LTG THOMAS S. VANDAL

FOREWORD FROM THE EIGHTH ARMY COMMANDING GENERAL

“As we make this historic transition, we will do so without degrading our ability to ‘Fight Tonight’. With an immediate and credible threat just to our north we can’t afford to drop our guard.”

Pacific Victors,

This is an exciting time to be a member of Eighth Army as the Republic of Korea-U.S. Alliance moves to a future that ensures we are postured to continue our enduring legacy of service here in South Korea.

Over the next few years more than 29,000 personnel and family members are scheduled to relocate to Camp Humphreys as part of a consolidation of U.S. forces on the Korean Peninsula. In preparation for the relocation, more than $10.7 billion has been spent to transform Camp Humphreys into a modern Army community with access to a wide array of services and support. Several units have already made the move, including a forward headquarters element from Eighth Army that relocated in June 2016.

The cell will continue to grow leading up to the relocation of the main body of Eighth Army in 2017 and take on more responsibility as additional personnel arrive.

As we make this historic transition, we will do so without degrading our ability to “Fight Tonight”. With an immediate and credible threat just to our north we can’t afford to drop our guard. In addition to maintaining readiness, we must take care of our uniformed and civilian workforce including our talented Korean national employees.

Managers and supervisors will keep open lines of communication with their employees throughout the relocation process to maximize transparency. While these changes will inevitably require us all to go through some growing pains and will require us to be flexible, I promise you they are necessary for our transformation and will make Eighth Army and the Alliance stronger.

I encourage you to take time to read through the rest of this special Transformation and Relocation edition of the ROK Steady to get more information about the move and how you and family can prepare for success.

Pacific Victors!
Katchi Kapsida!

CSM RICHARD E. MERRITT

FOREWORD FROM THE EIGHTH ARMY COMMAND SERGEANT MAJOR

Pacific Victors,

At the end of every exercise, I pull leaders aside and remind them that their mission isn't complete just because the commanding general calls ENDEX. We can't just pack up and head to the house; we have to conduct proper recovery operations. Just like the exercise itself, recovery is a critical part of the mission.

That also applies during our transition to Camp Humphreys. As Eighth Army and our subordinate commands prepare to pack up and move in the coming weeks and months we must ensure that all our Soldiers understand that moving is a mission.

We serve in a complex forward-deployed operating environment with a very real threat to the North. The ability to "Fight Tonight" means staying ready to fight every night – even while we're moving. While we'll do our best to balance our mission with our quality of life, the enemy won't care whether we've had time off to settle in or go check out the new pool.

We are the stewards of millions of dollars in critical equipment, furniture and government resources. We must maintain accountability and safety at all times.

Finally, we must remain sensitive to our Korean teammates and neighbors whose lives and livelihoods will be affected by our move.

They have been tremendous supporters of our Soldiers and our mission for decades.

Let's take time to show them the gratitude and respect they deserve.

Whether we are merely planning for this mission, or among those who will physically make the move, we have a huge responsibility.

With us, we'll move a legacy of service in the Republic of Korea that spans seven decades.

Our move will begin a new chapter in the history of the ROK-U.S. Alliance.

Writing history is not something we do in our spare time between missions. It is the mission.

Let's make it the best we can.

"Writing history is not something we do in our spare time between missions. It is the mission. "

Katchi Kapshida!

From the USAG Humphreys commander: Your new home is almost ready

Col. Joseph C. Holland
USAG Humphreys Commander

In 2016 U.S. Army Garrison Humphreys continues to grow and change in remarkable ways. This issue of the ROK Steady magazine brings you up to date on our construction projects and the challenges we face now and in the future as we transform it into the premier military installation in the Pacific region.

I am extremely proud of the dedication, hard work and flexibility our community demonstrates every day.

Despite the challenges that go with living and working amidst the largest construction project in Department of Defense, the garrison staff continues to provide installation management support and our community shows an even-tempered, “Can Do” attitude every day that is inspirational.

