developed. This may have growing importance as MAI membership expands beyond the OECD members.

It is important to keep the dispute settlement issue in perspective. The U.S. has strong constitutional provisions and an effective court system that provide important protections to foreign investors. The U.S. has a good record of honoring its international commitments. No arbitration cases have been brought against the United States under our BITs or under the NAFTA investment chapter.

We are sensitive, however, to the fact that this is a multilateral agreement which would include our major investment partners. In the months ahead, we will take particular care to ensure that the provisions of the agreement are fully consistent with U.S. practice and are sufficiently precise to minimize the likelihood that they would be interpreted in unintended ways.

With respect to the interests of state and local governments, as they requested in the case of the NAFTA, we intend that our states and localities not be responsible for responding to complaints about treatment alleged to be contrary to the obligations of the MAI. If such cases were to arise, the federal government would stand in to defend the case.

The Administration believes a well-designed MAI has the potential to advance American values in such areas as environmental protection and internationally recognized core labor standards. The OECD Secretariat has assembled considerable evidence suggesting that, as a general rule, foreign investment has a favorable impact on environment and labor standards abroad. Certainly, American companies generally take their high standards with them when they operate abroad. In addition, OECD nations have developed one of the few multilateral codes for business and these Guidelines for Multinational Enterprise are going to be associated with the MAI agreement.

The United States has made a series of proposals to strengthen the environmental provisions of the MAI. These proposals affirm the legitimacy of regulation to protect health, safety, and environment as long as it is otherwise consistent with the agreement. Additional proposals recognize the right of each Party to establish its own levels of domestic environmental protection and encourage environmental impact assessments for proposed investments involving a governmental action which is likely to have a significant adverse impact on health or the environment.

In addition, we have proposed language to preserve our right to regulate in general. For example, we have proposed language that further explains why the questions of national and most-favored-nation treatment need to be judged by comparing investors or investments that are "in like circumstances." We also have proposed language on transparency to provide for the verification of information to ensure compliance with a Party's laws and regulations. We are studying other proposals to further strengthen protection of the environment.

The United States is also giving attention to provisions that will be important to U.S. workers. In addition to the OECD Guidelines on Multinational Enterprises, we are seeking an affirmation of support for internationally-recognized core labor standards.

MAI negotiators agree that parties to the MAI should not engage in a "race to the bottom" by lowering their health, safety and environmental standards, or retreat from their support for internationally recognized core labor standards, in order to attract an investment. There will need to be meaningful commitments in these areas. This is an exceptionally challenging topic and developing the best approach will take time and will require consultation with interested constituencies. OECD countries, however, broadly share U.S. values in these areas and the OECD has a long tradition of dealing with environmental and labor concerns. For these reasons, this negotiation provides a good opportunity to tackle a set of issues that our country simply must confront as we move into an ever more globalized economy.

Over the past several years, developing countries have become more interested in and receptive to foreign investment. They recognize the benefits of foreign investment to their economies and people. They know that private foreign investment flows now substantially outpace foreign assistance funds. The interest of developing countries in attracting foreign investment can be seen in the explosion of bilateral investment treaties globally since the beginning of the 1990s, from 435 in 1990 to some 1300 today. Investment discussions in UNCTAD, the WTO, APEC and the FTAA are all looking to the MAI as a model for multilateral rules. Several of the transition and advanced developing economies have expressed interest in acceding to the MAI, including the five observers and the Baltics. The value of an MAI will be significantly advanced if a wider group of countries adhere to its provisions.

In order to ensure that any non-OECD signatories of the MAI meet basic environmental and labor standards, we have suggested the possibility of "readiness criteria." These criteria would indicate the ability of new members to the agreement to meeting their commitments on labor and environment. We are studying what type of criteria might be appropriate.

In April 1998 the negotiations produced a draft consolidated text and commentary. Following a six-month hiatus in negotiations, on October 14, 1998, French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin announced that France would not resume negotiations in the OECD framework and suggested that the framework for a new negotiation should be the WTO. In remarks to the National Assembly of that date, Prime Minister Jospin identified four conditions that France had set in February 1998 as a basis for continuing negotiations and that led to this decision: (1) inclusion of an exception to MAI disciplines for investments in "cultural" sectors; (2) the need to address satisfactorily, within the MAI mechanism, extraterritorial U.S. laws that France refused to apply on French soil in other contexts and discussions; (3) respect for European integration processes; and (4) inclusion of appropriate social (labor) and environmental norms.

In his October 23, 1998, statement as chairman of the OECD Executive Committee in Special Session, Under Secretary of State Stuart Eizenstat reported the delegates' views as to the MAI, as follows:

> There was a consensus among delegates on the need for and value of a multilateral framework for investment. The goal should still be sought. At the same time, delegates noted that significant concerns have been raised during consultations on the MAI. They include issues of sovereignty, protection of labour rights and environment, culture and other important matters.
>
> Delegates agreed on the importance of devoting additional time to take stock of these concerns and to assess how to accomplish the goal we all share of developing a multilateral framework of rules for investment. In further consultations, it will be important to broaden the participation of non-OECD member countries and to engage in further discussions with representatives of civil society (business, labour, non-governmental organizations, consumer and other groups). These consultations should proceed with a view to deciding how best to reach the shared goal of a multilateral framework for investment and to deal effectively with the concerns that have been expressed.

OECD News Release, Paris, October 23, 1998. Available at www1.oecd.org/media/release/nw98–101a.htm.

The United States worked hard but unsuccessfully to maintain negotiations of the MAI in the OECD. The May 1999 OECD Secretary-General's Report to Ministers on International Investment, prepared by the OECD Committee on Investment and Multinational Enterprises ("CIME"), stated that "[n]egotiations are no longer taking place."

5. Debt Relief

a. Agreement with Vietnam regarding debt consolidation and rescheduling

As discussed in Chapter 9. A.2.j., on July 11, 1995, President William J. Clinton announced the normalization of diplomatic relations with Vietnam. Normalization included the lifting of trade barriers in response to cooperation from Vietnam on POW/MIA and other issues. On April 7, 1997, U.S. Secretary of the Treasury Robert E. Rubin and Vietnam Finance Minister Nguyen Sinh Hung signed a bilateral agreement entitled "Consolidation and Rescheduling of Certain Debts Owed to, Guaranteed by, or Insured by the United States and AID." The agreement committed Vietnam to repay the former government of South Vietnam's debt of $146 million. Sanctions imposed under the Brook Amendment (see, e.g., Foreign Operations, Export Financing and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1995, Pub. L. No. 103–306, § 512, and similar provisions enacted annually), which bars assistance to countries in arrears on official debt repayments, were lifted on June 23, 1997, when the debt rescheduling agreement came into effect. A press release from the Department of the Treasury's Office of Public Affairs, excerpted below, explains the significance of the agreement.

This agreement, in part, implements the multilateral debt agreement Vietnam reached with the Paris Club of Western creditor countries in December 1993. As part of the Paris Club agreement, Vietnam acknowledged its responsibility for the economic and social debts of the Republic of Vietnam—the government in the south prior to April 30, 1975. The Paris Club agreement called on government creditors to provide formal relief on overdue debt payments as of year-end 1993.

The bilateral agreement between Vietnam and the United States covers the entire amount of economic debt outstanding to the United States. The loans involved were made by the United States on concessional terms from 1960–1975 to support the development of economic infrastructure and to finance the importation of agricultural and other commodities by Vietnam. In addition, the United States extended about $1 billion in economic grants during the same period.

Regular payments under the agreement will begin in July and extend until the year 2019.

b. Use of U.S. Exchange Stabilization Fund: Mexican debt assistance

In 1994 Mexico experienced severe economic problems, and the peso was devalued by 32 percent in December 1994. In response, the United States took action to create a financial support package to stabilize the peso and avert a liquidity crisis, in order to ensure orderly exchange arrangements and a stable system of exchange rates. A key part of this financial support package was the use of the Treasury Department's Exchange Stabilization Fund ("ESF" or "Fund") to provide loans and credits to Mexico. A memorandum of March 2, 1995, prepared by the Office of Legal Counsel ("OLC"), U.S. Department of Justice, confirmed that the fund could be used for this purpose. Memorandum from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice, to Edward S. Knight, General Counsel, Department of the Treasury, March 2, 1995, re: Use Of The Exchange Stabilization Fund To Provide Loans And Credits To Mexico.

The full text of the OLC memorandum opinion, excerpted below (with footnotes omitted), is available at www.usdoj.gov/olc/esf2.htm.

On January 31, 1995, the President proposed to use the Treasury Department's Exchange Stabilization Fund (the "ESF" or the "fund") to provide $20 billion of loans and credits to Mexico as part of a financial support package for that country (the "support package"). On February 21, 1995, the Treasury Secretary (the "Secretary") signed a series of agreements with the Mexican government implementing the support package. . . . We would like to take this opportunity to set forth briefly the basis for our determination that your conclusion [that the President and the Secretary have the authority to use the ESF in connection with the support package] is correct.

I. Background

A. The Support Package

Under the support package, the loans and credits to Mexico from the ESF will take three forms: (i) short-term currency "swaps" through which Mexico will borrow U.S. dollars in exchange for Mexican pesos for 90 days; (ii) medium-term currency swaps through which Mexico will borrow U.S. dollars for up to five years; and (iii) guaranties through which the United States will back-up Mexico's obligations on government securities for up to ten years. The ESF loans and credits will supplement billions of dollars of financial assistance that will be provided to Mexico by the International Monetary Fund ("IMF") and other lenders. As a whole, the support package is intended to help Mexico resolve its serious economic problems, which, in turn, have resulted in a significant destabilization of the Mexican peso and have threatened to disrupt the international currency exchange system.

B. The ESF

The ESF was established by Congress in 1934 pursuant to section 10(a) of the Gold Reserve Act, which is now codified at 31 U.S.C. § 5302. The ESF "is under the exclusive control of the Secretary," whose use of the fund is "[s]ubject to approval by the President." Id. § 5302(a)(2). Initially, the statute provided that the ESF was to be used "[f]or the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar." Act of Jan. 30, 1934, ch. 6, § 10(a), 48 Stat. 337, 341 (1934). That is no longer the case. The provision governing the Secretary's use of the ESF now states:

Consistent with the obligations of the Government in the International Monetary Fund on orderly exchange arrangements and a stable system of exchange rates, the Secretary or an agency designated by the Secretary, with the approval of the President, may deal in gold, foreign exchange, and other instruments of credit and securities the Secretary considers necessary. However, a loan or credit to a foreign entity or government of a foreign country may be made for more than 6 months in any 12-month period only if the President gives Congress a written statement that unique or emergency circumstances require the loan or credit be for more than 6 months. 31 U.S.C. § 5302(b).

The first sentence of the current provision stems from 1976 amendments to section 10(a) of the Gold Reserve Act. Those amendments eliminated the requirement that the ESF be used "for the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar," and provided instead that the fund was to be used consistent with U.S. obligations in the IMF. See Pub. L. No. 94–564, 90 Stat. 2660, 2661 (1976). The second sentence of the current provision stems from a 1977 amendment to section 10(a) of the Gold Reserve Act. See Pub. L. No. 95–147, 91 Stat. 1227, 1229 (1977). The intention of that amendment was to ensure that longer-term lending from the ESF was limited to "unique or exigent circumstances."

II. Statutory Analysis

In carrying out the support package, the Secretary will be "deal[ing] in gold, foreign exchange, and other instruments of credit and securities" within the meaning of 31 U.S.C. § 5302. The first question in the statutory analysis is whether use of the ESF in connection with the support package is "[c]onsistent with the obligations of the Government in the International Monetary Fund on orderly exchange arrangements and a stable system of exchange rates." We believe that it is. Again, the stated purpose of the support package is to stabilize the value of the Mexican peso and prevent disruption of international currency exchange arrangements—which is entirely in keeping with U.S. obligations in the IMF. Moreover, since the statute states that the Secretary may use the ESF as he "considers necessary," it is up to the Secretary (subject to the President's approval) to decide when such action is consistent with U.S. obligations in the IMF. The Secretary's decisions in that regard "are final." 31 U.S.C. § 5302(a)(2). In short, in implementing the support package, the Secretary has exercised the discretion with which Congress has charged him.

The plain language of the statute also provides the President and the Secretary with the legal authority to use the ESF for the currency swaps of up to five years and the guaranties of up to ten years. The statute explicitly states that loans or credits with repayment terms of more than six months can be extended from the ESF "if the President gives Congress a written statement that unique or emergency circumstances require the loan or credit be for more than 6 months." When the support package was proposed on January 31, 1995, the President announced that he had determined that the financial crisis in Mexico constituted unique and emergency circumstances. The President made his announcement in a joint statement that he issued with the congressional leadership, who expressed their collective view that the use of the ESF in connection with the support package was both lawful and necessary [citing 31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 155 (Jan. 31, 1995)].

The authority of the President and the Secretary to use the ESF as a source of loans or credits of more than six months has been invoked once before in the years since the statute was amended in 1977 to provide expressly for such action. That came in 1982, when President Reagan, acting in response to an earlier instance of financial turmoil in Mexico, turned to the ESF to provide loans to Mexico with maturities of up to one-year. In accordance with the statutory requirements, President Reagan notified Congress in writing on September 8, 1982 that he had determined on August 24, 1982 that unique and exigent circumstances required that the ESF loan to Mexico have repayment terms in excess of six months. It is true that no prior precedents under the ESF involved loans or credits of maturity lengths and dollar amounts comparable to those at issue in the support package. That said, such use of the ESF is clearly authorized by the language of the statute.

We find it telling that when Congress was considering what eventually became the 1977 amendment to section 10(a) of the Gold Reserve Act, it apparently gave some thought to restricting use of the ESF to short-term lending exclusively so that the ESF would not compete with the IMF—which was seen as the primary vehicle for longer-term lending. In fact, a question to that effect was posed to a Treasury Department official during the course of a Senate Banking Committee hearing that explored, among other things, the relationship between lending under the ESF and lending under the IMF [citing Amendments of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on International Finance of the Senate Comm. on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 157 (1976)]. In response, the Treasury official stated:

> [A] statutory requirement that [the ESF] be used for short-term lending exclusively would not be appropriate and would unnecessarily impair U.S. flexibility, especially in unforeseen circumstances, in implementing our international monetary policy. . . . [I]t is conceivable that, in some instances, use of the ESF for a somewhat more extended period may be necessary. External factors (such as natural disasters, trade embargoes, unforeseen economic developments . . .) may lead a country which has obtained a short-term credit from the ESF to seek an extension of that credit. It is also conceivable that political assassination or other unanticipated catastrophic event might justify a longer extension of credit, and the possibility of ESF operations in such cases should not be excluded. In none of these cases would the ESF compete with the IMF, and in all of these cases it well may be in the U.S. interests to provide somewhat more extended ESF financing [Id. At 158].

That sentiment carried the day, and ultimately found its way into the statute through the 1977 amendment. The report of the Senate Banking Committee on what turned out be that amendment puts its succinctly:

> The Committee recognizes that there may be circumstances where longer-term ESF credits may be necessary, and the amendment provides for that possibility. But the Committee intends, and the amendment expressly provides, that such longer-term financing be provided only where there are unique or exigent circumstances. As indicated by Treasury, these would include natural disasters, trade embargoes, unforeseen economic developments abroad, political assassinations, or other catastrophic events. In none of these cases should the ESF compete with the IMF, however, and every effort should be made to bring all medium and longer-term financing within the framework of the IMF or other appropriate multi-lateral facilities.

The Mexican economic crisis would appear to be a prime example of the type of unique or exigent circumstances that the Senate Banking Committee had in mind when crafting the 1977 amendment: according to some observers, Mexico's financial troubles were exacerbated by the shocking assassinations in 1994 of two key Mexican political leaders and the unanticipated strife in the Chiapas region of Mexico. Furthermore, the support package appears to honor the Committee's admonition that longer-term use of the ESF not "compete" with the IMF. It is our understanding that the loans and credits from the ESF complement the substantial financial assistance that the IMF and other lenders are furnishing to Mexico. Indeed, the Treasury Department has worked closely with the IMF in fashioning the support package.

Finally, it is worth noting that Congress plays an important oversight role with respect to use by the President and the Secretary of the ESF for loans of more than six months. As the Senate Banking Committee described Congress' function, "[t]he requirement that the President report to the Congress on any such longer-term financing will provide the Congress with an opportunity to scrutinize such longer-term ESF credits and take appropriate steps to insure that they are consistent with U.S. interests and U.S. obligations under the IMF." In that role, Congress has, over the years, considered various proposals to cabin the authority of the President and the Secretary under the ESF statute. Those proposals have been repeatedly rejected, however. This history reflects the judgment of Congress that the President and the Secretary should retain the flexibility to use the ESF, as they consider necessary, to respond promptly to sudden and unexpected international financial crises that undermine the global currency exchange system and jeopardize vital U.S. economic interests.

D. INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY, INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY AND ELECTRONIC COMMERCE

1. WTO Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights

a. The Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights

As discussed in B.2., supra, on April 15, 1994, the United States joined other countries in concluding the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade ("GATT"). Among the multilateral WTO agreements that the United States became a party to as a result of the Uruguay Round was the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights, Annex 1C of the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization, signed in Marrakesh, Morocco on 15 April 1994 ("TRIPS Agreement"), reprinted in 33 I.L.M. 1197 (1994). The full text of the TRIPS Agreement can be found on the WTO website at www.wto.org.

Parties to the TRIPS Agreement must adhere to minimum standards of protection for intellectual property, offer such protections on a most-favored nation and national treatment basis, and submit to binding dispute resolution. A Council on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights monitors implementation of the TRIPS Agreement and provides a forum for WTO members to consult on intellectual property matters. In its 2000 Trade Policy Agenda and 1999 Annual Report to Congress, Chapter II at 116, USTR reviewed the first five years of the Council's existence and highlighted issues of 1999. The full text of the report, issued in March 2000, is available through the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative Press Office.

Status

The Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (the TRIPS Agreement) is a multilateral agreement that sets minimum standards of protection for copyrights and neighboring rights, trademarks, geographical indications, industrial designs, patents, integrated-circuit layout designs, and undisclosed information. Minimum standards are established by the TRIPS Agreement for the enforcement of intellectual property rights in civil actions for infringement and, at least in regard to copyright piracy and trademark counterfeiting, in criminal actions and actions at the border. The TRIPS Agreement requires as well that, with very limited exceptions, WTO Members must also provide national and most-favored-nation treatment to the nationals of other WTO Members in regard to the protection of intellectual property. In addition, the TRIPS Agreement is the first multilateral intellectual property agreement that is enforceable between governments through WTO dispute settlement provisions.

Although the TRIPS Agreement entered into force on January 1, 1995, most obligations are phased in based on a country's level of development (developed country Members were required to implement by January 1, 1996; developing country Members generally were to implement by January 1, 2000; and least-developed country Members must implement by January 1, 2006). The TRIPS Agreement also provides a general "standstill" obligation, and mandates that those Members that avail themselves of the transition period for providing patent protection for pharmaceuticals and agricultural chemicals must provide a "mailbox". This mailbox is for filing patent applications claiming pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical inventions and providing exclusive marketing rights for such products in certain circumstances. All Members were obligated to provide "most-favored-nation" and national treatment beginning January 1, 1996.

Assessment of the First Five Years of Operation

The TRIPS Agreement has yielded enormous benefits for a broad range of U.S. industries, including producers of motion pictures, sound recordings, software, books, magazines, pharmaceuticals, agricultural chemicals, and consumer goods; and individuals, including authors, artists, composers, performers, and inventors and other innovators. As mentioned above, the Agreement establishes minimum standards for protection and enforcement of intellectual property rights of all kinds and provides for dispute settlement in the event that a WTO Member fails to fulfill its obligations fully and in a timely fashion. Much of the credit for ensuring that the benefits of the TRIPS Agreement are realized by U.S. industries should be given to the operation of the TRIPS Council.

During 1997 and 1998, the TRIPS Council conducted reviews of the implementation of obligations by developed country Members.

* * * *

Of particular importance to U.S. intellectual property right holders was the review of the enforcement obligations of the Agreement. During this review, the United States drew special attention to obligations such as that contained in Article 41.1 which requires Members to ensure that enforcement procedures sufficient to permit effective action against acts of infringement were available. Such procedures must include expeditious remedies which constitute a deterrent to further infringement. The United States stressed it was impossible to get a complete picture of the situation in a Member country without understanding how its enforcement remedies were applied in practice. If the procedures provided in legislative texts were not available in practice, they could not be effective or have the deterrent effect required by the Agreement.

The review of the provisions of Article 27.3(b) of the TRIPS Agreement during 1999 provided an opportunity for the developed country Members to compile information on the ways in which they have implemented any exceptions to patentability authorized by that section. The synoptic table compiled by the WTO Secretariat from the information provided by Members demonstrated that there is considerable uniformity in the protection afforded plants and animals among those Members that have implemented their obligations, even though the manner in which that protection is provided varies. The description of various regimes for protecting plants and animals also could assist developing country Members that were considering the best method to implement their obligations. In addition, the review provided an opportunity for the United States, along with other WTO Members, to submit papers that form the basis of discussion during Council meetings, helping to clarify issues related to the protection of plants and animals.

During 1998 and 1999, the TRIPS Council considered the articles of the Agreement, in particular those related to copyright and neighboring rights, for which emerging electronic commerce would likely have the greatest implications. The Council submitted a report to the General Council, identifying those articles and noting that the subject might be pursued further. The United States submitted a paper, as part of the review, giving its views on the implications of electronic commerce for the TRIPS Agreement.

In the TRIPS Council meetings in 1999, the United States continued to press for full and timely implementation of the TRIPS Agreement by all WTO Members. In a number of instances where WTO Members have not implemented their obligations fully, the United States has employed the WTO dispute settlement system to secure compliance. Since the WTO was created, the United States has filed 13 complaints under WTO dispute settlement procedures to challenge foreign government practices affecting U.S. creative works and protection of U.S. intellectual property rights. In 7 of those cases, we have already obtained favorable results, either by obtaining a satisfactory settlement or by prevailing in WTO dispute settlement proceedings. We reached prompt settlements with Japan on protection of sound recordings, with Portugal and Pakistan on patent protection, with Sweden on enforcement of its intellectual property laws, and with Turkey on taxation of foreign films. We also got favorable results from WTO dispute settlement rulings against Canada on magazines and against India on exclusive marketing rights on pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products. The remaining 6 cases are still pending, although progress has been made over the last year. These achievements demonstrate that the WTO dispute settlement mechanism has already had a significant impact on our ability to protect the creative works of U.S. citizens.

A commitment to full and timely implementation of TRIPS obligations by all WTO Members was evident in a TRIPS Council recommendation to Ministers at Singapore "reaffirming the importance of full implementation of the TRIPS Agreement within the applicable transition periods" and stating that "each WTO Member will take appropriate steps to apply the provisions of the Agreement." However, a series of recommendations for extending the transition period for developing country Members' implementation were made prior to the 1999 Ministerial. In spite of such efforts, however, more than 26 developing country Members have already volunteered to undergo an implementation review in the TRIPS Council during the year 2000 and the Council Chairman is consulting with other developing country Members to establish the schedule for 2001.

Geographical Indications: In addition to reviewing the implementation of obligations of the Agreement by new Members including the Kyrgyz Republic and Latvia, the TRIPS Council reviewed the responses to a questionnaire reviewing, in depth, developed and newly acceding Members' implementation of their obligations under section 3 of Part II of the TRIPS Agreement, i.e., obligations dealing with geographical indications. To facilitate this review, the WTO Secretariat prepared a synoptic table of the information contained in the responses. This information greatly enhanced Members' negotiations in the Council, as provided for in Article 23.4, on the establishment of a multilateral system for notification and registration of geographical indications for wines and spirits, aimed at facilitating the protection of such geographical indications. The European Union submitted a proposal for such a system under which Members would notify the WTO of their geographical indications and other Members would have one year in which to oppose any such notified geographical indications. If not opposed, the notified geographical indications would be registered and all Members would be required to provide protection as required under Article 23. The United States, Canada, Chile and Japan introduced an alternative proposal under which Members would notify their geographical indications for wines and spirits for incorporation in a register available to all Members on the WTO website. Under this proposal, Members choosing to participate in the system would agree to consult the notifications made on the website when making decisions regarding registration of related trademarks or otherwise providing protection for geographical indications for wines and spirits. Implementation of this proposal would not place obligations on Members beyond those already provided under the TRIPS Agreement or place undue burdens on the WTO Secretariat. The Council discussed the two proposals during its meetings in 1999. This negotiation will continue in 2000.

Review of Current Exceptions to Patentability for Plants and Animals: The TRIPS Council also reviewed the provisions of Article 27.3(b) of the Agreement that permits Members to exclude from patentability plants and animals and essentially biological processes for producing plants and animals. Any Member including such exclusions in its patent law must ensure that micro-organisms and non-biological and microbiological processes are patentable. . . . During the discussion, the United States noted that the ability to patent micro-organisms and non-biological and microbiological processes, as well as plants and animals per se, has given rise to a whole new industry that has brought inestimable benefits in health care, agriculture, and protection of the environment. The United States submitted a paper giving its views of the importance of providing patent protection for plants and animals and responding to some of the concerns raised by other WTO Members. It is expected that the review will remain on the agenda of the TRIPS Council in 2000.

Implementation: The United States continued to pursue implementation questions with a number of developed countries, including Denmark, regarding its failure to provide provisional relief in civil enforcement proceedings, and Ireland, for its failure to amend its copyright law to comply with TRIPS. Ireland passed a number of amendments to its existing copyright law to resolve major problems and was working to enact a comprehensive revision of its copyright law by the end of 1999. The United States continued to pursue a dispute settlement case with Greece regarding its failure to take appropriate action to stop television broadcast piracy in that country and considerable progress has been made in eliminating such piracy on the airwaves. The United States initiated dispute settlement procedures with the European Communities regarding its failure to provide protection for certain geographical indications of other WTO Members. Another was filed against Canada regarding its failure to ensure that all inventions protected by patent in Canada on January 1, 1996 had a term of protection that did not end before a period of twenty years measured from the date on which the patent application was filed. (The details of these cases are discussed in the Dispute Settlement Body section.)

* * * *

b. TRIPS and public health (HIV/AIDS)

As the TRIPS Agreement came into force, the application of TRIPS obligations toward drug patent-holders in the circumstance of legitimate public health crises such as HIV/AIDS became a matter of concern. In response to these concerns, on December 1, 1999, the U.S. Trade Representative ("USTR") Charlene Barshefsky and Secretary of Health and Human Services ("HHS") Donna E. Shalala announced their intention to develop a "cooperative approach on health-related intellectual property matters to ensure that the application of U.S. trade law related to intellectual property remains sufficiently flexible to respond to legitimate public health crises."

A joint USTR-HHS press release of that date, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Recognizing that health emergencies may require special measures, USTR and HHS are working together to establish a process for analyzing and evaluating health issues that arise in the application of U.S. trade-related intellectual property law and policy. When a foreign government expresses concern that U.S. trade law related to intellectual property significantly impedes its ability to address a health crisis in that country, USTR will seek and give full weight to the advice of HHS regarding the health considerations involved. This process will permit the application of U.S. trade-related intellectual property law to remain sufficiently flexible to react to public health crisis brought to the attention of USTR. It will also ensure that the minimum standards of the WTO Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) are respected.

2. Multilateral Treaties Administered By the World Intellectual Property Organization

The World Intellectual Property Organization ("WIPO") is a specialized agency of the United Nations that promotes the protection of intellectual property. WIPO administers a number of multilateral treaties on intellectual property to which the United States is a party. Additional information on WIPO can be found on its website at www.wipo.int. In the 1990s, the United States signed several other important multilateral treaties on intellectual property rights under the auspices of WIPO, discussed below.

a. Trademark Law Treaty

On October 28, 1994, the United States signed the Trademark Law Treaty, done at Geneva, October 27, 1994. The President transmitted the Trademark Law Treaty to the United States Senate on January 29, 1998 for advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–35 (1998). The Senate gave its advice and consent June 26, 1998. Legislation to implement obligations to be undertaken by the United States pursuant to the Trademark Law Treaty was enacted in the Trademark Law Treaty Implementation Act of 1998 ("TLTIA"), Pub. L. No. 105–330, 112 Stat. 3064, signed into law on October 30, 1998. TLTIA made several changes to the Trademark Act of 1946, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1051 et seq. The treaty entered into force for the United States on August 12, 2000.

The full text of the treaty can be found on the WIPO website, at www.wipo.int/treaties/en/index.html. Further information on TLTIA is available on the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office website, at www.uspto.gov/web/offices/com/sol/tmlwtrty/index.html.

Excerpted below is the report of the Department of State submitting the treaty to President William J. Clinton for transmittal to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. See S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–35.

The President: I have the honor to submit to you, with a view to its transmission to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification, the Trademark Law Treaty (hereinafter, the "Treaty") done at Geneva, October 27, 1994, with Regulations. The Treaty was signed by the United States on October 28, 1994. The Treaty will simplify the protection of trademarks and service marks for U.S. trademark owners by eliminating unnecessary formalities.

The Treaty entered into force on August 1, 1996. Seven countries are currently party to it. The provisions of the Treaty will make it easier for U.S. trademark owners to protect their valuable trademarks in those countries that become party to the Treaty. The Treaty's most important contribution is that it eliminates many of the formal requirements that now exist in the trademark application and registration maintenance process of many countries. Those requirements cause considerable expense and delay for trademark owners. The Treaty also provides assurances to trademark applicants and to holders of trademark applications and registrations that a document filed by the trademark owner or his/her attorney, if completed properly, will be accepted by the trademark office of every member State.

In addition, the Treaty will bring a number of practical improvements to the trademark application and registration maintenance process.

Applicants will be able to file trademark applications for protection under multiple goods or services classifications; these applications will mature into multiple class registrations.

All member States will be obliged to accept applications for and register service marks as well as goods marks.

Trademark owners and applicants will be able to record a change, such as a change of address, assignment of trademark rights, or appointment of a representative, for all of a trademark's relevant applications or registrations, by filing a single request.

With two minor exceptions, applicants and registrants will no longer need to undertake the often cumbersome process of legalizing signatures.

Further, the duration of the initial period of registration and of each renewal period will be ten years.

b. Copyright Treaty and Performances and Phonograms Treaty

On July 28, 1997, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification (1) the WIPO Copyright Treaty and (2) the WIPO Performances and Phonograms Treaty. Both treaties were done at Geneva on December 20, 1996, at the conclusion of the WIPO Diplomatic Conference on Certain Copyright and Neighboring

Rights Questions (December 2–20, 1996). S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–17. The Senate gave advice and consent to ratification on October 21, 1998. 145 CONG. REC. S12,985 (Nov. 12, 1998). The treaties entered into force by their terms following deposit of thirty instruments of ratification or accession; for the Copyright Treaty this occurred March 6, 2002, for the Performances and Phonograms Treaty on May 20, 2002. See also 92 Am. J. Int'l L. 44, 54 (1998)

> ensure that international copyright rules will keep pace with technological change, thus affording important protection against piracy for U.S. rights holders in the areas of music, film, computer software, and information products. The terms of the Treaties are thus consistent with the United States policy of encouraging other countries to provide adequate and effective intellectual property protection.

The President also noted that legislation, which was being prepared, was required to implement certain provisions of the treaties and to ensure that parties to them were granted, under U.S. copyright law, the rights to which they were entitled under the treaties. The accompanying report of the Department of State, dated July 22, 1997, and included in S. Treaty Doc. 105–17, is excerpted below.

Provisions common to the treaties

The Treaties respond to the challenges of protecting works in the realm of digital technology. In that regard both Treaties oblige parties to ensure that rights holders have the exclusive right to control on-demand transmissions of works to members of the public (Article 8, Copyright Treaty; Article 14, Performances and Phonograms Treaty). Both Treaties oblige parties to provide adequate legal protection against the circumvention of technologically based security measures, and to apply appropriate and effective remedies against protection-defeating devices or services (Article 11, Copyright Treaty; Article 18, Performances and Phonograms Treaty). Both require the provision of effective remedies against the knowing removal or alteration of electronic rights-management information without authority, and against the related acts of distribution, importation for distribution and communication to the public with knowledge that such information has been removed or altered (Article 12, Copyright Treaty; Article 19, Performances and Phonograms Treaty).

Both Treaties oblige parties to adopt the measures necessary to ensure the application of the Treaties and to ensure that enforcement procedures are available under the parties' laws so as to permit effective action against any act of infringement of rights covered by the Treaties, including provision of expeditious remedies to prevent infringements and remedies which constitute a deterrent to further infringements (Article 14, Copyright Treaty; Article 23, Performances and Phonograms Treaty).

In addition to these substantive obligations, each Treaty provides that not only WIPO member States, but also the European Community, as well as similar intergovernmental organizations, may become party to the Treaty. Admission of intergovernmental organizations other than the European Community will be subject to a decision by an Assembly created to administer each Treaty. To be eligible, such an organization must declare that it is competent in respect of, and have its own legislation binding on all its member States on, matters covered by the Treaty (Article 17, Copyright Treaty; Article 26, Performances and Phonograms Treaty).

Each party that is a State has a vote in the Assembly; intergovernmental organizations do not have an independent vote. However, an intergovernmental organization is permitted to participate in a vote on behalf of its member States that are party to the Treaty. There is no allowance for "split voting"; either an organization votes on behalf of all member State parties, or each member State party votes individually (Article 15(3), Copyright Treaty; Article 24(3), Performances and Phonograms Treaty).

In order to ensure that a party to one of the Treaties has recourse in the event of a dispute or non-compliance with treaty obligations by a party that is an intergovernmental organization or a member State of such an organization, each Treaty provides that each contracting party bears all the obligations under the Treaty (Article 18, Copyright Treaty; Article 27, Performances and Phonograms Treaty).

Each Treaty enters into force three months after thirty instruments of ratification or accession by states have been deposited with the Director General of WIPO. This number makes it impossible for the European Community and its member States to be in a position to control the Assembly (Article 20, Copyright Treaty; Article 29, Performances and Phonograms Treaty).

WIPO Copyright Treaty

The WIPO Copyright Treaty provides in Article 1 that it is a special agreement within the meaning of Article 20 of the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works, revised at Paris, July 24, 1971, as amended (the "Berne Convention"), to which the United States is a party (Article 1). Article 20 of the Berne Convention provides that the states party to the Berne Convention reserve the right to enter into special agreements among themselves insofar as the special agreements grant to authors more extensive rights than those granted under the Berne Convention.

The Copyright Treaty (Article 1(4)) requires that parties comply with the substantive obligations (Articles 1–21 and the Appendix) of the Berne Convention. Like the Berne Convention, the Copyright Treaty provides (Article 3) that parties may not impose formalities on the nationals of other parties as a condition for claiming protection under the Treaty.

In Articles 4 and 5, the Copyright Treaty clarifies, along the lines of Article 10 of the World Trade Organization Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights done at Marrakesh, April 15, 1994 ("TRIPS Agreement"), that computer programs are protected as literary works under the Berne Convention, and that original compilations of data (databases) that incorporate copyrightable authorship are also protected.

The Copyright Treaty (Article 6) explicitly recognizes a right of distribution for all categories of works (which, under the Berne Convention and the TRIPS Agreement is granted explicitly only for cinematographic works).

As does the TRIPS Agreement, the Copyright Treaty (Article 7) provides for an exclusive post-first-sale right of rental for computer programs, cinematographic works and works embodied in phonograms; parties need not implement the rental right in respect of computer programs where the program itself is not the object of rental, and in the case of cinematographic works where rental does not lead to widespread copying impairing the right of reproduction.

The Copyright Treaty (Article 8) extends to all categories of works the right of communication to the public (which under the Berne Convention and the TRIPS Agreement is required only to a varying extent for different categories of works), and clarifies that this right covers making works available to the public by wire or wireless means, through an interactive, on-demand transmission.

The Copyright Treaty (Article 9) extends the term of protection of photographic works to 50 years after the death of the author, as is already the case for all other categories of literary works. It does so by stating that parties shall not apply the provisions of Article 7(4) of the Berne Convention, which allows parties to limit the term of protection for such works to a minimum term of twenty-five years from the making of the work.

The Copyright Treaty (Article 10) extends the application of the three-step test for exceptions established for the right of reproduction in Article 9(2) of the Berne Convention to all other rights (as in Article 13 of the TRIPS Agreement): limitations or exceptions to all rights may be made in certain special cases that do not conflict with a normal exploitation of the work and do not unreasonably prejudice the interests of the author.

The Copyright Treaty (Article 22) does not allow any reservations to the obligations it sets forth.

WIPO Performances and Phonograms Treaty

Several important provisions of the WIPO Performances and Phonograms Treaty offer responses to the challenges of digital technology for performances and phonograms in digital form in the Internet and similar electronic networks. The relevant definitions (phonogram, fixation, producer of a phonogram, publication, broadcasting, communication to the public) are broad enough to cover the requirements of digital technology (Article 2). "Moral rights" are provided under Article 5 for performers in respect of their live aural performances or performances fixed in phonograms (although these rights cover many kinds of modifications, they may be particularly relevant in the case of digital manipulations of performances fixed in phonograms). In Articles 10 and 14, this Treaty provides an exclusive right for both performers and producers of phonograms to authorize making available their fixed performances and phonograms, respectively, by wire or wireless means, in an interactive, on-demand manner.

The Performances and Phonograms Treaty (Article 4) obliges parties to grant national treatment in respect of the rights provided in the Treaty to nationals of other parties, except to the extent that another party makes use of reservations permitted under Article 15(3) of the Treaty. It also requires that protection not be subject to any formalities.

Other important provisions of the Treaty are described below. Also noted are differences and similarities with the International Convention for the Protection of Performers, Producers of Phonograms and Broadcasting Organizations done at Rome, October 26, 1961 ("Rome Convention"), to which the United States is not a party, and the TRIPS Agreement. The Performances and Phonograms Treaty has no direct relationship to the Rome Convention. It includes some of the provisions of the Convention by reference (the provisions on criteria of eligibility for protection and on the possibility to apply reciprocity in respect of the right to remuneration for broadcasting and communication to the public), but there is no obligation to apply the other provisions of the Rome Convention. There is no legal relationship between the Treaty and the TRIPS Agreement.

Article 6 of the Performances and Phonograms Treaty (Article 6) provides for the exclusive rights of performers to authorize the broadcasting and communication to the public of their unfixed performances, except where the performance is already a broadcast program, and the fixation of their unfixed performances (this generally corresponds to the standards in the Rome Convention and the TRIPS Agreement). This Treaty (Articles 7 and 11) also includes an exclusive right of reproduction for performers in respect of their fixed performances and for producers of phonograms (in harmony with the Rome Convention and the TRIPS Agreement).

The Performances and Phonograms Treaty (Articles 8 and 12) provides recognition of a right of distribution (on which there is no provision in the Rome Convention or the TRIPS Agreement) for both performers and producers of phonograms.

The Performances and Phonograms Treaty (Articles 9 and 13) includes an exclusive post-first-sale right of rental for both performers and producers of phonograms; such a right is not granted in the Rome Convention, but is granted in the TRIPS Agreement explicitly for producers of phonograms and left to national legislation as far as performers are concerned. The Performances and Phonograms Treaty, furthermore, allows those countries where a system of equitable remuneration was applied on April 15, 1994, to maintain such a system, rather than provide an exclusive right (such a "grandfathering" clause is also included in the TRIPS Agreement).

The Performances and Phonograms Treaty (Article 15(1)) includes the right to a single equitable remuneration for performers and producers of phonograms for the broadcasting and communication to the public of phonograms published for commercial purposes or reproductions of such phonograms. Such a right is provided in the Rome Convention, but not in the TRIPS Agreement. Article 15(2) allows parties to establish in national legislation that the remuneration shall be claimed from the user by the performer or the producer of a phonogram, or both. Article 15(3) permits any party to declare, in a notification to the Director General of WIPO, that it will apply the provisions of Article 15(1) only in respect of certain uses or will otherwise limit their application or that it will not apply these provisions at all.

I recommend that, in accordance with Article 15(3), the United States include the following declaration in its instrument of ratification:

Pursuant to Article 15(3), the United States declares that it will apply the provisions of Article 15(1) only in respect of certain acts of broadcasting and communication to the public by digital means for which a direct or indirect fee is charged for reception, and for other retransmissions and digital phonorecord deliveries, as provided under United States law.

Article 16 of the Performances and Phonograms Treaty provides that limitations or exceptions to rights may be made in certain special cases that do not conflict with a normal exploitation of the performance or phonogram and do not unreasonably prejudice the interests of the performer or the producer of the phonogram. The same test is established in Article 9(2) of the Berne Convention, and is applied to the rights of performers and producers of phonograms under Article 13 of the TRIPS Agreement.

The Performances and Phonograms Treaty (Article 17) provides for a fifty-year term of protection for the rights of both performers and producers of phonograms (as in the TRIPS Agreement; the Rome Convention provides for only a twenty-year term).

Except for the remuneration right for broadcasting in Article 15(3), no reservations are allowed under the Performances and Phonograms Treaty (Article 21).

As provided in Article 22, this Treaty applies to performances that took place and phonograms that were fixed before the date of entry into force of the Treaty, provided that the term of protection has not expired, except that a party may limit the application of Article 5 concerning the moral rights of performers to performances after the entry into force of the Treaty.

Statements agreed to at the Diplomatic Conference are found as footnotes in the texts of the Treaties. These statements represent the negotiators' understanding of the language of the Treaties and can aid in the interpretation of certain articles. In particular, the agreed statements explain that computer storage of works and phonograms is covered by the Treaties, and that the provisions governing limitations and exceptions provide sufficient flexibility for countries to provide for and extend appropriate limitations on rights when adapting their laws to the digital environment.

Implementing legislation for the obligations the United States would undertake in the two treaties was signed into law on October 28, 1998, in the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, Pub. L. No. 105–304, 17 U.S.C. § 101 et seq.

(as amended), 112 Stat. 2860. President Clinton's signing statement is available in full at 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2168 (Nov. 2, 1998).

3. Intellectual Property Agreements with the People's Republic of China

a. 1992 United States-China Memorandum of Understanding on Intellectual Property Rights

In May 1991 the U.S. Trade Representative initiated an investigation of China's protection of patents, copyrights, and trade secrets under the U.S. trade law applicable to intellectual property rights, § 302(b)(2)(A) of the Trade Act of 1974 as amended, 19 U.S.C. § 2412(b)(2)(A). 56 Fed. Reg. 24,878 (May 31, 1991). Excerpts below from the Federal Register notice explain the basis of the investigation of China as a "priority foreign country" under § 182 of the Trade Act.

Section 182(a) of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2242) requires the USTR to identify countries that deny adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights or which deny fair and equitable market access to U.S. persons that rely on intellectual property protection. Accordingly, on April 26, 1991, the USTR identified the People's Republic of China as a priority foreign country under that provision. In identifying China as a priority foreign country, the USTR noted deficiencies in that country's intellectual property acts, policies and practices including: (1) Deficiencies in its patent law, in particular, the failure to provide product patent protection for chemicals, including pharmaceuticals and agrichemicals, (2) lack of copyright protection for U.S. works not first published in China, (3) deficient levels of protection under the copyright law and regulations that will come into effect on June 1, 1991, and (4) inadequate protection of trade secrets. Further, USTR noted the absence of effective enforcement of intellectual property rights in China, including rights in trademarks.

Section 302(b)(2)(A) of the Trade Act requires the USTR to initiate an investigation of any act, policy, or practice that was the basis of the identification of a country as a priority foreign country under the provisions of section 182(a)(2) of the Trade Act to determine whether such act, policy, or practice is actionable under section 301 of the Trade Act.

* * * *

On December 2, 1991, USTR issued Proposed Determinations Regarding the People's Republic of China's Intellectual Property Laws, Policies and Practices, with a request for public comment. 56 Fed. Reg. 61,278 (Dec. 2, 1991). Based on a proposed determination that China's acts, policies and practices "are unreasonable and constitute a burden or restriction" on U.S. commerce, USTR proposed to impose increased duties on certain products of the PRC. On January 17, 1992, China and the United States settled the dispute by entering into a memorandum of understanding ("MOU") on intellectual property issues. Key provisions of the 1992 MOU committed China to join relevant multilateral conventions and adopt compatible regulations. China also made commitments concerning patents and trade secrets.

The full text of the 1992 MOU, excerpted below, can be found on the Department of Commerce's website at www.tcc.mac.doc.gov/cgi-bin/doit.cgi?204:64:190553307:191.htm.

In the spirit of cooperation embodied in their bilateral Agreement on Trade Relations and consistent with the principles of the relevant international agreements, the Government of the People's Republic of China (Chinese Government) and the Government of the United States of America (U.S. Government) have reached a mutual understanding on the following provisions:

* * * *

1. The Chinese Government will accede to the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works (Berne Convention) (Paris 1971). The Chinese Government will submit a bill authorizing accession to the Berne Convention to its legislative body by April 1, 1992 and will use its best efforts to have the bill enacted by June 30, 1992. Upon enactment of the authorizing bill, the Chinese Government's instrument of accession to the Berne Convention will be submitted to the World Intellectual Property Organization with accession to be effective by October 15, 1992.

2. The Chinese Government will accede to the Convention for the Protection of Producers of Phonograms Against Unauthorized Duplication of Their Phonograms (Geneva Convention) and submit a bill to its legislative body authorizing accession by June 30, 1992. The Chinese Government will use its best efforts to have the bill enacted by February 1, 1993. The Chinese Government will deposit its instrument of ratification and the Convention will come into effect by June 1, 1993.

4. In so far as China's copyright law and its implementing regulations are inconsistent with the Berne Convention, the Geneva Convention or this Memorandum of Understanding (MOU), the Chinese Government will issue new regulations to comply with these Conventions and the MOU by October 1, 1992. These new regulations will also clarify the existing regulations and in particular will explain that the exclusive right of distribution that applies to all works and sound recordings includes making copies available by rental and that this exclusive right survives the first sale of copies. Regulations implementing the Conventions and this MOU will prevail over regulations for domestic works where there is an inconsistency between the new regulations and existing regulations.

* * * *

9. The Chinese Government will recognize this MOU as an agreement under Article 2 of the Copyright Law of the People's Republic of China which shall provide a basis for protection of works, including computer programs, and sound recordings of U.S. nationals published outside of China until such time as China accedes to the Berne Convention and the Geneva Convention. Such protection shall become effective 60 days after signature of this MOU.

Article 7

In recognition of the progress in improving the protection of intellectual property rights that the Chinese Government has made and of further progress that will result from the steps that the Chinese Government has agreed to take, and in the expectation that these commitments will be fully implemented, the U.S. Government will terminate the investigation initiated pursuant to the "special 301" [§ 301 of the Trade Act of 1974 as amended, 19 U.S.C. § 2411] provisions of U.S. trade law and China's designation as a priority foreign country will be revoked effective on the date of signature of this MOU.

* * * *

b. 1995 Intellectual Property Rights Enforcement Agreement

Building on the 1992 MOU, China and the United States entered into a second agreement in 1995. This agreement focused on enforcement of intellectual property rights, in the face of complaints that China was allowing widespread piracy of audio-visual and computer software materials. The 1995 Intellectual Property Rights ("IPR") Enforcement Agreement, which consisted of an exchange of letters and an action plan, committed China to take effective measures to substantially reduce IPR piracy, particularly of copyrighted, trademarked and patented products. Over the long term, China also committed in the action plan to create a new IPR enforcement structure, and to provide market access for audiovisual products, computer software, and books and periodicals from the United States. The full text of the 1995 IPR Enforcement Agreement can be found on the Department of Commerce's Trade Compliance Center's website, at http://170.110.214.18/tcc/data/commerce_html/TCC_2/PRCIntellectual_(2).html.

Excerpted below is testimony by U.S. Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific Affairs, November 29, 1995, describing key Chinese commitments under the 1995 IPR Enforcement Agreement and initial progress in fulfilling those commitments.

Intellectual Property Rights

On February 26, the United States and China reached a landmark agreement to halt rampant Chinese piracy of U.S. books, movies, computer software—piracy that had cost U.S. industries more than $1 billion a year. China also agreed to provide these leading edge industries—industries in which we enjoy a comparative advantage and on which we are staking much of our future—greater market access. This Agreement complemented the earlier 1992 IPR Memorandum of Understanding, in which China overhauled its IPR legal regime, and raised the standards of its copyright and patent regimes—among other areas.

In the IPR Enforcement Agreement, China promised to establish an effective system of intellectual property rights enforcement. As we defined that system during the negotiations, China pledged to take effective measures to halt piracy, make structural changes in its IPR enforcement regime that will ensure effective enforcement over time, and provide market access for audiovisual companies and for those that produce computer software. In more specific terms, the Chinese Government agreed that it would: initiate a 9 month Special Enforcement Period, during which intense raids would be undertaken; set up intra ministerial task forces and strike forces that include the police; vigorously attack large-scale producers and distributors of pirated materials; clean-up the CD factories that continue to produce pirated products; set up monitoring systems to check pirated production of CDs, audiovisual works, books and periodicals, and computer software; punish administratively or through application of criminal penalties serious offenders; establish an effective border enforcement regime; allow establishment of joint ventures immediately in two major cities in China for audiovisual companies (with 13 cities to open by the year 2000); and permit the establishment, for example, of joint ventures for the production of computer software.

* * * *

Enforcement

Ten months after signing the Agreement, implementation is mixed. The Agreement is complex—more than 30 pages of dense text—and requires action at all levels of the Chinese Government. More important, the magnitude of the problem—large-scale production of pirated products often with local government tolerance or, sometimes, with the participation of Chinese Government agencies—requires a significant exertion of political will.

In that context, China has taken some significant steps to attack rampant piracy. Clearly, the environment within which anti-piracy efforts can be pursued is much improved now over even last year. The system is becoming more transparent—recently, all of China's IPR laws, regulations, and administrative guidance were published, and public knowledge and understanding of IPR laws and regulations is much better than it was. If anything, consciousness of the need to protect IPR is higher in China, Hong Kong and Taiwan than it is in many countries and regions because of our and the Chinese government's intense efforts.

Piracy at the retail level has been markedly reduced in many major Chinese cities—particularly along the booming southeast coast where U.S. losses have been the largest. According to Chinese Government statistics, since signature of the Agreement, Chinese enforcement officials have launched 3,200 raids, seized and destroyed as many as 2 million pirated CDs and LDs, 700,000 pirated videos, and 400,000 pirated books. China's procuratorate has separately launched investigations into more than 1,000 possible criminal copyright infringement cases, including 321 "serious cases"—those in which illegal profits exceed 100,000 RMB (about $12,000). By contrast, last year enforcement was virtually non-existent. There have also been some criminal convictions to date.

In addition, China has made many of the structural changes mandated by the Agreement. China has set up intraministerial task forces in virtually all provincial capitals and many major cities, 30 in all. It has set up high-level, tough enforcement task forces in at least 18 provinces and major municipalities. In addition, China's courts have begun to render significant judgments against major IPR offenders. In a series of decisions rendered on cases brought by the Business Software Alliance, the Beijing Intermediate People's Court and other Chinese courts have ruled in favor of the BSA—levying fines of up to $60,000, and damages as well. China has now established IPR courts in Beijing, Guangzhou, Shenzhen and other major centers of piracy, and has begun an active program to train Chinese judges in the enforcement of IPR laws.

Despite these steps, China's overall implementation of the Agreement falls far short of the requirements of the Agreement. Despite improved enforcement efforts, U.S. industries still estimate that they lost $866 million as a result of China's piracy in 1995. Resolution of these issues is one of the Administration's top trade priorities . . .

4. Information Technology and Electronic Commerce

a. WTO Singapore Ministerial Declaration on Trade in Information Technology Products

As noted in B.2. supra, following the establishment of the WTO in January 1995, WTO members continued to negotiate on a number of topics upon which agreement had not been reached on a multilateral basis. On December 13, 1996, the United States and 28 other participants at the WTO's Singapore Ministerial Conference reached agreement on trade in information technology products such as computers, semiconductors, and computer software. The Ministerial Declaration on Trade in Information Technology Products, which entered into force July 1, 1997, provided for participants to completely eliminate duties on IT products listed in an annex to the declaration by January 1, 2000. Developing country participants were granted extended periods for some products. Excerpted below are key provisions of the declaration, which is available in full, with annexes, on the website of the World Trade Organization at www.wto.org/english/docs_e/legal_e/legal_e.htm, reprinted in 36 I.L.M. 375 (1997).

Ministers, Representing . . . Members of the World Trade Organization ("WTO"), and States or separate customs territories in the process of acceding to the WTO, which have agreed in Singapore on the expansion of world trade in information technology products and which account for well over 80 per cent of world trade in these products ("parties"):

* * * *

Declare as follows:

1. Each party's trade regime should evolve in a manner that enhances market access opportunities for information technology products.

2. Pursuant to the modalities set forth in the Annex to this Declaration, each party shall bind and eliminate customs duties and other duties and charges of any kind, within the meaning of Article II:1(b) of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994, with respect to the following:

(a) all products classified (or classifiable) with Harmonized System (1996) ("HS") headings listed in Attachment A to the Annex to this Declaration; and through equal rate reductions of customs duties beginning in 1997 and concluding in 2000, recognizing that extended staging of reductions and, before implementation, expansion of product coverage may be necessary in limited circumstances.

(b) all products specified in Attachment B to the Annex to this Declaration, whether or not they are included in Attachment A;

3. Ministers express satisfaction about the large product coverage outlined in the Attachments to the Annex to this Declaration. They instruct their respective officials to make good faith efforts to finalize plurilateral technical discussions in Geneva on the basis of these modalities, and instruct these officials to complete this work by 31 January 1997, so as to ensure the implementation of this Declaration by the largest number of participants.

* * * *

President Clinton issued Proclamation 7011 to implement the Singapore Declaration by proclaiming modification in the tariff categories and rates of duty set forth in the Harmonized Tariff Schedule, pursuant to his authority under § 111(b) of the Uruguay Round Agreements Act, 19 U.S.C. § 3521(b). 62 Fed. Reg. 35,909 (July 2, 1997).

b. European Union-United States: Joint statement on electronic commerce

During the 1990s electronic commerce became an international trade and commerce issue as well as a domestic policy issue. On December 5, 1997, the United States and the European Union issued a joint statement on electronic commerce. Excerpts below from the joint statement describe many of the key U.S. principles and objectives for expanding electronic commerce. The joint statement can be found at www.qlinks.net/comdocs/eu-us.htm.

3. We agree to work towards the development of a global marketplace where competition and consumer choice drive economic activity, on the basis of the following guidelines:

That the expansion of global electronic commerce will be essentially market-led and driven by private initiative. It should take into account the interests of all stakeholders, in particular of consumers, libraries, schools and other public institutions, as well as the need to ensure the widest use possible of new technologies.

That the role of government is to provide a clear, consistent and predictable legal framework, to promote a pro-competitive environment in which electronic commerce can flourish and to ensure adequate protection of public interest objectives such as privacy, intellectual property rights, prevention of fraud, consumer protection and public safety.

That industry self-regulation is important. Within the legal framework set by government, public interest objectives can, as appropriate, be served by international or mutually compatible codes of conduct, model contracts, guidelines, etc. agreed upon between industry and other private sector bodies.

That unnecessary existing legal and regulatory barriers should be eliminated and the emergence of new ones should be prevented. Where legislative action is deemed necessary, it should not be to the advantage or disadvantage of electronic commerce compared with other forms of commerce.

That taxes on electronic commerce should be clear, consistent, neutral and non discriminatory.

That it is important to enhance the awareness and confidence of citizens and SMEs in electronic commerce and to support the development of relevant skills and network literacy.

That interoperability, innovation and competition are important for the development of a global marketplace, and that, in this context, voluntary, consensus-based standards, preferably at an international level, can play an important role.

4. Specifically, we agree to work towards:

A global understanding, as soon as possible, that when goods are ordered electronically and delivered physically, there will be no additional import duties applied in relation to the use of electronic means; in all other cases relating to electronic commerce, the absence of duties on imports should remain.

The effective implementation by 1 January 1998 of the commitments on basic telecommunication services included in the schedules of commitments attached to the WTO General Agreement on Trade and Services (GATS) and the completion of the second phase of the Agreement on Information Technology Products by summer 1998.

The ratification and implementation, as soon as possible, of the WIPO Copyright Treaty and the WIPO Performances and Phonograms Treaty.

Ensuring the effective protection of privacy with regard to the processing of personal data on global information networks.

The creation of a global market-based system of registration, allocation and governance of Internet domain names which fully reflects the geographically and functionally diverse nature of the Internet.

5. Furthermore, we agree on:

Active support for the development, preferably on a global basis, of self-regulatory codes of conduct and technologies to gain consumer confidence in electronic commerce, and in doing so, to involve all market players, including those representing consumer interests.

Close co-operation and mutual assistance to ensure effective tax administration and to combat and prevent illegal activities on the Internet.

The important positive role that electronic commerce can play in developing a coherent approach to international work on trade facilitation.

Close co-operation in jointly defined areas of R&D and electronic commerce technologies, in the framework of the EU-US Science and Technology Agreement, as well as in appropriate business pilot projects.

Continuing substantive bilateral discussions at experts level, including, as appropriate, both government and private sector participants, on the issues mentioned above as well as other issues, such as government procurement; contract law and regulated professions; liability; commercial communication; electronic payments; encryption; electronic authentication/digital signatures; and filtering and rating technologies.

Close co-operation with a view to encouraging the exchange of statistical data on electronic commerce.

c. United States-Ireland Joint Communiqué on Electronic Commerce

The United States also addressed electronic commerce issues in bilateral negotiations with a number of nations. For instance, the United States–Ireland Joint Communiqué on Electronic Commerce, signed in September 1998 at Dublin, Ireland, included the following language on authentication and electronic signatures:

> Authentication/Electronic Signatures: Governments should support a global uniform commercial legal framework that recognises, facilitates, and enforces electronic transactions world-wide. A wide variety of authentication methods and technologies are developing rapidly. With respect to authentication and electronic signatures, efforts of the private sector in constructing rules and guidelines should be encouraged.
>
> The commercial legal framework should conform with the following principles:
>
> > the acceptability of electronic signatures for legal and commercial purposes;
> > the propriety and desirability of allowing parties to a transaction to determine the appropriate technological and business methods of authentication for their transaction; and > > the fostering of mutual cross-border recognition of electronic authentication methods and a non-discriminatory approach to electronic signatures from other countries as a necessary step in the removal of artificial barriers to cross-border commercial transactions.

U.S. President William J. Clinton and Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern signed the joint communiqué with digital signatures. This was the first use of a digital signature by a U.S. President on an international instrument. The full text of the agreement is available at http://act.iol.ie/eagreement.htm.

E. ANTITRUST

1. Litigation Concerning Extraterritorial Jurisdiction

a. Extraterritorial application of antitrust law in civil matters—Hartford Fire Insurance Co. v. California

The U.S. Supreme Court in Hartford Fire Insurance Co. v. California, 509 U.S. 764 (1993), ruled on the scope and application of U.S. antitrust laws both domestically and extraterritorially. Nineteen states and private plaintiffs had filed civil complaints alleging that U.S. and foreign-based members of the insurance industry had violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 1) by conspiring to restrict the terms of coverage of commercial general liability insurance available in the United States. The actions were consolidated for litigation. The Court described the history of the litigation as follows.

* * * *

The Sherman Act makes every contract, combination, or conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of interstate or foreign commerce illegal. 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1. These consolidated cases present questions about the application of that Act to the insurance industry, both here and abroad. The plaintiffs (respondents here) allege that both domestic and foreign defendants (petitioners here) violated the Sherman Act by engaging in various conspiracies to affect the American insurance market. A group of domestic defendants argues that the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 59 Stat. 33, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1011 et seq., precludes application of the Sherman Act to the conduct alleged; a group of foreign defendants argues that the principle of international comity requires the District Court to refrain from exercising jurisdiction over certain claims against it. We hold that most of the domestic defendants' alleged conduct is not immunized from antitrust liability by the McCarran-Ferguson Act, and that, even assuming it applies, the principle of international comity does not preclude District Court jurisdiction over the foreign conduct alleged.

. . . After the actions had been consolidated for litigation in the Northern District of California, the defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action, or, in the alternative, for summary judgment. The District Court granted the motions to dismiss. In re Insurance Antitrust Litigation, 723 F. Supp. 464 (1989). It held that the conduct alleged fell within the grant of antitrust immunity contained in § 2(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1012(b), because it amounted to "the business of insurance" and was "regulated by State Law" within the meaning of that section; none of the conduct, in the District Court's view, amounted to a "boycott" within the meaning of the § 3(b) exception to that grant of immunity. 15 U.S.C. § 1013(b). The District Court also dismissed the three claims that named only certain London-based defendants, invoking international comity and applying the Ninth Circuit's decision in Timberlane Lumber Co. v. Bank of America, N. T. & S. A., 549 F.2d 597 (1976).

The Court of Appeals reversed. In re Insurance Antitrust Litigation, 938 F.2d 919 (CA9 1991). Although it held the conduct involved to be "the business of insurance" within the meaning of § 2(b), it concluded that the defendants could not claim McCarran-Ferguson Act antitrust immunity for two independent reasons. First, it held, the foreign reinsurers were beyond the regulatory jurisdiction of the States; because their activities could not be "regulated by State Law" within the meaning of § 2(b), they did not fall within that section's grant of immunity. Although the domestic insurers were "regulated by State Law," the court held, they forfeited their § 2(b) exemption when they conspired with the nonexempt foreign reinsurers. Second, the Court of Appeals held that, even if the conduct alleged fell within the scope of § 2(b), it also fell within the § 3(b) exception for "act[s] of boycott, coercion, or intimidation." Finally, as to the three claims brought solely against foreign defendants, the court applied its Timberlane analysis, but concluded that the principle of international comity was no bar to exercising Sherman Act jurisdiction.

* * * *

The Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the question of the scope of the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1012(b), which provides antitrust immunity for insurers, and to address the "application of the Sherman Act to the foreign conduct at issue." Although the court concluded that "it was error for the Court of Appeals to hold the domestic insurers bereft of the McCarran-Ferguson Act exemption simply because they agreed or acted with foreign reinsurers," it affirmed the court of appeals conclusion that the conduct alleged in most claims fell within the "boycott" exception to McCarran-Ferguson Act antitrust immunity.

As to the claims against the foreign insurers, the Supreme Court held that international comity did not prevent Sherman Act jurisdiction over the foreign reinsurers. Excerpts below from the Court's opinion address this aspect of the case. (Footnotes have been omitted.)

At the outset, we note that the District Court undoubtedly had jurisdiction of these Sherman Act claims, as the London reinsurers apparently concede. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 37 ("Our position is not that the Sherman Act does not apply in the sense that a minimal basis for the exercise of jurisdiction doesn't exist here. Our position is that there are certain circumstances, and that this is one of them, in which the interests of another State are sufficient that the exercise of that jurisdiction should be restrained") Although the proposition was perhaps not always free from doubt, see American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 213 U.S. 347, 29 S.Ct. 511, 53 L.Ed. 826 (1909), it is well established by now that the Sherman Act applies to foreign conduct that was meant to produce and did in fact produce some substantial effect in the United States. See Matsushita Elec. Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 582, n. 6, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 1354, n. 6, 89 L.Ed.2d 538 (1986); United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F.2d 416, 444 (CA2 1945) (L. Hand, J.); Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 415, and Reporters' Note 3 (1987) (hereinafter Restatement (Third) Foreign Relations Law);

1 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law ¶ 236 (1978); cf. Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 704, 82 S.Ct. 1404, 1413, 8 L.Ed.2d 777 (1962); Steele v. Bulova Watch Co., 344 U.S. 280, 288, 73 S.Ct. 252, 256, 97 L.Ed. 319 (1952); United States v. Sisal Sales Corp., 274 U.S. 268, 275–276, 47 S.Ct. 592, 593–594, 71 L.Ed. 1042 (1927). Such is the conduct alleged here: that the London reinsurers engaged in unlawful conspiracies to affect the market for insurance in the United States and that their conduct in fact produced substantial effect. See 938 F.2d, at 933.

According to the London reinsurers, the District Court should have declined to exercise such jurisdiction under the principle of international comity. The Court of Appeals agreed that courts should look to that principle in deciding whether to exercise jurisdiction under the Sherman Act. Id., at 932. This availed the London reinsurers nothing, however. To be sure, the Court of Appeals believed that "application of [American] antitrust laws to the London reinsurance market 'would lead to significant conflict with English law and policy,' " and that "[s]uch a conflict, unless outweighed by other factors, would by itself be reason to decline exercise of jurisdiction." Id., at 933 (citation omitted). But other factors, in the court's view, including the London reinsurers' express purpose to affect United States commerce and the substantial nature of the effect produced, outweighed the supposed conflict and required the exercise of jurisdiction in this litigation. Id., at 934.

When it enacted the [Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act of 1982 ("FTAIA"), 96 Stat. 1246, 15 U.S.C. § 6a], Congress expressed no view on the question whether a court with Sherman Act jurisdiction should ever decline to exercise such jurisdiction on grounds of international comity. See H.R.Rep. No. 97–686, p. 13 (1982) ("If a court determines that the requirements for subject matter jurisdiction are met, [the FTAIA] would have no effect on the court['s] ability to employ notions of comity . . . or otherwise to take account of the international character of the transaction") (citing Timberlane). We need not decide that question here, however, for even assuming that in a proper case a court may decline to exercise Sherman Act jurisdiction over foreign conduct (or, as Justice SCALIA would put it, may conclude by the employment of comity analysis in the first instance that there is no jurisdiction), international comity would not counsel against exercising jurisdiction in the circumstances alleged here.

The only substantial question in this litigation is whether "there is in fact a true conflict between domestic and foreign law." Societe Nationale Industrielle Aerospatiale v. United States Dist. Court for Southern Dist. of Iowa, 482 U.S. 522, 555, 107 S.Ct. 2542, 2562, 96 L.Ed.2d 461 (1987) (BLACKMUN, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). The London reinsurers contend that applying the Act to their conduct would conflict significantly with British law, and the British Government, appearing before us as amicus curiae, concurs. See Brief for Petitioners Merrett Underwriting Agency Management Ltd. et al. in No. 91–1128, pp. 22–27; Brief for Government of United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland as Amicus Curiae 10–14. They assert that Parliament has established a comprehensive regulatory regime over the London reinsurance market and that the conduct alleged here was perfectly consistent with British law and policy. But this is not to state a conflict. "[T]he fact that conduct is lawful in the state in which it took place will not, of itself, bar application of the United States antitrust laws," even where the foreign state has a strong policy to permit or encourage such conduct. Restatement (Third) Foreign Relations Law § 415, Comment j; see Continental Ore Co., supra, 370 U.S., at 706–707, 82 S.Ct., at 1414–1415. No conflict exists, for these purposes, "where a person subject to regulation by two states can comply with the laws of both." Restatement (Third) Foreign Relations Law § 403, Comment e. Since the London reinsurers do not argue that British law requires them to act in some fashion prohibited by the law of the United States, see Reply Brief for Petitioners Merrett Underwriting Agency Management Ltd. et al. in No. 91–1128, pp. 7–8, or claim that their compliance with the laws of both countries is otherwise impossible, we see no conflict with British law. See Restatement (Third) Foreign Relations Law § 403, Comment e, § 415, Comment j. We have no need in this litigation to address other considerations that might inform a decision to refrain from the exercise of jurisdiction on grounds of international comity.

b. Extraterritorial application of U.S. antitrust law in criminal matters: United States v. Nippon Paper Indus. Co.

In 1997 a U.S. court, for the first time, held that, where activities committed abroad had a substantial and intended effect within the United States, they may form a basis for criminal prosecution under the Sherman Act. United States v. Nippon Paper Indus. Co., 109 F. 3d 1 (1st Cir. 1997). The First Circuit's opinion, excerpted below, described the facts in the case and provided the court's analysis in reversing dismissal of the indictment by the district court.

In 1995, a federal grand jury handed up an indictment naming as a defendant Nippon Paper Industries Co., Ltd. (NPI), a Japanese manufacturer of facsimile paper. The indictment alleges that in 1990 NPI and certain unnamed coconspirators held a number of meetings in Japan which culminated in an agreement to fix the price of thermal fax paper throughout North America. NPI and other manufacturers who were privy to the scheme purportedly accomplished their objective by selling the paper in Japan to unaffiliated trading houses on condition that the latter charge specified (inflated) prices for the paper when they resold it in North America. The trading houses then shipped and sold the paper to their subsidiaries in the United States who in turn sold it to American consumers at swollen prices. The indictment further relates that, in 1990 alone, NPI sold thermal fax paper worth approximately $6,100,000 for eventual import into the United States; and that in order to ensure the success of the venture, NPI monitored the paper trail and confirmed that the prices charged to end users were those that it had arranged. These activities, the indictment posits, had a substantial adverse effect on commerce in the United States and unreasonably restrained trade in violation of Section One of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 (1994).

* * * *

Our law has long presumed that "legislation of Congress, unless a contrary intent appears, is meant to apply only within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States." EEOC v. Arabian American Oil Co., 499 U.S. 244, 248, 113 L. Ed. 2d 274, 111 S. Ct. 1227 (1991) (citation omitted). In this context, the Supreme Court has charged inquiring courts with determining whether Congress has clearly expressed an affirmative desire to apply particular laws to conduct that occurs beyond the borders of the United States. See id.

* * * *

. . . In Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. California, 509 U.S. 764, 125 L. Ed. 2d 612, 113 S. Ct. 2891 (1993), the Court deemed it "well established by now that the Sherman Act applies to foreign conduct that was meant to produce and did in fact produce some substantial effect in the United States.". . . .

* * * *

Were this a civil case, our journey would be complete. But here the United States essays a criminal prosecution for solely extraterritorial conduct rather than a civil action. This is largely uncharted terrain; we are aware of no authority directly on point, and the parties have cited none.

Be that as it may, one datum sticks out like a sore thumb: in both criminal and civil cases, the claim that Section One [of the Sherman Act] applies extraterritorially is based on the same language in the same section of the same statute: "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Words may sometimes be chameleons, possessing different shades of meaning in different contexts, see, e.g., Hanover Ins. Co. v. United States, 880 F.2d 1503, 1504 (1st Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1023, 107 L. Ed. 2d 745, 110 S. Ct. 726 (1990), but common sense suggests that courts should interpret the same language in the same section of the same statute uniformly, regardless of whether the impetus for interpretation is criminal or civil.

. . . It is a fundamental interpretive principle that identical words or terms used in different parts of the same act are intended to have the same meaning . . . This principle—which the Court recently called "the basic canon of statutory construction," Estate of Cowart v. Nicklos Drilling Co., 505 U.S. 469, 479, 120 L. Ed. 2d 379, 112 S. Ct. 2589 (1992)—operates not only when particular phrases appear in different sections of the same act, but also when they appear in different paragraphs or sentences of a single section. . . . It follows, therefore, that if the language upon which the indictment rests were the same as the language upon which civil liability rests but appeared in a different section of the Sherman Act, or in a different part of the same section, we would be under great pressure to follow the lead of the Hartford Fire Court and construe the two iterations of the language identically. Where, as here, the tie binds more tightly—that is, the text under consideration is not merely a duplicate appearing somewhere else in the statute, but is the original phrase in the original setting—the pressure escalates and the case for reading the language in a manner consonant with a prior Supreme Court interpretation is irresistible. . . .

* * * *

. . . . The words of Section One have not changed since the Hartford Fire Court found that they clearly evince Congress' intent to apply the Sherman Act extraterritorially in civil actions, and it would be disingenuous for us to pretend that the words had lost their clarity simply because this is a criminal proceeding. Thus, unless some special circumstance obtains in this case, there is no principled way in which we can uphold the order of dismissal.

NPI and its amicus, the Government of Japan, urge that special reasons exist for measuring Section One's reach differently in a criminal context. We have reviewed their exhortations and found them hollow. . . .

* * * *

3. The Restatement. NPI and the district court, 944 F. Supp. at 65, both sing the praises of the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law (1987), claiming that it supports a distinction between civil and criminal cases on the issue of extraterritoriality. The passage to which they pin their hopes states:

> In the case of regulatory statutes that may give rise to both civil and criminal liability, such as the United States antitrust and securities laws, the presence of substantial foreign elements will ordinarily weigh against application of criminal law. In such cases, legislative intent to subject conduct outside the state's territory to its criminal law should be found only on the basis of express statement or clear implication.

Id. at § 403 cmt. f. We believe that this statement merely reaffirms the classic presumption against extraterritoriality—no more, no less. After all, nothing in the text of the Restatement proper contradicts the government's interpretation of Section One. See, e.g., id. at § 402(1)(c) (explaining that, subject only to a general requirement of reasonableness, a state has jurisdiction to proscribe "conduct outside its territory that has or is intended to have substantial effect within its territory"); n5 id. at § 415(2) ("Any agreement in restraint of United States trade that is made outside of the United States . . . [is] subject to the jurisdiction to prescribe of the United States, if a principal purpose of the conduct or agreement is to interfere with the commerce of the United States, and the agreement or conduct has some effect on that commerce."). What is more, other comments indicate that a country's decision to prosecute wholly foreign conduct is discretionary. See, e.g., id. at § 403 rep. n.8.

5. Comity. International comity is a doctrine that counsels voluntary forbearance when a sovereign which has a legitimate claim to jurisdiction concludes that a second sovereign also has a legitimate claim to jurisdiction under principles of international law. See Harold G. Maier, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction at a Crossroads: An Intersection Between Public and Private International Law, 76 A. J. Int'l L. 280, 281 n.1 (1982). Comity is more an aspiration than a fixed rule, more a matter of grace than a matter of obligation. In all events, its growth in the antitrust sphere has been stunted by Hartford Fire, in which the Court suggested that comity concerns would operate to defeat the exercise of jurisdiction only in those few cases in which the law of the foreign sovereign required a defendant to act in a manner incompatible with the Sherman Act or in which full compliance with both statutory schemes was impossible. See Hartford Fire, 509 U.S. at 798–99; see also Kenneth W. Dam, Extraterritoriality in an Age of Globalization: The Hartford Fire Case, 1993 Sup. Ct. Rev. 289, 306–07 (1993). Accordingly, the Hartford Fire Court gave short shrift to the defendants' entreaty that the conduct leading to antitrust liability was perfectly legal in the United Kingdom. See Hartford Fire, 509 U.S. at 798–99.

In this case the defendant's comity-based argument is even more attenuated. The conduct with which NPI is charged is illegal under both Japanese and American laws, thereby alleviating any founded concern about NPI being whipsawed between separate sovereigns. And, moreover, to the extent that comity is informed by general principles of reasonableness, see Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law § 403, the indictment lodged against NPI is well within the pale. In it, the government charges that the defendant orchestrated a conspiracy with the object of rigging prices in the United States. If the government can prove these charges, we see no tenable reason why principles of comity should shield NPI from prosecution. We live in an age of international commerce, where decisions reached in one corner of the world can reverberate around the globe in less time than it takes to tell the tale. Thus, a ruling in NPI's favor would create perverse incentives for those who would use nefarious means to influence markets in the United States, rewarding them for erecting as many territorial firewalls as possible between cause and effect.

We need go no further. Hartford Fire definitively establishes that Section One of the Sherman Act applies to wholly foreign conduct which has an intended and substantial effect in the United States. We are bound to accept that holding. Under settled principles of statutory construction, we also are bound to apply it by interpreting Section One the same way in a criminal case. The combined force of these commitments requires that we accept the government's cardinal argument, reverse the order of the district court, reinstate the indictment, and remand for further proceedings.

* * * *

On June 13, 1997, Nippon Paper Inc. filed a petition for writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court, which was denied. Nippon Paper Indus. Co. v. United States, 522 U.S. 1044 (1998). A brief filed by the United States, opposing the grant of certiorari, addressed the consistency of the First Circuit's opinion with international law, as excerpted below.

* * * *

. . . [C]ontrary to the government of Japan's assertion (Amicus Br. 4–5), the First Circuit's decision fully comports with principles of international law. It is well settled that a government may impose civil or criminal sanctions for foreign conduct that is intended to cause and actually causes substantial effects within its territory. 1 Charles C. Hyde, International Law 238, at 798 (2d ed. 1945). That principle was firmly established at the time of the Sherman Act's adoption. See U.S. Department of State, Report on Extraterritorial Crime and The Cutting Case 23–24 (1887); accord 2 John B. Moore, A Digest of International Law 202, at 244 (1906) ("The principle that a man who outside of a country willfully puts in motion a force to take effect in it is answerable in the place where the evil is done, is recognized in the criminal jurisprudence of all countries."). Moreover, that principle long has been accepted by this Court, see e.g., Strassheim, 221 U.S. at 285 (Holmes, J.), and is embedded in the "substantial and intended effects" test of Alcoa and Hartford. Accordingly, international law does not support petitioner's contention that the Sherman Act's jurisdictional reach should differ in criminal and civil cases. See also Pet. App. 23a–28a (Lynch, J., concurring).

2. Agreements with the European Communities Related to the Application of Competition Laws

a. 1991 Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Commission of the European Communities Regarding the Application of Competition Laws

On September 23, 1991, the U.S. Government and the Commission of the European Communities entered into the Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Commission of the European Communities Regarding the Application of Competition Laws. The stated purpose of the agreement was "to promote cooperation and coordination and lessen the possibility or impact of differences between the Parties in the application of their competition laws." Among other things, each party also agreed to "notify the other whenever its competition authorities become aware that their enforcement activities may affect important interests of the other Party."

The full text of the agreement, excerpted below, is available at www.usdoj.gov/atr/public/international/docs/ec.htm.

The Government of the United States of America and the Commission of the European Communities:

Recognizing that the world's economies are becoming increasingly interrelated, and in particular that this is true of the economies of the United States of America and the European Communities;

Noting that the Government of the United States of America and the Commission of the European Communities share the view that the sound and effective enforcement of competition law is a matter of importance to the efficient operation of their respective markets and to trade between them;

Noting that the sound and effective enforcement of the Parties' competition laws would be enhanced by cooperation and, in appropriate cases, coordination between them in the application of those laws;

Noting further that from time to time differences may arise between the Parties concerning the application of their competition laws to conduct or transactions that implicate significant interests of both Parties;

Having regard to the Recommendation of the Council of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development Concerning Cooperation Between Member Countries on Restrictive Business Practices Affecting International Trade, adopted on June 5, 1986; and Having regard to the Declaration on US-EC Relations adopted on November 23, 1990;

Have agreed as follows:

Article I

PURPOSE AND DEFINITIONS

1. The purpose of this Agreement is to promote cooperation and coordination and lessen the possibility or impact of differences between the Parties in the application of their competition laws.

* * * *

Article II

NOTIFICATION

1. Each Party shall notify the other whenever its competition authorities become aware that their enforcement activities may affect important interests of the other Party.

2. Enforcement activities as to which notification ordinarily will be appropriate include those that:

a. Are relevant to enforcement activities of the other Party;
b. Involve anticompetitive activities (other than a merger or acquisition) carried out in significant part in the other Party's territory;
c. Involve a merger or acquisition in which one or more of the parties to the transaction, or a company controlling one or more of the parties to the transaction, is a company incorporated or organized under the laws of the other Party or one of its states or member states;
d. Involve conduct believed to have been required, encouraged or approved by the other Party; or
e. Involve remedies that would, in significant respects, require or prohibit conduct in the other Party's territory.

* * * *

Article IV
COOPERATION AND COORDINATION IN ENFORCEMENT ACTIVITIES

1. The competition authorities of each Party will render assistance to the competition authorities of the other Party in their enforcement activities, to the extent compatible with the assisting Party's laws and important interests, and within its reasonably available resources.

2. In cases where both Parties have an interest in pursuing enforcement activities with regard to related situations, they may agree that it is in their mutual interest to coordinate their enforcement activities. In considering whether particular enforcement activities should be coordinated, the Parties shall take account of the following factors, among others:

a. the opportunity to make more efficient use of their resources devoted to the enforcement activities;
b. the relative abilities of the Parties' competition authorities to obtain information necessary to conduct the enforcement activities;
c. the effect of such coordination on the ability of both Parties to achieve the objectives of their enforcement activities; and
d. the possibility of reducing costs incurred by persons subject to the enforcement activities.

3. In any coordination arrangement, each Party shall conduct its enforcement activities expeditiously and, insofar as possible, consistently with the enforcement objectives of the other Party.

4. Subject to appropriate notice to the other Party, the competition authorities of either Party may limit or terminate their participation in a coordination arrangement and pursue their enforcement activities independently.

Article V
COOPERATION REGARDING ANTICOMPETITIVE ACTIVITIES IN THE TERRITORY OF ONE PARTY THAT ADVERSELY AFFECT THE INTERESTS OF THE OTHER PARTY

1. The Parties note that anticompetitive activities may occur within the territory of one Party that, in addition to violating that Party's competition laws, adversely affect important interests of the other Party. The Parties agree that it is in both their interests to address anticompetitive activities of this nature.

2. If a Party believes that anticompetitive activities carried out on the territory of the other Party are adversely affecting its important interests, the first Party may notify the other Party and may request that the other Party's competition authorities initiate appropriate enforcement activities. The notification shall be as specific as possible about the nature of the anticompetitive activities and their effects on the interests of the notifying Party, and shall include an offer of such further information and other cooperation as the notifying Party is able to provide.

ARTICLE VIII
CONFIDENTIALITY OF INFORMATION
1. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Agreement, neither Party is required to provide information to the other Party if disclosure of that information to the requesting Party

a. is prohibited by the law of the Party possessing the information, or
b. would be incompatible with important interests of the Party possessing the information.

2. Each Party agrees to maintain, to the fullest extent possible, the confidentiality of any information provided to it in confidence by the other Party under this Agreement and to oppose, to the fullest extent possible, any application for disclosure of such information by a third party that is not authorized by the Party that supplied the information.

b. 1998 European Communities-United States Positive Comity Agreement

On June 4, 1998, The United States of America and the European Communities also entered into the Agreement Between the Government of The United States of America and The European Communities on The Application of Positive Comity Principles in The Enforcement of Their Competition Laws ("Positive Comity Agreement"). The Positive Comity Agreement outlined the procedures under which one party to the Agreement can ask another to use its antitrust laws to address anticompetitive conduct, and set forth a presumption that enforcement would be first attempted by the party in whose territory the majority of the anticompetitive conduct and impact was underway.

The full text of the Positive Comity Agreement is available at www.usdoj.gov/atr/public/international/docs/1781.htm. Attorney General Janet Reno and Federal Trade Commission Chairman Robert Pitofsky signed the agreement on behalf of the United States. Excerpts below from a Press Release issued by the Department of Justice explain the importance of the agreement. The full press release is available at www.usdoj.gov/opa/pr/1998/June/255at.htm.html.

* * * *

Under the agreement, the requesting government or party relies on its counterpart to take action under its own laws, consulting frequently in the process. A positive comity referral will lead to efficient enforcement as each side deals with conduct occurring primarily in its own territory, and should help to resolve disputes over access to foreign markets, the Department said.

* * * *

The existing 1991 antitrust cooperation agreement between the U.S. and the EC contains a provision allowing either side to ask the other to take antitrust enforcement action against practices that harm the requesting party's interests. The new agreement adds a presumption that positive comity will be used in certain situations, and provides details about each party's responsibilities.

Under the new agreement a requesting party will normally defer or suspend enforcement activities in favor of positive comity where anticompetitive conduct occurs in a foreign country but does not directly harm the requesting country's consumers. In cases where the anticompetitive conduct does harm the requesting country's consumers, the requesting country will still defer or suspend enforcement activities when the conduct occurs principally in and is directed principally towards the other party's territory. This presumption assumes that the requested party will investigate and take appropriate remedial measures inconformity with its own laws. In conducting its investigation, the requested party would also report back to the requesting party on the status of the investigation, notify any changes in enforcement intentions, and comply with any reasonable suggestions of the requesting party.

Notwithstanding the presumption, the agreement contemplates that the parties may pursue separate and parallel enforcement activities where anticompetitive conduct, such as international price fixing cartels, affects both territories and justifies the imposition of penalties within both jurisdictions.

Today's agreement allows a party at a later point to decide to initiate or resume its enforcement activities, provided it promptly informs the other party of its intentions and reasons. The agreement does not require a requested party to act if it concludes that enforcement of its laws is not appropriate.

The new agreement does not apply to merger enforcement, where statutory deadlines in the U.S. and EU make the suspension or deferral of investigations inappropriate. Nor does the agreement provide for exchange of confidential business information, unless the consent of the source of the information has been obtained.

3. International Antitrust Enforcement Assistance Act (1994)

On November 2, 1994, the President signed into law the International Antitrust Enforcement Assistance Act ("IAEAA"), Pub. L. No. 103–438, 108 Stat 4597 (1994), codified at 15 U.S.C. §§ 6201–6210. New authority for the United States to provide assistance that would otherwise be prohibited from disclosure because of U.S. law made it possible for the United States to receive reciprocal assistance. Section 7 of the act established a procedure for entering into comprehensive antitrust mutual assistance agreements, requiring publication in the Federal Register not less than 45 days in advance with a request for public comment, and publication again after an agreement was entered into, terminated or amended. When an agreement entered into under this procedure was in effect with a foreign country, the act authorized the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission to provide certain evidence and other assistance pursuant to the agreement. Section 2 authorized disclosure of evidence to assist the foreign antitrust authority "(1) in determining whether a person has violated or is about to violate any of the foreign antitrust laws administered or enforced by the foreign antitrust authority, or (2) in enforcing any of such foreign antitrust laws." Section 3 authorized the Attorney General and the FTC, in certain circumstances, to conduct investigations in response to a request by a foreign antitrust authority while § 4 authorized U.S. federal courts to order provision of testimony or production of documents or other evidence to assist a foreign antitrust authority in defined circumstances.

Section 5 set forth limitations on the types of information that may be disclosed to foreign antitrust authorities. These restrictions include a prohibition on disclosure of information relating to pre-merger notification provisions of the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 (§ 7A of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18a), as well as certain grand jury evidence and classified information. Section 8 conditioned the use of antitrust mutual assistance agreements, among other things, on a determination that the foreign antitrust authority would satisfy assurances, terms and conditions required to be included in the agreement under § 12 and comply with confidentiality requirements, provided that the assistance "is consistent with the public interest of the United States."

Assistant Attorney General Anne K. Bingaman testified before the U.S. House of Representatives, Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Economic and Commercial Law, in support of the legislation on August 8, 1994. Excerpts below from Ms. Bingaman's prepared statement explained the need for the IAEAA.

The testimony is available in full at International Antitrust Enforcement Assistance Act of 1994: Hearing on H.R. 4781 Before the Subcommittee on Economic and Commercial Law of the Committee on the Judiciary, 103 Cong. 22–44 (1994) (statement of Anne K. Bingaman, Assistant Attorney General, Antitrust Division, Department of Justice.)

A broad consensus has come out of this dialogue [in preparing the legislation]. First, there is agreement that more effective enforcement tools are needed to protect American businesses and consumers from anticompetitive conduct in the international arena. Second, there is agreement that these tools must and can be developed in a way that safeguards confidential business information obtained from American firms from misuse or improper disclosure abroad. H.R. 4781 has been carefully crafted to achieve these objectives. It has been endorsed by companies like American Airlines, Apple Computer, Bethlehem Steel, Chrysler, Inland Steel, USX Corp., Viacom and Xerox.

We live in a global economy, in which the subject matter of antitrust enforcement can be as geographically widespread as the firms and the business activity that affect our nation's markets. Nearly a quarter of the United States' GDP is accounted for by export and import trade, roughly double the figure after World War II.

Today, international considerations in antitrust enforcement are in the mainstream of our enforcement activity. The Antitrust Division currently has some thirty active Sherman Act matters with major international aspects—nearly double the number that were ongoing just one year ago. And the number that were ongoing a year ago was itself high by historical standards, reflecting the renewed emphasis on international enforcement that Jim Rill, my predecessor under President Bush, had already begun.

More and more often, the evidence we need is located abroad. Unfortunately, evidence that is located abroad is far too often evidence that is beyond our reach—whether it is in the hands of private firms or individuals, or in the possession of a foreign antitrust enforcement agency. And when we cannot enforce our antitrust laws against foreign anticompetitive conduct because we cannot get the evidence, it is American consumers and American businesses that bear the cost.

The International Antitrust Enforcement Assistance Act would give us the tools we need to get foreign-located antitrust evidence that is beyond our reach today. The bill would enable the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission to enlist the help of foreign antitrust enforcers to get crucial antitrust evidence already in the foreign agencies' files, or in the possession of persons in their territory, by allowing us to offer reciprocal assistance in their antitrust investigations.

The Need for Foreign-Located Evidence

I noted a moment ago that the Antitrust Division currently has some thirty active Sherman Act investigations and cases with substantial international aspects. The most difficult challenge in these matters—and too often the biggest frustration—is getting information and documents from outside the United States. Many of these investigations involve straight-out cartel conduct aimed at American businesses and consumers. In several of these investigations, there is a serious possibility we will be unable to get the evidence to prosecute because crucial witnesses or documents are abroad and beyond our reach.

In some of these cases, only the U.S. is targeted and only U.S. antitrust laws are involved. Others of these cartels are aimed at both U.S. and foreign markets, and could be far more effectively investigated and prosecuted by joint action between U.S. and foreign antitrust authorities. In one such investigation recently, we seriously considered launching a coordinated investigation with a foreign antitrust authority; but we recognized that provisions in both our laws would have prevented our sharing the evidence we obtained in our respective territories. We have good reason to believe the foreign antitrust authority involved could have obtained valuable evidence that was beyond our reach.

* * * *

. . . I know you are familiar with the parallel settlements last month of the U.S. and European Commission antitrust cases against Microsoft. It is absolutely clear that our cooperation with the European Commission in that case led to faster, more effective and consistent relief than would have been possible for either us or the European Commission working alone. . . .

But cooperation in the Microsoft case was possible only because Microsoft agreed that the Justice Department and the European Commission could share information Microsoft had provided to the two agencies. Cooperation with Canada in the plastic dinnerware and fax paper cartel cases was possible only because the U.S.-Canada MLAT came into play. With H.R. 4781 we will be able to expand this kind of cooperation, to come closer to the day when cartels can no longer prey on the American market from safe havens abroad.

All of the antitrust agreements we have entered into in the past with some of our foreign counterparts fall short, because they are limited by existing law. None of these agreements allows the enforcement agencies to share investigative information whose confidentiality is protected under national law. And none of them allows an antitrust agency to obtain information from private parties on a compulsory basis to assist an antitrust investigation in the other country. Even our 1991 agreement with the European Commission—the most recent of our existing antitrust agreements—would not have allowed us to discuss the evidence in our respective cases if Microsoft had not waived its objection to our doing so.

The vital importance of cooperation and access to foreign-located evidence has been recognized in other areas of economic law, where there are cooperative arrangements for access to foreign evidence that far surpass what can be done under present law in antitrust enforcement. Notably, in the securities area—where the internationalization of the securities marketplace beginning in the 1980's highlighted the need for international cooperation in policing securities markets—the SEC has fifteen memoranda of understanding with its foreign counterparts under which it can obtain confidential investigative information and seek assistance in obtaining overseas evidence, in exchange for the SEC's agreement to reciprocate. Similar arrangements exist for tax law enforcement.

This is the kind of authority we need for antitrust—authority that will expand our ability to protect businesses and consumers from anticompetitive conduct, wherever it takes place, that violates our antitrust laws. We need to be able to ask our foreign counterparts for information in their investigative files. We need to be able to ask our foreign counterparts to obtain information for us from companies and individuals in their territory. And in order to get that kind of cooperation, we need legislation that will allow us to reciprocate.

United States–Australia International Antitrust Assistance Agreement

On April 27, 1999, the Department of Justice announced that Attorney General Janet Reno, FTC Chairman Robert Pitofsky and Australian Treasurer Peter Costello had signed the first antitrust mutual assistance agreement under the IAEAA. As noted in a press statement of that date, the agreement had been published for public comment in April 1997 (62 Fed. Reg. 20,022 (Apr. 24, 1997), as corrected 62 Fed. Reg. 24,131 and 24,159 (both May 2, 1997)) and would become effective after publication in the Federal Register and consideration by the Australian Parliament. The press release is available at www.usdoj.gov/atr/public/press_releases/1999/2382.htm. The agreement was published May 5, 1999. 64 Fed. Reg. 24,178 (May 5, 1999) and is also available at www.usdoj.gov/atr/public/international/docs/usaus57.htm.

4. Bilateral Antitrust Cooperation Agreements

In addition to the antitrust mutual legal assistance agreements authorized by the IAEAA and the two EU agreements, see E.2. and 3. supra, the Attorney General and the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission also signed a number of bilateral antitrust cooperation agreements during the 1990s. A new agreement was concluded with Canada in 1995 (replacing the existing 1984 agreement), and agreements were completed with Israel, Japan and Brazil during 1999. These agreements contained provisions for enforcement cooperation and coordination, "positive comity," notification of enforcement actions that might affect the other country, conflict avoidance and consultations with respect to enforcement actions, and effective confidentiality provisions. Texts of these agreements are available on the U.S. Department of Justice Antitrust Division's official web site at www.usdoj.gov/atr/public/international/int_arrangements.htm.

5. Antitrust Enforcement Guidelines for International Operations (1995)

In April 1995 the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission revised, updated, and reissued guidelines for enforcement of the U.S. antitrust laws upon businesses with international operations. Excerpted below is the introduction to the guidelines, which explained the scope and intent of the guidelines, as well as the topics covered. The guidelines also provided a summary list of antitrust-related statutes that may be enforced upon international operations.

The full text of the guidelines are available at www.usdoj.gov/atr/public/guidelines/internat.htm.

1. INTRODUCTION

For more than a century, the U.S. antitrust laws have stood as the ultimate protector of the competitive process that underlies our free market economy. Through this process, which enhances consumer choice and promotes competitive prices, society as a whole benefits from the best possible allocation of resources.

Although the federal antitrust laws have always applied to foreign commerce, that application is particularly important today. Throughout the world, the importance of antitrust law as a means to ensure open and free markets, protect consumers, and prevent conduct that impedes competition is becoming more apparent. The Department of Justice ("the Department") and the Federal Trade Commission ("the Commission" or "FTC") (when referred to collectively, "the Agencies"), as the federal agencies charged with the responsibility of enforcing the antitrust laws, thus have made it a high priority to enforce the antitrust laws with respect to international operations and to cooperate wherever appropriate with foreign authorities regarding such enforcement. In furtherance of this priority, the Agencies have revised and updated the Department's 1988 Antitrust Enforcement Guidelines for International Operations, which are hereby withdrawn.

The 1995 Antitrust Enforcement Guidelines for International Operations (hereinafter "Guidelines") are intended to provide antitrust guidance to businesses engaged in international operations on questions that relate specifically to the Agencies' international enforcement policy. They do not, therefore, provide a complete statement of the Agencies' general enforcement policies. The topics covered include the Agencies' subject matter jurisdiction over conduct and entities outside the United States and the considerations, issues, policies, and processes that govern their decision to exercise that jurisdiction; comity; mutual assistance in international antitrust enforcement; and the effects of foreign governmental involvement on the antitrust liability of private entities. In addition, the Guidelines discuss the relationship between antitrust and international trade initiatives. Finally, to illustrate how these principles may operate in certain contexts, the Guidelines include a number of examples.

As is the case with all guidelines, users should rely on qualified counsel to assist them in evaluating the antitrust risk associated with any contemplated transaction or activity. No set of guidelines can possibly indicate how the Agencies will assess the particular facts of every case. Persons seeking more specific advance statements of enforcement intentions with respect to the matters treated in these Guidelines should use the Department's Business Review procedure, the Commission's Advisory Opinion procedure, or one of the more specific procedures described below for particular types of transactions.

A. LAW OF THE SEA

1. United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea

a. U.S. transmittal to Senate for advice and consent

On July 29, 1994, the United States signed the Agreement Relating to the Implementation of Part XI of the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea ("1994 Agreement"), available at www.un.org/Depts/los/convention_agreements/convention_overview_convention.htm. On October 7, 1994, President William J. Clinton transmitted the 1994 Agreement and the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea ("UNCLOS"), 1836 U.N.T.S.41, to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification of the 1994 Agreement and to accession to UNCLOS. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–39 (1994). The text of UNCLOS is reprinted at 21 I.L.M. 1261 (1982), also available at http://www.un.org/Depts/los/convention_agreements/convention_overview_convention.htm.

As noted in the excerpts below from the President's letter transmitting the instruments to the Senate and from the report of the Department of State submitting the instruments to the President, the United States had long been a strong supporter of the need for a widely accepted and comprehensive law of the sea convention. At the time UNCLOS was adopted in 1982, however, the United States decided not to sign because of objections to the regime it would have established in Part XI for managing the development of seabed mineral resources beyond national jurisdiction, a view shared by other major industrialized nations. The changes to that regime contained in the 1994 Agreement were described in the President's letter as "meet[ing] the objections of the United States and other industrialized nations previously expressed to Part XI."

UNCLOS entered into force for States Parties on November 16, 1994. The 1994 Agreement provided for provisional application as of that date, pending its entry into force or until November 16, 1998, whichever was earlier. The 1994 Agreement entered into force definitively on July 28, 1996. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee held hearings on the two instruments on October 14 and 21, 2003, but at the time this volume was going to press neither had yet received the Senate's advice and consent.

Other documents referred to in the excerpts that follow, including an extensive commentary prepared by the Department of State on the provisions of the two instruments, are included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–39, reprinted in 34 I.L.M. 1393 (1995) and 6 Dep't St. Dispatch Supp.1 (Feb. 1995), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html. See also Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 2006–14, Digest 2001 at 675–76.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to accession, the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, with Annexes, done at Montego Bay, December 10, 1982 (the "Convention"), and, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Agreement Relating to the Implementation of Part XI of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982, with Annex, adopted at New York, July 28, 1994 (the "Agreement"), and signed by the United States, subject to ratification, on July 29, 1994. Also transmitted for the information of the Senate is the report of the Department of State with respect to the Convention and Agreement, as well as Resolution II of Annex I and Annex II of the Final Act of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea.

The United States has basic and enduring national interests in the oceans and has consistently taken the view that the full range of these interests is best protected through a widely accepted international framework governing uses of the sea. Since the late 1960s, the basic U.S. strategy has been to conclude a comprehensive treaty on the law of the sea that will be respected by all countries. Each succeeding U.S. Administration has recognized this as the cornerstone of U.S. oceans policy. Following adoption of the Convention in 1982, it has been the policy of the United States to act in a manner consistent with its provisions relating to traditional uses of the oceans and to encourage other countries to do likewise.

Notwithstanding [the] beneficial provisions of the Convention and bipartisan support for them, the United States decided not to sign the Convention in 1982 because of flaws in the regime it would have established for managing the development of mineral resources of the seabed beyond national jurisdiction (Part XI). . . .

. . . The Agreement, signed by the United States on July 29, 1994, fundamentally changes the deep seabed mining regime of the Convention. As described in the report of the Secretary of State, the Agreement meets the objections the United States and other industrialized nations previously expressed to Part XI. It promises to provide a stable and internationally recognized framework for mining to proceed in response to future demand for minerals.

Early adherence by the United States to the Convention and the Agreement is important to maintain a stable legal regime for all uses of the sea, which covers more than 70 percent of the surface of the globe. Maintenance of such stability is vital to U.S. national security and economic strength.

I therefore recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to the Convention and to the Agreement and give its advice and consent to accession to the Convention and to ratification of the Agreement. Should the Senate give such advice and consent, I intend to exercise the options concerning dispute settlement recommended in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State.

LETTER OF SUBMITTAL

* * * *

THE CONVENTION

The Convention provides a comprehensive framework with respect to uses of the oceans. It creates a structure for the governance and protection of all marine areas, including the airspace above and the seabed and subsoil below. After decades of dispute and negotiation, the Convention reflects consensus on the extent of jurisdiction that States may exercise off their coasts and allocates rights and duties among States. The Convention provides for a territorial sea of a maximum breadth of 12 nautical miles and coastal State sovereign rights over fisheries and other natural resources in an Exclusive Economic Zone (EEZ) that may extend to 200 nautical miles from the coast. In so doing, the Convention brings most fisheries under the jurisdiction of coastal States. (Some 90 percent of living marine resources are harvested within 200 nautical miles of the coast.) The Convention imposes on coastal States a duty to conserve these resources, as well as obligations upon all States to cooperate in the conservation of fisheries populations on the high seas and such populations that are found both on the high seas and within the EEZ (highly migratory stocks, such as tuna, as well as "straddling stocks"). In addition, it provides for special protective measures for anadromous species, such as salmon, and for marine mammals, such as whales.

The Convention also accords the coastal State sovereign rights over the exploration and development of non-living resources, including oil and gas, found in the seabed and subsoil of the continental shelf, which is defined to extend to 200 nautical miles from the coast or, where the continental margin extends beyond that limit, to the outer edge of the geological continental margin. It lays down specific criteria and procedures for determining the outer limit of the margin.

The Convention carefully balances the interests of States in controlling activities off their own coasts with those of all States in protecting the freedom to use ocean spaces without undue interference. It specifically preserves and elaborates the rights of military and commercial navigation and overflight in areas under coastal State jurisdiction and on the high seas beyond. It guarantees passage for all ships and aircraft through, under and over straits used for international navigation and archipelagos. It also guarantees the high seas freedoms of navigation, overflight and the laying and maintenance of submarine cables and pipelines in the EEZ and on the continental shelf.

For the non-living resources of the seabed beyond the limits of national jurisdiction (i.e., beyond the EEZ or continental margin, whichever is further seaward), the Convention establishes an international regime to govern exploration and exploitation of such resources. It defines the general conditions for access to deep seabed minerals by commercial entities and provides for the establishment of an international organization, the International Seabed Authority, to grant title to mine sites and establish necessary ground rules. The system was substantially modified by the 1994 Agreement, discussed below.

The Convention sets forth a comprehensive legal framework and basic obligations for protecting the marine environment from all sources of pollution, including pollution from vessels, from dumping, from seabed activities and from land-based activities. It creates a positive and unprecedented regime for marine environmental protection that will compel parties to come together to address issues of common and pressing concern. As such, the Convention is the strongest comprehensive environmental treaty now in existence or likely to emerge for quite some time.

The essential role of marine scientific research in understanding and managing the oceans is also secured. The Convention affirms the right of all States to conduct marine scientific research and sets forth obligations to promote and cooperate in such research. It confirms the rights of coastal States to require consent for such research undertaken in marine areas under their jurisdiction. These rights are balanced by specific criteria to ensure that coastal States exercise the consent authority in a predictable and reasonable fashion to promote maximum access for research activities.

The Convention establishes a dispute settlement system to promote compliance with its provisions and the peaceful settlement of disputes. These procedures are flexible, in providing options as to the appropriate means and fora for resolution of disputes, and comprehensive, in subjecting the bulk of the Convention's provisions to enforcement through binding mechanisms. The system also provides Parties the means of excluding from binding dispute settlement certain sensitive political and defense matters.

Further analysis of provisions of the Convention's 17 Parts, comprising 320 articles and nine Annexes, is set forth in the Commentary that is enclosed as part of this Report.

THE AGREEMENT

The achievement of a widely accepted and comprehensive law of the sea convention—to which the United States can become a Party—has been a consistent objective of successive U.S. administrations for the past quarter century. However, the United States decided not to sign the Convention upon its adoption in 1982 because of objections to the regime it would have established for managing the development of seabed mineral resources beyond national jurisdiction. While the other Parts of the Convention were judged beneficial for U.S. ocean policy interests, the United States determined the deep seabed regime of Part XI to be inadequate and in need of reform before the United States could consider becoming Party to the Convention.

Similar objections to Part XI also deterred all other major industrialized nations from adhering to the Convention. However, as a result of the important international political and economic changes of the last decade—including the end of the Cold War and growing reliance on free market principles—widespread recognition emerged that the seabed mining regime of the Convention required basic change in order to make it generally acceptable. As a result, informal negotiations were launched in 1990, under the auspices of the United Nations Secretary-General, that resulted in adoption of the Agreement on July 28, 1994.

The legally binding changes set forth in the Agreement meet the objections of the United States to Part XI of the Convention. The United States and all other major industrialized nations have signed the Agreement.

The provisions of the Agreement overhaul the decision-making procedures of Part XI to accord the United States, and others with major economic interests at stake, adequate influence over future decisions on possible deep seabed mining. The Agreement guarantees a seat for the United States on the critical executive body and requires a consensus of major contributors for financial decisions.

The Agreement restructures the deep seabed mining regime along free market principles and meets the U.S. goal of guaranteed access by U.S. firms to deep seabed minerals on the basis of reasonable terms and conditions. It eliminates mandatory transfer of technology and production controls. It scales back the structure of the organization to administer the mining regime and links the activation and operation of institutions to the actual development of concrete commercial interest in seabed mining. A future decision, which the United States and a few of its allies can block, is required before the organization's potential operating arm (the Enterprise) may be activated, and any activities on its part are subject to the same requirements that apply to private mining companies. States have no obligation to finance the Enterprise, and subsidies inconsistent with GATT are prohibited.

The Agreement provides for grandfathering the seabed mine site claims established on the basis of the exploration work already conducted by companies holding U.S. licenses on the basis of arrangements "similar to and no less favorable than" the best terms granted to previous claimants; further, it strengthens the provisions requiring consideration of the potential environmental impacts of deep seabed mining.

The Agreement provides for its provisional application from November 16, 1994, pending its entry into force. Without such a provision, the Convention would enter into force on that date with its objectionable seabed mining provisions unchanged. Provisional application may continue only for a limited period, pending entry into force. Provisional application would terminate on November 16, 1998, if the Agreement has not entered into force due to failure of a sufficient number of industrialized States to become Parties. Further, the Agreement provides flexibility in allowing States to apply it provisionally in accordance with their domestic laws and regulations.

In signing the agreement on July 29, 1994, the United States indicated that it intends to apply the agreement provisionally pending ratification. Provisional application by the United States will permit the advancement of U.S. seabed mining interests by U.S. participation in the International Seabed Authority from the outset to ensure that the implementation of the regime is consistent with those interests, while doing so consistent with existing laws and regulations.

Further analysis of the Agreement and its Annex, including analysis of the provisions of Part XI of the Convention as modified by the Agreement, is also set forth in the Commentary that follows.

STATUS OF THE CONVENTION AND THE AGREEMENT

One hundred and fifty-two States signed the Convention during the two years it was open for signature. As of September 8, 1994, 65 States had deposited their instruments of ratification, accession or succession to the Convention. The Convention will enter into force for these States on November 16, 1994, and thereafter for other States 30 days after deposit of their instruments of ratification or accession.

The United States joined 120 other States in voting for adoption of the Agreement on July 28, 1994; there were no negative votes and seven abstentions. As of September 8, 1994, 50 States and the European Community have signed the Agreement, of which 19 had previously ratified the Convention. Eighteen developed States have signed the Agreement, including the United States, all the members of the European Community, Japan, Canada and Australia, as well as major developing countries, such as Brazil, China and India.

RELATION TO THE 1958 GENEVA CONVENTIONS

Article 311(1) of the LOS Convention provides that the Convention will prevail, as between States Parties, over the four Geneva Conventions on the Law of the Sea of April 29, 1958, which are currently in force for the United States: the Convention on the Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone, 15 U.S.T. 1606, TIAS No. 5639, 516 U.N.T.S. 205 (entered into force September 10, 1964); the Convention on the High Seas, 13 U.S.T. 2312, TIAS No. 5200, 450 U.N.T.S. 82 (entered into force September 30, 1962); Convention on the Continental Shelf, 15 U.S.T. 471, TIAS No. 5578, 499 U.N.T.S. 311 (entered into force June 10, 1964); and the Convention on Fishing and Conservation of Living Resources of the High Seas, 17 U.S.T. 138, TIAS No. 5969, 559 U.N.T.S. 285 (entered into force March 20, 1966). Virtually all of the provisions of these Conventions are either repeated, modified, or replaced by the provisions of the LOS Convention.

DISPUTE SETTLEMENT

The Convention identifies four potential fora for binding dispute settlement:

> —The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea constituted under Annex VI;
> —The International Court of Justice;
> —An arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with Annex VII; and > —A special arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with Annex VIII for specified categories of disputes.

A State, when adhering to the Convention, or at any time thereafter, is able to choose, by written declaration, one or more of these means for the settlement of disputes under the Convention. If the parties to a dispute have not accepted the same procedure for the settlement of the dispute, it may be submitted only to arbitration in accordance with Annex VII, unless the parties otherwise agree. If a Party has failed to announce its choice of forum, it is deemed to have accepted arbitration in accordance with Annex VII. I recommend that the United States choose special arbitration for all the categories of disputes to which it may be applied and Annex VII arbitration for disputes not covered by the above, and thus that the United States make the following declaration:

The Government of the United States of America declares, in accordance with paragraph 1 of Article 287, that it chooses the following means for the settlement of disputes concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention:

> (A) a special arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with Annex VIII for the settlement of disputes concerning the interpretation or application of the articles of the Convention relating to (1) fisheries, (2) protection and preservation of the marine environment, (3) marine scientific research, and (4) navigation, including pollution from vessels and by dumping, and (B) an arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with Annex VII for the settlement of disputes not covered by the declaration in (A) above.

Subject to limited exceptions, the Convention excludes from binding dispute settlement disputes relating to the sovereign rights of coastal States with respect to the living resources in their EEZs. In addition, the Convention permits a State to opt out of binding dispute settlement procedures with respect to one or more enumerated categories of disputes, namely disputes regarding maritime boundaries between neighboring States, disputes concerning military activities and certain law enforcement activities, and disputes in respect of which the United Nations Security Council is exercising the functions assigned to it by the Charter of the United Nations.

I recommend that the United States elect to exclude all three of these categories of disputes from binding dispute settlement, and thus that the United States make the following declaration:

> The Government of the United States of America declares, in accordance with paragraph 1 of Article 298, that it does not accept the procedures provided for in section 2 of Part XV with respect to the categories of disputes set forth in subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) of that paragraph.

b. Strategic context of the law of the sea

On April 22, 1992, Rear Admiral William L. Schachte, Jr., Judge Advocate General's Corps, U.S. Navy, addressed the International Law of the Sea Conference in Valparaiso, Chile, on the status and importance of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea. In particular, his remarks focused on the vital interests of national security, commercial relations, and global stability, as provided in excerpts below.

The full text of Rear Admiral Schachte's remarks is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

From a U.S. point of view, while the specific threats we will face in the years ahead undoubtedly will be different from those that have dominated our thinking over the past forty years, capable, vigilant forces will be required to deter aggression and, if deterrence fails, to defend vital interests. As stated in the recently published National Security Strategy of the United States, the foundations of this strategy are: ensuring strategic deterrence; exercising forward presence in key areas; responding effectively to crises; and retaining the national capacity to reconstitute forces should this ever be needed.[1]

Each of these foundations is dependent, in significant part, on exercising navigation and overflight rights and other traditional uses of the oceans in a manner that is consistent with the 1982 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea. (fn. omitted).

It is widely recognized by the international community that these provisions provide a fair balance between coastal and maritime interests, and this was also pointed out by President Reagan in his 1983 Ocean Policy Statement.[3] This balance includes the preservation of vital navigational freedoms relied upon by our naval forces and much of our commerce. Just as importantly, since the close of the Conference that produced the 1982 U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, the Convention has served as a basis for settling differences between nations and for persuading nations to adopt maritime regimes consistent with customary international law as reflected in the Convention. Thus, upholding the integrity of the Convention (aside from Part XI) is in the interest of both maritime and littoral nations. It is in their interest to ensure that the Convention remains the principal articulation of the law of the sea.

A case in point is how the exercise of the navigational rights and freedoms embodied in the 1982 Convention are used by naval forces. In many States, these rights and responsibilities are a prominent component of operating guidance and orders used by forces at all levels, who look to the Convention as an authoritative embodiment of rules for the maritime environment. For the United States, an example of the Convention's influence and impact is the Commander's Handbook on the Law of Naval Operations, a U.S. Navy and U.S. Marine Corps warfare publication, which addresses both the law of the sea and law of naval warfare.[4] For military lawyers, an Annotated version has been developed, containing legal analyses, citations, and supplementary annexes.[5]

Law of the Sea—Current Status

While the 1982 Convention has not entered into force, it continues to serve important functions. The Convention's most significant impact comes not from producing new law, but from restating and codifying existing law, especially in the navigation, overflight, and other traditional use articles. By serving as a single source of authority for the content and meaning of customary international law, it should guide the behavior of nations, promoting stability of expectations, and providing a framework for issue resolution.

Nothing illustrates this better than our recent experiences in the Persian Gulf. After Iraqi forces invaded Kuwait, the United States demonstrated its resolve by promptly moving forward naval forces already deployed in the region. In order to confront the Iraqi aggression, a massive deployment of troops followed, most arriving by sea. (fn. omitted) As a member of the coalition, the United States undertook its largest strategic sealift of supplies in history, with more than 250 ships carrying nearly 18.5 billion pounds of equipment and supplies to sustain DESERT SHIELD and DESERT STORM forces. (fn. omitted) Also, in the ten-month period starting in August 1990, the coalition's maritime interception force of more than 165 ships from 14 allied nations challenged more than 10,000 merchant vessels, boarding nearly 1,500 to inspect manifests and cargo holds and diverting over 75 vessels for violation of UN sanction guidelines. (fn. omitted) While enroute to the Gulf area and while performing their duties on arrival, coalition ships and aircraft repeatedly exercised the rights of innocent passage, transit passage, archipelagic sea lanes passage, and high seas freedoms confirmed by the 1982 Convention.

Thus, DESERT SHIELD and DESERT STORM demonstrated, in a very tangible way, the absolute necessity for successful power projection, which cannot be accomplished without seapower. And seapower relies on freedom of navigation and overflight—freedoms guaranteed as a matter of international law and reflected in the Convention.

Another example of the Convention's impact today is marine environmental protection. In this regard, many nations, including the United States, believe that the Convention reflects customary international law for protecting and preserving the marine environment and is the first comprehensive approach to addressing this important area. The Convention is comprehensive in that it: (1) addresses State responsibility to curb all sources of marine pollution, and (2) requires those efforts give due regard to important maritime uses such as marine scientific research. The Convention also codifies basic navigational rights such as innocent passage in the territorial sea, high seas freedoms beyond the territorial sea, transit passage through straits and sea lanes passage through archipelagic waters.

Environmental regimes must be consistent with those rights. The Convention thus recognizes the delicate balance between protecting and preserving the environment and other competing interests, and provides the balanced framework for environmental norms that now are being further developed.

From a national security perspective, an important example of this balancing of interests is the special nature of sovereign immune vessels and aircraft set forth in Article 236. While this article excludes sovereign immune vessels and aircraft from the Convention's environmental provisions, it requires that each State ensure that such ships and aircraft act in a manner consistent with those provisions "so far as is reasonable and practicable" without impairing their operations or operational capabilities.

States cannot use or construe the sovereign immunity provision to avoid responsibility for protecting the environment. In fact, the U.S. Department of Defense and the U.S. Navy view Part XII and Article 236 of the Convention as a mandate to ensure continued responsibility for environmentally sound practices, and have included environmental awareness programs in Department of Defense activities as part of the national security mission. (fn. omitted) Examples include incorporation of hardware on board our ships to remove oil from bilge discharges, installing shipboard trash compactors, using recycled steel grit and plastic beads to remove old paint (instead of toxic chemical methods), and revising procurement practices (which has been successful in removing or reducing plastic packaging of over 70,000 items in our supply system).[10]

State practice also demonstrates widespread acknowledgement that the non-deep seabed mining provisions of the Convention reflect customary international law. For example, as of January,

2. Extension of U.S. Contiguous Zone

On September 2, 1999, President William J. Clinton issued Proclamation 7219 establishing the contiguous zone of the United States as extending to 24 nautical miles, consistent with international law, as excerpted below. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1684 (Sept. 2, 1999); 64 Fed. Reg. 48,701 (Sept. 8, 1999).

International law recognizes that coastal nations may establish zones contiguous to their territorial seas, known as contiguous zones.

The contiguous zone of the United States is a zone contiguous to the territorial sea of the United States, in which the United States may exercise the control necessary to prevent infringement of its customs, fiscal, immigration, or sanitary laws and regulations within its territory or territorial sea, and to punish infringement of the above laws and regulations committed within its territory or territorial sea.

Extension of the contiguous zone of the United States to the limits permitted by international law will advance the law enforcement and public health interests of the United States.

[11] Ocean Policy News, January 1992, p. 5, Council on Ocean Law, Washington, DC.

Moreover, this extension is an important step in preventing the removal of cultural heritage found within 24 nautical miles of the baseline.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, WILLIAM J. CLINTON, by the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution of the United States, and in accordance with international law, do hereby proclaim the extension of the contiguous zone of the United States of America, including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the United States Virgin Islands, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, and any other territory or possession over which the United States exercises sovereignty, as follows:

The contiguous zone of the United States extends to 24 nautical miles from the baselines of the United States determined in accordance with international law, but in no case within the territorial sea of another nation.

In accordance with international law, reflected in the applicable provisions of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea, within the contiguous zone of the United States the ships and aircraft of all countries enjoy the high seas freedoms of navigation and overflight and the laying of submarine cables and pipelines, and other internationally lawful uses of the sea related to those freedoms, such as those associated with the operation of ships, aircraft, and submarine cables and pipelines, and compatible with the other provisions of international law reflected in the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea.

Nothing in this proclamation:

(a) amends existing Federal or State law;
(b) amends or otherwise alters the rights and duties of the United States or other nations in the Exclusive Economic Zone of the United States established by Proclamation 5030 of March 10, 1983; or
(c) impairs the determination, in accordance with international law, of any maritime boundary of the United States with a foreign jurisdiction.

3. Maritime Boundary Treaties

a. United States-Mexico

On October 22, 1997, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations ("SFRC") reported favorably the Treaty on Maritime Boundaries between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, signed at Mexico City on May 4, 1978, and recommended that the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification. S. Exec. Rpt. No. 105–4 (1997). As explained in the SFRC report, the treaty "is intended to establish the maritime boundary between the United States and Mexico for the area between twelve and two hundred nautical miles off the coasts of the two countries in the Pacific Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico. The treaty was transmitted to the Senate by President Jimmy Carter on January 19, 1979. S. Treaty Doc. No. 96–6 (1979). It was originally favorably reported to the Senate on July 24, 1980, but was not considered by the full Senate at that time.

The SFRC report explained that, during the Committee's 1980 consideration of the treaty, three issues were raised: "(1) the method used to calculate the boundaries; (2) the allocation to Mexico of a large region in the Gulf of Mexico with an undetermined oil potential, and (3) the legality of the Administration establishing maritime boundaries on a provisional basis by means of executive agreements," as had been done since 1976 with Mexico. In 1997, the Committee concluded that ratification of the treaty would "advance the exploration and development of this area."

Answers to questions for the record posed to Ambassador Mary Beth West, Deputy Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Oceans, Environmental and International Scientific Affairs, U.S. Department of State, were included in S. Exec. Rpt. No. 105–4. Responses to questions on the issue of provisional applicability and concerning gaps not covered by the treaty, as well as oil potential are excerpted below.

The Senate gave advice and consent to ratification on October 23, 1997, and the treaty entered into force on November 13, 1997. For a discussion of the subsequent Treaty Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United Mexican States on the Delimitation of the Continental Shelf in the Western Gulf of Mexico Beyond 200 Nautical Miles, signed at Washington on June 9, 2000 and entered into force on January 17, 2001, see Digest 2000 at 697–700.

Question 1. The exchange of notes accompanying the treaty stated that the two parties would recognize the provisional boundaries set forth in the notes "pending final determination by treaty of the Maritime Boundaries between the two countries off both coasts." The Committee opposed the "provisional" boundary in 1980. What is the legal basis for determining maritime boundaries by executive agreement? Doesn't the fact that the Administration, in its testimony before the Committee last week, cited the need for "legal certainty" as to the border between the U.S. and Mexico indicate that the "provisional" boundary is not an appropriate legal instrument for settling boundaries?

Answer. The Administration fully acknowledges and respects the role of the Senate in the treaty making process. The exchange of notes associated with this treaty, which stated that the two parties would recognize the provisional boundaries set forth in the notes pending final determination by treaty, was within executive power vested in the President, and did not prejudice the prerogatives of the Senate regarding the provision of advice and consent.

As a practical matter, the Administration has viewed the provisional boundary reflected in the exchange of notes as a transitional tool which, pending entry into force of the treaty, has facilitated the exercise of jurisdiction by each side in its respective 200-mile zone. It should be remembered that, at the time of the exchange of notes, the United States and Mexico had recently established their respective 200-mile zones. The provisional boundary dividing these zones has greatly reduced the likelihood of disputes concerning, inter alia, where fishing vessels of each country could operate.

Question 2. The maritime boundaries treaty with Mexico addressed only those areas in the Gulf where U.S. and Mexican claims overlapped, and as a result left a gap of about 129 miles between the eastward and westward boundaries where there was no overlap. That gap was justified in part on the basis that negotiations over the reach and allocation of the continental shelf were still in process in the Law of the Sea proceedings. Is Mexico prepared to negotiate a follow-on treaty delimiting the "gap" areas?

Answer. We have raised the issue of delimiting the continental shelf in the western gap with Mexican Government officials, and have been informed that their desire was first to get the 1978 Treaty in force. It is our intent, at the time instruments of ratification are exchanged for the 1978 treaty, to propose early talks to establish a continental shelf boundary in this 129-mile gap.

Question 3. Action on the treaty in 1980 was apparently forestalled because of concerns about the oil potential of the Gulf region ceded to Mexico. What is the oil potential of the Gulf Region claimed by Mexico? By the United States? What is the oil potential of the Pacific Region claimed by the United States? Of Mexico? Does the technology exist to exploit that potential? What is the realistic timetable for exploitation of these regions?

Answer. The resource potential in the boundary areas was discussed in the 1982 U.S. Geological Survey study submitted to the Committee. A more recent general assessment for the Gulf of Mexico by the Minerals Management Service (MMS) did not evaluate the specific boundary areas. The estimate for the area between 900 meters water depth and the Sigsbee Escarpment in the Gulf was between 3.0 and 5.4 billion barrels of oil and 34.2 and 39.4 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. Recent exploratory drilling elsewhere beyond the Sigsbee Escarpment has indicated that hydrocarbon accumulations do exist within these sediments. Thus, the area adjacent to the U.S.-Mexico boundary in the Gulf of Mexico is an area of high potential, as confirmed by recent industry interest.

b. U.S.-U.K. treaties concerning the Caribbean

On March 9, 1994, President William J. Clinton transmitted two maritime boundary treaties with the United Kingdom to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification: Treaty Between the United States and the United Kingdom on the Delimitation in the Caribbean of a Maritime Boundary Relating to the U.S. Virgin Islands and Anguilla and the Treaty Between the United States and United Kingdom on the Delimitation in the Caribbean of a Maritime Boundary Relating to Puerto Rico/U.S. Virgin Islands and the British Virgin Islands, with Annex, both signed at London, November 5, 1993. 1913 U.N.T.S. 59 and 67, respectively. Excerpts below from the report of the Department of State submitting the treaties to the President and accompanying the President's letter of transmittal describe key elements of the treaties. See S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–23 (1994). Both treaties entered into force June 1, 1995. The treaties are also analyzed in Department of State publication Limits in the Seas No. 115 (1994), available at www.law.fsu.edu/library/collection/LimitsinSeas/index.php.

THE PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit to you, with a view to the transmittal to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification, the Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom on the Delimitation in the Caribbean of a Maritime Boundary Relating to the U.S. Virgin Islands and Anguilla and the Treaty between the United States and United Kingdom on the Delimitation in the Caribbean of a Maritime Boundary Relating to Puerto Rico/U.S. Virgin Islands and the British Virgin Islands, with Annex. Both treaties were signed at London, November 5, 1993. For the purpose of illustration only, the boundary lines have been drawn on maps attached to each treaty.

The maritime boundary treaties define the limits within which each Party may exercise territorial sea jurisdiction, fishery jurisdiction, or exclusive economic zone jurisdiction in areas where their claimed territorial seas or 200 nautical mile zones would otherwise overlap.

On March 1, 1977, the United States enacted the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, which established a fisheries zone contiguous to the territorial sea of the United States, including the territorial sea around Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands. The outer limit of the U.S.-claimed fishery zone adjacent to the United Kingdom fishery zone was a line equally distant from the territories of the United States and the United Kingdom. In 1983, this became the limit of the United States exclusive economic zone.

On March 9, 1977, by Proclamation of the Governor of the British Virgin Islands, a fisheries zone was established contiguous to the territorial sea of the British Virgin Islands. On November 6, 1981, by Proclamation No. 28, the United Kingdom extended the fishery limits of Anguilla to 200 nautical miles.

On March 27, 1979, the United States and United Kingdom signed a reciprocal fisheries agreement applying to the waters between the United States Caribbean territories and the British Virgin Islands. This agreement entered into force upon the exchange of instruments of ratification on March 10, 1983, following advice and consent to ratification by the Senate (TIAS 10545). In this agreement, the two Governments noted that they had a common approach based on the principle of equidistance regarding the limits of fishery jurisdiction as between the British Virgin Islands and the United States.

In 1980, both Governments agreed to undertake the technical work necessary to determine equidistant lines as the maritime boundaries between the United States and the British Virgin Islands and between the United States and Anguilla. During the 1980s, new coastline surveys were conducted on these islands in order to establish maritime boundaries based on the best available technology. Accurate delimitation of the boundaries called for determining the exact location of the base points on each coast from which to construct the equidistant line. This determination involved placing all geographical locations on a common datum, the North American Datum 1983 (NAD 83). The technical data was available by the early 1990s, and the technical calculations were completed by mid-1993.

In the calculation of the maritime boundary with the British Virgin Islands, simplification of the equidistant line was performed in order to reduce the number of boundary turning points from 126 to a more manageable 50 points.

c. United States—Niue

On June 23, 1998, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Treaty Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Niue on the Delimitation of a Maritime Boundary, signed in Wellington May 13, 1997. The treaty is also analyzed in Department of State publication Limits in the Seas No. 119 (1997), available at www.law.fsu.edu/library/collection/LimitsinSeas/index.php. The Senate gave advice and consent to ratification on August 1, 2002. The treaty entered into force October 8, 2004. Excerpts below from the Department of State report submitting the treaty to the President for transmittal to the Senate describe key aspects. See S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–53 (1998).

The President: I have the honor to submit to you, with a view to the transmittal to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification, the Treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of Niue on the Delimitation of a Maritime Boundary. This treaty was signed at Wellington, May 13, 1997. For the purpose of illustration only, the boundary has been drawn on a map attached to the treaty.

The maritime boundary treaty defines the limit within which each Party may exercise fishery and other exclusive economic zone (EEZ) jurisdiction in an area where their claimed 200 nautical mile zones would otherwise overlap.

On March 1, 1977, the United States enacted the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, which established a fisheries zone contiguous to the territorial sea of the United States, including the territorial sea around American Samoa. As published in the Federal Register, the United States claimed a fishery zone adjacent to American Samoa as a line equally distant from American Samoa and its neighbors. In 1983, this became the limit of the United States exclusive economic zone.

The Government of Niue first claimed an exclusive economic zone by Act No. 38, effective April 1, 1978. It reiterated its EEZ claim when it enacted the Territorial Sea and Exclusive Economic Zone Act of 1996, which entered into force April 7, 1997.

In 1980, the United States concluded maritime boundary treaties with the Cook Islands and with New Zealand (on behalf of Tokelau) that established maritime boundaries to the east and to the north of American Samoa, respectively. Equidistant lines formed the bases for these boundaries. Following the exchange of instruments of ratification, the boundary treaty with New Zealand entered into force on September 3, 1983; the boundary treaty with the Cook Islands entered into force on September 8, 1983.

In the early 1980s, the Government of the United States and Niue agreed, in principle, that a maritime boundary should be established based on an equidistant line calculated from all relevant territories. No special circumstances exist in the boundary region. The water is deep in this area, and no particular resource issue was identified that required a deviation from an equidistant line.

Both Parties recognized, however, that new coastal geodetic positioning survey work was required for both the American Samoan islands and Niue in order to update existing information, and to place all relevant coastlines on a common datum. Technical work was conducted by both sides during the 1980s and early 1990s. Positioning of coastal areas was placed on the more accurate World Geodetic System 1984 ("WGS 84") and the North American Datum 1983 ("NAD 83"). For the purposes of calculating this boundary, both datums were considered identical.

Prior to signature of the treaty, the political status of Niue was also addressed. Niue is in free association with New Zealand. While Niue is self-governing on internal matters, it conducts its foreign affairs in conjunction with New Zealand. Niue has declared, and does manage, its exclusive economic zone. Therefore, the United States requested, and received, confirmation from New Zealand that the Government of Niue had the competence to enter into this agreement with the United States.

4. Maritime Rights and Freedoms of International Community

a. General

See discussion of UN Convention on the Law of the Sea as relevant to these issues in A.1., supra. See also J. Ashley Roach & Robert W. Smith, United States Responses to Excessive Maritime Claims (2d ed. 1996) (hereafter "Roach and Smith").

b. Legal divisions of oceans

(1) Contiguous zone claims

During the period 1991–1999, the United States protested claims to a contiguous zone that exceeded the rights permitted coastal states under international law, usually involving attempts to expand the competence of the contiguous zone to include protection of national security interests. Protests by the United States included those made to China in August 1992 and to Iran in June 1994. See Roach & Smith at 166–171.

(2) Historic bay claims

In April 1991 the United States delivered a diplomatic note protesting Australia's historic bay claims in South Australia. The substantive portions of the note, as set forth below, were contained in a telegram from the U.S. Department of State to the U.S. Embassy in Canberra, April 6, 1991.

The United States . . . refers to the proclamation of the Governor-General of the Commonwealth of Australia signed on 19 March 1987 and published in the Commonwealth of Australia Gazette No. S57, Tuesday, 31 March 1987, pages 2–4, in which the Governor-General states that he is "satisfied that the following bays, namely: Anxious Bay, Encounter Bay, Lacepede Bay and Rivoli Bay is an historic bay," and proclaims a series of straight baselines across the mouths of those bays which do not appear to meet the criterion for juridical bays.

The United States has reviewed the report of the Commonwealth/South Australian Committee dated February 1986, entitled "South Australian Historic Bays Issue," which the Australian Embassy has kindly provided in response to the request of the United States for evidence that these claims meet the internationally accepted criteria for establishing claims to historic bays.

These criteria require a claiming state to show: a) open, notorious and effective exercise of authority over the bay by the coastal state; b) continuous exercise of that authority; and c) acquiescence by foreign states in the exercise of that authority.

Prior to the issuance of the 19 March 1987 proclamation, the United States was not aware of any claim by the Government of Australia that these bays were historic nor was such a claim mentioned in the United Nations Secretariat Study on Historic Bays, published in 1957 as UN Document A/CONF.13/1 and in 1958 in Volume 1: Preparatory Documents of the First United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, UN Doc. A/CONF.13/37, at pages 1038, or in any other compilation of historic bay claims of which the Untied States is aware.

Having reviewed the evidence submitted by the Government of Australia to support these claims, the United States regrets that it is unable to agree that Anxious, Encounter, Lacepede and Rivoli Bays meet the requirements of international law for historic bays and reserves its rights and those of its nationals in that regard.

The United States notes that effective 20 November 1990 the Government of Australia extended its territorial sea from three to twelve nautical miles. The United Sates is of the view that, with the increased coastal state maritime jurisdiction now permitted under customary international law reflected in the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and other rules of international law reflected therein, no new claim to historic bay or historic waters is needed to meet resource and security interests of the coastal state.

The United States has under study the other straight baselines promulgated by the Government of Australia and this note is without prejudice to our views regarding them.

(3) Straight baselines

In a diplomatic note delivered in June 1991, the United States protested a new Egyptian presidential decree promulgating straight baselines from which to measure the breadth of the Egyptian territorial sea in the Mediterranean, the Gulf of Aqaba, and the Red Sea.

The substantive portions of the note, set forth below, were contained in a telegram of June 8, 1991, from the Department of State to the U.S. Embassy in Cairo.

* * * *

The United States . . . has the honor to refer to Presidential Decree No. 27 of 9 January 1990 entitled "Decree Concerning the Baselines of the Maritime Areas of the Arab Republic of Egypt, 9 January 1990." In this decree co-ordinates of latitude and longitude are listed which establish straight baselines from which the territorial sea of the Arab Republic of Egypt is to be measured. The United States believes that these baselines are not drawn in accordance with the customary rules of international law reflected in the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (LOS Convention), which Egypt has ratified, for the following reasons.

In accordance with Article 5 of the LOS Convention, the normal baseline for measuring the breadth of the territorial sea is the low-water line along the coast as marked on large-scale charts officially recognized by the coastal state. Article 7 of the LOS Convention provides that, as an exception to the normal baseline, in localities in which the coastline is deeply indented and cut into, or where there is a fringe of islands along the coast in its immediate vicinity, the method of straight baselines joining appropriate basepoints may be employed in drawing the baseline from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured.

The United States observes that while the aforementioned decree establishes straight baselines along almost the entire coastline of the Arab Republic of Egypt in the Mediterranean, Gulf of Aqaba and Red Sea, the Egyptian coastline in all seas is generally smooth and gently undulating, and is neither deeply indented and cut into nor fringed with islands along its coast. Hence, in localities where neither criteria is met, the method of straight baselines may not be used; rather, in those areas the low water line, as depicted on official charts, must be used.

With regard to the coordinates referencing locations in the Gulf of Aqaba, Gulf of Suez and the Red Sea, the United States wishes to make the following observations.

The United States notes that the coastline in the vicinity of coordinates 1–32 located in the Gulf of Aqaba is neither masked by a fringe of islands nor is it deeply indented or cut into. The coastline in the vicinity of coordinates 32 and 33 also does not meet these criteria, nor does it constitute a juridical bay within the meaning of Article 10 of the LOS Convention. The United States observes that, whereas it would be possible to construct shorter baselines off the coast between coordinates 32 and 33 which could properly enclose juridical bays, such baselines were not drawn.

Baseline segments 33–36, from Ras Muhammed to the mainland northeast of Port Safaga also satisfy neither criterion.

Baseline segments 36–56 in the Red Sea fail to meet the criteria of areas in which the coastline in the vicinity is deeply indented and cut into, or in which there exists a > fringe of islands along the coast. The coastline in this vicinity is in fact practically void of islands and is relatively free from indentations. Accordingly, the normal baseline—the low water line—must be used in this vicinity.

With regard to straight baseline segments located in the Mediterranean Sea, the United States wishes to make the following observations.

> The Mediterranean Coastline in the vicinity of baseline segments 1–25 is clearly neither deeply indented and cut into, nor is it fringed with islands along the coast. However, segments 25–28 enclose Abu Kir Bay, a juridical bay. The Mediterranean coastline in the vicinity of segments 28–39 is also neither deeply indented and cut into nor fringed with islands in its immediate vicinity. Baseline segments 39–41 are invalid for the same reason.
> Whereas the waters behind the barrier spit between baseline segments 41 and 49 could properly be constituted as internal waters, such can be accomplished by the barrier spit itself, joining by short baseline segments the barrier segments in those few areas in which it is not continuous.
> Baseline segments 49–55 are invalid since the coastline in that vicinity is also neither deeply indented and cut into nor fringed with islands.

For the above reasons, the United States cannot accept the validity in international law of the straight baselines mentioned above as constituting the baseline from which the territorial sea of the Arab Republic of Egypt is to be measured, and reserves its rights and those of its nationals in this regard.

The United States looks forward to the views of the Government of the Arab Republic of Egypt in response to the points raised above.

* * * *

During this period, the United States also protested or asserted rights as to the drawing of straight baselines by other countries as inconsistent with applicable international law, including: to Denmark in 1991, concerning straight baselines around the Faroe Islands; to Iran in 1994 concerning its straight baseline in the Persian Gulf and Gulf of Oman; to Oman in 1991 concerning certain segments of its straight baselines; to Thailand in 1995 concerning its Announcement of June 12, 1970, as amended by Announcement No. 2 (1993), February 2, 1993; to Russia in 1992, concerning its straight baseline closing access to the Barents Sea port of Murmansk. See Roach & Smith at 73–146.

(4) Breadth of territorial sea

(i) Argentina

In July 1991 the United States requested an authoritative statement from the Government of Argentina as to the breadth of its territorial sea claim. At the time of the request, State Department records indicated that Argentina claimed a 200 nautical mile territorial sea by Law No. 17,094 of January 19, 1967, which the United States had protested. That law also stated that freedom of navigation and overflight beyond 12 nautical miles was not affected. Argentina had signed the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea on October 5, 1984, which established twelve nautical miles as the maximum breadth of the territorial sea and authorized coastal states to claim a 200 nautical mile exclusive economic zone. The Department's records did not indicate that Argentina had claimed an exclusive economic zone, ratified the LOS Convention, or otherwise modified its 200 nautical mile territorial sea claim.

A representative of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of Argentina responded that "current GOA practice and doctrine was in full accord with UN Law of the Sea (LOS) Convention establishing 12 nm [nautical miles] as the territorial sea and a 200 nm exclusive economic zone. These criteria have been used in all official documents for the last several years. . . ." Telegram of July 16, 1991, from U.S. Embassy Buenos Aires to Department of State.

(ii) Ecuador

On May 1, 1992, the Secretary of State sent a diplomatic note to chiefs of mission in Washington, D.C. of governments concerned with the International Convention for the Regulation of Whaling, regarding a reservation included in the instrument of adherence deposited with the United States by Ecuador on May 2, 1991. The text of the note is set forth below in full.

The Secretary of State presents his compliments to Their Excellencies and Messieurs and Mesdames the Chiefs of Mission of the Governments concerned with the International Convention for the Regulation of Whaling, signed at Washington on December 2, 1946, and has the honor to refer to his circular note of May 5, 1991 referring to the deposit with the Government of the United States of America on May 2, 1991, by Ecuador of an instrument of adherence which includes a reservation, which, in translation, reads as follows:

None of its provisions may affect or diminish the sovereign rights which Ecuador holds, has exercised, and exercises over its 200 nautical mile territorial sea, both insular and continental.

The Secretary of State wishes to state that, while the United States recognizes the right of Ecuador under international law to exercise fisheries jurisdiction within 200 nautical miles of its coast, the United States does not accept the reservation contained in the instrument of adherence by Ecuador, insofar as it asserts a claim to a territorial sea greater than 12 nautical miles, the maximum limit permitted under international law.

The Secretary of State would be grateful if the Chiefs of Mission would forward this information to their respective Governments.

c. U.S. freedom of navigation program

(1) International straits and navigational freedoms

At the twenty-sixth Law of the Sea Institute annual conference in Genoa, Italy, held from June 20–26, 1992, Rear Admiral William L. Schachte, Jr., Judge Advocate General's Corps, U.S. Navy, Department of Defense Representative for Ocean Policy Affairs, addressed issues presented by the building of bridges across straits used for international navigation. Excerpts from his prepared remarks set forth below addressed the practical problems that bridge-building across international straits pose for international maritime navigation, relevant aspects of the UN Law of the Sea Convention, and a U.S. suggestion for an international approach for appraising future proposals for the construction of bridges over international straits.

The full text of Rear Admiral Schachte's remarks is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

As you may know, Finland filed an application instituting proceedings before the International Court of Justice on May 17, 1991 in the Case entitled "Passage through the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark)." Finland complains that the proposed bridge across the Great Belt (the only deep draught route through the Straits connecting the Baltic with the North Sea) would be a fixed span with 65 metres' clearance, preventing Finnish drilling rigs from being towed in their vertical position under the bridge and thus in Finland's view contrary to international law. . . .*

The United States is not a party to the ICJ case, but my government feels strongly that the basic rules codified in the LOS Convention control. Although the LOS Convention straits articles do not per se address the issue of bridges across straits, the transit passage articles would clearly prohibit the unfettered, unilateral construction of a bridge across a strait used for international navigation (hereafter, an "international strait").

* Editors' note: The ICJ removed the case from its list on September 10, 1992, based on a settlement of the dispute by Finland and Denmark. Order of 10 September 1992—Discontinuance, available at www.icj-cij.org.

II. CONVENTION NAVIGATIONAL REGIMES AND TERMS OF ART WITH EMPHASIS ON THEIR RELEVANCE TO TRANSIT PASSAGE AND APPLICABLE U.S. INTERPRETATIONS

Central to any meaningful understanding of the navigation rights and correlative duties of user and straits States is an appreciation of the rationale behind the terms of art and definitions in the navigation provisions of the LOS Convention, which in the US view reflect customary law. These terms and definitions are not dead verbiage. They must be grasped and applied carefully. They enable the practitioner to trace logically through complex factual situations which arise, such as the Great Belt. The LOS Convention provides excellent analytical tools to come up with a very logical, persuasive conclusion. I shall next discuss various words of art, necessary facts and official United States interpretive positions on which analysis of the various straits regimes depend.

a. Genesis of the Regime of Transit Passage

The regime of transit passage in straits used for international navigation arose from: (a) the emergence of 12 mile territorial sea claims; (b) the distinction between the right of innocent passage and high seas freedom of navigation; (c) geography; and (d) reality.

Even before the Third UN Law of the Sea Conference first convened in the early seventies, the critical importance and unique nature of international straits was recognized. These choke points form the lifeline between high seas areas. In order for the high seas freedoms of navigation and overflight to be preserved in international straits which would be overlapped by 12 mile territorial sea claims (displacing the earlier recognized 3 mile territorial sea norm), the navigational regime in international straits would have to share similar basic characteristics with these high seas freedoms.

General support existed in the Conference for a 12 mile territorial sea. Such support depended, however, on ensuring that in international straits less than 24 miles wide at their narrowest point, an adequate navigation regime be preserved to ensure essential elements of the right of freedom of navigation and overflight. The lesser navigational right of non-suspendable innocent passage was simply not enough.

Reality, in terms of fundamental international commerce and security interests, required open access through international straits. Regardless of the breadth of the strait, whether 5 or 24 miles, certain freedoms had to apply, such as continuous and expeditious transit in, under, and over the strait and its approaches. Any codification of the law of the sea had to reflect this state practice and political and military reality.

Before we proceed further, it is important to underscore that the regime of transit passage is crucial to the maintenance of world peace and order. By relieving littoral states of the political burdens associated with a role as gate keepers, the transit passage rules minimize the possibility of straits states being drawn into conflicts.

b. Innocent Passage

A separate concept, different from the right of transit passage through international straits, is innocent passage through a coastal state's territorial sea. . . .

It is the United States' view that the enumerations in Articles 19 and 21 are all-inclusive, i.e. a ship may engage in any activity while engaged in innocent passage if it is not prejudicial or proscribed in Article 19(2), and a coastal State can only enact those laws and regulations which are contained in Article 21.

Perhaps the most important factor to be noted in this connection is the unwavering position of the United States and other major maritime powers that Article 21 does not permit a coastal State to require prior permission from, or notification to, a coastal State in order to exercise the right of innocent passage. A number of developing coastal States maintain that although the Convention is silent on this point, earlier customary international law permitted a coastal State to require prior notification. They thus believe that this competence still exists. This is incorrect. The travau preparatoires of the Convention unequivocally indicates that such is not the case.

During the Sea-Bed Committee (1970–73) discussions which were intended to produce a draft convention text, many developing States prepared amendments to the predecessor of Article 21(1) which would recognize such a coastal State right. . . . The process culminated in a statement by the President of the Conference in Plenary that the sponsors of the amendment at his request had agreed not to press it to a vote. Although the erstwhile sponsors attempted to accomplish the same objective via declarations during the signing session, such declarations are ultra vires in that Article 31 of the LOS Convention prohibits declarations which exclude or modify the legal effect of provisions of the LOS Convention.

* * * *

c. Non-Suspendable Innocent Passage

Under Article 16(4) of the 1958 Convention, non-suspendable innocent passage applied to ships through straits used for international navigation between one part of the high seas and another part of the high seas or territorial sea of a foreign State. It was important because it recognized that in straits overlapped by opposite three mile wide territorial seas, the international community had unquestionable rights of navigation not subject to interference by the coastal nation. These rights have evolved into a regime guaranteeing transit in, under, and over international straits codified as "transit passage" in the LOS Convention. The more limited regime of non-suspendable innocent passage is now applicable to international straits governed by Article 38(1) of the LOS Convention . . . and Article 45(1)(b) . . .

The regime of non-suspendable innocent passage under current customary law of the sea is extremely limited in application. It has in almost all cases been superseded by the transit passage regime applying to straits connecting one part of the high seas or an exclusive economic zone with another part of the high seas or an exclusive economic zone. The dead end strait exception is only applicable in those few geographic instances in which high seas or exclusive economic zone areas connect with a territorial seas area of one state by means of a strait bordered by one or more other states. Without the right of non-suspendable innocent passage, the state at the end of the cul-de-sac would effectively be "landlocked" with a territorial sea leading nowhere.

* * * *

d. Transit Passage

One of the two most important achievements of the drafters of the LOS Convention was the codification of the transit passage regime under Articles 37–44. The regime is applicable in straits which are used for international navigation between one part of the high seas or an exclusive economic zone and another part of the high seas or an exclusive economic zone. The right of transit passage, unlike non-suspendable innocent passage, includes the right of overflight and submerged transit.

Following are some important United States interpretative positions applicable to the transit passage regime. First, the language referring to "straits which are used for international navigation" signifies all straits which are used or which may be used for navigation, i.e. straits which are capable of being used are included. This interpretation is not based solely on geography; prospective navigational use must be based on need, e.g., new commercial trade routes superseding the old, or a former trade route no longer suitable due to a change in tides or currents, environmental problems, change in depth, etc. Essentially, we place less emphasis on historical use and look instead to the susceptibility of the strait to international navigation.

Second, it is the United States' position that the right of transit passage applies not just to the waters of the straits themselves but to all normally used approaches to the straits. It would make no sense at all to have the right of overflight, for example, apply only within the cartographers' historical delineation of a certain strait, but not apply to restrictive geographical areas leading into/out of the strait, thereby effectively preventing exercise of the right of overflight.

It would defy navigational safety to require ships or aircraft to converge at the hypothetical "entrance" to the strait. It would also effectively deny many aircraft the right of transit passage if the pilot had to zigzag around the territorial seas of rocks and islands during the approaches to a strait. For transit passage to have meaning, open over-water access through the approaches must be included.

Third, when the right of transit passage applies, it applies throughout the strait. The width of the transit corridor, in effect, is shore to shore (this is of course subject to any IMO-approved traffic separation scheme that may be in place).

It is perfectly legitimate for a strait state to avoid this shore-to-shore result by limiting its territorial sea claim. Japan, for example, has chosen to limit its territorial sea claim in five straits, thus creating a high seas corridor of similar convenience down the middle of those straits. In such a case, innocent passage applies within the territorial sea areas and high seas' freedom of navigation applies throughout the corridors. This is so because Article 36 provides that Part III does not apply when a high seas corridor exists through the strait: ". . . the other relevant Parts of this Convention, including the provisions regarding the freedom of navigation and overflight, apply."

* * * *

V. AN INTERNATIONAL APPROACH TO FUTURE BRIDGE PROPOSALS OVER STRAITS USED FOR INTERNATIONAL NAVIGATION

From the foregoing, it should be evident that the construction of a bridge across a strait used for international navigation, if not subject from its inception to certain internationally accepted safeguards and readily applicable standards, could destroy the carefully crafted balance of strait State/user States rights and obligations which form the essence of all the Convention's navigational articles. In crafting a reasonable international solution, we should look to the system whereby the international community, working through the International Maritime Organization as the "competent international organization," establishes sealanes and traffic separation schemes through international straits.

To designate a sealane or traffic separation scheme under that system a State would first submit a proposal to the International Maritime Organization with a view toward adoption by that body. To be adopted, the sealane or traffic separation scheme must conform to generally accepted international standards and regulations and the State must give "due publicity" to its proposal. Since sealanes and traffic separation schemes affect navigation, it is only reasonable and practical that similar steps be followed in the case of bridges.

This is particularly so since the United States does not believe that customary international law permits a State unilaterally and without prior international approval to construct a fixed bridge over an international strait which in many instances is the sole practical deep water route available. In order, therefore, to unify State practice, the United States suggests that all future construction plans for bridges over international straits be submitted to the International Maritime Organization.

Our suggestion consists of three elements. First, prior to referral of a proposal by a straits State of plans to construct a fixed bridge over a strait used for international navigation, the straits State should be required to provide actual notice of the proposal well in advance through the International Maritime Organization to all States. Second, all States which are then notified about the proposal by the International Maritime Organization would be given adequate opportunity to communicate their views to the proposing straits State which would be obliged to seek to accommodate such views.

As part of this process, the International Maritime Organization should first establish internationally recognized guidelines and standards to ensure that construction of bridges does not hamper or impede navigation through international straits. These guidelines and standards would in part be based on and vary with the type of international strait involved and other considerations, such as the nature and density of the traffic through such a strait, the availability of equally practicable alternate routes, and the associated additional costs, if any, of the proposed bridge construction.

Finally, the straits State initiating the bridge construction proposal could only proceed with actual construction upon determination by the International Maritime Organization that the proposal conforms to the established International Maritime Organization guidelines and standards.

By way of reference, the United States notes that Denmark gave notice to all States of its construction plans sixteen years ago and requested that interested States submit their views to it with a view to their accommodation. The only State to submit such views prior to construction was the former Soviet Union, which requested that the clearance of the main central span over the deep water channel be increased to 65 metres, a request Denmark duly incorporated into the final construction plans. The United States believes that notice through the International Maritime Organization would ensure the international community had effective notice of the opportunity to address so potentially serious a threat to effective international navigation.

The United States looks forward to working with other interested States to help develop these procedures within the International Maritime Organization. We believe that international acceptance of such a procedure which involves the International Maritime Organization and internationally recognized guidelines and standards that would apply to future bridge construction, would be the most equitable and effective means to address the issue. It would also reduce the potential for the establishment of adverse precedents in this field.

Recently we have been informed of suggestions to build bridges across other international straits. I wish to make it clear beyond any doubt that the United States would not acquiesce in the construction of such bridges unless internationally recognized procedures are already in place and complied with. To accept anything less after the international community worked so many years in the Law of the Sea Conference to establish a universally accepted navigation regime would place us all in unacceptable, uncertain dangers in a field in which the international community requires predictability, stability, and the orderly development of a universally endorsed body of traditional law of the sea norms.

(2) Right of transit by U.S. submarines through Dixon Entrance

In 1991 the United States informed Canada of intended transit through waters in Dixon Entrance by U.S. submarines proceeding to and from the Southeast Alaska Submarine Noise Measurement Facility ("SEAFAC") in Behm Canal, Alaska. The Dixon Entrance to Portland Channel is a body of water, some 27 miles wide at its western opening into the Pacific, that separates coastal areas of Alaska from those of British Columbia lying to the south. The Alaskan Boundary Tribunal, established by a 1903 U.S.-U.K. convention to settle boundary questions between the Territory of Alaska and British possessions, drew a line (known as the "A–B line") through the Dixon Entrance in an award of October 20, 1903. The United States and Canada subsequently disagreed as to the legal significance of the "A–B line" established in the award. See discussion in Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 1928–30.

In a diplomatic note of November 13, 1991, the embassy of Canada referred to the "announcement of the Government of Canada's decision to consent to the transit of Canadian internal waters in Dixon Entrance." It indicated further that "this decision by the Government of Canada reflects Canada's support for the objective of the SEAFAC facility in keeping with the mutual defence interests of our two countries and the NATO policy of deterrence." At the same time, the note stated:

> This decision also reflects, and is entirely without prejudice to, Canada's long-standing position that the A–B Line determined by the 1903 Alaska Boundary Award constitutes the international boundary in Dixon Entrance, and that the waters of Dixon Entrance south of the A–B Line are internal waters of Canada.

The Department of State responded in a diplomatic note of December 24, 1991, contesting the Canadian view of the boundary and the need for consent, as excerpted below. The full text of the U.S. diplomatic note is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

U.S. submarines en route to and from the Behm Canal Facility will transit submerged in U.S.-claimed waters of the Dixon Entrance. Although Canada claims some of the same waters, the United States does not accept the Canadian position on the location of the maritime boundary. The U.S. view is that the maritime boundary in the Dixon Entrance should be a line equidistant between Canadian and U.S. land territories.

Consent of the Government of Canada was never sought for the transits of the submarines. Consequently, while, in view of U.S.-Canadian mutual defense interests, the United States did consult Canada concerning the transits, the United States cannot accept that its authority to transit these waters is premised on Canada's consent to those transits.

* * * *

In providing notice to Canada of its intention to transit Dixon Entrance, the United States also provided information on its policies and procedures for handling claims for damage or losses incurred by fishermen or other mariners as a result of U.S. Navy submarine transits. A letter from Alan J. Kreczko, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, to the embassy of Canada, dated August 2, 1991, on these issues is set forth below in full.

In reference to our recent discussions concerning the transit by U.S. submarines through Dixon Entrance en route to and from Behm Canal, I am pleased to inform you of the following.

The United States Navy investigates all claims for damage or losses incurred by fishermen or other mariners as a result of U.S. Navy submarine transits. It is the policy of the U.S. Navy to settle admiralty claims fairly and promptly when legal liability exists. Administrative settlement of admiralty claims eliminates the expense and delay of litigation.

Fishermen or other mariners are entitled, under admiralty law principles, to recover the reasonable cost of repairs to damaged equipment, as well as the cost of replacement of lost equipment. The latter recovery is reduced by the depreciation based on the age of the lost equipment compared to its normal useful life. In addition, fishermen may recover lost profits (i.e., expected gross fishing receipts minus normal operating expenses) during a reasonable period of repair of damaged equipment or replacement of lost equipment.

Any claim for damages or losses incurred by Canadian fishermen or other mariners resulting from transit of Dixon Entrance by a U.S. submarine should be submitted to the Admiralty Division of the Judge Advocate General, 200 Stovall Street, Alexandria, VA 22332-2400 (703/325-9744). It should be noted that the U.S. submarines expect to transit Dixon Entrance much deeper than the fishing gear used in Dixon Entrance.

We believe there is no possibility of injury or death that might be caused by the transit of our submarines. In the event injury or death should result, claims would be handled in accordance with existing procedures under admiralty law principles or the NATO Status of Forces Agreement.

The appropriate Canadian authorities will be notified immediately in the unlikely event of an accident related to any weapons which might be carried aboard United States warships. Claims which might arise out of a weapons accident or incident will be dealt with through diplomatic channels in accordance with the customary procedures for the settlement of international claims under generally accepted principles of law and equity.

The existing United States policy regarding claims arising out of the operation of U.S. nuclear-powered warships is established by the Act of Congress attached to this letter.

The U.S. Navy will be giving at least 72 hours advance notification of the commencement and duration of operations at the Behm Canal Acoustic Measurement Facility to governmental officials in Ketchikan, and through Notices to Mariners and announcements by the Ketchikan radio stations and newspapers. The U.S. Navy will similarly inform Government of Canada officials at MARPAC Headquarters Esquimalt and DFO Prince Rupert.

As a matter of policy, the United States neither confirms nor denies the presence or absence of nuclear weapons on any of its ships. A further letter from Mr. Kreczko of August 30, 1991, provided the following information concerning nuclear accidents:

> Since the United States is also a party to the IAEA Convention on Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident, I am pleased to confirm that in the case of nuclear accidents involving nuclear ship propulsion plants the notification procedures set out in that Convention will be followed by the United States. . . .

(3) Right of innocent passage in territorial sea

(i) Restrictions on innocent passage of warships

During the period 1991–1999, the United States protested or asserted its right against restrictions on innocent passage of warships to Cape Verde in 1991, to Egypt in 1993, to Oman in 1991, to the Philippines in 1994, and to the United Arab Emirates in 1995. See Roach & Smith at 251–67.

(ii) Prior notice

In July 1991 the United States delivered a diplomatic note to the Government of Denmark protesting Denmark's requirement that foreign warships and other public vessels provide notice prior to transiting Denmark's territorial sea and requiring prior permission for passage of more than three warships at the same time (except for straits where prior notice is required) and straight baselines around the Faeroe Islands. The substantive provisions of the note are set forth below.

The Embassy of the United States of America presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Kingdom of Denmark and has the honor to refer to Ordinance Number 73 of 27 February 1976 and Ordinance Number 598 of 21 December 1976. Ordinance No. 73 mandates that warships and other public vessels provide notice prior to transiting Denmark's territorial sea (except in connection with passage of the Great Belt, Samsoe Belt or the Sound) and that prior permission for simultaneous passage is required whenever more than three warships transit the territorial sea (except that simultaneous passage of the Great Belt, Samsoe Belt or the Sound is allowed provided there is advance notification). Ordinance No. 598 establishes straight baselines completely surrounding the Faeroe Islands.

The Government of the United States wishes to remind the Government of Denmark that, as established in customary international law and as reflected in the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, the right of innocent passage through the territorial sea may he exercised by all ships, regardless of number, type, or cargo, and may not in any case he subjected to a requirement of prior permission or notice to the coastal state.

The United States believes that the baselines around the Faeroe Islands are not drawn in accordance with the customary rules of international law reflected in the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone, to which both Denmark and the United States are party, and in the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (LOS Convention), for the following reasons.

In accordance with Article 3 of the Territorial Sea Convention and with Article 5 of the LOS Convention, the normal baseline for measuring the breadth of the territorial sea is the low-water line along the coast as marked on the states large-scale charts officially recognized by the coastal state. Article 4 of the Territorial Sea Convention and Article 7 of the LOS Convention provide that, as an exception to the normal baseline, in localities where the coastline is deeply indented and cut into, or where there is a fringe of islands along the coast in its immediate vicinity the method of straight baselines joining appropriate basepoints may be employed in drawing the baseline from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured.

The United States observes that the baselines around the Faeroes are not straight baselines around individual islands, but are lines connecting the outermost islands and drying rocks of the Faeroes archipelago. Archipelagic states recognized under customary international law, as reflected in the LOS Convention, do not include mainland states, such as Denmark and the United States, which possess non-coastal archipelagos. Therefore, straight baselines cannot be drawn around mainland states' coastal archipelagos, such as the Faeroe Islands.

The United States also observes that straight baselines could be employed, consistent with international law, in certain localities of some of the Faeroe Islands which are deeply indented and cut into, or themselves fringed with islands along the coast. Furthermore, some of the islands contain juridical bays that could lawfully be enclosed by straight baselines. However, in localities where neither criterion is met, the method of straight baselines may not be used; rather, in those areas the low water line, as depicted on official charts, must be used.

The Government of the United States therefore wishes to emphasize its objections to the claims described above and made by ordinances No. 73 and 598 which are not valid in international law and reserves its rights and those of its nationals in this regard.

In a diplomatic note dated August 12, 1991, the United States protested requirements by Oman included in its instrument of ratification of UNCLOS, deposited August 17, 1989, concerning prior notice. Declaration Nos. 2 and 3 "guaranteed" the right of innocent passage, "subject to prior permission," to warships and "foreign nuclear-powered ships and ships carrying nuclear or other substances that are inherently dangerous or harmful to health or the environment." Submarines were also required to navigate on the surface and fly the flag of their home state. See UN, Multilateral Treaties Deposited, Chapter XXI, available at http://untreaty.un.org/ENGLISH/bible/englishinternetbible/partI/chapterXXI/treaty6.asp, and UNLOS Bull., No. 14, Dec.

1989, at 8–9. The U.S. diplomatic note stated, in relevant part:

> The Government of the United States wishes . . . to recall to the Government of Oman that, with regard to its Declaration Nos. 2 and 3, the right of innocent passage through the territorial sea may be exercised by all ships, regardless of type or cargo, and may not in any case be subjected to a requirement of prior permission of, or notice to, the coastal state. This right is also recognized in customary international law as reflected in the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.
>
> The United States Government notes that its warships have previously operated in Oman's territorial sea without the prior permission of the Government of Oman.

The note is available in U.S. Department of State publication Limits in the Seas No. 113, Annex 5, page 16, available at www.law.fsu.edu/library/collection/LimitsinSeas/index.php.

