"If your not going to do right by the American public and protect the Open Internet with strong Network Neutrality rules at the very least block further consolidation for media companies. I'd like to know how allowing Comcast to merge with NBC Universal benefits ordinary Americans like myself. Also considering the AOL Time Warner merger (AOL was a service provider and Time Warner Inc., an entertainment company) ended in disaster – the merger didn't even last the end of the decade and Time Warner Inc., even spun off service provider Time Warner Cable into an independent company why is allowing a service provider like Comcast to merge with an entertainment company a good idea. Today President Obama's Federal Communications Commission betrayed the fundamental principle of net neutrality and sold us out to AT&T, Verizon and Comcast. This is the culmination of a long struggle, and it's important we discuss frankly what led to this point. So this will be a longer e-mail than we traditionally send, with some recommended action items at the end. Despite what you may have read in the headlines, the rules passed by the FCC today amount to nothing more than a cynical ploy by Democrats to claim a victory on net neutrality while actually caving on real protections for consumers. Make no mistake, AT&T lobbyists pre-approved this proposal, which means consumers lost and Big Telecom won. Net neutrality is a principle that says that Internet users, not Internet service providers (ISPs), should be in control. It ensures that Internet service providers can't speed up, slow down, or block Web content based on its source, ownership, or destination. Yet today the FCC, let by Obama-appointed Julius Genachowski and cheered on by the White House, voted to adopt rules that will enshrine in federal regulations for the first time the ability of AT&T, Comcast, Verizon and other ISPs to discriminate between sources and types of content. And despite the fact that there is only one Internet, the rules also largely exempt cell phones and wireless devices from what meager protections the rules afford. It's no exaggeration to say that this decision marks the beginning of the end for the Internet as we know it. Senator Al Franken laid out what's at stake with this ruling, saying: "The FCC's action today is simply inadequate to protect consumers or preserve the free and open Internet. I am particularly disappointed to learn that the order will not specifically ban paid prioritization, allowing big companies to pay for a fast lane on the Internet and abandoning the foundation of net neutrality. The rule also contains almost no protections for mobile broadband service, remaining silent on the blocking of content, applications, and devices. Wireless technology is the future of the Internet, and for many rural Minnesotans, it's often the only choice for broadband."

Rather, we need more diversity in media. The "Citizens United" decision, the FCC ruling regarding [not] "Net Neutrality" are extremely troubling because they threaten our democracy. We've got to stop handing more power to huge corporations. We are supposed to encourage democracy, not oligarchy. Please act in the public interest (Yes, I know what Colin Powell's son former FCC chair said about the "public interest"). You've got to do much better by the people of the USA."
