The availability and quantity of science and technology information calls for efficient and effective management of information to retrieve the right information, research and advice for defense enterprises. To meet this goal, quality, timeliness and cost savings must be factored into such an enhanced delivery system.

Join your colleagues for a discussion with Dominic Davies, a Knowledge Management and Exploitation team leader at DSTL on the range and utility of information sources used to support their scientists and technologists. He will give examples of information products created by his team and demonstrate typical strategies and analysis techniques for keeping researchers current in their field.

Dominic Davies

Dominic Davies received his Ph.D. in Chemistry in 1998 from the University of Essex for his work on the effect of pressure on molecular motion in the solid state. He also worked at the Centre for Phosphor and Display Materials at the University of Greenwich on a DARPA funded advanced displays program.

In 2002, Davies joined the UK Defence Science and Technology Laboratory (DSTL) as a member of the Knowledge Agent team. In recognition of its work, this team was awarded the Best Information Team in the Public Sector Award at the International Information Industry Awards 2003. In 2009, he took over as the team leader for one of the four Knowledge Management and Exploitation Teams across DSTL. Also in the fall of 2009, Davies was elected to act as the Chair of the NATO Information Management Committee, and in 2010, he was asked to be the Group Leader for the Knowledge Management and Exploitation Group, part of the Knowledge and Information Services Department.