(iii) Temporary suspension of innocent passage

A coastal or island state may suspend innocent passage temporarily in specified areas of its territorial sea, when it is essential for the protection of its security. Such a suspension must be preceded by a published notice to the international community "and may not discriminate in form or in fact among foreign ships." See Territorial Sea Convention, article 16(3); UNCLOS, article 25(3). In a diplomatic note to Iran dated January 11, 1994, the United States objected to Iranian legislative provisions inconsistent with these requirements and to a requirement for prior authorization, as set forth below. The diplomatic note is included in an analysis of Iran's legislation available in Limits in the Seas No. 114, Annex 3, page 37, available at www.law.fsu.edu/library/collection/LimitsinSeas/index.php.

* * * *

The United States also notes that international law permits a coastal state to suspend temporarily in specified areas of its territorial sea the innocent passage of foreign ships if such suspension is essential for the protection of its security, and that such suspension may take effect only after having been duly published. Article 8 of Iran's 1993 Marine Areas Act cannot be accepted as removing the requirements that any suspension of innocent passage through parts of its territorial sea be temporary and that it take effect only after being duly published.

Article 9 of the 1993 Marine Areas Act impermissibly seeks to require foreign warships, and vessels carrying dangerous or noxious substances harmful to the environment, to obtain prior authorization from Iran to pass through Iran's territorial sea. Such a requirement has no foundation in the provisions of the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention, and the United States will continue to reject, as contrary to international law, any attempt to impose such a requirement on the exercise of the right of innocent passage of all ships.

(4) Flag state jurisdiction

(i) Boarding of U.S. vessel on the high seas

In a diplomatic note of June 26, 1991, the United States protested to the Government of El Salvador the non-consensual high seas boarding of the U.S. flag Annabelle 2. The substantive portions of the note are set forth below in full.

[The United States] has the honor to refer to the boarding by personnel from El Salvadoran gunboat GC-11 on 11 May 1991 of the U.S. flag trawler-yacht Annabelle 2 on the high seas without the consent of the master or the permission of the United States.

On May 11, 1991, the 103-foot Annabelle 2, homeport Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, was stopped and boarded in position 12-12N, 89-12W, approximately 68 nautical miles off the coast of El Salvador, by the El Salvador gunboat GC-11, for the purpose of verifying that the Annabelle 2 was not running guns into El Salvador from Nicaragua.

The personnel from GC-11 boarded the Annabelle 2 without seeking or obtaining the consent of the master or the permission of the flag state. Further, the personnel conducting the boarding did not carry or offer identification to the master of the Annabelle 2, and found no evidence of gun-running after a half hour search.

As is well established in international law, a vessel on the high seas is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the flag state, and, except for situations (including hot pursuit) not involved in this case, may not be boarded without the consent of the master or the permission of the flag state.

Accordingly, the United States protests this unauthorized boarding of one of its flag vessels and requests assurances that the exclusive jurisdiction of the flag state will be respected by the authorities of El Salvador in the future.

The U.S. Embassy provided additional information set forth below concerning procedures for requesting permission from the United States to board certain U.S. flag vessels on the high seas when the master refuses to consent, contained in a telegram from the Department of State to the embassy, dated June 24, 1991.

. . . This guidance applies only to vessels other than those entitled to sovereign immunity, i.e., warships or other government ships operated for non-commercial purposes. . . . [I]n the event the master consents to boarding, there is no need for USG consent, although there would be for enforcement action.

The general practice of states is reflected in Article 17 of the 1988 United Nations Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, which is in force for the United States and some 33 other states. El Salvador has not signed this Convention and is not a party to it, although we would encourage [it] to become a party. The procedures outlined below are, of course, available to all states, including those not party to the Vienna Drug Convention, for whatever reason they desire to board a U.S. flag vessel on the high seas when they are not otherwise authorized to do so under international law.

Article 17 provides that when a state desires to board and search a foreign flag vessel exercising freedom of navigation in accordance with international law, it may make its request to the flag state, requesting confirmation of registry, and if confirmed, request authorization to take action regarding the vessel.

Under Article 17, the United States has designated the Department of State as the authority to receive and respond to such requests under that convention. . . .

(ii) Special arrangement with the flag state: Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

As explained in a July 10, 1991, declaration by Bruce E. Leek, Bureau of International Narcotics Matters, Department of State, on July 1, 1991, the U.S. Coast Guard boarded the freighter M/V Lucky Star, with the consent of its master, and "discovered an estimated 100–140 tons of a cargo appearing to be Hashish and field-testing by standard means to be the same." On July 11, 1991, the Government of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, through its attorneys, formally confirmed its registry of the M/V Lucky Star, and authorized > appropriate United States authorities to board and search the LUCKY STAR and to enforce the laws of the United States of America pertaining to the seizure of contraband aboard the vessel, seizure of the vessel and possible criminal prosecution of the responsible parties. This authorization extends to the application of any applicable United States law which authorizes law enforcement action as to the vessel and crew on behalf of the United States.

In a press release of July 12, 1991, Bob Martinez, Director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, announced that U.S. agencies had "netted the largest hashish seizure in U.S. history. The estimated 100-ton cargo of hashish—worth about 2 billion dollars—was intercepted off Midway Island in the Pacific. . . . The hashish-bearing freighter—the "Lucky Star" had been operating outside of normal shipping channels, and was stopped on the high seas."

The authorization to board the Lucky Star and take law enforcement action was granted pursuant to a special arrangement, recorded in a diplomatic note from the Department of State to the embassy of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines dated July 11, 1991, and excerpted below.

The full text of the diplomatic note with attached Leeks declaration and correspondence confirming agreement is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The Department of State refers the Embassy of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines to Note No. 80 dated June 28, 1991, from the United States embassy at Bridgetown in which the United States sought verification of the registry of the M/V Lucky Star and permission of the Government of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines to detain the vessel, arrest the crew and enforce United States law on the grounds that a large quantity of hashish had been found on board the vessel.

The United States understands that the Government of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines has verified that the M/S Lucky Star is registered in Saint Vincent, and that, as it has done in previous cases involving its flag vessels suspected of engaging in the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances, desires to co-operate with the United States government to the fullest extent possible to suppress illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances by sea. In conformity with the international law of the sea the attention of the embassy is referred to the detailed information regarding the results of the search of the vessel contained in the declaration of the maritime law enforcement officer, Bureau of International Narcotics Matters, which is attached to this note.

Based on the foregoing, the United States understands that the Government of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines wishes to enter into a special arrangement with the Government of the United States regarding the enforcement of United States law against this vessel and the persons and cargo on board.

The United States acknowledges its duty, in taking action pursuant to such a special arrangement, to respect the sovereignty of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, to take due account of the need not to endanger the safety of life at sea, the security of the vessel and the cargo or to prejudice the commercial and legal interests of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines.

(iii) U.S. maritime drug interdiction agreements

During the 1990s the United States began to enter into bilateral maritime law enforcement agreements for counter-narcotics operations pursuant to article 17 of the 1988 Convention for the Suppression of Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, done at Vienna, December 20, 1988. By 1999, twenty such agreements, to facilitate maritime law enforcement cooperation with flag and coastal States, had entered into force. While the agreements varied to some degree, they provided for all or some of the following types of authority, defined as set forth below for a typical agreement.

"Shipboarding": Standing authority or procedures for the USCG to stop, board and search foreign vessels suspected of illicit traffic located seaward of the territorial sea of any nation.

"Shiprider": Standing authority to embark law enforcement (L/E) officials on platforms of the parties, which officials may then authorize certain law enforcement actions.

"Pursuit": Standing authority or procedures for USG L/E assets to pursue fleeing vessels or aircraft suspected of illicit traffic into foreign waters or airspace. May also include authority to stop, board and search pursued vessels.

"Entry-to-investigate": Standing authority or procedures for USG L/E assets to enter foreign waters or airspace to investigate vessels or aircraft located therein suspected of illicit traffic. May also include authority to stop, board and search such vessels.

"Overflight": Standing authority or procedures for USG L/E assets to fly in foreign airspace when in support of CD operations.
"Relay Order-to-land": Standing authority or procedures for USG L/E assets to relay an order to land in the host nation to aircraft suspected of illicit traffic.
"International Maritime Interdiction Support": Standing authority or procedures for USG L/E assets to moor or stay at national ports, entry of additional U.S. L/E officials (by ship and/or aircraft), entry of suspect vessels not flying U.S. or host nation flag, escort of persons from suspect vessels through and out of host nation (by ship and/or aircraft), and landing & temporarily remaining at international airports for logistics.

Countries with which bilateral maritime law enforcement agreements were signed during the 1990s are set forth below.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Antigua and Barbuda concerning maritime counter-drug operations, signed at St. John's April 19, 1995; entered into force April 19, 1995. Amended by exchange of notes at St. John's June 3, 1996; entered into force June 3, 1996.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Bahamas concerning a cooperative shiprider and overflight drug interdiction program, effected by exchange of notes at Nassau May 1 & 6, 1996; entered into force May 6, 1996.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Barbados concerning cooperation in suppressing illicit maritime drug trafficking, signed at Bridgetown June 25, 1997; entered into force October 11, 1998.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Belize concerning maritime counter-drug operations, signed at Belmopan December 23, 1992; entered into force December 23, 1992. TIAS 11914. Amended by a Protocol signed at Belmopan April 25, 2000; entered into force April 25, 2000.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Colombia to suppress illicit traffic by sea, signed at Bogota February 20, 1997; entered into force February 20, 1997.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Costa Rica concerning cooperation to suppress illicit traffic, signed at San Jose, December 1, 1998; entered into force November 19, 1999. Amended by the Protocol signed at San Jose July 2, 1999; entered into force on November 19, 1999.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Dominica concerning maritime counter-drug operations, signed at Roseau April 19, 1995; entered into force April 19, 1995. TIAS 12630.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Dominican Republic concerning maritime counter-drug operations, signed at Santo Domingo March 23, 1995; entered into force March 23, 1995. TIAS 12620. Amended by the Protocol signed at Washington, D.C. May 20, 2003; entered into force May 20, 2003.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Grenada concerning maritime counter-drug operations, signed at St George's May 16, 1995; entered into force May 16, 1995. TIAS 12648. Amended by exchange of notes at St. George's November 26, 1996; entered into force November 26, 1996.

Agreement between the United States of America and the Republic of Haiti concerning cooperation to suppress illicit maritime drug traffic, signed at Port au Prince October 17, 1997; entered into force September 5, 2002.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Jamaica concerning cooperation in suppressing illicit maritime drug trafficking, signed at Kingston May 6, 1997; entered into force March 10, 1998.

Arrangement between the Government of the United States and the Government of Panama for Support and Assistance from the U.S. Coast Guard for the National Maritime Service of the Ministry of Government and Justice, signed at Panama March 18, 1991; entered into force March 18, 1991. TIAS 11833.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of St. Kitts and Nevis concerning maritime counter-drug operations, signed at Basseterre April 13, 1995; entered into force April 13, 1995. Amended by exchange of notes at Bridgetown and Basseterre June 27, 1996; entered into force June 27, 1996.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of St. Lucia concerning maritime counter-drug operations, signed at Castries April 20, 1995; entered into force April 20, 1995. Amended by exchange of notes at Bridgetown and Castries June 5, 1996; entered into force June 5, 1996.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of St. Vincent and the Grenadines concerning maritime counter-drug operations, signed at Kingstown and Bridgetown, June 29 and July 4, 1995; entered into force July 4, 1995. TIAS 12676.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Suriname concerning cooperation in maritime law enforcement, signed at Paramaribo December 1, 1998; entered into force August 26, 1999.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Trinidad and Tobago concerning maritime counter-drug operations, signed at Port of Spain March 4, 1996; entered into force March 4, 1996.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland concerning maritime and aerial operations to suppress illicit trafficking by sea in waters of the Caribbean and Bermuda, signed at Washington July 13, 1998; entered into force October 30, 2000.

Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Venezuela to suppress illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances by sea, signed at Caracas November 9, 1991; entered into force upon signature.

TIAS 11827. Amended by the Protocol signed at Caracas July 23, 1997; entered into force July 23, 1997.

Two memoranda of understanding and a forward operating location agreement were also in effect during the 1990s, as listed below.

Memorandum of Understanding between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, on behalf of the Government of the British Virgin Islands, concerning maritime narcotics interdiction operations, signed at Tortola February 6, 1990. Amended by exchange of notes on December 2 and 10, 1992. Terminated October 30, 2000.

Memorandum of Understanding between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland including the Government of the Turks & Caicos Islands (the Government of the United Kingdom), the Government of the Bahamas (the Government of the Bahamas) and the Government of the United States of America (the Government of the United States), signed at Washington July 12, 1990.

Agreement of Cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Ecuador concerning United States access to and use of installations at the Ecuadorian Air Force Base in Manta for aerial counternarcotics activities, signed at Quito November 12, 1999; entered into force November 17, 1999.

5. Salvage at Sea

a. CSS Alabama

(1) Confirmation of French recognition of U.S. title to artifacts

The CSS Alabama was built in England in 1862 for the Confederacy and had a successful career as a destroyer of Union commerce in the U.S. Civil War until she was sunk in 1864. When the vessel's wreck was discovered by French divers in 1984 seven miles off the coast of France, both France and the United States claimed title. In May 1989 the French embassy informed the U.S. Department of State that the French government had decided that title to the CSS Alabama and its artifacts belonged to the United States. On October 3, 1989, the United States and France signed an executive agreement concerning protection and study of the wreck and artifacts. Agreement between the Government of the French Republic and the Government of the United States of America concerning the wreck of the CSS Alabama, Paris, Oct. 3, 1989, TIAS No. 11687, U.N. LOS BULL. No. 20, at 26 (1992). Among other things, the agreement established a scientific committee to be composed of two representatives from each government and of experts designated by each. See Digest 1989–1990 at 429–34.

At the first meeting of the scientific committee in Paris, June 11–13, 1991, a member of the French delegation suggested that although there was no doubt that the warship belonged to the United States, the question of ownership of the associated artifacts had not been resolved. In response to a request from the U.S. embassy in Paris for confirmation that the Government of France agreed that title to the artifacts associated with the wreck rested in the United States, the Office of Legal Affairs of the French Foreign Ministry responded in a diplomatic note of October 18, 1991, in which it referred to "the objects taken from the wreck of the CSS Alabama, which are the property of the United States Government."

(2) Ownership under U.S. law

On August 21, 1992, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit affirmed a lower court decision that a bell from the CSS Alabama belonged to the U.S. government. United States v. Steinmetz, 973 F.2d 212 (3d Cir. 1992). The bell had been recovered by a British diver in 1936 and was purchased by Steinmetz, a New Jersey antique dealer, from an antique dealer in Hastings, England. When Steinmetz offered the bell for auction in New York in December 1990, the United States claimed ownership of the bell and filed a complaint in admiralty in the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey. Steinmetz counterclaimed for a determination that the bell was his property, and for payment of full market value or, in the alternative, compensation under theories of quantum meruit and/or unjust enrichment by the United States. The district court granted the U.S. motion for summary judgment. 763 F. Supp. 1293 (D.N.J. 1991). In affirming, the court of appeals held that the United States had succeeded to ownership by the Confederacy and that the United States had not abandoned title, which can only be accomplished by "explicit acts."

Excerpts below from the court of appeals opinion address the law of succession in this case.

* * * *

2. Property of the Confederacy

Having established that the Confederacy owned the ALABAMA, we are faced with the question whether the United States succeeded to its ownership after the Civil War.

State succession is not a well-defined legal doctrine. One commentator, noting the different treatment given to the law of state succession by different writers, has suggested that it be treated in "specialized contexts" because the "concepts of 'succession' and 'continuity' of states . . . are levels of abstraction unfitted to deal with specific issues." See Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law 635 (1966).

* * * *

Steinmetz and the Amici contend that the succession doctrine is inapplicable to the Confederacy's property because under that doctrine the successor government taking the assets of the conquered government must also take on its debts, which the United States did not do with respect to the Confederacy. Indeed, section 4 of the Fourteenth Amendment explicitly provides:

> Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, . . . but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 4.

As Steinmetz notes, the English courts that addressed this issue assumed that when the United States succeeded to the property of the Confederacy, it also succeeded to the debts and obligations attached to that property. Thus, those courts would not allow the United States to succeed to Confederate property without assuming the outstanding obligations as to that property. See McRae, 8 L.R.-Eq. at 69; Prioleau, 35 L.J. Chancery N.S. at 11. We are unable to find a United States case that so held. But even the English courts did not interpret the succession doctrine to require the United States to succeed to the Confederacy's debts unrelated to the particular property at issue.

Even though there may be some question as to the exact contours of the succession doctrine as applied by the United States after the Civil War, in the case of the ALABAMA there were no outstanding liabilities for which the United States might have been responsible had it asserted its title to the ALABAMA right after the war. Steinmetz does not allege that the ALABAMA was not fully paid for by the Confederacy.

It follows that whether or not historians would regard the international law of succession as applicable here (fn. omitted) the succession doctrine, as explicated and applied by the United States Supreme Court with respect to the Civil War, entitled the United States to all property acquired by the Confederacy. Therefore, we hold that, as a matter of law, the United States acquired title to the ALABAMA after the Civil War ended.

b. Spanish naval shipwrecks

The requirement for express abandonment of a government-owned vessel as to the United States, noted above, was found also to apply to Spanish ownership of two Royal Navy vessels shipwrecked in 1750 and 1802 off the coast of Virginia. Sea Hunt, Inc. v. The Unidentified, Shipwrecked Vessel or Vessels, 47 F. Supp. 2d 678 (E.D. Va. 1999*), aff'd in part, rev'd in part*, 221 F.3d 634 (4th Cir. 2000). Sea Hunt, Inc., a maritime salvage company based in Virginia, located two shipwrecked vessels, Juno and La Galga, near the coast of Assateague Island. It then obtained permits from the Virginia Marine Resources Commission, an agency of the Commonwealth of Virginia, to conduct salvage operations and recover historic artifacts from the wrecks. Virginia asserted a claim of ownership over the vessels under the Abandoned Shipwreck Act of 1987 ("ASA"), 43 U.S.C. §§ 2101–2106. Under § 2105, the United States asserts title to any abandoned shipwreck that is on or embedded in the submerged lands of a state of the United States, and automatically transfers title to the state in whose submerged lands the shipwreck is located.

On March 11, 1998, Sea Hunt filed its Verified Complaint in Admiralty In Rem in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia against the two wrecks. The district court ordered that a warrant be issued for the arrest of the shipwrecked vessels and artifacts, granting to Sea Hunt exclusive rights of salvage until further notice of the Court, and directing Sea Hunt to publish a general notice of the claim and to send specific notice to both the United States and Spain. Subsequently, the district court denied motions by the United States to intervene on its own behalf, 182 F.R.D. 206 (E.D. Va. 1998), and on behalf of Spain, filed under the Treaty of Friendship and General Relations Between the United States of America and Spain, 1902. 22 F. Supp. 2d 521 (E.D. Va. 1998). Spain intervened and moved for summary judgment on December 23, 1998. At a hearing on March 5, 1999, the district court granted a U.S. motion to file an amicus brief and statement of interest. See 47 F. Supp. 2d at 681–84.

The district court noted that "[t]itle over a shipwreck covered under the ASA is transferred to the State in whose waters the wreck is located . . . Thus, if this Court finds that Juno and La Galga have at any time been abandoned by > Spain, then according to the ASA, the wrecks belong to Virginia. If, on the other hand, the Court finds that Spain has never abandoned Juno and La Galga, then Spain retains ownership over them." Id. at 685–86. In examining Fourth Circuit precedent as to the definition of "abandonment," the district court concluded that Sea Hunt would have to establish that Spain had "expressly abandoned" the vessels, as explained below.

* * * *

The statement of the law of abandonment by the Court in Columbus-America [Discovery Group v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co., 974 F.2d 450 (4th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 507 U.S. 1000 (1993)] could not be clearer. Although the Court clearly allows for an inference of abandonment for shipwrecks which have been lost and undiscovered for some time, in a case where the original owner appears, abandonment may not be inferred, but must be proven, regardless of how long the ships have been lost, and regardless of the character of the vessel. The Columbus-America case makes no distinction between private vessels and public vessels such as warships. Because of the assertion of a universal rule of express abandonment, it is irrelevant in this case for the purpose of determining abandonment whether JUNO and LA GALGA were warships in the service of Spain at the time of their sinking.

* * * *

The implication of the Columbus-America rule in this case is that, whether or not JUNO and LA GALGA are considered warships, their owner, the Kingdom of Spain, has appeared to claim ownership to them, and therefore Sea Hunt, in pressing its claim for possession of the vessels under the law of finds, must show by "strong and convincing evidence" that the shipwrecks have been expressly abandoned by Spain. Columbus-America, 974 F.2d at 465. Unless Sea Hunt can do so, the Court must apply the law of salvage, which operates under the premise that "the original owners still retain their ownership interests in such property." Id. at 459.

In applying this rule to the two vessels at issue, the district court had concluded that La Galga, which sank in 1750, had been expressly abandoned by the 1763 Treaty between Great Britain, Spain and France, ending the Seven Years War, based on what it characterized as "a sweeping grant of territory and property from Spain to Great Britain" recorded in Article XX of that treaty. Id. at 689. As to Juno, which sank in 1793, the district court concluded that Spain had not expressly abandoned the shipwreck in the 1819 Treaty ending the conflict between Spain and the United States arising out of the War of 1812. The court found that Article 2 of that treaty, transferring territory from Spain to the United States, was "much narrower than Article XX of the 1763 Treaty," and that Spain thus retained title. Id. at 690.

On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed the legal rationale of the district court and its conclusion as to Juno. The Fourth Circuit disagreed with the district court's reading of the 1763 Treaty, however, and reversed as to La Galga. 221 F.3d 634 (4th Cir. 2000). In addition, as explained below, the Fourth Circuit concluded that sovereign vessels were entitled to special treatment under the ASA and that the ASA did not affect the meaning of "abandoned" under admiralty law. Furthermore, the court of appeals concluded that the United States had unique treaty obligations to respect the immunity of the Spanish vessels.

* * * *

The legislative history of the ASA suggests that sovereign vessels must be treated differently from privately owned ones. The House Report incorporates a State Department letter, which states, "the U.S. only abandons its sovereignty over, and title to, sunken U.S. warships by affirmative act; mere passage of time or lack of positive assertions of right are insufficient to establish such abandonment." H.R. Rep. No. 100–514(II), at 13 (1988), reprinted in 1988 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 381. . . .

Further, courts have held that the ASA "did not affect the meaning of 'abandoned,' which serves as a precondition for the invocation of the ASA's provisions." . . .

Under admiralty law, where an owner comes forward to assert ownership in a shipwreck, abandonment must be shown by express acts. . . . This principle reflects the long standing admiralty rule that when "articles are lost at sea the title of the owner in them remains." . . .

* * * *

Finally, the express abandonment standard is required by Article X of the 1902 Treaty of Friendship and General Relations between the United States and Spain. Article X provides, "In cases of shipwreck, damages at sea, or forced putting in, each party shall afford to the vessels of the other . . . the same immunities which would have been granted to its own vessels in similar cases." Treaty of Friendship and General Relations, July 3, 1902, U.S.-Spain, 33 Stat. 2105. According to the United States Department of State, "this provision is unique" in that no other "friendship, commerce and navigation (FCN) treaty of the United States contains such a broadly worded provision applying to State ships entitled to sovereign immunity." Statement of Interest, U.S. Dep't of State, P 13 (Dec. 18, 1998). This treaty requires that imperiled Spanish vessels shall receive the same immunities conferred upon similarly situated vessels of the United States.

United States vessels may only be abandoned by an express, unambiguous, and affirmative act. Article IV of the Constitution states, "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States." U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3. From this it follows that the Constitution precludes a finding of implied abandonment of federal lands and property—dispositions of federal property require some congressional action. "The United States cannot abandon its own property except by explicit acts." See United States v. Steinmetz, 973 F.2d 212, 222 (3d Cir. 1992). The Supreme Court has emphasized that the United States cannot be precluded from asserting its ownership rights by private property "principles similar to laches, estoppel or adverse possession." United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19, 39–40, 91 L. Ed. 1889, 67 S. Ct. 1658 (1947). The government "holds its interests here as elsewhere in trust for all the people," and thus cannot relinquish its property without express acts. Id. at 40. The House Report for the ASA also relates the understanding that "U.S. warships and other public vessels . . . require an affirmative act of abandonment." H.R. Rep. No. 100–514(II), at 5 (1988), reprinted in 1988 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 374. Thus, one of the immunities granted to United States vessels is that they will not be considered abandoned without a clear and affirmative act by the government.

Under the terms of the 1902 Treaty, Spanish vessels can likewise be abandoned only by express renunciation. . . .

Applying the express abandonment standard to sovereign vessels also respects the legitimate interests of the executive branch. While the ASA confers title to abandoned shipwrecks to the states, it does not vitiate important national interests or undermine the well-established prerogatives of sovereign nations. . . .

* * * *

. . . Article XX [of the 1763 Treaty] does not contain "clear and convincing" evidence of express abandonment. While the language of Article XX encompasses a great deal of land and property, it does not mention vessels or shipwrecks, nor does Article XX refer to Spanish property in the sea or on the seabed. Such general treaty language does not come close to an "express declaration abandoning title," . . . and therefore cannot amount to clear and convincing evidence of an express abandonment.

B.

This view of the treaty is not ours alone. Both parties to Article XX of the 1763 Treaty agree that the Kingdom of Spain did not abandon LA GALGA. Such agreement is significant. When "the parties to a treaty both agree as to the meaning of a treaty provision . . . we must absent extraordinarily strong contrary evidence, defer to that interpretation.". . . .

The United States has strenuously defended Spain's ownership over these vessels. The government maintains that this is required by our obligations under the 1902 Treaty as well as general principles of international comity. The United States "is the owner of military vessels, thousands of which have been lost at sea, along with their crews. In supporting Spain, the United States seeks to insure that its sunken vessels and lost crews are treated as sovereign ships and honored graves, and are not subject to exploration, or exploitation, by private parties seeking treasures of the sea." Amicus Curiae Br. of U.S. at 1. Protection of the sacred sites of other nations thus assists in preventing the disturbance and exploitation of our own. Here the government's interest is rooted in customary international law. See 8 Digest of U.S. Practice in International Law 999, 1006 (1980) (noting that interference with sunken military vessels, "especially those with deceased individuals," is "improper" and that foreign governments' requests to have such views respected "should be honored").

It bears repeating that matters as sensitive as these implicate important interests of the executive branch. Courts cannot just turn over the sovereign shipwrecks of other nations to commercial salvors where negotiated treaties show no sign of an abandonment, and where the nations involved all agree that title to the shipwrecks remains with the original owner. Far from abandoning these shipwrecks, Spain has vigorously asserted its ownership rights in this proceeding. Nothing in the law of admiralty suggests that Spain has abandoned its dead by respecting their final resting place at sea.

c. Deadlight Fleet

At the end of World War II more than a hundred German submarines were surrendered to U.K. forces. Pursuant to agreements pertaining to disposal of German naval and merchant vessels, reached by the United Kingdom, the United States, and the USSR at the Potsdam Conference following the war, the United Kingdom sank most of the submarines, known as the Deadlight Fleet, in the North Sea. As also agreed, a limited number of the submarines were retained by the individual tripartite powers for purposes of experimentation rather than being destroyed.

In the early 1990s private parties began to inquire about the possibility of recovering some of the submarines, or parts thereof. On May 20, 1993, the United Kingdom indicated in a communication to the Department of State that it wished to grant rights to salvage the submarines for their scrap metal and sought confirmation that the U.S. and Russian authorities had no objection to the UK proposals for the recovery of the submarines. Following an exchange of additional information, on April 13, 1994, the Department of State confirmed to the British Embassy that it had never acquired title to any of the submarines and had no objection to the salvage but sought to ensure that they would not be useable as weapons of war. The letter of that date from J. Ashley Roach, Office of Oceans, Environment and Science, Department of State Office of the Legal Adviser, to the British Embassy provided as follows.

* * * *

I have the honor to advise you that the United States is now in a position to respond favorably to the request of Her Majesty's Government, set out in the note attached to Ewan Buchanan's letter of 20 May 1993, that the United States confirm that it has no objection to the United Kingdom's allowing those ex-German submarines forming part of the so-called Deadlight Fleet sunk by the Royal Navy in 1945/46 pursuant to the recommendations of the Tripartite Naval Commission Recommending the Allocation of the German Surface Navy and the German Submarine Fleet of 6 December 1945, title to which passed to Her Majesty's Government at the end of the war, to be raised for scrap metal.

The United States is of the view that it never acquired title to any of the German Deadlight Fleet submarines not seized by U.S. forces at the end of World War II.

Since the purpose of the sinking of these submarines at sea was to ensure they not be useable in the future as weapons of war, the United States would be pleased to be assured that these submarines will be cut up before being raised.

. . . We think the foregoing is consistent with our shared views on the acquisition of title to enemy warships during wartime and loss of title to sunken warships.

d. Discovery of Japanese minisubmarine sunk off Pearl Harbor

In 1992 the wreck of a Japanese Type A minisubmarine that had been sunk in combat near Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on December 7, 1941, was discovered and a salvage claim by the discoverer was filed in federal court in Hawaii. Institute of Aeronautical Archaeological Research, Inc. v. Wreck of Type A "Midget" Japanese Submarine, D. Hawaii, Civil No. 92-00522-SPK. A consent judgment and permanent injunction was issued on July 1, 1993, prohibiting "any action of any nature in relation to defendant sunken vessel" without the prior permission of the United States Government. An exchange of notes between the United States and the Embassy of Japan confirmed that the submarine was the property of the United States and that the Japanese government wished the United States to protect its interests. The U.S. note of January 12, 1993, which was confirmed in a reply note from the Embassy of Japan on the same date, is set forth below.

The Department of State refers to recent discussion between the United States and Japanese Governments regarding the recently discovered wreck of a Japanese Type A minisubmarine which was sunk in combat with United States naval forces near Pearl Harbor, Hawaii on December 7, 1941, and which is presently the subject of a salvage claim by the discoverer in the Federal District Court for the District of Hawaii.

At a scheduling conference on November 12, 1992, the United States Department of Justice entered an appearance and suggested that, in accordance with international law and United States salvage law, the owner of the wreck did not wish it to be salved or disturbed in any manner by the salvor. . . .

Since it is the view of the United States that the wreck and its associated artifacts are now the property of the United States, to assist the United States in preserving the rights and interests of the United States and Japan in this litigation, the Department would be grateful if the Government of Japan would confirm that it does not object to the view of the United States that the wreck and its associated artifacts are now the property of the United States, that the wreck is a war grave, and its desire that the United States protect the interests of the Government of Japan and its citizens therein.

e. SS Empire Knight

In February 1944 the British steamship Empire Knight, en route to New York from St. John, New Brunswick, Canada, ran aground and sank off the coast of Maine, apparently as a result of a steering or navigational error by the ship's crew. The ship was UK-flagged, owned by a UK company, was under UK Government control, and was preparing to join a World War II convoy of supply ships from the United States to the United Kingdom. Included in its cargo were a number of flasks containing mercury. In the late 1990s the mercury was found to be leaking into the marine environment. U.S. agencies spent approximately $4 million on initial cleanup efforts and anticipated the need for further expensive efforts. The U.S. Department of Justice filed a case against the owner of the vessel, Buries Markes Ltd., to recover for these expenditures under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980 ("CERCLA"), 42 U.S.C. § 9607(a). United States v. Buries Markes Ltd, Civ. No. 2:97cv00345 (D. Maine). The UK government informed the United States that it viewed the case as targeted against the U.K. Government, and that the vessel was entitled to sovereign immunity. Furthermore, it considered the case to be covered by the 1942 Knock-for-Knock Agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom of December 4, 1942, as amended, 56 Stat. 1780, E.A.S. No. 282. That agreement provides that each government "agrees to waive claims arising out of or in connection with negligent navigation . . . in respect of any vessel . . . owned by such Government against the other contracting Government . . . or in any case where such other Government represents that such claim if made would ultimately be borne by such other Government." The case was dismissed at the request of the Department of Justice without prejudice on March 24, 1998, in an unpublished order, and was not refiled.

6. Legislation in the United States Concerning Gambling at Sea

a. Gambling Ship Act

(1) 1994 amendments

The Gambling Ship Act, as amended, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1081–1084 (2000), prohibits most gambling aboard American-flag vessels operated principally for gambling. The Act prohibits anyone "who is on an American vessel or is otherwise under or within the jurisdiction of the United States," from directly or indirectly owning or holding any interest in any gambling ship or participating in the operation of a gambling operation on a gambling ship "if such gambling ship is on the high seas, or is an American vessel or otherwise under or within the jurisdiction of the United States, and is not within the jurisdiction of any State." As enacted in 1948, the term "gambling ship" was defined to include all "vessel[s] used principally for the operation of one or more gambling establishments." 18 U.S.C. § 1081 (1984). The reference to "jurisdiction of any State," meaning a state of the United States, made clear that the statute did not preempt laws of states of the United States, making it possible for a state to authorize operation of such gambling ships, but only within the reach of that state's jurisdiction, i.e., within the territorial sea.

In 1994 the Gambling Ship Act was amended by creating an exception to the prohibition on gambling ships in certain circumstances. See Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103–322, § 320501, 108 Stat. 1796, 2114–15 (1994). The definition of "gambling ship" in § 1081 was amended by providing that "[s]uch term does not include a vessel with respect to gambling aboard such vessel beyond the territorial waters of the United States during a covered voyage (as defined in section 4472 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 as in effect on January 1, 1994)." The definition of "covered voyage" under § 4472 included a "voyage of . . . a commercial vessel transporting passengers engaged in gambling aboard the vessel beyond the territorial waters of the United States, during which passengers embark or disembark the vessel in the United States." 26 U.S.C. § 4472 (1997). A 1992 interpretive regulation of the Internal Revenue Service, effective for voyages beginning on or after January 1, 1990 (57 Fed. Reg. 33,636 (July 30, 1992)), provided:

> For purposes of sections 4471 and 4472, the territorial waters of the United States are those waters within the international boundary line between the United States and any contiguous foreign country or within 3 nautical miles (3.45 statute miles) from low tide on the coastline.

26 C.F.R. § 43.4472–1(e) (1997).

(2) Width of territorial sea under Gambling Ship Act

On January 29, 1999, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed a district court opinion holding that the definition of "territorial waters" as used in the Gambling Ship Act, as amended, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1081–1084 (2000), remained three, rather than twelve, nautical miles. United States v. One Big Six Wheel, 166 F.3d 498 (2d Cir. 1999). The case was brought as an in rem action against Big Six Wheel, a gambling device on a vessel used in gambling cruises embarking and returning to Brooklyn, New York. The gambling cruises were often known as "cruises-to-nowhere" because they proceeded more than three nautical miles from the coastline of the United States where they operated on the sea as casinos until they turned around and re-entered the three-mile limit. The Second Circuit opinion summarized the statutory issue and its relation to the 1988 Presidential Proclamation extending the territorial waters of the United States to twelve miles as set forth below.

At one time, the Gambling Ship Act flatly prohibited gambling aboard American-flag vessels engaging in interstate and foreign commerce, anywhere. See 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1081–1082 (West 1984). The existence of the cruise-to-nowhere industry depends upon a 1994 amendment to the Act, which created exceptions for vessels on certain cruises, defined by reference to a provision of the Internal Revenue Code as of 1994 that levies a tax on the gambling revenues of such cruises. See Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103–322, § 320501, 108 Stat. 1796, 2114–15 (1994) (amending 18 U.S.C. § 1081). In 1994, the Internal Revenue Code defined such cruises as (inter alia) those that return within 24 hours to their port of embarkation and conduct gambling (subject to federal taxation) "beyond the territorial waters of the United States." 26 U.S.C. § 4472 (1994). Under the corresponding Internal Revenue regulation in effect in 1994, the territorial waters of the United States extended to three nautical miles. See 26 C.F.R. § 43.4472–1(e) (1994).

In August 1997, the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of New York notified Bay Casino that its operations were in violation of the Gambling Ship Act because its ships were not cruising twelve nautical miles to sea before opening the casino. The United States Attorney cited section 901(a) of AEDPA, which provides:

> The Congress declares that all the territorial sea of the United States, as defined by Presidential Proclamation 5928 of December 27, 1988 [extending U.S. territorial sea to twelve nautical miles[1]], for purposes of Federal criminal > jurisdiction is part of the United States, subject to its sovereignty, and is within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States for the purposes of title 18, United States Code [this title].

[1] Presidential Proclamation 5928, signed by President Reagan, extended the territorial sea of the United States to twelve nautical miles in order to conform to international standards. See 43 U.S.C.A. § 1331 (West Supp. 1998). This Proclamation, however, explicitly refused to "extend[] or otherwise alter[] existing Federal or State law or any jurisdiction, rights, legal interests, or obligations therefrom." Id. Therefore, it was not until the enactment of AEDPA in 1996 that the twelve nautical mile limit had any effect upon federal law—and even then, by its own language, only upon federal criminal jurisdiction.

18 U.S.C.A. § 7, Hist. & Stat. Note (West Supp. 1998) (first alteration and footnote added).

* * * *

Section 901(a) alters United States boundaries, but not for all purposes. Although the increment of territorial waters is made "part of the United States," this occurs solely "for purposes of Federal criminal jurisdiction." 18 U.S.C.A. § 7, Hist. & Stat. Note. Although that same increment is implemented "for the purposes of title 18," that measure is itself limited to "the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States." Id. Therefore, section 901 is jurisdiction defining. As the district court observed, to infer more would be to "read the phrase 'for purposes of Federal criminal jurisdiction' out of the statute."

* * * *

. . . The 1994 amendment to § 1081 effected a narrowing of the previously absolute prohibition. And the term "territorial waters" used therein is not coextensive with the extent of the nation's criminal jurisdiction; rather, it specifies geographically where a certain kind of offshore gambling is a criminal activity and where it is licit. However one expands the territory in which one's conduct might be proscribed as an offense against the United States, that territorial expansion does not criminalize offshore gambling that the Gambling Ship Act itself does not forbid.

. . . Given the plain language of AEDPA and the Gambling Ship Act, we read both terms consistently. For purposes of the Gambling Ship Act, until Congress says otherwise, the "territorial waters" extend three nautical miles from the U.S. coastline.

* * * *

b. Johnson (Gambling Devices) Act

(1) 1991 amendments

The Johnson Act, first enacted in 1951, regulated gambling devices located, inter alia, on vessels not covered by the Gambling Ship Act because the ship on which they are found is not used "principally" for gambling purposes. 15 U.S.C. §§ 1171–1175. Prior to amendments enacted in 1992, the Act declared it unlawful "knowingly to transport any gambling device to any place in a State [of the United States] or a possession of the United States from any place outside of such State or possession" unless lawful under the relevant state's laws.

The United States-Flag Cruise Ship Competitiveness Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102–251, 106 Stat. 60, 61–62 (1992), amended the Johnson Act in order to allow U.S. flag cruise ships to offer gambling as their foreign flag counterparts were able to do under the law. An explanation of the amendment provided by Congressman Lent of New York at the time the House of Representatives adopted the final version of the legislation on January 28, 1992, is provided below. 138 CONG. REC. H 68, 72 (daily ed. Jan. 28, 1992).

* * * *

. . . . This legislation will permit U.S.-flag cruise vessels to offer gambling to their passengers when embarked on cruises on the high seas. Currently, foreign-flag cruise ships departing from U.S. ports offer gambling but it is against the law for a U.S. ship to have gambling onboard. This prohibition has limited opportunities for American interests to engage in the profitable cruise ship trade.

H.R. 3866 changes the law so that both American and foreign-flag cruise ships will operate under the same rules regarding gambling onboard.

Mr. Speaker, the merchant marine and fisheries committee very carefully crafted this legislation as an amendment to the so-called gambling devices act. It will allow the possession and operation of gambling equipment on U.S.-flag vessels to the same extent that gambling is allowed on foreign-flag vessels. This bill does not affect in any way the current prohibitions in the gambling ship act, which make it illegal to operate a vessel that is principally engaged in gambling as a floating casino.

This bill preserves the right of a coastal state to enact legislation that prohibits gambling on a vessel that operates from a port of that state even if the vessel sails from that port out into international waters and then returns to the same port. The committee was aware that a number of coastal states do not want gambling on vessels in their waters and this legislation retains the right of states to continue to prohibit gambling.

(2) Applicability of state legislation

In July 1993 Entertainment A-Float filed an action against the state of Connecticut for a declaratory judgment and injunctive relief, asking the court, among other things, to declare that "applicable federal law and treaties supersede and preempt Connecticut's gambling laws" which prohibited the possession of gaming devices within the state. Entertainment A-Float v. State of Connecticut, Civil Action No. 3:93CV0319 (D.C.Ct. 1993). Entertainment A-Float was the time charterer of the cruise ship Europa Jet, registered in the Bahamas. As described in the complaint, Entertainment A-Float was organized to operate "cruises 'to nowhere,' where vessels leave a port and sail for approximately six hours and return to the same port." The Europa Jet was described as an "entertainment cruise vessel, including, among other things, a casino." While in the territorial waters of the state of Connecticut, the casino and all gambling equipment would be "locked up, secured, and not available for use by the public."

> Specifically, plaintiff argued that a state law prohibiting the possession of gaming devices within the state could not be applied to the gambling equipment of a vessel registered under the laws of a foreign nation, "as the laws of a host nation may not apply to the equipment aboard a foreign vessel exercising rights of free passage under the treaties governing the law of the seas."
>
> In an affidavit dated September 3, 1993, J. Ashley Roach, attorney-adviser, Office of Oceans, Environment and Science, Office of the Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, refuted this assertion. After first noting that the United States was not a party to the 1982 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea and that, as of the time of the affidavit, the Convention had not yet entered into force for the states that had ratified or acceded to it, he explained the position of the United States on this question as set forth below.

6. It is the position of the United States that the provisions of the Law of the Sea Convention with respect to traditional uses of the oceans generally confirm existing maritime law and practice and fairly balance the interests of all States, and that it is United States policy to accept and act in accordance with the balance of interests relating to traditional uses of the oceans—such as navigation and overflight—contained in the Convention. I Public Papers of the Presidents: Ronald Reagan 1983, at 378–79.

7. I understand that under United States law set out in title 15 of the U.S. Code, section 1175, it is unlawful, inter alia, to transport or possess any gambling device on board a vessel documented under the laws of a foreign country that is on a voyage that begins and ends in the same State without an intervening stop in another State or foreign country and the State in which the voyage begins and ends has enacted a statute the terms of which prohibit the use on that voyage of any gambling device.

8. I also understand that Connecticut has enacted a statute defining gambling as a crime against public policy, i.e., Connecticut General Statutes section 53–278a et seq.; that under section 53–

278c(d), it is a misdemeanor for any person to knowingly possess or transport any gambling device; that under section 53–278c(a), all gambling devices found in a "gambling premise" are subject to seizure; and that under section 53–278a(7), a gambling premise is defined to include any vessel intended to be used for "professional gambling", which under subsection (3) is defined to include offering to accept for profit money risked in gambling in slot machines. I further understand that this gambling statute does not contain express language as to the territorial scope of its application.

9. Under Article 18(1)(b) of the Law of the Sea Convention, "passage" includes navigation through the territorial sea for the purpose of proceeding to or from internal waters. (New London, Connecticut is located within the internal waters of the United States.) Under Article 21(1) of the Law of the Sea Convention, a coastal State may adopt laws and regulations, in conformity with the Law of the Sea Convention and other rules of international law, relating to the "innocent passage" through the territorial sea in respect of, inter alia, the safety of navigation and the regulation of maritime traffic, and the prevention of the infringement of the customs and fiscal laws and regulations of the coastal state. Article 21(2) of the Law of the Sea Convention provides that:

> 2. Such laws and regulations shall not apply to the design, construction, manning or equipment of foreign ships unless they are giving effect to generally accepted international rules or standards.

10. It is the position of the United States that the prohibition in Article 21(2) of the Law of the Sea Convention applies to those measures taken by a coastal State to promote safety of navigation and to minimize to the fullest extent possible pollution from vessels (see Article 194(3)(b) of the Convention), and thus limits the power of a coastal State to make and enforce laws relating to the essential marine-related operating characteristics (such as machinery design, hull, structure, crew size and competence) and marine-related equipment (such as radars, depth sounders, and pollution-prevention equipment) of a foreign ship engaged in innocent passage through the U.S. territorial sea (including proceeding to or from U.S. internal waters) See U.S. Department of State, Digest of United States Practice in International Law 1977, at 530 (1979). Nothing in the travaux preparatoire of Article 21 or Article 194(3)(b) refers to the presence of gambling equipment or paraphernalia aboard ships (of whatever flag) in ports and internal waters.

11. The Law of the Sea Convention contains no provision purporting, or effective, to interfere with the power of the United States or any one of the states of the union (including Connecticut) to prescribe, enforce, or adjudicate laws prohibiting the possession of gambling devices or paraphernalia aboard vessels of any flag or nationality within the internal waters (including ports) of the coastal State, including the United States or of any state of the union.

B. OUTER SPACE

1. Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space

On October 28, 1992, Kenneth Hodgkins, U.S. Adviser to the 47th Session of the UN General Assembly, addressed the Special Political Committee, providing the views of the United States on Item 72, "International Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space." Among other things, he addressed the role and structure of COPUOS and safe use of nuclear power sources in outer space.

Mr. Hodgkins' comments, excerpted below, are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Mr. Chairman, the Forty-seventh session of the General Assembly is meeting at a time during which dramatic changes continue to take place in the world political scene. There is no doubt that these changes present real possibilities to broaden international cooperation. The challenge before us is to seek those opportunities which will strengthen the role of the Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space (COPUOUS) as the chief advocate in the United Nations system for international cooperation in the peaceful uses of outer space. Bearing this in mind, at future sessions of COPUOS and its subcommittees, we must redouble our efforts to deepen the scientific and technical content of our deliberations, avoiding the infusion of issues, such as disarmament, which are more appropriately handled in other fora.

. . . [T]he past year has been a productive one for the Committee. This is no more evident than in our work celebrating the International Space Year (ISY).

* * * *

In addition to the work done through the UN Programme on Space Applications, concrete results were realized through the Space Agency Forum on International Space Year (SAFISY). SAFISY has grown to a membership of 21 space agencies and ministries from around the world and 10 affiliated members representing organizations with space interests. SAFISY has served as a forum to coordinate ISY activities in the field of earth science and technology, space science, and education and training. The projects include analysis of scientific data, conferences to report on scientific results, educational programs to inspire young people to pursue careers in math and science, and public outreach to stimulate interest in space.

In our view, the UN's involvement in the International Space Year is another sign that the process initiated several years ago of reinvigorating the work of COPUOS is on the right track. COPUOS members have long agreed that strengthening international cooperation in the exploration of outer space implies the need for the Committee and its Subcommittees to improve wherever necessary the methods and forms of their work. We have yet to see the sort of substantial changes that we believe are required to put COPUOS and its Subcommittees on a more effective footing. But we recognize that some real progress has been made, particularly in addressing the perennial problem of the Legal Subcommittee's organization of work. We applaud the action taken by the Subcommittee on agreeing to specific measures that will improve its efficiency. Next year, we will evaluate the future organization of work of the Legal Subcommittee, and we are confident that the spirit of cooperation and compromise that has characterized our work over the past year will yield positive results.

In conclusion, let me turn to the principles on the use of nuclear power sources in space. As we stated at the 35th session of the United Nations Committee on Peaceful Uses of Outer Space, the United States appreciates the efforts of that Committee on the complex technical subject of principles related to the safe use of nuclear power sources in outer space, in particular the efforts to deal with U.S. concerns for technical validity. The United States did not block the consensus recommendation of the Committee to forward the principles to the General Assembly, nor will the United States oppose their adoption here. On some points, however, it remains our view that the principles related to safe use of nuclear power sources in outer space do not yet contain the clarity and technical validity appropriate to guide safe use of nuclear power sources in outer space. The United States has an approach on these points which it considers to be technically clearer and more valid and has a history of demonstrated safe and successful application of nuclear power sources. We will continue to apply that approach.

Principle 11 calls for review and revision of the principles within two years, and we strongly believe that this will be necessary. Our vote in favor of these principles is predicated on the understanding that Principle 3 will be revised. In fact, this review and revision should begin promptly at the next sessions of the Scientific and Technical and Legal Subcommittees of COPUOS. In this manner the Committee can ensure the principles related to safe use of nuclear power sources in outer apace are technically sound and are consistent with proven U.S. safety practices.

On November 12, 1996, Mr. Hodgkins provided the views of the United States in the Special Political and Decolonization Committee on recent developments in COPUOS and the U.S. space program. Excerpts below concern management of the Global Positioning System, U.S. policy concerning space nuclear reactors in Earth orbit and minimization of space debris, and the importance of international cooperation in the peaceful uses of outer space as well as comments on the organization of work in COPUOS. The full text is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The United States is strongly committed to the basic tenet of the 1967 Outer Space Treaty; namely, that the exploration and use of outer space should be carried out for the benefit and in the interests of all states. That commitment was further underscored with the release on March 29th of President Clinton's policy on the use and management of the Global Positioning System (GPS).

GPS was designed by the U.S. Department of Defense as dual-use system. The 24 satellite constellation makes it possible for users to determine their position and navigate anywhere in the world. Over the past several years, GPS has rapidly become an integral component of the emerging Global Information Infrastructure, with applications including mapping and surveying; international air traffic management; global change research; car navigation; weather prediction; earthquake monitoring; and recreational activities such as hiking and taking measurements at sporting events. The growing demand from military, civil, commercial and scientific users has generated a commercial GPS equipment and service industry that covers the world.

This policy opens the door for rapid growth in international civil, commercial and scientific use of GPS. It announced the U.S. Government's intention to terminate the current practice of degrading civil GPS signals within the next decade, providing a better signal for all users. The policy also reaffirms the U.S. commitment to providing the GPS Standard Positioning Service on a continuous, worldwide basis, free of direct user fees.

As we leave behind the East-West rivalries and enter the Third Millennium, the exploration of outer space will be a major source of technological advances. Recognizing this, President Clinton announced on September 19th a new national space policy that is the first post-Cold War assessment of American space goals and activities. The policy reaffirms our commitment to the exploration and use of outer space by all nations for peaceful purposes and for the benefit of all humanity. It calls on the U.S. space program to enhance knowledge of the Earth, the solar system and the universe through human and robotic exploration and to promote international cooperation in space. The policy addresses two issues of particular interest to the Committee. Under this policy, space nuclear reactors will not be used in Earth orbit without specific approval by the President or his designee. Such requests for approval will take into account public safety, economic considerations, international treaty obligations, and U.S. national security and foreign policy interests. We believe that all countries planning to use space nuclear reactors should adopt an approval process which incorporates these elements. Of equal importance is what the policy says about space debris. It is in the interest of the U.S. Government to ensure that space debris minimization practices are applied by other spacefaring nations and international organizations. The President has directed that the U.S. will take a leadership role in international fora to adopt policies and practices aimed at debris minimization and will cooperate internationally in the exchange of information on debris research and the identification of debris mitigation options.

Mr. Chairman, my delegation would like to join previous speakers in expressing satisfaction with the positive developments that have occurred in the Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer apace and its subcommittees. The cooperative spirit in which we have worked over the past year is an encouraging sign that more can be accomplished in the future. We believe that the Committee is making real progress towards focusing its efforts on serving as an advocate for international cooperation in the peaceful uses of outer space in the United Nations system. This has not been easy and our most important accomplishments have come only after long and serious negotiations culminated by compromise on the part of all Member States. Although there are still skeptics, the positive results we see today demonstrate that the principle of consensus can work effectively.

In this regard, we are pleased to join consensus on the adoption of the "Declaration on International Cooperation in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space for the Benefit and in the Interests of All States, Taking into Particular Account the Needs of Developing Countries." After substantial debate, the Committee reached agreement on a balanced text which represents an important statement on the scope and nature of international cooperation in outer space. The Declaration recognizes that States are free to cooperate in the exploration of outer space on a mutually acceptable basis and suggests that particular attention should be given to the benefit for and the interests of developing countries. It also recommends that the Committee should be strengthened in its role as a forum for the exchange of information on space cooperation and encourages States to contribute to the UN Programme on Space Applications. These are laudable goals which reflect, in part, the U.S. practice in conducting international space activities.

I wish to recall that my delegation and others have put forward detailed proposals over the past decade for improving the organization of work in COPUOS and its subcommittees. Indeed, the Committee has concluded that strengthening international cooperation in the peaceful exploration and use of outer space implies the need for the Committee itself to improve, whenever necessary, the methods and forms of its work. We have always taken this mandate seriously. That is why, when one takes stock of what has been achieved to date, we are gratified to see that many of these proposals have in fact been adopted. Of particular note has been the productive discussions in the Scientific and Technical Subcommittee, where space scientists and experts are now playing a central role in the work of that subcommittee.

On the other hand, we are convinced that more can be done on the question of working methods, particularly in the Legal Subcommittee. In this regard, we note that the Chairman of COPUOS, Ambassador Peter Hohenfellner, is conducting consultations on the methods of work and agendas of the Committee and its subcommittees. This is an important step forward in seeking those reforms which will make COPUOS a more effective and efficient body in the UN system. Within the context of these discussions, the U.S. places its highest priority on two results. First, there must be an unambiguous commitment by all member states to the principle of consensus in both substantive and procedural matters taken up by COPUOS. Second, it is imperative that significant reductions are made in the duration of sessions of the Legal Subcommittee and the Committee. We have demonstrated that these two bodies can complete their work in less time, resulting in real savings in conference services.

2. Use of the Global Positioning System

A fact sheet released by the Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs, U.S. Department of State, December 16, 1998, described the Global Positioning System ("GPS") as follows:

> The NAVSTAR Global Positioning System (GPS) is a constellation of 24 satellites developed, launched, and maintained by the United States Air Force that provides positioning, timing, and navigation signals free of charge to both military and civilian users worldwide. GPS is the heart of a Global Navigation Satellite System (GNSS), which includes augmentations systems being developed by the United States, Europe, and Japan.

The fact sheet is available at www.state.gov/www/global/oes/space/9081216_fs_navstar.html. See also U.S. policy on GPS in 1.b., supra.

a. U.S.-Japan Joint Statement

On September 22, 1998, President William J. Clinton and Japanese Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi issued the United States-Japan Joint Statement on Cooperation in the Use of the Global Position System, 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1862 (1998). The statement addressed cooperative activities to promote GPS as an international standard, prevent misuse of GPS, promote compatible operating standards, build awareness of the need for adequate GPS radio frequency allocation, and encourage trade and investment in GPS equipment.

On the basis of a series of discussions between representatives and experts of the Government of the United States and the Government of Japan, U.S. President William Clinton and Japanese Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi have issued this Joint Statement regarding cooperation in the use of the Global Positioning System (GPS) Standard Positioning Service for global positioning and other applications.

* * * *

Building a Cooperative Relationship

The United States Government intends to continue to provide the GPS Standard Positioning Service for peaceful civil, commercial, and scientific use on a continuous, worldwide basis, free of direct user fees.

The Government of Japan intends to work closely with the United States to promote broad and effective use of the GPS Standard Positioning Service as a worldwide positioning, navigation, and timing standard. Both Governments are convinced of the need to prevent the misuse of GPS and its augmentation systems without unduly disrupting or degrading civilian uses, as well as of the need to prepare for emergency situations. Both Governments intend to cooperate to promote and facilitate civilian uses of GPS. It is anticipated that cooperation will:

- promote compatibility of operating standards for GPS technologies, equipment, and services;
- help develop effective approaches toward providing adequate radio frequency allocations for GPS and other radio navigation systems;
- identify potential barriers to the growth of commercial applications of GPS and appropriate preventative measures;
- encourage trade and investment in GPS equipment and services as a means of enhancing the information infrastructure of the Asia-Pacific region; and
- facilitate exchange of information on GPS-related matters of interest to both countries, such as enhancement of global positioning, navigation, and timing technologies and capabilities.

The two Governments intend to work together as appropriate on GPS-related issues that arise in the International Civil Aviation Organization, the International Maritime Organization, the International Telecommunication Union, and Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation, or in other international organizations or meetings.

Cooperative Mechanism

The Government of the United States and the Government of Japan have decided to establish a mechanism for bilateral cooperation relating to the use of the GPS Standard Positioning Service . . .

The two Governments share the expectation that this mechanism will help the two Governments identify ways to deal with GPS-related issues that may arise as civilian use of GPS increases, and take actions as appropriate.

b. U.S.-European Union consultations

On December 16, 1998, Mary Beth West, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Oceans, Fisheries, and Space, Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs, U.S. Department of State, and Mr. Matthias Ruete, Director for the Directorate General for Transportation, European Commission, issued a joint summary report for United States-European Union GPS and GNSS consultations.

The joint summary report, set forth in full below, is also available at www.state.gov/www/global/oes/space/981216_useu_gps.html.

The United States and Europe recognize the vital and growing reliance on satellite-based radio-positioning, navigation, and precision timing for commercial, civil, and scientific functions, including those related to safety-of-life.

In a series of exploratory discussions between the representatives and experts of the Government of the United States and the European Tripartite Group—European Community, represented by the European Commission, European Space Agency and Eurocontrol—, the two sides have discussed a number of options for achieving a future Global Navigation Satellite System (GNSS). The United States believes that a GNSS based on GPS and its related augmentations—such as WAAS, EGNOS, MSAS, maritime DGPS, and Eurofix—would effectively meet the needs of global users. The European institutions are in the process of making a decision in early 1999 on the future direction and role of Europe in satellite-based radionavigation.

At the most recent meetings, an option under consideration by the European institutions was discussed. This option would involve the creation of a European component of GNSS that would provide signals-in-space which would be fully compatible and interoperable with GPS. With regard to this option, the United States presented a concept for further discussion based on the following:

- Use of common GPS time, geodesy, and signal structure standards
- Protection of current radionavigation spectrum from disruption and interference
- Seamless, global interoperability of future systems with GPS
- Open signal structure for basic civil services to assure full availability for safety-related services and to promote equal access for applications development and value-added services
- No direct user fees for basic civil and public safety services
- Ensuring open market driven competition for user equipment and applications
- Recognizing the national and international security issues of GPS and GNSS and protecting against misuse of the systems.

The United States Government intends to continue to provide the GPS Standard Positioning Service for peaceful civil, commercial, and scientific use on a continuous, worldwide basis free of direct user charges. With regard to a GPS-based system, the United States Government is prepared to consider in a cooperative agreement, opportunities for expanding European insight and input into the operation, management, and modernization of GPS civil functions through appropriate mechanisms—e.g., civilian representation at the civil GPS augmentation centers. On a similar basis, Europe would consider, in line with the provisions above in this paragraph, equivalent U.S. treatment within a civil GNSS-2 created by Europe.

In the context of a cooperative agreement, structures for interface coordination could be established. These structures could be responsible for coordinating the technical characteristics of each system and may need to address policy issues, e.g., spectrum management and civil-military interfaces, so that their respective management structures can make informed decisions.

Both sides agree on the objective of achieving seamless global interoperability of satellite-based radionavigation systems. This implies both bilateral and multilateral cooperation on interoperability with ground and space-based augmentation systems (GBAS and SBAS) which might serve as contributions to the deployment of a future international integrity network. Further, this cooperation should support the development of appropriate radionavigation planning, as well as spectrum protection and planning, interface management, and the identification of and response to user requirements.

In order to clarify these options, both sides agree that technical meetings will take place in the near future. The two sides also intend to work together as appropriate on GNSS-related issues—e.g., certification, liability, and spectrum management—that arise in the International Civil Aviation Organization, the International Maritime Organization, the International Telecommunication Union, and in other international organizations or meetings.

On industrial issues, the two sides have concluded that there are opportunities for cooperation to promote the growth of trade in GNSS related products and services. This should include action to identify potential barriers to trade and appropriate measures to prevent or remove them.

In the spirit of the New Transatlantic Agenda, the two sides share the expectation that their consultations will help their respective authorities identify ways to deal with GPS/GNSS related issues that may arise as uses of GPS/GNSS increase.

3. Bilateral Agreements for Space Cooperation

a. Cross-waiver of liability agreement with Japan

On April 24, 1995, representatives of Japan and the United States signed the Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Japan Concerning Cross-Waiver of Liability for Cooperation in the Exploration and Use of Space for Peaceful Purposes, TIAS 12638. The agreement entered into force July 20, 1995. The purpose of the agreement, as provided in Article 1, "is to establish a framework for cross-waiver of liability in the interest of encouraging cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Japan in joint activities for the exploration and use of space for peaceful purposes." Article 2 provided that the agreement "shall apply to joint activities listed in the Annex, ongoing at the time of entry into force of this Agreement or begun while this Agreement is in force." It also provided that the parties may revise the annex by mutual agreement. Article 3.2 (a) provided, among other things, that > Each Party agrees to a cross-waiver of liability pursuant to which each Party waives all claims against [the other Party; a related entity of the other Party; and employees of the other Party or related entity] based on damage arising out of Protected Space Operations. . . . The cross-waiver shall apply to any claims for damage, whatever the legal basis for such claims, including but not limited to delict and tort (including negligence of every degree and kind) and contract. . . .

The term "Protected Space Operations" was defined in Article 3.1.(f) to mean "all activities pursuant to the joint activities listed in the Annex, including launch vehicle activities and payload activities on Earth, in outer space, or in transit between Earth and outer space. . . . [but] excludes activities on Earth which are conducted on return from space to develop further a payload's product or process for use other than for the joint activity in question."

Article 3(2)(c) provided that

> This cross-waiver of liability shall be applicable to liability arising from the Convention on International Liability for Damage Caused by Space Objects. . . . where the person, entity, or property causing the damage is involved in Protected Space Operations and the person, entity or property damaged is damaged by virtue of its involvement in Protected Space Operations.

Article 3.2(d) set forth a number of exceptions to the cross waiver, including, among others, "claims made by a natural person, his/her estate, survivors, or subrogees for injury, other impairment of health or death of such natural person," claims for damage caused by willful misconduct, and intellectual property claims.

For a discussion of the President's authority to waive such claims by executive agreement, see Chapter 4.A.2.d.

b. Other agreements

During the 1990s the United States also entered into the U.S.-Argentina Agreement for Cooperation in the Civil Uses of Space, signed at Buenos Aires, August 6, 1991, as extended, TIAS 12214; the U.S.-Brazil Framework Agreement on Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space, with Annex, signed at Brasilia, March 1, 1996; and the U.S.-Russia Agreement Concerning Cooperation in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space for Peaceful Purposes, with Annex, signed at Washington, June 17, 1992, as extended, TIAS 12457.

4. International Space Station Partners Agreement

On January 29, 1998, in Washington, D.C., the United States, Japan, Canada, Russia, and eleven members of the European Space Agency—Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, The Netherlands, Norway, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom—signed the Agreement Among the Government of Canada, Governments of Member States of the European Space Agency, the Government of Japan, the Government of the Russian Federation, and the Government of the United States of America Concerning Cooperation on the Civil International Space Station ("Intergovernmental Agreement" or "IGA"). A provisional arrangement, the Arrangement Concerning Application of the Space Station Intergovernmental Agreement Pending its Entry into Force, was signed at the same time by the government representatives. The parties to the provisional arrangement "undert[ook], to the fullest extent possible consistent with their domestic laws and regulations, to abide by the terms of the Intergovernmental Agreement until it enters into force or becomes operative with respect to each of them." The provisional arrangement entered into force on the date of signature.

The IGA committed the parties to a cooperative program to build, operate, and utilize a permanently manned civil space station. It was designed to supersede the Agreement on Cooperation in the Detailed Design, Development, Operation, and Utilization of the Permanently Manned Civil Space Station, done at Washington on September 29, 1988 (which had entered into force for the United States and Japan but not for any other space station partners), and to permit the Russian Federation to join the program. Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright accepted the IGA for the United States on November 19, 1998, and it entered into force March 27, 2001, for Canada, Japan, the Russian Federation and the United States. Under Article 4 of the IGA "Cooperating Agencies" were responsible for implementing Space Station cooperation on behalf of the governments. NASA signed implementing memoranda of understanding with the Canadian Space Agency, the European Space Agency, the Russian Space Agency, and the Government of Japan. The preamble to the IGA "[r]ecognize[d] that [these MOUs were prepared] in conjunction with their Governments' negotiation of this Agreement, and that the MOUs provide detailed provisions in implementation of this Agreement."

Excerpted below are Article 1, providing the object and scope of the agreement, and Article 2, reaffirming that the Space Station would be developed, operated and utilized in accordance with international law. Article 21 set forth the agreed territorial approach to intellectual property law on the Space Station flight elements based on registry of the elements, implemented in the United States pursuant to 35 U.S.C. § 105. (Article 16, the cross-waiver of liability provision of the IGA, excluded intellectual property claims.) Article 22 generally permitted a partner state to exercise criminal jurisdiction over personnel who are its nationals for misconduct occurring in space, and provided for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters.

The full text of the IGA is available at 1998 U.S.T. LEXIS 212. Remarks at the signing by Acting Secretary of State Strobe Talbott, who signed for the United States, and other representatives of the United States and other countries and agencies are available at www.state.gov/www/global/oes/space/980129_space_agreement.html.

Object and Scope

1. The object of this Agreement is to establish a long-term international cooperative framework among the Partners, on the basis of genuine partnership, for the detailed design, development, operation, and utilization of a permanently inhabited civil international Space Station for peaceful purposes, in accordance with international law. This civil international Space Station will enhance the scientific, technological, and commercial use of outer space. This Agreement specifically defines the civil international

Space Station program and the nature of this partnership, including the respective rights and obligations of the Partners in this cooperation. This Agreement further provides for mechanisms and arrangements designed to ensure that its object is fulfilled.

2. The Partners will join their efforts, under the lead role of the United States for overall management and coordination, to create an integrated international Space Station. The United States and Russia, drawing on their extensive experience in human space flight, will produce elements which serve as the foundation for the international Space Station. The European Partner and Japan will produce elements that will significantly enhance the Space Station's capabilities. Canada's contribution will be an essential part of the Space Station. This Agreement lists in the Annex the elements to be provided by the Partners to form the international Space Station.

3. The permanently inhabited civil international Space Station (hereinafter "the Space Station") will be a multi-use facility in low-earth orbit, with flight elements and Space Station-unique ground elements provided by all the Partners. By providing Space Station flight elements, each Partner acquires certain rights to use the Space Station and participates in its management in accordance with this Agreement, the MOUs, and implementing arrangements.

4. The Space Station is conceived as having an evolutionary character. The Partner States' rights and obligations regarding evolution shall be subject to specific provisions in accordance with Article 14.

Article 2

International Rights and Obligations

1. The Space Station shall be developed, operated, and utilized in accordance with international law, including the Outer Space Treaty, the Rescue Agreement, the Liability Convention, and the Registration Convention.
2. Nothing in this Agreement shall be interpreted as:
(a) modifying the rights and obligations of the Partner States found in the treaties listed in paragraph 1 above, either toward each other or toward other States, except as otherwise provided in Article 16;

(b) affecting the rights and obligations of the Partner States when exploring or using outer space, whether individually or in cooperation with other States, in activities unrelated to the Space Station; or
(c) constituting a basis for asserting a claim to national appropriation over outer space or over any portion of outer space.

* * * *

Article 21

Intellectual Property

1. For the purposes of this Agreement, "intellectual property" is understood to have the meaning of Article 2 of the Convention Establishing the World Intellectual Property Organization, done at Stockholm on 14 July 1967.
2. Subject to the provisions of this Article, for purposes of intellectual property law, an activity occurring in or on a Space Station flight element shall be deemed to have occurred only in the territory of the Partner State of that element's registry, except that for ESA-registered elements any European Partner State may deem the activity to have occurred within its territory. For avoidance of doubt, participation by a Partner State, its Cooperating Agency, or its related entities in an activity occurring in or on any other Partner's Space Station flight element shall not in and of itself alter or affect the jurisdiction over such activity provided for in the previous sentence.
3. In respect of an invention made in or on any Space Station flight element by a person who is not its national or resident, a Partner State shall not apply its laws concerning secrecy of inventions so as to prevent the filing of a patent application (for example, by imposing a delay or requiring prior authorization) in any other Partner State that provides for the protection of the secrecy of patent applications containing information that is classified or otherwise protected for national security purposes. This provision does not prejudice (a) the right of any Partner State in which a patent application is first filed to control the secrecy of such patent application or restrict its further filing; or (b) the right of any other Partner State in which an application is subsequently filed to restrict, pursuant to any international obligation, the dissemination of an application.

[Paragraphs 4 and 5 address multiple concurrent jurisdiction on an ESA-registered element]

* * * *

6. The temporary presence in the territory of a Partner State of any articles, including the components of a flight element, in transit between any place on Earth and any flight element of the Space Station registered by another Partner State or ESA shall not in itself form the basis for any proceedings in the first Partner State for patent infringement.

Article 22

Criminal Jurisdiction

In view of the unique and unprecedented nature of this particular international cooperation in space:

1. Canada, the European Partner States, Japan, Russia, and the United States may exercise criminal jurisdiction over personnel in or on any flight element who are their respective nationals.
2. In a case involving misconduct on orbit that: (a) affects the life or safety of a national of another Partner State or (b) occurs in or on or causes damage to the flight element of another Partner State, the Partner State whose national is the alleged perpetrator shall, at the request of any affected Partner State, consult with such State concerning their respective prosecutorial interests. An affected Partner State may, following such consultation, exercise criminal jurisdiction over the alleged perpetrator provided that, within 90 days of the date of such consultation or within such other period as may be mutually agreed, the Partner State whose national is the alleged perpetrator either:

(1) concurs in such exercise of criminal jurisdiction, or

(2) fails to provide assurances that it will submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution.

3. If a Partner State which makes extradition conditional on the existence of a treaty receives a request for extradition from another Partner State with which it has no extradition treaty, it may at its option consider this Agreement as the legal basis for extradition in respect of the alleged misconduct on orbit. Extradition shall be subject to the procedural provisions and the other conditions of the law of the requested Partner State.
4. Each Partner State shall, subject to its national laws and regulations, afford the other Partners assistance in connection with alleged misconduct on orbit.
5. This Article is not intended to limit the authorities and procedures for the maintenance of order and the conduct of crew activities in or on the Space Station which shall be established in the Code of Conduct pursuant to Article 11, and the Code of Conduct is not intended to limit the application of this Article.

* * * *

5. U.S. Legislation on Space Commercialization

On October 28, 1998, President William J. Clinton signed the Commercial Space Act of 1998, Pub. L. No. 105–303, 112 Stat. 2843, 42 U.S.C. § 14701 et seq. The act, "To encourage the development of a commercial space industry in the United States, and for other purposes," provided the following statement of policy concerning commercialization of the space station in § 101(a):

> The Congress declares that a priority goal of constructing the International Space Station is the economic development of Earth orbital space. The Congress further declares that free and competitive markets create the most efficient conditions for promoting economic development, and should therefore govern the economic development of Earth orbital space. The Congress further declares that the use of free market principles in operating, servicing, allocating the use of, and adding capabilities to the Space Station, and the resulting fullest possible engagement > of commercial providers and participation of commercial users, will reduce Space Station operational costs for all partners and the Federal Government's share of the United States burden to fund operations.

Among other things, the act also required the federal government to "acquire space transportation services from United States commercial providers whenever such services are required in the course of its activities," with exceptions to be determined on a case-by-case basis.

Environment and Other Transnational Scientific Issues

A. ENVIRONMENT

1. Sustainable Development

United Nations Conference on Environment and Development

The United Nations Conference on Environment and Development ("UNCED"), met June 3–14, 1992, in Rio de Janeiro, on the twentieth anniversary of the first Conference on the Human Environment held in Stockholm, Sweden. In addition to the instruments adopted at the culmination of the conference discussed below, see discussion of others adopted at UNCED in A.1.c. (climate change) and 5.a. (biological diversity).

(1) Rio Declaration on Environment and Development

The Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.151/5/Rev.1 (1992), reprinted in 31 I.L.M. 874, ("Rio Declaration") sets forth 27 principles designed to help guide international action on the basis of environmental and economic responsibility. At the fourth and final meeting of the preparatory committee held in March 1992, a number of drafts of the Rio Declaration were tabled, including one from the United States. See Principles on General Rights and Obligations, Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, Proposal Submitted by the U.S., U.N. GAOR 4th Sess., Agenda item 3, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.151/PC/WG.III/L.21 (1992).

At the time of its adoption at UNCED, the United States recorded interpretive statements for the record on principles 3, 7, 12, and 23. The preamble and those provisions of the Rio Declaration follow.

* * * *

Reaffirming the Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment, adopted at Stockholm on 16 June 1972, and seeking to build upon it,

With the goal of establishing a new and equitable global partnership through the creation of new levels of cooperation among States, key sectors of societies and people,

Working towards international agreements which respect the interests of all and protect the integrity of the global environmental and developmental system,

Recognizing the integral and interdependent nature of the Earth, our home,

Proclaims that:

* * * *

Principle 3

The right to development must be fulfilled so as to equitably meet developmental and environmental needs of present and future generations.

* * * *

States shall cooperate in a spirit of global partnership to conserve, protect and restore the health and integrity of the Earth's ecosystem. In view of the different contributions to global environmental degradation, States have common but differentiated responsibilities. The developed countries acknowledge the responsibility that they bear in the international pursuit of sustainable development in view of the pressures their societies place on the global environment and of the technologies and financial resources they command.

* * * *

Principle 12

States should cooperate to promote a supportive and open international economic system that would lead to economic growth and sustainable development in all countries, to better address the problems of environmental degradation. Trade policy measures for environmental purposes should not constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination or a disguised restriction on international trade. Unilateral actions to deal with environmental challenges outside the jurisdiction of the importing country should be avoided. Environmental measures addressing transboundary or global environmental problems should, as far as possible, be based on an international consensus.

* * * *

The environment and natural resources of people under oppression, domination and occupation shall be protected.

* * * *

The U.S. interpretive statements are set forth below.

Principle 3

The United States does not, by joining consensus on the Rio Declaration, change its long-standing opposition to the so-called "right to development." Development is not a right. On the contrary, development is a goal we all hold, which depends for its realization in large part on the promotion and protection of the human rights set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The United States understands and accepts the thrust of Principle 3 to be that economic development goals and objectives must be pursued in such a way that the development and environmental needs of present and future generations are taken into account. The United States cannot agree to, and would disassociate itself from, any interpretation of Principle 3 that accepts a "right to development," or otherwise goes beyond that understanding.

Principle 7

The United States understands and accepts that Principle 7 highlights the special leadership role of the developed countries, based on our industrial development, our experience with environmental protection policies and actions, and our wealth, technical expertise and capabilities.

The United States does not accept any interpretation of Principle 7 that would imply a recognition or acceptance by the United States of any international obligations or liabilities, or any diminution in the responsibilities of developing countries.

Principle 12

The United States understands that, in certain situations, trade measures may provide an effective and appropriate means of addressing environmental concerns, including long-term sustainable forest management concerns and environmental concerns outside national jurisdiction, subject to certain disciplines.

Principle 23

The United States understands that nothing in this Declaration prejudices or predetermines the status of any territories under occupation or the natural resources that appertain to such territories. The United States further understands that this Declaration does not prejudge negotiations to achieve a just and lasting peace in the Middle East, including issues relating to natural resources and their management. The United States also understands that this Declaration does not affect the rights and duties of occupying powers under the laws of war.

(2) Agenda 21

UNCED also adopted Agenda 21, described as follows in the introduction to the press summary of the document:

> On 22 December 1989, the United Nations General Assembly called for a global meeting that would devise > strategies to halt and reverse the effects of environmental degradation "in the context of increased national and international efforts to promote sustainable and environmentally sound development in all countries."

>
> Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development on 14 June 1992, is the international community's response to that request. It is a comprehensive programme of action to be implemented—from now and into the twenty-first century—by Governments, development agencies, United Nations organizations and independent sector groups in every area where human (economic) activity affects the environment.
>
> See www.johannesburgsummit.org/html/basic_info/a21_final_summary.doc.
>
> The text of Agenda 21 is available at www.un.org/esa/sustdev/documents/agenda21/english/agenda21toc.htm.
>
> The United States submitted the following interpretive statements on Agenda 21 for the record. The reference to Forest Principles is to A Non-legally Binding Authoritative Statement of Principles for a Global Consensus on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of All Types of Forests, also adopted at UNCED and reprinted in 31 I.L.M. 881 (1992).

Trade measures taken for environmental purposes

The United States accepts the references in Agenda 21 and the Forests Principles to trade measures taken for environmental purposes subject to the same understanding stated for Principle 12 of the Rio Declaration.

Technology Cooperation

The United States strongly believes that adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights is an essential component of any international technology cooperation effort aimed at environmental protection and/or development assistance. Such protection is essential to provide incentives for innovation in the development of environmentally sound and appropriate technologies, and to facilitate access to and transfer and dissemination of such technologies.

The United States understands the provisions of the Forest Principles and Agenda 21 regarding access to and transfer of technology to mean that, in the case of technologies and know-how subject to intellectual property rights, such access and transfer shall be on freely negotiated, mutually agreed terms that recognize and are consistent with the adequate and effective protection of those rights.

Biotechnology

The United States understands that biotechnology is in no way an intrinsically unsafe process. The United States accepts to consider the need for and feasibility of internationally agreed guidelines on safety in biotechnology releases, and to consider studying the feasibility of guidelines which could facilitate national legislation on liability and compensation, subject to this understanding.

Sharing of Benefits Derived from Biological and Genetic Resources

The United States understands the references to appropriate measures for the fair and equitable sharing of benefits derived from biological and genetic resources in Agenda 21 to mean such measures as may be mutually agreed between the sources and users of these resources, under conditions that recognize and are fully consistent with the adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights. In addition, references to the sharing of benefits derived from the use of biological and genetic resources are understood to be without regard to the source of such resources.

Right to Socio-Economic Development on a Sustainable Basis

The United States understands the words "right to socio-economic development on a sustainable basis" in the Forests Principles on the same basis as stated for Principle 3 of the Rio Declaration.

ODA Targets

The United States is not among those countries that have affirmed an overseas development assistance target. Such a target would detract from the more important issues of the effectiveness and quality of aid and the policies in the recipient country. The United States emphasizes that, with respect to Chapter 33, paragraph 15, it is one of the "other developed countries" that "agree to make their best efforts to increase" their level of ODA, "in line with their support for reform efforts in developing countries." The United States has traditionally been the largest aid donor in volume terms and will continue to provide high-quality aid on a case-by-case basis, in a way that encourages reform efforts in developing countries.

2. NAFTA Side Agreement on Environment

The 1993 North American Agreement on Environmental Cooperation ("NAAEC") is discussed in Chapter 11.B.3.b.

3. Pollution and Related Issues

a. Amendments to 1987 Montreal protocol

During the 1990s the United States participated in the adoption of four amendments to the 1987 Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer, reprinted in 26 I.L.M. 1541 (1987). The four amendments, discussed below, were adopted in Beijing (1999), entered into force December 23, 2003; Montreal (1997), entered into force November 10, 1999, for the United States December 23, 2003; Copenhagen (1992), entered into force June 14, 1994; and London (1990), entered into force August 10, 1992. See also Digest 2003 at 777–78.

(1) Beijing amendment

On December 3, 1999, the United States participated in the adoption of the most recent of the amendments by the Eleventh Meeting of the Parties to the Montreal Protocol at Beijing. The Beijing amendment tightened controls on certain substances as described below in excerpts from the report of the Department of State, submitting the amendment to the President for transmittal to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. President William J. Clinton transmitted the amendment, with the report of the Department of State, on June 22, 2000. S. Treaty Doc. 106–32 (2000); see S. Exec. Rep. 107–10; it entered into force for the United States December 30, 2003. See Digest 2003 at 777–81.

The Montreal Protocol, which the United States ratified in 1988, is the most important international instrument for the protection of an essential component of the global environment, the stratospheric ozone layer. U.S. leadership in protecting the ozone layer, besides being critical to the success of this global environmental endeavor, works to safeguard public health. The gradual loss of the stratospheric ozone layer, which the Montreal Protocol seeks to reverse, has been causally linked to, for instance, a higher incidence of skin cancers, cataracts, and damage to ecosystems.

A multilateral regime such as that provided by the Protocol is necessary to control emissions of ozone-depleting substances because such emissions anywhere could affect the ozone layer globally. The Beijing Amendment and adjustments to the Protocol adopted in 1999 will, when implemented, constitute another major step forward in protecting public health and the environment from potential adverse effects of stratospheric ozone depletion.

* * * *

The principal features of the Beijing Amendment are:

—the addition of bromochloromethane as a controlled substance under the Montreal Protocol, along with associated control measures (such as a phaseout of production and consumption by January 1, 2002, subject to essential use decisions, and a ban on trade of this substance with non-Parties);

—the addition of a freeze in the level of production of hydrochlorofluorocarbons ("HCFCs") from January 1, 2004;
—the addition of a ban on trade with non-Parties in HCFCs from January 1, 2004; and —the addition of reporting requirements on the annual use of methyl bromide for quarantine and preshipment purposes.

The United States will have the legal authority to implement its obligations under the Beijing Amendment under Title 6 of the Clean Air Act, as amended (including, e.g., sections 602, 604, 605, 606, 614, and 615). Certain new regulations will be required for the United States to carry out its obligations under the Amendment.

By its terms, the amendment will enter into force on January 1, 2001, provided that at least twenty Parties to the Montreal Protocol have deposited their instruments of ratification, acceptance or approval. In accordance with Article 2 of the Beijing Amendment, no State may deposit an instrument of ratification to the amendment unless it has previously or simultaneously become a party to the Montreal Amendment. Thus, U.S. ratification of the Beijing Amendment will require its previous or simultaneous ratification of the 1997 Montreal Amendment.

Ratification by the United States of both these amendments is important to demonstrate to the rest of the world the U.S. commitment to the preservation of the stratospheric ozone layer. Early ratification of the Beijing Amendment will also encourage the wide participation necessary for full realization of its goals. Ratification is consistent with U.S. foreign policy and environmental and economic interests.

(2) Montreal amendment

The United States participated in the adoption of the Montreal amendment by the Ninth Meeting of the Parties to the Montreal Protocol and referred to in the submittal letter in (1), supra, at Montreal on December 17, 1997. President Clinton transmitted the amendment to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on September 16, 1999; it entered into force for the United States on December 30, 2003. Excerpts below from the accompanying September 10, 1999, report of the Department of State submitting the protocol to the President explain the expanded trade controls set forth in the amendment. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–10 (1999), see S. Exec. Rep. No. 107–10 and Digest 2003 at 777–81.

* * * *

The principal features of the 1997 Amendment are the expansion of trade controls to include methyl bromide and the addition of a licensing requirement for trade in certain controlled substances.

The trade provisions of the Montreal Protocol (Article 4) would be amended to treat methyl bromide in the same manner as other substances already controlled, that is, there would be a ban on trade in methyl bromide between a Party and a non-Party.

The licensing provision will require each Party to have in place a system for licensing the import and export of all new, used, recycled, and reclaimed controlled substances under the Montreal Protocol.

The main intent of the trade ban with non-Parties is to minimize, if not thwart, the possibility that States which are not bound by compliance obligations regarding methyl bromide could gain a competitive advantage over Montreal Protocol Parties who are bound. The licensing provision will support world law enforcement efforts to diminish any illegal trade in controlled substances.

The United States has the legal authority to implement its obligations under the 1997 Amendment under Title 6 of the Clean Air Act, as amended (including, e.g., sections 604, 605, 606, 614 and 615).

By its terms, the 1997 Amendment was to have entered into force on January 1, 1999, provided that at least twenty States, party to the Montreal Protocol, had deposited their instruments of ratification, acceptance or approval. However, because twenty States had not indicated their consent to be bound until August on 12, 1999, the Amendment will enter into force for those States on November 10, 1999. . . .

(3) Copenhagen amendment

> The United States participated in the adoption of the Copenhagen amendment on November 25, 1992, at the Fourth Meeting of the Parties to the Montreal Protocol. President William J. Clinton transmitted the amendment to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on July 20, 1993. Excerpts below from the accompanying June 23, 1993, report of the Department of State submitting the amendment to the President for transmittal describe the adjustment and amendment package negotiated under the auspices of the United Nations Environment Program ("UNEP"). S. Treaty Doc. 103–9 (1993); see S. Exec. Rep. 103–25. The Copenhagen amendment entered into force generally and for the United States June 14, 1994.

* * * *

The adjustments, which are being transmitted for the information of the Senate, were adopted by the Parties pursuant to Article 2(9) of the Protocol, and provide for accelerated phase-out schedules for substances already controlled. They provide for:

> —the phase-out of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs), other fully halogenated CFCs, carbon tetrachloride, and methyl chloroform in 1996 (instead of 2000), subject to an exception for agreed essential uses; and > —the phase-out of halons in 1994 (instead of 2000), subject to an exception for agreed essential uses.

The adjustments, which are not subject to ratification, will enter into force for all Parties to the Protocol on September 22, 1993.

The principal feature of the Amendment is the addition of new controlled substances, namely, HCFCs, HBFCs and methyl bromide.

—With respect to hydrochlorofluorocarbons (HCFCs), consumption would be capped in 1996, with interim cuts starting in 2004 leading to a total phase-out in 2030.
—With respect to hydrobromofluorocarbons (HBFCs), the phaseout date for production and consumption would be set for 1996, subject to an exception for agreed essential uses.
—With respect to methyl bromide, a widely used agricultural fumigant with a relatively high ozone-depleting potential, its production and consumption would be subject to a freeze in 1995 at 1991 levels with an exception for quarantines and preshipment uses.

The trade provisions of the Montreal Protocol (Article 4) would be amended to treat HBFCs in the same manner as the other substances already controlled. With respect to the other new controlled substances (HCFCs, methyl bromide), the Amendment calls for the Parties to consider, by January 1, 1996, whether to amend the Protocol to extend the trade provisions to such substances.

Regarding Parties operating under Article 5 of the Protocol (certain developing countries), the Amendment provides that, with respect to substances already controlled under the Protocol (i.e., CFCs, halons, other fully halogenated CFCs, carbon tetrachloride, and methyl chloroform), any acceleration of their respective phaseout schedules that goes beyond those contained in the London Amendment will apply (with a ten-year grace period) to such Parties after a review Meeting of the Parties, to take place not later than 1995, and will be based on the conclusions of that review. With respect to potential controls on new substances (i.e., HCFCs, HBFCs, and methyl bromide), the 1995 review Meeting of the Parties will decide, through the adjustment procedure, what base years, if any, control schedules, phase-out dates, if any, etc., will apply to Article 5 Parties.

Because of the addition of new controlled substances and new annexes listing such substances, the Amendment also contains appropriate conforming changes throughout the text of the Protocol (e.g., with respect to reporting requirements under Article 7).

The United States will have the legal authority to implement its obligations under the Amendment under Title 6 of the Clean Air Act, as amended (including, e.g., sections 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 614, and 615). Existing regulations will not be sufficient for the United States to carry out its obligations under the Amendment. As such, administrative rulemaking pursuant to the Environmental Protection Agency's statutory authority under the Clean Air Act, as amended, will be required.

(4) London amendment

President George H. W. Bush transmitted the London amendment to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on May 14, 1991. The United States signed this first amendment, adopted by the Second Meeting of the Parties to the Montreal Protocol, at London on June 29, 1990. Excerpts below from the accompanying May 3, 1991, report of the Department of State submitting the amendment to the President for transmittal describe the additions provided in the amendment. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–4; see S. Exec. Rep. No. 102–21 (1993). See also 86 Am. J. Intl L. 124 (1992). The London amendment entered into force generally and for the United States August 10, 1992.

* * * *

The principal features of the Amendment involve the addition of new controlled substances and the establishment of a financial mechanism to assist developing countries to comply with the Protocol's control measure obligations.

With respect to new controlled substances, the Amendment sets forth the following control measures as Articles 2C, 2D and 2E of the Montreal Protocol:

—for production and consumption of fully halogenated CFCs other than those controlled under the original

Protocol, 20% reduction from 1989 levels in 1993, 85% reduction in 1997, and a phaseout in 2000;
—for production and consumption of carbon tetrachloride, 85% reduction from 1989 levels in 1995, and a phaseout in 2000;
—for production and consumption of methyl chloroform, freeze in 1993, 30% reduction in 1995, 70% reduction in 2000, and a phaseout in 2005.

With respect to financial assistance to developing countries, Article 10 of the Montreal Protocol was amended to establish a funding mechanism to meet the agreed incremental costs incurred by certain developing country Parties with low levels of consumption of controlled substances (hereinafter, "Article 5 Parties") in meeting their control measure obligations and to finance clearing-house functions (e.g., country studies, information dissemination). An Executive Committee, to be composed of seven members from Article 5 Parties and seven members from non-Article 5 Parties, is to develop and monitor implementation of the mechanism.

The funding mechanism is to be financed by voluntary contributions from non-Article 5 Parties based on the UN scale of assessment. Bilateral assistance can constitute up to 20 percent of a Party's contribution. The mechanism is to involve the World Bank for financing projects, UNEP for operating the technical clearing-house, and the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) for performing pre-investment studies. The Amendment explicitly provides that the funding mechanism is "without prejudice to any future arrangements . . . with respect to other environmental issues."

With respect to transfer of technology, Article 10A, which is added by the Amendment, elaborates Article 5(2) of the Montreal Protocol and provides that each Party is to take every practicable step, consistent with the programs supported by the financial mechanism, to ensure that the best available, environmentally safe substitutes and related technologies are expeditiously transferred to Article 5 Parties and that such transfers occur under fair and most favorable conditions.

The Amendment contains a new "grievance procedure" for Article 5 Parties. Recognizing the relationship between the effective implementation on financial/technical assistance and the ability of developing countries to meet their control measure obligations, the Amendment provides that if an Article 5 Party, having taken all practicable steps, considers that it is unable to implement any or all of the control measure obligations due to inadequate implementation of the provisions on financial and technical assistance, it may bring its case to the next Meeting of the Parties. The Parties are to decide upon appropriate action.

The trade control provisions of Article 4 of the Montreal Protocol have been amended to incorporate the newly controlled substances. Further, the Amendment provides that, for purposes of that Article, a "State not party to this Protocol" includes, with respect to a particular controlled substance, a State that has not agreed to be bound by the control measures in effect for that substance. Thus, if a Party to the Protocol were not to ratify the Amendment, it would be treated as a non-Party for purposes of trade controls on methyl chloroform, carbon tetrachloride, and other CFCs.

The reporting of data provisions contained in Article 7 of the Montreal Protocol have been amended to include reporting requirements for the newly controlled substances, as well as for transitional substances (HCFCs).

The Amendment also modifies the scheme pertaining to industrial rationalization. Under Article 2 of the Montreal Protocol, any Party may take advantage of limited increases in production (ten or fifteen percent) for purposes of industrial rationalization; only certain Parties may take advantage of unlimited increases in production for industrial rationalization. In both cases, there is a requirement that the Parties concerned do not exceed their combined production limits. The Amendment eliminates the provision allowing limited increases in production and permits all Parties to take advantage of unlimited increases in production for industrial rationalization (provided the Parties concerned do not exceed their combined production limits).

The Amendment also modifies the voting procedure in Article 2(9) for adjustments. The Montreal Protocol now provides that, in the absence of consensus, such decisions are to be taken by a two-thirds majority vote of the Parties present and voting "representing at least fifty percent of the total consumption of the controlled substances of the Parties." The Amendment provides that the two-thirds majority vote must represent a majority of Article 5 Parties present and voting and a majority of non-Article 5 Parties present and voting.

The originally controlled CFCs and halons continue to be listed in Annex A of the Protocol. Newly controlled substances appear in Annex B. Transitional substances (HCFCs) are listed in Annex C. To accommodate this structure, the Amendment makes appropriate conforming changes throughout the text of the Montreal Protocol.

New legislation will not be required to implement the Amendment. The United States will have the authority to implement its obligations under the recently enacted Clean Air Act Amendments of 1990, P.L. 101–549 (Nov. 15, 1990). With respect to control measures, the Clean Air Act Amendments are generally more stringent than the Montreal Protocol Amendment's requirements. However, in any case where the Montreal Protocol Amendment's provisions were more stringent, Section 614(b) of the Clean Air Act, as amended by P.L. 101–549, provides that the more stringent provision would govern, and Section 615 grants the EPA Administrator authority to implement such provision. Section 615, patterned after former Section 157(b), grants the EPA Administrator general authority to regulate substances, practices, processes, or activities that he finds may reasonably be anticipated to affect the stratosphere, especially ozone in the stratosphere, if such effect may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare.

Adjustments to the Montreal Protocol were also adopted by the Parties on June 29, 1990, pursuant to the tacit amendment procedure contained in Article 2(9) of the Protocol. The adjustments require:

> —for production and consumption of CFCs, a 50% reduction in 1995, an 85% reduction in 1997, and a phaseout in 2000 (Article 2A);

—for production and consumption of halons, a 50% reduction in 1995, and a phaseout (except for essential uses) in 2000 (Article 2B).

The adjustments, which were concluded by the United States as an executive agreement, entered into force for all Parties on March 7, 1991, six months after circulation by the depository. The informal consolidated text enclosed for the information of the Senate reflects the text of the Montreal Protocol as modified by the 1990 adjustments and amendments.

b. U.S.-Canada air quality agreement

On March 13, 1991, President George H.W. Bush and Prime Minister Brian Mulroney signed the Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada on Air Quality, with annexes, done at Ottawa, TIAS No. 11783. The agreement entered into force upon signature.

Excerpts from the preamble and Article III, set forth below, describe the significance to the two countries of the new agreement and its basic objective. The full text of the agreement and related materials is available at www.epa.gov/airmarkets/usca/.

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada, hereinafter referred to as "the Parties", Convinced that transboundary air pollution can cause significant harm to natural resources of vital environmental, cultural and economic importance, and to human health in both countries;

Desiring that emissions of air pollutants from sources within their countries not result in significant transboundary air pollution;

Convinced that transboundary air pollution can effectively be reduced through cooperative or coordinated action providing for controlling emissions of air pollutants in both countries;

* * * *

Noting their tradition of environmental cooperation as reflected in the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, the Trail Smelter Arbitration of 1941, the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1978, as amended, the Memorandum of Intent Concerning Transboundary Air Pollution of 1980, the 1986 Joint Report of the Special Envoys on Acid Rain, as well as the ECE Convention on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution of 1979;

Convinced that a healthy environment is essential to assure the well-being of present and future generations in the United States and Canada, as well as of the global community;
Have agreed as follows:

* * * *

Article III
General Air Quality Objective

1. The general objective of the Parties is to control transboundary air pollution between the two countries.
2. To this end, the Parties shall:
(a) in accordance with Article IV, establish specific objectives for emissions limitations or reductions of air pollutants and adopt the necessary programs and other measures to implement such specific objectives;
(b) in accordance with Article V, undertake environmental impact assessment, prior notification, and, as appropriate, mitigation measures;
(c) carry out coordinated or cooperative scientific and technical activities, and economic research, in accordance with Article VI, and exchange information, in accordance with Article VII;
(d) establish institutional arrangements, in accordance with Articles VIII and IX; and
(e) review and assess progress, consult, address issues of concern, and settle disputes, in accordance with Articles X, XI, XII and XIII.

* * * *

Under Articles VIII and IX, referred to in Article II.2(d), the parties agreed to "establish and maintain a bilateral Air Quality Committee to assist in the implementation of this Agreement" and gave the International Joint Commission responsibilities for assisting in implementation. The International Joint Commission was established by the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, TS 548; 36 Stat. 2448.

Annex 1, entitled "Specific Objectives Concerning Sulphur Dioxide and Nitrogen Oxides," and Annex 2, "Scientific and Technical Activities and Economic Research," provide further details of the agreement and form an integral part of the treaty.

On December 7, 2000, the two countries signed the Protocol Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada Amending the "Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada on Air Quality." The protocol, which entered into force upon signature, was "intend[ed] to reduce the transboundary flow of tropospheric ozone and precursor emissions (NOx and VOC)," to help in attaining air quality goals. It added a new Annex 3, titled "Specific Objectives Concerning Ground-Level Ozone Precursors." See www.ec.gc.ca/air/can_usa_e.html.

c. Persistent pollutants

(1) Persistent organic pollutants and heavy metals

In 1998 the United States joined other countries in negotiation of what was to become the Convention on Persistent Organic Pollutants, S. Treaty Doc. No. 107–5 (2002); see also Digest 2002 at 771–77.

A press statement by the Office of the Spokesman, U.S. Department of State, July 10, 1998, described the state of the negotiations as of that date and announced the signing of two executive agreements. The two agreements were both protocols to the 1979 Convention on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution, 1302 U.N.T.S. 245: the Protocol On Heavy Metals and the Protocol on Persistent Organic Pollutants, both signed at Aarhus, Denmark, June 24, 1998. The Protocol on Heavy Metals entered into force for the United States on December 29, 2003.

The press statement is available at http://usembassy-australia.state.gov/hyper/WF980713/epf104.htm.

* * * *

The United States participated in the first meeting of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee (INC) for a global agreement on persistent organic pollutants (POPs) June 29–July 3 in Montreal, Canada. The meeting was held under the auspices of the United Nations' Environment Program. Earlier in June, the United States signed regional agreements on persistent organic pollutants and heavy metals at a United Nations Economic Commission for Europe (UN/ECE) Ministerial Conference in Aarhus, Denmark.

The United States joined delegates from more than 100 countries and dozens of interested non-governmental organizations in Montreal to begin the development of an historic international agreement to create binding obligations governing a variety of toxic substances known as persistent organic pollutants (POPs). POPs pose both local, regional and global problems due to their toxic nature, ability to accumulate in human and animal tissue, and to travel long distances from their source of origin causing adverse effects to humans and the environment.

During the week-long INC session government delegations organized for the task of gathering information necessary to determine practical and effective obligations to manage the 12 specified POPs (PCBs (polychlorinated biphenyls), DDT, dioxins, furans, and eight other very toxic organochlorine pesticides (aldrin, dieldrin, endrin, chlordane, heptachlor, hexachlorobenzene, mirex, and toxaphene)). The United States anticipates a constructive negotiation in upcoming sessions that will result in an agreement by the year 2000 to protect human health and the environment.

In June, the United States joined top environment officials from 52 countries for the Environment for Europe Ministerial Conference in Aarhus, Denmark. Deputy Assistant Secretary for the Environment Rafe Pomerance on behalf of the United States signed two agreements on reducing air emissions of POPs and heavy metals. These agreements are binding protocols to the UN/ECE Convention on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution. While the measures enacted in the agreements are already addressed under U.S. environmental laws, the new protocols will greatly assist in reducing the global migration of highly toxic compounds from a range of sources.

The agreements include bans on the production and restrictions on the use of certain pesticides and PCBs (polychlorinated biphenyls). The agreements also include requirements to apply best available technologies to control air emissions of three heavy metals, cadmium, lead and mercury, to prevent their adverse effects on the environment and human health.

Participants in the Ministerial Conference included the New Independent States of the former Soviet Union and Central and Eastern Europe, the Russian Federation, Western Europe, Canada and the United States. Representatives of environmental non-governmental organizations participated fully in the June 23–25 Ministerial meeting.

(2) Persistent toxic substances in the Great Lakes

On April 7, 1997, Carol Browner, Administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency ("EPA") and Sergio Marchi, Minister of the Environment, Govenment of Canada, approved the Strategy for the Virtual Elimination of Persistent Toxic Substances in the Great Lakes. As explained by the EPA, "[t]he Great Lakes—Superior, Michigan, Huron, Erie and Ontario—are a dominant part of the physical and cultural heritage of North America. Shared with Canada and spanning more than 750 miles (1,200 kilometers) from west to east, these vast inland freshwater seas have provided water for consumption, transportation, power, recreation and a host of other uses." The excerpt below provides the stated purpose of the strategy, which is available in full at www.epa.gov/glnpo/p2/bns.html.

* * * *

In keeping with the objective of the Revised Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1978, as amended by Protocol signed November 18, 1987 (1987 GLWQA) to restore and protect the Great Lakes, the purpose of this binational strategy (the Strategy) is to set forth a collaborative process by which Environment Canada (EC) and the United States Environmental Protection Agency (USEPA), in consultation with other federal departments and agencies, Great Lakes states, the Province of Ontario, Tribes, and First Nations, will work in cooperation with their public and private partners toward the goal of virtual elimination of persistent toxic substances resulting from human activity, particularly those which bioaccumulate, from the Great Lakes Basin, so as to protect and ensure the health and integrity of the Great Lakes ecosystem. In cases where this Strategy addresses a naturally-occurring substance, it is the anthropogenic sources of pollution that, when warranted, will be targeted for reduction through a life-cycle management approach so as to achieve naturally-occurring levels. An underlying tenet of this Strategy is that the governments cannot by their actions alone achieve the goal of virtual elimination. This Strategy challenges all sectors of society to participate and cooperate to ensure success. The goal of virtual elimination will be achieved through a variety of programs and actions, but the primary emphasis of this Strategy will be on pollution prevention. This Strategy reaffirms the two countries' commitment to the sound management of chemicals, as stated in Agenda 21: A Global Action Plan for the 21st Century and adopted at the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. The Strategy will also be guided by the principles articulated by the International Joint Commission's (IJC) Virtual Elimination Task Force (VETF) in the Seventh Biennial Report on Great Lakes Quality. This Strategy has been developed under the auspices of the Binational Executive Committee (BEC), which is charged with coordinating the implementation of the binational aspects of the 1987 GLWQA.

The BEC is co-chaired by EC and USEPA, and includes members of the Great Lakes states, the Province of Ontario, and other federal departments and agencies in Canada and the United States (U.S.).

d. Climate change

(1) Framework Convention on Climate Change

The Framework Convention on Climate Change ("Convention") was negotiated under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee ("INC") established by the UN General Assembly for this purpose and opened for signature at UNCED (see 1.a., supra), reprinted in 31 I.L.M. 849 (1992). President George H. W. Bush signed the Convention at UNCED on June 12, 1992, and transmitted it to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on September 8, 1992. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–38; see S. Exec. Rep. 102–55 (1992). The Senate provided advice and consent to ratification on October 7, 1992, 138 CONG. REC. S17,150, and the Convention entered into force March 21, 1994. The United States was the first industrialized country to ratify the Convention.

The INC adopted the Convention text at its fifth session, second part, held at New York from April 30 to May 9, 1992. At that time, it approved a resolution on interim arrangements to extend the life of the INC until the Convention entered into force for the purpose of preparing for the first Conference of the Parties ("COP").

The Convention addressed net emissions of all greenhouse gases not controlled by the 1987 Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer, discussed in 3.a., supra. It imposed on all Parties general commitments to address climate change, including reporting requirements; it also required specified developed countries (referred to as "Annex I Parties") to adopt measures to address climate change and to report on the anticipated effect of such measures on their respective emissions of greenhouse gases, with the non-binding aim of returning such emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2000. The August 28, 1992, report of the Department of State submitting the Convention to the President, which accompanied the transmittal, is excerpted below. The report is included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–38.

* * * *

The Convention is the product of nearly two years of negotiations under the auspices of the United Nations General Assembly. During the negotiations, the Department of State coordinated with all relevant federal agencies and met regularly with members of Congress, as well as with private sector and environmental groups.

The Convention reflects many elements promoted by the United States during the negotiations. It sets forth an action-oriented approach to climate change, with provision for reporting on, and review of, measures taken by Parties domestically and abroad to address climate change. The Convention embodies a comprehensive approach to climate change, promoting action related to all sources and sinks (such as forests) of all greenhouse gases (other than those controlled by the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer). Encompassing greenhouse gas sinks will encourage efforts to conserve the Earth's forests, whose rapid destruction accounts for up to 30 percent of global net carbon dioxide (CO[2]) emissions and accelerates the loss of biodiversity. Further, encompassing all greenhouse gas sources and sinks, and allowing countries to undertake "joint implementation" of their national strategies, will allow countries to exploit diverse opportunities, significantly reducing the costs of limiting greenhouse gas emissions.

The Convention reflects the importance of cost-effectiveness of response measures, and allows joint action by two or more Parties in cooperation to limit global emissions. It calls for cooperation related to technology, scientific research and monitoring, information exchange, and education, training, and public awareness. Finally, the Convention establishes various institutions: a Conference of the Parties, a secretariat, a body for scientific and technological advice, and a body to assist the Conference of the Parties in implementation of the Convention.

Efficient operation of the institutions established by the Convention will be critical to its success. While it is envisioned that the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) will continue as the primary forum for analysis of scientific and technical issues related to climate change, providing both regular assessments and requested scientific and technical advice, the body established by the Convention for scientific and technical advice will serve a key liaison function between scientific organizations such as the IPCC and the Conference of the Parties. It will interpret scientific and technical information and advise the Conference of the Parties. It will also monitor overall change in the composition of the atmosphere and its implications for the environment. The subsidiary body on implementation will consider the national action plans and information submitted by the Parties pursuant to the Convention to assess the global response to climate change and report to the Conference of the Parties. We believe that this body will play a critical role in the technical evaluation of national policies and measures and their effects at mitigating and adapting to climate change. Over time, we anticipate that this body will prove a vital forum for sharing information and experience and for promoting cooperative partnerships among Parties.

The Convention provides for industrialized countries to take the lead in addressing climate change. As such, these countries have enhanced reporting and review obligations under the Convention. Further, these countries are to provide technical and financial support to developing countries to enable them to prepare their reports, as well as to meet certain other costs of implementing the Convention.

Early ratification by the United States is important to demonstrate to the rest of the world the U.S. commitment to protection of the climate and is likely to encourage the wide participation necessary for realization of the Convention's goals. Ratification of the Convention is consistent with U.S. foreign policy and economic and environmental interests.

(2) Kyoto Protocol

The first COP to the Framework Convention on Climate Change, meeting in Berlin in 1995, determined that the Convention's commitments were inadequate. In Decision 1/CP.1, referred to as the "Berlin Mandate," the COP agreed "to begin a process to enable it to take appropriate action for the period beyond 2000, including the strengthening of the commitments of the Parties included in Annex I to the Convention (Annex I Parties) in Article 4, paragraph 2(a) and (b), through the adoption of a protocol or another legal instrument." U.N. Doc. FCCC/CP/1995/7/Add.1 (June 6, 1995).

In January 1997 the United States submitted a draft protocol text that reflected a three-part framework for a target to limit and reduce greenhouse gas emissions among developed countries: 1) the target, set at an achievable level, should be binding; 2) countries should have flexibility nationally in implementation of the targets; and 3) the agreement must engage all countries, including developing countries, in next steps because finding a solution to the climate change problem would require a concerted global effort. In June 1997 the United States submitted an elaborated version of its January submission.

On October 22, 1997, President Clinton announced the position the United States would take in the negotiations at the third meeting of the Conference of the Parties ("COP3"), scheduled for December 1997, as excerpted below. 33 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1629 (Oct. 27, 1997). The June 1997 U.S. submission is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

In the international climate negotiations, the United States will pursue a comprehensive framework that includes three elements, which, taken together, will enable us to build a strong and robust global agreement. First, the United States proposes at Kyoto that we commit to the binding and realistic target of returning to emissions of 1990 levels between 2008 and 2012. And we should not stop there. We should commit to reduce emissions below 1990 levels in the 5-year period thereafter, and we must work toward further reductions in the years ahead.

The industrialized nations tried to reduce emissions to 1990 levels once before with a voluntary approach, but regrettably, most of us, including especially the United States, fell short. We must find new resolve to achieve these reductions, and to do that we simply must commit to binding limits.

Second, we will embrace flexible mechanisms for meeting these limits. We propose an innovative, joint implementation system that allows a firm in one country to invest in a project that reduces emissions in another country and receive credit for those reductions at home. And we propose an international system of emissions trading. These innovations will cut worldwide pollution, keep costs low, and help developing countries protect their environment, too, without sacrificing their economic growth.

Third, both industrialized and developing countries must participate in meeting the challenge of climate change. The industrialized world must lead, but developing countries also must be engaged. The United States will not assume binding obligations unless key developing nations meaningfully participate in this effort.

. . . If the entire industrialized world reduces emissions over the next several decades but emissions from the developing world continue to grow at their current pace, concentrations of greenhouse gasses in the atmosphere will continue to climb. Developing countries have an opportunity to chart a different energy future consistent with their growth potential and their legitimate economic aspirations. . . . We can and we must work together on this problem in a way that benefits us all.

Here at home, we must move forward by unleashing the full power of free markets and technological innovations to meet the challenge of climate change. I propose a sweeping plan to provide incentives and lift roadblocks to help our companies and our citizens find new and creative ways of reducing greenhouse gas emissions:

First, we must enact tax cuts and make research and development investments worth up to $5 billion over the next 5 years, targeted incentives to encourage energy efficiency and the use of cleaner energy sources.

Second, we must urge companies to take early actions to reduce emissions by ensuring that they receive appropriate credit for showing the way.

Third, we must create a market system for reducing emissions wherever they can be achieved most inexpensively, here or abroad, a system that will draw on our successful experience with acid rain permit trading.

Fourth, we must reinvent how the Federal Government, the Nation's largest energy consumer, buys and uses energy. . . .

Fifth, we must unleash competition in the electricity industry, to remove outdated regulations and save Americans billions of dollars. We must do it in a way that leads to even greater progress in cleaning our air and delivers a significant down payment in reducing greenhouse gas emissions. . . .

Sixth, we must continue to encourage key industry sectors to prepare their own greenhouse gas reduction plans. And we must, along with State and local government, remove the barriers to the most energy efficient usage possible. . . .

This plan is sensible and sound. Since it's a long-term problem requiring a long-term solution, it will be phased in over time. . . .

States meeting in COP3 in Kyoto, Japan, adopted a protocol (the "Kyoto Protocol") setting forth emissions limitation and reduction commitments to apply after 2000, reprinted in 37 I.L.M. 22 (1998). Excerpts below from a press conference by Stuart Eizenstat, Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business and Agricultural Affairs, at the conclusion of COP3, December 11, 1997, provide the views of the United States on the protocol agreed to at the conference.

* * * *.

Let me say at the outset that these negotiations may well have been the most complex international negotiations ever held. Few issues cut across as many complicated disciplines as climate change, and we had 160 nations, each with its own unique challenges and viewpoints.

Today we reached a historic agreement, a historic first step, in the Kyoto Protocol. It is, indeed, a significant first step in a truly global effort to address climate change. Generations from now, people will remember our work here for establishing the core elements of a strong, realistic and legally binding framework.

* * * *

Together with other industrialized nations, we reached a strong, comprehensive agreement stimulated by the dramatic and very difficult EU (European Union)-U.S.-Japan agreement, (which was) struck after three days of almost round-the-clock negotiations. And (it was) all the more striking because of the disparate natures of our economies and the very different ways in which we use energy. This historic agreement, which included also Australia and Canada, Russia, New Zealand, and other industrial nations, will achieve far greater reductions in greenhouse gases than most thought possible when our delegations arrived 10 days ago. By establishing this framework, industrial nations have demonstrated leadership in forging a legally-binding, lasting effort against this threat.

Agreement among the industrial nations did not come easily. Hard choices were made, and, in the spirit of compromise, a remarkable consensus was forged. In my many years as a negotiator, I've never seen so many parties move so far so quickly.

Considering the range of complex issues and that what we're building is very much a work in progress, we have truly taken a significant first step.

. . . [W]hen we work together to take meaningful steps to protect the planet for our children and grandchildren. We agreed to move well beyond our proposal to reduce emissions to 1990 levels by the years 2008 to 2012. In fact, we've committed to reduce our emissions by 7 percent by 2010, below 1990 levels, while the EU and Japan have reduced theirs by 8 and 6 percent, respectively.

We also forged an important consensus among industrial nations, for market-based mechanisms, such as international emissions trading. The rules and mechanisms governing these new institutions still have to be worked out. And I want to emphasize we have really only a framework here for those new mechanisms. And we believe this framework can be filled out by next year's conference.

We also agreed to cover all six greenhouse gases, a key U.S. goal, given the dramatic increases in new synthetic gases. Several industrialized nations agreed also, in concept, to form an umbrella for trading of the new emissions rights which will be created, which will consist of the U.S., Canada, Japan, New Zealand, Australia and Russia, and will be open to all countries who wish to work together to establish an emissions trading group.

We also had hoped to reach agreement on a series of ways to ensure the meaningful participation of developing countries. This is perhaps the single disappointment and regret. We did begin, in ways which I'll describe, to make a down payment, but we clearly didn't accomplish all we had wanted. By the opposition of some to a system of international emissions trading, a system was threatened that is critical to the ability of so many industrial nations to meet their strong reduction targets, targets they are now being asked to assume and are agreeing to do so, even though that system only involved industrial countries, and was universally endorsed by the industrial countries who would use it.

We were also unable to establish a mechanism that would have allowed developing nations to volunteer to take on binding targets because of the opposition of some developing countries.

Clearly, this opposition was not uniform, and it did not come from all developing countries. In fact, we made an important down payment in developing country participation in solving the global climate problem by establishing a Clean Development Mechanism for credit, which will help create a bridge between both industrialized and developing countries, harnessing private investment in clean energy technologies for credit back to industrial users. And we look forward to working with developing nations on launching this mechanism and on jointly finding other ways that developing nations can address this problem. We mustn't let the climate change problem become a divisive, North-South problem. This is genuinely a problem of global proportions. It is genuinely a problem which requires global solutions.

QUESTION: There's been a lot of speculation on how the U.S. Congress will react to this Protocol. But without trying to get into any prediction of whether they will approve it or how—I think the other question that is raised by a lot of the other delegations is, if it takes several years for the major players to endorse this, is that going to send out the wrong message to everyone involved who's trying to fight global warming?

UNDER SECRETARY EIZENSTAT: No. . . . [W]e view Kyoto not as the end of a process, but as a historic beginning of a process to deal with a long-term problem that ultimately must be solved not only by developed but by developing countries.

For the United States, with our system there is a two-step process. The first is the question of signature by the President. He alone can make the decision as to whether he will do so. . . .

Second is the question of eventual ratification [with advice and consent of] the U.S. Senate. The President has indicated that the United States would not take on legally binding targets until there was meaningful participation by developing countries. Clearly, despite the very important step taken through the Brazilian process of creating a Clean Development Mechanism for Credit, that meaningful participation has not yet been taken as a result of the steps that were done here. We hope, over time, they will.

* * * *

Prior to the completion of the Kyoto Protocol, on July 25, 1997, the U.S. Senate had passed S.Res. 98 (referred to as the "Byrd-Hagel resolution") by a vote of 95–0, expressing the sense of the Senate that:

> (1) the United States should not be a signatory to any protocol to, or other agreement regarding, the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change of 1992, at negotiations in Kyoto in December 1997, or thereafter, which would—
>
> (A) mandate new commitments to limit or reduce greenhouse gas emissions for the Annex I Parties, unless the protocol or other agreement also mandates new specific scheduled commitments to limit or reduce greenhouse gas emissions for Developing Country Parties within the same compliance period, or
>
> (B) would result in serious harm to the economy of the United States; and
> (2) any such protocol or other agreement which would require the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification should be accompanied by a detailed explanation of any legislation or regulatory actions that may be required to implement the protocol or other agreement and should also be accompanied by an analysis of the detailed financial costs and other impacts on the economy of the United States which would be incurred by the implementation of the protocol or other agreement.

The Kyoto Protocol was opened for signature March 16, 1998. The United States signed the protocol on November 12, 1998. In light of the absence of requirements for emissions limitations by developing countries, President Clinton did not transmit it for advice and consent to ratification. On February 26, 1999, the President stated:

> We took a giant step forward in 1997, when we helped to forge the Kyoto agreement. Now we're working to persuade developing countries that they, too, can and must participate meaningfully in this effort without forgoing growth. We are also trying to persuade a majority in the United States Congress that we can do the same thing.

35 PRES. WEEKLY COMP. DOC. 317 (Feb. 26, 1999).

In March 2001 the United States announced that it would not proceed with ratification of the Kyoto Protocol. See Digest 2000 at 711–27 and Digest 2001 at 730–38. In October 2004 Russia announced that it would ratify the Protocol; Russian ratification would enable the protocol to enter into force without the United States.

(1) Convention on Oil Pollution Preparedness, Response and Co-operation

On August 1, 1991, President George H. W. Bush transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the International Convention on Oil Pollution Preparedness, Response and Co-operation, with Annex, adopted under the auspices of the International Maritime Organization ("IMO") November 30, 1990, and signed by the United States on that date. As indicated in excerpts below from the accompanying September 24, 1999, report of the Department of State submitting the treaty to the President, the treaty responded to the environmentally disastrous grounding of the Exxon Valdez on March 24, 1989, in Prince William Sound off Alaska and a U.S. initiative of July 1989. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–11 (1991); see S. Exec. Rep. No. 102–16. The convention received the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification October 29, 1991, 137 CONG. REC. S15,398, and entered into force May 13, 1995. See also 86 Am.J. Int'l L. 110 (1992).

* * * *

The Exxon Valdez disaster vividly demonstrated that catastrophic oil spills have the potential to overwhelm the resources of any single nation. The Convention will create a global network to coordinate pollution response resources to minimize damage from such disasters.

The Convention will increase the protection of the marine environment in a number of ways. First, it requires Parties to establish a national system for preparedness and response. This would include a national operational contact point, a national contingency plan with supporting regional and local contingency plans, oil pollution emergency plans for ships and offshore oil platforms, and reporting requirements for oil pollution incidents. Second, the Convention encourages all Parties to enter into bilateral and regional response agreements to prepare for and respond to oil pollution incidents. Finally, the Convention establishes a voluntary mechanism for more developed countries to provide technical assistance in the form of equipment and training to less developed nations.

The IMO, subject to its agreement and the availability of its resources, is delegated a central role in carrying out the purposes of the Convention, including the information services, education and training, technical services and technical assistance. For example it may act as a clearinghouse for information concerning the availability of pollution response resources of all types from any requesting nation.

The International Maritime Organization successfully utilized the global coordination provisions of the Convention to provide invaluable assistance to the Persian Gulf States in responding to the Iraqi oil release during the Gulf war.

The Convention was developed in response to your environmental initiative proposed at the Paris Economic Summit of July 1989. Paragraph 46 of the Joint Communique of the Summit of the Arch articulated that initiative as follows:

> We express our concern that national, regional and global capabilities to contain and alleviate the consequences of oil spills be improved. . . . We also ask the International Maritime Organization to put forward further proposals for preventive action.

* * * *

Article 1 of the Convention provides that Parties shall, individually or jointly, take all appropriate measures to prepare for and respond to an oil pollution incident. It includes a provision confirming that warships, naval auxiliaries or other ships owned or operated by a State and used, for the time being, only on government noncommercial service are exempt from the provisions of the Convention. The United States understands this principle of sovereign immunity extends to bareboat-chartered and demise-chartered ships managed or operated by contractors on behalf of the State.

* * * *

The Convention will require implementing legislation. Article 4(1)(b) requires all persons to report any observed event at sea involving a discharge of oil or the presence of oil, even if that person was not involved in the discharge. Under current U.S. law there is no authority to impose reporting requirements on persons not directly connected to an oil discharge. On the other hand, legislation is not expected to be needed to implement the shipboard response plan requirement set out in Article 3 of the Convention. The IMO has adopted an amendment to the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution From Ships (MARPOL 73/78) containing an identical requirement. The amendment, which is expected to enter into force in November 1992, will be implemented by the U.S. under existing authority (33 U.S.C. 1903). In that event, no additional legislation regarding shipboard response plans would be required.

(2) Convention on the Prior Informed Consent Procedure for Certain Hazardous Chemicals and Pesticides in International Trade

On September 11, 1998, the United States signed the Convention on the Prior Informed Consent Procedure for Certain Hazardous Chemicals and Pesticides in International Trade, with Annexes, done at Rotterdam September 30, 1998 ("Convention"). Excerpts below from the September 24, 1999, report of the Department of State to the President submitting the Convention for transmittal to the Senate for advice and consent describe the U.S. interest in the Convention. The report accompanied the transmittal of the Convention by President William J. Clinton to the Senate. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–21 (2000). The Senate Foreign Relations Committee held hearings on the Convention in June 2003.

Advances in chemical synthesis and production in this century have been responsible for many important benefits currently enjoyed by modern society. The introduction and use of chemicals and pesticides into the environment, however, also carries with it inherent risks. The United States has made great strides to address these risks since the dangers of indiscriminate pesticide use were highlighted some thirty-five years ago. Each year, chemical manufacturers and developed-country governments such as the United States spend many millions of dollars to test and assess chemicals to ensure that they can be managed in a sound manner once they are introduced into commerce. The Environmental Protection Agency and other state and federal agencies employ a great number of experts to decide which chemicals can be used safely and to ensure their safe use.

Outside the developed world, however, countries simply do not have these resources at their disposal, and the United States and other developed countries have long recognized the critical role they play in sharing their experience and knowledge with developing countries and to help alert them to significant chemical risks. With the current pace of globalization and associated increases in chemical trade, the need to promote good risk-based decision-making is also increasing rapidly in many countries.

The Rotterdam Convention is a substantial new tool to promote this goal. The Convention establishes a procedure to promote shared responsibility in the international trade of certain hazardous chemicals through the exchange of information about these chemicals and the communication of national decisions about their import and export. Under the Convention, each Party agrees to inform the Secretariat of its national decisions regarding the import of certain listed chemicals, and each Party is required to ensure that exports from its territory comply with those import decisions. This mechanism is known as the prior informed consent, or "PIC", procedure. The Convention also required each exporting Party to provide export notifications to importing Parties with respect to each chemical that the exporting Party has banned or severely restricted under its domestic law.

The Convention builds on voluntary guidelines for the exchange of information on chemicals in international trade and on a parallel international code of conduct for the distribution and use of pesticides (the "voluntary procedure"). The United States helped develop the voluntary procedure, which was designed to give developing countries information about risks posed by especially hazardous chemicals and to assist them in enforcing their decisions regarding trade in such chemicals. Over 150 countries currently participate in the voluntary procedure, which has been operational since 1992. Major chemical producers and environmental groups from the United States and abroad have supported the voluntary procedure and endorsed its being strengthened into binding obligations. The Convention includes in its original list of chemicals subject to the PIC procedure the 27 chemicals that were listed in the voluntary procedure at the time the Convention was concluded.

The United States played a leading role in negotiating the Convention, which was developed under the joint auspices of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and the United Nations Environment Program (UNEP). . . .

The following analysis reviews the Convention's key provisions and sets forth the proposed understanding of the United States with respect to several elements.

* * * *

ARTICLE 12 (EXPORT NOTIFICATION)

Article 12 requires a Party to provide an export notification to the importing Party when a chemical that is banned or severely restricted under the exporting Party's law is exported from its territory. The information required to be contained in these export notifications is set out in Annex V. The export notification shall be provided prior to the first export following adoption of the regulatory action, and, thereafter, before the first export in any calendar year or after a major change in the regulatory status of the chemical. This article also requires importing Parties to acknowledge receipt of the first export notification. In the absence of such acknowledgement, exporting Parties are required to submit a second notification. The second notification does not need to be provided prior to export. This Article also provides that the export notification requirement may be waived by the importing Party.

These export notification obligations cease when a chemical has been listed in Annex III and the importing Party has provided an import decision response concerning that chemical. The requirement is based on the principle that importing Parties should be informed if they are receiving exports of chemicals that are banned or severely restricted in the country of export. Certain export notification requirements are already in place in the United States and certain other developed countries.

Article 12 does not expressly state whether the obligation to provide export notifications extends to exports of chemicals in a different category (i.e., pesticide or industrial chemical) from the one in which the exporting Party imposed a ban or severe restriction. At the behest of the United States, Canada, Mexico and the European Union, it was made clear during the negotiation, however, that the obligation in Article 12 would be fulfilled if a country only required notification of exports in the same category in which the ban or severe restriction had been taken. This category-based approach to export notification is consistent with the approach taken by the United States and several other countries in implementing the voluntary PIC procedure. In order to emphasize this point, I recommend that the following understanding be included in the U.S. instrument of ratification:

> It is the understanding of the United States of America that the notification obligation in Article 12 requires only that an exporting Party provide export notifications with respect to exports in the same category of chemicals in which the exporting Party has imposed a ban or severe restriction, and does not require notifications for exports of chemicals in a different category.

* * * *

ANNEX V—INFORMATION REQUIREMENTS FOR EXPORT NOTIFICATION

Annex V sets out the information that shall be contained in export notifications required under Article 12.

Although much of the Convention can be implemented in the United States under existing statutory authority, it is envisaged that certain changes in domestic law would be made before the United States would deposit its instrument of ratification. The United States would likely implement its obligations relating to the pesticide category of chemicals through the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA), and those relating to the industrial category through the Toxic Substances Control Act (TSCA). These statutes currently provide EPA with some limited authority over the export of particularly hazardous chemicals, but it is envisaged that additional legislative authority will be required to expeditiously and effectively meet all the Convention's requirements.

(3) Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal

On May 20, 1991, President George H. W. Bush transmitted the Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal, with Annexes, done at Basel March 22, 1989 ("Basel Convention" or "Convention") to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. Excerpts below from the President's transmittal letter and the accompanying report of the Department of State submitting the Convention to the President provide the views of the United States on the importance of the Convention in promoting safe trade in certain hazardous chemicals and the need for several understandings. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–5 (1991); see S. Exec. Rep. 102–36 (1992). The Senate provided advice and consent, with understandings as proposed, on August 11, 1992. 138 CONG. REC. S12,291. See also 28 I.L.M. 649 (1989). Necessary implementing legislation has not yet been enacted.

The United States is also party to a decision of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development Council on the control of transfrontier movements of wastes destined for recovery operations, done at Paris March 30, 1992, in keeping with the Basel Convention. C(92)39/FINAL, TIAS No. 11880.

TRANSMITTAL LETTER

The Convention, which was negotiated under the auspices of the United Nations Environment Program with the active participation of the United States, makes environmentally sound management the prerequisite to any transboundary movement of wastes. To that end, it bars transboundary movements unless every country involved has consented. Even when consent is obtained, shipments must be prohibited when either the country from which the wastes are exported or the country in which the wastes will be disposed have reason to believe that the shipment will not be handled in an environmentally sound manner. The Convention also provides for the environmentally sound management of wastes that are illegally transported.

Upon receiving the unanimous recommendation of interested agencies, I personally authorized signature of the Convention by the United States last March. The notice-and-consent regime it establishes advances environmental goals that the United States has long held. We were one of the first nations to enact legislation prohibiting exports of hazardous wastes without the consent of the importing country. In March 1989, as negotiations of this Convention were concluding, I announced that the Administration planned to seek statutory authority to ban exports of hazardous wastes except pursuant to a bilateral agreement providing for the environmentally sound management of the wastes. We now have such agreements with Canada and Mexico. Proposed legislation supported by the Administration has recently been transmitted to the Congress.

SUBMITTAL LETTER

* * * *

Article 1 of the Convention describes its scope. The Convention governs movements of hazardous wastes, defined in Annexes I and III, as well as movements of household wastes and ash from the incineration of household wastes, which are listed in Annex II.

The Convention does not regulate movements of low-level radioactive wastes that are covered by other international control systems, such as the Code of Practice of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), to which the U.S. adheres; or wastes from the normal operations of ships, which are governed by the Protocol of 1978 Relating to the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution from Ships. The United States is a party to that Protocol.

In accordance with customary international law, the Convention does not apply to sovereign immune vessels and aircraft. Because the Convention does not expressly make this exclusion, I recommend that the United States include the following understanding in its instrument of ratification:

> It is the understanding of the United States of America that, as the Convention does not apply to vessels and aircraft that are entitled to sovereign immunity under international law, in particular to any warship, naval auxiliary, and other vessels or aircraft owned or operated by a State and in use on government, non-commercial service, each state shall ensure that such vessels or aircraft act in a manner consistent with this Convention, so far as is practicable and reasonable, by adopting appropriate measures that do not impair the operation or operational capabilities of sovereign immune vessels.

Article 2 stipulates definitions of terms important in the Convention. They are straightforward. Nevertheless, the definition of "transit state" in Article 2(12)—states "through which" wastes are transported on their way from an exporting state for disposal in another state—requires clarification to avoid a potential conflict between the Convention and the law of the sea. Pursuant to Article 6, "transit states" must be notified and given an opportunity to consent to a waste shipment. The United States has consistently maintained that, under international law, notification to or authorization of coastal states is not required for passage through territorial seas and exclusive economic zones (EEZs). This is reflected in Article 4(12) of the Convention, which provides that the Convention does not affect "navigational rights and freedoms as provided for in international law."

To ensure that the meaning of this provision is clear, I recommend that the following understanding be included in the instrument of ratification:

> It is the understanding of the United States of America that a state is a "transit state" within the meaning of the Convention only if wastes are moved, or are planned to be moved, through its inland waterways, inland waters, or land territory.

* * * *

Article 3 requires parties to communicate their national definitions of wastes to an international Secretariat, which is to be created pursuant to Article 16.

The major substantive provisions of the Convention are contained in the next several articles. Article 4, in setting forth the general obligations of parties, requires that transboundary movements be prohibited unless all states concerned have consented. Parties also shall, as appropriate, ensure the availability of adequate domestic disposal facilities and reduce the generation of wastes. . . .

* * * *

Article 4(9)(a) requires that an exporting state allow transboundary movements of wastes for disposal only when it lacks the technical capacity, necessary facilities, capacity, or "suitable disposal sites" to dispose of the wastes in an "environmentally sound and efficient manner." The Convention does not define "efficient" or "suitable." The United States will consider the cost of disposal, including the comparative cost of environmentally sound disposal outside the United States, as one factor in deciding whether disposal sites in the United States are "suitable." I recommend that this be explained in the following understanding, to be included in the instrument of ratification:

> It is the understanding of the United States of America that an exporting state may decide that it lacks the capacity to dispose of wastes in an "environmentally sound and efficient manner" if disposal in the importing country would be both environmentally sound and economically efficient.

* * * *

Article 7 addresses notification to and consent of transit states that are not parties to the Convention. Articles 8 and 9 address wastes handled improperly. When wastes are not disposed of in accordance with the information provided to the governments of the exporting and importing states, Article 8 requires the exporting and transit states to allow the reimportation of those wastes by the private persons involved. Pursuant to Article 9, when a shipment violates the Convention or general principles of international law as "the result of conduct on the part" of the exporter or generator, the exporting state must ensure that the wastes are disposed of properly, either by requiring the private persons to arrange for proper disposal or by taking charge of the wastes itself. The importing state accepts the same obligations in the case of wastes deemed to be illegal "as the result of conduct on the part of the importer or disposer." When responsibility cannot be assigned, the states are to cooperate to manage the wastes in an environmentally sound manner.

I recommend that the United States include the following understanding of Article 9 when it deposits its instrument of ratification:

> It is the understanding of the United States of America that Article 9(2) does not create obligations for the exporting state with regard to cleanup, beyond taking such wastes back or otherwise disposing of them in accordance with the Convention. Further obligations may be determined by the parties pursuant to Article 12.

This understanding closely follows the language and structure of Article 9, as well as the intention of the negotiators. Article 9(2) does not discuss remedying environmental or health damages resulting from the illegal traffic. Article 12 calls upon the parties to cooperate in considering a protocol on liability and compensation for damage from the disposal of wastes. Because cleaning up wastes in another sovereign's territory could be both costly and politically sensitive, it would be unreasonable to interpret the general language of the Convention as creating such an obligation.

Article 11 provides that the Convention will not apply to transboundary movements that are governed by bilateral or regional arrangements that meet standards set forth in Article 11. Arrangements concluded after the Convention's entry into force must contain provisions that are "not less environmentally sound" than those in the Convention. Arrangements made before the Convention enters into force must be "compatible" with environmentally sound management of wastes. The United States currently has bilateral agreements with Canada and Mexico governing transboundary movements of hazardous wastes. The Convention will not apply to transboundary movements of hazardous wastes pursuant to those agreements.

In addition, the United States has many agreements that provide for U.S. Government activities and installations abroad, including, for example, military base agreements. Wastes generated by the United States under these agreements may be returned to the United States for disposal. Such movements are "transboundary movements" as that term is defined in Article 2(3) and therefore fall under the Convention. Because the United States ensures the proper handling of the wastes when they are returned to the United States under its control, the agreements are "compatible" with environmentally sound management, as required by Article 11(2). Consequently, the Convention does not apply to such movements when they take place pursuant to these agreements concluded before the Convention. Agreements for U.S. Government operations abroad entered into after the Convention, in order to qualify as an agreement under Article 11(1), must contain provisions that are not less environmentally sound than those in the Convention. In accordance with current U.S. policy, U.S. Government installations abroad will be subject to the applicable law of the host country.

* * * *

Before the United States can deposit its instrument of ratification, changes in domestic law will be necessary. The primary changes include creating authority to prohibit shipments when the United States has reason to believe that the wastes will not be handled in an environmentally sound manner, as well as the authority to take charge of wastes found to be illegally transported when the responsible private parties do not arrange for the environmentally sound disposal of the wastes. Furthermore, current domestic law regulates only transboundary movements of hazardous wastes. The Convention, however, also governs movements of household wastes, ash from the incineration of those wastes, and wastes that are regarded as hazardous under the Convention but not under current U.S. law. All necessary changes are contained in the Administration's proposal for legislation to implement the Convention.

f. Nuclear safety

(1) Convention on Nuclear Safety

On May 11, 1995, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Convention on Nuclear Safety, done at Vienna on September 20, 1994, to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. The Convention was adopted by a Diplomatic Conference convened by the International Atomic Energy Agency ("IAEA") in June 1994 and was opened for signature, and signed by the United States, in Vienna on September 20, 1994, during the IAEA General Conference. The Senate provided advice and consent on March 25, 1999, 145 CONG. REC. S3,572, and it entered into force for the United States July 10, 1999. Excerpts are provided below from the President's letter of transmittal and the accompanying May 1, 1995, report of the Department of State submitting the convention to the President. S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–6 (1994); S. Exec. Rep. No. 106–1.

* * * *

At the September 1991 General Conference of the IAEA, a resolution was adopted, with U.S. support, calling for the IAEA secretariat to develop elements for a possible International Convention on Nuclear Safety. From 1992 to 1994, the IAEA convened seven expert working group meetings, in which the United States participated. The IAEA Board of Governors approved a draft text at its meeting in February 1994, after which the IAEA convened a Diplomatic Conference attended by representatives of more than 80 countries in June 1994. The final text of the Convention resulted from that Conference.

The Convention establishes a legal obligation on the part of Parties to apply certain general safety principles to the construction, operation, and regulation of land-based civilian nuclear power plants under their jurisdiction. Parties to the Convention also agree to submit periodic reports on the steps they are taking to implement the obligations of the Convention. These reports will be reviewed and discussed at review meetings of the Parties, at which each Party will have an opportunity to discuss and seek clarification of reports submitted by other Parties.

The United States has initiated many steps to deal with nuclear safety, and has supported the effort to develop this Convention.

With its obligatory reporting and review procedures, requiring Parties to demonstrate in international meetings how they are complying with safety principles, the Convention should encourage countries to improve nuclear safety domestically and thus result in an increase in nuclear safety worldwide. I urge the Senate to act expeditiously in giving its advice and consent to ratification.

* * * *

The Convention is a particularly important complement to bilateral and multilateral safety assistance programs for countries currently operating older Soviet-designed power reactors that present a greater safety risk than reactors of more recent design. It provides a crucial political mechanism to encourage these governments to support: (1) emerging domestic regulatory organizations and (2) other entities responsible for developing a domestic nuclear safety culture.

The Convention applies only to civilian nuclear power facilities, which pose the greatest safety risk because of the magnitude of stored energy and the inventory of radioactive isotopes. In the United States, all commercial nuclear reactors licensed by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission are included. The Experimental Breeder Reactor (EBR-II), which is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Energy, is also covered by the Convention. Other nuclear facilities and fuel-cycle activities, such as reprocessing and/or enrichment plants, are not covered by the Convention. The Preamble of the Convention does, however, recognize the need to develop a waste management convention at an appropriate time in the future. The Convention does not delineate standards the Contracting Parties must meet, but instead requires them to take appropriate steps intended to ensure the safety of nuclear installations.

The Convention encourages early participation through its elaboration as an incentive convention, under which countries apply fundamental principles rather than detailed safety standards, while they further develop their nuclear safety infrastructures domestically. The goal is that over time, through processes of self-improvement, acceptance of the obligations under the Convention, and periodic reviews, all the Contracting Parties will attain a higher level of safety.

No implementing legislation will be necessary for the United States to comply with its obligations under the Convention.

(2) Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel and Radioactive Waste Management

The need for a waste management convention, mentioned in the Department of State's report in f.(1), supra, resulted in the Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel and Radioactive Waste Management, opened for signature in Vienna under the auspices of IAEA on September 5, 1997, and signed by the United States on that date. President William J. Clinton transmitted the convention to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on September 13, 2000. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–48 (2000); see S. Exec. Rep. 108–5 (2003). It received advice and consent to ratification April 2, 2003, 149 CONG. REC. S4,730, and entered into force for the United States on July 14, 2003. Excerpts below from the July 13, 2000, report of the Department of State submitting the convention to the President, which was included with the transmittal, provide the views of the United States on the convention.

* * * *

This Convention is an important part of the efforts to raise the level of nuclear safety around the world. The Convention on Nuclear Safety (CNS), to which the United States became a Party on July 10, 1999, applies only to civilian nuclear power installations. Other nuclear facilities, spent fuel, and fuel-cycle activities are not covered under the CNS. The Preamble of the CNS does, however, recognize the need to develop a waste convention and contains a preambulary statement affirming a commitment by the Parties to develop a similar convention on the safe management of radioactive waste.

To this end, a Group of Experts was constituted from approximately 50 countries to prepare a draft convention on spent nuclear fuel and radioactive waste. From 1995 to 1997, the International Atomic Energy Agency convened seven meetings of the Group in which the United States participated. A draft text was completed in March 1997 and submitted for review by the Board of Governors at its June 1997 meeting. The Board subsequently authorized the Director-General to convene a Diplomatic Conference in Vienna. The Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel Management and the Safety of Radioactive Waste Management was adopted on September 5, 1997. Secretary of Energy Pena signed the Convention for the United States on that date.

The Convention will enter into force 90 days after 25 states have ratified the Convention, 15 of which must have one operational nuclear power plant. A Preparatory Meeting is to be held no later than six months after entry into force. The first Review Meeting is to be held no later than 30 months after entry into force. The interval between review meetings is not to exceed three years. To date, the Convention has been signed by 41 countries and ratified by 15 countries. Of these 15 countries, 10 are states with at least one operational nuclear power reactor.

Structured similarly to the CNS, the Convention establishes a series of broad commitments with respect to the safe management of spent fuel and radioactive waste. The Convention does not delineate mandatory standards the Parties must meet, but instead Parties are to take appropriate steps to bring their activities into compliance with the obligations of the Convention.

Under the Convention, Parties will submit periodic national reports on the steps that they are taking to implement the obligations of the Convention. These reports will be reviewed and discussed at Review Meetings of the Parties, at which each Party will have an opportunity to discuss and seek clarification of reports submitted by other Parties. Although not reflected in the Convention text, as currently proposed the Parties are to be organized into subgroups of five to seven countries. The United States will be assigned a group and will have the opportunity to review national reports of other countries assigned to this group. Parties also can comment on national reports of countries not in their review group.

The U.S. national report form and structure will be closely modeled after the national report submitted for the CNS. As required under the Convention, the report will include, inter alia, the U.S. legislative and regulatory framework, spent nuclear fuel and radioactive waste inventory data (from currently available Federal Government databases) and a listing of types of existing and proposed facilities, whether Federal, State, or private. The United States believes its management and safety practices meet all Convention commitments.

The Department of Energy is the lead agency for preparation of the report in coordination with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Department of State. An interagency working group was established for the purpose of coordinating Convention activities.

The scope of the Convention includes safety requirements for spent fuel management when the spent fuel results from the operation of civilian nuclear reactors; radioactive waste management resulting from civilian applications; disused sealed sources no longer needed; operational radiation protection; management of nuclear facilities; decommissioning; emergency preparedness; a legislative and regulatory framework; and transboundary movement. It does not include naturally occurring radioactive materials (NORM), unless a Party declares it as radioactive waste for the purposes of the Convention.

The scope of the Convention does not apply to a Party's military radioactive waste or spent nuclear fuel unless the Party declares it as spent nuclear fuel or radioactive waste for the purposes of the Convention.

The Convention would apply to military radioactive waste and spent nuclear fuel if and when such material is permanently transferred to and managed within exclusively civilian programs. The Convention contains provisions to ensure that national security is not compromised and that Parties have absolute discretion as to what information is reported on material from military sources.

In the United States, all military radioactive waste and spent nuclear fuel is normally transferred to civilian programs for disposal. The Convention will not, therefore, affect ongoing U.S. military operations in any way, nor will classified information be covered in the U.S. national report.

As does the CNS, this Convention encourages broad participation through its elaboration as an incentive process, under which Parties take appropriate steps to bring their activities into compliance with the obligations of the Convention. The goal is that over time, through processes of self-improvement, acceptance of the obligations under the Convention, and periodic reviews of their Convention-related activities, all the Parties will attain a higher level of safety with the management of their spent fuel and radioactive waste.

* * * *

Article 38 addresses dispute resolution. In the event of a disagreement between Parties concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention, the Parties must consult within the framework of a meeting of the Parties with a view to resolving the disagreement by consensus. If these consultations do not resolve the disagreement, then Article 38 provides that recourse can be made to the mediation, conciliation and arbitration mechanisms provided for in international law, including the rules and practices prevailing within the IAEA. During the Diplomatic Conference in 1997 that considered and adopted the Convention, it was made clear during the discussions leading to the adoption of the final text of Article 38 that the words "recourse can be made" were deliberately chosen to avoid any implication that the dispute resolution mechanisms referred to in the Article were mandatory. Thus, Article 38 does not commit the United States to binding mediation, conciliation or arbitration.

a. Marine wildlife

(1) U.S. fisheries policy

In remarks at the fifth North Pacific Rim Fisheries Conference, Anchorage, Alaska, December 1, 1999, R. Tucker Scully, Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs, U.S. Department of State, outlined ongoing U.S. efforts to address the challenges of achieving sustainable fisheries. Mr. Scully addressed a number of the multilateral agreements discussed below. In addition, he noted that > there has been a significant effort, centered largely in [the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations] ("FAO"), to develop agreed guidelines and action plans to identify steps to facilitate and promote implementation of the international legal obligations to conserve fish, as well as steps to identify emerging issues requiring priority attention. These include: the FAO Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries [1996], as well as international plans of action to deal with seabird mortality in longline fisheries, conservation and management of shark species, and excess capacity in the world's fishing fleet. The FAO is also pursuing another initiative to crack down on illegal, unregulated and unreported ("IUU") fishing activities.

Further, Mr. Scully discussed "examples of innovative responses at the bilateral and regional levels," including among others the U.S.-Canada Pacific Salmon Agreement and the 1994 Convention for the Conservation and Management of the Pollock Resources of the Central Bering Sea, both discussed below.

Excerpts below from Mr. Scully's remarks discussed efforts to combat IUU fishing. The full text is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/991201_scully_fisheries.html.

Finally, I would like to turn to recent steps taken to deal with fishing activities that undermine the effectiveness of regional fishery conservation organizations—what has become known as illegal, unregulated and unreported (IUU) fishing. In this instance, "illegal" refers to fishing by a vessel of a Party to the agreement in a manner that violates the terms of the agreement or conservation measures adopted under it. "Unregulated" refers to fishing by a vessel of a non-Party in a manner that obstructs achievement of the purposes of the agreement or measures adopted under it. "Unreported" can refer to either, but is included in the concept to emphasize the fact that unreported catches undercut the ability to undertake the assessments of fish populations necessary for sound management.

IUU fishing typically targets high value species and has become a major problem for Atlantic bluefin tuna and swordfish in the area of ICCAT—the International Commission for the Conservation of Atlantic Tuna—and for Patagonian toothfish, marketed in the United States as Chilean sea bass, in the area of CCAMLR—the Commission for the Conservation of Antarctic Marine Living Resources. The Members of both Commissions have developed innovative approaches to counter IUU fishing, approaches that seek to use trade or market access as a tool.

In 1994, ICCAT developed an action plan to deal with IUU fishing for bluefin tuna and has subsequently agreed upon such a plan for swordfish. In each instance, the plan provides for a process, including documentation of catch, for identifying non-Parties whose vessels are engaged in fishing activities that diminish the effectiveness of ICCAT conservation measures and for identifying Parties whose vessels are not complying with ICCAT conservation measures. Non-Parties or Parties so identified are accorded a one-year period to rectify the situation. If the situation is not rectified, the Commission will require ICCAT members to prohibit imports of bluefin tuna or swordfish products from the non-complying nation.

ICCAT has previously imposed such bans on imports of bluefin tuna from Belize, Honduras and Panama. At its recently concluded 1999 annual meeting, ICCAT, for the first time, authorized an import ban against a Party—against Equatorial Guinea in respect of bluefin tuna; and imposed import bans upon two non-Parties—Belize and Honduras—in respect of swordfish.

CCAMLR, at its 1999 annual meeting that wound up last month, reached agreement on an innovative vessel-based catch documentation system for Patagonian toothfish and the other toothfish species found in Antarctic waters. Developing a system was complicated by the fact that Patagonian toothfish, while concentrated in the area covered by CCAMLR, may also be caught outside of the area. (In fact, one of the challenges facing CCAMLR is the widespread practice of IUU vessels of harvesting toothfish in the CCAMLR area but portraying it as originating elsewhere.)

The CCAMLR catch documentation system is based on the requirement that each landing or transshipment of Dissostichus (toothfish) species generate a document that identifies where the catch was taken (specific areas within CCAMLR waters or FAO statistical area, if outside CCAMLR waters) and where the catch was landed or transshipped and its recipient. The specific elements of the CCAMLR system are:

> i) CCAMLR Parties will require that each of their vessels complete a Dissostichus catch document and obtain flag State certification of the document on each occasion that it lands or transships toothfish, wherever landed or transshipped; > ii) CCAMLR Parties will require that any toothfish landed at its ports or transshipped to its vessels be accompanied by a Dissostichus catch document, completed by the vessel and certified by the flag State of the vessel, whether a Party or a non-Party to CCAMLR; and > iii) CCAMLR Parties will require that each shipment of toothfish imported into its territory be accompanied by the Dissositchus catch document or documents, certified by the exporting State, that account for all of the shipment

(2) Convention for the Conservation of Anadromous Stocks in the Northern Pacific

On May 19, 1992, President George H. W. Bush transmitted the Convention for the Conservation of Anadromous Stocks in the North Pacific Ocean to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–30 (1992); see S. Exec. Rep. No. 102–51 (1992). The convention was signed by the United States, Canada, Japan, and the Russian Federation on February 11, 1992, in Moscow. The Senate gave advice and consent to ratification on August 11, 1992, 138 CONG. REC. S12,291, and it entered into force on February 16, 1993. TIAS No. 11465. Excerpts below from the May 14, 1992, report of the Department of State submitting the convention to the President, which accompanied the transmittal, describe key aspects of the convention.

* * * *

The Convention has as its centerpiece a prohibition on high seas fishing for Pacific salmon, which will protect valuable migrating U.S.-origin salmonids. It also establishes a new international organization to promote the conservation of anadromous stocks (primarily Pacific salmon) throughout their migratory range in the high seas area of the North Pacific Ocean and its adjacent seas, as well as ecologically related species that interact with these resources, including various marine mammals, seabirds, and non-anadromous fish species. The new organization, which is to be known as the North Pacific Anadromous Fish Commission, will also serve as a needed venue for consultation and coordination of high seas fishery enforcement activities by the contracting parties.

Canada, Japan, the Russian Federation, and the United States are the primary States of origin for anadromous stocks in the North Pacific Ocean. These stocks intermingle extensively on the high seas beyond the 200-nautical mile zones of coastal States.

Customary international law, as reflected in Article 66 of the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, prohibits fishing for salmon on the high seas, except where this would cause economic dislocation for a State. Japan, however, has enjoyed a sanctioned high seas salmon fishery under a trilateral agreement with Canada and the United States, as well as under a bilateral accord with the Soviet Union (now the Russian Federation). The trilateral agreement, known as the International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean, (the basic instrument for the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission—INPFC), gave the United States and Canada a means to limit Japanese interceptions of North American-origin salmon in a fishery ostensibly aimed at the harvest of Asian-origin salmon.

The United States has nevertheless maintained that any harvest of migrating Pacific salmon on the high seas is irrational due to the adverse effect it has on efforts of States of origin to conserve and manage such fish. In addition, U.S. Northwest and Alaska fishing interests have long desired the end of such high seas fishing so that the United States could accrue full social, economic and recreational benefits from the fish produced in our waters.

In February 1989, Soviet representatives informed U.S. officials that the Soviet Union would no longer allocate to Japan a high seas salmon quota for Soviet-origin fish, beginning in 1992. At that time, the Soviets also provided the United States with a draft international agreement outlining the establishment of a new organization for conserving North Pacific anadromous stocks. The Soviets explained that the new organization could come into effect once Japan's high seas salmon fishing ceased in the North Pacific.

In response to the proposal, the United States cooperated with the Soviet Union to produce a joint draft convention, which was presented to Canada and Japan for their consideration the following month. In July 1990, Canada contacted the United States to express its desire to work cooperatively in the development of the proposed new Convention and invited the United States, Japan, and the Soviet Union to a meeting in Ottawa, Canada, October 23–24, 1990, to begin discussions towards that end. Following that meeting, the four countries participated in a drafting group exercise in January 1991 to prepare a composite draft negotiating text of the Convention. Negotiations on this text were subsequently held in Washington, D.C., June 25–27, 1991, and at a final negotiating session held September 16–20, 1991, in Ottawa, Canada, which resulted in ad referendum agreement on the new Convention.

Since the conclusion of those negotiations, the Soviet Union has dissolved. Consultations among Canada, Japan, the Russian Federation, and the United States produced agreement that the Russian Federation would replace the Soviet Union as a party to the Convention. The Russian Federation also agreed to serve as depositary for the Convention. The text of the Convention was subsequently modified to achieve these results.

It was understood throughout the negotiations that the new Convention would establish an organization that would supersede the INPFC. . . .

(3) Convention on the Conservation and Management of Pollock Resources in the Central Bering Sea

On August 9, 1994, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Convention on the Conservation and Management of Pollock Resources in the Central Bering Sea, with annex, done at Washington on June 16, 1994. The Convention was signed on that date by representatives of the People's Republic of China, the Republic of Korea, the Russian Federation, and the United States. Japan and the Republic of Poland, the other participating countries in the preparation of the agreement, signed at a later date. The convention entered into force for the United States on December 8, 1995. The July 9, 1994, report of the Department of State submitting the convention to the President and accompanying the transmittal explained the convention as excerpted below. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–27 (1994); see S. Exec. Rep. 103–36.

The Convention establishes an international regime for the conservation and management of pollock resources in the central region of the Bering Sea in the North Pacific Ocean. It is a state-of-the-art fishing agreement that includes strong measures to conserve and manage the pollock resources enforced by effective compliance provisions. Among other things, the Convention requires that vessels fishing for pollock in the Convention Area carry scientific observers and use real-time satellite position-fixing transmitters while in the Bering Sea. Furthermore, all fishing vessels of any Party to the Convention may be boarded and inspected by authorized officials of any other Party for compliance with the Convention.

Pollock in the North Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea represent one of the most commercially important fishery resources in the world. The economic value of the U.S. pollock industry in Alaska, Washington, and Oregon is approximately $2 billion annually.

In the late 1980s, vessels of Japan, Korea, China, and Poland fished extensively and without restraint in the area of the central Bering Sea beyond the waters over which the United States and Russia exercise exclusive fishery management jurisdiction. This situation created severe conservation problems for pollock stocks in the adjacent U.S. and Russian waters. Catches of Aleutian Basin pollock in the central Bering Sea declined from a peak of nearly 1.5 million metric tons in 1989 to less than 11,000 tons in 1992. Anxiety also arose regarding possible adverse impacts on other ecologically related marine species.

In early 1991, a negotiating process on a multilateral agreement on fishing for pollock in the central Bering Sea began which ultimately required ten sessions over a three-year period to come to fruition. During the negotiations, all participating States voluntarily suspended fishing for Aleutian Basin pollock in the central Bering Sea and in the adjacent U.S. and Russian areas. Officials of the Department of Commerce, the U.S. Coast Guard, representatives of the U.S. fishing industry, state government officials of Alaska and Washington, and Congressional representatives strongly supported the U.S. negotiating effort. On February 11, 1994, representatives of the involved countries concluded their discussions and reached ad referendum agreement on a Convention on the Conservation and Management of Pollock Resources in the Central Bering Sea, with Annex. The Convention was opened for signature at Washington on June 16, 1994.

(4) Highly migratory fish

(i) U.S. inclusion of highly migratory tuna under U.S. EEZ jurisdiction

In 1990 the United States amended the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act ("MFCMA") to include highly migratory species among all other species over which it asserts sovereign rights and exclusive management authority while such species occur in the U.S. exclusive economic zone. Fishery Conservation Amendments of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101–627, 104 Stat. 4436. 16 U.S.C. § 1812. The amendment was effective January 1, 1992. In April 1991 the U.S. Mission to the United Nations transmitted a copy of the new legislation to the Special Representative to the Secretary General for the Law of the Sea with an aide memoire announcing the U.S. action. The aide memoire is set forth below in full.

The Permanent Representative of the United States of America to the United Nations presents his compliments to the Special Representative of the Secretary General for the Law of the Sea and would like to draw his attention to the enactment of amendments to the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act.

The most significant change in the United States law is the amendment to include highly migratory tuna as species of fish under United States jurisdiction throughout the exclusive economic zone. Accordingly, the United States now recognizes coastal state claims of jurisdiction over highly migratory species of tuna within the exclusive economic zone. Prior to this amendment, the United States only claimed, and recognized claims of other countries to, jurisdiction over tuna out to twelve nautical miles. This change will make the U.S. position consistent with the overwhelming state practice subsequent to the 1982 United Nations Law of the Sea Convention, with regard to highly migratory species.

The effective date of enactment of the amendment is January 1, 1992. Upon that date the United States will assert management authority over such species in its exclusive economic zone. As a matter of international law, effective November 28, 1990, the United States recognized similar assertions by coastal nations regarding their exclusive economic zones.

(ii) UN agreement on straddling and highly migratory fish

On February 20, 1996, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Agreement for the Implementation of the Provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982, Relating to the Conservation and Management of Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks, with annexes ("Agreement"), reprinted in 34 I.L.M 1542 (1995) The Agreement was adopted on August 4, 1995, at United Nations headquarters in New York by consensus of the United Nations Conference on Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks and signed on behalf of the United States on December 4, 1995. The Senate provided advice and consent on June 27, 1996, and the Agreement entered into force December 11, 2001. See Digest 2001 at 685–86.

The report of the Department of State submitting the Agreement to the President and accompanying the transmittal letter is excerpted below. S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–24 (1996); see S. Exec. Rep. No. 104–20.

* * * *

The Agreement has its origins in Agenda 21, the detailed plan of action adopted by the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. Responding to the precipitous decline in a number of valuable fish stocks in the world's oceans, Agenda 21 called for an intergovernmental conference to strengthen the conservation and management of straddling fish stocks and highly migratory fish stocks.

Straddling fish stocks are stocks which occur both within the exclusive economic zones (EEZs) of one or more coastal States and in adjacent high seas areas. Among these are valuable stocks of cod in the Northwest Atlantic Ocean and pollock in the Bering Sea. Highly migratory fish stocks are those which migrate extensively across the high seas and through the EEZs of many coastal States. Examples include tuna and swordfish.

The conference began under United Nations auspices in 1993 and successfully concluded in August 1995 with the adoption of the Agreement. . . .

The Agreement, as its title indicates, builds upon certain provisions of the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea ("the Convention") related to fisheries. In so doing, the Agreement reaffirms the central role of the Convention as the accepted foundation and framework for this critical body of international law. Although the United States need not become party to the Convention in order to become party to the Agreement, we would maximize our benefits from these two treaties if the United States were a party to both of them. The Convention was transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent October 6, 1994 (Treaty Doc. 103–39).

The linkage between the two treaties is very strong. As discussed in more detail below, much of the text of the Agreement is drawn from, and elaborates upon, provisions of the Convention. Article 4 of the Agreement stipulates that the Agreement "shall be interpreted and applied in the context of and in a manner consistent with the Convention." Part VIII of the Agreement also provides that disputes arising between parties under the Agreement (as well as under regional fishery agreements) are subject to resolution in accordance with the dispute settlement provisions of the Convention.

As a practical matter, U.S. adherence to both treaties will best ensure that they are implemented in a manner consistent with U.S. fishery interests. A brief review of the fisheries provisions of the Convention demonstrates how closely tied the two treaties are.

The Convention permits coastal States to establish EEZs extending 200 nautical miles from their coastal baselines. Under Articles 56, 61 and 62 of the Convention, coastal States enjoy sovereign rights and exclusive jurisdiction to exploit, conserve and manage living marine resources within their EEZs, subject to general obligations to prevent overfishing and to allocate surplus resources, if any, to other nations. Because approximately 90 percent of living marine resources are harvested within 200 miles of shore, the Convention effectively gives coastal States full control over the large majority of marine fisheries.

Beyond the EEZs of any State, i.e., on the high seas, all States have the right for their nationals to engage in fishing. Articles 116–119 of the Convention qualify this right by making it subject to certain rights, duties and interests of coastal States, as well as to a general duty to conserve high seas resources and to cooperate with other States in conservation efforts. In fulfillment of these obligations, multilateral fishery agreements and organizations have been established to conserve and manage high seas fisheries in many regions of the world.

Certain species and categories of fish do not remain solely within EEZs or solely in the high seas, but rather migrate across the line that separates the EEZs from the high seas. For anadromous stocks (such as a salmon) and catadromous species (such as eels), Articles 66 and 67 of the Convention, respectively, essentially forbid high seas harvesting. For straddling stocks and highly migratory species, the Convention contains . . . general injunctions [in Articles 63(2), 64(1) and 64(2)].

These general provisions, while establishing an agreed framework for cooperation and conservation, have not proven sufficiently specific to curb overharvesting that has plagued several of the world's key fish resources. Indeed, since 1989, total marine catches have begun to decline. The United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization reports that about 70 percent of marine fish stocks are fully to heavily exploited, overexploited, depleted or slowly recovering. Of particular concern to the United States, the Aleutian Basin pollock stock collapsed in the late 1980's, while the stock of Western Atlantic bluefin tuna has become severely depleted.

The agreement gives the international community the chance to reverse these trends and to create mechanisms needed to ensure sustainable marine fisheries. Its 50 articles and two annexes strengthen and make more specific the provisions of the Convention, and back those provisions up with effective enforcement techniques and compulsory dispute settlement. . . .

* * * *

In conjunction with the transmittal of the Convention to the Senate in October 1994, I recommended that, for fishery disputes arising under the Convention, the United States choose a special arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with Annex VIII of the Convention as the appropriate dispute settlement procedure. See Sen. Treaty Doc. 103–39, pp. ix–x. To be consistent, I recommend that the United States choose the same procedure for disputes arising under the Agreement.

(5) Sea turtles

(i) Legislation and regulations

Section 609 of the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. Law No., 101–162, 103 Stat. 988 (1989), prohibited the importation of shrimp or products from shrimp "which have been harvested with commercial fishing technology which may affect adversely" certain species of sea turtles protected under U.S. law and regulations. Under § 609 the prohibition would not apply if the President determined and certified to the Congress not later than May 1, 1991 that:

> (A) the government of the harvesting nation has provided documentary evidence of the adoption of a regulatory program governing the incidental taking of such sea turtles in the course of such harvesting that is comparable to that of the United States; and

(B) the average rate of that incidental taking by the vessels of the harvesting nation is comparable to the average rate of incidental taking of sea turtles by United States vessels in the course of such harvesting; or
(C) the particular fishing environment of the harvesting nation does not pose a threat of the incidental taking of such sea turtles in the course of such harvesting.

Section 609 also required the Secretary of State, in consultation with the Secretary of Commerce, among other things, to "initiate negotiations as soon as possible" (1) "for the development of bilateral or multilateral agreements with other nations for the protection and conservation of such [protected] species of sea turtles" and (2) "with all foreign governments which are engaged in, or which have persons or companies engaged in, commercial fishing operations which, as determined by the Secretary of Commerce, may affect adversely such species of sea turtles, for the purpose of entering into bilateral and multilateral treaties with such countries to protect such species of sea turtles."

