Note: the structure outlined in this document is not an official proposal by the United States.

Introduction

During the May 5-9, 2003 meeting of the Trilateral Steering Committee for Economic Classification (TSC), Canada, Mexico and the U.S. agreed to fundamental conceptual objectives and guidelines for the creation of a demand-based aggregation structure for NAPCS (see Discussion Paper 1 under NAPCS Discussion Papers link on the NAPCS Home Page). The NAPCS structure illustration presented here was designed to help facilitate the translation of these concepts into form by: (1) providing a considered and comprehensive illustration regarding the possible architecture of a demand-based aggregation structure for products that is consistent with the agreed-to NAPCS structure objectives and guidelines and (2) defining the upper levels of the NAPCS demand-based hierarchy at a level of detail sufficient to (a) identify the appropriate placement of broad categories of goods and services and (b) allow the development of detailed aggregation structures for service products underneath the top-level NAPCS aggregates for services. In general, I suggest that the upper levels of aggregation in the NAPCS structure should conform best with the product detail collected on expenditure surveys, while the lowest levels of aggregation, especially the detailed NAPCS products, should work best for classifying detailed product data available from suppliers. While I believe the illustration covers the overwhelming value of products that must be accounted for and placed in the final NAPCS structure, I make no pretense that the structure is anything but suggestive.

Guidelines and Considerations Underlying this Illustration

The dominant conceptual driver behind the illustration is the fundamental principle that all products should be classified according to their primary use and according to how they are used in relationship to each other. Having applied this fundamental principle, the resulting structure contains product groups that fall naturally into one of three class of customer categories:

1. Overwhelmingly purchased by households/persons
2. Overwhelmingly purchased by businesses, including institutions and government
3. Primary class of consumer is not overwhelming or clear.

However, the structure is based on how products are used, not on the class of customer that purchases them. And, it neither assumes nor requires data providers to delineate product revenues by class of customer beyond that stated in NAPCS product lists or already provided in known existing data collections. As such, the structure is entirely consistent with the principle the TSC previously in this area: “NAPCS structure should not be exclusively based on class of customer or final/intermediate demand grouping categories but those grouping categories are acceptable when appropriate for any particular detailed product area.”

At the top-level, the structure contains 45 product groups, with product group 45 devoted to public administration products. While product groups numbered 1-24 in the structure contain most all products primarily consumed for household/personal uses, it is important to note that many of these same products are heavily (perhaps primarily) purchased by businesses (e.g. prepared meals and beverage products in 1.2.1 and 1.2.2, travel and lodging products in 16.1 and 16.2, and health care products in 19.1 – 19.4). Similarly, while product groups numbered 25-45 in the structure contain most products that are primarily consumed for business uses, some of the products contained here are also heavily consumed and purchased by persons/households. For example, single-family home construction, maintenance and repair construction, and building materials and supplies are also included here (under product class 25.1.2, Construction of Buildings) because all these product types are used in close association with construction and it is not possible to comparably subdivide these product types between person/household uses and businesses uses. Overall, the products in Groups 25-44 are overwhelmingly used as inputs to production processes, and I arranged them according to a modified KLEMS (capital, labor, energy, materials, and services) configuration commonly found in the production theory literature. Specifically, because empirical studies indicate that capital, energy, and utilities are used as complements in production, I used a KELMS structure, except where specific service products were used in close association with the KELM components of the structure.

In creating the structure, I examined and borrowed from existing classification materials, even if I did not use the same terminology. I also wrestled constantly with the issue of how best (especially at what level of aggregation) to integrate goods and services used in close association with each other to satisfy a common need. In some cases, I judged that this integration could be successively achieved at a fairly low-level of aggregation; while in others I concluded would be best achieved by integrating at a higher level of aggregation. For example, under Product Sub-Group 25.1, Construction and Related Products, I first sought to integrate construction with architecture, urban planning, and engineering services, etc. at the product class level under non-building construction (25.1.1) and at the residential and nonresidential levels under building construction (25.1.2). Ultimately, however, I opted to integrate construction with these related product areas at the product subgroup level 25.1.
