Dear Ms. Espinel:

Cutting off Internet access in response copyright infringement and do more than punish the accused. Other innocent users of the same access point will also be punished. This is against the American creed of innocent until proven guilty.

Internet users communications should be treated as private messages and not be open to inspection.

Digital locks serve no purpose except to make one a law breaker. If a person has a legal use to a copyright item a lock is meaningless as the person should have the right to copy it. If the person does not have legal use of the item then they are already breaking the law and the lock is again meaningless.

Sincerely,
Robert deJarnette