On January 10, 1991, the Department of State, by delegation from the President, published a notice of guidelines for determining comparability of foreign programs for the protection of turtles in shrimp trawl fishing operations beginning May 1, 1991. 56 Fed. Reg. 1051 (Jan. 10, 1991). The notice is excerpted below.

* * * *

The Department of State has determined that the import restriction does not apply to aquaculture shrimp, since the harvesting of such shrimp does not adversely affect sea turtles. The Department has also determined that the scope of section 609 is limited to the wider Caribbean/western Atlantic region. Section 609 refers to sea turtles whose conservation is the subject of U.S. regulations that require, among other things, that shrimp trawl vessels fishing in U.S. waters in certain areas of the Gulf of Mexico and Atlantic use Turtle Excluder Devices (TEDs) or reduced tow times during certain seasons to reduce the incidental mortality of sea turtles in trawl operations. In passing section 609, Congress recognized that these conservation measures taken by U.S. shrimp fishermen would be of limited effectiveness unless a similar level of protection is afforded throughout the turtles' migratory range across the Gulf of Mexico, Caribbean and western central Atlantic (Wider Caribbean Region).

It has been determined that nations in the wider Caribbean with commercial shrimp trawl operations, through whose waters these sea turtles migrate, are: Mexico, Belize, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, Colombia, Venezuela, Trinidad and Tobago, Guyana, Suriname, French Guiana, and Brazil.

The foundation of the U.S. program is the requirement that shrimp trawl vessels use approved TEDs in areas and at times when there is a likelihood of intercepting sea turtles. Vessels under 25 feet may use restricted tow times in lieu of the TEDs requirement. The goal of this program is to protect sea turtle populations from further decline by reducing their incidental mortality in shrimp trawl operations. The Department's guidelines recognize that other nations may have different distributions of sea turtles in their waters, and that there may be other methods of reducing sea turtle mortality in shrimp trawl operations. The guidelines do, however, contain a presumption in favor of TEDs because of their proven effectiveness in the U.S. fishery.

* * * *

The initial determination of comparability will be made by May 1, 1991. To be found comparable, a foreign nation's program must include the following elements.

1. No retention—a prohibition on the retention of incidentally caught sea turtles.
2. Resuscitation—a requirement that comatose incidentally caught sea turtles be resuscitated.
3. Reduction of Incidental Taking. At the time of requesting an initial positive determination, many affected nations may not have data on the incidental taking of sea turtle in their shrimp trawl fishery. This element will therefore be satisfied if there is either:

(a) A commitment to require all shrimp trawl vessels to use TEDs at all times (or reduce tow times if a vessel is under 25 feet). This requirement may be phased in over a period of not more than three years. The program description should establish a timetable during which TEDs use will be phased in; or
(b) A commitment to engage in a statistically reliable and verifiable scientific program to determine times and areas of turtle abundance and assess the impact of the shrimp trawl fishery on sea turtles; to develop and assess technologies to reduce the impact of the shrimp trawl fishery on sea turtles; and to require the use of fishing technologies and techniques that will reduce the incidental mortality of sea turtles in the shrimp trawl fishery to insignificant levels. A program will be found comparable if it contains these elements and if the period of assessment and implementation is not more than three years. The program description should establish a timetable by which each phase of the program is to be completed.

4. Enforcement. To be comparable, a program must include a credible enforcement effort that includes monitoring for compliance and appropriate sanctions.

On May 1, 1991, the Department of State issued a press release announcing that it had certified that "thirteen countries in the wider Caribbean region have taken initial steps to protect sea turtles from capture and drowning in their shrimp fishing operations." The press release also explained the U.S. law and policy for the protection of sea turtles:

> Sea turtles and shrimp share similar habitats in tropical and sub-tropical waters and, as a result, the air breathing turtles are often caught in shrimp nets and drown. This incidental drowning has been identified as the principal threat to the survival of sea turtles in U.S. waters. To protect turtles, U.S. shrimpers are required to use a piece > of equipment in their nets called the turtle excluder device (or TED). . . .

>
> The 1989 law is intended to extend the protection given to sea turtles under the U.S. regulations to other areas these turtles inhabit throughout the Gulf of Mexico, Caribbean and Western Central Atlantic (the wider Caribbean.) . . .

The full text of the press release as contained in a telegram from the Department to American embassies of affected countries, May 3, 1991, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The guidelines for certification were amended February 18, 1993, to bring them into line with changes in regulations for the U.S. domestic program. 58 Fed. Reg. 9015 (Feb. 18, 1993). As explained in the February 18 notice, under the new domestic regulations, "all U.S. commercial shrimp trawl vessels in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean from North Carolina to Texas must use TEDs at all times in all areas," with limited exemptions. See 57 Fed. Reg. 57,348 (Dec. 4, 1992). See also 58 Fed. Reg. 26,025 (Apr. 29, 1993).

On April 30, 1993, the Department of State certified eight countries under § 609 as having adopted comparable programs and that the fishing environment in two other countries did not pose a threat of the incidental taking of sea turtles. 58 Fed. Reg. 28,428 (May 13, 1993). The ban on shrimp imports to the United States remained in place for four countries that were not certified; two of those countries were subsequently certified. 58 Fed. Reg. 30,082 (May 25, 1993) and 58 Fed. Reg. 40,685 (July 29, 1993). The same countries were certified in 1994 (59 Fed. Reg. 25,697 (May 17, 1994) and 1995 (60 Fed. Reg. 24,962 (May 10, 1995) and 43,640 (Aug. 22, 1995).

Effective May 1, 1996, the guidelines for determining comparability were again revised, this time in response to a court order. 61 Fed. Reg. 17,342 (Apr. 19, 1996). Excerpts from the notice are set forth below.

The Department of State had previously determined that Congress intended Section 609 to apply only to certain nations in the wider Caribbean/western Atlantic region. However, on December 29, 1995, Judge Thomas J. Aquilino, Jr., of the U.S. Court of International Trade, issued an order in Earth Island Institute v. Christopher (CIT 94-06-00321) requiring that Section 609 applies to shrimp harvested in all foreign nations.

* * * *

Shrimp Exporter's Declaration. The Department of State has determined that, in order to achieve effective implementation of Section 609 on a world-wide basis, beginning May 1, 1996, all shipments of shrimp and products of shrimp into the United States must be accompanied by a declaration (DSP-121, revised) attesting that the shrimp accompanying the declaration was harvested either under conditions that do not adversely affect sea turtles (as defined [in the notice]) or in waters subject to the jurisdiction of a nation currently certified pursuant to Section 609. All declarations must be signed by the exporter of the shrimp. A government official of the harvesting nation must also sign those declarations asserting that the accompanying shrimp was harvested under conditions that do not adversely affect sea turtles. . . .

> On April 30, 1996, the Department of State certified 36 countries as meeting the requirements of the law, including 15 countries that had shrimp fisheries only in cold waters with essentially no risk of taking sea turtles and 8 nations only harvesting shrimp using manual rather than mechanical means to retrieve nets. 61 Fed. Reg. 24,998 (May 17, 1996); see also 61 Fed. Reg. 43,395 (Aug. 22, 1996), 61 Fed. Reg. 59,482 (Nov. 22, 1996), 62 Fed. Reg. 4826 (Jan. 31, 1997), and 62 Fed. Reg. 19,157 (Apr. 18, 1997), certifying a total of five additional countries. For certification decisions under these new guidelines in 1997 and 1998, see 62 Fed. Reg. 29,759 (June 2, 1997), 63 Fed. Reg. 30,550 (June 4, 1998), and 63 Fed. Reg. 44,499 (Aug. 19, 1998). On June 4, 1998, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit vacated the trial court's 1996 rulings that had prompted revisions to the guidelines in 1996, as discussed above. Earth Island Inst. v. Albright, 147 F.3d 1352 (Fed. Cir. 1998). Effective August 28, 1998, the State Department reaffirmed the guidelines with certain modifications. 63 Fed. Reg. 46,094 (Aug. 28, 1998).

In October 1996 India, Malaysia, Thailand and Pakistan challenged § 609 under WTO dispute settlement procedures, claiming that it violated U.S. obligations under the WTO. The 2000 Trade Policy Agenda & 1999 Annual Report of the President of the United States on the Trade Agreements Program, available through the U.S. Trade Representative Press Office, described the proceedings through 1999 as set forth below. See also remarks by David Balton, Director of the Office of Marine Conservation, U.S. Department of State, "Setting the Record Straight on Sea Turtles and Shrimp," December 7, 1999, available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/991207_balton_turtles.html.

The United States prevailed on the central points of a challenge brought by India, Malaysia, Pakistan, and Thailand to U.S. restrictions on imports of shrimp and shrimp products harvested in a manner harmful to endangered species of sea turtles, under a special "shrimp-turtle" statute. (This case did not concern and did not affect the Endangered Species Act.) A dispute settlement panel found that these import restrictions were inconsistent with WTO rules. However, the United States appealed, and on October 12, 1998, the Appellate Body largely reversed the panel's ruling. The Appellate Body confirmed that WTO rules allow Members to condition access to their markets on compliance with certain policies such as environmental conservation and agreed that the U.S. "shrimp-turtle law" was a permissible measure adopted for the purpose of sea turtle conservation. The Appellate Body also found that WTO rules permit panels to accept unsolicited amicus curiae briefs from non-governmental organizations. The Appellate Body, however, did find fault with certain aspects of the U.S. implementation of the shrimp-turtle law. In particular, it found that the State Department's procedures for determining whether countries meet the requirements of the law did not provide adequate due process, because exporting nations were not afforded formal opportunities to be heard, and were not given formal written explanations of adverse decisions. The Appellate Body also found that the United States had unfairly discriminated between the complaining countries and Western Hemisphere nations by not exerting as great an effort to negotiate a sea turtle conservation agreement with the complaining countries and by not providing them the same opportunities to receive technical assistance.

The United States informed the DSB of its intention to implement the rulings and recommendations of the DSB in a manner consistent not only with WTO obligations, but also with the firm commitment of the United States to protect endangered species of sea turtles. In this connection, the United States agreed to an implementation period of 13 months, which ended on December 6, 1999. After Congressional consultations and opportunities for input from all interested parties, in July 1999 the State Department revised its procedures to provide more due process to countries applying for certification under the shrimp-turtle law. In addition, the State Department is making progress in efforts to negotiate a sea turtle conservation agreement with the countries of the Indian Ocean region, including the complaining countries, and the United States is providing the complaining countries with additional technical assistance in the adoption of sea turtle conservation measures. Throughout the case, U.S. import restrictions on shrimp harvested in a manner harmful to sea turtles have remained fully in effect.

See Digest 2001 at 752–62 concerning the October 22, 2001, WTO Appellate Body conclusion that the United States had taken sufficient steps to address deficiencies found in the 1998 decision, U.S. litigation concerning implementation of § 609, and progress on negotiation of an Indian Ocean sea turtle convention.

As noted in the summary above, in response to the WTO case, the United States once again revised the guidelines for implementation of § 609. 64 Fed. Reg. 36,946 (July 8, 1999). On October 20, 1999, the Department of State determined that the harvesting of shrimp in the Spencer Gulf of southern Australia did not pose a threat of the incidental taking of sea turtles and therefore the import prohibitions of § 609 did not apply to shrimp harvested in the Spencer Gulf. 64 Fed. Reg. 57,921 (Oct. 27, 1999).

(ii) Inter-American Convention for the Protection and Conservation of Sea Turtles, with annexes

On May 22, 1998, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Inter-American Convention for the Protection and Conservation of Sea Turtles, with annexes, done at Caracas December 1, 1996 ("Convention"), to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. The United States signed the Convention, subject to ratification, on December 13, 1996, in Caracas, Venezuela. The Senate gave advice and consent to ratification on September 20, 2000, 146 CONG. REC. S8,866, and the Convention entered into force May 2, 2001.

The July 16, 1997, report of the Department of State submitting the Convention to the President and accompanying the transmittal is excerpted below. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–48 (1998); see S. Exec. Rep. No. 106–18.

All known species of sea turtles found in the Western hemisphere are threatened or endangered, some critically so. Because sea turtles migrate extensively, effective protection and conservation of these species require cooperation among States within their migratory range. Although the international community has banned trade in sea turtles and sea turtle products pursuant to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora ("CITES"), the Convention I am submitting is the first multilateral agreement that actually sets standards to protect and conserve sea turtles and their habitats.

Congress called for the negotiation of multilateral agreements for the protection and conservation of sea turtles in Section 609 of the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990 (Public Law 101–162). In close cooperation with Mexico, the United States led a three-year effort to negotiate the Convention with other Latin American and Caribbean nations. Substantive negotiations on the Convention concluded on September 5, 1996, at a meeting in Salvador da Bahia, Brazil. The Convention, once ratified and implemented, will enhance the conservation of sea turtles and harmonize standards for their protection throughout the Western Hemisphere.

More specifically, the Convention requires Parties to promote the protection and conservation of sea turtle populations and their habitats; to reduce the incidental capture, injury and mortality of sea turtles associated with commercial fisheries; to prohibit the intentional take of, and domestic and international trade in, sea turtles, their eggs, parts and products; and to foster international cooperation in the research and management of sea turtles. The Convention specifically obligates Parties to require the use of turtle excluder devices ("TEDs") by commercial shrimp trawl vessels in a manner comparable to the requirements in effect in the United States. The Convention also includes provisions on monitoring and compliance.

* * * *

. . . Pursuant to Article IV(3)(a), a Party may allow exceptions to the obligations relating to the intentional capture, retention and killing of, and domestic trade in, sea turtles solely to satisfy economic subsistence need of traditional communities, provided such exceptions do not undermine efforts to achieve the objective of the Convention. A Party considering such exceptions must take into account recommendations of the Consultative Committee of Experts, established under Article VII. Such a Party must also establish a management program that includes limits on levels of intentional taking of sea turtles and report to the other Parties on this program.

This exception would not directly affect the United States, as U.S. law prohibits the intentional taking of sea turtles, for subsistence use or otherwise. However, traditional communities in certain other States in Latin America and the Caribbean do take sea turtles intentionally. If the Convention had prohibited this practice, few such States would have become party to it. The Convention instead creates a regime in which, for the first time, such takings will be circumscribed and monitored.

* * * *

Existing legislation, including the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act, 16 U.S.C. § 1801 et seq., and the Endangered Species Act, 16 U.S.C. § 1531 et seq., provide sufficient legislative authority to implement U.S. obligations under the Convention. Therefore, no new legislation is necessary in order for the United States to become party to the Convention.

(6) U.S.-Canada Pacific salmon agreement

On June 30, 1999, the United States and Canada reached agreement through an exchange of notes on a ten-year accord to conserve and manage Pacific salmon found in the waters of both countries. The agreement included amendments to the Agreement Relating to and Amending Annexes I and IV of the Treaty Concerning Pacific Salmon of January 28, 1985, with attachments. The texts of the notes comprising the agreement are available at www.state.gov/www/global/oes/oceans/990630_salmon_index.html.

A joint statement of June 3, 1999, by Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright and Canadian Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy announced the agreement and described it as follows:

> The comprehensive agreement, reached through vigorous diplomacy among the responsible parties, is designed to > ensure the sustainability of the five Pacific salmon species through a combination of scientific cooperation, new funds to improve fisheries management and aid recovery of weakened salmon stocks, and necessary limits on salmon catches. . . .

>
>
> A fact sheet released by the Department of State also on June 3 provided an overview of the agreement as excerpted below. The agreement was implemented by the Pacific Salmon Treaty Act, 16 U.S.C. §§ 3631–3644, enacted March 15, 1985, Pub. L. No. 99–5, 99 Stat. 7, and amended March 19, 1992, Pub. L. No. 102–251, 106 Stat. 66. The full text of the fact sheet is available at www.state.gov/www/global/oes/oceans/fs_990603_salmon.html.

* * * *

I. Fishery regimes. Most elements of the agreement are contained in several new "chapters" that replace earlier expired versions of Chapters 1–6 of Annex IV of the Pacific Salmon Treaty. Additionally, an understanding was reached regarding management of certain northern fisheries affecting coho salmon, a topic not specifically covered in previous agreements.

Most of the new fishery arrangements will be in effect for ten years, beginning in 1999. The arrangement concerning the US share of Fraser sockeye will be in effect for twelve years, also beginning in 1999. The governments would agree that the new fishery regimes are consistent with all the principles of the Pacific Salmon Treaty, and that compliance with those regimes constitutes satisfaction of all obligations under those principles.

Transboundary Rivers (Chapter 1). This agreement specifies arrangements for sockeye, coho, chinook, and pink salmon management for several rivers that flow from Canada to the Pacific Ocean through the Alaskan panhandle, including the Stikine, Taku and Alsek rivers. An attachment to the agreement describes programs and associated costs for joint enhancement of sockeye salmon in the Taku and Stikine rivers.

Northern British Columbia and Southeast Alaska (Chapter 2). This agreement addresses the management of sockeye and pink salmon fisheries in southeast Alaska and northern British Columbia. It specifies how the fisheries will be managed to achieve conservation and fair sharing of salmon stocks that intermingle in the border area. The fixed catch ceilings contained in the expired agreements are replaced with abundance-based provisions that allow harvests to vary from year to year depending on the abundance of salmon. Of particular note, because they resolve long-contentious issues, are agreements governing Alaska's purse seine fisheries near Noyes Island (District 104) and the gillnet fishery at Tree Point (District 101), and Canada's various marine net fisheries and its troll fishery for pink salmon in Canadian Area 1.

Chinook Salmon (Chapter 3). Because they pass through fisheries regulated by many jurisdictions in both Canada and the US, chinook salmon have been the focus of increasing concern and controversy in recent years. Although some chinook populations are relatively healthy, particularly the "far north migrating stocks" that tend to migrate to the marine waters near Alaska to grow and mature, others have been so diminished in recent years that they have been "listed" by the US federal government under the Endangered Species Act (ESA). Many factors in addition to harvest have contributed to the decline of these stocks. The conservation-based fishery regimes established by this new agreement will help to ensure the effectiveness of public and private investments in habitat restoration and other aspects of salmon recovery.

The new chinook regime encompasses marine and certain freshwater fisheries in Alaska, Canada, Washington, and Oregon. All chinook fisheries will be managed based on abundance, replacing the fixed catch quotas that applied in previous regimes. Two types of fisheries have been designated: (1) those that will be managed based on the aggregate abundance of chinook salmon present in the fishery, and (2) those that will be managed based on the status of individual stocks or stock groups in the fishery. . . .

* * * *

II. Regional bilateral funds. The agreement establishes two funds which would be managed bilaterally and which would address science, restoration, and enhancement needs relating to salmon production. The Northern Boundary and Transboundary Rivers Restoration and Enhancement Fund ("Northern Fund") would address needs in northern and central British Columbia, southeast Alaska, and the Alsek, Taku and Stikine rivers. The Southern Boundary Restoration and Enhancement Fund ("Southern Fund") would address needs in southern British Columbia, the states of Washington and Oregon and the Snake River basin in Idaho.

The Northern and Southern funds would be constituted by an allocation of $75 million and $65 million dollars ($US), respectively, by the United States, provided over four years. Either country, as well as third parties, may contribute to the funds in the future upon agreement of the Parties.

For each of the regional funds, a bilateral committee composed of three representatives appointed by each of the two countries will be responsible for the approval of expenditure of moneys generated by the funds. . . .

The funds will be utilized for activities relating to the development of improved information for resource management (including data acquisition and improved scientific understanding of factors affecting salmon production); rehabilitation, restoration, and/or improvement of natural habitat to enhance the productivity and protection of Pacific salmon; and enhancement of wild stock production using low-technology methods.

III. Renewed Cooperation on Scientific and Institutional Matters. The agreement includes a commitment by the two countries to improve how scientific information is obtained, shared, and applied to the management of the resource. Among other things, the agreement encourages staff exchanges between the management agencies, bilateral workshops, and participation in the public domestic management processes of the other country.

Additionally, a new bilateral Committee on Scientific Cooperation has been established. . . .

IV. Habitat. The agreement highlights the importance of habitat protection and restoration to achieving the long-term objectives of the Parties relative to salmon. While the primary focus of the agreement is on setting provisions that govern the management of fisheries, it is well understood that achieving optimum production of salmon will depend on other initiatives as well. These include, but are not limited to, maintaining adequate water quality and quantity, the achievement of improved spawning success and migration corridors for adult and juvenile salmon, and other measures that maintain and increase the production of natural stocks. The PSC will be directed to report annually to the Parties to identify stocks for which measures beyond harvest controls are required and the non-fishing factors that limit production, options for addressing these factors, and progress of the Parties in implementing measures to improve production.

(7) Driftnet fishing

(i) Convention for the Prohibition of Fishing with Long Driftnets in the South Pacific

On May 21, 1991, President George H. W. Bush transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Convention for the Prohibition of Fishing with Long Driftnets in the South Pacific, done at Wellington, on November 24, 1989 ("Wellington Convention") and Protocol I, done at Noumea on October 20, 1990. The term "driftnet" was defined in the convention to mean "a gillnet or other net or a combination of nets which is more than 2.5 kilometres in length the purpose of which is to enmesh, entrap or entangle fish by drifting on the surface of or in the water."

Excerpts below from the report of the Department of State submitting the letter to the President, which accompanied the transmittal, include proposed understandings to accompany ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–7 (1991); see S. Exec. Rep. 102–20 (1991). The Senate gave advice and consent to ratification on November 26, 1991, 137 CONG.

REC. S18,226, subject to understandings in substantially the language proposed. The convention and protocol entered into force May 17, 1991, and for the United States on February 28, 1992. See also 85 Am. J. Int'l L. 668 (1991).

The Wellington Convention is an important international agreement for the control of high seas driftnet fishing. During the past decade fleets from Japan, Taiwan, and Korea initiated driftnet fisheries for albacore tuna in the South Pacific. The significant increase in the size of the fisheries during the late 1980s raised alarms among the South Pacific states because of their impact on all marine resources in general, and on albacore stocks in particular. Scientific data, while not conclusive, indicated that albacore stocks were in danger of collapse if driftnet fishing continued to occur at these high levels. Serious concerns were also raised that the fishery was causing levels of mortality to populations of marine mammals, sea birds, and turtles that could not be sustained.

In response to this threat the South Pacific states concluded the Wellington Convention. The Convention applies to the area lying within 10 degrees North latitude and 50 degrees South latitude and 130 degrees East longitude and 120 degrees West longitude (Article 1), including the exclusive economic zones of the parties. The Convention is open for signature by the United States because the United States has territories in the Convention Area (American Samoa as well as certain unincorporated islands). The United States signed the Convention on November 14, 1990.

The primary obligations under the Convention are contained in Articles 2 and 3. Article 2 provides that parties shall prohibit their nationals and vessels from engaging in driftnet fishing activities in the Convention Area. Article 3 provides that parties shall not assist or encourage the use of driftnets within the Convention Area, and shall take measures consistent with international law to prohibit the use of driftnets or the transshipment of driftnet catches in waters under their fisheries jurisdiction within the Convention Area. Article 3 further provides that parties may take measures consistent with international law to prohibit the landing and processing of driftnet catches within their territory, prohibit importation of driftnet caught fish whether processed or not, restrict port access and port servicing facilities to driftnet vessels, and prohibit the possession of driftnets on board fishing vessels.

* * * *

Under Article 10(1)(b), the Convention is open for signature by states "in respect of" territory in the Convention Area. It is the Department's view that in signing the Convention the United States signed not merely on behalf of American Samoa but on its own behalf, obligating itself to prohibit driftnet fishing in all waters under its fisheries jurisdiction in the Convention Area and by all United States nationals and vessels throughout the Convention Area. Because the language of Article 10 is ambiguous, I recommend that the United States include the following understanding in its instrument of ratification:

> The United States signed the Convention in its own name and on its own behalf because a portion of its exclusive economic zone is located within the Convention Area. It is the United States understanding that upon becoming a party to the Convention the United States will be obligated to prohibit driftnet fishing in all areas of its exclusive economic zone within the Convention Area, and to prohibit all United States nationals and vessels documented under United States laws from fishing with driftnets in the Convention Area.

There is one additional understanding I recommend the United States include in its instrument of ratification. The Convention provides for measures consistent with international law to restrict driftnet fishing activities by vessels within waters under the fisheries jurisdiction [of a Party]. It is the United States view that such measures may only be applied when consistent with navigation and other international transit rights as reflected in the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea. For example, it would be inconsistent with navigation and other international transit rights to prohibit a vessel that is merely transiting the United States exclusive economic zone from [possessing] a driftnet on board. It would not, on the other hand, be inconsistent with navigation and other international transit rights, as reflected in the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea, to prohibit possession of a driftnet by a vessel permitted to fish in the United States exclusive economic zone under a governing international fisheries agreement, or to require that any driftnet gear be stowed during transit in a manner that makes it inoperable. The understanding should read as follows:

> Article 3 provides for measures consistent with international law to restrict driftnet fishing activities by vessels within areas under a party's fisheries jurisdiction. It is the United States understanding that such measures will only be applied when consistent with navigation and other international transit rights as reflected in the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

No additional legislation will be required to implement United States obligations under the Convention. Section 113 of Public Law 101–627 [Fishery Conservation Amendments of 1990, 104 Stat. 4436, 4453–4454] amends section 307(1) of the Magnuson Fisheries Conservation and Management Act (MFCMA) [16 U.S.C. § 1857(1)] to prohibit "driftnet fishing that is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, including use of a fishing vessel of the United States to engage in such fishing beyond the exclusive economic zone of any nation." This provision prohibits driftnet fishing in the United States exclusive economic zone around American Samoa and the unincorporated islands in the Convention Area, and by United States nationals and vessels documented under United States laws anywhere in the Convention Area. In addition, because the MFCMA defines fishing broadly enough to include activities in support of catching fish, this provision serves to prohibit the transshipment of driftnet catch in the United States exclusive economic zone covered by the Convention.

Two Protocols were adopted on October 20, 1990, to supplement the Wellington Convention. In Protocol I, which is open to distant water fishing nations, parties agree to prohibit their nationals and vessels from driftnet fishing in the Convention Area.

In Protocol II, parties with exclusive economic zones contiguous with or adjacent to the Convention Area agree to prohibit driftnet fishing and transshipment of driftnet catch in areas under their fisheries jurisdiction.

The United States signed Protocol I on February 26, 1991. The obligations contained in Protocol I essentially duplicate those obligations that the United States would undertake in the Convention itself. Nevertheless, South Pacific states were keenly interested in the United States signing the Protocol both to show support for the Convention's principles and because it was felt that other distant water fishing nations would be more likely to sign the Protocol if the United States did.

The United States does not intend at this time to sign Protocol II.

Ratification of the Wellington Convention and Protocol I is consistent with United States policy on driftnet fishing. At the United Nations General Assembly in 1989 the United States cosponsored a resolution [GA Res. 44/225, dated Dec. 22, 1989], adopted by consensus, that recommended among other things a cessation of all driftnet fishing in the South Pacific by July 1, 1991. Moreover, section 107 of Public Law 101–627 provides that it is the policy of the Congress that the United States should support the Wellington Convention and secure a permanent ban on the use of large scale driftnets on the high seas of the world.

(ii) Global moratorium

As noted in (i), supra, the United States had co-sponsored a resolution adopted by the UN General Assembly in 1989 recommending a cessation of driftnet fishing in the South Pacific by July 1, 1991. In December 1991 the United States co-sponsored a resolution for the first time calling for a moratorium. A/RES/46/215. Resolution 215 called upon all members to "[e]nsure that a global moratorium on all large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing is fully implemented on the high seas . . . by 31 December 1992."

(iii) High Seas Driftnet Fisheries Enforcement Act

On November 2, 1992, the United States enacted the High Seas Driftnet Fisheries Enforcement Act, Pub. L. No. 102–582, 106 Stat. 4901, 16 U.S.C. §§ 1826a–1826c. Subsections 101(a)(1) and (b)(1)of the act, 16 U.S.C. § 1826a(a)(1) and (b)(1), required the identification of "nations whose nationals or vessels conduct large-scale driftnet fishing beyond the exclusive economic zone of any nation." Paragraph (a)(2) required the Secretary of the Treasury to "(A) withhold or revoke the clearance [to proceed from a port or place in the United States in certain circumstances required by 46 App. U.S.C. § 91] for any large-scale driftnet fishing vessel that is documented under the laws of the United States or of a nation [identified on a list required] under paragraph (1); and (B) deny entry of that vessel to any place in the United States and to the navigable waters of the United States."

Subsection 101(b)(2) required the President to enter into consultations with governments of nations identified under (b)(1) "for the purpose of obtaining an agreement that will effect the immediate termination of large-scale driftnet fishing by the nationals or vessels of that nation beyond the exclusive economic zone of any nation." The President was also required to direct the prohibition of importation into the United States of fish and fish products and sport fishing equipment from an identified nation at the time of identification or if consultations were not satisfactorily concluded within ninety days. Finally, § 101a(a)(4) required the Secretary of Commerce to determine and certify to the President within six months any instances where the import prohibition was "insufficient to cause that nation to terminate [such] large-scale driftnet fishing" or where the nation had retaliated against the United States as a result of the prohibition. Such certification was deemed to be a certification under 22 U.S.C. § 1978(a), which authorized the President to direct the prohibition of "the bringing or the importation into the United States of any products from the offending country . . . to the extent that such prohibition is sanctioned by the World Trade Organization . . . or the multilateral trade agreements. . . ."

In signing the legislation, President George H. W. Bush stressed U.S. support for the moratorium but also noted areas where the act must be construed consistent with the President's constitutional authority to conduct foreign relations and international law. 28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2281 (Nov. 2, 1992).

[The High Seas Driftnet Fisheries Enforcement Act] calls for a number of measures in support of United Nations General Assembly Resolutions 44/225, 45/197, and 46/215, which pertain to large-scale driftnet fishing and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas. The Act also calls for measures to address unregulated fishing in the area of the Central Bering Sea that is beyond the jurisdiction of the United States and the Russian Federation.

As a principal cosponsor of all three Resolutions, the United States has demonstrated strong leadership to address the problems of wastefulness and harm to the ecosystem caused by this fishing technique. I am grateful for the cooperation and support of many concerned countries that contributed to the successful adoption of the Resolutions. The United States has a particular interest in the effective implementation of the Resolutions because of the threat that driftnet fishing poses to living marine resources on the high seas.

It was appropriate that the United Nations General Assembly, by its Resolution 46/215, called upon all members of the international community to ensure that a global moratorium on all large-scale driftnet fishing is fully implemented by December 31, 1992. The Resolution is consistent with our treaty commitments under the Wellington Convention done on November 24, 1989.

Through this Act, the United States reinforces its commitment to cooperate with all concerned nations to ensure that the moratorium is implemented on time. The United States urges that all nations take appropriate measures to prohibit their nationals and fishing vessels flying their flags from undertaking any activities contrary to Resolution 46/215k, and to impose appropriate penalties for such activities.

For its part, the United States has already taken steps, through the enactment of Public Law 101–627 on November 28, 1990, to prohibit any U.S. national firm engaging in large-scale driftnet fishing in areas subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, as well as in areas beyond the 200-nautical mile exclusive economic zone of any nation.

With respect to problems posed by unregulated fishing in the Central Bering Sea, the United States is pleased with the success achieved with other concerned countries, including the Russian Federation, in securing an agreement voluntarily to suspend fishing in the area during 1993 and 1994. The Administration intends to continue actively to pursue a longer term conservation and management regime for this area.

* * * *

Some provisions of the Act could be construed to encroach upon the President's authority under the Constitution to conduct foreign relations, including the unfettered conduct of negotiations with foreign nations. To avoid constitutional questions that might otherwise arise, I will construe all of these provisions to be advisory, not mandatory. With respect to section 203, which states the "sense of the Congress" concerning trade negotiations, I note that my Administration has taken the initiative in bringing environmental issues into our overall trade agenda.

Finally, I note that section 101 of the bill will be interpreted in accord with the recognized principles of international law. Those principles recognize the right of innocent passage of ships of all states through the territorial sea, a right that shall not be hampered.

On May 4, 1995, several animal-rights and environmental groups filed a lawsuit in the Court of International Trade ("CIT") against the Secretaries of Commerce and State alleging that the U.S. Government violated the High Seas Driftnet Fisheries Enforcement Act by failing to identify Italy as a nation whose nationals or vessels conducted large-scale driftnet fishing beyond the exclusive economic zone of any nation. Excerpts from a 1999 report to Congress (see iv(B) below) describe the resolution of the 1995 litigation as follows:

> The CIT decided in favor of the plaintiffs on 16 February 1996 and issued a judgment on 18 March 1996, ordering the Secretary of Commerce to identify Italy pursuant to the High Seas Driftnet Fisheries Enforcement Act. [Humane Society of the United States v. Brown, 901 F. Supp. 338 (C.I.T. 1996)]. Secretary Brown identified Italy as a large-scale high seas driftnet fishing nation on 28 March 1996. [61 FR 18721 (Apr. 29, 1996)]. Following the identification, the U.S. Government concluded an agreement with the Government of Italy to secure an immediate end to large-scale high seas driftnet fishing operations. Based on that agreement, Secretary Kantor certified on 07 January 1997, that Italy had terminated large-scale driftnet fishing. A more detailed account of the lawsuit and the 1996 U.S.-Italy driftnet agreement can be found in the 1996 NMFS driftnet report to the Congress.

A subsequent action, filed in 1998 with the CIT, is summarized in the same report as excerpted below (footnote omitted). The full text of the report is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

On 18 March 1998, the Humane Society of the United States, Humane Society International, and the Defenders of Wildlife filed in the Court of International Trade (CIT) a complaint for declaratory and injunctive relief against the President and the Secretaries of State and Commerce (The Humane Society of the United States, et al. v. Clinton, et al., No. 98-03-00557). The plaintiffs sought a declaration that the President violated the High Seas Driftnet Fisheries Enforcement Act by failing to impose trade restrictions against Italy for its failure to stop large-scale driftnet fishing by Italian nationals and vessels on the high seas. Alternatively, the plaintiffs sought a declaration that the Secretary of Commerce violated the Act by failing to issue a second identification of Italy as a country for which there is reason to believe its nationals or vessels are continuing to conduct large-scale driftnet fishing operations beyond the exclusive economic zone of any nation. The plaintiffs sought an injunction compelling the President and the Secretary of Commerce to comply with the above statutory duties. They claimed that Italy failed to effectively implement the 1996 U.S.-Italy driftnet agreement and that large-scale high seas driftnet fishing by nationals and vessels of Italy continued in 1997 and 1998.

The CIT issued a judgment on 05 March 1999 [Humane Soc'y of the United States v. Clinton, 44 F. Supp. 2d 260 (1999), aff'd Humane Soc'y of the United States v. Clinton, 236 F. 3d 1320 (Fed. Cir. 2001)] denying the plaintiffs' request for a writ of mandamus directing the President to impose trade sanctions on Italy pursuant to the Act. The CIT also refused to order the Secretary of Commerce to withdraw an earlier certification that Italy had ceased largescale driftnet fishing; a withdrawal would have led to the imposition of trade sanctions. However, the CIT found that because there was "ample evidence that the Secretary of Commerce had reason to believe that large-scale driftnet fishing continues on the high seas by Italian nationals or vessels, the Secretary's refusal to identify Italy a second time is arbitrary, capricious and not in accordance with the Driftnet Act." As a result, the CIT ordered the Secretary to identify Italy on or before 19 March 1999, as a nation for which there is reason to believe its nationals or vessels are conducting large-scale driftnet fishing beyond the exclusive economic zone of any nation, and notify the President and the nation of Italy of this identification.

The Secretary notified the President on 19 March 1999, that he had identified Italy pursuant to the High Seas Driftnet Fisheries Enforcement Act, 16 U.S.C. §1826a(b)(1)(B). . . . [64 Fed. Reg. 34,217 (June 25, 1999)].

As a result of the identification, the President began consultations with the Government of Italy on 17 April 1999 to obtain an agreement to effect the immediate termination of such activities. . . . On 15 July 1999, the United States and Italy formally agreed, via an exchange of diplomatic notes, on measures to end Italian large-scale high seas driftnet fishing. This action obviated the need to impose trade sanctions on Italian fish, fish products and sport fishing equipment pursuant to the Act. Copies of the diplomatic notes and a Department of State press release on the driftnet agreement are provided in Attachments 2 and 3, respectively.

The new driftnet agreement reiterated the Government of Italy's commitment to full implementation of the measures to combat large-scale high seas driftnet fishing in the 1996 U.S.-Italy driftnet agreement. As a result of Italy's driftnet vessel conversion program (a product of the 1996 agreement), almost 80 percent of Italy's driftnet fleet was converted to other fishing methods or scrapped. In an effort to induce the remaining driftnet vessels to apply for the program, Italy extended the application deadline to the end of June 1999.

Italy took a number of additional measures to strengthen the enforcement of its laws relating to driftnet fishing. . . .

Finally, Italy agreed to several new cooperative measures with the United States. The two countries are considering establishing direct communication links to relay real-time information from U.S. sources about possible Italian driftnet violations to the Italian Coast Guard. They will also promote the exchange of fisheries enforcement officers to observe fishing activities through the end of 2001. The Governments of the United States and Italy will conduct periodic consultations regarding the implementation of the United Nations global moratorium on large-scale high seas driftnet fishing. Such consultations will continue until the end of 2001, when a European Union ban on all driftnet fishing will enter into force.

agreement, available at http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings/statements/1999/ps990715c.html.

On March 8, 1993, the U.S. Department of State Spokesman issued a press release announcing steps the United States would take in the event U.S. enforcement authorities "have reasonable grounds to believe that any foreign flag vessel encountered on the high seas is conducting, or has conducted, large-scale pelagic driftnet fishing operations in violation of the United Nations resolution," as set forth below. The full text of the press statement is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

1. U.S. authorities will contact the authorities of the territory whose flag the vessel is flying to seek confirmation that the vessel is in fact registered by those authorities. If the vessel is not flying a flag, U.S. authorities will contact the authorities of the territory in which the vessel claims to be registered to seek confirmation of the same information. The U.S. Government will expect a prompt response to such a request to facilitate enforcement operations.

2. If the contacted authorities verify that the vessel in question is registered in their territory, U.S. authorities will take appropriate action in accordance with agreements in force between the United States and those authorities or any other bilateral or multilateral arrangements that may be made to prevent large-scale pelagic driftnet fishing operations on the high seas inconsistent with the United Nations resolution. If there are no preexisting arrangements, the United States will seek a special arrangement to take law enforcement, or other appropriate action, on behalf of the authorities in whose territory the vessel is registered.

3. If the contacted authorities deny that the vessel in question is registered in their territory, or if the vessel refuses to reveal or claim a territory of registry, U.S. authorities will, consistent with Article 92 of the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, treat the vessel as stateless. It is noted that, under customary international law and U.S. law, a stateless vessel conducting large-scale pelagic driftnet fishing operations on the high seas would be subject to prosecution in the United States.

(iv) U.S. reports to the United Nations and to Congress

(A) Reports to the United Nations

UN General Assembly Decision 49/436 (1994), among other things, called for information relevant to implementation of Resolution 46/215 to be provided to the Secretary General, and requested the Secretary General to report to the General Assembly at its 50th session. Excerpts below from the submission of the United States dated June 1995 focus on areas of international cooperation. The full text of the submission is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

The United States attaches great importance to compliance with Resolution 46/215, and has taken measures individually and collectively to prevent large-scale pelagic driftnet fishing on the high seas, and has called upon all members of the international community to implement and comply with the resolution. The United States has urged all members of the international community, intergovernmental organizations, non-governmental organizations, and scientific institutions with expertise in relation to living marine resources to report to the Secretary-General any activity or conduct inconsistent with the terms of resolution 46/215.

* * * *

To monitor compliance with the driftnet moratorium in 1994, the U.S. Coast Guard and the U.S. National Marine Fisheries Service continued to carry out enforcement and surveillance activities in the North Pacific in areas of former large-scale driftnet fishing. . . . No large-scale high seas driftnet activity was sighted by U.S. enforcement patrols in 1994.

All U.S. Coast Guard Operations were coordinated with enforcement officials of Japan, Canada, and Russia. In addition, direct lines of communication have been established between the Coast Guard and the Russian Federation Border Guard to facilitate sharing of information.

In December 1994, the United States and the People's Republic of China extended for two years a Memorandum of Understanding designed to ensure effective cooperation and implementation of Resolution 46/215. Under the terms of the agreement, originally signed on December 3, 1993, enforcement officials of either country may board and inspect vessels flying the U.S. or PRC flag in the North Pacific Ocean found using or equipped to use large-scale high seas pelagic driftnets inconsistent with the provisions of Resolution 46/215.

The agreement also provides for enforcement officials of either country to ride on board high seas driftnet fishery enforcement vessels of the other country. The U.S. Coast Guard will carry PRC shipriders on two high seas fishery enforcement patrols this year in areas of former large-scale high seas driftnet fishing activity. During one of these patrols, the U.S. Coast Guard and the Russian Federal Border Service will conduct a coordinated high seas driftnet fishing surveillance operation.

The U.S. Coast Guard's high-seas enforcement plan for 1995 will include over 110 days of cutter patrols, and an estimated 215 hours of airborne surveillance from U.S. Coast Guard air patrols based in Alaska and Hawaii. These flights will be coordinated with similar enforcement efforts by Canada to provide maximum patrol-area coverage.

In two European fisheries, questions have been raised regarding the use of large-scale driftnets on the high seas. Environmental groups charged last year that fishermen of several European Union (EU) member nations continued to conduct large-scale, high seas driftnet fishing.

The countries concerned have been conducting diligent enforcement in the fishery, and the United States expects that these efforts, in addition to the framework established by international law, EU regulations, and EU member state regulations, are sufficient to ensure full compliance with Resolution 46/215.

(B) Reports to Congress

Section 206(e) of the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act requires that the Secretary of Commerce, after consultation with the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Transportation, submit a report describing and evaluating the steps taken by the United States to carry out the provisions of § 206 regarding foreign large-scale high seas driftnet fishing. The annual report, first submitted in 1989, describes actions taken by the United States each calendar year to implement the global driftnet moratorium called for by United Nations General Assembly Resolution 46/215 and to secure a permanent ban on the use of large-scale driftnets by persons or vessels fishing beyond the exclusive economic zone of any nation. The current report and information on obtaining copies of prior year reports are available at www.nmfs.noaa.gov/sfa/international/Congress_Reports.htm.

(8) FAO Agreement to Promote Compliance With International Conservation and Management Measures by Fishing Vessels on the High Seas

(i) Transmittal for advice and consent

On April 25, 1994, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Food and Agriculture Organization ("FAO") Agreement to Promote Compliance With International Conservation and Management Measures by Fishing Vessels on the High Seas to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. The agreement was adopted at Rome by consensus by the Conference of the FAO on November 24, 1993. Although negotiations originally focused on the problem of "reflagging" fishing vessels as a means to avoid agreed fishing rules, the agreement as adopted had a broader reach, imposing a set of specific duties for all flag states to ensure that their vessels do not undermine conservation rules. The United States ratified the agreement December 19, 1995; it entered into force on April 24, 2003. Excerpts below from the April 5, 1994 report of the Department of State submitting the convention to the President and accompanying the transmittal describe key aspects of the treaty and the U.S. role in its negotiation. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–24 (1994); see S. Exec. Rep. 103–32 (1994). See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 267 (1996).

* * * *

The negotiation of this Agreement began as a response to a growing threat to the integrity of multilateral organizations concerned with the conservation and management of living marine resources. Fishing vessels flying the flag of a State participating in such organizations have increasingly reflagged to non-member States as a means to avoid fishing restrictions that would otherwise apply. Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, called upon States to take effective action to deter such reflagging. Other international conferences and fora echoed this call until, in November 1992, largely on the initiative of the United States, the FAO Council decided to conclude a treaty under FAO auspices on "reflagging" as expeditiously as possible.

In the course of the negotiations that ensued, information became available to show that reflagging was only part of a larger problem. A growing number of newly built high seas fishing vessels are registered directly (i.e., without reflagging) in States that are not members of the major multilateral fisheries organizations, precisely because these States are not bound by the restrictions adopted by those organizations. Accordingly, the United States agreed with the large majority of States participating in the negotiations to expand the original concept of the treaty to address the problems caused by this practice.

The Agreement that resulted has two primary objectives: (1) to impose upon all States whose fishing vessels operate on the high seas an array of obligations designed to make the activities of those vessels consistent with conservation and management needs; and (2) to increase the transparency of all high seas fishing operations through the collection and dissemination of data. Thus, while the Agreement is still sometimes called the "Flagging" or "Reflagging" Agreement, these are essentially misnomers. The actual agreement deals with a much broader range of issues, as discussed below.

Article I defines a number of critical terms for purposes of the Agreement, including "fishing vessel" and "international conservation and management measure." Article I(b) defines the latter term to mean > measures to conserve or manage one or more species of living marine resources that are adopted and applied in accordance with the relevant rules of international law as reflected in the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. Such measures may be adopted either by global, regional or sub-regional fisheries organizations, subject to the rights and obligations of their members, or by treaties or other international agreements.

One feature of this key definition deserves comment. Negotiators of the Agreement intended this definition to include, in part, the measures that are adopted periodically by international fisheries organizations, such as the International Commission for the Conservation of Atlantic Tunas (ICCAT) or the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organization (NASCO). In some cases, the treaties establishing these organizations allow Parties to "opt-out" of specific measures adopted by the organizations by filing timely objections. While the exercise of such opt-out rights has caused some controversy (e.g., between Canada and the European Union ("EU") regarding measures adopted by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization), the negotiators decided not to affect these pre-existing rights through operation of this Agreement. The phrase "subject to the rights and obligations of their members" is intended to preserve these pre-existing rights. Hence, should an ICCAT member that is also a party to this Agreement exercise its right under the treaty establishing ICCAT to opt out of a particular ICCAT measure, it would not be bound by this Agreement to observe that measure.

Article II, which describes more specifically the fishing vessels to which the Agreement applies, strikes a balance between the goal of comprehensive coverage and the desire not to impose undue administrative burdens on States with large numbers of high seas fishing vessels. Under Article II(1), the Agreement generally applies to all fishing vessels that are used or intended for fishing on the high seas. Article II(2), however, allows a Party to exempt its fishing vessels less than 24 meters in length from most of the administrative requirements of the Agreement, subject to certain important limitations. A Party that exercises its right to make such an exemption must nevertheless prohibit each of its high seas fishing vessels, regardless of length, from engaging in any activity that undermines the effectiveness of international conservation and management measures and must take enforcement action with respect to vessels that violate this prohibition (Article II(2)(b)).

* * * *

Article III sets forth a broad range of obligations for Parties whose fishing vessels operate on the high seas. Such Parties must

(1) ensure that such vessels do not undermine international conservation and management measures (P1);
(2) prohibit such vessels from fishing on the high seas without specific authorization from the appropriate authority of the Party (P2);
(3) not issue such an authorization unless it can exercise responsibility with respect to such vessel (P3);
(4) not issue such an authorization to a reflagged vessel that has previously undermined the effectiveness of international conservation and management measures, unless certain conditions are met (e.g., real change of ownership and control) (P5);
(5) ensure that such vessels are marked in accordance with recognized international standards (P6);

(6) ensure that such vessels provide to it sufficient information on its fishing operations (P7); and
(7) take enforcement measures in respect of such vessels that contravene the requirements of the Agreement (P8).

* * * *

(ii) Implementing legislation

On November 3, 1995, President William J. Clinton signed into law the Fisheries Act of 1995. Pub. L. No. 104–43, 109 Stat. 366, 16 U.S.C. § 501 note (1995). Title I of that act, the High Seas Fishing Compliance Act of 1995, had as its stated purpose to implement the FAO agreement and "to establish a system of permitting, reporting, and regulation for vessels of the United States fishing on the high seas." Section 106 of this title, 16 U.S.C. § 5505, provided that it was unlawful for any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States:

> (1) to use a high seas fishing vessel on the high seas in contravention of international conservation and management measures described in section 105(e);
> (2) to use a high seas fishing vessel on the high seas, unless the vessel has on board a valid permit issued under section 104;
>
> (3) to use a high seas fishing vessel in violation of the conditions or restrictions of a permit issued under section 104;
>
> (4) to falsify any information required to be reported, communicated, or recorded pursuant to this title or any regulation issued under this title, or to fail to submit in a timely fashion any required information, or to fail to report to the Secretary immediately any change in circumstances that has the effect of rendering any such information false, incomplete, or misleading;
> (5) to refuse to permit an authorized officer to board a high seas fishing vessel subject to such person's control for purposes of conducting any search or inspection in > connection with the enforcement of this title or any regulation issued under this title;

>
> (9) to ship, transport, offer for sale, sell, purchase, import, export, or have custody, control, or possession of, any living marine resource taken or retained in violation of this title or any regulation or permit issued under this title; . . . .

Civil penalties and permit sanctions were set forth in § 108, 16 U.S.C. § 5507.

Section 109, 16 U.S.C. § 5508, established criminal penalties for a person committing certain of the enumerated acts, including those included in paragraph 9 of § 106. Section 110, 16 U.S.C. § 5509, provided for forfeiture of high seas fishing vessels committing prohibited acts, with some exceptions, pursuant to a civil proceeding.

(9) International fishery agreements: Amendments to Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act

The Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act, Pub. L. No. 94–265, 90 Stat. 331, 16 U.S.C. § 1821 (1976) ("MFCMA"), was enacted "to provide for the conservation and management of the fisheries, and for other purposes." Section 202 of the MFCMA requires and/or authorizes negotiation of certain international fishery agreements.

In 1992 Congress added a new subsection (g) to § 202 authorizing the Secretary of State, in consultation with the Secretary of Commerce, to negotiate and conclude a fishery agreement with Russia, on certain conditions. Pub. L. No. 102–251, 106 Stat. 60 (1992). Negotiations were ongoing as this volume was being prepared. The 1992 act also amended other provisions of the MFCMA "effective on the date on which the Agreement between the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the Maritime Boundary, signed June 1, 1990, enters into force for the United States."

The 1990 agreement received Senate advice and consent to ratification September 16, 1991. 137 CONG. REC. S13,009) (see S. Treaty Doc. No. 101–22 (1990); S. Exec. Rep. 102–13 (1991)) but has not yet been approved by the Duma. Nevertheless, because the agreement is applied provisionally pursuant to an exchange of notes at the time of signing, TIAS No. 11451, the amendments were effective on the effective date of the act.

The Sustainable Fisheries Act, Pub. L. No. 104–297, 110 Stat. 3559 (1996), further amended § 202 by adding a new subsection (h) requiring the Secretary of State, in cooperation with the Secretary of Commerce, to "seek to secure an international agreement to establish standards and measures for bycatch reduction that are comparable to the standards and measures applicable to United States fishermen for such purposes in any fishery regulated pursuant to this Act for which the Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of State, determines that such an international agreement is necessary and appropriate." The new subsection made any such agreement subject to approval by both Houses of Congress under procedures set forth in § 203, as amended by Pub. L. No. 104–297. In signing the legislation, President William J. Clinton stated, as to the mandate to obtain international agreements on bycatch reduction, "[u]nder our Constitution, it is the President who articulates the Nation's foreign policy and who determines the timing and subject matter of our negotiations with foreign nations. Accordingly, in keeping with past practice, I shall treat this provision as advisory, not mandatory." 32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2040 (Oct. 14, 1996).

(10) Dolphin conservation

During the 1990s the United States participated actively in efforts to improve protection of dolphins. As explained by the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration ("NOAA"):

> in the 1950s fishermen discovered that large, mature yellowfin tuna in the eastern tropical Pacific Ocean (ETP) aggregated beneath schools of certain dolphin stocks. Since that discovery, the predominant tuna fishing method in the ETP has been to encircle schools of dolphins with a fishing net, or "purse seine," to capture the tuna concentrated below. Hundreds of thousands of dolphins died in the early years of this fishery.

In 1972 the United States enacted the Marine Mammal Protection Act ("MMPA"), Pub. L. No. 92–522, 86 Stat. 1027, 16 U.S.C. § 1361 (1972). Among other things, the MMPA imposed a moratorium on the taking and importation of marine mammals and marine mammal products, with certain exceptions. The MMPA was amended in 1988 to add language specifying criteria to be met for the importation of tuna. Pub. L. No. 100–711, 102 Stat. 4755 (1988). In 1990 Congress enacted the Dolphin Protection Consumer Information Act ("DPCIA"), Title IX, Pub. L. No. 101–617, 104 Stat. 4436, 16 U.S.C. § 1385, effective May 1991. This act made it a violation of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. § 45) > for any producer, importer, exporter, distributor, or seller of any tuna product that is exported from or offered for sale in the United States to include on the label of that product the term "dolphin safe" or any other term or symbol that falsely claims or suggests that the tuna contained in the product were harvested using a method of fishing that is not harmful to dolphins if the product contains tuna harvested—

> (A) on the high seas by a vessel engaged in driftnet fishing;
> (B) outside the eastern tropical Pacific Ocean by a vessel using purse seine nets [under certain circumstances];
> (C) in the eastern tropical Pacific Ocean by a vessel using a purse seine net unless the tuna meet the requirements for being considered dolphin safe under paragraph (2); or

> (D) by a vessel in a fishery other than one described in subparagraph (A), (B), or (C) that is identified by the Secretary as having a regular and significant mortality or serious injury of dolphins, unless such product is accompanied by a written statement executed by the captain of the vessel and an observer participating in a national or international program acceptable to the Secretary that no dolphins were killed or seriously injured in the sets or other gear deployments in which the tuna were caught, provided that the Secretary determines that such an observer statement is necessary.

In 1992 Congress enacted the International Dolphin Conservation Act of 1992 ("IDCA"), "to amend the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972 to authorize the Secretary of State to enter into international agreements to establish a global moratorium to prohibit harvesting of tuna through the use of purse seine nets deployed on or to encircle dolphins or other marine mammals, and for other purposes." New § 302 authorized such international agreements "of at least 5 years duration" under specified terms. Section 305 prohibited the Secretary of the Treasury from banning the importation of yellowfin tuna or yellowfin tuna products from any country committing to implement a similar moratorium of at least 5 years beginning March 1, 1994, and to take additional steps to reduce dolphin mortality. Section 307 provided civil or criminal penalties for committing certain specified acts, including "(1) for any person, after June 1, 1994, to sell, purchase, offer for sale, transport, or ship, in the United States, any tuna or tuna product that is not dolphin safe" [and] (2) for any person or vessel that is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, intentionally to set a purse seine net on or to encircle any marine mammal during any tuna fishing operation after February 28, 1994," with certain exceptions.

Excerpts below from a 2003 report to Congress describe international efforts beginning in 1992 and subsequent U.S. legislation to address this issue. The full text of the report is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The La Jolla Agreement and the Panama Declaration. In the fall of 1992, nations participating in the ETP tuna fishery signed the La Jolla Agreement, which established the IDCP and placed voluntary limits on the maximum number of dolphins that could be incidentally killed annually in the fishery, lowering the annual limit over seven years, with a goal of eliminating dolphin mortality in the fishery. In 1991, the year before the Agreement was negotiated, dolphin mortalities totaled 27,127. The goal of the La Jolla Agreement was to reduce dolphin mortalities from 19,500 in 1993 to below 5,000 per year by 1999. In 1993, the first year of the program, dolphin mortalities fell to 3,601.

Even with this success, the U.S. market remained closed to tuna caught under the program. In hopes of resolving this issue, the United States, nine other nations fishing in the ETP, and five prominent environmental non-governmental organizations came together in 1995 and negotiated the Panama Declaration. The Panama Declaration established a framework to go even further to protect dolphin populations in the ETP. Under the Panama Declaration, the countries participating in the fishery agreed to negotiate a legally binding agreement that would build on the success of the La Jolla Agreement and strengthen it in several ways. In addition to strengthening efforts to protect dolphins, the signatories to the Panama Declaration committed themselves to reduce bycatch in commercial fisheries and included provisions for additional protection for individual stocks of dolphins and for other living marine resources to achieve an ecosystem approach to management of the fishery. Furthermore, the efforts of the [Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission ("IATTC")] and the nations that negotiated the Panama Declaration resulted in 100 percent observer coverage of large vessels of the tuna purse seine fishery in the ETP by 1995. This level of observer coverage is unprecedented in any multinational fishery in the world. The nations that signed the Panama Declaration anticipated that the United States would amend the MMPA to allow the import of yellowfin tuna into the United States from nations that are participating in, and are in compliance with, the IDCP. In fact, the commitment of the fishing countries to strengthen the La Jolla Agreement as outlined above was predicated on such changes to U.S. law.

Marine Mammal Protection Act Amendments of 1997 and the Agreement on the International Dolphin Conservation Program. In recognition of the international successes of and in response to the Panama Declaration, Congress passed the [International Dolphin Conservation Program Act ("IDCPA")] in 1997, which amended the MMPA to implement the provisions of the Panama Declaration. Specifically, the amendments, 1) allow for lifting the embargoes for countries fishing in compliance with the IDCP; 2) lift the ban on the sale of tuna that is not dolphin-safe under certain conditions; and 3) allow for a change in the definition of dolphin-safe to include tuna caught in accordance with the IDCP, providing that no dolphins were killed or seriously injured in catching the tuna. . . . With the amendments in place and in anticipation of a change in the definition of dolphin-safe, the nations participating in the tuna purse seine fishery in the ETP came together in February 1998 and successfully negotiated the [International Dolphin Conservation Program Agreement ("Agreement")], a legally-binding international instrument for dolphin conservation and ecosystem management in the ETP. The Agreement built upon previous voluntary dolphin protection commitments that had been adopted by the ETP tuna fishing nations beginning in the early 1990s and was designed to strengthen the dolphin protection measures already in place and afford nations harvesting tuna in the ETP in compliance with those measures access to the U.S. tuna market. To date, Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, United States, Vanuatu, and Venezuela have ratified the Agreement. Bolivia, Colombia, and the European Union are applying the Agreement provisionally. The IATTC staff provide Secretariat support to the Agreement and perform other functions that are set forth in the Agreement or are agreed upon pursuant to the Agreement. The Agreement Area comprises the area of the Pacific Ocean bounded by the coastline of North, Central, and South America and by the 40.N parallel from the coast of North America to its intersection with the lS0.W meridian; the lS0.W meridian to its intersection with the 40.S parallel; and the 40.S parallel to its intersection with the coast of South America.

The Agreement on the International Dolphin Conservation Program. The Agreement is unique in many ways. There is no other international agreement for which detailed information on every set of every fishing trip is available and used to monitor compliance with agreed to conservation and management measures. The Agreement has a number of features that make it the most closely monitored and most strictly enforced agreement for the conservation of marine resources anywhere in the world, including:

> 100 percent observer coverage on large vessels (for the purposes of the IDCP, vessels with carrying capacities greater than 400 short tons or 363.8 metric tons, or Class 6); review of data by IATTC Secretariat staff from every set by large vessels; an International Review Panel (IRP) that identifies possible infractions to the provisions of the Agreement, and where the IRP believes that an infraction may have occurred, referral of the incident to the flag state for review and action; and requirement for the flag state to report back to the IRP on the results of its investigation of possible infractions.

The Agreement is widely recognized as the best-monitored, best-enforced, and most transparent agreement for the conservation and management of living marine resources in the world today. Indeed, the Agreement itself requires that the Parties promote transparency in its implementation, including through public participation, as appropriate. Participation in the forum in which the implementation of the Agreement is monitored is not limited to member nations. Industry representatives and non-governmental conservation organizations also attend and actively participate in meetings of the Parties and the IRP and support the overall process. The intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations are also given timely access to relevant information, subject to procedural rules on access to such information that the Parties may adopt. . . .

The Agreement on the International Dolphin Conservation Program discussed in the report was concluded as a congressionally-authorized executive agreement, done pursuant to the International Dolphin Conservation Program Act of 1997, Pub. L. No. 105–42, 111 Stat. 1122 (1997), 16 U.S.C. §§ 1361 et seq., also discussed in the excerpts. Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright signed the agreement on May 21, 1998 and signed the instrument of acceptance on July 21, 1998.

A fact sheet issued by NOAA provided further information on the International Dolphin Conservation Program Act, as excerpted below. The full text of the fact sheet is available at www.nmfs.noaa.gov/prot_res/readingrm/tunadolphin/idcpa_fact_sheet.htm.

Key provisions of the IDCPA include:

- Allowing U.S. fishing vessels to participate in the ETP yellowfin tuna fishery on equivalent terms with the flag vessels of other IDCP signatory nations;
- Permitting U.S. citizens crewing on the vessels of other nations in the fishery to incidentally take marine mammals during fishing operations outside the U.S. exclusive economic zone;
- Requiring the development of an official dolphin-safe mark that could be used to indicate that a tuna product is "dolphin-safe;"
- Conducting specified research to address the question of whether intentional chase and encirclement by the tuna fishery is having a significant adverse impact on any depleted dolphin stock;
- Requiring the development of a domestic tracking and verification program to track tuna harvested from the ETP by U.S. and foreign vessels. The program will track both dolphin-safe and non-dolphin-safe tuna from capture to final sale and is an expansion of the current program for tracking tuna.

The IDCPA did not become effective until the following two certifications were made: (1) The Secretary of Commerce certified that research had begun on the effects of intentional chase and encirclement on ETP dolphins, and that funds were available to complete the first year of the study, and (2) the Secretary of State certified to Congress that a binding legal instrument establishing the IDCP has been adopted and is in force.

- Research: On July 27, 1998, the Secretary of Commerce made the required certification on the research program. As required by the IDCPA, data gathered has been used in determining whether intentional encirclement of dolphins with purse seine nets is having a significant adverse impact on any depleted dolphin stock in the ETP. This information, along with individual opinions rendered from members of two Expert Panels, input from the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission and the U.S. Marine Mammal Commission, and other relevant information have been provided to the Secretary for consideration in making a decision.

- IDCPA effective date: On March 3, 1999, the Secretary of State provided the required certification to Congress that the Agreement on the IDCP had been adopted and was in force. Consequently, the IDCPA became effective on that date.

* * * *

On May 7, 1999 the National Marine Fisheries Service, NOAA, Department of Commerce ("NMFS"), by delegation, made an initial finding under the IDCPA that "there is insufficient evidence that chase and encirclement by the tuna purse seine fishery 'is having a significant adverse impact' on depleted dolphin stocks in the ETP." 64 Fed. Reg. 24,590 (May 7, 1999). Further explanation from the Federal Register is excerpted below.

---

* * * *

Section 304(a) of the Marine Mammal Protection Act (MMPA), as revised by the IDCPA, requires the NMFS, in consultation with the Marine Mammal Commission and the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission (IATTC), to "conduct a study of the effect of intentional encirclement (including chase) on dolphins and dolphin stocks incidentally taken in the course of purse seine fishing for yellowfin tuna in the ETP." The law requires the study to consist of abundance surveys and stress studies to address the question of whether encirclement is having a significant adverse impact on depleted dolphin stocks.

Under the IDCPA, the dolphin-safe labeling standard could change depending upon the results of this study. The IDCPA states that the Secretary of Commerce shall make [an initial] finding in March 1999, based on the initial results of the study regarding whether the intentional deployment on or encirclement of dolphins with purse seine nets "is having a significant adverse impact" on any depleted dolphin stock in the ETP. The authority to make this determination has been delegated to the NMFS. Unless there is an initial finding that the best scientific information available in March 1999 supports a scientific conclusion that the fishery is causing a "significant adverse impact," the new dolphin-safe labeling standard in paragraph (h)(1) of the Dolphin Protection Consumer Information Act (DPCIA) (i.e., that no dolphins were killed or seriously injured during the sets in which the tuna were caught) automatically replaces the prior labeling standard, which permitted no intentional encirclement of dolphins during the trip in which the tuna was caught. . . .

> Based on this initial finding, the Federal Register notice explained that, effective February 2, 2000, "the new dolphinsafe labeling standard in paragraph (h)(1) of the [DPCIA] (i.e., that no dolphins were killed or seriously injured during the sets in which the tuna were caught) automatically replaces the prior labeling standard, which permitted no intentional encirclement of dolphins during the trip in which the tuna was caught."
>
> A number of environmental groups challenged this result, and the issue was ultimately decided by the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. On July 23, 2001, the court found that the Secretary was statutorily required to make a determination "whether or not" the fishery was having such an impact on dolphins, based on whatever evidence was available, and that by relying on "insufficiency of evidence," he had acted contrary to law and abused his discretion. As a result, the pre-existing labeling standard for "dolphin-safe tuna" remained in effect. Brower v. Evans, 257 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2001). See Digest 2001 at 748–52. See also Digest 2002 at 794–96, concerning the Secretary's final finding on the same issue and the stay of implementation of that finding in litigation challenging it. See also Earth Island v. Evans, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15729 (N.D. Cal. 2004).

b. South Pacific Regional Environment Programme

On November 7, 1997, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Agreement Establishing the South Pacific Regional Environment Programme ("SPREP"), done at Apia, June 16, 1993. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–32 (1993); see S. Exec. Rep. No. 107–7. The Senate provided advice and consent on September 5, 2002, 148 CONG. REC. S8,326; the convention had not entered into force for the United States at the time of this writing.

As the President explained in the letter of transmittal:

> [SPREP] has existed for almost 15 years to promote cooperation in the South Pacific region, to protect and improve the South Pacific environment and to ensure sustainable development in that region. Prior to the Agreement, SPREP had the status of an informal institution housed within the South Pacific Commission. When this institutional arrangement began to prove inefficient, the United States and the nations of the region negotiated the Agreement to allow SPREP to become an intergovernmental organization in its own right and enhance its ability to promote cooperation among its members.

c. Coral reefs

In 1994 the United States, Australia, France, Japan, Jamaica, the Philippines, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the World Bank, and UNEP founded the International Coral Reef Initiative ("ICRI") to protect coral reefs, often referred to as the "rainforests of the sea," and related ecosystems. On May 6, 1997, Under Secretary of State for Global Affairs Timothy E. Wirth testified before the House Subcommittee on Fisheries Conservation, Wildlife and Oceans on House Resolution 87 (then pending but not adopted), expressing the sense of the House that there should be global action to condemn coral reef fisheries that are harmful to coral reef ecosystems and to promote the development of sustainable coral reef fishing practices worldwide. Excerpts below from Mr. Wirth's prepared testimony describe the U.S. participation in the ICRI.

The full text of the testimony is available at www.state.gov/www/global/oes/oceans/970506.html.

* * * *

While the benefits provided by coral reefs are well known, the threats they currently face are not. While coral reef ecosystems are adapted to respond to natural system stresses or perturbations, they are unprepared for the impact of increasing levels of human activity. Scientists estimate that more than two-thirds of the earth's coral reefs are threatened or in decline. Damaged or destroyed reefs can be found along the shores of more than 93 countries, including the United States and its territories.

To combat the serious threats to coral reefs worldwide, I was pleased to announce the establishment of the International Coral Reef Initiative (ICRI) in 1994. The Department of State hosted the ICRI Secretariat until 1996 and continues to play a central role in the Initiative. ICRI was designed as a partnership of local communities, scientists, conservation groups, resource users, private interests, and governments working to protect and manage coral reef resources including associated ecosystems such as sea grass beds and mangroves. It has grown rapidly over the past three years from a small group of founding partners to a large consortium in which over 73 countries participate. By design, project ownership and leadership is intentionally shared at regional, national, or local levels. With this strategy, local resource users and the private sector can play a major role in implementing market-based management initiatives which are designed to promote the sustainable utilization of coral reef resources.

As recognized in H. Res. 87, unsustainable fishing practices are one of the most detrimental of all human activities impacting our reefs. These practices include fishing techniques that destroy the reef itself or encourage excessive harvest of available stocks. Corals, the foundation of reef ecosystems, grow slowly and are easily damaged. Scientists estimate that in some areas it may take over 600 years for new coral to reach the size of the corals that have been destroyed by human activities.

It was a great pleasure to serve as the Honorary Workshop Chairman when ICRI's strategic plans, the Call to Action and Framework for Action, were rolled out in the Philippines in 1995. These documents endorsed strategies to encourage sustainable coral reef management practices world-wide. These include measures to prevent illegal fishing practices, achieve sustainable fisheries and to protect the ecological systems that support them. ICRI partners encourage the implementation of the FAO Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries and the development and promotion of mechanisms for regulating international trade in species that are illegally harvested, endangered or threatened.

* * * *

ecosystems. Section 5(d) of the executive order addressed international cooperation in these issues as follows:

> (d) International Cooperation. The Secretary of State and the Administrator of the Agency for International Development, in cooperation with other members of the Coral Reef Task Force and drawing upon their expertise, shall assess the U.S. role in international trade and protection of coral reef species and implement appropriate strategies and actions to promote conservation and sustainable use of coral reef resources worldwide. Such actions shall include expanded collaboration with other International Coral Reef Initiative ("ICRI") partners, especially governments, to implement the ICRI through its Framework for Action and the Global Coral Reef Monitoring Network at regional, national, and local levels.

a. Biodiversity

(1) Convention on Biological Diversity

The Convention on Biological Diversity, with annexes, done at Rio de Janeiro, June 5, 1992, was negotiated under the auspices of the United Nations Environment Programme ("UNEP"), reprinted in 31 I.L.M. 818 (1992). It was opened for signature at the UN Conference on Environment and Development (see A.1.a. supra) on June 5 and signed by the United States on that date. On November 19, 1993, President William J. Clinton transmitted the convention to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee reported the convention favorably to the Senate on July 11, 1994. S. Exec. Rep. 103–30 (1994). No action has been taken by the Senate on the convention.

Excerpts below from the letter of transmittal set forth the views of the United States on the convention. Additional excerpts from the accompanying report of the Department of State submitting the convention to the President address the issue of a biosafety protocol and set forth understandings recommended to be included in the U.S. instrument of ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–20 (1993). See also fact sheet released by the Department of State January 5, 1999, indicating continued support for the convention, available at www.state.gov/www/global/oes/fs-biodiversity_990105.html.

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL

* * * *

The final text of the Convention was adopted in Nairobi by the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for a Convention on Biological Diversity (INC) on May 22, 1992. The INC was preceded by three technical meetings of an Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on Biological Diversity and two meetings of an Ad Hoc Working Group of Legal and Technical Experts. Five sessions of the INC were held, from June 1991 to May 1992. The Convention was opened for signature at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in Rio de Janeiro on June 5, 1992.

The Convention is a comprehensive agreement, addressing the many facets of biological diversity. It will play a major role in stemming the loss of the earth's species, their habitats, and ecosystems through the Convention's obligations to conserve biodiversity and sustainably use its components as well as its provisions that facilitate access to genetic resources and access to and transfer of technology so crucial to long-term sustainable development of the earth's biological resources. The Convention will also create a much needed forum for focusing international activities and setting global priorities on biological diversity.

The objectives of the Convention as set forth therein are the conservation of biological diversity, the sustainable use of its components, and the fair and equitable sharing of benefits arising out of the utilization of genetic resources. These objectives are implemented through specific provisions that address, inter alia, identification and monitoring, in situ and ex situ conservation, sustainable use, research and training, public education and awareness, impact assessment, access to genetic resources, access to and transfer of technology, technical and scientific cooperation, handling of biotechnology and distribution of its benefits, and financing.

Economic incentives will help all Parties achieve the environmental benefits of conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity. The Administration thus supports the concept that benefits stemming from the use of genetic resources should flow back to those nations that act to conserve biological diversity and provide access to their genetic resources. We will strive to realize this objective of the Convention. As recognized in the Convention, the adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights is another important economic incentive that encourages the development of innovative technologies, improving all Parties' ability to conserve and sustainably use biological resources. The Administration will therefore strongly resist any actions taken by Parties to the Convention that lead to inadequate levels of protection of intellectual property rights, and will continue to pursue a vigorous policy with respect to the adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights in negotiations on bilateral and multilateral trade agreements. In this regard, the report of the Department of State provides a detailed statement of the Administration's position on those provisions of the Convention that relate to intellectual property rights.

Biological diversity conservation in the United States is addressed through a tightly woven partnership of Federal, State, and private sector programs in management of our lands and waters and their resident and migratory species. There are hundreds of State and Federal laws and programs and an extensive system of Federal and State wildlife refuges, marine sanctuaries, wildlife management areas, recreation areas, parks, and forests. These existing programs and authorities are considered sufficient to enable any activities necessary to effectively implement our responsibilities under the Convention. The Administration does not intend to disrupt the existing balance of Federal and State authorities through this Convention. Indeed, the Administration is committed to expanding and strengthening these relationships. We look forward to continued cooperation in conserving biological diversity and in promoting the sustainable use of its components.

The Convention will enter into force on December 29, 1993. Prompt ratification will demonstrate the United States commitment to the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity and will encourage other countries to do likewise. Furthermore, in light of the rapid entry into force of the Convention, early ratification will best allow the United States to fully represent its national interest at the first Conference of the Parties.

I recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to this Convention and give its advice and consent to ratification, subject to the understandings described in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State.

LETTER OF SUBMITTAL

* * * *

ARTICLE 3 (PRINCIPLE)

The Convention states verbatim Principle 21 of the Stockholm Declaration from the 1972 United Nations Conference on the Human Environment. This principle recognizes the sovereign right of States to exploit their own resources pursuant to their own environmental policies and the concomitant responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction. Although the article lacks language which places it in specific context within the Convention, the United States understands that it references a principle that the Parties will bear in mind in their actions under the Convention. The Department of State recommends that the following understanding be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> The Government of the United States of America understands that Article 3 references a principle to be taken into account in the implementation of the Convention.

* * * *

ARTICLE 16 (ACCESS TO AND TRANSFER OF TECHNOLOGY)

Paragraph 1 creates a general obligation with respect to access to and transfer of technology. . . . Paragraph 2 specifies the terms of such access and transfer. . . .

* * * *

Technology transfer by the U.S. private sector to other countries, including developing countries, requires an economic infrastructure in the recipient country that encourages the voluntary transfer of technology and provides sufficient safeguards for investment. An essential component of this infrastructure is a legal regime that provides adequate and effective levels of intellectual property protection. To be considered adequate and effective, a country's intellectual property system must make protection available for all fields of technology and provide effective procedures for enforcing rights. When a recipient country has an inhospitable climate for investment, it becomes less likely that the U.S. private sector will enter that country's market. The absence of such protection has the effect of blocking access to new products based on foreign-originated proprietary technology and inhibiting joint development activities and application of proprietary technology to address indigenous problems or needs of the recipient country.

The Convention is consistent with these fundamental tenets. The United States understands that with respect to technology subject to patents and other intellectual property rights, Parties must ensure that access to and transfer of technology recognize and are consistent with adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights. In particular, the Convention does not provide a basis for the use of compulsory licensing laws to compel private companies to transfer technology.

The Department of State therefore recommends that the following understanding be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

It is the understanding of the Government of the United States of America with respect to provisions addressing access to and transfer of technology that:

a. "fair and most favorable terms" in Article 16(2) means terms that are voluntarily agreed to by all parties to the transaction;
b. with respect to technology subject to patents and other intellectual property rights, Parties must ensure that any access to or transfer of technology that occurs recognizes and is consistent with the adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights, and that Article 16(5) does not alter this obligation.

* * * *

ARTICLE 19 (HANDLING OF BIOTECHNOLOGY AND DISTRIBUTION OF ITS BENEFITS)

Paragraph 1 provides for the effective participation in biotechnology research activities by those Parties that provided the genetic resources for such research, where feasible in the territory of such Parties. The United States understands that with respect to research conducted by public or private entities in the United States, the entity conducting the research shall determine the circumstances under which it is appropriate to provide for the participation of developing countries and whether it is feasible for such research to be performed in the territory of the developing country. The United States considers that in implementing Article 19(1) the Parties should take measures that promote the negotiation of agreements regarding research on genetic resources that are voluntarily accepted by both the provider of the genetic resource and the entity conducting the research activities.

The subject matter of Article 19(1) is virtually identical to the subject matter of Article 15(6). The United States understands Article 15(6) to apply only to scientific research conducted by a Party, while Article 19(1) addresses measures taken by Parties regarding scientific research conducted by either public or private entities. To confirm the United States' understanding of the relationship between Articles 15(6) and 19(1) and the scope of the obligations under Article 19(1), the Department of State recommends that the following understanding be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> It is the understanding of the Government of the United States of America with respect to provisions addressing the conduct and location of research based on genetic resources that:
>
> a. Article 15(6) applies only to scientific research conducted by a Party, while Article 19(1) addresses measures taken by Parties regarding scientific research conducted by either public or private entities.
> b. Article 19(1) cannot serve as a basis for any Party to unilaterally change the terms of existing agreements involving public or private U.S. entities.

* * * *

ARTICLE 20 (FINANCIAL RESOURCES)

Pursuant to this article the Parties undertake to provide financial resources in support of the Convention. . . .

* * * *

Agreement on the costs of implementing measures cannot be evaluated except in the context of agreement on a particular measure. Thus, the United States understands that to qualify for funding pursuant to this paragraph, both the costs and the measures must be agreed between a developing country Party and the institutional structure. The Department of State therefore recommends that the following understanding be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> It is the understanding of the Government of the United States of America that, with respect to Article 20(2), the financial resources provided by developed country Parties are to enable developing country Parties to meet the agreed > full incremental costs to them of implementing measures that fulfill the obligations of the Convention and to benefit from its provisions and that are agreed between a developing country Party and the institutional structure referred to in Article 21.

* * * *

ARTICLE 21 (FINANCIAL MECHANISM)

This article establishes a mechanism for the provision of financial resources to assist developing countries in implementing the Convention. . . .

Paragraph 1 provides that the mechanism shall function under the authority and guidance of, and be accountable to, the COP and that the operation of the mechanism shall be carried out by such institutional structure as may be decided upon by the COP at its first meeting. In addition, it states that the COP shall determine the policy, strategy, program priorities and eligibility criteria relating to the access to and utilization of the financial resources. In this context, the United States understands that the "authority" of the COP relates to determining policy, strategy, program priorities, and eligibility criteria and not that the COP will have absolute control over the institutional structure. The Department of State therefore recommends that the following understanding be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> It is the understanding of the Government of the United States of America that, with respect to Article 21(1), the "authority" of the Conference of the Parties with respect to the financial mechanism relates to determining, for the purposes of the Convention, the policy, strategy, program priorities and eligibility criteria relating to the access to and utilization of such resources.

Paragraph 1 further provides that the contributions shall be such as to take into account the need for predictability, adequacy and timely flow of funds referred to in Article 20 in accordance with the amount of resources needed to be decided periodically by the COP. At the time of the adoption of the agreed text of the Convention, nineteen countries (including the United States) declared their understanding that the decision to be taken by the COP under Paragraph 1 refers to the "amount of resources needed" by the financial mechanism, not to the extent or nature and form of the contributions of the Parties. The Department of State therefore recommends that the following understanding be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> The Government of the United States of America understands that the decision to be taken by the Conference of the Parties under Article 21, Paragraph 1, concerns "the amount of resources needed" by the financial mechanism, and that nothing in Article 20 or 21 authorizes the Conference of the Parties to take decisions concerning the amount, nature, frequency or size of the contributions of the Parties to the institutional structure.

* * * *

ARTICLE 22 (RELATIONSHIP WITH OTHER INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS)

* * * *

Paragraph 2 obligates the Parties to implement the Convention with respect to the marine environment consistently with the rights and obligations of States under the law of the sea. During the negotiations, the United States proposed, in addition to Article 22(2) the inclusion of a sovereign immunity clause, i.e., that the Convention does not apply to military vessels or aircraft, but that each Party has an obligation to ensure, by the adoption of appropriate measures not impairing operations or operational capabilities of such vessels or aircraft owned or operated by it, that such vessels or aircraft act in a manner consistent, so far as is reasonable and practicable, with the Convention.

In view of the reference in Paragraph 22(2) to the law of the sea and the recognition by many delegations during the negotiations that the United States proposal was a principle of customary international law and therefore superfluous, the United States withdrew its proposal. The Department of State therefore recommends that the following understanding be included in the United States instrument of ratification:

> The Government of the United States of America understands that although the provisions of this Convention do not apply to any warship, naval auxiliary, or other vessels or aircraft owned or operated by a State and used, for the time being, only on government non-commercial service, each State shall ensure, by the adoption of appropriate measures not impairing operations or operational capabilities of such vessels or aircraft owned or operated by it, that such vessels or aircraft act in a manner consistent, so far as is reasonable and practicable, with this Convention.

(2) Specially protected areas and wildlife

On April 20, 1993, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Protocol Concerning Specially Protected Areas and Wildlife to the Convention for the Protection and Development of the Marine Environment of the Wider Caribbean Region, with accompanying papers. The Senate gave advice and consent to ratification subject to certain reservations and an understanding, on September 5, 2002, 148 CONG. REC. S8,326 (Sept. 5, 2002); see Digest 2002 at 792–94. It entered into force for the United States on August 16, 2003. Excerpts below from the transmittal letter and the report of the Department of State submitting the treaty to the President describe the protocol and U.S. concerns. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–5 (1993); see S. Exec. Rep. No. 107–8 (2002).

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Protocol Concerning Specially Protected Areas and Wildlife to the Convention for the Protection and Development of the Marine Environment of the Wider Caribbean Region, done at Kingston on January 18, 1990. Included for the information of the Senate is a Proces-verbal of Rectification correcting technical errors in the English and Spanish language texts. I also transmit, for the information of the Senate, the Annexes to the Protocol which were adopted at Kingston June 11, 1991, and the report of the Department of State with respect to the Protocol.

The Protocol elaborates and builds on the general obligation in the Convention for the Protection and Development of the Marine Environment of the Wider Caribbean Region, which calls for parties to establish specially protected areas in order to protect and preserve rare or fragile ecosystems, as well as the habitats of threatened or endangered species of fauna and flora. Species of plants and animals that the parties believe require international cooperation to provide adequate protection are listed in three Annexes developed in implementation of the Protocol. The initial version of the Annexes was adopted in 1991. Annexes I and II list species of special concern, including endangered and threatened species, subspecies, and their populations of plants (Annex I) and animals (Annex II). Species included in these Annexes are to receive protection within the geographic area of the Protocol comparable to that for species listed as endangered or threatened under the Endangered Species Act, or protected under the Marine Mammal Protection Act. Annex III lists plants and animals requiring some management, but not necessarily full protection.

* * * *

Article 11 of the Protocol contains co-operative measures that the parties are obligated to adopt to ensure the protection and recovery of endangered and threatened species of flora and fauna listed in the three Protocol Annexes. Annexes I and II comprise plant and animal species, respectively, requiring the most protection. They include endangered and threatened species, subspecies, and their populations. Parties are required to prohibit all forms of destruction and disturbance of Annex I species. Parties are obligated to prohibit the taking, possession, killing or commercial trade of Annex II species and, to the extent possible, to prevent their disturbance particularly during periods of biological stress. Parties are obligated to adopt and implement plans for the management and use of Annex III species.

The provisions of Article 11 prohibiting the taking of the species of fauna listed in Annex II are inconsistent with the Marine Mammal Protection Act (P.L. 92–522), which permits limited takings of marine mammals for the purpose of display, in connection with the disposal of offshore drilling rigs, and as incidental catch related to fishing operations. I, therefore, recommend that [a reservation] be included in the United States instrument of ratification . . .

* * * *

The United States intends to notify the depositary at the time it accepts the Annexes that the Protocol will not apply to six species of fauna and flora that do not require the protection provided by the Protocol in U.S. territory. These species are the least tern (Sterna antillarum), the Audubon's shearwater (Puffinus lherminieri), the Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas population of the wood stork (Mycteria americana), and the Florida and Alabama populations of the brown pelican (Pelicanus occidentalis), which are listed on Annex II, as well as the fulvous whistling duck (Dendrocygna bicolor) and the populations of widgeon or ditch grass (Rupia maritima) located in the continental United States, which are listed on Annex III.

Several terrestrial species, e.g. bats (Tadarida brasiliensis and Brachyphylla cavernarum) and falcons (Falco peregrinus), are listed in the Annexes. The listing of these species, however, is not intended to describe the relevant terrestrial scope of the Protocol. As the United States has not designated any terrestrial area, the Protocol obligations will not apply with respect to such species.

* * * *

The Protocol requires each Contracting party to perform environmental assessments on "industrial and other projects and activities that would have a negative environmental impact." It is ambiguous on its face as to the extent to which Article 13 would apply to non-federal activities and to activities which have an extraterritorial impact. The United States has actively promoted environmental impact assessment internationally and has broad-based laws and policies that implement environmental impact assessments domestically. However, U.S. law and policy does not require environmental impact assessments for non-federal actions and in certain other circumstances. The United States, therefore, intends to reserve to Article 13 of the Protocol to the extent that the obligations contained therein differ from the obligations contained in Article 12 of the Cartagena Convention. . . .

* * * *

The Protocol will be implemented in the United States through existing statutory authority and no additional legislation is required. Existing legislation relating to protected areas includes, among others, the Marine Protection, Research, and Sanctuaries Act (16 U.S.C. sec. 1431 et seq.), the Coastal Zone Management Act (16 U.S.C. sec. 1451 et seq.), and the Wilderness Act (16 U.S.C. sec. 1131 et seq.). The provisions of the Protocol relating to species conservation will be implemented through the Endangered Species Act (16 U.S.C. sec. 1531 et seq.), the Marine Mammal Protection Act (16 U.S.C. sec. 1361 et seq.), the Coastal Zone Management Act (id.) and the Migratory Bird Treaty Act (33 U.S.C. sec. 1251 et seq.), for example.

At the Diplomatic Conference that adopted the Annexes to the Protocol, the parties agreed that the Protocol would not apply to non-native species, defined as species found outside of their natural geographic distribution, as a result of deliberate or incidental human intervention. Thus, in the United States, certain exotic species, e.g., the muscovy duck and the common iguana, are not covered by the Protocol obligations. I, therefore, recommend that [an understanding] be included in the United States instruments of ratification. . . .

b. Desertification

On August 2, 1996, President William J. Clinton transmitted the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in Countries Experiencing Drought, Particularly in Africa, with Annexes, to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–29. As explained in the Department of State report accompanying the transmittal, "[t]he purpose of the Convention is to combat desertification (i.e., land degradation) and mitigate the effects of drought on arid, semiarid and dry sub-humid lands through effective action at all levels, . . . particularly in Africa." Further excerpts from the report of the Department of State to the President accompanying the transmittal are set forth in Digest 2000 at 728–31. See also 91 Am. J. Int'l L. 93, 118 (1997).

The Senate gave advice and consent to ratification of the convention on October 18, 2000, see Digest 2000 at 731–32, and it entered into force for the United States February 15, 2001.

c. Migratory birds

On October 23, 1997, the U.S. Senate gave advice and consent to ratification to two protocols relating to migratory birds, discussed below: (1) the Protocol Between the United States and Canada Amending the 1916 Convention for the Protection of Migratory Birds in Canada and the United States, with a related exchange of notes, signed at Washington on December 14, 1995, and (2) the Protocol Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United Mexican States Amending the Convention for the Protection of Migratory Birds and Game Mammals, signed at Mexico City on May 5, 1997. 143 CONG. REC. at S11,167 and S11,168. In each case, ratification was conditioned on an understanding concerning the definition of "indigenous inhabitant," to be included in the instrument of ratification as follows:

> Indigenous inhabitants.—The United States understands that the term "indigenous inhabitants" as used in Article [I (Mexico); II(4)(b) (Canada)] means a permanent resident of a village within a subsistence harvest area, regardless of race. In its implementation of [the relevant article], the United States also understands that where it is appropriate to recognize a need to assist indigenous inhabitants in meeting nutritional and other essential needs, or for the teaching of cultural knowledge to or by their family members, there may be cases where, with the permission of the village council and the appropriate permits, immediate family members of indigenous inhabitants may be invited to participate in the customary spring and summer subsistence harvest.

See also 92 Am. J. Int'l L. 243, 267 (1998). The protocols entered into force on October 7, 1999 (Canada) and December 30, 1999 (Mexico).

(1) U.S.-Canada

On August 2, 1996, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Protocol between the United States and Canada amending the 1916 Convention for the Protection of Migratory Birds in Canada and the United States, with a related exchange of notes, signed at Washington December 14, 1995. The protocol was designed to bring the 1916 convention into conformity with the actual practices of the two parties and with Canadian law. Excerpts below from the report of the Department of State submitting the protocol to the President for transmittal provide the views of the United States on the importance of changes to be made by the protocol and the statutory requirement for consistency with other migratory bird conventions. S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–28 (1996); see S. Exec. Rep. No. 105–5. See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 647, 649 (1996).

* * * *

The 1916 Convention for the Protection of Migratory Birds in Canada and the United States ("the Convention") presently does not permit hunting of the migratory species covered under the Convention from March 10 to September 1 except in extremely limited circumstances. Despite this prohibition, aboriginal people of Canada and indigenous people in Alaska have continued their traditional hunt of these birds in the spring and summer for subsistence and other related purposes. In the United States, the prohibition against this traditional hunt has not been actively enforced. In Canada, as a result of recent constitutional guarantees and judicial decisions, the Canadian Federal Government has recognized a right in aboriginal people to this traditional hunt, and the prohibition has not been enforced for this reason.

The goals of the Protocol are to bring the Convention into conformity with actual practice and Canadian law, and to permit the effective regulation for conservation purposes of the traditional hunt. Timely ratification is of the essence to secure U.S.-Canada conservation efforts.

This Protocol would replace a protocol with a similar purpose, which was signed in 1979, transmitted to the Senate with a message from the President dated November 24, 1980, and which is now pending in the Committee on foreign Relations. (Executive W, 96th Cong., 2nd Sess. (1980).)

A detailed analysis of the Protocol follows.

THE PROTOCOL

The Preamble to the Protocol states as its goals allowing a traditional subsistence hunt and improving conservation of migratory birds by allowing for the effective regulation of this hunt. In addition, the Preamble notes that, by sanctioning a traditional subsistence hunt, the Parties do not intend to cause significant increases in the take of species of migratory birds relative to their continental population sizes, compared to the take that is occurring at present. Any such increase in take as a result of the types of hunting provided for in the Protocol would thus be inconsistent with the Convention.

* * * *

Article II of the Protocol substantially rewrites Article II of the Convention to include new subsistence hunt provisions. An introductory paragraph outlines the conservation principles that apply to all management of migratory birds under the Convention. In addition, this paragraph lists a variety of means to achieve these conservation principles.

The United States and Canada exchanged diplomatic notes at the time of the Protocol signing, in which both governments confirmed that the conservation principles set forth in Article II apply to all activities under Article II. The United States considered this exchange of notes desirable in light of the language of Article II (4)(a), which contains the phrase "subject to existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada under section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and the regulatory and conservation regimes defined in the relevant treaties, land claims agreements, self-government agreements, and co-management agreements with Aboriginal peoples of Canada. . . ." This phrase was sought by Canada in order to recognize Canadian court decisions that affirm certain rights of aboriginal people to exploit natural resources. However, as the exchange of notes makes clear, this phrase does not override the conservation principles set forth earlier in Article II.

Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of Article II of the Protocol continue the basic closed and open seasons for hunting contained in the original Convention, with a closed season between March 10 and September 1. The open season remains limited to three and one half months, which the Parties agreed would be interpreted to mean 107 days. The closed season for migratory insectivorous and nongame birds is maintained. Exceptions to these closed seasons may be made for scientific, educational or other specific purposes consistent with the conservation principles of the Convention. This language is found in similar conventions between the United States and Japan (TIAS 7990; 25 UST 3329) (hereinafter "the Japan Convention") and the successor States to the former U.S.S.R. (TIAS 9073; 29 UST 4647) (hereinafter the "U.S.S.R. Convention"), respectively.

The traditional subsistence hunt is provided for as an exception to the closed season and is dealt with in paragraph 4, with different provisions for the hunt in Canada and the United States reflecting different domestic legal regimes and practices. Paragraph 4(a) recognizes that in Canada, aboriginal people have a right to harvest birds under the Canadian Constitution, treaties between aboriginal people and the Government, and other provisions of Canadian law, and permits Canada to allow such a harvest as a matter of international law. Paragraph 4(b) authorizes the United States to allow such a harvest only in Alaska.

* * * *

The Protocol does not create any private rights of action under U.S. law, and, in particular, does not create a right of persons to harvest migratory birds and their eggs. Similarly, Canada does not regard the agreement as creating a right in aboriginal people of Canada to harvest birds; this right is implemented by the Canadian Constitution and relevant agreements between the Government of Canada and its aboriginal groups.

* * * *

CONSISTENCY WITH OTHER MIGRATORY BIRD CONVENTIONS

As a matter of international law, in order for the United States to take advantage of certain provisions of the Protocol, a conforming amendment to the U.S.-Mexico Convention on the Protection of Migratory Birds and Mammals (TS 912; 50 Stat. 1311) will be required. The U.S.-Mexico Convention currently mandates a "close season for wild ducks from the tenth of March to the first of September," while the Protocol would allow a limited hunt of migratory birds, including ducks, in Alaska during part of this time period.

As a matter of domestic law, a conforming amendment to the U.S.-Mexico Convention would also be required. Specifically, the Department of Interior could not implement a provision of one convention that allows a hunt prohibited by the provision of another, since U.S. courts have held that the statute implementing the various migratory bird conventions should be interpreted to require application of the most restrictive one in the case of conflict.

See Alaska Fish & Wildlife Fed'n & Outdoor Council, Inc. v. Dunkle, 829 F. 2d 933, 941 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. den., 485 U.S. 988 (1988).

The United States has indicated to Canada that the provision allowing the hunting of wild ducks during the closed season cannot become effective in the United States until the conforming amendment to the U.S.-Mexico Convention enters into force.

It will not be necessary to amend the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Convention, since it allows a subsistence hunt of the type contained in the Protocol.

The U.S.-Japan Convention contains a more restrictive definition of subsistence hunt than is contemplated by the Protocol. . . . The U.S.-Japan Convention does, however, allow each Party to decide on open seasons for hunting, as long as these seasons are set "so as to avoid * * * principal nesting seasons and to maintain * * * optimum numbers." In addition, there is a specific prohibition on "any sale, purchase or exchange" of birds and their eggs, by-products or parts. A subsistence hunt under the U.S.-Canada Convention therefore will have to be implemented in a manner consistent with these provisions of the U.S.-Japan Convention. Thus, for example, avoidance of principal nesting seasons will allow for only limited taking of eggs.

DOMESTIC IMPLEMENTATION

An existing statute (16 U.S.C. § 712) authorizes the Department of the Interior to promulgate regulations to implement migratory bird treaties with a number of countries, including Canada. No additional statutory authority would be required to implement the Protocol.

Principal species customarily and traditionally taken for subsistence in the United States are shown in a list enclosed for your information.

The term "indigenous inhabitants" in Article II (4)(2)(b) of the Protocol refers primarily to Alaska Natives who are permanent residents of villages within designated areas of Alaska where subsistence hunting of migratory birds is customary and traditional. The term also includes non-Native permanent residents of these villages who have legitimate subsistence hunting needs. Subsistence harvest areas encompass the customary and traditional hunting areas of villages with a customary and traditional pattern of migratory bird harvest. These areas are to be designated through a deliberative process, which would include the management bodies discussed below and employ the best available information on nutritional and cultural needs, customary and traditional use, and other pertinent factors.

* * * *

(2) U.S.-Mexico

As noted in (1), supra, the United States could not implement the terms of the new protocol with Mexico until it entered into a conforming amendment to a U.S.-Canada agreement on the same topic. On September 15, 1997, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Protocol Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United Mexican States Amending the Convention for the Protection of Migratory Birds and Game Mammals, signed at Mexico City on May 5, 1997 ("the Mexico Protocol") for this purpose. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–26 (1997); see S. Exec. Rep. No. 105–5. Article I of the Mexico Protocol amended the original convention to permit the subsistence harvest of wild ducks and their eggs by indigenous inhabitants in Alaska during the period March 10 – September 1, to conform to the U.S.-Canada agreement. As explained in the President's letter of transmittal:

> The Mexico Protocol is particularly important because it will permit the full implementation of the Protocol Amending the 1916 Convention for the Protection of Migratory Birds in Canada and the United States ("the Canada Protocol") that is pending before the Senate at this time. The Canada Protocol is an important agreement that addresses the management of a spring/summer subsistence hunt of waterfowl in communities in Alaska and northern Canada. The Mexico Protocol conforms the Canadian and Mexican migratory bird conventions in a manner that will permit a legal and regulated spring/summer subsistence hunt in Canada and the United States.

d. Arctic

(1) Arctic Council

On September 19, 1996, the United States and seven other states with sovereignty over territory in the Arctic signed the Declaration on the Establishment of the Arctic Council in Ottawa, Canada, reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 1382 (1996). In September 1998 the Ministers of the Arctic Council, meeting in Iqaluit, which became the capital of Nunavut, Canada, approved certain rules, terms of reference and mandates. Brief excerpts below from an analysis of the Arctic Council prepared by Evan Bloom, attorney-adviser, Office of Oceans, Environment and International Scientific Affairs, Office of the Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, describe the development of the Arctic Council during the 1990s and its operation (footnotes omitted). See also U.S. Department of State press statement of September 18, 1998, announcing that the "Arctic Council today accepted an offer by the United States to serve as Chair for the period 1998–2000," available at http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings/statements/1998/ps980918.html.

Mr. Bloom's analysis is available in full at 93 Am. J. Int'l L. 712 (1999).

A new "high level forum" for cooperation in the Arctic has been established by the eight states with sovereignty over territory in that region: Canada, Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, Russia, Sweden and the United States. This new entity, called the Arctic Council, ended its organizational phase and took up its new responsibilities in September of 1998 at its first ministerial-level meeting held at Iqaluit, [now the capital of Nunavut], Canada. At that meeting, the chairmanship of the Council passed from Canada to the United States, which will hold that position for the next two years.

The Arctic Council is the only major intergovernmental initiative for the Arctic involving all eight Arctic states. . . .

I. HISTORY OF THE COUNCIL

The Arctic Council is an outgrowth of the Arctic Environmental Protection Strategy (AEPS), announced by the eight Arctic states in 1991 and based on a proposal by the Finnish Government to initiate a process to address Arctic-wide environmental issues. The AEPS, along with a Declaration on the Protection of the Arctic Environment, was approved by Arctic ministers at Rovaniemi, Finland, in June 1991 as a political—but not a legal—commitment to establish a more comprehensive structure for cooperation. The AEPS identified five key objectives . . .

Although "sustainable economic development" is mentioned in the AEPS, the primary emphasis was on environmental issues. The Arctic states, taking advantage of the opportunity for cooperation presented by the end of the Cold War, were particularly interested in giving an international scope to efforts to clean-up toxins in the Russian Arctic.

As part of the AEPS, the Arctic states established four working groups. States, observers and indigenous groups would send appropriate experts to assist in the work of those described below:

* The Arctic Monitoring and Assessment Program (AMAP) monitors levels and assesses the effects of anthropogenic pollutants in the Arctic. AMAP produces assessment reports on the status and trends in the condition of Arctic ecosystems, detects emerging problems, their possible causes and the potential risk to Arctic ecosystems, and recommends responses.
* The Conservation of Arctic Flora and Fauna (CAFF) working group facilitates the exchange of information and coordination of research on species and habitats of flora and fauna in the Arctic. In particular, CAFF looks at the practices of Arctic states with respect to conservation and management of Arctic species and the relationship to and use of such species by indigenous groups.

* The Emergency Prevention, Preparedness and Response (EPPR) working group provides a framework for cooperation in responding to the threat of environmental emergencies. EPPR gathers experts to consider cooperation with regard to actions in response to significant accidental pollution from any source, coordination and harmonization of preventive policies, and establishment of a system of early notification in the event of significant accidental pollution or the threat of such pollution.

* The Protection of the Arctic Marine Environment (PAME) working group takes preventive and other measures directly or through competent international organizations regarding marine pollution in the Arctic irrespective of origin.

* * * *

Some states . . . felt that the AEPS comprised only part of what the states in the region should discuss with respect to the Arctic. . . . In 1995, Canada began to advocate the transformation of the AEPS into a new international organization which would not only subsume the existing AEPS programs but would also address the broader issue of sustainable development.

The United States, in particular, had difficulty with the notion of creating a new international organization. However, it ultimately agreed to the formation of a council without legal personality. The result was the Declaration on the Establishment of the Arctic Council, signed at Ottawa on September 19, 1996 (the "Ottawa Declaration").

II. THE MAIN THEMES OF THE NEW COUNCIL

The Ottawa Declaration marked a shift in focus for the Arctic states from environmental protection alone to the broader concept of sustainable development. The Declaration provides that the Council is a high level forum designed to: "provide a means for promoting cooperation, coordination and interaction among the Arctic states, with the involvement of the Arctic indigenous communities and other Arctic inhabitants on common Arctic issues, in particular issues of sustainable development and environmental protection in the Arctic." The Council also oversees and coordinates programs established under the AEPS, namely those supervised by the four original working groups discussed above.

In the two-year period following adoption of the Ottawa Declaration, the Arctic states and Permanent Participants worked on rules of procedure and terms of reference for a sustainable development program, as well as new mandates for the Council's programs. Those rules, terms of reference and mandates were approved by the Arctic Ministers in their Declaration at Iqaluit (the "Iqaluit Declaration").

* * * *

(2) U.S.-Russia cooperation in the prevention of pollution

On December 16, 1994, Vice President Al Gore signed the Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Russian Federation on Cooperation in the Prevention of Pollution of the Environment in the Arctic. TIAS No. 12589. The executive agreement was effective upon signature. Article 1 of the agreement indicated the types of issues on which the two governments intended to cooperate:

> The Parties shall cooperate in the prevention, reduction and control of pollution in the Arctic marine and terrestrial environment resulting from the accidental or intentional introduction of contaminants into that environment.
>
> To this end the Parties shall cooperate in research, monitoring, assessment and other activities, bilaterally and in the appropriate multilateral fora.

e. Antarctica: Protocol on Environmental Protection

(1) Transmittal of Protocol

On February 14, 1992, President George H.W. Bush transmitted the Protocol on Environmental Protection to the Antarctic Treaty of 1959, 12 UST 794, 402 U.N.T.S. 71 ("Protocol"), with annexes, done at Madrid October 4, 1991, and an additional annex done at Bonn, October 17, 1991, to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. The Protocol was opened for signature on October 4 in Madrid and, thereafter, in Washington until October 3, 1992. Twenty-three of the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties, including the United States, signed the Protocol on October 4, along with eight of the Contracting Parties that were not Consultative Parties.

The Senate provided advice and consent on October 7, 1992, and the Protocol entered into force for the United States January 14, 1998. Excerpts below from the report of the Department of State submitting the Protocol to the President for transmittal describe the Protocol and its annexes. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–22; see S. Exec. Rep. No. 102–54.

* * * *

The Protocol builds upon the Antarctic Treaty to extend and improve the Treaty's effectiveness as a mechanism for ensuring the protection of the Antarctic environment. It designates Antarctica as a natural reserve, devoted to peace and science, and sets forth legally binding environmental protection principles applicable to human activities in Antarctica, including obligations to accord priority to scientific research. The Protocol prohibits all activities relating to Antarctic mineral resources, except for scientific research, and provides that this prohibition cannot be amended by less than unanimous agreement for at least 50 years following entry into force of the Protocol.

The Protocol requires Parties to protect Antarctic fauna and flora and imposes strict limitations on disposal of wastes in Antarctica and discharge of pollutants into Antarctic waters. It also requires application of environmental impact assessment procedures to activities undertaken in Antarctica, including non-governmental activities, for which advance notice is required under the Antarctic Treaty. Parties are further required to provide for response to environmental emergencies, including the development of joint contingency plans.

Detailed mandatory rules for environmental protection pursuant to these requirements are incorporated in a system of annexes, forming an integral part of the Protocol. Specific annexes on environmental impact assessment; conservation of Antarctic fauna and flora; waste disposal and waste management; and the prevention of marine pollution were adopted with the Protocol. A fifth annex on area protection and management was adopted October 17, 1991 by the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties at the Sixteenth Antarctic Treaty Consultative Meeting. Provision is also made for additional annexes to be incorporated following entry into force of the Protocol.

Dispute settlement procedures are included in the Protocol. These include compulsory and binding procedures for disputes over the interpretation or application of, and compliance with, the provisions of the Protocol relating to mineral resource activities, environmental impact assessment and response action, as well as most provisions included in the Annexes.

The Protocol establishes a Committee on Environmental Protection, as an expert advisory body to provide advice and formulate recommendations to the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Meetings in connection with the implementation of the Protocol.

Conclusion of the Protocol resulted from negotiations during the Eleventh Antarctic Treaty Special Consultative Meeting among the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties—Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, China, Ecuador, Finland, France, Germany, India, Italy, Japan, Republic of Korea, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Poland, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay.

The fourteen Contracting Parties which are not Consultative Parties—Austria, Bulgaria, Canada, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Cuba, Denmark, Greece, Guatemala, Hungary, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Papua New Guinea, Romania and Switzerland, as well as representatives of a number of international organizations, attended as observers.

The Special Consultative Meeting, convened pursuant to a recommendation adopted in Paris in October, 1989, had as general terms of reference the "further elaboration, maintenance and effective implementation of a comprehensive system for the protection of the Antarctic environment." The first session of the Special Consultative Meeting took place in Vina del Mar, Chile, November 19–December 6, 1990; and the second in Madrid, April 22–30, June 17–22, and October 3–4, 1991.

(2) Implementing legislation

Article 13 of the Protocol "obligates the Parties to take appropriate measures within their competence, including the adoption of laws and regulations, administrative actions and enforcement measures, to ensure compliance with the Protocol (including its annexes)." In October 1996 the United States amended current law applicable to Antarctica to fulfill its obligations preparatory to ratification. Antarctic Science, Tourism, and Conservation Act of 1996, Pub. L. 1014–227, 110 Stat. 3034, 16 U.S.C. 2401 note. Title I of the act amended the Antarctic Conservation Act of 1978 by, among other things, setting forth in new § 4 a list of prohibited acts, 16 U.S.C. § 2403. Section 4(a) enumerated acts generally unlawful, while 4(b) listed acts "prohibited unless authorized by permit." Section 4(c) provided that many of the acts in 4(a) and all in 4(b) were not unlawful "if the person committing the act reasonably believed that the act was committed under emergency circumstances involving the safety of human life or of ships, aircraft, or equipment or facilities of high value, or the protection of the environment."

As amended, prohibited acts under § 4(a) included, among other things, introduction of prohibited products, disposal of waste in particular ways; transporting passengers by any seagoing vessel not required to comply with the Act to Prevent Pollution from Ships or Annex IV to the Protocol; damaging, removing, or destroying a historic site or monument; failing to cooperate with an authorized officer or employee of the United States to search or inspect in connection with enforcement of the act; and interfering with arrest or detention of another person known to have committed a prohibited act. Acts prohibited without permit under § 4(b) include certain types of waste disposal, introducing a nonnative species, operating within any Antarctic Specially Protected Area, and dealing with any native bird, mammal, or plant that the person knows or should have known was taken in violation of the act.

New § 4A, 16 U.S.C. § 2403a, established a requirement for an environmental impact assessment for proposals for federal agency activities in Antarctica affecting the quality of the human environment in Antarctica or dependent or associated ecosystems.

Section 202 of the 1996 act amended the Antarctic Protection Act of 1990 by prohibiting mineral resource activities in the Antarctic, 16 U.S.C. §§ 2463, 2465.

f. International Plant Protection Convention

On November 17, 1997, the United States signed the revised International Plant Protection Convention ("IPPC"), adopted at the 29th Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations ("FAO") in Rome ("Conference"). At the request of the United States, the Conference adopted the following explanatory statement addressing the relationship between the revised IPPC and the World Trade Organization Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures in the Conference Report:

> With reference to Article III of this Convention, nothing in this Convention, and in particular in Articles VI or VII thereof, shall be interpreted as limiting the rights or the > obligations of the contracting parties to this Convention under the Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures (SPS Agreement).

Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, Report of the World Food Summit, 7–18 November 1997 (Rome 1997) C 1997/REP, XIII.B., available at www.fao.org/documents/show_cdr.asp?url_file=/docrep/W7475e/W7475e00.htm.

To make clear the U.S. interpretation and intended implementation of the revised IPPC, as well as the U.S. understanding of other parties' interpretation, the U.S. delegation delivered a statement in a plenary session of the Conference, set forth below.

We thank the Secretariat and the membership of the FAO for their help and cooperation in clarifying the intent of the revised text of the IPPC. The United States has supported the work of the FAO Conference on the amended text of the International Plant Protection Convention.

Representatives of IPPC member countries have worked over many months to try to update the IPPC. The revised IPPC is designed to clarify how the IPPC parties will develop international phytosanitary standards, as called for in the World Trade Organization Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures (SPS Agreement). At the same time, we also recognize the complementary role of other international organizations, in particular the Codex Alimentarius Commission, and the International Office of Epizootics, with respect to sanitary standards.

We agree with the clarifications of the Secretariat as well as the general understanding of the parties to the convention that, consistent with the current IPPC, nothing in the revised convention shall be interpreted as restricting the ability of contracting parties to take sanitary or phytosanitary measures against any pest to protect human, animal or plant life or health or the environment.

Accordingly, the United States will continue to regulate for these purposes, consistent with the requirements of U.S. law.

In addition, we are reassured that all Conference participants approved, in connection with the adoption of the revised IPPC, an explanatory statement that underscores that the amended IPPC is to be interpreted in a manner consistent with and does not alter the terms or effect of the SPS Agreement. Accordingly, in implementing the amended convention, the United States will be guided by the SPS Agreement, and in particular will interpret Articles VI and VII of the revised IPPC in a manner that is consistent with the SPS Agreement, including Article 5 thereof.

The United States believes that the international community is already witnessing the benefits of the more liberalized trade regime established with the completion of the Uruguay Round. The United States has a broad set of concerns, including human health and environment, that should be part of future international standard-setting activities. The standards we will establish in the IPPC process and other similar processes will help lay the foundation for unparalleled global prosperity. To ensure this, however, we must inform our work with scientific principles and develop consensus on enduring principles of plant protection that will not only protect species and human health and the environment, but also promote harmonized standards for exporters. We look forward to working with all parties to the IPPC in this vital endeavor.

Lastly, the United States notes that the Conference Report contains a conclusion, reflected in the Resolution concerning adoption of the amended IPPC, that the amended convention would not involve new obligations for contracting parties for purposes of Article XIII of the existing convention, which governs the amendment process. We can accept this conclusion on the basis of the foregoing understandings regarding how the convention is to be interpreted. Thank you.

President William J. Clinton transmitted the 1997 revisions to the Senate on March 23, 2000, for advice and consent to acceptance. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–23 (2000); see S. Exec. Rep. No. 106–27 (2000). Excerpts below from the report of the Department of State submitting the convention to the President include proposed understandings to be included in the instrument of acceptance.*

The IPPC, a multilateral convention which entered into force internationally in 1952 and for the United States in 1972, is aimed at promoting international cooperation to control and prevent the spread of harmful plant pests. The IPPC serves, together with regional plant protection organizations and national plant protection organizations, to develop international plant health standards, promote harmonization of plant quarantine activities with emerging standards, facilitate the dissemination of phytosanitary information, and support plant health assistance to developing countries. The United States has been a leading force in furthering the work of the IPPC. A 1979 revision of the original IPPC (the "existing IPPC") entered into force in 1991.

In 1995, after the adoption of the World Trade Organization (WTO) Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures (the "SPS Agreement"), which identified the organizations operating within the framework of the IPPC as relevant international organizations in the field of sanitary and phytosanitary protection, a consensus developed among the IPPC parties to revise the IPPC text. An important impetus for

* Although "ratification" is the more familiar term for the action and instrument expressing U.S. consent to be bound by a treaty made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the term "acceptance" is synonymous and the procedure identical for the United States in this case. "Acceptance" was used in order to follow the language of the IPPC itself; the revisions were done as an amendment of the existing treaty and follow the amendment procedure provided in Article XXI, which calls for "acceptance" of amendments.

The United States also deposits an instrument of acceptance in the case of certain international agreements that require consent to be bound subsequent to signature, but that do not, under U.S. practice, require the advice and consent of the Senate. In some instances these instruments may be signed by the Secretary of State rather than by the President. See, e.g, Agreement on the International Dolphin Conservation Program, A.4.a.(10) supra.

the revision was to bring the existing IPPC into alignment with the SPS Agreement, which calls for the harmonization of sanitary and phytosanitary measures among countries on the basis of the development of international standards, including within the framework of the IPPC. The revised IPPC was adopted November 17, 1997, by the Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) of the United Nations.

The revised IPPC is intended to clarify existing procedures, update terms and definitions, and strengthen the ability of IPPC parties to develop phytosanitary standards. Standard setting has become a fundamental need for U.S. agriculture. It is necessary to create a stable international trade system that balances the need for protection against pest risks and the need for predictability and fairness in international trade practices. American farmers who are interested in exporting their products to foreign markets would benefit significantly from such a trade system. The revised IPPC is meant to be interpreted consistently with the SPS Agreement and not to limit the rights or obligations of the parties to that agreement.

* * * *

Article VI provides that a party may require phytosanitary measures for quarantine pests and regulated non-quarantine pests, provided that such measures are not more stringent than measures applied to the same pests within its own territory and limited to what is technically justified and necessary to protect plant health. This article restates in greater detail the parties' obligations, set forth in Article VI(2) of the existing IPPC, to have a technical basis for requiring phytosanitary measures and not to impose such requirements arbitrarily. The United States intends that nothing in this article will be interpreted or implemented to limit the rights of the United States under relevant international agreements, in particular the SPS Agreement, including the right to maintain control, inspection, and approval procedures consistent with its obligations under that Agreement. In order to make the U.S. view clear to the other parties, it is recommended that the following understanding be included in the U.S. instrument of acceptance:

> Nothing in the amended International Plant Protection Convention (IPPC) is to be interpreted in a manner inconsistent with, or alters the terms or effect of, the World Trade Organization (WTO) Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures (SPS Agreement) or other relevant international agreements. In implementing the amended IPPC, the United States will be guided by the SPS Agreement and other relevant international agreements, and in particular will interpret Articles VI and VII of the amended IPPC in a manner that is consistent with the SPS Agreement, including Article 5 thereof.

Article VI also prohibits the parties from requiring phytosanitary measures for non-regulated pests. This article would not, however, preclude the United States from restricting the importation of "invasive" pests in order to protect plant life or health or the environment. If an "invasive" pest is injurious to plant life or health or the environment, it could be regulated as a quarantine pest or a regulated non-quarantine pest. Nor would this article preclude the United States from restricting the importation of an "invasive" pest in order to protect human or animal life or health. The term "pest" is defined in Article II of the revised IPPC as "any species, strain or biotype of plant, animal or pathogenic agent injurious to plants or plant products" (emphasis added). The scope of both the existing and the revised IPPC is the protection of plant life and health and the environment. Therefore, neither the existing IPPC nor the revised IPPC prohibits the parties from taking any action with regard to pests that could harm human or animal life or health. (The protection of human and animal health falls within the domain of the Codex Alimentarius Commission and the International Office of Epizootics (OIE), not the IPPC.) In order to make the U.S. view clear to the other parties, it is recommended that the following understanding be included in the U.S. instrument of acceptance:

> Nothing in the amended IPPC limits the authority of the United States, consistent with the SPS Agreement, to take sanitary or phytosanitary measures against any pest to protect human, animal or plant life or health or the environment.

* * * *

Existing legislation, i.e., the Plant Quarantine Act, 7 U.S.C. 151 et seq., the Federal Plant Pest Act, 7 U.S.C. 150aa et seq., the Federal Noxious Weed Act, 7 U.S.C. 2801 et seq., and the Federal Seed Act, 7 U.S.C. 1551 et seq., provides sufficient authority to implement U.S. obligations under the revised IPPC. Therefore, no new legislation is necessary for the United States to accept the revised IPPC. Furthermore, implementation of the revised IPPC will not require any increase in appropriations.

* * * *

The Senate granted advice and consent on October 18, 2000, 146 CONG. REC. S10,658, but as of this writing the IPPC revisions had not entered into force. The resolution of acceptance included three understandings:

> (1) Relationship to other international agreements.—The United States understands that nothing in the amended Convention is to be interpreted in a manner inconsistent with, or alters the terms or effect of, the World Trade Organization Agreement on the application of Sanitary or Phytosanitary Measures (SPS Agreement) or other relevant international agreements.
>
> (2) Authority to take measures against pests.—The United States understands that nothing in the amended Convention limits the authority of the United States, consistent with the SPS Agreement, to take sanitary or phytosanitary measures against any pest to protect the environment or human, animal, or plant life or health.
>
> (3) Article XX ("Technical assistance").—The United States understands that the provisions of Article XX entail no binding obligation to appropriate funds for technical assistance.

Convention on the Provision of Telecommunication Resources for Disaster Mitigation and Relief Operations

On November 17, 1998, Ambasador A. Peter Burleigh, Chargé d'affaires, a.i. of the United States Mission to the United Nations, signed the Tampere Convention on Provision of Emergency Telecommunications Resources for Disaster Mitigation and Relief Operations. A press statement by the United States mission to the United Nations described the convention as set forth below.

The text of the Tampere Convention and related documents, including "best practices," presented to the Working Group on Emergency Telecommunications for in December 1998, are available at www.state.gov/www/issues/relief/tpere1.html.

* * * *

The Convention was negotiated in June in Finland at the urging of the humanitarian relief community and has already been signed by 33 nations. One of the most important instruments of its kind in over a decade, Tampere will assist in moving telecommunications personnel and equipment, quickly, into disaster areas worldwide.

Tampere signatories agree to end excessive import duties and minimize administrative and political barriers that prevent or delay swift provision across national borders of emergency telecommunications. These are used to locate disaster victims or assist in movement of food, medicine and other vital supplies. Signatories agree for the first time to protect relief workers engaging in emergency telecommunications, and their equipment.

Signatories have also formed a working group to standardize cross-border and security procedures. This is managed by the United Nations Emergency Relief Coordinator, Sergio de Mello.

It is hoped that the Tampere Convention will lead to a second convention protecting all relief workers and victims they assist.

A. U.S. COMMISSION FOR THE PRESERVATION OF AMERICA'S HERITAGE ABROAD

The U.S. Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad was established as an independent U.S. agency in 1985. § 1303 of Title XIII of Pub. L. No. 99–83 (1985), 16 U.S.C. § 469j. The main impetus behind § 1303 was the destruction and deterioration of cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings in Eastern and Central Europe resulting from the genocide of the Jewish and other populations in these areas. The statute requires the commission to:

> (1) identify and publish a list of those cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings located abroad which are associated with the foreign heritage of United States citizens from eastern and central Europe, particularly those cemeteries, monuments, and buildings which are in danger of deterioration or destruction; [and]
> (2) encourage the preservation and protection of such cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings by obtaining, in cooperation with the Department of State, assurances from foreign governments that the cemeteries, monuments, and buildings will be preserved and protected . . .

In carrying out its duties, the commission has entered into agreements on the protection and preservation of relevant cultural properties with a number of countries. The first such agreement was entered into with the Czech and Slovak Republic on March 17, 1992. (Subsequently, the commission entered into separate agreements with the Slovak Republic (March 9, 2001) and the Czech Republic (March 3, 2003)). Additional agreements entered into during the 1990s were with Romania (July 8, 1992), Ukraine (March 4, 1994) and Slovenia (May 8, 1996).

The agreements provided for: (1) taking appropriate steps to protect and preserve properties associated with the "cultural heritage" of all national, religious, or ethnic groups residing in the territory, including groups which were victims of genocide during World War II; (2) cooperation in identifying lists of such properties; (3) the possibility of contributions and assistance from the U.S. side; (4) the establishment of a Joint Cultural Heritage Commission to oversee the lists and perform other functions delegated to it; and (5) the designation of the Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad and a counterpart foreign government body as Executive Agencies for implementing the agreement.

A current list of all countries with whom such agreements have been reached, with links to the text of each agreement and related information, is available at www.heritageabroad.gov/agreements/agreement_list.html.

B. INTERNATIONAL CULTURAL PROPERTY PROTECTION

1. Implementation

During the 1990s the United States took action to protect cultural property in El Salvador, Guatemala, Mali, Peru, and Nicaragua at the request of those countries. These actions were taken pursuant to the 1970 UNESCO Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property, 823 UNTS 231 (1972), ratified by the United States in 1983 ("1970 UNESCO Convention"), and implemented by the Convention on Cultural Property Implementation Act, Pub. L. No. 97–446 (1983), 19 U.S.C. § 2601 et seq., which provides for imposition of import restrictions on certain archaeological or ethnological material when pillage of these materials places the cultural heritage of another State Party to the Convention in jeopardy. Information on all instruments and implementing regulations is available at http://exchanges.state.gov/culprop/list.html.

a. El Salvador

On March 8, 1995, the United States entered into its first bilateral instrument for the protection of international cultural property, signing a memorandum of understanding ("MOU") with El Salvador. The MOU placed import restrictions on all of El Salvador's pre-Hispanic archaeological materials and continued without interruption the protection of Cara Sucia archaeological material, which had been protected on an emergency basis since 1987. The MOU was extended for a five-year period and amended effective March 8, 2000.

In Article I of the MOU the United States agreed to restrict the importation into the United States of archaeological material listed in an appendix ("Designated List") unless El Salvador certifies that such exportation is not in violation of its laws. The United States also agreed to offer for return to El Salvador any material on the Designated List forfeited to the United States. Article II set forth measures to be taken by each government to further protect El Salvador's cultural patrimony. Under Article II.A. El Salvador also agreed to use its best efforts to permit the exchange of its archaeological materials under circumstances in which such exchange does not jeopardize its cultural patrimony. The import restrictions agreed to in the MOU were effective upon publication by the U.S. Customs Service in the Federal Register on March 10, 1995, 60 Fed. Reg. 13,351 (March 10, 1995), as corrected. Excerpts below from the Federal Register notice explain the action being taken.

The value of cultural property, whether archaeological or ethnological in nature, is immeasurable. Such items often constitute the very essence of a society and convey important information concerning a people's origin, history, and traditional setting. The importance and popularity of such items regrettably makes them targets of theft, encourages clandestine looting of archaeological sites, and results in their illegal export and import.

The U.S. shares in the international concern for the need to protect endangered cultural property. The appearance in the U.S. of stolen or illegally exported artifacts from other countries where there has been pillage has, on occasion, strained our foreign and cultural relations. This situation, combined with the concerns of museum, archaeological, and scholarly communities, was recognized by the President and Congress. It became apparent that it was in the national interest for the U.S. to join with other countries to control illegal trafficking of such articles in international commerce.

The U.S. joined international efforts and actively participated in deliberations resulting in the 1970 UNESCO Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property (823 U.N.T.S. 231 (1972)). U.S. acceptance of the 1970 UNESCO Convention was codified into U.S. law as the "Convention on Cultural Property Implementation Act" (Pub. L. 97–446, 19 U.S.C. 2601 et seq.). The spirit of the Convention was enacted into law to promote U.S. leadership in achieving greater international cooperation towards preserving cultural treasures that are of importance not only to the nations whence they originate, but also to greater international understanding of mankind's common heritage. The U.S. is, to date, the only major art importing country to implement the 1970 Convention.

During the past several years, import restrictions have been imposed on a emergency basis on archaeological and cultural artifacts of a number of signatory nations as a result of requests for protection received from those nations.

Now, for the first time, import restrictions are being imposed as the result of a bilateral agreement entered into between the United States and a signatory nation. This agreement has been entered into in March 1995, pursuant to the provisions of 19 U.S.C. 2602. Accordingly, the Customs Regulations are being amended to reflect the imposition of the restrictions. Section 12.104g(a) is being amended to indicate that restrictions have been imposed pursuant to the agreement between the United States and the Republic of El Salvador.

b. Canada

On April 10, 1997, the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada signed an agreement to protect archaeological and ethnological material that represents the aboriginal cultural groups of Canada. The agreement also included protection for historic shipwrecks. In a reciprocal provision, Canada recognized the existence of U.S. laws that protect archaeological resources and Native American cultural items as well as historic shipwrecks. Canada agreed to cooperate with the U.S. Government in recovering such objects that had entered Canada illicitly. The Federal Register notice publishing the U.S. import restrictions, 62 Fed. Reg. 19,488 (April 22, 1997), explained that the application of import restrictions was based on a determination that the cultural patrimony of Canada was in jeopardy from the pillage of the following: archaeological and ethnological material from (1) the Inuit (since 2000 B.C.), (2) the Subarctic Indian (17th Century A.D.), (3) the Northwest Coast Indian (since 10,000 B.C.), and (4) the Woodland Indian (from 9000 B.C.); archaeological material (1) of the Plateau Indian (dating from 6,000 B.C.) and (2) found (at historic shipwrecks and other underwater historic sites) in the inland waters of Canada as well as in the Canadian territorial waters of the Atlantic, Pacific, and Arctic Oceans, and the Great Lakes; and ethnological material (dating from approximately 1700 A.D.) of the Plains Indian. The restrictions expired on April 9, 2002.

For further information, including the full text of the agreement and the Federal Register notice, see http://exchanges.state.gov/culprop/cafact.html.

c. Peru

On June 9, 1997, the U.S. and Peru signed an MOU placing import restrictions on pre-Columbian archaeological artifacts and Colonial ethnological materials from all areas of Peru. Previously, on May 7, 1990, the United States had taken emergency action to impose import restrictions on Moche artifacts from the Sipan archaeological region of northern Peru. The MOU continued the import restrictions on Sipan archaeological material without interruption. The MOU was extended for a five-year period and amended effective June 9, 2002.

The import restrictions agreed to in the MOU were effective upon publication in the Federal Register on June 11, 1997, 62 Fed. Reg. 31,713 (June 11, 1997). Excerpts below from the Federal Register notice explain the basis for the action being taken.

In reaching the decision to recommend extension of protection, the Deputy Director, United States Information Agency, determined that, pursuant to the requirements of the Act, with respect to categories of pre-Columbian archaeological material proposed by the Government of Peru for U.S. import restrictions, ranging in date from approximately 12,000 B.C. to A.D. 1532, and including, but not limited to, objects comprised of textiles, metals, ceramics, lithics, perishable remains, and human remains that represent cultures that include, but are not limited to, the Chavin, Paracas, Vincus, Moche (including objects derived from the archaeological zone of Sipan), Viru, Lima, Nazca, Recuay, Tiahuanaco, Huari, Chimu, Chancay, Cuzco, and Inca; that the cultural patrimony of Peru is in jeopardy from the pillage of these irreplaceable materials representing pre-Columbian heritage; and that with respect to certain categories of ethnological material of the Colonial period, ranging in date from A.D. 1532 to 1821, proposed by the Government of Peru for U.S. import restrictions but limited to (1) objects directly related to the pre-Columbian past, whose pre-Columbian design and function are maintained with some Colonial characteristics and may include textiles, metal objects, and ceremonial wood, ceramic and stone vessels; and (2) objects used for religious evangelism among indigenous peoples and including Colonial paintings and sculpture with distinct indigenous iconography; that the cultural patrimony of Peru is in jeopardy of pillage of these irreplaceable materials as documented by the request.

d. Mali

On September 23, 1993, the U.S. took emergency action to impose import restrictions on archaeological material from the Niger River Valley region and the Tellem burial caves of Bandiagara. On September 19, 1997, the Government of the United States and the Government of the Republic of Mali signed an MOU that continued without interruption the import restrictions placed on archaeological material from Mali. The United States and Mali extended the MOU for five years on September 19, 2002.

As explained in the Federal Register Notice implementing the import restrictions in the MOU, 62 Fed. Reg. 49,594 (Sept. 23, 1997), the action protected "archaeological material from sites in the region of the Niger River Valley and the Bandiagara Escarpment (Cliff), Mali, dating from approximately the Neolithic period to approximately the 18th century, identifiable by unique stylistic features, by medium, and where possible, by historic and cultural context." The decision to impose import restrictions was based on "a determination that the cultural patrimony of Mali continues to be in jeopardy from pillage of irreplaceable materials representing Mali heritage and that the pillage is endemic and substantially documented with respect to sites in the region of the Niger River Valley and the Bandiagara Escarpment (Cliff) of Mali." For further information see http://exchanges.state.gov/culprop/mlfact.html.

e. Nicaragua

On June 16, 1999, the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Nicaragua signed an agreement to place import restrictions on certain archaeological material ranging in date from approximately 8000 B.C. through approximately 1500 A.D. and representing prehispanic cultures of the Republic of Nicaragua. The import restrictions went into effect on October 26, 2000, following the conclusion of an exchange of diplomatic notes between the two governments on October 20, 2000. As explained in the Federal Register Notice implementing the import restrictions in the agreement, 65 Fed. Reg. 64,140 (Oct. 26, 2000), the decision to impose import restrictions was based on a determination that:

> the cultural patrimony of Nicaragua is in jeopardy from the pillage of archaeological materials which represent its prehispanic heritage. . . . Ranging in date from approximately 8000 B.C. to approximately 1500 A.D., categories of restricted artifacts include, but are not limited to: figurines of stone, ceramic, shell, and metal; ceramic polychrome vessels, drums, and other small ceramic objects; stone vessels, stone statues, small stone artifacts, > and stone metates (carved three-legged grinding stones); and jade and metal (gold) artifacts. These materials of cultural significance are irreplaceable. The pillage of these materials from their context has prevented the fullest possible understanding of the prehispanic cultural history of Nicaragua by systematic destruction of the archaeological record. Furthermore, the cultural patrimony represented by these materials is a source of identity and esteem for the modern Nicaraguan nation.

For further information, see http://exchanges.state.gov/culprop/nifact.html.

2. Definition of "Pillage"

On August 20, 1990, the Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice, responded to a request from the United States Information Agency ("USIA") concerning, among other things, the interpretation of the statutory term "pillage" as used in the Convention on Cultural Property Implementation Act. Memorandum for Alberto J. Mora, General Counsel, USIA, Re: Application of the Convention on Cultural Property Implementation Act, August 20, 1990.

At the time, USIA was entertaining a request from the Government of Canada—the first request made to the United States under the 1970 UNESCO Convention. Under § 303(a)(1)(A) of the act, the President's authority to impose import restrictions in response to the Canadian request was contingent, inter alia, on a finding that Canada's "cultural patrimony . . . is in jeopardy from the pillage" of its archaeological or ethnological materials. The term "pillage" is not defined in the convention or in the act or its legislative history. Comments from the general public and elsewhere suggested a narrow reading of the statutory term that would limit it to "looting" in the traditional sense. OLC concluded, however, that USIA has discretion to interpret the term "pillage" as applied to ethnological materials to encompass the removal of such materials through thievery and fraud.

C. PROTECTION OF WORLD CULTURAL AND NATURAL HERITAGE

1. UNESCO Convention Concerning the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage

As a party to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization ("UNESCO") Convention Concerning the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage, done at Paris November 23, 1972, entered into force December 17, 1975, 27 UST 37; TIAS 8226, the United States has, among other things, entered into agreements with other countries in keeping with Article 6 of the convention. Article 6 provided:

> 1. Whilst fully respecting the sovereignty of the States on whose territory the cultural and natural heritage mentioned in Articles 1 and 2 is situated, and without prejudice to property rights provided by national legislation, the States Parties to this Convention recognize that such heritage constitutes a world heritage for whose protection it is the duty of the international community as a whole to co-operate.
> 2. The States Parties undertake, in accordance with the provisions of this Convention, to give their help in the identification, protection, conservation and presentation of the cultural and natural heritage referred to in paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article 11 if the States on whose territory it is situated so request.
>
> 3. Each State Party to this Convention undertakes not to take any deliberate measures which might damage directly or indirectly the cultural and natural heritage referred to in Articles 1 and 2 situated on the territory of other States Parties to this Convention.

During the 1990s the United States entered into a memorandum of understanding ("MOU") to create a framework for cooperation for conservation, preservation and/or management based in whole or in part on the convention with Venezuela, TIAS 11807, July 1, 1991; Costa Rica, TIAS 11793, October 8, 1991; and Mexico, June 10, 1998. In each case the MOU was entered into for the United States by the National Park Service of the Department of the Interior.

2. UNIDROIT Convention on Stolen or Illegally Exported Cultural Objects

The United States actively participated in the negotiation of the International Institute for the Unification of Private Law ("UNIDROIT") Convention on Stolen or Illegally Exported Cultural Objects, approved June 24, 1995, at a diplomatic conference co-hosted by UNIDROIT and the Government of Italy. The Convention entered into force on July 1, 1998, initially among China, Ecuador, Lithuania, Paraguay and Romania. The text of the convention and current status information are available at www.unidroit.org/english/conventions/1995culturalproperty/main.htm.

The United States abstained from the vote adopting the convention text and has not signed it. A memorandum prepared by Harold S. Burman, Office of the Legal Adviser for Private International Law, U.S. Department of State, discussed key provisions of the convention, its relationship to the UNESCO convention discussed in C.1., supra, and U.S. concerns, as excerpted below, and available in full at 34 I.L.M. 1322 (1995).

The International Institute for the Unification of Private Law ("UNIDROIT") Convention on Stolen or Illegally Exported Cultural Objects was completed at a Diplomatic Conference held in Rome in June. The Conference was hosted by the Italian Government and UNIDROIT, and was attended by over 70 countries, as well as a number of observer states and international organizations. The Convention seeks to reduce illicit traffic in cultural objects by expanding the rights upon which return of such objects can be sought, and by widening the scope of objects subject to its provisions, in comparison to earlier conventions and treaties. An earlier Convention produced by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization ("UNESCO") in 1970 has been joined by over eighty states, but has had only limited impact since, of the so-called "market" states, only the United States, Canada and Australia have become parties. In the 1980's, UNESCO asked UNIDROIT, which specializes in private law unification, to undertake preparation of a second treaty that might bring the remaining market states, principally those in Western Europe and Japan, into the treaty regime. The final convention was approved by 37 States in favor, 5 against, and 17 abstentions (including the United States).

The negotiations, as reflected by the Preamble, avoided some issues that had been previously debated at the United Nations, such as the balance between protection of national cultural heritage and the international dissemination of culture. Language was also included in the Preamble and in operative provisions with regard to special concerns about archeological sites and protection of objects from native and indigenous communities, primarily at the request of the United States, Canada and Australia.

The Convention only applies prospectively (Article 10). Its two major parts would establish (1) an obligation to return stolen objects, subject to the Convention's provisions, and (2) new grounds for return of illegally exported objects. The first major part, set out in Chapter II (Articles 3–4) covers return of stolen objects, and its provisions apply to both public and private claims.

While all States recognize some concept of "theft," and U.S. courts have applied foreign law in a variety of cases, the extent to which foreign legal concepts of theft would be applied under the Convention in U.S. courts will need to be considered. Leading cases in the United States today[1] would require a particularized analysis of foreign law to determine whether the legal concept of "stolen" is clearly set out in foreign statutes and applicable to a given case; U.S. courts generally have rejected claims for return based on foreign law absent such proof. While the United States was unsuccessful in its effort to remove a provision (Article 3(2)) which equates "illegally excavated" objects with "stolen," final drafting changes brought that provision closer to the American cases referred to above.

A significant departure from U.S. practice is that, under the Convention, stolen object claims may be subject to prescription (a period beyond which claims under the Convention cannot be maintained) and compensation for bona fide possessors who can establish due diligence. The final text did not retain diligence requirements for claimants, a point on which U.S. state laws vary. The impact of Chapter II is likely to be limited in U.S. cases, since the Convention allows States to continue to apply provisions of their domestic laws that are more favorable for claimants (similar to the operation of a remedial statute). Most U.S. states follow the old English nemo dat rule, in contrast to most civil law States; thus proof of theft in U.S. cases leaves few defenses for return, and compensation in most cases is not required. Since U.S. state law in most cases will remain more beneficial to claimants, Chapter II would have its principal impact on claims brought in other countries.

One issue regarding the meaning of "public collections" (the Convention grants special treatment to such objects) illustrated the difficulty of accommodating some American practices. The United States, unlike almost all other countries, has developed a system whereby over ninety percent of identified collections are created and held by private "non-profits" (primarily museums and research institutions), rather than by government controlled or financed institutions. Only after protracted negotiation was agreement achieved in Article 3(7) allowing coverage of American-type "non-profits."

The second major part of the Convention (Chapter III, Articles 5–7) is more of a departure from traditional U.S. practice, and more problematic in terms of eventual U.S. ratification, in that it provides for indirect enforcement of foreign export laws. The United States unsuccessfully sought an option, at least for those States already party to the 1970 UNESCO Convention, to exclude Chapter III altogether, that is, not to enforce that part of the Convention applying foreign export law.

Only States can pursue claims under this part, and it more closely resembles public rather than private law. If a claimant State can prove violation of its laws "regulating the export of cultural objects for the purpose of protecting its cultural heritage" (defined in Article 1(b)), it must then move to the second level of proof (Article 5(3)), that removal of the object significantly impairs the State or community interests listed in the Convention, or is otherwise of significant cultural importance for that State. Rules under this part on compensation, due diligence, prescription, etc., while not the same, are generally similar to those affecting recovery of stolen objects.

Some source States had initially sought an internationally-recognized system of export certification, and alternatively a treaty-based presumption of illegality that would apply in the absence of an export certificate. The final language eliminated any such presumption. Also eliminated, at the urging of the United States and a number of other States, was a provision that would have allowed a forum State to refuse to return an object on the basis that it had as close a relationship with the object as did the requesting State. Language that would have indirectly limited the use of ordre publique as a grounds for States to refuse to comply was also dropped.

Under its general priorities provision (Article 13), the Convention would not apply to cases otherwise covered by treaties or other legally binding international instruments to which a contracting State is a party. This formulation would include, e.g., conventions that regulate the acquisition or protection of objects in wartime. Unaddressed in the Convention are other issues that may arise concerning objects taken during periods of hostilities or occupation, whether artistic, archival, or otherwise. The United States had sought clarification, but few States were willing to take a public position on the matter.

At this stage, most U.S. commentators have stated that unless a sufficient number of market States—other than those already a party to the 1970 UNESCO Convention (i.e., other than Canada or Australia)—ratify the UNIDROIT Convention, it is premature to consider in detail the possible benefits or drawbacks of the Convention for the United States. At such time as there may be interest in exploring possible U.S. ratification, draft federal implementing legislation would be necessary. As was the case with the UNESCO Convention, it is assumed that such legislation would further refine recovery rights and procedures in the United States, including possible additional conditions for enforcement.

D. EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE

The Fulbright Program, sponsored by the U.S. Information Agency ("USIA"), now the Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs of the U.S. State Department, provides for international educational exchanges "to enable the government of the United States to increase mutual understanding between the people of the United States and the people of other countries . . . and thus to assist in the development of friendly, sympathetic, and peaceful relations, between the United States and other countries of the world." The program was first established by legislation in 1946 and operates currently under the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961, Pub. L. No. 87–256, 22 U.S.C. § 2451.

Events of the 1990s led to executive agreements between the United States and foreign countries to establish new or expanded programs in a number of countries. In the 1991–1999 period, these included: South Africa (Feburary 17, 1997), Bulgaria (September 1992), Romania (July 30, 1992), and Czechoslovakia (January 14, 1991) (Following the creation of the separate Czech and Slovak Republics on January 1, 1993, that agreement continued to apply to the Czech Republic and a separate agreement was signed with the Slovak Republic on September 22, 1994.)

A news release issued at the time the United States and South Africa signed their agreement establishing the binational J. William Fulbright Commission for Education Exchange between the Republic of South Africa and the United States of America is excerpted below. The full text is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Vice President Al Gore and South African Deputy President Thabo Mbeki signed an agreement in Capetown, South Africa, Feb. 17, establishing a binational Fulbright Commission to expand academic and professional exchanges between their two countries. The Commission will be governed by a Board consisting of an equal number of citizens of the United States and citizens of South Africa. The Commission office will be in South Africa.

The agreement aims to continue the large number and variety of educational and professional exchanges already carried on between the countries and to develop a specific program with the principal objective to encourage greater mutual understanding between the peoples of the Republic of South Africa and of the United States. The agreement calls for financial contributions to the program from both governments and for the new Commission to engage in private sector fund raising.

The Fulbright Program . . . functioned on a limited scale between the two countries from 1952 to 1994. Administered by USIA staff in the U.S. embassy in Pretoria, the Fulbright Program primarily has involved South Africans coming to the United States to study and engage in research. Since South Africa's historic 1994 elections, academic exchanges among Americans and South Africans have increased greatly.

Private International Law

A. COMMERCIAL LAW

1. United Nations Commission on International Trade Law ("UNCITRAL")

a. Electronic commerce

On December 16, 1996, the UN General Assembly approved the UNCITRAL-prepared Model Law on Electronic Commerce. UN General Assembly Resolution 51/162, U.N. Doc. A/RES/51/162. An additional article 5 bis was adopted in 1998. U.N. Doc. A/CN.9/450 (1998). The full text of the model law, with Guide to Enactment, is available at www.uncitral.org/en-index.htm.

The UNCITRAL Working Group on Electronic Commerce, at its thirty-fourth session, Vienna, February 8–19, 1999, issued a note by the Secretariat on uniform rules for electronic signatures. See A/CN.9/WG/IV/WP.80, dated December 15, 1998. This product grew out of the UNCITRAL thirtieth session in May 1997, when the working group was asked to prepare uniform rules on the legal issues of digital signatures and certification authorities. A Report on Private International Law Activities prepared by Harold S. Burman and Peter H. Pfund for the 92nd Annual Meeting of the American Society of International Law, April 2, 1998, noted that > computer-based commercial activities with older paper world standards, adds computer era special requirements, such as attribution, allocation of risk, and default rules on when and where contractual events may be deemed to have taken place. The model law was increasingly used as a source for new law proposals both within states of the US and foreign countries, and now appear in a number of provisions in [National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws'] NCCUSL's fast moving efforts toward developing new computer law, both in the draft UCC Article 2B and the new draft Uniform Electronic Transactions Act.

The full text of the report is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

A memorandum prepared by Mr. Burman dated April 30, 1999, commented further on implications of legal developments in electronic commerce. The memorandum, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. See also Digest 2001 at 784–85, 791 concerning negotiation of a model law adopted by UNCITRAL on July 5, 2001.

International developments on the electronic commerce (Ecom) front are at a crossroads, and raise problems which may blur the line between public and private law. The economics of and globalization of commerce and telecommunications, and the opening up of ECom trade and services between countries and distant parties previously limited in their ability to engage in direct commerce, are pushing the need for new legal standards and new concepts of jurisdiction. The concept of physical "territory" as the basis either for regulation or application of law is itself proving to be difficult to apply in some cases. Existing "direct effects" theories for extraterritorial application of national laws may also no longer work.

In recent years, public law initiatives in this field have rested on expansion of trade, including liberalization of trade in services; deregulation of telecommunications; U.S. proposed restraints on taxation of cross-border internet commerce, as well as avoidance of over-regulation, to allow market forces to determine future commercial and technological patterns; and benign acceptance up to this point of cross-border company operations, such as credit card systems, without agreement as to underlying territorial legal differences. Gaps, at least for now, have however grown between the EU and the US, on the intersection of electronic commerce and data rights, consumer protection, security standards, message authentication, cryptology export, and national security and law enforcement. These gaps are generating standoff s in international bodies such as the OECD, making consensus on common standards difficult. In turn, if these gaps remain, substantial progress on Ecom at organizations such as the WTO and UNCITRAL may prove difficult.

Multilateral negotiations on private law unification, for example, produced significant progress at UNCITRAL on international electronic funds transfers in 1992 and the now widely used UN Model Law on Electronic Commerce in 1996. As the unresolved problems in the public law arena however now begin to merge with private law issues, progress on the private law front has bogged down, as has been seen at the OECD and UNCITRAL with regard to work on electronic and digital signature systems.

As with the OECD, the biggest divide at UNCITRAL is between the "free market" states, including the U.S., who seek laws that leave wide room for market forces to drive commerce in a computer age, versus some EU, Asian and other states, who seek to substantially regulate this new commercial arena. Efforts to promote regulation in turn are often premised on acceptance of a particular technology, a development that the U.S. also opposes.

All of the above test the limits of private law unification in newly developing electronic practices. Older paradigms, such as sales of goods involved in the 1980 UN "Vienna" Convention (CISG), the negotiation of the 1995 UN Convention on independent guarantees and standby letters of credit, and others sought to harmonize existing legal standards and established commercial practices. To facilitate the coming age of computer commerce, new standards and new default principals [sic] of commercial law may at times be needed many years—maybe decades—before the older paradigm could produce them.

At the same time, the effort to anticipate the market and its legal needs has its own hazards, such as that experienced in efforts to find consensus on electronic signature and message authentication systems. Given the laws of unintended consequences, untimely development of rules can restrict market development and work against new technological applications. It also appears unlikely for most areas of Ecom that there will be the alternative of "instant customary law", in which new technology applications have produced consensus around standards without delay, such as has occurred for some aspects of international space law. The path forward therefore may require a new vision.

b. UN Convention on Direct Guarantees and Standby Letters of Credit

The 1995 UNCITRAL-prepared UN Convention on Direct Guarantees and Standby Letters of Credit was adopted by the UN General Assembly in Resolution 50/48, December 11, 1995, U.N. Doc. A/RES/50/48 (1996). The Secretariat's Explanatory Note is available in U.N. Doc. A/CN.9/431 (1996). The United States signed the convention on December 11, 1997. A summary of the convention's provisions prepared by Harold Burman, is set forth below. A more extensive commentary, prepared by Mr. Burman and another member of the negotiating team, James E. Byrne, Professor, George Mason University School of Law and Director, Institute of International Banking Law and Practice, Inc., is available at 35 I.L.M. 735 (1996); the text of the convention is reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 740.

The Convention provides uniform rules for bank guarantees and standby letters of credit that are used today in a large portion of international trade, investment and financial undertakings. By bridging differences between American letter of credit practice and European-based guarantee practice, the Convention would streamline the use of these financial undertakings and lower the cost of international transactions.

The Convention, importantly, also adopts the U.S.-led effort to gain international agreement on rules which favor financial instruments with a high assurance of payment, by limiting grounds on which either parties, banks or courts may dishonor them. This in turn allows the use of such instruments as collateral, which significantly enhances commercial transactions and trade.

Of equal importance, the Convention's provisions promote sound international banking practices. The negotiation of the Convention was fully coordinated with concurrent revisions to the private sector rules followed by banks in 140 countries in processing letters of credit, published by the International Chamber of Commerce. In addition, the U.S. positions were also coordinated with 1995 revisions to thte Uniform Commercial Code.

* * * *

. . . [The Convention's] most significant provisions are as follows:

Chapters I and II define the financial instruments to be covered by the Convention, and set out standards to determine internationality and other criteria, and provide rules of interpretation. The convention's standards provide a bridge between American letter of credit law and European-based bank guarantee law.

Chapters III and IV set out the rights, obligations and defenses of the three key parties to such transactions, applicants, issuers and beneficiaries, provide standards by which payment obligations are to be met and set out the closely related standards under which courts of contracting states can order non-payment of such instruments. The Convention adopts cross-border uniform rules for independent undertakings with regard to their creation and formation (Articles 7 and 8), transfer of a drawing right (Article 9) termination (Articles 11 & 12) and rights and obligations (Articles 13–19) which are compatible with those contained in recent revisions to Uniform commercial Code Article 5, the governing uniform law among the states of the United States.

Articles 19 (exception to payment obligations) and 20 (provisional court measures) are the key provisions of the Convention. Together with other articles, they provide very narrow grounds on which payment can be dishonored, which in turn allows such instruments to have a wide usage in international commerce as collateral. This approach is also a key feature of U.S. domestic law.

Chapter VI, together with subparagraph 3 of Article 1 provides a uniform international rule on applicable law for instruments covered by the Convention, even where the particular instrument may not otherwise be subject to the remaining rules in a given case. Chapter VII provides typical final provisions on signature, ratification, termination, etc.

c. Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvency

The Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvency was adopted in the 30th session of UNCITRAL, in Vienna, May 12–30, 1997, reprinted in 36 I.L.M. 1386 (1997). Report of the 30th session of UNCITRAL, ANNEX I (U.N. Doc. A/52/17). See also "Guide to Enactment of the UNCITRAL Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvency," U.N. Doc. A/CN.9/442 (1997).

On December 4, 1997, Harold S. Burman testified before the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts, Senate Committee on the Judiciary. His testimony, urging statutory implementation of the model law, is excerpted below. Legislation has been introduced but not yet enacted.

The [National Bankruptcy Revision] Commission ["NBRC"], which was established by Congress to provide recommendations for revisions to the United States Bankruptcy Code, reviewed the recently completed United Nations Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvency and unanimously recommended that its provisions be incorporated as amendments to the United States Code. . . .

We are pleased to support the NBRC recommendation, and believe that its adoption will further the interests of fair treatment for investors, lenders and commercial borrowers across all borders, and will thus facilitate investment and trade. The direction taken by this Model Law is fully consistent with the needs of a globalized economy as well as business and corporate interests that now link many countries together. The provisions of the Model Law were adopted in a process that itself illustrates a new path for co-operation between the private sector, public authorities and international organizations. The process was begun several years ago by two years of meetings organized by private sector associations which involved judges, the private bar, government officials, commercial finance interests and others from over 30 countries. Those meetings developed a working consensus on achievable and practical goals that would facilitate cross-border cooperation and commerce by modernizing national insolvency law regimes.

That consensus was brought before UNCITRAL, a UN General Assembly body in whose work the United States has actively participated since its establishment in 1966. The Commission began work and in a record two year period completed the Model Law with the support of over 50 countries. The General Assembly endorsed the Model Law last month in New York, and recommended that states review their legislative regimes and incorporate these provisions as necessary, which can establish a global receptivity to cross-border commerce.

The United Nations Model Law in many respects parallels the openness to fair treatment for foreign and domestic interests alike adopted in the 1978 amendments to the U.S. Bankruptcy Code. If the United States takes the step now to incorporate these provisions, to the extent not already reflected in our Code, it will be a strong signal to other countries to actively consider taking the same step. Conversely, if we fail to do so it will send an equally negative signal, which is not in the U.S. interest.

Our support emphasizes four overall factors. First, wide adoption of the Model Law is good economics in an era of global business relationships. Business concerns increasingly develop close linkage with a variety of production, labor, distribution, financing and market access entities across many borders. That has facilitated trade to the benefit of many countries. At the same time, it has given rise to an increasing vulnerability, where any one or more of these linked business entities comes under severe financial pressure. Left to existing national legal systems, this can now more often lead to collapse, loss of jobs, and loss of value in many of the related business entities. This occurs because under many existing legal systems, without waiting for cooperative efforts spanning the several countries involved, local assets are distributed preferentially to local creditors and the economic value, and jobs, of the enterprise are quickly dissipated. The Model Law's provisions would provide a platform on which to avoid those consequences.

Secondly, the type of insolvency law regime of a country seeking commercial finance for its various enterprises has become a "front-line" factor in risk assessment, and therefore the cost of credit that could be extended to that country. This is not only because of the need to calculate the extent of risk, but also now as a gauge of how much a country in fact has sought to align its local system with the needs of global economic relationships. Adoption of the Model Law's provisions would signal such an intent.

Thirdly, the Model Law regime hinges on active cooperation between the courts and administrators of each country involved. While American Courts have become increasingly open to such cooperation, legislative authority is necessary for that to happen in many countries. Encouraging cross-border cooperation between judicial and other authorities should have beneficial spin-off effects in other areas of mutual interest as well.

The fourth and last factor is our view that the United States should support this type of process in which private sector-led economic objectives, and private sector associations both played a large part in the international process. We believe there is a developing role for such market-based projects, especially in the area of commercial and trade law development, while under the umbrella of an international organization.

The Department has consulted throughout this process with major associations and the judiciary in the United States involved in this area of law and practice, to ensure that both private sector and state concerns are addressed. . . .

d. Convention on the Limitation Period in the International Sale of Goods, With Protocol

On August 6, 1993, President William J. Clinton transmitted the United Nations Convention on the Limitation Period in the International Sale of Goods and 1980 protocol amending that convention, to the Senate for advice and consent to accession. See Department of State Public Notice 2133, "Entry into Force for the United States of the Convention on the Limitation Period in the International Sale of Goods, With Protocol," 60 Fed. Reg. 3484 (Jan. 17, 1995), which reproduced the consolidated text of the 1974 convention, as modified by the 1980 protocol. The convention entered into force for the United States on December 1, 1994. Excerpted below is the June 17, 1993, report of the Department of State to the President describing the terms and function of the treaty, which was included with the letter of transmittal. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–10 (Aug. 6, 1993); the convention text is reprinted in 13 I.L.M. 949 (1974) and the protocol in 19 I.L.M. 698 (1980).

* * * *

THE PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit to you, with the recommendation that they be transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to accession, the multilateral United Nations Convention on the Limitation Period in the International Sale of Goods, done at New York on June 14, 1974, together with the 1980 Protocol amending that Convention, done at Vienna on April 11, 1980.

Both the 1974 Convention and its amending Protocol were prepared by the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL), in whose work the United States actively participates. The 1974 Convention, as amended by the 1980 Protocol, (together referred to as "the Convention"), provides an international statute of limitations for disputes concerning international sales of goods transactions covered by the Convention. The Convention would reduce the present uncertainty as to finality in international sales that arises because of differing national legal rules, and thereby reduce impediments to international trade. The Convention preserves the right of parties to a transaction not to be bound by the Convention's provisions.

This Convention is intended to be implemented together with the 1980 United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (UN Sales Convention), which entered into force for the United States on January 1, 1988. The UN Sales Convention has over 30 states parties.

To obtain conformity between the two conventions, the 1980 Protocol amending the 1974 Limitation Convention was negotiated at the same Diplomatic Conference at which the UN Sales Convention was adopted.

Commerce generally, and international commerce especially, depends on reasonable certainty of commercial practice and finality of transactions. The latter is achieved partly through statutes of limitation on disputes which unsettle past transactions. This has been accomplished to a considerable extent between the states of the United States by widespread adoption of the Uniform Commercial Code. On the international level, it is hoped that greater certainty can also be achieved through countries becoming party to the Convention.

In the absence of the Convention's uniform rules, sellers and buyers in international transactions face an array of limitation periods and related rules. Limitation periods range from 6 months in some countries for certain transactions to 30 years in others. As with domestic statutes of limitations, the Convention balances the need to permit claims to be heard with the need to protect commerce by providing a point of finality to transactions.

Both the 1974 Convention and the 1980 amending Protocol came in force on August 1, 1988. More states are expected to become party to the Convention following the success of the UN Sales Convention. Accession by the United States to the Convention should accelerate this process and contribute to greater harmonization of trade laws.

The House of Delegates of the American Bar Association adopted a resolution in August 1989 endorsing accession by the United States to the Limitations Convention. In May 1989, the Secretary of State's Advisory Committee on Private International Law, on which 11 major national legal organizations are represented, also endorsed U.S. accession to the Convention.

Both the American Bar Association and the Advisory Committee recommended, and I agree, that the United States upon accession should make a declaration, as provided for in Article XII of the 1980 Protocol, excluding a provision that draws upon national rules on conflicts of laws to determine the Convention's applicability in certain cases. By making the applicability of the Convention depend on the non-uniform laws of various countries, this provision of the amended Convention would partially defeat the uniformity which we seek to achieve.

I recommend therefore that the U.S. accession be subject to the following declaration: Pursuant to Article XII, the United States will not be bound by Article I of the Protocol.

In accordance with the 1980 Protocol, the United Nations Secretary-General has prepared a consolidated text of the 1974 Limitation Convention as amended by the 1980 Protocol. A copy of that consolidated text is enclosed for the information of the Senate.

The Convention will be self-executing and thus requires no federal implementing legislation. The Convention has no budgetary implications and does not require administrative support. The Convention's effect is limited to foreign commerce of the United States.

* * * *

In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, October 26, 1993, Harold S. Burman observed:

> One feature that we think should be noted is that the Convention preserves freedom of choice for individual parties to a contract, both in their ability to vary most provisions of the Convention by agreement, and in their ability to exclude the Convention altogether from applying to their sales transactions. At the same time, the Convention creates a base line on the law on limitations for international transactions that is generally consistent with modern commercial law—which is a forward step and one fully supportive of our commercial and trade interests.

e. Procurement of Goods, Construction, and Services

The United States participated in the negotiation of the UNCITRAL Model Law on Procurement of Goods and Construction adopted by UNCITRAL in 1993 ("1993 model law"). U.N. Doc. A/Res/49/54 (1995). The following year, the UNCITRAL Model Law on Procurement of Goods, Construction and Services, with Guide to Enactment ("1994 model law") added provisions covering international procurement of services. Texts of the two model laws are available at www.uncitral.org/english/texts/procurem/procurementindex.htm.

Excerpts below from commentary prepared by Don Wallace, Jr., chief U.S. delegate to the Working Group on Insolvency Law (formerly the Working Group on the New International Economic Order ("NIEO")), in 1992, describe key issues in the 1993 model law. 1 Public Procurement Law Review 406 (1992); see also 3 Public Procurement Law Review CS2 (1994).

The NIEO Working Group of UNCITRAL . . . began work on a draft model law on public procurement in 1988 and finished its work on July 2, 1992. The draft law along with a commentary (or guide to legislators) will be submitted to the full Commission for its approval at its plenary session in Vienna in May 1993. It is hoped that the draft will serve as a model for those governments wishing to adopt or modernize their public procurement law.

The model law deals with public procurement of goods and civil works (consultant services are not currently included but may be added [see 1994 model law]) and is so drafted that it may be adapted to any sector of the economy including military procurement. The law addresses procurement by any government agency and may apply to local governments and parastatals. It applies to both domestic and international procurement. It specifies six methods of procurement, and makes provision for bid protests (called the "right to review").

It is appropriate first to say a word or two about some of the more distinctive features of the model law. Article 8 ter of the draft provides that "suppliers and contractors" (defined to include potential suppliers and contractors) are eligible to bid or otherwise participate in all methods of procurement "without regard to nationality" unless the procuring entity decides otherwise. I believe this is a considerable innovation for a model national law. Thus, the law has no definition of a "foreign" individual or entity; rather the procuring entity will have to define, for example, "domestic" bidders if it wishes to limit bids to them. A procuring entity may be bound to limit procurement to a certain group of nations, for example under a regional treaty, and it is, of course, allowed to do so by the model law. It may be noted that this "international" preference applies to all methods, even to single-source procurement.

In some ways, the most difficult article for the working group has been Article 7 and its new companion Article 7 bis. These articles specify the six methods of procurement covered by the law: tendering proceedings (formal competitive bidding), two-stage tendering, requests for proposals, competitive negotiation, request for quotations ("shopping") and single-source procurement. Tendering proceedings are the preferred method, and a record must be made by a procuring entity before any other method may be used. (The decision to do so may also be subject to approval by a higher level of government authority). Article 7 bis specifies the conditions under which each of the remaining methods may be used. In the case of two-stage tendering, requests for proposals, and competitive negotiation (and it may be that not all governments will adopt all three methods in their law), the conditions are identical, the principal one being inability to "formulate detailed specifications." The "urgent need" and "catastrophic event" (one thinks of Hurricane Andrew) are shared with the three methods just noted. Significant again is the requirement in Article 7(5) calling for a record "of the grounds and circumstances on which [the procuring entity] relied to justify the use of [a] . . . particular method of procurement."

With respect to competitive bids, it may be of interest that the working group dropped any provision for alternate bids. Article 12 makes clear that bidding should be open to all, and only in special circumstances may bids be sought from restricted lists, referred to as "particular suppliers or contractors selected" by the procuring entity. In the latter case the number selected must be sufficient to ensure "effective competition."

The final chapter of the law deals succinctly and cleanly with "right to review," available with respect to any "breach of a duty" imposed by the law. Excluded from the scope of review are certain discretionary decisions, such as the selection of the method of procurement, a decision to reject all tenders and some others. Administrative review is spelled out in some detail and provision is made in Article 41 for "suspension of procurement proceedings" for seven calendar days, although the suspension may in turn be waived in the case of "urgent public interest." Article 40 provides for judicial review in all cases where a country's law calls for it, and suggests that it be provided in those countries where it is not.

f. Receivables financing

On March 3, 1995, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws ("NCCUSL") wrote to the Department of State "recommend[ing] that UNCITRAL proceed with a project to draft a model receivables financing law for adoption by nations." This unanimous request from NCCUSL was a primary factor in U.S. support for the UNCITRAL Convention on the Assignment of Receivables in International Trade (see Digest 2003 at 854–55) and the UNIDROIT Convention on International Interest in Mobile Equipment (Id. at 848–54).