During the last 12 months we’ve opened many new facilities and expanded the garrison’s footprint—we’re now nearly twice the size we were one year ago.

Additionally, we have new rotational units on post who live and work in our newest facilities.

In the next few years, when the transformation of Camp Humphreys from a small airfield to the home of most Army units in Korea is complete, we will have first-class facilities which will enhance our combat readiness and provide excellent support to our community.

We’re doing all of this while remaining ready to “Fight Tonight.”

As we move into the future, we do so with the support of our partners in U.S. Forces Korea, Eighth Army, the 2nd ROK-U.S. Combined Division and the Republic of Korea Army.

Thanks to all of our partners, military and civilian, for their continued support during this challenging time.

Our success is due in large part to the great cooperation and collaboration of our partners and allies.

Finally, we have the deepest gratitude for our friends in the Korean community.

For more than 65 years, the Republic of Korea and the United States of America have been allies, partners and friends. We have bled together in war and, in peace, have built a modern democracy that is the envy of the world.

This relationship, founded on friendship and mutual respect is the key to our long-standing relationship and will guide us into the future.

From the USAG Yongsan commander: Support in Area II will continue

Col. J. Scott Peterson

USAG Yongsan and Area II Commander

This summer marks the start of the transformation and relocation of units from Area II and Yongsan to U.S. Army Garrison Humphreys.

It also highlights the historic beginning of the long process to collapse our current footprint and restructure ourselves to support the Area II Community.

The Yongsan Collapse Plan is a complex and evolving plan which involves close coordination with several military organizations and community stakeholders to ensure we provide the right level of services for the population.

As we collapse and restructure, our priority is still maintaining readiness. We will do this by implementing a comprehensive plan that ensures our operational and functional processes remain efficient and effective.

Over the next few years and as tenant units relocate, the population in Area II will gradually decrease from nearly 22,500 to 3,200. In the meantime, we will support the Combined Forces Command residual and support a population of about 13,500.

Timing remains 'conditions based', meaning the transfer of real property and real estate is postponed indefinitely. Until then, CFC Headquarters will remain in Yongsan.

We will eventually shrink to about 276 acres. We will vacate and close nearly 1,200 facilities, downsize our housing areas, prepare parcels for turn-over to the South Korean government, divest excess facilities, build new or renovate existing facilities and infrastructure necessary to support the CFC and Yongsan Residuals.

In the coming months, U.S. Forces Korea and Installation Management Command along with the South Korean government will participate in the CFC planning charrette where we will address the requirements we need to maintain an effective support structure for the CFC Residual.

It is critical that we have a dedicated staff to provide the necessary services to support Area II. As part of the Base Collapse Plan, the garrison will also go through an internal restructuring and look for cost-saving opportunities to ensure we maintain the right balance of leaders and employees.

This is an exciting and historic period as we transform our current footprint, prepare for the future, and move the majority of our forces to USAG Humphreys.

We will see some dramatic changes in Area II in the next few years, but rest assured, USAG Yongsan is committed to providing garrison services and support throughout the transformation process.

USAG-Y Continued Support At a Glance

Below is a list of some of the essential services USAG Yongsan will continue to provide to Area II. As the supported population decreases, USAGY will continue to reevaluate garrison services to ensure they are proportionate to the population.

- Emergency Services
- Communications Services
- FMWR programs (eventually scaled down)
- Religious services (eventually scaled down)
- Security functions
- DoDEA Schools (eventually scaled down)
- Hospital (will move to USAG Humphreys)
- Commissary (eventually scaled down)
- PX (eventually scaled to a shoppette)
- Gas station
- All utility services
- Housing services (limited)

Maintaining Readiness

By Tim Oberle

Eighth Army Public Affairs

With the majority of U.S. military personnel in South Korea scheduled to relocate south of Seoul over the next few years, U.S. Forces Korea and Eighth Army have made it a priority to maintain readiness throughout the transition.

