NRC Request for Additional Information: Are the SG channel heads in the U.S. Fleet from Creusot Forge manufactured from an ingot with controlled solidification (or similar process)? If not, what process was used and is there reason to suspect high levels of carbon in these components?

Response:

Many of the SG channel heads in the U.S. fleet by Creusot Forge were manufactured by hot forming of a forged blank from a conventional ingot and some from LSD (directed solidification) ingots.

AREVA is in the process of reviewing documents to confirm which channel heads in the U.S. fleet were formed from each type of ingot. This activity will be complete in another three to four weeks, at which time we can provide you a precise answer.

In Reference 1, AREVA NP Inc. (AREVA) provided an Attachment A which listed U.S. nuclear power plants that contain components fabricated with forgings that were ordered from Creusot Forge (CF). These components were manufactured by multiple fabricators, one of which was AREVA. Please be aware that the number of forgings in the list may not match the actual number of forgings used by the fabricator. The actual number used is still being verified. AREVA will provide a revision to Attachment A, if it is deemed necessary.

Also note that some of the components referenced in the table are not yet installed in the plant or are associated with a cancelled project.