The letter, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The situation regarding receivables financing that was faced some forty years ago at the interstate level is similar to the situation regarding receivables financing arising now at the international level. The solution proposed by the Conference in cooperation with the American Law Institute for this country was to prepare a body of law that could be enacted, and that was enacted, by each of the states. It was unnecessary to prepare or propose any overarching federal legislation. In the international setting regarding receivables financing, we recommend a similar approach.

UNCITRAL's primary objective should be the preparation of a model law for enactment by nations as part of their corpus of law. It is in their interest to have a body of law that provides a sound basis for receivables financing. To the extent that any nation has such a body of law, suppliers of goods or services on unsecured credit will have access to a secondary credit market in which they may obtain funds by offering pools of receivables as collateral to secure loans. This form of receivables financing stimulates economic activity by facilitating the primary sale of goods and services.

UNCITRAL could provide a distinct and valuable service to the international community by formulating and promulgating a sound model receivables financing law for national adoption, so that the economic value of receivables financing can be realized even in credit markets within a nation. With that legal base, international credit markets will also be well served through increased primary sales and secondary level secured credit. Conversely, the absence of a sound legal base in the laws of the several nations will hinder the development of a satisfactory body of international economic law.

Three fundamental legal risks threaten the integrity of receivables financing, whether within a nation or internationally: (1) the risk that assignments will not be deemed valid and binding on debtors, (2) the risk of bankruptcy or insolvency of the assignor and the ensuing claim that the receivables are property of the bankrupt's estate to be distributed to general creditors of the bankruptcy, and (3) the risk of conflicting claims to the same pool of receivables. The most important of these risks is the bankruptcy risk, but comprehensive solution to the bankruptcy risk is likely to include substantial resolution of the validity and priority risks as well.

If an assignor becomes bankrupt, the nation in which the assignor is located will probably prescribe the law governing the marketing and distribution of the assets of the assignor's estate. In cases in which the receivables have been absolutely assigned, it is vitally important that the assigned receivables not be captured for the benefit of unsecured creditors in the administration of the assignor's estate. As you may know, that issue arose in the United States recently, even after all these years, and to date has not been fully resolved. To achieve the desired result, the bankruptcy law governing the assignor's estate and the law governing receivables must recognize that absolute assignments are valid and the assignments divest the assignor of ownership of the receivables. In the event that more than one nation asserts bankruptcy power, rules of private international law will determine which nation has that jurisdiction.

The bankruptcy risk and risk of competing claims to receivables raise essentially "property"-type legal issues . . . International commercial law has wisely tended to address "contract"-type issues while avoiding a "property"-type analysis.

This is reflected clearly in the Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods. Article 4(b) declares explicitly that the Convention is not concerned with the effect that a contract of sale may have on the property in the goods sold. The Factoring Convention stopped short of addressing property.

The 20 January 1995 draft refers to the Sales Convention and to the Factoring Convention, which were framed by a "contract"-type analysis. However, any law establishing a minimally satisfactory framework for receivables financing cannot be viewed in such a narrow context. Fundamental rules of property must be prescribed. Experience teaches that in that context, a model law for domestic enactment is preferable to an international convention.

2. International Institute for the Unification of Private Law ("UNIDROIT")

a. Principles of International Commercial Contracts

The United States participated in the working group charged with developing the Principles of International Commercial Contracts approved by the UNIDROIT Governing Council in 1994. In 1997 the United States became a member in the working group to consider an enlarged second edition. A Report on Private International Law Activities prepared by Harold S. Burman and Peter H. Pfund for the 92nd Annual Meeting of the American Society of International Law, April 2, 1998, noted that, as part of the UNIDROIT work program for 1999–2001, "[t]he now widely used 1994 UNIDROIT 'Principles of International Commercial Contracts,' which merge common law and civil law contract law principles, will be updated in a four-five year process by considering new provisions in the following areas: agency law, assignments, third party rights, limitation periods, and possibly electronic contracting." The second edition was approved by the Governing Council in April 2004. Both the 1994 and a 2004 edition are available at www.unidroit.org/english/principles/contracts/main.htm.

The full text of the report is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

b. Franchising

In 1998 the Governing Council of UNIDROIT authorized publication of its Guide to International Master Franchise Arrangements. The Guide was the first publication of its kind issued by UNIDROIT. As stated in the introduction, the Guide "confirms the intention of the organization to expand its activities to cover also alternative approaches to the unification of law in addition to the more traditional approach of preparing and adopting prescriptive legal norms in the form of international conventions." See Guide at xxx. The Governing Council had established in 1993 a Study Group on Franchising, of which the United States was a member, to examine different aspects of franchising and indicate to the Institute what further actions would be suitable. The Study Group concluded that this subject did not lend itself to an international convention or uniform law, because such an approach would lack flexibility and might hamper the development of the franchising industry. The Study Group consequently recommended to the Council that work on a guide be undertaken, and the Council endorsed this recommendation. The Guide offers a comprehensive examination of the whole life of a master franchise arrangement, from negotiation and drafting to the end of the relationship and its effects. It deals with the relations between and among the franchisor, sub-franchisor and franchisee. A description of the Guide, including the table of contents, and information on ordering copies, are available at www.unidroit.org.

3. Jurisdiction and Judgments

a. Negotiation of Hague Conference on Private International law convention

In May 1992 the United States proposed that the Hague Conference place on its agenda consideration of a convention on jurisdiction and the recognition/enforcement of foreign judgments in civil and commercial matters in a letter from Edwin Williamson, Legal Adviser of the U.S. Department of State, to Georges Droz, Secretary General of The Hague Conference on Private International Law, May 5, 1992.

The full text of Mr. Williamson's letter, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

For some time the Department of State has been concerned by the anomaly resulting from the large number of countries party, as is the United States, to the 1958 U.N. Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards ("New York Convention") and the few successful conventions dealing with the recognition and enforcement of judgments. The United States is a party to no convention or treaty dealing with the recognition and enforcement of judgments.

. . . The United States would like to propose that The Hague Conference resume work in the field of recognition and enforcement of judgments with a view to preparing a single convention to which Hague Conference Member States and other countries might become parties and that would enter into force only between ratifying or acceding States that agree that it should enter into force as between them.

* * * *

. . . As the Hague Conference includes among its Member States the Member States of the European Community and those of the European Free Trade Area, the organization seems especially suited to be the forum for the preparation and negotiation of a convention that would involve the participation of these States and the organization's other Member States—from many regions of the world including Eastern Europe, North America, Central and South America and the Far East. Much of the research and cooperation that went into preparation and negotiation of the 1971 Hague Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters and its Supplementary Protocol will be generally useful in further work by the Hague Conference in this field. That Hague Convention was in effect superseded by subsequent events—the Brussels Convention that is obligatory among Member States of the European Community and more recently the Lugano Convention between Member States of the European Community and the European Free Trade Area. While taking account of the 1971 Hague Convention, we would propose that The Hague Conference build on the Brussels and Lugano conventions in seeking to achieve a convention that is capable of meeting the needs of and being broadly accepted by the larger community represented by the Member states of The Hague Conference. For example, it appears that it might be possible to accept certain of the bases of jurisdiction and bases for recognition and enforcement of judgments set out in the Brussels and Lugano Conventions and thereby make provision for a generally accepted system for use in Europe and beyond. However, other aspects of these Conventions may not be so broadly acceptable and would need change to accommodate the needs and preferences of countries from other regions of the world than Western Europe. It seems to us that we need not necessarily choose between a traité simple, dealing essentially only with those judgments that are entitled to recognition and enforcement in party States, and a traité double also dealing with permissible bases of jurisdiction for litigation involving persons or entities habitually resident in party States. We believe that there should be consideration of the possibility for party States to utilize jurisdictional bases for litigation that are not designated as permissible or exorbitant by the convention. So long as such jurisdictional bases are not excluded as exorbitant, judgments based on them would not be entitled to recognition and enforcement under the convention, but party States would remain free to recognise and enforce them under their general law.

* * * *

The first session of a Hague Conference special commission on this topic took place in June 1997. The second negotiating session ended March 18, 1998. On that date, David R. Andrews, Legal Adviser of the U.S. Department of State, addressed the current state of negotiations in remarks to the Joint Conference of the London Court of International Arbitration and the American Arbitration Association, in Miami, Florida.

The full text of Mr. Andrews' remarks, excerpted below, is available in the LCIA International Arbitration Newsletter, August 1998. See also Jeffrey D. Kovar, "A Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Foreign Civil Judgments?" International Law News, Summer 1999, at 14.

* * * *

With the continuing expansion of international trade and commerce, and the phenomenal growth in international telecommunications, we are riding the crest of a social and economic revolution as profound as the industrial revolution of the 19th Century. Our domestic economies are rapidly evolving into global economies.

* * * *

With this growth in international commerce and human contacts inevitably comes a growth in civil disputes, but the world's means of dispute resolution are not evolving at the pace of international trade law and institutions or the Internet. While arbitration has proved very effective at resolving an increasing number of international commercial disputes, it is not appropriate for all legal disputes or for all parties. If we are to avoid limiting or distorting the globalization of the economy, we must make sure that the world's judicial systems cooperate in providing remedies to international businesses.

European Common Market countries recognized very early how essential an integrated system for the recognition and enforcement of judgments was to their economic integration. They made accession to the Brussels Convention a requirement for entry into the EC and later the EU. Today European businesses enjoy the security of knowing that a judgment rendered by a court in one country of the European Union will be enforced with minimal procedural requirements in the courts of the 15 other EU states and the remaining EFTA states.

For reasons related to the federalist structure of the United States, the United States Supreme Court has also recognized the importance of enforcing foreign judgments in the 1895 case of Hilton v. Guyot [159 U.S. 113 (1895)]. In Hilton, the Supreme Court found that foreign judgments are entitled to recognition and enforcement in the courts of the United States on the basis of the principle of comity, provided they meet general requirements of due process.

Unfortunately, piecemeal solutions are not effective on a global basis, and raise their own inequities. The Brussels Convention, for example, generally only addresses jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments between EU domiciliaries, but it also discriminates against persons and companies not domiciled in the EU.

* * * *

As for U.S. practice, although U.S. courts provide a hospitable forum for foreign judgment holders—at least those from countries with well-established and independent judicial systems that assure basic due process—there is little reciprocity in other countries for persons holding a valid judgment from a U.S. court. In fact, the courts of many countries cannot enforce the judgments of a foreign court unless there is a treaty obligation to do so. And, as I said earlier, the United States is not a party to any such treaties.

The lack of reciprocity and perception of unfairness cannot continue indefinitely. . . .

* * * *

The legal and policy issues confronting the negotiation of a global judgments convention are daunting. As a threshold matter, the Hague Conference member states have decided to attempt to prepare a convention that will address not only the recognition and enforcement of judgments, but will also set out required and prohibited grounds of jurisdiction over foreign defendants.

Clearly, a convention that simply set up rules for recognizing and enforcing judgments would most closely parallel the existing U.S. system of comity. (In the language of the negotiations, such a convention would be called a "simple" or a "single" convention.) However, we and other countries will seek to exclude grounds of jurisdiction that appear unreasonable, and forms and measures of damage viewed as excessive or otherwise unacceptable will be examined.

An international judgments convention that addressed only the recognition and enforcement of judgments, without addressing jurisdiction, would be perceived as opening the door to unfairness. While the New York Convention is not so limited, agreements to arbitrate represent the choice of both parties. Because the jurisdiction of national courts depends upon the choice of the plaintiff and local law, a convention simply providing for the recognition and enforcement of all foreign judgments can afford only limited protection to defendants.

* * * *

The Brussels Convention creates a very rigid framework of required grounds of jurisdiction, and effectively prohibits courts from assuming jurisdiction against EU domiciliaries that are not among the required grounds. (It is called a "double" convention.)

The Brussels Convention has a list of required grounds of jurisdiction that is both broad and narrow. In certain applications it would violate constitutional due process limitations in the United States that protect the defendant (for example, the Brussels Convention permits jurisdiction over a tortfeasor in whatever country the effect of the tort is felt). The Convention also omits (and therefore prohibits) jurisdictional grounds that are well known in this country (for example, "doing business" jurisdiction).

It is natural for European countries to prefer their approach, which works well for them. However, it would not be reasonable to expect that such a system could be applied on a world-wide basis. While the approach may work within the confines of the EU—where countries are increasingly integrating and share an historic legal culture—a global agreement must be able to take into account the significant differences in the legal systems that exist outside the EU.

* * * *

It is no secret that U.S. "long-arm" and "tag" jurisdiction are not favored abroad. Nor do foreign governments appreciate our courts' awards for punitive and treble damages. It may even prove difficult to obtain acceptance of the common law principle of judicial restraint known as forum non conveniens by civil code countries unfamiliar with this type of judicial discretion.

* * * *

So, how can we structure a successful convention?

One proposal is to take the approach of the Brussels Convention, and negotiate a convention with an exhaustive list of required grounds of jurisdiction, all other grounds of jurisdiction being prohibited. This does not appear realistic to us. The Brussels Convention was originally operative only among civil law countries with quite similar civil codes. This would not be the case for a global convention.

In our view, a more workable alternative would be for the convention to present a list of required and a list of prohibited grounds of jurisdiction, that do not purport to be exhaustive. The convention would therefore permit, but not benefit, any grounds of jurisdiction not listed. (Such a convention is currently referred to as a "mixed" convention.) U.S. courts would have to hear cases against persons and entities domiciled in a party state based on the required grounds, and judgments from U.S. courts based on the required grounds would be enforceable in other states party as a matter of treaty obligation. U.S. courts would refuse to hear cases invoking jurisdiction based on prohibited grounds of jurisdiction.

Litigation based on grounds of jurisdiction not listed in a mixed convention would not be barred, but recognition and enforcement under the convention would not be possible. Recognition and enforcement would only be available under the general law and comity of the requested country.

Whether or not the Hague convention will be a double or mixed convention has not yet been decided. We hope to see consensus on a mixed convention by the end of the special commission negotiating session next fall.

There are also questions of fundamental fairness that inevitably arise when considering the recognition of foreign judgments from a widely disparate group of countries. Some effort will have to be made, for example, to ensure that the convention takes into account the diversity of judicial systems represented by the various parties, and provides a mechanism that allows the recognition and enforcement of only those judgments that were the result of fair proceedings. For example, a state or state-owned entity should not be able to enforce a judgment against a debtor where the legal proceeding was subject to undue influence by the state.

In the United States, we will also have to grapple with constitutional due process requirements, as well as federalism concerns. Because due process limitations cannot be overcome by treaty or statute, they will constrain our negotiating latitude.

None of these difficult considerations should deter us from pursing the negotiation of a multilateral convention. . . .

b. Enforcement of judgments in U.S. courts

(1) Due process

Two cases in 1999 addressed the requirement in U.S. law that judgments obtained in foreign courts can only be enforced in the United States if the judgment was obtained consistent with due process of law.

In Bank Melli Iran v. Pahlavi, 58 F.3d 1406 (9th Cir. 1999), the court of appeals affirmed a lower court decision that judgments obtained by Bank Melli Iran and Bank Mellat ("the Bank") against Shams Pahlavi, the sister of the former Shah of Iran, in the tribunals of Iran could not be enforced. The court agreed that Pahlavi could not have obtained due process of law in the courts of Iran and rejected arguments of the Bank that provisions of the Algiers Accords exempted claims related to the Shah's assets from the requirement for due process in U.S. Courts. Footnotes have been omitted from the excerpts that follow.

Pahlavi's major bulwark against the Banks' attack is her assertion that the judgments cannot be enforced because she could not have had due process in Iran during the period that those judgments were obtained against her. That simple but crucial fact, she says, precludes enforcement of the Banks' judgments on any theory. We agree with her premise, and, on the record of this case, we agree with the district court's conclusion as well.

It has long been the law of the United States that a foreign judgment cannot be enforced if it was obtained in a manner that did not accord with the basics of due process. See Hilton, 159 U.S. at 205–06, 16 S. Ct. at 159. As the Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States succinctly puts it: "A court in the United States may not recognize a judgment of a court of a foreign state if: (a) the judgment was rendered under a judicial system that does not provide impartial tribunals or procedures compatible with due process of law. . . ." § 482(1)(a) (1987).

We are aware of no deviation from that principle. In fact, as we have already shown, it was expressly incorporated into the Foreign Money-Judgments Act. Cal. Civ. Proc. Code § 1713.4. . . . It can hardly be gainsaid that enforcement will not be permitted under California law if due process was lacking when the foreign judgment was obtained. Faced with that ineluctable proposition, the Banks argue that the Algerian Accords have somehow elided the due process requirement from the law of the United States as far as Pahlavi is concerned. With that we cannot agree.

The Algerian Accords do provide that Iran can bring actions to recover any of its assets from the family of the former Shah. See Declaration of the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic, Point IV, para. 12, reprinted in Dep't St. Bull., Jan. 19, 1981, at 3 ("General Declaration"). They also provide that in litigation against the Shah's family "the claims of Iran should not be considered legally barred either by sovereign immunity principles or by the act of state doctrine and that Iranian decrees and judgments relating to such assets should be enforced by such courts in accordance with United States law." Id. at Par. 14. It is upon this language that the Banks rest their claim that the United States courts cannot consider whether the judgments were obtained in accordance with due process. That is a foundation that crumbles under the weight the Banks seek to place upon it.

It is true that "the clear import of treaty language controls unless 'application of the words of the treaty according to their obvious meaning effects a result inconsistent with the intent or expectations of its signatories.'" Sumitomo Shoji Amer., Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176, 180, 102 S. Ct. 2374, 2377, 72 L. Ed. 2d 765 (1982) (citation omitted). Where the Banks' argument goes awry is in the suggestion that the language in question removes due process considerations from the purview of the United States Courts. In the first place, it is notable that the Accords eliminate certain defenses—sovereign immunity and the act of state doctrine —but otherwise provide that enforcement of judgments shall be "in accordance with United States law." That law, of course, includes the due process requirement which we have already delineated.

Secondly, when Warren Christopher, then the former Deputy Secretary of State and one of the chief architects of the Algerian Accords, addressed the concerned members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives in 1981, he assured them that "Iran's claims to the property of the Shah and his family will have to be adjudicated in U.S. courts in full accordance with due process of law." Iran's Seizure of the United States Embassy: Hearings before the House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 149 (1981). It would be most surprising if what he really meant was that due process would be applicable if the initial action were brought in the courts of the United States, a rather obvious point, but that those same courts would be expected to enforce any judgment obtained in Iran, regardless of due process considerations. Absent strong evidence to the contrary—evidence not present in this record—the only reasonable inference is that the United States intended that enforcement "in accordance with United States law" include the due process requirements that are usually demanded by our courts when they review foreign judgments.

Finally, a construction of the Algerian Accords that permitted the taking of assets from a resident of this country by means of a judgment obtained without due process of law would raise grave questions about the enforceability of that part of the Accords. That question would be lurking in the case were we to accept the position that the Banks argue for. See Boeing Co., 771 F.2d at 1284 (regarding lurking constitutional issues in the Accords); cf. Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654, 688–89, 101 S. Ct. 2972, 2991, 69 L. Ed. 2d 918 (1981) (court upholds Algerian Accords but notes that enforcement may leave residual constitutional issues, at least as against the United States Government.) We see no reason to stretch the language of the Accords and thereby create those questions because we have no reason to think that the Accords were intended to change the law of this country in that backhanded a fashion. Thus, we hold that attempts to enforce judgments under the Algerian Accords are not exempt from due process defenses.

Having so held, we are left with the question of whether the district court properly granted Pahlavi summary judgment on the due process issue. That is, did she show that she could not get due process in Iran? On this record, the answer is yes. . . .

* * * *

The evidence in this case indicated that Pahlavi could not expect fair treatment from the courts of Iran, could not personally appear before those courts, could not obtain proper legal representation in Iran, and could not even obtain local witnesses on her behalf. Those are not mere niceties of American jurisprudence. . . . They are ingredients of basic due process.

* * * *

In S. C. Chimexim S.A. v. Velco Enterprises Ltd, 36 F. Supp. 2d 206 (S.D.N.Y. 1999), Chimexim sought to enforce in the Southern District of New York a judgment rendered in its favor by a tribunal in Bucharest, Romania. Following a description of Romania's government, and a summary of the underlying facts in the case and the proceedings in Romania, the court concluded that "the Romanian judicial system comports with the requirements of due process." The court's analysis is excerpted below (footnotes omitted).

---

* * * *

. . . The seminal case in the area of enforcing foreign judgments, Hilton v. Guyot, explained the doctrine of comity as follows:

> No law has any effect . . . beyond the limits of the sovereignty from which its authority is derived. The extent to which the law of one nation, as put in force within its territory . . . by judicial decree, shall be allowed to operate within the dominion of another nation, depends upon what our greatest jurists have been content to call > the "comity of nations". . . . [Comity] is the recognition which one nation allows within its territory to the . . . judicial acts of another nation, having due regard both to international duty and convenience, and to the rights of its own citizens, or of persons who are under the protection of its laws.

159 U.S. at 163–64. The Supreme Court in Hilton held that if the foreign forum provides a full and fair trial before a court of competent jurisdiction, "under a system of jurisprudence likely to secure an impartial administration of justice . . . and there is nothing to show either prejudice . . . or fraud in procuring the judgment," the judgment should be enforced and not "tried afresh." Id. at 202–03.

* * * *

The materials submitted to the Court as well as the Court's own research demonstrate that the Romanian judicial system comports with the requirements of due process. Velco's sweeping allegation that the Bucharest Judgment is unenforceable because the "Romanian judicial system is incompatible with due process" (Velco Mem. at 10) is rejected, as a matter of law. . . .

The record establishes the following:

First, the Romanian government and its judicial system have undergone extensive reform since the fall of the Communist regime in 1989 and the adoption of the Romanian Constitution in 1991. . . .

Second, the Romanian judicial system now has the earmarks of an independent system that is capable of duly administering justice. There is a Constitution that sets forth certain due process guarantees, including procedural due process. There is a Judiciary Law that establishes the judiciary as an independent branch of government. There is judicial tenure for at least some judges. There are three levels of appellate review, and in the instant case Velco has taken advantage of that right to appellate review.

Third, as expert testimony submitted by Chimexim demonstrates, due process in fact is provided under Romanian law. . . . Velco failed to submit any expert opinion suggesting that Romanian tribunals are not impartial or that Romanian civil courts do not provide litigants with due process.

Finally, the United States entered into a trade relations treaty with Romania in 1992, which provided that:

> nationals and companies of either [the United States or Romania] shall be accorded national treatment with respect to access to all courts and administrative bodies in the territory of the other [country], as plaintiffs, defendants or otherwise. They shall not claim or enjoy immunity from suit or execution of judgment, proceedings for the recognition and enforcement of arbitral awards, or other liability in the territory [of either country] with respect to commercial transactions.

The language of the trade agreement demonstrates that the United States was willing to recognize Romania's judicial system.

On the basis of this record, which includes the unrebutted affidavits of Chimexim's expert witnesses, I can only conclude that Chimexim has met its burden of demonstrating that the Romanian judicial system comports with the requirements of due process.

As noted, the record does demonstrate that the Romanian judicial system is far from perfect. As Velco points out, "corruption remains a concern" in Romania and there "is some evidence that [due process] guarantees are not always accorded." No judicial system operates flawlessly, however, and unfortunately injustices occur from time to time even in our own system. Velco's general (and conclusory) assertions are not sufficient to create a genuine issue of fact that Romania's judicial system as a whole is devoid of impartiality or due process.

* * * *

(2) Public policy

In Southwest Livestock and Trucking Company, Inc. v. Ramon, 169 F.3d 317 (5th Cir. 1999), the court of appeals vacated a district court decision refusing to recognize a judgment obtained in Mexico. Southwest Livestock argued that the Mexican judgment in favor of Ramon, which required it to satisfy its debt and pay interest at 48%, violated Texas usury laws. The federal court noted that in this case it "must apply Texas law regarding the recognition of foreign country money-judgments." Excerpts below from the decision explain the court's conclusion that the judgment should be recognized.

* * * *

Under the Texas Recognition Act, a court must recognize a foreign country judgment assessing money damages unless the judgment debtor establishes one of ten specific grounds for nonrecognition. . . . Southwest Livestock contends that it established a ground for nonrecognition. It notes that the Texas Constitution places a six percent interest rate limit on contracts that do not contain a stated interest rate. . . . It also points to a Texas statute that states that usury is against Texas public policy. . . . Thus, according to Southwest Livestock, the Mexican judgment violates Texas public policy, and the district court properly withheld recognition of the judgment. . . .

* * * *

To decide whether the district court erred in refusing to recognize the Mexican judgment on public policy grounds, we consider the plain language of the Texas Recognition Act. . . . Section 36.005(b)(3) of the Texas Recognition Act permits the district court not to recognize a foreign country judgment if "the cause of action on which the judgment is based is repugnant to the public policy" of Texas. . . . This subsection of the Texas Recognition Act does not refer to the judgment itself, but specifically to the "cause of action on which the judgment is based." Thus, the fact that a judgment offends Texas public policy does not, in and of itself, permit the district court to refuse recognition of that judgment. . . .

In this case, the Mexican judgment was based on an action for collection of a promissory note. This cause of action is not repugnant to Texas public policy. . . . Under the Texas Recognition Act, it is irrelevant that the Mexican judgment itself contravened Texas's public policy against usury. Thus, the plain language of the Texas Recognition Act suggests that the district court erred in refusing to recognize the Mexican judgment.

* * * *

[Furthermore,] [d]ifferent considerations apply when a party seeks recognition of a foreign judgment for defensive purposes [rather than using the foreign law offensively]. As Justice Brandeis once stated:

> The company is in a position different from that of a plaintiff who seeks to enforce a cause of action conferred by the laws of another state. The right which it claims should be given effect is set up by way of defense to an asserted liability; and to a defense different considerations apply. A state may, on occasion, decline to enforce a foreign cause of action. In so doing, it merely denies a remedy leaving unimpaired the plaintiff's substantive right, so that he is free to enforce it elsewhere. But to refuse to give effect to a substantive defense under the applicable law of another state, as under the circumstances here presented, subjects the defendant to irremediable liability. This may not be done.

Bradford Elec. Light Co. v. Clapper, 286 U.S. 145, 160, 52 S. Ct. 571, 576, 76 L. Ed. 1026, (1932); cf. Resource Sav. Assoc. v. Neary, 782 S.W.2d 897, 900 (Tex. App.—Dallas 1989, writ denied) (noting that because a party sought recognition of a foreign judgment for defensive purposes different considerations applied, but refusing to recognize the foreign judgment nonetheless). . . .

We are especially reluctant to conclude that recognizing the Mexican judgment offends Texas public policy under the circumstances of this case. The purpose behind Texas usury laws is to protect unsophisticated borrowers from unscrupulous lenders. See Woods-Tucker, 642 F.2d at 753 n.13 ("It is the underlying policy of each state's usury laws to protect necessitous borrowers within its borders"); see also Quinn-Moore v. Lambert, 272 Ark. 324, 614 S.W.2d 230 (1981) ("As far as we know, usury laws exist in all states. Such laws are based upon a universally recognized public policy that protects necessitous borrowers from the exaction of exorbitant interest from unscrupulous lenders."). This case, however, does not involve the victimizing of a naive consumer. Southwest Livestock is managed by sophisticated and knowledgeable people with experience in business. Additionally, the evidence in the record does not suggest that Ramon misled or deceived Southwest Livestock. Southwest Livestock and Ramon negotiated the loan in good faith and at arms length. In short, both parties fully appreciated the nature of the loan transaction and their respective contractual obligations.

Accordingly, in light of the plain language of the Texas Recognition Act, and after consideration of our decision in Woods-Tucker [642 F.2d 744 (5th Cir. 1981)] and the purpose behind Texas public policy against usury, we hold that Texas's public policy does not justify withholding recognition of the Mexican judgment. The district court erred in deciding otherwise.

4. Organization of American States

The Organization of American States held its Fifth Inter-American Specialized Conference on Private International Law ("CIDIP-V") in Mexico City from March 14–18, 1994. Excerpts below from a memorandum prepared by Harold S. Burman and Peter H. Pfund for the 46th meeting of the Secretary of State's Advisory Committee on Private International Law, May 16, 1994, summarize aspects of the meeting, and, in particular, the Inter-American Convention on the Law Applicable to International Contracts. The text of the Convention is reprinted in uncorrected form in 33 I.L.M. 733 (1994). A corrected version of several of the translations, including English, has not yet been issued and the United States has not become party.

The full text of Mr. Burman's memorandum is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c 8183.htm. For more extensive commentary, see Harold S. Burman, International Conflict of Laws, the 1994 Inter-American Convention on the Law Applicable to International Contracts, and Trends for the 1990s, 28 Vand. J. Transnat'l L. 367 (May 1995).

Nineteen OAS Member States—more than at any other previous CIDIP—participated at CIDIP-V. . . . A resolution adopted by the conference, co-sponsored by six States on the basis of a U.S. draft, calls for an examination of resources made available for secretariat legal services in support of the CIDIP process. The study could include recommendations for funding and other support for preparatory meetings as well. The purpose of the resolution is to encourage a reexamination of the OAS process by the new Secretary General and the new head of the Legal Secretariat, who will take office in mid-1994. This could include an increase in PIL support functions between the CIDIP conferences, along the lines of work now done by the secretariats of the other international organizations specialized in this field.

Inter-American Convention on the Law Applicable to International Contracts

Although preparatory work was limited to one meeting prior to CIDIP-V, a potentially effective final convention on applicable law embodying several modern commercial and conflicts of laws concepts was completed at CIDIP-V (ACPIL Doc. AC 46/OAS-1). The earlier draft convention text (distributed at the last ACPIL meeting), prepared by Mexico and approved by the Inter-American Juridical Committee, introduced a significant change by combining elements of Latin legal traditions with recent conventions completed by the Hague Conference and the European Community, as well as conflicts of law case developments in the U.S. Delegates at the preparatory meeting in Tucson, Arizona, co-hosted by the OAS and the National Law Center for Inter-American Free Trade (CIFT), introduced provisions significantly raising the role of business practice and custom, together with those which would enhance validity and enforceability of commercial agreements.

The Convention text favors validation of agreements and commercial transactions, rather than applying conflicts rules in a neutral fashion without regard to their potential impact. States parties are assured the right to exclude categories of contracts from the convention's coverage, which the U.S. will need to invoke. Its innovations in an Inter-American context include coverage of governmental contracts, unless excluded; reference to extension of the Convention to new methods of contracting (primarily meant to encompass contracts utilizing electronic data interchange); recognition and enforcement of party choice of law; inclusion as a source of applicable law of general principles of international commercial law formulated by international organizations (primary examples discussed were the UNIDROIT General Principles and the ICC'S rules on letters of credit); inclusion of commercial usages as a source of law; a rule linking commercial practices to determinations as to whether a principal is bound by acts of an agent; and rules favoring existence and validity of contracts.

The drafting of the Convention leaves something to be desired, in large part due to time limitations at the diplomatic conference and the absence of additional preparatory meetings; clarifications can be made by the U.S. in the form of reservations and understandings that would accompany the U.S. instrument of ratification.

The Convention reflects an apparent change in approach by a number of countries in the Americas, who are now seeking to enhance economic integration by unifying transborder law. It offers us an opportunity to facilitate trade and support the process of Inter-American law modernization. . . .

5. Carriage of Goods by Sea Act: Vimar Seguros y Reaseguros, S.A. v. M/V Sky Reefer

On March 20, 1995, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed a First Circuit decision upholding a foreign arbitration clause in a bill of lading. Vimar Seguros y Reaseguros, S.A. v. M/V Sky Reefer, 515 U.S. 528 (1995). The case involved a shipment of fruit from Morocco to Massachusetts on the ship MV Sky Reefer. When the fruit arrived damaged, the insurance company paid the distributor's claim and brought suit, with the distributor, against the ship owner and the ship in the U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts. The respondents moved to stay the action in U.S. courts and to compel arbitration in Tokyo under the bill of lading's foreign arbitration clause and § 3 of the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"). Petitioners opposed the motion, arguing that the arbitration clause was unenforceable under the FAA, among other reasons, because it violated § 3(8) of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 46 U.S.C. §§ 1300–1315. The district court granted the motion to stay and compelled arbitration while retaining jurisdiction pending arbitration. The First Circuit affirmed. 29 F.3d 727 (1st Cir. 1994).

The Supreme Court granted certiorari to resolve a split between the circuits on the enforceability of foreign arbitration clauses in maritime bills of lading. See State Establishment for Agricultural Product Trading v. MV Wesermunde, 838 F.2d 1576 (11th Cir. 1988). Excerpts below from the Court's opinion explain its decision in upholding the foreign arbitration clause.

* * * *

The leading case for invalidation of a foreign forum selection clause is the opinion of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Indussa Corp. v. S. S. Ranborg, 377 F.2d 200 (1967) (en banc). The court there found that COGSA invalidated a clause designating a foreign judicial forum because it "puts 'a high hurdle' in the way of enforcing liability, and thus is an effective means for carriers to secure settlements lower than if cargo [owners] could sue in a convenient forum." Id., at 203 (citation omitted). The court observed "there could be no assurance that [the foreign court] would apply [COGSA] in the same way as would an American tribunal subject to the uniform control of the Supreme Court." Id., at 203–204. Following Indussa, the Courts of Appeals without exception have invalidated foreign forum selection clauses under § 3(8). [internal citations omitted.] The logic of that extension would be quite defensible, but we cannot endorse the reasoning or the conclusion of the Indussa rule itself.

The determinative provision in COGSA, examined with care, does not support the arguments advanced first in Indussa and now by petitioner. Section 3(8) of COGSA provides as follows:

> Any clause, covenant, or agreement in a contract of carriage relieving the carrier or the ship from liability for loss or damage to or in connection with the goods, arising from negligence, fault, or failure in the duties and obligations provided in this section, or lessening such liability otherwise than as provided in this chapter, shall be null and void and of no effect.

The liability that may not be lessened is "liability for loss or damage . . . arising from negligence, fault, or failure in the duties and obligations provided in this section." The statute thus addresses the lessening of the specific liability imposed by the Act, without addressing the separate question of the means and costs of enforcing that liability. The difference is that between explicit statutory guarantees and the procedure for enforcing them, between applicable liability principles and the forum in which they are to be vindicated.

The liability imposed on carriers under COGSA § 3 is defined by explicit standards of conduct, and it is designed to correct specific abuses by carriers. In the 19th century it was a prevalent practice for common carriers to insert clauses in bills of lading exempting themselves from liability for damage or loss, limiting the period in which plaintiffs had to present their notice of claim or bring suit, and capping any damages awards per package. See 2A M. Sturley, Benedict on Admiralty § 11, pp. 2–2 to 2–3 (1995); 2 T. Schoenbaum, Admiralty and Maritime Law § 10–13 (2d ed. 1994); Yancey, The Carriage of Goods: Hague, COGSA, Visby, and Hamburg. Thus, § 3, entitled "Responsibilities and liabilities of carrier and ship," requires that the carrier "exercise due diligence to . . . make the ship seaworthy" and "properly man, equip, and supply the ship" before and at the beginning of the voyage, § 3(1),

"properly and carefully load, handle, stow, carry, keep, care for, and discharge the goods carried," § 3(2), and issue a bill of lading with specified contents, § 3(3). Section 3(6) allows the cargo owner to provide notice of loss or damage within three days and to bring suit within one year. These are the substantive obligations and particular procedures that § 3(8) prohibits a carrier from altering to its advantage in a bill of lading. Nothing in this section, however, suggests that the statute prevents the parties from agreeing to enforce these obligations in a particular forum. By its terms, it establishes certain duties and obligations, separate and apart from the mechanisms for their enforcement.

* * * *

Our reading of "lessening such liability" to exclude increases in the transaction costs of litigation also finds support in the goals of the Brussels Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules Relating to Bills of Lading, 51 Stat. 233 (1924) (Hague Rules), on which COGSA is modeled. Sixty-six countries, including the United States and Japan, are now parties to the Convention, see Department of State, Office of the Legal Adviser, Treaties in Force: A List of Treaties and Other International Agreements of the United States in Force on January 1, 1994, p. 367 (June 1994), and it appears that none has interpreted its enactment of § 3(8) of the Hague Rules to prohibit foreign forum selection clauses, see Sturley, International Uniform Laws in National Courts: The Influence of Domestic Law in Conflicts of Interpretation, 27 Va. J. Int'l L. 729, 776–796 (1987). The English courts long ago rejected the reasoning later adopted by the Indussa court. See Maharani Woollen Mills Co. v. Anchor Line, [1927] 29 Lloyd's List L. Rep. 169 (C. A.) (Scrutton, L. J.) ("The liability of the carrier appears to me to remain exactly the same under the clause. The only difference is a question of procedure—where shall the law be enforced?—and I do not read any clause as to procedure as lessening liability"). And other countries that do not recognize foreign forum selection clauses rely on specific provisions to that effect in their domestic versions of the Hague Rules, see, e.g., Sea-Carriage of Goods Act 1924, § 9(2) (Australia); Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, No. 1 of 1986, § 3 (South Africa). In light of the fact that COGSA is the culmination of a multilateral effort "to establish uniform ocean bills of lading to govern the rights and liabilities of carriers and shippers inter se in international trade," Robert C. Herd & Co. v. Krawill Machinery Corp., 359 U.S. 297, 301, 3 L. Ed. 2d 820, 79 S. Ct. 766 (1959), we decline to interpret our version of the Hague Rules in a manner contrary to every other nation to have addressed this issue. See Sturley, supra, at 736 (conflicts in the interpretation of the Hague Rules not only destroy aesthetic symmetry in the international legal order but impose real costs on the commercial system the Rules govern).

It would also be out of keeping with the objects of the Convention for the courts of this country to interpret COGSA to disparage the authority or competence of international forums for dispute resolution. Petitioner's skepticism over the ability of foreign arbitrators to apply COGSA or the Hague Rules, and its reliance on this aspect of Indussa Corp. v. S. S. Ranborg, 377 F.2d 200 (CA2 1967), must give way to contemporary principles of international comity and commercial practice. As the Court observed in The Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U.S. 1, 32 L. Ed. 2d 513, 92 S. Ct. 1907 (1972), when it enforced a foreign forum selection clause, the historical judicial resistance to foreign forum selection clauses "has little place in an era when . . . businesses once essentially local now operate in world markets." Id., at 12. "The expansion of American business and industry will hardly be encouraged," we explained, "if, notwithstanding solemn contracts, we insist on a parochial concept that all disputes must be resolved under our laws and in our courts." Id., at 9. See Mitsubishi Motors Corp. v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, Inc., 473 U.S. 614, 638, 87 L. Ed. 2d 444, 105 S. Ct. 3346 (1985) (if international arbitral institutions "are to take a central place in the international legal order, national courts will need to 'shake off the old judicial hostility to arbitration,' and also their customary and understandable unwillingness to cede jurisdiction of a claim arising under domestic law to a foreign or transnational tribunal") (citation omitted); Scherk v. Alberto-Culver Co., 417 U.S. at 516 ("A parochial refusal by the courts of one country to enforce an international arbitration agreement" would frustrate "the orderliness and predictability essential to any international business transaction"); see also Allison, Arbitration of Private Antitrust Claims in International Trade: A Study in the Subordination of National Interests to the Demands of a World Market, 18 N. Y. U. J. Int'l Law & Pol. 361, 439 (1986).

That the forum here is arbitration only heightens the irony of petitioner's argument, for the FAA is also based in part on an international convention, 9 U.S.C. § 201 et seq. (codifying the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, June 10, 1958, [1970] 21 U.S. T. 2517, TIAS No. 6997), intended "to encourage the recognition and enforcement of commercial arbitration agreements in international contracts and to unify the standards by which agreements to arbitrate are observed and arbitral awards are enforced in the signatory countries," Scherk, supra, at 520, n. 15. The FAA requires enforcement of arbitration agreements in contracts that involve interstate commerce, see Allied-Bruce Terminix Cos. v. Dobson, 513 U.S. 265, 130 L. Ed. 2d 753, 115 S. Ct. 834 (1995), and in maritime transactions, including bills of lading, see 9 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2, 201, 202, where there is no independent basis in law or equity for revocation, cf. Carnival Cruise Lines, 499 U.S. at 595 ("Forum-selection clauses contained in form passage contracts are subject to judicial scrutiny for fundamental fairness"). If the United States is to be able to gain the benefits of international accords and have a role as a trusted partner in multilateral endeavors, its courts should be most cautious before interpreting its domestic legislation in such manner as to violate international agreements. That concern counsels against construing COGSA to nullify foreign arbitration clauses because of inconvenience to the plaintiff or insular distrust of the ability of foreign arbitrators to apply the law.

6. NAFTA Arbitration

Article 2022 of the North American Free Trade Agreement ("NAFTA"), entitled "Alternative Dispute Resolution of Commercial Disputes," addresses private investment disputes. Paragraph one provides that:

> Each Party shall, to the maximum extent possible, encourage and facilitate the use of arbitration and other means of alternative dispute resolution for the settlement of international commercial disputes between private parties in the free trade area.

Paragraph 4 requires the Free Trade Commission ("FTC") to "establish an Advisory Committee on Private Commercial Disputes ['Advisory Committee'] comprising persons with expertise or experience in the resolution of private international commercial disputes."

The FTC, established by NAFTA Article 2001 and made up of the United States Trade Representative, the Canadian Minister of International Trade, and the Mexican Secretary of Economy, established the advisory committee in October 1994. The Advisory Committee is composed of private sector members from the United States, Mexico, and Canada, and two representatives of each country who jointly chair the committee. The founding co-chairs for the United States were Ginger Lew, General Counsel of the U.S. Department of Commerce, and Conrad Harper, Legal Adviser of the U.S. Department of State. Under Article 1 of its Terms of Reference, available at www.mac.doc.gov/nafta/terms.htm, the Advisory Committee is required "to report and make recommendations to the [Free Trade] Commission on general issues referred to it by the Commission on the availability, use and effectiveness of arbitration, mediation, and other procedures for the resolution of private international commercial disputes in the free trade area." Article 1.2 specifies six matters referred to the Committee and Article 1.3 provides that the FTC may refer other matters from time to time.

In November 1996 the Advisory Committee issued the Report of the NAFTA Advisory Committee on Private Commercial Disputes to the NAFTA Free Trade Commission, available at www.mac.doc.gov/nafta/report96.htm. The report described the establishment and activities of subcommittees to examine priority issues, set forth conclusions and future work plans, and recommended that the FTC adopt a statement reflecting its conclusions. Excerpts from the Advisory Committee's conclusions and its suggested recommendation to the FTC follow (italics in the original).

III. COMMITTEE CONCLUSIONS

The Committee has reached several conclusions based on its work to date. Each NAFTA country has laws and procedures in place to support the use of arbitration, including the recognition and enforcement of arbitral awards, at both the federal and state/provincial levels. No new legislation is recommended at the present time. Although the three countries have supported the enforcement of arbitration agreements and arbitral awards, the Committee has identified some difficulties related to the recognition and enforcement of arbitral agreements and arbitral awards.

There is a wide range of arbitral institutions available in the three countries, including the American Arbitration Association, the British Columbia International Commercial Arbitration Center, The Quebec National and International Commercial Arbitration Center, the Mexico City National Chamber of Commerce and the International Chamber of Commerce. Moreover, a new transnational organization, the Commercial Arbitration and Mediation Center for the Americas (CAMCA), was launched in December 1995 by the first four institutions listed above. Users of arbitration services have a similarly wide selection of procedural rules available for arbitration, including the 1976 UNCITRAL Rules. Given the number and high caliber of available arbitral organizations, the Committee sees no need for the NAFTA Parties to promote or fund the creation of any additional organizations at this time.

The business and legal communities in the NAFTA countries regard arbitration as an acceptable method of dispute resolution. According to the Committee's survey, a number of current or potential users of ADR expressed some reservations with international arbitration (although not necessarily limited to the NAFTA countries), stemming from perceived problems such as the difficulty in enforcing awards and the lack of pre-award remedies. There is a need for greater promotion of the use of ADR, in particular arbitration, targeted at end-users (business executives and in-house/corporate legal counsel) and the small business community. Such promotion should address the perceptions in the business community regarding arbitration. The distribution of a brochure and the presentation of seminars targeted at the end-users would represent a significant step forward in promoting the use of arbitration in the NAFTA region.

V. RECOMMENDATIONS

The Committee recommends that the Commission:

Adopt a statement substantively in the following form: "The Free Trade Commission—confirming the commitment of the NAFTA Parties to encourage and facilitate, to the maximum extent possible, the use of arbitration and other means of alternative dispute resolution for the settlement of international commercial disputes between private parties in the free trade area; and acknowledging the obligation of the Parties to recognize and enforce arbitral awards under applicable international conventions and national laws—states its support for the use of arbitration and other forms of alternative dispute resolution in the NAFTA area, and wishes to draw to the attention of the Judiciary the significant benefits inherent in the use of arbitration and other forms of alternative dispute resolution. In this connection, the Commission calls for the assistance of each Party to: (1) take appropriate steps to ensure that domestic laws do not provide for the judicial review of arbitral awards in a manner inconsistent with their international obligations, including the NAFTA and the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards of 1958 (the New York Convention); (2) take appropriate steps to include issues related to arbitration and other forms of alternative dispute resolution in judicial training programs; (3) encourage courts to direct matters to arbitration or other forms of alternative dispute resolution, and enforce arbitral awards and arbitration agreements, where appropriate; and (4) promote dispute prevention."

* * * *

In 1997 the NAFTA advisory committee issued a brochure entitled "Alternative Dispute Resolution in International Contracts" outlining possible methods of alternative dispute resolution available to persons operating within the NAFTA region. The brochure also set out model clauses for use in contracts and described principal arbitration institutions available in the NAFTA. The brochure is available at www.mac.doc.gov/nafta/contract.htm.

7. Other Issues

a. Infrastructure project developments

A Report on Private International Law Activities prepared by Harold S. Burman and Peter H. Pfund for the 92nd Annual Meeting of the American Society of International Law, April 2, 1998, included the excerpt below on "Infrastructure project development in foreign countries: the new era of private sector partnership?"

The full text of the report is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

* * * *

International organization work has begun on legislative guidance for new methods of project finance. UNCITRAL is actively engaged in preparing such legislative guidance, the first phase of which may be completed by mid-1999. The Organization of American States (OAS) may also soon begin work on a related topic for its next Specialized Conference on Private International Law (CIDIP-VI), international loan agreements with an emphasis on secured interest financing.

The last decade has seen a shift away from the post-1950s focus on multilateral and bilateral governmental funding and oversight of foreign projects, toward privatization which in turn has prompted a move toward private sector funding, construction and management. While governmental funding and recipient state regulation of public services, and in some cases government guarantees remain, nevertheless the balance has shifted toward building on private sector initiatives as a means of realizing the efficiencies of the market place. This also has the effect of moving major infrastructure work off-budget, leaving recipient governments more free to direct their available capital toward other purposes. This movement at the same time raises new issues of competition policy and other aspects of privatization of public services.

To accomplish these ends, the focus has now shifted at some bodies to private law regimes on management, financing and corporate law issues. These include recognition of foreign investment and management rights, profit repatriation, securitization, authorization for special corporate entities necessary for long-term private loan placement, new regulatory and dispute resolution methods which can recognize private interests in the provision of public services, standards for long-term development contracts and management, and new rules on applicable law.

b. International secured interests

Remarks prepared by Mr. Burman for a symposium at the University of Pittsburgh, October 17, 1997, "Ten Years of the United Nations Sales Convention: Building on the CISG: International Commercial Law Developments and Trends for the 2000's" addressed, among other things, developments in international secured interests, as excerpted below. 17 J.L. & Com. 355 (1998).

[International secured interests] crosses over areas of established law, such as those encountered in the formulation of the CISG, as well as electronic commerce and new economic functions of the law in today's market. It is the largest "front" in the PIL field today, cutting across many basic economic assumptions and beliefs as to what the commercial law can and cannot be permitted to do. Security interests for commercial finance in moveable, i.e., "non-possessory," property has been the real economic engine of the American experiment with the modern Uniform Commercial Code. Nevertheless, its economic underpinnings and the legal concepts it carries are a difficult sell internationally.

Two draft conventions are concurrently underway at UNIDROIT and UNCITRAL which can significantly boost availability of commercial credit for investments and transactions. Adoption of either for many countries could signal a concrete step toward seeking the benefits of a global economic village, which in turn may also call for a change in some domestic law traditions. On this topic, the U.S. view has been that traditional methods of harmonization are of little real value to the developing and emerging states. While merging existing concepts of assignment law may have some effect on evening out the legal field, it is unlikely to produce new credit.

According to the commercial finance community, if countries adopt laws comparable to Article 9 of the U.C.C., based on publicly-accessible notice filing systems which determine priority for claimants, new credit derived from bulk receivables, such as credit card receivables, can flow to the markets of underdeveloped countries. This means, in the U.S. view, that economic objectives, i.e., new credit for needy markets, should be agreed upon and serve as the basis for the formulation of laws. This would, however, also result in significant changes in many national laws, and the outcome of this approach is far from clear.

The first of the two projects, a proposed UNIDROIT convention, is more narrowly focussed on high-end moveable equipment such as aircraft, containers, satellites, agricultural and construction equipment, and possibly vessels. This convention builds on the 1988 UNIDROIT Convention on International Financial Leasing. Determining when equipment has entered the international zone and is covered, or whether to cover equipment ab initio that crosses borders regularly in the normal course of business is a key issue. Both treaty projects rely on open disclosure systems, whereby potential assignees, upon whom credit systems rely, would have prior notice of the existence of other and possibly competing interests. Notice would be effected through internationally-based electronic registries, or nationally-linked registries under an international supervisory system.

The second related project, the proposed UNCITRAL convention, covers accounts receivable financing, which is often employed for general inventory and project financing, and would have a much wider reach than the UNIDROIT text. The convention, as currently drafted, would cover both international receivables and international assignment of domestic receivables. The latter would go beyond many similar conventions in terms of direct affect on domestically created rights, however, a consensus for such a step has not been reached. The draft also calls for acceptance of the concepts of future interests in property not yet in existence, "bulk" assignments, which are key factors in inventory and agricultural production financing, as well as accessing new pools of credit supported by bank card, toll road and other high volume transactions.

Both projects will soon face a significant conceptual and practical hurdle—the need for acceptance of the concept of perfection of security interests through computer-based registries, possibly operated internationally. The efficiency of computer systems covering distant countries' markets is what would achieve a sufficiently low cost of credit to make it useful for the undeveloped world, if its products are to enter the stream of trade. This is a vision shared by the international lending agencies, such as the World Bank, the IADB, the U.S., Canada and some other states, and the finance lending community, but not yet by a number of other states, including many West European states. Even if agreement on concepts can be reached, practical hurdles exist internationally since such registries do not yet exist. Conversely, in the U.S., where the legal concepts are in place, the registries across our many counties and states are almost all paper-based, and migration to linked computer systems, which would need some degree of uniformity, may be years away.

One might be tempted, on the basis of the discussion above, to cast the era of the CISG nostalgically as the "good old days."

c. U.S. positions on certain private international law projects

In a memorandum prepared in April 1999, Harold Burman reviewed the basis for U.S. decisions not to support certain types of projects in the area of private international law during the 1990s.

The full text of the memorandum is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

. . . [During the 1990s] projects rejected by the U.S. were in all but one case not approved by the [international organizations] involved. These tended to fall into two groups, either representing topics on which there had been (a) no showing that solutions in the private, as opposed to public, international, law were likely to be viable, or (b) no showing that any solution was needed in the particular legal sector involved.

The first category involved proposals for work on cross-border environmental damage, class action or mass tort case rules, or cross-border migratory movements and labor access. The first group, i.e. cross-border environmental law, arose from time to time in three of the four primary [International Organizations] that focus on PIL matters. Studies raising the possibility of work in that area were produced at the Hague Conference, Unidroit and by several states involved in the OAS Specialized Conferences on Private International Law. In each case, the U.S. position approved by this office after interagency consultation and review by private bar associations in the U.S. was that, while recognizing the importance of the topics as such, there was no showing that intergovernmental solutions could be achieved within the limits of the private law. The U.S. reiterated in those cases that we supported consideration of related issues in appropriate public law fora.

In the second group, class action or mass tort issues, we did not support the topics per se, that is, we rejected the notion that there were international problems of a nature warranting a PIL project to resolve them on a multilateral basis. Issues surrounding several cases such as the Bhopal chemical plant damage cases, in which jurisdiction was unsuccessfully sought in the U.S. for injuries occurring in India or alternately Indian courts were unsuccessfully urged to adopt U.S. standards for assessing tort liability were seen as the genesis of these proposals. Aside from our rejection of the notion that PIL could be a basis for restating important tort standards, the possibility of a political cast over such projects was apparent, and PIL projects have never been successfully pursued when underlaid with significant political agendas.

The third group, primarily arising from time to time in proposals for work at the OAS PIL Conferences, did not gain sufficient support so that no studies were produced and, other than declining to indicate support at an early stage, no further action was needed.

The second category, no showing of sufficient need, arose in two proposals. First, UNIDROIT proposed work on unifying the hotel keeper's contract with consumers, i.e. international travelers, and/or agents and others marketing such arrangements. Following a review by the U.S. travel and tourism industry and the Department of Commerce, the U.S., while agreeing that a wide disparity between various national and local laws and regulations was evident, took the position that no showing has been made that absent harmonization there was either dislocation of the market or serious impediments to trade. The U.S. was joined in that case by several other governments, and the project was dropped.

A second case arose concerning international electronic commerce. UNCITRAL, following completion of the successful 1996 Model Law on Electronic Commerce which the U.S. supported, undertook a second project to elaborate rules on electronic signatures. The U.S. sought unsuccessfully to defer that project, arguing that elaboration of such rules would constrain market development of contract law in the early stages of e-commerce, and that the proposed project favored certain technologies over others. The U.S. position was difficult to maintain since both the legal concepts as well as the technology supporting such rules, which favored digital signatures and "public-key infrastructure", originated in the U.S. and had in fact been adopted at that time by several U.S. states. Ultimately, a second UNCITRAL Model law was on track to be produced on e-signatures which would eliminate many but not all of the U.S. concerns.

B. FAMILY LAW

1. Convention on Protection of Children and Co-operation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption

The Convention on Protection of Children and Co-operation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption was adopted at The Hague May 29, 1993, at the conclusion of the Seventeenth Session of the Hague Conference on Private International Law. It was signed by the United States at the Royal Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs on March 31, 1994. President William J. Clinton transmitted the convention to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on June 11, 1998. The Senate gave its advice and consent on September 20, 2000. 146 CONG. REC. S8866 (Sept. 20, 2000). Implementing legislation was adopted in The Intercountry Adoption Act of 2000, Pub. L. No. 106–279, 114 Stat. 825 (2000), codified at 42 U.S.C. §§ 14901–14954, and proposed implementing regulations were published on September 15, 2003. 68 Fed. Reg. 54,063 and 54,119 (Sept. 15, 2003). See discussion of transmittal documents and further steps for implementation in Digest 2000 at 141–50; discussion of regulations in Digest 2003 at 108–18; s*ee also* 92 Am. The Convention sets out norms and procedures to safeguard children involved in intercountry adoptions and to protect the interests of their birth and adoptive parents. These safeguards are designed to discourage trafficking in children and to ensure that intercountry adoptions are made in the best interests of the children involved. Cooperation between Contracting States will be facilitated by the establishment in each Contracting State of a central authority with programmatic and case-specific functions. The Convention also provides for the recognition of adoptions that fall within its scope in all other Contracting States.

* * * *

It is estimated that U.S. citizens annually adopt as many children from abroad as all other countries combined (13,621 children in Fiscal Year 1997). The Convention is intended to ensure that intercountry adoptions take place in the best interests of the children and parents involved, and to establish a system of cooperation among Contracting States to prevent abduction of, and trafficking in children. We have worked closely with U.S. adoption interests and the legal community in negotiating the provisions of the Convention and in preparing the necessary implementing legislation.

2. Convention on Jurisdiction, Applicable Law, Recognition, Enforcement and Co-operation in Respect of Parental Responsibility and Measures for the Protection of Children

The United States participated in the negotiation of the Convention on Jurisdiction, Applicable Law, Recognition, Enforcement and Co-operation in Respect of Parental Responsibility and Measures for the Protection of Children ("Child Protection Convention"), adopted by unanimous vote, October 18, 1996, at the Eighteenth Session of the Hague Conference, reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 1391 (1996). The new convention revised the 1961 Hague Convention on the Powers of Authorities and the Law Applicable in Respect of the Protection of Children. Excerpts below from a description of the convention prepared by Gloria DeHart, Attorney-adviser, Office of Private International Law, Office of the Legal Adviser, Department of State, as an introductory note to publication in International Legal Materials, follow. The United States had not signed the convention as of the time of this writing.

As adopted, the Convention has seven chapters—Scope, Jurisdiction, Applicable Law, Enforcement, Co-operation, General Clauses and Final Clauses. The 1961 Convention did not define what measures were included in it, resulting in some confusion as to its scope. In fact, the primary use of the 1961 Convention was related to issues of custody, the coverage of which is not clear from either its title or text. The descriptive title, the Preamble and Chapter I (Scope) make the coverage and purpose of the 1996 Convention clear.

In Chapter I (Articles 1–4), the Convention is made applicable to children from birth to age 18 (Article 2) and specifies, by example and not exclusively, what is included in the Convention—generally measures for the protection of the person or property of children, including custody determinations ("parental responsibility"—defined in Article 1). The inclusion of kafala (the Islamic institution used instead of adoption) together with the provisions of Chapter V on co-operation (especially Article 33) fills a gap in the coverage of the 1993 Hague Convention on Protection of Children and Co-operation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption, 32 I.L.M. 1134 (1993), whose procedures were not made applicable to kafala or analogous institutions. There are 10 specifically excluded subjects (including adoption) listed in Article 4.

Chapter II on jurisdiction (Articles 5–14) is the basic core of the Convention and establishes "habitual residence" as the primary jurisdictional standard. When the child's habitual residence changes, jurisdiction follows. Where a child has no habitual residence or it cannot be determined (as in the case of refugee children), the State where the child is present has jurisdiction. In Article 7, the Convention establishes the important principle that jurisdiction cannot be based on a change in habitual residence occurring as a result of a wrongful removal except in two very limited circumstances. Related to this provision is Article 50 which provides that the Convention does not affect the application of the 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, 19 I.L.M. 1501 (1980), and that nothing precludes the Protection Convention from being invoked to obtain the return of a wrongfully abducted child or of organizing access rights. Giving some flexibility to the Convention are two articles which make it possible for the habitual residence State to transfer jurisdiction to other named States when it would be in the best interests of the child to do so. Authorities are authorized to communicate with each other in the application of these articles. (Articles 8, 9) A special divorce jurisdiction is established in Article 10, permitting a court with jurisdiction over the divorce to take measures for protection (most likely a custody determination) in limited circumstances even though the State is not the habitual residence of the child concerned. When the child is merely present in a State, that State may take measures in urgent situations or may take measures of a provisional character with a limited territorial effect. (Articles 11, 12) Jurisdiction is determined at the time measures have been requested and changes to a second State only if the first State has declined jurisdiction. Measures properly taken remain in effect until changed (Article 14).

3. Convention on the International Protection of Adults

The United States participated actively in the preparation and negotiation of the Convention on the International Protection of Adults ("Adults' Convention" or "Convention"), adopted by unanimous vote of the Hague Conference at The Hague on October 2, 1999, reprinted in 39 I.L.M. 7 (2000). Laws in the United States and many other countries increasingly recognize the need to respect the rights of the incapacitated adult involved and provide for measures that may be taken by adults themselves, such as durable powers of attorney intended to regulate the handling of their affairs in the event of incapacity. At the same time, the ease of international travel and the growing number of persons who divide their living arrangements between two or more countries give rise to questions concerning which country has jurisdiction and which country's laws apply if a traveler becomes incapacitated.

The stated purpose of the Adults' Convention is to protect adults (defined as persons 18 years or older) in international situations when "by reason of an impairment or insufficiency of their personal faculties, [they] are not in a position to protect their interests." It provides a means for determining which country's authorities have jurisdiction to take protective measures and which laws are applicable as well as providing for recognition and enforcement of protective measures in all Contracting States. The Convention establishes that jurisdiction generally lies with the country that is the adult's habitual residence or, in cases of refugees or others where habitual residence cannot be established, the country in which the adult is present. Authorities in the relevant jurisdiction are in most cases required to apply local law. An important exception to this rule is made when an adult takes action, such as executing a durable power of attorney, that grants powers of representation to be exercised in the future if the adult becomes unable to protect his or her own interests. In that case, the law of the habitual residence may be replaced by a law specified by the adult, so long as the law chosen is of a country with sufficient connections to the adult.

At the time of this writing, the United States had not signed the Convention.

4. International Reciprocal Family Support Enforcement

a. Overview

In 1995 the United States submitted to the Hague Conference on Private International Law's Special Commission on Maintenance a review of U.S. efforts in international child support enforcement, excerpted below.

The full text of the submission is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The United States has not as yet ratified any of the international treaties and conventions related to the recognition of support orders and the enforcement of support obligations. Family law has always been a matter of state law in the United States, and at the time the support conventions were developed by the United Nations and the Hague Conference on Private International Law, the United States federal government had not become involved in family law issues. Since that time, the United States federal government has become more involved in domestic family law matters, and particularly in developing a program for the enforcement of family support both within and among the states. In international family law matters, the United States has been involved, until recently, only with child abduction and adoption issues, not family support.

Lacking federal involvement, the states of the United States have developed their own system of international enforcement. However, legislation has now been proposed to place on a federal government-to-foreign government level the kind of bilateral system developed by the states. The legislation would provide for services at the federal level through a Central Authority to ensure an efficient, workable and uniformly implemented system in cooperation with the states and with the foreign countries which are willing to take part. In addition, the federal government is considering the possibility of the United States becoming a party to one or more of the existing conventions.

The purpose of this paper is to provide a brief explanation of the United States enforcement system generally, the state-developed international system, and the proposed federal level system. . . . Moreover, the United States would like, in the near future and for the medium term at least, to place the present U.S. state-level arrangements with some 18 countries and future arrangements on a federal government-to-foreign government basis.

The Federal Child Support Enforcement System

In 1974, the United States Congress established a mandatory program for the states for the enforcement of family support by the enactment of Title IV-D of the Social Security Act ("the IV-D program"). Congress has amended the program since that time, most notably in 1984 and 1988, to expand both the coverage of the program (to all families, not just those receiving welfare assistance) and the procedures the states are required to use. Legislation now pending in Congress would make additional changes. The federal program and accompanying regulations established a federal-level agency to administer the program—the Office of Child Support Enforcement (OCSE) in the Department of Health and Human Services. They also required each of the states to establish an agency at the state level to enforce existing orders, to obtain support orders where necessary, to establish paternity, and to cooperate with the child support enforcement offices in other states in interstate cases. The states must utilize interstate procedures when necessary to obtain support. The program countrywide is providing enforcement services in a total of almost 19 million cases. There is, at present, no federal requirement for U.S. states to provide support enforcement services in international cases. The absence of a mandate to the federal government prompted the states to use the system developed for dealing with interstate cases within the United States to extend their enforcement efforts to cases from other countries.

State Action: URESA and International Enforcement

The URESA System

The Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (URESA) was first developed in 1950 by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL), and was revised significantly in 1968 (RURESA). In August, 1992, an almost wholly new Act was completed to replace URESA/RURESA and was renamed the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA). In the United States, NCCUSL is composed of appointed representatives from the various states and has the purpose to develop laws in areas where uniformity of state law or procedure would be beneficial to the states. Enactment of these proposed laws is entirely within the competence of state legislatures. The interstate support laws have been enacted in all of the states, and a majority of the states have now or shortly will enact the new UIFSA. Because the application of the new UIFSA to international cases is unchanged, the arrangements made and discussed below under URESA are equally applicable to UIFSA.

* * * *

URESA Applied to International Support Enforcement

Because the problems of interstate and international enforcement are similar, the URESA procedures proved flexible enough for use when one of the separated parents lives in a foreign jurisdiction. The 1968 RURESA expanded the definition of "state" to include "any foreign jurisdiction in which this or a substantially similar reciprocal law is in effect." A similar definition is contained in UIFSA: "a foreign jurisdiction that has established procedures for the issuance and enforcement of support orders which are substantially similar to the procedures under this act." By this simple addition to the definition, the reach of the enforcement process of the states was greatly expanded.

Although the United States Constitution prohibits any state from entering "into any treaty, alliance, or confederation" and requires the consent of Congress for a state to "enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power," the consent of Congress is not required for interstate agreements that fall outside the scope of the Compact Clause. The arrangements between the states and foreign countries for the enforcement of support obligations are based on the principle of comity, that is, the voluntary recognition and respect given to the acts of another nation's government, and, as a matter of policy, also on the principle of reciprocity. They do not violate the Constitutional prohibition. In this area, the states and the federal government both have power to act, but if the federal government were to act, the federal power would control.

The Development and Function of the Support Agreements

Standards for Establishing Reciprocity

The states generally determine whether reciprocity is possible based on the following standards: 1) the country will enforce the child support obligation, collect the money and send it to the requesting state, whether or not there is an existing order; 2) the order will be enforced if recognizable under the laws and procedures of the country, and if it is not recognized or no order exists, an order or its equivalent will be obtained; 3) the system will deal with both in and out of wedlock children, and a determination of paternity will be made if possible in the circumstances; 4) each country will use its own laws and procedures; and 5) there will be no means test for legal services, and no charge for legal assistance or the services of government offices or personnel.

Case Procedures

To satisfy the requirement of URESA that a copy of the "state's" reciprocal act accompany the petition, a summary of the law applicable to the enforcement of support was developed, where necessary, by the country involved. . . . [E]ach of these countries has designated an agency to act as a "Central Authority" to supervise the arrangement and ensure that petitions are processed and to provide location services as far as possible.

In the United States, the cases are handled through the public offices of the states for domestic child support cases—almost always the state IV-D offices—for both incoming and outgoing cases.

* * * *

The Reciprocating Countries

The states of the United States (varying with the state and country involved) first established reciprocity in support enforcement with the Canadian provinces which have a similar system for inter-province enforcement which they have extended individually to the states on a province-to-state basis. With the success of the Canadian arrangements, the system was used to extend enforcement to other countries: to Australia, Bermuda, Fiji, Jamaica, New Zealand, South Africa, and the United Kingdom with similar reciprocal systems; to Austria and Germany which developed and enacted reciprocal laws, and, based on existing laws and procedures, to the Czech Republic, France, Hungary, Mexico, Norway, Poland, the Slovak Republic, and Sweden. France and Germany (the Deutsches Institut für Vormundschaftswesen before the German legislation was enacted) were the pioneers who helped in the development of forms and procedures. The possibility of such reciprocal arrangements has been discussed with a number of other countries throughout the world. Most of the state arrangements have been negotiated by a small "team" of state officials representing their individual states and the National Child Support Enforcement Association (NCSEA), and the Family Law Section of the American Bar Association (ABA).

* * * *

Proposed Action by the United States Federal Government Proposed Legislation

* * * *

The proposed legislation for international support enforcement responds to the many concerns that have been voiced—by NCSEA, the ABA, and many foreign countries—about the ad hoc state-by-state method of attempting to enforce child support obligations across national borders. And it responds to calls for the federal government to create a unitary, national system that would help ensure that parents cannot evade their support obligations by leaving the United States or by coming to the United States. The legislation does the following:

- Authorizes the federal government to negotiate international support enforcement arrangements with foreign countries that would be applicable in all fifty states. These arrangements may be by simple declaration or by executive agreement (in effect a treaty) in whole or in part.
- Provides cost-free support enforcement services in the United States to persons resident abroad who wish to enforce support obligations against individuals living in the United States.
- Establishes standards to ensure that foreign countries will be declared to be reciprocating countries and receive support enforcement assistance from the United States only if they correspondingly provide U.S. residents needing such assistance with substantially similar services, including cost-free administrative and legal assistance as necessary.

- Provides that requests for U.S. enforcement assistance from foreign countries that agree to provide reciprocal services qualify for federal funding under the IV-D program.
- Leaves individual states free to continue existing state-negotiated reciprocity arrangements with foreign jurisdictions in those cases where the United States federal government has not established reciprocity with a particular jurisdiction.
- Establishes the Department of Health and Human Services as the Central Authority for the United States.
- Provides an option for the states to enforce spousal support orders.

Developing this system does not preclude, and may facilitate, eventual United States ratification of the 1956 United Nations Convention on the Recovery Abroad of Maintenance and the several Hague Conventions dealing with family support. By adopting an existing and workable system of bilateral arrangements for initial United States government involvement in international enforcement, the legislation provides a framework for United States participation in the existing conventions and a means for the United States to develop enforcement systems with countries which are not parties to the existing conventions.

Plan for Implementation

Designation of Reciprocating Foreign Countries

The State Department and the Department of Health and Human Services will review the existing state arrangements and, with the agreement of the foreign country involved, make the appropriate federal declaration and place the agreement on a federal government to foreign government basis. In addition, these Departments will contact, and respond to contacts from, other countries, particularly those with whom discussions on possible reciprocal arrangements have already been held. These discussions may also involve the possibility of placing such arrangements, or any part of them including the provision of legal services, on the level of a treaty by executive agreement rather than reciprocal declarations if this proves to be necessary or desirable.

Procedures and Central Authority Functions

The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) in its Office of Child Support Enforcement (OCSE) has already established the position of International Liaison Officer. . . .

. . . We are interested in getting comments and suggestions from present and potential reciprocating countries on what needs to be done.

b. U.S. legislation

As discussed above, the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act ("UIFSA") was drafted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws ("NCCUSL") and approved and recommended by it for enactment in all states in July 1996. UIFSA was intended to revise and replace the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act ("URESA") and the Revised Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement Support Act ("RURESA"). All 50 states and the District of Columbia had enacted UIFSA as state law by the end of 1999.

Although UIFSA is primarily concerned with enforcement of child support orders between states of the United States, the act defines the term "state" more broadly:

> "State" means a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the United States Virgin Islands, or any territory or insular possession subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. The term includes: (i) an Indian tribe; and (ii) a foreign jurisdiction that has enacted a law or established procedures for issuance and enforcement of support orders which are substantially similar to the procedures under this [Act], the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act, or the Revised Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act.

Section 101(19) (emphasis added.) The full text of UIFSA, with prefatory note and comments, is available at www.law.upenn.edu/bll/ulc/fnact99/1990s/uifsa96.htm.

Shortly after the adoption of UIFSA in 1996, federal welfare reform legislation was enacted that, among other things, required states to enact UIFSA in order to remain eligible for federal funding of child support enforcement. Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996 ("PRWA"), Pub. L. No. 104–193, § 321, 110 Stat. 2105, 42 U.S.C. § 666(f).

Section 459A of the PRWA, 42 U.S.C. § 659a(a), authorized the Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Secretary of Health and Human Services, to declare foreign countries or their political subdivisions to be "reciprocating countries" for the purpose of enforcement of family support obligations if the country "has established, or undertakes to establish, procedures for the establishment and enforcement of duties of support owed to obligees who are residents of the United States. . . ." The procedures must be in substantial conformity with the standards set forth in subsection (b) of the provision. The mandatory elements set forth in that subsection are as follows:

> (A) The foreign country (or political subdivision thereof) has in effect procedures, available to residents of the United States—
> (i) for establishment of paternity, and for establishment of orders of support for children and custodial parents; and
> (ii) for enforcement of orders to provide support to children and custodial parents, including procedures for collection and appropriate distribution of support payments under such orders.
> (B) The procedures described in subparagraph (A), including legal and administrative assistance, are provided to residents of the United States at no cost.
> (C) An agency of the foreign country is designated as a Central Authority responsible for—

(i) facilitating support enforcement in cases involving residents of the foreign country and residents of the United States; and

(ii) ensuring compliance with the standards established pursuant to this subsection.

A declaration under this provision "may be made in the form of an international agreement, in connection with an international agreement or corresponding foreign declaration, or on a unilateral basis." Finally, § 659a(d) provides that a "State [of the United States] may enter into reciprocal arrangements for the establishment and enforcement of support obligations with foreign countries that are not the subject of a declaration pursuant to subsection (a), to the extent consistent with Federal law."

At the end of 1999, Ireland, Poland, the Slovak Republic and two Canadian Provinces—British Columbia and Nova Scotia—had been declared to be reciprocating countries under the act. 65 Fed. Reg. 31,953 (May 19, 2000).

c. Proposal for new Hague Conference convention on maintenance obligations

On April 13, 1999, the United States presented to the Hague Conference on Private International Law Special Commission on Maintenance Obligations a discussion paper entitled "Toward an Accommodation of Divergent Jurisdictional Standards for the Determination of Maintenance Obligations in Private International Law," prepared by Professor Robert G. Spector.

Professor Spector's comments, excerpted below (footnotes omitted), are available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

In April, 1999, the Hague Conference on Private International Law's Special Commission on Maintenance Obligations voted to begin work on a new convention on maintenance obligations. Professor William Duncan, First Secretary of the Conference, provided the delegates with an excellent background paper. He noted that the present jurisdictional situation is "extraordinarily complex with a mixture of multilateral, regional and bilateral arrangements. . . ." Part of the complexity is due to the fact that legal systems have different rules of jurisdiction to determine the existence of a maintenance obligation. Divergent jurisdictional rules between civil law countries, as illustrated in the 1958 and 1973 Hague Conventions on the Recognition of Maintenance Obligations, and many common law countries, such as the United States, create obstacles to the receipt of maintenance by deserving families and obfuscate multilateral and bilateral negotiations.

It is the thesis of this essay that a new approach to the recognition of judgments, rather than direct or indirect jurisdictional rules, is the best way to harmonize divergent state practice. States should agree to recognize a maintenance judgment where the original determination was made under factual circumstances meeting the jurisdictional standards of the requested state. The issue therefore is whether on the facts of the case, the requested state could recognize the judgment based on a ground of jurisdiction acceptable under its law.

Adoption of this approach will result in the recognition of the vast majority of maintenance judgments, and eliminate a prolonged discussion of jurisdictional standards that may be unlikely to produce substantive agreement. There will be, however, a few judgments which will not be able to be recognized in the requested state. To address those situations, any new convention should establish procedures whereby the state of the maintenance creditor could request the state where the maintenance debtor is located to obtain a new maintenance order against the debtor. Thus, in every case, either a prior maintenance judgment can be recognized, or a new order obtained, thereby assuring that deserving families will not be deprived of necessary support.

A. The Current Divergent Jurisdictional Standards

1. The United States

In the United States family law cases are subject to three different jurisdictional standards. First, jurisdiction to enter a judgment of divorce or dissolution depends on the relationship between one of the parties and the forum. The United States does not recognize divorce jurisdiction based on nationality. Second, jurisdiction to take a measure with regard to the protection of minors, such as custody or access, depends on the length of time the minor has been habitually resident in the state. If the minor has been a resident of the state for six months, jurisdiction to determine the minor's custody and access is normally present. Third, jurisdiction to determine a maintenance obligation is governed by the same standards as jurisdiction to determine any other monetary award. The United States Supreme Court has not distinguished between jurisdiction to award a monetary judgment in a commercial case, a tort case, and a family maintenance obligation. The same standards are applicable to all cases involving monetary judgments.

In cases involving monetary awards, such as maintenance cases, the jurisdictional standards dictated by the Constitution are based on the relationship between the defendant-debtor and the forum. Jurisdiction over a defendant who is a resident of the state is always permitted. The relationship required for a state to exercise jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant in family maintenance cases has been codified in the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act, which has been enacted in all fifty states of the United States. That Act provides that a state may exercise jurisdiction of a nonresident defendant in the following circumstances:

(A) the individual is personally served with a legal citation within the state;

(B) the individual submits to the jurisdiction of the state by consent, by entering a general appearance, or by filing a responsive document that has the effect of waiving the objection to the state's jurisdiction;

(C) the individual resided with the child in the state;

(D) the individual resided in the state and provided prenatal expenses or support for the child;

(E) the child resided in the state as a result of the acts or directives of the individual;

(F) the individual engaged in sexual intercourse in the state and the child may have been conceived by that act of intercourse;

(G) the individual asserted parentage in the state's putative father registry.

All of these enumerated circumstances have been found to be in conformity with the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution. Conspicuously absent from the list of enumerated circumstances is an exercise of jurisdiction based solely on the residence of the maintenance creditor. Under the Constitution, courts in the United States may not exercise jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant if the defendant has no relationship to the forum. Therefore, the enumerated circumstances mentioned in the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act represent the furthest extent of the ability of any United States court to exercise jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant for the purpose of entering a maintenance order.

2. The Hague Conventions

Civil Law standards for the recognition and enforcement of maintenance are contained in Article 3 of the 1958 and Articles 7 and 8 of the 1973 Hague Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Decisions Relating to Maintenance Obligations. These two conventions contain rules of indirect jurisdiction in that they require recognition of maintenance obligations if:

(A) the maintenance creditor or debtor had his habitual residence in the State where the decision was rendered at the time when the proceedings were instituted;

(B) the maintenance debtor and the maintenance creditor were nationals of the state at the time the proceedings were instituted;

(C) the defendant submitted to the jurisdiction either expressly or by presenting his case on the merits;

(D) the decision was part of a divorce, legal separation, or annulment by an authority of a State recognized as having jurisdiction in such matters.

B. The Incompatibility of the Jurisdictional Standards

Some of these jurisdictional rules are compatible. For example, both systems agree that jurisdiction is appropriate when the state is the residence of the maintenance debtor or when the debtor consents.

However, some of the formulated jurisdictional rules are, on their face, incompatible with each other. The indirect jurisdictional rules of Articles 7 and 8 of the 1973 Hague Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Decisions Relating to Maintenance Obligations would be unconstitutional in the United States. The United States requires that, if the maintenance debtor is not a resident of the state, there must be an adequate relationship between the debtor and the forum to justify the forum in assuming jurisdiction. The habitual residence of the maintenance creditor is not such an adequate relationship.

In addition, the common nationality of the maintenance creditor and debtor is not, by itself, a constitutionally sufficient relationship since nationality does not require that there be substantial contacts between the debtor and the forum. Jurisdiction based solely on nationality, as opposed to residence or domicile, is not recognized in the United States, regardless of whether the issue is one of divorce, custody and access or maintenance. Therefore, Article 8 of the 1973 Hague Convention would also be unconstitutional in the United States if the divorce, annulment or legal separation was performed by the state of the parties' nationality without the maintenance debtor being domiciled in the state or having some other adequate relationship to the state.

There have been a number advocates for the establishment in the United States of a child-centered standard of jurisdiction in maintenance cases which would allow the state where the child was a resident to determine the amount and duration of child support. Professor Duncan expressed the hope that the constitutional difficulties that such a rule would present for the United States would not be an insuperable obstacle to agreement.

Unfortunately, the United States has recently reconsidered the issue of child-centered jurisdiction during the process of studying the interstate child support system. After a long and serious debate, the United States Commission on Interstate Child Support and the drafters of the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act determined that any attempt to base jurisdiction on the residence of the maintenance creditor or the child would be unconstitutional under the United States Supreme Court's interpretation of the Due Process Clause as applied to the exercise of jurisdiction by state courts in maintenance cases. Thus, the Uniform Act expands those actions of a maintenance debtor that would subject him to jurisdiction to the limits allowed by the Supreme Court but does not attempt to base jurisdiction on the habitual residence of the maintenance creditor or of the child.

Some of the jurisdictional bases of the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act would probably be unacceptable to the states that are parties to the 1973 Hague Convention. The Uniform Act authorizes a state to exercise jurisdiction when the defendant is served with a citation in the jurisdiction. This is a form of "tag" jurisdiction, which although common and accepted in the United States, is not generally accepted in civil law countries. The same may be true of jurisdiction based on the fact that sexual relations took place in the state which may have resulted in the conception of the child. This could result in taking jurisdiction when neither the maintenance creditor or debtor were habitually resident in the state.

C. Toward an Accommodation

When states have jurisdictional rules that are this divergent, it is very difficult to draft a mutually acceptable convention on jurisdiction. The current experience with the attempt to agree on rules of jurisdiction with respect to the proposed convention on International Jurisdiction and the Effects of Foreign Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters is illustrative of the difficulties. The success of the 1996 Hague Convention on Jurisdiction, Applicable Law, Recognition, Enforcement and Co-operation in Respect of Parental Responsibility and Measures for the Protection of Children is due to the fact that the jurisdictional rules of both the common law and the civil law countries for measures dealing with the protection of minors are based on the relationship between the child and the state which is taking the measure. Therefore, agreement on the use of the habitual residence of the child as the primary jurisdictional standard was easy to obtain. However, because the rules on jurisdiction in maintenance cases are so diverse, it is very unlikely that rules of jurisdiction could be drafted which would be acceptable on a global basis.

A more productive approach would be to focus the discussion on standards for the recognition of judgments. It is possible to agree on which judgments should be recognized without agreeing on rules of jurisdiction. This can be accomplished by granting recognition to all maintenance judgments which were rendered on a factual basis which would satisfy the jurisdictional rules of the state that is requested to recognize the judgment. Under this principle, it would not matter what jurisdictional basis the requesting state's court articulated when it rendered the judgment. The crucial question is whether, regardless of the reasons stated by the court of the requesting state, the facts of the case would support jurisdiction under the rules of the requested state. If so, the judgment should be recognized.

Under this proposal, a maintenance judgment from another country would be recognized by a party to the 1973 Hague Convention so long as the facts of the case indicated that it was rendered by a state that was the habitual residence of the maintenance creditor or debtor, was by the court of a state recognized as having jurisdiction over the divorce, legal separation or annulment of the parties, was the place of common nationality of the parties, or was the jurisdiction to which the maintenance debtor submitted. The United States would recognize a maintenance judgment of another state so long as the facts of the case indicated that jurisdiction could have been predicated on any of the grounds specified in the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act.

This proposal will result in the recognition of most maintenance judgments. There will be a few cases where recognition will not be possible. In those cases there should be an agreement that the non-recognizing country will obtain a new order against the maintenance debtor. Any proposed convention should include procedures for a state to request the establishment of a maintenance order in another state, particularly where the requested state cannot recognize the first state's maintenance judgment.

* * * *

D. Conclusion

It would greatly simplify the task of revising the maintenance conventions if there were no attempt to draft direct or indirect rules of jurisdiction. Instead, as indicated above, the revision should focus on accommodating all divergent jurisdictional views by a standard that requires recognition when the factual basis underlying the maintenance judgment satisfies the jurisdictional rules of the requested state.

5. International Wills Convention

On August 2, 1991, the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification of the Convention Providing a Uniform Law on the Form of an International Will, adopted at a diplomatic conference held in Washington, D.C. on October 26, 1973, entered into force on February 9, 1978 ("Wills Convention"), reprinted in 12 I.L.M. 1298 (1973). Advice and consent was provided subject to the understanding in the President's Letter of Transmittal that the U.S. instrument of ratification would not be deposited until after necessary federal legislation was enacted. See S. Treaty Doc. No. 99–29 (1986). In the United States the authority to execute an international will remains a matter of state law. A number of U.S. states have enacted the Uniform International Wills Act, prepared by the Uniform Law Commissioners for this purpose. The federal legislation would address, among other things, the validity of certain international wills in the United States and designation of U.S. diplomatic and consular agents to act with regard to U.S. nationals abroad and military officers licensed to practice law to act with regard to members of U.S. Armed Forces and other eligible legal assistance clients. Legislation had not been enacted at the time this volume went to press and the Wills Convention had not yet entered into force for the United States.

Sanctions

A. IMPOSITION OF SANCTIONS

1. Burma

Section 570 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Act, 1997, Pub. L. No. 104–208, 110 Stat. 3009 (1996), required imposition of certain sanctions on Burma and authorized the President to prohibit investment in that country upon a determination that the Government of Burma had committed large-scale repression or violence against the democratic opposition. In addition, § 570(d) required a report to Congress every six months on conditions in Burma and U.S. policy. Excerpts below from the semiannual report submitted December 2, 1997, describe implementation of § 570 and summarize progress in implementing U.S. policy. The semiannual reports also addressed issues identified in § 570(d), measuring progress: (1) toward democratization; (2) on improving the quality of life; and (3) development of a multilateral strategy.

The full text of the December 1997 report is available at www.state.gov/www/regions/eap/971202_us-burma_report.html. The semiannual report submitted April 25, 2000, the last covering the 1991–1999 period, is available at www.state.gov/www/regions/eap/000425_us-burma_report.html.

U.S. policy toward Burma seeks progress in three key areas: democracy, human rights, and counternarcotics. We have taken strong measures to pressure the SLORC to end its repression and move towards democratic government. Since 1989, the United States has been unable to certify that Burma has cooperated in efforts against narcotics. The U.S. has suspended economic aid, withdrawn GSP and OPIC, implemented an arms embargo, blocked assistance from international financial institutions, downgraded our representation from Ambassador to Charge, and imposed visa restrictions on senior leaders and their families.

In addition, the President signed Executive Order 13047 invoking the authority of section 570(d) of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1997 and of section 203 of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act to impose a ban on new investment by U.S. persons in Burma effective May 21, 1997. The order prohibits U.S. persons from engaging in any of the following activities if they are undertaken pursuant to an agreement, or pursuant to the exercise of rights under such an agreement, that is entered into with the Government of Burma or a nongovernmental entity in Burma on or after May 21, 1997:

— entering a new contract that includes the economic development of resources located in Burma;
— entering a new contract providing for the general supervision and guarantee of another person's performance of a contract that includes the economic development of resources located in Burma;
— the purchase of a share of ownership, including an equity interest, in the economic development of resources located in Burma; or — entering into a contract providing for the participation in royalties, earnings, or profits in the economic development of resources located in Burma, without regard to the form of the participation.

Additionally, the executive order prohibits:

— persons from facilitating transactions of foreign persons that would violate any of the foregoing prohibitions if engaged in by a U.S. person; and — any transaction by a U.S. person or within the United States that evades or avoids, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions in the order.

We are engaged in vigorous multilateral diplomacy to encourage ASEAN, Japan, the EU, and other nations to take similar steps and/or other actions to encourage progress by the SLORC in these areas of key concern. The EU imposed visa restrictions similar to ours and, earlier this year, withdrew certain trade preferences. Canada also withdrew GSP completely in August, imposed a requirement that all Canadian exports be issued an export permit prior to shipment to Burma, and issued a government statement discouraging further investment in Burma by Canadian firms. Japan's suspension of much of its bilateral aid program remains in force.

The net effect of these U.S. and international measures has been a further decline of investor confidence in Burma and deeper stagnation of the Burmese economy. While Burma's economic crisis is largely a result of the SLORC's own heavy-handed mismanagement, the SLORC is unlikely to find a way out of the crisis unless political developments permit an easing of international pressure.

E.O. 13047, referred to in the report to Congress above, was published at 62 Fed. Reg. 28,301 (May 22, 1997). I have taken these steps in response to a deepening pattern of severe repression by the State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC) in Burma. During the past 7 months, the SLORC has arrested and detained large numbers of students and opposition supporters, sentenced dozens to long-term imprisonment, and prevented the expression of political views by the democratic opposition, including Aung San Suu Kyi and the National League for Democracy (NLD). It is my judgment that recent actions by the regime in Rangoon constitute large-scale repression of the democratic opposition committed by the Government of Burma within the meaning of section 570(b) of the Act.

The Burmese authorities also have committed serious abuses in their recent military campaign against Burma's Karen minority, forcibly conscripting civilians and compelling thousands to flee into Thailand. Moreover, Burma remains the world's leading producer of opium and heroin, with official tolerance of drug trafficking and traffickers in defiance of the views of the international community.

I believe that the actions and policies of the SLORC regime constitute an extraordinary and unusual threat to the security and stability of the region, and therefore to the national security and foreign policy of the United States.

It is in the national security and foreign policy interests of the United States to seek an end to abuses of human rights in Burma and to support efforts to achieve democratic reform. Progress on these issues would promote regional peace and stability and would be in the political, security, and economic interests of the United States.

2. Haiti

On October 4, 1991, President George H.W. Bush issued E.O. 12775, declaring a national emergency with respect to Haiti and imposing sanctions, as part of an effort to restore democracy in Haiti following the overthrow of Jean-Bertrand Aristide in September 1991. 56 Fed. Reg. 50,641 (Oct. 7, 1991). See also 2 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 44 at 814–817 (Nov. 4, 1991). The Office of Foreign Assets Control ("OFAC" or "FAC"), Department of the Treasury, issued the Haitian Transaction Regulations implementing this executive order effective March 31, 1992. 57 Fed. Reg. 10,820 (Mar. 31, 1992). During the next three years the United States imposed sanctions—unilaterally, together with the Organization of American States, and in implementation of UN Security Council resolutions. Sanctions were fully lifted only when Jean-Bertrand Aristide was restored to power on October 15, 1994. Throughout this period the President transmitted messages to Congress pursuant to 50 U.S.C. §§ 1641(c) and 1703(c), which require semiannual reports whenever the President exercises his authority to declare a national emergency under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act ("IEEPA").

On October 13, 1994, just days before the return of Aristide to Haiti, President William J. Clinton transmitted the penultimate report pursuant to those provisions. The report provided the following background and summary of U.S. actions during the three years of diplomacy, sanctions, and threat of use of force. 30 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2012 (Oct. 13, 1994). See also Chapter 1.C.2. j. and m. and 3.a. concerning sanctions connected with immigration and visas, and Chapters 17.B.5. and 18.A.5.b.(1) discussing U.S. involvement in peacekeeping efforts in Haiti.

1. In December 1990, the Haitian people elected Jean-Bertrand Aristide as their President by an overwhelming margin in a free and fair election. The United States praised Haiti's success in peacefully implementing its democratic constitutional system and provided significant political and economic support to the new government. The Haitian military abruptly interrupted the consolidation of Haiti's new democracy when, in September 1991, it illegally and violently ousted President Aristide from office and drove him into exile.

2. The United States, on its own and together with the Organization of American States (OAS), immediately imposed sanctions against the illegal regime. The United States also actively supported the efforts of the OAS and the United Nations to restore democracy to Haiti and to bring about President Aristide's return by facilitating negotiations between the Haitian parties. The United States and the international community also offered material assistance within the context of an eventual negotiated settlement of the Haitian crisis to support the return to democracy, build constitutional structures, and foster economic well-being.

As a result of continuing military intransigence in the face of these efforts and of worsening human rights abuses in Haiti, the conclusion was reached that no political settlement of the Haitian crisis was possible as long as the three principal military leaders remained in power. Therefore, beginning in early May 1994, a series of steps were taken to intensify the pressure of sanctions on the military leaders and their associates in order to bring the three leaders to step down. With U.S. leadership, the U.N. Security Council on May 6, 1994, enacted Resolution 917, imposing comprehensive trade sanctions and other measures on Haiti. This was followed by a succession of unilateral United States sanctions —banning scheduled air service and financial transactions to or from Haiti or between Haiti and third countries through the United States and blocking the assets in the United States or under United States control of Haitians resident in Haiti. Additionally, under authorities not related to the IEEPA, all visas that had been issued to Haitians at Port-au-Prince or Curacao before May 11, 1994, were revoked. Several other countries took similar actions.

The continued resistance of the illegal regime to the efforts of the international community also prompted the United States to augment embargo enforcement. The United States and other countries entered into a cooperative endeavor with the Dominican Republic to monitor that country's enforcement of sanctions along its land border with Haiti and in its coastal waters.

As the reporting period progressed, it became apparent that the Haitian military leaders, even under the pressure of intense worldwide sanctions, were determined to cling to power and to block the restoration of democracy and return of President Aristide. Internal repression continued to worsen, exemplified by the expulsion in July of the UN/OAS-sponsored International Civilian Mission (ICM) human rights observers. As a result of this deterioration and the threat it posed to peace and security in the region, the U.N. Security Council enacted Resolution 940 on July 31, 1994, authorizing the use of all necessary means to bring about the departure of the military leadership and the return of the legitimate authorities including President Aristide. In the succeeding weeks, the international community under U.S. leadership assembled a multinational coalition force to carry out this mandate.

On September 18, 1994, I directed the deployment of U.S. Armed Forces to Haiti to remove the military leaders and restore democracy. However, I remained deeply committed to achieving our goals peacefully if possible. Therefore, on the previous day I had sent former President Jimmy Carter, Senator Sam Nunn and retired General Colin Powell to Haiti on a final diplomatic mission. The combination of an imminent military operation and determined diplomacy led to an agreement on September 18, that portends the early achievement of our and the international community's goals in Haiti. The military leaders have relinquished power and the legitimate authorities will be restored by October 15 at the latest. As a result of the agreement reached in Port-au-Prince on September 18, U.S. forces in the vanguard of the multinational coalition force drawn from 26 countries began a peaceful deployment to Haiti on September 19.

In a spirit of reconciliation and reconstruction, President Aristide called on September 25 for the immediate ceasing of sanctions to further the mission of the coalition forces and begin without delay the work of rebuilding. In response to this request, on September 26, in an address before the United Nations General Assembly, I announced my intention to suspend all unilateral sanctions against Haiti except those that affect the military leaders and their immediate supporters and families. I also directed that steps be taken in accordance with Resolutions 917 and 940 to permit supplies and services to flow to Haiti to restore health care, water and electrical services, provide construction materials for humanitarian programs, and allow the shipment of communications, agricultural, and educational materials.

Regulations to accomplish those objectives were published in the Federal Register on October 5. In addition, the U.N. Security Council on September 29 enacted Resolution 944 directing that all U.N. sanctions be terminated the day after President Aristide returns to Haiti. Finally, the national emergency with respect to Haiti was extended on September 30, 1994, to allow the continued enforcement of those sanctions that are to remain in force until the restoration of democracy to Haiti is completed as will be signified by President Aristide's return to his country.

Excerpts below from reports of April 25, 1994, 30 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 91 (May 2, 1994) and further excerpts from the report of October 13, 1994, supra, provide more detailed descriptions of U.S. actions.

Message to Congress, April 25, 1994

* * * *

4. Economic sanctions against the de facto regime in Haiti were first imposed in October 1991. On October 4, 1991, in Executive Order No. 12775, President Bush declared a national emergency to deal with the threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States caused by events that had occurred in Haiti to disrupt the legitimate exercise of power by the democratically elected government of that country (56 Fed. Reg. 50,641). In that order, the President ordered the immediate blocking of all property and interests in property of the Government of Haiti (including the Banque de la Republique d'Haiti) then or thereafter located in the United States or within the possession or control of a U.S. person, including its overseas branches. The Executive order also prohibited any direct or indirect payments or transfers to the de facto regime in Haiti of funds or other financial or investment assets or credits by any U.S. person, including its overseas branches, or by any entity organized under the laws of Haiti and owned or controlled by a U.S. person.

Subsequently, on October 28, 1991, President Bush issued Executive Order No. 12779, adding trade sanctions against Haiti to the sanctions imposed on October 4 (56 Fed. Reg. 55,975). This order prohibited exportation from the United States of goods, technology, services, and importation into the United States of Haitian-origin goods and services, after November 5, 1991, with certain limited exceptions. The order exempted trade in publications and other informational materials from the import, export, and payment prohibitions and permitted the exportation to Haiti of donations to relieve human suffering as well as commercial sales of five food commodities: rice, beans, sugar, wheat flour, and cooking oil. In order to permit the return to the United States of goods being prepared for U.S. customers by Haiti's substantial "assembly sector," the order also permitted, through December 5, 1991, the importation into the United States of goods assembled or processed in Haiti that contained parts or materials previously exported to Haiti from the United States. On February 5, 1992, it was announced that specific licenses could be applied for on a case-by-case basis by U.S. persons wishing to resume a pre-embargo import/export relationship with the assembly sector in Haiti.

5. On June 30, 1993, I issued Executive Order No. 12853 that expanded the blocking of assets of the de facto regime to include assets of Haitian nationals identified by the Secretary of the Treasury as providing substantial financial or material contributions to the regime, or doing substantial business with the regime. That Executive Order also implemented United Nations Security Council Resolution ("UNSC Resolution") 841 of June 16, 1993, by prohibiting the sale or supply by U.S. persons or from the United States, or using U.S.-registered vessels or aircraft, of petroleum or petroleum products or arms and related materiel of all types to any person or entity in Haiti, or for the purpose of any business carried on in or operated from Haiti, or promoting or calculated to promote such sale or supply. Carriage of such goods to Haiti on U.S.-registered vessels is prohibited, as is any transaction for the evasion or avoidance of, or attempt to evade or avoid, any prohibition in the order.

6. As noted in my previous report, apparent steady progress toward achieving the firm goal of restoring democracy in Haiti permitted the United States and the world community to suspend economic sanctions against Haiti in August 1993. With strong support from the United States, the United Nations Security Council adopted Resolution 861 on August 27, 1993, suspending the petroleum, arms, and financial sanctions imposed under UNSC

Resolution 841. On the same day, the Secretary General of the OAS announced that the OAS was urging member states to suspend their trade embargoes. In concert with these U.N. and OAS actions, U.S. trade and financial restrictions against Haiti were suspended, effective at 9:35 a.m. e.d.t., on August 31, 1993.

These steps demonstrated my determination and that of the international community to see that Haiti and the Haitian people resume their rightful place in our hemispheric community of democracies. Our work to reach a solution to the Haitian crisis through the Governors Island Agreement was however seriously threatened by accelerating violence in Haiti sponsored or tolerated by the de facto regime. The violence culminated on October 11, 1993, with the obstruction by armed "attachés," supported by the Haitian military and police, of the deployment of U.S. military trainers and engineers sent to Haiti as part of the United Nations Mission in Haiti. The Haitian military's decision to dishonor its commitments made in the Governors Island Agreement was apparent. On October 13, 1993, the United Nations Security Council issued Resolution 873, which terminated the suspension of sanctions effective at 11:59 p.m. e.d.t., October 18, 1993.

As a result, effective at 11:59 p.m. e.d.t., October 18, 1993, the Department of the Treasury revoked the suspension of those trade and financial sanctions that had been suspended, so that the full scope of prior prohibitions was reinstated (58 Fed. Reg. 54,024, October 19, 1993). In addition to the actions I took in Executive Order No. 12853, the reinstated sanctions in the Haitian Transactions Regulations, 31 C.F.R. Part 580 (the "HTR"), prohibit most unlicensed trade with Haiti, and block the assets of the de facto regime in Haiti and the Government of Haiti. Restrictions on the entry into U.S. ports of vessels whose Haitian calls would violate U.S. or OAS sanctions had they been made by U.S. persons were also reinstated.

Also effective at 11:59 p.m. e.d.t., October 18, 1993, I issued Executive Order No. 12872 (58 Fed. Reg. 54,029), authorizing the Department of the Treasury to block assets of persons who have: (1) contributed to the obstruction of UNSC resolutions 841 and 873, the Governors Island Agreement, or the activities of the U.N. Mission in Haiti; (2) perpetuated or contributed to the violence in Haiti; or (3) materially or financially supported either the obstruction or the violence referred to above. This authority is in addition to the blocking authority provided for in the original sanctions and in Executive Order No. 12853 of June 30, 1993, and ensures adequate authority to reach assets subject to U.S. jurisdiction of military and police officials, civilian "attaches" and their financial patrons meeting these criteria. A list of 41 such individuals was published on November 1, 1993, by the Office of Foreign Assets Control (FAC) of the Department of the Treasury (58 Fed. Reg. 58,480).

On October 18, I ordered the deployment of six U.S. Navy vessels off Haiti's shores. To improve compliance with the ban on petroleum and munitions shipments to Haiti contained in UNSC resolutions 841 and 873, my Administration succeeded in securing the passage of UNSC Resolution No. 875. UNSC Resolution 875 calls upon the United Nations Member States acting either nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements to halt inward maritime shipping for Haiti in order to inspect and verify that the Haiti-bound cargo does not contain UNSC-prohibited petroleum or arms. A multinational Maritime Interdiction Force that includes elements of the U.S. Navy and the U.S. Coast Guard has been established and now patrols the waters off Haiti.

7. The declaration of the national emergency on October 4, 1991, was made pursuant to the authority vested in the President by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.) (IEEPA), the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.), and section 301 of title 3 of the United States Code. The emergency declaration was reported to the Congress on October 4, 1991, pursuant to section 204(b) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1703(b)). The additional sanctions set forth in Executive Orders Nos. 12779, 12853, and 12872, were imposed pursuant to the authority vested in the President by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the statutes cited above, as well as the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 (22 U.S.C. 287c), and represent the response by the United States to the United Nations Security Council and OAS directives and recommendations discussed above.

9. In implementing the Haitian sanctions program, FAC has made extensive use of its authority to specifically license transactions with respect to Haiti in an effort to mitigate the effects of the sanctions on the legitimate Government of Haiti and on the livelihood of Haitian workers employed by Haiti's assembly sector, and to ensure the availability of necessary medicines and medical supplies and the undisrupted flow of humanitarian donations to Haiti's poor. . . .

10. During this reporting period, U.S.-led OAS initiatives resulted in even greater intensification and coordination of enforcement activities. Continued close coordination with the U.S. Customs Service in Miami sharply reduced the number of attempted exports of unmanifested, unauthorized merchandise. New FAC initiatives are expected to result in more effective coordination of Customs Service and Department of Justice activities in prosecution of embargo violations. During the reporting period, the multinational Maritime Interdiction Force that contains elements of the U.S. Navy and U.S. Coast Guard, continued to patrol offshore Haiti and to conduct ship boardings, inspections of cargoes bound for Haiti, identification of suspected violators, and referrals for investigation. . . .

Message to Congress, October 13, 1994

* * * *

8. Since my report of April 25, 1994, in order to implement UNSC Resolution 917 of May 6, and to take additional steps with respect to the actions and policies of the de facto regime in Haiti, I issued Executive Order No. 12914, dated May 7, 1994. Effective at 11:59 p.m. e.d.t., on May 8, 1994, the order blocks all funds and financial resources of three categories of individuals that are or hereafter come within the possession or control of U.S. persons, including their overseas branches. These groups include (a) all officers of the Haitian military, including the police, and their immediate families; (b) the major participants in the coup d'etat in Haiti of 1991 and in the illegal governments since the coup d'etat and their immediate families; and (c) those employed by or acting on behalf of the Haitian military, and their immediate families. The Executive Order also bans arriving and departing flights, and overflights stopping or originating in Haiti, except regularly scheduled commercial passenger flights. . . . E.O. No. 12914 (59 Fed. Reg. 24,339, May 10, 1994) . . .

9. Subsequently, on May 21, 1994, in implementation of UNSC Resolution 917 of May 6, and in order to further strengthen sanctions in response to the actions and policies of the de facto regime in Haiti, I issued Executive Order No. 12917. Effective at 11:59 p.m. e.d.t., on May 21, 1994, the order prohibits (1) the importation into the United States of any goods originating in Haiti or services performed in Haiti, that are exported from Haiti after May 21, 1994, or any activity by any U.S. persons or in the United States that promotes, or is intended to promote, such importation; (2) any activity by U.S. persons or in the United States that promotes the exportation or transshipment of any goods originating in Haiti that are exported from Haiti after May 21, 1994; (3) any dealing by U.S. persons or in the United States, or using U.S.-registered vessels or aircraft, of any goods originating in Haiti that are exported from Haiti after May 21, 1994; and (4) the sale, supply, or exportation by U.S. persons or from the United States, or using U.S.-registered vessels or aircraft, of any goods, regardless of origin, to Haiti, or for the purpose of any business carried on in or operated from Haiti, or any activity by U.S. persons or in the United States that promotes such sale, supply, or exportation.

Exemptions from the foregoing prohibitions include: (1) informational materials, such as books and other publications, needed for the free flow of information; (2) the sale, supply, or exportation of medicines and medical supplies, as authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, and rice, beans, sugar, wheat flour, cooking oil, corn, corn flour, milk and edible tallow, provided that neither the de facto regime in Haiti nor any person designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as a blocked individual or entity of Haiti is a direct or indirect party to the transaction; and (3) transactions specifically licensed or otherwise authorized by FAC. . . . E.O. No. 12917 (59 Fed. Reg. 26,925, May 24, 1994). . . .

10. Again, on June 10, 1994, in order to take additional steps with respect to the actions and policies of the de facto regime in Haiti, I issued Executive Order No. 12920. Effective at 11:59 p.m. e.d.t., on June 10, 1994, the order prohibits, first, any payment or transfer of funds or other financial or investment assets or credits to Haiti from or through the United States, or to or through the United States from Haiti, with the following exceptions: (1) payments and transfers for the conduct of activities in Haiti of the United States Government, the United Nations, the OAS, or foreign diplomatic missions; (2) payments and transfers between the United States and Haiti for the conduct of activities in Haiti of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) engaged in the provision in Haiti of essential humanitarian assistance as authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury; (3) payments and transfers from a U.S. person to any close relative of the remitter or of the remitter's spouse who is resident in Haiti, provided that such payments do not exceed $50.00 per month to any one household, and that neither the de facto regime in Haiti nor any person designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as a blocked individual or entity of Haiti is a beneficiary of the remittance; (4) reasonable amounts of funds carried by travelers to or from Haiti to cover their travel-related expenses; and (5) payments and transfers incidental to shipments to Haiti of food, medicine, medical supplies, and informational materials exempt from the export prohibitions of this order. The order also prohibits the sale, supply, or exportation by U.S. persons or from the United States, or using U.S.-registered vessels or aircraft, of any goods, technology, or services, regardless of origin, to Haiti, or for the purpose of any business carried on in or operated from Haiti, or any activity by U.S. persons in the United States that promotes such sale, supply, or exportation. Exportations of the following types are exempt from the foregoing provision: (1) informational materials, such as books and other publications needed for the free flow of information; (2) medicines and medical supplies, as authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, and rice, beans, sugar, wheat flour, cooking oil, corn, corn flour, milk, and edible tallow, provided that neither the de facto regime in Haiti nor any person designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as a blocked individual or entity of Haiti is a direct or indirect party to the transaction; and (3) donations of food, medicine, and medical supplies intended to relieve human suffering. . . . E.O. No. 12920 (59 Fed. Reg. 30,501, June 14, 1994). . . .

11. Once again, on June 21, 1994, in order to take additional steps with respect to the actions and policies of the de facto regime in Haiti, I issued Executive Order No. 12922. Effective at 10:09 p.m. e.d.t., on June 21, 1994, the order blocks all property and interests in property that are or come within the United States or within the possession or control of U.S. persons, including their overseas branches, of (1) any Haitian national resident in Haiti; or (2) any other person subject to the blocking provisions of Executive Order Nos. 12775, 12779, 12853, 12872, or 12914 and Haitian citizens who are members of the immediate family of any such person, as identified by the Secretary of the Treasury. This provision does not apply to property of nongovernmental organizations engaged in the provision of essential humanitarian assistance in Haiti or in the conduct of refugee and migration operations in Haiti, as identified by the Secretary of the Treasury. Payments and transfers previously authorized by Executive Order No. 12920, of June 10, 1994, may continue to be made in a manner directed by the Secretary of the Treasury. . . . Executive Order No. 12922 (59 Fed. Reg. 32,645, June 23, 1994) . . .

12. A policy statement, effective January 31, 1994 (59 Fed. Reg. 8134, February 18, 1994), was published to extend until March 31, 1994, the expiration date for all current assembly sector licenses issued by FAC pursuant to the HTR, and a second policy notice, effective March 29, 1994, was published on April 1, 1994 (59 Fed. Reg. 15,342), extending these licenses through May 31, 1994. These licenses provided an exception to the comprehensive U.S. trade embargo on Haiti under which the "assembly sector" continued to receive parts and supplies from, and supply finished products to, persons in the United States.

Assembly sector trade with the United States accounted for a significant portion of Haiti's imports, and a substantial majority of its exports, prior to the institution of the OAS-requested embargo in November 1991. . . .

As noted above and as mandated by UNSC Resolution 917, Executive Order No. 12917 further restricted imports from and exports to Haiti after May 21, 1994. Consequently, all FAC licenses for importation into the United States from the Haitian assembly sector were withdrawn effective May 22, 1994. The FAC is continuing, in close coordination with the Department of State, to evaluate license applications from U.S. companies seeking to repatriate capital equipment, parts, and components previously exported for use in assembly sector activities.

Following the successful deployment to Haiti of U.S. forces serving as the vanguard of the multinational coalition force, and as promised in my September 26 address before the United Nations General Assembly, amendments to the HTR were published on October 5, 1994, suspending, effective 10:28 a.m. on October 5, 1994, the sanctions that the United States had imposed on Haiti unilaterally, with the exceptions noted below. Section 580.211 of the HTR, which was added to the HTR in June 1992 to deny entry into U.S. ports to vessels engaged in certain trade transactions with Haiti, was removed. A new section, 580.518, was added to license generally the export from the United States to Haiti of all food and food products.

Section 580.519 was added to the HTR to remove the prohibition (which I had imposed in Executive Order No. 12920 on June 14) on payments or transfers of funds or other financial or investment assets to Haiti from or through the United States, or to or through the United States from Haiti. Section 580.520 was added to unblock the property and interests in the United States of Haitian nationals resident in Haiti, which I had blocked in Executive Order No. 12922 on June 23; however, section 580.520 provides that the property and interests in property of certain persons, listed in the revised "Appendix A" to the HTR, will remain blocked until further notice. The HTR were also amended by the addition of section 580.521 to permit the specific licensing of exports to Haiti of fuel and equipment for electric power generation, telecommunications materials, media and educational supplies, agricultural supplies, and construction and transportation supplies for humanitarian purposes. Section 580.522 was added to authorize the case-by-case licensing of charter flights between the United States and Haiti for use by humanitarian relief agencies to transport needed personnel and supplies, or for journalists covering events in Haiti. . . .

On September 29, I directed the Secretary of Transportation to issue the necessary directives to terminate the ban on regularly-scheduled air passenger service between the United States and Haiti that had been imposed on June 24.

The HTR will be further amended upon the return of President Aristide to Haiti to provide that, in accordance with U.N. Resolution 944 of September 29, 1994, on the day following his return, the U.S. sanctions imposed pursuant to U.N. Resolutions 841, 873, and 917 will be terminated. At that time, I will also direct the Secretary of Transportation to rescind the ban on all other air transportation (all cargo and charter) between the United States and Haiti that I imposed on May 7, 1994.

13. Humanitarian Shipments. Executive Order No. 12917 revoked an earlier exception to the export ban permitting the exportation to Haiti of "donated articles to relieve human suffering." . . . However, the Executive Order provides an exemption from its trade prohibitions for the sale, supply, or exportation of certain basic commodities essential to humanitarian assistance programs serving Haiti's urban and rural poor, i.e., medicines and medical supplies and certain nutritional staples of the Haitian diet, as well as for informational materials. The FAC developed procedures to facilitate U.N. Sanctions Committee approval for humanitarian shipments to Haiti that do not fall within the narrowly-defined U.N. exemption categories. Specific authorizations have also been issued on a case-by-case basis for commercial deliveries to certain "blocked individuals of Haiti," in order to allow the continued supply in Haiti of essential foodstuffs, while retaining the ability to closely monitor such transactions. . . .

Humanitarian Services. Executive Order No. 12920 exempts from its financial prohibitions payments and transfers between the United States and Haiti in support of the conduct of activities in Haiti of NGOs engaged in the provision in Haiti of essential humanitarian assistance. The FAC immediately issued a specific license to the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID), permitting it to continue uninterrupted its essential services in Haiti. Subsequently, based on recommendations by AID and the State Department, FAC developed a system of registration for NGOs engaged in relief efforts such as the delivery of food, medicine and medical supplies, as well as refugee and migration operations, to assure that approved payment orders are neither rejected nor blocked by U.S. banks in implementing the financial prohibitions of recent Executive orders. . . .

Air Transportation Services. Executive Order No. 12914, effective 11:59 p.m. e.d.t., May 8, 1994, banned arriving and departing flights and overflights stopping or originating in Haiti, except regularly scheduled commercial passenger flights. On June 10, an order was issued by the President to the Secretary of Transportation that terminated, effective June 24, 1994, regularly scheduled air service between the United States and Haiti by U.S. and Haitian carriers.

Specific licenses have been issued to authorize air ambulance services for medical evacuation flights to and from Haiti [and] certain cargo flights for the delivery of humanitarian shipments, including food and medicine, by registered NGOs. . . .

Blocked Haitian-Owned Vessels. Several dozen Haitian-owned vessels in the United States were blocked by Executive Order No. 12922 on June 21, 1994. . . .

Specific licenses have been issued to U.S. agents for the blocked vessels to authorize the provisioning, maintenance and repairs necessary to ensure seaworthiness to facilitate the lawful return of crew members to their home countries. No debits of U.S.-blocked funds were authorized by such licenses. . . .

14. Following the issuance of the blocking order in Executive Order No. 12922 on June 21, more than 1200 Haitian accounts were blocked totaling in excess of $79.1 million as of August 30, 1994. . . .

15. . . . During the reporting period, the multi-national Maritime Interdiction Force (MIF), which contains elements of the U.S. Navy and U.S. Coast Guard, continued to patrol offshore Haiti and to conduct ship boardings, inspections of cargoes bound for Haiti, identification of suspected violators and referrals for investigation. . . . With assumption of control of Haitian ports by the Multinational Force following its September 19 deployment to Haiti, enforcement of the maritime sanctions in the ports became possible. The MIF operations therefore were terminated on September 28, 1994.

16. Since my report of April 25, 1994, in consultation with the Department of State and other Federal agencies, FAC has issued General Notices No. 5, No. 6, No. 7, No. 8, No. 9, and No. 10, "Notification of Blocked Individuals and Blocked Entities of Haiti." The Notices (issued June 2, June 17, June 22 (two Notices, August 2, and September 14, 1994, respectively) identify a total of 372 additional individuals and 94 companies and banks determined by the Department of the Treasury to be Blocked Individuals and Blocked Entities of Haiti. These are persons (1) who seized power illegally from the democratically-elected government of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide on September 30, 1991, or who have since the effective date of Executive Order No. 12775, acted or purported to act directly or indirectly on behalf of, or under the asserted authority of, such persons or of any agencies, instrumentalities or entities of the de facto regime in Haiti or any extra-constitutional successor thereto; (2) are the immediate family members of an individual who is (a) an officer of the Haitian military, including the police, (b) a major participant in the coup d'etat in Haiti of 1991 or in the illegal governments since the coup d'etat, (c) employed by or acting on behalf of the Haitian military, or (d) a Haitian national resident in Haiti; or persons subject to the blocking provisions of Executive Orders No. 12775, No. 12779, No. 12853, No. 12872, or No. 12914, or a Haitian citizen who is member of the immediate family of such person. United States persons are prohibited from engaging in transactions with these entities and individuals and with all officers of the Haitian military unless the transactions are licensed by FAC. All assets owned or controlled by these parties that are or come within the United States or that are or come within the possession or control of U.S. persons, including their overseas branches, are blocked. United States persons are not prohibited, however, from paying funds owed to these entities or individuals into blocked Government of Haiti Account No. 021083909 at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, or, pursuant to specific licenses issued by FAC, into blocked accounts held in the names of the blocked parties in domestic U.S. financial institutions.

Following the return of Jean-Bertrand Aristide to Haiti on October 15, 1994, the United States terminated the remaining sanctions as contemplated. Excerpts below from President Clinton's final report to Congress dated February 3, 1995, describe the actions taken. 31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 185 (Feb. 6, 1995).

On October 15, President Aristide returned to Haiti to assume his official responsibilities. Effective October 16, 1994, by Executive Order No. 12932 (59 Fed. Reg. 52403, October 14, 1994), I terminated the national emergency declared on October 4, 1991, in Executive Order No. 12775, along with all sanctions with respect to Haiti imposed in that Executive Order, subsequent Executive Orders, and the Department of the Treasury regulations to deal with that emergency. This termination does not affect compliance and enforcement actions involving prior transactions or violations of the sanctions.

4. The Department of the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control (FAC) amended the Haitian Transactions Regulations, 31 C.F.R. Part 580 (the "HTR") on December 27, 1994 (59 Fed. Reg. 66,476, December 27, 1994), to add section 580.524, indicating the termination of sanctions pursuant to Executive Order No. 12932, effective October 16, 1994. The effect of this amendment is to authorize all transactions previously prohibited by subpart B of the HTR or by the previously stated Executive Orders. Reports due under general or specific license must still be filed with FAC covering activities up until the effective date of this termination. Enforcement actions with respect to past violations of the sanctions are not affected by the termination of sanctions. . . .

3. Cuba

a. The Cuban Democracy Act of 1992

In an effort to bring about a transition to democracy in Cuba, Congress passed the Cuban Democracy Act of 1992, Pub. L. No. 102–484, tit. XII, §§ 1201–10, 22 U.S.C. §§ 6001–6010 (1994) ("CDA"). Among other things, the CDA modified the existing Cuba embargo and imposed civil penalties. President Clinton implemented the CDA by issuing Executive Order ("E.O.") 12854 of July 4, 1993, delegating authority to the Departments of State, Treasury and Commerce.

The Department of the Treasury amended the Cuban Assets Control Regulations, 31 CFR pt. 515 (1993), to bring them into conformity with the CDA in a rule promulgated on June 29, 1993. The Federal Register described the action as excerpted below. 58 Fed. Reg. 34,709 (June 29, 1993).

* * * *

The enactment on October 23, 1992, of the Cuban Democracy Act of 1992, sections 1701–12, Public Law 102–484, 106 Stat. 2575 (the "CDA"), requires changes to the Cuban Assets Control Regulations, 31 CFR part 515 (the "Regulations"), to effect the modification of the Cuban embargo contained in the CDA. Section 515.207 is amended to add to the Regulations a prohibition on the entry of a vessel into the United States to load or unload any freight if the vessel has entered Cuba in the trade of goods or services. Such a vessel may not enter the United States to load or unload freight for 180 days from the day it has departed Cuba. Section 515.559 is amended to reflect the CDA's prohibitions on the issuance of most licenses for trade with Cuba under that section to entities that are owned or controlled by a U.S. person and located in third countries. Such licenses may be granted only for transactions based on contracts entered into before October 23, 1992, or for other transactions authorized by the CDA involving the exportation of medicine or medical equipment, or telecommunications equipment. Section 515.571 is added to authorize vessels to enter the United States after calling in Cuba where the vessels' trade with Cuba was authorized by the U.S Treasury Department or by the U.S. Commerce Department consistent with the requirements of the CDA.

Because the CDA amends section 16 of the Trading With the Enemy Act, 50 U.S.C. App. 16, to permit the imposition of civil monetary penalties and civil forfeiture, Subpart G is extensively revised to establish the procedures governing the imposition of civil penalties. In addition, § 515.417 is added to the Regulations to provide an interpretation of the limitations contained in the CDA on the use of civil penalties.

Section 1705 of the CDA authorizes certain transactions for the support of the Cuban People. . . .

* * * *

By letter of July 22, 1993, the Department of State provided general policy guidelines to the Federal Communications Commission for implementation of the telecommunications provisions of the CDA. The FCC published a notice in the Federal Register dated July 27, 1993, attaching the letter and notifying applicants for circuits between the United States and Cuba that they must comply with criteria set forth in the letter. 58 Fed. Reg. 46,193 (Sept. 1, 1993). The letter, excerpted below, also indicated that OFAC would license travel and payments related to telecommunications arrangements, see 58 Fed. Reg. 45,060 (Aug. 26, 1993) and that the Department of Commerce's Bureau of Export Administration would permit the export of telecommunications commodities for approved projects.

---

* * * *

The purpose of this letter is to inform you of the Executive branch's general policy guidelines for implementation of the telecommunications provisions of the Cuban Democracy Act. These guidelines provide guidance to the Commission in considering proposals for telecommunications between the United States and Cuba. Also set forth is an action plan for the Departments of State, Treasury and Commerce, and the FCC.

Section 1705(e)(1) of the Cuban Democracy Act (CDA), states that "telecommunication services between the United States and Cuba shall be permitted." It further provides that "* * * telecommunications facilities are authorized in such quantity and of such quality as may be necessary to provide efficient and adequate telecommunications services between the United States and Cuba." The CDA also allows for full or partial payment of amounts due to Cuba as a result of the provision of such service.

Other provisions of the CDA are intended to tighten the economic embargo on Castro, and in section 1710(a) the Secretary of the Treasury is charged with ensuring that activities permitted under the CDA, such as telecommunications, are carried out for the purposes of the CDA and not for "the accumulation by the Cuban government of excessive amounts of United States currency or the accumulation of excessive profits by any person or entity."

The Executive branch has developed a policy which provides for open competition among all telecommunications carriers which comply with Federal Communications Commission regulations and are licensed as appropriate by Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control and Commerce's Bureau of Export Administration. The policy implements the applicable provisions of the CDA by authorizing the provision of service to Cuba as [set forth in further detail in following paragraphs.]

Section 525(b) of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1994 and 1995, Pub. L. No. 103–236, 108 Stat. 474 (1994), amended section 5(b)(4) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 50 U.S.C. App. 1–44 ("TWEA"), to expand the list of items considered to be information or informational materials. Under this section of TWEA, often referred to as the Berman Amendment, the President is prohibited from regulating or prohibiting the importation or exportation of such materials. In implementing the new provision, OFAC amended certain aspects of the Cuban Assets Control

Regulations but noted the relationship between the CDA and TWEA as follows:

> The provision of, and payments for, telecommunications services between Cuba and the United States are governed exclusively by section 1705 of the Cuban Democracy Act . . . That section authorizes such services, but permits the regulation of payments to Cuba for telecommunications. The CDA provision on telecommunications preempts the provisions of TWEA on information and informational materials to the extent that the provisions are inconsistent. 60 Fed. Reg. 39,255 (Aug. 2, 1995).

b. The LIBERTAD Act

On March 12, 1996, President Clinton signed the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (LIBERTAD) Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–114, 110 Stat. 785 (1996) (also referred to as the Helms-Burton Act). Titles I and II of the act contained a list of restrictions and incentives aiming to bring about a transition to democracy in Cuba. Section 204 of the act authorized the President to take steps to suspend the embargo, but only after submitting a determination to Congress that a "transition government" is in power in Cuba. A 1998 U.S. State Department fact sheet, available at www.state.gov/www/regions/wha/cuba/helms.html, described the law as follows:

After the fall of Communist governments in the Soviet bloc in the early 1990s, members of Congress sought to increase pressure for peaceful democratic change in Cuba and to deter international involvement with property claimed by U.S. citizens that had been expropriated without compensation by the Cuban Government. This led to the development of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (Libertad) Act, known as the Helms-Burton Act after its principal sponsors. In February 1996, Cuban MiGs shot down two civilian aircraft in international air space, killing three U.S.

citizens and one U.S. resident. Congress then passed the act by overwhelming margins. The President signed it into law on March 12, 1996.

Provisions

Title I strengthened sanctions against the current Cuban Government. Among many other provisions, it codified the U.S. embargo on trade and financial transactions which had been in effect pursuant to a Presidential proclamation since the Kennedy Administration.

Title II describes U.S. policy toward and assistance to a free and independent Cuba. It required the President to produce a plan for providing economic assistance to a transition or democratic government in Cuba. (The President delivered the plan to Congress in January 1997.)

Title III creates a private cause of action and authorizes U.S. nationals with claims to confiscated property in Cuba to file suit in U.S. courts against persons that may be "trafficking" in that property. The Act grants the President the authority to suspend the lawsuit provisions for periods of 6 months if it is necessary to the national interest of the United States and will expedite a transition to democracy in Cuba. The President has exercised this authority five times, most recently in July 1998.

Title IV requires the denial of visas to and exclusion from the U.S. of persons who, after March 12, 1996, confiscate or "traffic" in confiscated property in Cuba claimed by U.S. nationals. The objective of this provision is to protect the status of confiscated U.S. property and to support existing sanctions against the current regime. The State Department reviews a broad range of economic activity in Cuba to determine the applicability of Title IV. The results of this effort appear not only in the actual determinations of "trafficking," but also in the deterrent to investment in confiscated U.S. property and in the exacerbation of the uncertainty of investing in Cuba.

* * * *

See Chapter 1.C.2.f. concerning implementation of Title IV and Chapter 8.B.2. concerning decision to suspend Title III. See also Chapter 11.A.6. and B.4.c.; and discussion of international cooperation with U.S. efforts to exert pressure on Cuba to initiate democratic change in statements in July 1997 by Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business, and Agricultural Affairs, Stuart Eizenstat, available at www.state.gov/www/regions/wha/970716a_eizenstat.html and www.state.gov/www/issues/economic/cuba970716.html.

In his statement on signing the LIBERTAD Act, March 12, 1996, excerpted below, President Clinton described the attack on U.S. civilian aircraft to which the act responded and his views on implementation of sanctions consistent with the President's constitutional authority. 32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOCS 478 (Mar. 18, 1996).

Today I have signed into law H.R. 927, the "Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (LIBERTAD) Act of 1996." This Act is a justified response to the Cuban government's unjustified, unlawful attack on two unarmed U.S. civilian aircraft that left three U.S. citizens and one U.S. resident dead. The Act imposes additional sanctions on the Cuban regime, mandates the preparation of a plan for U.S. assistance to transitional and democratically elected Cuban governments, creates a cause of action enabling U.S. nationals to sue those who expropriate or "traffic" in expropriated properties in Cuba, and denies such traffickers entry into the United States. It is a clear statement of our determination to respond to attacks on U.S. nationals and of our continued commitment to stand by the Cuban people in their peaceful struggle for freedom.

Immediately after Cuba's brutal act, I urged that differences on the bill be set aside so that the United States could speak in a single, strong voice. By acting swiftly—just 17 days after the attack—we are sending a powerful message to the Cuban regime that we do not and will not tolerate such conduct.

The Act also reaffirms our common goal of promoting a peaceful transition to democracy in Cuba by tightening the existing embargo while reaching out to the Cuban people. Our current efforts are beginning to yield results: they are depriving the Cuban regime of the hard currency it needs to maintain its grip on power; more importantly, they are empowering the agents of peaceful change on the island. This Act provides further support for the Administration's efforts to strengthen independent organizations in Cuba intent on building democracy and respect for human rights. And I welcome its call for a plan to provide assistance to Cuba under transitional and democratically elected governments.

Consistent with the Constitution, I interpret the Act as not derogating from the President's authority to conduct foreign policy. A number of provisions—sections 104(a), 109(b), 113, 201, 202(e), and 202(f)—could be read to state the foreign policy of the United States, or would direct that particular diplomatic initiatives or other courses of action be taken with respect to foreign countries or governments. While I support the underlying intent of these sections, the President's constitutional authority over foreign policy necessarily entails discretion over these matters. Accordingly, I will construe these provisions to be precatory.

The President must also be able to respond effectively to rapid changes in Cuba. This capability is necessary to ensure that we can advance our national interests in a manner that is conducive to a democratic transition in Cuba. Section 102(h), concerning the codification of the economic embargo, and the requirements for determining that a transitional or democratically elected government is in power, could be read to impose overly rigid constraints on the implementation of our foreign policy. I will continue to work with the Congress to obtain the flexibility needed if the United States is to be in a position to advance our shared interest in a rapid and peaceful transition to democracy in Cuba.

Finally, Title IV of the Act provides for the Secretary of State to deny visas to, and the Attorney General to exclude from the United States, certain persons who confiscate or traffic in expropriated property after the date of enactment of the Act. I understand that the provision was not intended to reach those coming to the United States or United Nations as diplomats. A categorical prohibition on the entry of all those who fall within the scope of section 401 could constrain the exercise of my exclusive authority under Article II of the Constitution to receive ambassadors and to conduct diplomacy. I am, therefore, directing the Secretary of State and the Attorney General to ensure that this provision is implemented in a way that does not interfere with my constitutional prerogatives and responsibilities.

The Cuban regime's lawless downing of two unarmed planes served as a harsh reminder of why a democratic Cuba is vitally important both to the Cuban and to the American people. The LIBERTAD Act, which I have signed into law in memory of the four victims of this cruel attack, reasserts our resolve to help carry the tide of democracy to the shores of Cuba.

OFAC amended the Cuban Assets Control Regulations to bring them into conformity with the LIBERTAD Act in a final rule published July 18, 1996. 61 Fed. Reg. 37,385 (July 18, 1996). Background provided in the Federal Register explained the amendments as excerpted below.

* * * *

Section 515.208 is added to the Regulations to include a specific prohibition on knowingly making a loan, extending credit or other financing by a United States national, permanent resident alien, or a United States agency for the purpose of financing transactions involving confiscated property, the claim to which is owned by a United States national. (All transactions with respect to property or interests in property of the Cuban Government or Cuban nationals are prohibited pursuant to § 515.201 of the Regulations.) Sections 515.334, .335, .336, and .337 are added to the Regulations to incorporate definitions for "United States national," "confiscated," "property," and "permanent resident alien" as used in the Libertad Act's prohibition on financing, contained in § 515.208. Section 515.701 is amended to state that violations of the prohibition on financing are subject to the civil penalties described in that section.

Section 515.701 is further amended to describe the civil penalty authority contained in section 16 of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 50 U.S.C. App. 1–44, as amended by the Libertad Act. Certain restrictions on the use of civil penalty authority were eliminated by the Act and references to those restrictions are removed.

c. Policy on humanitarian assistance and support for civil society

On October 6, 1995, President Clinton announced a number of policy changes to Cuba sanctions. In remarks delivered at the non-governmental organization Freedom House, the President stated:

> In our own hemisphere, only one country, Cuba, continues to resist the trend toward democracy. Today we are announcing new steps to encourage its peaceful transition to a free and open society. We will tighten the enforcement of our embargo to keep the pressure for reform on, but we will promote democracy and the free flow of ideas more actively. I have authorized our news media to open bureaus in Cuba. We will allow more people to travel to and from Cuba for educational, religious, and human rights purposes. We will now permit American non-governmental organizations to engage in a fuller range of activities in Cuba. And today, it gives me great pleasure to announce that our first grant to fund NGO work in Cuba will be awarded to Freedom House to promote peaceful change and protect human rights.

31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1775 (Oct. 9, 1995). Pursuant to this announcement, OFAC amended the Cuban Assets Control Regulations to add three interpretive sections "concerning the authorization of travel transactions related to research, free-lance journalism, and educational activities in Cuba." 60 Fed. Reg. 54,194 (Oct. 20, 1995).

Additional amendments, as described in the Federal Register, included the following:

> A general license is added to permit travel to Cuba once a year in cases of extreme humanitarian need. Statements of licensing policy are added concerning the availability of specific licenses for public performances, educational exchanges, activities of human rights organizations, and the reciprocal establishment of news organization offices.

Payment of expenses for intellectual property protection in Cuba is also authorized. In addition, a number of clarifying technical amendments are included in this final rule.

On March 20, 1998, President Clinton announced steps to expand the flow of humanitarian assistance to Cuba and to support religious freedom and other elements of civil society there. 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 475 (Mar. 23, 1998). See also 63 Fed. Reg. 27,348 (May 18, 1998), amending the Cuban Assets Control Regulations, among other things, "to authorize a person subject to U.S. jurisdiction to make remittances to a close relative in Cuba of up to $300 in any consecutive 3-month period."

Eight weeks ago, His Holiness John Paul II made an historic visit to Cuba. He spoke to and for the Catholic faithful who have for decades endured a system that denied their right to worship freely.

In anticipation and in support of that visit, my administration made a number of exceptions to our policy regarding travel and shipment of humanitarian supplies to Cuba. The response of the Cuban people to that visit has since convinced me that we should continue to look for ways to support Cuba's people without supporting its regime, by providing additional humanitarian relief, increasing human contacts, and helping the Cuban people prepare for a peaceful transition to a free, independent, and prosperous nation.

Prior to the Pope's visit, we authorized direct charter flights for pilgrims to attend Papal services. We also authorized direct humanitarian cargo flights to Cuba in order to reduce the cost of getting these needed supplies to the Cuban people. The deliveries were carefully monitored to ensure that they reached the people for whom they were intended.

These measures were fully consistent with the letter and spirit of the Cuban Democracy Act and the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act, which, in addition to sustaining tough economic sanctions, also enable and encourage the administration to conduct a program of support for the Cuban people.

* * * *

To build further on the impact of the Pope's visit, to support the role of the Church and other elements of civil society in Cuba, and to thereby help prepare the Cuban people for a democratic transition, I have also decided to take the following steps:

— Resume licensing direct humanitarian charter flights to Cuba. Direct humanitarian flights under applicable agency regulations will make it easier for Cuban-Americans to visit loved ones on the island, and for humanitarian organizations to provide needed assistance more expeditiously and at lower cost.
— Establish new licensing arrangements to permit Cuban-Americans and Cuban families living here in the United States to send humanitarian remittances to their families in Cuba at the level of $300 per quarter, as was permitted until 1994. This will enable Cuban-Americans to provide direct support to relatives in Cuba, while moving the current flow of remittances back into legal, orderly channels.
— Streamline and expedite the issuance of licenses for the sale of medicines and medical supplies and equipment to Cuba. Based on experience of the past several years, including during the Papal visit, we believe that the end-use verification called for in the Cuban Democracy Act can be met through simplified arrangements.

On January 5, 1999, President Clinton announced additional steps to expand the flow of humanitarian assistance to Cuba and strengthen independent civil society. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 7 (Jan. 11, 1999). The President's statement, excerpted below, stated that the steps were "designed to help the Cuban people without strengthening the Cuban Government," consistent with the policy of "keeping pressure on the regime for democratic change . . . while finding ways to reach out to the Cuban people," and consistent with the CDA and LIBERTAD Act. OFAC amended the Cuban Assets Control Regulations in light of the President's announcement effective May 10, 1999. 64 Fed. Reg. 25,808 (May 13, 1999). The rule also implemented § 211 of Division A, Title II, of the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1999, Pub. L. No. 105–277, "excluding from the scope of the general license contained in § 515.527 any transaction or payment with respect to a mark, trade name, or commercial name that is the same as or substantially similar to a mark, trade name, or commercial name that was used in connection with a business or assets that were confiscated, unless the original owner of the mark, trade name, or commercial name or the bona fide successor-in-interest has expressly consented."

Building on the success of the measures I announced last March, I am today authorizing additional steps to reach out to the Cuban people:

Expansion of remittances by allowing any U.S. resident (not only those with families in Cuba) to send limited funds to individual Cuban families as well as to organizations independent of the government.

Expansion of people-to-people contact through two-way exchanges among academics, athletes, scientists, and others, including streamlining the approval process for such visits.

Authorization of the sale of food and agricultural inputs to independent non-governmental entities, including religious groups and Cuba's emerging private sector, such as family restaurants and private farmers.

Authorization of charter passenger flights to cities in Cuba other than Havana and from some cities in the United States other than Miami in order to facilitate family reunification for persons living outside those cities.

An effort to establish direct mail service to Cuba, as provided for in the Cuban Democracy Act of 1992.

At the same time, we are taking steps to increase the flow of information to the Cuban people and others around the world, by strengthening Radio and TV Marti and launching new public diplomacy programs in Latin America and Europe to keep international attention focused on the need for change in Cuba. The United States will continue to urge the international community to do more to promote respect for human rights and democratic transition in Cuba.

4. Iran and Libya

a. Iran and Libya Sanctions Act of 1996

The Iran and Libya Sanctions Act of 1996 ("ILSA"), Pub. L. No. 104–172, 110 Stat. 1541, was signed into law on August 5, 1996. In remarks at The George Washington University on the same day, "American Security in a Changing World," President Clinton noted that he had signed the act into law and explained that:

> [i]t builds on what we've already done to isolate those regimes by imposing tough penalties on foreign companies that go forward with new investments in key sectors. The act will help to deny them the money they need to finance international terrorism or to acquire weapons of mass destruction. It will increase the pressure on Libya to extradite the suspects in the bombing of Pan Am 103.

32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1404 (Aug. 12, 1996).

Section 5 of the act required the President to impose at least two of six enumerated sanctions if he determined that a sanctionable activity had occurred. The sanctionable activities, as set forth in § 5, were: (1) investments of $40 million (amended by the ILSA Extension Act of 2001 with respect to Libya to reduce triggering investment to $20 million) or more that directly and significantly enhanced the ability of Iran or Libya to develop its petroleum resources, and (2) provision of goods, services, technology, or other items to Libya in violation of UN Security Council Resolutions 748 (1992) or 883 (1993) that significantly and materially contributed to Libya's ability to acquire certain weapons or enhanced Libya's military or paramilitary capabilities; or contributed to Libya's ability to develop its petroleum resources or maintain its aviation capabilities. (See 4.c. below).

Section 6 of the act set forth the six sanctions as follows.

* * * *

(1) EXPORT-IMPORT BANK ASSISTANCE FOR EXPORTS TO SANCTIONED PERSONS.—The President may direct the Export-Import Bank of the United States not to give approval to the issuance of any guarantee, insurance, extension of credit, or participation in the extension of credit in connection with the export of any goods or services to any sanctioned person.
(2) EXPORT SANCTION.—The President may order the United States Government not to issue any specific license and not to grant any other specific permission or authority to export any goods or technology to a sanctioned person under—

(i) the Export Administration Act of 1979;
(ii) the Arms Export Control Act;
(iii) the Atomic Energy Act of 1954; or
(iv) any other statute that requires the prior review and approval of the United States Government as a condition for the export or reexport of goods or services.

(3) LOANS FROM UNITED STATES FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS.—The United States Government may prohibit any United States financial institution from making loans or providing credits to any sanctioned person totaling more than $10,000,000 in any 12-month period unless such person is engaged in activities to relieve human suffering and the loans or credits are provided for such activities.

(4) PROHIBITIONS ON FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS.—The following prohibitions may be imposed against a sanctioned person that is a financial institution:

> (A) PROHIBITION ON DESIGNATION AS PRIMARY DEALER.—Neither the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System nor the Federal Reserve Bank of New York may designate, or permit the continuation of any prior designation of, such financial institution as a primary dealer in United States Government debt instruments.
> (B) PROHIBITION ON SERVICE AS A REPOSITORY OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS.—Such financial institution may not serve as agent of the United States Government or serve as repository for United States Government funds.

The imposition of either sanction under subparagraph (A) or (B) shall be treated as 1 sanction for purposes of section 5, and the imposition of both such sanctions shall be treated as 2 sanctions for purposes of section 5.
(5) PROCUREMENT SANCTION.—The United States Government may not procure, or enter into any contract for the procurement of, any goods or services from a sanctioned person [with certain exceptions].
(6) ADDITIONAL SANCTIONS.—The President may impose sanctions, as appropriate, to restrict imports with respect to a sanctioned person, in accordance with the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1701 and following).

* * * *

The act also set forth certain other possible courses of action following a determination that sanctionable activity had occurred. Section 9(a) of the act authorized the President to delay imposition of sanctions resulting from sanctionable activity by a foreign person in order to initiate consultations with the government with primary jurisdiction over that person and then to either impose the sanctions or certify to Congress that the government has taken specific and effective actions to terminate the involvement of the foreign person in the activities at issue. Section 9(c) authorized the President to waive imposition of sanctions if he determined and reported to Congress that such waiver was important to the national interest of the United States. In addition, § 4(c), applicable only to Iran, authorized the President to waive sanctions with respect to all nationals of a country if the country had agreed to undertake substantial measures, including economic sanctions, that would inhibit Iran's efforts to acquire weapons of mass destruction and promote acts of intentional terrorism.

Section 7 of the act provided that the Secretary of State may, upon the request of any person, issue an advisory opinion on whether a proposed activity would be sanctionable.

Section 8 provided for termination of sanctions. As to Iran, the requirement to impose sanctions "shall no longer have force or effect" if the President determined and certified to Congress that Iran (1) "has ceased its efforts to design, develop, manufacture, or acquire" certain weapons and related technology; and (2) has been removed from the list of state sponsors of terrorism determined under section 6(j) of the Export Administration Act of 1979. As to Libya, the act required the President to determine and certify "that Libya has fulfilled the requirements of [UN Security Council Resolutions 731 and 748]." See certification by George W. Bush, 69 Fed. Reg. 24,907 (May 5, 2004).

On December 16, 1996, the Department of State, acting by delegation from the President, published a Federal Register notice, "Additional Information for the Iran and Libya Sanctions Act," 61 Fed. Reg. 66,067 (Dec. 16, 1996). Among other things, the notice indicated that the act did not replace or supersede existing sanctions against Iran or Libya, stating that "the Iranian Assets Control Regulations (31 C.F.R. Part 535), the Iranian Transactions Regulations (31 C.F.R. Part 560), and the Libyan Sanctions Regulations (31 C.F.R. Part 550) remain in effect . . ." See also delegation of authority at 61 Fed. Reg. 64,249 (Dec. 4, 1996).

On May 18, 1998, Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright issued a determination entitled "Iran and Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA): Decision in the South Pars Case," excerpted below and available at www.useu.be/summit/albr518.html.

I have determined that the investment by the firms Total (France), Gazprom (Russia), and Petronas (Malaysia) in the development of Iran's South Pars gas field constitutes activity covered by the Iran and Libya Sanctions Act of 1996. This determination follows an extensive review of the actions taken by the firms in this case as they relate to the provisions of the law.

At the same time, exercising the project waiver authority of Section 9(c) of the Act, I have decided that it is important to the national interest to waive the imposition of sanctions against the three firms involved. Among other factors, I considered the significant, enhanced cooperation we have achieved with the European Union and Russia in accomplishing ILSA's primary objective of inhibiting Iran's ability to develop weapons of mass destruction and support of terrorism.

Granting this waiver does not mean we support this investment; we do not. In fact, we made vigorous efforts to stop it, including representations at the highest levels of the governments involved. When it appeared that the project would nevertheless go forward, we closely studied the possible application of sanctions. We concluded that sanctions would not prevent this project from proceeding.

While unsuccessful in stopping the South Pars deal, our efforts to discourage the Indonesian firm Bakrie from proceeding with the development of the Balal oilfield contributed to Bakrie's apparent decision to withdraw although the impact of the Asian financial crisis was also important.

My decision to grant section 9(c) waivers in this case is based on the conclusion that, taking all factors into account, it is the option that best serves U.S. interests. I also decided that it would not be appropriate to grant country-wide waivers under Section 4(c) of ILSA.

b. Other sanctions with respect to Iran

With the seizure of the U.S. embassy in Tehran and the taking of hostages, President Jimmy Carter issued E.O. 12170 of November 14, 1979, declaring a national emergency with respect to Iran. In E.O. 12957 of March 15, 1995, President Clinton declared a separate national emergency under IEEPA with respect to Iran and imposed sanctions prohibiting any United States citizen or company from entering into contracts relating to Iranian petroleum resources. 60 Fed. Reg. 14,615 (Mar. 17, 1995); 31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 381 (Mar. 13, 1995). In reporting this action to Congress, the President explained:

> Iran has reacted to the limitations on its financial resources by negotiating for Western firms to provide financing and know-how for management of the development of petroleum resources. Such development would provide new funds that the Iranian Government could use to continue its current policies. It continues to be the policy of the U.S. Government to seek to limit those resources and these prohibitions will prevent United States persons from acting in a manner that undermines that effort.

31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 425 (Mar. 20, 1995).

On May 6, 1995, President Clinton issued E.O. 12959, which substantially supplemented and amended the sanctions in place, and revoked sections 1 and 2 of E.O. 12957. 60 Fed. Reg. 24,757 (May 9, 1995). In E.O. 13059 of August 19, 1997, President Clinton consolidated previous sanctions against Iran, revoking prospectively E.O. 12613 (52 Fed. Reg. 41,940 (Oct. 30, 1987), which had been partially revoked in E.O. 12959) and major parts of E.O. 12959. 62 Fed. Reg. 44,531 (Aug. 21, 1997). The President has continued to renew annually the national emergency declared in E.O.12957. See, e.g., 64 Fed. Reg. 12,239 (Mar. 12, 1999).

In a letter to Congress reporting the issuance of E.O. 13059, the President described the three orders to date and indicated certain transactions that he had directed the Secretary of the Treasury to authorize through licensing, as excerpted below. 33 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1262 (Aug. 25, 1997).

On March 15, 1995, I reported to the Congress that, pursuant to section 203(a) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1702(a)) ("IEEPA") and section 201(a) of the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1621(a)) ("NEA"), I had exercised my statutory authority to declare a national emergency to respond to the actions and policies of the Government of Iran and to issue Executive Order 12957, which prohibited United States persons from entering into contracts for the financing or the overall management or supervision of the development of petroleum resources located in Iran or over which Iran claims jurisdiction. On May 6, 1995, I exercised my authority under these statutes and under section 505(a) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 (22 U.S.C. 2349aa-9(a)) ("ISDCA") to issue Executive Order 12959, which imposed additional measures to respond to Iran's intensified efforts to acquire weapons of mass destruction and to its continuing support for international terrorism, including support for acts that undermine the Middle East peace process. Executive Order 12959 imposed a comprehensive trade and investment embargo on Iran.

Following the imposition of these restrictions, Iran has continued to engage in activities that represent a threat to the peace and security of all nations. I have found it necessary to take additional measures to confirm that the embargo on Iran prohibits all trade and investment activities by United States persons, wherever located, and to consolidate in one order the various prohibitions previously imposed to deal with the national emergency declared on March 15, 1995. I have issued a new Executive order and hereby report to the Congress pursuant to section 204(b) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1703(b)), section 301 of the NEA (50 U.S.C. 1631), and section 505(c) of the ISDCA (22 U.S.C. 2349aa-9(c)).

* * * *

This new Executive order provides that the Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Secretary of State, is authorized to take such actions, including the promulgation of rules and regulations, as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the order. There are certain transactions subject to prohibition under this order that I have directed the Secretary of the Treasury to authorize through licensing, including transactions by United States persons related to the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal in The Hague, established pursuant to the Algiers Accords, and other international obligations and U.S. Government functions. In addition, under appropriate conditions, United States persons may be licensed to participate in market-based swaps of crude oil from the Caspian Sea area for Iranian crude oil in support of energy projects in Azerbaijan, Turkmenistan, and Kazakhstan.

Excerpts from E.O. 13059 follow.

Section 1. Except to the extent provided in section 3 of this order or in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date of this order, the importation into the United States of any goods or services of Iranian origin or owned or controlled by the Government of Iran, other than information or informational materials within the meaning of section 203(b)(3) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)(3)), is hereby prohibited.

Sec. 2. Except to the extent provided in section 3 of this order, in section 203(b) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)), or in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date of this order, the following are prohibited:

(a) the exportation, reexportation, sale, or supply, directly or indirectly, from the United States, or by a United States person, wherever located, of any goods, technology, or services to Iran or the Government of Iran, including the exportation, reexportation, sale, or supply of any goods, technology, or services to a person in a third country undertaken with knowledge or reason to know that:

> (i) such goods, technology, or services are intended specifically for supply, transshipment, or reexportation, directly or indirectly, to Iran or the Government of Iran; or
> (ii) such goods, technology, or services are intended specifically for use in the production of, for commingling with, or for incorporation into goods, technology, or services to be directly or indirectly supplied, transshipped, or reexported exclusively or predominantly to Iran or the Government of Iran;

(b) the reexportation from a third country, directly or indirectly, by a person other than a United States person of any goods, technology, or services that have been exported from the United States, if:

> (i) undertaken with knowledge or reason to know that the reexportation is intended specifically for Iran or the Government of Iran, and
> (ii) the exportation of such goods, technology, or services to Iran from the United States was subject to export license application requirements under any United States regulations in effect on May 6, 1995, or thereafter is made subject to such requirements imposed independently of the actions taken pursuant to the national emergency declared in Executive Order 12957; provided, however, that this prohibition shall not apply to those goods or that technology subject to export license application requirements if such goods or technology have been:
> (A) substantially transformed into a foreign-made product outside the United States; or

(B) incorporated into a foreign-made product outside the United States if the aggregate value of such controlled United States goods and technology constitutes less than 10 percent of the total value of the foreign-made product to be exported from a third country;

(c) any new investment by a United States person in Iran or in property, including entities, owned or controlled by the Government of Iran;
(d) any transaction or dealing by a United States person, wherever located, including purchasing, selling, transporting, swapping, brokering, approving, financing, facilitating, or guaranteeing, in or related to:

(i) goods or services of Iranian origin or owned or controlled by the Government of Iran; or
(ii) goods, technology, or services for exportation, reexportation, sale, or supply, directly or indirectly, to Iran or the Government of Iran;

(e) any approval, financing, facilitation, or guarantee by a United States person, wherever located, of a transaction by a foreign person where the transaction by that foreign person would be prohibited by this order if performed by a United States person or within the United States; and
(f) any transaction by a United States person or within the United States that evades or avoids, or has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in this order.

* * * *

Sec. 8. Nothing contained in this order shall create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable by any party against the United States, its agencies or instrumentalities, its officers or employees, or any other person.

Sec. 9. The measures taken pursuant to this order are in response to actions of the Government of Iran occurring after the conclusion of the 1981 Algiers Accords, and are intended solely as a response to those later actions.

* * * *

E.O. 13059 left intact subsections 1(e) and (g) of E.O. 12959, which prohibited:

> (e) any new investment by a United States person in Iran or in property (including entities) owned or controlled by the Government of Iran;
> . . . and
> (g) any transaction by any United States person or within the United States that evades or avoids, or has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in this order.

c. Other sanctions with respect to Libya

As discussed in Chapter 3.B.1.a.(1), in 1992 the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 731, condemning the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772, deploring the fact that the Libyan Government had not responded effectively to requests to cooperate fully in establishing responsibility for those terrorist acts and urging the Libyan Government to provide "a full and effective response to those requests so as to contribute to the elimination of international terrorism." U.N. Doc. S/RES/731 (1992). On March 31, 1992, acting under Chapter VII, the Security Council adopted Resolution 748, which, among other things, included a ban on all air traffic into and out of Libya; a ban on the operations of Libyan Arab Airlines offices worldwide; a ban on provision of aircraft and related services and parts to Libya; a ban on all arms supplies and related material of all types to Libya; withdrawal of military advisers, specialists, and technicians from Libya; a requirement that states significantly reduce staff at Libyan diplomatic missions and consular posts; and a requirement that states take steps to deny entry or expel Libyan nationals involved in terrorist activities. On November 11, 1993, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 883, ordering a freeze of all Libyan assets in other countries. U.N. Doc. S/RES/883 (1993).

Both a trade embargo (with certain exceptions for humanitarian purposes) and an asset freeze in respect of Libya had already been imposed by the United States in January 1986 in response to terrorist attacks at the Vienna and Rome airports in which five Americans were killed and to convincing evidence of Libyan government involvement with the Abu Nidal terrorist organization responsible for the attacks. President Reagan issued E.O. 12543, "Prohibiting Trade and Certain Transactions Involving Libya," on January 7, 1986, 51 Fed. Reg. 875 (Jan. 9, 1986), declaring a national emergency under IEEPA with respect to Libya. On January 8, President Reagan issued E.O. 12544, "Blocking Libyan Government Property in the United States or Held by U.S. Persons," 51 Fed. Reg. 1235 (Jan. 10, 1986). See Cumulative Digest 1981–1988, II at 2736–37 and III at 3034–41.

In E.O. 12801 of April 15, 1992, President George H.W. Bush imposed a ban on air traffic to and from Libya in further implementation of Resolution 748. 57 Fed. Reg. 14,319 (Apr. 17, 1992). Section 1 provided:

> Except to the extent provided in regulations, orders, directives, authorizations, or licenses that may hereafter be issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract > entered into or any license or permit granted before the effective date of this order, the granting of permission to any aircraft to take off from, land in, or overfly the United States, if the aircraft, as part of the same flight or as a continuation of that flight, is destined to land in or has taken off from the territory of Libya, is hereby prohibited.

E.O. 12801 was implemented by the Federal Aviation Administration ("FAA") in Special Federal Aviation Regulation ("SFAR") No. 65, effective April 20, 1992. In publishing a final rule on September 20, 1995, the FAA explained: "Exceptions are made for particular flights approved by the United States Government in consultation with the UN Security Council committee established under Security Council Resolution 748 (1992) and for certain emergency operations."

60 Fed. Reg. 48,643 (Sept. 20, 1995).

Effective January 31, 1994, OFAC amended the Libyan Sanctions Regulations, 31 CFR pt. 550, consistent with Resolution 883, to eliminate "an exception that had existed to the comprehensive blocking of [Government of Libya] property required by E.O. 12544." 59 Fed. Reg. 5105 (Feb. 3, 1994). The amendment revoked § 550.516 of the regulations which had "unblocked, by general license, deposits in currencies other than U.S. dollars held by U.S. persons abroad, if otherwise blocked under the [Libyan Sanctions Regulations]."

In response to the turnover by Libya in 1999 of two persons charged with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103, the UN Security Council, acting under UNSCR 1192 (1998), suspended UN sanctions against Libya. See also Digest 2003 at 161–65 discussing UN Security Council Resolution 1506, lifting UN sanctions in response to positive Libyan commitments and actions relative to weapons of mass destruction, and E.O. 13357 (69 Fed. Reg. 56,665 (Sept. 22, 2004)) terminating the national emergency declared in E.O. 12543, and revoking related economic sanctions. These actions did not affect Libya's continued designation as a state sponsor of terrorism. See Chapter 3.B.1.g.

5. Iraq

a. U.S. declaration of national emergency

On August 2, 1990, upon Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, President George H.W. Bush issued E.O. 12722 declaring a national emergency with respect to Iraq and imposing economic sanctions. 55 Fed. Reg. 31,803 (Aug. 3, 1990). A letter of February 11, 1991, from President Bush reporting to Congress on the national emergency with respect to Iraq described the actions taken in this and subsequent executive orders as well as implementing regulations, as excerpted below. 27 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 158 (Feb. 11, 1991).

---

1. On August 2, 1990, in Executive Order No. 12722, I declared a national emergency to deal with the threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States caused by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. (55 FR 31803.) In that order, I ordered the immediate blocking of all property and interests in property of the Government of Iraq (including the Central Bank of Iraq) then or thereafter located in the United States or within the possession or control of a U.S. person. I also prohibited the importation of goods or services of Iraqi origin into the United States and the exportation of goods, technology, and services to Iraq from the United States. In addition, I prohibited travel-related transactions and transportation transactions from or to Iraq and the performance of any contract in support of any industrial, commercial, or governmental project in Iraq. U.S. persons were also prohibited from granting or extending credit or loans to the Government of Iraq.

At the same time, at the request of the Government of Kuwait, I issued Executive Order No. 12723 (55 FR 31805), blocking all property of the Government of Kuwait then or thereafter in the United States or in the possession or control of a U.S. person.

Subsequently, on August 9, 1990, I issued Executive Orders Nos. 12724 and 12725 (55 FR 33089), to ensure that the sanctions imposed by the United States were consistent with United Nations Security Council Resolution 661 of August 6, 1990. Under these orders, additional steps were taken with regard to Iraq, and sanctions were applied to Kuwait as well to insure that no benefit to Iraq resulted from the military occupation of Kuwait.

2. The declaration of the national emergency on August 2, 1990, was made pursuant to the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.), the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.), and section 301 of title 3 of the United States Code. I reported the declaration to the Congress on August 3, 1990, pursuant to section 204(b) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1703(b)). The additional sanctions of August 9, 1990, were imposed pursuant to the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the statutes cited above the United Nations Participation Act (22 U.S.C. 287(c)). The present report is submitted pursuant to 50 U.S.C. 1641(c) and 1703(c). This report discusses only Administration actions and expenses directly related to the national emergency with respect to Iraq declared in Executive Order No. 12722, as implemented pursuant to that order and Executive Order Nos. 12723, 12724, and 12725.

3. The Office of Foreign Assets Control of the Department of the Treasury ("FAC"), after consultation with other Federal agencies, issued the Kuwaiti Assets Control Regulations, 31 C.F.R. Part 570 (55 FR 49857, November 30, 1990), and the Iraqi Sanctions Regulations, 31 C.F.R. Part 575 (56 FR 2112, January 18, 1991), to implement the prohibitions contained in Executive Orders Nos. 12722–12725.

Prior to the issuance of the final regulations, FAC issued a number of general licenses to address emergency situations affecting U.S. persons and the legitimate Government of Kuwait. Those general licenses have been incorporated, as appropriate, into the Kuwaiti Assets Control Regulations and the Iraqi Sanctions Regulations as general licenses, which permit transactions that would otherwise be prohibited by the Executive orders and regulations. U.S. persons, including U.S. financial institutions, are authorized to complete certain securities, foreign exchange, and similar transactions on behalf of the Government of Kuwait that were entered into prior to August 2, 1990. Similarly, certain import and export transactions commenced prior to August 2, 1990, were allowed to be completed, provided that any payments owed to Iraq or Kuwait were paid into a blocked account in a U.S. financial institution. The regulations also allow for the investment and reinvestment of blocked Kuwaiti and Iraqi assets. Consistent with United Nations Security Council Resolutions 661 and 666, the regulations also outline licensing procedures permitting the donation to Iraq or Kuwait of food in humanitarian circumstances, and of medical supplies, where it is demonstrated to FAC that the proposed export transaction meets the requirements for exemption under United Nations Security Council Resolution 661. . . .

4. Worldwide outrage over the invasion of Kuwait by Saddam Hussein has resulted in the imposition of sanctions by nearly every country of the world. To an extent unprecedented in the history of peacetime economic sanctions, the community of nations has worked together to make the sanctions effective in isolating Saddam Hussein and in cutting him off from the support he needs in order to continue his illegal occupation of Kuwait. This cooperation has occurred through the United Nations Sanctions Committee, established by United Nations Security Council Resolution 661, diplomatic channels, and day-to-day working contact among the national authorities responsible for implementing and administering the sanctions.

5. As of January 24, 1991, FAC had issued 158 specific licenses to Kuwaiti governmental entities operating assets or direct investments in the United States, enabling continued operation and the preservation of Kuwaiti government assets in the United States, as well as addressing certain expenditures by or on behalf of the Government of Kuwait in exile. In addition, 68 specific licenses were issued regulating transactions involving the Government of Iraq or its assets. Authorizations were granted enabling the Iraqi Embassy to conduct diplomatic representation in the United States. Specific licenses were also issued to non-Iraqi entities determining or authorizing the disposition of pre-embargo imports and exports on the high seas, authorizing the payment under confirmed letters of credit for pre-embargo exports, and permitting the conduct of procedural transactions such as the filing of lawsuits and payment for legal representation. In all cases involving Iraqi property, steps were taken to ensure that no financial benefit accrued to Iraq as a result of a licensing decision. In order to ensure compliance with the terms and conditions of licenses, reporting requirements have been imposed that are closely monitored. Licensed accounts are regularly audited by FAC compliance personnel and by deputized auditors from other regulatory agencies. Compliance analyses are prepared monthly for major licensed Kuwaiti governmental entities.

The enforcement efforts of the United States Government complement the efforts worldwide to enforce sanctions against Iraq. The United States has utilized a wide variety of diplomatic, administrative, and enforcement tools to deter circumvention of the global trade and financial embargoes established under United Nations Security Council resolutions. The enforcement efforts of the United States have been augmented through ongoing contacts with the United Nations, the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development, the European Community and member states' central banks through the Bank for International Settlements, as well as with representatives of individual governments.

On April 3, 1991, the Iraq Sanctions Regulations were amended to add an appendix to provide public notice of a list of persons, known as "specially designated nationals" of the Government of Iraq, falling within the definition of "Government of Iraq" in the regulations. 56 Fed. Reg. 13,584 (Apr. 3, 1991). In his report on the national emergency to Congress of August 3, 1992, President Bush explained, among other things, the status and operation of the list at that time. 28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1377 (Aug. 3, 1992).

3. Investigation also continues into the roles played by various individuals and firms outside of Iraq in Saddam Hussein's procurement network. These investigations may lead to additions to the FAC listing of individuals and organizations determined to be Specially Designated Nationals ("SDN's") of the Government of Iraq. In practice, an Iraqi SDN is a representative, agent, intermediary, or front (whether open or covert) of the Iraqi government that is located outside of Iraq. Iraqi SDN's are Saddam Hussein's principal instruments for doing business in third countries, and doing business with them is the same as doing business directly with the Government of Iraq.

The impact of being named an Iraqi SDN is considerable: all assets within U.S. jurisdiction of parties found to be Iraqi's SDN's are blocked; all economic transactions with SDN's by U.S. persons are prohibited; and the SDN individual or organization is exposed as an agent of the Iraqi regime.