Eighth Army Commanding General, Lt. Gen. Thomas Vandal, has been at the forefront of the transformation effort, and continually stresses the importance of readiness.

“The operating environment here on the Korean Peninsula dictates that we maintain a high level of readiness at all times,” Vandal said. “The unpredictable nature of the Kim regime, coupled with a pattern of recent provocations, poses an immediate and credible threat to the entire region.

To maintain an effective deterrent to future aggression and provocations, it is imperative that we maintain a strong readiness posture.”

ROC Drills

In anticipation of the move, U.S. Forces Korea and Eighth Army have worked side-by-side with senior leaders from South Korea to lay down the groundwork for transition. Over the last few years they have hosted a series of rehearsal of concept drills to synchronize their efforts.

“The ROC Drills provide an opportunity to familiarize both U.S. and South Korean senior leaders with the concept for transformation, the dynamic mission requirements here in Korea and establish a common operating picture from an operational and mission command perspective,” said Vandal. “During each ROC Drill, we walk them through the transformation process and conduct an aerial tour of Camp Humphreys to make sure everyone is on the same page.”

Forward Headquarters Element

Another action Eighth Army has implemented to prevent a reduction in readiness took place in June 2016 when more than 100 Eighth Army personnel relocated to Camp Humphreys to establish a forward headquarters element.

The forward element marks a major milestone in the historic re-stationing effort and will set the conditions for the bulk of moves to occur in 2017 and 2018.

The key responsibilities of the forward element include meeting with local civic leaders in the Pyeongtaek area, overseeing the final aspects of the construction process, maintaining rear-area operation situational awareness, serving as a mission command node for noncombatant evacuation operation coordination and overseeing reception, staging, onward movement and integration activities.

The forward element will continue to grow, leading up to the relocation of the Eighth Army main body in 2017.

Readiness through Redundancy

Since 2013, Eighth Army has integrated fully-manned rotational units under the Army’s Regionally Aligned Forces initiative. The presence of rotational forces on the peninsula provides redundancy in critical support areas, which allows increased flexibility during the move.

“The capacity of RAF units to seamlessly integrate into our existing operational tempo and fill specific mission sets provides a scalable, mission-capable redundancy that has reinforced our readiness posture,” said Vandal. “Conducting routine rotations also provides a great opportunity for Eighth Army to exercise critical wartime functions such as reception, staging, onward movement and integration, which in-turn increases our readiness.”

during Transformation

Minimize Disruption

Leading up to the decision to relocate, ROK and U.S. leaders established conditions, which must be met, in order for critical capabilities to relocate. Throughout the move senior leaders will review these conditions-based requirements to make sure the necessary personnel and infrastructure are in place prior to each unit's re-stationing.

U.S. Forces Korea leaders have also set conditions for the requisite infrastructure that must be in place to maintain quality of life and minimize disruption to the military community throughout the move. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers Far East District has been hard at work to ensure the necessary pieces are in place turning Camp Humphreys into a modern Army garrison with all of the amenities of a flagship installation back in the U.S. Military personnel and Family members requiring services that aren't available on post during the transition will be directed to an off-post entity that can help them meet their needs.

Since the Korean War, ROK and U.S. Civilian employees have been a vital part of the workforce and have greatly strengthened the Alliance. As the transition occurs U.S. Forces Korea remains committed to making every effort to ensure they are taken care of in return.

"The primary goal of U.S. Forces Korea during transformation is an orderly transfer of personnel using transparent, formal, and consistent processes while still maintaining mission readiness," Vandal explained in a May 2016 memorandum to the U.S. Forces Korea civilian workforce. "To aid this process, civilian human resource guidance will be published at the earliest convenience (and) commands (will) create human capital plans to relocate to their new duty location. Together they will provide civilian employees with the information they need to make informed decisions about their future."

