

Sabrina M. Segal

Sabrina M. Segal is currently Counselor to the Inspector General and Chief Investigator at the United States International Trade Commission. She provides independent legal guidance to the Inspector General and conducts inspections, evaluations, and criminal investigations. Prior to her position with USITC, Ms. Segal was an Attorney Advisor at the United States Agency for International Development where she specialized in government ethics, national security, and technology. While at USAID, Ms. Segal traveled to the Middle East, Africa, and other developing regions in support of U.S. Government foreign assistance efforts.

Ms. Segal has been frequently recognized for her outstanding work and in 2010 was honored with an inaugural Causey Award, given by Federal News Radio, recognizing her work with cloud computing and new media implementation. She was also named one of the Federal Bar Association's 2010 Younger Federal Lawyers of the year. In addition to her regular duties, Ms. Segal performs pro bono work, serves as the Commission pro bono coordinator, and is the Commission representative to the Interagency Pro Bono Working group.

Ms. Segal began her federal career as a Presidential Management Fellow at the Department of State in 2005. Prior to becoming a Fed, she worked in the private sector for companies including Fidelity Investments, Wired.com, and Walt Disney World. She is a member of the Florida Bar, received her J.D. and a Masters of Intellectual Property, Commerce, and Technology from the University of New Hampshire School of Law, formerly Franklin Pierce Law Center, and her B.S. in Communication with a focus on technology from Boston University. She and her husband live in Washington, DC and in her spare time she enjoys cycling, knitting, and traveling to New York City to watch her sister in off- off- off- Broadway plays.