The list was amended periodically on the basis of new information; see, e.g., 60 Fed. Reg. 6376 (Feb. 1, 1995).

b. UN Oil-for-Food Program

(1) Preliminary actions

On April 15, 1991, the Security Council adopted Resolution 706, authorizing the import by UN member states of oil products originating from Iraq for a six-month period, up to a value of $1.6 billion under certain conditions, for humanitarian activities, funding of the United Nations Compensation Fund, and payment of UN costs in facilitating the return of all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq, and half the costs of the Boundary Commission. U.N. Doc. S/RES/706 (1991). Iraq did not make use of the mechanism provided by this resolution.

Subsequently, on October 2, 1992, the Security Council adopted Resolution 778 requiring states temporarily to transfer Iraqi funds representing the proceeds of sale of Iraqi petroleum or petroleum products paid for after August 6, 1990, to the escrow account provided for in Resolution 706 for humanitarian and other specified activities in Iraq. In keeping with this resolution, President Bush issued E.O. 12817. 57 Fed. Reg. 48,433 (Oct. 23, 1992). In a February 22, 1993, report to Congress on the national emergency, President William J. Clinton described these developments as excerpted below. 29 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 212 (Feb. 22, 1993).

* * * *

1. On October 21, 1992, President Bush issued Executive Order No. 12817, implementing in the United States measures adopted in United Nations Security Council Resolution ("UNSCR") No. 778 of October 2, 1992. UNSCR No. 778 requires U.N. member states temporarily to transfer to a U.N. escrow account up to $200 million apiece in Iraqi oil proceeds paid by the purchaser after the imposition of U.N. sanctions on Iraq. These funds finance Iraq's obligations for U.N. activities with respect to Iraq, including expenses to verify Iraqi weapons destruction and to provide humanitarian assistance in Iraq on a nonpartisan basis. A portion of the escrowed funds will also fund the activities of the U.N. Compensation Commission in Geneva, which will handle claims from victims of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. The funds placed in the escrow account are to be returned, with interest, to the member states that transferred them to the U.N., as funds are received from future sales of Iraqi oil authorized by the United Nations Security Council. No member state is required to fund more than half of the total contributions to the escrow account.

Executive Order No. 12817 authorized the Secretary of the Treasury (the "Secretary") to identify the proceeds of the sale of Iraqi petroleum or petroleum products paid for by or on behalf of the purchaser on or after August 6, 1990, and directed United States financial institutions holding such funds to transfer them to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York ("FRBNY") in the manner required by the Secretary. Executive Order No. 12817 further directs the FRBNY to receive, hold, and transfer funds in which the Government of Iraq has an interest at the direction of the Secretary to fulfill U.S. rights and obligations pursuant to UNSCR No. 778.

* * * *

5. Pursuant to Executive Order No. 12817 implementing UNSCR No. 778, on October 26, 1992, FAC directed the FRBNY to establish a blocked account for receipt of certain post-August 6, 1990, Iraqi oil sales proceeds, and to hold, invest, and transfer these funds as required by the order. On the same date, FAC directed the eight United States financial institutions holding the affected oil proceeds, on an allocated, pro rata basis, to transfer a total of $200 million of these blocked Iraqi assets to the FRBNY account. On December 15, 1992, following the payment of $20 million by the Government of Kuwait and $30 million by the Government of Saudi Arabia to a special United Nations-controlled account, entitled UNSCR No. 778 Escrow Account, the FRBNY was directed to transfer a corresponding amount of $50 million from the blocked account it holds to the United Nations-controlled account. Future transfers from the blocked FRBNY account will be made on a matching basis up to the $200 million for which the United States is potentially obligated pursuant to UNSCR No. 778.

9. The United States imposed economic sanctions on Iraq in response to Iraq's invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait, a clear act of brutal aggression. The United States, together with the international community, is maintaining economic sanctions against Iraq because the Iraqi regime has failed to comply fully with United Nations Security Council resolutions, including those calling for the elimination of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, the inviolability of the Iraq-Kuwait boundary, the release of Kuwaiti and other third country nations, compensation for victims of Iraqi aggression, long-term monitoring of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) capabilities, and the return of Kuwaiti assets stolen during its illegal occupation of Kuwait. The U.N. sanctions remain in place; the United States will continue to enforce those sanctions.

The Saddam Hussein regime continued to violate basic human rights by repressing the Iraqi civilian population and depriving it of humanitarian assistance. The United Nations Security Council passed resolutions that permit Iraq to sell $1.6 billion of oil under U.N. auspices to fund the provision of food, medicine, and other humanitarian supplies to the people of Iraq. Under the U.N. resolutions, the equitable distribution within Iraq of this assistance would be supervised and monitored by the United Nations. The Iraqi regime continued to refuse to accept these resolutions and has thereby chosen to perpetuate the suffering of its civilian population.

In his letter to Congress on February 9, 1996, President Clinton reported that "[c]umulative transfers from the blocked Federal Reserve Bank of New York account since issuance of E.O. 12817 now have amounted to $200 million, fully satisfying the U.S. commitment to match the payments of other Member States from blocked Iraqi oil payments, and its obligation pursuant to United Nations Security Council Resolution 778." 32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 230 (Feb. 12, 1996).

(2) UN Security Council Resolution 986 and subsequent actions

On April 14, 1995, the Security Council adopted Resolution 986 authorizing states, under certain conditions, to import Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products up to one billion dollars every 90 days primarily for humanitarian purposes. See also Resolutions 1111 (1997), 1129 (1997), 1143 (1997), 1153 (1998), 1158 (1998), and 1175 (1998) amending and extending the program established in Resolution 986. Effective December 10, 1996, the Iraqi Sanctions Regulations were amended to implement this "oil-for-food" procedure in the United States. 61 Fed. Reg. 65,312 (Dec. 11, 1996). Excerpts below describe the action taken.

* * * *

On April 14, 1995, the United Nations Security Council (the "UNSC") adopted Resolution 986, which creates a framework, subject to agreement of the Government of Iraq, that would permit the Government of Iraq to sell $2 billion worth of petroleum and petroleum products over a 6-month period, with all proceeds placed in a United Nations ("UN") escrow account for designated uses. On May 20, 1996, a Memorandum of Understanding Between the Secretariat of the United Nations and the Government of Iraq on the Implementation of Security Council Resolution 986 (1995) (the "Memorandum of Understanding") was signed by representatives of the Government of Iraq and the UN. The Memorandum of Understanding contains agreements preparatory to implementation of Resolution 986. On August 12, 1996, Procedures to be Employed by the Security Council Committee Established by Resolution 661 (1990) Concerning the Situation Between Iraq and Kuwait in the Discharge of its Responsibility as Required by Paragraph 12 of Security Council Resolution 986 (1995) (the "Guidelines") further elaborated the procedures necessary to implement Resolution 986. A portion of the proceeds in the escrow account will be available for Iraq's purchase of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs, and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, to be specified in a list prepared by Iraq and submitted to and approved by the UN Secretary-General. At the UN level, this program will be administered by the UNSC Committee established pursuant to UNSC Resolution 661 (the "661 Committee"), which has established guidelines concerning procedures for permitted Iraqi purchases and sales. Within the United States, the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control ("OFAC"), in consultation with the Department of State, will implement UNSC Resolution 986. No direct financial transactions with the Government of Iraq are permitted.

* * * *

New [31 C.F.R.] § 575.523 provides a statement of licensing policy for U.S. persons seeking to purchase petroleum and petroleum products from the Government of Iraq or Iraq's State Oil Marketing Organization ("SOMO") pursuant to UNSC Resolution 986, other relevant Security Council resolutions, the Memorandum of Understanding, and other guidance issued by the 661 Committee. Issuance of a specific license authorizes the licensee to deal directly with the 661 Committee or its designee (the "overseers") appointed by the UN Secretary-General pursuant to UNSC Resolution 986, other relevant Security Council resolutions, the Memorandum of Understanding, and other guidance issued by the 661 Committee. The list of "national oil purchasers" will be supplied to the 661 Committee. Licensees whose contracts are approved by the overseers are authorized to perform those contracts in accordance with their terms.

New §§ 575.524 and 575.525 provide statements of licensing policy for the exportation to Iraq of pipeline parts and equipment necessary for the safe operation of the Iraqi portion of the Kirkuk-Yumurtalik pipeline system, and the sale of humanitarian aid to Iraq.

New § 575.526 adds a general license for dealing in, and importation into the United States of, Iraqi-origin petroleum and petroleum products, the purchase and exportation of which have been authorized in accordance with UNSC Resolution 986, other relevant Security Council resolutions, the Memorandum of Understanding, and other guidance issued by the 661 Committee.

In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on May 21, 1998, Thomas Pickering, Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, discussed the role of the oil-for-food program in U.S. policy toward Iraq.

[The Security Council resolutions that ended the Gulf war] mandate that Iraq is to be disarmed of its weapons of mass destruction capabilities and of missile systems with a range of more than 150 kilometers. They also mandate the maintenance of sanctions on Iraq until it has complied with its obligations under the range of Security Council resolutions.

I will be very frank. Based on Saddam's record, we have no reason to think he will comply with the obligations the Security Council has levied on Iraq. That means, as far as the U.S. is concerned, that sanctions will be a fact of life for the foreseeable future. But since our quarrel is with Saddam, not with the Iraqi people, we have never sought to impose unnecessary hardship on innocent Iraqi civilians who have no voice in the decisions the regime makes. The sanctions themselves never barred the shipment of humanitarian goods to Iraq. Since 1991, we have worked hard to come up with mechanisms to ensure that the humanitarian needs of Iraqi civilians can be met within the framework of the sanctions regime.

To that end, we have proposed several "oil-for-food" programs, with various degrees of success:

- The U.S. proposed the first "oil-for-food" program in 1991 with UNSCR 706/712. Iraq rejected this program.
- In 1995, we drafted UNSCR 986, which provided a slightly revised "oil-for-food" program. Iraq resisted implementing this program for more than a year, then dragged out negotiations with the SYG (UN Secretary General) for months. It finally went into effect in December 1996.
- Most recently, we supported the expansion of the "oil-for-food" program under UNSCR 1153, based on the SYG's recommendations that the expanded program was needed to meet the legitimate humanitarian concerns of the Iraqi people.

The so-called "oil-for-food" framework is a unique effort. For the first time, the international community is using the revenues of a state subject to strict sanctions to meet the humanitarian needs of that state's citizens. Let me be perfectly clear—this is not a humanitarian assistance program, but the controlled and monitored utilization of Iraq's own resources to provide for the humanitarian needs of its people.

Since 1990, Iraq has been subject to the toughest and most comprehensive international sanctions regime in history. It still is. The "oil-for-food" program keeps these sanctions in place but makes them endurable for the average Iraqi and acceptable to the larger international community which, unlike Saddam, is concerned about the suffering of his people. The Iraqi Government has no control over any of the revenue generated by UN-monitored oil sales; all revenue goes directly into a UN-controlled escrow account. The Iraqi Government may not legally purchase anything other than the humanitarian items it was always permitted to buy under the existing sanctions regime—but chose not to—and the UN Sanctions Committee must approve all such purchases. In the parts of Iraq controlled by the Iraqi Government, distribution of these humanitarian purchases is observed by the UN; in the northern areas of Iraq, the distribution is undertaken by the UN directly.

Without an "oil-for-food" program in place, our options are stark. Let me be perfectly clear what those options are:

- watching the Iraqi people starve while Saddam Hussein deliberately refuses to spend Iraq's resources on their welfare; or
- lifting sanctions prematurely.

There is no doubt that, without an "oil-for-food" program in place, the Iraqi Government would continue to exploit the suffering of its people to force the international community to lift sanctions. This has been Iraq's policy for years. Frankly, after eight years of sanctions, most states in the world either do not understand or do not care that the Iraqi Government is fully responsible for the Iraqi people's suffering—they just want that suffering to end.

The "oil-for-food" program allows us to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people without compromising our firm stand on sanctions. In a very real sense, the "oil-for-food" program is the key to sustaining the sanctions regime until Iraq complies with its obligations. The Iraqi Government clearly understands this basic dynamic. That is why it rejected earlier efforts to implement an "oil-for-food" program, and why it has gone to such lengths to obstruct the current program.

We are now working with the Secretariat and other members of the Security Council to ensure the effective implementation of the expanded "oil-for-food" program the Council approved last February. Predictably, Iraq has been dragging its heels in producing a distribution plan that would allow UNSCR 1153 to go into effect. Even more disturbing, Iraq explicitly rejected some of the SYG's key recommendations which are essential for implementing UNSCR 1153 as intended. Given the importance of the "oil-for-food" program in humanitarian terms—and to the sustainability of the sanctions regime—we will persist in our efforts nonetheless.

I should also mention our continuing concern at the illegal traffic in oil and petroleum products conducted by Iraq. The $5.2 billion ceiling under UNSCR 1153 was specifically intended to allow Iraq to sell legally as much oil as is needed to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people. The fact that Iraq continues to export sizeable amounts of petroleum products illegally—and that the Iraqi Government refuses to permit the UN to oversee or monitor these sales—strongly suggests that the proceeds from these sales are intended for nonhumanitarian purposes. We are currently seeking ways to make the Iraqi Government accountable for this illegal traffic—or to end it through tougher enforcement measures.

6. Sudan

On January 31, 1996, the United Nations Security Council adopted Resolution 1044, which called upon the Government of Sudan to comply with the requests of the Organization of African Unity to extradite three suspects in an assassination attempt on the President of Egypt in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia the previous year and to desist from actions providing support for international terrorism. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1044 (1996). As a result of Sudan's continued non-compliance, the Security Council passed Resolution 1054 on April 26, 1996. Resolution 1054 demanded that the Government of Sudan comply with the conditions set forth in Resolution 1044 and decided that all states must reduce significantly the staff at Sudanese diplomatic missions and restrict their movement, and take steps to restrict the entry into or travel through their territory for members of the Sudanese government and armed forces. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1054 (1996). For implementation of these restrictions by the United States, see Chapter 1.C.3.f.

On August 16, 1996, the Security Council adopted Resolution 1070, deciding that all states must deny permission to take off from, land in, or overfly their territories for any commercial or government aircraft from Sudan, but its sanctions were not imposed. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1070 (1996). UN Security Council Resolution 1372, adopted September 28, 2001, lifted the UN's sanctions against Sudan.

By E.O. 13067 of November 3, 1997, President William J. Clinton declared a national emergency and imposed unilateral sanctions against Sudan, finding that > the policies and actions of the Government of Sudan, including continued support for international terrorism; ongoing efforts to destabilize neighboring governments; and the prevalence of human rights violations, including slavery and the denial of religious freedom, constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States . . .

62 Fed. Reg. 59,989 (Nov. 5, 1997). The order, excerpted below, blocked all property of the Government of Sudan within the United States or in the possession or control of a U.S. person (including overseas branches), and prohibited trade and related transactions with Sudan by U.S. persons or from the United States, except for humanitarian aid.

Section 1. Except to the extent provided in section 203(b) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)) and in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses that may be issued pursuant to this order, all property and interests in property of the Government of Sudan that are in the United States, that hereafter come within the United States, or that hereafter come within the possession or control of United States persons, including their overseas branches, are blocked.

Sec. 2. The following are prohibited, except to the extent provided in section 203(b) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)) and in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses that may be issued pursuant to this order:

(a) the importation into the United States of any goods or services of Sudanese origin, other than information or informational materials;

(b) the exportation or reexportation, directly or indirectly, to Sudan of any goods, technology (including technical data, software, or other information), or services from the United States or by a United States person, wherever located, or requiring the issuance of a license by a Federal agency, except for donations of articles intended to relieve human suffering, such as food, clothing, and medicine;

(c) the facilitation by a United States person, including but not limited to brokering activities, of the exportation or reexportation of goods, technology, or services from Sudan to any destination, or to Sudan from any location;

(d) the performance by any United States person of any contract, including a financing contract, in support of an industrial, commercial, public utility, or governmental project in Sudan;

(e) the grant or extension of credits or loans by any United States person to the Government of Sudan;

(f) any transaction by a United States person relating to transportation of cargo to or from Sudan; the provision of transportation of cargo to or from the United States by any Sudanese person or any vessel or aircraft of Sudanese registration; or the sale in the United States by any person holding authority under subtitle 7 of title 49, United States Code, of any transportation of cargo by air that includes any stop in Sudan; and
(g) any transaction by any United States person or within the United States that evades or avoids, or has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in this order.

See 63 Fed. Reg. 29,608 (June 1, 1998) adding the names of 62 Sudanese entities to the list of specially designated nationals maintained by OFAC, 31 C.F.R. ch. V, which has been updated as needed. By final rule of July 1, 1998, OFAC promulgated the Sudanese Sanctions Regulations further implementing the executive order. 63 Fed. Reg. 35,809 (July 1, 1998).

7. UNITA (Angola)

a. Arms embargo under UN Security Council Resolution 864

On May 19, 1993, after a 16-year civil war between the National Union for Total Independence of Angola ("UNITA") and the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola ("MPLA"), the United States officially recognized the Government of Angola under President Jose Eduardo dos Santos, leader of the MPLA. See Chapter 9.A.1.

UNITA returned to armed conflict after failing to win a majority in multi-party democratic elections. The United Nations Security Council, acting under its Chapter VII authority, adopted Resolution 864 on September 15, 1993, U.N. Doc. S/RES/864 (1993), in which it determined that UNITA's military actions constituted a threat to international peace and security. Among other things, Resolution 864 imposed an arms embargo.

On September 26, 1993, President William J. Clinton issued E.O. 12865, excerpted below, declaring a national emergency under IEEPA, and implementing the arms embargo as to UNITA. 58 Fed. Reg. 51,005 (Sept. 29, 1993). OFAC implemented the UNITA (Angola) Sanctions Regulations in December, 31 C.F.R. pt. 590, 58 Fed. Reg. 64,904 (Dec. 10, 1993).

* * * *

I, WILLIAM J. CLINTON, President of the United States of America, take note of the United Nations Security Council's determination that, as a result of UNITA's military actions, the situation in Angola constitutes a threat to international peace and security, and find that the actions and policies of UNITA, in continuing military actions, repeated attempts to seize additional territory and failure to withdraw its troops from locations that it has occupied since the resumption of hostilities, in repeatedly attacking United Nations personnel working to provide humanitarian assistance, in holding foreign nationals against their will, in refusing to accept the results of the democratic elections held in Angola in 1992, and in failing to abide by the "Acordos de Paz," constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the foreign policy of the United States, and hereby declare a national emergency to deal with that threat.
I hereby order:

Section 1. The following are prohibited, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or contract entered into or any license or permit granted before the effective date of this order, except to the extent provided in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses which may hereafter be issued pursuant to this order:

(a) The sale or supply by United States persons or from the United States, or using U.S.-registered vessels or aircraft, of arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment and spare parts for the aforementioned, as well as petroleum and petroleum products, regardless of origin:

(1) to UNITA;
(2) to the territory of Angola, other than through points of entry to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, or any activity by United States persons or in the United States which promotes or is calculated to promote such sale or supply.

(b) Any transaction by any United States person that evades or avoids, or has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in this order.

* * * *

b. Further sanctions under UN Security Council Resolution 1127

In Resolution 1127 of August 28, 1997, the UN Security Council decided, among other things, that all member nations must restrict the travel of senior officials of UNITA and adult members of their families through their territories; close all UNITA offices in their territories; deny permission for aircraft to land in, take off from, or overfly their territories if such aircraft were used by UNITA, or originating from or destined for certain locations within Angola; and prohibit the supply of specified aircraft-related goods and services. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1127 (1997).

On December 12 President Clinton issued E.O. 13069, excerpted below, closing UNITA offices, implementing the flight restrictions called for under Resolution 1127, and restricting the sale of aircraft-related goods and services to UNITA. 62 Fed. Reg. 65,989 (Dec. 16, 1997). See also Chapter 1.C.3.g., suspending entry of "senior officials of [UNITA] and adult members of their immediate families."

Section 1. Except to the extent provided in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date of this order, all UNITA offices located in the United States shall be immediately and completely closed.

Sec. 2. Except to the extent provided in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date of this order, the following are prohibited:

(a) the sale, supply, or making available in any form, by United States persons or from the United States or using U.S.-registered vessels or aircraft, of any aircraft or aircraft components, regardless of origin:

(i) to UNITA; or
(ii) to the territory of Angola other than through a point of entry specified pursuant to section 4 of this order;

(b) the insurance, engineering, or servicing by United States persons or from the United States of any aircraft owned or controlled by UNITA;
(c) the granting of permission to any aircraft to take off from, land in, or overfly the United States if the aircraft, as part of the same flight or as a continuation of that flight, is destined to land in or has taken off from a place in the territory of Angola other than one specified pursuant to section 4 of this order;
(d) the provision or making available by United States persons or from the United States of engineering and maintenance servicing, the certification of airworthiness, the payment of new claims against existing insurance contracts, or the provision, renewal, or making available of direct insurance with respect to:

(i) any aircraft registered in Angola other than those specified pursuant to section 4 of this order; or

(ii) any aircraft that entered the territory of Angola other than through a point of entry specified pursuant to section 4 of this order;

(e) any transaction by any United States person or within the United States that evades or avoids, or has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in this order.

c. Asset freeze and diamond import ban under UN Security Council Resolution 1173

Again finding that UNITA had failed to fulfill its obligations to demilitarize under the Angolan Peace Accords and previous resolutions, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 1173 on June 12, 1998. In this resolution, the Security Council called upon all nations, among other things, to freeze assets owned by UNITA, to prohibit importation of diamonds from Angola that were not certified by the Government of Angola, and to prohibit the sale to certain persons and entities in Angola of mining equipment, motorized vehicles, or watercraft. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1173 (1998). See also U.N. Doc. S/RES/1176 (1998) (postponing the effective date of measures specified by Resolution 1173 until July 1, 1998).

Section 1. Except to the extent provided in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date of this order, all property and interests in property that are in the United States, that hereafter come within the United States, or that are or hereafter come within the possession or control of United States persons, of UNITA, or of those senior officials of UNITA, or adult members of their immediate families, who are designated pursuant to section 5 of this order, are hereby blocked.

Sec. 2. Except to the extent provided in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date of this order, the following are prohibited:

(a) the direct or indirect importation into the United States of all diamonds exported from Angola on or after the effective date of this order that are not controlled through the Certificate of Origin regime of the Angolan Government of Unity and National Reconciliation;
(b) the sale or supply by United States persons or from the United States or using U.S.-registered vessels or aircraft, of equipment used in mining, regardless of origin, to the territory of Angola other than through a point of entry designated pursuant to section 5 of this order;
(c) the sale or supply by United States persons or from the United States or using U.S.-registered vessels or aircraft, of motorized vehicles, watercraft, or spare parts for the foregoing, regardless of origin, to the territory of Angola other than through a point of entry designated pursuant to section 5 of this order; and
(d) the sale or supply by United States persons or from the United States or using U.S.-registered vessels or aircraft, of mining services or ground or waterborne transportation services, regardless of origin, to persons in areas of Angola to which State administration has not been extended, as designated pursuant to section 5 of this order.

8. Former Yugoslavia

a. Preliminary steps

As discussed in Chapter 17.A.1 and 18.A.4., widespread armed conflict existed in the former Yugoslavia throughout the 1990s. The United States imposed sanctions beginning in July 1991, announcing "the policy of the U.S. Government to deny all applications for licenses and other approvals to export or otherwise transfer defense articles to Yugoslavia" and suspending all licenses authorizing export or transfers of defense articles or services. Department of State Public Notice 1427, 56 Fed. Reg. 33,322 (July 19, 1991). On December 5, 1991, President George H.W. Bush issued Proclamation 6389, amending the Generalized System of Preferences ("GSP") to remove Yugoslavia from the list of countries whose products were eligible for benefits of the GSP. 56 Fed. Reg. 64,467 (Dec. 9, 1991). A statement released by the White House Office of the Press Secretary, April 7, 1992, announcing U.S. recognition of Bosnia-Hercegovina, Croatia, and Slovenia "as sovereign and independent states" also announced the lifting of economic sanctions against those three countries. I Pub. Papers 553 (April 7, 1992), see also Chapter 9.A.2.c. Lifting of sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro would be "contingent on Belgrade's lifting the economic blockades directed against Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia." The arms embargo remained in effect.

b. Implementation of sanctions under UN Security Council resolutions

On May 30, 1992, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 757 that, among other things, decided that all states must adopt specified measures as to the Former Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) ("FRY(S/M)") "until the Council decides that the authorities in the [FRY(S/M)], including the Yugoslav People's Army, have taken effective measures to fulfill the requirements of Resolution 752 (1992)." The measures included, with certain exceptions, a trade embargo, asset freeze, denial of permission for aircraft landing or overflight, and reduction of the level of staff at diplomatic and consular posts of the FRY(S/M). U.N. Doc. S/RES/757 (1992).

On the same day, President Bush issued E.O. 12808, excerpted below, declaring a national emergency under IEEPA and blocking all property and interests in property of the Governments of Serbia and Montenegro, or held in the name of the former Government of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia located in the United States or within the possession or control of U.S. persons, including their overseas branches. 57 Fed. Reg. 23,299 (June 2, 1992).

* * * *

I, GEORGE BUSH, President of the United States of America, find that the actions and policies of the Governments of Serbia and Montenegro, acting under the name of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, in their involvement in and support for groups attempting to seize territory in Croatia and Bosnia-Hercegovina by force and violence utilizing, in part, the forces of the so-called Yugoslav National Army, constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States, and hereby declare a national emergency to deal with that threat. I hereby order:

Section 1. Except to the extent provided in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses which may hereafter be issued pursuant to this order, all property and interests in property of the Government of Serbia and the Government of Montenegro that are in the United States, that hereafter come within the United States, or that are or hereafter come within the possession or control of United States persons, including their overseas branches, are hereby blocked.

Sec. 2. Except to the extent provided in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses which may hereafter be issued pursuant to this order, all property and interests in property in the name of the Government of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia that are in the United States, that hereafter come within the United States, or that are or hereafter come within the possession or control of United States persons, including their overseas branches, are hereby blocked.

Sec. 3. Any transaction by any United States person that evades or avoids, or has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in this order is prohibited.

* * * *

President Bush took additional measures to prohibit trade and other transactions by issuing E.O. 12810, (57 Fed. Reg. 24,347 (June 9, 1992)). In response to UN Security Council Resolution 787, E.O. 12831, (58 Fed. Reg. 5253 (Jan. 21, 1993)), expanded the sanctions further. In keeping with UN Security Council Resolution 820 of April 17, 1993, (U.N. Doc. S/RES/820 (1994)), on April 25, 1993, President William J. Clinton issued E.O. 12846, again expanding sanctions on the FRY (S/M) and Serbian-controlled areas of Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. 58 Fed. Reg. 25,771 (Apr. 27, 1993).

In his report of May 25, 1993, to Congress on the national emergency with respect to the former Yugoslavia, President William J. Clinton described the relevant Security Council resolutions and U.S. sanctions then in place, including implementing regulations, as excerpted below. 29 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 950 (May 31, 1993).

* * * *

. . . The present report . . . discusses Administration actions and expenses directly related to the exercise of powers and authorities conferred by the declaration of a national emergency in Executive Order No. 12808 and to expanded sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) (the "FRY (S/M)") contained in Executive Order No. 12810 of June 5, 1992 (57 FR 24347, June 9, 1992), Executive Order No. 12831 of January 15, 1993 (58 FR 5253, January 21, 1993), and Executive Order No. 12846 of April 28 [sic], 1993 (58 FR 25771, April 27, 1993).

1. Executive Order No. 12808 blocked all property and interests in property of the Governments of Serbia and Montenegro, or held in the name of the former Government of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, then or thereafter located in the United States or within the possession or control of U.S. persons, including their overseas branches. Subsequently, Executive Order No. 12810 expanded U.S. actions to implement in the United States the U.N. sanctions against the FRY (S/M) adopted in United Nations Security Council Resolution No. 757 of May 30, 1992. In addition to reaffirming the blocking of FRY (S/M) Government property, this order prohibits transactions with respect to the FRY (S/M) involving imports, exports, dealing in FRY-origin property, air and sea transportation, contract performance, funds transfers, activity promoting importation or exportation or dealings in property, and official sports, scientific, technical, or cultural representation of the FRY (S/M) in the United States. Executive Order No. 12810 exempted from trade restrictions (1) transshipments through the FRY (S/M), and (2) activities related to the United Nations Protection Force ("UNPROFOR"), the Conference on Yugoslavia, or the European Community Monitor Mission.

On January 15, 1993, President Bush issued Executive Order No. 12831 to implement new sanctions contained in United Nations Security Council Resolution No. 787 of November 16, 1992. The order revokes the exemption for transshipments through the FRY (S/M) contained in Executive Order No. 12810; prohibits transactions within the United States or by a U.S. person relating to FRY (S/M) vessels and vessels in which a majority or controlling interest is held by a person or entity in, or operating from, the FRY (S/M), and states that all such vessels shall be considered as vessels of the FRY (S/M), regardless of the flag under which they sail. Executive Order No. 12831 also delegates discretionary authority to the Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Secretary of State, to prohibit trade and financial transactions involving any areas of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia as to which there is inadequate assurance that such transactions will not be diverted to the benefit of the FRY (S/M).

On April 26, 1993, I issued Executive Order No. 12846 to implement in the United States the sanctions adopted in United Nations Security Council Resolution No. 820 of April 17, 1993. That resolution called on the Bosnian Serbs to accept the Vance-Owen peace plan for Bosnia-Hercegovina and, if they failed to do so by April 26, called on member states to take additional measures to tighten the embargo against the FRY (S/M) and Serbian-controlled areas of Croatia and Bosnia-Hercegovina. Effective 12.01 a.m. e.d.t., April 28, 1993, Executive Order 12846: (1) blocks all property and interests in property of businesses organized or located in the FRY (S/M), including the property of their U.S. and other foreign subsidiaries, that are in or later come within the United States or the possession or control of U.S. persons, including their overseas branches; (2) confirms the charging to the owners or operators of property blocked under this order or Executive Orders No. 12808, No. 12810, or No. 12831 all expenses incident to the blocking and maintenance of such property, requires that such expenses be satisfied from sources other than blocked funds, and permits such property to be sold and the proceeds (after payment of expenses) placed in a blocked account; (3) orders (a) the detention pending investigation of all nonblocked vessels, aircraft, freight vehicles, rolling stock, and cargo within the United States suspected of violating United Nations Security Council Resolutions No. 713, No. 757, No. 787, or No. 820, and (b) the blocking of such conveyances or cargo if a violation is determined to have been committed, and permits the liquidation of such blocked conveyances or cargo and the placing of the proceeds into a blocked account; (4) prohibits any vessel registered in the United States, or owned or controlled by U.S. persons, other than U.S. naval vessels, from entering the territorial waters of the FRY (S/M); and (5) prohibits U.S. persons from engaging in any transactions relating to the shipment of goods to, from, or through United Nations Protected Areas in the Republic of Croatia and areas in the Republic of Bosnia-Hercegovina under the control of Bosnia Serb forces. Executive Order No. 12846 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury in consultation with the Secretary of State to take such actions, and to employ all powers granted to me by the authorities cited above, as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of that order. The sanctions imposed in the offer do not invalidate existing licenses or authorizations issued pursuant to Executive Orders No. 12808, No. 12810, or No. 12831 except as those licenses and authorizations may thereafter be terminated, suspended, or modified by the issuing Federal agencies, but otherwise the sanctions apply notwithstanding any preexisting contracts, international agreements, licenses, or authorizations.

2. The declaration of the national emergency on May 30, 1992, was made pursuant to the authority vested in the President by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.), the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.), and section 301 of title 3 of the United States Code. The emergency declaration was reported to the Congress on May 30, 1992, pursuant to section 204(b) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1703(b)). The additional sanctions set forth in Executive Orders No. 12810, No. 12831, and No. 12846 were imposed pursuant to the authority vested in the President by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the statutes cited above, section 1114 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, as amended (49 U.S.C. App. 1514), and section 5 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945, as amended (22 U.S.C. 287c).

3. Since the last report, the Office of Foreign Assets Control of the Department of the Treasury ("FAC"), in consultation with the Department of State and other Federal agencies, issued the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) Sanctions Regulations, 31 C.F.R. Part 585 (58 FR 13199, March 10, 1903—the "Regulations"), to implement the prohibitions contained in Executive Orders No. 12808, No. 12810, and No. 12831. . . .

On January 15, 1993, FAC issued General Notice No. 2, entitled "Notification of Status of Yugoslav Entities." . . . The list is composed of government, financial, and commercial entities organized in Serbia or Montenegro and a number of foreign subsidiaries of such entities. The list is illustrative of entities covered by FAC's presumption, stated in the notice, that all entities organized or located in Serbia or Montenegro, as well as their foreign branches and subsidiaries, are controlled by the Government of the FRY (S/M) and thus subject to the blocking provisions of the Executive orders. . . . As part of a U.S.-led allied effort to tighten economic sanctions against Yugoslavia, on March 11, 1993, FAC named 25 maritime firms and 55 ships controlled by these firms as "Specially Designated Nationals" ("SDNs") of Yugoslavia. . . . The FRY (S/M) has continued to operate its maritime fleet and trade in violation of the international economic sanctions mandated by United Nations Security Council Resolutions No. 757 and No. 787. Operations and activities by Yugoslav front companies, or SDNs, enable the Government of the FRY (S/M) to circumvent the international trade embargo. The effect of FAC's SDN designation is to identify agents and property of the Government of the FRY (S/M), and property of entities organized or located in the FRY (S/M), and thus to extend the applicability of the regulatory prohibitions governing transactions with the Government of the FRY (S/M) and its nationals by U.S. persons to these designated individuals and entities wherever located, irrespective of nationality or registration. U.S. persons are prohibited from engaging in any transaction involving property in which an SDN has an interest; which includes all financial and trade transactions. All SDN property within the jurisdiction of the United States (including financial assets in U.S. bank branches overseas) is blocked. . . .

4. Over the past 6 months, the Departments of State and the Treasury have worked closely with European Community (the "EC") member states and other U.N. member nations to coordinate implementation of the sanctions against the FRY (S/M). This has included visits by assessment teams formed under the auspices of the United States, the EC, and the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe (the "CSCE") to states bordering on Serbia and Montenegro; deployment of CSCE sanctions assistance missions ("SAMs") to Albania, Bulgaria, Croatia, the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Hungary, Romania, and Ukraine to assist in monitoring land and Danube River traffic; bilateral contacts between the United States and other countries with the purpose of tightening financial and trade restrictions on the FRY (S/M); and establishment of a mechanism to coordinate enforcement efforts and to exchange technical information.

5. In accordance with licensing policy and the Regulations, FAC has exercised its authority to license certain specific transactions with respect to the FRY (S/M) that are consistent with the Security Council sanctions. . . . Specific licenses have been issued for (1) payment to U.S. or third-country secured creditors, under certain narrowly defined circumstances, for pre-embargo import and export transactions; (2) for legal representation or advice to the Government of the FRY (S/M) or FRY (S/M)-controlled clients; (3) for restricted and closely monitored operations by subsidiaries of FRY (S/M)-controlled firms located in the United States; (4) for limited FRY (S/M) diplomatic representation in Washington and New York; (5) for patent, trademark and copyright protection, and maintenance transactions in the FRY (S/M) not involving payment to the FRY (S/M) Government; (6) for certain communications, news media, and travel-related transactions; (7) for the payment of crews' wages and vessel maintenance of FRY (S/M)-controlled ships blocked in the United States; (8) for the removal from the FRY (S/M) of manufactured property owned and controlled by U.S. entities; and (9) to assist the United Nations in its relief operations and the activities of the U.N. Protection Force. Pursuant to United Nations Security Council Resolutions No. 757 and No. 760, specific licenses have also been issued to authorize exportation of food, medicine, and supplies intended for humanitarian purposes in the FRY (S/M).

* * * *

Following adoption of UN Security Resolution 942, September 23, 1994, (U.N. Doc. S/RES/942 (1994)), President Clinton issued E.O. 12934. 59 Fed. Reg. 54,119 (Oct. 27, 1994). E.O. 12934 expanded the scope of the national emergency "to address the unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States posed by the actions and policies of the Bosnian Serb forces and the authorities in the territory that they control, including their refusal to accept the proposed territorial settlement of the conflict in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina." It blocked all property and interests in property of the "Bosnian Serb forces and the authorities in the territory that they control within the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as the property of any entity organized or located in, or controlled by any person in, or resident in, those areas." 32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2467 (Dec. 6, 1996).

c. Suspension of certain sanctions

As discussed in Chapter 17.A.1., the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina was signed in Paris on December 14, 1995. In recognition of this action, President Clinton issued Presidential Determination No. 96–7, December 27, 1995, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the application of sanctions imposed on Serbia and Montenegro pursuant to E.O.s 12808, 12810, 12831, and 12846; and the Secretary of Transportation to suspend sanctions imposed pursuant to Department of Transportation Orders 92-5-28 and 92-6-27 of 1992 and Special Federal Aviation Regulation No. 66–2 of May 31, 1995. It also authorized the Secretary of State to take appropriate action to suspend the application of sanctions imposed pursuant to Department of State Public Notice 1427 (see 8.a. supra), "at the appropriate time in conformity with the provisions of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1021 of November 22, 1995." 61 Fed. Reg. 2887 (Jan. 29, 1996). See 61 Fed.

Reg. 1282 (Jan. 19, 1996) prospectively suspending sanctions imposed on the FRY(S/M) and 61 Fed. Reg. 24,696 (May 16, 1996), prospectively suspending sanctions imposed on the Bosnian Serb forces and authorities and on the territory that they control within the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

In issuing Determination No. 96–7, the President determined that > the waiver or modification of the sanctions on Serbia and Montenegro . . . is necessary to achieve a negotiated settlement of the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina that is acceptable to the parties.

An accompanying Memorandum of Justification for Presidential Certification Regarding the Modification of the Application of U.S. Sanctions on Serbia and Montenegro, also available at 61 Fed. Reg. 2887, described the peace negotiations in detail.

On May 24, 1996, President William J. Clinton continued in place the national emergency with respect to the Government of the FRY(S/M) and the Bosnian Serb forces and those areas of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina under the control of the Bosnian Serb forces. 61 Fed. Reg. 26,773 (May 29, 1996). As explained in a letter to Congress, the President found it "necessary to maintain in force the broad authorities necessary to reimpose economic pressure on the Government of the [FRY(S/M)] and the Bosnian Serb forces and the authorities in the territory that they control if either fail significantly to meet their obligations under the Peace Agreement." 32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 945 (May 24, 1996).

Excerpts below from the May 24 Federal Register Notice announcing the continuation of the emergency describe Presidential Determination 96–7 and the status of blocked property as of that date.

* * * *

On December 27, 1995, I issued Presidential Determination No. 96–7, directing the Secretary of the Treasury, inter alia, to suspend the application of sanctions imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) pursuant to the above-referenced Executive Orders and to continue to block property previously blocked until provision is made to address claims or encumbrances, including the claims of the other successor states of the former Yugoslavia. This sanctions relief, in conformity with United Nations Security Council Resolution 1022 of November 22, 1995 (hereinafter the "Resolution"), was an essential factor motivating Serbia and Montenegro's acceptance of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina initialed by the parties in Dayton, Ohio, on November 21, 1995, and signed in Paris on December 14, 1995 (hereinafter the "Peace Agreement"). The sanctions imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) were accordingly suspended prospectively, effective January 16, 1996 [61 Fed. Reg. 1282 (Jan. 19, 1996)]. Sanctions imposed on the Bosnian Serb forces and authorities and on the territory that they control within the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina were subsequently suspended prospectively, effective May 10, 1996 [61 Fed. Reg. 24,696 (May 16, 1996)], also in conformity with the Peace Agreement and Resolution.

In the last year, substantial progress has been achieved to bring about a settlement on the conflict in the former Yugoslavia acceptable to the parties. Before agreeing to the sanctions suspension, the United States insisted on a credible reimposition mechanism to ensure the full implementation of the Peace Agreement. Thus, Resolution 1022 provides a mechanism to reimpose the sanctions if the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or the Bosnian Serb authorities fail significantly to meet their obligations under the Peace Agreement. It also provides that sanctions will not be terminated until after the first free and fair elections occur in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as provided for in the Peace Agreement, and provided that the Bosnian Serb forces have continued to respect the zones of separation as provided in the Peace Agreement. The Resolution also provides for the continued blocking of assets potentially subject to conflicting claims and encumbrances, including the claims of the other successor states of the former Yugoslavia, until provision is made to address them.

Because the resolution of the crisis and conflict in the former Yugoslavia that resulted from the actions and policies of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), and of the Bosnian Serb forces and the authorities in the territory that they control, will not be complete until such time as the Peace Agreement is implemented fully and the terms of Resolution 1022 have been met, the national emergency declared on May 30, 1992, as expanded in scope on October 25, 1994, and the measures adopted pursuant thereto to deal with that emergency must continue beyond May 30, 1996.

Therefore, in accordance with section 202(d) of the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1622(d)), I am continuing the national emergency with respect to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and the Bosnian Serb forces and those areas of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina under the control of the Bosnian Serb forces.

* * * *

As authorized in Presidential Determination No. 96–7, effective July 12, 1996, the Department of State amended the International Traffic in Arms Regulations ("ITAR") to reflect that it was no longer the policy of the United States to deny licenses or other approvals for exports and imports of defense articles and defense services, destined for or originating in the states of the former Yugoslavia with the exception of the FRY(S/M). 61 Fed. Reg. 36,625 (July 12, 1996). Excerpts from the Federal Register Supplementary Information explaining the lifting of the policy of denial imposed in 1991 follow.

. . . Upon the initialing of the Dayton accords, the UN Security Council (UNSC) on November 22, 1995, adopted Resolution 1021, providing for a phased lifting of the UNSC arms embargo on all the successor states of former Yugoslavia. With the signing of the peace agreement on December 14, 1995, by the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), and the submission of a report on the signing by the UN Secretary General ("signing report") on the same date, the timeline for the phased lifting began.

* * * *

Section 126.1(c) of the ITAR states that whenever the UN Security Council mandates an arms embargo, all transactions which are prohibited by the embargo and which involve U.S. persons anywhere, or any person in the United States, and defense articles and services of a type enumerated on the United States Munitions List, irrespective of origin, are prohibited under the ITAR for the duration of the embargo, unless the Department of State publishes a Federal Register notice specifying different measures. Notice of the policy of denial and suspension with regard to the states of former Yugoslavia was published in the Federal Register on July 19, 1991 (5[6] FR 33322).

The lifting at this time of the policy of denial with respect to states of former Yugoslavia other than the FRY (Serbia and Montenegro), and corresponding amendment to the relevant portion of § 126.1(a) of the ITAR, is consistent with developments in the region and is in furtherance of our national security and foreign policy objectives.

The Federal Register notice of July 19, 1991, may not, however, cease to be effective with respect to the FRY (Serbia and Montenegro) without a certification to Congress by the President pursuant to Section 540A of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1996, Pub. L. 104–107. No such certification has been made.

In his December 6, 1996, report to Congress on the national emergency President Clinton noted:

> On October 1, 1996, the United Nations passed UNSCR 1074, terminating U.N. sanctions against the FRY (S/M) and the Bosnian Serbs in light of the elections that took place in Bosnia and Herzegovina on September 14, 1996. UNSCR 1074, however, reaffirms the provisions of UNSCR 1022 with respect to the release of blocked assets. . . .

* * * *

> The resolution of the crisis and conflict of the former Yugoslavia that has resulted from the actions and policies of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), and of the Bosnian Serb forces and the authorities in the territory that they control, will not be complete until such time as the Peace Agreement is implemented fully and the terms of UNSCR 1022 have been met. . . .

d. Kosovo

On March 31, 1998, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 1160, U.N. Doc. S/RES/1160, calling upon the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("FRY") to take the "necessary steps to achieve a political solution to the issue of Kosovo," and deciding under Chapter VII to impose an arms embargo as to the FRY, including Kosovo. See Chapter 17.B.3. Effective July 14, 1998, the United States implemented the arms embargo through a final rule published by the Bureau of Export Administration, U.S. Department of Commerce. 63 Fed. Reg. 37,767 (July 14, 1998).

On June 9, 1998, President Clinton issued E.O. 13088, declaring a national emergency under IEEPA to deal with the new threat from developments in Kosovo, finding:

> that the actions and policies of the Governments of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and the Republic of Serbia with respect to Kosovo, by promoting ethnic conflict and human suffering, threaten to destabilize countries of the region and to disrupt progress in Bosnia and Herzegovina in implementing the Dayton peace agreement, and therefore constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States. . . .

63 Fed. Reg. 32,109 (June 12, 1998). E.O. 13088 imposed economic sanctions as set forth below.

Section 1. (a) Except to the extent provided in section 2 of this order, section 203(b) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)), and in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses that may hereafter be issued pursuant to this order, all property and interests in property of the Governments of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Republic of Serbia, and the Republic of Montenegro that are in the United States, that hereafter come within the United States, or that are or hereafter come within the possession or control of United States persons, including their overseas branches, are hereby blocked.

(b) The blocking of property and property interests in paragraph (a) of this section includes the prohibition of financial transactions with, including trade financing for, the Governments of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Republic of Serbia, and the Republic of Montenegro by United States persons.

Sec. 2. Nothing in section 1 of this order shall prohibit financial transactions, including trade financing, by United States persons within the territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) if (a) conducted exclusively through the domestic banking system within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in local currency (dinars), or (b) conducted using bank notes or barter.

Sec. 3. Except as otherwise provided in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses that may hereafter be issued pursuant to this order, all new investment by United States persons in the territory of the Republic of Serbia, and the approval or other facilitation by United States persons of other persons' new investment in the territory of the Republic of Serbia, are prohibited.

Sec. 7. The Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Secretary of State, shall give special consideration to the circumstances of the Government of the Republic of Montenegro and persons located in and organized under the laws of the Republic of Montenegro in the implementation of this order.

President Clinton's January 5, 1999, report to Congress on the national emergency with respect to Kosovo included a summary of the regulations enacted to implement E.O. 13088, as excerpted below. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 8 (Jan. 5, 1999).

* * * *

2. The Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC), acting under authority delegated by the Secretary of the Treasury, implemented the sanctions imposed under the foregoing statutes and Executive Order 13088 and has issued the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) Kosovo Sanctions Regulations, 31 CFR part 586 (the "Regulations") (63 Fed. Reg. 54,575, October 13, 1998). . . .

* * * *

[In addition to blocking property and interests in property, t]he Regulations also prohibit all new investment in the territory of the Republic of Serbia by United States persons, and the approval or other facilitation by United States persons or other persons' new investment in the territory of the Republic of Serbia. The term "new investment," means (a) the acquisition of debt or equity interests in, (b) a commitment or contribution of funds or other assets to, or (c) a loan or other extension of credit to, a public or private undertaking, entity, or project, other than donations of funds to charitable organizations for purely humanitarian purposes. Any transaction by a United States person that evades or avoids, or that has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in Executive Order 13088 is prohibited. Finally, the Regulations provide a general license, authorizing all transactions by United States persons involving property or interests in property of the Government of the Republic of Montenegro, except as provided pursuant to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and Bosnian Serb-Controlled Areas of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina Sanctions Regulations, 31 CFR part 585.

* * * *

On April 30, 1999, President Clinton issued E.O. 13121 to take additional steps with respect to the continuing human rights and humanitarian crisis in Kosovo and the national emergency declared with respect to Kosovo, effective May 1, 1999. 64 Fed. Reg. 24,021 (May 5, 1999). That order, among other things, replaced § 2 of E.O. 13088 with language imposing sanctions on trade in goods or services and related activities with the FRY(S/M), its government, the government of the Republic of Serbia, and the government of the Republic of Montenegro. At the same time, it added new language to § 7, including the following new subsection c:

> The Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Secretary of State, is hereby directed to authorize commercial sales of agricultural commodities and products, medicine, and medical equipment for civilian end use in the territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) under appropriate safeguards to prevent diversion to military, paramilitary, or political use by the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Government of the Republic of Serbia, or the Government of the Republic of Montenegro.

As explained in the President's message to Congress reporting the new order, this action was taken "in keeping with [the] Administration's new policy to exempt commercial sales of food and medicine from sanctions regimes." 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 780 (Apr. 30, 1999).

On May 27, 1999, President Clinton announced the continuation of the emergency imposed by executive orders from 1992–1994 as to blocked funds and assets subject to claims and encumbrances "until the status of all remaining blocked property is resolved, the Peace Agreement implemented, and the terms of the Resolution met." 64 Fed. Reg. 29,205 (May 28, 1999). The same order continued the emergency in response to the situation in Kosovo, stating:

> Since [E.O. 13088 was issued], the government of President Milosevic has rejected the international community's efforts to find a peaceful settlement for the crisis in Kosovo and has launched a massive campaign of ethnic cleansing that has displaced a large percentage of the population and been accompanied by an increasing number of atrocities. In light of President Milosevic's brutal assault against the people of Kosovo, his complete disregard for the requirements of the international community and the threat his actions pose to regional peace and stability, I have determined that it is necessary to maintain in force these emergency authorities beyond June 9, 1999.

See Digest 2001 at 803–08 discussing E.O. 13192, lifting and modifying certain sanctions, and E.O. 13219 declaring a national emergency relating to persons who threaten international stabilization efforts in the Western Balkans; and Digest 2003 at 930–34 discussing E.O. 13304 terminating national emergencies and instituting certain new measures.

9. Niger

As a result of a military coup on January 27, 1996, that overthrew the democratically elected Government of Niger, on January 30, 1996, the United States suspended bilateral development and military assistance to Niger, totaling almost $25 million in fiscal year 1995. A statement by White House Press Secretary Michael McCurry on January 31, 1996, announcing the suspension, is excerpted below. See also 90 Am. J. Int'l L. 454 (1996).

* * * *

The United States regrets that these programs, which directly benefited the people of Niger, are now suspended.

In addition, the United States will not support any new programs for Niger in the international financial institutions in which it holds membership so long as the military authorities ignore the calls of the international community to return to the barracks and restore the legitimately elected government.

The United States again calls upon the military leadership in Niger to restore immediately the duly elected, civilian, democratic government and stresses that we will not recognize any interim civilian administration appointed by the military coup leaders. The existing democratic institutions, however imperfect, represent the will of the Nigerian people and must be respected.

Finally, the United States urges the military coup leaders to engage in discussion with elected authorities of Niger on means to restore the legitimate civilian government promptly. The swift condemnation of this coup by the Secretaries General of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity, along with the European Union and many individual countries, demonstrates the international community's firm rejection of military solutions to political problems. The United States will consult urgently with other countries in capitals and at the United Nations on possible additional steps we might take to restore the legitimate Government of Niger.

* * * *

The action was taken pursuant to section 508 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–107, 110 Stat. 704, 723 (1996) which prohibited obligation or expenditure of funds made available under the act for assistance "to any country whose duly elected Head of Government is deposed by military coup or decree." Assistance may be resumed if

"subsequent to the termination of assistance a democratically elected government has taken office." For a discussion of similar provisions in previous appropriations acts, see, e.g., II Cumulative Digest 1981–1988, at 2606–08.

10. Terrorism: Taliban support of international terrorism

On July 4, 1999, President William J. Clinton issued E.O. 13129, declaring a national emergency, prohibiting United States companies from selling goods and services to Afghanistan's ruling Taliban militia, and freezing all Taliban assets in the United States. 64 Fed. Reg. 36,759 (July 7, 1999). See 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOCS. 1283 (July 12, 1999).

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.) ("IEEPA"), the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.), and section 301 of title 3, United States Code,

I, WILLIAM J. CLINTON, President of the United States of America, find that the actions and policies of the Taliban in Afghanistan, in allowing territory under its control in Afghanistan to be used as a safe haven and base of operations for Usama bin Ladin and the Al-Qaida organization who have committed and threaten to continue to commit acts of violence against the United States and its nationals, constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States, and hereby declare a national emergency to deal with that threat.

I hereby order:

Section 1. Except to the extent provided in section 203(b) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)) and in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses that may be issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date:

(a) all property and interests in property of the Taliban; and
(b) all property and interests in property of persons determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Secretary of State and the Attorney General:

(i) to be owned or controlled by, or to act for or on behalf of, the Taliban; or
(ii) to provide financial, material, or technological support for, or services in support of, any of the foregoing,

that are in the United States, that hereafter come within the United States, or that are or hereafter come within the possession or control of United States persons, are blocked.

Sec. 2. Except to the extent provided in section 203(b) of IEEPA (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)) and in regulations, orders, directives, or licenses that may be issued pursuant to this order, and notwithstanding any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the effective date:

(a) any transaction or dealing by United States persons or within the United States in property or interests in property blocked pursuant to this order is prohibited, including the making or receiving of any contribution of funds, goods, or services to or for the benefit of the Taliban or persons designated pursuant to this order;
(b) the exportation, reexportation, sale, or supply, directly or indirectly, from the United States, or by a United States person, wherever located, of any goods, software, technology (including technical data), or services to the territory of Afghanistan controlled by the Taliban or to the Taliban or persons designated pursuant to this order is prohibited;
(c) the importation into the United States of any goods, software, technology, or services owned or controlled by the Taliban or persons designated pursuant to this order or from the territory of Afghanistan controlled by the Taliban is prohibited;
(d) any transaction by any United States person or within the United States that evades or avoids, or has the purpose of evading or avoiding, or attempts to violate, any of the prohibitions set forth in this order is prohibited; and

(e) any conspiracy formed to violate any of the prohibitions set forth in this order is prohibited.

Sec. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Secretary of State, is hereby directed to authorize commercial sales of agricultural commodities and products, medicine, and medical equipment for civilian end use in the territory of Afghanistan controlled by the Taliban under appropriate safeguards to prevent diversion to military, paramilitary, or terrorist end users or end use or to political end use.

On October 15, 1999, the UN Security Council, acting under Chapter VII, unanimously adopted Resolution 1267. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1267 (1999). The Security Council decided that unless the Taliban complied fully with its demand that it "turn over Usama bin Laden without further delay to appropriate authorities in a country where he has been indicted, or to appropriate authorities in a country where he will be returned to such a country, or to appropriate authorities in a country where he will be arrested and effectively brought to justice," by November 14, all states must impose sanctions. Resolution 1267 also established a committee consisting of all members of the Security Council to undertake specified tasks related to implementation of the measures mandated in the resolution. Materials related to operation of the committee are maintained at www.un.org/Docs/sc/committees/1267Template.htm.

On November 15, 1999, President Clinton issued a statement concerning the UN sanctions against the Taliban, as excerpted below. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2386 (Nov. 22, 1999).

Today the President of the United Nations Security Council certified that the economic sanctions against the Taliban laid out in Resolution 1267 one month ago are now in effect. These sanctions are being implemented because the Taliban has spurned the unanimous demand of the Security Council and refused to deliver Usama bin Ladin to a country where he can face justice for his acts of terrorism, including the bombing of America's Embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam.

The international community has again spoken with one voice, and its resolve to combat the threat of international terrorism is clear. The U.N. sanctions parallel the unilateral ones that the United States placed on the Taliban in July and will result in the restriction of landing rights of airlines owned, leased, or operated by or on behalf of the Taliban, the freezing of Taliban accounts around the world, and the prohibition of investment in any undertaking owned or controlled by the Taliban. I ask all the nations of the world to do their utmost so that these sanctions are implemented fully and swiftly.

B. LIFTING OF SANCTIONS

1. Cambodia

In January 1992 President George H.W. Bush lifted the trade embargo against Cambodia, normalizing economic relations between the United States and Cambodia. In remarks to the Singapore Lecture Group in Singapore, January 4, 1992, President Bush stated:

> When the Paris conference agreed on a peace settlement for Cambodia, my Government offered to remove our trade embargo as the United Nations advance mission began to implement the settlement. And today I am pleased to announce the lifting of that embargo. Working with others, we need to turn attention to the economic reconstruction of that deeply wounded land, and so its new political reconciliation has a home from which to grow.

28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 28 (Jan. 4, 1992).

OFAC implemented the lifting of the embargo by final rule effective January 3, 1992. 31 C.F.R. pt. 500, 57 Fed. Reg. 1872 (Jan. 16, 1992). The supplementary information provided in the Federal Register explained:

> . . . Newly authorized transactions include, but are not limited to, importations from and exportations to Cambodia (not otherwise restricted), new investment, travel-related transactions and brokering transactions. Property blocked as of January 2, 1992, because of an interest therein of Cambodia or its nationals, remains blocked.

OFAC amended its regulations effective March 16, 1992, to provide for the registration of claims by U.S. nationals against Cambodia. 57 Fed. Reg. 9052 (Mar. 16, 1992). Pursuant to a settlement reached October 6, 1994, discussed in Chapter 8.A.6., most previously blocked funds were unblocked. 59 Fed. Reg. 60,558 (Nov. 25, 1994).

2. Vietnam

In the early 1990s the United States took steps toward normalization of relations between the United States and Vietnam through amendments to the Foreign Assets Control Regulations. See, e.g., 57 Fed. Reg. 17,855 (Apr. 28, 1992) (authorizing telecommunications transactions involving Vietnam "provided that payments owed to Vietnam or its nationals are deposited into blocked interest-bearing accounts in domestic U.S. banks pending full lifting of the trade embargo"); 57 Fed. Reg. 20,765 (May 15, 1992) (authorizing non-governmental organizations to conduct humanitarian projects in Vietnam and allowing issuance of specific licenses for certain humanitarian transactions with related amendment of Bureau of Export Administration controls, 57 Fed. Reg. 31,658 (July 17, 1992)); 57 Fed. Reg. 62,230 (Dec. 30, 1992) (authorizing persons subject to U.S. jurisdiction to enter into contracts with Vietnam or Vietnamese nationals "contingent upon the lifting of the embargo on Vietnam"); 58 Fed. Reg. 63,083 (Nov. 30, 1993) (making available specific licenses authorizing training and orientation services by U.S. entities to Vietnamese nationals); 58 Fed. Reg. 68,529 (Dec. 28, 1993) (making available a general license permitting participation by persons subject to U.S. jurisdiction in certain development projects in Vietnam).

On February 3, 1994, President Clinton lifted the trade embargo against Vietnam. 30 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 205 (Feb. 7, 1994). Excerpts from the President's statement announcing this decision are set forth below. See also Chapter 9.A.2.j.

Today I am lifting the trade embargo against Vietnam because I am absolutely convinced it offers the best way to resolve the fate of those who remain missing and about whom we are not sure. We've worked hard over the last year to achieve progress. On Memorial Day, I pledged to declassify and make available virtually all Government documents related to our POW's and MIA. On Veterans Day, I announced that we had fulfilled that pledge. Last April, and again in July, I sent two Presidential delegations to Vietnam to expand our search for remains and documents. We intensified our diplomatic efforts. . . .

Last July, I said any improvement in our relations with Vietnam would depend on tangible progress in four specific areas: first, the recovery and return of remains of our POW's and MIA; second, the continued resolution of discrepancy cases, cases in which there is reason to believe individuals could have survived the incident in which they were lost; third, further assistance from Vietnam and Laos on investigations along their common border, an area where many U.S. servicemen were lost and pilots downed; and fourth, accelerated efforts to provide all relevant POW/MIA-related documents.

Today, I can report that significant, tangible progress has been made in all these four areas. Let me describe it. First, on remains: Since the beginning of this administration, we have recovered the remains of 67 American servicemen. In the 7 months since July, we've recovered 39 sets of remains, more than during all of 1992. Second, on the discrepancy cases: Since the beginning of the administration, we've reduced the number of these cases from 135 to 73. Since last July, we've confirmed the deaths of 19 servicemen who were on the list. A special United States team in Vietnam continues to investigate the remaining cases. Third, on cooperation with Laos: As a direct result of the conditions set out in July, the Governments of Vietnam and Laos agreed to work with us to investigate their common border. The first such investigation took place in December and located new remains as well as crash sites that will soon be excavated. Fourth, on the documents: Since July, we have received important wartime documents from Vietnam's military archives that provide leads on unresolved POW/MIA cases. The progress achieved on unresolved questions is encouraging, but it must not end here. I remain personally committed to continuing the search for the answers and the peace of mind that families of the missing deserve.

* * * *

I want to be clear: These actions do not constitute a normalization of our relationships. Before that happens, we must have more progress, more cooperation, and more answers. Toward that end, this spring I will send another high-level U.S. delegation to Vietnam to continue the search for remains and for documents.

* * * *

Also on February 3, OFAC issued a final rule implementing prospectively the lifting of the embargo. 59 Fed. Reg. 5696 (Feb. 7, 1994). As explained in the Federal Register:

> The effect of this amendment is that transactions involving [property in which Vietnam or its nationals have an interest] coming within the jurisdiction of the United States or into the possession or control of persons subject to the jurisdiction of the United States after 5:05 p.m. E.S.T., February 3, 1994, or in which an interest of Vietnam or a national thereof arises after that time, are authorized by general license. Newly authorized transactions include, but are not limited to, importations from and exportations to Vietnam (not otherwise restricted), new investment, travel-related transactions and brokering transactions. Property blocked as of 5:04 p.m. E.S.T., February 3, 1994, remains blocked. . . .

See also 60 Fed. Reg. 12,885 (Mar. 9, 1995) unblocking the remaining Vietnamese property, based on a claims settlement agreement, discussed in Chapter 8.A.7.

C. SANCTIONS POLICY

1. Policy on Food and Medical Sanctions

On April 28, 1999, President William J. Clinton announced that the United States would exempt commercial sales of agricultural commodities and products, medicine, and medical equipment from future unilateral economic sanctions regimes, with certain exceptions. See, e.g., E.O. 13121, 64 Fed. Reg. 24,021 (May 5, 1999), discussed in 8.d., supra.

Excerpts below from a fact sheet released by the Department of State, July 27, 1999, describe the implementation of the policy. The fact sheet is available at www.state.gov/www/issues/economic/fs_990727_sanctions.html.

On July 26, 1999, the Department of the Treasury issued changes to the Iran, Libya and Sudan sanctions regulations concerning the sale of certain agricultural commodities, medicine and medical equipment implements.

The changes were intended to implement President Clinton's announcement of April 28, 1999 that the United States would henceforth exempt commercial sales of agricultural commodities and products, medicine, and medical equipment from future unilateral economic sanctions regimes.

In addition, the President decided that the Administration would extend that policy to existing economic sanctions programs by modifying licensing policies for currently embargoed countries to permit a case-by-case review of specific proposals for commercial sales.

The new regulations, issued by Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC), permit the sale of agricultural commodities and products intended for use as food, and medicines, and medical equipment provided they are not on the Commerce Control List in effect on the date of exportation.

As the President said, this change in policy has been implemented as part of the overall United States Government approach to sanctions reform. It is not directed at any specific country. Rather, it reflects a calculation of the impact on overall policy objectives of including food and medicine in unilateral sanctions. Sales of food, medicine and medical equipment do not generally enhance a nation's military capacity or ability to support terrorism. On the contrary, funds spent on agricultural commodities are not available for other, less desirable uses. The purpose in applying sanctions is to influence the behavior of regimes, not to deny people their basic humanitarian needs.

The new regulations do not provide for the automatic approval of food and medicine sales. Each contract will still have to pass through a policy filter. However, the regulations shift the presumption in favor of approving such sales. At the same time, there will be no U.S. Government funding or financing in support of such sales authorized by the change.

There are, of course, circumstances under which such commercial sales will not be permitted. These include:

- armed conflict involving the United States or its allies;
- the diversion by a regime of agricultural or medical imports to its armed forces or its political supporters;

- or situations where the regime or its officials would derive an unjustifiable economic benefit from these imports.

Sanctions are a legitimate tool of our foreign policy. But the United States has always sought to limit their impact on innocent and vulnerable populations. For 2 years, the Administration has been working to ensure that sanctions are carefully targeted, advance foreign policy goals, and avoid as much as possible damage to other U.S. interests. The U.S. Government has—and continues to have—extensive discussions of these issues with the Congress with the goal of comprehensive sanctions reform.

The announced changes reflect the basic objectives of overall sanctions reform effort:

- to ensure that unilateral economic sanctions are effective;
- that the costs to U.S. interests of imposing sanctions are minimized; and
- that the President retain the flexibility to impose sanctions —even on food and medicine—should circumstances warrant.

* * * *

2. Sanctions as a Foreign Policy Tool

Toward the end of the 1990s, several pieces of legislation were introduced that would have effected reforms on the use of economic sanctions. In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on July 1, 1999, Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business, and Agricultural Affairs Stuart E. Eizenstat addressed the use of economic sanctions in U.S. foreign policy and the role of federal legislation.

The full text of Mr. Eizenstat's testimony is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/990701_eizen_sanctions.html.

* * * *

A number of bills involving economic sanctions have . . . been introduced into both Houses of Congress. These include broad legislation such as the Sanctions Policy Reform Act, S.757, and its House counterpart, the Enhancement of Trade, Security, and Human Rights through Sanctions Reform Act, H.R. 1244, and the Sanctions Rationalization Act of 1999, S.927. Others are narrower in scope, addressing food and medicines, targeting specific countries or issues, such as the Export Administration Act.

The Administration has a clear position, Mr. Chairman, on the role of economic sanctions. Properly designed, implemented and applied as a part of a coherent strategy, sanctions—including economic sanctions—are a valuable tool for enforcing international norms and protecting our national interests. At the same time, sanctions are a blunt instrument. They are not a panacea nor are they cost free. Indeed, used inappropriately, they can actually impede the attainment of our objectives and come at a significant cost to other U.S. policy objectives.

* * * *

With respect to what constitutes a sanction, Mr. Chairman, there is no uniformly applicable legislative definition, but when I speak of a sanction, I have in mind the use of economic tools to address conduct by foreign governments or entities that is harmful to U.S. foreign policy interests. I do not include, for example, trade-related retaliation under our trade laws.

During today's testimony, I will speak to the full range of measures that are sometimes placed within the rubric of "economic sanctions." Some include, for example, the denial of a normally available benefit, such as access to the U.S. market on an NTR basis, or the right to purchase U.S. goods or services or to attract U.S. investment. The broad trade embargoes on Iran, Cuba, North Korea, Libya, Sudan and Yugoslavia are undisputed examples. Some might also include decisions about whether to offer U.S. support in International Financial Institutions or conditions on U.S. aid that are imposed to advance U.S. foreign policy objectives.

* * * *

We believe that our use of sanctions should be governed by a number of common sense principles and that any prospective legislation should be measured against these same standards.

First, effectiveness should be our watchword. In fact, used ineffectively, they can even make it more difficult to attain our goals and come at a significant cost to other U.S. policy objectives. At the same time, our emphasis on effectiveness should not lead us to expect instant results or deter us from acting alone when important U.S. interests are at stake. Indeed, this is why presidential flexibility is essential.

Second, unilateral economic sanctions should not be a first resort to conduct by a foreign government which negatively affects our interests. We should first aggressively pursue other available diplomatic options. These can range from symbolic measures like withdrawing an Ambassador, reducing embassy staff, to denying visas to target figures, entering into security arrangements with neighboring countries, to military intervention and everything in between. In general, we should turn to sanctions only after other options have failed or have been judged inadequate or inappropriate.

Third, sanctions are most effective when they have broad multilateral support. The history of our use of unilateral sanctions shows that by themselves in the majority of cases they fail to change the conduct of the targeted country or, at best, are a contributory but probably not a decisive factor in securing the changes of behavior or policy that we seek. Multilateral sanctions in contrast maximize international pressure on the offending state. They show unity of international purpose. Because they are multilateral, these sanctions regimes are more difficult to evade or undermine. They minimize the damage to U.S. competitiveness and distribute more equitably the cost of sanctions across countries. It was multilateral sanctions that helped end apartheid in South Africa, that have isolated Saddam Hussein in Iraq, that brought Serbia to the bargaining table in Dayton. When considering sanctions legislation, we believe that the Congress could include provisions urging the President to make maximum efforts to develop multilateral cooperation with other countries having similar interests in addressing the concern which the sanctions are intended to address.

Nonetheless, if we are unsuccessful in building a multilateral regime, and important national interests are at issue, we must be prepared to act unilaterally. To maintain its leadership role, the U.S. must sometimes act even though other nations are not compelled to do so.

Fourth, flexibility of application is absolutely essential if we are to use sanctions effectively. The fundamental principle underlying our approach is one of symmetry between the two branches—Congress, in short, should be no more prescriptive of the Executive Branch than it is of itself.

Our foreign policy is most effective when it reflects cooperation and consultation between the Administration and the Congress. The decision to apply economic sanctions—or to lift or waive potential measures or those already in place—should reflect a relationship of comity between the Executive and Legislative branches. We must respect the particular role that each branch plays in making foreign policy.

* * * *

In any sanctions reform legislation we support a single national interest waiver standard applicable to all future sanctions legislation.

Our experiences with the Libertad Act (Helms-Burton) and the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA) underscore the importance of flexibility to achieving the purposes of those acts.

In the case of Helms-Burton, the exercise of Title III waiver authority led the EU, in December, 1996, to enact and restate each 6 months its Common Position on Cuba, tying concrete improvement of its relations with Cuba to fundamental changes in respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in Cuba. The EU has spoken out more forcefully in support of democracy and human rights. It has established a special Human Rights Working Group among its Embassies to reach out to dissidents and has condemned the arrest of the dissident working group.

Similarly, the prospect of an amendment to Title IV that would authorize a waiver led the EU to agree to an Understanding to limit investment in illegally expropriated properties worldwide, including in Cuba. . . . The pathbreaking Understanding that we reached with the EU on May 18, 1998, will, for the first time, establish multilateral disciplines among major capital exporting countries to inhibit and deter investment in properties that have been expropriated in violation of international law.

These new restrictions will discourage illegal expropriations and chill investment in Cuba, warning investors to keep "hands off." Castro has railed against the Understanding, precisely because he understands its potential impact on Cuba and because he sees that it embodies the principles underlying Helms-Burton.

* * * *

Similarly, the flexibility included in ILSA—the ability to decide whether to impose or waive sanctions—was central to our ability to advance the objectives of that law. In developing ILSA, Congress was motivated by its deep concern about the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and terrorism and expressed its deep concern about Iran. We used the Act's waiver authority to help consolidate the gains that we had made with the EU and Russia on strengthening international cooperation to oppose Iran's dangerous and objectionable behavior. For example, the EU strengthened its already good export controls on dealing with Iran. It helped us avoid a major dispute with allies that would not have served the Act's objectives and would have heavily strained our cooperation with our allies across the board.

With these general principles in mind, . . . [w]e have proposed appropriate and flexible guidelines that the Executive Branch would be willing to apply to future imposition of sanctions under IEEPA as well as discretionary sanctions under future sanctions laws passed by Congress.

First, we believe that flexibility accompanied by national interest waiver authority applicable to all future unilateral sanctions legislation is the single most essential element. . . .

Second, it is important to prevent excessive procedural constraints from hamstringing the Executive Branch, for example, advance public notice of sanctions which could allow a target country or entity to rearrange its assets in advance of U.S. action. . . .

Sunset clauses tied to a set time period rather than a measure of a sanction's performance are not appropriate. . . .

* * * *

In sum, if our policies are to be effective, we must work together—Administration, Congress, at the state and local level, as well as the business community, including NGOs—to see that our use of sanctions is appropriate, coherent, and designed to attract international support. . . .

Chapter 17

International Conflict Resolution and Avoidance

A. PEACE PROCESS AND RELATED ISSUES

1. Bosnia: 1995 Dayton Peace Accords

The Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia splintered during the 1990s. Slovenia, Croatia, The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, and Bosnia and Herzegovina ("Bosnia") were recognized as independent states in 1992. The remaining republics of Serbia and Montenegro declared a new Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("FRY") in April 1992. See Chapter 9.B.1. A State Department historical publication described the subsequent conflict as "Europe's bloodiest conflict since World War II. Lasting nearly 4 years, the conflict caused by the breakup of Yugoslavia claimed some quarter of a million lives, displaced two million people from their homes, and posed one of the great tests to the international community since the end of the Cold War." History of the Department of State During the Clinton Presidency (1993–2001), Chapter 11, produced by the Department of State Historian's Office ("History"), available at www.state.gov/r/pa/ho/pubs/8527.htm.

In 1992 the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia was convened in London and in Geneva in an effort to find a peaceful settlement to the resulting conflicts. The London Conference, co-chaired by UK Prime Minister John Major as the Head of State/Government of the Presidency of the European Community and by UN Secretary General Boutros-Ghali, was held August 26–27, 1992. See intervention of Acting Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger at the London Conference, August 26, 1992, with conference documents and related materials in 3 Dep't St. Dispatch Supp. No. 7 (Sept. 15, 1992), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html. See also intervention of Secretary Eagleburger at the Geneva Conference, December 16, 1992, in Chapter 3.B.2.c.

As discussed in Chapter 16.A.8.b, sanctions imposed by the United Nations and the United States during this period were tied to specific efforts to achieve a peaceful resolution. In particular, UN Security Council Resolution 820 of April 17, 1993, called on the Bosnian Serbs to accept by April 26, 1993, a peace plan for Bosnia "in the form agreed to by two of the Bosnian parties and set out in the report of the Secretary-General of 26 March 1993 (S/25479)" (often referred to as the "Vance-Owen peace plan" after the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia). U.N. Doc. S/RES/820 (1993). When the Bosnian Serbs failed to accept the plan, President William J. Clinton issued Executive Order No. 12846 implementing sanctions mandated by Resolution 820. 58 Fed. Reg. 25,771 (Apr. 27, 1993).

Significant developments in 1994 are described as excerpted below in the 1996 CIA World Factbook, available at www.theodora.com/wfb/bosnia_and_herzegovina_geography.html:

> In March 1994, Bosnia's Muslims and Croats reduced the number of warring factions from three to two by signing an agreement in Washington, DC, creating the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. A group of rebel Muslims, however, continues to battle government forces in the northwest enclave of Bihac. A Contact Group of countries, the US, UK, France, Germany, and Russia, continues to seek a resolution between the Federation and the Bosnian Serbs. In July of 1994 the Contact Group presented a plan to the warring parties that roughly equally divides the country between the two, while > maintaining Bosnia in its current internationally recognized borders. The Federation agreed to the plan almost immediately, while the Bosnian Serbs rejected it.

Negotiating efforts continued through 1995 and, as discussed in Chapter 18.A.4.a., on August 26, 1995, the United States participated in a NATO two-week bombing campaign in response to a mortar attack by Bosnian Serbs on a Sarajevo market. Following this attack, on October 5, the parties agreed to end their fighting and meet in the United States for "'proximity talks,' a negotiating process in which a neutral party conducted individual talks with the combatants, who were housed in close quarters but separate from each other." History, supra.

The proximity talks were held at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Dayton, Ohio, from November 1 through November 21, 1995, and resulted in three agreements. The first two, concluded on November 10 and 12, 1995, were the Dayton Agreement on Implementing the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, with annexed Agreed Principles for the Interim Statute for the City of Mostar, reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 170 (1996); and the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 184 (1996).

On November 21, 1995, the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the FRY, and the Republic of Croatia initialed the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina ("Dayton Peace Accords"), reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 75 (1996). In an "Agreement on Initialing," signed on the same day, the initialing parties made a commitment to sign the agreement, with annexes, in their initialed form, and expressed consent to be bound. The Dayton Peace Accords were signed by the parties at Paris on December 14, 1995, and entered into force upon signature. The United States and the other members of the Contact Group, as well as a representative of the European Union, signed as witnesses. Documents related to the Dayton Peace Accords are available at 7 Dep't St. Dispatch Supp. No. 1 (March 1996).

A summary of the Dayton Peace Accords released by the Department of State on November 30, 1995, described the terms of the agreement as follows:

- Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia agree to fully respect the sovereign equality of one another and to settle disputes by peaceful means.
- The FRY and Bosnia and Herzegovina recognize each other, and agree to discuss further aspects of their mutual recognition.
- The parties agree to fully respect and promote fulfillment of the commitments made in the various Annexes, and they obligate themselves to respect human rights and the rights of refugees and displaced persons.
- The parties agree to cooperate fully with all entities, including those authorized by the United Nations Security Council, in implementing the peace settlement and investigating and prosecuting war crimes and other violations of international humanitarian law.

The twelve annexes addressed detailed arrangements among the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and its constituent entities for the transition from war to peace and for the establishment of a constitutional system of governance. The annexes also contemplated the designation of a High Representative, inter alia, to monitor the implementation of the peace settlement and coordinate the activities of the civilian organizations and agencies in Bosnia and Herzegovina to ensure the efficient implementation of the civilian aspects of the peace settlement. The complete text of the agreement and twelve annexes and related documents is available at www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/bosnia/bosagree.html.

Suspension of sanctions in response to these developments is discussed in Chapter 16.A.8.c. Participation by the United States in multilateral peacekeeping operations implementing the Dayton Accords is discussed in B.2. below.

2. Middle East

During the 1990s the United States and other countries continued efforts to resolve longstanding conflicts in the Middle East. Key documents from the period 1993–2001 and related materials are available at www.state.gov/p/nea/rt/c9679.htm.

a. Madrid Peace Conference

(1) Resumption of the peace process

On March 6, 1991, President George H.W. Bush addressed a joint session of Congress to mark the end of the Gulf War. 27 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 257 (Mar. 6, 1991). In his remarks, the President also announced that he had instructed Secretary of State James Baker to travel to the region to resume the peace process, which would be grounded in United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

Resolution 242, adopted in 1967,

> [a]ffirms that the fulfillment of Charter principles requires the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East which should include the application of both the following principles:
>
> > Withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict;
> > Termination of all claims or states of belligerency and respect for and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every State in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force . . .
>
> U.N. Doc. S/RES/242 (1967).

Resolution 338, adopted in 1973,

> [c]alls upon all parties to present fighting to cease all firing and terminate all military activity immediately, > no later than 12 hours after the moment of the adoption of this decision, in the positions they now occupy;

>
> [c]alls upon all parties concerned to start immediately after the cease-fire the implementation of Security Council Resolution 242 (1967) in all of its parts;
>
> [d]ecides that, immediately and concurrently with the cease-fire, negotiations start between the parties concerned under appropriate auspices aimed at establishing a just and durable peace in the Middle East.

U.N. Doc. S/RES/338 (1973).

President Bush's March 6, 1991, speech is excerpted below.

* * * *

Our commitment to peace in the Middle East does not end with the liberation of Kuwait. So tonight let me outline four key challenges to be met.

First, we must work together to create shared security arrangements in the region. . . .

Second, we must act to control the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the missiles used to deliver them. . . .

And third, we must work to create new opportunities for peace and stability in the Middle East. On the night I announced Operation Desert Storm, I expressed my hope that out of the horrors of war might come new momentum for peace. We've learned in the modern age geography cannot guarantee security, and security does not come from military power alone.

All of us know the depth of bitterness that has made the dispute between Israel and its neighbors so painful and intractable. Yet, in the conflict just concluded, Israel and many of the Arab States have for the first time found themselves confronting the same aggressor. By now, it should be plain to all parties that peacemaking in the Middle East requires compromise. At the same time, peace brings real benefits to everyone. We must do all that we can to close the gap between Israel and the Arab States—and between Israelis and Palestinians. The tactics of terror lead absolutely nowhere. There can be no substitute for diplomacy.

A comprehensive peace must be grounded in United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 and the principle of territory for peace. This principle must be elaborated to provide for Israel's security and recognition and at the same time for legitimate Palestinian political rights. Anything else would fail the twin test of fairness and security. The time has come to put an end to Arab-Israeli conflict.

The war with Iraq is over. The quest for solutions to the problems in Lebanon, in the Arab-Israeli dispute, and in the Gulf must go forward with new vigor and determination. And I guarantee you: No one will work harder for a stable peace in the region than we will.

Fourth, we must foster economic development for the sake of peace and progress. . . .

By meeting these four challenges, we can build a framework for peace. I've asked Secretary of State Baker to go to the Middle East to begin the process. He will go to listen, to probe, to offer suggestions—to advance the search for peace and stability. I've also asked him to raise the plight of the hostages held in Lebanon. We have not forgotten them, and we will not forget them.

To all the challenges that confront this region of the world there is no single solution, no solely American answer. But we can make a difference. America will work tirelessly as a catalyst for positive change.

(2) Invitation to participants

On October 18, 1991, Secretary of State Baker announced that the United States and the Soviet Union would co-sponsor a peace conference in Madrid, to commence October 30, 1991. The invitation from the United States and the Soviet Union, describing the structure and goals of the conference, is available at 4 Dep't St. Dispatch Supp. No. 4 (1993), http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html, and is excerpted below.

. . . The United States and the Soviet Union are prepared to assist the parties to achieve a just, lasting and comprehensive peace settlement, through direct negotiations along two tracks, between Israel and the Arab states, and between Israel and the Palestinians, based on United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. The objective of this process is real peace.

* * * *

Direct bilateral negotiations will begin four days after the opening of the conference. Those parties who wish to attend multilateral negotiations will convene two weeks after the opening of the conference to organize those negotiations. The co-sponsors believe that those negotiations should focus on region-wide issues of water, refugee issues, environment, economic development, and other subjects of mutual interest.

The co-sponsors will chair the conference which will be held at ministerial level. Governments to be invited include Israel, Syria, Lebanon and Jordan. Palestinians will be invited and attend as part of a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. Egypt will be invited to the conference as a participant. The European Community will be a participant in the conference, alongside the United States and the Soviet Union and will be represented by its presidency. The Gulf Cooperation Council will be invited to send its secretary-general to the conference as an observer, and GCC member states will be invited to participate in organizing the negotiations on multilateral issues. The United Nations will be invited to send an observer, representing the secretary-general.

The conference will have no power to impose solutions on the parties or veto agreements reached by them. It will have no authority to make decisions for the parties and no ability to vote on issues or results. The conference can reconvene only with the consent of all the parties.

With respect to negotiations between Israel and Palestinians who are part of the joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation, negotiations will be conducted in phases, beginning with talks on interim self-government arrangements. These talks will be conducted with the objective of reaching agreement within one year. Once agreed, the interim self-government arrangements will last for a period of five years; beginning the third year of the period of interim self-government arrangements, negotiations will take place on permanent status. These permanent status negotiations, and the negotiations between Israel and the Arab states, will take place on the basis of Resolutions 242 and 338.

It is understood that the co-sponsors are committed to making this process succeed. It is their intention to convene the conference and negotiations with those parties who agree to attend.

* * * *

(3) The Madrid Peace Conference and the commencement of negotiations

The Madrid Peace Conference began on October 30, 1991, with opening remarks by President Bush reaffirming the basis and structure of the negotiations and outlining the role the United States would play in the process, including the provision of written assurances to Israel, Syria, Jordan and Lebanon and the Palestinians. Documents related to the Madrid Peace Conference, including President Bush's speech, excerpted below, and the closing remarks of Secretary of State Baker on November 1, 1991, are available at 2 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 44 at 803–10 (Nov. 4, 1991), http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

* * * *

Our objective must be clear and straightforward. It is not simply to end the state of war in the Middle East and replace it with a state of non-belligerency. This is not enough; this would not last. Rather, we seek peace, real peace. And by real peace I mean treaties. Security. Diplomatic relations. Economic relations. Trade. Investment. Cultural exchange. Even tourism.

What we envision is a process of direct negotiations proceeding along two tracks, one between Israel and the Arab states; the other between Israel and the Palestinians. Negotiations are to be conducted on the basis of U.N. Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. . . .

* * * *

We know that peace must . . . be based on fairness. In the absence of fairness, there will be no legitimacy—no stability. This applies above all to the Palestinian people, many of whom have known turmoil and frustration above all else. Israel now has an opportunity to demonstrate that it is willing to enter into a new relationship with its Palestinian neighbors; one predicated upon mutual respect and cooperation. Throughout the Middle East, we seek a stable and enduring settlement. We've not defined what this means; indeed, I make these points with no map showing where the final borders are to be drawn. Nevertheless, we believe territorial compromise is essential for peace. Boundaries should reflect the quality of both security and political arrangements. The United States is prepared to accept whatever the parties themselves find acceptable. What we seek, as I said on March 6, is a solution that meets the twin tests of fairness and security.

. . . I want to say something about the role of the United States of America. We played an active role in making this conference possible; both the Secretary of State, Jim Baker, and I will play an active role in helping the process succeed. Toward this end, we've provided written assurances to Israel, to Syria, to Jordan, Lebanon, and the Palestinians. In the spirit of openness and honesty, we will brief all parties on the assurances that we have provided to the other. We're prepared to extend guarantees, provide technology and support, if that is what peace requires. And we will call upon our friends and allies in Europe and in Asia to join with us in providing resources so that peace and prosperity go hand in hand.

b. The implementing agreements and Oslo Accords

(1) Post-Madrid negotiations

Secretary of State Warren Christopher made his first official trip to the Middle East in February 1993 in an attempt to remove obstacles to negotiations. On March 10, 1993, Secretary Christopher, speaking on behalf of President Clinton, invited the parties to negotiations in Washington starting April 20, 1993, stating:

> The resumption of bilateral and multilateral negotiations, which we are announcing today, is important but not an end in itself. Our objective and the objective of all parties must be to make real, tangible progress soon. Nearly everyone I spoke to on my trip in the Middle East agreed that there may be now a one-time opportunity to promote peace. History tells us that such opportunities may be fleeting, especially in the Middle East, and we believe it is now time to re-launch the negotiations.
>
> Toward this end, the United States and Russia, as co-sponsors of the Middle East peace negotiations, are today inviting the parties to resume bilateral negotiations here in Washington for the 2-week period commencing on Tuesday, April 20 [1993]. We're also announcing the reconvening of the multilateral working groups [on] a specified series of dates beginning with the water group on April 27 in Geneva.

The text of Secretary Christopher's statement is available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dossec/1993/9303/930310dossec2.html.

(2) The Declaration of Principles ("Oslo Accords")

In August 1993 the Palestinian Liberation Organization and the Israeli Government announced that, through secret talks held in Oslo since January 1993, they had agreed upon a Declaration of Principles that would create the framework for a five-year transition to Palestinian self-rule in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Materials from the September 1993 developments discussed below are reprinted in 4 Dep't St. Dispatch Supp. No. 4 (Sept. 1993), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

In an exchange of letters dated September 9, 1993, Yasser Arafat, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the PLO, confirmed PLO commitments to, among other things, recognize the right of Israel to exist in peace and security, accept UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, commit to the Middle East peace process, renounce the use of terrorism and other acts of violence, and undertake to submit necessary changes in regard to the Palestinian Covenant to the Palestinian National Council for formal approval. In response, Yitzhak Rabin, Prime Minister of Israel, recognized the PLO as the representative of the Palestinian people and agreed to negotiate with it within the Middle East peace process. In a separate letter of the same date addressed to Norwegian Foreign Minister Johan Jorgen Holst, Chairman Arafat confirmed that, upon the signing of the Declaration of Principles, he would include in public statements that the PLO "encourages and calls upon the Palestinian people in the West Bank and Gaza Strip to take part in steps leading to normalization of life, rejecting violence and terrorism, contributing to peace and stability and participating actively in shaping reconstruction, economic development and cooperation."

The Government of the State of Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements at Washington, D.C. on September 13, 1993, reprinted in 32 I.L.M. 1525 (1993). The United States and the Russian Federation signed as witnesses.

Article I of the Declaration of Principles described the aim of the negotiations as follows:

> The aim of the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations within the current Middle East peace process is, among other things, to establish a Palestinian Interim Self-Government > Authority, the elected Council (the "Council"), for the Palestinian people in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, for a transitional period not exceeding five years, leading to a permanent settlement based on Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

>
> It is understood that the interim arrangements are an integral part of the whole peace process and that the negotiations on the permanent status will lead to the implementation of Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

Article II provided that "the agreed framework for the interim period is set forth in this Declaration of Principles."

The remaining articles and attached annexes addressed elections in the West Bank and Gaza Strip for the Council, jurisdiction of the Council, a five-year transitional period, and provision for permanent status negotiations, preparatory transfer of powers and responsibilities, negotiation of an agreement on the interim period, public order and security for the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, enactment and review of laws and military orders, establishment of a joint Israeli-Palestinian Liaison Committee, cooperation in economic fields, liaison and cooperation with Jordan and Egypt, redeployment of Israeli forces, Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and Jericho area, resolution of disputes, and Israeli-Palestinian cooperation concerning regional programs.

At the signing ceremony, President William J. Clinton "pledge[d] the active support of the United States of America to the difficult work that lies ahead." 29 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1739 (Sept. 20, 1993). On the same day, Secretary of State Warren Christopher, at a luncheon with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PLO Executive Committee Member Mahmoud Abbas, reiterated the commitment of the United States to "remain a full partner in the pursuit of peace, as asked for by the parties. We will spare no effort in helping the parties reach new agreements and then to turn the agreements into reality." He continued:

> To accomplish that end, we will need the international community to become all of our partners in mustering the substantial resources necessary to make these historic agreements succeed. The United States will try to play a coordinating role in marshaling these resources. Together with our international partners, we must ensure that the new Palestinian authority will have the resources to enable it to do its vital work. We must also promote economic development in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

We will also be responsive to the needs of Israel that result from this agreement. For the part of the United States, I want to reaffirm our unshakable commitment to Israel's security and well-being.

(3) Middle East Peace Facilitation Act

Following the signing of the Declaration of Principles, Congress passed the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act, Part E, Pub. L. No. 103–125, 107 Stat. 1309 (1993), amended by Pub. L. No. 103–166, 107 Stat. 1978 (1993) ("MEPFA"). MEPFA granted the President authority to suspend, under certain conditions and for periods of no more than 6 months, the following statutory provisions as they applied with respect to the PLO or entities associated with it: (1) § 307 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended (22 U.S.C. § 2227) (making funds authorized to be appropriated for voluntary contributions to international organizations unavailable for U.S. proportionate share for programs for the PLO or projects whose purpose is to benefit the PLO or associated entities); (2) § 114 of the Department of State Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1984 and 1985 (22 U.S.C. § 287e note) (reducing payment of assessed contributions to the United Nations by share of amounts budgeted for projects whose primary purpose is to benefit the PLO or associated entities); (3) § 1003 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1988 and 1989 (22 U.S.C. § 5202) (making it unlawful, with the purpose of furthering the interests of the PLO, to receive anything of value or to expend funds from the PLO or any of its constituent groups, or for the PLO to establish a PLO office in the United States)*; and (4) § 37 of the Bretton Woods Agreement Act (22 U.S.C. § 286w) (stating the policy of the United States that the PLO should not be given membership or any other official status in the International Monetary Fund).

President Clinton certified to the Congress pursuant to § 583(b)(2) of the act that "(A) it is in the national interest of the United States to exercise such authority; and (B) the Palestine Liberation Organization continues to abide by all the commitments described in paragraph (4)." Paragraph (4) enumerated commitments made in letters of September 9, 1993, to the Prime Minister of Israel and to the Foreign Minister of Norway, and "in, and resulting from, the good faith implementation of, the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements. . . ." See 2.b.(2), supra.

The President's authority was continued in the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act of 1994, Part E of Title V, Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1994 and 1995, Pub. L. No. 103–236, 108 Stat. 382 (1994); the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act of 1995, Title VI of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–107, 110 Stat. 704. Thereafter, authority to waive certain prohibitions was continued in general provisions of the annual Foreign Operations, Export

* The U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York had previously determined that this provision did not require the closure of the PLO Permanent Observer Mission to the United Nations nor impair the continued exercise of the PLO's functions as a Permanent Observer at the United Nations. United States v. Palestine Liberation Organization, 695 F.Supp. 1456 (S.D.N.Y. 1988). The court explained: "In sum, the language of the Headquarters Agreement, the long-standing practice under it, and the interpretation given it by the parties to it leave no doubt that it places an obligation upon the United States to refrain from impairing the function of the PLO Observer Mission to the United Nations. The ATA and its legislative history do not manifest Congress' intent to abrogate this obligation. We are therefore constrained to interpret the ATA as failing to supersede the Headquarters Agreement and inapplicable to the Mission." The United States did not appeal.

(4) Implementing agreements

In 1994 and 1995, the Government of the State of Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization concluded a series of agreements intended to implement the Declaration of Principles. Prominent among these was the Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area signed at Cairo on May 4, 1994, reprinted in 33 I.L.M. 622 (1994). The agreement provided, among other things, for the scheduled withdrawal of Israeli forces, the establishment of the Palestinian Authority, and the assumption of specified authority and responsibilities by the Palestinian Authority in areas subject to the agreement. It was signed by the Government of the State of Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization as parties and officially began the five-year period of interim Palestinian self-rule envisaged by the Declaration of Principles. The United States, the Russian Federation, and the Arab Republic of Egypt signed as witnesses. The text of the Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area is available at www.state.gov/p/nea/rt/c9962.htm.

(5) Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip

On September 28, 1995, the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip was signed in Washington, D.C. ("Interim Agreement"), reprinted in 36 I.L.M. 551 (1997) as called for in the Declaration of Principles.

The Interim Agreement, among other things, provided for the establishment of an elected, self-governing Palestinian Authority comprised of a representative Council and a Ra'ees (leader) of its Executive Authority, and for transfer of civil and security responsibilities to the Palestinian Authority in additional parts of the West Bank. It also called for the establishment of U.S.-Israel-Palestinian and U.S.-Jordan-Israel trilateral commissions, both of which were established. See, e.g., Remarks by Secretary of State Warren Christopher, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat and Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres following the first meeting of the U.S.-Israel-Palestinian trilateral commission, September 29, 1995, available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dossec/1995/9509/950929dossec.html.

The agreement was signed by the Government of the State of Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization and witnessed by the United States, Russia, Egypt, Jordan, Norway, and the European Union. The text of the agreement is available at www.state.gov/p/nea/rls/22678.htm.

(6) The Jordan/Israel peace process

In the course of the Madrid/Oslo process, Israel and Jordan negotiated three documents bringing an end to their hostilities and culminating in a Treaty of Peace. The first of the documents was the Israel-Jordan Common Agenda for The Bilateral Peace Negotiations ("Common Agenda"), reprinted in 32 I.L.M. 1522 (1993), which was initialed on September 14, 1993, at Washington D.C. The stated goal of the Common Agenda was "the achievement of just, lasting and comprehensive peace between the Arab States, the Palestinians and Israel as per the Madrid invitation." To this end, the Common Agenda outlined eight elements on which Israel and Jordan would work to achieve satisfactory resolutions, and stated that the anticipated outcome of this endeavor would be the conclusion of a peace treaty. Secretary of State Christopher commented as follows at the initialing ceremony, which occurred one day after the signing of the Declaration of Principles:

> Yesterday, I expressed the hope that we could see progress toward a comprehensive peace settlement between Israel and all of her Arab neighbors. Today, we take a very important step toward that very comprehensive peace with the initialing of the Israeli-Jordanian substantive agenda.
>
>
> . . . You have created a substantive framework to negotiate, and we hope to resolve, vital issues between Israel and Jordan—issues such as security, territory, refugees and displaced persons, natural resources, and economic cooperation.

See 4 St. Dep't Dispatch Supp. No. 4 (Sept. 1993), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/1993/html/Dispatchv4Sup4.html.

The second of the documents, the Washington Declaration, was signed on July 25, 1994, at Washington, D.C., by Israel and Jordan and witnessed by the United States. The Declaration embraced and expanded upon the underlying principles of the Common Agenda and recorded that "the state of belligerency between Jordan and Israel has been terminated."

The culminating document, the Treaty of Peace between the State of Israel and the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, was initialed on October 17, 1994, and signed at the Israel/Jordan border on October 26, 1994, reprinted in 34 I.L.M. 43 (1995). The Treaty was signed by the State of Israel and the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan and witnessed by the United States. The Treaty established a state of peace between the parties, fixed their common boundary without prejudice to the status of the West Bank, and provided for the resumption of normal economic relations.

The texts of the Common Agenda, the Washington Declaration, and the Treaty of Peace are available at http://usembassy-israel.org.il/publish/peace/peaindex.htm#jordan.

c. The Hebron redeployment

The next agreement to emerge from the Israeli-Palestinian peace process was the January 1997 Protocol Concerning the Redeployment in Hebron ("Hebron Protocol"), reprinted in 36 I.L.M. 650 (1997); see also www.state.gov/p/nea/rt/c9960.htm. The Hebron Protocol, which was signed by the Government of the State of Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization at Jerusalem on January 17, 1997, provided for the redeployment of Israeli military forces and the reconfiguration of Palestinian and Israeli security powers and responsibilities in Hebron.

A Note for the Record on more general issues, prepared by U.S. Special Middle East Coordinator Dennis Ross at the request of the parties and dated January 17, 1997, recorded points agreed upon in a meeting by leaders of the two sides on January 15, 1997. The text of the Note for the Record is available at http://usembassy-israel.org.il/publish/peace/note_record.htm. The texts of briefings, press releases, and speeches relating to the signature of the Protocol are available at http://usembassy-israel.org.il/publish/peace/1997archive.html.

On January 14, 1997, President William J. Clinton had welcomed news that agreement on Hebron had been reached, as excerpted below. 33 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 41 (Jan. 20, 1997).

A few minutes ago, Prime Minister Netanyahu and Chairman Arafat called me to tell me that they have reached agreement on the Israeli redeployment in Hebron. This achievement brings to a successful conclusion the talks that were launched in Washington last September, and it brings us another step closer to a lasting, secure Middle East peace.

* * * *

Israel will promptly redeploy its troops. The parties will establish practical security arrangements to strengthen stability and improve cooperation. There will also be an agreed roadmap for further redeployment by Israel. The Palestinians have reaffirmed their commitments, including their commitment to fight terrorism.

I thank Prime Minister Netanyahu and Chairman Arafat for their leadership. King Hussein also deserves special recognition and gratitude for his work for peace. I also want to express my appreciation to President Mubarak for his support. . . .

Today's agreement is not an end in itself. Bringing its words to life will require active and continuous cooperation between Israeli and Palestinian officials. It will demand every effort to stop those who would choose confrontation over cooperation. . . .

That's why it is so important that the Israelis and the Palestinians have agreed to continue to work on the remaining issues contained in their agreements. As they do, the United States will do all it can to help. . . .

d. The Wye River Memorandum

President William J. Clinton, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, and Special Middle East Coordinator Dennis Ross began a series of meetings and visits with Israeli and Palestinian leaders in the first half of 1998, resulting in the Wye River Memorandum signed October 23, 1998, at Washington, reprinted in 37 I.L.M. 1251 (1998). The signing parties were the Palestinian Liberation Organization and the Government of the State of Israel. The United States signed as a witness.

As set forth in the memorandum, certain steps were to be undertaken initially over a 12-week period > to facilitate implementation of the Interim Agreement on the West Bank and Gaza Strip of September 28, 1995 (the "Interim Agreement") and other related agreements including the Note for the Record of January 17, 1997 (hereinafter referred to as "the prior agreements") so that the Israeli and Palestinian sides can more effectively carry out their reciprocal responsibilities, including those relating to further redeployments and security respectively. These steps are to be carried out in a parallel phased approach in accordance with this Memorandum and the attached time line. They are subject to the relevant terms and conditions of the prior agreements and do not supersede their other requirements.

The Wye River Memorandum specifically provided for a role for the United States in implementation, including on security, as excerpted below.

The text of the memorandum is also available at www.state.gov/p/nea/rt/c9960.htm. Press and other materials released by the United States relating to the memorandum are available at http://usembassy-israel.org.il/publish/peace/october98/news.html.

II. SECURITY

* * * *

Pursuant to the prior agreements, the Palestinian side's implementation of its responsibilities for security, security cooperation, and other issues will be as detailed below during the time periods specified in the attached time line:

A. Security Actions

1. Outlawing and Combating Terrorist Organizations

(a) The Palestinian side will make known its policy of zero tolerance for terror and violence against both sides.
(b) A work plan developed by the Palestinian side will be shared with the U.S. and thereafter implementation will begin immediately to ensure the systematic and effective combat of terrorist organizations and their infrastructure.
(c) In addition to the bilateral Israeli-Palestinian security cooperation, a U.S.-Palestinian committee will meet biweekly to review the steps being taken to eliminate terrorists cells and the support structure that plans, finances, supplies and abets terror. In these meetings, the Palestinian side will inform the U.S. fully of the actions it has taken to outlaw all organizations (or wings of organizations, as appropriate) of a military, terrorist or violent character and their support structure and to prevent them from operating in areas under its jurisdiction.
(d) The Palestinian side will apprehend the specific individuals suspected of perpetrating acts of violence and terror for the purpose of further investigation, and prosecution and punishment of all persons involved in acts of violence and terror.
(e) A U.S.-Palestinian committee will meet to review and evaluate information pertinent to the decisions on prosecution, punishment or other legal measures which affect the status of individuals suspected of abetting or perpetrating acts of violence and terror.

2. Prohibiting Illegal Weapons

(a) The Palestinian side will ensure an effective legal framework is in place to criminalize, in conformity with the prior agreements, any importation, manufacturing or unlicensed sale, acquisition or possession of firearms, ammunition or weapons in areas under Palestinian jurisdiction.
(b) In addition, the Palestinian side will establish and vigorously and continuously implement a systematic program for the collection and appropriate handling of all such illegal items in accordance with the prior agreements. The U.S. has agreed to assist in carrying out this program.

(c) A U.S.-Palestinian-Israeli committee will be established to assist and enhance cooperation in preventing the smuggling or other unauthorized introduction of weapons or explosive materials into areas under Palestinian jurisdiction.

3. Prevention of Incitement

(a) Drawing on relevant international practice and pursuant to Article XXII (1) of the Interim Agreement and the Note for the Record, the Palestinian side will issue a decree prohibiting all forms of incitement to violence or terror, and establishing mechanisms for acting systematically against all expressions or threats of violence or terror. This decree will be comparable to the existing Israeli legislation which deals with the same subject.
(b) A U.S.-Palestinian-Israeli committee will meet on a regular basis to monitor cases of possible incitement to violence or terror and to make recommendations and reports on how to prevent such incitement. The Israeli, Palestinian and U.S. sides will each appoint a media specialist, a law enforcement representative, an educational specialist and a current or former elected official to the committee.

e. Continuation of Oslo Process after May 4, 1999

With the approach of May 4, 1999, the date for the end of the five-year transitional period and for the conclusion of permanent status negotiations, the White House announced several steps it was taking to promote the pursuit of Israeli-Palestinian peace. The April 26, 1999, statement by the White House Press Secretary, excerpted below, is available at www.usembassy-israel.org.il/publish/peace/archives/1999/april/me0426a.html.

* * * *

First, the United States calls upon both parties to continue to adhere to the terms of reference of the peace process as defined in Madrid and Oslo. The objective of the negotiating process is the implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, including land for peace, and all other agreements under the Oslo process.

Second, the United States calls on the parties to continue to carry out all their interim period responsibilities, including full implementation without any further delay of the Interim Agreement and the Wye River Memorandum and continued cooperation between the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli Government.

Third, the United States believes that the Oslo process was never intended to be open-ended; accordingly, the United States calls on both parties to engage in accelerated permanent status negotiations and to rededicate themselves to the goal of reaching an agreement within one year. Toward that end, and in an effort to facilitate that process, the United States is ready to help launch those negotiations after the Israeli elections and once an Israeli government has been formed, and to review and monitor their progress. The United States also is prepared, with the consent of the parties, to bring them together within six months to review the status of their efforts and to facilitate reaching an agreement.

Finally, if Israelis and Palestinians are to reach an agreement, it is essential that they do their part to create a serious, fair and credible environment for negotiations. In this regard, it is critical to the interest both sides share in enhancing the security of their people that the Palestinians continue their efforts to fight terror and that Israelis and Palestinians maintain their security cooperation. Furthermore, Palestinians and Israelis must avoid unilateral acts and declarations that prejudge or predetermine issues reserved for permanent status negotiations. Indeed, negotiations and a credible peace process offer the only way to reach an enduring agreement on permanent status issues.

Acting in a spirit of partnership and moving away from a zero-sum mentality, Israelis and Palestinians can work together to achieve a just and lasting peace.

f. The Sharm el-Sheikh Memorandum

Following the election of Ehud Barak as Israeli Prime Minister in 1999, Israel and the PLO concluded the Sharm el-Sheikh Memorandum on the Implementation Timeline of Outstanding Commitments of Agreements Signed and the Resumption of Permanent Status Negotiations, reprinted in 38 I.L.M. 1465 (1999). The memorandum was signed at Sharm el-Sheikh, Egypt on September 4, 1999, by the Government of the State of Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization, and witnessed by Egypt, the United States, and Jordan.

In addition to addressing the fulfillment of certain commitments from prior agreements relating to the interim period, the Sharm el-Sheikh Memorandum provided a timeline for the resumption of negotiations concerning the permanent status of the Palestinians, "reaffirm[ing] their understanding that the negotiations on the Permanent Status will lead to the implementation of Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338." According to the timeline, those negotiations were to commence by September 13, 1999, with a framework agreement to be reached within five months, and a comprehensive agreement to be reached no later than September 13, 2000.

Remarks by Secretary of State Madeleine Albright at the time of signing, excerpted below, are available at http://usembassy-israel.org.il/publish/press/visits/september99/transcripts.html, as are additional related materials. The Sharm el-Sheikh Memorandum can also be found at www.state.gov/p/nea/rt/c9960.htm.

* * * *

The accord Israeli and Palestinian leaders have just signed provides a long awaited boost both to the substance and to the spirit of the search for Middle East peace. By agreeing on a plan for implementing the Wye River Memorandum and other outstanding commitments, the two sides have begun to rebuild their partnership; a partnership that is central to the Oslo process, and vital to the region's future.

For the first time in several years, Israelis and Palestinians are working together and solving problems together. Relationships of trust and shared conviction are being built through this process. The result is beneficial to both sides. Under today's agreement further redeployments will be carried out. Security cooperation will deepen. The fight against terror will continue, and prisoners will be reunited with their families. In addition, construction of a port for Gaza will begin, and safe passage between Gaza and the West Bank will be opened.

These provisions are important in themselves, but there is an even larger significance to this agreement.

First, the fact that Israelis and Palestinians negotiated this pact directly is a rich source of hope for the future. As one can see here tonight, the peace process has many sponsors and many supporters. But that process cannot succeed unless the parties are engaged with each other gaining mutual confidence and building mutual trust.

When that happens, agreements are not only more likely to be signed, they are more likely to be implemented. And if you ask the average Palestinian or Israeli, he or she will tell you, implementation is what counts.

Second, through this agreement the parties have cleared the way for the beginning of serious permanent status negotiation. Here is where the bold vision encompassed by the Oslo Declaration of Principles will meet its sternest test.

3. Peru and Ecuador

A longstanding border conflict between Ecuador and Peru broke into renewed fighting in January 1995. Prior hostilities had been settled by the 1942 Rio de Janeiro Protocol of Peace, Friendship and Boundaries between Ecuador and Peru ("Rio Protocol") that defined the border and provided for its demarcation. The Rio Protocol was signed January 29, 1942, by

Peru and Ecuador and also by representatives of four countries as guarantors: the Argentine Republic, Brazil, Chile and the United States. Among other things, Article VII of the protocol provided that "any doubt or disagreement which may arise in the execution of this protocol shall be settled by the parties concerned, with the assistance of the [guarantor states]." Article IX provided in relevant part that "rectifications [in the demarcation of the boundary] shall be made with the collaboration of the [guarantor states]."

A White House statement of October 9, 1998, described the background and ongoing participation of the United States in negotiations to resolve the unresolved border dispute, as excerpted below.

The full text of the statement is available at http://clinton6.nara.gov/1998/10/1998-10-09-fact-sheet-on-ecuador-peru-border-dispute.html.

* * * *

In 1995, in the most serious combat since 1941, Peru and Ecuador fought in a remote undemarcated area. As Guarantors of the Rio Protocol, the United States, Brazil, Argentina, and Chile, became actively engaged in the search for a diplomatic solution. With Guarantor help, Ecuador and Peru agreed to stop fighting and seek a definitive peace settlement [Declaration of Peace of Itamaraty, February 17, 1995].

Without exemplary peacekeeping support from many nations, including the U.S., this peace would not be moving forward. Guarantor military observers (MOMEP) organized the withdrawal of troops from the disputed Cenepa Valley and supervised demobilization of troops on both sides. The combat zone was demilitarized. MOMEP, with the privatization of military personnel over the former guarantor states, continues to monitor the demilitarized zone.

Since February 1998, with the assistance of the Guarantors, Ecuador and Peru have been engaged in direct negotiations to reach a comprehensive and lasting settlement. This final settlement package is to consist of four agreements, each of which must be approved before any one is implemented. The package consists of: a commerce and navigation treaty guaranteeing Ecuador's free navigation on the Amazon; a mutual security agreement designed to prevent future conflicts; a border integration agreement which will stimulate much-needed development in both countries; and a completion of demarcation of the land border. Presidents Fujimori and Mahuad have met several times to resolve the remaining differences. The first three agreements have been completed, but no understanding has been reached on the fourth—the land border question. Both countries stand to benefit enormously from the successful conclusion of the peace process. And all nations of the Americas take pride in the elimination of one of the last sources of international armed conflict in the Hemisphere.

* * * *

Subsequently, the Presidents of Peru and Ecuador, with formal backing from their respective national legislatures through resolutions adopted October 16, requested the guarantors of the Rio Protocol to formulate a binding solution to their dispute. In a joint letter dated October 23, 1998, representatives of the four guarantor countries set forth their solution. Identical copies of the letter were sent to President Fujimori and President Mahuad.

The full text of the letter, excerpted below from an English translation of the official Spanish, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Our governments have accepted, through Article VII of the Rio Protocol of Peace, Friendship and Boundaries of 1942, the obligation of guaranteeing the implementation of that treaty. That commits us to facilitating, when necessary, understandings among the parties. This responsibility includes presenting ideas to clarify points on which the parties may differ.

As guarantors, we recognize that the parties, acting on the basis of the Rio Protocol and its implementing documents, have attempted to achieve the high purposes of peace, friendship and understanding that would enable them to develop a mutually beneficial and cooperative relationship in accord with the purposes set forth in Article I of the Protocol.

We thus record with satisfaction that this process has to date produced drafts for a "Treaty of Commerce and Navigation," for "Navigation in Sectors Cut by Geodesic Lines and the Napo River," for a "Broad Agreement of Border Integration," and for the creation of a "Binational Commission on Confidence-Building Measures and Security," as well as an "Agreement for the Establishment of Measures to Assure the Efficient Functioning of the Zarumilla Canal."

Your government, together with that of [Peru/Ecuador], has informed us of your concern that your efforts, in the course of this long process, have not obtained results that meet the expectations of both countries that would enable you to complete all the aspects described in the Declaration of Brasilia of November 26, 1997 and the Work Plan of Rio de Janeiro of January 19 of this year. As Your Excellency points out in the joint letter that you sent with the President of [Peru/Ecuador] to the President of Brazil on October 8, the difficulties concern the completion of the fixing on the ground of your common land boundary.

In that letter, the parties ask for our support to formulate a comprehensive and definitive proposal that will contribute to the attainment of the objectives of peace, friendship, understanding and good will that motivate them. Our governments, by means of the letter of the President of Brazil of October 10, informed Your Excellency that obtaining this proposal would require prior acceptance by both of your governments that our point of view would be mandatory, and the approval of this commitment by the Congresses of Ecuador and Peru.

These requirements having been met, we the Chiefs of State of the guarantor countries, in accordance with the provisions of the Santiago Accord and the Work Plan of Rio de Janeiro, propose the following points to conclude the fixing of the common land boundary and complete the comprehensive and definitive settlement: . . .

* * * *

2. In accordance with the attached map, the Government of Peru will grant as private property to the Government of Ecuador an area of one square kilometer, at the center of which will be the point Ecuador identified to MOMEP as being Tiwinza, within the sector referred to in Ecuador as Tiwinza.

* * * *

11. In addition, the parties will put into final form the drafts of the Treaties and Agreements, whose texts form part of the comprehensive and definitive settlement that ends the differences between the two countries.

* * * *

In this manner, we, the guarantors, believe that the process that began with the Declaration of Itamaraty concludes in a manner that respects the interests and sentiments of both nations and ensuring the full and proper implementation of the Protocol of Rio de Janeiro. As a result, this will make possible the development of the aspirations of peace, friendship, and confidence in a common future desired by the peoples of Peru and Ecuador.

* * * *

On October 26, 1998, the Presidential Act of Brasilia was signed by the Republic of Ecuador and the Republic of Peru, with representatives of the four guarantor countries signing as witnesses. Thomas McClarty, President Clinton's Special Envoy for the Americas, signed on behalf of the United States. The Presidential Act provides, in translation from the official Spanish, as excerpted below.

The full text of the English translation is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

On the occasion of this transcendental event, the Presidents of Peru and Ecuador came together to sign this:
Presidential Act of Brasilia

1. They expressed their conviction of the historic transcendence that the agreements reached between the two governments has for the development and well-being of the brotherly communities of Ecuador and of Peru. With them culminates the process of substantive conversations provided for in the Declaration of Peace of Itamaraty the 17th of February 1995 and the discrepancies between the two Republics are concluded in global and definitive form in such a way that, on the basis of their common roots, both Nations direct themselves toward a promising future of cooperation and mutual benefit.

2. They declare that from the binding point of view expressed by the Heads of State of the Guarantor Countries, in their letter dated the 23rd of October, which forms an integral part of this document, the border differences between the two countries are definitively resolved. On this basis, they register their firm and unshakeable will of their respective Governments to conclude, inside of the briefest possible space of time, the fixing on the ground of the common land border.

3. Simultaneously, they manifest their commitment to submit the accords that are signed on this date, to the process of approval of domestic law, as is appropriate, with an eye toward assuring their fastest entrance into force. . . .

4. To set down firm expressions of the importance of the accords for the ideals of peace, stability and prosperity that animate the American Continent. In this spirit and in conformity with the First Article of the Protocol of Peace, Friendship and Boundaries of Rio de Janeiro, they solemnly reaffirm the renunciation of the threat and use of force in the relations between Peru and Ecuador, as well as all acts which might affect peace and friendship between the two nations.

5. Desirous of highlighting their recognition of the fundamental role played in the achievement of these understandings by the governments of the Republic of Argentina, the Federal Republic of Brazil, the Republic of Chile and the United States of America, Guarantor countries of the Protocol of Peace, Friendship and Boundaries signed in Rio de Janeiro the 29th of January 1942, the Presidents of Ecuador and Peru register their appreciation of these Nations for their dedication and effort displayed in compliance with the dispositions of the Protocol and they urge them to continue this function until the conclusion of the demarcation.

* * * *

On June 17, 1999, the U.S. Department of Defense announced the formal closure of MOMEP, stating that "all foreign military personnel who participated in MOMEP, including the U.S. contingent, will be entirely withdrawn from the area by June 30." The announcement explained that the October 26 agreements had "led to formal demarcation of border regions on May 13, 1999." See www.defenselink.mil/releases/1999/b06171999_bt298–99.html.

4. Mozambique

The United States acted as an observer during peace talks in Rome to end a civil war in Mozambique dating to shortly after its independence in 1975. The talks resulted in the conclusion of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique, signed at Rome October 4, 1992. The Agreement was signed by Joaquim Alberto Chissano, President of the Republic of Mozambique, and Afonso Macacho Marceta Dhlakama, President of the armed rebel movement Resistëncia Nacional Moçambicana ("RENAMO"), in the presence of representatives of the United States of America, among others. The text of the agreement and certain related documents are available at www.usip.org/library/pa/mozambique/pa_mozambique.html.

5. Ethiopia and Eritrea

On May 25, 1999, Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Susan Rice testified before the Subcommittee on Africa of the House International Relations Committee on the border conflict between Ethiopia and Eritrea. S. Hrg. No. 106–60 (1999). Excerpts from her remarks set forth below address U.S. efforts to facilitate a peaceful resolution of the dispute. See Digest 2000 at 311–12 for the signing of a peace agreement and Digest 2002 at 925–26 concerning the delimitation of the border through the Eritrea/Ethiopia Boundary Commission in The Hague.

Immediately upon the outbreak of hostilities in May 1998, I led two interagency missions to Ethiopia and Eritrea to facilitate a peaceful resolution of the dispute. Working with the Government of Rwanda, we proposed a series of steps to end the conflict in accordance with both sides' shared principles and international law. These recommendations, endorsed by the OAU and the UNSC, later informed development by the OAU of its Framework Agreement. These initial missions also resulted in agreement by the two parties to the airstrike moratorium, which remained in effect until February 6, 1999. Beginning in October, President Clinton sent former National Security Advisor Anthony Lake and an interagency team from the State Department, the National Security Council, and the Department of Defense on four missions to Ethiopia and Eritrea, the most recent occurring in early 1999. We are grateful for Mr. Lake's tireless work on behalf of the President and the Secretary of State. His intensive efforts, which still continue, have been aimed at helping both sides find a mutually agreed basis for resolving the dispute without further loss of life. Working closely with the OAU and the UNSC, Mr. Lake and our team put forth numerous proposals to both sides consistent with the OAU Framework. In December, Ethiopia formally accepted the Framework Agreement. Eritrea did not, requesting clarification on numerous specific questions.

Fighting resumed on February 6 while UN envoy Ambassador Mohammed Sahnoun was in the region still seeking a peaceful resolution to the conflict. Following this first phase of fighting, Eritrean troops were compelled to withdraw from Badme—an important element of the draft OAU Framework Agreement. Subsequent Eritrean acceptance of the Framework was welcomed by the United States and the UNSC but was greeted with skepticism by Ethiopia. Ethiopia instead demanded Eritrea's unconditional, unilateral withdrawal from all contested areas that Ethiopia had administered prior to last May.

On April 14, Prime Minister Meles of Ethiopia offered a cease-fire in return for an explicit commitment by Eritrea to remove its forces unilaterally from contested areas. He later added that Eritrean withdrawal must occur within an undefined but "short" period.

Eritrea continues to demand a cease-fire prior to committing to withdraw from disputed territories. Ethiopia insists that a cease-fire and implementation of the OAU Framework Agreement can only follow an explicit Eritrean commitment to withdraw from all territories occupied since the conflict erupted on May 6, 1998.

6. Democratic Republic of the Congo

In 1994 Zaire, as the Democratic Republic of the Congo was then known, became a haven for over a million Rwandan ethnic Hutus. Many of these Hutus had been involved in the 1994 genocide in Rwanda and were fleeing the Tutsi-dominated government that subsequently took power there. Rwanda invaded Zaire in 1996. President Mobutu was replaced by rebel leader Laurent Kabila in May 1997, who changed the country's name to the Democratic Republic of the Congo ("DRC"). Less than fifteen months after installing Kabila, Rwanda again invaded Congo to topple him. President Kabila, however, was able to survive by winning military support from Angola and Zimbabwe. The war continued, and the country descended into a conflict between a coalition that formed between President Kabila and Zimbabwe, Chad, Angola, and Namibia on the one hand, and one that included Rwanda, Uganda, and the Congolese rebels they supported on the other.

The United States became involved in efforts to reach a diplomatic resolution and, in part through the efforts of Presidential Envoy Howard Wolpe, helped to facilitate the Cease Fire Agreement signed at Lusaka on July 10, 1999. The text of the agreement is available at www.usip.org/library/pa/drc/drc_07101999.html.

On June 8, 1999, Assistant Secretary Susan Rice testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the United States' ongoing efforts in the Congo.

The full text of her testimony, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/990608_rice_conflict.html.

From the start of the Congo crisis, the U.S. has pursued an active diplomatic strategy in support of our objectives. Beginning last August, we have provided full support for the regional initiative taken by [the Southern African Development Community ("SADC")] and the [Organization for African Unity "OAU")]. . . .

* * * *

Throughout, U.S. policy objectives in the Congo have been consistent and clear. We seek peace, prosperity, democracy, and respect for fundamental human rights. We have affirmed our support for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Congo. We have repeatedly condemned any violation of this fundamental principle of both the United Nations Charter and the Organization of African Unity.

We have worked to counter those who would perpetuate genocide in the region. We have encouraged the establishment of an inclusive political transition that would end the cycle of violence and impunity; build respect for the rule of law and human rights; and create the conditions for lasting development and reconstruction. As a consequence, we have been committed to a policy of engagement in support of the Congolese people who suffered so much under Mobutu Sese Seko's tyranny.

* * * *

We cannot lose sight of the continued need for a meaningful constructive role by the United Nations. In the medium to long term, it will be dangerous for Africa and for the world at large if the UN becomes marginalized from the management of crises. For this reason, we have been encouraged by the UN Secretary

General's appointment of Special Envoy Niasse, and have encouraged a very active engagement by the UN SYG.

In the longer term, our objectives are equally clear. We seek to strengthen the process of internal reconciliation and democratization within all of the states of the region, so as to reduce the tensions and conflicts that fuel insurgent movements. In short, we seek stable, economically self-reliant, and democratic nations with which we can work to address our mutual economic and security interests on the continent. A stable and democratic Congo can contribute powerfully to regional stability. Its economic promise is even greater, with enormous benefits for U.S. economic interests as well as for the African continent in general.

However, Congo's potential can only be realized in the context of a negotiated cease-fire and comprehensive political settlement that takes account both of the legitimate concerns of Congo's neighbors and the internal political conditions that helped precipitate the crisis. For a resolution to be durable, any solution must also address the issue of ex-FAR, Interahamwe, UNITA, and other nonstate actors.

The Lusaka Cease Fire Agreement, signed in July 1999, called for a cease-fire, the deployment of a UN peacekeeping operation, the withdrawal of foreign troops, and the launching of an "Inter-Congolese Dialogue" to form a transitional government leading to elections. The accords additionally called for the parties to create a Joint Military Commission ("JMC") which, together with a UN/OAU observer group, would be responsible for executing peace-keeping operations until the deployment of a UN peace-keeping force.

In a statement in Pretoria, South Africa, on December 6, 1999, U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations Richard Holbrooke referred to the DRC as "perhaps the biggest challenge we may face in Africa in the coming year" and pledged U.S. support:

> The United States through the United Nations and through our special envoy [Howard Wolpe] here with us today, has worked tirelessly to support the Lusaka process. This includes supporting the recently established Joint Military Commission (JMC), which needs significant international support.

7. Sierra Leone

U.S. Presidential Envoy Reverend Jesse Jackson assisted in the negotiation of a cessation of hostilities agreement in Sierra Leone in May 1999. Assistant Secretary Rice had testified on the prospects for peace in Sierra Leone before the House International Relations Committee on March 23, 1999. Excerpts from her remarks, set forth below, describe the background of the conflict as well as U.S. interest in Sierra Leone and involvement in the peace effort.

Ms. Rice's testimony is available in full at www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/990323_rice_sierra.html.

* * * *

The war in Sierra Leone has its origins in a long history of corrupt and predatory civilian and military governments that set the stage for a decade-long insurrection, destroyed state institutions, and left the country vulnerable to external manipulation. . . .

In early 1996, Sierra Leone's people demanded a return to democracy and celebrated their country's first free-and-fair elections in 3 decades. The democratically elected government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah took office in March and immediately began negotiations with the rebel movement [Revolutionary United Front ("RUF")], resulting in a peace agreement signed in Abidjan in November 1996. But peace and stability were short-lived. Elements of the Sierra Leone Army, styling themselves the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC), overthrew the Kabbah government in May 1997, and invited the RUF to join their junta. The AFRC suspended the constitution, banned political activity, and killed, tortured, or arbitrarily detained anyone they perceived threatening their hold on power. World opinion resounded against the coup. The Sierra Leonean people stood up to the junta as well, often at the risk of their lives. For 9 months civil servants refused to go to work, children refused to go to school, university students protested and plotted to regain freedom. After almost a year of brutal AFRC misrule, ECOMOG [Economic Community of Western African States Cease-fire Monitoring Group] restored President Kabbah and his government to power in February 1998, earning commendation from the international community.

* * * *

. . . RUF/AFRC rebels still control much of the Kailahun District on the Liberian border, the Kono diamond mining district, and Makeni. RUF forces continue to victimize innocent civilians throughout the country.

U.S. Interests

The United States has significant interests in Sierra Leone and a stake in the country's future. First, our response to the crisis is an important test of our commitment to democracy and human rights in Africa. . . . Second, we feel a compelling moral imperative to end the suffering of innocent civilians, many of whom have lived with the violent whims of armed thugs for most of this decade. Third, a lasting settlement in Sierra Leone will allow Nigerian, Ghanaian, and Malian troops to return honorably to their countries. An honorable exit for Nigerian-led ECOMOG could improve prospects for a successful transition to democratic and civilian rule for Nigeria.

Conversely, a continued rebel offensive would further threaten regional stability and progress in West Africa. The conflict in Sierra Leone could easily cross borders, spilling into Guinea, and potentially re-igniting civil war in Liberia. It could adversely affect our allies in the region, including Nigeria, Senegal, Cote d'Ivoire and Ghana, and other countries of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS). Continued hostilities could thwart ECOWAS' ongoing efforts to integrate their economies more effectively.

* * * *

U.S. Role

The United States has been actively involved in Sierra Leone over the past 4 years to try to end rebel hostilities, consolidate democracy, and promote national reconciliation. First, the Administration provided logistical and communications support for the elections in 1996. After the May 1997 coup, we joined ECOWAS, the Organization of African Unity, the United Nations, and the rest or the international community, in condemning the overthrow of the elected government and to press for its restoration. The UN Security Council, led by the United States and the United Kingdom, adopted targeted sanctions in October 1997 against the junta and authorized ECOWAS to enforce them. After the restoration of the democratic government, we supported ECOMOG's Sierra Leone operation with critical nonlethal logistical assistance to help it respond effectively to the rebels' "Operation No Living Thing" campaign. We provided the peacekeeping force $3.9 million in communications, transportation equipment, and other logistical services—including helicopter lift in fiscal year 1998.

* * * *

The Lomé Peace Agreement, signed July 7, 1999, made Foday Sankoh Vice President and gave other RUF members positions in the government. The agreement called for an international peacekeeping force run initially by both ECOMOG and the United Nations. The UN Security Council established the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone ("UNAMSIL") in 1999, with an initial force of 6,000.

In a joint statement issued by the United States and the United Kingdom at the time of the July 6, 1999, signing, the two governments "congratulate[d] the Government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front of Sierra Leone on the conclusion of the peace agreement signed today." The statement continued:

> We would also like to express our support for the agreement, which will bring to an end the tragic war in Sierra Leone. We encourage both parties to continue to demonstrate their commitment to long term peace.

> We will continue to encourage and support the implementation of this agreement as appropriate and beneficial to both parties, and will encourage other members of the international community to do the same.

See www.usip.org/library/pa/sl/adddoc/sl_signing_07061999.html. The agreement and related materials are available at http://www.usip.org/library/pa/drc/drc_07101999.html.

8. Liberia

The 1989–1996 Liberian civil war, which was one of Africa's bloodiest, claimed the lives of more than 200,000 Liberians and further displaced a million others into refugee camps in neighboring countries. The Economic Community of West African States ("ECOWAS") and its security arm, the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group ("ECOMOG"), intervened to counter an insurgency led in part by Charles Taylor. An important opportunity for advancing the peace process under ECOMOG's military leadership arose following the highly contested Battle for Monrovia in April 1996, in which both sides fought to a stalemate, and regional commitment to the peace process intensified. After consultations in Liberia in July 1996, the United States provided 30 million dollars in non-lethal assistance (e.g., transportation and communications assistance) to bolster ECOMOG. The United States also chaired the International Contact Group on Liberia ("ICGL"), which shared information and coordinated donor assistance to the peace process; the U.S. additionally acted as interlocutor between ECOMOG and the ICGL with respect to the peace process. As an ICGL member, the United States participated in four UN special conferences on Liberia beginning in September 1996, which brought together ECOWAS, ECOMOG, ICGL, Organization of African Unity ("OAU", now the African Union), and UN agency representatives and officials. As a result, disarmament and demobilization of warring factions were carried out and special elections were held on July 19, 1997, resulting in Charles Taylor's election.

B. PEACEKEEPING MISSIONS AND RELATED ISSUES

1. Presidential Directive on Multilateral Peace Operations

On May 3, 1994, President William J. Clinton issued Presidential Decision Directive 25, establishing U.S. policy on reforming multilateral peace operations. ("PDD 25"). A press release of May 5, 1994, described the directive as follows:

> . . . This directive is the product of a year-long interagency policy review and extensive consultations with dozens of Members of Congress from both parties.
>
> The policy represents the first, comprehensive framework for U.S. decision-making on issues of peacekeeping and peace enforcement suited to the realities of the post Cold War period.
>
> Peace operations are not and cannot be the centerpiece of U.S. foreign policy. However, as the policy states, properly conceived and well-executed peace operations can be a useful element in serving America's interests. The directive prescribes a number of specific steps to improve U.S. and UN management of UN peace operations in order to ensure that use of such operations is selective and more effective.

30 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 998 (May 9, 1994).

An executive summary prepared by the Department of State February 22, 1996, provided a summary of key elements of PDD 25. Excerpts below address factors to be considered in deciding whether to vote for proposed new UN peace operations or to support regionally-sponsored peace operations, command and control of U.S. forces participating in peace operations, and protection of peace keepers and peace enforcers.

I. Supporting the Right Peace Operations

i. Voting for Peace Operations

The U.S. will support well-defined peace operations, generally, as a tool to provide finite windows of opportunity to allow combatants to resolve their differences and failed societies to begin to reconstitute themselves. Peace operations should not be open-ended commitments but instead linked to concrete political solutions; otherwise, they normally should not be undertaken. To the greatest extent possible, each UN peace operation should have a specified timeframe tied to intermediate or final objectives, an integrated political/military strategy well-coordinated with humanitarian assistance efforts, specified troop levels, and a firm budget estimate. The U.S. will continue to urge the UN Secretariat and Security Council members to engage in rigorous, standard evaluations of all proposed new peace operations. The Administration will consider the factors below when deciding whether to vote for a proposed new UN peace operation (Chapter VI or Chapter VII) or to support a regionally-sponsored peace operation:

— UN involvement advances U.S. interests, and there is an international community of interest for dealing with the problem on a multilateral basis.
— There is a threat to or breach of international peace and security, often of a regional character, defined as one or a combination of the following:
— International aggression, or;—Urgent humanitarian disaster coupled with violence;—Sudden interruption of established democracy or gross violation of human rights coupled with violence, or threat of violence.
— There are clear objectives and an understanding of where the mission fits on the spectrum between traditional peacekeeping and peace enforcement.
— For traditional (Chapter VI) peacekeeping operations, a ceasefire should be in place and the consent of the parties obtained before the force is deployed.

— For peace enforcement (Chapter VII) operations, the threat to international peace and security is considered significant.
— The means to accomplish the mission are available, including the forces, financing and mandate appropriate to the mission.
— The political, economic and humanitarian consequences of inaction by the international community have been weighed and are considered unacceptable.
— The operation's anticipated duration is tied to clear objectives and realistic criteria for ending the operation.

These factors are an aid in decision-making; they do not by themselves constitute a prescriptive device. Decisions have been and will be based on the cumulative weight of the factors, with no single factor necessarily being an absolute determinant.

In addition, using the factors above, the U.S. will continue to scrutinize closely all existing peace operations when they come up for regular renewal by the Security Council to assess the value of continuing them. . . .

* * * *

II. The Role of Regional Organizations

In some cases, the appropriate way to perform peace operations will be to involve regional organizations. The U.S. will continue to emphasize the UN as the primary international body with the authority to conduct peacekeeping operations. At the same time, the U.S. will support efforts to improve regional organizations' peacekeeping capabilities. When regional organizations or groupings seek to conduct peacekeeping with UNSC endorsement, U.S. support will be conditioned on adherence to the principles of the UN Charter and meeting established UNSC criteria, including neutrality, consent of the conflicting parties, formal UNSC oversight and finite, renewable mandates.

With respect to the question of peacekeeping in the territory of the former Soviet Union, requests for "traditional" UN blue-helmeted operations will be considered on the same basis as other requests, using the factors previously outlined (e.g., a threat to international peace and security, clear objectives, etc.). U.S.

support for these operations will, as with other such requests, be conditioned on adherence to the principles of the UN Charter and established UNSC criteria.

* * * *

V. Command and Control of U.S. Forces

A. Our Policy: The President retains and will never relinquish command authority over U.S. forces. On a case by case basis, the President will consider placing appropriate U.S. forces under the operational control of a competent UN commander for specific UN operations authorized by the Security Council. The greater the U.S. military role, the less likely it will be that the U.S. will agree to have a UN commander exercise overall operational control over U.S. forces. Any large scale participation of U.S. forces in a major peace enforcement mission that is likely to involve combat should ordinarily be conducted under U.S. command and operational control or through competent regional organizations such as NATO or ad hoc coalitions.

There is nothing new about this Administration's policy regarding the command and control of U.S. forces. U.S. military personnel have participated in UN peace operations since 1948. American forces have served under the operational control of foreign commanders since the Revolutionary War, including in World War I, World War II, Operation Desert Storm and in NATO since its inception. We have done so and will continue to do so when the President determines it serves U.S. national interests.

Since the end of the Cold War, U.S. military personnel have begun serving in UN operations in greater numbers. President Bush sent a large U.S. field hospital unit to Croatia and observers to Cambodia, Kuwait and Western Sahara. President Clinton has deployed two U.S. infantry companies to Macedonia in a monitoring capacity and logisticians to the UN operation in Somalia.

B. Definition of Command: No President has ever relinquished command over U.S. forces. Command constitutes the authority to issue orders covering every aspect of military operations and administration. The sole source of legitimacy for U.S. commanders originates from the U.S. Constitution, federal law and the Uniform Code of Military Justice and flows from the President to the lowest U.S. commander in the field. The chain of command from the President to the lowest U.S. commander in the field remains inviolate.

C. Definition of Operational Control: It is sometimes prudent or advantageous (for reasons such as maximizing military effectiveness and ensuring unity of command) to place U.S. forces under the operational control of a foreign commander to achieve specified military objectives. In making this determination, factors such as the mission, the size of the proposed U.S. force, the risks involved, anticipated duration, and rules of engagement will be carefully considered.

Operational control is a subset of command. It is given for a specific time frame or mission and includes the authority to assign tasks to U.S. forces already deployed by the President, and assign tasks to U.S. units led by U.S. officers. Within the limits of operational control, a foreign UN commander cannot: change the mission or deploy U.S. forces outside the area of responsibility agreed to by the President, separate units, divide their supplies, administer discipline, promote anyone, or change their internal organization.

D. Fundamental Elements of U.S. Command Always Apply: If it is to our advantage to place U.S. forces under the operational control of a UN commander, the fundamental elements of U.S. command still apply. U.S. commanders will maintain the capability to report separately to higher U.S. military authorities, as well as the UN commander. Commanders of U.S. military units participating in UN operations will refer to higher U.S. authorities orders that are illegal under U.S. or international law, or are outside the mandate of the mission to which the U.S. agreed with the UN, if they are unable to resolve the matter with the UN commander. The U.S. reserves the right to terminate participation at any time and to take whatever actions it deems necessary to protect U.S. forces if they are endangered.

There is no intention to use these conditions to subvert the operational chain of command. Unity of command remains a vital concern. Questions of legality, mission mandate, and prudence will continue to be worked out "on the ground" before the orders are issued. The U.S. will continue to work with the UN and other member states to streamline command and control procedures and maximize effective coordination on the ground.

E. Protection of U.S. Peacekeepers: The U.S. remains concerned that in some cases, captured UN peacekeepers and UN peace enforcers may not have adequate protection under international law. The U.S. believes that individuals captured while performing UN peacekeeping or UN peace enforcement activities, whether as members of a UN force or a U.S. force executing a UN Security Council mandate, should, as a matter of policy, be immediately released to UN officials; until released, at a minimum they should be accorded protections identical to those afforded prisoners of war under the 1949 Geneva Convention III (GPW). The U.S. will generally seek to incorporate appropriate language into UN Security Council resolutions that establish or extend peace operations in order to provide adequate legal protection to captured UN peacekeepers. In appropriate cases, the U.S. would seek assurances that U.S. forces assisting the UN are treated as experts on mission for the United Nations, and thus are entitled to appropriate privileges and immunities and are subject to immediate release when captured. Moreover, the Administration is actively involved in negotiating a draft international convention at the United Nations to provide a special international convention at the United Nations to provide a special international status for individuals serving in peacekeeping and peace enforcement operations under a UN mandate. Finally, the Administration will take appropriate steps to ensure that any U.S. military personnel captured while serving as part of a multinational peacekeeping force or peace enforcement effort are immediately released to UN authorities.

2. Macedonia and Bosnia

On December 11, 1992, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 795 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/795 (1992), establishing the UN Protection Force ("UNPROFOR") Macedonia mission under chapter VI of the UN Charter, and expanded its size in Security Council Resolution 842, adopted June 18, 1993 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/842 (1993)). In July 1993 a U.S. peacekeeping contingent was deployed as part of that mission. In a letter to Congress of July 9, 1993, President William J. Clinton described the action as follows:

> Over the past several days, we have begun implementing plans to augment UNPROFOR Macedonia with U.S. Armed Forces, consistent with Security Council Resolution 842 and as part of the U.S. commitment to support multilateral efforts to prevent the Balkan conflict from spreading and to contribute to stability in the regions. . . .
>
> The U.S. contingent will serve under the operational control of UNPROFOR Macedonia and will conduct missions as directed by the U.N. commander. . . .

29 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1297 (July 19, 1993).

In conjunction with the Dayton Peace Accords, discussed in A.1., supra, the United States addressed the question of its role in post-Dayton peacekeeping operations to be conducted under NATO auspices. In remarks delivered November 21, 1995, President Clinton stated:

> Now that the parties to the war have made a serious commitment to peace, we must help them to make it work. All the parties have asked for a strong international force to supervise the separation of forces and to give them confidence that each side will live up to their agreements. Only NATO can do that job. And the United States as NATO's leader must play an essential role in this mission. . . .
>
> The NATO military mission will be clear and limited. Our troops will take their orders only from the American general who commands NATO. They will have authority to meet any threat to their safety or any violation of the peace agreement with immediate and decisive force. And there will be a reasonable timetable for their withdrawal.

31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2049 (Nov. 27, 1995).

Secretary of State Warren Christopher subsequently testified before the U.S. House of Representatives, Committee on International Relations, in support of committing U.S. troops to the NATO peacekeeping force to be deployed to Bosnia. Excerpts below from Secretary Christopher's prepared testimony addressed the importance of helping to ensure the implementation of the Dayton Peace Accords.

The full text of Secretary Christopher's testimony is available at www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/bosnia/bosctest.html. For additional information on U.S. policy and actions in Bosnia, see www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/bosnia/boshome.html.

* * * *

We have a fundamental choice. As the President made clear, if the United States does not participate, there will be no NATO force. If there is no NATO force, there will be no peace in Bosnia, and the war will reignite.

* * * *

Our national interest in implementing the Dayton settlement is clear.

We have a strong interest in ending the worst atrocities in Europe since World War II—atrocities that are all the more pernicious because they have been directed at specific groups of people because of their faith. By helping peace take hold, we can make sure that the people of Bosnia see no more days of dodging bullets, no more winters of freshly dug graves, no more years of isolation from the outside world.

We have a strong interest in making sure that this conflict does not spread. Bosnia lies on a faultline in a volatile region of Europe. To the south are Kosovo, Albania, and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the likeliest flashpoints of a wider war, as well as Greece and Turkey, two NATO allies. To the north and east lie Hungary, Romania and Bulgaria, fragile new democracies deeply threatened by the prospect of ethnic conflict in the Balkans. To the north also lies the Eastern Slavonia region of Croatia, which could yet spark a regional war if the Dayton accords are not implemented.

Peace in this part of Europe matters to the United States because Europe matters to the United States. Twice this century, we have sent millions of American soldiers to war across the Atlantic. The first of this century's great wars began with violence in Sarajevo. The second began with aggression in Central Europe and with horrors that the world ignored until it was too late. Ever since, our leaders, Republican and Democrat alike, have acted to protect our vital interest in European stability. If we do not take this opportunity for peace, we could be faced with the prospect of action far costlier and more dangerous than anything being contemplated now.

The United States also has a vital interest in maintaining our leadership in the world. Taking action in Bosnia now is an acid test of American leadership. After creating this opportunity for peace, we cannot afford to walk away. I can tell you from my personal experience as Secretary of State that if we are seen as a country that does not follow through on its initiatives, no nation will follow us—not in Europe, not in the Middle East, not in Asia, not anywhere.

* * * *

The Dayton accord does require the parties to take extremely difficult steps on the road to peace. I believe that each is prepared to carry out its commitments, but only if each is confident that the other parties will carry out theirs. Each party made it clear that they would reach settlement only if NATO agreed to lead a peace implementation force.

* * * *

. . . We must remember that we secured the agreement because peace is the key to what all the parties want: from reconstruction, to justice, to rejoining the international community. We constructed the agreement to ensure that it will be carried out. We have made certain that sanctions against Serbia, our main source of leverage with that country, will be reimposed if the agreement is not implemented. Sanctions against the Bosnian Serbs will remain in place until their forces withdraw behind the agreed boundary of the Serb Republic. Moreover, our troops will have the strength and authority to enforce key military provisions of the agreement.

In addition, let me emphasize that it was not enough for me that President Milosevic was specifically authorized to negotiate the accord on behalf of the Bosnian Serbs. I insisted that the Bosnian Serbs initial it as well. In Dayton, President Milosevic promised to obtain their agreement within 10 days; as it turned out, he did so in just two days. This kind of response increases my confidence that this accord will be carried out.

Mr. Chairman, as we negotiated in Dayton, we constantly insisted on an agreement that our military could implement and enforce. Each part of the agreement was carefully constructed to take into account the needs of our armed forces and the advice of the military members of our team. As a result, the military annex to the agreement contains the kind of detailed provisions our military considered essential to their task.

Let me assure you that [the NATO Implementation Force] IFOR's mission is well-defined and limited. Our troops will enforce the military aspects of the agreement—enforcing the cease-fire, supervising the withdrawal of forces, and establishing a zone of separation between them. But it will not be asked to guarantee the success of democracy or reconstruction, or to act as a police force. One of the lessons we have learned in the last few years is that our military should not be a permanent guarantor of peace. It should create opportunities that others must then seize.

* * * *

Civilian agencies from around the world will carry out a separate program to help the people of Bosnia rebuild. Our European allies will pay for most of this vital civilian effort. International organizations will also play an important role. The OSCE will supervise elections. The UNHCR will coordinate the return of refugees. The World Bank and IMF will help Bosnia's economy recover, with the EU also playing a leading role. The UN will help monitor and train local police.

In a letter to Congress of December 6, 1995, President Clinton reported:

> . . . [P]ursuant to the North Atlantic Council (NAC) decision of December 1, 1995, I have ordered the deployment of approximately 1,500 U.S. military personnel to Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia as part of a NATO "enabling force" to lay the groundwork for the prompt and safe deployment of the NATO-led Implementation Force (IFOR). United States personnel participating in the enabling force will be under NATO operational control and rules of engagement. To date, I have also authorized the deployment of approximately 3,000 additional U.S. military personnel to Hungary, Italy, and Croatia in order to establish forward U.S. support infrastructure for the enabling force and the IFOR.
>
>
> It is envisioned that the IFOR main body will begin to deploy following the signature of the peace agreement in Paris and the issuance of final NATO and U.S. orders. The enabling force will thereafter remain as part of the IFOR.

31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2144 (Dec. 11, 1995).

On December 21, 1995, President Clinton reported to Congress that, following the signing of the Dayton Accords on December 14 and "consistent with United Nations Security Council Resolution 1031 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/1031 (1995)) and the North Atlantic Council (NAC) decision of December 16, 1995," he had ordered 20,000 U.S. military personnel to participate in IFOR "in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, principally in a sector surrounding Tuzla." 31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2215 (Dec. 25, 1995). He explained further that > [a]pproximately 5,000 U.S. military personnel will also deploy as part of the IFOR in other states of the former Yugoslavia, principally Croatia. The IFOR, including U.S. forces assigned to it, will be under NATO operational control and will operate under NATO rules of engagement. In addition, a total of approximately 7,000 U.S. support forces, under U.S. command and control and rules of engagement, will deploy in Hungary, Croatia, Italy, and other states in the region in support of IFOR. . . .

On December 20, 1996, President Clinton reported to Congress that IFOR had "successfully accomplished its mission to monitor and ensure compliance by all parties with the military aspects of the Peace Agreement . . . [and] assisted in the overall civilian implementation effort. . . ." 32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2535 (Dec. 30, 1996). Excerpts below describe U.S. participation in a follow-on force known as the Stabilization Force ("SFOR"), established pursuant to UN Security Council Resolution 1088 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/1088 (1996)) The report also indicated that U.S. troops continued to be deployed in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia as part of the United Nations Preventive Deployment force ("UNPREDEP"), which succeeded UNPROFOR, and that a small contingent was serving in Croatia "in direct support of the UNTAES Transitional Administrator." The United Nations Transitional Authority In Eastern Slavonia, Baranja And Western Sirmium ("UNTAES") was established on January 15, 1996, by UN Security Council Resolution 1037 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/1037 (1996)).

* * * *

In order to contribute further to a secure environment necessary for the consolidation of peace throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina, NATO has approved, and I have authorized U.S. participation in [SFOR]. The United Nations Security Council authorized member states to establish the follow-on force in UNSCR 1088 of December 12, 1996. Transfer of authority from IFOR to SFOR occurred on December 20, 1996. The parties to the Peace Agreement have all confirmed to NATO their support for the SFOR mission. . . .

SFOR's tasks are to deter or prevent a resumption of hostilities or new threats of peace, to consolidate IFOR's achievements, to promote a climate in which the civilian-led peace process can go forward. Subject to this primary mission, SFOR will provide selective support, within its capabilities to civilian organizations implementing the Dayton Peace Agreement.

3. Kosovo

In 1998 the Contact Group previously engaged in reaching the political solution in Bosnia, see A.1., supra, addressed new issues arising out of Serbia's violent suppression of ethnic Albanians in the province of Kosovo. On March 9 and 25, 1998, the foreign ministers of the now six-nation group (Italy having joined the United States, Britain, France, Germany, and Russia) met in London and in Brussels and transmitted statements to the Security Council issued on each of those occasions, U.N. Docs. S/1998/223 and S/1998/272, respectively. The March 9 statement, transmitted by the United Kingdom by letter of March 12, 1998, stated that "[i]n light of the deplorable violence in Kosovo, we feel compelled to take steps to demonstrate to the authorities in Belgrade that they cannot defy international standards without facing severe consequences" and enumerated "a broad range of actions to address the current situation on an urgent basis" the Contact Group had decided to take. The statement called on President Milosevic, among other things, to withdraw special police units and cease action by the security forces affecting civilians, and to commit himself publicly to meaningful dialogue without preconditions and take other steps toward peaceful resolution. The Contact Group also endorsed consideration by the Security Council of a comprehensive arms embargo against the FRY, including Kosovo, and refusal to supply equipment to the FRY "which might be used for internal repression, or for terrorism."

In its March 25 statement, transmitted by the United States by letter of March 27, 1998, the Contact Group found that insufficient progress had been made by Milosevic in taking the actions identified in the statement of March 9. The Contact Group called upon President Milosevic "to implement fully all the relevant steps in the London statement" and, among other things, "agreed to maintain and implement the measures announced on March 9, including seeking adoption by March 31 of the arms embargo resolution currently under consideration in the United Nations Security Council." The statement concluded:

> 13. The fundamental position of the Contact Group remains the same. We support neither independence nor the maintenance of the status quo as the end-result of negotiations between the Belgrade authorities and the Kosovo Albanian leadership on the status of Kosovo. Without prejudging what that result may be, we base the principles for a solution to the Kosovo problem on the territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and on OSCE standards, Helsinki principles, and the UN Charter. Such a solution must also take into account the rights of the Kosovar Albanians and all those who live in Kosovo. We support a substantially greater degree of autonomy for Kosovo, which must include meaningful self-administration.

On March 31, 1998, the Security Council adopted Resolution 1160 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/1160 (1998)), noting with appreciation the statements of the Contact Group. Acting under Chapter VII, among other things, the Security Council called upon the FRY to take "necessary steps to achieve a political solution to the issue of Kosovo through dialogue and to implement the actions indicated in the Contact Group statements of 9 and 25 March 1998"; called upon the Kosovar Albanian leadership to "condemn all terrorist action"; and called upon the authorities in Belgrade and the Kosovar Albanian leadership "to enter without preconditions into a meaningful dialogue on political status issues." It also decided to impose the proposed arms embargo as to the FRY, including Kosovo, "for the purposes of fostering peace and stability in Kosovo." U.N. Doc. S/RES/1160 (1998). See also discussion of sanctions imposed by the United States in Chapter 16.A.8.d.

a. UN Security Council Resolution 1244

As discussed in Chapter 18.A.4.b., in 1999 the United States participated in a NATO military campaign to end the humanitarian crisis in Kosovo. On June 8, 1999, the United Nations Security Council, acting under Chapter VII, adopted Resolution 1244 as part of a settlement designed to bring about a cessation of the NATO military campaign. In the resolution the Security Council demanded that the FRY "put an immediate and verifiable end to violence and repression in Kosovo, and begin and complete verifiable phased withdrawal from Kosovo" and decided that "a political solution to the Kosovo crisis shall be based on the general principles in annex 1 [adopted by the G-8 Foreign Ministers May 6, 1999] and as further elaborated in the principles and other required elements in annex 2 [including points 1 to 9 of a paper presented in Belgrade on June 2, 1999, and accepted by the FRY]." U.N. Doc. S/RES/1244 (1999).

The Security Council also decided, among other things, to deploy both international civil and security presences. Operative Paragraph ("OP") 7 authorized the establishment of the international security presence, the Kosovo Security Force ("KFOR"), with a non-exclusive list of responsibilities set forth in OP 9. OP 10 authorized the establishment of the international civil presence, the UN Interim Administration for Kosovo ("UNMIK"), described as "an interim administration for Kosovo under which the people of Kosovo can enjoy substantial autonomy within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and which will provide transitional administration while establishing and overseeing the development of provisional democratic self-governing institutions to ensure conditions for a peaceful and normal life for all inhabitants of Kosovo." OP 11 enumerated UNMIK's main responsibilities.

On June 12, 1999, in light of the cessation of hostilities, President Clinton reported in a letter to Congress, excerpted below, that he was committing U.S. forces to KFOR. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1107 (June 21, 1999).

I can now confirm that the FRY has accepted NATO's conditions, and the process of implementing them has begun. On June 9, Lieutenant General Sir Michael Jackson, the NATO commander of KFOR, concluded a Military-Technical Agreement (MTA) with FRY authorities. The MTA specifies the detailed modalities and schedule for the full withdrawal of all FRY military, paramilitary and police forces from Kosovo. The MTA also details the role and authorities of KFOR, confirming that it can take the measures necessary to create a secure environment for the return of the Kosovars to their homes in safety and self-government. Among other authorities, KFOR is empowered to ensure that the withdrawal of FRY forces proceeds on schedule, to protect KFOR and the civil implementation presence, and assist other international entities involved in restoring peace to Kosovo.

Conclusion of the MTA and the subsequent start of Serb force withdrawals paved the way for NATO to suspend its air campaign on June 10, 1999, and for the United Nations Security Council on the same day to adopt Resolution 1244 authorizing the establishment of the international security force.

In view of these events, I have directed the deployment of approximately 7,000 U.S. military personnel as the U.S. contribution to the approximately 50,000 member, NATO-led security force (KFOR) now being deployed into Kosovo. The KFOR will operate under unified NATO command and control, and with rules of engagement set by the Alliance. As part of the central NATO role that we have insisted upon, and consistent with the recommendations of my senior civilian and military advisors, U.S. personnel participating in these efforts will be under the operational control solely of officers from the Untied States or other NATO countries. In addition, a total of approximately 1,500 U.S. military personnel, under separate U.S. command and control, will deploy to other countries in the region, as our national support element, in support of KFOR.

On December 15, 1999, President Clinton reported further to Congress on developments in Kosovo, including the then current roles of KFOR and UNMIK, as excerpted below. The full text is available at 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2623 (Dec. 15, 1999).

. . . The mission of KFOR is to provide a continued military presence in order to deter renewed hostilities; verify and, if necessary, enforce the terms of the Military Technical Agreement (MTA) between NATO and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY); enforce the terms of the agreement of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) to demilitarize and reintegrate itself into civil society; provide operational direction to the newly established Kosovo Protection Corps; and contribute to a secure environment to facilitate the work of the U.N. Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) by providing, until UNMIK assumes these functions, for public security and appropriate control of the borders.

* * * *

Since my report to the Congress of June 12, the FRY, in accordance with Resolution 1244 and the MTA, withdrew its military, paramilitary, and police forces from Kosovo. The KLA agreed on June 21, 1999, to a ceasefire, to withdraw from the zones of conflict in Kosovo, and to demilitarize itself. On September 20, 1999, KFOR Commander Lieutenant General Sir Mike Jackson accepted the KLA's certification that the KLA had completed its demilitarization in accordance with the June 21 agreement. The UNMIK thereafter established a civil emergency services entity known as the Kosovo Protection Corps that is intended to provide civic assistance in emergencies and other forms of humanitarian assistance. The UNMIK is in the process of considering applications from former KLA personnel for service in this Corps.

b. Authorities of UNMIK

As a UN mission administering territory within a sovereign state, UNMIK presented a number of legal questions, including the basic issue of its legal authority, its ability to enter into international agreements, and establishment of representative offices.

(1) General

Within weeks of the adoption of Resolution 1244, representatives of the United States presented U.S. views of UNMIK's legal authority in a meeting with the United Nations legal office, as set forth in full below.

- UNSCR 1244 authorizes the SYG to establish an interim administration for Kosovo, initially under the sole governing authority of an International Civil Presence (ICP), controlled by a Special Representative of the SYG (SRSG).
- In UNSCR 1244, the Security Council conferred on the SRSG all legal authority necessary to implement the resolution and to achieve the Council's objectives.
- The ICP's responsibilities include providing civilian administration for as long as required, establishing and overseeing provisional Kosovar institutions of self-government, and maintaining civil law and order. In order to fulfill these responsibilities, the SRSG must exercise or control all governmental authority in Kosovo, including political and economic functions, until such time as Kosovar institutions of self-government can exercise such authority.
- The SRSG has the full authority to implement the ICP's mandate, including by modifying or suspending FRY/Serbian law, or suspending the operation of existing FRY/Serbian institutions, as necessary.

- Because this is a Chapter VII resolution, the FRY is obligated to carry out its responsibilities under the resolution; it must cooperate fully with the ICP and may not erect or invoke domestic legal barriers to the fulfillment of the ICP's mandate.
- The FRY also may not erect practical barriers to the fulfillment of the ICP's mandate. Any lack of FRY cooperation may not stand in the way of implementation of UNSCR 1244.
- The resolution refers to promoting substantial autonomy and self-government "taking full account . . . of the Rambouillet accords." Rambouillet, however, is neither definitive nor binding, and may be utilized as a model at UNMIK's discretion.
- UNMIK's broad mandate is in no way inconsistent with the resolution's preambular reference to FRY "sovereignty and territorial integrity," or with the operative text's statement that the purpose of the interim administration is to allow the people of Kosovo to "enjoy substantial autonomy within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia."
- The international borders of the FRY will remain intact during the interim period, and may only be adjusted in negotiations on future status.
- The resolution also explicitly provides for the "presence" of a limited number of Yugoslav personnel (to be determined by KFOR) at key border crossings. The resolution makes clear, however, that UNMIK, not the FRY, will determine who and what may transit at those and other border crossings.
- There can be no question that the Security Council both possesses, and has in this case exercised, the authority under Chapter VII to establish an interim administration for Kosovo that does carry out other functions that might otherwise be considered to be attributes of "sovereignty".

UNMIK issued Regulation 1 on July 25, 1999. UNMIK/REG/1999/1. Sections 1, 3 and 4, excerpted below, reflect the U.S. legal views. UNMIK regulations are available at www.unmikonline.org/regulations/index_reg_1999.htm.

* * * *

Section 1

AUTHORITY OF THE INTERIM ADMINISTRATION

1.1 All legislative and executive authority with respect to Kosovo, including the administration of the judiciary, is vested in UNMIK and is exercised by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General.

1.2 The Special Representative of the Secretary-General may appoint any person to perform functions in the civil administration in Kosovo, including the judiciary, or remove such person. Such functions shall be exercised in accordance with the existing laws, as specified in section 3, and any regulations issued by UNMIK.

Section 2

OBSERVANCE OF INTERNATIONALLY RECOGNIZED STANDARDS

In exercising their functions, all persons undertaking public duties or holding public office in Kosovo shall observe internationally recognized human rights standards and shall not discriminate against any person on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, association with a national community, property, birth or other status.

* * * *

Section 3

APPLICABLE LAW IN KOSOVO

The laws applicable in the territory of Kosovo prior to 24 March 1999 shall continue to apply in Kosovo insofar as they do not conflict with standards referred to in section 2, the fulfillment of the mandate given to UNMIK under United Nations Security Council resolution 1244 (1999), or the present or any other regulation issued by UNMIK.

Section 4
REGULATIONS ISSUED BY UNMIK
In the performance of the duties entrusted to the interim administration under United Nations Security Council resolution 1244 (1999), UNMIK will, as necessary, issue legislative acts in the form of regulations. Such regulations will remain in force until repealed by UNMIK or superseded by such rules as are subsequently issued by the institutions established under a political settlement, as provided for in United Nations Security Council resolution 1244 (1999).

* * * *

Because of questions raised concerning changes in Kosovar law after March 22, 1989, UNMIK later decided to modify Regulation 1 and adopted Regulation 24, entitled "On the Law Applicable in Kosovo," on December 12, 1999, set forth below. UNMIK/REG/1999/24. On the same day, Regulation 25 repealed section 3 of Regulation 1.

1.1 The law applicable in Kosovo shall be:
(a) The regulations promulgated by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and subsidiary instruments issued thereunder; and
(b) The law in force in Kosovo on 22 March 1989.
In case of a conflict, the regulations and subsidiary instruments issued thereunder shall take precedence.

1.2 If a court of competent jurisdiction or a body or person required to implement a provision of the law determines that a subject matter or situation is not covered by the laws set out in section 1.1 of the present regulation but is covered by another law in force in Kosovo after 22 March 1989 which is not discriminatory and which complies with section 1.3 of the present regulation, the court, body or person shall, as an exception, apply that law.

1.3 In exercising their functions, all persons undertaking public duties or holding public office in Kosovo shall observe internationally recognized human rights standards, as reflected in particular in [specified human rights treaties].

1.4 No person undertaking public duties or holding public office in Kosovo shall discriminate against any person on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, natural, ethnic or social origin, association with a national community, property, birth or other status. In criminal proceedings, the defendant shall have the benefit of the most favourable provision in the criminal laws which were in force in Kosovo between 22 March 1989 and the date of the present regulation.

1.5 Capital punishment is abolished.

See also Regulation 59, adopted October 27, 2000, UNMIK/REG/2000/54, amending Regulation 24 to provide that "for each offence punishable by the death penalty under the law in force in Kosovo on 22 March 1989, the penalty will be a term of imprisonment between the minimum as provided for by the law for that offence and a maximum of forty (40) years."

(2) Authority to enter into international agreement

Subsequently, the U.S. Overseas Private Investment Corporation ("OPIC") entered into an international agreement with UNMIK to permit OPIC to support eligible projects in Kosovo in order to contribute to its economic development. See Chapter 11.c.3. The agreement entered into force May 30, 2002; see www.opic.gov/PressReleases/2002/2-18.htm. By law, OPIC operates its insurance, reinsurance, and guaranty programs only in a "less developed friendly country or area with the government of which the President of the United States has agreed to institute" such programs. Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, ("FAA") § 273(a), Pub. L. No. 87–195, 75 Stat. 424 (1961). Section 237(b) of the FAA also requires OPIC to determine that "suitable arrangements" exist to protect its interests in the relevant country or area. Although OPIC traditionally meets these requirements through a bilateral agreement with the government of a foreign country, UNMIK was deemed to have the authority under UNSCR 1244 to enter into an agreement related to the establishment of OPIC programs in Kosovo and to be treated as the governing authority in Kosovo for purposes of § 237(a) of the FAA. UNMIK had also displayed the effective control necessary to guarantee that suitable arrangements were in place to protect OPIC's interests related to these programs as required under § 237(b).