During this time, "it is imperative that lines of communication between employees and supervisors remain open," he continued. "I encourage all supervisors to inform employees of timelines and options available during the relocation process. I also encourage employees to communicate their intent to relocate with their chain of command. This communication between supervisors and employees will maintain the strength of our workforce."

"We will (also) be conducting a series of town hall meetings to discuss concerns and maintain dialogue. Maintaining open and transparent communication while planning and executing the workforce relocation will provide stability for our civilian personnel, while simultaneously maintaining mission readiness. Together, we will succeed in our force's relocation."

"This is something we want to do regularly...because at the end of the day this is about being as transparent as we possibly can to ensure that everyone knows what the timelines are," Vandal explained.

U.S. Forces Korea commander Gen. Vincent Brooks echoed similar sentiments in a May 2016 press release.

"We are fully committed to taking care of our civilian workforce, just like they've taken care of us," Brooks said. "Our dedicated employees are an integral part of our team and contribute greatly to the strength and continued success of our alliance. As such, we remain committed to an open dialogue throughout this entire transformation process."

Eighth Army has also established a Transformation and Relocation website that is accessible through the U.S. Army Garrison Yongsan application. The website will provide regular transformation updates to the community and contains a welcome guide that walks you through the re-stationing process, a timeline of major headquarters movements, frequently asked questions and a page dedicated to the Korean National workforce that is in Hangul.

Bruce Skillin, the director for human resources for U.S. Forces Korea, addresses American Forces Network Yongsan discussing how transformation and relocation affects civilian employees.

USFK Public Affairs Office

Transformation is in full swing for U.S. forces on the Korean peninsula. As part of two major relocation plans agreed upon by South Korea and the U.S., the Yongsan Relocation Plan and the Land Partnership Plan, thousands of personnel will relocate to Pyeongtaek, Gyeonggi Province.

The YRP relocates personnel from Yongsan Garrison in central Seoul, moving everything including the U.S. Forces Korea and Eighth Army headquarters to Pyeongtaek. The LPP redeploys the ROK-U.S. Combined Division, now stationed north of Seoul, to Pyeongtaek.

As both civilian and military personnel prepare to make the big move, USFK has recently shifted its emphasis to communicating with the workforce.

According to Eighth Army Commanding General, Lt. Gen. Thomas S. Vandal, the command will strive to maintain “open and transparent communication” with both the military and civilian workforce through a series of town halls, radio shows, public service announcements and a transformation website.

A key strategy to this plan is providing comprehensive civilian human resource guidance. Another key component, said Vandal, will be command communication and planning.

“Commands are also creating human capital plans to relocate to their new duty location,” said Vandal. “Together they will provide civilian employees with the information they need to make informed decisions about their future.”

Vandal encouraged supervisors to inform employees of timelines and options available during the relocation process.

Bruce Skillin, director for human resources for USFK, recently took to the airwaves on American Forces Network’s Pen-wide Show to talk about how the move to Camp Humphreys will affect civilian employees.

During the show Skillin addressed one of the most frequently asked questions by civilian employees working in Seoul: “will I have to relocate?”

“Not right away,” said Skillin. “There will be some residual of-fices/functions remaining in Yongsan for many more years.”

Skillin said, “It is imperative that lines of communication be-tween employees and supervisors remain open during transforma-tion. Employees should ask their supervisors what is happening with their jobs. Supervisors should be communicating command plans to their employees.”

Korean and U.S. employees alike are encouraged to ‘join in the conversation’ by attending town halls, using social media platforms through the transformation website and asking direct questions to their supervisors.

“We are fully committed to taking care of our civilian work-force, just like they’ve taken care of us,” said Gen. Vincent K. Brooks, commander, USFK in a news release last month. “Our dedicated employees are an integral part of our team and contrib-ute greatly to the strength and continued success of our Alliance. As such, we remain committed to an open dialogue throughtout this entire transformation process.”
