

PRESERVING HISTORY ONE PERSON AT A TIME

As one of the world's foremost authorities on Holocaust history, the Museum depends on its collection of artifacts, documents, photographs, films, and oral testimonies to teach the lessons of humanity's greatest crime and to stand as evidence of what happened for ages to come.

It is crucial that the Museum rescue and preserve this material evidence while there is still time—before the survivors are gone and their personal histories lost forever. To accomplish this, the Museum needs your help.

The Museum seeks original artifacts from survivors (or their heirs)—Jewish and non-Jewish—who were displaced, persecuted, or discriminated against by the Nazis and their collaborators between 1933 and 1945, as well as from other eyewitnesses to these events. This includes materials relating to the immediate postwar era, life in the displaced persons camps, and emigration from Europe.

The Museum also seeks to expand its Registry of Holocaust Survivors to ensure that the names of survivors are preserved in the historical record and are available to help survivors and their families trace missing relatives and friends.

Only together can we safeguard the memory of the Holocaust for all time.