Provisions governing the duration of the OPIC agreement reflected the uncertain duration of the interim administration for Kosovo. UNSCR 1244 envisioned that the period of interim administration would terminate following a political process designed to determine Kosovo's future status. Following the successful conclusion of that process, UNMIK would oversee the transfer of authority from Kosovo's provisional institutions to institutions established under the political settlement. Article 5 of the agreement therefore provided for expiration at the end of the period of interim administration:

> This Agreement shall continue in force until the earlier of (i) conclusion of UNMIK's mandate to provide interim administration in Kosovo, as provided in United Nations Security Council Resolution 1244, and (ii) six months from the date of a receipt of a note by which one party informs the other of an intent to terminate this Agreement. In such event, the provisions of this Agreement shall, with respect to Investment Support provided while this Agreement was in force, remain in force so long as such Investment Support remains outstanding, but in no case longer than the first to occur of (iii) twenty years after the termination of this Agreement and (iv) termination of the authority of UNMIK.

(3) Establishment of U.S. office in Pristina

On July 6, 1998 U.S. Chargé d'Affaires in Belgrade Richard Miles and his Russian counterpart launched the Kosovo Diplomatic Observer Mission ("KOM" or "KDOM"). As explained in a fact sheet released by the Department of State July 8, 1998, "[t]he KOM is an integrated entity under the political guidance of a coordination group consisting of the ambassadors of the Contact Group countries in Belgrade as well as the ambassadors of Austria (representing the EU Presidency) and Poland (representing the Chairman-in-Office of the OSCE). Each national component of the KOM is an extension of its respective embassy in Belgrade." See www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/fs_980708_kom.html.

By July 1999 the United States had begun the process of establishing the United States Office Pristina ("USOP"). Its functions were to serve as a liaison office to UNMIK and KFOR, engage with the Kosovars regarding U.S. concerns, and provide a platform for the activities of U.S. visitors and agencies. The office was initially established based on authority derived from U.S. participation in KDOM. Because an office of this nature is not contemplated under the Vienna Conventions on Diplomatic or Consular Relations and because diplomatic relations with the FRY had been severed, persons initially assigned to the office did not have privileges and immunities and the office was not inviolable. Once the office was fully operational, the United States intended to seek to formalize the office's status as a liaison mission to UNMIK. The United States viewed UNMIK's authority as including the ability to authorize the establishment of such an office and to provide protection and some derivative privileges and immunities.

On July 10, 2000, UNMIK issued Regulation 42, entitled "On the Establishment and Functioning of Liaison Offices in Kosovo," relying on the authority of Resolution 1244 and Regulation No. 1999/1. Section 2 of the regulation reflected the U.S. views, setting forth the privileges and immunities of liaison offices and their personnel, as well as the functions they may perform. The regulation is available at www.unmikonline.org/regulations/index_reg_2000.htm.

4. Somalia

In response to widespread famine and clan violence in Somalia, on December 3, 1992, the UN Security Council, acting under Chapter VII, adopted Resolution 794 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/794 (1992)), which among other things authorized Member States to use "all necessary means" to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations.

On December 10, 1992, the United States led a multinational force called the Unified Task Force ("UNITAF") into Somalia in Operation Restore Hope. On December 10, 1992, President George H.W. Bush reported to Congress setting forth the basis for U.S. participation in this mission. 28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2338 (Dec. 10, 1992).

Beginning in January of this year with the adoption of U.N. Security Council Resolution 733, the United Nations has been actively addressing the humanitarian crisis in Somalia. The United States has been assisting the U.N. effort to deal with a human catastrophe. Over 300,000 Somalis have died of starvation. Five times that number remain at risk, beyond the reach of international relief efforts in large part because of the security situation. As a result, voluntary relief organizations from the United States and other countries have appealed for assistance from outside security forces.

On November 29, 1992, the Secretary General of the United Nations reported to the Security Council that the deteriorating security conditions in Somalia had severely disrupted international relief efforts and that an immediate military operation under U.N. authority was urgently required. On December 3, the Security Council adopted Resolution 794, which determined that the situation in Somalia constituted a threat to international peace and security, and, invoking Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter, authorized Member States to use all necessary means to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia. In my judgment, the deployment of U.S. Armed Forces under U.S. command to Somalia as part of this multilateral response to the Resolution is necessary to address a major humanitarian calamity, avert related threats to international peace and security, and protect the safety of Americans and others engaged in relief operations.

In the evening, Eastern Standard Time, on December 8, 1992, U.S. Armed Forces entered Somalia to secure the airfield and port facility of Mogadishu. Other elements of the U.S. Armed Forces and the Armed Forces of other Members of the United Nations are being introduced into Somalia to achieve the objectives of U.N. Security Council Resolution 794. No organized resistance has been encountered to date.

U.S. Armed Forces will remain in Somalia only as long as necessary to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations and will then turn over the responsibility of maintaining this environment to a U.N. peacekeeping force assigned to Somalia. Over 15 nations have already offered to deploy troops. While it is not possible to estimate precisely how long the transfer of responsibility may take, we believe that prolonged operations will not be necessary.

We do not intend that U.S. Armed Forces deployed to Somalia become involved in hostilities. Nonetheless, these forces are equipped and ready to take such measures as may be needed to accomplish their humanitarian mission and defend themselves, if necessary; they also will have the support of any additional U.S. Armed Forces necessary to ensure their safety and the accomplishment of their mission.

I have taken these actions pursuant to my constitutional authority to conduct our foreign relations and as Commander in Chief and Chief Executive, and in accordance with applicable treaties and laws. In doing so, I have taken into account the views expressed in H. Con. Res. 370, S. Con. Res. 132, and the Horn of Africa Recovery and Food Security Act, Public Law 102–274, on the urgent need for action in Somalia.

I am providing this report in accordance with my desire that Congress be fully informed and consistent with the War Powers Resolution. I look forward to cooperating with Congress in the effort to relieve human suffering and to restore peace and stability to the region.

> On May 4, 1993, the United Nations Operation in Somalia ("UNOSOM II") assumed control of operations as "Operation Continued Hope." See U.N. Doc. S/RES/814 (1993), expanding the mandate of UNOSOM I (S/RES/751 (1992)). UNITAF was disbanded and the United States presence reduced from approximately 30,000 to approximately 1,200 personnel. After the Somali National Congress attacked and killed 25 UN peacekeepers on June 5, 1993, the United States increased its operations as authorized by UN Security Council Resolution 837 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/837 (1993)). On October 3 and 4, 1993, eighteen U.S. personnel died in a violent clash with the Somali National Congress. In March 1994 the United States withdrew its personnel from Somalia.

5. Haiti

As discussed in Chapter 16.A.2., the United States was engaged during the years 1991–1994 in efforts to restore democracy in Haiti following the military overthrow of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in September 1991. On July 31, 1994, the UN Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, adopted Resolution 940 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/940 (1994)). Among other things, the resolution authorized the Member States to form a multinational force "and, in this framework, to use all necessary means to facilitate the departure from Haiti of the military leadership, consistent with the Governors Island Agreement, the prompt return of the legitimately elected President and the restoration of the legitimate authorities of the Government of Haiti," and to offer transitional assistance. Resolution 940 also revised and extended the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Haiti ("UNMIH"). UNMIH, composed of UN police monitors and a military construction unit, was originally established under Security Council Resolution 867 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/

867 (1993)) to help implement efforts during 1993 to reach a solution to the Haitian crisis recorded in "the Governors Island Agreement [S/26063] and the political accords contained in the New York Pact . . . (S/26297)."

At the same time, President Clinton sent a negotiating team led by former President Jimmy Carter to persuade the de facto authorities to step aside and allow for the return of constitutional rule. The leaders of the military regime agreed to a peaceful transfer of power and accepted the introduction of the multinational force before it reached Haitian soil. See letter of September 21, 1994, from President Clinton to Congress. 30 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1823 (Sept. 26, 1994). In a further report to Congress of March 21, 1995, President Clinton described the U.S. force and transition as follows:

> On September 21, 1994, I reported to the Congress that on September 19, 1994, U.S. forces under the command of the Commander in Chief, U.S. Atlantic Command, were introduced into Haitian territory following an agreement successfully concluded by former President Jimmy Carter, Senator Sam Nunn, and General Colin Powell and as part of the Multinational Force (MNF) provided for by United Nations Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 940 of July 31, 1994. . . .
>
> At their peak last September and into October, U.S. forces assigned to the MNF in Haiti numbered just over 20,000. Approximately 2,000 non-U.S. personnel from 27 nations also participated in the initial stages of the MNF. Over the last 6 months, U.S. forces gradually have been reduced, consistent with the establishment of a secure and stable environment called for by UNSCR 940, such that they currently number just under 5,300. . . . When the transition to the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) authorized by UNSCR 975 of January 30, 1995, is complete on March 31, 1995, approximately 2,500 U.S. forces will remain in Haiti as the U.S. contribution to UNMIH's force structure. . . .

31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 452 (Mar. 27, 1995).

In a March 21, 1996, letter to Congress, President Clinton stated that the United States supported > the successful efforts of UNMIH to assist the Government of Haiti in sustaining a secure and stable environment, protecting international personnel and key installations, establishing the conditions for holding elections, and professionalizing its security force.

> . . . [P]ursuant to U.N. Security Council Resolution 975, UNMIH was authorized to assume responsibility for the U.S.-led Multinational Force for peacekeeping operations in Haiti. Through the presence of UNMIH and its support to the United Nations-Organization of American States International Civilian Mission, a tremendous improvement in the observance of basic human rights in Haiti has been achieved. . . . [and] Haiti's Presidential election on December 17, 1995, led to the first-ever transition from one democratically elected President to another on February 7, 1996.

32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 542 (Mar. 25, 1996). A letter dated September 27, 1994, from Walter A. Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, setting forth the basis under U.S. law for deploying U.S. armed forces into Haiti as part of the multinational force is discussed in Chapter 18.A.5.b.(1).

6. East Timor

The United States strongly supported the 1999 United Nations-sponsored referendum on independence in East Timor and worked to persuade Indonesia to accept an international peacekeeping force after the independence vote. The vote for independence from Indonesia was held on August 30, 1999, and was followed by a surge in violence. The UN Security Council subsequently adopted Resolution 1264 which, among other things, authorized the creation of a multinational force for the purpose of stabilizing the country and offering humanitarian assistance. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1264 (1999).

On October 8, 1999, President William J. Clinton reported to Congress describing U.S. participation in support of the UN operation in East Timor, excerpted below. 35 PRES. WEEKLY COMP. DOC. 1998 (October 18, 1999). East Timor gained independence on May 20, 2002.

On September 15, 1999, the United Nations Security Council, under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized the establishment of a multinational force to restore peace and security in East Timor, to protect and support the United Nations Mission in East Timor (UNAMET), and, within force capabilities, to facilitate humanitarian assistance operations. In support of this multinational effort, I directed a limited number of U.S. military forces to deploy to East Timor to provide support to the multinational force (INTERFET) being assembled under Australian leadership to carry out the mission described in Security Council Resolution 1264. United States support to the multinational force has thus far been limited to communications, intelligence, logistics, planning assistance, and transportation.

Recently, I authorized the deployment of the amphibious ship, USS BELLEAU WOOD (LHA 3), and her embarked helicopters, to the East Timor region, including Indonesian waters, to provide helicopter airlift and search and rescue support to the multinational operation. Also embarked in BELLEAU WOOD is a portion of her assigned complement of personnel from the 31st Marine Expeditionary Unit (Special Operations Capable) (MEU (SOC)). At this time, I do not anticipate that the embarked Marines will be deployed ashore, with the exception of the temporary deployment of a communications element to support air operations.

At this point, it is not possible to predict how long this operation will continue. The duration of the deployment depends upon the course of events in East Timor and may include rotation of naval assets and embarked aircraft. United States support for this multinational effort will continue until transition to a U.N. peacekeeping force is complete. It is, however, our objective to redeploy U.S. forces as soon as circumstances permit.

Use of Force and Arms Control

A. USE OF FORCE

1. The Gulf War

a. UN Security Council resolutions adopted in 1990 concerning Iraq's invasion of Kuwait

On August 2, 1990, Iraq invaded Kuwait. Between that time and November 29, 1990, the UN Security Council adopted twelve resolutions relating to the Iraqi invasion. The first, Resolution 660 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/660 (1990)), was adopted on August 2, 1990. In that resolution, the Security Council determined "that there exists a breach of international peace and security as regards the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait." The Security Council, among other things, demanded "that Iraq withdraw immediately and unconditionally all its forces to the positions in which they were located on 1 August 1990."

Subsequent resolutions included, among others, Resolution 661 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/661 (1990)), adopted on August 6. In that resolution, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, decided that "no state shall import or promote the export of goods from Iraq or Kuwait, or make economic or financial resources available to Iraq or Kuwait, except for medical or humanitarian purposes." The Security Council also established a committee to oversee the implementation of the economic measures set forth in Resolution 661. Those measures were expanded upon in Resolution 665 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/665 (1990)), adopted on August 25; and in Resolution 670 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/670 (1990)), adopted on September 25. In Resolution 666 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/666 (1990)), adopted on September 13, and Resolution 669 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/669 (1990)), adopted on September 24, the Security Council directed the committee that was established in Resolution 661 to consider the humanitarian situation in Iraq and any requests for assistance under Article 50 of the UN Charter.

In Resolution 662 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/662 (1990)), adopted on August 9, the Security Council decided that Iraq's annexation of Kuwait was null and void. In Resolution 677 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/677 (1990)), adopted on November 28, the Security Council acted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter to condemn Iraq's attempts to alter Kuwait's demographic population and to destroy Kuwait's civil records.

Finally, on November 29, 1990, the Security Council adopted Resolution 678 (U.N. Doc. S/RES/678 (1990)). In that resolution, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, authorized states "to use all necessary means" to uphold the previous resolutions if Iraq failed to comply with those resolutions by January 15, 1991.

Resolution 678 is set forth in full below.

The Security Council,

Recalling, and reaffirming its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990, 669 (1990) of 24 September 1990, 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990, 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990 and 677 (1990) of 28 November 1990,

Noting that, despite all efforts by the United Nations, Iraq refuses to comply with its obligation to implement resolution 660 (1990) and the above-mentioned subsequent relevant resolutions, in flagrant contempt of the Security Council,

Mindful of its duties and responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance and preservation of international peace and security,

Determined to secure full compliance with its decisions,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Demands that Iraq comply fully with resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions, and decides, while maintaining all its decisions, to allow Iraq one final opportunity, as a pause of goodwill, to do so;

2. Authorizes Member States co-operating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq on or before 15 January 1991 fully implements, as set forth in paragraph 1 above, the foregoing resolutions, to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area;

3. Requests all States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken in pursuance of paragraph 2 of the present resolution;

4. Requests the States concerned to keep the Security Council regularly informed on the progress of actions undertaken pursuant to paragraphs 2 and 3 of the present resolution;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

b. U.S. authorization for the use of force

On January 14, 1991, President George H.W. Bush signed into law a Joint Resolution to authorize the use of United States armed forces pursuant to UN Security Council Resolution 678. Key provisions of the law entitled "Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution," H.R.J. Res. 77, 102d Cong., 1st Sess., Pub. L. No. 102–1, 105 Stat. 3 (1991), are provided below.

Whereas the Government of Iraq without provocation invaded and occupied the territory of Kuwait on August 2, 1990;

Whereas both the House of Representatives (in H.J. Res. 658 of the 101st Congress) and the Senate (in S. Con. Res. 147 of the 101st Congress) have condemned Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and declared their support for international action to reverse Iraq's aggression;

Whereas Iraq's conventional, chemical, biological, and nuclear weapons and ballistic missile programs and its demonstrated willingness to use weapons of mass destruction pose a grave threat to world peace;

Whereas the international community has demanded that Iraq withdraw unconditionally and immediately from Kuwait and that Kuwait's independence and legitimate government be restored;

Whereas the United Nations Security Council repeatedly affirmed the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense in response to the armed attack by Iraq against Kuwait in accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter;

Whereas, in the absence of full compliance by Iraq of with its resolutions, the United Nations Security Council in Resolution 678 has authorized member states of the United Nations to use all necessary means, after January 15, 1991, to uphold and implement all relevant Security Council resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area; and

Whereas Iraq has persisted in its illegal occupation of, and brutal aggression against Kuwait: Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

This joint resolution may be cited as the "Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution".

SEC. 2. AUTHORIZATION FOR USE OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES

(a) Authorization.—The President is authorized, subject to subsection (b), to use United States Armed Forces pursuant to United Nations Security Council Resolution 678 (1990) in order to achieve implementation of Security Council Resolutions 660, 661, 662, 664, 665, 666, 667, 669, 670, 674 and 677.

(b) Requirement for Determination That Use of Military Force is Necessary.—Before exercising the authority granted in subsection (a), the President shall make available to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate his determination that—
  (1) the United States has used all appropriate diplomatic and other peaceful means to obtain compliance by Iraq with the United Nations Security Council resolutions cited in subsection (a) and
  (2) that those efforts have not been and would not be successful in obtaining such compliance.

(c) War Powers Resolution Requirements.
  (1) Specific Statutory Authorization. Consistent with section 8(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution, the Congress declares that this section is intended to constitute specific statutory authorization within the meaning of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution.

* * * *

SEC. 3. REPORTS TO CONGRESS

At least once every 60 days, the President shall submit to the Congress a summary of the status of efforts to obtain compliance by Iraq with the resolutions adopted by the United Nations Security Council in response to Iraq's aggression.

In his signing statement, excerpted below, President Bush welcomed the action of Congress while preserving the executive branch view as to the President's constitutional authority in this area. 27 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 48 (Jan. 21, 1991). The War Powers Resolution, referenced in the President's statement, is also discussed in A.5.a and b. below. See also Digest 1973 at 560–63 for a discussion of the War Powers Act at the time of its enactment over a Presidential veto.

. . . By passing H.J. Res. 77, the Congress of the United States has expressed its approval of the use of U.S. Armed Forces consistent with U.N. Security Council Resolution 678. I asked the Congress to support implementation of the U.N. Security Council Resolution 678 because such action would send the clearest possible message to Saddam Hussein that he must withdraw from Kuwait without condition or delay. . . . To all, I emphasize again my conviction that this resolution provides the best hope for peace.

. . . This resolution provides unmistakable support for the international community's determination that Iraq's ongoing aggression against, and occupation of, Kuwait shall not stand. As I made clear to congressional leaders at the outset, my request for congressional support did not, and my signing this resolution does not, constitute any change in the long-standing positions of the executive branch on either the President's constitutional authority to use the Armed Forces to defend vital U.S. interests or the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution. . . . I shall continue to consult closely with the Congress in the days ahead.

c. U.S. intervention

On January 16, 1991, U.S. armed forces commenced combat operations against Iraqi forces and military targets in Iraq and Kuwait together with forces from a number of other countries. President George H.W. Bush reported this action to Congress in a letter of January 18, 1991, excerpted below.

The full text of the letter is available at 1991 Pub. Papers vol. I at 42 (Jan. 16, 1991). See also address to the nation by President Bush, January 16, 1991, 27 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 50 (Jan. 21, 1991).

On January 16, 1991, I made available to you, consistent with section 2(b) of the Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution . . . , my determination that appropriate diplomatic and other peaceful means had not and would not compel Iraq to withdraw unconditionally from Kuwait and meet the other requirements of the U.N. Security Council and the world community. With great reluctance, I concluded, as did the other coalition leaders, that only the use of armed force would achieve an Iraqi withdrawal together with the other U.N. goals of restoring Kuwait's legitimate government, protecting the lives of our citizens, and reestablishing security and stability in the Persian Gulf region. Consistent with the War Powers Resolution, I now inform you that pursuant to my authority as Commander in Chief, I directed U.S. Armed Forces to commence combat operations on January 16, 1991, against Iraqi forces and military targets in Iraq and Kuwait. The Armed Forces of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Kingdom, France, Italy, and Canada are participating as well.

* * * *

The operations of U.S. and other coalition forces are contemplated by the resolutions of the U.N. Security Council, as well as H.J. Res. 77, adopted by Congress on January 12, 1991. They are designed to ensure that the mandates of the United Nations and the common goals of our coalition partners are achieved and the safety of our citizens and Forces is ensured.

d. U.S. views on the law applicable to the conflict in the Persian Gulf

(1) International Committee of the Red Cross memorandum on the applicability of international humanitarian law

In December 1990, representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross ("ICRC") provided each nation that might participate in the Iraqi-Kuwait conflict with a "Memorandum on the Applicability of International Humanitarian Law in the Gulf Region." The memorandum was provided to officials at the Department of State on December 11. In a telegram dated January 11, 1991, excerpted below, the United States set forth the memorandum, in paragraphs 3–7, and U.S. comments on its content, as paragraph 8.

3. Protection Of Persons Not Participating Or No Longer Participating In Hostilities.

A. The four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 are applicable as soon as armed hostilities break out between two or more parties to the Conventions.
B. Under the Conventions, persons not participating or no longer participating in the hostilities, such as the wounded, the sick, the shipwrecked, prisoners of war and civilians, must be respected and protected in all circumstances.
C. In this respect the ICRC wishes to recall the general scope of the Conventions:
   (1) The first Geneva Convention, for the amelioration of the condition of wounded and sick in armed forces in the field, is intended to ensure that wounded and sick combatants are respected and cared for;
   (2) The second Geneva Convention, for the amelioration of the condition of wounded, sick and shipwrecked members of armed forces at sea, adapts the provisions of the first Convention to war at sea;
   (3) The third Geneva Convention, relative to the treatment of prisoners of war, entitles members of armed forces and certain other categories of combatants to prisoner-of-war status when captured and specifies the humane treatment to which they are entitled;
   (4) The fourth Geneva Convention, relative to the protection of civilian persons in time of war and applicable in particular in occupied territories, prohibits violence to life and person, the taking of hostages, deportations, outrages upon personal dignity, and the passing of sentences and carrying out of executions without fair trial. It also governs the conditions under which civilians may be interned and provides special protection for children.

4. Conduct of Hostilities

A. The parties to an armed conflict must also observe a number of rules on the conduct of hostilities. These rules are laid down, in particular, in the Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907, most of which have become part of customary law.

B. These rules have been reaffirmed and in some cases supplemented in 1977 Protocol I additional to the Geneva Conventions. The following general rules are recognized as binding on any party to an armed conflict:
   (1) A distinction must be made in all circumstances between combatants and military objectives on the one hand, and civilians and civilian objects on the other. It is forbidden to attack civilian persons or objects or to launch indiscriminate attacks.
   (2) All feasible precautions must be taken to avoid loss of civilian life or damage to civilian objects, and attacks that would cause incidental loss of life or damage which would be excessive in relation to the direct military advantage anticipated are prohibited.
   (3) It is prohibited to have recourse to means and methods of warfare which uselessly aggravate the sufferings of disabled combatants or which render their death inevitable (prohibition of causing superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering).
   (4) When a choice is possible between several military objectives for obtaining a similar military objective, the objective selected shall be that the attack on which may be expected to cause the least danger to civilian lives and civilian objects.
   (5) Effective advance warning must be given of attacks which may affect the civilian population, unless circumstances do not permit.
   (6) Acts or threats of violence the main purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population are prohibited.
   (7) It is prohibited to order that there shall be no survivors. Defenseless combatants, such as those who have surrendered, the wounded, the sick, the shipwrecked and pilots bailing out of aircraft in distress may not be attacked.

(8) It is prohibited to kill, injure or capture an adversary by resort to perfidy. Acts inviting the confidence of an adversary to lead him to believe that he is entitled to, or is obliged to accord protection under the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, with intent to betray that confidence, constitute perfidy.

C. The following rules apply to the use of certain weapons in the event of armed conflict:
   (1) It is prohibited to use asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases or to use bacteriological methods of warfare (1925 Geneva Protocol); this was formally reaffirmed at the 1989 Paris Conference.
   (2) It is prohibited to develop, produce or stockpile bacteriological (biological) and toxin weapons (1972 Convention).
   (3) It is prohibited to use bullets which expand or flatten easily in the human body (for example, dum-dum bullets; 1899 Hague Declaration).
   (4) It is prohibited to use certain explosive projectiles (1868 St. Petersburg Declaration).
   (5) The use of sea mines is restricted (1907 Hague Convention).
   (6) The use of certain conventional weapons which may be deemed to be excessively injurious or to have indiscriminate effects is prohibited or restricted: 1890 Convention, with Protocols I (non-detectable fragments), II (prohibitions or restrictions on the use of mines, booby-traps and other devices) and III (prohibitions and restrictions on the use of incendiary weapons).

D. The ICRC also wishes to point out that the use of weapons . . . of mass destruction is subject to the general rules of international humanitarian law and in particular the basic principle of the distinction between combatants and civilians and the immunity of the latter from attack.

E. The ICRC invites states which are not party to the 1977 Protocol I to respect, in the event of armed conflict, the following articles of the Protocol, which stem from the basic principle of civilian immunity from attack:

(1) Article 54: Protection of objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population;
(2) Article 55: Protection of the natural environment;
(3) Article 56: Protection of works and installations containing dangerous forces.

5. Respect For The Emblem And Medical Activities

A. The Red Cross and Red Crescent emblems must be respected in all circumstances. Medical and religious personnel, ambulances, hospitals and other medical units and means of transport shall in particular be identified by one of the emblems and respected accordingly.
B. The States concerned shall comply with the provisions of the 1949 Geneva Conventions relating to such protection. . . .
C. The States concerned are also invited to observe the rules of 1977 Protocol I which supplement these provisions. . . .

6. Dissemination Of International Humanitarian Law—It is extremely important for the members of armed forces stationed in the Gulf to be aware of their obligations under international humanitarian law. Proper instructions must be issued to this effect. The teaching of the law to the armed forces is, moreover, an obligation expressly stipulated by the Geneva Conventions and their additional Protocols.

7. Role Of The ICRC And Obligations Of States

A. The ICRC's primary function is to protect and assist military and civilian victims of armed conflicts. It also has the task of working for the faithful application of international humanitarian law.
B. As a specifically neutral and independent institution, the ICRC may also act as a neutral intermediary.
C. International humanitarian law entrusts the ICRC with certain specific tasks.
D. With regard to prisoners of war protected under the third Geneva Convention, the ICRC wishes to point out in particular the obligation of the detaining power to register and notify prisoners of war to the ICRC by the most rapid means (Article 122). The same obligation exists for civilians deprived of their liberty under the fourth Geneva Convention (Article 137).

E. The wounded, the sick and the dead of the adverse party protected under the first Convention must also be registered and notified to the ICRC (Article 16). The second Geneva Convention contains a similar provision (Article 19), relating to the shipwrecked as well as the wounded, the sick and the dead.

F. In accordance with Articles 126 and 143 of the third and fourth Geneva Conventions respectively, the ICRC is entitled to visit all prisoners of war and civilians protected under the fourth Geneva Convention and to speak with them in private.

G. The ICRC reaffirms the need to apply international humanitarian law in the event of armed conflict and remains at the disposal of the States concerned to contribute, as far as its means allow, to the implementation of the humanitarian rules and to perform the tasks entrusted to it by international humanitarian law.

8. Following comments clarify U.S. interpretations regarding ICRC memorandum:

A. Paragraph 3A. Iraq and all nations participating as allies of the U.S. in Desert Shield Operations are parties to the four Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949.

B. Paragraph 3C(4). As noted in U.N. Security Council Resolutions 666, 670, and 674, the fourth Geneva Convention is regarded as applicable to the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait.

C. Paragraph 4A. For military political and humanitarian reasons, the United States in 1987 announced that it would not become a party to the 1977 Protocol I additional to the 1949 Geneva Conventions; therefore, the U.S. is not bound by Protocol I. The U.S. signed Protocol II (dealing with internal armed conflict) and submitted it to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification in 1987, which remains pending. As Iraq is not a party to Protocols I and II, the obligations of those treaties are not binding upon any nation involved in combat operations against Iraq. However, as Kuwait is a party to Protocol II, the standards set forth in Article 4, 5, and 6 thereof may be regarded as guidelines for minimum human rights standards within Kuwait once restoration of Kuwait begins. . . .

D. Paragraph 4B, second sentence. The ICRC statement that "the following general rules are recognized as binding . . ." is misleading. Some are viewed as not binding, while some statements require substantial qualification or clarification. The following comments are offered in clarification.

E. Paragraph 4B(1). The obligation of distinguishing combatants and military objectives from civilians and civilian objects is a shared responsibility of the attacker, defender, and the civilian population as such. An attacker must exercise reasonable precautions to minimize incidental or collateral injury to the civilian population, consistent with mission accomplishment and allowable risk to the attacking force. A defender must exercise reasonable precaution to separate the civilian population and civilian objects from military objectives. Civilians must exercise reasonable precaution to remove themselves from the vicinity of military objectives or military operations. The force that has control over the civilians has an obligation to place them in a safe place. In no case may a combatant force utilize individual civilians or the civilian population to shield a military objective from attack. A nation that utilizes civilians to shield a target from attack assumes responsibility for their injury, so long as an attacker exercises reasonable precaution in executing its operations. Likewise, civilians working within or in the immediate vicinity of a legitimate military objective assume a certain risk of injury.

F. Paragraph 4B(2). "Feasible precautions" are reasonable precautions, consistent with mission accomplishment and allowable risk to attacking forces. While collateral damage to civilian objects should be minimized, consistent with the above, collateral damage to civilian objects should not be given the same level of concern as incidental injury to civilians. Measures to minimize collateral damage to civilian objects should not include steps that will place U.S. and allied lives at greater or unnecessary risk. The concept of "incidental loss of life excessive in relation to the military advantage anticipated" generally is measured against an overall campaign. While it is difficult to weigh the possibility of collateral civilian casualties on a target-by-target basis, minimization of collateral civilian casualties is a continuing responsibility at all levels of the targeting process. Combat is a give-and-take between attacker and defender, and collateral civilian casualties are likely to occur notwithstanding the best efforts of either party. What is prohibited is wanton disregard for possible civilian casualties.

G. Paragraph 4B(3). The weapons and tactics employed by U.S. forces are entirely consistent with the law of war obligations of the United States.

H. Paragraph 4B(4) contains the language of Article 57(3) of Protocol I, and is not a part of customary law. The provision applies "when a choice is possible . . . ;" it is not mandatory. An attacker may comply with it if it is possible to do so, subject to mission accomplishment and allowable risk, or he may determine that it is impossible to make such a determination.

I. Paragraph 4B(5). A warning need not be specific. It may be a blanket warning, delivered by leaflets and/or radio, advising the civilian population of an enemy nation to avoid remaining in proximity to military objectives. The "unless circumstances do not permit" recognizes the importance of the element of surprise. Where surprise is important to mission accomplishment and allowable risk to friendly forces, a warning is not required.

J. Paragraphs 4B(6) through (8). U.S. practice is consistent with the obligations/prohibitions stated. With respect to 4B(7), the protections stated apply to all aircrew rather than pilots only.

K. Paragraphs 4C(1) and (2). The U.S. accepts the prohibition on chemical weapons contained in the 1925 Geneva Gas Protocol as binding upon first use only. Use of chemical weapons, riot control agents and chemical herbicides are governed by Executive Order 11850, as implemented by JSCAP. The U.S. unilaterally renounced the use of biological/bacteriological weapons in 1969.

L. Paragraphs 4C(3) through (5). No U.S. weapon or employment doctrine violates the provisions stated in these paragraphs. All weapons in the U.S. inventory are lawful. None are subject to any special employment consideration(s) beyond those set forth in comments E. and F. above.

M. Paragraph 4C(6). Neither the United States nor Iraq is a party to the 1980 Conventional Weapons Convention. While the treaty is not regarded as binding in the present crisis, U.S. forces meet their law of war obligations regarding weapons employment through the general provisions E. and F. above.

N. Paragraph 4D. U.S. practice is consistent with this paragraph.

O. Paragraph 4E(1). U.S. practice does not involve methods of warfare that have as their intention the starvation of the enemy civilian population.

P. Paragraph 4E(2). U.S. practice does not involve methods of warfare that would constitute widespread, long-term and severe damage to the environment.

Q. Paragraph 4E(3). While the U.S. shares the concern expressed in Article 56 of Protocol I regarding carrying out an attack against a target that may result in release of "dangerous forces," targeting decisions regarding the attack of such facilities are policy decisions that must be made based upon all relevant factors. Military objectives may not be placed in proximity to structures containing "dangerous forces" in order to shield those military objectives from attack. The U.S. does not recognize a protected status for enemy air and ground defenses placed in proximity to structures containing such "dangerous forces."

R. Paragraph 5. The U.S. agrees with these provisions. It is noted, however, that . . . the technical means of protection for medical transports are limited in their effect, particularly in an electronic warfare environment. In a meeting of nations at Geneva in August 1990, the provisions of Annex I to Protocol I were found to be inadequate. Moreover, a revised Annex I to Protocol I, not yet approved by any nation, states (in part) that these technical means are provided merely to facilitate identification of medical transportation, and are not intended to provide protection as such.

S. Paragraph 6. The U.S. strongly supports this paragraph. DOD Directive 5100.77, in implementation of U.S. law of war obligations, requires that all military personnel receive law of war training commensurate with their duties and responsibilities. This training is a command responsibility.

T. Paragraph 7. The obligations set forth in this paragraph generally are subject to the consent of the parties to the conflict, as noted in Article 9 of the GPW and 10 of the GC. Although the U.S. historically has called upon the ICRC to assist it in implementation of the provisions of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, ultimately any decision to seek assistance of the ICRC or any other humanitarian organization is subject to the consent of the parties to the conflict in general and the host nation in particular.

(2) Treatment of prisoners of war

On January 19, 1991, Central Command for the coalition forces announced the capture of Iraqi prisoners of war ("POWs") by coalition forces. The United States then advised Iraq, by diplomatic note, that the United States would abide by its obligations under the 1949 Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Prisoners of War, Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3316, 75 U.N.T.S. 135 ("GPW"), and that the United States expected Iraq to do the same. The United States also reminded Iraq of its obligations generally under the law of armed conflict. The January 19 diplomatic note read in full as follows.

The Government of the United States calls upon the Government of Iraq to respect its obligations under the international laws of armed conflict, including the Geneva Conventions on the protection of the victims of war and the Hague Conventions on the conduct of hostilities on land and at sea. The Government of the United States expects the Government of Iraq to respect its obligations under the Geneva Protocol of 1925 not to use chemical or biological weapons.

Hostilities must be conducted in a manner so as to minimize injury to civilians. The civilian population, as such, as well as individual civilians, should not be the object of attack. Medical personnel, medical facilities and hospital ships must be respected and protected at all times. In Resolution 670 and 674, the United Nations Security Council specifically called upon Iraq to abide by its obligations under the Fourth Geneva Convention.

The Government advises the Government of Iraq that the United States intends to treat captured members of the Armed Forces of Iraq in accordance with the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Prisoners of War. Iraqi prisoners of war will not be mistreated and will be provided humane and safe detention and medical care. They will not be exposed to danger, insults or public curiosity. They will not be maltreated or misused to obtain military information or for propaganda purposes. They will not be denied food, water, or medical treatment. They will be safeguarded against harm during combat operations.

The United States expects Iraq to provide the same treatment to members of the U.S. and other coalition Armed Forces captured by Iraq, in accordance with Iraq's obligations under the Geneva Conventions. We specifically expect the Government of Iraq to provide documentation on prisoners of war in accordance with the Convention and to provide the International Committee of the Red Cross with access to prisoners of war, as will be done by the United States.

The Government of the United States reminds the Government of Iraq that under international law, violations of the Geneva Conventions, the Geneva Protocol of 1926, or related international laws of armed conflict are war crimes, and individuals guilty of such violations may be subject to prosecutions at any time, without any statute of limitations. This includes members of the Iraqi Armed Forces and civilian government officials.

By the next day, January 20, the United States had information that Iraq was holding U.S. POWs under conditions contrary to the GPW. By diplomatic note of that date, the United States protested the apparent mistreatment of U.S. POWs and reminded Iraq that such mistreatment constituted a war crime. The United States demanded full Iraqi compliance with the GPW and requested immediate access for the International Committee of the Red Cross to any POWs held by Iraq. The January 20 diplomatic note to Iraq follows in full.

On January 19, 1991, the Government of the United States informed the Government of Iraq that it intends to treat members of the Iraqi Armed Forces fully in accordance with the Third Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Prisoners of War, and that the United States expected Iraq also to comply fully with this humanitarian convention.

The Government of the United States has heard audio recordings of Iraqi television broadcasts which purport to be interviews with captured American and coalition military personnel, and has heard other accounts of such broadcasts. The Government of Iraq appears to have subjected these men to unlawful treatment for propaganda purposes and coercion—physical and mental—in order to secure information and statements from them. If these broadcasts are authentic, Iraq has committed serious violations of the Third Geneva Convention.

The Government of the United States protests the apparently unlawful coercion and misuse of prisoners of war for propaganda purposes, the failure to respect their honor and well-being, and the subjection of such individuals to public humiliation. All of these actions are in violation of the Convention.

The mistreatment of prisoners of war is a war crime, and the inhumane treatment of prisoners of war is a grave breach of the Convention. The United States demands that Iraq immediately desist from any further illegal action and that it respect its obligations under the Geneva Convention.

The Government of the United States again reminds the Government of Iraq that prisoners of war must at all times be humanely treated and must be afforded food, water, clothing, and every guarantee of hygiene and healthfulness. It is requested that the International Committee of the Red Cross, which has representatives in Baghdad, be provided immediate access to any prisoners of war.

On January 21, the United States sent an additional diplomatic note, responding to information that the Government of Iraq intended to locate coalition POWs in Iraq at likely strategic targets of coalition forces. In the note, provided in full below, the United States protested any move to endanger coalition POWs.

Baghdad radio has reported that the Government of Iraq intends to locate United States and Iraqi prisoners at likely strategic targets of coalition forces. The United States strongly protests the Government of Iraq's threat to so endanger POWs.

Under Article 19 of the Third Geneva Convention, prisoners of war are to be evacuated as soon as possible after their capture to camps situated in an area away from the combat zone, so that they will be out of danger. Under Article 23 of the Third Geneva Convention, no prisoner of war may be sent to, or detained in, areas where he may be exposed to the fire of the combat zone, nor may his presence be used to render certain points or areas immune from military operations. Moreover, prisoners of war are to have shelters against air bombardment and other hazards of war to the same extent as the local civilian population. Iraqi POWs captured by the United States will be accorded these protections.

The United States and other coalition forces are only attacking targets of military value in Iraq; the civilian population, as such, is not the object of attack. Consequently the Government of Iraq is capable of placing coalition POWs in areas where military attacks will not occur.

If the Government of Iraq places coalition POWs at military targets in Iraq, then the Government of Iraq will be in violation of the Third Geneva Convention, and Iraqi officials—whether members of the Iraqi Armed Forces or civilian government personnel—will have committed a serious war crime. The Government of the United States reminds the Government of Iraq that Iraqi individuals who are guilty of such war crimes, as well as other war crimes such as the exposure of POWs to mistreatment, coerced statements, public curiosity and insult, are personally liable and subject to prosecution at any time.

(3) Department of Defense report to Congress on role of the law of armed conflict

Section 501 of the Persian Gulf Conflict Supplemental Authorization and Personnel Benefits Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102–25, 105 Stat. 75 (codified as amended in scattered sections of 10 U.S.C.), required the Department of Defense to submit to Congress a report on the conduct of hostilities in the Persian Gulf. Section 501(b)(12) required that the report contain a discussion of "[t]he role of the law of armed conflict in the planning and execution of military operations by United States forces and the other coalition forces and the effects on operations of Iraqi compliance or noncompliance with the law of armed conflict. . . ." Pursuant to Section 501, the Department of Defense submitted the report to Congress on April 10, 1992. Appendix O to the report, addressing the role of the law of war in the conflict, reprinted in 31 I.L.M. 612 (1992), is excerpted below.

THE ROLE OF THE LAW OF WAR

BACKGROUND

The United States, its Coalition partners, and Iraq are parties to numerous law of war treaties intended to minimize unnecessary suffering by combatants and noncombatants during war. The US military's law of war program is one of the more comprehensive in the world. As indicated in this appendix, it is US policy that its forces will conduct military operations in a manner consistent with US law of war obligations. This appendix discusses the principal law of war issues that arose during Operation Desert Storm.

As defined in Joint Publication 1–02, Department of Defense (DOD) Dictionary of Military and Associated Terms (1 December 1989), the law of war is "That part of international law that regulates the conduct of armed hostilities. It is often termed the law of armed conflict." While the terms are synonymous, this appendix will use "law of war" for consistency. Both concepts of jus ad bellum and jus in bello are covered in this appendix.

In addition to the United Nations Charter, with its prohibition against the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, treaties applicable to the Persian Gulf War include:

- Hague Convention IV and its Annex Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land of 18 October 1907 ("Hague IV").
- Hague Convention V Respecting the Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers and Persons in Case of War on Land of 18 October 1907 ("Hague V").
- Hague Convention VIII Relative to the Laying of Automatic Submarine Contact Mines of 18 October 1907 ("Hague VIII").
- Hague Convention IX Concerning Bombardment by Naval Forces in Time of War of 18 October 1907 ("Hague IX").
- Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare of 17 June 1925 ("1925 Geneva Protocol").
- Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide of 9 December 1948 ("the Genocide Convention").
- The four Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949:

- Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field ("GWS").
- Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea (hereinafter "GWS [Sea]").
- Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War ("GPW").
- Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War ("GC").
- Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict of 14 May 1954 ("1954 Hague"). Since Iraq, Kuwait, France, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and other Coalition members are parties to this treaty, the treaty was binding between Iraq and Kuwait, and between Iraq and those Coalition members in the Persian Gulf War. Canada, Great Britain, and the United States are not parties to this treaty. However, the armed forces of each receive training on its provisions, and the treaty was followed by all Coalition forces in the Persian Gulf War.

The United States is a party to all of these treaties, except the 1954 Hague Cultural Property Convention. While Iraq is not a party to Hague IV, the International Military Tribunal (Nuremberg, 1946) stated with regard to it that:

> The rules of land warfare expressed in . . . [Hague IV] undoubtedly represented an advance over existing International Law at the time of their adoption . . . but by 1939 these rules . . . were recognized by all civilized nations and were regarded as being declaratory of the laws and customs of war.

As customary international law, its obligations are binding upon all nations. Neither is Iraq a party to Hague V, Hague VIII, or Hague IX. However, the provisions of each cited herein are regarded as a reflection of the customary practice of nations, and therefore binding upon all nations.

The United States, other Coalition members, and Iraq are parties to the 1925 Geneva Protocol which prohibits the use of chemical (CW) or bacteriological (biological) weapons (BW) in time of war. Both Iraq and the United States filed a reservation to this treaty at the time of their respective ratifications. Iraq's reservation accepted the 1925 Geneva Protocol as prohibiting first use of CW or BW weapons; the United States, having unilaterally renounced the use of BW in 1969, accepted without reservation the prohibition on BW and first use of CW. (The United States also is a party to the Convention on the Prohibition of Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological [Biological] and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction of 10 April 1972; Iraq is not.) All nations party to the Persian Gulf conflict, including Iraq, are parties to the four 1949 Geneva Conventions for the protection of war victims. The precise applicability of these treaties will be addressed in the discussion of each topic in this appendix.

Three other law of war treaties were not legally applicable in the Persian Gulf War, but nonetheless bear mention. They are:

- 1977 Convention on the Prohibition of Military or Any Other Hostile Use of Environmental Modification Techniques ("ENMOD Convention"). While the United States and many of its Coalition partners are parties to this treaty, Iraq has signed but not ratified the ENMOD Convention; therefore it was not legally applicable to Iraqi actions during the Persian Gulf War.
- 1977 Protocol I Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 ("Protocol I"). From 1974 to 1977 the United States and more than 100 other nations participated in a Diplomatic Conference intended to supplement the 1949 Geneva Conventions and modernize the law of war. That conference produced two new law of war treaties: Protocol I deals with the law of war in international armed conflicts, while Protocol II addresses the law of war applicable to internal armed conflicts. Iraq and several Coalition members, including the United States, Great Britain, and France, are not parties to Protocol I; therefore it was not applicable during the Persian Gulf War. For humanitarian, military, and political reasons, the United States in 1987 declined to become a party to Protocol I; France reached a similar decision in 1984.

- 1980 Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons. Iraq and most of the Coalition partners, including the United States, are not parties to this treaty; it had no applicability in the Persian Gulf War. However, US and Coalition actions were consistent with its language. Iraqi actions were consistent with the treaty except as to its provisions on land mines and booby traps.

TAKING OF HOSTAGES

Whatever the purpose, whether for intimidation, concessions, reprisal, or to render areas or legitimate military objects immune from military operations, the taking of hostages is unequivocally and expressly prohibited by Article 34, GC.[1]

Applicability of the GC was triggered by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait on 2 August; thereafter Iraq was an Occupying Power in Kuwait, with express obligations. Under articles 5, 42, and 78, GC, Iraq could intern foreign nationals only if internal security made it "absolutely necessary" (in Iraq) or "imperative" (in Kuwait). Iraq asserted no rights under any of these provisions in defense of its illegal taking of hostages in Iraq and Kuwait.

United Nations Security Council (UNSC) Resolution 664 (18 August) overrode authority inconsistent with its obligations under the GC that Iraq might have claimed to restrict the departure of US citizens and other third-country nationals in Kuwait or Iraq, and clarified the legal status of noncombatants.

[1] The United States is party to the International Convention Against Taking of Hostages of 17 December 1979, under which hostage taking is identified as an act of international terrorism.

Hostage taking by Iraq can be divided into four categories:

- The taking of Kuwaiti nationals as hostages and individual and mass forcible deportations to Iraq, in violation of Articles 34 and 49, GC;
- The taking of third-country nationals in Kuwait as hostages and individual and mass forcible deportations from Kuwait to Iraq, in violation of Articles 34 and 49, GC;
- The taking of foreign nationals within Iraq as hostages, with individual and mass forcible transfers, in violation of Articles 34 and 35, GC; and
- Compelling Kuwaiti and other foreign citizens to serve in the armed forces of Iraq, in violation of Article 51, GC.

The taking of hostages, their unlawful deportation, and compelling hostages to serve in the armed forces of Iraq constitute Grave Breaches (that is, major violations of the law of war) under Article 147, GC.

US and other hostages in Iraq, including civilians forcibly deported from Kuwait, were placed in or around military targets as "human shields", in violation of Articles 28 and 38(4), GC. . . .

TREATMENT OF CIVILIANS IN OCCUPIED TERRITORY

The GC governs the treatment of civilians in occupied territories. As previously indicated, all parties to the conflict, including Iraq, are parties to this convention. The treaty's application was triggered by the Iraqi invasion, and was specifically recognized in UNSC resolutions that addressed that crisis.

An earlier law of war treaty that remains relevant is Hague IV, which contains regulations relating to the protection of civilian property (public and private) in occupied territory; in contrast, the GC sets forth the obligations of an occupying power in providing protection for civilians in occupied territory. Cultural property in Kuwait also was protected by the 1954 Hague Cultural Property Convention.

Iraqi actions read like a very long list of violations of Hague IV, GC, and the 1954 Hague Cultural Property Convention. From the beginning of its invasion of Kuwait, Iraq exhibited an intent not only to refuse to conduct itself as an occupying power, but to deny that it was an occupying power. Its intention was to annex Kuwait as a part of Iraq, and remove any vestige of Kuwait's previous existence as an independent, sovereign nation. (Its transfer of a part of its own civilian population into occupied Kuwait for the purpose of annexation and resettlement constitutes a violation of Article 49, GC.)

A case can be made that Iraqi actions may violate the Genocide Convention, which defines genocide as any of the following acts committed with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group:

- Killing members of the group;
- Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;
- Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;
- Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group; or
- Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

Iraq carried out every act of the types condemned by the Genocide Convention, except for forcibly transferring children. Many Kuwaiti citizens were deported forcibly to Iraq; many others were tortured and/or murdered. There were instances of Kuwaiti women of child-bearing age being brutally rendered incapable of having children. Collective executions of innocent Kuwaiti civilians took place routinely. Kuwaiti public records were removed or destroyed, apparently to prevent or impede the reconstitution of Kuwait if Kuwait were liberated. Kuwaiti identification cards and license plates were revoked and replaced with Iraqi credentials, identifying Kuwait as Iraq's 19th province.

In violation of Hague IV and the 1954 Hague Cultural Property Convention, cultural, private and public (municipal and national) property was confiscated; pillage was widespread. (Confiscation of private property is prohibited under any circumstance, as is the confiscation of municipal public property. Confiscation of movable national public property is prohibited without military need and cash compensation, while immovable national public property may be temporarily confiscated under the concept of usufruct—the right to use another's property so long as it is not damaged.)

Iraqi confiscation appears to have been primarily, if not entirely, part of a program:

- Of erasing any record of the sovereign state of Kuwait;
- Of looting directed by the Iraqi leadership to provide consumer goods for the Iraqi public; and
- Of looting by individual Iraqi soldiers, which was tolerated by Iraqi military commanders and higher civilian and military authorities.

Civilians who remained in Kuwait were denied the necessities for survival, such as food, water, and basic medical care, in violation of Articles 55 and 56, GC. Kuwaiti doctors were forcibly deported to Iraq; Filipino nurses working in the hospitals were raped repeatedly by Iraqi soldiers. Kuwaiti civilians were not permitted any medical care unless they presented Iraqi identification cards; presentation of an Iraqi identification card by a Kuwaiti citizen seldom resulted in any genuine medical care. Medical supplies and equipment in Kuwaiti hospitals necessary for the needs of the civilian population of Kuwait were illegally taken, in violation of Article 57, GC, in brutal disregard for Kuwaiti lives. . . .

The slightest perceived offense could lead to torture and execution of the purported offender, often in front of family members. Torture and murder of civilians is prohibited by Article 32, GC. Iraqi policy provided for the collective punishment of the family of any individual who served in or was suspected of assisting the Kuwaiti resistance. This punishment routinely took the form of destruction of the family home and execution of all family members. Collective punishment is prohibited expressly by Article 33, GC.

The Iraqi occupation remained brutal until the very end; civilians were murdered in the final days of that occupation to eliminate witnesses to Iraqi repression. The Government of Kuwait estimates that 1,082 civilians were murdered during the occupation. Many more were forcibly deported to Iraq; several thousand remain missing. On their departure, Iraqi forces set off previously placed explosive charges on Kuwait's oil wells, a vengeful act of wanton destruction.

Coalition forces acted briefly as an occupying power. When the Operation Desert Storm ground offensive began, Coalition forces moved into Iraq. Physical seizure and control of Iraqi territory triggered the application of Hague IV and the GC. Both treaties initially had little practical application, since Coalition forces occupied uninhabited desert. As hostilities diminished, the internal conflict that erupted in Iraq caused thousands of civilians to flee the fighting (such as in Al-Basrah, between Iraqi military units and Shi'ite forces) and to enter territory held by Coalition forces. Allied forces provided food, water and medical care to these refugees. As Coaltion forces prepared to withdraw from Iraq, no international relief agency was ready to assume this relief effort. Consequently, refugees were offered the opportunity to move to the refugee camp at Rafha, Saudi Arabia. Approximately 20,000 refugees (including more than 8,000 from the Safwan area) accepted this offer.

In the conflict's latter phases, public and private international relief agency representatives entered the area of conflict, often without sufficient advance notification and coordination with Coalition authorities. While relief agencies undoubtedly were anxious to perform humanitarian missions, their entry onto the battlefield without the advance consent of the parties to the conflict is not consistent with Article 9, GWS (a provision common to all four 1949 Geneva Conventions), Article 125, GPW, and Article 63, GC. It impeded Coalition efforts to end hostilities as rapidly as possible, and placed these organizations' members at risk from the ongoing hostilities. Coalition aviation units searching for mobile Scud missile launchers in western Iraq were inhibited in their efforts to neutralize that threat by vehicles from those organizations moving through Scud missile operating areas that otherwise were devoid of civilians. The lack of timely, proper coordination by relief agencies with Coalition forces adversely affected air strikes against other Iraqi targets on other occasions. While well-intentioned, these intrusions required increased diligence by Coalition forces, placed Coalition forces at increased risk, and were factors in the failure to resolve the Scud threat.

Whether in territory Coalition forces occupied or in parts of Iraq still under Iraqi control, US and Coalition operations in Iraq were carefully attuned to the fact those operations were being conducted in an area encompassing "the cradle of civilization," near many archaeological sites of great cultural significance. Coalition operations were conducted in a way that balanced maximum possible protection for those cultural sites against protection of Coalition lives and accomplishment of the assigned mission.

While Article 4(1) of the 1954 Hague Convention provides specific protection for cultural property, Article 4(2) permits waiver of that protection where military necessity makes such a waiver imperative; such "imperative military necessity" can occur when an enemy uses cultural property and its immediate surroundings to protect legitimate military targets, in violation of Article 4(1). Coalition forces continued to respect Iraqi cultural property, even where Iraqi forces used such property to shield military targets from attack. However, some indirect damage may have occurred to some Iraqi cultural property due to the concussive effect of munitions directed against Iraqi targets some distance away from the cultural sites.

Since US military doctrine is prepared consistent with US law of war obligations and policies, the provisions of Hague IV, GC, and the 1954 Hague Convention did not have any significant adverse effect on planning or executing military operations.

TARGETING, COLLATERAL DAMAGE AND CIVILIAN CASUALTIES

The law of war with respect to targeting, collateral damage and collateral civilian casualties is derived from the principle of discrimination; that is, the necessity for distinguishing between combatants, who may be attacked, and noncombatants, against whom an intentional attack may not be directed, and between legitimate military targets and civilian objects. Although this is a major part of the foundation on which the law of war is built, it is one of the least codified portions of that law.

As a general principle, the law of war prohibits the intentional destruction of civilian objects not imperatively required by military necessity and the direct, intentional attack of civilians not taking part in hostilities. The United States takes these proscriptions into account in developing and acquiring weapons systems, and in using them in combat. Central Command (CENTCOM) forces adhered to these fundamental law of war proscriptions in conducting military operations during Operation Desert Storm through discriminating target selection and careful matching of available forces and weapons systems to selected targets and Iraqi defenses, without regard to Iraqi violations of its law of war obligations toward the civilian population and civilian objects.

Several treaty provisions specifically address the responsibility to minimize collateral damage to civilian objects and injury to civilians. Article 23(g) of the Annex to Hague IV prohibits destruction not "imperatively demanded by the necessities of war," while Article 27 of that same annex offers protection from intentional attack to "buildings dedicated to religion, art, science, or charitable purposes, historic monuments, hospitals, and places where the sick and wounded are collected, provided they are not being used at the time for military purposes." Similar language is contained in Article 5 of Hague IX, while the conditions for protection of cultural property in the 1954 Hague Cultural Property Convention were set forth in the preceding discussion on the treatment of civilians in occupied territory. In summary, cultural and civilian objects are protected from direct, intentional attack unless they are used for military purposes, such as shielding military objects from attack.

While the prohibition contained in Article 23(g) generally refers to intentional destruction or injury, it also precludes collateral damage of civilian objects or injury to noncombatant civilians that is clearly disproportionate to the military advantage gained in the attack of military objectives, as discussed below. As previously indicated, Hague IV was found to be part of customary international law in the course of war crimes trials following World War II, and continues to be so regarded.

An uncodified but similar provision is the principle of proportionality. It prohibits military action in which the negative effects (such as collateral civilian casualties) clearly outweigh the military gain. This balancing may be done on a target-by-target basis, as frequently was the case during Operation Desert Storm, but also may be weighed in overall terms against campaign objectives. CENTCOM conducted its campaign with a focus on minimizing collateral civilian casualties and damage to civilian objects. Some targets were specifically avoided because the value of destruction of each target was outweighed by the potential risk to nearby civilians or, as in the case of certain archaeological and religious sites, to civilian objects.

Coalition forces took several steps to minimize the risk of injury to noncombatants. To the degree possible and consistent with allowable risk to aircraft and aircrews, aircraft and munitions were selected so that attacks on targets within populated areas would provide the greatest possible accuracy and the least risk to civilian objects and the civilian population. Where required, attacking aircraft were accompanied by support mission aircraft to minimize attacking aircraft aircrew distraction from their assigned mission. Aircrews attacking targets in populated areas were directed not to expend their munitions if they lacked positive identification of their targets. When this occurred, aircrews dropped their bombs on alternate targets or returned to base with their weapons.

One reason for the maneuver plan adopted for the ground campaign was that it avoided populated areas, where Coalition and Iraqi civilian casualties and damage to civilian objects necessarily would have been high. This was a factor in deciding against an amphibious assault into Kuwait City.

The principle of proportionality acknowledges the unfortunate inevitability of collateral civilian casualties and collateral damage to civilian objects when noncombatants and civilian objects are mingled with combatants and targets, even with reasonable efforts by the parties to a conflict to minimize collateral injury and damage.

This proved to be the case in the air campaign. Despite conducting the most discriminate air campaign in history, including extraordinary measures by Coalition aircrews to minimize collateral civilian casualties, the Coalition could not avoid causing some collateral damage and injury.

There are several reasons for this. One is the fact that in any modern society, many objects intended for civilian use also may be used for military purposes. A bridge or highway vital to daily commuter and business traffic can be equally crucial to military traffic, or support for a nation's war effort. Railroads, airports, seaports, and the interstate highway system in the United States have been funded by the Congress in part because of US national security concerns, for example; each proved invaluable to the movement of US military units to various ports for deployment to Southwest Asia (SWA) for Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm. Destruction of a bridge, airport, or port facility, or interdiction of a highway can be equally important in impeding an enemy's war effort.

The same is true with regard to major utilities; for example, microwave towers for everyday, peacetime civilian communications can constitute a vital part of a military command and control (C2) system, while electric power grids can be used simultaneously for military and civilian purposes. Some Iraqi military installations had separate electrical generators; others did not. Industries essential to the manufacturing of CW, BW and conventional weapons depended on the national electric power grid.

Experience in its 1980–1988 war with Iran caused the Government of Iraq to develop a substantial and comprehensive degree of redundancy in its normal, civilian utilities as back-up for its national defense. Much of this redundancy, by necessity, was in urban areas. Attack of these targets necessarily placed the civilian population at risk, unless civilians were evacuated from the surrounding area. Iraqi authorities elected not to move civilians away from objects they knew were legitimate military targets, thereby placing those civilians at risk of injury incidental to Coalition attacks against these targets, notwithstanding efforts by the Coalition to minimize risk to innocent civilians.

When objects are used concurrently for civilian and military purposes, they are liable to attack if there is a military advantage to be gained in their attack. ("Military advantage" is not restricted to tactical gains, but is linked to the full context of a war strategy, in this instance, the execution of the Coalition war plan for liberation of Kuwait.)

Attack of all segments of the Iraqi communications system was essential to destruction of Iraqi military C2. C2 was crucial to Iraq's integrated air defense system; it was of equal importance for Iraqi ground forces. Iraqi C2 was highly centralized. With Saddam Hussein's fear of internal threats to his rule, he has discouraged individual initiative while emphasizing positive control. Iraqi military commanders were authorized to do only that which was directed by highest authority. Destruction of its C2 capabilities would make Iraqi combat forces unable to respond quickly to Coalition initiatives.

Baghdad bridges crossing the Euphrates River contained the multiple fiberoptic links that provided Saddam Hussein with secure communications to his southern group of forces. Attack of these bridges severed those secure communication links, while restricting movement of Iraqi military forces and deployment of CW and BW warfare capabilities. Civilians using those bridges or near other targets at the time of their attack were at risk of injury incidental to the legitimate attack of those targets.

Another reason for collateral damage to civilian objects and injury to civilians during Operation Desert Storm lay in the policy of the Government of Iraq, which purposely used both Iraqi and Kuwaiti civilian populations and civilian objects as shields for military objects. Contrary to the admonishment against such conduct contained in Article 19, GWS, Articles 18 and 28, GC, Article 4(1), 1954 Hague, and certain principles of customary law codified in Protocol I (discussed below), the Government of Iraq placed military assets (personnel, weapons, and equipment) in civilian populated areas and next to protected objects (mosques, medical facilities, and cultural sites) in an effort to protect them from attack. For this purpose, Iraqi military helicopters were dispersed into residential areas; and military supplies were stored in mosques, schools, and hospitals in Iraq and Kuwait. Similarly, a cache of Iraqi Silkworm surface-to-surface missiles was found inside a school in a populated area in Kuwait City. UN inspectors uncovered chemical bomb production equipment while inspecting a sugar factory in Iraq. The equipment had been moved to the site to escape Coalition air strikes. This intentional mingling of military objects with civilian objects naturally placed the civilian population living nearby, working within, or using those civilian objects at risk from legitimate military attacks on those military objects.

The Coalition targeted specific military objects in populated areas, which the law of war permits; at no time were civilian areas as such attacked. Coalition forces also chose not to attack many military targets in populated areas or in or adjacent to cultural (archaeological) sites, even though attack of those military targets is authorized by the law of war. The attack of legitimate Iraqi military targets, notwithstanding the fact it resulted in collateral injury to civilians and damage to civilian objects, was consistent with the customary practice of nations and the law of war.

The Government of Iraq sought to convey a highly inaccurate image of indiscriminate bombing by the Coalition through a deliberate disinformation campaign. Iraq utilized any collateral damage that occurred—including damage or injury caused by Iraqi surface-to-air missiles and antiaircraft munitions falling to earth in populated areas—in its campaign to convey the misimpression that the Coalition was targeting populated areas and civilian objects. This disinformation campaign was factually incorrect, and did not accurately reflect the high degree of care exercised by the Coalition in attack of Iraqi targets.

* * * *

Minimizing collateral damage and injury is a responsibility shared by attacker and defender. Article 48 of the 1977 Protocol I provides that:

> In order to ensure respect for and protection of the civilian population and civilian objects, the Parties to the conflict shall at all times distinguish between the civilian population and combatants and between civilian objects and military objectives and accordingly shall direct their operations only against military objectives.

Paragraph one of Article 49 of Protocol I states that " 'Attacks' means acts of violence against the adversary, whether in offense or defense." Use of the word "attacks" in this manner is etymologically inconsistent with its customary use in any of the six official languages of Protocol I. Conversely, the word "attack" or "attacks" historically has referred to and today refers to offensive operations only. Article 49(1) otherwise reflects the applicability of the law of war to actions of both attacker and defender, including the obligation to take appropriate measures to minimize injury to civilians not participating in hostilities.

* * * *

In the effort to minimize collateral civilian casualties, a substantial responsibility for protection of the civilian population rests with the party controlling the civilian population. Historically, and from a common sense standpoint, the party controlling the civilian population has the opportunity and the responsibility to minimize the risk to the civilian population through the separation of military objects from the civilian population, evacuation of the civilian population from near immovable military objects, and development of air raid precautions. Throughout World War II, for example, both Axis and Allied nations took each of these steps to protect their respective civilian populations from the effects of military operations.

The Government of Iraq elected not to take routine air-raid precautions to protect its civilian population. Civilians were not evacuated in any significant numbers from Baghdad, nor were they removed from proximity to legitimate military targets. There were air raid shelters for less than 1 percent of the civilian population of Baghdad. The Government of Iraq chose instead to use its civilians to shield legitimate military targets from attack, exploiting collateral civilian casualties and damage to civilian objects in its disinformation campaign to erode international and US domestic support for the Coalition effort to liberate Kuwait.

The presence of civilians will not render a target immune from attack; legitimate targets may be attacked wherever located (outside neutral territory and waters). An attacker must exercise reasonable precautions to minimize incidental or collateral injury to the civilian population or damage to civilian objects, consistent with mission accomplishment and allowable risk to the attacking forces. The defending party must exercise reasonable precautions to separate the civilian population and civilian objects from military objectives, and avoid placing military objectives in the midst of the civilian population. As previously indicated, a defender is expressly prohibited from using the civilian population or civilian objects (including cultural property) to shield legitimate targets from attack.

The Government of Iraq was aware of its law of war obligations. In the month preceding the Coalition air campaign, for example, a civil defense exercise was conducted, during which more than one million civilians were evacuated from Baghdad. No government evacuation program was undertaken during the Coalition air campaign. As previously indicated, the Government of Iraq elected instead to mix military objects with the civilian population. Pronouncements that Coalition air forces would not attack populated areas increased Iraqi movement of military objects into populated areas in Iraq and Kuwait to shield them from attack, in callous disregard of its law of war obligations and the safety of its own civilians and Kuwaiti civilians.

Similar actions were taken by the Government of Iraq to use cultural property to protect legitimate targets from attack; a classic example was the positioning of two fighter aircraft adjacent to the ancient temple of Ur (as depicted in the photograph in Volume II, Chapter VI, "Off Limits Targets" section) on the theory that Coalition respect for the protection of cultural property would preclude the attack of those aircraft. While the law of war permits the attack of the two fighter aircraft, with Iraq bearing responsibility for any damage to the temple, Commander-in-Chief, Central Command (CINCCENT) elected not to attack the aircraft on the basis of respect for cultural property and the belief that positioning of the aircraft adjacent to Ur (without servicing equipment or a runway nearby) effectively had placed each out of action, thereby limiting the value of their destruction by Coalition air forces when weighed against the risk of damage to the temple. Other cultural property similarly remained on the Coalition no-attack list, despite Iraqi placement of valuable military equipment in or near those sites.

Undoubtedly, the most tragic result of this intentional commingling of military objects with the civilian population occurred in the 13 February attack on the Al-Firdus Bunker (also sometimes referred to as the Al-'Amariyah bunker) on Baghdad.

Originally constructed during the Iran-Iraq War as an air raid shelter, it had been converted to a military C2 bunker in the middle of a populated area. While the entrance(s) to a bomb shelter permit easy and rapid entrance and exit, barbed wire had been placed around the Al-Firdus bunker, its entrances had been secured to prevent unauthorized access, and armed guards had been posted. It also had been camouflaged. Knowing Coalition air attacks on targets in Baghdad took advantage of the cover of darkness, Iraqi authorities permitted selected civilians—apparently the families of officer personnel working in the bunker—to enter the Al-'Amariyah Bunker at night to use the former air raid shelter part of the bunker, on a level above the C2 center. Coalition authorities were unaware of the presence of these civilians in the bunker complex. The 13 February attack of the Al-'Amariyah bunker—a legitimate military target—resulted in the unfortunate deaths of those Iraqi civilians who had taken refuge above the C2 center.

An attacker operating in the fog of war may make decisions that will lead to innocent civilians' deaths. The death of civilians always is regrettable, but inevitable when a defender fails to honor his own law of war obligations—or callously disregards them, as was the case with Saddam Hussein. In reviewing an incident such as the attack of the Al-'Amariyah bunker, the law of war recognizes the difficulty of decision making amid the confusion of war. Leaders and commanders necessarily have to make decisions on the basis of their assessment of the information reasonably available to them at the time, rather than what is determined in hindsight.

Protocol I establishes similar legal requirements. Articles 51(7) and 58 of the 1977 Protocol I expressly prohibit a defender from using the civilian population or individual civilians to render certain points or areas immune from military operations, in particular in an attempt to shield military objectives from attack or to shield, favor or impede military operations; obligate a defender to remove the civilian population, individual civilians and civilian objects under the defender's control from near military objectives; avoid locating military objectives within or near densely populated areas; and to take other necessary precautions to protect the civilian population, individual civilians and civilian objects under its control against the dangers resulting from military operations.

It is in this area that deficiencies of the 1977 Protocol I become apparent. As correctly stated in Article 51(8) of Protocol I, a nation confronted with callous actions by its opponent (such as the use of "human shields") is not released from its obligation to exercise reasonable precaution to minimize collateral injury to the civilian population or damage to civilian objects. This obligation was recognized by Coalition forces in the conduct of their operations. In practice, this concept tends to facilitate the disinformation campaign of a callous opponent by focusing international public opinion upon the obligation of the attacking force to minimize collateral civilian casualties and damage to civilian objects—a result fully consistent with Iraq's strategy in this regard. This inherent problem is worsened by the language of Article 52(3) of Protocol I, which states:

> In case of doubt whether an object which is normally dedicated to civilian purposes, such as a place of worship, a house or other dwelling or a school, is being used to make an effective contribution to military action, it shall be presumed not to be so used.

This language, which is not a codification of the customary practice of nations, causes several things to occur that are contrary to the traditional law of war. It shifts the burden for determining the precise use of an object from the party controlling that object (and therefore in possession of the facts as to its use) to the party lacking such control and facts, i.e., from defender to attacker. This imbalance ignores the realities of war in demanding a degree of certainty of an attacker that seldom exists in combat. It also encourages a defender to ignore its obligation to separate the civilian population, individual civilians and civilian objects from military objectives, as the Government of Iraq illustrated during the Persian Gulf War.

In the case of the Al-Firdus bunker, for example—repeatedly and incorrectly referred to by the Government of Iraq and some media representatives as a "civilian bomb shelter"—the Coalition forces had evidence the bunker was being used as an Iraqi command and control center and had no knowledge it was concurrently being used as a bomb shelter for civilians. Under the rule of international law known as military necessity, which permits the attack of structures used to further an enemy's prosecution of a war, this was a legitimate military target. Coalition forces had no obligation to refrain from attacking it. If Coalition forces had known that Iraqi civilians were occupying it as a shelter, they may have withheld an attack until the civilians had removed themselves (although the law of war does not require such restraint). Iraq had an obligation under the law of war to refrain from commingling its civilian population with what was an obviously military target. Alternatively, Iraq could have designated the location as a hospital, safety zone, or a neutral zone, as provided for in Articles 14 and 15, GC.

ENEMY PRISONER OF WAR PROGRAM

This section contains similar information to that contained in Appendix L, but is a more condensed version of that appendix, with emphasis on the legal aspects of the Enemy Prisoner of War (EPW) program. Appendix L used the same base information as Appendix O, but expands to include more operational issues.

Coalition care for EPWs was in strict compliance with the 1949 Geneva Convention relative to the treatment of Prisoners of War (hereafter "GPW"). Centralized management of EPW operations began during Operation Desert Shield and continued throughout Operation Desert Storm. The US National Prisoner of War Information Center (NPWIC) became operational before ground operations began and a new automated information program for preserving, cataloging, and accounting for captured personnel (as required by the GPW) was fielded in Operation Desert Shield. Trained Reserve Component (RC) EPW units were activated, and camp advisory teams were sent to Saudi Arabia to account for and to provide technical assistance on custody and treatment of US-transferred EPWs.

EPWs captured by Coalition forces during Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm were maintained in either a US or Saudi EPW camp. The United States accepted EPWs captured by the United Kingdom (UK) and France, while Saudi Arabia managed a consolidated camp for those EPWs captured by the remaining Coalition forces.

* * * *

US and other Coalition forces treated EPWs and displaced civilians in accordance with the 1949 Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims. The first three conventions mandate humane treatment and full accountability for all prisoners of war from the moment of capture until their repatriation, release, or death. The fourth convention (GC) requires humane treatment for displaced civilians. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) was provided access to Coalition EPW facilities and reviewed their findings with Coalition representatives in periodic meetings in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. While US and Coalition forces worked closely with the ICRC on EPW matters throughout Operation Desert Storm, neither the ICRC nor any other human rights organization played any other role affecting the course of the war. The ICRC was ineffective in providing any protection for US and Coalition POWs in Iraq's custody.

NPWIC was established at the Pentagon during Operation Desert Shield using active duty personnel and became fully operational with Reserve staffing on 21 January. Its mission was to account for EPWs in US custody and to ensure compliance with the 1949 Geneva Conventions. Article 122, GPW requires a captor to establish a National Information Bureau within the shortest time possible after the onset of hostilities. The NPWIC, manned by Army Reserve Individual Mobilization Augmentees, volunteer Reservists and retired personnel, served as a central repository for information relative to EPWs captured by or transferred to US forces, and coordinated information pertaining to EPWs and US POWs in Iraqi hands with the ICRC.

The US and Saudi governments concluded an agreement which allowed the US to transfer captured EPWs to Saudi control after processing by US EPW elements. This agreement was applicable to EPWs captured by the French and British, as those EPWs were processed and maintained in US EPW camps. The US provided camp advisory teams to work with the Government of Saudi Arabia to assist in compliance with the 1949 Geneva Conventions, to facilitate logistic and administrative cooperation, and to maintain accountability for US-transferred EPWs. The size of the host nation EPW camps limited the number of EPWs the United States could transfer, and required that EPWs remain longer in US EPW camps.

After active hostilities ended, in order to transfer all EPWs still under US control, the Brooklyn (West) EPW camp, along with its EPWs, was transferred to the Saudi Arabian National Guard.

* * * *

Eight EPWs died while in US custody, all as a result of injuries or sickness contracted before capture. One died of malnutrition/dehydration, five as a result of injuries or wounds, and two from unknown causes. Three US-transferred EPWs died in Saudi Arabian camps from wounds received in the Saudi camp, either during an EPW riot or inflicted by another EPW. These deaths were investigated and reported to the ICRC, as required by Articles 120, 122, and 123, GPW.

When Operation Desert Storm began, psychological operations were undertaken to encourage maximum defection or surrender of Iraqi forces. Leaflets to be used as safe conduct passes were widely disseminated over and behind Iraqi lines with great success.

Photographs and videotapes of the first Iraqi EPWs captured were taken and shown by the public media. The capture or detention of EPWs is recognized as newsworthy events and, as such, photography of such events is not prohibited by the GPW. However, Article 13, GPW does prohibit photography that might humiliate or degrade any EPW. Media use of photographs of EPWs raised some apprehension in light of formal US condemnation of the forced videotapes of US and Coalition POWs being made and shown by Iraq. CENTCOM and other DOD officials also expressed concern for the safety of the family of any Iraqi defector who might be identified from media photographs by Iraqi officials. Because of these sensitivities, and consistent with Article 13, GPW, DOD developed guidelines for photographing EPWs. These guidelines limited both the opportunities for photography and the display of EPW photographs taken, while protecting Iraqi EPWs and their families from retribution by the Government of Iraq.

Operation Desert Storm netted a large number of persons thought to be EPWs who were actually displaced civilians. Subsequent interrogations determined that they were innocent civilians who had taken no hostile action against Coalition forces. In some cases, individuals had surrendered to Coalition forces to receive food, water, and lodging, while others were captured because they appeared to be part of hostile forces. Tribunals were conducted to verify the status of detainees.* Upon determination of their status as innocent civilians, detainees were transferred from US custody to Safwan, a US-operated refugee camp, or to Rafha, a Saudi Arabian refugee camp.

In March, Coalition forces and Iraqi military representatives signed an agreement for the repatriation of prisoners of war, to be conducted under ICRC auspices. Repatriation of EPWs not in medical channels occurred at Judaydat Ar-ar, near the Jordanian border. Those in medical channels were flown directly to Baghdad on ICRC aircraft.

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS OF WAR

US and Coalition personnel captured by Iraq were POWs protected by the GWS (if wounded, injured, or sick) and GPW. All US POWs captured during the Persian Gulf War were moved to Baghdad by land after their capture. With some exceptions, depending on their location at the time of capture, their route usually was through Kuwait City to Al-Basrah and then on to Baghdad. Those taken to Kuwait City and Al-Basrah usually were detained there for no more than a few hours or overnight. Limited interrogation of POWs occurred in these cities. Although some were physically abused during their transit to Baghdad, most were treated reasonably well.

* Editors' Note: Appendix L contained the following description of compliance with Article 5 of GPW:

> Under Article 5 of the GPW, tribunals were conducted to determine whether civilians were entitled to be granted POW status. For those detainees whose status was questionable, tribunals were conducted to verify status, based upon the individual's relationship to the military and participation in the war. A total of 1,196 tribunal hearings were conducted. As a result, 310 persons were granted POW status; the others were determined to be displaced civilians and were treated as refugees. No civilian was found to have acted as an unlawful combatant.

On arrival in Baghdad, most Air Force, Navy, and Marine POWs were taken immediately to what the POWs referred to as "The Bunker" (most probably at the Directorate of Military Intelligence) for initial interrogation. They then were taken to what appeared to be the main long-term incarceration site, located in the Iraqi Intelligence Service Regional Headquarters (dubbed "The Biltmore" by the POWs). Since this building was a legitimate military target, the detention of POWs in it was a violation of Article 23, GPW; POWs thus were unnecessarily placed at risk when the facility was bombed on 23 February.

In contravention of Article 26, GPW, all US POWs incarcerated at the "Biltmore" experienced food deprivation. US POWs also were provided inadequate protection from the cold, in violation of Article 25, GPW.

After the 23 February bombing of the "Biltmore" by Coalition aircraft, the POWs were relocated to either Abu Abu Ghurayb Prison (dubbed "Joliet Prison") or Al-Rashid Military Prison ("The Half-Way House"), both near Baghdad. The Army POWs, on the other hand, were believed to have been sent directly to the Al-Rashid Military Prison, where they remained until their repatriation. All US POWs were repatriated from the Al-Rashid Military Prison. The detention of prisoners of war in a prison generally is prohibited by Article 22, GPW.

All US POWs suffered physical abuse at the hands of their Iraqi captors, in violation of Articles 13, 14, and 17, GPW. Most POWs were tortured, a grave breach, in violation of Article 130, GPW. Some POWs were forced to make public propaganda statements, in violation of Article 13. In addition, none was permitted the rights otherwise afforded them by the GPW, such as the right of correspondence authorized by Article 70. Although the ICRC had access to Iraqi EPWs captured by the Coalition, ICRC members did not see Coalition POWs until the day of their repatriation.

Lack of access to non-US Coalition POW debriefs precludes comment on their treatment. From US POW debriefings, it is known that several Coalition POWs, especially the Saudi and Kuwaiti pilots, were abused physically by their Iraqi captors, in violation of Articles 13 and 17, GPW.

Iraqi POW handling procedures and treatment of Coalition POWs were reasonably predictable, based on a study of Iraqi treatment of Iranians during the eight-year Iran-Iraq war. Iraqi mistreatment of Coalition POWs constituted a Grave Breach of the GPW, as set forth in Article 130 of that treaty.

REPATRIATION OF PRISONERS OF WAR

Article 118, GPW, establishes a POW's right to be repatriated. In conflicts since the GPW's adoption, this principle has become conditional: Each POW must consent to repatriation rather than being forced to return. This proved to be the case after hostilities in this war ended.

No EPW was forcibly repatriated. Coalition forces identified to the ICRC those Iraqi EPWs not desiring repatriation. Once an Iraqi EPW scheduled for repatriation reached the repatriation site, the ICRC reconfirmed his willingness to be repatriated. Those who indicated they no longer desired to return to Iraq were returned to the custody of the detaining power.

On 4 March, Iraq released the first group of 10 Coalition prisoners of war, six of whom were US personnel. The United States simultaneously released 294 Iraqi EPWs for repatriation to Iraq. Of the 294, 10 refused repatriation at the repatriation site and were returned to US custody.

Iraq and the Coalition forces continued repatriation actions through August 1991, at which time 13,318 Iraqi EPWs who refused repatriation remained under Saudi control. On 5 August 1991, Iraqi EPWs still refusing repatriation were reclassified as refugees by the United States (in coordination with Saudi Arabia and the ICRC), concluding application of the GPW.

When US custody of Iraqi EPWs ended, ICRC officials informed the 800th Military Police Brigade (PW) that the treatment of Iraqi EPWs by US forces was the best compliance with the GPW by any nation in any conflict in history. Coalition measures to comply with the GPW had no adverse effect on planning and executing military operations; if anything, by encouraging the surrender of Iraqi military personnel, they improved those operations.

USE OF RUSES AND ACTS OF PERFIDY

Under the law of war, deception includes those measures designed to mislead the enemy by manipulation, distortion, or falsification of evidence to induce him to react in a manner prejudicial to his interests. Ruses are deception of the enemy by legitimate means, and are specifically allowed by Article 24, Annex to Hague IV, and Protocol I. As correctly stated in Article 37(2) of Protocol I:

> Ruses of war are not prohibited. Such ruses are acts which are intended to mislead an adversary or to induce him to act recklessly but which infringe no rule of [the law of war] and which are not perfidious because they do not invite the confidence of an adversary with respect to protection under that law. The following are examples of ruses: the use of camouflage, decoys, mock operations and misinformation.

Coalition actions that convinced Iraqi military leaders that the ground campaign to liberate Kuwait would be focused in eastern Kuwait, and would include an amphibious assault, are examples of legitimate ruses. These deception measures were crucial to the Coalition's goal of minimizing the number of Coalition casualties and, in all likelihood, resulted in fewer Iraqi casualties as well.

In contrast, perfidy is prohibited by the law of war. Perfidy is defined in Article 37(1) of Protocol I as:

> Acts inviting the confidence of an adversary to lead him to believe that he is entitled to, or is obliged to accord, protection under the [law of war], with intent to betray that confidence. . . .

Perfidious acts include the feigning of an intent to surrender or negotiate under a flag of truce, or the feigning of protected status through improper use of the Red Cross or Red Crescent distinctive emblem.

Perfidious acts are prohibited on the basis that perfidy may damage mutual respect for the law of war, may lead to unnecessary escalation of the conflict, may result in the injury or death of enemy forces legitimately attempting to surrender or discharging their humanitarian duties, or may impede the restoration of peace.

There were few examples of perfidious practices during the Persian Gulf War. The most publicized were those associated with the battle of Ras Al-Khafji, which began on 29 January. As that battle began, Iraqi tanks entered Ras Al-Khafji with their turrets reversed, turning their guns forward only at the moment action began between Iraqi and Coalition forces. While there was some media speculation that this was an act of perfidy, it was not; a reversed turret is not a recognized indication of surrender per se. Some tactical confusion may have occurred, since Coalition ground forces were operating under a defensive posture at that time, and were to engage Iraqi forces only upon clear indication of hostile intent, or some hostile act.

However, individual acts of perfidy did occur. On one occasion, Iraqi soldiers waved a white flag and laid down their weapons. When a Saudi Arabian patrol advanced to accept their surrender, it was fired upon by Iraqi forces hidden in buildings on either side of the street. During the same battle, an Iraqi officer approached Coalition forces with his hands in the air, indicating his intention to surrender. When near his would-be captors, he drew a concealed pistol from his boot, fired, and was killed during the combat that followed.

Necessarily, these incidents instilled in Coalition forces a greater sense of caution once the ground offensive began. However, there does not appear to have been any centrally directed Iraqi policy to carry out acts of perfidy. The fundamental principles of the law of war applied to Coalition and Iraqi forces throughout the war. The few incidents that did occur did not have a major effect on planning or executing Coalition military operations.

WAR CRIMES

Iraqi war crimes were widespread and premeditated. They included the taking of hostages, forcible deportation, torture and murder of civilians, in violation of the GC; looting of civilian property in violation of Hague IV; looting of cultural property, in violation of the 1954 Hague Cultural Property Convention; indiscriminate attacks in the launching of Scud missiles against cities rather than specific military objectives, in violation of customary international law; violation of Hague VIII in the method of using sea mines; and unnecessary destruction in violation of Article 23(g) of the Annex to Hague IV, as evidenced by the unlawful and wanton release of oil into the Persian Gulf and the unlawful and wanton sabotage of hundreds of Kuwaiti oil wells. The latter acts also constitute a violation of Article 53, GC and a Grave Breach under Article 147, GC.

As indicated earlier, the United States, Iraq, and the members of the Coalition that liberated Kuwait are parties to several law of war treaties. Each assumes good faith in its application and enforcement. Common Article 1 of the four 1949 Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims requires that parties to those treaties "respect and ensure respect" for each of those treaties. The obligation to "respect and ensure respect" was binding upon all parties to the Persian Gulf War. It is an affirmative requirement to take all reasonable and necessary steps to bring individuals responsible for war crimes to justice. In a separate article common to the four 1949 Geneva Conventions, no nation has the authority to absolve itself or any other nation party to those treaties of any liability incurred by the commission of a Grave Breach (Article 50, GWS; Article 51, GWS (Sea); Article 130, GPW; and Article 147, GC).

The United States has one of the more comprehensive law of war programs in existence. DOD Directive 5100.77 is the foundation for the US military law of war program. It contains four policies:

- The law of war and obligations of the US Government under that law . . . [will be] observed and enforced by the US Armed Forces.
- A program, designed to prevent violations of the law of war . . . [will be] implemented by the US Armed Forces.
- Alleged violations of the law of war, whether committed by or against US or enemy personnel, . . . [will be] promptly reported, thoroughly investigated, and, where appropriate, remedied by corrective action.

- Violations of the law of war alleged to have been committed by or against allied military or civilian personnel shall be reported through appropriate military command channels for ultimate transmission to appropriate agencies of allied governments.

The Joint Staff, each military department, the unified and specified commands, and subordinate commands have issued implementing directives. It is within this framework that war crimes investigations were conducted in the course of Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm.

* * * *

Interagency meetings in late August established a process for informal coordination on war crimes issues, and ensured policy makers were kept informed. On 15 October, the President warned Iraq of its liability for war crimes. The United States was successful in incorporating into UNSC Resolution 674 (29 October) language regarding Iraq's accountability for its war crimes, in particular its potential liability for Grave Breaches of the GC, and inviting States to collect relevant information regarding Iraqi Grave Breaches and provide it to the Security Council.

* * * *

Following Iraq's breach of international peace and security by its invasion of Kuwait, the UNSC, in Resolution 667, decided to take further concrete measures "in response to Iraq's continued violation of the [UN] Charter, of resolutions of the Council and of international law." Specific Iraqi war crimes include:

- The taking of Kuwaiti nationals as hostages, and their individual and mass forcible deportation to Iraq, in violation of Articles 34, 49 and 147, GC.
- The taking of third-country nationals in Kuwait as hostages, and their individual and mass forcible deportation to Iraq, in violation of Articles 34, 49, and 147, GC.
- The taking of third-country nationals in Iraq as hostages, and their individual and mass forcible transfer within Iraq, in violation of Articles 34, 35, and 147, GC.

- Compelling Kuwaiti and other foreign nationals to serve in the armed forces of Iraq, in violations of Articles 51 and 147, GC.
- Use of Kuwaiti and third country nationals as human shields in violation of Articles 28 and 38(4), GC.
- Inhumane treatment of Kuwaiti and third country civilians, to include rape and willful killing, in violation of Articles 27, 32 and 147, GC.
- As noted previously, possible violation of the Genocide Convention, through acts committed with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national group (that is, the Kuwaiti people).
- The transfer of its own civilian population into occupied Kuwait, in violation of Article 49, GC.
- Torture and other inhumane treatment of POWs, in violation of Articles 13, 17, 22, 25, 26, 27, and 130, GPW.
- Using POWs as a shield to render certain points immune from military operations, in violation of Article 23, GPW.
- Unnecessary destruction of Kuwaiti private and public property, in violation of Article 23 (g), Annex to Hague IV.
- Pillage, in violation of Article 47, Annex to Hague IV.
- Illegal confiscation/inadequate safeguarding of Kuwaiti public property, in violation of Article 55, Annex to Hague IV, and Article 147, GC.
- Pillage of Kuwaiti civilian hospitals, in violation of Articles 55, 56, 57, and 147, GC.
- In its indiscriminate Scud missile attacks, unnecessary destruction of Saudi Arabian and Israeli property, in violation of Article 23 (g), Annex to Hague IV.
- In its intentional release of oil into the Persian Gulf and its sabotage of the Al-Burqan and Ar-Rumaylah oil fields in Kuwait, unnecessary destruction in violation of Articles 23 (g) and 55, Annex to Hague IV, and Articles 53 and 147, GC.
- In its use of drifting naval contact mines and mines lacking devices for their self-neutralization in the event of their breaking loose from their moorings, in violation of Article 1, Hague VIII.

Iraq is a party to the 1925 Geneva Protocol, which prohibits use of CW/BW. Iraq, through its reservation at the time of ratification, pledged no first use of either CW or BW. Although Iraq did not use CW/BW in this war, it violated this treaty in its 1980–88 war against Iran. During the Persian Gulf War, Iraq threatened the use of CW/BW and deployed CW. Although prepared to do so, Iraqi forces did not use either of these weapons of mass destruction during this conflict, perhaps in part due to the success of Coalition efforts to destroy Iraqi CW/BW capabilities, Iraqi C2, and Iraq's inability to move its weapons to forward sites.

Article 29, GC, states that "The Party to the conflict in whose hands protected persons may be, is responsible for the treatment accorded to them by its agents, irrespective of any individual responsibility which may be incurred." Similarly, Article 12, GPW, declares that "Prisoners of war are in the hands of the enemy Power, but not of the individuals or military units who have captured them. Irrespective of the individual responsibilities that may exist, the Detaining Power is responsible for the treatment given them." Responsibility for the treatment (and mistreatment) of civilian detainees and POW in Iraqi hands, clearly lay with the Government of Iraq and its senior officials.

Criminal responsibility for violations of the law of war rests with a commander, including the national leadership, if he (or she):

- Orders or permits the offense to be committed, or
- Knew or should have known of the offense (s), had the means to prevent or halt them, and failed to do all which he was capable of doing to prevent the offenses or their recurrence.

In addition, the invasion of Kuwait was ordered by Saddam Hussein and is a crime against peace for which he, as well as the Ba'ath Party leadership and military high command, bear direct responsibility.

The crimes committed against Kuwaiti civilians and property, and against third party nationals, are offenses for which Saddam Hussein, officials of the Ba'ath Party, and his subordinates bear direct responsibility. However, the principal responsibility rests with Saddam Hussein. Saddam Hussein's C2 of Iraqi military and security forces appeared to be total and unequivocal. There is substantial evidence that each act alleged was taken as a result of his orders, or was taken with his knowledge and approval, or was an act of which he should have known.

It is important to note that, with the possible exception of the Coalition's need to direct considerable effort toward the hunt for Iraqi Scud missiles, no Iraqi action leading to or resulting in a violation of the law of war gained Iraq any military advantages. This "negative gain from negative actions" in essence reinforces the validity of the law of war.

ENVIRONMENTAL TERRORISM

Between seven and nine million barrels of oil were set free in the Gulf by Iraqi action. Five hundred ninety oil well heads were damaged or destroyed. 508 were set on fire, and 82 were damaged so that oil was flowing freely from them.

There has been international examination of these acts. From 9 to 12 July 1991, the Government of Canada, working with the UN Secretary General, hosted a conference of international experts in Ottawa to consider Iraq's wanton acts of destruction and their law of war implications. There was general agreement the actions constituted violations of the law of war, namely:

- Article 23g of the Annex to Hague IV, which forbids the destruction of "enemy property, unless . . . imperatively demanded by the necessities of war;" and
- Article 147 of the GC, which makes a Grave Breach the "extensive destruction . . . of property, not justified by military necessity and carried out unlawfully and wantonly."

The Ottawa Conference of Experts also noted UNSC Resolution 687 (3 April 1991), which reaffirmed that Iraq was liable under international law to compensate any environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources.

Other treaties the Conference of Experts considered were the ENMOD Convention and the 1977 Protocol I, articles 35 and 55 of which contain provisions for the protection of the environment. It was the general conclusion of the experts that the former did not apply to actions of the kinds perpetrated by Iraq, while the latter was not applicable during the Persian Gulf War for reasons previously stated.

Even had Protocol I been in force, there were questions as to whether the Iraqi actions would have violated its environmental provisions. During that treaty's negotiation, there was general agreement that one of its criteria for determining whether a violation had taken place ("long term") was measured in decades. It is not clear the damage Iraq caused, while severe in a layman's sense of the term, would meet the technical-legal use of that term in Protocol I. The prohibitions on damage to the environment contained in Protocol I were not intended to prohibit battlefield damage caused by conventional operations and, in all likelihood, would not apply to Iraq's actions in the Persian Gulf War.

The Ottawa Conference of Experts did not conclude that new laws or treaties were required; rather, it was the belief of those present that respect for and enforcement of the existing law of war was of greatest importance.

* * * *

. . . Review of Iraqi actions makes it clear the oil well destruction had no military purpose, but was simply punitive destruction at its worst. . . .

CONDUCT OF NEUTRAL NATIONS

Neutrality normally is based on a nation's proclamation of neutrality or assumption of a neutral posture with respect to a particular conflict. Iran and Jordan each issued proclamations of neutrality during the Persian Gulf crisis and, as described, refrained from active participation in the war. Other nations, such as Austria and Switzerland, enjoy relative degrees of international guarantees of their neutrality.

Neutrality in the Persian Gulf War was controlled in part by the 1907 Hague V Convention; but traditional concepts of neutral rights and duties are substantially modified when, as in this case, the United Nations authorizes collective action against an aggressor nation.

It was the US position during the Persian Gulf crisis that, regardless of assertions of neutrality, all nations were obligated to avoid hindrance of Coalition operations undertaken pursuant to, or in conjunction with, UNSC decisions, and to provide whatever assistance possible. By virtue of UNSC Resolution 678 (29 November), members were requested "to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken" by nations pursuant to its authorization of use of all necessary means to uphold and implement prior resolutions. The language of UNSC Resolution 678 is consistent with Articles 2(5), 2(6), 25, and 49 of the UN Charter. Article 2(5) states:

> All Members shall give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the present Charter, and shall refrain from giving assistance to any state against which the United Nations is taking preventive or enforcement action.

Article 2(6) provides:

> The Organization shall ensure that states which are not Members of the United Nations act in accordance with these Principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 25 provides:

> The Members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the present Charter.

Article 49 declares:

> The Members of the United Nations shall join in affording mutual assistance in carrying out the measures decided upon by the Security Council.

This section focuses on the conduct of Jordan, Iran, India and traditionally neutral European nations (primarily Austria and Switzerland) during the course of the hostilities, and the effect of Coalition maritime interceptions on neutral shipping.

UNSC Resolution 661, which called for an economic embargo of Iraq, pursuant to Article 41 of the UN Charter, obligated all member nations to refrain from aiding Iraq. The declarations of "neutrality" by Jordan and Iran were subordinate to their obligation as UN members to comply with UNSC resolutions. Although Jordan's attitude toward Iraq and the Coalition appeared inconsistent with its UN obligations, mere sympathy for one belligerent does not constitute a violation of traditional neutral duties, nor even a rejection of the obligations imposed by the UNSC resolutions cited. Conduct is the issue.

There were reports that Jordan supplied materials (including munitions) to Iraq during Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm. Furnishing supplies and munitions to a belligerent traditionally has been regarded as a violation of a neutral's obligations. In this case, it would have been an even more palpable contravention of Jordan's obligations—both because of the request of UNSC Resolution 678 that all States support those seeking to uphold and implement the relevant resolutions, and because the sanctions Resolution 661 established expressly prohibited the supply of war materials to Iraq.

As the US became aware of specific allegations of Jordanian failure to comply with UNSC sanctions, they were raised with the Government of Jordan. Some were without foundation; some were substantiated. Regarding the latter, the Government of Jordan acted to stop the actions and reassured the United States those instances had been the result of individual initiative rather than as a result of government policy. Such logistical assistance as Jordan may have provided Iraq did not substantially improve Iraq's ability to conduct operations, nor did it have an appreciable effect on Coalition forces' operational capabilities.

During actual hostilities, Saudi Arabia stopped pumping oil to Jordan; Jordan obtained petroleum from Iraq, taking delivery by truck. Although not a violation of a neutral's duties under traditional principles of international law, such purchases were inconsistent with UNSC Resolutions 661 and 678. While the Jordanian importation of oil products from Iraq did not substantially affect Coalition military operations, additional steps were required by Coalition forces to protect Iraqi and Jordanian civilians from the risks of military operations. Jordan imported Iraqi oil by truck across roads in western Iraq during the day and night. These oil trucks were commingled with military and civilian vehicles. At night, some oil trucks were mistaken for mobile Scud launchers or other military vehicles; other trucks and civilian vehicles were struck incidental to attack of legitimate military targets.

This collateral damage and injury, which occurred despite previously described Coalition efforts to minimize damage to civilian objects and injury to noncombatant civilians, is attributable to Jordan's failure to ensure adherence to UNSC sanctions and to warn its nationals of the perils of travel on main supply routes in a combat zone. It also is attributable to mixing of Iraqi military vehicles and convoys with Jordanian civilian traffic traveling in Iraq. Coalition forces continued to take reasonable precautions to minimize collateral damage to civilian vehicles and incidental injury to noncombatant civilians. As a result, the ability to target Iraqi military vehicles and convoys, including mobile Scud missile launchers and support equipment, was impeded.

Iran's conduct during Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm essentially was consistent with that expected of a neutral under traditional principles of international law, including Hague V. Immediately after the Operation Desert Storm air campaign began, many Iraqi civil and military aircraft began fleeing to Iran, presumably to avoid damage or destruction by Coalition air forces. Under Article 11 of Hague V and traditional law of war principles regarding neutral rights and obligations, when belligerent military aircraft land in a nation not party to a conflict, the neutral must intern the aircraft, aircrew, and accompanying military personnel for the duration of the war. Both Switzerland and Sweden took such actions in the course of World War II, for example, with respect to Allied and German aircraft and aircrews. Some civil (and possibly some military) transport aircraft may have returned to Iraq. With respect to tactical aircraft, however, it appears Iran complied with the traditional obligations of a neutral. US forces nonetheless remained alert to the possibility of a flanking attack by Iraqi aircraft operating from Iran.

Although the situation never arose, the United States advised Iran that, in light of UNSC Resolution 678, Iran would be obligated to return downed Coalition aircraft and aircrew, rather than intern them. This illustrates the modified nature of neutrality in these circumstances. It also was the US position that entry into Iranian (or Jordanian) airspace to rescue downed aviators would be consistent with its international obligations as a belligerent, particularly in light of Resolution 678.

On several occasions, Iran protested alleged entry of its airspace by Coalition aircraft or missiles. The United States expressed regret for any damage that may have occurred within Iranian territory by virtue of inadvertent entry into Iranian airspace. The US replies did not, however, address whether Iranian expectations of airspace inviolability were affected by UNSC Resolution 678.

Although military aircraft must gain permission to enter another State's airspace (except in distress), both Switzerland and Austria routinely granted such clearance for US military transport aircraft prior to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. Early in the Persian Gulf crisis, the United States approached the Governments of Austria and Switzerland, seeking permission for overflight of US military transport aircraft carrying equipment and personnel to SWA. Despite initial misgivings, based upon their traditional neutrality, each nation assented. That there was a reluctance to grant permission early in the crisis—that is, when the United States was not involved in the hostilities, and thus not legally a belligerent—demonstrates that the view by these two States of neutrality may be more expansive than the traditional understanding of the role of neutrality in the law of war. At the same time, while Switzerland is not a UN member, its support for the US effort (through airspace clearances for US military aircraft) preceded UNSC Resolution 678.

Given their reluctance to permit pre-hostilities overflights, it was natural to expect that Switzerland and Austria would weigh very carefully any requests for overflights once offensive actions began, which each did. In light of the UNSC request that all States support the efforts of those acting to uphold and implement UNSC resolutions, each government decided that overflights by US military transport aircraft would not be inconsistent with its neutral obligations. Accordingly, permission for overflights was granted, easing logistical support for combat operations.

In contrast, overflight denial by the Government of India required Marine combat aviation assets in the Western Pacific to fly across the Pacific, the continental US, the Atlantic, and through Europe to reach SWA, substantially increasing the transit route. Air Force transport aircraft delivering ammunition to the theater of operations also were denied overflight permission.

UNSC Resolution 661 directed member states to prevent the import or transshipment of materials originating in Iraq or Kuwait, and further obligated member states to prevent imports to or exports from Iraq and Kuwait. In support of Resolution 661, on 16 August, the United States ordered its warships to intercept all ships believed to be proceeding to or from Iraq or Kuwait, and all vessels bound to or from ports of other nations carrying materials destined for or originating from Iraq or Kuwait. On 25 August, the Security Council adopted Resolution 665, which called upon UN members to enforce sanctions by means of a maritime interception operation. This contemplated intercepting so-called "neutral" shipping as well as that of non-neutral nations. These resolutions modified the obligation of neutral powers to remain impartial with regard to Coalition UN members.

The law of war regarding neutrality traditionally permits neutral nations to engage in non-war-related commerce with belligerent nations. During the Persian Gulf crisis, however, the Coalition Maritime Interception Force (MIF) was directed to prevent all goods (except medical supplies and humanitarian foodstuffs expressly authorized for Iraqi import by the UNSC Sanctions Committee) from leaving or entering Iraqi-controlled ports or Iraq, consistent with the relevant UNSC resolutions. The claim of neutral status by Iran and Jordan, or any of the traditional neutral nations, did not adversely affect the conduct of the Coalition's ability to carry out military operations against Iraq.

THE CONCEPT OF "SURRENDER" IN THE CONDUCT OF COMBAT OPERATIONS

The law of war obligates a party to a conflict to accept the surrender of enemy personnel and thereafter treat them in accordance with the provisions of the 1949 Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims. Article 23(d) of Hague IV prohibits the denial of quarter, that is the refusal to accept an enemy's surrender, while other provisions in that treaty address the use of flags of truce and capitulation.

However, there is a gap in the law of war in defining precisely when surrender takes effect or how it may be accomplished in practical terms. Surrender involves an offer by the surrendering party (a unit or an individual soldier) and an ability to accept on the part of his opponent. The latter may not refuse an offer of surrender when communicated, but that communication must be made at a time when it can be received and properly acted upon—an attempt at surrender in the midst of a hard-fought battle is neither easily communicated nor received. The issue is one of reasonableness.

A combatant force involved in an armed conflict is not obligated to offer its opponent an opportunity to surrender before carrying out an attack. To minimize Iraqi and Coalition casualties, however, the Coalition engaged in a major psychological operations campaign to encourage Iraqi soldiers to surrender before the Coalition ground offensive. Once that offensive began, the Coalition effort was to defeat Iraqi forces as quickly as possible to minimize the loss of Coalition lives. In the process, Coalition forces continued to accept legitimate Iraqi offers of surrender in a manner consistent with the law of war. The large number of Iraqi prisoners of war is evidence of Coalition compliance with its law of war obligations with regard to surrendering forces.

2. Cease-fire and Post-Gulf War Activity in Iraq

a. Cease-fire

On March 3, 1991, Iraqi and coalition military commanders reached a truce agreement on the cessation of hostilities in the Persian Gulf, including restoration of the Iraq-Kuwait border. On April 3, 1991, the UN Security Council acted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter to adopt Resolution 687, U.N. Doc. S/RES/687 (1991), which set forth the terms of a formal cease-fire. That resolution provided in part as follows.

The Security Council,

* * * *

Affirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq, and noting the intention expressed by the Member States cooperating with Kuwait under paragraph 2 of resolution 678 (1990) to bring their military presence in Iraq to an end as soon as possible consistent with paragraph 8 of resolution 686 (1991),

* * * *

Bearing in mind its objective of restoring international peace and security in the area as set out in recent resolutions of the Security Council,

* * * *

1. Affirms all thirteen resolutions [adopted between August 2, 1990 and March 2, 1991], except as expressly changed below to achieve the goals of this resolution, including a formal cease-fire;

2. Demands that Iraq and Kuwait respect the inviolability of the international boundary and the allocation of islands set out in the "Agreed Minutes Between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq Regarding the Restoration of Friendly Relations, Recognition and Related Matters", signed by them in the exercise of their sovereignty at Baghdad on 4 October 1963 and registered with the United Nations and published by the United Nations in document 7063, United Nations, Treaty Series, 1964;

* * * *

5. Requests the Secretary-General, after consulting with Iraq and Kuwait, to submit within three days to the Security Council for its approval a plan for the immediate deployment of a United Nations observer unit to monitor the Khor Abdullah and a demilitarized zone, which is hereby established . . . ; to deter violations of the boundary through its presence in and surveillance of the demilitarized zone . . . ;

6. Notes that as soon as the Secretary-General notifies the Security Council of the completion of the deployment of the United Nations observer unit, the conditions will be established for the Member States cooperating with Kuwait in accordance with resolution 678 (1990) to bring their military presence in Iraq to an end consistent with resolution 686 (1991);

* * * *

33. Declares that, upon official notification by Iraq to the Secretary-General and to the Security Council of its acceptance of the provisions above, a formal cease-fire is effective between Iraq and Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait in accordance with resolution 678 (1990);

34. Decides to remain seized of the matter and to take such further steps as may be required for the implementation of the present resolution and to secure peace and security in the area.

* * * *

Part C of the resolution addressed Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. Sections 8 and 12 are set forth below.

8. Decides that Iraq shall unconditionally accept the destruction, removal, or rendering harmless, under international supervision, of:

(a) All chemical and biological weapons and all stocks of agents and all related subsystems and components and all research, development, support and manufacturing facilities;

(b) All ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres and related major parts, and repair and production facilities;

* * * *

12. Decides that Iraq shall unconditionally agree not to acquire or develop nuclear weapons or nuclear-weapons-usable material or any subsystems or components or any research, development, support or manufacturing facilities related to the above . . . ; to accept . . . urgent on-site inspection and the destruction, removal or rendering harmless as appropriate of all items specified above . . . ;

Among other things, Part C also required Iraq to declare fully its weapons of mass destruction programs and to "unconditionally undertake not to use, develop, or construct or acquire any [weapons of mass destruction]"; provided for the establishment of a Special Commission to verify the elimination of Iraq's chemical and biological weapons (UNSCOM) and mandated that the International Atomic Energy Agency verify elimination of Iraq's nuclear weapons program; and invited Iraq to reaffirm its obligations under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, July 1, 1968, 21 U.S.T. 483, 729 U.N.T.S. 161, and the Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare, June 17, 1925, 26 U.S.T. 571, 94 L.N.T.S. 95, and to ratify the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction, Apr. 10, 1972, 26 U.S.T. 583, TIAS No. 8062.

As discussed in Chapter 8.A.9., Part E of the resolution provided for payment of damages and claims arising from Iraq's unlawful invasion of Kuwait. Under Part G, the Council required Iraq to cooperate with the International Committee of the Red Cross to locate missing Kuwaitis and third-State nationals and to cooperate with all Red Cross activities.

Part H of Resolution 687 required Iraq "to inform the Security Council that it will not commit or support any act of international terrorism or allow any organization directed towards commission of such acts to operate within its territory and to condemn unequivocally and renounce all acts, methods and practices of terrorism."

b. Security Council response to humanitarian crisis

Shortly after the cessation of hostilities in Iraq, Kurdish rebels seized control of several towns in northern Iraq. In response, Iraqi forces launched a harsh counteroffensive that included the use of napalm and chemical attacks. Fearful that Iraq would continue to use force against them, more than one million Kurdish refugees fled for Iran and Turkey. On April 5, 1991, the Security Council responded to the humanitarian crisis with Resolution 688, U.N. Doc. S/RES/688 (1991). This resolution, not adopted under Chapter VII, condemned Iraq's repression of its civilian population and, specifically, of its Kurdish population, and asked member states to assist the Kurds and other refugees in northern Iraq. The resolution also demanded that Iraq cooperate with any relief efforts. Excerpts from Resolution 688 provide as follows.

The Security Council,

* * * *

Gravely concerned by the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, including most recently in Kurdish populated areas which led to a massive flow of refugees towards and across international frontiers and to cross border incursions, which threaten international peace and security in the region,

Deeply disturbed by the magnitude of the human suffering involved,

* * * *

1. Condemns the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, including most recently in Kurdish populated areas, the consequences of which threaten international peace and security in the region;

2. Demands that Iraq, as a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region, immediately end this repression and expresses the hope in the same context that an open dialogue will take place to ensure that the human and political rights of all Iraqi citizens are respected;

3. Insists that Iraq allow immediate access by international humanitarian organizations to all those in need of assistance in all parts of Iraq and to make available all necessary facilities for their operations;

* * * *

6. Appeals to all Member States and to all humanitarian organizations to contribute to these humanitarian relief efforts;

7. Demands that Iraq cooperate with the Secretary-General to these ends;

* * * *

c. Establishment and enforcement of no-fly zones

(1) Northern no-fly zone

In response to Resolution 688, a combined task force of U.S., French, and British forces instituted Operation Provide Comfort (later known as Operation Northern Watch), based out of Incirlik Air Base in Turkey, to provide humanitarian relief in northern Iraq. The task force dropped its first supplies to Kurdish refugees on April 7, 1991. On April 10, U.S. officials advised Iraq that, to ensure that Iraqi planes would not impede the relief effort, Iraq was not to fly any planes in Iraq north of the 36th parallel. In June 1991, as Provide Comfort ground units began withdrawing from northern Iraq, the United States restated its earlier ban on Iraqi flights north of the 36th parallel. In testimony before the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East, House Foreign Affairs Committee, on June 17, 1991, Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs John H. Kelly explained that the purposes of the ban were to protect the Kurds from further aggression and to monitor Iraqi compliance with Resolutions 687 and 688, as excerpted below. 2 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 25 at 459 (June 24, 1991), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

In response to the massive outflow of refugees fleeing Saddam Hussein's repression, the United States on April 7 launched "Operation Provide Comfort" which, together with similar efforts by many of our coalition partners and allies, saved the lives of uncounted numbers of Kurdish refugees. The initial aims of "Operation Provide Comfort" have largely been met. These include supply of food and shelter to remote mountain camps, construction of transit camps, and the establishment of conditions to facilitate the safe return of refugees to their homes in northern Iraq.

We do not intend to maintain US troops in northern Iraq any longer than necessary. . . . The UN assumed administrative authority for the relief operation on June 7. We expect US forces to withdraw from Iraq as their mission in the relief operation is completed.

An extensive UN presence is mandated by UNSC Resolution 688, which requires Iraq to provide access to those in need of assistance in all parts of Iraq. Behind UNSC Resolution 688 are the enforcement provisions of Resolution 687 dealing with conditions to alleviate sanctions and reparations; the Iraqi government knows that the international community, in monitoring Iraq's compliance with UNSC Resolution 688, will take into account its treatment of Iraqi citizens.

* * * *

(2) Southern no-fly zone

In August 1992, in response to Iraq's attacks on the Shi'a population in southern Iraq, the coalition imposed a second no-fly zone over the Iraqi territory south of the 32nd parallel. A combined task force, Operation Southern Watch, was instituted to protect the zone. On August 26, President H.W. Bush made the following statement with respect to the second no-fly zone. 28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1512 (Aug. 26, 1992).

* * * *

. . . In recent weeks and months, we have heard and seen new evidence of harsh repression by the government of Saddam Hussein against the men, women, and children of Iraq. What emerges from eyewitness accounts, as well as from the detailed August 11 testimony before the UN Security Council of UN human rights envoy Max van der Stoel, is further graphic proof of Saddam's brutality.

We now know of Saddam's use of helicopters and, beginning this spring, fixed-wing aircraft to bomb and strafe civilians and villages there in the south, his execution last month of merchants in Baghdad, and his gradual tightening of the economic blockade against the people of the north. These reports are further confirmation that the Government of Iraq is failing to meet its obligations under UN Security Council Resolution 688.

This resolution, passed in April of 1991, demands that Saddam Hussein end repression of the Iraqi people. By denying access to human rights monitors and other observers, Saddam has sought to prevent the world from learning of his brutality. It is time to ensure the world does know.

And, therefore, the United States and its coalition partners have today informed the Iraqi Government that 24 hours from now, coalition aircraft, including those of the United States, will begin flying surveillance missions in southern Iraq, south of the 32 degrees north latitude, to monitor the situation there. This will provide coverage of the areas where a majority of the most significant recent violations of Resolution 688 have taken place.

The coalition is also informing Iraq's government that in order to facilitate these monitoring efforts, it is establishing a "no-fly zone" for all Iraqi fixed- and rotary-wing aircraft. This new prohibition will also go into effect in 24 hours over this same area. It will remain in effect until the coalition determines that it is no longer required.

It will be similar to the "no-fly zone" the collation imposed on northern Iraq more than 1 year ago. I want to emphasize that these actions are designed to enhance our ability to monitor developments in southern Iraq. These actions are consistent with long-standing US policy toward Iraq. We seek Iraq's compliance, not its partition.

The United States continues to support Iraq's territorial unity and bears no ill will toward its people. We continue to look forward to working with a new leadership in Baghdad, one that does not brutally suppress its own people and violate the most basic norms of humanity. Until that day, no one should doubt our readiness to respond decisively to Iraq's failure to respect the "no-fly zone."

Moreover, the United States and our coalition partners are prepared to consider additional steps should Saddam continue to violate this or other UN resolutions. . . .

d. Enforcement of no-fly zones

(1) Coalition air strike in southern Iraq

In late December 1992 and early January 1993, Iraq deployed missile batteries into the southern no-fly zone, seized military equipment in the UN-supervised neutral zone between Iraq and Kuwait, and unsuccessfully launched a missile against a U.S. F-15E aircraft. On January 6, 1993, Russia, France, the United Kingdom and the United States demanded that Iraq remove surface-to-air missile sites from below the 32nd parallel and that it stop violating the northern and southern no-fly zones. Iraq rebuffed that demarche and, on January 11 and 12, 1993, warned coalition aircraft to stop patrolling in the no-fly zones. Coalition forces responded on January 13, 1993, with an intense air strike against Iraqi fixed air-defense and mobile missiles sites in southern Iraq. See letter from President George H.W. Bush to congressional leaders, dated January 19, 1993, reporting, among other things, use of force by coalition forces against Iraq for its activities in the southern no-fly zone and interference with weapons inspectors. 29 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 67 (Jan. 25, 1993).

On the day of the strikes, UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali confirmed that Iraq continued to violate relevant UN resolutions, and that the mandate to member states in Resolution 678 to use "all necessary means to uphold and implement" the Security Council's resolutions, applied to Iraq's violation of the terms of the cease-fire set forth in Resolution 687. Secretary General Boutros-Ghali's statement at a January 4, 1993 press conference is excerpted below.

The full text of the press conference is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Question: Do you approve of yesterday's raid against Iraq?

The SECRETARY-GENERAL: The raid was carried out in accordance with a mandate from the Security Council under resolution 678 (1991), and the motive for the raid was Iraq's violations of that resolution, which concern the cease-fire. As Secretary-General of the United Nations, I can tell you that the action was taken in accordance with the resolutions of the Security Council and the Charter of the United Nations.

* * * *

. . . I have been in contact with the Iraqis for almost 12 months, in an attempt to convince them that it is in their interest to implement the resolutions of the United Nations. It is in their interest, through implementation of the resolutions of the United Nations, to bring the embargo and the situation they are in to an end. Unfortunately, I have not been successful and have not managed either with respect to the cease-fire or the other relevant resolutions, to convince the Iraqis that it is in their interest, more particularly in the interest of the Iraqi people, to implement the resolutions they have accepted.

* * * *

(2) U.S. involvement in enforcement of no-fly zones

Consistent with the Authorization of Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution, Pub. L. No. 102–1, 105 Stat. 3 (1991), discussed in A.1.b., supra, President William J. Clinton filed periodic reports with Congress providing a summary of the status of efforts to obtain Iraq's compliance with the resolutions adopted by the UN Security Council in response to Iraq's acts of aggression.

In one of the reports, submitted April 7, 1994, President Clinton reported to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate concerning the status of the no-fly zones and their continuing necessity. As excerpted below, President Clinton explained that the northern no-fly zone had so far deterred Iraq from engaging in major military operations in that region, but that Iraq continued to use land-based artillery against civilians living in the southern no-fly zone. 30 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 739 (Apr. 11, 1994).

* * * *

The "no-fly zones" over northern and southern Iraq permit the monitoring of Iraq's compliance with UNSCRs 687 and 688. Over the last 2 years, the northern no-fly zone has deterred Iraq from a major military offensive in the region. Since the no-fly zone was established in southern Iraq, Iraq's use of aircraft against its population in the region has stopped. However, Iraqi forces have responded to the no-fly zone by stepping up their use of land-based artillery to shell marsh villages.

Indeed, the ongoing military campaign against the civilian population of the marsh villages intensified during the beginning of March. A large search-and-destroy operation is taking place. The offensive includes the razing of villages and large-scale burning operations, concentrated in the triangle bounded by Al Nasiriya, Al Qurnah, and Basrah. The magnitude of the operation is causing civilian inhabitants to flee toward Iran, as well as deeper into the marshes toward the outskirts of southern Iraqi cities.

In northern Iraq, in the vicinity of Mosul, there is both Iraqi troop movement and some increase in the number of troops. Iraqi intentions are not clear and we are watching this situation closely.

The Special Rapporteur of the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, Max van der Stoel, presented a new report in February 1994 on the human rights situation in Iraq describing the Iraqi military's continuing repression against its civilian populations in the marshes. The Special Rapporteur asserts that the Government of Iraq has engaged in war crimes and crimes against humanity, and may have committed violations of the 1948 Genocide Convention. Regarding the Kurds, the Special Rapporteur has judged that the extent and gravity of reported violations places the survival of Kurds in jeopardy. The Special Rapporteur judged that there are essentially no freedoms of opinion, expression, or association in Iraq. Torture is widespread in Iraq and results from a system of state-terror successfully directed at subduing the population. . . .

* * * *

On October 27, 1994, President Clinton reported that, earlier that month, Iraq had relocated a number of troops to southern Iraq, approximately twenty kilometers from the border with Kuwait. In addition, Iraq had oriented its artillery assets toward Kuwait. As indicated in the President's report, excerpted below, on October 15, 1994, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 949, U.N. Doc. S/RES/949 (1994), demanding that Iraq withdraw its relocated troops and not utilize its forces to threaten its neighbors or UN operations or to redeploy or enhance its position in southern Iraq. President Clinton ordered additional U.S. deployments to the Persian Gulf, after which the Iraqi troops relocated to their original positions. 30 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2173 (Oct. 31, 1994).

* * * *

Iraq's recent behavior with respect to Kuwait has shown the world that it has not changed its threatening ways and cannot be trusted. In early October 1994, elements of the Hammurabi Division of the elite Iraqi Republican Guard were detected relocating to positions at Shaihah airfield in southern Iraq. This was the southernmost deployment of Republican Guard forces since the 1990–1991 Gulf War. By October 8, the 15th Mechanized Brigade of the Hammurabi Division had deployed to approximately 20 kilometers from the Kuwait border. Its artillery assets were oriented south toward Kuwait. At the same time, the Al Nida Division of the Republican Guard began moving from the Mosul rail yard and the Baghdad area to positions in southern Iraq. All these units were fully equipped with ammunition, food, and fuel, leading us to conclude that this was no mere exercise.

By October 8, these troop movements, combined with forces already in southern Iraq, brought Iraqi troop strength in southern Iraq to 64,000, organized into 8 divisions. By October 9, indications were present that logistic sites were being established in the vicinity of these deployments. Iraqi movements to the south continued, and by October 11, it was assessed that Iraq would be capable of launching an attack by October 13.

This provocation required a strong response. Accordingly, on October 8, 1994, I ordered the immediate deployment of additional U.S. military forces to the Persian Gulf. These deployments included the USS George Washington Carrier Battle Group and its accompanying cruise missile ships, a U.S. Marine Corps Expeditionary Unit, a U.S. Army Mechanized Task Force, and personnel to operate two additional Patriot missile batteries. On October 10, I further ordered the deployment of over 500 U.S. Air Force and Marine Corps combat and supporting aircraft to the region.

In response to these measures, the Iraqi government began ordering its forces to move to positions in the rear, around Nasariya and Qalat Salih, north of Basra, but still within several hours of the Kuwaiti border. Had these forces remained deployed around Nasariya, it would have constituted a significant enhancement of Iraq's capabilities in southern Iraq. By October 15, there were clear indications that most Iraqi forces that had been moved south since late September were being redeployed to their original locations. On October 15, 1994, the international community also demonstrated its strong resolve regarding this latest provocation when it passed unanimously U.N. Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 949, which condemned Iraq's provocative behavior and demanded that Iraq immediately withdraw the units deployed in the south to their original positions, not utilize its forces to threaten its neighbors or U.N. operations, not redeploy or enhance its military capacity in southern Iraq, and cooperate fully with the U.N. Special Commission (UNSCOM).

* * * *

On November 4, 1996, President Clinton noted that, in response to Saddam Hussein's recent military action in northern Iraq, the United States had expanded the southern no-fly zone from 32 degrees to 33 degrees north latitude, and it struck against certain sites and facilities south of the 33rd parallel to ensure the safety of U.S. forces enforcing the now expanded no-fly zone. In his report, excerpted below, President Clinton also noted that Turkey would have to determine before December 1996 whether to renew permission for the combined task force to use Incirlik as a base for the northern operation (Operation Provide Comfort). 32 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2339 (Nov. 11, 1996).

Saddam Hussein's attack on Irbil in late August and his continuing efforts to manipulate local rivalries in northern Iraq to his advantage, provide new evidence that he remains a threat to his own people, to his neighbors, and to the peace of the region. As I detailed in my last report, the United States responded to Saddam's military action in the north by expanding the Southern no-fly zone from 32 degrees to 33 degrees north latitude. The U.S. response included strikes against surface-to-air missile sites, command and control centers, and air defense control facilities south of the 33rd parallel in order to help ensure the safety of our forces enforcing the expanded no-fly zone.

* * * *

United Nations Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 949, adopted in October 1994, demands that Iraq not threaten its neighbors or UN operations in Iraq and that it not redeploy or enhance its military capacity in southern Iraq. In view of Saddam's reinforced record of unreliability, it is prudent to retain a significant U.S. force presence in the region in order to maintain the capability to respond rapidly to possible Iraqi aggression or threats against its neighbors.

* * * *

On May 8, 1997, President Clinton reported that Iraq had disregarded the southern no-fly zone to transport Iraqi pilgrims from their homes near the Iraqi-Saudi border to religious sites in Iraq, and back. Because of the religious sensitivity of the situation, the non-threatening nature of the flights, and the potential danger to innocent civilians, the coalition agreed not to take any military action in response. 33 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 687 (May 12, 1997).

On November 26, 1997, President Clinton reported that Iraq had been intentionally violating the no-fly zones to test the extent to which the coalition would enforce them and described the coalition response, as excerpted below. 33 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1931 (Dec. 8, 1997).

* * * *

Regarding military operations, the United States and its coalition partners continue to enforce the no-fly zones over Iraq under Operation Northern Watch and Operation Southern Watch. We have detected myriad intentional Iraqi violations of both no-fly zones. While these incidents (Iraqi violations of the no-fly zones) started several hours after an Iranian air raid on terrorist bases inside Iraq, it was clear that Iraq's purpose was to try and test the coalition to see how far it could go in violating the ban on flights in these regions. A maximum effort by Operation Southern Watch forces complemented by early arrival in theater of the USS NIMITZ battle group, dramatically reduced violations in the southern no-fly zone. An increase in the number of support aircraft participating in Northern Watch allowed increased operating capacity that in turn significantly reduced the number of violations in the north. We have repeatedly made clear to the Government of Iraq and to all other relevant parties that the United States and its partners will continue to enforce both no-fly zones, and that we reserve the right to respond appropriately and decisively to any Iraqi provocations.

* * * *

United Nations Security Council Resolution 949 adopted in October 1994, demands that Iraq not use its military or any other forces to threaten its neighbors or U.N. operations in Iraq and that it not redeploy troops or enhance its military capacity in southern Iraq. In view of Saddam's accumulating record of unreliability, it is prudent to retain a significant U.S. force presence in the region in order to deter Iraq and maintain the capability to respond rapidly to possible Iraqi aggression or threats against its neighbors.

* * * *

On May 19, 1999, President Clinton reported that the United States and coalition partners enforcing the no-fly zones had repeatedly been subject to anti-aircraft firings and radar illuminations and that he had authorized aircrews to respond directly and forcibly in self defense. Excerpts follow. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 945 (May 24, 1999).

---

* * * *

The United States and coalition partners enforcing the no-fly zones over Iraq under Operations Northern Watch and Southern Watch continue to be subject to multiple anti-aircraft artillery firings and radar illuminations, and have faced more than 35 surface-to-air missile attacks. Additionally, since the conclusion of Desert Fox*, Iraqi aircraft have committed over 120 no-fly zone violations.

In response to Iraq's repeated no-fly-zone violations and attacks on our aircraft, I have authorized our aircrews to respond directly and forcibly to the increased Iraqi threat. United States and coalition forces are fully prepared and authorized to defend themselves against any Iraqi threat while carrying out their no-fly zone enforcement mission and have, when circumstances warranted, engaged various components of the Iraqi integrated air defense system. As a consequence, the Iraqi air defense system has been degraded substantially since December 1998.

e. 1993 strikes in response to Iraq's attempted assassination of former President Bush

In the spring of 1993 the United States learned that the Government of Iraq had attempted to assassinate former President George H.W. Bush in April 1993 when he was visiting Kuwait City. In June 1993 President William J. Clinton responded to that attempted assassination by directing missile strikes on the principal command and control complex of the Iraqi Intelligence Service, which was directly implicated in the attempted assassination. In a June 28, 1993, report from President Clinton to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate advising them of the strikes, the President explained:

> I ordered this military response only after I considered the results of a thorough and independent investigation by U.S. intelligence and law enforcement agencies. The reports by Attorney General Reno and Director of Central Intelligence Woolsey provided compelling evidence that the operation that threatened the life of President Bush in Kuwait City in April was directed and pursued by the Iraqi Intelligence Service and that the Government of Iraq bore direct responsibility for this effort.

29 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1183 (July 5, 1993).

The President's report indicated that the United States acted in self defense in accordance with Article 51 of the UN Charter. The United States had reported its action under Article 51 in a letter to the Security Council dated June 26, 1993, set forth below. U.N. Doc. S/26003 (1993).

In accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter, I wish, on behalf of my Government, to report that the United States has exercised its right of self-defense by responding to the Government of Iraq's unlawful attempt to murder the former Chief Executive of the United States Government, President George Bush, and to its continuing threat to United States nationals.

The Government of Iraq bears direct responsibility for the failed attempt to assassinate the former President of the United States for actions he took while he was President. The United States has reached this conclusion based on clear and compelling evidence of the Government of Iraq's actions in the attempted murder.

Based on the pattern of the Government of Iraq's behaviour, including the disregard for international law and Security Council resolutions, the United States has concluded that there is no reasonable prospect that new diplomatic initiatives or economic measures can influence the current Government of Iraq to cease planning future attacks against the United States. Accordingly, as a last resort, the United States has decided that it is necessary to respond to the attempted attack and the threat of further attacks by striking at an Iraqi military and intelligence target that is involved in such attacks. The United States has chosen its target carefully so as to minimize risks of collateral damage to civilians.

It is the sincere hope of the United States Government that such limited and proportionate action may frustrate future unlawful actions on the part of the Government of Iraq and discourage or preempt such activities.

f. 1998 strikes in response to Iraq's failure to comply with weapons inspections obligations under UN resolutions

The cease-fire established by UN Security Council Resolution 687 called for the elimination, under international supervision, of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles with a range of greater than 150 kilometers, and for the elimination of related items and production facilities. Resolution 687 also called for measures to ensure that Iraq did not resume the acquisition and production of prohibited weapons. The United Nations Special Commission ("UNSCOM") was established to implement the non-nuclear provisions of Resolution 687 and to assist the International Atomic Energy Agency in the nuclear areas. The terms of UNSCOM's mandate are set forth in paragraphs 7 to 13 of Resolution 687.

On April 3, 1998, President Clinton reported to Congress, in accordance with the Authorization of Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution, Pub. L. No. 102–1, 105 Stat. 3 (1991), discussed in A.1.b. supra, that Iraq had not been cooperating with UNSCOM weapons inspectors until it signed a memorandum of understanding ("MOU") between the Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister and U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan. That MOU, endorsed by the Security Council in Resolution 1154, U.N. Doc. S/RES/1154 (1998), reiterated Iraq's commitment to allow UNSCOM unconditional access to designated sites. President Clinton also reported that he had increased the U.S. presence in the region and that such increase would remain in effect until Iraq's compliance with the terms of the MOU could be assured. Finally, President Clinton explained that the U.S. and its coalition partners engaged in Iraq had made clear that, although they sought a diplomatic resolution to Iraq's violation of its commitments, the coalition would resort to military force, if necessary. 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 569 (Apr. 13, 1998).

For much of the period covered by this report, Iraq was engaged in a serious challenge to the authority of the UNSC and the will of the international community. As documented in my last report, Iraq refused to allow U.N. Special Commission (UNSCOM) inspectors to carry out their work at a number of sites last December; Iraq's refusal to cooperate in spite of repeated warnings continued until the signing of the Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) between U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan and Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz on February 23, and the endorsement of this agreement by the UNSC on March 2 when it adopted UNSCR 1154. Both the MOU and UNSCR 1154 reiterate Iraq's commitment to provide immediate, unconditional, and unrestricted access to UNSCOM and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). UNSCR 1154 also stresses that any further Iraqi violation of the relevant UNSC resolutions would result in the severest consequences for Iraq. Iraq's commitment is now in the process of being tested.

* * * *

Throughout the crisis created by Iraq's refusal to cooperate with U.N. weapons inspectors, the objective of my Administration was to achieve effective inspections, preferably through a diplomatic solution. Our vigorous diplomatic efforts were backed by the credible threat to use force, if necessary. . . .

* * * *

Until Iraqi intent to comply with the MOU is verified, it will be necessary to maintain our current augmented force posture in the region. The ongoing inspections of the so-called "presidential sites" mark the next critical phase in the UNSCOM inspections process. Once Iraqi compliance is assured, we will consider whether we can reduce our present force posture.

* * * *

On August 5, 1998, Iraq unilaterally decided to suspend its cooperation with UNSCOM and the International Atomic Energy Agency ("IAEA"). On September 9, the UN Security Council acted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter to adopt unanimously Resolution 1194, U.N. Doc. S/RES/1194 (1998). The resolution condemned Iraq's decision to suspend cooperation as a "totally unacceptable contravention of its obligations," and demanded that Iraq resume cooperation. On October 31, Iraq announced that it was ceasing all cooperation with UNSCOM.

On November 14, 1998, Iraq committed itself to comply unconditionally with the Security Council's resolutions. It withdrew its objectionable conditions and permitted the resumption of all activities of the weapons inspectors. Despite Iraq's apparent decision to cooperate with UNSCOM and IAEA, it did not do so. After exhausting all diplomatic efforts to resolve the problem of Iraq's failure to cooperate, the United States and Great Britain resorted to the use of force.

On December 16, 1998, coalition forces struck military and strategic targets in Iraq for the purpose of degrading Iraq's ability to reconstitute and deliver its weapons of mass destruction. In a letter of the same date, the United States reported to the Security Council that the forces were "acting under the authority provided by the resolutions of the Security Council." U.N. Doc. S/1998/1181. The letter to the Security Council is excerpted below.

Coalition forces have begun operations against military targets in Iraq. Our ongoing military action is substantial. We are attacking Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programmes and its ability to threaten its neighbours.

Coalition forces are acting under the authority provided by the resolutions of the Security Council. This action is a necessary and proportionate response to the continued refusal of the Iraqi Government to comply with the resolutions of the Security Council and the threat to international peace and security which Iraq's non-compliance represents. In carrying out this action, our forces have taken appropriate measures to defend themselves from any interference by Iraq, and have made every possible effort to avoid civilian casualties and collateral damage.

As the Council is well aware, this resort to military force was undertaken only when it became evident that diplomacy had been exhausted. The coalition acted out of necessity, and the Government of Iraq bears full responsibility for the consequences of this military operation. We did not act precipitately. On the contrary, the United States of America has worked with its partners in the Security Council over the past months in a sincere and sustained effort to bring about a peaceful resolution of the confrontation created by Iraq. For reasons best known to Saddam Hussein, Iraq chose to reject that effort.

Following the liberation of Kuwait from Iraqi occupation in 1991, the Security Council, in its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, mandated a ceasefire; but it also imposed a number of essential conditions on Iraq, including the destruction of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction and acceptance by Iraq of United Nations inspections.

In its resolutions including, in addition to resolution 687 (1991), resolutions 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991, 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991, 1154 (1998) of 2 March 1998, 1194 (1998) of 9 September 1998, 1205 (1998) of 5 November 1998 and others—the Council has elaborated and reiterated those conditions, including "full, final and complete disclosure" of all aspects of its programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction, and "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access" for the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) "to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect." Iraqi compliance with all these requirements is a fundamental element of international peace and security in the region.

Nevertheless, Iraq has repeatedly taken actions which constitute flagrant, material breaches of these provisions. On a number of occasions, the Council has affirmed that similar Iraqi actions constituted such breaches, as well as a threat to international peace and security. In our view, the Council need not state these conclusions on each occasion.

Just one month ago, on 14 November 1998, the Government of Iraq committed itself to providing full and unconditional cooperation with UNSCOM, as required by Security Council resolutions. The Iraqi Government described it as a "clear and unconditional decision by the Iraqi Government to resume cooperation with UNSCOM and IAEA." Iraq stated that the weapons inspectors could "immediately resume all their activities according to the relevant resolutions of the Security Council." It must be noted that Iraq rescinded its restrictions on UNSCOM and IAEA and offered those assurances only in the face of a credible threat of force. Military force was not employed at that time, however, because the United States, along with other members of the Security Council, sought a peaceful resolution to the situation created by Iraq and opted to go the extra mile to test Iraqi intentions.

In that event, Iraq failed to fulfill its assurances. As the UNSCOM report of 15 December 1998 makes clear, Iraq failed to provide the full cooperation it promised on 14 November, and thus left UNSCOM unable to conduct the substantive disarmament work mandated to it by the Security Council.

By refusing to make available documents and information requested by UNSCOM within the scope of its mandate, by imposing new restrictions on the weapons inspectors and by repeatedly denying access to facilities which UNSCOM wished to inspect, Iraq, once again, acted in flagrant and material breach of Security Council resolution 687 (1991).

Following Iraq's repeated, flagrant and material breaches of its obligations under Security Council resolutions . . . in addition to its failure to fulfill its own commitments, the coalition today exercised the authority given by the Security Council in its resolution 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990 for Member States to employ all necessary means to secure Iraqi compliance with the Council's resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area. Any Iraqi attempt to attack coalition forces or to initiate aggressive action against a neighbouring State will be met with a swift response by the coalition.

Also on December 16, Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright made the following remarks, released by the Office of the Spokesman, U.S. Department of State.

* * * *

. . . I want to emphasize the extent to which the United States sought a diplomatic outcome to the confrontation between Iraq and the UN Security Council. Show-downs last fall, last winter and last month were all concluded without air strikes, after Iraq promised to cooperate fully with UN weapons inspectors.

Throughout, we worked hard to maintain Security Council unity by allowing time and then more time for Iraq to live up to those promises. . . .

Although we were criticized by some for persevering in our diplomatic efforts for so long, the truth is that these efforts were both necessary and successful. They helped to preserve Council unity and isolate Iraq internationally. They were not successful, however, in gaining full Iraqi compliance with its obligations. This is not because the requests the Security Council made were unreasonable or unachievable or unjustified, but because compliance would have required something Saddam Hussein is simply unwilling to do, which is to come fully clean about his weapons of mass destruction programs.

US policy is based on principles established by the Security Council in the aftermath of the Gulf War more than seven and a half years ago. These principles have been reaffirmed on literally dozens of occasions, and they are designed to ensure that Saddam Hussein's Iraq does not again threaten its neighbors or the world with weapons of mass destruction. This is a deadly serious objective, given Saddam's demonstrated willingness to use such weapons both against foreign adversaries and his own people.

Saddam's capacity to develop and brandish such armaments poses a threat to international security and peace that cannot be ignored. One way or another, it must be countered; and degrading that capacity is the purpose of the strikes on military targets in Iraq that the President has ordered today.

* * * *

The joint U.S. and British operation against Iraq was completed in seventy hours. On December 19, after completion of the operation, President Clinton made an address to the nation, excerpted below. 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2516 (Dec. 28, 1998).

Our objectives in this military action were clear: to degrade Saddam's weapons of mass destruction program and related delivery systems, as well as his capacity to attack his neighbors. It will take some time to make a detailed assessment of our operation, but based on the briefing I've just received, I am confident we have achieved our mission. We have inflicted significant damage on Saddam's weapons of mass destruction programs, on the command structures that direct and protect that capability, and on his military and security infrastructure. . . .

So long as Saddam remains in power, he will remain a threat to his people, his region, and the world. With our allies, we must pursue a strategy to contain him and to constrain his weapons of mass destruction program, while working toward the day Iraq has a government willing to live at peace with its people and with its neighbors.

Let me describe the elements of that strategy going forward. First, we will maintain a strong military presence in the area, and we will remain ready to use it if Saddam tries to rebuild his weapons of mass destruction, strikes out at his neighbors, challenges allied aircraft, or moves against the Kurds. We also will continue to enforce no-fly zones in the north and from the southern suburbs of Baghdad to the Kuwaiti border.

Second, we will sustain what have been among the most extensive sanctions in U.N. history. To date, they have cost Saddam more than $120 billion, resources that otherwise would have gone toward rebuilding his military. At the same time, we will support a continuation of the oil-for-food program, which generates more than $10 billion a year for food, medicine, and other critical humanitarian supplies for the Iraqi people. We will insist that Iraq's oil be used for food, not tanks.

Third, we would welcome the return of UNSCOM and the International Atomic Energy Agency back into Iraq to pursue their mandate from the United Nations—provided that Iraq first takes concrete, affirmative, and demonstrable actions to show that it will fully cooperate with the inspectors. But if UNSCOM is not allowed to resume its work on a regular basis, we will remain vigilant and prepared to use force if we see that Iraq is rebuilding its weapons programs.

Now, over the long-term, the best way to end the threat that Saddam poses to his own people in the region is for Iraq to have a different government. We will intensify our engagement with the Iraqi opposition groups, prudently and effectively. We will work with Radio Free Iraq to help news and information flow freely to the country. And we will stand ready to help a new leadership in Baghdad that abides by its international commitments and respects the rights of its own people. We hope it will return Iraq to its rightful place in the community of nations.

3. Strikes in Sudan and Afghanistan in Response to Embassy Bombings

On August 7, 1998, bombs exploded at the U.S. embassies in Nairobi, Kenya and Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, killing nearly 300 people, including twelve Americans. Based on evidence of the involvement of Osama bin Laden, a Saudi expatriate who lived in Afghanistan and had developed an extensive terrorist network, on August 20, 1998, the United States launched Tomahawk missiles against terrorist training camps in Afghanistan and against a Sudanese pharmaceutical plant that appeared to be manufacturing chemical weapons.

President Clinton announced the strikes, explaining:

> I ordered this action for four reasons: First, because we have convincing evidence these groups played the key role in the Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania; second, because these groups have executed terrorist attacks against Americans in the past; third, because we have compelling information that they were planning additional terrorist attacks against our citizens and others with the inevitable collateral casualties we saw so tragically in Africa; and fourth, because they are seeking to acquire chemical weapons and other dangerous weapons.
>
> Terrorists must have no doubt that, in the face of their threats, America will protect its citizens and will continue to lead the world's fight for peace, freedom, and security. . . .

Remarks in Martha's Vineyard, Massachusetts, on Military Action Against Terrorist Sites in Afghanistan and Sudan, 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1642 (Aug. 24, 1998).

By letter of August 20, the Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations, Ambassador Bill Richardson, informed the President of the Security Council that the United States had acted in self-defense, in accordance with Article 51 of the UN Charter, as set forth below. UN Doc. S/1998/780 (1998).

---

In accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, I wish, on behalf of my Government, to report that the United States of America has exercised its right of self-defence in responding to a series of armed attacks against United States embassies and United States nationals.

My Government has obtained convincing information from a variety of reliable sources that the organization of Usama Bin Ladin is responsible for the devastating bombings on 7 August 1998 of the United States embassies in Nairobi and Dar Es Salaam. Those attacks resulted in the deaths of 12 American nationals and over 250 other persons, as well as numerous serious injuries and heavy property damage. The Bin Ladin organization maintains an extensive network of camps, arsenals and training and supply facilities in Afghanistan, and support facilities in Sudan, which have been and are being used to mount terrorist attacks against American targets. These facilities include an installation at which chemical weapons have been produced.

In response to these terrorist attacks, and to prevent and deter their continuation, United States armed forces today struck at a series of camps and installations used by the Bin Ladin organization to support terrorist actions against the United States and other countries. In particular, United States forces struck a facility being used to produce chemical weapons in the Sudan and terrorist training and basing camps in Afghanistan.

These attacks were carried out only after repeated efforts to convince the Government of the Sudan and the Taliban regime in Afghanistan to shut these terrorist activities down and to cease their cooperation with the Bin Ladin organization. That organization has issued a series of blatant warnings that "strikes will continue from everywhere" against American targets, and we have convincing evidence that further such attacks were in preparation from these same terrorist facilities. The United States, therefore, had no choice but to use armed force to prevent these attacks from continuing.

In doing so, the United States has acted pursuant to the right of self-defence confirmed by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations. The targets struck, and the timing and method of attack used, were carefully designed to minimize risks of collateral damage to civilians and to comply with international law, including the rules of necessity and proportionality.

It is the sincere hope of the United States Government that these limited actions will deter and prevent the repetition of unlawful terrorist attacks on the United States and other countries. We call upon all nations to take the steps necessary to bring such indiscriminate terrorism to an end.

I ask that you circulate the text of the present letter as a document of the Security Council.

On the same date, Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright and National Security Advisor Samuel Berger held a press briefing concerning the strikes. Among other things, Mr. Berger stated:

> We have been concerned about the threat that Osama bin Laden and his network posed to U.S. interests for quite some time. In 1996, we pressured the Sudanese government to disassociate themselves from bin Laden, and for some time we have sought to have him expelled from Afghanistan. . . . These efforts were unsuccessful.
>
> In May, as you know, the bin Laden group issued a so-called fatwah against the United States, indicating that they had targeted the United States for a systematic campaign of terror. That obviously increased our sense of attention and focus on this group.

See http://secretary.state.gov/www/statements/1998/980820.html.

4. Intervention in the Former Yugoslavia

a. Bosnia-Herzegovina

Beginning in April 1993, the United States provided support for the United Nations and NATO efforts to resolve the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, discussed in Chapter 17.A.1. and B.2. In a letter of April 13, 1993, reporting this action to Congress, President Clinton explained that the UN Security Council had established a ban on unauthorized military flights over Bosnia-Herzegovina in Resolution 781 (1992). In response to violations of that resolution, the Security Council decided, in Resolution 816 (1993), to extend the ban to all unauthorized flights over Bosnia-Herzegovina; NATO agreed to provide NATO air enforcement for the no-fly zone. The President explained:

> The United States actively supported these decisions. At my direction, the Joint Chiefs of Staff sent an execute order to all U.S. forces participating in the NATO force, for the conduct of phased air operations to prevent flights not authorized by the United Nations over Bosnia-Herzegovina. . . .

See 1993 Pub. Papers vol. I at 429 (Apr. 13, 1993).

In a subsequent report, September 1, 1995, President Clinton reported U.S. participation in the commencement of two weeks of NATO air strikes, excerpted below. 1995 Pub. Papers vol. II at 1279 (Sept. 1, 1995).

. . . I am today reporting on the use of U.S. combat and support aircraft commencing on August 29, 1995 (EDT), in a series of NATO air strikes against Bosnian Serb Army (BSA) forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina that were threatening the U.N.-declared safe areas of Sarajevo, Tuzla, and Gorazde. The NATO air strikes were launched following an August 28, 1995, BSA mortar attack on Sarajevo that killed 37 people and injured over 80. This tragic and inexcusable act was the latest in a series of BSA attacks on unarmed civilians in the safe areas.

* * * *

. . . Under United Nations Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 824 of May 6, 1993, certain portions of Bosnia-Herzegovina, including the city of Sarajevo, were established as safe areas that should be "free from armed attacks and from any other hostile act." Additionally, under UNSCR 836 of June 4, 1993, member states and regional organizations are authorized, in close coordination with the Untied Nations, to take all necessary measures, through the use of air power, to support the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) in the performance of its mandate related to the safe areas. This mandate includes deterring attacks and replying to bombardments on the safe areas. Consistent with these and other resolutions, and in light of the recent events described above, the United Nations requested and NATO initiated air strikes on August 29, 1995. The air strikes were fully coordinated with the simultaneous artillery attacks by the Rapid Reaction Force.

* * * *

I authorized these actions in conjunction with our NATO allies to implement the relevant U.N. Security Council resolutions and NATO decisions. As I have reported in the past and as our current diplomatic actions clearly indicate, our efforts in the former Yugoslavia are intended to assist the parties to reach a negotiated settlement to the conflict. . . .

* * * *

On September 18, 1995, President Clinton announced that "the Bosnian Serbs had agreed to comply with a condition set by NATO and the United Nations for ending the NATO air strikes" and that the air operations had therefore been suspended. 6 Dep't State Dispatch No. 38 at 692 (Sept. 18, 1995), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html. The President explained:

> . . . [T]he Bosnian Serbs have stated that they will end all offensive operations within the Sarajevo exclusion zone, withdraw their heavy weapons from the zone within six days, and allow road and air access to Sarajevo within 24 hours. NATO and the UN, therefore, have suspended air operations temporarily and will carefully monitor the Serb compliance with these commitments.
>
> * * * *
> Now the Bosnian Serbs must carry out their commitments and then turn their energies toward a > political settlement that will end this terrible conflict for good. They should have no doubt that NATO will resume the air strikes if they fail to keep their com-mitments-if they strike again at Sarajevo or the other safe areas.

b. Kosovo

(1) NATO military intervention

Kosovo was an autonomous region within Serbia until 1989, when Serbian leader Slobodan Milosevic brought the region under Belgrade's direct control. In early 1998, open conflict broke out between the government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("FRY") and the Kosovar Albanians. The conflict resulted in the deaths of approximately 1,500 Kosovar Albanians and forced approximately 400,000 people from their homes.

On September 23, 1998, the United Nations Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, adopted Resolution 1199. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1199 (1998). In that resolution, the Security Council affirmed that the deterioration of the situation in Kosovo constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. The Security Council expressed deep concern about the FRY's excessive use of force. The Security Council demanded, inter alia, a cease fire by all parties to the conflict and that the "authorities of the [FRY] . . . take immediate steps to improve the humanitarian situation and to avert the impending humanitarian catastrophe; . . . cease all action by the security forces affecting the civilian population and order the withdrawal of security units used for civilian repression; . . . [and] facilitate . . . the safe return of refugees and displaced persons to their homes." On October 24, 1998, the United Nations Security Council, again acting under Chapter VII, adopted Resolution 1203 reiterating its demand that the FRY "comply fully and swiftly" with Resolution 1199. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1203 (1998). The Security Council also endorsed two missions that had been established to observe Serbia's compliance with Resolution 1199.

Despite international efforts to resolve the conflict, fighting in Kosovo again flared up in the beginning of 1999. At that point, renewed international efforts were made to bring about a peaceful resolution to the conflict. In February 1999, the Contact Group, consisting of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Russia and Italy, brought the FRY and the Kosovar Albanians together in Rambouillet, near Paris. Negotiations took place from February 6 to February 23, and again from March 15 to March 18. At the end of the conference, the FRY delegation continued to refuse the terms of a settlement proposed by the Contact Group. Immediately thereafter, Serbian forces intensified their operations against the ethnic Albanians in Kosovo.

On March 24, the United States and its NATO allies commenced air strikes against the FRY. On March 23, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs James P. Rubin had responded to a question from the press concerning the justification for undertaking such air strikes:

> There has been extensive consideration of this issue with our NATO allies. We and our allies have looked to numerous factors in making our judgment, including—there have been serious and widespread violations of international law; there has been the use of excessive and indiscriminate force; Yugoslavia has failed to comply with OSCE and NATO agreements, with UN Security Council resolutions, with its obligation to cooperate with the War Crimes Tribunal, as well as with numerous other commitments.
> With Belgrade giving every indication of conducting a new offensive against Kosovar Albanians, we face the prospect of a new explosion if the international community doesn't take preventive action. It could be an explosion that exceeds the suffering of last fall. In short, Serbia's actions constitute a threat to the region, > particularly Albania and Macedonia and potentially NATO allies Greece and Turkey.

>
> On the basis of such considerations, we and our NATO allies believe there are legitimate grounds to threaten and, if necessary, use force. . . .

State Dept. Noon Briefing, James P. Rubin (Mar. 23, 1999).

Also on March 24, Chargé d'Affaires of the U.S. Mission to the United Nations A. Peter Burleigh delivered the following statement to the Security Council on the situation in Kosovo, provided in full below. UN Doc. S/PV.3988 (1999).

The current situation in Kosovo is of grave concern to all of us. We and our allies have begun military action only with the greatest reluctance. But we believe that such action is necessary to respond to Belgrade's brutal persecution of Kosovar Albanians, violations of international law, excessive and indiscriminate use of force, refusal to negotiate to resolve the issue peacefully, and recent military buildup in Kosovo, all of which foreshadow a humanitarian catastrophe of immense proportions.

We have begun today's action to avert this humanitarian catastrophe and to deter further aggression and repression in Kosovo. Serb forces numbering 40,000 are now in action in and around Kosovo. 30,000 Kosovars have fled their homes just since March 19. As a result of Serb action in the last five weeks, there are more than 60,000 new refugees and displaced persons. The total number of displaced persons is approaching a quarter of a million.

The continuing offensive by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia is generating refugees and creating pressure on neighboring countries, threatening the stability of the region. Repressive Serb action in Kosovo has already resulted in cross-border activity in Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Recent actions by Belgrade also constitute a threat to the safety of international observers and humanitarian workers in Kosovo.

Security Council resolutions 1199 and 1203 recognized that the situation in Kosovo constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region and invoked Chapter VII of the Charter. In Security Council resolution 1199, the Security Council demanded that Serbian forces take immediate steps to improve the humanitarian situation and avert the impending humanitarian catastrophe.

In October of 1998, Belgrade entered into agreements and understandings with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) to verify its compliance with Security Council demands, particularly on reduction of security forces, cooperation with international observers, cooperation with humanitarian relief agencies, and negotiations on a political settlement for substantial autonomy. Belgrade has refused to comply.

Belgrade's actions also violate its commitments under the Helsinki Final Act, as well as its obligations under the international law of human rights. Belgrade's actions in Kosovo cannot be dismissed as an internal matter.

For months, Serb actions have led to escalating explosions of violence. It is imperative that the international community take quick measures to avoid humanitarian suffering and widespread destruction which could exceed that of the 1998 offensive.

Mr. President, I reiterate that we have initiated action today with the greatest reluctance. Our preference has been to achieve our objectives in the Balkans through peaceful means. Since fighting erupted in February 1998, we have been actively engaged in seeking resolution of the conflict through diplomacy under the auspices of the Contact Group backed by NATO. These efforts led to talks in Rambouillet and Paris, which produced a fair, just, and balanced agreement. The Kosovar Albanians signed the agreement, but Belgrade rejected all efforts to achieve a peaceful solution.

We are mindful that violations of the cease-fire and provocations by the Kosovo Liberation Army have also contributed to this situation. However, it is Belgrade's systematic policy of undermining last October's agreements and thwarting all diplomatic efforts to resolve the situation which have prevented a peaceful solution and led us to today's action.

In this context, we believe that action by NATO is justified and necessary to stop the violence and prevent an even greater humanitarian disaster. As President Clinton said today, "... we and our allies have a chance to leave our children a Europe that is free, peaceful, and stable. But we must—we must—act now to do that."

In a statement to the nation on March 24, 1999, President Clinton set forth a brief history of the conflict and explained the reasons for NATO's intervention. 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 516 (Mar. 29, 1999). Excerpts follow.

* * * *

In 1989, Serbia's leader, Slobodan Milosevic, the same leader who started the wars in Bosnia and Croatia, and moved against Slovenia in the last decade, stripped Kosovo of the constitutional autonomy its people enjoyed thus denying them their right to speak their language, run their schools, shape their daily lives. For years, Kosovars struggled peacefully to get their rights back. When President Milosevic sent his troops and police to crush them, the struggle grew violent.

Last fall our diplomacy, backed by the threat of force from our NATO Alliance, stopped the fighting for a while, and rescued tens of thousands of people from freezing and starvation in the hills where they had fled to save their lives. And last month, with our allies and Russia, we proposed a peace agreement to end the fighting for good. The Kosovar leaders signed that agreement last week. Even though it does not give them all they want, even though their people were still being savaged, they saw that a just peace is better than a long and unwinnable war.

The Serbian leaders, on the other hand, refused even to discuss key elements of the peace agreement. As the Kosovars were saying "yes" to peace, Serbia stationed 40,000 troops in and around Kosovo in preparation for a major offensive—and in clear violation of the commitments they had made.

Now, they've started moving from village to village, shelling civilians and torching their houses. . . .

Ending this tragedy is a moral imperative. It is also important to America's national interest. Take a look at this map. Kosovo is a small place, but it sits on a major fault line between Europe, Asia and the Middle East, at the meeting place of Islam and both the Western and Orthodox branches of Christianity. To the south are our allies, Greece and Turkey; to the north, our new democratic allies in Central Europe. And all around Kosovo there are other small countries, struggling with their own economic and political challenges—countries that could be overwhelmed by a large, new wave of refugees from Kosovo. All the ingredients for a major war are there: ancient grievances, struggling democracies, and in the center of it all a dictator in Serbia who has done nothing since the Cold War ended but start new wars and pour gasoline on the flames of ethnic and religious division.

Sarajevo, the capital of neighboring Bosnia, is where World War I began. World War II and the Holocaust engulfed this region. In both wars Europe was slow to recognize the dangers, and the United States waited even longer to enter the conflicts. Just imagine if leaders back then had acted wisely and early enough, how many lives could have been saved, how many Americans would not have had to die.

We learned some of the same lessons in Bosnia just a few years ago. The world did not act early enough to stop that war, either. . . .

* * * *

Over the last few months we have done everything we possibly could to solve this problem peacefully. Secretary Albright has worked tirelessly for a negotiated agreement. Mr. Milosevic has refused.

On Sunday I sent Ambassador Dick Holbrooke to Serbia to make clear to him again, on behalf of the United States and our NATO allies, that he must honor his own commitments and stop his repression, or face military action. Again, he refused.

Today, we and our 18 NATO allies agreed to do what we said we would do, what we must do to restore the peace. Our mission is clear: to demonstrate the seriousness of NATO's purpose so that the Serbian leaders understand the imperative of reversing course. To deter an even bloodier offensive against innocent civilians in Kosovo and, if necessary, to seriously damage the Serbian military's capacity to harm the people of Kosovo. In short, if President Milosevic will not make peace, we will limit his ability to make war.

* * * *

Hopefully, Mr. Milosevic will realize his present course is self-destructive and unsustainable. If he decides to accept the peace agreement and demilitarize Kosovo, NATO has agreed to help to implement it with a peace-keeping force. If NATO is invited to do so, our troops should take part in that mission to keep the peace. But I do not intend to put our troops in Kosovo to fight a war.

* * * *

The FRY government has failed to comply with U.N. Security Council resolutions, and its actions are in violation of its obligations under the U.N. Charter and its other international commitments. The FRY government's actions in Kosovo are not simply an internal matter. The Security Council has condemned FRY actions as a threat to regional peace and security. The FRY government's violence creates a conflict with no natural boundaries, pushing refugees across borders and potentially drawing in neighboring countries. The Kosovo region is a tinderbox that could ignite a wider European war with dangerous consequences to the United States.

United States and NATO forces have targeted the FRY government's integrated air defense system, military and security police command and control elements, and military and security police facilities and infrastructure. United States naval ships and aircraft and U.S. Air Force aircraft are participating in these operations. Many of our NATO allies are also contributing aircraft and other forces.

In addition, since this air operation began, the U.S. Embassy in Skopje, Macedonia, has been subjected to increasingly hostile demonstrations by a large number of Serbian sympathizers. In response, I have authorized a unit consisting of about 100 combat-equipped Marines from USS NASSAU (LHA 4), which is supporting the air operations in Kosovo, to deploy to Skopje to enhance security at our embassy. These Marines will remain deployed so long as is necessary to protect our embassy and U.S. persons.

* * * *

I have taken these actions pursuant to my constitutional authority to conduct U.S. foreign relations and as Commander in Chief and Chief Executive. In doing so, I have taken into account the views and support expressed by the Congress in S. Con. Res. 21 and H. Con. Res. 42. I am providing this report as part of my efforts to keep the Congress fully informed, consistent with the War Powers Resolution. I appreciate the support of the Congress in this action.

On April 12, 1999, at an "extraordinary meeting" of the North Atlantic Council held in Brussels, NATO set forth its objectives with respect to the military operation in Kosovo. Those objectives included: the termination of all violence and repression in the region; the withdrawal from Kosovo of military, police, and paramilitary forces; the stationing in Kosovo of an international military presence; the safe return of all displaced persons and the unhindered access to them by humanitarian aid organizations; and the establishment of a new political framework for Kosovo. The heads of state of the NATO countries reaffirmed those objectives, and set forth the conditions to an end of the air strike, in the following statement, issued in Washington on April 23, 1999.

The full text of the statement is available at www.nato.int/docu/pr/1999/p99-062e.htm.

1. The crisis in Kosovo represents a fundamental challenge to the values for which NATO has stood since its foundation: democracy, human rights and the rule of law. It is the culmination of a deliberate policy of oppression, ethnic cleansing and violence pursued by the Belgrade regime under the direction of President Milosevic. We will not allow this campaign of terror to succeed. NATO is determined to prevail.

2. NATO's military action against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) supports the political aims of the international community, which were reaffirmed in recent statements by the UN Secretary-General and the European Union: a peaceful, multi-ethnic and democratic Kosovo where all its people can live in security and enjoy universal human rights and freedoms on an equal basis.

3. Our military actions are directed not at the Serb people but at the policies of the regime in Belgrade, which has repeatedly rejected all efforts to solve the crisis peacefully. President Milosevic must:

> Ensure a verifiable stop to all military action and the immediate ending of violence and repression in Kosovo;
> Withdraw from Kosovo his military, police and paramilitary forces;
> Agree to the stationing in Kosovo of an international military presence;
> Agree to the unconditional and safe return of all refugees and displaced persons, and unhindered access to them by humanitarian aid organisations; and > Provide credible assurance of his willingness to work for the establishment of a political framework agreement based on the Rambouillet accords.

4. There can be no compromise on these conditions. As long as Belgrade fails to meet the legitimate demands of the international community and continues to inflict immense human suffering, Alliance air operations against the Yugoslav war machine will continue. We hold President Milosevic and the Belgrade leadership responsible for the safety of all Kosovar citizens. We will fulfill our promise to the Kosovar people that they can return to their homes and live in peace and security.

5. We are intensifying NATO's military actions to increase the pressure on Belgrade. . . .

6. NATO is prepared to suspend its air strikes once Belgrade has unequivocally accepted the above mentioned conditions and demonstrably begun to withdraw its forces from Kosovo according to a precise and rapid timetable. This could follow the passage of a United Nations Security Council resolution, which we will seek, requiring the withdrawal of Serb forces and the demilitarisation of Kosovo and encompassing the deployment of an international military force to safeguard the swift return of all refugees and displaced persons as well as the establishment of an international provisional administration of Kosovo under which its people can enjoy substantial autonomy within the FRY. NATO remains ready to form the core of such an international military force. It would be multinational in character with contributions from non-NATO countries.

7. Russia has a particular responsibility in the United Nations and an important role to play in the search for a solution to the conflict in Kosovo. . . . We want to work constructively with Russia, in the spirit of the Founding Act.

8. The long-planned, unrestrained and continuing assault by Yugoslav military, police and paramilitary forces on Kosovars and the repression directed against other minorities of the FRY are aggravating the already massive humanitarian catastrophe. This threatens to destabilise the surrounding region.

9. NATO, its members and its Partners have responded to the humanitarian emergency and are intensifying their refugee and humanitarian relief operations in close cooperation with the UNHCR, the lead agency in this field, and with other relevant organisations. We will continue our assistance as long as necessary. NATO forces are making a major contribution to this task.

10. We pay tribute to the servicemen and women of NATO whose courage and dedication are ensuring the success of our military and humanitarian operations.

11. Atrocities against the people of Kosovo by FRY military, police and paramilitary forces represent a flagrant violation of international law. Our governments will cooperate with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) to support investigation of all those, including at the highest levels, responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity. NATO will support the ICTY in its efforts to secure relevant information. There can be no lasting peace without justice.

12. We acknowledge and welcome the courageous support that states in the region are providing to our efforts in Kosovo. . . .

13. We will not tolerate threats by the Belgrade regime to the security of its neighbours. We will respond to such challenges by Belgrade to its neighbours resulting from the presence of NATO forces or their activities on their territory during this crisis.

14. We reaffirm our support for the territorial integrity and sovereignty of all countries in the region.

15. We reaffirm our strong support for the democratically elected government of Montenegro. Any move by Belgrade to undermine the government of President Djukanovic will have grave consequences. FRY forces should leave the demilitarised zone of Prevlaka immediately.

16. The objective of a free, prosperous, open and economically integrated Southeast Europe cannot be fully assured until the FRY embarks upon the transition to democracy. . . .

