About This Sourcebook

Direct supervision management in jails is a focus of National Institute of Corrections (NIC) resource development and training because of its advantages for managing inmate behavior. In a direct supervision housing unit, correctional officers can interact constantly with inmates to manage their behavior. In contrast, officers in intermittent or remote surveillance jails have more difficulty identifying problem situations before they develop, because they are not in direct contact with inmates.

This resource has been developed for local officials, jail practitioners, and others interested in the direct supervision concept of jail design and management. It is the result of survey research conducted over the past 10 years.

As a directory, the sourcebook will help readers locate direct supervision facilities that they may wish to study, contact, or visit. As a data source, the document provides basic information on the design, bedspace, and other aspects of the facilities listed.

What Is Direct Supervision?

The term “direct supervision” has been used loosely to describe a variety of jail designs and management styles. Usually, jails described as operating with direct supervision share the basic element of a correctional officer having some non-barrier, face-to-face contact with the jail inmates under his/her care.

NIC’s own definition has two precise elements. For purposes of this document, a podular direct supervision housing unit is described as follows:

- The housing unit design is podular. Inmates’ cells are arranged around a common area, usually called a “dayroom.” There is no secure control booth for the supervising officer, and there are no physical barriers between the officer and the inmates. The officer may have a desk or table for paperwork, but it is in the open dayroom area.
- The inmate management style is direct supervision. An officer is stationed in the pod with the inmates throughout the officer’s duty shift. The officer moves about the pod and interacts with the inmates to manage their behavior.

Within this definition, if the officer is responsible for observing two or more housing units (pods) at the same time, supervision is not direct. If the officer moves between the housing unit and a physically separate viewing area, this also is not considered direct supervision for purposes of this directory.

Some jails included in this directory do not meet the strict “podular” design requirement within this definition. Instead, they have adapted a non-podular physical layout in ways that allow staff to engage in direct, face-to-face management of inmates.

- In some jails, the physical plant was modified to allow a different method of managing inmates. For example, cell doors may have been removed from a linear-style housing unit and an officer station placed within the unit’s open space.
- Some jails designed for podular remote surveillance have been modified by adding an officer station on the unit.
- Dormitory housing is another architectural option that can be managed by one or more officers stationed on the unit to create a direct supervision environment.

Reliability of Data

The information presented for each jail is drawn from questionnaires completed by jail staff and is, therefore, self-reported. Descriptions reflect the information provided by facility personnel, as interpreted by project staff and, in some cases, as supplemented by additional information retrieved from agency web sites. The level of detail provided may not be comparable for all facilities. NIC staff did not visit any of these jails for purposes of developing this directory. By publishing this directory NIC is in no way certifying or evaluating them as direct supervision jails or otherwise.

KEY TO FACILITY TYPES

Jails can have a combination of design styles – Jails that are not predominantly direct supervision in design or management can have an addition or section of inmate housing that uses direct supervision.

- Podular/direct supervision jails – Inmates' cells are arranged around a common area, usually called a "dayroom." An officer is stationed in the pod with the inmates. The officer moves about the pod and interacts with the inmates to manage their behavior. There is no secure control booth for the supervising officer, and there are no physical barriers between the officer and the inmates. The officer may have a desk or table for paperwork, but it is in the open dayroom area.

- ▶ If the officer supervises two or more pods at the same time, supervision is considered intermittent, not direct. If the officer moves between the housing unit and a physically separate viewing area, this also is not considered direct supervision for purposes of this directory.

- Linear/intermittent supervision jails – Includes jails with cells arranged along the sides of a cell block. Officers come into the housing unit on scheduled rounds or as needed to interact with the inmates.

- ▶ Linear-style jails can be operated as direct supervision if an officer is permanently stationed within the cell block.

- Podular/remote supervision jails – Includes jails that have a podular design with cells around a dayroom, but no officer is permanently stationed inside the pod. Indirect supervision is provided through remote monitoring at a console.

- ▶ An officer may also provide intermittent direct supervision (officers come into the pods on scheduled rounds or as needed to interact with the inmates), but if an officer is not posted inside the pod, this is not considered direct supervision for purposes of this directory.

Research for the Third Edition

This 2006 sourcebook updates directories NIC published in 1995 and 2001 to provide access to information on direct supervision jails. Agencies and jails listed in the 2001 edition were invited to review and provide corrections to their facility profiles, and additional research identified many other new direct supervision jails.

1995 Edition:	199 direct supervision jails listed
2001 Edition:	293 jails listed	—	94 new entries
2006 Edition:	349 jails listed	—	90 new entries

The growing number of listed jails suggests that direct supervision continues to be adopted as a design style and management philosophy in large and small jurisdictions across the United States.

NIC cannot claim to verify that all currently valid direct supervision jails have been included in this directory. In fact, some probable direct supervision facilities were invited to provide information but did not do so within the time frame of the research.

The project staff and the NIC Jails Division would like to thank the agency staff who responded to our request for reviews and information about new jail facilities. We appreciate your help and your willingness to share with your colleagues in other locations.

Information Included About Each Jail

The published profile of each jail includes the following basic information about the jail's operating authority and its physical plant:

- The facility's name,
- Its operating authority (such as a county sheriff's office, a city corrections department, or a regional jail authority),
- Contact information, including a web site link if located,
- The year the jail opened,
- The operating status, including construction status if applicable, and
- The elevation. (Within this directory, low-rise = one to two stories; mid-rise = three to four stories; high-rise = five or more stories).

The physical design of each facility is an important aspect of direct supervision jails. This directory distinguishes between three categories of jails:

- Podular/direct supervision jails — Includes jails that are designed, built, and operated as podular direct supervision facilities or in which direct supervision is the predominant inmate management style.
- Jails converted to direct supervision — Includes jails that were not designed for direct supervision but, through physical plant and/or operational changes, use direct supervision in a major portion of the facility. A brief description of the conversion method is provided when available.
- Jails with a combination of design styles — Includes jails that are not predominantly direct supervision in design or management but have an addition or section of inmate housing that uses direct supervision. Profiles of these facilities indicate what populations are housed in direct supervision units when this information is available.

Details are also reported about inmate housing, with emphasis on direct supervision units:

- The largest direct supervision pod size, and the maximum number of inmates supervised by a single correctional officer in direct supervision,
- The number of beds designated for disciplinary or high-security housing in a predominantly direct supervision facility,
- A description of any dormitory-style, direct supervision housing, and
- A summary of any non-direct supervision housing in the facility, in predominantly direct supervision jails.

How This Sourcebook is Organized

Jail profiles on the following pages are presented by state. Within each state, they are listed in alphabetic order by county or other operating authority. For larger jail systems with more than one direct supervision facility, the jails are listed in alphabetic order by facility name. A list of jail entries appears on the following pages.

Three indexes appear in the back of the directory:

- Jails converted to direct supervision (includes jails with a partial conversion to direct supervision),
- Jails with a combination of design styles, and
- All listed jails.
