Foreword

Message from the Administrator
NASA Headquarters Honor/Awards

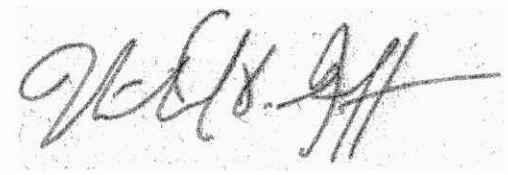

We are blessed at NASA to have the attributes the scholar James Q. Wilson described in his study of high performance organizations infused with a strong sense of mission. In such organizations, wrote Wilson, "people did not always have to be told what to do; they knew what to do, and what is more important, wanted to do it well."

Because NASA has so many talented people who fit this description, it is always a happy chore to recognize a select number of our colleagues for exemplary contributions to NASA's missions. Congratulations to everyone being honored today for managerial and technical excellence and outstanding performance on demanding projects during the past year.

In 2006, the space shuttle got back to work building the International Space Station. Looking forward, the agency began developing our next generation of spacecraft and formulated plans for a permanent lunar outpost. In a memorable year for space science, NASA missions provided new evidence of water on Mars, discovered erupting geysers on Saturn's moon Enceladus, sent the first ever probe toward Pluto, brought back dust from a comet and launched new instruments to study the sun and the weather on Earth. The agency also restructured our aeronautics research portfolio to return to long-term, cutting-edge, fundamental research. All of these accomplishments are the result of individuals and teams striving to achieve the highest level of performance.

To all those being honored today for your stand out work, you have my sincere gratitude and admiration.

Michael D. Griffin
Administrator