17. It is our aim to make stability in Southeast Europe a priority of our transatlantic agenda. . . .

(2) The cease-fire in Kosovo and the deployment of the international security presence

On June 9, 1999, NATO and the FRY executed a military-technical agreement to establish a durable cessation to the hostilities in Kosovo. The agreement provided for the phased withdrawal of FRY forces from Kosovo, and from certain newly established safety zones. The agreement also set forth the terms for the deployment in Kosovo of an international security force ("KFOR"), which, in accordance with a UN resolution then pending before the Security Council, would operate under UN auspices. Under the agreement, the KFOR was authorized to use force, if necessary, to ensure security in the region and compliance with the military-technical agreement. Specifically, the KFOR was authorized > to take such actions as are required, including the use of necessary force, to ensure compliance with this Agreement and protection of the international security force . . . , and to contribute to a secure environment for the international civil implementation presence, and other international organisations, agencies and non-governmental organisations. . . .

The full text of the military-technical agreement is available at www.nato.int/kosovo/docu/a990609a.htm.

On June 10, 1999, after an air campaign that lasted seventy-seven days, and in accordance with the military-technical agreement between NATO and the FRY, NATO Secretary General Javier Solana announced the temporary suspension of the air operation against the FRY. See also 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1074 (June 14, 1999).

Also on June 10, the Security Council adopted Resolution 1244. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1244 (1999). In that resolution, the Security Council acted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter to deploy in Kosovo an international civil presence, in addition to the KFOR (for which the Security Council set forth certain responsibilities). Resolution 1244 provides in part as follows.

The Security Council,

* * * *

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the other States of the region . . . ,

Reaffirming the call in previous resolutions for substantial autonomy and meaningful self-administration for Kosovo,

Determining that the situation in the region continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to ensure the safety and security of international personnel and the implementation by all concerned of their responsibilities under the present resolution, and acting for these purposes under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

* * * *

3. Demands in particular that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia put an immediate and verifiable end to violence and repression in Kosovo, and begin and complete verifiable phased withdrawal from Kosovo of all military, police and paramilitary forces according to a rapid timetable, with which the deployment of the international security presence in Kosovo will be synchronized;

4. Confirms that after the withdrawal an agreed number of Yugoslav and Serb military and police personnel will be permitted to return to Kosovo to perform [certain] functions . . . ;

5. Decides on the deployment in Kosovo, under United Nations auspices, of international civil and security presences, with appropriate equipment and personnel as required, and welcomes the agreement of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to such presences;

* * * *

7. Authorizes Member States and relevant international organizations to establish the international security presence in Kosovo . . . with all necessary means to fulfil its responsibilities under paragraph 9 below;

8. Affirms the need for the rapid early deployment of effective international civil and security presences to Kosovo, and demands that the parties cooperate fully in their deployment;

9. Decides that the responsibilities of the international security presence to be deployed and acting in Kosovo will include:

(a) Deterring renewed hostilities, maintaining and where necessary enforcing a ceasefire, and ensuring the withdrawal and preventing the return into Kosovo of Federal and Republic military, police and paramilitary forces, except as provided in point 6 of annex 2;

(b) Demilitarizing the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) and other armed Kosovo Albanian groups as required in paragraph 15 below;

(c) Establishing a secure environment in which refugees and displaced persons can return home in safety, the international civil presence can operate, a transitional administration can be established, and humanitarian aid can be delivered;

(d) Ensuring public safety and order until the international civil presence can take responsibility for this task;

(e) Supervising demining until the international civil presence can, as appropriate, take over responsibility for this task;

(f) Supporting, as appropriate, and coordinating closely with the work of the international civil presence;

(g) Conducting border monitoring duties as required;

(h) Ensuring the protection and freedom of movement of itself, the international civil presence, and other international organizations;

10. Authorizes the Secretary-General, with the assistance of relevant international organizations, to establish an international civil presence in Kosovo in order to provide an interim administration for Kosovo under which the people of Kosovo can enjoy substantial autonomy within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and which will provide transitional administration while establishing and overseeing the development of provisional democratic self-governing institutions to ensure conditions for a peaceful and normal life for all inhabitants of Kosovo;

* * * *

12. Emphasizes the need for coordinated humanitarian relief operations, and for the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to allow unimpeded access to Kosovo by humanitarian aid organizations and to cooperate with such organizations so as to ensure the fast and effective delivery of international aid;

* * * *

15. Demands that the KLA and other armed Kosovo Albanian groups end immediately all offensive actions and comply with the requirements for demilitarization . . . ;

16. Decides that the prohibitions imposed by paragraph 8 of resolution 1160 (1998) shall not apply to arms and related materiel for the use of the international civil and security presences;

(3) Proceedings instituted before the International Court of Justice

On April 29, 1999, the FRY instituted proceedings before the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") against each of the ten NATO member states for violations of international obligations related to the use of force and sovereignty. With respect to the FRY's case against the United States, the FRY defined the dispute as follows:

> The subject-matter of the dispute are acts of the United States of America by which it has violated its international obligation banning the use of force against another State, the obligation not to intervene in the internal affairs of another State, the obligation not to violate the sovereignty > of another State, the obligation to protect the civilian population and civilian objects in wartime, the obligation to protect the environment, the obligation relating to free navigation on international rivers, the obligation regarding fundamental human rights and freedoms, the obligation not to use prohibited weapons, the obligation not to deliberately inflict conditions of life calculated to cause the physical destruction of a national group.

The full text of the FRY's application is available at www.icj-cij.org/icjwww/idocket/iyus/iyusframe.htm.

The FRY asserted that the ICJ had jurisdiction in the case against the United States under Article IX of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on December 9, 1948 (the "Genocide Convention"), and Article 38, paragraph 5, of the Rules of the Court.

Immediately after filing its application with the ICJ, the FRY also submitted a request for provisional measures to halt the air campaign that was then in progress. On June 2, 1999, the ICJ refused to order interim measures against any NATO member state, finding that it lacked prima facie jurisdiction to entertain the FRY's application, and that it therefore could not indicate any provisional measures in response to that application. With respect to two NATO member states, Spain and the United States, the ICJ found that it manifestly lacked jurisdiction. The ICJ therefore dismissed entirely the cases against these two states. See Case Concerning Legality of Use of Force (Yugo. v. U.S.), 1999 I.C.J. 114 (June 2) (order rejecting request for the indication of provisional measures), excerpted below and available at www.icj-cij.org/icjwww/idocket/iyus/iyusframe.htm.

19. Whereas the Court, under its Statute, does not automatically have jurisdiction over legal disputes between States parties to that Statute or between other States to whom access to the Court has been granted; whereas the Court has repeatedly stated "that one of the fundamental principles of its Statute is that it cannot decide a dispute between States without the consent of those States to its jurisdiction" (East Timor, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1995, p. 101, para. 26); and whereas the Court can therefore exercise jurisdiction only between States parties to a dispute who not only have access to the Court but also have accepted the jurisdiction of the Court, either in general form or for the individual dispute concerned;

* * * *

22. Whereas the United States contends that "[its] reservation [to Article IX] is clear and unambiguous"; that "[t]he United States has not given the specific consent [that reservation] requires [and] . . . will not do so"; and that Article IX of the Convention cannot in consequence found the jurisdiction of the Court in this case, even prima facie; whereas the United States also observed that reservations to the Genocide Convention are generally permitted; that its reservation to Article IX is not contrary to the Convention's object and purpose; and that, "[s]ince . . . Yugoslavia did not object to the . . . reservation, [it] is bound by it"; and whereas the United States further contends that there is no "legally sufficient . . . connection between the charges against the United States contained in the Application and [the] supposed jurisdictional basis under the Genocide Convention"; and whereas the United States further asserts that Yugoslavia has failed to make any credible allegation of violation of the Genocide Convention, by failing to demonstrate the existence of the specific intent required by the Convention to "destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such", which intent could not be inferred from the conduct of conventional military operations against another State;

23. Whereas Yugoslavia disputed the United States interpretation of the Genocide Convention, but submitted no argument concerning the United States reservation to Article IX of the Convention;

24. Whereas the Genocide Convention does not prohibit reservations; whereas Yugoslavia did not object to the United States reservation to Article IX; and whereas the said reservation had the effect of excluding that Article from the provisions of the Convention in force between the Parties;

25. Whereas in consequence Article IX of the Genocide Convention cannot found the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain a dispute between Yugoslavia and the United States alleged to fall within its provisions; and whereas that Article manifestly does not constitute a basis of jurisdiction in the present case, even prima facie;

* * * *

27. Whereas the United States observes that it "has not consented to jurisdiction under Article 38, paragraph 5, [of the Rules of Court] and will not do so";

28. Whereas it is quite clear that, in the absence of consent by the United States, given pursuant to Article 38, paragraph 5, of the Rules, the Court cannot exercise jurisdiction in the present case, even prima facie;

* * * *

29. Whereas it follows from what has been said above that the Court manifestly lacks jurisdiction to entertain Yugoslavia's Application; whereas it cannot therefore indicate any provisional measure whatsoever in order to protect the rights invoked therein; and whereas, within a system of consensual jurisdiction, to maintain on the General List a case upon which it appears certain that the Court will not be able to adjudicate on the merits would most assuredly not contribute to the sound administration of justice;

* * * *

5. Presidential Authority to Deploy Armed Forces

a. Military intervention: Kosovo

In April 1999 the U.S. House of Representatives considered several measures relevant to the situation in Kosovo. On April 28, the House defeated a joint resolution that would have declared a state of war between the United States and the FRY (discussed below); a concurrent resolution, passed by the Senate, that would have expressly authorized the President to conduct military air operations and missile strikes against the FRY; and a concurrent resolution that would have directed the President to remove U.S. Armed Forces from their positions in connection with operations against the FRY (also discussed below). On the same day, the House passed a bill, never acted on by the Senate, to prohibit the use of funds for deployment of U.S. ground forces without specific congressional authorization.

In a hearing of the House International Relations Committee on April 22, 1999, the Department of State submitted a letter providing the views of the Administration in opposing House Concurrent Resolution 82 ("H.Con.Res.82") and House Joint Resolution 44, as excerpted below.

* * * *

The Administration objects to H.Con.Res.82, which would purport to direct the President, pursuant to section 5C of the War Powers Resolution, to remove United States Armed Forces from their positions in connection with the present operations against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

The United States' military operations with respect to Kosovo are profoundly in the interests of the United States. . . .

Moreover, H.Con.Res.82 is based on a part of the War Powers Resolution, Section 5C, that is unconstitutional under the Supreme Court's decision in [INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983)]. Under Chadha, Congress cannot legislate through a concurrent resolution.

* * * *

House Joint Resolution 44 would declare a State of War between the United States and the government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. However, neither NATO nor the United States believes that a State of War exists. The President has not requested a declaration of war.

A declaration of war would be entirely counterproductive as a matter of policy, and is unnecessary as a matter of law. On only five occasions in the United States' history, and never since World War II, has the Congress declared war, reflecting the extraordinary nature of, and implications attendant on such a declaration.

While . . . [President] Milosevic should not doubt the resolve of the United States and the NATO to preserve the security and stability of Europe and to uphold international humanitarian norms, we are not at war with the F.R.Y. or its people.

Furthermore, this resolution would convey the message that this is a bilateral war, between the United States and the F.R.Y., rather than an allied effort by NATO.

Finally, a declaration of war would press front-line states to make a potentially difficult decision between belligerence and neutrality, with possibly harmful consequences for NATO access to their territory and airspace, as well as the stability of the Balkans.

As a matter of law, there is no need for a declaration of war. Every use of U.S. Armed Forces, since World War II, has been undertaken pursuant to the President's constitutional authority, in some cases with congressional authorization, but never by declaration of war.

This administration, like previous administrations, takes the view that the President has broad authority as Commander-in-Chief. And under his authority to conduct foreign relations, to authorize the use of force in the national interest.

* * * *

Michael J. Matheson, Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State, responded to a question in the context of Kosovo concerning the distinction between armed conflict and war under international law and Presidential powers under the Constitution, as excerpted below. House International Relations Committee, Hearing on War Powers Act, April 22, 1999. A transcript of the hearing, including the text of the letter, supra, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

[T]he position of the United States is that we are involved in an armed conflict. . . .You will find in all of the international instruments governing the use of armed force since World War II references to armed conflict.

* * * *

. . . Armed conflict, as it is used in all of the modern international instruments, includes any significant fighting between states and for example, in the 1949 Geneva Conventions you will find that the declaration of its applicability includes both declared war and any other armed conflict between states. . . .

. . . [T]he point is that in modern international law, it was recognized that the old notion of state of war was so ambiguous that it was important to have a clear objective standard of armed conflict, and that is why the 1949 Conventions applied to armed conflict regardless of whether the states recognized the state of war. . . . Armed conflict is military action between the forces of states. This need not involve, and typically in international practice does not involve, a declared and recognized state of war which has much more far reaching consequences.

* * * *

United States Presidents of this and all previous Administrations have believed that the President has very wide constitutional authority as commander-in-chief to use the armed forces of the United States for purposes of protecting U.S. national interest. . . . At the moment, we are involved in an armed conflict which the President believes he clearly has constitutional authority to engage in.

(1) Litigation in U.S. courts

During the bombing campaign, thirty-one members of Congress filed suit against the President in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia seeking a declaration that U.S. air strikes in the FRY violated the War Powers Clause of the Constitution and the War Powers Resolution, 50 U.S.C. § 1541–1548. The complaint alleged that the President had violated these provisions by authorizing air strikes for a period of more than sixty days without congressional authorization. The district court dismissed the suit for lack of standing, Campbell v. Clinton, 52 F.Supp. 2d 34 (D.D.C. 1999), and the court of appeals affirmed, concluding that congressmen must rely on the broad range of legislative authority available to them in this area rather than the courts. 203 F.3d 19 (D.C. Cir. 2000). See Digest 2000 at 758–65.

(2) Office of Legal Counsel opinion

The War Powers Resolution, Pub. L. No. 93–148, 87 Stat. 555 (1973), 50 U.S.C. §§ 1541–1548 (1994) (the "WPR"), referred to in Campbell v. Clinton, supra, sets forth procedures for authorizing and reporting on hostilities. See Digest 1973 at 560–63 for a discussion of the War Powers Resolution at the time of its enactment over a Presidential veto.

On May 21, 1999, President Clinton signed Pub. L. No. 106–31, 113 Stat. 57 (1999), providing emergency supplemental appropriations for military operations in Kosovo. A memorandum prepared by Assistant Attorney General Randolph Moss, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel ("OLC"), memorialized legal advice provided in May 1999 that Pub. L. No. 106–31 constituted authorization for continuing hostilities consistent with the War Powers Resolution. Memorandum from Assistant Attorney General Randolph Moss for the Attorney General re: Authorization for Continuing Hostilities in Kosovo, December 19, 2000. After summarizing relevant provisions of the War Powers Resolution, the memorandum demonstrated, by reference to the relevant case law, to historical practice, and to basic principles of constitutional law, that appropriations laws such as the one at issue may authorize military combat, particularly where, as here, it was clear that Congress intended to enable the President to continue military operations in Kosovo. Excerpts from the memorandum opinion are set forth below.

* * * *

The "core" of the WPR "resides in sections 4(a)(1) and 5(b)." John Hart Ely, War and Responsibility 48 (1993). Section 4(a)(1) of the WPR requires the President to submit a report to Congress whenever, "[i]n the absence of a declaration of war," United States Armed Forces are introduced "into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances." 50 U.S.C. § 1543(a)(1). Section 5(b) requires the President to "terminate any use of the United States Armed Forces with respect to which [a] report [under section 4(a)(1)] was submitted (or required) [within 60 days thereafter]" unless the Congress takes certain enumerated actions to authorize continuing combat or "is physically unable to meet as a result of an armed attack upon the United States." 50 U.S.C. § 1544(b). The 60 day period may be extended for an additional 30 days if the President certifies to Congress that "unavoidable military necessity respecting the safety of United States Armed Forces requires the continued use of such armed forces in bringing about a prompt removal of such forces." Id. Thus, when a report under section 4(a)(1) is filed (or required to be filed), section 5(b)'s 60 day (or, in appropriate circumstances, 90 day) "clock" begins to run.

Under section 5(b), Congress may, within the 60 day period, authorize continuing hostilities after that period by any one of three methods: (1) by a declaration of war; (2) by enacting a "specific authorization for such use of United States Armed forces"; or (3) by "extend[ing] by law such sixty-day period." 50 U.S.C. § 1544(b). The section thus functions essentially as a burden-shifting device.

II. Appropriations and Authorization of Military Combat

The Supreme Court has recognized that, as a general matter, appropriation statutes may "stand[] as confirmation and ratification of the action of the Chief Executive." Fleming v. Mohawk Wrecking & Lumber Co., 331 U.S. 111, 116 (1947). Congress may also "amend substantive law in an appropriations statute, as long as it does so clearly." Robertson v. Seattle Audubon Soc., 503 U.S. 429, 440 (1992). "[W]hen Congress desires to suspend or repeal a statute in force, '[t]here can be no doubt that . . . it could accomplish its purpose by an amendment to an appropriation bill, or otherwise.' United States v. Dickerson, 310 U.S. 554, 555 (1940). 'The whole question depends on the intent of Congress as expressed in the statutes.' United States v. Mitchell, 109 U.S. 146, 150 (1883)." United States v. Will, 449 U.S. 200, 222 (1980).

* * * *

The most conspicuous example of Congress authorizing hostilities through its appropriations power occurred during the War in Vietnam. See William C. Banks & Peter Raven-Hansen, National Security Law and the Power of the Purse 119 (1994) ("The paradigm of what we have called legitimating appropriations—appropriation measures from which the executive infers authority for national security actions—is the succession of appropriations for military activities in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam War."). In that war, the State Department Legal Adviser argued that Congress had authorized the conflict, not only through the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution, 78 Stat. 384 (1964), but also by enacting supplemental appropriations bills. . . . Leonard C. Meeker, The Legality of United States Participation in the Defense of Viet-Nam, 54 Dep't St. Bull. 474, 487–88 (1966) (footnote omitted).

* * * *

. . . Section 8(a) of the WPR . . . provides that authority "shall not be inferred . . . from any provision of law . . . including any provision contained in any appropriations Act, unless such provision specifically authorizes the introduction of United States Armed Forces into hostilities or into such situations and states that it is intended to constitute specific statutory authorization within the meaning of this chapter." 50 U.S.C. § 1547(a). In assessing whether an appropriation statute can constitute authorization, the critical question thus becomes how to understand section 8(a)(1).

* * * *

. . . If section 8(a)(1) were read to block all possibility of inferring congressional approval of military action from any appropriation, unless that appropriation referred in terms to the WPR and stated that it was intended to constitute specific authority for the action under that statute, then it would be unconstitutional. . . .

In order to avoid this constitutional problem, we do not interpret section 8(a)(1) as binding future Congresses but instead as having the effect of establishing a background principle against which Congress legislates. In our view, section 8(a)(1) continues to have operative legal effect, but only so far as it operates to inform how an executive or judicial branch actor should interpret the intent of subsequent Congresses that enact appropriation statutes that do not specifically reference the WPR. On the question whether an appropriation statute enacted by a subsequent Congress constitutes authorization for continued hostilities, it is the intent of the subsequent Congress, as evidenced by the text and legislative history of the appropriation statute, that controls the analysis. The existence of section 8(a)(1) might affect this analysis.

V. Pub. L. No. 106–31 and the War Powers Resolution

. . . [T]he the text of Pub. L. No. 106–31 and the legislative record as a whole make clear that Congress intended, by enacting the President's request, to enable the President to continue U.S. participation in Operation Allied Force for as long as funding remained available, i.e., through at least the end of the fiscal year on September 30, and indeed even longer. . . .

In this context, the concerns that have been voiced about finding congressional authorization in general appropriation statutes are not applicable. The purposes of both H.R. 1664 and H.R. 1141 were plain on the face of the bills. . . . In this case, "Congress as a whole was aware of" the basic terms of the special, emergency appropriation for continuing military operations in Kosovo. . . . The bill was surely among the most visible and important pieces of legislation introduced before the first session of the 106th Congress, and both the Administration and individual members pointedly and publicly underscored its significance. . . .

* * * *

Finally, it is worth observing that, in this case, the underlying purpose of the WPR's "clock" was fully satisfied. That clock functions to ensure that, where the President commits U.S. troops to hostilities without first obtaining congressional authorization, Congress has the opportunity to consider the merits of the President's actions and to decide whether those hostilities may continue. Here, the President ordered a series of air strikes in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia "to demonstrate the seriousness of NATO's purpose so that the Serbian leaders understand the imperative of reversing course; to deter an even bloodier offensive against innocent civilians in Kosovo; and, if necessary, to seriously damage the Serbian military's capacity to harm the people of Kosovo." Letter for the Speaker from the President, March 26, 1999, at 1. Congress then had the opportunity to deliberate on the wisdom of the President's actions, which it did, considering several resolutions relating to the military efforts in Kosovo. After all of those deliberations, Congress decided to use one of its most important constitutional powers over war and peace—its appropriation power—specifically to fund the ongoing military effort. By doing so, it authorized the President to continue military activities in the region.

b. Peacekeeping

(1) Haiti

On September 15, 1994, Senators Robert Dole, Alan K. Simpson, Strom Thurmond, and William S. Cohen requested from OLC a copy or summary of any legal opinion that that Office may have rendered concerning the lawfulness of President Clinton's planned deployment of U.S. forces into Haiti without authorization by Congress. By letter dated September 27, 1994, Assistant Attorney General Walter Dellinger responded to the Senators' request, providing an analysis of the applicable law, concluding that "the President had legal and constitutional authority to order United States troops to be deployed into Haiti." Assistant Attorney General Dellinger's letter is excerpted below (footnotes excluded). See discussion of U.S. involvement in Haiti throughout the 1991–1994 period in Chapter 16.A.2. and U.S. peacekeeping efforts in Haiti in Chapter 17.B.5.

The full text of the letter is available at www.usdoj.gov/olc/haiti.htm.

* * * *

In this case, a combination of three factors provided legal justification for the planned deployment. . . .

I. First, the Haitian deployment accorded with the sense of Congress, as expressed in section 8147 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1994, Pub. L. No. 103–139. That provision was sponsored by, among others, Senators Dole, Simpson and Thurmond. See 139 Cong. Rec. S14,021–22 (daily ed. Oct. 20, 1993).

Section 8147(b), 107 Stat. 1474, of the Act states the sense of Congress that "funds appropriated by this Act should not be obligated or expended for United States military operations in Haiti" unless certain conditions (including, in the alternative, prior Congressional authorization) were met. Section 8147(c), 107 Stat. 1475, however, added that > [i]t is the sense of Congress that the limitation in subsection (b) should not apply if the President reports in advance to Congress that the intended deployment of United States Armed Forces into Haiti—

>
> (1) is justified by United States national security interests;
>
> (2) will be undertaken only after necessary steps have been taken to ensure the safety and security of United States Armed Forces, including steps to ensure that United States Armed Forces will not become targets due to the nature of their rules of engagement;
>
> (3) will be undertaken only after an assessment that—
>
> (A) the proposed mission and objectives are most appropriate for the United States Armed Forces rather > than civilian personnel or armed forces from other nations, and > (B) that the United States Armed Forces proposed for deployment are necessary and sufficient to accomplish the objectives of the proposed mission;

> (4) will be undertaken only after clear objectives for the deployment are established;
> (5) will be undertaken only after an exit strategy for ending the deployment has been identified; and > (6) will be undertaken only after the financial costs of the deployment are estimated.

In short, it was the sense of Congress that the President need not seek prior authorization for the deployment in Haiti provided that he made certain specific findings and reported them to Congress in advance of the deployment. The President made the appropriate findings and detailed them to Congress in conformity with the terms of the resolution. See Letter to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives from the President (Sept. 18, 1994). Accordingly, this is not, for constitutional purposes, a situation in which the President has "take[n] measures incompatible with the expressed or implied will of Congress," Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. at 637 (Jackson, J., concurring). Rather, it is either a case in which the President has acted "pursuant to an . . . implied authorization of Congress," so that "his authority is at its maximum," id. at 635, or at least a case in which he may "rely upon his own independent powers" in a matter where Congress has "enable[d], if not invite[d], measures on independent presidential responsibility." Id. at 637.

II. Furthermore, the structure of the War Powers Resolution (WPR) recognizes and presupposes the existence of unilateral Presidential authority to deploy armed forces "into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances." 50 U.S.C. § 1543(a)(1). The WPR requires that, in the absence of a declaration of war, the President must report to Congress within 48 hours of introducing armed forces into such circumstances and must terminate the use of United States armed forces within 60 days (or 90 days, if military necessity requires additional time to effect a withdrawal) unless Congress permits otherwise. Id. § 1544(b). This structure makes sense only if the President may introduce troops into hostilities or potential hostilities without prior authorization by the Congress: the WPR regulates such action by the President and seeks to set limits to it.

To be sure, the WPR declares that it should not be "construed as granting any authority to the President with respect to the introduction of United States Armed Forces into hostilities or into situations wherein involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances." 50 U.S.C. § 1547(d)(2). But just as clearly, the WPR assumes that the President already has such authority, and indeed the WPR states that it is not "intended to alter the constitutional authority of the . . . President." Id. § 1547(d)(1). Furthermore, although the WPR announces that, in the absence of specific authorization from Congress, the President may introduce armed forces into hostilities only in "a national emergency created by attack upon the United States, its territories or possessions, or its armed forces," id. § 1541(c), even the defenders of the WPR concede that this declaration—found in the "Purpose and Policy" section of the WPR—either is incomplete or is not meant to be binding. See, e.g., Cyrus R. Vance, Striking the Balance: Congress and the President Under the War Powers Resolution, 133 U. Pa. L. Rev. 79, 81 (1984).

The WPR was enacted against a background that was "replete with instances of presidential uses of military force abroad in the absence of prior congressional approval." Presidential Power to Use the Armed Forces Abroad Without Statutory Authorization, 4A Op. O.L.C. 185, 187 (1980). While Congress obviously sought to structure and regulate such unilateral deployments, its overriding interest was to prevent the United States from being engaged, without express congressional authorization, in major, prolonged conflicts such as the wars in Vietnam and Korea, rather than to prohibit the President from using or threatening to use troops to achieve important diplomatic objectives where the risk of sustained military conflict was negligible.

Further, in establishing and funding a military force that is capable of being projected anywhere around the globe, Congress has given the President, as Commander in Chief, considerable discretion in deciding how that force is to be deployed. See Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 789 (1950); cf. Maul v. United States, 274 U.S. 501, 515–16 (1927) (Brandeis and Holmes, J.J., concurring) (President "may direct any revenue cutter to cruise in any waters in order to perform any duty of the service"). By declining, in the WPR or other statutory law, to prohibit the President from using his conjoint statutory and constitutional powers to deploy troops into situations like that in Haiti, Congress has left the President both the authority and the means to take such initiatives.

In this case, the President reported to Congress, consistent with the WPR, that United States military forces, together with units supplied by foreign allies, began operations in Haitian territory, including its territorial waters and airspace. The President stated in his report that he undertook those measures "to further the national security interests of the United States; to stop the brutal atrocities that threaten tens of thousands of Haitians; to secure our borders; to preserve stability and promote democracy in our hemisphere; and to uphold the reliability of the commitments we make, and the commitments others make to us, including the Governors Island Agreement and the agreement concluded on September 18 in Haiti." Letter to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives from the President, at 2 (Sept. 21, 1994). We believed that the deployment was fully consistent with the WPR, and with the authority Congress reserved to itself under that statute to consider whether affirmative legislative authorization for the continuance of the deployment should be provided.

III. Finally, in our judgment, the Declaration of War Clause, U.S. Const., art. I, § 8, cl. 11 ("[t]he Congress shall have Power . . . [t]o declare War"), did not of its own force require specific prior congressional authorization for the deployment of troops at issue here. That deployment was characterized by circumstances that sufficed to show that the operation was not a "war" within the meaning of the Declaration of War Clause. The deployment was to have taken place, and did in fact take place, with the full consent of the legitimate government of the country involved. Taking that and other circumstances into account, the President, together with his military and intelligence advisors, determined that the nature, scope and duration of the deployment were not consistent with the conclusion that the event was a "war."

In reaching that conclusion, we were guided by the initial premise, articulated by Justice Robert Jackson, that the President, as Chief Executive and Commander in Chief, "is exclusively responsible" for the "conduct of diplomatic and foreign affairs," and accordingly that he may, absent specific legislative restriction, deploy United States armed forces "abroad or to any particular region." Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. at 789. Presidents have often utilized this authority, in the absence of specific legislative authorization, to deploy United States military personnel into foreign countries at the invitation of the legitimate governments of those countries. For example, during President Taft's Administration, the recognized government of Nicaragua called upon the United States to intervene because of civil disturbance. According to President Taft, "[t]his led to the landing of marines and quite a campaign. . . . This was not an act of war, because it was done with the consent of the lawful authorities of the territory where it took place." William Howard Taft, The Presidency 88–89 (1916).

In 1940, after the fall of Denmark to Germany, President Franklin Roosevelt ordered United States troops to occupy Greenland, a Danish possession in the North Atlantic of vital strategic interest to the United States. This was done pursuant to an agreement between the United States and the Danish Minister in Washington, and was welcomed by the local officials on Greenland. Congress was not consulted or even directly informed. See James Grafton Rogers, World Policing and the Constitution 69–70 (1945). Later, in 1941, the President ordered United States troops to occupy Iceland, an independent nation, pursuant to an agreement between himself and the Prime Minister of Iceland. The President relied upon his authority as Commander in Chief, and notified Congress only after the event. Id. at 70–71. More recently, in 1989, at the request of President Corazon Aquino, President Bush authorized military assistance to the Philippine government to suppress a coup attempt. Pub. Papers of George Bush 1615 (1989).

Such a pattern of Executive conduct, made under claim of right, extended over many decades and engaged in by Presidents of both parties, "evidences the existence of broad constitutional power." Presidential Power to Use the Armed Forces Abroad Without Statutory Authorization, 4A Op. O.L.C. at 187.

We are not suggesting, however, that the United States cannot be said to engage in "war" whenever it deploys troops into a country at the invitation of that country's legitimate government. Rather, we believe that "war" does not exist where United States troops are deployed at the invitation of a fully legitimate government in circumstances in which the nature, scope, and duration of the deployment are such that the use of force involved does not rise to the level of "war."

In deciding whether prior Congressional authorization for the Haitian deployment was constitutionally necessary, the President was entitled to take into account the anticipated nature, scope and duration of the planned deployment, and in particular the limited antecedent risk that United States forces would encounter significant armed resistance or suffer or inflict substantial casualties as a result of the deployment. Indeed, it was the President's hope, since vindicated by the event that the Haitian military leadership would agree to step down before exchanges of fire occurred. Moreover, while it would not be appropriate here to discuss operational details, other aspects of the planned deployment, including the fact that it would not involve extreme use of force, as for example preparatory bombardment, were also relevant to the judgment that it was not a "war."

On the basis of the reasoning detailed above, we concluded that the President had the constitutional authority to deploy troops into Haiti even prior to the September 18 agreement.

(2) Bosnia

In a memorandum opinion of November 30, 1995, OLC followed a similar analysis in concluding that the President, "acting without specific statutory authorization, may lawfully introduce United States ground troops into Bosnia in order to assist North Atlantic Treaty Organization to ensure compliance with a peace agreement." Memorandum for the Counsel to the President from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel re: Proposed Deployment of United States Armed Forces into Bosnia. As discussed in Chapter 17.B.2., on December 17, 1995, President Clinton ordered 20,000 U.S. military personnel to participate in IFOR, the NATO force in Bosnia.

The full text of the memorandum opinion, excerpted below, is available at www.usdoj.gov/olc/bosnia2.htm.

Several circumstances of the proposed deployment have led some to take a different view of this question. Unlike the Haitian intervention, this operation arguably is not a case where "the risk of sustained military conflict [is] negligible." OLC Haiti Letter at 1, 4. With the exception of the limited commitment of ground troops to Macedonia, the United States' previous military involvement in the Yugoslav theater has been undertaken only by its naval or aerial forces. The deployment of 20,000 troops on the ground is an essentially different, and more problematic, type of intervention: it raises the risk that the United States will incur (and inflict) casualties. Disengagement of ground forces can be far more difficult than the withdrawal of forces deployed for air strikes or naval interdictions. Because of the difficulties of disengaging ground forces from situations of conflict, and the attendant risk that hostilities will escalate, arguably there is a greater need for approval at the outset for the commitment of such troops to such situations; otherwise, Congress may be confronted with circumstances in which the exercise of its power to declare war is effectively foreclosed.

Nevertheless, we do not believe that these arguments against the President's unilateral authority to deploy forces into Bosnia are persuasive. The deployment would be in aid of a peace agreement that will be guaranteed by NATO and the United Nations Security Council. The parties to the agreement already are in substantial, though perhaps not total, compliance with an earlier cease-fire agreement, and have invited the deployment of NATO forces and guaranteed their safety. To send United States forces to the region, in these circumstances, does not constitute "war" in any sense of the word. Historical practice reinforces the most natural reading of the constitutional language: at the least, the President may deploy United States forces here without express authorization to protect the national interests, even if the deployment is not without some risk.

6. Issues Before the International Court of Justice

During the 1990s the United States participated in two proceedings before the ICJ involving use of force issues, discussed below. See also A.4.a.(3) supra.

a. Nuclear weapons advisory opinion

On August 27, 1993, the Director General of the World Health Organization ("WHO"), Dr. Hiroshi Nakajima, sent a letter to the registrar of the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") requesting an advisory opinion on the following question: "In the view of the health and environmental effects, would the use of nuclear weapons by a State in war or other armed conflict be a breach of its obligations under international law including the WHO Constitution?" The WHO's request for an advisory opinion is available at www.icj-cij.org/icjwww/icases/ianw/ianwframe.htm.

On December 19, 1994, UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali informed the ICJ of UN General Assembly Resolution 49/75 K, adopted on December 15 pursuant to Article 96, paragraph 1 of the UN Charter. G.A. Res. 49/75 K, U.N. GAOR, 49th Sess., U.N. Doc. A/RES/49/75 (1994). In that resolution, the General Assembly decided to request the ICJ "urgently to render its advisory opinion on the following question: 'Is the threat or use of nuclear weapons in any circumstance permitted under international law?' " By order dated February 1, 1995, the ICJ decided that states entitled to appear before it and before the United Nations could submit their views on the General Assembly's question until June 20, 1995. On June 20, 1995, the United States submitted its views, inter alia, that the ICJ should exercise its discretion under Article 65 of its statute not to issue an opinion, and that in any event international law did not prohibit the threat or use of nuclear weapons in armed conflict per se. Excerpts from the U.S. submission on the latter issue are provided below (footnotes omitted).

The full text of the submission is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

A. Introduction

Some states have by agreement undertaken not to possess or use nuclear weapons under any circumstances and others have undertaken not to use such weapons in certain defined geographical areas. Apart from this, there is no prohibition in conventional or customary international law on the threat or use of nuclear weapons. On the contrary, international law is replete with agreements that regulate the possession or use of nuclear weapons, providing compelling evidence that their use is not deemed to be generally unlawful. The practice of States, including the Permanent Members of the Security Council, all of which maintain stocks of nuclear weapons, further proves this point.

In addition, nothing in the body of the international humanitarian law of armed conflict indicates that nuclear weapons are prohibited per se. As in the case of other weapons, the legality of use depends on the conformity of the particular use with the rules applicable to such weapons. This would, in turn, depend on factors that can only be guessed at, including the characteristics of the particular weapon used and its effects, the military requirement for the destruction of the target in question and the magnitude of the risk to civilians. Judicial speculation on a matter of such fundamental importance would be inappropriate.

B. There is No General Prohibition on the Use of Nuclear Weapons

It is a fundamental principle of international law that restrictions on States cannot be presumed but must be found in conventional law specifically accepted by them or in customary law generally accepted by the community of nations. There is no general prohibition on the use of nuclear weapons in any international agreement. There is likewise no such prohibition in customary international law. Such a customary prohibition could only result from a general and consistent practice of States followed by them from a sense of legal obligation. We submit, based on the following analysis of the agreements, conduct and expressed views of States, that there is no such practice.

1. Customary Law. Customary international law is created by a general and consistent practice of States followed by them from a sense of legal obligation. Evidence of a customary norm requires indication of "extensive and virtually uniform" State practice, including States whose interests are "specially affected." Among the actions of States that contribute to the development of customary international law are international agreements concluded by them, governmental acts, and official statements of what the law is considered to be. (However, mere hortatory declarations or acts not based on a perception of legal obligation would not suffice.)

With respect to the use of nuclear weapons, customary law could not be created over the objection of the nuclear-weapon States, which are the States whose interests are most specially affected. Nor could customary law be created by abstaining from the use of nuclear weapons for humanitarian, political or military reasons, rather than from a belief that such abstention is required by law. Among the more important indicators of State practice in this area are the international agreements that regulate but do not prohibit nuclear weapons, the fact of the acquisition and deployment of nuclear weapons by the major military powers, and the official views expressed by States on this question.

2. International Agreements. We are aware of no international agreement—and certainly none to which the United States is a Party—that contains a general prohibition on the use of nuclear weapons. On the contrary, it is evident that existing agreements proceed from the assumption that there is no such general prohibition.

* * * *

3. Conduct of States. It is well known that the Permanent Members of the Security Council possess nuclear weapons and have developed and deployed systems for their use in armed conflict. These States would not have borne the expense and effort of acquiring and maintaining these weapons and delivery systems if they believed that the use of nuclear weapons was generally prohibited. On the contrary, the possible use of these weapons is an important factor in the structure of their military establishments, the development of their security doctrines and strategy, and their efforts to prevent aggression and provide an essential element of the exercise of their right of self-defense. (These deployments and doctrines are discussed in the 1990 Report of the Secretary-General on nuclear weapons [A/45/373, September 18, 1990]). This pattern of conduct is inconsistent with the existence of any general legal prohibition on the use of nuclear weapons.

The fact that such weapons have actually been used in only one armed conflict does not suggest the contrary. Certainly nuclear-weapon States have preserved the option to use nuclear weapons if necessary, and (as is explained below) have not refrained from further use of these weapons because they believed such use to be unlawful—which is an essential element in the development of customary international law.

4. Expressed Views of States. Various States have taken differing views on the legality of the use of nuclear weapons. As the United Nations Secretary-General has recently concluded, "no uniform view has emerged as yet on the legal aspects of the possession of nuclear weapons and their use as a means of warfare." This is confirmed by the WHO resolution that requested an advisory opinion, which refers to the fact that "marked differences of opinion have been expressed by Member States about the lawfulness of the use of nuclear weapons." The variety and disparity of views expressed by States demonstrates that there is no generally-accepted prohibition on the use of nuclear weapons. Under these circumstances, customary international law cannot be said to include such a general prohibition.

The position of the nuclear-weapon States is best illustrated by their official statements on nuclear-weapons use in the context of the Non-Proliferation Treaty and the Treaty of Tlatelolco. On April 5, 1995, Secretary of State Christopher announced that President Clinton had declared the following in the context of the Conference on the extension of the Non-Proliferation Treaty:

> The United States reaffirms that it will not use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear-weapon States Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons except in the case of an invasion or any other attack on the United States, its territories, its armed forces or other troops, its allies, or on a State towards which it has a security commitment, carried out or sustained by such a non-nuclear-weapon State in association or alliance with a nuclear-weapon [State].

Statements identical in substance were made at the same time by France, Russia and the United Kingdom. The Security Council unanimously took note of these statements 'with appreciation", [UN Security Council Resolution 984 (1985)] and no exception was taken to the reservation by these States of the right to use nuclear weapons in certain circumstances.

Likewise, at the time of its ratification of Additional Protocols I and II to the Tlatelolco Treaty, the United States made a formal statement of understandings and declarations, including a statement that effectively reserved its right to use nuclear weapons against one of the Contracting Parties in the event of "an armed attack by a Contracting Party, in which it was assisted by a nuclear-weapon State. . . ." [28 I.L.M. 1423]. Similar statements were made by the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union. France stated that nothing in the Protocol could present an obstacle to "the full exercise of the right of self-defense confirmed by Article 51 of the United Nations Charter."

Although these statements differ in some respects, they have certain important common features. In particular, none acknowledges any general prohibition on the use of nuclear weapons; on the contrary, each clearly reserves the right to use nuclear weapons in some circumstances. Further, limits are offered only with respect to certain States, thus indicating that there are no comparable constraints on the use of nuclear weapons against States generally.

Additional statements of nuclear-weapon States on the use of nuclear weapons are contained in Appendix I to the Secretary-General's 1990 Report [UN Doc. A/45/373 (1990)]. In each case, the government in question stated its resolve to act in such a manner as to avoid the necessity for the use of nuclear weapons, but in no case is there a recognition of any general prohibition on the use of nuclear weapons.

Beginning with Resolution 16/1653 in 1961, the U.N. General Assembly has adopted a series of resolutions declaring that the use of nuclear weapons is contrary to the U.N. Charter and international law generally. It is well established, however, that aside from certain administrative matters, the General Assembly does not have the authority to "legislate" or create legally binding obligations on its members. Further, such General Assembly resolutions could only be declarative of the existence of principles of customary international law to the extent that such principles had been recognized by the international community, including the States most directly affected. In fact, there were a significant number of U.N. Member States that did not accept these resolutions: in particular, these resolutions were not accepted by a majority of the nuclear-weapon States.

For example, Resolution 1653 was adopted by a vote of 55 to 20, with 26 abstentions, and each of the subsequent resolutions attracted at least 16 negative votes and a number of abstentions. In each case, the United States, the United Kingdom and France voted against the resolution. The representative of the United Kingdom, in explaining his Government's vote on Resolution 1653, stated that "so long as States possess nuclear weapons, they will use them in self-defense." The representative of the United States stated that:

> . . . it is simply untrue to say that the use of nuclear weapons is contrary to the Charter and to international law. . . . Indeed, the very provisions of the Charter approve, and demand, the exercise of self-defense against armed attack. It is very clear that the Charter says nothing whatever about any particular weapon or method which may be used for self-defense.

[U.N. Doc. A/13/PV.1063(1961)]

During the 1980s, the General Assembly adopted a series of resolutions urging the nuclear-weapon States to adopt a policy of refraining from the first use of nuclear weapons and to begin negotiations on a legally binding regime including the obligation not to be the first to use nuclear weapons. Like the resolutions cited above, these resolutions on first use were not accepted by a significant number of U.N. Member States and in particular were not accepted by most nuclear-weapon States. Further, the adoption of these resolutions implicitly indicates a general understanding that there is no existing prohibition on all uses of nuclear weapons, since there would be no need for first-use resolutions and agreements if all uses were already prohibited.

Taken together, these various expressions of the views of States demonstrate that there is no consensus on the question of the legality of the use of nuclear weapons. In particular, there is nothing approaching the degree of acceptance by States, and of acceptance by the States most specifically affected, that would be required to create obligations under customary international law.

Finally, there is nothing in the United Nations Charter, or in rules of customary international law embodied in it, that per se precludes the use of nuclear weapons. For example, States may use force when authorized by the Security Council under Chapter VII or in the exercise of individual or collective self-defense. The exercise of self-defense is subject to the rules of necessity and proportionality, but the application of those rules to any use of nuclear weapons depends on the precise circumstances involved and cannot be judged in the abstract.

C. The Law of Armed Conflict Does Not Prohibit the Use of Nuclear Weapons

The United States has long taken the position that various principles of the international law of armed conflict would apply to the use of nuclear weapons as well as to other means and methods of warfare. This in no way means, however, that the use of nuclear weapons is precluded by the law of war. As the following will demonstrate, the issue of the legality depends on the precise circumstances involved in any particular use of a nuclear weapon.

It has been argued that the use of nuclear weapons is inherently precluded by the principles of international humanitarian law, regardless of the circumstances of their use. It seems to be assumed that any use of nuclear weapons would inevitably escalate into a massive strategic nuclear exchange, with the deliberate destruction of the population centers of the opposing sides.

Such assumptions are speculative in the extreme, and cannot be the basis for judgments by the Court on the legality of hypothetical uses of nuclear weapons that otherwise comply with the principles of international humanitarian law. In fact, any serious analysis of the legality of a hypothetical use of nuclear weapons would of necessity have to consider the precise circumstances of that use. Such circumstances cannot be evaluated in the abstract, and any attempt by the Court to do so would, in our view, be inappropriate.

Various arguments have been advanced in support of the conclusion that the use of nuclear weapons is precluded by the law of armed conflict. In the following, we shall consider these arguments in turn and indicate why we believe each to be incorrect.

* * * *

6. 1977 Additional Protocol I. Additional Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions contains a number of new rules on means and methods of warfare, which of course apply only to States that ratify Protocol I. (For example, the provisions on reprisals and the protection of the environment are new rules that have not been incorporated into customary law.) It is, however, clear from the negotiating and ratification record of Protocol I that the new rules contained in the Protocol were not intended to apply to nuclear weapons.

At the outset of the negotiations that led to Protocol I, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) stated that:

> Prohibitions relating to atomic, bacteriological and chemical warfare are subjects of international agreements or negotiations by governments, and in submitting these draft

> Additional Protocols the ICRC does not intend to broach these problems.

Explicit statements to the same effect were made during the negotiations by various delegations, including France, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Furthermore, in creating an ad hoc committee to consider specific restrictions on the use of Conventional weapons thought to present special dangers to the civilian population, the Conference rejected a proposal to expand the scope of this study to nuclear weapons. The Committee concluded that the predominant view was acceptance of "the limitation of the work of this Conference to conventional weapons", noting in particular the important function of nuclear weapons in deterring the outbreak of armed conflict.

Nevertheless, in light of the importance of this point, a number of States made clear formal statements upon signature or ratification emphasizing that the new rules adopted in the Protocol would not apply to nuclear weapons. For example, the signature of the United Kingdom was based on the formal understanding that:

> . . . the new rules introduced by the Protocol are not intended to have any effect on and do not regulate or prohibit the use of nuclear weapons.

Similar express formal statements have been made on signature or ratification by Belgium, Canada, Italy, Germany, the Netherlands, Spain and the United States.

To our knowledge, no State made any comment or objection to any of these formal and clear statements and declarations, nor did any State express a contrary view in connection with its own signature or ratification of Protocol I. In short, the record of signature and ratification of the Protocol reflect a manifest understanding that nuclear weapons were not prohibited or restricted by the new rules established by the Protocol.

This conclusion is consistent with the analysis of those experts on international humanitarian law who are best informed on the Conference's work. For example, the Commentary of the ICRC concluded: that "there is no doubt that during the four sessions of the Conference agreement was reached not to discuss nuclear weapons"; that the principles reaffirmed in the Protocol "do not allow the conclusion that nuclear weapons are prohibited as such by international humanitarian law"; and that "the hypothesis that States acceding to the Protocol bind themselves without wishing to—or even without knowing—with regard to such an important question as the use of nuclear weapons, is not acceptable." Likewise, the extensive commentary of Bothe, Partsch and Solf on the Protocols [New Rules for Victims of International Armed Conflict (1982)] concludes that the negotiating record "shows a realization by the Conference that the scope of its work excluded the special problems of the use of nuclear weapons."

* * * *

9. Reprisals. It has been argued that the use of nuclear weapons would not be consistent with the law of reprisals. For the purpose of the law of armed conflict, reprisals are lawful acts of retaliation in the form of conduct that would otherwise be unlawful, resorted to by one belligerent in response to violations of the law of war by another belligerent. Such reprisals would be lawful if conducted in accordance with the applicable principles governing belligerent reprisals. Specifically, the reprisals must be taken with the intent to cause the enemy to cease violations of the law of armed conflict, other means of securing compliance should be exhausted, and the reprisals must be proportionate to the violations. As in the case of other requirements of the law of armed conflict, a judgment about compliance of any use of nuclear weapons with these requirements would have to be made on the basis of the actual circumstances in each case, and could not be made in advance or in the abstract. (Of course, as shown elsewhere in this submission, possible lawful use of nuclear weapons is not limited to reprisals.)

Various provisions of Additional Protocol I contain prohibitions on reprisals against specific types of persons or objects, including the civilian population or individual civilians (Article 51(6)), civilian objects (Article 52(1)), cultural objects and places or worship (Article 53 (c)), objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population (Article 54(4)), the natural environment (Article 55(2)), and works and installations containing dangerous forces (Article 56(4)). These are among the new rules established by the Protocol that, as explained above, do not apply to nuclear weapons.

10. Neutrality. It has been asserted that the rules of neutrality in the law of armed conflict apply to and prohibit the use of nuclear weapons. However, the principle of neutrality is not a broad guarantee to neutral States of immunity from the effects of war, whether economic or environmental. Its purpose was to preclude military invasion or bombardment of neutral territory, and otherwise to define complementary rights and obligations of neutrals and belligerents. We are aware of no case in which a belligerent has been held responsible for collateral damage to neutral territory for lawful acts of war committed outside that territory.

Further, the argument that the principle of neutrality prohibits the use of nuclear weapons is evidently based on the assertion that the use of such weapons would inevitably cause severe damage in the territory of neutral States. This assumption is incorrect and in any event highly speculative. The Court could not find that such damage would occur without knowing the precise circumstances of a particular use. Like any other weapon, nuclear weapons could be used to violate neutrality, but this in no way means that nuclear weapons are prohibited per se by neutrality principles.

* * * *

On July 8, 1996, the ICJ issued two decisions, one with respect to the request made by the WHO, and the other with respect to the request made by the General Assembly. As to the WHO's request, the ICJ found that the WHO lacked competence to inquire into the legality of the use of nuclear weapons because that question falls outside the scope of the WHO's mandate. The WHO is concerned not with the use of nuclear weapons itself, but with the effects of such use. Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict, 1996 I.C.J. 93 (July 8).

With respect to the General Assembly's request, however, the ICJ rendered an advisory opinion. Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, 1996 I.C.J. 95 (July 8), available at www.icj-cij.org/icjwww/icases/iunan/iunanframe.htm. The ICJ decided that "the most directly relevant applicable law . . . is that relating to the use of force enshrined in the United Nations Charter and the law applicable in armed conflict which regulates the conduct of hostilities, together with any specific treaties on nuclear weapons that the Court might determine to be relevant." After reviewing this body of law, the Court found that neither customary nor conventional international law authorizes or prohibits the threat or use of nuclear weapons per se and that any use of nuclear weapons is governed by the restrictions on use of force in the UN Charter. Finding that the established principles and rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict apply to nuclear weapons, the Court noted that although "the use of such weapons in fact seems scarcely reconcilable with respect for such requirements," it did not have "sufficient elements to enable it to conclude with certainty that the use of nuclear weapons would necessarily be at variance with the principles and rules of law applicable in armed conflict in any circumstance." The Court concluded:

> 96. . . . [T]he Court cannot lose sight of the fundamental right of every State to survival, and thus its right to resort to self-defence, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, when its survival is at stake. Nor can it ignore the practice referred to as "policy of deterrence", to which an appreciable section of the international community adhered for many years. The Court also notes the reservations which certain nuclear-weapon States have appended to the undertakings they have given, notably under the Protocols to the Treaties of Tlatelolco and Rarotonga, and also under the declarations made by them in connection with the extension of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, not to resort to such weapons.
> 97. Accordingly, in view of the present state of international law viewed as a whole, as examined above by the Court, and of the elements of fact at its disposal, > the Court is led to observe that it cannot reach a definitive conclusion as to the legality or illegality of the use of nuclear weapons by a State in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which its very survival would be at stake.

b. Oil platforms (Iran v. U.S.)

On November 2, 1992, the Islamic Republic of Iran filed in the Registry of the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") an Application instituting proceedings against the United States of America concerning a dispute "aris[ing] out of the attack [on] and destruction of three offshore oil production complexes, owned and operated for commercial purposes by the National Iranian Oil Company, by several warships of the United States Navy on 19 October 1987 and 18 April 1988, respectively." In its Application, Iran contended that these acts constituted a "fundamental breach" of Articles I and X(1) of the Treaty of Amity, Economic Relations and Consular Rights between the United States of America and Iran, signed in Tehran on August 15, 1955, entered into force June 16, 1957, and of "international law." Iran relied on Article XXI, paragraph 2, of the treaty as the basis for the Court's jurisdiction. Iran's application asked for reparations "in an amount to be determined by the Court at a subsequent stage of the proceedings" and "any other remedy the Court may deem appropriate." In its Memorial, Iran added a claim of violation of Article IV of the treaty.

The Court's judgment on U.S. preliminary objections, issued December 12, 1996, and its order on a counter-claim by the United States, issued March 10, 1998, are addressed below. The Court issued its judgment on the merits in 2003, denying both Iran's claim and the U.S. counterclaim. The 2003 judgment contains a summary of the detailed facts relevant to Iran's claims and U.S. counterclaim. See Digest 2003 at 1036–66. Pleadings, decisions, and transcripts of oral proceedings in the case are available at www.icj-cij.org.

(1) Jurisdiction

In Preliminary Objections filed December 16, 1993, the United States raised a preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of the Court. pursuant to Article 79, paragraph 1 of the Rules of the Court. The United States argued that the Court lacked jurisdiction because Iran's claims in fact raised issues relating to the use of force:

> Although Iran seeks to characterize this case as one involving violations of the 1955 Treaty, it is clear from its Application and Memorial that Iran is attempting to use the Treaty in order to bring before the Court claims that the United States violated provisions of the United Nations Charter and principles of customary international law relating to the use of force by one state against another. As Iran is well aware, the Court has no jurisdiction to hear such complaints against the United States. Iran's efforts to recast the 1995 Treaty, addressing purely commercial and consular matters as addressing the fundamental issues of war and peace fly in the face of the terms of the 1955 Treaty and its history as well as the jurisprudence of the Court.

The United States denied that its actions had violated any of the "conventions, principles, or rules of customary international law" asserted by Iran, but in any event, since "there is no claim that the Court has jurisdiction under Article 36(2) of the statute of the Court," its consideration of Iran's application was "limited to alleged violations of the terms of the 1955 Treaty." Turning to the 1955 Treaty, the United States argued that the Court lacked jurisdiction as alleged by Iran under Articles I, IV(1), or X(1) of the Treaty, because "[e]ven a cursory review of these articles . . . shows that they have no reasonable connection to the incidents of 19 October 1987 and 18 April 1988." Oral proceedings on the U.S. preliminary objections were held September 16 and 24, 1996.

On December 12, 1996, the ICJ issued a Preliminary Opinion, concluding that it had jurisdiction over Iran's claim under Article X(1), but not under Article I or IV. The Court rejected the U.S. position that Iran's claims in fact raised issues relating to the use of force, concluding that "[a] violation of the rights of one party under the Treaty by means of the use of force is as unlawful as would be a violation by administrative decision or by any other means. Matters relating to the use of force are therefore not per se excluded from the reach of the Treaty of 1955."

The Court then turned to the U.S. argument that Iran's claims were irrelevant to the subject matter contemplated by the Treaty. Article I of the Treaty provides that "[t]here shall be firm and enduring peace and sincere friendship between the United States . . . and Iran." The Court rejected Iran's contention that the language imposed "actual obligations on the Contracting Parties" rather than constituting, in the words of the United States, a "statement of aspiration":

> . . . [T]he Court considers that the objective of peace and friendship proclaimed in Article I of the Treaty of 1955 is such as to throw light on the interpretation of the other Treaty provisions, and in particular of Articles IV and X. Article I is thus not without legal significance for such an interpretation, but cannot, taken in isolation, be a basis for the jurisdiction of the Court.

Paragraph 31.

As to Article IV(1), which provides for reciprocal treatment of nationals and companies of each party, the Court concluded that "these detailed provisions concern the treatment by each party of the nationals and companies of the other party, as well as their property and enterprises. Such provisions do not cover the actions carried out in this case by the United States against Iran. Article IV, paragraph 1, thus does not lay down any norms applicable to this particular case. This Article cannot therefore form the basis of the Court's jurisdiction." Paragraph 36.

Article X(1) provides that "[b]etween the territories of the two High Contracting parties there shall be freedom of commerce and navigation." The United States argued that Iran did not allege action by the United States to hinder the freedom of maritime commerce: "[q]uite to the contrary, all of the actions by the United States were taken to advance freedom of navigation, consistent with the views expressed by the Security Council in Resolution 552." While not deciding the meaning of Article X, the Court concluded that "there exists between the Parties a dispute as to the interpretation and the application of [this provision]; and that as a consequence the Court has jurisdiction to entertain this dispute." Paragraph 53.

The United States had also asserted that "[a]ny doubts as to the applicability of the 1955 Treaty to Iran's claims is dispelled by Article XX of the Treaty, paragraph (1) which provides: "1. The present Treaty shall not preclude the application of measures: . . . (d) necessary . . . to protect [a party's] essential security interests." The Court rejected this argument as a basis for challenging jurisdiction, concluding that "Article XX, paragraph 1(d), does not restrict its jurisdiction in the present case, but is confined to affording the Parties a possible defence on the merits to be used should the occasion arise." Paragraph 20.

The Court did not rule at this time on the U.S. assertions that its actions were necessary to the protection of national interests and self defense and therefore consistent with Article XX of the Treaty.

(2) U.S. counterclaim

The United States filed its counter-memorial on June 23, 1997, including in it a counterclaim asking the Court to find that "in attacking vessels, laying mines in the Gulf and otherwise engaging in military actions in 1987–1988 that were dangerous and detrimental to maritime commerce," Iran breached its obligations to the United States under Article X of the 1955 Treaty and is under an obligation to make "full reparation to the United States for violating the 1955 Treaty in a form and amount to be determined by the Court at a subsequent stage of the proceedings."

By Order of March 10, 1998, the Court held that the counter-claim presented by the United States in its Counter-Memorial was admissible as such and formed part of the proceedings. In so doing, it rejected Iran's argument that the counterclaim did not meet the requirements of Article 80 of the Rules of Court concerning "jurisdiction" and "direct connection." The Court found that the actions alleged by the United States were "capable of falling within the scope of Article X, paragraph 1, of the 1955 Treaty as interpreted by the Court" and that the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the counterclaim "in so far as the facts alleged may have prejudiced the freedoms guaranteed" by that provision. It also found that the claims of the two Parties "rest on facts of the same nature" and "form part of the same factual complex," and that the Parties "pursue the same legal aim, namely the establishment of legal responsibility for violations of the 1955 Treaty." Paragraph 38. Finding further that the counterclaim was "directly connected with the subject-matter of the claims of Iran, Paragraph 39, the Court concluded that the counterclaim "satisfies the conditions set forth in Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Rules of court." Paragraph 40.

7. Conventional Weapons Convention and Protocols

a. Transmittal of convention and two protocols

On May 12, 1994, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects ("CCW"), together with its Protocol on Non-Detectable Fragments ("Protocol I") and its Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby-Traps and Other Devices ("Protocol II"). S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–25. See also 88 Am. J. Int'l. L. 719, 748 (1994); 19 I.L.M 1524 (1980). Excerpts from the President's letter of transmittal and from the report of the Department of State submitting the treaty to the President follow. The statement of Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger at the signing of the convention, January 13, 1993, and related documents are all available at 4 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 3 at 26 (Jan. 18, 1993); see also fact sheet at 6 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 11 at 193 (Mar. 13, 1995), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed To Be Excessively Injurious or To Have Indiscriminate Effects (the Convention), and two accompanying Protocols on Non-Detectable Fragments (Protocol I) and on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby-Traps and Other Devices (Protocol II). Also transmitted for the information of the Senate is the report of the Department of State with respect to the Convention and its Protocols.

The Convention was concluded at Geneva on October 10, 1980, was signed by the United States on April 8, 1982, and entered into force on December 2, 1983. More than 30 countries have become Party to the Convention. It constitutes a modest but significant humanitarian effort to protect the victims of armed conflict from the effects of particular weapons. It will supplement prohibitions or restrictions on the use of weapons contained in existing treaties and customary international law, including the prohibition on the use in war of chemical and bacteriological weapons in the Geneva Protocol of June 17, 1925. It will provide a basis for effective controls on the widespread and indiscriminate use of landmines, which have caused widespread civilian casualties in recent conflicts.

The Convention and its Protocols restrict, for humanitarian reasons, the use in armed conflicts of three specific types of conventional weapons. Protocol I prohibits the use of weapons that rely on fragments not detectable by X-rays. Protocol II regulates the use of landmines and similar devices for the purpose of reducing the danger to the civilian population caused by the indiscriminate use of such weapons, and prohibits certain types of booby-traps. Protocol III restricts the use of incendiary weapons in populated areas.

The United States signed the Convention on April 8, 1982. Since then, it has been subject to detailed interagency reviews. Based on these reviews, I have concluded that the United States should become a Party to the Convention and to its Protocols I and II. As described in the report of the Secretary of State, there are concerns about the acceptability of Protocol III from a military point of view that require further examination. I therefore recommend that in the meantime the United States exercise its right under Article 4 of the Convention to accept only Protocols I and II.

I believe that United States ratification of the Convention and its Protocols I and II will underscore our commitment to the principle that belligerents must refrain from weapons or methods of warfare that are inhumane or unnecessary from a military standpoint. . . .

More specifically, by becoming Party, we will encourage the observance by other countries of restrictions on landmines and other weapons that U.S. Armed Forces and those of our allies already observe as a matter of humanity, common sense, and sound military doctrine. The United States will be able to take the lead in negotiating improvements to the Mines Protocol so as to deal more effectively with the immense threat to the civilian population caused by the indiscriminate use of those weapons. It will strengthen our efforts to encourage adoption of a moratorium on export of all anti-personnel landmines.

I therefore recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to the Convention and its Protocols I and II and give its advice and consent to ratification subject to the conditions contained in the report of the Department of State.

* * * *

The Convention is part of the legal regime dealing with the conduct of international armed conflict, including the four 1949 Geneva Conventions on the Protection of the Victims of War and the 1899 and 1907 Hague Conventions Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land. These significant treaties attempt to reduce the suffering caused by armed conflicts and to provide protection to the victims of war, including the civilian population and members of the armed forces who have been wounded or captured. They are an attempt to reduce the inevitable suffering and damage present during any war in a manner consistent with legitimate military requirements.

* * * *

At the time the Convention was negotiated, there were already a number of international rules on the use of particular weapons in time of war. These include: the prohibition in the 1907 Hague Regulations on the Laws and Customs of War on the use of poison or poisoned weapons and the use of "* * * arms, projectiles, or material calculated to cause unnecessary suffering"; the prohibition on explosive anti-personnel projectiles in the 1868 St. Petersburg Declaration; the prohibition on expanding (or "dum-dum") bullets in the 1899 Hague Declaration; and the important prohibition on the use of chemical and bacteriological weapons contained in the Geneva Protocol of June 17, 1925. However, these rules did not significantly affect the use of landmines and incendiaries, which were commonly thought to present special risks to the civilian population.

* * * *

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF PROVISIONS

* * * *

One provision in these articles is objectionable. Paragraph 4 of Article 7 of that article provides that the Convention applies to the wars of "national liberation" identified in Article 1(4) of Protocol I Additional to the 1949 Geneva Conventions. (Article 1(4) of Additional Protocol I would apply the rules of international armed conflict to any armed conflict "in which peoples are fighting against colonial domination and alien occupation and against racist regimes in the exercise of their right of self-determination. * * *") In the case of a state that is party to the Convention but not to Additional Protocol I, an "authority" representing a "liberation movement" would, under this provision, be entitled to the protections of the 1949 Geneva Conventions (including those conferring prisoner-of-war status) if it accepts and applies those Conventions.

In our view, Article 1(4) of Additional Protocol I injects subjective and politically controversial standards into international humanitarian law and undermines the important traditional distinction between international and non-international armed conflicts. Accordingly, the United States should not accept the validity of Article 1(4) as a basis for the application of the rules of humanitarian law. We recommend that the United States declare, at the time of ratification of the Convention, that Article 7 will have no effect. During the coming Review Conference on the Convention, it is our intention to support an amendment extending the Convention to all internal armed conflicts. This would have the effect of applying the requirements of the Convention to all armed conflicts, whatever their political character, without giving special preference and status to "liberation wars."

To demonstrate our support for humanitarian concerns, we should formally state, at the time of U.S. ratification, our intention to apply the provisions of the Convention to all international and non-international armed conflicts, as defined in common Articles 2 and 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

* * * *

The Senate adopted a resolution giving advice and consent to ratification of the Convention and the two protocols, subject to certain conditions, on March 24, 1995. 141 CONG. REC. S4568 (daily ed. Mar. 24, 1995), as excerpted below. The CCW and two protocols entered into force for the United States on September 25, 1995.

---

* * * *

(a) The advice and consent of the Senate . . . is given subject to the following conditions, which shall be included in the instrument of ratification of the Convention:

(1) RESERVATION.—Article 7(4)(b) of the Convention shall not apply with respect to the United States.
(2) DECLARATION.—The United States declares, with reference to the scope of application defined in Article 1 of the Convention, that the United States will apply the provisions of the Convention, Protocol I, and Protocol II to all armed conflicts referred to in Articles 2 and 3 common to the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949.
(3) UNDERSTANDING.-The United States understands that Article 6(1) of Protocol II does not prohibit the adaptation for use as booby-traps of portable objects created for a purpose other than as a booby-trap if the adaptation does not violate paragraph (1)(b) of the Article.
(4) UNDERSTANDING.—The United States considers that the fourth paragraph of the preamble to the Convention, which refers to the substance of provisions of Article 35(3) and Article 55(1) of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, applies only to States which have accepted those provisions.

(b) The advice and consent of the Senate . . . is given subject to the following conditions, which are not required to be included in the instrument of ratification of the Convention:

(1) DECLARATION.-Any amendment to the Convention, Protocol I, or Protocol II . . . any adherence by the United States to Protocol III to the Convention, or the adoption of any additional protocol to the Convention, will enter into force with respect to the United States only pursuant to the treaty-making power of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as set forth in Article II, Section 2, Clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States.
(2) DECLARATION.—The Senate notes the statements by the President and the Secretary of State in the letters accompanying transmittal of the Convention to the Senate that there are concerns about the acceptability of Protocol III to the Convention from a military point of view that require further examination and that Protocol III should be given further study by the United States Government on an interagency basis. Accordingly, the Senate urges the President to complete the process of review with respect to Protocol III and to report the results to the Senate on the date of submission to the Senate of any amendments which may be concluded at the 1995 international conference for review of the Convention.

b. Additional and amended protocols to the CCW

As suggested in the President's transmittal of the CCW, the United States led efforts to strengthen the Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby-Traps and Other Devices. This U.S.-led effort resulted in the amended Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby-Traps and Other Devices, adopted at Geneva on May 3, 1996 ("amended Mines Protocol") which places tighter restrictions on landmine use and transfer. On January 7, 1997 President Clinton transmitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification the amended Mines Protocol, along with two other Protocols: the Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Incendiary Weapons, adopted at Geneva on October 10, 1980 ("Incendiary Weapons Protocol" or "Protocol III") and the Protocol on Blinding Laser Weapons, adopted at Geneva on May 3, 1996 ("Blinding Laser Protocol"). S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–1 (1997). The President's letter of transmittal is excerpted below.

* * * *

The most important of these Protocols is the amended Mines Protocol. It is an essential step forward in dealing with the problem of anti-personnel landmines (APL) and in minimizing the very severe casualties to civilians that have resulted from their use. It is an important precursor to the total prohibition of these weapons that the United States seeks.

Among other things, the amended Mines Protocol will do the following: (1) expand the scope of the original Protocol to include internal armed conflicts, where most civilian mine casualties have occurred; (2) require that all remotely delivered anti-personnel mines be equipped with self-destruct devices and backup self-deactivation features to ensure that they do not pose a long-term threat to civilians; (3) require that all nonremotely delivered anti-personnel mines that are not equipped with such devices be used only within controlled, marked, and monitored minefields to protect the civilian population in the area; (4) require that all anti-personnel mines be detectable using commonly available technology to make the task of mine clearance easier and safer; (5) require that the party laying mines assume responsibility for them to ensure against their irresponsible and indiscriminate use; and (6) provide more effective means for dealing with compliance problems to ensure that these restrictions are actually observed. These objectives were all endorsed by the Senate in its Resolution of Ratification of the Convention in March 1995.

The amended Mines Protocol was not as strong as we would have preferred. In particular, its provisions on verification and compliance are not as rigorous as we had proposed, and the transition periods allowed for the conversion or elimination of certain non-compliant mines are longer than we thought necessary. . . .

Nonetheless, I am convinced that this amended Protocol will, if generally adhered to, save many lives and prevent many tragic injuries. It will, as well, help to prepare the ground for the total prohibition of anti-personnel landmines to which the United States is committed. In this regard, I cannot overemphasize how seriously the United States takes the goal of eliminating APL entirely. The carnage and devastation caused by anti-personnel landmines—the hidden killers that murder and maim more than 25,000 people every year—must end.

On May 16, 1996, I launched an international effort to this end. This initiative sets out to concrete path to a global ban on anti-personnel landmines and is one of my top arms control priorities. At the same time, the policy recognizes that the United States has international commitments and responsibilities that must be taken into account in any negotiations on a total ban. As our work on this initiative progresses, we will continue to consult with the Congress.

The second of these Protocols—the Protocol on Incendiary Weapons—is part of the original Convention but was not sent to the Senate for advice and consent with the other 1980 Protocols in 1994 because of concerns about the acceptability of the Protocol from a military point of view. Incendiary weapons have significant potential military value, particularly with respect to flammable military targets that cannot so readily be destroyed with conventional explosives.

At the same time, these weapons can be misused in a manner that could cause heavy civilian casualties. In particular, the Protocol prohibits the use of air-delivered incendiary weapons against targets located in a city, town, village, or other concentration of civilians, a practice that caused very heavy civilian casualties in past conflicts.

The Executive branch has given very careful study to the Incendiaries Protocol and has developed a reservation that would, in our view, make it acceptable from a broader national security perspective. This proposed reservation, the text of which appears in the report of the Department of State, would reserve the right to use incendiaries against military objectives located in concentrations of civilians where it is judged that such use would cause fewer casualties and less collateral damage than alternative weapons.

The third of the Protocols—the new Protocol on Blinding Lasers—prohibits the use or transfer of laser weapons specifically designed to cause permanent blindness to unenhanced vision (that is, to the naked eye or to the eye with corrective devices). The Protocol also requires Parties to take all feasible precautions in the employment of other laser systems to avoid the incidence of such blindness.

These blinding lasers are not needed by our military forces. They are potential weapons of the future, and the United States is committed to preventing their emergence and use. The United States supports the adoption of this new Protocol.

On May 20, 1999, the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification of the amended Mines Protocol subject to one reservation, nine understandings and 13 declarations binding on the President, excerpted below. 145 CONG. REC. S5780–3 (1999). The protocol entered into force for the United States on November 24, 1999. The Senate took no action on the other two pending protocols.

The Senate's advice and consent to the ratification of the Amended Mines Protocol is subject to the reservation, which shall be included in the United States instrument of ratification and shall be binding upon the President, that the United States reserves the right to use other devices (as defined in Article 2(5) of the Amended Mines Protocol) to destroy any stock of food or drink that is judged likely to be used by an enemy military force, if due precautions are taken for the safety of the civilian population.

* * * *

The Senate's advice and consent to the ratification of the Amended Mines Protocol is subject to the following understandings, which shall be included in the United States instrument of ratification and shall be binding upon the President:

(1) UNITED STATES COMPLIANCE.—The United States understands that—

(A) any decision by any military commander, military personnel, or any other person responsible for planning, authorizing, or executing military action shall only be judged on the basis of that person's assessment of the information reasonably available to the person at the time the person planned, authorized, or executed the action under review, and shall not be judged on the basis of information that comes to light after the action under review was taken; and

(B) Article 14 of the Amended Mines Protocol (insofar as it relates to penal sanctions) shall apply only in a situation in which an individual—

(i) knew, or should have known, that his action was prohibited under the Amended Mines Protocol;

(ii) intended to kill or cause serious injury to a civilian; and

(iii) knew or should have known, that the person he intended to kill or cause serious injury was a civilian.

(2) Effective Exclusion.—The United States understands that, for the purposes of Article 5(6)(b) of the Amended Mines Protocol, the maintenance of observation over avenues of approach where mines subject to that Article are deployed constitutes one acceptable form of monitoring to ensure the effective exclusion of civilians.

(3) Historic Monuments.—The United States understands that Article 7(1)(i) of the Amended Mines Protocol refers only to a limited class of objects that, because of their clearly recognizable characteristics and because of their widely recognized importance, constitute a part of the cultural or spiritual heritage of peoples.

(4) Legitimate Military Objectives.—The United States understands that an area of land itself can be a legitimate military objective for the purpose of the use of landmines, if its neutralization or denial, in the circumstances applicable at the time, offers a military advantage.

(5) Peace Treaties.—The United States understands that the allocation of responsibilities for landmines in Article 5(2)(b) of the Amended Mines Protocol does not preclude agreement, in connection with peace treaties or similar arrangements, to allocate responsibilities under that Article in a manner that respects the essential spirit and purpose of the Article.

(6) Booby-Traps and Other Devices.—For the purposes of the Amended Mines Protocol, the United States understands that—

(A) the prohibition contained in Article 7(2) of the Amended Mines Protocol does not preclude the expedient adaptation or adaptation in advance of other objects for use as booby-traps or other devices;

(B) a trip-wired hand grenade shall be considered a "booby-trap" under Article 2(4) of the Amended Mines Protocol and shall not be considered a "mine" or an "anti-personnel mine" under Article 2(1) or Article 2(3), respectively; and

(C) none of the provisions of the Amended Mines Protocol, including Article 2(5), applies to hand grenades other than trip-wired hand grenades.

(7) NON-LETHAL CAPABILITIES.—The United States understands that nothing in the Amended Mines Protocol may be construed as restricting or affecting in any way non-lethal weapon technology that is designed to temporarily disable, stun, signal the presence of a person, or operate in any other fashion, but not to cause permanent incapacity.
(8) INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL JURISDICTION.—The United States understands that the provisions of Article 14 of the Amended Mines Protocol relating to penal sanctions refer to measures by the authorities of States Parties to the Protocol and do not authorize the trial of any person before an international criminal tribunal. The United States shall not recognize the jurisdiction of any international tribunal to prosecute a United States citizen for a violation of the Protocol or the Convention on Conventional Weapons.

* * * *

The Senate's advice and consent to the ratification of the Amended Mines Protocol is subject to the following conditions, which shall be binding upon the President:
(1) PURSUIT DETERRENT MUNITION.—

(A) UNDERSTANDING.—The Senate understands that nothing in the Amended Mines Protocol restricts the possession or use of the Pursuit Deterrent Munition, which is in compliance with the provisions in the Technical Annex.

8. Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict and The Hague Protocol

On January 6, 1999, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict ("Convention"), and for advice and consent to accession to the Hague Protocol, both concluded on May 14, 1954, and entered into force on August 7, 1956, 249 U.N.T.S. 240. In his transmittal letter, the President also reiterated support for the prompt approval of Protocol II Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, concluded at Geneva on June 10, 1977, reprinted in 38 I.L.M. 769 (1999). The May 12, 1998, report of the Department of State submitting the instruments to the President and included with the transmittal in S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–1 (1999) is excerpted below. Senate action was still pending as this volume was going to press.

The Hague Convention—Background

The Hague Convention is part of the legal regime dealing with the conduct of armed conflict, both international and non-international. It constitutes the first comprehensive treaty for the protection of cultural property during armed conflict.

A number of provisions for the protection of cultural property were included in law of war agreements prior to World War II, but the experience of that war clearly demonstrated a need for more effective and comprehensive protections. Accordingly, a diplomatic conference was convened at The Hague in 1954 under the auspices of UNESCO (the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) to negotiate a new instrument.

The United States participated actively in the negotiation and drafting of the Convention. The U.S. delegation favored its ratification by the United States and the head of the delegation signed the Convention. However, after review of the Convention, certain concerns were raised and it was not submitted to the Senate. A number of these concerns have not been borne out in the decades of experience with the Convention since its entry into force. U.S. military forces have not only followed but exceeded its terms in the conduct of military operations. The minor concerns that remain relate to ambiguities in language that should be addressed through appropriate understandings or conditions as set forth herein and detailed in the section-by-section analysis.

Historically, the United States has recognized special protection for cultural property in armed conflict. The U.S. Army codified the obligation to protect cultural property in Articles 34–36 of General Order No. 100 (1863), which was regarded as a reflection of the customary practice of nations, including, as it did, provision for waiver of the protection in the event of military necessity.

The essence of the position historically taken by U.S. military forces is contained in a memorandum issued on December 29, 1943, by General Dwight D. Eisenhower to U.S. forces in Italy:

> Today we are fighting in a country which has contributed a great deal to our cultural inheritance, a country rich in monuments which by their creation helped and now in their old age illustrate the growth of the civilization which is ours. We are bound to respect those monuments so far as war allows.
>
> If we have to choose between destroying a famous building and sacrificing our own men, then our men's lives count infinitely more and the building must go. But the choice is not always so clear-cut as that. In many cases the monuments can be spared without any detriment to operational needs. Nothing can stand against the argument of military necessity. That is an accepted principle. But the phrase "military necessity" is sometimes used where it would be more truthful to speak of military convenience or even personal convenience. I do not want it to cloak slackness or indifference.
> It is the responsibility of higher commanders to determine * * * the locations of historical monuments whether they be immediately ahead of our front lines or in areas occupied by us. This information passed to lower echelons through normal channels places the responsibility on all commanders of complying with the spirit of this letter.

For practical purposes, U.S. military operations since the promulgation of the Convention have been entirely consistent with its provisions. During Operation Desert Storm, for example, intelligence resources were utilized to look for cultural property in order to properly identify it. Target intelligence officers identified cultural property or cultural property sites in Iraq; a "no-strike" target list was prepared, placing known cultural property off limits from attack, as well as some otherwise legitimate targets if their attack might place nearby cultural property at risk of damage.

In attacking legitimate targets in the vicinity of cultural objects, to the extent possible, weapons were selected that would accomplish destruction of the target while minimizing the risk of collateral damage to nearby cultural or civilian property. However, the proximity of military objectives to cultural property did not render those military objectives immune from attack, nor would it under the Convention.

The Hague Convention—Summary

The Convention consists of a preamble, seven chapters, final provisions, and regulations for the execution of the Convention.

Primarily, the Convention elaborates obligations contained in earlier treaties, including the prohibition on attacks directed against cultural property and against misappropriation of such property. (These principles may be found in Articles 27 and 56, respectively, of the Annex to the 1907 Hague Convention IV.) It also provides expanded protection by establishing a regime for special protection of a highly limited category of cultural property included on an International Register. The Convention provides both for preparations in peacetime for safeguarding cultural property against foreseeable effects of armed conflict, and also for respect for such property in time of war or military occupation. In conformity with the customary practice of nations, the protection of cultural property is not absolute. If cultural property is used for military purposes or in the event of imperative military necessity, the protection afforded by the Convention is waived in accordance with the Convention's terms.

The Hague Protocol

The Protocol to the Convention was concluded on the same day as the Convention itself, but is a separate agreement from the Convention. The Hague Protocol contains provisions which require the prevention of exportation of cultural property from occupied territory, and the taking into custody and return of exported cultural property. The Hague Protocol also contains provisions for the deposit of cultural property by one Party in the territory of another Party for protective purposes and the return of such property.

The United States did not sign the Hague Protocol in 1954 because of certain objections to both the drafting and substantive provisions of Section I of the Hague Protocol, particularly the provision requiring indemnification by an occupying Party to "holders in good faith" of cultural property exported from territory occupied by it. Regarding the drafting, there was concern that, for example, the term "export" was undefined and invited confusion and debate. The main substantive provision of concern dealt with the obligation of indemnification. With respect to this indemnification obligation, concern centered on the complexities and burdens of implementation under both U.S. and other legal systems. These objections require further consideration.

Given these objections, it is our view that the United States should declare, at the time of accession of the Protocol, that the United States will not be bound by the provisions of Section I of the Hague Protocol. This procedure is specifically permitted by Section III, paragraph 9 of the Hague Protocol.

Conclusion

The United States has participated actively in all of the significant international negotiations on the laws of armed conflict. Each treaty produced has received extensive inter-agency review to determine whether it is consistent with our humanitarian values and legitimate military requirements and whether the United States should become a Party. This is true also for the Hague Cultural Property Convention and the Hague Protocol and I believe the United States should proceed now with ratification and accession.

Following the Gulf War, Congress expressed interest in the issue of cultural protection in the context of a request for a review of the matter by the Senate Committee on Appropriations in its report on the Department of Defense Appropriations Bill, 1992 (Senate Report 102–154, page 46).

In addition, there has been renewed interest in the Convention as the issues surrounding the disposition of Nazi assets from World War II have commanded increased attention. (The Convention, however, is understood not to apply retroactively and hence would have no legal impact on the matter. Nonetheless, our ratification at this time would underscore our commitment to the just resolution of this important issue.)

Also, there have been international meetings over the last four years to consider possible future amendments. These meetings will enter a more formal phase this year with a review conference of state parties to be held in the Spring of 1999. As only parties may adopt amendments, U.S. ratification would enable us to play an appropriate role in this initiative, as well as the future course of the Convention generally.

I believe that the Convention contains reasonable provisions which are already consistent with U.S. military policy and practices. Action by the United States to ratify the Convention will underscore our commitment to afford better protection to the world's cultural resources and advance efforts to promote its object and purpose.

The Department of State and the Department of Defense join in recommending that the Convention and the Hague Protocol be submitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification and accession at an early date, subject to the above understandings and declaration.

Protocol II Additional to the Geneva Conventions

In a letter dated January 29th, 1987, the Reagan Administration requested the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification of Protocol II. The Senate, however, did not act on Protocol II. I believe renewed consideration of this important law of war instrument is appropriate.

Protocol II deals with non-international armed conflict and, unlike its companion law of war agreement, Protocol I, which deals with international armed conflict, Protocol II has not been a source of controversy. Protocol I was not submitted for ratification at the time Protocol II was transmitted. This decision was based on certain military, humanitarian and terrorism-related objections.

With respect to Protocol II, we are not aware of any serious substantive objections to its ratification and believe its ratification would assist us in continuing to exercise leadership in the international community in matters relating to the law of war.

With respect to Protocol I, the comprehensive military review of all past military objections that you directed is underway. This review will take some time. It need not, however, delay progress on Protocol II, which essentially expands upon fundamental rules contained in the 1949 Geneva Conventions with respect to internal armed conflicts. In particular, Protocol II makes clear that any deliberate killing of a noncombatant in the course of a non-international armed conflict is a violation of the law of war, punishable as murder. Clearly, observance of these fundamental provisions in civil wars over the past several decades would have avoided many of the worst human tragedies we have witnessed.

Most of our closest allies have ratified Protocol II. Given our position of leadership in the law of war area, U.S. ratification would give a significant boost to the Protocol's visibility and would enhance efforts to further ease the suffering of war's victims—especially, in this case, civilian victims of internal armed conflicts.

I therefore recommend that you request the Senate renew its consideration of Protocol II and give its advice and consent to ratification, subject to the understandings and reservations that are described fully in the report attached to the original January 29, 1987 letter of transmittal to the 100th Congress (Treaty Doc. 100–2).

Section-by-Section Analysis of the Hague Convention and the Hague Protocol

* * * *

Article 4 requires Parties to ". . . respect cultural property . . . by refraining from any use of the property and its immediate surroundings or of the appliances in use for its protection for purposes which are likely to expose it to destruction or damage in the event of armed conflict. . . ."

In this regard, we recommend that the ratification of the Convention be subject to the following understanding:

> It is the understanding of the United States of America that, as is true for all civilian objects, the primary responsibility for the protection of cultural property rests with the party controlling that property, to ensure that it is properly identified and that it is not used for an unlawful purpose.

Article 11 introduces the notion of reciprocity into the arrangements for special protection. It specifies that if a Party fails to fulfill its obligations not to use protected property for military purposes or in the event of "exceptional cases of unavoidable military necessity," the protection may be lost. Special protection is thus limited. The "unavoidable military necessity" waiver, however, requires a determination "by the officer commanding a force the equivalent of a division in size or larger."

The criteria for special protection are relatively rigorous and, in practice there has been no proliferation of sites designated for special protection. In fact, only eight sites worldwide have been designated for special protection. All are located in Western Europe and include the Vatican and art storage areas in the Netherlands, Germany and Austria.

An early DoD concern which contributed to the decision not to submit the Convention during the 1950's derived from this Chapter. The concern was that the Kremlin would be designated for special protection to make it immune from attack. It was never so designated. Such a designation would, in any case, have been contrary to the terms of Chapter II and would not have prevented its attack in any case. No concern remains in this regard today.

However, there is a more realistic concern deriving from this Chapter. Due to ambiguous modifiers such as those in the Article 11 phrase " 'exceptional' cases of 'unavoidable' military necessity," the provisions may be misconstrued to impose an unreasonable and disproportionate responsibility on the attacker to avoid damage to cultural property. Clarification would help avoid a suggestion that strict compliance with the Convention would mean that any collateral damage would constitute a violation of the Convention. While such an interpretation would be entirely inconsistent with customary international law, the following understanding would confirm that the treaty conforms to customary international law and minimize possibilities of misinterpretation:

> It is the understanding of the United States of America that "special protection", as defined in Chapter II of the Convention, codifies customary international law in that it, first, prohibits the use of any cultural property to shield any legitimate military targets from attack, second, allows all property to be attacked using any lawful and proportionate means if required by military necessity and notwithstanding possible collateral damage to such property.

Accordingly, we recommend that the ratification of the Convention be subject to this understanding.

A like consideration, and one that pertains more broadly, is the possibility of failure of the custodian of cultural property to mark that property to facilitate its identification, or for persons planning an attack to be held to an unreasonable standard with respect to identification of all cultural property. In either case, the commander authorizing an attack is responsible only for acting on the basis of information reasonably available to him at the time of the attack; that is, there is no strict liability standard for decisions made in the fog of war. Given past misinterpretations of the law of war that might be asserted with respect to the Convention, we also believe the United States should include the following understanding, at the time of ratification of the Convention:

> It is the understanding of the United States of America that decisions by military commanders and others responsible for planning, deciding upon, and executing attacks can only be judged on the basis of their assessment of the information reasonably available to them at the relevant time.

Finally, it is clear from the negotiating record that the Convention applies only to situations in which conventional weapons could be used. Both the Conference and the Convention followed the same approach as other conferences on international humanitarian law in which the issue of weapons of mass destruction, such as nuclear weapons, was left aside. Accordingly, the United States should make clear that:

> It is the understanding of the United States of America, that the rules established by the Convention apply only to conventional weapons, and are without prejudice to the rules of international law governing other types of weapons, including nuclear weapons.

* * * *

The Protocol to the Convention contains provisions intended to prevent the exportation of cultural property from occupied territory. Section I obligates an occupying Party to prevent the exportation of cultural property from territory it occupies, and for each Party to take into its custody cultural property exported contrary to the Protocol, and to return such cultural property at the close of hostilities. An occupying power whose duty it was to prevent such exportation of cultural property is obligated to indemnify holders in good faith of the cultural property which has to be returned.

* * * *

We have certain concerns with respect to Section I of the Protocol. Indeed, the United States did not sign the Protocol in 1954 because of certain objections to both the drafting and substantive provisions of Section I of the Protocol. Regarding the drafting, there was concern that, for example, the term "export" was undefined and invited confusion and debate. Regarding the substance, the main objectionable provision, paragraph 4 of Section I, requires indemnification by an occupying state to "holders in good faith" of cultural property exported from territory occupied by it. Objections, in this regard, centered on the complexities and burdens of implementation under both U.S. and other legal systems.

Given these objections, it is our view that the United States should declare, at the time of accession to the Protocol, that the United States will not be bound by the provisions of Section I of the Protocol. This procedure is specifically permitted by Section III, paragraph 9 of the Protocol.

B. ARMS CONTROL & DISARMAMENT

1. START

Negotiations for what was to become the Treaty on the Reduction and Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms ("START") took place between the United States and the Soviet Union beginning in 1982 and culminated in the signing of the treaty in Moscow on July 31, 1991. Fact sheets released by the Department of State related to START are available at www.state.gov/www/global/arms/bureau_ac/factsheets_ac.html.

a. Transmittal for advice and consent to ratification

On November 25, 1991, President George H.W. Bush transmitted START to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. Brief excerpts from the report, included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–20 (1991), are set forth below. According to the President's transmittal letter, START incorporated "the most extensive verification regime in history." The letter continued:

> START represents a critical watershed in our long-term effort to stabilize the strategic balance through arms control. Stabilization of the strategic balance will help cement one of the most fundamental tenets of our preferred world order—that conflict must not and shall not be resolved through the use of nuclear weapons. Moreover, recent events underscore the need to ensure stability and to broaden the dialogue between our countries. Implementation of START would reinforce these efforts.

The transmittal included two annexes (on Agreed Statements and on Definitions); six protocols (on Conversion or Elimination, on Inspection, on Notification, on Throw-Weight, on Telemetry, and on the Joint Compliance and Inspection Commission); and the Memorandum of Understanding on the Establishment of Data Base Relating to [START], all integral parts of the treaty. The President also provided, for the information of the Senate, documents associated with, but not integral parts of, the treaty. Key features of the treaty were further outlined in a report of the Department of State accompanying the President's letter. Brief excerpts from the report follow (internal headings have been omitted). See also III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 3575–83 and 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 346, 354 (1992) for more extensive treatment.

* * * *

At the core of the Treaty is the obligation undertaken to reduce and limit ICBMs, ICBM launchers, SLBMs, SLBM launchers, heavy bombers, ICBM warheads, SLBM warheads, and heavy bomber armaments, such that, seven years after entry into force of the Treaty, the aggregate numbers of each of the Parties do not exceed: 1600 for deployed ICBMs and their associated launchers (including 154 for deployed heavy ICBMs and their associated launchers), deployed SLBMs and their associated launchers, and deployed heavy bombers; and 6000 for warheads attributed to deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers; including 4900 for warheads attributed to deployed ICBMs and deployed SLBMs, of which no more than 1100 can be attributed to deployed ICBMs on mobile launchers of ICBMs, and no more than 1540 attributed to deployed heavy ICBMs.

The Treaty provides for the reductions to take place in three phases—36, 60 and 84 months after entry into force of the Treaty—with separate aggregate limits for the first two phases, culminating in achievement of the full limits by the end of the third phase. (As [the President] stated on September 27, 1991, however, the United States will accelerate its elimination of ICBMs scheduled for deactivation once START is ratified.) The central limits also include a restriction on the aggregate throw-weight of deployed ICBMs and deployed SLBMs, which is to become effective seven years after entry into force of the Treaty.

The Definitions Annex of the Treaty is the Treaty glossary. . . .

The Treaty sets forth numerous prohibitions pertaining to strategic offensive arms. . . .

The Treaty contains special provisions for mobile ICBM launchers. . . .

The Memorandum of Understanding establishes a data base of information exchanged in accordance with the Treaty.

In order to provide assurance that each Party has met the various limits set forth in the Treaty, the Parties are required to eliminate specified Treaty-limited items or to convert them to items not governed by the Treaty's central limits in accordance with procedures established in the Treaty . . . The Conversion or Elimination Protocol sets forth specific means for conducting conversion or elimination of mobile ICBMs and their launchers, silo launchers and SLBM launchers, and heavy bombers and certain associated equipment and structures. . . .

The Parties are required to make on-board technical measurements and to broadcast all telemetric information obtained from such measurements during each flight test of an ICBM or SLBM. With limited exceptions, no activity, including encryption, encapsulation, or jamming, that denies full access to telemetric information during flight tests . . . is permitted. . . .

The Treaty provides for verification by national technical means of verification and prohibits use of measures of concealment or other measures that would interfere with such means. . . .

The Treaty contains the most extensive and intrusive inspection regime ever included in an arms control agreement. . . .

To promote the objectives and implementation of the provisions of the Treaty, the Parties have established the Joint Compliance and Inspection Commission (JCIC).

* * * *

The treaty is to remain in force for 15 years unless superseded earlier. . . .

The Treaty also provides that each Party may, in exercising its national sovereignty, withdraw from the Treaty if it decides that extraordinary events related to the subject matter of the Treaty have jeopardized its supreme interests.

b. Lisbon Protocol

On June 19, 1992, President George H.W. Bush transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Protocol to START, signed at Lisbon, Portugal, on May 23, 1992, by representatives of the United States, the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine ("Lisbon Protocol"). S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–32 (1992); see also 86 Am. J. Int'l L. 792, 799 (1992). The Protocol constituted an amendment to START and was designed to allow for implementation of the treaty following the dissolution of the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The President also transmitted for the information of the Senate letters containing legally binding commitments from the respective heads of state of the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, and Ukraine concerning the removal of nuclear weapons and strategic offensive arms from their respective territories. The President's transmittal letter was accompanied by a report of the Department of State, dated June 17, 1992, including an article-by-article analysis of the Protocol, and analyses of the three letters. Key sections of the report, included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–32, are excerpted below.

* * * *

. . . Shortly after submission of the START Treaty to the Senate, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was dissolved and was replaced with a number of independent states, four of which have strategic offensive arms and declared START-related facilities on their territories. The unprecedented chain of events surrounding the demise of the Soviet Union has resulted in a delay in consideration of the START Treaty by the Senate so that the necessary steps could be taken that would allow for implementation of the START Treaty under the changed political circumstances. The results of these efforts are a new Protocol to the START Treaty with associated letters, which enable and facilitate implementation of the START Treaty.

* * * *

THE PROTOCOL

All strategic offensive arms are based, and all declared START-related facilities are located, in four former Soviet republics: the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine. Each of theses states has consistently stated its intention to observe and implement the START Treaty. In order to give legal effect to these intentions in the changed political circumstances following the demise of the Soviet Union, the United States and the four former Soviet republics have signed the Protocol, which is an integral part of the START Treaty. Under the provision of the Protocol, each of the four states will become a Party to the START Treaty.

The Protocol provides that the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine together shall assume the obligations of the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics under the START Treaty. It obligates these four states to make such arrangements among themselves as are required to implement the START Treaty's limits and restrictions, to allow functioning of the verifications provisions of the START Treaty throughout the territory of the four states, and to allocate those costs that would have been borne by the Soviet Union. The Protocol also clarifies how certain terms used in the START Treaty will be applied, now that the four states will be Parties in place of the former Soviet Union.

Of great importance, the protocol obligates Byelarus, Kazakhstan, and Ukraine to adhere to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of July 1, 1968, as non-nuclear-weapon States Parties in the shortest possible period of time and to begin immediately to take appropriate steps toward this end. Thus, the Protocol will not only allow the implementation of the START Treaty, but will also constitute a critical element in the furtherance of the United States' nuclear non-proliferation objectives.

The START Treaty, including the Protocol, is subject to ratification and shall enter into force on the date of the final exchange of instruments of ratification. The Protocol, as an integral part of the START Treaty, shall remain in force throughout the duration of the START Treaty. All provisions of the START Treaty that are not explicitly addressed by the Protocol remain unchanged. . . .

* * * *

c. Entry into force

On October 1, 1992, the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification of the treaty with annexes and protocols transmitted November 25, 1991, Corrigenda of December 19, 1991, and the Lisbon Protocol. 138 CONG. REC. S15,955–56 (daily ed. Oct. 1, 1992). These documents are referred to collectively as the START Treaty or START. The resolution of ratification was subject to seven conditions and declarations. Key provisions are set forth below. See also III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 3584–85 and 87 Am. J. Int'l L. 108 (1993).

START entered into force on December 5, 1994, with Belarus, Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation, Ukraine, and the United States as State Parties.

(c) CONDITIONS: The Senate's advice and consent to the ratification of the START Treaty is subject to the following conditions, which shall be binding upon the President:

(1) BINDING OBLIGATIONS: That upon entry into force of the START Treaty, including the May 23, 1992 Protocol, the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation and Ukraine shall be legally bound under international law to all obligations of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics set forth in the START Treaty, its two Annexes, six Protocols, Memorandum of Understanding and Corrigenda.

(2) LEGAL AND POLITICAL OBLIGATIONS OF U.S.S.R.: That the legal and political obligations of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics reflected in the four related separate agreements, seven legally binding letters, four areas of correspondence, two politically binding declarations, thirteen joint statements and ten other statements on related issues transmitted in Treaty Doc. 102–20 for the information of the Senate with the START Treaty are included in the "obligations of the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics under the Treaty" assumed by the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine pursuant to Article I of the May 23, 1992 Protocol, and that the legal obligations assumed therein are of the same force and effect as the provisions of the Treaty. The United States shall regard actions inconsistent with these legal obligations as equivalent under international law to actions inconsistent with the START Treaty. This condition shall be communicated by the President to the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation and Ukraine, in such form as he deems appropriate.

(3) BYELARUS, KAZAKHSTAN AND UKRAINE LETTERS: That the letter from Chairman Shushkevich of the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Byelarus to President Bush dated May 20, 1992; the letter from President Nazarbayev of the Republic of Kazakhstan to President Bush dated May 19, 1992; and the letter from President Kravchuk of Ukraine to President Bush dated May 7, 1992 (all having been submitted to the Senate as associated with the May 23, 1992 Protocol in Treaty Doc. 102–32), being obligations legally binding only in the event of ratification of the START Treaty, are of the same force and effect as the provisions of the Treaty. The United States shall regard actions inconsistent with these obligations as equivalent under international law to actions inconsistent with the START Treaty. This condition shall be communicated by the President to the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan and Ukraine, in such form as he deems appropriate.

(4) NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY: That the obligations of the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan and Ukraine to adhere to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of July 1, 1968 as non-nuclear-weapon States Parties in the shortest possible time, set forth in Article V of the May 23, 1992 Protocol, are of the same force and effect as the provisions of the Treaty. The United States shall regard actions inconsistent with these obligations as equivalent under international law to actions inconsistent with the START Treaty. This condition shall be communicated by the President to the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan and Ukraine in such form as he deems appropriate.

* * * *

(6) ELIMINATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS FROM BYELARUS, KAZAKHSTAN AND UKRAINE: If the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan and Ukraine have not eliminated all nuclear weapons located on their territory and have not eliminated, in accordance with the procedures of the START Treaty, all strategic offensive arms located on their territory, within seven years following the date of entry into force of the START Treaty, as agreed to in legally binding letters submitted to the Senate in connection with the May 23, 1992 Protocol in Treaty Doc. 102–32, then the President—

(A) shall consult with the Senate regarding the effect on the START Treaty of such developments.

(B) shall, if the President determines that failure to eliminate, within seven years following the date of entry into force of the START Treaty, all nuclear weapons, including all strategic offensive arms, located on the territories of the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan and Ukraine is of such significance as to constitute a changed circumstance effecting the Treaty's object and purpose, and if the President decides not to invoke the withdrawal right under Article XVII of the Treaty, the President shall request a meeting of the Joint Compliance and Inspection Commission in accordance with Article XV of the Treaty, to assess the viability of the treaty and to ascertain if an amendment is needed to accommodate the change of circumstance, or the President shall undertake other appropriate diplomatic steps; and

(C) shall, if the President has made the determination and decision described in subparagraph (B)—

(i) submit for the Senate's advice and consent to ratification any change in the obligations of the States Parties under the Treaty that is designed to accommodate such circumstance and is agreed to by all State Parties, unless such change is a minor matter of an administrative or technical nature; or

(ii) if no such change in the obligations of the State Parties is agreed to by all State Parties but the President determines nonetheless that continued adherence to the START Treaty would serve the national security interests of the United States, the President shall seek a Senate resolution of support of such continued adherence, notwithstanding the changes circumstance affecting the Treaty's object and purpose.

* * * *

(8) NUCLEAR STOCKPILE WEAPONS ARRANGEMENT: In as much as the prospect of a loss of control of nuclear weapons or fissile material in the former Soviet Union could pose a serious threat to the United States and to international peace and security, in connection with any further agreement reducing strategic offensive arms, the President shall seek an appropriate arrangement, including the use of reciprocal inspections, data exchanges, and other cooperative measures, to monitor—

(A) the numbers of nuclear stockpile weapons on the territory of the parties to this Treaty; and

(B) the location and inventory of facilities on the territory of the parties to this Treaty capable of producing or processing significant quantities of fissile materials.

(b) DECLARATIONS: The Senate's advice and consent to ratification of the START Treaty is subject to following declarations, which express the intent of the Senate:

(1) SUBSTANTIAL FURTHER REDUCTIONS: Cognizant of the United States' obligation under article VI of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of July 1, 1998 "to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control," the Senate finds that the President entered into a Joint Understanding of June 17, 1992, on behalf of the United States, with President Yeltsin, on behalf of the Russian Federation, agreeing to conclude promptly a treaty providing for substantial further reductions in strategic offensive arms. The Senate encourages the concluding of such a treaty at the earliest possible date and will give it prompt consideration upon submission by the President for advice and consent to ratification. In anticipation of the completion, ratification, and entry into force of a treaty with the Russian Federation for substantial further reductions in strategic arms, the Senate calls upon the other nuclear-weapons states to give careful and early consideration to corresponding reductions of their own nuclear arsenals.

(2) MISSILE TECHNOLOGY CONTROL REGIME: The Senate urges the President to seek the adherence by the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan and Ukraine to the guidelines of the Missile Technology Control Regime.

(3) ELIMINATION AND DISMANTLEMENT OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS: The Senate commends the Republic of Byelarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, and Ukraine for eliminating the tactical nuclear warheads from their territories and urges the rapid elimination of the strategic nuclear warheads from their territories pursuant to their obligations under the START Treaty. The Senate urges the President to instruct the Safety, Security and Dismantlement negotiators to proceed expeditiously to obtain the destruction of all nuclear warheads from eliminated systems and to facilitate secure safeguarded storage of the special nuclear materials withdrawn from eliminated weapons.

2. START II

As noted in the Senate resolution of ratification, supra, Presidents Bush and Yeltsin signed the Joint Understanding on Reductions in Strategic Offensive Arms on June 17, 1992, at a summit in Washington, June 15–17, 1992 ("Joint Understanding"). In the Joint Understanding, the Presidents stated that "the two sides have agreed upon and will promptly conclude a Treaty with the following provisions," followed by an enumeration of reductions in strategic forces to be taken within the seven-year period following entry into force of the START Treaty and further reductions by the year 2003 or by the end of the year 2000 "if the United States can contribute to the financing of the destruction or elimination of strategic offensive arms in Russia." The text of the Joint Understanding is available at 28 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1082 (June 22, 1992); see also 3 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 25 at 481–504 (1992) at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html (containing the text of the Joint Understanding and other instruments resulting from the June 1992 summit), III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 3585–86, and fact sheets available at www.state.gov/www/global/arms/bureau_ac/factsheets_ac.html.

The anticipated treaty was signed at Moscow on January 3, 1993. Treaty Between the United States of America and the Russian Federation on Further Reduction and Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms ("START II"). On January 15, 1993, President George H.W. Bush transmitted START II to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–1 (1993).

Unlike START, START II was bilateral, with only the United States and the Russian Federation as parties. In connection with the Lisbon Protocol, B.1.b., supra, the other START Parties (Belarus, Kazakhstan, and Ukraine) had pledged to eliminate strategic offensive arms located on their territories in legally-binding letters, discussed supra.

START II also included: The Protocol on Procedures Governing Elimination of Heavy ICBMs and on Procedures Governing Conversion of Silo Launchers of Heavy ICBMs Relating to the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Russian Federation on Further Reduction and Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms ("Elimination and Conversion Protocol"); The Protocol on Exhibitions and Inspections of Heavy Bombers Relating to the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Russian Federation on Further Reduction and Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms ("Exhibitions and Inspections Protocol"); and The Memorandum of Understanding on Warhead Attribution and Heavy Bomber Data Relating to the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Russian Federation on Further Reduction and Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms ("Memorandum on Attribution"). Excerpts from the President's letter of transmittal, included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–1, follow. See also III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 3586–87.

* * * *

The START II Treaty is a milestone in the continuing effort by the United States and the Russian Federation to address the threat posed by strategic offensive nuclear weapons, especially multiple-war head ICBMs [intercontinental ballistic missiles]. It builds upon and relies on the Treaty Between the United States of America and Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the Reduction and Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms (the START Treaty) signed at Moscow on July 31, 1991. At the same time, the START II Treaty goes even further than the START Treaty.

The START Treaty was the first treaty actually to reduce strategic offensive arms of both countries, with overall reductions of 30–40 percent and reductions of up to 50 percent in the most threatening systems. It enhances stability in times of crisis.

It . . . limits strategic arms but also reduces them significantly below current levels.

* * * *

The START II Treaty builds upon and surpasses the accomplishments of the START Treaty by further reducing strategic offensive arms in such a way that further increases the stability of the strategic nuclear balance. It bans deployment of the most destabilizing type of nuclear weapons system—land-based intercontinental ballistic missiles with multiple independently targetable nuclear warheads. At the same time, the START II Treaty permits the United States to maintain a stabilizing sea-based force.

The central limits of the START II Treaty require reductions by January 1, 2003, to 3000–3500 warheads. Within this, there are sub-limits of between 1700–1750 warheads on deployed SLBMS [submarine-launch ballistic missiles] for each Party, or such lower number as each Party shall decide for itself; and zero for warheads on deployed heavy ICBMs. Thus, the Treaty reduces the current overall deployments of strategic nuclear weapons on each side by more than two-thirds from current levels. These limits will be reached by the end of the year 2000 if both Parties reach agreement on a program of assistance to the Russian Federation with regard to dismantling strategic offensive arms within a year after entry into force of the Treaty. Acceptance of these reductions serves as a clear indication of the ending of the Cold War.

. . . START II will result in the complete elimination of heavy ICBMs (the SS-18) and the elimination or conversion of their launchers. All heavy ICBMs and launch canisters will be destroyed. All but 90 heavy ICBM silos will . . . be destroyed and these 90 silos will be modified to be incapable of launching SS-18s. To address the Russians' stated concern over the cost of implementing the transition to a single-warhead ICBM force, the START II Treaty provides for the conversion of up to 90 of the 154 Russian SS-18 silos that will remain after the START Treaty reductions. The Russians have unilaterally undertaken to use the converted silos only for the smaller, SS-25 type single-warhead ICBMs. When implemented, the Treaty's conversion provisions, which include extensive on-site inspection rights, will preclude the use of these silos to launch heavy ICBMs. Together with the elimination of SS-18 missiles, these provisions are intended to ensure that the strategic capability of the SS-18 system is eliminated.

START II allows some reductions to be taken by downloading, i.e., reducing the number of warheads attributed to existing missiles. This will allow the United States to achieve the reductions required by the Treaty in a cost-effective way by downloading some or all our sea-based Trident ICBMs and land-based Minuteman III ICBMs. The Treaty also allows downloading, in Russia, of 105 of the 170 SS-19 multiple-warheads missiles in existing silos to a single-warhead missile. All other Russian launchers of multiple-warhead ICBMs—including the remaining 65 SS-19s—must be converted for single-warhead ICBMs or eliminated in accordance with START procedures.

START II can be implemented in a fashion that is fully consistent with U.S. national security. To ensure that we have the ability to respond to worldwide conventional contingencies, it allows for the reorientation, without any conversion procedures, of 100 START-accountable heavy bombers to a conventional role. These heavy bombers will not be count against START II warhead limits.

The START Treaty and the START II Treaty remain in force concurrently and have the same duration. Except as explicitly modified by the START II Treaty, the provisions of the START Treaty will be used to implement START II.

On January 26, 1996, the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification of the START II Treaty, including the Elimination and Conversion Protocol, the Exhibitions and Inspections Protocol, and the Memorandum of Attribution, which are integral parts thereof. 142 CONG. REC. S461–63 (daily ed. Jan. 26, 1996). The resolution of ratification was subject to six conditions and seven declarations. The Senate conditioned ratification on an understanding that START II would not affect the existing rights and obligations of the Parties under the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, 23 U.S.T. 3435 (1972) ("ABM Treaty"). Excerpts below provide additional conditions and declarations.

START II has not been ratified by the United States. See Digest 2002 at 1027–28.

* * * *

CONDITIONS—The advice and consent of the Senate to the ratification of the START II Treaty is subject to the following conditions, which shall be binding upon the President:

* * * *

(4) EXCHANGE OF LETTERS.—The exchange of letters—

(A) between Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger and Minister of Foreign Affairs Andrey Kozyrev, dated December 29, 1992, regarding SS-18 missiles and launchers now on the territory of Kazakhstan,

(B) between Secretary of State Eagleburger and Minister of Foreign Affairs Kozyrev, dated December 29, 1992, and December 31, 1992, regarding heavy bombers, and

(C) between Minister of Defense Pavel Grachev and Secretary of Defense Richard Cheney, dated December 29, 1992, and January 3, 1993, making assurance on Russian intent regarding the conversion and retention of 90 silo launchers of RS-20 [SS-18] heavy intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs) (all having been submitted to the Senate as associated with the START II Treaty), are of the same force and effect as the provisions of the START II Treaty. The United States shall regard actions inconsistent with obligations under those exchanges of letters as equivalent under international law to actions inconsistent with the START II Treaty.

* * * *

(c) DECLARATIONS.—The advice and consent of the Senate to ratification of the START II Treaty is subject to the following declarations, which express the intent of the Senate:

(1) COOPERATIVE THREAT REDUCTIONS.—Pursuant to the Joint Statement on Transparency and Irreversibility of the Process of Reducing Nuclear Weapons [see B.6. below], agreed to in Moscow, May 10, 1995, between the President of the United States and the President of the Russian Federation, it is the sense of the Senate that both parties to the START II Treaty should attach high priority to—

(A) the exchange of detailed information on aggregate stockpiles of nuclear warheads, on stocks of fissile materials, and on their safety and security;

(B) the maintenance at distinct and secure storage facilities, on a reciprocal basis, of fissile materials removed from nuclear warheads and declared to be excess to national security requirements for the purpose of confirming the irreversibility of nuclear weapons reduction; and

(C) the adoption of other cooperative measures to enhance confidence in the reciprocal declarations on fissile material stockpiles.

* * * *

(5) MISSILE TECHNOLOGY CONTROL REGIME.—The Senate urges the President to insist that the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, Ukraine, and the Russian Federation abide by the guidelines of the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR) [see E.3 below]. For purposes of this paragraph, the term "Missile Technology Control Regime" means the policy statement between the United States, the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy, Canada, and Japan announced April 16, 1987, to restrict sensitive missile-revenant transfers based on the MTCR Annex, and any amendments thereto.

3. Conventional Armed Forces in Europe

a. Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe

The United States and twenty-one other states signed the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe ("CFE Treaty") on November 19, 1990, in Paris. See Digest

1989–1990 at 578–79, III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 3587–94. Within the relevant geographical area, the CFE established numerical limits on five categories of conventional armaments and equipment: battle tanks, armored combat vehicles, artillery, combat aircraft, and attack helicopters. It also established a verification system, including on-site inspections, to confirm compliance. A separate non-legally binding declaration of the parties covering Naval Land-Based Aircraft was signed on the same date ("LBNA Declaration").

President George H.W. Bush transmitted the CFE Treaty, with associated instruments, to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on July 9, 1991. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–8 (1991). Transmittal had been delayed due to disputes concerning the holdings of the Soviet conventional armed forces within the area of application of the treaty. Excerpts below from the section-by-section analysis contained in the report of the Department of State accompanying President Bush's transmittal and included in S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–8 explain the issues involved.

. . . The dispute arose upon signature of the Treaty on November 19, 1990, when the 22 States Parties exchanged information about the holdings of their conventional armed forces within the area of application of the Treaty. Among other problems, the information provided at that time by the Soviet Union failed to count against the Treaty's numerical limitations over 6,000 items of conventional armaments and equipment limited by the Treaty held within the area of application by its Naval Infantry units, Coastal Defense forces, Strategic Rocket forces, Civil Defense and DOSAAF organizations, and internal security organizations. . . . The Soviet Union claimed that conventional armaments and equipment held by such organizations were not subject to the counting rules in Article III. Led by the United States, this position was consistently rejected by the 21 other Treaty Signatories as being without foundation in either the Treaty text or the negotiating record of the Treaty.

[In addition], the Soviet Union [had moved] thousands of conventional armaments and equipment of a type limited by the Treaty out of the area of application between January 1989 and November 19, 1990 . . . [M]any States Parties, including the United States, found such a large build-up of armaments and equipment just outside the area of application to be inconsistent with the goals of the Treaty and potentially destabilizing. Consequently, the United States led diplomatic efforts during the negotiation of the Treaty and for several months thereafter to prevail upon the Soviet Union to provide commitments to alleviate the potential threat posed by such armaments and equipment.

* * * *

In order to address these concerns, a series of legally binding agreements followed that covered all of the transferred items indirectly and ensured that, in the future, items held by such units would count against treaty limitations. The package of agreements, expressed as statements, was accepted by all States Parties on June 14, 1991, at Vienna. The equipment that had been moved outside the area of application ("east of the Urals") was addressed in a political commitment (non-legally binding statement) by the Soviet Union. President Bush's transmittal letter described the CFE Treaty and accompanying instruments as set forth below.

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe (CFE). The Treaty includes the following documents, which are integral parts thereof: the Protocol on Existing Types (with an Annex thereto), the Protocol on Aircraft Reclassification, the Protocol on Reduction, the Protocol on Helicopter Recategorization, the Protocol on Information Exchange (with an Annex on Format), the Protocol on Inspection, the Protocol on the Joint Consultative Group, and the Protocol on Provisional Application. The Treaty, together with the Protocols, was signed at Paris on November 19, 1990. I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the Report of the Department of State on the Treaty.

In addition, I transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, six documents associated with, but not part of, the Treaty that are relevant to the Senate's consideration of the Treaty: Statement by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, dated June 14, 1991; Statement by the Government of the United States of America, dated June 14, 1991, responding to the Statement by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Statements identical in content were made by the 20 other signatory states on the same date. Copies of these Statements are also transmitted.); Declaration by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany on the Personnel Strength of German Armed Forces, dated November 19, 1990; Declaration of the States Parties to the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe With Respect to Personnel Strength, dated November 19, 1990; Declaration of the States Parties to the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe With Respect to Land-Based Naval Aircraft, dated November 19, 1990; and Statement by the Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to the Joint Consultative Group, dated June 14, 1991. The first two Statements are legally binding and constitute a separate international agreement, while the latter four documents represent political commitments.

The CFE Treaty is the most ambitious arms control agreement ever concluded. The complexities of negotiating a treaty involving 22 nations and tens of thousands of armaments spread over an area of more than two and a half million square miles were immense. Difficult technical issues such as definitions, counting rules, methods for destroying reduced equipment, and inspection rights were painstakingly negotiated.

The Treaty is the first conventional arms control agreement since World War II. It marks the first time in history that European nations, together with the United States and Canada, have agreed to reduce and numerically limit their land-based conventional military equipment, especially equipment necessary to conduct offensive operations. Significantly, the reductions will eliminate the overwhelming Soviet numerical advantage in conventional armaments that has existed in Europe for more than 40 years. The Treaty's limits enhance stability by ending force disparities, and they limit the capability for launching surprise attack and initiating large-scale offensive action in Europe.

The Treaty contains a wide-ranging verification regime. Under this regime, in which intrusive on-site inspection complements national technical means to monitor compliance, ground and air forces of the participating states in the area of application of the Treaty will be subject to inspection, either at declared sites or with challenge inspections. The Treaty also provides for a detailed information exchange on the command organization of each participating state's land, air, and air defense forces as well as information about the number and location of each participating state's military equipment, subject to the limitations and other provisions of the Treaty. This information will be updated periodically and as significant changes to such data and reductions of equipment take place.

The military equipment to be reduced and limited consists of battle tanks, armored combat vehicles, artillery, attack helicopters, and combat aircraft in service with the conventional armed forces of the States Parties in Europe from the Atlantic to the Urals. Inclusion of the Baltic military district within the area of application of the Treaty ensures that the Treaty's limits apply comprehensively to all Soviet forces within the area. This does not represent any change in the long-standing U.S. policy of non-recognition of the forcible incorporation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union. At the conclusion of the 40-month reduction period, the numerical limits on this equipment in the area of application for each group of participating states will be as follows: 20,000 battle tanks, 30,000 armored combat vehicles, 20,000 pieces of artillery, 2,000 attack helicopters, and 6,800 combat aircraft. All military equipment subject to and in excess of these limits that was in the area of application at the time of Treaty signature or entry into force (whichever amount is greater) must be destroyed or, within specified limits, converted to nonmilitary or other purposes. Subceilings are established for specific geographical zones within the area of application, the purpose of these being to thin out forces on the central front while forestalling buildups in the flank areas. Under the so-called "sufficiency rule" of the Treaty, no State Party may hold more than approximately one-third of the total amount of equipment in these five categories permitted within the area of application as a whole.

Above and beyond eliminating force disparities and limiting the capability for launching large-scale offensive action, the CFE Treaty will be of major importance in laying the indispensable foundation for the post-Cold War security architecture in Europe.

Only with this foundation in place can we move from a European security order based on confrontation to one based on cooperation. I believe that the CFE Treaty is in the best interests of the United States and represents an important step in defining the new security regime in Europe. It achieves unprecedented arms reductions that strengthen U.S., Canadian, and European security. Therefore, I urge the Senate to give early and favorable consideration to the Treaty and its related Protocols and Annexes, and to give advice and consent to its ratification.

The section-by-section analysis of the treaty contained in the accompanying report of the Department of State noted as follows concerning a key provision on consent in paragraph 5 of Article IV.

* * * *

. . . [P]aragraph 5 of Article IV provides that States Parties belonging to the same group of States Parties may locate battle tanks, armored combat vehicles, and artillery in active units in each of the areas described . . . provided that no State Party stations conventional armed forces on the territory of another State Party without the agreement of that State Party.

There is one additional point regarding paragraph 5 concerning the issue of stationing States Parties. Paragraph 5 reiterates a principle of customary international law that, with certain exceptions (e.g., as part of a United Nations Security Council enforcement action carried out in accordance with Chapter VII of the UN Charter), no State Party may station forces on another State Party's territory without the permission of that State Party. Within the context of the CFE Treaty, for example, this means that, as a general rule, the Soviet Union cannot station forces in Hungary without Hungary's permission.

* * * *

After extensive hearings, on November 25, 1991, the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification subject to conditions related to the pre-signature Soviet transfers of CFE-limited items, host State consent, and the possible emergence of new states from the territory of the Soviet Union. The Senate resolution also included four declarations relating to accession to the CFE Treaty by certain new states, treaty interpretation, the requirement that further arms reduction obligations be approved only as treaties with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, and compliance issues and future strategic arms treaties. 137 CONG. REC. S18,018 (daily ed. Nov. 25, 1991).

Prior to ratification of the CFE Treaty, the United States enacted implementing legislation amending the Arms Export Control Act. Conventional Forces in Europe Treaty Implementation Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102–228, § 1, 105 Stat. 1691, 22 U.S.C. § 2751 (1991). The amendments authorized the President, with certain conditions and additional authorities, to > transfer to any NATO/CFE country, in accordance with NATO plans, defense articles—

> (1) that are battle tanks, armoured combat vehicles, or artillery included within the CFE Treaty's definition of "conventional armaments and equipment limited by the Treaty";
> (2) that were, as of the date of signature of the CFE Treaty, in the stocks of the Department of Defense and located in the CFE Treaty's area of application; and
> (3) that the President determines are not needed by United States military forces within the CFE Treaty's area of application.

22 U.S.C. § 2799b. The United States deposited its instrument of ratification on July 17, 1992.

Due to delays in ratification by Armenia, Belarus and Kazakhstan, the States Parties agreed at the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe ("CSCE") Helsinki

Summit Conference in July 1992 to apply the CFE Treaty provisionally. The Final Act provided that the States Parties agreed:

> 1. Without prejudice to the provisions of Article XXII of the Treaty and notwithstanding the Protocol on Provisional Application of the Treaty, the States Parties shall apply provisionally all of the provisions of the Treaty, beginning on July 17, 1992, on the basis of the agreement reached by all States Parties expressed hereby. The States Parties deem that such provisional application constitutes an improvement to the Treaty.

The full text is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm. The CFE Treaty entered into force November 9, 1992.

The Concluding Act of the Negotiation on Personnel Strength of Conventional Armed Forces in Europe, known as "CFE-1A," was also signed on July 10, 1992. A fact sheet released by the Department of State November 7, 1995, described the CFE-1A as excerpted below. The fact sheet, which also addresses the CFE Treaty, is available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/acda/factshee/conwpn/cfe-1.htm. The Concluding Act is available at www.osce.org/docs/english/1990–1999/cfe/cfe-1ae.htm.

* * * *

CFE-1A constitutes a political commitment by its signatories to limit (and, where applicable, reduce) the personnel strength of their conventional armed forces. In contrast to the CFE Treaty, CFE-1A is not a legally binding agreement, and thus not subject to ratification by parliaments.

The heart of the CFE-1A agreement is a "ceiling" on the military personnel of each participating state within the CFE Treaty's area of application. Each participating state determined its own ceiling, taking into consideration its national defense plans and security interests. These numerical ceilings were not subject to negotiation among the participants, although the levels were open to discussion prior to adoption of the agreement. In general terms, the CFE-1A limitation applies to military personnel based on land in the area of application.

b. CFE "Flank Document"

On April 7, 1997, President William J. Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Document Agreed Among the States Parties to the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe of November 19, 1990, adopted at Vienna May 31, 1996 (also known as the "Flank Document"), as Annex A to the Final Document of the first CFE Review Conference. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–5 (1997). The Flank Document responded to Russian concerns about its ability to meet its security requirements because of limitations imposed by the CFE Treaty in the "flank" region, described in paragraph 1(A) of Article V of the CFE Treaty. Although the States Parties had agreed to apply the Flank Document provisionally, the President noted that the provisional application extended only until May 15, 1997, and urged advice and consent before that date. Excerpts from the President's letter of transmittal explain the development of this instrument, which substantially increased the amount of Russian armaments and equipment permitted in the original flank region, modified the geographical limits of that region, provided for an interim limit until entry into force, and provided for increased verification measures.

* * * *

The CFE Treaty has resulted in the verified reduction of more than 50,000 pieces of heavy military equipment, including tanks, armored combat vehicles, artillery pieces, combat aircraft, and attack helicopters. By the end of 1996, CFE states had accepted and conducted more than 2,700 intrusive, on-site inspections. Contacts between the military organizations charged with implementing CFE are cooperative and extensive. The CFE Treaty has helped to transform a world of two armed camps into a Europe where dividing lines no longer hold.

The Flank Document is part of that process. It is the culmination of over 2 years of negotiations and months of intensive discussions with the Russian Federation, Ukraine, our NATO Allies, and our other CFE Treaty partners. The Flank Document resolves in a cooperative way the most difficult problem that arose during the Treaty's first 5 years of implementation: Russian and Ukrainian concerns about the impact of the Treaty's equipment limits in the flank zone on their security and military flexibility. The other Treaty states—including all NATO Allies—agreed that some of those concerns were reasonable and ought to be addressed.

The Flank Document is the result of a painstaking multilateral diplomatic effort that had as its main goal the preservation of the integrity of the CFE Treaty and achievement of the goals of its mandate. It is a crucial step in adaptation of the CFE Treaty to the dramatic political changes that have occurred in Europe since the Treaty was signed. The Flank Document confirms the importance of subregional constraints on heavy military equipment. More specifically, it revalidates the idea, unique to CFE, of limits on the amount of equipment particular nations in the Treaty area can locate on certain portions of their own national territory. Timely entry into force of the Flank Document will ensure that these key principles are not a matter of debate in the negotiations we have just begun in Vienna to adapt the CFE Treaty to new political realities, including the prospect of the enlarged NATO.

* * * *

On May 14, 1997, the Senate adopted its resolution of ratification to the Flank Agreement. 143 CONG. REC. S4451 (daily ed. May 14, 1997). The resolution of ratification was subject to fourteen conditions, including the following:

> (1) POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.—Nothing in the CFE Flank Document shall be construed as altering the policy of the United States to achieve the immediate and complete withdrawal of any armed forces and military equipment under the control of the Russian Federation that are deployed on the territories of the independent states of the former Soviet Union (as defined in section 3 of the FREEDOM Support Act) without the full and complete agreement of those states.

(2) Violations of state sovereignty.—

* * * *

(C) Statement of policy.—Prior to the deposit of the United States instrument of ratification, the President shall certify to the Senate that the United States and the governments of Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Turkey, and the United Kingdom have issued a joint statement affirming that—

(i) the CFE Flank Document does not give any State Party the right to station (under Article IV, paragraph 5 of the Treaty) or temporarily deploy (under Article V, paragraphs 1(B) and (C) of the Treaty) conventional armaments and equipment limited by the Treaty on the territory of other States Parties to the Treaty without the freely expressed consent of the receiving State Party;

(ii) the CFE Flank Document does not alter or abridge the right of any State Party under the Treaty to utilize fully its declared maximum levels for conventional armaments and equipment limited by the Treaty notified pursuant to Article VII of the Treaty; and

(iii) the CFE Flank Document does not alter in any way the requirement for the freely expressed consent of all States Parties concerned in the exercise of any reallocations envisioned under Article IV, paragraph 3 of the CFE Flank Document.

* * * *

See also S. Exec. Rep. No. 105–5 (1997).

Because of the extensive list of conditions and certification requirements contained in the resolution of ratification, President Clinton issued two statements to the Congress, both dated May 14, 1997. In the first, excerpted in Chapter 4.B.6.a.(3)(ii), the President stated that he would "interpret the Conditions of concern in the resolution in a manner consistent with the responsibilities entrusted to me as President under the Constitution. Nevertheless, without prejudice to my Constitutional authorities, I will implement the Conditions in the resolution." The certification called for in Condition 2(C) supra, was included in the second letter. See 143 CONG. REC. S4588. The Flank Document entered into force on May 15, 1997.

The United States had earlier issued a joint statement with Azerbaijan dated May 21, 1996, on the Flank Document. The statement had confirmed the same points set out in Condition 2(C); excerpts below from the statement address further issues. The full text of the joint statement is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

. . . The United States and Azerbaijan affirm their joint understanding that with respect to the region covered by the Treaty on Conventional Forces in Europe of November 19, 1990, a State's military forces should be deployed on the territory of another State only with the freely expressed consent of the host country.

* * * *

The United States acknowledges the absence of foreign military bases on the territory of the Azerbaijan Republic and supports the position taken by Azerbaijan that the temporary presence of foreign troops on its territory may be based only on a duly concluded agreement with Azerbaijan according to its constitution and in conformity with international law.

The United States and Azerbaijan reiterate their concern with regard to conventional armaments and equipment of types limited by the Treaty, which are unaccounted for and uncontrolled within the Treaty. They recognize the obligation of all States Parties to work in a cooperative manner within the Joint Consultative Group to develop practical steps toward fulfilling the commitment of the States Parties, as expressed in the Review Conference Final Document, to resolve the issue of unaccounted-for-TLE as soon as possible and achieve full implementation of all Treaty provisions.

The United States supports the sovereign right of Azerbaijan, as a free and independent State, to take the position under the CFE Treaty contained in the statement of the Chairman of the First CFE Review Conference on May 31, 1996, that temporary deployment and reallocation of quotas referred to in Section IV, paragraphs 2 and 3 of the CFE Flank Agreement will not be used in the context of the Azerbaijan Republic.

c. Adaptation

After the entry into force of the Flank agreement, the States Parties of the CFE Treaty initiated the process of "adaptation," a process that would amend the Treaty to account for the vast changes in the European security situation that had occurred since the signature of the original CFE Treaty. In the course of the adaptation negotiations, the chief U.S. negotiator, Ambassador Greg Govan, reaffirmed the position of the United States Government on the issue of host State consent. Statement in the Joint Consultative Group, Vienna, March 9, 1999, excerpted below and available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

The concept of consent by any state to a foreign military presence on its sovereign territory is derived from fundamental precepts of sovereign authority. That concept of consent was laid down in the original Treaty. . . . Due notice must also be taken of the fact that consent is required for "forces", not just for armaments and equipment limited by the Treaty. It is our understanding that the intent of this provision was to make foreign military presence without host nation consent a violation of the CFE Treaty, if States Parties were involved, in addition to such an act or circumstance being against other international laws and norms of behavior. We strongly adhere to this interpretation and reject any contrary explanation.

Although Article IV, paragraph 5 uses the term "stations", we believe that it covers all forces present, regardless of type, composition, or purpose. There is no exemption in the consent clause for what, in one Treaty region, might be called "temporary deployments", nor for any other kind of presence, such as transits or military exercises. In short, although "stationed forces" has come to refer informally to foreign forces present on another's territory "permanently" or for extended duration, the CFE Treaty consent requirement for stationing, as that term is used in paragraph 5, Article IV, applies to all foreign forces present, for whatever purpose, and under whatever CFE Treaty status.

We believe that consent is conditional, as determined by the host, to include:

- The size or composition of foreign forces, to include limits on its [treaty-limited equipment] TLE
- The duration for all or part of the foreign presence;
- The locations where foreign forces are permitted or from which they are prohibited;
- The requirement that the forces comply with all CFE obligations
- Distribution of costs for inspection and other activities of a Treaty nature that incur to the host by virtue of the foreign military presence;
- Other measures, to include environmental protection, that are often part of so-called "status of forces agreements" between host and stationing state.

We also firmly hold that consent may be withdrawn as well as given. At any time, a host state may withdraw consent, and the foreign forces must initiate a timely and prompt withdrawal. . . . The existence of a prior bilateral agreement that is not associated with the CFE Treaty cannot serve as a basis for circumventing the CFE consent requirement, or for claims that the requirement has been fulfilled in the face of a contemporary denial of consent by the host State Party.

It is precisely because we consider consent so important that we have wholeheartedly endorsed repetition of the requirement for consent in each and every case where the adapted CFE Treaty speaks about a foreign military presence. This does not mean that we in any way restrict consent to this or that foreign military presence only. . . .

There is a straight and unwavering line from Article IV, paragraph 5 running through all of NATO's proposals for express consent for use of headroom, for transits, for military exercises—in short, for any foreign military presence under an adapted CFE Treaty. We believe this general principle should be reinforced. We believe that it should be made explicit and specific in notifications that act as a public manifestation of host State Party consent to or rejection of the presence of foreign military forces. And because abuse or circumvention of the consent requirement is a direct violation of the CFE Treaty as well as of international law, we shall judge any such occurrences very seriously and react accordingly.

The negotiations culminated at the OSCE Istanbul Summit on November 19, 1999, with the signature of the Agreement on Adaptation of the Treaty on Conventional Forces in Europe ("Agreement on Adaptation") and the adoption of the CFE Final Act of the States Parties to the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe ("Final Act"), with 14 attached Annexes. Twelve of the Final Act Annexes incorporated voluntary, independent, unilateral national measures of self-restraint. The thirteenth Annex was a declaration by the Government of Moldova that the Moldovan Constitution prohibited the presence of foreign military forces on its territory. The fourteenth Annex constituted an agreement between the Republic of Georgia and the Russian Federation regarding the partial withdrawal and limited continuing presence of Russian forces in Georgia. The Final Act specifically referred to its fourteenth Annex and to the Russian commitment to withdraw its forces from Moldova, stating that the States Parties:

> Have welcomed the joint statement by Georgia and the Russian Federation of 17 November 1999, which is attached to this Final Act; [and]
> Have taken note of the statement by the Republic of Moldova, which is attached to this Final Act, concerning > its renunciation of the right to receive a temporary deployment on its territory and have welcomed the commitment of the Russian Federation to withdraw and/or destroy Russian conventional armaments and equipment limited by the Treaty by the end of 2001, in the context of its commitment referred to in paragraph 19 of the Istanbul Summit Declaration. . . .

The full text of the Final Act is available at www.osce.org/docs/english/1990-1999/cfe/cfefinact99e.htm. The text of the Agreement on Adaptation is available at www.osce.org/docs/english/1990-1999/cfe/cfeagree.htm.

Various political commitments that facilitated the conclusion of the Agreement on Adaptation were embodied in the 1999 OSCE Istanbul Summit Declaration, including key commitments regarding the reduction of Russian military equipment in Georgia and withdrawal of Russian troops from Moldova. The Istanbul Summit Declaration, also issued on November 19, 1999, is available at www.osce.org/docs/english/1990-1999/summits/istadecl99e.htm.

In a statement at the time of the signing of the Agreement on Adaptation, President Clinton described the importance of the agreement and conditioned transmittal to the Senate for advice and consent on fulfillment by the Russian Federation of its Istanbul commitments. The President's statement is set forth below in full.

Today I joined the leaders of 30 nations in signing an Agreement that will adapt the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe (CFE) to the post-Cold War world.

The original CFE Treaty limited the armaments of the Eastern and Western blocs, a division that has happily been erased since the collapse of the Warsaw Pact. The adapted Treaty will place legally binding limits on the armed forces of every individual country that is party to it, from the Atlantic to the Urals. It will require nations to provide more information about their deployment of military equipment. It will strengthen the requirement that host nations must consent to the deployment of foreign forces on their territory, which speaks directly to the interests of a number of nations of the former Soviet Union, including Ukraine, Moldova, Georgia, and Azerbaijan.

The Adaptation Agreement will also open the Treaty to accession by other European countries. And it will preserve NATO's ability to fulfill its post-Cold War responsibilities.

In all these ways, the adapted Treaty will enhance peace, security and stability throughout Europe. Therefore, it is in America's national interest to sign it now, and to lock in the commitment of other nations to its terms. At the same time, in order to reap these benefits, we must have confidence that there will be real compliance.

Russia has pledged that it will comply with the flank provisions of the adapted Treaty by reducing its forces in the North Caucasus. This must be done as soon as possible. I will only submit this Agreement to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification when Russian forces have in fact been reduced to the flank levels set forth in the adapted Treaty.

4. Open Skies Treaty

The Treaty on Open Skies, negotiated by the then-members of NATO and the Warsaw Pact, was signed in Helsinki, Finland, on March 24, 1992. See www.state.gov/t/ac/rls/fs/12691.htm. The treaty established a regime of unarmed aerial observation flights over the entire territory of its participants. On August 12, 1992, President George H.W. Bush transmitted the treaty to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 102–37 (1992). Excerpts below from the President's transmittal letter set forth the views of the United States on key provisions. Since signature of the treaty on March 24, 1992, the former Czechoslovakia has divided into two separate states (the Czech and Slovak Republics), and both have reaffirmed their participation in the treaty. See North Atlantic Cooperation Council Communiqué Statement issued following the Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Cooperation Council ("NACC"), Istanbul, Turkey, June 10, 1994, 5 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 25 at 404 (June 20, 1994), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Treaty on Open Skies. I believe that the Treaty on Open Skies is in the best interest of the United States. By engaging all participating States actively in cooperative observation, the Treaty on Open Skies will strengthen international stability. The Treaty also provides an important means of increasing mutual understanding of military forces and activities, thus easing tensions and strengthening confidence and security, not only in the area covered by the Treaty, but in other areas as well.

* * * *

The Open Skies Treaty establishes a regime of unarmed aerial observation flights over the entire territory of its 25 signatories (North Atlantic Treaty Organization Allies, Eastern European members of the former Warsaw Pact, and Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, and Georgia). The Treaty is designed to enhance mutual understanding and confidence by giving all participants, regardless of size, a direct role in observing military or other activities of concern to them. Covering territory from Vancouver to Vladivostok, Open Skies is the widest-ranging international effort to date to promote openness and transparency of military forces and activities. The Treaty allows for consensus decisions to improve sensors, to adjust quotas, and to admit new participants in order to enhance its effectiveness. The Open Skies principles may be applicable to States in other regions of the world as well.

The Treaty's operative provisions focus on four subjects:

—Territory: The entire territory of all participants will be accessible to aerial observation. Whereas the former Soviet Union had insisted on closing areas for national security reasons, the Treaty provides that only flight safety considerations may restrict the conduct of observation flights.

—Aircraft: Unarmed fixed-wing aircraft provided by either the observing or observed Party can be used. All Open Skies aircraft and sensors must pass specified certification and inspection procedures to ensure that they meet the standards of the Treaty.
—Sensors: Open Skies aircraft may have video, panoramic and framing cameras for daylight photography, infra-red line scanners for a day/night capability, and synthetic aperture radar for a day/night all-weather capability. Photographic image quality will permit recognition of major military equipment, e.g., distinguishing a tank from a truck-allowing significant transparency of military forces and activities. Sensor categories and capabilities can be improved by agreement among the States Parties. All equipment used in Open Skies must be commercially available to all participants. Data collected from the flights will be immediately shared by the observing and observed Parties, and may also be obtained by other States Parties.
—Quotas: Loosely scaled to size, each State Party has agreed to an annual quota of observation flights it is willing to receive (42 for the United States and Russia/Belarus to 2–4 for the smallest States Parties). States Parties may conduct as many observation flights as they are willing to receive.

The Treaty establishes an Open Skies Consultative Commission, composed of representatives designated by each State Party, to meet in Vienna, to promote the objectives and to facilitate the implementation of the provisions of the Treaty.

Therefore, I urge the Senate to give early and favorable consideration to the Treaty and its related Annexes, and to give advice and consent to its ratification.

On August 6, 1993, the Senate adopted its resolution of ratification of the Open Skies Treaty, subject to two conditions and one declaration. 139 CONG. REC. S10,800 (daily ed.

Aug. 6, 1993). The United States ratified the Open Skies Treaty in 1993, and it entered into force January 1, 2002. See Digest 2002 at 1028–32.

5. Other Security Building and Cooperative Security Measures

a. Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe

During the 1990s, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe ("OSCE"), formerly known as the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe ("CSCE"), coordinated a variety of security-building measures and agreements. In December 1996 the then 54 member states of the OSCE, including a delegation from the United States headed by Vice President Albert Gore, held a summit meeting in Lisbon, Portugal. A June 30, 1997, U.S. Department of State fact sheet provided a brief overview of the work of the OSCE during the Lisbon Summit of 1996. See w*ww.state.gov/www/global/arms/factsheets/secbldg/oscesb.html*.

On November 16, 1999, in Istanbul, the Plenary Meeting of the OSCE Forum for Security Cooperation adopted the 1999 Vienna Document. The provisions of the 1999 Vienna Document established confidence- and security-building measures ("CSBMs") that involved, inter alia, annual exchanges of information on military forces, major weapons systems and equipment, and defense planning; prior negotiation and observance of certain military activities, and compliance and verification inspections and evaluations. Excerpts below from a fact sheet provided by the Department of the Navy describe the history and application of the Vienna documents. The fact sheet is available at www.nawcwpns.navy.mil/~treaty/VNADOC.html.

The full text of the 1999 Vienna Document is available at www.osce.org/docs/english/1990–1999/csbms2/vienn99e.htm. The full text of the 1994 Vienna Document, referred to in the text below, is available at www.state.gov/t/np/trty/18460.htm.

Purpose:
The Vienna Document seeks to undertake, in stages, new, effective and concrete actions designed to make progress in strengthening confidence and security and in achieving disarmament, so as to give effect and expression to the duty of States to refrain from the threat or use of force in their mutual relations as well as in their international relations in general.

Background:

On 17 November 1990, CSCE (predecessor of OSCE) participating States adopted the Vienna Document 1990, which built upon and added to the confidence- and security-building measures contained in the Document of the Stockholm Conference 1986. On 4 March 1992, the Vienna Document 1992 was adopted, which built upon Vienna Document 1990. On 28 November 1994, the participating States similarly adopted the Vienna Document 1994. On 16 November 1999, the Vienna Document 1999 was adopted in Istanbul at the Plenary Meeting of the OSCE Forum for Security Co-operation.

Provisions:

The confidence- and security-building provisions of the Vienna Document are not as restrictive or stringent as the verification measures under the CFE treaty. . . .

The measures apply to the whole of Europe as well as the adjoining sea area and air space from the Atlantic to the Urals (ATTU) region. The comprehensive coverage includes NATO members, the former Warsaw Pact members, and the neutral and nonaligned states. Former states of the Soviet Union, whose territory lies within the zone, have accepted the Vienna Document, with the exception of Georgia and the Baltic states. The Russian territory falling outside the ATTU region is excluded from the agreement.

The Vienna Document requires the annual exchange of information on their military forces concerning the military organization, manpower and major weapon and equipment systems (battle tanks, helicopters, armored combat vehicles including armored personnel carriers, armored infantry fighting vehicles, heavy armament combat vehicles, armored personnel carrier look-alikes and armored infantry fighting vehicle look-alikes, anti-tank guided missile launchers permanently/integrally mounted on armored vehicles, self-propelled and towed artillery pieces, mortars and multiple rocket launchers (100 mm caliber and above), and armored vehicle launched bridges in the zone of application. The information will be provided in an agreed format to all other participating States not later than 15 December of each year. It will be valid as of 1 January of the following year.

Under the Vienna Document, there are three ways signatory countries may observe activities in another country: Inspections, evaluations and visits.

* * * *

b. NATO Expansion and Russia-NATO Cooperation

In 1997, following the dissolution of the Soviet Union, NATO invited three additional countries to join its ranks. On February 11, 1998, President Clinton transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification the Protocols to the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 on the accession of Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–36 (1998). See Chapter 7.C.

6. Other Instruments with Russia and Former Soviet States

Presidents William J. Clinton and Boris N. Yeltsin met in further summits between 1993 to 1998 to discuss an array of issues, including arms control, demilitarization, cooperative threat reduction, and nonproliferation. The Presidents met in Vancouver from April 3–4, 1993, in Moscow from January 12–15, 1994, on September 28, 1994, in Washington D.C., in Moscow from May 9–10, 1995, and April 26, 1996, then in Helsinki on March 21, 1997, and again in Moscow on September 2, 1998. At these summits they signed instruments including the Joint Statement on Strategic Stability and Nuclear Security, Joint Statement on the Transparency and Irreversibility of the Process of Reducing Nuclear Weapons, two joint statements on European Security, Joint Statement on Missile Systems, Joint Statement on Nonproliferation, Joint Statement on the Highly Enriched Uranium Agreement (see C.6.a. below), Joint Statement Concerning the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, Joint Statement on Parameters on Future Reduction in Nuclear Forces, Joint Statement on Chemical Weapons, Joint Statement on Plutonium Disposition (see C.6.b. below. below), Joint Statement on Security Challenges at the Threshold of the Twenty-First Century, Joint Statement on a Protocol to the Convention on the Prohibition of Biological Weapons, Joint Statement on the Exchange of Information on Missile Launches and Early Warning. Explanations and excerpts from a few statements concerning arms control and cooperative threat reduction follow.

A statement on the mutual detargeting of strategic nuclear systems was released by the White House Office of the Press Secretary at Moscow on January 14, 1994, excerpted below. 5 Dep't St. Dispatch Supp. 1 at 25 (Jan. 1994) at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html; see also 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 753, 757–58 (1994).

United States and Russian experts have discussed for several months possible measures to improve strategic stability, increase mutual confidence, and step back from Cold War nuclear force postures. These discussions have included proposals for mutual detargeting of strategic nuclear systems. Based on these talks, the Presidents announced that they will direct the detargeting of strategic nuclear missiles under their respective commands. . . .

Intercontinental and submarine-launched ballistic missiles are capable of being launched against one of several targets or sets of targets stored in weapon system computers. Historically, a target setting associated with actual war plans had been the routine alert assignment of U.S. missile systems. Detargeting will involve changing weapon-system control settings so that on a day-to-day basis no country, including Russia, Ukraine, or any other former Soviet territory, will be targeted by U.S. strategic forces. Russia has told the United States that their detargeting measures are comparable.

* * * *

Presidents Clinton of the United States, Yeltsin of the Russian Federation, and Kravchuk of Ukraine, meeting in Moscow on January 14, 1994, also issued a trilateral statement, excerpted below. 5 Dep't St. Dispatch Supp. 1 at 19 (Jan. 1994) at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html; see also 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 753, 758–59 (1994).

The three Presidents reiterated that they will deal with one another as full and equal partners and that relations among their countries must be conducted on the basis of respect for the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of each nation.

* * * *

The Presidents emphasized the importance of ensuring the safety and security of nuclear weapons pending their dismantlement.

The Presidents recognize the importance of compensation to Ukraine, Kazakhstan and Belarus for the value of the highly-enriched uranium in nuclear warheads located on their territories. Arrangements have been worked out to provide fair and timely compensation to Ukraine, Kazakhstan and Belarus as the nuclear warheads on their territory are transferred to Russia for dismantling.

Presidents Clinton and Yeltsin expressed satisfaction with the completion of the highly-enriched uranium contract, which was signed by appropriate authorities of the United States and Russia. By converting weapons-grade uranium into uranium which can only be used for peaceful purposes, the highly-enriched uranium agreement is a major step forward in fulfilling the countries' mutual non-proliferation objectives.

The three Presidents decided on simultaneous actions on transfer of nuclear warheads from Ukraine and delivery of compensation to Ukraine in the form of fuel assemblies for nuclear power stations.

Presidents Clinton and Yeltsin informed President Kravchuk that the United States and Russia are prepared to provide security assurances to Ukraine. In particular, once the START I Treaty enters into force and Ukraine becomes a non-nuclear-weapon[s] state party to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), the United States and Russia will:

> Reaffirm their commitment to Ukraine, in accordance with the principles of the CSCE Final Act, to respect the independence and sovereignty and the existing borders of the CSCE member states and recognize that border changes can be made only by peaceful and consensual means; and reaffirm their obligation to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, and that none of their weapons will ever be used except in self-defense or otherwise in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations; . . .
> * * * *

On May 10, 1995, Presidents Clinton and Yeltsin issued the Joint Statement on the Transparency and Irreversibility of the Process of Reducing Nuclear Weapons, excerpted below. 6 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 20 at 403 (May 15, 1995) available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

* * * *

Taking into account the proposal by President B.N. Yeltsin for a treaty on nuclear safety and strategic stability among the five nuclear powers, they declare that:

Fissile materials removed from nuclear weapons being eliminated and excess to national security requirements will not be used to manufacture nuclear weapons;

No newly produced fissile materials will be used in nuclear weapons; and Fissile materials from or within civil nuclear programs will not be used to manufacture nuclear weapons.

The United States of America and the Russian Federation will negotiate agreements to increase the transparency and irreversibility of nuclear arms reduction that, inter alia, establish:

An exchange on a regular basis of detailed information on aggregate stockpiles of nuclear warheads, on stocks of fissile materials and on their safety and security;

A cooperative arrangement for reciprocal monitoring at storage facilities of fissile materials removed from nuclear warheads and declared to be excess to national security requirements to help confirm the irreversibility of the process of reducing nuclear weapons, recognizing that progress in this area is linked to progress in implementing the joint U.S.-Russian program for the fissile material storage facility at Mayak; and

Other cooperative measures, as necessary to enhance confidence in the reciprocal declarations on fissile material stockpiles.

* * * *

The United States of America and the Russian Federation will seek to conclude in the shortest possible time an agreement for cooperation between their governments enabling the exchange of information as necessary to implement the arrangements called for above, by providing for the protection of that information. No information will be exchanged until the respective arrangement enters into force.

7. Anti-Personnel Mines

As discussed in A.7., supra, during the 1990s the United States ratified the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects ("CCW"), together with its Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby-Traps and Other Devices ("Protocol II" or "Mines Protocol") and the amended Mines Protocol, which was a result of U.S.-led efforts to place tighter restrictions on landmine use and transfer. See A.7.b. supra.

On September 17, 1997, the White House issued three fact sheets addressing U.S. efforts to eliminate the threat of anti-personnel landmines ("APL") and issues related to ongoing negotiations of the 1997 Convention on the Prohibition and the Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and on their Destruction ("Mine Ban Treaty" or "Ottawa Convention"). In December 1997 the Mine Ban Treaty was opened for signature in Ottawa, Canada. Although the United States had actively participated in its negotiation, ultimately it declined to sign due to unmet concerns, as reflected in excerpts from the fact sheets below.

The first fact sheet provides an overview of U.S. efforts, in addition to becoming party to the CCW and its protocols, to eliminate the threat of anti-personnel landmines during the 1990s, as excerpted below.

The full texts of the fact sheets are available at www.clintonpresidentialcenter.org/legacy/091797-fact-sheet-on-landmine.htm.

In May, 1996, we announced that the United States plans to destroy by the end of 1999 about three million non-self-destructing APL. Destruction of these mines is well underway and on schedule (1.5 million have been destroyed to date). The United States retains only those non-self-destructing APL needed for training and for defense in Korea.

On January 17, 1997, we announced that the United States would observe a permanent ban on export and transfer of APL. We will work to put this policy into law.

On January 17, 1997, the United States also announced that we would cap our APL stockpile at the current level of inventory.

Today, the President announced that by 2003 we will no longer use anti-personnel landmines outside Korea, and, within Korea, our objective is to have alternatives to anti-personnel landmines ready by 2006. The Department of Defense is pursuing an aggressive research and development effort to enable us to achieve these objectives. Requested funding for this program is $3M in FY98 and $5M in FY99.

* * * *

On September 26, 1994, at the UN General Assembly, President Clinton called for the elimination of anti-personnel landmines, the first world leader to do so.

On December 10, 1996, in the UN General Assembly, nations voted overwhelmingly (156–0) in favor of the U.S.-initiated resolution urging states to pursue an agreement to ban anti-personnel landmines.

At the opening of the Conference on Disarmament (CD) on January 20, the United States began work with other member nations to initiate negotiations on a comprehensive, global agreement to ban APL.

Today, the President announced we would renew our commitment to work aggressively to establish negotiations in the CD, and to reach agreement on an export ban as a first step.

* * * *

The second fact sheet explained U.S. requirements for landmines in Korea.

The security situation in Korea is unique, requiring the United States to maintain the option of using anti-personnel landmines there until alternatives are available or the risk of aggression has been removed. Our objective is to have alternatives to our anti-personnel landmines there ready by 2006.

* * * *

Because North Korean forces are so close to Seoul and so outnumber allied forces in place, the United Nations command [led by a U.S. Army General pursuant to the U.N. Armistice Agreement of 1953] relies on pre-planned and emplaced minefields to counter and slow a possible North Korean advance. These minefields are well marked with fences and signs and are monitored by South Korean troops. They do not pose a threat to the local civilian population. In hostilities, additional APL would be deployed to delay and to disrupt the attack long enough for us to bring in air power and other reinforcements with the objective of halting the attack and preventing the enormous loss of life that would result if North Korean forces were to overrun Seoul. Any U.S. anti-personnel landmines that are not marked and monitored will self-destruct within a maximum of 15 days, leaving no residual threat to the civilian population.

The third fact sheet addressed anti-tank munitions.

The United States believes that any treaty designed to ban anti-personnel landmines must not ban anti-tank mines, as would have been the case for the U.S. were we to have signed the Ottawa process treaty. The U.S. has an inventory of high-tech anti-tank systems with submunitions, i.e., anti-handling devices, that are designed to protect the anti-tank mines. Deployed around the anti-tank mines, these submunitions are essential to the effectiveness of the anti-tank minefield by preventing rapid breaching or removal by enemy footsoldiers.

These systems are only used in the case of imminent hostilities and can be air or ground delivered. . . .

Because they are self-destructing and self-deactivating, the anti-tank mines and their submunitions do not present a threat to the civilian population after hostilities have ended. . . .

8. Small Arms and Light Weapons

a. Overview

A fact sheet issued by the U.S. Department of State on February 15, 2000, provided an overview of U.S. efforts to combat international trafficking in small arms and light weapons during the 1990s. The excerpt below describes U.S. initiatives in several areas; the OAS Convention and arms brokering legislation, also addressed in the fact sheet, are discussed in 8.d. and 12 below.

As Secretary Albright told the United Nations in September 1999, "The international community must develop an integrated, comprehensive response—in countries of origin and countries of conflict, among buyers, sellers and brokers, and with governments as well as international and non-governmental organizations." The U.S. contribution to this effort is summarized below.

* * * *

Greater Accountability

The United States maintains the world's most open arms export procedures, and is promoting greater openness in the practices of other nations. In 1996, the President signed legislation amending the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to require the annual publication of information about arms authorized for commercial export by the United States that fall below the previously existing reporting thresholds for U.S. arms transfers. The report includes detailed, country-by-country information on the numbers of firearms, ammunition, and other "small-ticket" defense items authorized by the United States for export, setting a world standard for transparency. The United States has presented this report as a model to the 33-nation Wassenaar Arrangement, which promotes restraint and transparency in the export of conventional arms. The United States also publishes reports on arms flows to regions of conflict in order to raise public awareness of the issue. Last July, for example, the State Department released Arms and Conflict in Africa. It is available at: www.state.gov.

Careful Scrutiny of Export Licenses

If arms export license applications exceed the normal, reasonable domestic needs of a given importing country or show other abnormalities, the United States will audit and, if necessary, cut off exports to that country. On that basis, the United States has suspended exports to Paraguay since 1996. In addition, as U.S. law prohibits arms and munitions exported from the United States to be re-transferred by the recipient without prior U.S. approval, audits are conducted if diversions or transshipments are suspected.

* * * *

Cracking Down on Financing of Illicit Arms

Illicit markets in valuable commodities such as diamonds have helped finance arms flows, particularly to embargoed groups and nations. The United States and other concerned countries are identifying ways to track and intercept illicit trafficking in precious gemstones used in financing conflicts in Africa. One possibility is legislation that would require each diamond to be sold with a certificate of origin guaranteeing its legality. Such an initiative would require working closely with the diamond industry, whose cooperation is essential for any dependably effective regime.

* * * *

International Diplomacy

The United States is working with many nations and international organizations on the problem of illicit small arms.

U.S.-EU. At their December 1999 summit in Washington, the United States and the European Union released a statement of "Common Principles on Small Arms and Light Weapons," in which they pledged to observe the "highest standards of restraint" in their small arms export policies, and took further steps to harmonize their export practices and policies. They approved a 10-point "Action Plan," and established a formal working group through which they will continue their activities.

* * * *

Norway. The United States has worked closely with a group of like-minded nations led by Norway that is helping to set the international agenda for addressing the problem of small arms proliferation. The statement released by the 18 countries attending the last such conference in Oslo in December 1999 focused special attention on the importance of regulating the activities of arms brokers. President Clinton and Norwegian Prime Minister Bondevik also announced a bilateral task force on small arms and light weapons, focusing on efforts to destroy surplus small arms in conflict zones.

* * * *

b. International Traffic in Arms Regulations

The International Traffic in Arms Regulations (implemented pursuant to the Arms Export Control Act, 22 U.S.C. § 2751, 35 seq.), provide that it is the policy of the United States to deny licenses for the import of certain defense articles originating in certain countries (the "ITAR" list). See 22 C.F.R. § 126.1.

In the mid-1990s the Administration amended the list to include additional countries and to remove Russia from the ITAR list to eliminate former Cold War restrictions on trade and economic cooperation with Russia. In order to avoid possible compromise of public safety, the Administration undertook to negotiate voluntary export restraints with Russia. In 1996 the Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice, provided a memorandum opinion advising that the President had authority under the Arms Export Control Act, 22 U.S.C. § 2778 (1996), in the furtherance of U.S. foreign policy, to restrict the import of Russian munitions to certain classes of firearms and ammunition. Memorandum Opinion for the Special Assistant to the President and Legal Adviser to the National Security Council, from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, February 9, 1996.

* * * *

. . . The question has been raised whether the President possesses authority under the AECA to limit the import of munitions from Russia. We have concluded that restricting the import of Russian munitions to certain classes of firearms and ammunition is a legitimate use of the President's authority under the AECA to restrict the import of munitions in furtherance of United States foreign policy.

Section 38 of the AECA authorizes the President to control the import and the export of defense articles and defense services "[i]n furtherance of world peace and the security and foreign policy of the United States." 22 U.S.C. § 2778(a)(1). Section 38 further authorizes the President "to designate those items which shall be considered as defense articles and defense services for the purposes of this section and to promulgate regulations for the import and export of such articles and services." Id. The Act generally requires a license as a condition of exporting or importing any defense articles so designated by the President. 22 U.S.C. § 2778(b)(1)(B)(2).

* * * *

Pursuant to [a Presidential] delegation of authority, the Departments of State and Treasury issued regulations to implement the Act. See International Traffic in Arms Regulations, 22 C.F.R. pts. 120–130 (1995) (State Department regulations); Importation of Arms, Ammunition and Implements of War, 27 C.F.R. pt. 47 (1995) (Treasury Department regulations). The designation of defense articles subject to import restrictions is set forth in the U.S. Munitions Import List at 27 C.F.R. 47.21 and includes categories for firearms and ammunition.

We understand that one part of the Administration's trade negotiation with Russia involves the possible importation into the United States from Russia of arms for sporting and hunting purposes. The Administration intends to continue to prevent imports of certain classes of weapons that are deemed to pose an unacceptable risk to public safety. In our view, the AECA would authorize imposition of controls on such imports.

. . . The Federal Circuit recently affirmed the President's authority under the AECA to prohibit the import of arms in furtherance of foreign policy objectives. B-West Imports, Inc. v. United States, No. 95–1326, 1996 WL 29106 (Fed. Cir. Jan. 25, 1996). We understand that the Administration's objective in removing Russia from the ITAR list is to improve American-Russian trade relations, remove Cold War restrictions to economic cooperation, and expand economic opportunities for both countries. These objectives reflect significant United States foreign policy goals. Thus, there can be no doubt that the bilateral trade reform contemplated by the Administration is designed to further the foreign policy of the United States. Accordingly, the contemplated import controls fall squarely within the statutory authorization of section 38.

We note that it could be argued that protecting public safety —the reason for limiting the importation of munitions into the United States—is a domestic, not a foreign policy concern. Even assuming that protecting public safety is viewed as exclusively a domestic issue, we do not believe this calls into question the President's authority under section 38 (as delegated to the Secretaries of Treasury and State) to control import of munitions. United States foreign policy usually includes as one component the promotion of domestic goals or the avoidance of a negative impact on domestic concerns in the process of pursuing a foreign policy objective. Taking into account the domestic effects of foreign policy does not change the fact that it is foreign policy that is being set. See, e.g., Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416 (1920) (President possesses authority to promote foreign policy through treaty power even where object affected is a local concern). Indeed, it would be artificial as well as practically impossible to separate the two. . . .

* * * *

. . . In determining how far to open United States markets to Russian arms manufacturers, the President is faced with just such a delicate confluence of factors that requires that United States foreign policy integrate international commercial policy with domestic policy concerns.

For these reasons, we conclude that restricting the import of Russian munitions to certain classes of firearms and ammunition is a legitimate use of the President's authority under the AECA as delegated to the Secretaries of Treasury and State.

c. Litigation concerning re-importation of small arms into the United States

In 1996 Intrac Arms International, a licensed U.S. importer of firearms, sought to import from Austria several thousand World War II U.S.-manufactured rifles to sell to collectors. The U.S. Department of Treasury (Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms), in consultation with the U.S. Department of State, denied Intrac's application to import these arms in 1997. Intrac then filed a lawsuit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants, upholding the Departments' determination and interpreting the requirements for the import of certain firearms originating in the United States. Intrac Arms Int'l v. Albright, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21858 (D.D.C.).

Excerpts from the court opinion below address the statutory scheme applicable to such importation, including the requirement for consent to transfer of weapons provided by the United States to foreign countries through military assistance programs and statutes regulating importation of firearms. (Most footnotes have been omitted.)

II. Statutory Background

It is well established that the President of the United States has broad powers to control foreign policy. United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 324, 81 L.Ed. 255, 57 S.Ct. 216 (1936) (acknowledging that Congress has generally left exercise of President's power in foreign relations matters to President's unrestricted judgment); B-West Imports, Inc. v. United States, 75 F.3d 633, 636 (Fed. Cir. 1996) (holding that statutes granting President authority to act on foreign policy matters are to be liberally construed); South Puerto Rico Sugar Co. Trading Corp. v. United States, 167 Ct. Cl. 236, 334 F.2d 622, 631–32 (Ct. Cl. 1964), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 964, 13 L.Ed.2d 558, 85 S.Ct. 654

(1965) (holding that when Congress uses broad language in delegating authority to President in the area of foreign relations, that authority must be liberally construed, so long as there is no contrary statutory provision). Therefore, in reviewing the executive branch decision in this case, the broad authority granted to the President in foreign affairs must be kept in mind as a guiding principle.

There are two statutory schemes which are relevant: the retransfer consent statutes, and the importation of firearms statutes. In Exec. Order No. 11958, 42 Fed. Reg. 4,311 (1977), the President delegated his authority regarding retransfer consent to the State Department. In that same Executive Order, the President delegated his authority regarding the importation of arms to the Treasury Department, although its decisions are to be guided by the views of the State Department.

A. Retransfer Consent

* * * *

The retransfer consent statutes require that when the United States provides a foreign country with weapons through a military assistance program, that country must agree to obtain the consent of the President before it transfers those weapons to any other person or entity. This required consent from the United States is referred to as "retransfer consent".

The current statutory provisions requiring such retransfer consent are contained in Section 3(a) of the Arms Export Control Act ("AECA") (codified at 22 U.S.C. § 2753(a) (1998)) (dealing with firearms sold or leased to foreign countries), and Section 505(a)(1)(B) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 ("FAA") (codified at 22 U.S.C. § 2314 (1998)) (dealing with firearms granted to foreign countries).

. . . [I]t is clear that the retransfer consent statutes were in effect when Austria acquired the weapons in 1956, and have remained in effect by virtue of savings provisions enacted by Congress. These statutes give the President broad control over the movement of U.S.-provided arms by requiring those who obtained them under military assistance programs to obtain his approval before transferring them to any other entity.

B. Importation of Firearms

The importation of firearms provided under military assistance programs is governed by two statutory provisions. The first is Section 38(b)(1) of the AECA (codified at 22 U.S.C. § 2778(b)). The second is Section 925 of the Gun Control Act of 1968 ("GCA") (codified at 18 U.S.C. § 925 (1998)).

Section 38(b)(1)(A) of the AECA creates a general prohibition against the importation into the United States of any arms originally provided under military assistance programs. This general prohibition is lifted if an importer is seeking to import firearms classified as curios or relics under Treasury Department guidelines, and the foreign government owning those arms certifies to the United States that it does in fact own them.

* * * *

Congress made clear in Section 201 of the GCA (codified at 26 U.S.C. § 5847 (1998)) that it never intended to have the GCA supersede Section 38(b)(1) of the AECA. Section 201 provides:[10]

> Nothing in this chapter shall be construed as modifying or affecting the requirements of section 414 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, with respect to the manufacture, exportation, and importation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

Therefore, Intrac's right to import rifles under Section 925(e) is subject to and limited by Section 38(b) of the AECA.

* * * *

[10] As the Government notes, Section 414 of the Mutual Security Act was repealed, but a savings provision was included in Section 212(b)(1) of the International Security Assistance and Arms Export Control Act of 1976, that explicitly provides that any reference to Section 414 of the Mutual Security Act shall be deemed a reference to the AECA.

IV. Analysis

A. Statutory Framework

As already set forth above, the retransfer consent statutes apply to firearms provided under military assistance programs. ATF assumed, in the absence of any information to the contrary from Intrac, that the firearms in question were provided to Austria (or the original source from which Austria obtained them) under a military assistance program. This assumption was reasonable given the information known about these types of weapons. See Owen Decl. at 4–5.

Consequently, Intrac is required to complete a two-step process prior to obtaining a permit to import the arms into the United States. First, pursuant to Section 3(a) of the AECA, Intrac must obtain the President's consent to retransfer the firearms from Austria to Intrac. [In addition,] . . . Section 38(b)(1)(B) requires Intrac to show that the firearms are curios or relics, and requires the foreign government to certify that it owns the firearms. Without completing both steps of this two-step process, Intrac cannot obtain a permit to import these firearms into the United States.

B. Retransfer Consent

Intrac argues that since these weapons were provided under a sales program, rather than a military assistance program, the retransfer statutes do not apply. Intrac also argues that retransfer consent is unnecessary because there is no evidence of a contract between Austria and the United States requiring Austria to obtain retransfer consent prior to selling the firearms to Intrac.

Intrac's first argument is unpersuasive. . . . Since it was reasonable for the Government to assume, on the basis of the existing Administrative Record, that the firearms were provided under a military assistance program, Owen Decl. at 4–5, the retransfer statutes must apply in this case.

Intrac's second argument rests on Section 3(a) of the AECA, which conditions the granting of military assistance on acceptance of the retransfer consent requirement, making that requirement a contract term. Intrac argues that because no contract exists between Austria and the United States, the statutory requirement does not apply in this case, and even if a contract did exist, it would not bar importation of these firearms.

. . . The purpose of the retransfer consent statutes is to give the President control over the movement of U.S. firearms provided under military assistance programs. This purpose would be completely subverted if, as Intrac argues, "a breach of any such contract [made pursuant to a military assistance program] would not bar the rifles from importation." As the Government notes, Intrac's reading of the AECA would prevent the President from imposing embargos against importation of curios and relics from unfriendly nations, such as China, Libya, Iraq, or Cuba. Congress surely did not intend to nullify the statutes in this way, and risk the possibility of transfers of weapons to unfriendly nations, or the possibility of "unfettered trafficking of U.S. military weapons".

* * * *

The State Department's policy is to grant retransfer consent to private parties only when a public interest for granting such consent can be shown. Situations where such a public interest might exist include demilitarizing the firearms and placing them in a public display, or using them for a federal contract. Id. Before granting retransfer consent, the State Department requires assurances as to the end-use of the firearms, and requires that this end-use serve the public interest.

* * * *

The State Department's policy is, on its face, a reasonable and permissible construction of the retransfer statutes, and will be upheld, for two reasons. First, the President has broad powers to control foreign policy, and his powers under the retransfer consent statutes must be broadly construed. Second, Congress has failed to narrow the President's powers under the retransfer consent statutes, despite having had many opportunities to do so since the original statute was passed in 1949.

[Because there] are no judicially manageable standards by which to judge the State Department's exercise of its discretion in

[the application of the policy to Intrac], . . . the State Department's exercise of discretion will be upheld.

C. Importation of Firearms

Even after an importer obtains retransfer consent to acquire United States manufactured arms from a foreign country, it must still meet the requirements of the importation statutes before importing them into the United States. . . . The first requirement is that such weapons are classified as curios or relics, as defined by Treasury Department guidelines; both parties agree that Intrac has met this requirement.

The second requirement is that the foreign government holding these weapons must certify to the United States that it actually owns them. When Intrac submitted its application for a permit to ATF in December 1996, it included a letter from the Austrian government certifying that Austria owned the weapons.

* * * *

The State Department and ATF require that a foreign government continue to own the firearms until final approval of the importation application. A.R. Tab 10 at 3. Given the silence of the statute on this point, the agency's construction is both reasonable and permissible. By requiring ownership of the firearms by the foreign country up until final approval of their importation, both the State Department and ATF can address any foreign policy concerns before final consummation of the transaction, and can properly administer the retransfer consent statutes, as they may apply to a particular situation. Id.

* * * *

D. Due Process Violation

Intrac argues that the Government violated its due process rights under the Fifth Amendment by denying its application to import firearms. Specifically, Intrac alleges that the Government violated its liberty and property interests in the issuance of a permit to import the firearms. Intrac claims that these interests were created by the mandatory language in the relevant statutes, as well as the substantive limitations placed on official discretion by these statutes.

* * * *

Intrac has not, however, shown that it has any entitlement to a permit to import the firearms. It has cited to no statutory provision that mandates issuance of a permit in this case. . . .

* * * *

d. OAS Convention

On June 9, 1998, President William J. Clinton transmitted the Inter-American Convention Against the Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Firearms, Ammunition, Explosives, and other Related Materials, signed at Washington, D.C. on November 11, 1997, for the Senate's advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–49 (1998). The President's transmittal letter follows. The United States has not yet become party to the treaty.

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the Inter-American Convention Against the Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Firearms, Ammunition, Explosives, and Other Related Materials (the "Convention"), adopted at the Special Session of the General Assembly of the Organization of American States (OAS) at Washington on November 13, 1997. The Convention was signed by the United States and 28 other OAS Member States on November 14, 1997, at the OAS Headquarters in Washington. So far, 31 States have signed the Convention and one (Belize) has ratified it. In addition, for the information of the Senate, I transmit the report of the Department of State with respect to the Convention.

The Convention is the first multilateral treaty of its kind in the world. The provisions of the Convention are explained in the accompanying report of the Department of State. The Convention should be an effective tool to assist in the hemispheric effort to combat the illicit manufacturing and trafficking in firearms, ammunition, explosives, and other related materials, and could also enhance the law enforcement efforts of the States Parties in other areas, given the links that often exist between those offenses and organized criminal activity, such as drug trafficking and terrorism.

The Convention provides for a broad range of cooperation, including extradition, mutual legal assistance, technical assistance, and exchanges of information, experiences, and training, in relation to the offenses covered under the treaty. The Convention also imposes on the Parties an obligation to criminalize the offenses set forth in the treaty if they have not already done so. The Convention will not require implementing legislation for the United States.

This treaty would advance important U.S. Government interests, and would enhance hemispheric security by obstructing the illicit flow of weapons to criminals such as terrorists and drug traffickers. In addition, ratification of this Convention by the United States would be consistent with, and give impetus to, the active work being done by the United States Government on this subject in other fora, such as the United Nations, the P-8 Group, and the OAS Inter-American Drug Abuse Control Commission (CICAD).

I recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to the Convention, and that it give its advice and consent to ratification.

9. Transfers of Conventional Weapons and Dual-Use Technologies

On January 16, 1994, the United States and Russia issued the U.S.-Russian Federation Joint Statement on Issues of Export Controls and Policy in the Area of Transfers of Conventional Weapons and Dual-Use Technologies ("Joint Statement"). The Joint Statement, set forth below in full, is available with the referenced Memorandum of Intent Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Russian Federation on Cooperation in the Area of Export Control at www.state.gov/www/global/arms/factsheets/exptcon/expctrlc.html.

The Secretary of State of the United States of America and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation underscored the staunch commitment of their countries to efforts to curb the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and to enhance global and regional stability. In keeping with the spirit of the new strategic partnership between the United States and Russia the Ministers have agreed on development of wide-ranging cooperation in the field of export control. Moreover, they have agreed that all necessary steps in this field be taken expeditiously, and have established a senior-level working group for this purpose, as well as to initiate bilateral cooperation in the areas specified in a Memorandum of Intent signed this day in Moscow.

The Ministers expressed satisfaction with steps taken since the last meeting of the President of the United States and the President of the Russian Federation to eliminate the vestiges of the Cold War, such as the Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Controls (COCOM), which according to the understanding reached by COCOM members will be terminated not later than March 31, 1994. They also welcomed the decision to establish a new multilateral regime for enhancing responsibility and transparency in the transfers of armaments and sensitive dual-use technologies. This new arrangement would not be directed against any state or group of states, and would prevent the acquisition of such items for military end uses if the behavior of a state is or becomes a cause for serious concern as determined by the participants of the new multilateral regime.

The United States and Russia, as leading exporters of conventional weapons, military equipment and dual-use technologies, are convinced that additional measures are needed on an international basis to increase responsibility, transparency and, where appropriate, restraint in this area. They expressed their willingness to work with other countries in bringing about the early establishment of a new multilateral regime in order to achieve these objectives, which would supplement existing non-proliferation regimes in particular through arrangements to exchange information for the purpose of meaningful consultations.

10. Wassenaar Arrangement on Export Controls for Conventional Arms and Dual-Use Goods and Technologies

The Wassenaar Arrangement ("WA"), instituted in 1996 by thirty-three co-founding countries, including the United States, covers both conventional weapons and sensitive dual-use goods and technologies.

The WA was established following the dissolution of the Coordinating Committee on Multilateral Export Controls ("COCOM"), which had addressed export controls during the Cold War era. On November 16, 1993, in The Hague, representatives of the seventeen COCOM member states agreed to terminate COCOM, and to establish a new multilateral arrangement, temporarily known as the "New Forum." This decision was confirmed at a High Level Meeting at Wassenaar, the Netherlands in March 1994. COCOM ceased to exist as of March 31, 1994. See www.wassenaar.org/docs/History.html. The following excerpts from a U.S. Department of State fact sheet briefly describe the role of the WA.

The full text of the fact sheet is available at: www.state.gov/t/np/rls/fs/2001/5285.htm.

* * * *

The WA is designed to prevent destabilizing accumulations of arms and dual-use goods and technologies. The Arrangement encourages transparency, consultation and, where appropriate, national policies of restraint. In doing so, the WA fosters greater responsibility and accountability in transfers of arms and dual use goods and technologies. The Arrangement also provides a venue in which governments can consider collectively the implications of various transfers on their international and regional security interests. This is the principal security benefit of membership.

WA members maintain export controls on the WA Munitions and Dual-Use lists. These lists regularly are reviewed by experts of the Participating States and revised as needed. However, the decision to transfer or deny any controlled item remains the responsibility of individual member states. To facilitate meeting the WA's principal objective of preventing destabilizing accumulations, members report on their decisions to transfer or deny to nonmembers certain classes of weapons and dual-use technologies.

In order to enhance transparency in arms transfers, Wassenaar members report semiannually on deliveries to nonmembers of weapons in categories derived from the UN Register of Conventional Arms.

. . . Wassenaar members also report on their transfers to nonmembers of dual-use goods. The Wassenaar Dual-Use List comprises a Basic List of controlled technology, on which members semiannually report aggregated license denials. The Basic List is subdivided into a Sensitive List of technologies on which members report individual denials of licenses within 30–60 days. In addition to these individual denials, members also report semiannually aggregated numbers of licenses issued or transfers made. Finally, the Sensitive List is further subdivided into a Very Sensitive List, consisting of technology subject to extreme vigilance in national licensing decisions.

Although no country is an explicit target of the WA, members are committed to dealing firmly with states whose behavior is a cause for serious concern. There is broad agreement that these states presently are Iran, Iraq, Libya and North Korea. Wassenaar members deal with these "countries of concern" by preventing, through shared national policies of restraint, their acquisition of armaments and sensitive dual use goods and technologies for military end-use.

* * * *

11. UN Register of Conventional Arms

The United States participated in the development of the UN Register of Conventional Arms, the purpose of which is to promote transparency in the transfer and sales of conventional arms. On May 1, 1995, the United States issued a statement reporting its April 28 submission to the United Nations and describing the UN Register. The statement, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/www/global/arms/factsheets/conwpn/convun.html.

* * * *

. . . [The submission of the United States includes] data . . . on the number of US international transfers (exports and imports) of seven categories of major conventional arms during 1994, as well as available background information on US military holdings and procurement through national production in 1994 and on US arms import and export policies, legislation, and administrative procedures.

* * * *

The UN Register represents both an old idea, first raised in the League of Nations before World War II, and an innovative new direction for the post-Cold War international security agenda. It reflects a change in emphasis from preoccupation with the danger of nuclear war to measures that can increase confidence, reduce suspicions, and help expose and stem the proliferation of destabilizing and excessive accumulations of conventional armaments, especially in regions of tension.

The Register was established by UN Resolution 46/36L on Transparency in Armaments and adopted without dissent on December 9, 1991 by a vote of 150–0, with Iraq and Cuba abstaining and China and Syria not participating in the vote. Resolution 46/36L put in motion a multi-dimensional process which, among other things, instituted the Register of Conventional Arms and called on all member countries to report the number of arms in seven categories exported or imported from their territory during the calendar year.

This resolution, initiated by the European Community and Japan and co-sponsored by the United States, sent an important message to the international community and helped set a desirable new direction and tone to the international security agenda. The Register is intended to serve as an important global confidence-building measure and a political gesture symbolizing this new direction.

Information contributed by countries to the UN Register of Conventional Arms is available to all countries and will be compiled by the Secretary General in a report to the UN General Assembly. . . .

The United States believes the UN Register will encourage countries to develop national procedures for reviewing the potential impact of arms transfers on regional and international security. It may also encourage countries to develop appropriate means of control over the export and import of arms. . . .

12. "Brokering" Amendment to Arms Export Control Act

The "brokering" amendment to the Arms Export Control Act ("AECA") (also known as the Foreign Military Sales Act), Pub. L. No. 90–629, 82 Stat. 1320 (1968), was enacted July 21, 1996. Pub. L. No. 104–164 § 151, 110 Stat. 1421 (1996) (codified as amended at 22 U.S.C. § 2278 (1996)). The purpose of the amendment was to regulate and prevent the brokering of defense articles and technology that had not previously been covered by the AECA, namely overseas brokering and the brokering of non-U.S. defense articles or technology.

The text of the 1996 brokering amendment to the AECA follows.

* * * *

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 38(b)(1)(A) of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2778(b)(1)(A)) is amended—

(2) by adding at the end the following new clause:
"(ii)(I) As prescribed in regulations issued under this section, every person (other than an officer or employee of the United States Government acting in official capacity) who engages in the business of brokering activities with respect to the manufacture, export, import, or transfer of any defense article or defense service designated by the President under subsection (a)(1), or in the business of brokering activities with respect to the manufacture, export, import, or transfer of any foreign defense article or defense service (as defined in subclause (IV)), shall register with the United States Government agency charged with the administration of this section, and shall pay a registration fee which shall be prescribed by such regulations.
"(II) Such brokering activities shall include the financing, transportation, freight forwarding, or taking of any other action that facilitates the manufacture, export, or import of a defense article or defense service.
"(III) No person may engage in the business of brokering activities described in subclause (I) without a license, issued in accordance with this Act, except that no license shall be required for such activities undertaken by or for an agency of the United States Government—
"(aa) for use by an agency of the United States Government; or
"(bb) for carrying out any foreign assistance or sales program authorized by law and subject to the control of the President by other means.
"(IV) For purposes of this clause, the term 'foreign defense article or defense service' includes any non-United States defense article or defense service of a nature described on the United States Munitions List regardless of whether such article or service is of United States origin or whether such article or service contains United States origin components."

* * * *

The brokering amendment was implemented through the ITAR, 22 C.F.R. pt. 129. The regulations required persons meeting the definitions of the act to register with the Office of Defense Trade Controls. Section 129.2(b) explained the application of the term "brokering" in the statute and regulations as follows:

> For example, this includes, but is not limited to, activities by U.S. persons who are located inside or outside of the United States or foreign persons subject to U.S. jurisdiction involving defense articles or defense services of U.S. or foreign origin which are located inside or outside of the United States. But, this does not include activities by U.S. persons that are limited exclusively to U.S. domestic sales or transfers (e.g., not for export or re-transfer in the United States or a foreign person).

22 C.F.R. § 129.2(b).

Section 129.3(b) listed persons exempt from the registration requirements, namely employees of the United States Government acting in an official capacity, 129.3(b)(1), employees of foreign governments or international organizations acting in an official capacity, 129.3(b)(2), and persons "exclusively in the business of financing, transporting, or freight forwarding, whose business activities do not also include brokering defense articles or defense services. For example, air carriers and freight forwarders who merely transport or arrange transportation for licensed United States Munitions List items are not required to register, nor are banks or credit companies who merely provide commercially available lines or letters of credit to persons registered in accordance with Part 122 of this subchapter required to register." 22 C.F.R. § 129.3(b)(3).

Under the regulations, no person could engage in brokering activities without obtaining approval (i.e., a license); however licenses were not required for brokering activities "undertaken by or for an agency of the United States Government, for use by the United States Government or for "carrying out any foreign assistance or sales program authorized by law and subject to the control of the President . . ." 22 C.F.R. § 129.6(b)(1). A license was also not required for the brokering of certain military equipment arranged within and destined for NATO member states, Australia, Japan and New Zealand. See 22 C.F.R. § 129.6(b)(2).

C. NUCLEAR NONPROLIFERATION AND NUCLEAR COOPERATION

1. Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty

In April 1993 President Clinton announced at a summit in Vancouver, among other things, that "we will be starting a consultative process within the next 2 months with Russia, our allies, and other states, aimed at commencing negotiations toward a multilateral nuclear test ban." See Statement on Advancing U.S. Relations With Russia and Other New Independent States, 29 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 660 (Apr. 26, 1993).

In July 1993 President Clinton stated his intention to negotiate a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty ("CTBT"), and extend the U.S. testing moratorium. He called on other nations to observe the moratorium in an effort to further non-proliferation goals. See President's Radio Address, 1 Pub. Papers 993–95 (July 3, 1993). In October 1993 China conducted its first nuclear test since President Clinton's appeal for a global moratorium. The White House issued a statement regretting China's decision to resume nuclear testing and urged China to join other nuclear powers in the moratorium. See Statement by the Press Secretary on Nuclear Testing by China, 2 Pub. Papers 1694 (Oct. 5, 1993).

In May 1995 the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons ("Non-Proliferation Treaty" or "NPT") Review and Extension Conference agreed to extend the NPT indefinitely and without condition, as discussed in C.2.a., below. The Conference also adopted the "Principles and Objectives for Nuclear Non-Proliferation and Disarmament" calling for the conclusion of negotiations on a CTBT in 1996. Then in June 1995 President Chirac announced the resumption of French nuclear testing in the South Pacific as part of a final series of tests to ensure the reliability and modernization of France's nuclear arsenal prior to the signing of a CTBT. The tests ended a moratorium that had been in place since 1992 when President Mitterrand halted nuclear testing. The White House issued a statement regretting France's decision to resume nuclear testing. See www.clintonpresidentialcenter.org/legacy/090595-statement-by-press-secretary-on-french-nuclear-testing.htm.

The CTBT was negotiated at the Geneva Conference on Disarmament from January 1994 to August 1996. The United Nations General Assembly adopted the CTBT via Resolution 50/245 on September 10, 1996. U.N. Doc. A/RES/50/245 (1996), reprinted in 35 I.L.M. 1439 (1996).

Article I of the CTBT sets forth its basic obligations as follows:

> 1. Each State Party undertakes not to carry out any nuclear weapon test explosion or any other nuclear explosion, and to prohibit and prevent any such nuclear explosion at any place under its jurisdiction or control.
> 2. Each State Party undertakes, furthermore, to refrain from causing, encouraging, or in any way participating in the carrying out of any nuclear weapon test explosion or any other nuclear explosion.

On September 24, President Clinton became the first world leader to sign the CTBT. The President transmitted the treaty to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on September 23, 1997. S. Treaty Doc. No. 105–28 (1997). See also 92 Am. J. Int'l L. 44, 59–65 (1998). Excerpts below from the President's letter of transmittal describe the provisions of the treaty and its importance.

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Comprehensive Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty (the "Treaty" or "CTBT"), opened for signature and signed by the United States at New York on September 24, 1996. The Treaty includes two Annexes, a Protocol, and two Annexes to the Protocol, all of which form integral parts of the Treaty. I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State on the Treaty, including an Article-by-Article analysis of the Treaty.

Also included in the Department of State's report is a document relevant to but not part of the Treaty: the Text on the Establishment of a Preparatory Commission for the Comprehensive Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty Organization, adopted by the Signatory States to the Treaty on November 19, 1996. The Text provides the basis for the work of the Preparatory Commission for the Comprehensive Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty Organization in preparing detailed procedures for implementing the Treaty and making arrangements for the first session of the Conference of the States Parties to the Treaty. In particular, by the terms of the Treaty, the Preparatory Commission will be responsible for ensuring that the verification regime established by the Treaty will be effectively in operation at such time as the Treaty enters into force. My Administration has completed and will submit separately to the Senate an analysis of the verifiability of the Treaty, consistent with section 37 of the Arms Control and Disarmament Act, as amended. Such legislation as may be necessary to implement the Treaty also will be submitted separately to the Senate for appropriate action.

The conclusion of the Comprehensive Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty is a signal event in the history of arms control. The subject of the Treaty is one that has been under consideration by the international community for nearly 40 years, and the significance of the conclusion of negotiations and the signature to date of more than 140 states cannot be overestimated. The Treaty creates an absolute prohibition against the conduct of nuclear weapon test explosions or any other nuclear explosion anywhere. Specifically, each State Party undertakes not to carry out any nuclear weapon test explosion or any other nuclear explosion; to prohibit and prevent any nuclear explosions at any place under its jurisdiction or control; and to refrain from causing, encouraging, or in any way participating in the carrying out of any nuclear weapon test explosion or any other nuclear explosion.

The Treaty establishes a far reaching verification regime, based on the provision of seismic, hydroaucoustic, radionuclide, and infrasound data by a global network (the "International Monitoring System") consisting of the facilities listed in Annex 1 to the Protocol. Data provided by the International Monitoring System will be stored, analyzed, and disseminated, in accordance with Treaty-mandated operational manuals, by an International Data Center that will be part of the Technical Secretariat of the Comprehensive Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty Organization. The verification regime includes rules for the conduct of on-site inspections, provisions for consultation and clarification, and voluntary confidence-building measures designed to contribute to the timely resolution of any compliance concerns arising from possible misinterpretation of monitoring data related to chemical explosions that a State Party intends to or has carried out. Equally important to the U.S. ability to verify the Treaty, the text specifically provides for the right of States Parties to use information obtained by national technical means in a manner consistent with generally recognized principles of international law for purposes of verification generally, and in particular, as the basis for an on-site inspection request. The verification regime provides each State Party the right to protect sensitive installations, activities, or locations not related to the Treaty. Determinations of compliance with the Treaty rest with each individual State Party to the Treaty.

Negotiations for a nuclear test-ban treaty date back to the Eisenhower Administration. During the period 1978–1980, negotiations among the United States, the United Kingdom, and the USSR (the Depositary Governments of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT)) made progress, but ended without agreement. Thereafter, as the nonnuclear weapon states called for test-ban negotiations, the United States urged the Conference on Disarmament (the "CD") to devote its attention to the difficult aspects of monitoring compliance with such a ban and developing elements of an international monitoring regime. After the United States, joined by other key states, declared its support for comprehensive test-ban negotiations with a view toward prompt conclusion of a treaty, negotiations on a comprehensive test-ban were initiated in the CD, in January 1994. Increased impetus for the conclusion of a comprehensive nuclear test-ban treaty by the end of 1996 resulted from the adoption, by the Parties to the NPT in conjunction with the indefinite and unconditional extension of that Treaty, of "Principles and Objectives for Nuclear Non-Proliferation and Disarmament" that listed the conclusion of a CTBT as the highest measure of its program of action.

On August 11, 1995, when I announced U.S. support for a "zero yield" CTBT, I stated that:

> . . . As part of our national security strategy, the United States must and will retain strategic nuclear forces sufficient to deter any future hostile foreign leadership with access to strategic nuclear forces from acting against our vital interests and to convince it that seeking a nuclear advantage would be futile. In this regard, I consider the maintenance of a safe and reliable nuclear stockpile to be a supreme national interest of the United States. I am assured by the Secretary of Energy and the Directors of our nuclear weapons labs that we can meet the challenge of maintaining our nuclear deterrent under a CTBT through a Science Based Stockpile Stewardship program without nuclear testing. I directed the implementation of such a program almost 2 years ago, and it is being developed with the support of the Secretary of Defense and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. This program will now be tied to a new certification procedure. In order for this program to succeed, both the Administration and the Congress must provide sustained bipartisan support for the stockpile stewardship program over the next decade and beyond. I am committed to working with the Congress to ensure this support.
> While I am optimistic that the stockpile stewardship program will be successful, as President I cannot dismiss the possibility, however unlikely, that the program will fall short of its objectives. Therefore, in addition to the > new annual certification procedure for our nuclear weapons stockpile, I am also establishing concrete, specific safeguards that define the conditions under which the United States can enter into a CTBT . . .

The safeguards that were established are as follows:

The conduct of a Science Based Stockpile Stewardship program to ensure a high level of confidence in the safety and reliability of nuclear weapons in the active stockpile, including the conduct of a broad range of effective and continuing experimental programs.

The maintenance of modern nuclear laboratory facilities and programs in theoretical and exploratory nuclear technology that will attract, retain, and ensure the continued application of our human scientific resources to those programs on which continued progress in nuclear technology depends.

The maintenance of the basic capability to resume nuclear test activities prohibited by the CTBT should the United States cease to be bound to adhere to this Treaty.

The continuation of a comprehensive research and development program to improve our treaty monitoring capabilities and operations.

The continuing development of a broad range of intelligence gathering and analytical capabilities and operations to ensure accurate and comprehensive information on worldwide nuclear arsenals, nuclear weapons development programs, and related nuclear programs.

The understanding that if the President of the United States is informed by the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of Energy (DOE)—advised by the Nuclear Weapons Council, the Directors of DOE's nuclear weapons laboratories, and the Commander of the U.S. Strategic Command—that a high level of confidence in the safety or reliability of a nuclear weapon type that the two Secretaries consider to be critical to our nuclear deterrent could no longer be certified, the President, in consultation with the Congress, would be prepared to withdraw from the CTBT under the standard "supreme national interests" clause in order to conduct whatever testing might be required.

With regard to the last safeguard:

The U.S. regards continued high confidence in the safety and reliability of its nuclear weapons stockpile as a matter affecting the supreme interests of the country and will regard any events calling that confidence into question as "extraordinary events related to the subject matter of the treaty." It will exercise its rights under the "supreme national interests" clause if it judges that the safety or reliability of its nuclear weapons stockpile cannot be assured with the necessary high degree of confidence without nuclear testing.

To implement that commitment, the Secretaries of Defense and Energy—advised by the Nuclear Weapons Council or "NWC" (comprising representatives of DOD, JCS, and DOE), the Directors of DOE's nuclear weapons laboratories and the commander of the U.S. Strategic Command—will report to the President annually, whether they can certify that the Nation's nuclear weapons stockpile and all critical elements thereof are, to a high degree of confidence, safe and reliable, and, if they cannot do so, whether, in their opinion and that of the NWC, testing is necessary to assure, with a high degree of confidence, the adequacy of corrective measures to assure the safety and reliability of the stockpile, or elements thereof. The Secretaries will state the reasons for their conclusions, and the views of the NWC, reporting any minority views.

After receiving the Secretaries' certification and accompanying report, including NWC and minority views, the President will provide them to the appropriate committees of the Congress, together with a report on the actions he has taken in light of them.

If the President is advised, by the above procedure, that a high level of confidence in the safety or reliability of a nuclear weapon type critical to the Nation's nuclear deterrent could no longer be certified without nuclear testing, or that nuclear testing is necessary to assure the adequacy of corrective measures, the President will be prepared to exercise our "supreme national interests" rights under the Treaty, in order to conduct such testing.

The procedure for such annual certification by the Secretaries, and for advice to them by the NWC, U.S. Strategic Command, and the DOE nuclear weapons laboratories will be embodied in domestic law.

The Comprehensive Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty is of singular significance to the continuing efforts to stem nuclear proliferation and strengthen regional and global stability. Its conclusion marks the achievement of the highest priority item on the international arms control and nonproliferation agenda. Its effective implementation will provide a foundation on which further efforts to control and limit nuclear weapons can be soundly based. By responding to the call for a CTBT by the end of 1996, the Signatory States, and most importantly the nuclear weapon states, have demonstrated the bona fides of their commitment to meaningful arms control measures.

The monitoring challenges presented by the wide scope of the CTBT exceed those imposed by any previous nuclear test-related treaty. Our current capability to monitor nuclear explosions will undergo significant improvement over the next several years to meet these challenges. Even with these enhancements, though, several conceivable CTBT evasion scenarios have been identified. Nonetheless, our National Intelligence Means (NIM), together with the Treaty's verification regime and our diplomatic efforts, provide the United States with the means to make the CTBT effectively verifiable. By this, I mean that the United States:

> will have a wide range of resources (NIM, the totality of information available in public and private channels, and the mechanisms established by the Treaty) for addressing compliance concerns and imposing sanctions in cases of noncompliance; and will thereby have the means to: (a) assess whether the Treaty is deterring the conduct of nuclear explosions (in terms of yields and number of tests) that could damage U.S. security interests and constraining the proliferation of nuclear weapons, and (b) take prompt and effective counteraction.

My judgment that the CTBT is effectively verifiable also reflects the belief that U.S. nuclear deterrence would not be undermined by possible nuclear testing that the United States might fail to detect under the Treaty, bearing in mind that the United States will derive substantial confidence from other factors—the CTBT's "supreme national interests" clause, the annual certification procedure for the U.S. nuclear stockpile, and the U.S. Safeguards program.

I believe that the Comprehensive Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty is in the best interests of the United States. Its provisions will significantly further our nuclear nonproliferation and arms control objectives and strengthen international security. Therefore, I urge the Senate to give early and favorable consideration to the Treaty and its advice and consent to ratification as soon as possible.

On October 13, 1999, the Senate refused to grant advice and consent to ratification of the CTBT. See 145 CONG. REC. S12,505–550 (daily ed. Oct. 13, 1999). In a press conference following the Senate's action, President Clinton promised that the United States would not test nuclear weapons during the remainder of his term in office. President Clinton called the CTBT "critical to protecting the American people from the dangers of nuclear war," and pledged to continue "the policy we have observed since 1992 of not conducting nuclear tests." 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2026 (Oct. 18, 1999).

2. Non-Proliferation Treaty Extension (1995) and Security Assurances

a. Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons: Extension decision, joint principles and Middle East resolution

The NPT, signed in triplicate at Washington, London, and Moscow on July 1, 1968, entered into force on March 5, 1970, TIAS 6839, 729 U.N.T.S. 161, provides for periodic review conferences at five-year intervals. A conference held in 1995 was specifically provided for in Article X of the Treaty: "Twenty-five years after the entry into force of the Treaty, a conference shall be convened to decide whether the Treaty shall continue in force indefinitely, or shall be extended for an additional fixed period or periods. This decision shall be taken by a majority of the Parties to the Treaty."

The Review and Extension Conference of the Parties to the NPT was convened in New York from April 17 to May 12, 1995. The conference was attended by 175 of the Treaty's 178 States Parties. On May 11, 1995, the conference decided to extend the Treaty indefinitely, and agreed to greater accountability in future review conferences concerning the NPT's implementation. Extension of the Treaty on the Non-proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, NPT/CONF.1995/32/DEC.3. The conference also adopted a set of Principles and Objectives for Nuclear Non-Proliferation and Disarmament, addressing issues of nuclear disarmament, nuclear weapon-free zones, security assurances, safeguards under the authority of the IAEA, and peaceful uses of nuclear energy; and a resolution calling for a nuclear-free zone in the Middle East. Excerpts from the Principles and Objectives follow. The full texts of these documents are available at www.state.gov/www/global/arms/bureau_np/decision.html.

Nuclear disarmament

3. . . .The undertakings with regard to nuclear disarmament as set out in the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons should . . . be fulfilled with determination. In this regard, the nuclear-weapon States reaffirm their commitment, as stated in article VI, to pursue in good faith negotiations on effective measures relating to nuclear disarmament.

4. The achievement of the following measures is important in the full realization and effective implementation of article VI, including the programme of action as reflected below:

(a) The completion by the Conference on Disarmament of the negotiations on a universal and internationally and effectively verifiable Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty no later than 1996. Pending the entry into force of a Comprehensive Test-Ban Treaty, the nuclear-weapon States should exercise utmost restraint;

(b) The immediate commencement and early conclusion of negotiations on a non-discriminatory and universally applicable convention banning the production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices, in accordance with the statement of the Special Coordinator of the Conference on Disarmament and the mandate contained therein;
(c) The determined pursuit by the nuclear-weapon States of systematic and progressive efforts to reduce nuclear weapons globally, with the ultimate goals of eliminating those weapons, and by all States of general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control.

* * * *

Security assurances
8. Noting United Nations Security Council resolution 984 (1995), which was adopted unanimously on 11 April 1995, as well as the declarations by the nuclear-weapon Sates concerning both negative and positive security assurances, further steps should be considered to assure non-nuclear-weapon States party to the Treaty against the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. These steps could take the form of an internationally legally binding instrument.

* * * *

b. UN Resolution 984

On April 11, 1995, the U.N. Security Council adopted Resolution 984 on Security Assurances in preparation for and corresponding with the NPT meeting to extend the treaty discussed above. U.N. Doc. S/RES/984 (1995). Security Assurances were seen as an incentive for non-nuclear weapon states to join the NPT regime, and for non-nuclear weapons States already parties to the NPT to continue their policies against the proliferation of nuclear weapons. Key provisions of the Resolution follow.

The Security Council,

* * * *

1. Takes note with appreciation of the statements made by each of the nuclear-weapon States (S/1995/261, S/1995/262, S/1995/263, S/1995/264, S/1995/265), in which they give security assurances against the use of nuclear weapons to non-nuclear-weapon States that are Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons;

2. Recognizes the legitimate interest of non-nuclear-weapon States Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons to receive assurances that the Security Council, and above all its nuclear-weapon State permanent members, will act immediately in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, in the event that such States are the victim of an act of, or object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used;

3. Recognizes further that, in case of aggression with nuclear weapons or the threat of such aggression against a non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, any State may bring the matter immediately to the attention of the Security Council to enable the Council to take urgent action to provide assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to the State victim of an act of, or object of a threat of, such aggression; and recognizes also that the nuclear-weapon State permanent members of the Security Council will bring the matter immediately to the attention of the Council and seek Council action to provide, in accordance with the Charter, the necessary assistance to the State victim;

* * * *

6. Expresses its intention to recommend appropriate procedures, in response to any request from a non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons that is the victim of such an act of aggression, regarding compensation under international law from the aggressor for loss, damage or injury sustained as a result of the aggression;

* * * *

9. Reaffirms the inherent right, recognized under Article 51 of the Charter, of individual and collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security;
10. Underlines that the issues raised in this resolution remain of continuing concern to the Council.

c. Security assurances by the United States

The security assurance provided by the United States, referred to in the 1995 Principles and Objectives and in Resolution 984, supra, was conveyed on April 6, 1995, in a letter to the Secretary General from Edward W. Gnehm, Chargé d'Affaires a.i. of the U.S. Mission to the United Nations. U.N. Doc. A/50/153 (1995), S/1995/263. The letter forwarded a "statement by the Secretary of State [of April 5, 1995] announcing a declaration by President Clinton." The statement > reaffirm[ed] that [the United States] will not use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear-weapon States Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons except in the case of an invasion or any other attack on the United States, its territories, its armed forces or other troops, its allies, or on a State towards which it has a security commitment, carried out or sustained by such a non-nuclear-weapon State in association or alliance with a nuclear-weapon State.

Further excerpts below from the letter explain the U.S. position and its view of the role of the United Nations in the event of aggression against a non-nuclear-weapon state.

* * * *

The United States of America believes that universal adherence to and compliance with international conventions and treaties seeking to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is a cornerstone of global security. The Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons is a central element of this regime. . . . The United States considers the indefinite extension of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons without conditions as a matter of the highest national priority and will continue to pursue all appropriate efforts to achieve that outcome.

* * * *

Aggression with nuclear weapons, or the threat of such aggression, against a non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons would create a qualitatively new situation in which the nuclear-weapon-State permanent members of the United Nations Security Council would have to act immediately through the Security Council, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, to take the measures necessary to counter such aggression or to remove the threat of aggression. Any State which commits aggression accompanied by the use of nuclear weapons or which threatens such aggression must be aware that its actions are to be countered effectively by measures to be taken in accordance with the Charter to suppress the aggression or remove the threat of aggression.

Non-nuclear-weapon States Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons have a legitimate desire for assurances that the United Nations Security Council, and above all its nuclear-weapon-State permanent members, would act immediately in accordance with the Charter, in the event such non-nuclear-weapon States are the victim of an act of, or object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used.

The United States affirms its intention to provide or support immediate assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to any non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons that is a victim of an act of, or an object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used.

Among the means available to the Security Council for assisting such a non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons would be an investigation into the situation and appropriate measures to settle the dispute and to restore international peace and security.

United Nations Member States should take appropriate measures in response to a request for technical, medical, scientific or humanitarian assistance from a non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons that is a victim of an act of aggression with nuclear weapons, and the Security Council should consider what measures are needed in this regard in the event of such an act of aggression.

The Security Council should recommend appropriate procedures, in response to any request from a non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons that is the victim of such an act of aggression, regarding compensation under international law from the aggressor for loss, damage or injury sustained as a result of the aggression.

The United States reaffirms the inherent right, recognized under Article 51 of the Charter, of individual and collective self-defence if an armed attack, including a nuclear attack, occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

A U.S. Department of State fact sheet dated April 5, 1995, excerpted below, explained the President's declaration. See www.state.gov/www/global/arms/factsheets/wmd/nuclear/npt/nonucwp.html.

Background

Beginning with the negotiations on the NPT in the 1960s, many non-nuclear-weapon states made clear that in exchange for commitments not to acquire nuclear weapons they expected certain assurances from nuclear-weapon states. It was not possible to include such a provision in the NPT, but in 1968 the United States, United Kingdom and Soviet Union each announced that they would seek immediate Security Council action to provide assistance in accordance with the United Nations Charter to any NPT non-nuclear-weapon state threatened with aggression involving nuclear weapons, or which is the victim of such aggression. These so-called positive security assurances were "welcomed" in U.N. Security Council resolution 255 which was adopted on June 19, 1968.

To further address concerns in this area, the United States, United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union each declared in 1978 a policy against the use of nuclear weapons toward NPT non-nuclear-weapon states. Russia adopted a new negative security assurance in 1993 which was closer in substance to the policies of the United Kingdom and United States.

France and China joined the NPT in 1992 and about a year ago all five NPT nuclear-weapon states began to address the security assurance issue during consultations on the margins of the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva. One outcome of that effort was an agreement that each would issue a national statement with their release planned for this week.

Presidential Declaration

* * * *

The President declares that the United States will not use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear-weapon States Parties to the NPT except under certain circumstances. This declaration reaffirms long-standing U.S. policy in this area and is fully compatible with U.S. alliance obligations. Notably, the language of this negative security assurance is virtually identical to that which is scheduled to be released today by the United Kingdom, France, and Russia. Many NPT non-nuclear-weapon states have long urged the nuclear-weapon states to achieve a common formula on negative security assurances. The fact that four of the five have done so is an important achievement. China will issue its own statement.

The President also declares that the United States intends to provide or support immediate assistance, in accordance with the United Nations Charter, to any NPT non-nuclear-weapon state threatened with aggression involving nuclear weapons or which is the victim of such aggression. This declaration reaffirms and makes more explicit the U.S. commitment first made in 1968. This revised

U.S. positive security assurance underscores the 1968 pledge by elaborating on the type of assistance the U.N. Security Council could consider in these circumstances. Some NPT non-nuclear-weapon states have long urged such an elaboration as a way to make these assurances more credible. . . .

3. Nuclear Suppliers Group

The Nuclear Suppliers Group ("NSG") was formed in 1974, following the nuclear detonation by India in the same year. At the end of the 1990s, the NSG consisted of forty member nations. The primary purpose of the NSG is to ensure that suppliers uniformly apply a comprehensive set of guidelines to ensure that nuclear cooperation does not contribute to proliferation. The NSG develops guidelines and control lists to prevent proliferation. Such guidelines, which are developed by consensus and voluntarily adopted by NSG members, were first published in 1978. The NSG met in The Hague in March 1991 and thereafter held annual plenary meetings during the 1990s to strengthen NSG controls. The following text is extracted from two U.S. Department of State fact sheets on the NSG. See www.state.gov/t/np/rls/fs/3053.htm and www.state.gov/www/global/arms/factsheets/exptcon/nuexpcnt.html.

* * * *

The first set of NSG Guidelines (Part 1) governs exports of nuclear materials and equipment which require the application of International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) safeguards at the recipient facility. The Part 1 nuclear control list is called the "Trigger List" because the export of such items "triggers" the requirement for IAEA safeguards.

The second set of NSG Guidelines (Part 2) governs exports of nuclear-related dual-use equipment and materials. The NSG Guidelines also control technology related to both nuclear and nuclear-related dual-use exports. Both Parts 1 and 2 of the NSG Guidelines aim to ensure that nuclear trade for peaceful purposes does not contribute to the proliferation of nuclear weapons or explosive devices while not hindering such trade.

* * * *

The NSG Guidelines include a number of important conditions that help promote nuclear cooperation under sound nonproliferation arrangements. For Trigger List exports, the NSG Guidelines currently require, for example, (1) an agreement between the International Atomic Energy Agency and the recipient state requiring the application of safeguards on all fissionable materials in its nuclear activities (also known as "full-scope IAEA safeguards")—not just on the exported items, (2) physical protection against unauthorized use of transferred materials and facilities, and (3) restraint in the transfer of sensitive facilities, technology, and weapons-usable materials, i.e., exports that could contribute to the acquisition of plutonium or highly enriched uranium.

In 1992, spurred on by revelations about Iraq's illicit nuclear weapons program, the NSG adopted controls on nuclear-related dual-use goods, for example those with both nuclear and non-nuclear applications, that could make a major contribution to unsafeguarded nuclear activities or to nuclear explosive activities. The NSG Dual-Use Guidelines prohibit the transfer of controlled items for use in a non-nuclear weapon state in a nuclear explosive activity or an unsafeguarded nuclear fuel-cycle activity, or when there is an unacceptable risk of diversion to such an activity. To reduce the risk of diversion, the Guidelines require recipients to provide assurances 1) specifying how transferred items will be used, 2) stating that they will not be used for proscribed activities, and 3) stating that the suppliers' consent will be obtained before any retransfers of the items.

The NSG also agreed to control technology related to both Trigger List and controlled dual-use goods. By controlling technical information and assistance for the development, production, and use of controlled goods, NSG members limit the ability of proliferant states to use technical expertise or blueprints as part of a nuclear weapons program.

4. Nuclear Nonproliferation Sanctions

a. Enforcement of nonproliferation treaties

During the 1990s, the threat of nuclear proliferation from countries such as North Korea, India, and Pakistan led the United States to adopt policies and sanctions regimes, in an effort to enforce States Parties' compliance with their obligations under the NPT and other non-proliferation agreements. Section 530 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1994–95, Pub. L. No. 103–236, 108 Stat. 479 (1994), 22 U.S.C. § 2429a-2, as set forth below, prohibited assistance to countries not complying with IAEA or bilateral agreements with the United States.

* * * *

(b) PROHIBITION.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no United States assistance under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 shall be provided to any non-nuclear weapon state that is found by the President to have terminated, abrogated, or materially violated an IAEA full-scope safeguard agreement or materially violated a bilateral United States nuclear cooperation agreement entered into after the date of enactment of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978.

(c) WAIVER.—The President may waive the application of subsection (b) if—

(1) the President determines that the termination of such assistance would be seriously prejudicial to the achievement of United States nonproliferation objectives or otherwise jeopardize the common defense and security; and

(2) the President reports such determination to the Congress at least 15 days in advance of any resumption of assistance to that state.

* * * *

b. Nuclear Proliferation Prevention Act of 1994

In 1994, as part of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1994 and 1995, Congress passed the Nuclear Proliferation Prevention Act ("NPPA"). Pub. L. No. 103–236, tit. VIII, 108 Stat. 507 (1994). This legislation was designed to sanction entities that contributed to the proliferation of nuclear material and weapons-related technology and to expand existing sanctions against any non-nuclear state that detonated a nuclear explosive device.

Section 821 of the NPPA required the President to impose sanctions, with certain exceptions, "if the President determines . . . that . . . a foreign person or a United States person has materially and with requisite knowledge contributed, through the export from the United States or any other country of any goods or technology (as defined in section 830(2)), to the efforts by any individual, group, or non-nuclear-weapon state to acquire unsafeguarded special nuclear material or to use, develop, produce, stockpile, or otherwise acquire any nuclear explosive device." The sanctions were required to be imposed on > (A) the foreign person or United States person with respect to which the President makes the determination described in that paragraph;

> (B) any successor entity to that foreign person or United States person;
> (C) any foreign person or United States person that is a parent or subsidiary of that person if that parent or subsidiary materially and with requisite knowledge assisted in the activities which were the basis of that determination; and

> (D) any foreign person or United States person that is an affiliate of that person if that affiliate materially and with requisite knowledge assisted in the activities which were the basis of that determination and if that affiliate is controlled in fact by that person.

The sanction to be imposed, with certain exceptions, was that "the United States Government shall not procure, or enter into any contract for the procurement of, any goods or services" from such persons. The President was authorized to waive the application of the sanction twelve months after sanctions were imposed "if the President determines and certifies in writing to the Congress that the continued imposition of the sanction would have a serious adverse effect on vital United States interests."

Section 822 of the act amended § 3 of the Arms Export Control Act ("AECA"), 22 U.S.C. § 2753, to prohibit "sales or leases . . . to any country that the President has determined is in material breach of its binding commitments to the United States under international treaties or agreements concerning the nonproliferation of nuclear explosive devices (as defined in section 830(4) of the Nuclear Proliferation Prevention Act of 1994) and unsafeguarded special nuclear material (as defined in section 830(8) of that Act)."

Section 826 amended the AECA by adding a new Chapter 10, "Nuclear Nonproliferation Controls." 22 U.S.C. §§ 2799aa and 2799aa-1. This new chapter consisted of new versions of the "Symington Amendment" and the "Glenn Amendment," formerly §§ 669 and 670 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended. New § 101 (the Symington Amendment) prohibited specified assistance, in subsection (a) > to any country which the President determines delivers nuclear enrichment equipment, materials, or technology to any other country on or after August 4, 1977, or receives such equipment, materials, or technology from any other country on or after August 4, 1977, unless before such delivery—

> (1) the supplying country and receiving country have reached agreement to place all such equipment, materials, or technology, upon delivery, under multilateral auspices and management when available; and
> (2) the recipient country has entered into an agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency to place all such equipment, materials, technology, and all nuclear fuel and facilities in such country under the safeguards system of such Agency.

Section 101(b) authorized the President to provide otherwise prohibited assistance if he determined and certified to Congress that "(A) the termination of such assistance would have a serious adverse effect on vital United States interests; and (B) he has received reliable assurances that the country in question will not acquire or develop nuclear weapons or assist other nations in doing so." Such a certification ceases to be effective, however, if the Congress enacts a resolution disapproving the furnishing of assistance pursuant to the certification within thirty calendar days after receiving the certification. 108 Stat. 515 (1994).

New § 102 (the Glenn Amendment) in § (a) prohibited specified assistance to > any country which the President determines—

> (A) delivers nuclear reprocessing equipment, materials, or technology to any other country on or after August 4, 1977, or receives such equipment, materials, or technology from any other country on or after August 4, 1977 (except for the transfer of reprocessing technology associated with the investigation, under international evaluation programs in which the United States participates, of technologies which are alternatives to pure plutonium reprocessing), or > (B) is a non-nuclear-weapon state which, on or after August 8, 1985, exports illegally (or attempts to export illegally) from the United States any material, equipment, or technology which would contribute significantly to the ability of such country to manufacture a > nuclear explosive device, if the President determines that the material, equipment, or technology was to be used by such country in the manufacture of a nuclear explosive device.

Assistance may be provided if the President determines and certifies in writing to Congress "that the termination of such assistance would be seriously prejudicial to the achievement of United States nonproliferation objectives or otherwise jeopardize the common defense and security."

New § 102(b) expanded the list of applicable sanctions for transferring, receiving or detonating a nuclear device and, in addition, provided for sanctions for transferring or receiving nuclear weapons design information or components. Specifically, this provision required a broad range of sanctions (including terminating specified U.S. assistance, defense trade, U.S. Government credit or financial assistance, U.S. bank loans, and dual-use exports) against a country:

> (1) . . . in the event that the President determines that [the] country, after the effective date of part B of the Nuclear Proliferation Prevention Act of 1994—
> (A) transfers to a non-nuclear-weapon state a nuclear explosive device, > (B) is a non-nuclear-weapon state and either—
> (i) receives a nuclear explosive device, or
> (ii) detonates a nuclear explosive device,
> (C) transfers to a non-nuclear-weapon state any design information or component which is determined by the President to be important to, and known by the transferring country to be intended by the recipient state for use in, the development or manufacture of any nuclear explosive device, or > (D) is a non-nuclear-weapon state and seeks and receives any design information or component which is determined by the President to be important to, and intended by the recipient state for use in, the development or manufacture of any nuclear explosive device, then the President shall forthwith report in writing his determination to the Congress and shall forthwith impose the sanctions described in paragraph (2) against that country.

The President may delay imposition of sanctions under paragraphs (1)(A) and (1)(B) for thirty days of continuous session of Congress upon a certification that he has "determined that an immediate imposition of sanctions on that country would be detrimental to the national security of the United States." The sanctions under (1)(A) and (1)(B) cannot be waived without legislation from Congress. Sanctions under (1)(C) or (1)(D) "shall not apply" if the President determines and certifies in writing to Congress "that the application of such sanctions against such country would have a serious adverse effect on vital United States interests."

Further amendments were made to this section in 1999 following imposition of sanctions on India and Pakistan, discussed below.

5. India-Pakistan Nuclear Tests (1998)

As noted above, in 1998 the governments of India and Pakistan conducted nuclear tests. The five permanent members of the UN Security Council issued a joint communiqué expressing concern over the tests and the Security Council adopted Resolution 1172. The United States and China issued a joint statement expressing the countries' concern over the tests and the potential destabilization of South Asia. The United States also imposed sanctions, consistent with provisions of, inter alia, the AECA discussed above, on both governments.

a. Joint communiqué

On June 4, 1998, in Geneva, the five permanent members of the UN Security Council ("P-5") issued a joint communiqué, excerpted below, condemning the tests, enumerating steps that India and Pakistan should take, and affirming their readiness to assist the two countries to resolve the disputes between them. UN Doc. No. S/1998/473 (1998).

1. Bearing in mind the responsibility of their countries for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Foreign Ministers of China, France, Russia, the United Kingdom and the United States met in Geneva on June 4, 1998 to coordinate their response to the grave situation created by the nuclear tests carried out in May 1998 by India and then by Pakistan. The Ministers condemned these tests, expressed their deep concern about the danger to peace and stability in the region, and pledged to cooperate closely in urgent efforts to prevent a nuclear and missile arms race in the Subcontinent, to bolster the non-proliferation regime, and to encourage reconciliation and peaceful resolution of differences between India and Pakistan.
2. The Ministers agreed that quick action is needed to arrest the further escalation of regional tensions stimulated by the recent nuclear tests. India and Pakistan should therefore stop all further such tests. They should refrain from the weaponization or deployment of nuclear weapons, from the testing or deployment of missiles capable of delivering nuclear weapons, and from any further production of fissile material for nuclear weapons. They should also halt provocative statements, refrain from any military movements that could be construed as threatening and increase transparency in their actions. Direct communications between the parties could help to build confidence.
3. To reinforce security and stability in the region and more widely, the Five strongly believe that India and Pakistan should adhere to the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty immediately and unconditionally, thereby facilitating its early entry into force. The Five also call upon India and Pakistan to participate, in a positive spirit and on the basis of the agreed mandate, in negotiations with other states in the Conference on Disarmament for a Fissile Material Cut-off Convention with a view to reaching early agreement. The Five will seek firm commitments by India and Pakistan not to weaponize or deploy nuclear weapons or missiles. India and Pakistan should also confirm their policies not to export equipment, materials or technology that could contribute to weapons of mass destruction or missiles capable of delivering them, and should undertake appropriate commitments in that regard.

4. The Ministers agreed that the international non-proliferation regime must remain strong and effective despite the recent nuclear tests in South Asia. Their goal continues to be adherence by all countries, including India and Pakistan, to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) as it stands, without any modification. This Treaty is the cornerstone of the non-proliferation regime and the essential foundation for the pursuit of nuclear disarmament. Notwithstanding their recent nuclear tests, India and Pakistan do not have the status of nuclear weapons states in accordance with the NPT.
5. The Ministers concluded that efforts to resolve disputes between India and Pakistan must be pursued with determination. The Ministers affirm their readiness to assist India and Pakistan, in a manner acceptable to both sides, in promoting reconciliation and cooperation. The Ministers pledged that they will actively encourage India and Pakistan to find mutually acceptable solutions, through direct dialogue, that address the root causes of the tension, including Kashmir, and to try to build confidence rather than seek confrontation. In that connection, the Ministers urged both parties to avoid threatening military movements, cross-border violations, or other provocative acts.

b. Security Council Resolution 1172

On June 6, 1998, the U.N. Security Council adopted Resolution 1172 that, inter alia, condemned the nuclear tests conducted by India and Pakistan and endorsed the joint communiqué. U.N. Doc. S/RES/1172 (1998). The resolution provided further as excerpted below.

The Security Council,

* * * *

3. Demands that India and Pakistan refrain from further nuclear tests and in this context calls upon all States not to carry out any nuclear weapon test explosion or any other nuclear explosion in accordance with the provisions of the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty;

* * * *

7. Calls upon India and Pakistan immediately to stop their nuclear weapon development programmes, to refrain from weaponization or from the deployment of nuclear weapons, to cease development of ballistic missiles capable of delivering nuclear weapons and any further production of fissile material for nuclear weapons, to confirm their policies not to export equipment, materials or technology that could contribute to weapons of mass destruction or missiles capable of delivering them and to undertake appropriate commitments in that regard;

8. Encourages all States to prevent the export of equipment, materials or technology that could in any way assist programmes in India or Pakistan for nuclear weapons or for ballistic missiles capable of delivering such weapons, and welcomes national policies adopted and declared in this respect;

9. Expresses its grave concern at the negative effect of the nuclear tests conducted by India and Pakistan on peace and stability in South Asia and beyond;

* * * *

c. U.S.-China joint statement

On June 27, 1998, Presidents William J. Clinton and Jiang Zemin released a joint statement, reaffirming their respective policies intended to prevent the export of materials, equipment, or technology that could assist programs in India or Pakistan relating to nuclear weapons or for ballistic missiles capable of delivering such weapons. The full text of the joint statement is available at: www.china-embassy.org/eng/zmgx/zysj/kldfh/t36228.htm. Among other things the joint statement called for "the prompt initiation and conclusion of negotiations in the Conference on Disarmament, on the basis of the 1995 agreed mandate, for a multilateral treaty banning the production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices. We urge India and Pakistan to participate, in a positive spirit, in such negotiations with other states in the Conference on Disarmament with a view to reaching early agreement."

d. Imposition of sanctions

In May 1998 President Clinton issued two determinations in accordance with § 102(b)(1) of the Arms Export Control Act. In Presidential Determination No. 98–22, 63 Fed. Reg. 27,665 (May 20, 1998), the President determined that "India, a non-nuclear-weapon state, detonated a nuclear explosive device on May 11, 1998. The relevant agencies and instrumentalities of the United States Government are hereby directed to take the necessary actions to impose the sanctions described in section 102(b)(2) of that Act." Presidential Determination No. 98–25, 63 Fed. Reg. 31,881 (June 10, 1998), made the same determination as to Pakistan.

A fact sheet released in September 2000 by the U.S. Department of State Bureau of South Asian Affairs described the application of the sanctions under § 102(b)(2) of the AECA (the "Glenn Amendment" 4.b. supra), as excerpted below. See www.state.gov/www/regions/sa/0009_glenna.html.

See discussion of relevant AECA amendments in 4.b. supra. In 2001 the President waived the nuclear-related sanctions imposed on India and Pakistan. 66 Fed. Reg. 50,095 (Oct. 2, 2001). See Digest 2001 at 808–10.

. . . Under the Glenn Amendment, if the President determines that a non-nuclear weapon state [as defined by the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT)] detonates a nuclear explosive device, certain sanctions apply. The sanctions impose broad-ranging restrictions on various types of assistance, loans, and trade. The DOD Appropriations Act of 2000, signed into law on October 25, 1999, provides authority for the President to waive Glenn Amendment sanctions.

Glenn Amendment—India

Glenn Amendment sanctions were applied to India in the wake of its 1998 nuclear test. Certain sanctions were waived in October 1999. These included sanctions on some environmental programs as well as other activities. However, sanctions remain on programs which are affected by the following:

Prohibition of Foreign Assistance Act (FAA)-funded activities, U.S. government credit, credit guarantees or "other financial assistance" by departments, agencies, or instrumentalities of the U.S. government where no exemption (e.g., for humanitarian assistance or food or other agricultural commodities), "notwithstanding" authority, or existing waiver applies.

Prohibition of Foreign Military Sales (FMS), Foreign Military Financing (FMF).

Prohibition of licenses for export of items on the U.S. Munitions List (USML), certain dual-use exports, and for certain end-users.

The Glenn Amendment states that the United States must oppose (vote no or abstain) any IFI loan or financial or technical assistance that does not directly support basic human needs (BHN).

Glenn Amendment and Related Nuclear Provisions—Pakistan

At the time of its nuclear tests in May 1998, several restrictions on assistance to Pakistan were already in place in connection with the Pressler Amendment (triggered by Pakistan's possession of a nuclear explosive device) and the Symington Amendment (triggered by Pakistan's receipt of uranium enrichment equipment). The May 1998 nuclear tests subjected Pakistan to a broader range of economic and military sanctions under the Glenn Amendment.

Since most assistance had already been terminated, the Glenn sanctions had limited additional consequences for bilateral assistance to Pakistan. However, they placed new restrictions on U.S. credit and credit guarantees, including by EXIM and OPIC; all Foreign Military Sales; licenses for commercial exports of munitions and certain dual-use items; and commercial bank lending to the government of Pakistan, except for loans or credits for purchasing food or other agricultural commodities. The most significant new restriction for Pakistan under Glenn was a congressional directive that the U.S. shall not support non-Basic Human Needs lending by international financial institutions.

In December 1998, the President authorized U.S. representatives to allow for approval of a particular IMF package, but that authorization has since lapsed and has not been renewed.

Consistent with UN Security Council Resolution 1172, the United States denied the licensing of exports of certain articles and technologies to both countries. The Bureau of Export Administration, U.S. Department of Commerce ("BXA"), issued an interim rule, effective November 1998, outlining the nature of the sanctions against India and Pakistan. 63 Fed. Reg. 64,322 (Nov. 19, 1998) (codified at 15 C.F.R. pt. 742 and 744). The rule was amended in 1998 and thereafter, adding or deleting facilities from the list. See, e.g., 63 Fed. Reg. 65,552 (Nov. 27, 1998). An explanation of the implementation of the relevant regulations was included in the Federal Register, excerpts from which follow.

* * * *

In accordance with section 102(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, President Clinton reported to the Congress on May 13th with regard to India and May 30th with regard to Pakistan his determinations that those non-nuclear weapon states had each detonated a nuclear explosive device. The President directed in the determination reported to the Congress that the relevant agencies and instrumentalities of the United States take the necessary actions to impose the sanctions described in section 102(b)(2) of that Act.

Consistent with the President's directive, the Bureau of Export Administration (BXA) is imposing certain sanctions, as well as certain supplementary measures to enhance the sanctions. Consistent with the provisions of section 102(b)(2)(G) of the Arms Export Control Act, BXA is amending the Export Administration Regulations (EAR) by adding new § 742.16, India and Pakistan sanctions. This section codifies a license review policy of denial for the export and reexport of items controlled for nuclear proliferation (NP) reasons to all end-users in India and Pakistan, except for computers (see § 742.12(b)(3)(iii), High Performance Computers, for license review policy for computers). This licensing policy was adopted in practice in existing regulations in June 1998. . . . Items controlled on the Commerce Control List for nuclear and missile technology reasons have been made subject to this sanction policy because of their significance for nuclear explosive purposes and for delivery of nuclear devices.

To supplement the sanctions of § 742.16, this rule adds certain Indian and Pakistani government, parastatal, and private entities determined to be involved in nuclear or missile activities to the Entity List in Supplement No. 4 to part 744. License requirements for these entities are set forth in the newly added § 744.11. Exports and reexports of all items subject to the EAR to listed government, parastatal, and private entities require a license. A license is also required if you know that the ultimate consignee or end-user is a listed government, parastatal, or private Indian or Pakistani entity, and the item is subject to the EAR. . . . All applications to export or reexport items subject to the EAR will be reviewed with a presumption of denial to these entities, except items for the preservation of safety of civil aircraft will be reviewed on a case-by-case basis. Except for items controlled for NP or MT reasons, exports or reexports to listed parastatals and private entities with whom you have a preexisting business arrangement will be considered on a case-by-case basis, with a presumption of approval in cases where neither the arrangement nor the specific transaction involves nuclear or missile activities and the exports or reexports are pursuant to that arrangement. The term "business arrangement" covers the full range of business agreements, including general contracts, general terms agreements (e.g., agreements whereby the seller delivers products under purchase orders to be issued by the buyer), general business agreements, offset agreements, letter agreements that are stand-alone contracts, and letter agreements that are amendments to existing contracts or other agreements. The terms of the preexisting business arrangement policy may also apply to the longstanding continued supply of a particular item or items from the exporter to the entity even when there is no current agreement between the firms. BXA, in conjunction with other agencies, will determine eligibility under the preexisting business arrangement policy. In order to be eligible under the policy, you must provide documentation to establish such an arrangement. The documentation should be provided at the time you submit a license application to export or reexport items to any listed parastatal or private entity.

To further supplement the sanctions of § 742.16, this rule adds certain Indian and Pakistani military entities to the Entity List in Supplement No. 4 to part 744. License requirements for these entities are set forth in the newly added § 744.12. . . . The addition of entities to the Entity List does not relieve exporters or reexporters of their obligations under General Prohibition 5 in § 736.2(b)(5) of the EAR, "You may not, without a license, knowingly export or reexport any item subject to the EAR to an end-user or end-use that is prohibited by part 744 of the EAR." BXA strongly urges the use of Supplement No. 3 to part 732 of the EAR, "BXA's 'Know Your Customer' Guidance and Red Flags" when exporting or reexporting to India and Pakistan.

e. Presidential waiver

In 1999 Congress enacted authority for the President to waive certain sanctions against India and Pakistan. Section 9001 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, FY 2000, Pub. L. No. 106–79 (1999), 22 U.S.C. 2799aa-1 note. Section 9001(d) stated that it was the sense of the Congress that "the broad application of export controls to nearly 300 Indian and Pakistani entities is inconsistent with the specific national security interests of the United States" and that "export controls should be applied only to those Indian and Pakistani entities that make direct and material contributions to weapons of mass destruction and missile programs and only to those items that can contribute to such programs."

Section 9001(a) provided for a Presidential waiver "with respect to India and Pakistan, [of] the application of any sanction contained in section 101 or 102 of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2799aa or 22 U.S.C. 2799aa-1), section 2(b)(4) of the Export Import Bank Act of 1945 (12 U.S.C. 635(b)(4)), or section 620(e) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, (22 U.S.C. 2375(e))." Section 9001(b) limited the waiver authority, making it inapplicable "with respect to a sanction or prohibition contained in subparagraph (B), (C), or (G) of section 102(b)(2) of the Arms Export Control Act, unless the President determines, and so certifies to the Congress, that the application of the restriction would not be in the national security interests of the United States." The President exercised this waiver authority on September 22, 2001. 66 Fed. Reg. 50,095 (Oct. 2, 2001). See Digest 2001 at 808–11.

6. Agreements and Cooperative Programs with Russia and Former Soviet States

a. Highly enriched uranium

The United States and Russia concluded the Agreement Concerning the Disposition of Highly Enriched Uranium ("HEU") Extracted from Nuclear Weapons in Washington on February 18, 1993. The 1993 agreement and related contracts and agreements are referred to as the "HEU Agreements." See 31 C.F.R. § 540.305 (2001) (definition of "HEU Agreements"). As described in a U.S. State Department press release, available at www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2002/11255.htm, "[t]he 1993 HEU Agreement calls for Russia to convert 500 tons of highly-enriched uranium from dismantled nuclear weapons into reactor fuel for use in commercial nuclear reactors in the United States. Shipments began in 1995 and will continue through 2013." See also discussion of these issues in 88 Am. J. Int'l L. 753, 760 (1994).

Article I of the 1993 agreement (Purpose), provided for the parties to cooperate in order to achieve the following objectives:

> (1) The conversion as soon as practicable of highly enriched uranium extracted from nuclear weapons resulting from the reduction of nuclear weapons pursuant to arms control agreements and other commitments of the Parties which is currently estimated at approximately 500 metric tons in the Russian Federation, having an average assay of 90 percent or greater of the uranium isotope 235 into low enriched uranium (LEU) for use as fuel in commercial nuclear reactors. For purposes of this Agreement, LEU shall mean uranium enriched to less than 20 percent in the isotope 235; and (2) The technology developed in the Russian Federation for conversion of HEU resulting from the reduction of nuclear weapons in the Russian Federation may be used for conversion of United States HEU in the United States of America; and (3) The establishment of appropriate measures to fulfill the non-proliferation, physical protection, nuclear material accounting and control, and environmental requirements of the Parties with respect to HEU and LEU subject to this Agreement.

Article II required the parties to seek to enter into an initial implementing contract to accomplish the objectives of the HEU Agreement. The contract was to provide for, inter alia, the purchase and sale of LEU (converted from HEU at facilities in the Russian Federation) by the U.S.

executive agent, initial delivery to the United States of low enriched uranium ("LEU") and minimum conversion amounts, participation of the U.S. private sector and of Russian enterprises, as well as use by the Russian side of a portion of proceeds from the sale of LEU for the conversion of defense enterprises, enhancement of the safety of nuclear power plants, environmental clean-up, and the construction and operation of facilities in the Russian Federation for the conversion of HEU to LEU. Article V provided in paragraph 3 that the parties, to the extent practicable, were to seek to arrange for more rapid conversion of HEU to LEU than provided for in Article II.

Paragraph 10 of Article V read:

> Prior to the conclusion of any implementing contract, the Parties shall establish transparency measures to ensure that the objectives of this Agreement are met, including provisions for nuclear material accounting and control and access, from the time that HEU is made available for conversion until it is converted into LEU. Specific transparency measures shall be established in the same time frame as the negotiation of the initial implementing contract, and shall be executed by a separate agreement.

The two instruments that established the required transparency were (1) the Memorandum of Understanding between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Russian Federation Relating to Transparency and Additional Arrangements Concerning the Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Russian Federation Concerning the Disposition of Highly Enriched Uranium Extracted from Nuclear Weapons ("MOU"), concluded at Washington on September 1, 1993, and (2) the Protocol on HEU Transparency Arrangements in Furtherance of the Memorandum of Understanding of September 1, 1993, ("Protocol") signed in March 1994. Under the MOU, Article I, Purpose and Scope, the Russian side is to ensure, inter alia, that the HEU extracted from nuclear weapons pursuant to the HEU Agreement is oxidized, fluorinated and subsequently blended with natural uranium or LEU blended stock to yield LEU end product enriched to less than 5 percent U-235. The U.S. side is to ensure that LEU received by the United States pursuant to the agreement is fabricated into fuel for commercial nuclear reactors. The Protocol details transparency and access requirements, including observation by monitors of either party in the territory of the other.

On January 14, 1994, the White House Office of the Press Secretary released a statement noting that "an important non-proliferation objective of the United States is to ensure that the highly enriched uranium (HEU) removed from nuclear weapons is converted to low-enriched uranium (LEU), which cannot be used for nuclear weapons purposes." 5 Dep't St. Dispatch Supp. 1 at 25 (Jan. 1994) available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html. The statement, excerpted below, described the terms of the "HEU Contract" under which the United States (through the U.S. Enrichment Corporation or "USEC") agreed to purchase LEU from Russia.

Large numbers of nuclear warheads of the arsenal of the former Soviet Union are being withdrawn from service as a result of arms control agreements such as INF and START and unilateral initiatives to reduce tactical nuclear forces. As these warheads are dismantled, valuable nuclear material is removed. . . .

LEU has economic value as fuel for nuclear power stations. . . .

Under the terms of the HEU contract signed in Moscow [on January 14, 1994, by USEC], Russia will convert 500 tons of HEU to LEU and sell the LEU to the . . . USEC, a U.S. Government corporation. USEC will use the LEU it purchases from Russia to fulfill contracts to supply fuel for nuclear power stations in the United States and throughout the world. Over the 20-year life of the HEU contract, Russia will earn approximately $12 billion from sales of enriched uranium to commercial nuclear power stations. There will be no net cost to the U.S. Government.

In addition, Ukraine, Kazakhstan, and Belarus will receive compensation for the value of the HEU in warheads transferred to Russia. In the case of Ukraine, as warheads are transferred to Russia for dismantling, Ukraine will receive in compensation fuel assemblies for its nuclear power stations. . . .

b. 1998 Joint Statement of Principles for Management and Disposition of Plutonium Designated as No Longer Required for Defense Purposes

On September 2, 1998, at a summit between President Clinton and President Yeltsin held in Moscow, the Presidents of the two countries signed the Joint Statement of Principles for Management and Disposition of Plutonium Designated as No Longer Required for Defense Purposes. The purpose of the Joint Statement was to commit both countries to remove and convert significant amounts of plutonium from their nuclear weapons programs so that this material could not be used for future weapons. The Joint Statement led to the Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Russian Federation Concerning the Management and Disposition of Plutonium Designated as no Longer Required for Defense Purposes and Related Cooperation (2000), also known as the "Plutonium Disposition Agreement," available at www.nnsa.doe.gov/na-20/docs/2000_Agreement.pdf.

The text of the Joint Statement is excerpted below. A fact sheet issued by the White House Office of the Press Secretary on the same date is available at http://clinton6.nara.gov/1998/09/1998-09-01-fact-sheet-on-;plutonium-disposition-statement.html.

We have agreed on the following principles:—The U.S. and Russia will each convert approximately 50 tons of plutonium withdrawn in stages from nuclear military program into forms unusable for nuclear weapons. We recognize that interim storage will be required for this material;—The two governments will cooperate to pursue this goal through consumption of plutonium fuel in existing nuclear reactors (or reactors which may enter into service during the duration of our cooperation) or the immobilization of plutonium in glass or ceramic form mixed with high-level radioactive waste;—The U.S. and Russia expect that the comprehensive effort for the management and disposition of this plutonium will be a broad-based multilateral one, and welcome close cooperation and coordination with other countries, including those of the G-8. They further intend to encourage partnership with private industry;—In cooperation with others, the U.S. and Russia will, as soon as practically feasible and according to a time frame to be negotiated by the two governments, develop and operate an initial set of industrial-scale facilities for the conversion of plutonium to fuel for the above-mentioned existing reactors;—Conditions on cooperative projects for plutonium management and disposition will be determined by mutual consent of the parties participating in those projects;—In the plutonium management and disposition effort, the U.S. and Russia will seek to develop acceptable methods and technology for transparency measures, including appropriate international verification measures and stringent standards of physical protection, control, and accounting for the management of plutonium;—We also recognize that in order for this effort to be carried out, it will be necessary to agree upon appropriate financing arrangements.

c. The Gore-Chernomyrdin Commission

In April 1993 during a summit held in Vancouver, British Columbia, Presidents Clinton and Yeltsin created the U.S.-Russia Joint Commission on Economic and Technological Cooperation, which became known as the Gore-Chernomyrdin Commission ("GCC"), after its co-chairmen, U.S. Vice President Al Gore and Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin. The Commission was designed to support cooperation between the United States and Russia in the areas of space, energy, and technology. See 4 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 15 at 225 (Apr. 12, 1993) at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

By July 1996 the scope of work had expanded to include eight committees on Space, Business Development, Energy Policy, Defense Conversion, Science and Technology, Environment, Health, and Agribusiness. The nonproliferation initiatives were addressed by both the Energy Policy and Defense Conversion committees. The following discussion highlights some of the key developments in the nonproliferation area. Unless indicated otherwise, quotations are from a fact sheet released by the Department of State July 8, 1996, which includes fact sheets for sessions of the GCC from the first session held September 1993 in Washington, D.C. through the sixth session, held in Washington in January 1996, available at www.state.gov/www/regions/nis/gore_chernomyrdin.html. Fact sheets for earlier sessions are also available at 5 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 1 at 2 (Jan. 3, 1994) and No. 52 at 843 (Dec. 26, 1994), http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

On December 16, 1993, in Moscow, Vice President Gore and Prime Minister Chernomyrdin signed the Joint Principles for Nuclear Reactor Safety, done at Moscow, Dec. 16, 1993, described in the December 1993 fact sheet as "a milestone statement of principles for nuclear safety cooperation, with both governments committed to support and expand bilateral and multilateral efforts to promote nuclear safety." They also agreed on "principles guiding U.S. and Russian cooperation in the conversion and diversification of defense industries." On the same date, U.S. Secretary of Energy Hazel O'Leary and Russian Minister of Atomic Energy Viktor Mikhailov signed the Agreement Concerning Operational Safety Enhancements, Risk Reduction Measures and Nuclear Safety Regulation for Civil Nuclear Facilities in the Russian Federation to improve the safety of Russian nuclear reactors.

In June 1994 Vice President Gore and Prime Minister Chernomyrdin signed an agreement "obligating the U.S. and the Russian Federation to end the operation of plutonium production reactors by the year 2000. The agreement also prohibits the restarting of any reactors already closed and bars both countries from using in nuclear weapons any plutonium produced by the production reactors after the agreement enters into force." Agreement Concerning the Shutdown of Plutonium Production Reactors and the Cessation of Use of Newly Produced Plutonium for Nuclear Weapons, done at Washington, June 23, 1994. Both countries also agreed to expedite the construction of a fissile material storage facility at Mayak.

In December 1994, among other things, the two sides agreed that they "will exchange unclassified technical information to enhance safety and security in the dismantlement of nuclear warheads in both countries." Warhead Safety and Security Agreement, done at Moscow, Dec. 16, 1994.

In the June 1995 session two instruments were signed "showing marked progress in the area of nuclear accountability. The first covers the cooperation in the area of nuclear materials protection, control, and accounting [MCP&A]. [Joint Statement on Protection, Control and Accounting of Nuclear Materials, done at Moscow June 30, 1995.] The second covers cooperation on safety issues related to fuel cycle facilities and research reactors. [Agreement Between the U.S. Department of Energy and the Federal Nuclear and Radiation Safety Authority of the Russian Federation for Cooperation on Enhancing the Safety of Russian Nuclear Fuel Cycle Facilities and Research Reactors, done at Moscow, June 30, 1995] Statements were also signed on nuclear materials protection, transparency measures on purchases of highly enriched uranium, and plutonium production reactors. . . . [e.g., Joint Statement on HEU Purchase Agreement Transparency Measures.]"

On January 30, 1996, Secretary O'Leary and Minister Mikhailov signed a joint statement on "guiding principles in the area of nuclear materials accountability." Joint Statement on Guiding Principles in the Area of Control, Accountability, and Physical Protection of Nuclear Materials.

In July 1996 in Moscow, Secretary O'Leary and Minister Mikhailov signed joint statements addressing MCP&A cooperation. Joint Statement on Control, Accounting, and Physical Protection of Nuclear Materials and Joint Statement on Nuclear Material Protection, Control, and Accounting During Transportation.

On September 23, 1997, at its ninth session, Vice President Gore and Prime Minster Chernomyrdin signed the Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Russian Federation Concerning Cooperation Regarding Plutonium Production Reactors, done at Moscow, Sept. 23, 1997. A statement released on that date by the White House Office of the Vice President described the agreement as "represent[ing] an additional, significant step away from the nuclear legacy of the Cold War by placing a cap on U.S. and Russian stockpiles of nuclear weapon-grade plutonium. It also prohibits Russian use in nuclear weapons of recently produced plutonium. It marks the first time that the U.S. and Russia have placed limits on the materials for nuclear warheads themselves rather than on their delivery vehicles such as missiles and bombers, as in the START and INF treaties." The agreement specifically required Russia to covert three plutonium-producing reactors in active use "so that they no longer produce weapon-grade plutonium. . . . Similarly, U.S. plutonium-producing reactors, all of which have been closed down since 1989, must remain closed." The full text of the statement is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

Subsequent to the tenth session of the GCC, U.S. Secretary of Energy Bill Richardson and Russian Minister of Atomic Energy Yevgeniy Adamov signed the Agreement between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Russian Federation on the Nuclear Cities Initiative on September 22, 1998 at Vienna. As provided in Article 1, the purpose of the agreement "is to create a framework for cooperation in facilitating civilian production that will provide new jobs for workers displaced from enterprises of the nuclear complex in the 'Nuclear Cities' controlled by the Ministry of the Russian Federation for Atomic Energy."

d. Cooperative threat reduction program

Responding to a request from then Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev for assistance in dismantling Soviet nuclear weapons, President George H.W. Bush proposed that the United States would assist in the disposition, dismantlement, and destruction of nuclear weapons in the Soviet Union. Congress enacted the Soviet Nuclear Threat Reduction Act of 1991 in response, commonly referred to as "Nunn-Lugar" after Senators Nunn and Lugar. Pub. L. No. 102–228, 105 Stat. 1691 (1991), Title II, 22 U.S.C. § 2551 note. The Act authorized provision of assistance to address the threat of nuclear weapons proliferation resulting from the poor protection, control, and accounting of nuclear weapons and materials in the former Soviet Union and successor states and the concurrent potential for smuggling or transfer of materials, weapons, or weapons-related knowledge. Excerpts from the 1991 act, describing its objectives and requirement for Presidential certification in order to provide the assistance, follow.

SEC. 211. NATIONAL DEFENSE AND SOVIET WEAPONS DESTRUCTION.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds—

(1) that Soviet President Gorbachev has requested Western help in dismantling nuclear weapons, and President Bush has proposed United States cooperation on the storage, transportation, dismantling, and destruction of Soviet nuclear weapons;

(2) that the profound changes underway in the Soviet Union pose three types of danger to nuclear safety and stability, as follows:

(A) ultimate disposition of nuclear weapons among the Soviet Union, its republics, and any successor entities that is not conducive to weapons safety or to international stability; (B) seizure, theft, sale, or use of nuclear weapons or components; and (C) transfers of weapons, weapons components, or weapons know-how outside of the territory of the Soviet Union, its republics, and any successor entities, that contribute to world-wide proliferation; and

(3) that it is in the national security interests of the United States (A) to facilitate on a priority basis the transportation, storage, safeguarding, and destruction of nuclear and other weapons in the Soviet Union, its republics, and any successor entities, and (B) to assist in the prevention of weapons proliferation.
(b) EXCLUSIONS.—United States assistance in destroying nuclear and other weapons under this title may not be provided to the Soviet Union, any of its republics, or any successor entity unless the President certifies to the Congress that the proposed recipient is committed to—
(1) making a substantial investment of its resources for dismantling or destroying such weapons;
(2) forgoing any military modernization program that exceeds legitimate defense requirements and forgoing the replacement of destroyed weapons of mass destruction;
(3) forgoing any use of fissionable and other components of destroyed nuclear weapons in new nuclear weapons;
(4) facilitating United States verification of weapons destruction carried out under section 212;
(5) complying with all relevant arms control agreements; and
(6) observing internationally recognized human rights, including the protection of minorities.

On November 30, 1993, the Soviet Nuclear Threat Reduction Act was incorporated into the "Cooperative Threat Reduction Act of 1993," as part of the Fiscal Year 1994 National Defense Authorization Act. Pub. L. No. 103–160, Title XII, § 1203, 107 Stat. 1778 (1993) (codified at 22 U.S.C. § 5952). The new act authorized the President, notwithstanding any other provision of law, to "conduct programs . . . to assist the independent states of the former Soviet Union in the demilitarization of the former Soviet Union.

Any such program may be carried out only to the extent that the President determines that the program will directly contribute to the national security interests of the United States." 22 U.S.C. § 5952(a).

In addition to programs authorized in 1991, the new act also specified programs, inter alia, to "facilitate the elimination, and the safe and secure transportation and storage, of nuclear, chemical, and other weapons and their delivery vehicles," id. at (b)(1) "to prevent the proliferation of weapons, weapons components, and weapons-related technology and expertise," id. at (b)(3) "to facilitate the demilitarization of defense industries and the conversion of military technologies and capabilities into civilian activities," id. at (b)(5) and "to assist in the environmental restoration of former military sites and installations when such restoration is necessary to the demilitarization or conversion programs," id. at (b)(6).

Through the work of these programs, Kazakhstan became free of nuclear weapons in 1995, and both Ukraine and Belarus became free of nuclear weapons in 1996.

Between 1995 and 1997, the United States Government provided the Republic of Belarus approximately $75 million in Cooperative Threat Reduction ("CTR") funding. Additional CTR assistance to Belarus was suspended in 1997 as a result of the Government of Belarus' worsening human rights record and anti-democratic behavior. For more information on the CTR Program in Belarus, see http://minsk.usembassy.gov/html/ctr.html. CTR programs continued throughout the 1990s in Ukraine, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Russia.

7. Nuclear Weapons Free Zones: The African Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone Treaty and the South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone Treaty

In 1996 the countries of Africa, including the territory of the continent of Africa, islands States members of the Organization of African Unity ("OAU") and all islands considered by the OAU in its resolutions to be part of Africa, entered into the African Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone Treaty ("Treaty of Pelindaba"). This treaty complements other regional treaty regimes declaring nuclear weapons free zones ("NWFZs"), and commits the States Parties, inter alia, not to conduct, or seek or receive assistance in conducting, research on nuclear weapons, or to develop, manufacture, stockpile or otherwise acquire, possess or have control over any nuclear explosive device (or to seek or receive assistance in any such actions), and to prohibit the stationing of non-peaceful nuclear devices within their territories. The full text of the Treaty is available at www.state.gov/t/ac/trt/4699.htm; see also U.N. Doc. A/RES/51/53 (1996).

On April 4, 1996 the United States signed Protocols I and II of the treaty. At the time of writing, the treaty had not yet entered into force and the United States had not ratified the protocols. In Protocols I and II the five nuclear-weapon states (China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom, and the United States) agreed not to use or threaten to use nuclear devices against any party to the treaty, not to contribute to actions that would violate the treaty, and not to test, assist in, or encourage the testing of nuclear weapons in the Zone. The full text of the two protocols is available at www.state.gov/t/ac/trt/4699.htm. The United States included a declaration that it reserved the right to respond with all options, implying possible use of nuclear weapons, to a chemical or biological weapons attack by a member of the zone.

Also in 1996 the United States signed three protocols to the South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone Treaty ("Treaty of Rarotonga"), reprinted in 24 I.L.M. 1442 (1985). The Treaty of Rarotonga established a nuclear weapons free zone in the South Pacific. The Treaty opened for signature on August 6, 1985 and entered into force December 11, 1986. The three protocols were opened for signature on August 8, 1986, in Suva, Fiji. All five nuclear weapon states have signed the protocols for which they are eligible, as explained below. The United States, along with the United Kingdom and France, signed the three protocols to the treaty on March 25, 1996, at a ceremony in Suva, Fiji. The full texts of the Treaty and the Protocols are available online at www.state.gov/t/ac/trt/5189.htm.

Under Protocol I, the United States, France, and the United Kingdom are required to apply the basic provisions of the treaty to their respective territories in the Zone. This includes the U.S. territories of American Samoa and Jarvis Island. Neither Russia nor China has any territory in the Zone so they are not eligible to become parties to Protocol I. Under Protocol II, the United States, France, the United Kingdom, the Russian Federation and China agreed not to use or threaten to use nuclear explosive devices against any party to the treaty or against each other's territories located within the zone. Under Protocol III, the United States, France, the United Kingdom, the Russian Federation and China agreed not to test nuclear explosive devices within the zone established by the Treaty. As of the end of 2004, the United States had not ratified the Protocols.

8. U.S.-China Relations on Nuclear Issues

a. Agreement for nuclear cooperation

On July 23, 1985, the United States and China signed the Agreement for Cooperation Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the People's Republic of China Concerning Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy (known as the U.S.-China Nuclear Cooperation Agreement or "NCA"). TIAS No. 12027. The agreement was intended to meet the requirements of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, to establish a regime for nuclear cooperation as a condition for potential U.S. nuclear exports. See III Cumulative Digest 1981–1988 at 2863–84.

In approving the NCA in 1985, Congress enacted a joint resolution that conditioned implementation and nuclear cooperation on presidential certification of certain conditions including, inter alia, that verification measures were designed to be effective in ensuring that nuclear exports under the agreement are used solely for intended peaceful purposes, and that China was not assisting non-nuclear-weapons states to acquire nuclear weapons capabilities in violation of Section 129 of the AEA. The President was also required to submit a report on Chinese nonproliferation policies and practices. Pub. L. No. 99–183 (1985). Additional conditions were imposed for the NCA's implementation in 1990 following the incident at Tienanmen Square. Foreign Relations Authorization Act, FY 1990–91, Pub. L. No. 101–246 (the "Tienanmen Square Legislation").

In 1995, with the 1985 agreement still not implemented, Washington and Beijing began intense negotiations aimed at meeting China's certification requirements under the NCA. In 1996 and 1997, China pledged not to provide assistance to unsafeguarded nuclear facilities, promulgated new nuclear export control regulations, and joined the Zangger Committee. In addition, China announced it would formulate nuclear-related dual-use export control regulations by mid-1998 and offered a confidential written assurance to Washington that it would halt all new nuclear cooperation with Iran. In response to these steps, in October 1997, President William J. Clinton announced his intention to implement the NCA, stating that > the United States and China share a strong interest in stopping the spread of weapons of mass destruction and other sophisticated weaponry in unstable regions and rogue states—notably Iran. I welcome the steps China has taken and the clear assurances it has given today to help prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons and related technology. On the basis of these steps and assurances, I agreed to move ahead with the US-China agreement for cooperation concerning the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. It will allow our companies to apply for licenses to sell equipment to Chinese nuclear power plants, subject to US monitoring. This agreement is win-win-win. It serves America's national security, environmental and economic interests.

The White House, Office of the Press Secretary, "Press Conference by President Clinton and President Jiang Zemin," October 29, 1997, available at www.clintonpresidentialcenter.org/legacy/102997-joint-press-conference-with-jiang-zemin.htm.

On January 12, 1998, President Clinton made the formal certification and report required by U.S. law for implementation. In his Presidential Determination, the President certified "that the People's Republic of China has provided clear and unequivocal assurances to the United States that it is not assisting and will not assist any nonnuclear-weapon state, either directly or indirectly, in acquiring nuclear explosive devices or the material and components for such devices." Presidential Determination No. 98–10, 63 Fed. Reg. 3447 (Jan. 23, 1998).

On February 4, 1998, while the issue was before Congress, Robert J. Einhorn, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Nonproliferation, testified before the House Committee on International Relations on the rationale behind the Administration's policy on nuclear cooperation with China, and about Chinese steps regarding nonproliferation.

The full text of the testimony, excerpted below, is available at www.state.gov/s/l/c8183.htm.

U.S. goals in the nuclear nonproliferation talks were carefully chosen to satisfy—and in some cases exceed—the requirements of U.S. law to implement the 1985 Agreement. Our goals were: (1) to terminate Chinese assistance to Pakistan's unsafeguarded nuclear facilities and nuclear explosive program, (2) to curtail Chinese cooperation with Iran's safeguarded nuclear program, (3) to establish an effective Chinese nuclear and nuclear-related dual-use export control system, and (4) to obtain Chinese participation in multilateral nuclear export control efforts. We achieved important results in each of these areas.

• China made a commitment in May 1996 not to provide assistance to unsafeguarded nuclear facilities, in Pakistan or anywhere else. . . .

• China has agreed to phase out its nuclear cooperation with Iran. . . .

• China is putting in place for the first time a comprehensive, nationwide system of nuclear and nuclear-related dual-use export controls. . . .

China became a member of the NPT Exporters Committee (Zangger Committee) in October 1997, the first time China has joined a multilateral nonproliferation export control regime. Committee membership will both enhance China's export control expertise and strengthen its commitment to nonproliferation norms and practices. . . .

The recent steps the Chinese have taken and the new assurances they have provided meet our negotiating goals and, more importantly, satisfy the standards set by the Congress for implementing the 1985 Agreement. . . .

But the progress we have seen involves more than words, more than commitments on paper. We have already begun to see concrete actions—in terms of sales to third countries rejected or canceled, detailed regulations and control lists adopted and publicized, and active participation in international regimes initiated.

* * * *

Taken together, these various steps and developments constitute a marked, positive shift in China's nuclear nonproliferation policies and practices. On the basis of this record, and taking carefully into account the specific requirements of U.S. law, the President announced on October 29, 1997 that he would submit to Congress the certifications and report necessary to implement the 1985 Agreement. He signed the certification package on January 12 of this year. It is now sitting before the Congress for the 30 continuous legislative days required before the Agreement can be implemented.

Implementation of the 1985 Agreement will bring important benefits for the United States.

It will provide an effective means of encouraging China to live up to the nuclear nonproliferation commitments it has recently made. It is necessary to point out, in this connection, that the 1985 U.S.-PRC Agreement will make China eligible to receive

U.S. nuclear exports; it does not guarantee that China will receive them. Under our nuclear licensing procedures, individual transactions will have to be approved on a case-by-case basis and each license is subject to a thorough interagency review process. If the Chinese do not abide by their assurances, we can withhold approval of new licenses and even revoke previously-approved licenses.

Implementation will therefore give China continuing incentives to fulfill its obligations. We will be monitoring Chinese behavior closely. Given the close historical ties between China and Pakistan and the challenge Beijing faces in implementing its new export control system, it is certainly conceivable that cases will arise that raise questions. If and when we encounter problems or uncertainties, we will not hesitate to raise them with Beijing. With the 1985 Agreement in effect—and prospects for continued cooperation potentially at risk—the Chinese will have a strong stake in being responsive to our inquiries and in taking prompt, corrective steps to prevent or stop any activities inconsistent with China's policies and commitments. Failure to proceed with implementation, on the other hand, would deprive us of the best vehicle we have for promoting cooperative and conscientious follow-up on China's undertakings.

* * * *

Congress did not reject the certifications within the ninety-day period provided by law and the NCA was finally implemented on March 19, 1998. The Agreement on Cooperation Concerning Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Technologies, with annex, was signed at Beijing on June 29, 1998, and entered into force the same day. Thereafter the parties also signed a Protocol on Cooperation in Nuclear Safety Matters in Vienna on September 24, 1998, which entered into force on that day.

b. Cox Report

In 1999 the House Select Committee on U.S. National Security and Military/Commercial Concerns with the People's Republic of China released the Cox Report, a declassified version of a comprehensive report detailing China's espionage and intelligence gathering activities, including in the area of thermonuclear reactor technology and missile and space-launch technology. H.R. Rep. No. 105–851 (1999).

The report detailed both China's espionage activities and the Committee's analysis of China's ability to exploit the illegally obtained intelligence. The report also assessed certain aspects of United States export control laws, and found that certain U.S. companies had unlawfully transferred missile design information to the PRC. Additionally, the report noted legislative measures designed to increase safeguards, and the need for additional measures. The declassified report is available online at www.gpo.gov/congress/house/hr105851-html/index.html.

Excerpts from the Overview of the report are set forth below.

* * * *

A. The People's Republic of China (PRC) has stolen design information on the United States' most advanced thermonuclear weapons. . . . These thefts of nuclear secrets from our national weapons laboratories enabled the PRC to design, develop, and successfully test modern strategic nuclear weapons sooner than would otherwise have been possible. The stolen U.S. nuclear secrets give the PRC design information on thermonuclear weapons on a par with our own.

The PRC thefts from our National Laboratories began at least as early as the late 1970s. Significant secrets are known to have been stolen, from the laboratories or elsewhere, as recently as the mid-1990s. Such thefts almost certainly continue to the present.

• The stolen information includes classified information on seven U.S. thermonuclear warheads, including every currently deployed thermonuclear warhead in the U.S. ballistic missile arsenal.

• The stolen information also includes classified design information for an enhanced radiation weapon (commonly known as the "neutron bomb"), which neither the United States, nor any other nation, has yet deployed.

* * * *

D. In the aftermath of three failed satellite launches since 1992, U.S. satellite manufacturers transferred missile design information and know-how to the PRC without obtaining the legally required licenses. This information has improved the reliability of PRC rockets useful for civilian and military purposes. The illegally transmitted information is useful for the design and improved reliability of future PRC ballistic missiles, as well.

U.S. satellite manufacturers analyzed the causes of three PRC launch failures and recommended improvements to the reliability of the PRC rockets. These launch failure reviews were conducted without required Department of State export licenses, and communicated technical information to the PRC in violation of the International Traffic in Arms Regulations.

* * * *

G. The Strom Thurmond National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1999 (Pub. L. No. 105–261 (Oct. 17, 1998), 112 Stat. 1920)) took important steps to correct deficiencies in the administration of U.S. export controls on commercial space launches in the PRC. But the aggressive implementation of this law is vital, and other problems with launches in the PRC that the Act does not address require immediate attention.

The Fiscal 1999 Department of Defense Authorization Act sought to increase safeguards on technology transfer during foreign launches of U.S. satellites.

The measures set forth in the Act include transferring licensing jurisdiction to the Department of State, and increased support for the Defense Department's efforts to prevent technology loss.

However, additional measures—including better training for Defense Department monitors and improved procedures for hiring professional security personnel—will be needed.

9. Democratic People's Republic of Korea

a. The Agreed Framework: Background and implementation

In March 1993 the Democratic People's Republic of Korea ("DPRK" or "North Korea") gave notice to the UN Security Council that it intended to withdraw from the NPT. This action followed the discovery of discrepancies in the DPRK's declaration of nuclear material, which it was required to account for under the NPT. The United States undertook negotiations to persuade the DPRK not to withdraw from the NPT and to freeze and ultimately dismantle its nuclear weapons.

In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on January 24, 1995, Secretary of State Warren Christopher explained the impetus for the U.S. efforts to halt the DPRK's nuclear weapons program. The full text of Secretary Christopher's testimony is available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dossec/1995/9501/950124dossec.html. See also 89 Am. J. Int'l L. 372 (1995).

Over the last decade, successive administrations watched with concern as North Korea pursued its nuclear program, its development of ballistic missiles, and its build-up of forces. In 1987, during the Reagan Administration, North Korea's 5 megawatt reactor became operational. And in 1989, during the Bush Administration, North Korea unloaded an unknown amount of spent fuel that may have been reprocessed into plutonium.

When North Korea sought to remove its nuclear program from the constraint of international safeguards, President Clinton moved quickly to meet the potential global threat posed by its nuclear ambitions. Left unchecked, North Korea would soon have been in a position to produce hundreds of kilograms of plutonium for nuclear weapons—and to provoke a destabilizing nuclear arms race in Northeast Asia. It would also have been able to sell nuclear material or nuclear weapons to rogue states in the Middle East—just as it has sold them ballistic missiles in recent years.

* * * *

In June 1993 the two countries agreed on a Joint Statement of Principles in order to achieve peace and security on a nuclear-free Korean peninsula, 4 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 24 at 440 (June 14, 1993), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html, followed by an Agreed Statement in August of 1994. On October 21, 1994, after sixteen months of negotiations, the United States and North Korea signed an Agreed Framework with the objective of ending the threat of nuclear proliferation on the Korean Peninsula, reprinted in 34 I.L.M. 603 (1995).

Secretary of State Christopher outlined the terms of the Agreed Framework and its effects in his January 1995 testimony, supra, as set forth below.

First, the Agreed Framework immediately froze the North Korean nuclear program. The North agreed not to restart its 5 megawatt reactor. It agreed to seal its reprocessing facility and eventually dismantle it. It agreed to cooperate with the United States to store safely the spent fuel from the 5 megawatt reactor—rather than reprocess it—and eventually ship it out of the country. In short, North Korea's capacity to separate or produce plutonium was ended. All these steps are now taking place under the careful scrutiny of the IAEA.

Second, the North agreed to freeze construction of its 50 and 200 megawatt reactors and ultimately dismantle them. Absent this agreement, the two reactors would have been capable of producing enough plutonium for dozens of bombs each year.

Third, under the Agreed Framework, North Korea will remain a party to the NPT. As such, it must fully disclose its past nuclear activities. North Korea is obligated to cooperate with whatever measures the IAEA deems necessary—including special inspections—to resolve questions about its nuclear program.

Let me stress that as a result of the Framework, North Korea must fulfill additional obligations beyond its NPT requirements. These include no more reprocessing of spent fuel, the shipment of the spent fuel containing plutonium out of the country, and dismantlement of the gas graphite reactor system.

In return for these steps, North Korea will receive some benefits. We will lead an international effort to provide North Korea with proliferation-resistant, light-water reactors. It will also receive heavy fuel oil shipments as an interim energy source until the light-water reactors come on line early in the next century. Almost all financing for the LWRs will come from others, primarily South Korea and Japan. We expect the heavy fuel oil to be provided by the United States and other concerned countries.

Under the Agreed Framework, initial work on the LWR project will begin, but there will be no delivery of any significant nuclear components for the reactors until North Korea complies fully with its safeguards obligations. Put another way, the North Koreans will not receive critical equipment or technology for LWRs [light water reactors] until the IAEA is satisfied that questions about past North Korean nuclear activity are resolved.

Also under the terms of the Agreed Framework, the North has agreed to resume its dialogue with the Republic of Korea. This was a critical provision for South Korea and the United States if the Framework was to stand the test of time. Finally, under the Framework, the United States will move carefully toward more normal relations with North Korea. To ensure smooth implementation of the Framework, we will open a liaison office in Pyongyang, and North Korea will open a liaison office here. I would stress, though, that full normalization is explicitly linked to the North's willingness to resolve many issues of concern to us. We have made clear to the North Koreans that our agenda begins with their ballistic missile development and export activities, and their destabilizing conventional force deployment.

We designed the structure of the Agreed Framework to maximize the benefits and minimize the risks to the United States, South Korea and Japan. Let me explain how:

First, the burden of up-front performance falls on North Korea, not the United States. The North had to freeze immediately all construction of its 50 and 200 megawatt reactors. It had to refrain from refueling and restarting the 5 megawatt reactor and from taking any steps to reprocess existing spent fuel and to separate plutonium.

The steps we are taking in response are carefully calibrated. Last week, we provided 50,000 tons of heavy oil to North Korea, equivalent to less than one-half of one percent of its annual electrical energy production capability, and worth less than $5 million at current market prices. We are helping it safely store spent fuel until it is shipped out of the North. As an alternative to reprocessing, this is profoundly in our interest. We also have moved very selectively to ease commercial sanctions on North Korea. And we are moving ahead with the North Koreans to resolve issues related to establishing liaison offices.

The most significant benefits for North Korea will come several years later, after we have had time to judge North Korean performance and intentions. As I noted earlier, the most important benefit that the North will receive under the Agreed Framework, the sensitive nuclear components for LWRs, will not be provided until the North fully complies with its safeguards obligations, which includes accounting for its past activities.

Second, the structure of the Framework enables us to monitor closely North Korean compliance. This is not an arrangement that relies on trust. The IAEA is in North Korea monitoring the freeze and has received excellent cooperation. Beyond this, we have our own national technical means to verify the North's compliance.

Third, the Framework is also structured so that we are not disadvantaged in any significant way if the DPRK reneges on its commitments—at any time. The path to full implementation has defined checkpoints. If at any checkpoint, North Korea fails to fulfill its obligations, it will lose the benefits of compliance that it so clearly desires. If the North backs out of the deal in the next several years, for example, it will have gained little except modest amounts of heavy oil and some technical help in ensuring the safe storage of spent fuel. Should the North renege when it is required to submit to IAEA special inspections, Pyongyang will still be left with only the empty shells of two LWRs. Even if that happens, we will still have benefitted greatly. Why? Because the North's entire nuclear program will have been frozen for years.

Fourth, the Framework places highest priority on the elements of the North's program that most acutely threaten U.S. security. That means the accumulation of plutonium. For example, we insisted that the Agreed Framework provide for the removal of spent fuel from North Korea without being reprocessed. That fuel (enough to build about five bombs) was a direct threat to our allies if it were ever reprocessed.

* * * *

We are cautious but hopeful about the continued smooth implementation of the Framework's terms. The North has frozen its nuclear program and is moving forward in discussions with the IAEA to enact additional verification measures. It is cooperating with American experts to ensure safe storage of the spent fuel at its Yongbyon nuclear plant—cooperation which has included the first visit by American technicians to Yongbyon.

At the same time, we have made important progress toward establishing the Korean Energy Development Organization (KEDO), the international consortium that will have a key role in implementing the Agreed Framework. It is KEDO that will ensure the provision of light-water reactors to North Korea, the heavy oil shipments, the safe storage of the spent fuel and its eventual shipment out of North Korea. South Korea will play a central role, and Japan will play a significant role, in the financing and construction of the LWR project. Both countries strongly support the Framework as in their national interest, and have demonstrated that support with their significant commitment to finance its implementation.

After several productive meetings with the Republic of Korea and Japan on KEDO, we have also begun to approach other potential members of KEDO in Asia and Europe. We hope to hold the first KEDO meeting next month in the United States.

* * * *

Regional security, ultimately, is what the Agreed Framework is designed to protect. The North's efforts to develop nuclear weapons and the means to deliver them have been a clear and immediate threat to our allies South Korea and Japan. Continuing tensions on the Korean peninsula in turn have been a threat to security and prosperity throughout Asia, the world's most dynamic economic region.

The Agreed Framework not only stops North Korea's nuclear program in its tracks. It provides a basis for reducing tensions in the region by opening the way for the establishment of more normal political and economic relationships between the United States and North Korea, and prospectively between North and South Korea. As part of the Framework, North Korea has pledged to resume dialogue with South Korea on matters affecting peace and security on the peninsula. We have made clear that resuming North-South dialogue is essential to the success of the Framework —so important that we were prepared to walk away from the Framework if North Korea had not been willing to meet that condition.

* * * *

The benefits of the Framework also extend well beyond our interests in Asia. The Framework supports our overarching goal of a strong global nonproliferation regime. It maintains the integrity of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. It prevents future North Korean sales of nuclear weapons or materials to the Middle East. And it gives us an opportunity to curb North Korean sales of missile technology to those same countries.

* * * *

Under the Agreed Framework, the United States also undertook to provide "formal assurances to the DPRK, against the threat or use of nuclear weapons by the U.S." Such assurances were to be effective when the DPRK came into compliance with the NPT.

b. Korean Energy Development Organization

As noted in Secretary Christopher's testimony, the Korean Energy Development Organization ("KEDO") was established in 1995 to fulfill the objectives of the Agreed Framework. The Agreement on the Establishment of the Korean Peninsula Energy Development Organization ("KEDO Charter") was signed on March 9, 1995, in New York, reprinted in 34 I.L.M.

608 (1995). The purposes of KEDO, as set forth in Article II of the KEDO Charter, follow. For the full text of the KEDO Charter as amended, see www.kedo.org.

* * * *

ARTICLE II

(a) The purposes of the Organization shall be to:

(1) provide for the financing and supply of a light-water reactor (hereinafter referred to as "LWR") project in North Korea (hereinafter referred to as "the DPRK"), consisting of two reactors of the Korean standard nuclear plant model with a capacity of approximately 1,000 MW(e) each, pursuant to a supply agreement to be concluded between the Organization and the DPRK;

(2) provide for the supply of interim energy alternatives in lieu of the energy from the DPRK's graphite-moderated reactors pending construction of the first light-water reactor unit; and

(3) provide for the implementation of any other measures deemed necessary to accomplish the foregoing or otherwise to carry out the objectives of the Agreed Framework.

(b) The Organization shall fulfill its purposes with a view toward ensuring the full implementation by the DPRK of its undertakings as described in the Agreed Framework.

* * * *

A protocol signed in Washington by the Governments of the Republic of Korea, Japan and the United States on September 19, 1997, amended Articles V(b), VI(b) and (e), VIII(d) and (f) and XIV(b), (c) and (d) of the Agreement. See 2035 U.N.T.S. 280. The amendments to Articles V(b), VI(b) and Article XIV(b) make international organizations, including regional integration organizations, as well as states, eligible for membership in KEDO and provide for representation on the Executive Board on the basis of substantial and sustained support for the Organization. These amendments led to the European Union becoming a member of KEDO, with representation on the Executive Board.

10. Nonproliferation and Disarmament Fund

On October 24, 1992, President George H.W. Bush signed into law the Freedom for Russia and Emerging Eurasian Democracies and Open Markets Support Act of 1992 ("FREEDOM Support Act"), Pub. L. No. 102–511, 106 Stat. 3320. Section 504 of the act established the Nonproliferation and Disarmament Fund and authorized the President "to promote bilateral and multilateral nonproliferation and disarmament activities"

> (1) by supporting the dismantlement and destruction of nuclear, biological, and chemical weapons, their delivery systems, and conventional weapons;
> (2) by supporting bilateral and multilateral efforts to halt the proliferation of nuclear, biological, and chemical weapons, their delivery systems, related technologies, and other weapons, including activities such as—
> (A) the storage, transportation, and safeguarding of such weapons, and > (B) the purchase, barter, or other acquisition of such weapons or materials derived from such weapons;
> (3) by establishing programs for safeguarding against the proliferation of nuclear, biological, chemical, and other weapons of the independent states of the former Soviet Union;
> (4) by establishing programs for preventing diversion of weapons-related scientific and technical expertise of the independent states to terrorist groups or to third countries;
> (5) by establishing science and technology centers in the independent states for the purpose of engaging weapons scientists and engineers of the independent states (in particular those who were previously involved in the design and production of nuclear, biological, and chemical weapons) in productive, nonmilitary undertakings; and > (6) by establishing programs for facilitating the conversion of military technologies and capabilities and defense industries of the former Soviet Union into civilian activities.

Funds appropriated in annual appropriations acts to carry out § 504 are made available "notwithstanding any other provision of law, to promote bilateral and multilateral activities relating to nonproliferation and disarmament," and may be used "for such countries other than the Independent States of the former Soviet Union and international organizations when it is in the national security interest of the United States to do so." See, e.g., Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriation Act, FY 2000, Pub. L. No. 106–113, 113 Stat. 1501 (1999), under the heading "Nonproliferation, Anti-Terrorism, Demining and Related Programs."

11. IAEA and Other Multilateral Undertakings

a. International Atomic Energy Agency

During the 1990s, the International Atomic Energy Agency ("IAEA"), an organization of the United Nations, developed and implemented several multilateral agreements and conventions relating to, inter alia, the safe disposal of nuclear material, and non-proliferation of nuclear weapons. The United States became party to several such multilateral agreements during this time, as well as other instruments discussed below.

(1) Convention on Nuclear Safety

The Convention on Nuclear Safety was adopted in Vienna on June 17, 1994, by a diplomatic conference convened by the IAEA at its headquarters from June 14–17, 1994. The convention was opened for signature on September 20, 1994, and signed by the United States on that date.

On May 11, 1995, President William J. Clinton transmitted the convention to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 104–6 (1995). The President's letter of transmittal, set forth below, explains the importance of the convention to the United States, which entered into force for the United States on July 10, 1999. The full text of the convention is also available at www.iaea.org/Publications/Documents/Infcircs/Others/inf449.shtml and at www.state.gov/t/np/trty/5940.htm.

I transmit herewith, for Senate advice and consent to ratification, the Convention on Nuclear Safety done at Vienna on September 20, 1994. . . .

At the September 1991 General Conference of the IAEA, a Resolution was adopted, with U.S. Support, calling for the IAEA secretariat to develop elements for a possible International Convention of Nuclear Safety. From 1992 to 1994, the IAEA convened seven expert working group meetings, in which the United States participated. The IAEA Board of Governors approved a draft text at its meeting in February 1994, after which the IAEA Convened a Diplomatic Conference attended by representatives of more than 80 countries in June 1994. The final text of the Convention resulted in the Conference.

The Convention establishes a legal obligation on the part of the Parties to apply certain general safety principles to the construction, operation, and regulation of land-based civilian nuclear power plants under their jurisdiction. Parties to the Convention also agree to submit periodic reports on the steps they are taking to implement the obligations of the Convention. These reports will be reviewed and discussed at review meetings of the Parties at which each Party will have an opportunity to discuss and seek clarification of reports submitted by other Parties.

The United States has initiated many steps to deal with nuclear safety, and has supported the effort to develop this Convention. With its obligatory reporting and review procedures, requiring Parties to demonstrate in international meeting how they are complying with safety principles, the Convention should encourage countries to improve nuclear safety domestically and thus result in an increase in nuclear safety worldwide. I urge the Senate to act expeditiously in giving its advice and consent to ratification.

(2) Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel Management and on the Safety of Radioactive Waste Management

On September 5, 1997, the United States signed the Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel Management and on the Safety of Radioactive Waste Management ("Joint Convention"). In transmitting the Joint Convention to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on September 13, 2000, President Clinton described the significance of the instrument as set forth below. S. Treaty Doc. No. 106–48 (2000). The convention entered into force for the United States on July 14, 2003.

I transmit herewith, for Senate advice and consent to ratification, the Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel Management and on the Safety of Radioactive Waste Management, done at Vienna on September 5, 1997. Also transmitted for the information of the Senate is the report of the Department of State concerning the Convention.

This Convention was adopted by a Diplomatic Conference convened by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in September 1997 and was opened for signature in Vienna on September 5, 1997, during the IAEA General Conference, on which date Secretary of Energy Federico Pena signed the Convention for the United States.

The Convention is an important part of the effort to raise the level of nuclear safety around the world. It is companion to and structured similarly to the Convention on Nuclear Safety (CNS), to which the Senate gave its advice and consent on March 25, 1999, and which entered into force for the United States on July 10, 1999. The Convention establishes a series of broad commitments with respect to the safe management of spent fuel and radioactive waste. The Convention does not delineate detailed mandatory standards the Parties must meet, but instead Parties are to take appropriate steps to bring their activities into compliance with the general obligations of the Convention.

The Convention includes safety requirements for spent fuel management when the spent fuel results from the operation of civilian nuclear reactors and radioactive waste management for wastes resulting from civilian applications.

The Convention does not apply to a Party's military radioactive waste or spent nuclear fuel unless the Party declares it as spent nuclear fuel or radioactive waste for the purposes of the Convention, or if and when such waste material is permanently transferred to and managed within exclusively civilian programs. The Convention contains provisions to ensure that national security is not compromised and that Parties have absolute discretion as to what information is reported on material from military sources.

The United States has initiated many steps to improve nuclear safety worldwide in accordance with its long-standing policy to make safety an absolute priority in the use of nuclear energy, and has supported the effort to develop both the CNS and this Convention. The Convention should encourage countries to improve the management of spent fuel and radioactive waste domestically and thus result in an increase in nuclear safety worldwide.

(3) Taiwan retransfer agreements

Following the 1971 recognition by the United Nations and the IAEA of the People's Republic of China as the sole representative of China, Taiwan was no longer recognized as a Party to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. It was also unable to sign safeguards agreements with the IAEA as a sovereign state. To address this situation, Taiwan, the United States and the IAEA completed a trilateral Safeguards Transfer Agreement, signed December 6, 1971, 22 U.S.T. 1837; TIAS No. 7228.

The United States entered into an agreement via an exchange of notes with Canada in 1993 to govern the retransfer of Canadian nuclear material by the United States to Taiwan for peaceful purposes. The United States agreed, inter alia, to ensure that Canadian uranium and special nuclear material, while on Taiwan, are subject to both the Agreement for Cooperation Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy, signed April 4, 1972 (reproduced at TIAS No. 7364; 23 U.S.T. 945), as amended, and the above-mentioned Safeguards Transfer Agreement. See Agreement Between the United States and Canada Concerning Cooperation On the Application of Non-Proliferation Assurances to Canadian Uranium to be Transferred From Canada to the United States for Enrichment and Fabrication Into Fuel and Retransferred to Taiwan for Use in Nuclear Reactors, TIAS No. 12490 (1993). The U.S. and Australia also commenced negotiations in 1993 for retransfers to Taiwan. These negotiations resulted in an exchange of notes in 2001, modeled closely on the Canadian agreement. The U.S.-Australia agreement entered into force on May 17, 2002. 2001 U.S.T. Lexis 102.

(4) Additional Protocol to the U.S.-IAEA Safeguards Agreement

On September 22, 1998, the United States signed an Additional Protocol with the IAEA. The Additional Protocol supplements the U.S. undertakings in the Agreement Between the United States of America and the International Atomic Energy Agency for the Application of Safeguards in the United States ("Safeguards Agreement and Protocol Thereto"), signed at Vienna November 18, 1977, entered into force on December 9, 1980, 32 U.S.T. 3317, TIAS No. 9900.

The Additional Protocol was based on the provisions of a "Model Protocol," approved by the Agency's Board of Governors in 1997. One of the key goals of the Model Protocol was to require non-nuclear-weapon states to provide more information and greater access to the IAEA on their nuclear programs and nuclear-related activities. The United States accepted the provisions of the Model Protocol on a voluntary basis. See fact sheet at www.state.gov/t/np/rls/fs/2002/10316.htm.

President George W. Bush transmitted the Protocol to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification on May 9, 2002. S. Treaty Doc. No. 107–7. See Digest 2002 at 1057–62. On March 31, 2004, the protocol received Senate advice and consent to ratification, but at year end it had not yet entered into force.

b. European Atomic Energy Community

During the 1990s the United States negotiated a number of instruments relating to nuclear cooperation with the European Atomic Energy Community ("EURATOM"). In order to replace and update an agreement expiring December 31, 1995, representatives of the United States and the European Commission signed the Agreement for Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy between the United States and the European Atomic Energy Community in Brussels, Belgium, November 7, 1995. As explained in a statement from the U.S. Department of State on that date:

> President Clinton approved the new agreement and authorized its execution by Presidential Determination No. 96–4, dated November 1, 1995. [60 Fed. Reg. 56,931 (Nov. 13, 1995).]
>
> Now that the agreement has been signed, the President, as required by Section 123 of the U.S. Atomic Energy Act, will submit it to Congress for a review period of 90 continuous session days. The new agreement may be brought into force at the conclusion of this statutory congressional review period unless a joint resolution of disapproval is enacted.

6 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 47 at 862 (Nov. 20, 1995), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

President Clinton transmitted the new agreement to Congress on November 29, 1995. 31 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 2077 (Dec. 4, 1995). Congress allowed the agreement to enter into force, which occurred as of April 12, 1996. Excerpts from President Clinton's November 1995 letter follow.

* * * *

I am pleased to transmit to the Congress, pursuant to sections 123 b. and 123 d. of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended 42 U.S.C. 2153(b), (d), the text of a proposed Agreement for Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy Between the United States of America and the European Atomic Energy Community (EURATOM) with accompanying agreed minutes, annexes, and other attachments. . . .

The proposed new agreement with EURATOM has been negotiated in accordance with the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended by the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 (NNPA) and as otherwise amended. It replaces two existing agreements for peaceful nuclear cooperation with EURATOM, including the 1960 agreement that has served as our primary legal framework for cooperation in recent years and that will expire by its terms on December 31 of this year. [11 U.S.T. 2589; 402 U.N.T.S. 325 (1960)]. The proposed new agreement will provide an updated, comprehensive framework for peaceful nuclear cooperation between the United States and EURATOM, will facilitate such cooperation, and will establish strengthened nonproliferation conditions and controls including all those required by the NNPA. The new agreement provides for the transfer of nonnuclear material, nuclear material, and equipment for both nuclear research and nuclear power purposes. It does not provide for transfers under the agreement of any sensitive nuclear technology (SNT).

The proposed agreement has an initial term of 30 years, and will continue in force indefinitely thereafter in increments of 5 years each until terminated in accordance with its provisions. In the event of termination, key nonproliferation conditions and controls, including guarantees of safeguards, peaceful use and adequate physical protection, and the U.S. right to approve retransfers to third parties, will remain effective with respect to transferred nonnuclear material, nuclear material, and equipment, as well nuclear material produced through their use. Procedures are also established for determining the survival of additional controls.

* * * *

The proposed new agreement provides for very stringent controls over certain fuel cycle activities, including enrichment, reprocessing, and alteration in form or content and storage of plutonium and other sensitive nuclear materials. The United States and EURATOM have accepted these controls on a reciprocal basis, not as a sign of either Party's distrust of the other, and not for the purpose of interfering with each other's fuel cycle choices, which are for each Party to determine for itself, but rather as a reflection of their common conviction that the provisions in question represent an important norm for peaceful nuclear commerce.

In view of the strong commitment of EURATOM and its member states to the international nonproliferation regime, the comprehensive nonproliferation commitments they have made, the advanced technological character of the EURATOM civil nuclear program, the long history of extensive transatlantic cooperation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy without any risk of proliferation, and the fact that all member states are close allies or close friends of the United States, the proposed new agreement provides to EURATOM (and on a reciprocal basis, to the United States) advance, long-term approval for specified enrichment, retransfers, reprocessing, alteration in form or content, and storage of specified nuclear material and for retransfers of nonnuclear material and equipment. The approval for reprocessing and alteration in form or content may be suspended if either activity ceases to meet the criteria set out in U.S. law, including criteria relating to safeguards and physical protection.

In providing advance, long-term approval for certain nuclear fuel cycle activities, the proposed agreement has features similar to those in several other agreements for cooperation that the United States has entered into subsequent to enactment of the NNPA. These include bilateral U.S. agreements with Japan, Finland, Norway and Sweden. (The U.S. agreements with Finland and Sweden will be automatically terminated upon entry into force of the new U.S.-EURATOM agreement, as Finland and Sweden joined the European Union on January 1, 1995.) Among the documents I am transmitting herewith to the Congress is an analysis by the Secretary of Energy of the advance, long-term approvals contained in the proposed U.S. agreement with EURATOM. The analysis concludes that the approvals meet all requirements of the Atomic Energy Act.

* * * *

Also in 1995, the U.S.-EURATOM Agreement in the Field of Nuclear Material Safeguards Research and Development was signed in Brussels and Washington, January 6, 1995, and entered into force the same day. TIAS No. 12596 (1995). The Agreement's objective is to provide a means for cooperation between the United States and the European Community regarding research and development on the topic of nuclear safeguards. Article 2 sets forth the areas of cooperation as follows:

> 1. Safeguards systems analysis for part or the complete fuel cycle;
> 2. Measurement and accountancy control technology for nuclear materials;
> 3. Containment and surveillance technology for nuclear materials and nuclear facilities;
> 4. Nuclear safeguards training courses for inspectors and specialists;
> 5. Scientific coordination of both Parties' efforts to transfer nuclear safeguards technologies to other countries, upon their request, in order to improve the effectiveness of their national safeguards systems;
> Other areas of cooperation may be added by mutual agreement.

c. Trilateral Initiative

The United States, Russia, and the IAEA launched a voluntary program known as the Trilateral Initiative in September 1996. The IAEA described the basis for the initiative as follows:

> The Trilateral Initiative was launched in 1996 following independent statements by the President of the United States beginning in 1993, and by the President of the > Russian Federation in 1996. It is an Initiative between the IAEA, the Russian Federation and the United States that is in the context of Article VI of the NPT. The intention is to examine the technical, legal and financial issues associated with IAEA verification of weapon origin and other fissile material released from defense programmes in those two countries.

D. CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WEAPONS NONPROLIFERATION

1. Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC)

a. Negotiation and transmittal

The Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on Their Destruction ("CWC"), with annexes, was opened for signature at Paris on January 13, 1993, and signed by the United States on that date. The annexes, which are integral parts of the Convention, include the Annex on Chemicals, the Annex on Implementation and Verification, and the Annex on the Protection of Confidential Information. The Treaty and Annexes are also available at www.cwc.gov.

On November 23, 1993, President William J. Clinton transmitted the CWC and accompanying instruments to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. S. Treaty Doc. No. 103–21 (1993). Excerpts from the President's letter of transmittal follow.

* * * *

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on Their Destruction (the "Chemical Weapons Convention" or CWC). The Convention includes the following documents, which are integral parts thereof: the Annex on Chemicals, the Annex on Implementation and Verification, and the Annex on the Protection of Confidential Information. The Convention was opened for signature and was signed by the United States at Paris on January 13, 1993. I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the Report of the Department of State on the Convention.

In addition, I transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, two documents relevant to, but not part of, the Convention: the Resolution Establishing the Preparatory Commission for the Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons and the Text on the Establishment of a Preparatory Commission (with three Annexes), adopted by acclamation by Signatory States at Paris on January 13, 1993. These documents provide the basis for the Preparatory Commission for the Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons (Preparatory Commission), which is responsible for preparing detailed procedures for implementing the Convention and for laying the foundation for the international organization created by the Convention. In addition, the recommended legislation necessary to implement the Chemical Weapons Convention, environmental documentation related to the Convention, and an analysis of the verifiability of the Convention consistent with Section 37 of the Arms Control and Disarmament Act, as amended, will be submitted separately to the Senate for its information.

The Chemical Weapons Convention is unprecedented in its scope. The Convention will require States Parties to destroy their chemical weapons and chemical weapons production facilities under the observation of international inspectors; subject States Parties' citizens and businesses and other nongovernmental entities to its obligations; subject States Parties' chemical industry to declarations and routine inspection; and subject any facility or location in the territory or any other place under the jurisdiction or control of a State Party to international inspection to address other States Parties' compliance concerns.

The Chemical Weapons Convention is also unique in the number of countries involved in its development and committed from the outset to its non-proliferation objectives. This major arms control treaty was negotiated by the 39 countries in the Geneva-based Conference on Disarmament, with contributions from an equal number of observer countries, representing all areas of the world. . . .

The complexities of negotiating a universally applicable treaty were immense. Difficult issues such as the need to balance an adequate degree of intrusiveness, to address compliance concerns, with the need to protect sensitive nonchemical weapons related information and constitutional rights, were painstakingly negotiated. The international chemical industry, and U.S. chemical industry representatives, in particular, played a crucial role in the elaboration of landmark provisions for the protection of sensitive commercial and national security information.

* * * *

The Convention is designed to exclude the possibility of the use or threat of use of chemical weapons, thus reflecting a significant step forward in reducing the threat of chemical warfare. To this end, the Convention prohibits the development, production, acquisition, stockpiling, retention, and, direct or indirect, transfer to anyone of chemical weapons; the use of chemical weapons against anyone, including retaliatory use; the engagement in any military preparations to use chemical weapons; and the assistance, encouragement, or inducement of anyone to engage in activities prohibited to States Parties. The convention also requires all chemical weapons to be declared, declarations to be internationally confirmed, and all chemical weapons to be completely eliminated within 10 years after its entry into force (15 years in extraordinary cases), with storage and destruction monitored through on-site international inspection. The Convention further requires all chemical weapons production to cease within 30 days of the entry into force of the Convention for a State Party and all chemical weapons production facilities to be eliminated (or in exceptional cases of compelling need, and with the permission of the Conference of the States Parties, converted to peaceful purposes). Cessation of production, and destruction within 10 years after the entry into force of the Convention (or conversion and peaceful production), will be internationally monitored through on-site inspection.

In addition, the Convention prohibits use of riot control agents as a method of warfare, reaffirms the prohibition in international law on the use of herbicides as a method of warfare, and provides for the possibility for protection against and assistance in the event of use or threat of use of chemical weapons against a State Party. The Administration is reviewing the impact of the Convention's prohibition on the use of riot control agents as a method of warfare on Executive Order No. 11850, which specifies the current policy of the United States with regard to the use of riot control agents in war. The results of the review will be submitted separately to the Senate [see 1.b. and c. below].

The Convention contains a number of provisions that make a major contribution to our nonproliferation objectives. In addition to verification of the destruction of chemical weapons, the Convention provides a regime for monitoring relevant civilian chemical industry facilities through declaration and inspection requirements. States Parties are also prohibited from providing any assistance to anyone to engage in activities, such as the acquisition of chemical weapons, prohibited by the Convention. Exports to non-States Parties of chemicals listed in the Convention are prohibited in some instances and subject to end-user assurances in others. Imports of some chemicals from non-States Parties are also banned. These restrictions will also serve to provide an incentive for countries to become parties as soon as possible. Finally, each State Party is required to pass penal legislation prohibiting individuals and businesses and other nongovernmental entities from engaging in activities on its territory or any other place under its jurisdiction that are prohibited to States Parties. Such penal legislation must also apply to the activities of each State Party's citizens, wherever the activities occur. Through these provisions, the Convention furthers the important goal of preventing the proliferation of chemical weapons, while holding out the promise of their eventual worldwide elimination.

The Convention contains two verification regimes to enhance the security of States Parties to the Convention and limit the possibility of clandestine chemical weapons production, storage, and use. The first regime provides for a routine monitoring regime involving declarations, initial visits, systematic inspections of declared chemical weapons storage, production and destruction facilities, and routine inspections of the relevant civilian chemical industry facilities. The second regime, challenge inspections, allows a State Party to have an international inspection conducted of any facility or location in the territory or any other place under the jurisdiction or control of another State Party in order to clarify and resolve questions of possible noncompliance. The Convention obligates the challenged State Party to accept the inspection and to make every reasonable effort to satisfy the compliance concern. At the same time, the Convention provides a system for the inspected State Party to manage access to a challenged site in a manner that allows for protection of its national security, proprietary, and constitutional concerns. In addition, the Convention contains requirements for the protection of confidential information obtained by the OPCW.

The Convention prohibits reservations to the Articles. However, the CWC allows reservations to the Annexes so long as they are compatible with the object and purpose of the Convention. This structure prevents States Parties from modifying their fundamental obligations, as some countries, including the United States, did with regard to the Geneva Protocol of 1925 when they attached reservations preserving the right to retaliate with chemical weapons. At the same time, it allows States Parties some flexibility with regard to the specifics of their implementation of the Convention.

Beyond the elimination of chemical weapons, the Chemical Weapons Convention is of major importance in providing a foundation for enhancing regional and global stability, a forum for promoting international cooperation and responsibility, and a system for resolution of national concerns.

I believe that the Chemical Weapons Convention is in the best interests of the United States. Its provisions will significantly strengthen United States, allied and international security, and enhance global and regional stability. Therefore, I urge the Senate to give early and favorable consideration to the Convention, and to give advice and consent to its ratification as soon as possible in 1994.

b. Entry into force

The U.S. Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification of the CWC on April 24, 1997, subject to certain conditions. 143 CONG. REC. S3689 (daily ed. Apr. 24, 1997). Conditions included, inter alia, limitations with regard to cost-sharing, intelligence sharing and assessments, expectations on the primacy of constitutional guarantees, as well as the continuing vitality of the Australia Group (see D.3.a. below) and national export controls, and provisions to ensure chemical and biological defense capabilities. Condition 26 required the President to certify that U.S. use of riot control agents in certain circumstances was not restricted by the Convention, and provided that the President "shall take no measure and prescribe no rule or regulation, which would alter or eliminate Executive Order 11850 of April 8, 1975," discussed in c. below. The full text of the resolution of ratification is also available at www.cwc.gov/ratification_conditions. See also Chapter 4.B.4.a. President Clinton submitted a report to the Senate dated April 28, 1997, addressing the conditions of ratification. 143 CONG. REC. S3749 (Apr. 28, 1997). The CWC entered into force on April 29, 1997.

c. Riot control agents

On June 23, 1994, President William J. Clinton reported by letter to the Senate on the administration's review of the impact of the CWC on Executive Order No. 11850, which states U.S. policy with regard to the use of riot control agents ("RCAs") in war. 140 CONG. REC. S7635 (daily ed. June 24, 1994). The President's letter is excerpted below.

* * * *

Article I(5) of the CWC prohibits Parties from using RCAs as a "method of warfare." That phrase is not defined in the CWC. The United States interprets this provision to mean that:

— The CWC applies only to the use of RCAs in international or internal armed conflict. Other peacetime uses of RCAs, such as normal peacekeeping operations, law enforcement operations, humanitarian and disaster relief operations, counter-terrorist and hostage rescue operations, and noncombatant rescue operations conducted outside such conflicts are unaffected by the Convention.
— The CWC does not apply to all uses of RCAs in time of armed conflict. Use of RCAs solely against noncombatants for law enforcement, riot control, or other noncombat purposes would not be considered as a "method of warfare" and therefore would not be prohibited. Accordingly, the CWC does not prohibit the use of RCAs in riot control situations in areas under direct U.S. military control, including against rioting prisoners of war, and to protect convoys from civil disturbances, terrorists, and paramilitary organizations in rear areas outside the zone of immediate combat.
— The CWC does prohibit the use of RCAs solely against combatants. In addition, according to the current international understanding, the CWC's prohibition on the use of RCAs as a "method of warfare" also precludes the use of RCAs even for humanitarian purposes in situations where combatants and noncombatants are intermingled, such as the rescue of downed air crews, passengers, and escaping prisoners and situations where civilians are being used to mask or screen attacks. However, were the international understanding of this issue to change, the United States would not consider itself bound by this position.

Upon receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification of the Chemical Weapons Convention, a new Executive order outlining U.S. policy on the use of RCAs under the Convention will be issued. I will also direct the Office of the Secretary of Defense to accelerate efforts to field non-chemical, non-lethal alternatives to RCAs for use in situations where combatants and noncombatants are intermingled.

* * * *

In response to Condition 26 in the Senate resolution of advice and consent to ratification of the CCW, supra, on April 28, 1997, the President certified as follows:

> In connection with Condition (26), Riot Control Agents, the United States is not restricted by the Convention in its use of riot control agents, including the use against combatants who are parties to a conflict, in any of the following cases: (i) the conduct of peacetime military operations within an area of ongoing armed conflict when the United States is not a party to the conflict (such as recent use of the United States Armed Forces in Somalia, Bosnia, and Rwanda); (ii) consensual peacekeeping operations when the use of force is authorized by the receiving state, including operations pursuant to Chapter VI of the United Nations Charter; and (iii) peacekeeping operations when force is authorized by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.

143 CONG. REC. S3749 (Apr. 28, 1997).

d. U.S. implementation

The Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998 was enacted on October 21, 1998. Pub. L. No. 105–277, Div. I, 112 Stat. 2681–856 (1998) (codified in scattered sections of 22 U.S.C.). The CWC Implementation Act designated the Department of State as the National Administrative Authority required by the convention to serve as liaison between the Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons ("OCPW"), established to implement the Convention, and other States Parties; authorized and provided for procedures for inspections while containing provisions to protect national security and constitutional rights; and provided for criminal and civil penalties for certain unlawful activities.

The act provided significant protections for U.S. private and industry interests. Section 102 provided that no one can be required to "waive any right under the Constitution for any purpose related to the Act or the Convention" as a condition for entering into a contract or receiving any benefit from the United States. Section 103(a), subsection (1) provided jurisdiction in the Court of Federal Claims for claims against the United States for "any taking of property without just compensation that occurs by reason of the action of any officer or employee of the Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons, including any member of an inspection team of the Technical Secretariat, or by reason of the action of any officer or employee of the United States pursuant to this Act or the Convention." Subsections (2) and (3) required the imposition of sanctions on certain foreign persons and foreign governments involved in disclosure of U.S. confidential business information.

Section 103(f) required denial of visas and exclusion from the United States of any alien who:

> (1) is, or previously served as, an officer or employee of the Organization and who has willfully published, divulged, disclosed, or made known in any manner or to any extent not authorized by the Convention any United States confidential business information coming to him in the course of his employment or official duties, or by reason of any examination or investigation of any return, report, or record made to or filed with the Organization, or any officer or employee thereof, such practice or disclosure having resulted in financial loses or damages to a United States person and for which actions or omissions the United States has been found liable of a tort or taking pursuant to this Act; [or]
> (2) traffics in United States confidential business information, a proven claim to which is owned by a United States national; . . .

Section 201, among other things, amended Title 18 of the U.S. Code to add § 229, which provided criminal penalties for any person, with exceptions including members of the U.S. Armed Forces, who would knowingly "develop, produce, otherwise acquire, transfer directly or indirectly, receive, stockpile, retain, own, possess, or use, or threaten to use, any chemical weapon; or . . . assist or induce, in any way, any person to violate [the above provision], or to attempt or conspire to violate [the above provision]." Under section 211 of the act, the President was authorized to suspend or revoke export authority for any person who is a national of the United States or any person within the United States who violated 18 U.S.C. § 229.

Sections 302–304 provided authority and procedures for inspections of facilities in the United States under the Convention. Section 305 required that such inspections be conducted with the consent of the person in charge of the premises or, if consent is withheld, pursuant to a search warrant as prescribed under § 305. Section 307 provided that the President may deny a request to inspect a facility in the United States on the ground that the inspection may pose a threat to the national security interests of the United States.

On May 18, 1999, the Bureau of Export Administration of the U.S. Department of Commerce enacted an interim rule to implement the CWC Act. 64 Fed. Reg. 27,138 (May 18, 1999), as corrected, 64 Fed. Reg. 28,908 (May 28, 1999). On June 25, 1999, President Clinton signed Executive Order 13128, entitled "Implementation of the Chemical Weapons Convention and the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act," allocating responsibility for implementation. 64 Fed. Reg. 34,703 (June 28, 1999). Subsequently, the Department of Commerce issued interim rules establishing Parts II and III of the Chemical Weapons Convention Regulations, 64 Fed. Reg. 39,194 (July 21, 1999) and 64 Fed. Reg. 73, 744 (Dec. 30, 1999).

e. Constitutionality of inspections under the Chemical Weapons Convention

On September 10, 1996, Richard L. Shiffrin, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice, testified before the Subcommittee on the Constitution, Federalism, and Property Rights of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Shiffrin concluded that the inspection provisions of the CWC Act discussed above are consistent with the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution.

The full text of the statement, excerpted below, is available at w*ww.usdoj.gov/olc/cwc_tes.htm*.

* * * *

This inspection scheme is fully consistent with Fourth Amendment principles. The Fourth Amendment requires that "subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions," Katz v. United States, 390 U.S. 347, 357 (1967), searches and seizures conducted in the absence of "a judicial warrant issued upon probable cause and particularly describing the items to be seized" are per se unreasonable. United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 701 (1983). The Fourth Amendment's warrant and probable cause requirements do not apply to a particular search, however, when the party to be searched provides consent. Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973). I thus would emphasize that the warrant provisions under the CWC and its implementing legislation would apply only to the small minority of inspections as to which consent might be withheld.

* * * *

In certain instances, insufficient evidence may exist to establish criminal probable cause within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Thus, a search warrant would be unobtainable. The CWC anticipates this possibility and would not force a choice between compliance with its terms, and adherence to our constitutional principles. Rather, the Convention specifically allows the U.S. Government, in granting access to facilities identified for challenge inspections, to "tak[e] into account any constitutional obligations it may have with regard to proprietary rights or searches and seizures." See Verification Annex of the CWC, pt. X, para. C.41. Hence, in the rare event that the Fourth Amendment would pose a bar to a search of premises identified for a challenge inspection and the inspection could not go forward, the United States would remain in full compliance with its obligations under the CWC.

2. The Australia Group

The Australia Group ("AG"), of which the United States is a member, was founded in 1984 in the aftermath of the use of chemical weapons during the Iran-Iraq War. The principal impetus for the AG was to ensure that industries of the participating countries did not assist, either purposefully or inadvertently, states seeking to acquire a chemical or biological weapons ("CBW") capability. Participation in the AG is dependent on consensus. Participating countries must have established effective national export controls and demonstrate compliance with multinational treaties banning certain CBW activities. The AG's activities are designed to complement and serve the objectives of the 1925 Geneva Protocol, the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention ("BWC"), and the 1993 Chemical Weapons Convention ("CWC").

In 1993, the AG implemented a "no-undercut" policy in order to enhance cooperation in enforcing export controls. Under this policy, AG members agreed to notify the AG of any export licenses that were denied for nonproliferation reasons, and provided that other participants would consult with the government that denied a specific license before they would approve identical transactions. See www.state.gov/www/global/arms/bureau_np/000401_ag.html.

Also in the 1990s, the AG adopted a common approach on export controls and issued the Control List of Dual Use Chemicals: Commercial and Military Application. This list of controlled materials is available at www.state.gov/www/global/arms/factsheets/wmd/cw/auslist.html.

3. Chemical and Biological Weapons Control and Warfare Elimination Act of 1991

a. Enactment

On October 28, 1991, President George H.W. Bush signed into law the Chemical and Biological Weapons Control and Warfare Elimination Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102–138, 105 Stat. 722, 22 U.S.C. §§ 501–06 ("CBW Act").

Section 502 of the CBW Act set forth its purposes, including "to mandate United States sanctions, and to encourage international sanctions, against countries that use chemical or biological weapons in violation of international law or use lethal chemical or biological weapons against their own nationals, and to impose sanctions against companies that aid in the proliferation of chemical and biological weapons" and "to support multilaterally coordinated efforts to control the proliferation of chemical and biological weapons."

Section 504 required, inter alia, the creation of a list of "goods and technology that would directly and substantially assist a foreign government or group in acquiring the capability to develop, produce, stockpile, or deliver chemical or biological weapons, the licensing of which would be effective in barring acquisition or enhancement of such capability." The provision required a validated license for export of such goods or technology to any "country of concern." That term was defined to include any country that did not have a bilateral or multilateral arrangement with the United States for control of such goods or technology or was otherwise designated by the Secretary of State.

Sections 505 and 507 of the act established new sanctions to be imposed against foreign persons and countries, respectively. Section 505 amended the Export Administration Act of 1979 and the Arms Export Control Act to prohibit U.S. government procurement from certain foreign persons, with specified exceptions, > if the President determines that a foreign person . . . has knowingly and materially contributed through the export . . . of U.S. goods or technology that are subject to U.S. jurisdiction . . . to the efforts by any foreign country, project or entity [meeting criteria related to use of lethal chemical or biological weapons or its status as a state sponsor of terrorism] . . . to use, develop, produce, stockpile, or otherwise acquire chemical or biological weapons.

Section 505 provided for a Presidential waiver of sanctions twelve months after imposition based on a determination that "such waiver is important to the national security interests of the United States."

Section 507 required the imposition of broad sanctions against a country when the President determined under § 506 that its government "has used chemical or biological weapons in violation of international law or has used lethal chemical or biological weapons against its own nationals." Initial sanctions provided in § 507 included termination of foreign assistance, arms sales, and arms sales financing. Additional sanctions were to be imposed unless, within three months after making the determination under § 506, the President certified to Congress that the government was no longer using such weapons in such manner, had provided reliable assurances that it would not do so in the future, and was willing to allow on-site inspections. The statute provided for termination of sanctions after twelve months if certain criteria were met and provided a Presidential waiver if the President determined that such waiver was "essential to the national security interests of the United States" or that "there has been a fundamental change in the leadership and policies of [the] government of the country." Id. at § 507(d). It also provided certain exceptions related to contract sanctity.

The United States imposed sanctions on a number of foreign entities under the 1991 Act for their knowing contribution to CBW programs in countries of concern. See, e.g., 62 Fed. Reg. 28, 304 (May 22, 1997), 62 Fed. Reg. 51,926 (Oct. 3, 1997), and 63 Fed. Reg. 9039 (Feb. 23, 1998).

b. Presidential discretion under the CBW Act

As noted above, section 505 of the CBW Act requires the President to make a determination, upon the presentation of sufficient evidence, that would trigger sanctions. A November 16, 1995, memorandum opinion prepared by Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, Department of Justice, addressed the issue of whether the President has discretion, under certain circumstances, to delay making such a determination.

The opinion concluded that the "Act permits the President to delay making determinations that would trigger sanctions under [§ 505 of the Act, 50 U.S.C. app. § 2410c], when the delay is necessary to protect intelligence sources or methods used for acquiring intelligence relating to [chemical or biological weapons] proliferation." The opinion likewise concluded that the President can delay a determination "when no reasonable alternative means exists to protect the life of an intelligence source."

The full text of the memorandum opinion, excerpted below, is available at www.usdoj.gov/olc/cbw_b10.htm.

* * * *

We believe that the President has the right, and indeed the duty, to protect the life of an intelligence source in such circumstances. This responsibility is rooted both in statutory law and in the President's constitutional authority to protect national security. (footnote omitted) The President's obligations towards any intelligence source whose life would be at risk in this case if a determination were made are thus in direct conflict with the President's obligations under the CBW Act not to delay making a determination indefinitely, once the evidence establishes that a violation has taken place. Faced with such unavoidably conflicting obligations, we believe that the President may reasonably and lawfully conclude that the obligation to preserve the life of the source should prevail.

* * * *

In reaching its conclusions, the opinion relied on the following language included in the signing statement issued by President George H.W. Bush on signing the Act into law on October 28, 1991. The full text of the signing statement is available at http://bushlibrary.tamu.edu/research/papers/1991/91102809.html.

Title V, Chemical and Biological Weapons (CBW), raises concerns with respect to both the President's control over negotiations with foreign governments and the possible disclosure of sensitive information. Title V's provisions establish sanctions against foreign companies and countries involved in the spread or use of chemical and biological weapons. Title V demonstrates that the Congress endorses my goal of stemming dangerous CBW proliferation. In signing this Act, it is my understanding, as reflected in the legislative history, that title V gives me the flexibility to protect intelligence sources and methods essential to the acquisition of intelligence about CBW proliferation. In part, such flexibility is available because title V does not dictate the timing of determinations that would lead to sanctions against foreign persons.

E. MISSILE DEFENSE & MISSILE PROLIFERATION

1. The ABM Treaty

Issues concerning succession of successor states of the former Soviet Union to the ABM Treaty are discussed in Chapter 4.B.6.a.(3).

2. Joint Statement of the Presidents of the United States of America and the Russian Federation on the Exchange of Information on Missile Launches and Early Warning of September 2, 1998

On September 2, 1998, U.S. President Clinton and Russian President Yeltsin signed the Joint Statement on the Exchange of Information on Missile Launches and Early Warning in Moscow. 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1694 (Sept. 7, 1998). The text of the statement follows.

Taking into account the continuing worldwide proliferation of ballistic missiles and of missile technologies, the need to minimize even further the consequences of a false missile attack warning and above all, to prevent the possibility of a missile launch caused by such false warning, the President of the United States and the President of the Russian Federation have reached agreement on a cooperative initiative between the United States and Russia regarding the exchange of information on missile launches and early warning.

The objective of the initiative is the continuous exchange of information on the launches of ballistic missiles and space launch vehicles derived from each side's missile launch warning system, including the possible establishment of a center for the exchange of missile launch data operated by the United States and Russia and separate from their respective national centers. As part of this initiative, the United States and Russia will also examine the possibility of establishing a multilateral ballistic missile and space launch vehicle pre-launch notification regime in which other states could voluntarily participate.

The Presidents have directed their experts to develop as quickly as possible for approval in their respective countries a plan for advancing this initiative toward implementation as soon as practicable.

Russia, proceeding from its international obligations relating to information derived from missile attack warning systems, will reach agreement regarding necessary issues relating to the implementation of this initiative.

3. Missile Technology Control Regime Guidelines

Excerpts below from a U.S. State Department fact sheet, issued December 23, 2003, by the Bureau of Nonproliferation, describe the origins and work of the Missile Technology Control Regime ("MTCR"). The fact sheet is available at www.state.gov/t/np/rls/fs/27514.htm.

In 1987, seven concerned countries created the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR) to restrict the proliferation of nuclear-capable missiles and related technology. The original participants in the Regime were Canada, France, West Germany, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom, and the United States. . . .

The MTCR is not a treaty, but a voluntary arrangement among member countries sharing a common interest in controlling missile proliferation. The Regime's mandate was expanded in 2003 to include preventing terrorists from acquiring missiles and missile technology.

The MTCR Partners have committed to apply a common export policy (MTCR Guidelines) to a common list (MTCR Annex) of controlled items, including virtually all key equipment and technology needed for missile development, production, and operation. The Guidelines and Annex are implemented by each Partner in accordance with its national legislation.

The MTCR Guidelines restrict transfers of "missiles" . . . capable of delivering weapons of mass destruction (WMD). . . .

* * * *

On January 7, 1993, the Bureau of Nonproliferation, U.S. Department of State, released a statement that "[t]he United States Government has, after careful consideration and subject to its international treaty obligations, decided that, when considering the transfer of equipment and technology related to missiles, it will act in accordance with the attached Guidelines beginning on January 7, 1993. These Guidelines replace those adopted on April 16, 1987." See 4 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 3 at 41 (Jan. 18, 1993), available at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

In June 1996 the United States adopted the Equipment and Technology Annex for the MTCR Guidelines. The 1993 U.S. statement, containing the text of the guidelines (excerpted below), as well as the 1996 annex, are available at www.state.gov/t/ac/trt/5073.htm.

1. The purpose of these Guidelines is to limit the risks of proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (i.e. nuclear, chemical and biological weapons), by controlling transfers that could make a contribution to delivery systems (other than manned aircraft) for such weapons. The Guidelines are not designed to impede national space programs or international cooperation in such programs as long as such programs could not contribute to delivery systems for weapons of mass destruction. These Guidelines, including the attached Annex, form the basis for controlling transfers to any destination beyond the Government's jurisdiction or control of all delivery systems (other than manned aircraft) capable of delivering weapons of mass destruction, and of equipment and technology relevant to missiles whose performance in terms of payload and range exceeds stated parameters. Restraint will be exercised in the consideration of all transfers of items contained within the Annex and all such transfers will be considered on a case-by-case basis. The Government will implement the Guidelines in accordance with national legislation.

2. The Annex consists of two categories of items, which term includes equipment and technology. Category I items, all of which are in Annex Items 1 and 2, are those items of greatest sensitivity. If a Category I item is included in a system, that system will also be considered as Category I, except when the incorporated item cannot be separated, removed or duplicated. Particular restraint will be exercised in the consideration of Category I transfers regardless of their purpose, and there will be a strong presumption to deny such transfers. Particular restraint will also be exercised in the consideration of transfers of any items in the Annex, or of any missiles (whether or not in the Annex), if the Government judges, on the basis of all available, persuasive information, evaluated according to factors including those in paragraph 3, that they are intended to be used for the delivery of weapons of mass destruction, and there will be a strong presumption to deny such transfers. Until further notice, the transfer of Category I production facilities will not be authorized. The transfer of other Category I items will be authorized only on rare occasions and where the Government (A) obtains binding government-to-government undertakings embodying the assurances from the recipient government called for in paragraph 5 of these Guidelines and (B) assumes responsibility for taking all steps necessary to ensure that the item is put only to its stated end-use. It is understood that the decision to transfer remains the sole and sovereign judgment of the United States Government.

3. In the evaluation of transfer applications for Annex items, the following factors will be taken into account:
   A. Concerns about the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction;
   B. The capabilities and objectives of the missile and space programs of the recipient state;
   C. The significance of the transfer in terms of the potential development of delivery systems (other than manned aircraft) for weapons of mass destruction;
   D. The assessment of the end-use of the transfers, including the relevant assurances of the recipient states referred to in sub-paragraphs 5.A and 5.B below;
   E. The applicability of relevant multilateral agreements.

* * * *

4. Chinese Missile Transfers

During the 1990s the United States became increasingly concerned about China's transfers of missiles and missile-related technology as a result of such transfers to states like Iran and Pakistan. In 1991 and 1993, the U.S. imposed sanctions on Chinese entities pursuant to the Missile Technology Control Act, which amended the Arms Export Control Act and the Export Administration Act of 1979. See Pub. L. No. 101–501, 104 Stat. 1738, (Nov. 5, 1990).

On June 25, 1991, the Secretary of State made a determination that Chinese entities had "engaged in missile technology proliferation activities that required the sanctions described in section 73(a)(2)(A) of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2797b(a)(2)(A)) and section 11B(b)(1)(B)(i) of the Export Administration Act of 1979 (50 U.S.C. app. 2410b(b)(1)(B)(i))." 56 Fed. Reg. 32,601 (July 17, 1991). These sanctions were waived in the interests of national security on February 26, 1992. See 57 Fed. Reg. 11,768 (Apr. 7, 1992).

On August 24, 1993, sanctions were again imposed on the Chinese Ministry of Aerospace Industry, including the China Precision Machinery Import/Export Corporation ("CPMIEC"), as well as Pakistan's Ministry of Defense for missile proliferation activities. See 58 Fed. Reg. 45,408 (Aug. 27, 1993). The following sanctions were imposed on the named entities and their subsidiaries:

> (A) licenses for export to the sanctioned entities of Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR) equipment or technology controlled pursuant to the Export Administration Act of 1979 or the Arms Export Control Act will be denied for two years; and
> (B) no U.S. government contracts relating to MTCR equipment or technology and involving the sanctioned entities will be entered into for two years.

Imposition of sanctions led to negotiations between the U.S. and China, resulting in the Joint Statement on Missile Proliferation signed on October 4, 1994. The Joint Statement provided:

> The United States of America and the People's Republic of China, in furtherance of their shared nonproliferation interests, have agreed to take the following steps as of today's date: (1) the United States will take the measures necessary to lift the sanctions imposed in August 1993, and (2) once the United States lifts the sanctions, China will not export ground-to-ground missiles featuring the primary parameters of the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR)—that is, inherently capable of reaching a range of at least 300 km with a payload of at least 500 kg.

> Both sides also reaffirm their respective commitments to the Guidelines and parameters of the MTCR, and have agreed to hold in-depth discussions on the MTCR.

On the same date, a Joint Statement on Stopping the Production of Fissile Materials For Nuclear Weapons was issued, stating:

> The United States of America and the People's Republic of China, in support of their shared interest in preventing the proliferation of nuclear weapons, have agreed to work together to promote the earliest possible achievement of a multilateral, non-discriminatory, and effectively verifiable convention banning the production of fissile materials for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices.

The Joint Statements and statements by Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Vice Premier and Foreign Minister Qian, are available at 5 Dep't St. Dispatch No. 42 at 701 (Oct. 17, 1994) at http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/ERC/briefing/dispatch/index.html.

On November 1, 1994, Lynn E. Davis, Under Secretary for Arms Control and International Security Affairs, determined that it was "essential to the national security of the United States to waive" the sanctions that had previously been imposed. 59 Fed. Reg. 55,522 (Nov. 7, 1994). As a result of this waiver, "the U.S. government will no longer be required to deny licenses for exports to the entities described above or to activities of the Chinese government relating to missile development or production or affecting the development or production of electronics, space systems, or equipment, and military aircraft of Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR) Annex equipment or technology. In addition, U.S. government contracts related to MTCR Annex items no longer are prohibited with these entities." Id. at 55,523. The missile sanctions on the Pakistani entities remained in place until they expired in August 1995. See id.

F. WEAPONS OF MASS DESTRUCTION ("WMD"): GENERAL MEASURES

1. Iran-Iraq Arms Non-Proliferation Act of 1992

The Iran-Iraq Arms Non-Proliferation Act requires the imposition of sanctions on countries that transfer to Iran or Iraq any goods or technology (including dual-use items and training or information) so as to contribute knowingly and materially to those countries' efforts to acquire WMD or "destabilizing numbers and types of advanced conventional weapons." Pub. L. No. 102–484, Div. A, Title XVI, §§ 1601–08, 106 Stat. 2571 (1992), as amended Pub. L. No. 104–106, Div. A, Title XIV, § 1408(a)–(c), 110 Stat. 494 (1996); Pub. L. No. 107–228, Div. B, Title XIII, § 1308(g)(1)(C), 116 Stat. 1441 (2002).

Section 1604 of the Act sets forth mandatory procurement and export sanctions against any "person" engaged in such activities. Section 1605 sets forth both mandatory and discretionary sanctions applicable to any "country" engaged in such activities. Mandatory sanctions include: suspension of U.S. assistance, opposition to multilateral development bank assistance, suspension of co-development or co-production agreements, suspension of military and dual-use technical exchange agreements, and a prohibition of exports to the sanctioned country of any item on the U.S. Munitions List (established pursuant to § 38 of the AECA, 22 U.S.C. § 2778). In addition, the act authorized the President to exercise the authorities of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, except with respect to urgent humanitarian assistance.

Finally, § 1606 provided the President with authority to waive any sanction under §§ 1603, 1604 or 1605 if he determined and reported to Congress that the exercise of such authority "is essential to the national interest of the United States."

2. Executive Order Sanctions

a. Executive Order 12938

On November 14, 1994, President William J. Clinton issued Executive Order 12938, "Proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction." 59 Fed. Reg. 59,099 (Nov. 16, 1994). Key provisions of the executive order, declaring a national emergency and providing for sanctions in addition to those mandated by statute, are set forth below.

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.), the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.), the Arms Export Control Act, as amended (22 U.S.C. 2751 et seq.), Executive Orders Nos. 12851 and 12924, and section 301 of title 3, United States Code,

I, WILLIAM J. CLINTON, President of the United States of America, find that the proliferation of nuclear, biological, and chemical weapons ("weapons of mass destruction") and of the means of delivering such weapons, constitutes an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States, and hereby declare a national emergency to deal with that threat.

Accordingly, I hereby order:

Sec. 4. Sanctions Against Foreign Persons. (a) In addition to the sanctions imposed on foreign persons as provided in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1991 and the Chemical and Biological Weapons Control and Warfare Elimination Act of 1991, sanctions also shall be imposed on a foreign person with respect to chemical and biological weapons proliferation if the Secretary of State determines that the foreign person on or after the effective date of this order or its predecessor, Executive Order No. 12735 of November 16, 1990, knowingly and materially contributed to the efforts of any foreign country, project, or entity to use, develop, produce, stockpile, or otherwise acquire chemical or biological weapons.

Sec. 5. Sanctions Against Foreign Countries. (a) In addition to the sanctions imposed on foreign countries as provided in the Chemical and Biological Weapons Control and Warfare Elimination Act of 1991, sanctions also shall be imposed on a foreign country as specified in subsection (b) of this section, if the Secretary of State determines that the foreign country has, on or after the effective date of this order or its predecessor, Executive Order No. 12735 of November 16, 1990, (1) used chemical or biological weapons in violation of international law; (2) made substantial preparations to use chemical or biological weapons in violation of international law; or (3) developed, produced, stockpiled, or otherwise acquired chemical or biological weapons in violation of international law.
(b) The following sanctions shall be imposed on any foreign country identified in subsection (a)(1) of this section unless the Secretary of State determines, on grounds of significant foreign policy or national security, that any individual sanction should not be applied. The sanctions specified in this section may be made applicable to the countries identified in subsections (a)(2) or (a)(3) when the Secretary of State determines that such action will further the objectives of this order pertaining to proliferation. The sanctions specified in subsection (b)(2) below shall be imposed with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury.
(1) Foreign Assistance. No assistance shall be provided to that country under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, or any successor act, or the Arms Export Control Act, other than assistance that is intended to benefit the people of that country directly and that is not channeled through governmental agencies or entities of that country.

b. Executive Order 13094

On July 28, 1998, President Clinton issued Executive Order 13094, amending Executive Order 12938, effective July 29, 1998. 63 Fed. Reg. 40,803 (July 30, 1998). Executive Order 13094, excerpted below, significantly expanded the authority under Executive Order 12938 to impose sanctions against foreign entities determined to have materially contributed (or attempted to materially contribute) to efforts of a foreign country to acquire WMD (as already stated in 12938), or (additionally) the means of delivering them (i.e., missile systems or technology).

(a) Section 4 of Executive Order 12938 of November 14, 1994, is revised to read as follows:

"Sec. 4. Measures Against Foreign Persons.

(a) Determination by Secretary of State; Imposition of Measures. Except to the extent provided in section 203(b) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)), where applicable, if the Secretary of State determines that a foreign person, on or after November 16, 1990, the effective date of Executive Order 12735, the predecessor order to Executive Order 12938, has materially contributed or attempted to contribute materially to the efforts of any foreign country, project, or entity of proliferation concern to use, acquire, design, develop, produce, or stockpile weapons of mass destruction or missiles capable of delivering such weapons, the measures set forth in subsections (b), (c), and (d) of this section shall be imposed on that foreign person to the extent determined by the Secretary of State in consultation with the implementing agency and other relevant agencies. Nothing in this section is intended to preclude the imposition on that foreign person of other measures or sanctions available under this order or under other authorities.

(b) Procurement Ban. No department or agency of the United States Government may procure, or enter into any contract for the procurement of, any goods, technology, or services from any foreign person described in subsection (a) of this section.

(c) Assistance Ban. No department or agency of the United States Government may provide any assistance to any foreign person described in subsection (a) of this section, and no such foreign person shall be eligible to participate in any assistance program of the United States Government.

(d) Import Ban. The Secretary of the Treasury shall prohibit the importation into the United States of goods, technology, or services produced or provided by any foreign person described in subsection (a) of this section, other than information or informational materials within the meaning of section 203(b)(3) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1702(b)(3)).
(e) Termination. Measures pursuant to this section may be terminated against a foreign person if the Secretary of State determines that there is reliable evidence that such foreign person has ceased all activities referred to in subsection (a) of this section.
(f) Exceptions. Departments and agencies of the United States Government, acting in consultation with the Secretary of State, may, by license, regulation, order, directive, exception, or otherwise, provide for:
(I) Procurement contracts necessary to meet U.S. operational military requirements or requirements under defense production agreements; intelligence requirements; sole source suppliers, spare parts, components, routine servicing and maintenance of products for the United States Government; and medical and humanitarian items; and (II) Performance pursuant to contracts in force on the effective date of this order under appropriate circumstances."

Sanctions have been imposed under these executive orders in numerous cases since the expansion of the entity sanctions in 1998. See, e.g., 60 Fed. Reg. 42,089 (Aug. 6, 1998) and 64 Fed. Reg. 2935 (Jan. 19, 1999). On February 23, 1999, the Office of Foreign Assets Control, Department of the Treasury, issued a final rule implementing Executive Order 13094. 64 Fed. Reg. 8715 (Feb. 23, 1999).
